Well, Sir, at the head of every day's proceedings are attached comments of this character. I need not say to your Honor that, in our opinion, they do great injustice to the character, the manner and the spirit of Mr. Moulton upon the stand; and the occasion justifies me in saying that for propriety of demeanor, for suavity and gentlemanly conduct, for a high degree of intelligence in his conception of and answers to questions, no gentleman under my observation has ever sustained an examination of the length and severity to which Mr. Moulton was subjected with more credit and honor, both to his heart and his mind, and I am sure that your Honor will agree in that remark. And I am also quite sure, Sir, that whatever idea in other respects our friends upon the other side may entertain in regard to Mr. Moulton, they do not participate in these ungenerous, and uncandid, and severe criticisms upon his manner and mode of giving his testimony. Now, if your Honor please, I do not dispute the right of THE TRIBUNE, or any other member of the press, in its capacity as a public journal, to express whatever ideas and criticisms it may choose to publish in regard to counsel, or witnesses or Court. They have the utmost freedom in that respect, and, so far as I am concerned, I am quite free to admit that their comments, unfavorable to myself, are, most probably, entirely accurate and just. But when those comments, those private opinions of THE TRIBUNE, not only with regard to the proceedings in this court-room, but to transactions which transpired during the recess of the Court, are affixed to its report of the trial, ushered to the public under the official sanction of this Court, we are justified, I think, in asking from your Honor a disclaimer of that official character, and we do ask it.

Judge Neilson—I regret that those causes of criticism should arise, and will communicate with the editor of THE TRIBUNE upon the subject, in reference to the future publications, which I hope may be rendered satisfactory. Will you proceed now, Mr. Fullerton?

MR. EVARTS ON NEWSPAPER CRITICISM.

Mr. Evarts—I may, perhaps, be permitted to say a word, if your Honor please. Whatever either my learned associates or myself may have to say in regard to Mr. Moulton as a witness will be said at the proper stage of the cause, and under the proper responsibility of counsel, and for a legitimate purpose; and we do not sympathize with any criticisms of witnesses or of counsel on one side or the other in the trial of the cause. We, the counsel, are not on trial, nor have we exposed ourselves voluntarily to exhibition. We are here in the discharge, on one side and the other, of responsible, difficult, solemn duties; and the mere fact that, as all proceedings in Court are public, there is a crowd here, and as the interest of the community centers upon this trial, the press is largely and properly interested in disseminating the facts of the trial throughout the country, does not, in our judgment, expose any of us to the criticism that belongs to actors on the stage from men who pay for tickets to be amused at the exhibition.

Judge Neilson—Proceed Mr. Fullerton.

MR. WOODRUFF'S TESTIMONY RESUMED.

Franklin Woodruff was then recalled and examined by Mr. Fullerton.

Q. I recall your attention to an interview between yourself, Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tracy, which took place in the Fall of '72 at Mr. Tracy's office, and ask you what then and there occurred? A. I called at Mr. Tracy's office, with Mr. Moulton, I think it was about half-past eight o'clock in the morning, for the purpose of Mr. Moulton's relating to Mr. Tracy the history of this scandal case.

Mr. Evarts—No matter what the purpose was. What occurred between you? A. Well, Mr. Moulton immediately—

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton, keep your witness within the line.

The Witness—Mr. Moulton immediately proceeded to tell Gen. Tracy all about the case.

Q. What did he tell him—just repeat it now? A. And his connection with the case. He told him that the essential points of this Woodhull scandal were true. He told him of what he had been doing in regard to the case, commencing back at the time when he went to Mr. Beecher—when he went for Mr. Beecher on the prayer meeting evening, and told him what Mr. Beecher had done—told him what he had done—

Mr. Evarts—State to us what he told him.

Judge Neilson—Get your witness to the point, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—I want you to state what Mr. Moulton said. Do not, please, state that he told you about such a thing, but tell us what he said in regard to that thing—the substance of it; of course you cannot repeat the words? A. Well, he told Gen. Tracy, as I have stated, that the essential points of his story, as published in the paper, were true; and he told him that he went for Mr. Beecher on a certain evening; that Mr. Beecher went to his house, and from there to Mrs. Tilton's. He told Gen. Tracy that Mrs. Tilton had written a confession, and afterwards a retraction; and he told Gen. Tracy what he had done—how he had—

Q. What did he say he had done? A. He told him that he had striven to keep the thing covered up—keep the whole story covered up—and that, so far, he had been able to; but now the story was published by the Woodhull-Claffin paper. He told him that I was very urgent, that he should consult Gen. Tracy as counsel, that what he might do should be done wisely; that I feared—or at least I expected—that he would have to make some statement, and that if he did so, it was necessary to do it under the advice of counsel; and he had been asked, he told Gen. Tracy, to deny the story.

Q. How is that; repeat that? A. He told Gen. Tracy that he had been asked to deny the story in a public card; that I had objected and protested against it, and that he was not willing to do it. General Tracy said in reply—

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I object to what Gen. Tracy said being given in evidence by this witness.

Judge Neilson—It is a part of the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—This witness has now said—as it now stands, this witness has made Gen. Tracy his counsel.

Judge Neilson—He did not say—

Mr. Evarts—But, your Honor, in these last three words of the witness, he has so said, as we regard it.

Judge Neilson—I think we must take it all, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception to this specifically, and to anything from Gen. Tracy.

The Witness—I objected to Mr. Moulton making any statement in a public card.

Q. What did you say? A. I said that I would protest against; that I would not, as he was a partner of mine—that I would not allow it; that I thought it would be very wrong to make any such statement of a story that he knew was true—deny it in a public card. Gen. Tracy replied that he did not recommend lying, but he thought in some cases—in this case particularly—that a man would be justified in denying that story; and I replied to Gen. Tracy that for half of Brooklyn I would not have Mr. Moulton or any other gentleman come out in a public denial with a written card. And Gen. Tracy spoke and says: "Can't Moulton and Tilton go to Europe for one or two years?" I said no, that could not be done; Mr. Robinson, the other partner, was in Europe, and that would be utterly impossible. Then Mr. Moulton—or, at least, Mr. Moulton said that he had observed silence, and he thought that was the only thing to do. I concurred in that, and Gen. Tracy said that silence was the best for all parties—to cover it up—best for all interests. That was the sum and substance, pretty much, of the conversation that morning. And then we met again, three or four days after, at Moulton's house in Remsen street.

Q. Now, give us that?

Mr. Evarts—That has not been brought in.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh yes; it is.

Mr. Evarts—Not with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly it has. [To the witness:] Go on.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception.

The Witness—We met at Mr. Moulton's house—it was a Sunday evening after our conversation—by appointment; Mr. Tilton was there, Mr. Moulton was there, and I was there, and Gen. Tracy came there; we all went up into Mr. Moulton's study in the top story of the house, and there Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton told Gen. Tracy about the case, and, in addition to what Mr. Moulton said, showed Gen. Tracy the letter of contrition, and Gen. Tracy read it; but Mr. Tilton had expressed an unwillingness to have Gen. Tracy brought into the case.

Q. What did he say? A. Mr. Tilton—

Mr. Evarts—In Mr. Tracy's presence?

The Witness—He said to Gen. Tracy: "If Mr. Beecher and I shall ever get into law or into court in regard to the matter, could you or would you ever be counsel on his side," and Gen. Tracy said no, that he could not and should not; that he need not have any fears on that score. He went on to show him the letter of contrition; talked about the case as published in the Woodhull statement; and that is the sum and substance of the interview, only that Gen. Tracy recommended silence as essential and absolutely necessary for each and all the parties; that it was the best thing to keep the thing covered up; there seemed to be nothing else to do.

Q. Now, do I understand you to say that the letter of contrition was shown to Mr. Tracy after he made use of this observation in regard to not being Mr. Beecher's counsel? A. Yes, Sir; it was shown to him that evening afterwards.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton say anything manifesting an unwillingness to have Gen. Tracy brought in, and if so, what? A. He did; he said that he did not want any other parties to know about it; he thought it unwise to consult Mr. Tracy; and as Gen. Tracy attended Mr. Beecher's church, he thought it might be unwise to have him in the case.

Judge Neilson—Was that in Mr. Tracy's presence?

The Witness—No; he did not say that in Gen. Tracy's presence.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that will be stricken out.

Mr. Evarts—I understand the last answer is to be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Yes; strike it out.

Mr. Fullerton—What did he say in Gen. Tracy's presence, if anything, about his unwillingness to have anything disclosed to him? A. I don't think he said anything in his presence.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Here there was a pause, the defendant's counsel consulting together.

Mr. Beach—While the counsel on the other side are consulting, it may be proper for me to say in regard to the extraneous matter of which I spoke this morning, that this pamphlet does not profess to be published by THE TRIBUNE office, but by McDevitt, Campbell & Co., publishers; the contents of the report and comments upon the proceedings are contained in it as they appeared in THE TRIBUNE.

Judge Neilson—I would like to say before the cross-examination proceeds, that while the learned counsel will exercise their own judgment in regard to the cross-examining the witness as they think proper, I think it may be well to divest the question at once of all suggestion that Mr. Tracy is in any sense on trial. It is not so. Possibly that might make the cross-examination briefer and more kindly. Mr. Tracy is known to us as a gentleman of very high character, very conscientious in the discharge of his duty, and it is not necessary that he should on this occasion be vindicated in any sense whatever. Therefore we had better confine ourselves to the real merits.

Mr. Tracy—I am obliged to your Honor, and I will try so far as I am able.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. WOODRUFF.

Mr. Woodruff was then cross-examined by Mr. Tracy:

Q. Mr. Woodruff, are you definite as to the time of morning the interview was had at my office? A. I am pretty definite—somewhere between eight and nine o'clock.

Q. About how long did it last, do you think? A. I should think about half an hour to an hour.

Q. Did you meet Mr. Moulton on your way to your business?

A. No, Sir.

Q. You called to introduce Mr. Moulton to me that morning, did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I never had seen him? A. I don't know that you had.

Q. You did introduce him to me that morning? A. I did.

Q. And you had known me for some time? A. I had.

Q. And your senior partner had known me? A. I don't know as to that.

Q. Well, you came into my office and introduced Mr. Moulton to me? A. I did.

Q. And stated the subject of the introduction. Did you not say that you had called for the purpose of making an appointment when we could have a longer and more definite conversation on the subject? A. No, Sir; I saw you the evening previous, and probably had half an hour or three-quarters of an hour interview with you the evening before, and made this appointment for the next morning.

Q. Were there any papers present at the time you were at my office? A. I don't think there were.

Q. None at all? A. None that I remember.

Q. Not even the Woodhull publication? A. None that I recollect.

Q. The talk in my office was entirely general? A. It was about this case.

Q. But entirely general about the case? A. It was very fully about the case, I should think, as I recollect it.

Q. The object of consulting me was to ascertain what answer ought to be made to the Woodhull publication, was it not? A. Certainly.

Q. You felt that some reply ought to be made to it? A. I felt that Mr. Moulton would have to say something.

Q. Now, did you think that the Woodhull publication rested upon apparent information obtained from Moulton? Was that the reason of your thinking that he ought to make some answer? A. No, Sir; there were a great many people speaking to me about it—asking why Mr. Moulton did not come out and say something—why he did not deny it?

Q. It was because the article referred to him in some place as the source of information? A. Referred to him and also to Mr. Beecher.

Q. It referred to Mr. Moulton as the source of some of the information given in the article? A. Certainly, Sir.

Q. Particularly the pistol scene? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You stated to me in conversation, did you not, that there were papers which it would be absolutely necessary for me to see before I could express any definite opinion as to what answer ought to be made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You said you had some papers? A. I didn't say I had, but Mr. Moulton did.

Q. Mr. Moulton said he had some, and I said, did I not, that it was impossible for me to express any opinion in the absence of these papers? A. Any positive opinion; you expressed yourself that silence was the only true course to pursue.

Q. But I could not decide that definitely at all, without seeing the papers? A. I don't know that you decided absolutely the question; I thought you were pretty firm in your views that that was the course to pursue, and the only course.

Q. Well, the object of the interview the next Sunday was that I might see the papers, and get more full information on the subject? A. Certainly; that the whole thing might be further considered.

Q. Do you recollect the time of day that I came to Mr. Moulton's house that afternoon? A. I don't know that I can tell the exact time; it was—somewhere in the afternoon, pretty near night, about four or five o'clock.

Q. Was it not about three o'clock? A. It might be three o'clock.

Q. Do you recollect Mr. Tilton was in the house when I came? A. I don't think he was.

Q. Do you recollect that I went to Mr. Moulton's study on Sunday afternoon, where I was shown the papers, and you were present and Mr. Moulton? A. I remember we were up there.

Q. Alone? A. For a very short time.

Q. Before Mr. Tilton came in? A. Yes.

Q. Now, were not some papers shown me there, and was not the object of going into the study to show me some of these papers? A. No; I think this occurred: I think Moulton talked with you, and after a moment went down stairs for Mr. Tilton, and he came up. I don't think that the papers were shown you until after Tilton came into the room; that is my recollection.

Q. Don't you remember that what was called the letter of apology was shown me on my first going into the room? A. No, Sir; I don't think that was shown you until after Mr. Tilton came up; that is my recollection.

Q. Don't you recollect my criticism on the paper that day? A. I remember some remark you made about it.

Q. Don't you remember, also, that the retraction was shown me? A. No, Sir, I don't.

Q. And the explanation of the retraction? A. I don't; I recollect talking about it; I don't recollect that that paper was shown you.

Q. Don't you think Mr. Moulton showed to me those three papers on Sunday afternoon? A. I don't know; very likely he did.

ON WHAT THE SCANDAL RESTS.

Q. Don't you recollect this? After I was shown that letter of contrition and criticised it, don't you remember that I asked Mr. Moulton, "Now, Mr. Moulton, on what does this scandal rest aside from these papers?"

Mr. Beach—I object to that question as assuming that Mr. Tracy criticised it.

Mr. Tracy—He said I did.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; he said you made some remarks about it.

Mr. Tracy—That was his answer to my question of criticism.

Mr. Tracy—After that, don't you remember that I asked Mr. Moulton, "On what does this scandal rest aside from these papers?" And didn't he say to me, "It rests upon some statements that Mrs. Tilton has made to her husband"? A. Yes, Sir; I think he said that.

Q. And did I not ask him what it was; don't you remember my asking him that? A. I think you did.

Q. And didn't he say that he would prefer, if Mr. Tilton would consent, to have Mr. Tilton state that to me in his own words? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect that.

Q. And then didn't he go down stairs and bring Mr. Tilton up? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect it in that way; according to my recollection he went down stairs after Mr. Tilton very soon after we went up.

Q. Whether Mr. Tilton was there or not, didn't he say that he preferred to have Mr. Tilton state that in his own way? A. I don't recollect his saying that.

Q. Mr. Tilton did state it to me, didn't he? A. I don't recollect of his stating it to you.

Q. Don't you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember his having what is called "The True Story" there that afternoon? A. No, Sir.

Q. You do not? A. No, Sir.

Q. The big paper? A. No, Sir; I don't think I ever saw or heard of anything of that until Christmas after; that is according to my recollection.

Q. Did he read there that "True Story"? A. I don't recollect it. I should say not.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton make any statement to me of what his accusation against Mr. Beecher was? A. He said it was an accusation of adultery.

Q. Mr. Tilton said so to me? A. I so understood it.

Q. What did he say? A. He said Mr. Beecher had been guilty of adultery.

Q. With his wife? A. I don't know that he said with his wife; I am not sure he said with his wife.

Q. Were you ever present at any other interview with me between us four in that study? A. No, Sir; I think not; I don't recollect any other.

Q. And do you say that you never were present when Mr. Tilton read to me there what he called "The True Story"? A. I say that I have not the slightest recollection that the reading of that "True Story" occurred there, or that it ever occurred before you when I was present.

Q. You have no recollection? A. None at all. The "True Story," the first time I ever saw it I think it was Christmas Day, or Christmas Eve, that Mr. Tilton came to my house.

Q. What time did you leave Mr. Moulton's house that day? A. I guess it was ten o'clock.

Q. At night? A. At night.

Q. Who left first, do you remember? A. You and I left together, and we walked up as far as Clinton street together.

Q. That is the only interview at which you say we were ever present? A. That is the only interview when we were all present that I recollect of.

Q. Did you ever hear what was called the "true story" read? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—But that was afterwards, I understand you? A. Yes, Sir, that was afterwards.

Mr. Tracy—The Woodhull scandal was present there that afternoon, was it not, on Sunday. A. I think it was.

Q. And that was the first interview that we had ever had where the papers were all present, so that I could consider the question of what—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

The Witness—That was the interview —

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Tracy—Was this the first interview that we had ever had when the Woodhull scandal was present? A. I think so; I would not swear positively; it might have been present that morning.

Q. And it was the first interview where what is called the apology or letter of contrition was present? A. The letter of contrition—I don't know; it is called three or four names.

Q. It was where the retraction was present and the explanation of the retraction? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember my being shown any other paper that day by Mr. Moulton? A. I do not.

Q. You say that interview began about three or four o'clock in the afternoon and broke up at ten o'clock at night? A. I say according to my recollection it commenced somewhere from four or five o'clock, and that we stayed there until ten o'clock; it might have been half-past ten or eleven o'clock—half-past ten.

Q. Will you tell us what we were doing all that time? A. I believe we went down to supper; we spent part of the time in eating and drinking.

Q. How long did that take? A. I guess an hour or an hour and a half.

Q. What were we doing the balance of the time? A. Discussing this scandal?

Q. In its various phases? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The Woodhull scandal? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember that the pistol scene was discussed there? A. I think it was; yes, Sir; I recollect it was spoken about.

Q. And do you remember that the scene was also discussed, where the scandal represented Mrs. Woodhull with Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton together in the presence of Mr. Beecher, urging him to proceed to the Steinway Hall meeting—whether that interview was discussed? A. I think there was something said about it; I think so.

Q. Mr. Moulton there denied that the pistol scene was correctly reported in the papers, didn't he? A. I think he said it was not correctly reported.

Q. Did he also say that he never took or went with Mrs. Woodhull, in the presence of Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, when Mr. Tilton urged him to preside at the Steinway Hall meeting? A. I don't recollect that.

Q. Don't you remember that I said to Mr. Moulton, "In so far as this story relates to you, I don't see but you can deny it—the part of it that relates to you?" A. Well, I think you did say something of the kind.

Q. And he admitted it, didn't he? A. Well, I don't recollect clearly about that, whether he admitted it or denied it, or not.

Q. Then, did I not take up this Woodhull story, paragraph by paragraph, so far as it related to Mr. Tilton? A. I think that was talked about and discussed.

Q. Paragraph by paragraph? A. I don't recollect it was discussed paragraph by paragraph, but I know it was generally talked about.

Q. And the object of my doing that was to ascertain how far the parties to it could deny it? A. Yes, Sir; I suppose so.

Q. Now, did not Mr. Moulton deny there that afternoon expressly that he had ever communicated this information to Mrs. Woodhull? A. I don't recollect that he did.

Q. You don't recollect that he did deny it? A. I don't recollect that he did.

Q. Do you mean to say that he admitted it? A. No, Sir; I don't mean to say he admitted it.

Q. Do you mean to say that the subject of whether or not he had communicated this subject to Mrs. Woodhull was discussed? A. It might have been discussed.

Q. Don't you remember that it was? A. No, Sir.

Q. [Referring to a copy of The Woodhull & Claflin Weekly.]

I will take, for instance, one scene here, about the "Child and the Grave;" do you remember that scene? A. I remember it being talked about somewhere; I cannot tell.

Q. Do you remember that this paragraph was read and talked about:

Mrs. Woodhull—His revelations were made subsequently, at sundry times, and during months of friendly intercourse, as occasion brought the subject up. I will, however, condense his statements to me, and state the facts as he related them, as consecutively as possible. I kept notes of the conversations as they occurred from time to time, but the matter is so much impressed on my mind that I have no hesitation in relating them from memory.

Reporter—Do you not fear that by taking the responsibility of this exposé you may involve yourself in trouble? Even if all you relate should be true, may not those involved deny it in toto, even the fact of their having made the statements?

Mrs. Woodhull—I do not fear anything of the sort. I know this thing must come out, and the statement of the plain, unvarnished truth will outweigh all the perjuries that can be invented, if it come to that pass. I have been charged with attempts at blackmailing, but I tell you, Sir, there is not money enough in these two cities to purchase my silence in this matter. I believe it is my duty and my mission to carry the torch, etc.

After that, Mrs. Woodhull again says:

Mr. Tilton first began to have suspicions of Mr. Beecher—

Mr. Fullerton—I object.

Judge Neilson—He has a right to recall the attention of the witness to parts of the paper to see if that helps his reply, and to see what answer he will make. I think that is the idea.

Mr. Fullerton—I think he has accomplished his purpose by reading as much as he has read.

Mr. Tracy—I say, frankly, I have to read much of this paper.

Mr. Fullerton—It seems to me he is taking occasion to read this paper when it ought not to be read.

Judge Neilson—Counsel ought not to continue to read the paper beyond what ought to be read.

Mr. Beach—I suppose the Court will admonish the jury that they are not to take it as true, because Mr. Tracy reads it.

Mr. Tracy—I am reading this for the purpose of calling the attention of the witness to it.

Judge Neilson—You are reading it to see if you can refresh the recollection of the witness?

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir; so that he will recollect that this scene was said to be false. [Reading:]

Mr. Tilton first began to have suspicions of Mr. Beecher on his own return from a long lecturing tour through the West. He questioned his little daughter privately in his study regarding what had transpired in his absence. The tale of iniquitous horror that was revealed to me was, he said, "enough to turn the heart of a stranger to stone, to say nothing of a husband and father." It was not the fact of the intimacy alone, but in addition to that the terrible orgies—so he said—of which his house had been made the scene, and the boldness with which matters had been carried on in the presence of his children—"These things drove me mad," said he, "and I went to Elizabeth and confronted her with the child and the damning tale she had told me. My wife did not deny the charge, nor attempt any palliation."

Do you remember that occurrence? A. I remember it somewhere, but I don't recollect it distinctly on that night.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton asked whether he had communicated such facts as that to Mrs. Woodhull? A. I don't recollect.

Q. And you don't recollect whether he admitted or denied that he had made that communication to Mrs. Woodhull. A. No, Sir.

REAL PURPOSE OF THE INTERVIEW.

Q. Do you mean to say generally that you don't remember whether Mr. Tilton denied having been the author of this information—of this article? A. I recollect that he denied it somewhere; I don't know whether it was there or not.

Q. Didn't he deny it then and there? A. Very likely he might have done so, but I don't recollect that he did. General, if you will allow me to say a word, I took very little interest in the discussion of that paper; I read it and heard it read once or twice; I lay on the sofa smoking a cigar and I paid very little attention to the discussion on that part of it.

Q. But you paid attention enough to it to say — A. I know it was there and talked about.

Q. That I was going over it, paragraph by paragraph, to see what these parties would probably deny? A. Yes, Sir; I think you were going over it.

Q. Was not the whole subject of that interview to see what disposition could be made of this Woodhull publication? A. It was that, I suppose, and the whole scandal together.

Q. That was the whole scandal before the public at that time? A. That was all that had been published that I know of.

Q. Do you remember, during that interview, Mr. Tilton's expression about The Police Gazette, saying, "although you see a hundred lies in it, and you know there are a hundred lies in it, yet you cannot say the whole paper is a lie." Do you remember that expression being made? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't remember that reference to The Police Gazette? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You say you were lying on the sofa? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are not able to repeat very much of that interview consecutively, are you? A. No, Sir; not a great deal of it; I did not lay it up with care.

Q. Were you asleep any of the time? A. No, Sir; I was not, according to my recollection.

Q. Now, do you remember of my advising Mr. Moulton to sign a card denying the Woodhull statement, in so far as it related to him? A. No, Sir; I don't think you advised him to sign a card.

Q. I said he could safely, did I not? A. Well, I don't recollect that you did General.

Q. Do you remember Mr. Tilton and me having an argument that afternoon as to whether he could truthfully deny the Woodhull publication or not? A. I think you talked about it, but I couldn't state the substance of the discussion.

Q. Was it not in that discussion between Mr. Tilton and myself, I arguing that from his statement to me he could deny the Woodhull card—was it not in that connection that he said “You cannot take The Police Gazette and say because you see a hundred lies in it, that the whole paper is a lie?” A. I don’t recollect anything about The Police Gazette.

Q. “You can’t say the paper is all a lie?” A. I don’t remember that.

Q. You don’t recollect that phraseology? A. No, Sir.

Q. You say he charged Mr. Beecher with being an adulterer that day in my presence? A. He said he had been guilty of adultery.

Q. Didn’t I turn to him then and say, “Do you mean with your wife?” And was not his reply to me, “No, Sir; with another woman?” A. No, Sir; I don’t recollect that you said that.

Q. You don’t remember that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember any allusion to another woman that day in that conversation? A. I don’t recollect any allusion to any woman, only that Mr. Beecher had been guilty of adultery; he did not say with whom.

WOODRUFF’S AID TO TILTON’S PAPER.

Q. Were you interested in The Golden Age in some way at its commencement?

Q. Just what did you do in connection with The Golden Age—state your connection with it? A. Well, Sir, I was in the habit of going to Mr. Moulton frequently about the beginning of 1871; I met Mr. Tilton there once or twice; I had rarely ever met him before that; I knew him slightly; and he told me about his being thrown out of The Union and Independent, and Mr. Moulton had talked with me about the case of Mr. Tilton’s position, and Mr. Tilton was out of employment, and he expressed a wish that if he could only have a paper, and I, without thinking of it, asked him what it would cost to start a paper. He said he thought a paper could be started with $15,000 or $20,000 capital, and the paper question was talked over, and we went and talked with other people about it, and finally we started a subscription paper, which I and others signed, and The Golden Age was started the 1st of March, I think, 1871.

Q. You subscribed how much yourself? A. I subscribed $3,000.

Q. And how much was subscribed in all? A. I think $12,000; Mr. Tilton, I believe, had several thousand dollars of his own beside—$4,000 or $5,000 or $6,000.

Q. That made up the capital of The Golden Age? A. I don’t know that it made up the capital of The Golden Age; that was the money that was subscribed.

Q. That is all that you knew of what constituted the capital? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What Mr. Tilton had in ready money with you and what you subscribed was understood to be the financial basis of the paper, was it not? A. I suppose so; yes, Sir.

Q. I mean you and the other gentlemen who subscribed liberally? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how was that subscription to be payable? A. Well, I believe I was to call it in, or ask for it as it was wanted along, from time to time.

Q. And did you call it in? A. I did; it passed through my hands.

Q. When did you call it in? A. Well, I think it was along somewhere in the late Summer or Fall of that year; it might have been later; I can’t recollect; it was some time after.

Q. Was more than one payment made, or was half paid at one time? A. Well, I think the half was paid at one time.

Q. You don’t remember when it was definitely? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, what did you get for that subscription? A. I took a note from Mr. Tilton; I took Mr. Tilton’s note.

Q. For the whole of it? A. No, Sir; for what I paid, the half; I only paid in $1,500.

Q. You paid in $1,500? A. Yes, Sir, and took his note.

Q. And took his note? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For that $1,500? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The notes that have been introduced in the case are for the one-half of the subscription which was paid in? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you saw Mr. Southwick about it also, did you not—one of the subscribers? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you said to Mr. Southwick, did you not, that you had arranged it so that if the subscribers paid in one-half of the subscription, Mr. Tilton would give his notes for that amount, payable when The Golden Age was a success, and release the subscribers from the other half of the subscription? A. No, Sir; it did not occur that way at all.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment. We object to that question. What passed between him and Mr. Southwick is not evidence here.

The Witness—Mr. Southwick drew these notes. That was his form of the notes.

Q. Have you ever paid the whole $3,000? A. No, Sir; I have not.

Q. Have you ever been released from it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. By whom? A. It was done in this way. I think in June, 1872, Mr. Tilton says, one day, that The Golden Age is about paying its way, and that he only owed two or three hundred dollars; and says I, “Is that so?” and says he, “Yes.” Says I, “You are in remarkable good shape.” “Yes.” And I remembered that he had $7,000 deposited with the firm that he had just received a few days before from Mr. Bowen, and I said to Mr. Tilton, “Now, instead of calling in for the rest of this money, wouldn’t it be better for these people that have—for the contributions—for the notes—for the amount that has been paid in, that they should surrender them as a part of the loss that had been incurred in starting The Golden Age, and instead of calling in the other $6,000, and you have $12,000 in debt, not call it in, relinquish it, and be free of debt.” Well, that was discussed, and he said he did not think they would do it. I said, “I think they would do it,” and he said it would be a very generous thing if they did. I told him I would try it; so I saw them, and that was the way it was disposed of.

Q. And the basis of that was the $7,000 which he had with you? A. Not the basis of it. I knew he had several thousand dollars in money, and he said he was about paying his expenses, and he then owed two or three hundred dollars.

Q. It was the amount of money that he then had on deposit with you, together with what he said about the paper that led to the suggestion? A. No; I thought he was in good shape to be free of debt and take the thing and carry it along himself, taking all the circumstances.

Q. Yes, I understand; and it was the amount of money that he had on deposit with you at that time, together with his statement as to the prosperity of the paper, that led you to make that suggestion? A. I think those were the circumstances; yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember about how much he had on deposit with you at the time he made that suggestion? A. I think he had seven or eight thousand dollars, it might have been more, it might not have been so much.

Q. That was the Bowen money? A. I presume so; I don't know positively.

Q. And that was done at that time, was it? A. What was one?

Q. I mean the arrangement for the surrender of the one-half of the subscription? A. Made on the 10th of June, when those notes were returned; my note shows that.

Q. The 10th of June? A. I think it was the 10th of June, 1872, that they were returned.

Q. Do you think that the return of the notes that have been introduced in evidence followed immediately on this suggestion of Mr. Tilton? A. What suggestion?

Q. Your suggestion to Mr. Tilton about the condition of the paper? A. Very soon after. It was a very few days that I was engaged in consummating it.

Q. Isn't there any way by which you can tell us when the half of these subscriptions were paid to Tilton? A. I don't believe there is, without a great deal of trouble. I might possibly find the checks by searching all through the papers of the firm of Woodruff and Robinson.

Q. What? A. The paid checks might possibly be found.

Q. Don't his account with your firm show that? A. He had other moneys there, and I could not tell. It might have been mixed together, you know.

Q. Would not your own account with the firm show your payment of the subscription? A. I think it would.

Q. Have you looked to see when it was? A. No, Sir; I have not.

Q. Will you? A. I will if you want me to.

Q. We do want you to. A. All right.

Q. We want to know exactly when you paid that subscription. You paid at the same time with the others, do you think? A. No, I don't think it was all paid at once.

Q. Were they paid about the same time? A. Well, there might have been a few weeks' difference. I don't think I asked for the money any faster than it was wanted.

Q. We want the facts, the dates when they were paid in; that is all? A. Yea.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

The Witness—When do you want those dates, Gen. Tracy?

Mr. Tracy—Just as soon as you can get them.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Do you wish to re-examine?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

TILTON'S RIGHT TO TESTIFY DENIED.

Theodore Tilton was called to the witness stand at this juncture. The Clerk began to administer the oath, when he was interrupted by counsel for the defense with an appeal to the Court denying Mr. Tilton's right to be a witness in the case. The senior counsel, Mr. Evarts, made the appeal, citing authorities and examples in proof of the claim set up. Following is Mr. Evarts's argument.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—Wait a moment, Mr. Clerk.

Mr. Fullerton—We offer Mr. Tilton as a witness.

Mr. Evarts—I object to him as a witness in the cause. The plaintiff is now called, as we understand, and offered to be sworn as a witness in his own behalf on the issue of this trial. That issue, as a question of fact, is solely and distinctly the adultery of his wife. That is the fact on which his right of action arises, on that alone; and as his wife's adultery, and the question of whether Mr. Beecher is a man of upright morals in this behalf, or guilty of this crime, is wholly immaterial in respect of Mr. Beecher's relation, except as the responsible person against whom the law gives recourse for the injury that has arisen from the wife's adultery, which has invaded the family, destroyed its unity, and, in the language of the law, been the cause by which he has lost the fellowship of his wife. Now, at the common law there would seem to be no question that neither husband nor wife can be called as a witness, not only upon an issue as grave as this against the character and conduct of the other, and as deep in its penetration into the unity of marriage, but on any of the more ordinary aspersions of character, or interferences with the family relation: and it is only, as I suppose, from there being some impression that in certain limited, statutory interferences with the integrity of the common law rule in this behalf, there have come to be occasions in which husband and wife can testify against or for one another, that it can be presumed or pretended that Mr. Tilton is a witness here on this issue. But if I was satisfied, your Honor, that the common law rule as obtaining in this State is of the regard and completeness that I have imputed to it, I think I shall have no difficulty in satisfying your Honor that the legislation of this State, so far from permitting any such disturbance or deviation from that rule in a case of this kind, has, on the other hand, completely confirmed it and refused to disturb it. It seems to be utterly unquestionable that the wife cannot be a witness in this case. The wife of this plaintiff cannot be a witness to sustain her life and character. The wife of Mr. Beecher cannot be a witness to defend her husband, because the common law has said, great as is the interest of the administration of justice, all-powerful as it should be, to draw into Court all evidence that can speak the truth within the rules of evidence, yet the administration of justice was made for society, not society for the administration of justice; and there are certain institutions of society lying at the base of our civilization, sustaining the whole fabric of its prosperity, its purity, its dignity and its strength, which must not be undermined, or corrupted, or disfigured, or defiled, under the notion that in the administration of justice the truth must be sought in every quarter and from every witness. Thus the great minds, legislative, judicial, the great moralists, the great religious teachers, have all combined to say that there are certain limits imposed by the nature of human society in the fabric as it is constituted, for our defense and protection, that cannot be overpassed. That, of client and attorney, that of clergyman and penitent, that of physician and patient, are, however, trivial compared with the relation of husband and wife, barriers against the introduction of evidence from sources thus protected; because, without that respect of the law to those relations, no client could confide in a lawyer to defend him, no patient in a physician to save him, no penitent in a priest or clergyman to aid him. But when we come to the relation of husband and wife, it is the foundation of our civilized society; for though nature provides the sexual attraction, yet it is the civil and religious institution of marriage that makes civilized Christian communities instead of loose and lustful herdings of the human race. Now, the common law, built up by masculine understandings that have raised its great establishment, uses no fine and sentimental phrases, such as come from platform orators, or from eloquent lawyers, but it understands the institution that it has undertaken to frame, and it protects it accordingly. It provides that when man and woman come together under the Divine law of purity, that they twain shall become one flesh, and thus that the population of the world shall be furnished, and not otherwise, consistently with the Divine command. And when the common law says that a man and his wife are one, or, in Lord Coke's language, "As two souls in one person"—it is said no man shall put asunder those who are thus joined together, and, least of all, in the name of law, shall the administration of justice pull and tear asunder this conjugal relation by the step of the sheriff or the precept of the judge that compels one to come and betray the other. It is not when the question comes before the Court so much the interest, or the duty, or the particular circumstances of the individual case of marriage that is thus brought up for attention, as the institution itself. It is the happy marriages, it is the unbroken marriages, it is the whole system of marriage, by which husband and wife are in the supreme confidence within their household and in each other's embrace, that no interests of society, no law of the land, can invade. And if every Englishman and every American prides himself upon the inviolability of his threshold against the king or all the power of government, except within certain strict mandates of the law authorizing a forcible passage of it, how much more important that all that makes the inviolability of the threshold important, to wit, the inviolability of the family and the protection of the marriage, should be sustained by the law against the king or the mandate, albeit, of the law!

DIFFERENT ASPECTS OF THE QUESTION.

Now, there are various aspects in which this matter presents itself in respect to this institution of marriage that do not, perhaps, readily rise to the mind as suggested by the particular circumstances of any case in which the question is agitated. Let us

But there is another general relation of this subject in a different attitude, in which the community are interested. Suppose that a husband, instead of having discovered an adultery of his wife, has invented an adultery of his wife. Suppose that through the processes of law there is sought to be worked out a scheme of degradation and menace on the community, well known to the police, that is, a combination of corrupt married pairs to make victims of third persons. Now, is it permitted by our law that the wife should bring about attitudes implicating any impropriety, and then that the husband should be allowed to come into Court and prove the wife's adultery by the confession, as it would be said, of the paramour? No; this law in respect to the marriage relation is not merely a law inter sese in its protection of society, not merely a law inter sese between the married people, not only a protection of the marriage against innovation by one to the injury of the other, or by the public to disturb; but it is a position of the married people to society in which they move that is not to be disturbed. See how, if a husband is to be admitted to testify in issues of this kind, how the law, defective and inconsistent, necessarily, if it allows it, involves the interest of justice and throws down the protection of the opposite party. Suppose a husband gives false testimony by which a defendant is destroyed in that suit, and suppose the wife of the husband thus witnessing can prove it is falsehood (I do not now speak of her exclusion from that suit; to that I have already referred), but when the defendant in that money action undertakes to vindicate truth and justice at the bar, and indicts the false witness, the husband, for perjury, the law says the sanctity of the marriage relation does not permit you to call his wife to convict him. The rules of law are universal, they are prescient, they are comprehensive, and they do not undertake to do by halves and imperfectly what the absolute interests of society require to be done completely and perfectly.

WORDS OF WISE COMMENTATORS CITED.

Now, if your Honor please, as I have no doubt that your Honor will consider the question here to be disposed of as grave and important, not only in reference to this trial, but in reference to the general administration of justice and the interest of marriage, I may be permitted to call your attention to the uniform tenor of the commentators of authority upon this rule, and to say that it is, in substance, a rule not so much of the law or evidence as of the law of marriage. "Bacon's Abridgment" gives, as the reason of the rule, the implacable dissensions which might be caused by it and the great danger of perjury in taking the oaths of persons under so great a bias, and the extreme hardship of the case. And Best adds to this observation of Bacon :

"This rule was not limited to protecting from disclosure matters communicated in nuptial confidence, or facts, the knowledge of which had been acquired in consequence of the relation of husband and wife, and was as absolute prohibition of the testimony of the witness to any facts affecting the husband or wife, as the case might be, however the knowledge of this fact might have been acquired."

He goes on with this observation, which it is right that I should call attention to, though the book shows the limit of it:

"But the rule only applied where the husband or wife was a party to the suit, in which the other was called as a witness, and did not extend to collateral proceedings between third parties."

But your Honor understands that this commentary was written in a state of the law where an idea that a party to a suit could himself be a witness was excluded by the mere fact that he was a party, and therefore it loses its pertinency.

In an action for wages, Chief Justice Lee, who was the eminent successor of Lord Hardwicke, refused to let the wife's confession of a receipt of £20 be given in evidence, saying:

"Husband and wife cannot be admitted to be witnesses for each other, because their interests are absolutely the same; nor against each other, because contrary to the legal policy of marriage."

Cord's Rights of Married Women says:

"The declarations of the wife are not evidence for the husband; and in an action for criminal conversation, the wife's confessions are not evidence for the husband."

Coke upon Littleton says:

"Note.—It hath been resolved by the justices that a wife cannot be produced either against or for her husband, qua sunt duae animae in carne una, and it might be a case of implacable discord and dissension between the husband and the wife, and a means of great inconvenience."

Epimiseus says, N. P., 382:

"These [husband and wife] being one person in the consideration of the law, and their interest absolutely the same, they cannot be witnesses for each other, nor against each other, on account of its being likely to create disputes, and so against the policy of marriage." * * * * *

"And this rule is founded on the policy of the law, and not on the ground of interest."

Gilbert on Evidence, after laying down the rule of exclusion as a corollary from the exclusion of the party, says of the contrary rule:

"Such a law would occasion implacable divisions and quarrels, and destroy the very legal policy of marriage, that has so contrived it that their interest should be but one; which it could never be, if wives were admitted to destroy the interest of their husbands, and the peace of families could not be easily maintained if the law admitted any attestation against the wife."

Gilbert again says:

"The rule of exclusion of husband and wife is grounded on the identity of interest on public policy. The former reason being assigned for not permitting them to testify for each other and the latter not allowing them to be called against each other."

Greenleaf, our own eminent commentary, says:

"Communications between husband and wife belong to the class of privileged communications and are therefore protected, independently of the ground of interest and identity, which precludes the parties from testifying for or against each other. The happiness of the married state requires there should be the most unlimited confidence between husband and wife; and this confidence the law secures, by providing that it shall be kept forever inviolable; that nothing shall be extracted from the bosom of the wife which was confided there by the husband. Therefore, after the parties are separated, whether it be by divorce or by the death of the husband, the wife is still precluded from disclosing any conversation with him; though she may be admitted to testify to facts which came to her knowledge by means equally accessible to any person not standing in that relation."

And he adds again:

"This exclusion [that of husband and wife] is founded partly on the identity of their legal rights and partly on principles of public policy, which lie at the basis of civil society. For it is essential to the happiness of social life, that the confidence subsisting between husband and wife should be sacredly protected and cherished in its most unlimited extent."

Kent says (2 Kent's Comm., 178):

"The husband and wife cannot be witnesses for or against each other in a civil suit. This is a well settled principle of law and equity, and it is founded as well on the interest of the parties being the same as on public policy."

Peake on the "Law of Evidence" speaks of this relation as coming under a rule of this kind:

"We are now to consider those who stand in a different situation, and are excluded not by reason of any disability, but on account of higher duties, either domestic or public, binding them to silence."

"It has been before mentioned, that no one can be a witness for himself; and it follows of course that husband and wife, whose interests the law has united, are incompetent to give evidence of each other, or any other person whose interests are the same; and the law, considering the policy of marriage, also prevents them from giving evidence against each other; for it would be hard that the wife, who could not be a witness for her husband, should be a witness against him: such a rule would occasion implacable divisions and quarrels between them."

And again :

"The rule of law does not merely prevent a husband or wife from giving evidence for the purpose of criminating each other; it goes much further, and precludes any evidence which has the least tendency to it, or which directly prejudices the civil rights of each other. Neither in a civil action, nor a criminal prosecution, are they permitted to give any evidence which, in its future effects, may criminate each other; and this rule is so inviolable, that no consent of the other party will authorize the breach of it."

Phillips on Evidence supports the rule, placing it upon the same principles I have stated:

"The reason for excluding the husband and wife from giving evidence, either for or against each other, is founded partly on their identity of interest, and partly on a principle of public policy which deems it necessary to guard the security and confidence of private life, even at the risk of an occasional failure of justice. They cannot be witnesses for each other, because their interests are absolutely the same; they are not witnesses against each other, because this is inconsistent with the relation of marriage."

And Reeves, in his "Domestic Relations," and other commentators, says on that relation that the removal of the disqualification of interest does not affect the first-mentioned reason, because, when one is called for the other, either examination might bring out facts making for or against the other. Reeves says distinctly:

"It is a rule of law that husband and wife cannot be witnesses for or against each other. This is peculiar to the relation of husband and wife." * * * *
 "The principle of the rule arises from that anxious solicitude which the law discovers to preserve domestic tranquillity." * * * *
 "In the case of husband and wife, if the husband and wife and their antagonist all agree that the wife may be a witness, the law interferes and prevents it. This shows that it is not because the wife is interested that she is prevented from being a witness; for the right of the opposite party to object to an interested witness may be waived; but to suffer such a waiver in the case of a husband and wife has a tendency to disturb that domestic tranquillity which is so desirable; and, therefore, the law forbids it."

In the quaint language of 2 Rolle Abr. [686]:

"A married woman cannot be a witness for or against her husband, inasmuch as they are one in law, and inasmuch as 'displeasure' can arise between them, or perjury, or other great 'inconvenience.'"

In Scholer's Domestic Relations [2d Ed.], published in 1870, this principle is insisted upon and enlarged, and Starkie in his Evidence says [page 103]:

"On grounds of public policy it is a general rule that the husband and wife cannot give evidence to affect each other, either, as it seems, civilly or criminally. For to admit such evidence, would occasion domestic dissension and discord; it would compel a violation of that confidence which ought, from the nature of the relation, to be regarded as sacred; and it would be arming each of the parties with the means of offense which might be used for very dangerous purposes."

On page 709 he adds :

"Where neither of them is either a party to the suit, or interested in the general result, the husband or wife is, it seems, competent to prove any fact, provided the evidence does not directly criminate the other, or, as it seems, involve the disclosure of some communication made by the other."

This matter of "criminate," as the authorities will show, means not exposure to criminal justice, but to the imputations that carry opprobrium.

"Where a man or wife are divorced by Act of Parliament, a wife is not competent to prove a contract made by her husband previous to the divorce, because the confidence between a man and wife should be kept forever inviolable."

In Tyler on Infancy and Coverture [320, Ed. 1868, page 70], this same principle is laid down.

I will now offer your Honor some of the leading cases in the English law and in our own law and the law of our sister States. In Bentley v. Cooke (3 Dougl., 422), Lord Mansfield says:

"There has never been an instance, either in a civil or criminal case, where the husband or wife has been permitted to be a witness for or against the other, except in case of necessity, and that necessity is not a general necessity, as where no other witness can be had, but a particular necessity, as where, for instance, the wife would otherwise be exposed without remedy to personal injury. I think the husband was not a competent witness."

Now, the husband was there called by the defendant to prove the former's marriage to plaintiff, who had sued as a femme sole, and on his evidence she was nonsuited.

The case of necessity, as your Honor is aware, is where a wife is permitted in the criminal law to testify against personal violence; for otherwise the husband would be protected by the law against all sorts of personal and private injury to the wife in the absence of any other witness.

In Davis v. Dinwoody, 4 T. R. (678), Lord Kenyon says:

"Independently of the question of interest, husbands and wives are not admitted as witnesses either for or against each other. From their being so nearly connected, they are supposed to have such a bias upon their minds that they are not to be permitted to give evidence either for or against each other."

That was a case where neither husband nor wife were parties. And these two cases which I have just read of Lord Mansfield and Lord Kenyon are approved in 9th New-York, page 154.

Now, to show that divorce does not open the mouths of either party to the previous marriage, in the case of Munroe & Twisleton (Peake's Add'l'l. Cas. 219), Lord Alvanley says:

"To prove any fact arising after divorce this lady [the divorced wife] is a competent witness, but not to prove a contract or anything else which happened during the coverture. She was at that time bound to secrecy; what she did [sic] might be in consequence of the trust and confidence reposed in her by her husband."

Now, that action was of this kind: Assumpsit for the board of an infant. She, who at the time of the transaction was defendant's wife, since divorced, was called as a witness to prove the contract. Lord Alvanley says:

"It shall never be endured that the confidence which the law has created while the parties remained in the most intimate of all relations, shall be broken whenever, by the misconduct of one party (for misconduct alone can have that effect) the relation has been dissolved."

And in the case of Doker and Hasler (Ryan and Moody, 196), Best, C. J., says:

"I remember that in that case [Monroe vs. Twisleton, Peake's Add'l'l. Cas. 219], in which I was counsel, Lord Alvanley refused to allow a woman, after a divorce, to speak to conversations which had passed between herself and her husband during the existence of the marriage. I am satisfied with the propriety of that decision, and I think that the happiness of the marriage state requires that the confidence between man and wife should be kept forever inviolable."

This was an action by an administrator for a false return to a fi fa. The defense was that the execution was fraudulently taken out to protect the goods of the testator against his assignee in bankruptcy. To prove this the testator's widow was called to testify as to a conversation between herself and her deceased husband, and the testimony was rejected.

In the case of O'Connor vs. Majoribanks [5 Scott's new 394; 4 Manning and Granger, 435]. In following Monroe vs. Twisleton, the Court (Tindal, C. J., Caltman & Maule, J.J.) says:

"A wife shall never give evidence either for her husband or against him; not for him, because their interests are the same; and not against him, because thereby dissension and dispute might arise in families. We are asked to confine our judgment only to cases of confidential communications; but I think that would be dangerous and inconvenient. It is either to abide by Lord Alvanley's judgment in the case of Monroe v. Twisleton [above]; that is the better and sounder doctrine."

In Barbat v. Allen [7 Exch., 609, S. C. 10 Eng. L. and Eq., 596], this case of O'Connor v. Majoribank was cited as holding that the rule of exclusion does not stand on the ground of the sacredness of conjugal communications, quoting Maule, J.:

"The rule can hardly stand upon that ground; but Pollock, C. B., says: 'I am not prepared to express an assent to those observations. The rule is, that so far as the law can respect those communications it does so, but it cannot do so in all instances where the husband and wife are not parties to the proceeding at all.'"

In Stapleton vs. Croft (21 Law Journal, N. S., Q. B. 247), it was held, Campbell, C. J., giving the opinion, though it was after Lord Brougham's act was passed, which introduced certain latitude for husband and wife, as the statute has it, that—

"The disqualification of husbands and wives rests not merely on the ground of interest, or union of incapacity, but one reason is to preserve the peace of families. Wightmans says the reason for excluding the evidence in question rests not merely on interest, but upon a much larger view of the relation existing between husband and wife."

Now, the New-York cases. I cite to your Honor The People vs. Mercein (8 Paige, 50) for some observations of Chancellor Walworth. This case your Honor will recollect. Chancellor Walworth says:

"The wife is prohibited from being a witness against her husband, upon the principle that the happiness of the married relation requires that perfect confidence should subsist between the husband and wife; so that he may freely communicate with her in relation to his business, and to all the various transactions of his life, in the full assurance that she can never afterwards be compelled, or even permitted, to give evidence against him to his injury, or as to any matters thus communicated."

This was a habeas corpus to relator's father-in-law, to bring before the Court relator's wife and child. The wife was said to be properly admitted to prove acts of cruelty by her husband towards her, but not his general character or any other misconduct.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Evarts, would it be agreeable to you to suspend at this point? It is now 1 o'clock.

Mr. Evarts—Quite so.

The Court then took a recess until 2 o'clock.

SOME ENGLISH PRECEDENTS.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Evarts resumed his argument.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I had been diverted to a line of authorities in our own country a little earlier than I should have done, and I wish to call your Honor's attention to a line of English cases of considerable importance on this general rule. I cite the case of the King vs. Luffe, in the 8th of East., 183. This was a case known to the English law and to our law as a bastardy case, the point being, as your Honor understands, to fix the responsibility upon a putative father and of a bastard child, in order to save the public from the expense that it otherwise would be put to. Those cases in form are of the King, or Crown, or the Parish, or some public representation against the putative father, so that your Honor sees that no party intervenes there to make a rule growing out of the question of who is party. The Parish is on one side and the putative father on the other, to whom the bastard child is to be attributed. And the question came up whether the mother of the bastard, being a married woman, the husband of the woman could be admitted as a witness to prove anything that tended to produce the conclusion of the adultery of his wife being the mother of this child, not by her husband but by the putative father; and one part of the proof for the public was to prove that this child, born of parents in wedlock, was not the child of the husband, but of the putative father, and one necessary link, or important link was or might be to prove the non-access of the husband to the wife during the period of gestation with the child; and the husband on the ordinary necessities or convenience of the law would be the natural witness to prove that incidental fact in the proof of his wife's adultery—his own non-access during the period to which the gestation was to be attributed. And it was held by the courts that the husband could not be admitted as a witness to prove non-access, and on the ground of the marital relation, that he could not be heard to furnish testimony that formed any part of the proof of the imputation of this grave criminality on the part of the wife. And I use the word criminality in regard to this fault, offense, or sin, because it is the language uniformly of the law, and of the law books, and does not turn at all upon the question whether adultery has been made by legislation—as it was not at common law, and is not at common law anywhere—a crime. In England it was not a crime. There was no criminal exposure by any such proof concerning the wife any more than there is in the State of New-York; but yet English Courts pass upon it in reference to this line of cases, and on this mere point of the non-access as provable by the husband, as excluded by that policy of the law that does not permit husband or wife to testify concerning one another, and to the prejudice of the other in matters of this nature, Lord Ellenborough says:

"Three exceptions have been taken to this order: first, that the wife was examined generally and alone to the fact of non-access, and that the order is founded on her evidence alone; whereas it is laid down in the cases that an order of this sort cannot be made on the evidence of the wife alone, but that there must be other proof of the non-access. This objection is grounded upon a principle of public policy, which prohibits the wife from being examined against her husband in any matter affecting his interest or character, unless in cases of interest where, from the nature of the thing, no other witnesses can probably have been present; but exceptions of that sort have been used; and that it is necessary, and on that point allowable, to examine her."

Now, this case, dealing with the general proposition as applied to that line of cases, came up for consideration in another case. The King vs. The Inhabitants of Kea—the name of a town—in the 11th of East, 133.

"A woman cannot give evidence of the non-access of her husband to bastardize her issue, though he be dead at the time of her examination as a witness, and therefore an order of sessions stated by that court to be founded in part upon credence given to her testimony of that fact, was quashed."

Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., when this case was called on, said "that to hold this evidence receivable would be in direct contradiction to The King vs. Reading, and other cases, which were not meant to be overruled in The King vs. Luffe; the Court in that case intending that the wife had been examined only to those facts which she might legally prove, and not to the non-access of her husband. the principle of public policy precluding her from being a witness to that fact."

And the rest of the Court signified their concurrence in this opinion. Then the counsel argued that the difference was made because in this case, when the wife was called, her husband was dead, and they argued that point and said if the Court considered that the rule stood on the broad ground of general public policy affecting the children born during the marriage, as well as the parties themselves, they could not pretend to argue in support of the order. That is, if the difference that they sought to raise to the Court did not make a distinction, because the rule of the Court was upon the whole broad ground of public policy, they could not attempt to make that distinction.

"The Court unanimously assent to this, and Le Blanc, J., added that they were bound on the statement of this case to notice the objection taken to the competency of the wife to prove the fact of non-access."

We cannot bring a book that we wanted from the library, but I refer your Honor and my learned friends to the case of Pope agt. Pope, 1st of Moody & Ryan, 269. It is a more modern case. In our own American reports is the report of the case of The State v. Herman, 13 Iredell, North Carolina Reports, 502, which sustains these English cases as being the law of this country. And the same principle in the case of The State agt. Pettaway, 8d Hawks, N. C. Reports. And a certain case of Dennison v. Page, 29 Penn. State Reports, 430, from which I read:

"A mother of a child born in wedlock, but begotten before, is incompetent to prove that the child was not begotten by the man who became her husband before the birth of the child, and in the absence of other evidence of non-access."

This is an important decision, if your Honor please. in which the whole doctrine is considered, and the conclusion is based upon this general proposition of the protection of marriage against any invasion by the administration of justice.

The case of The King v. The Inhabitants of Cliviger, in 2 Durnford & East, 133. There they say that a wife shall not be called in any case to give evidence even tending to criminate her husband.

"In case of a settlement where a marriage had been proved between two paupers, the first wife of the husband is not a competent witness to prove a former marriage with him, because such evidence tended to show him to be guilty of bigamy."

It is not a bigamous marriage which he speaks of; it is an authentic marriage, which he is not permitted to prove, although the case was not of an indictment for bigamy, but only a case of settlement, raised in the general form that I have stated.

SOME AMERICAN PRECEDENTS.

There are some Virginia cases; the case of Robin and others, paupers, against King, in which the Court of Appeals of Virginia, the highest Court of that State, says:

"In a suit by persons held in slavery against their master to recover their freedom, the defendant claimed the plaintiffs as slaves by purchase of them as slaves from W. K. The plaintiffs offered K. K., widow of W. K., to prove that W. K. in his lifetime, before sale to defendant, repeatedly declared in presence of his family, and without injunction of secrecy, that the mother of plaintiffs, then held by him in slavery, was an Indian woman."

Which would negative the idea of the progeny being slaves, as your Honor understands.

"Held, the widow not a competent witness to prove such declaration of her deceased husband."

Though death had terminated the relation, yet the wife could not speak even of a matter of that kind, though it was not a question of any personal interest of hers or the estate.

Now, a very important case in the Supreme Court of the United States, is the case of Stein vs. Bowman, in the 13th of Peters, 209:

"It is a general rule that neither husband nor wife can be a witness for or against each other. This rule is subject to some exceptions, as when the husband commits an offense against the person of his wife. The husband and wife may be called as witnesses in the same cases, and if in their statement of facts they should contradict each other, that would not destroy the competency of either. It would not follow from such contradiction that either was guilty of perjury, and in some cases the wife may be a witness under peculiar circumstances where the husband may be interested in the question, and to some extent in the event of the cause."

Now the peculiar circumstances of this case will strike your Honor.

"The wife cannot be a witness to criminate her husband, or to state that which she has learned from him in their confidential intercourse. The rule which protects the domestic relations from exposure, rests upon considerations connected with the peace of families, and it is considered that this principle does not afford protection to the husband and wife while they are at liberty to invoke it or not at their discretion, when the question is propounded; but it renders them incompetent to disclose facts in evidence in violation of the rule. The husband [as in this case] being dead, does not weaken the principle. It would seem rather to increase than lessen the force of the rule."

Now, the matter to which the wife was brought as a witness after her husband's death, in behalf of one of the parties against whom her husband had testified, was a suit in which the husband during his lifetime has testified and now is dead, and the wife was adduced as a witness to contradict those statements of the husband, and to show that the transaction was not as he represented.

ed it, but was a fraudulent transaction—to his knowledge, I mean. Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the Court, and all the learned Justices, which included at that time the late eminent Chief-Justice Taney, Judge Story, Mr. Justice Thompson of our State, Judge McLean, Judge Baldwin, Judge Wayne, Judge Barbour, Judge Catron and Judge McKimley—and the Court was filled with those eminent Judges—establish the proposition in its fullest extent, and upon the principles of the interest of society lay down so extensive a rule as to exclude the wife under the peculiar circumstances that I have stated.

“The law does not seem to be entirely settled how far in a collateral case a wife may be examined on matters in which her husband may be eventually interested. Nor whether in such a case she may not be asked questions as to the facts that may in some measure tend to criminate her husband, but which afford no ground for the foundation for a prosecution. The decisions which have been made upon these points seem to have been influenced by the circumstances of each case, and they are somewhat contradictory. It is, however, admitted in all the cases that a wife is not competent, except in cases of violence upon her person, directly to criminate her husband or to disclose that which she has learned from him in their confidential intercourse.”

He then alludes to analogies that have been involved upon the relations of attorney and client:

“The rule which protects an attorney in such a case is founded upon public policy, and may be essential in the administration of justice. But this privilege is the privilege of the client and not of the attorney. The rule which protects the domestic relations from exposure rests upon considerations connected with the peace of families; and it is conceived that this principle does not merely afford protection to the husband and wife which they are at liberty to invoke or not at their discretion when the question is propounded. But it renders them incompetent to disclose facts in evidence in violation of the rule. And it is well that the principle does not rest on the discretion of the parties. If it did, in most instances it would afford no substantial protection to persons uninstructed in their rights and thrown off their guard and embarrassed by searching interrogatories.”

“In the present case, the witness was called to discredit her husband, to prove, in fact”——

That is not in issue; but to prove, in a suit in which her husband had testified, contrary testimony, that he had sworn falsely—if she was to be believed, of course. There was a contradiction between them.

“To prove in fact that he had committed perjury, and the establishment of the fact, depended on his own confessions, confessions which if ever made were made in all the confidence that subsists between husband and wife. It is true the husband was dead (of course he could not be indicted or tried) but this does not weaken the principle. Can the wife, under such circumstances, either voluntarily be permitted or by force of authority be compelled to state facts in evidence which render infamous the character of her husband?”

That is the proposition upon which it turns—“to render infamous the character of her husband.”

“We think most clearly that she cannot be. Public policy and established principles forbid it.”

“The rule is founded upon the deepest and soundest principles of our nature, principles which have grown out of those domestic relations which constitute the basis of civil society, and which are essential to the enjoyment of that confidence which should subsist between those who are connected by the nearest and dearest relations of life. To break down or impair the great principles which protect the sanctity of husband and wife would be to destroy the best solace of human existence.”

Judge Gaston, whose reputation is well known to the lawyers of our country, a celebrated North Carolina Judge, in the case of the State v. Curen Jolly, in the 3d of Devereux and Battle's Reports, 110, says:

“The husband, even after divorce, not competent to prove the adultery of his wife on her prosecution therefor.”

The next case in New York that I ask your attention to is that of Babcock v. Booth, 2 Hill, 181, where the opinion is given by Judge Bronson. The Court says:

“It is sound policy to exclude the wife whenever she is called either against the husband or his representative, and asked to disclose any fact which came to her knowledge in consequence of the intimate relation which once existed between herself and her husband.”

The decision below was reversed for admitting the testimony of a widow in behalf of the defendant in a suit by her husband's administrator, so far as it applied to statements made by the husband to her alone concerning the subject of the controversy. In Burrill v. Bull, 3 Sandford, Ch. 15, Vice-Chancellor Sandford lays it down that by O'Connor v. Majoribanks (6 Lond. Jur., 509; S. C. 5, Scott's New Rep., 394) the case that I read to your Honor from the King's Bench:

“The rule was established on consideration that husband and wife should not be witnesses either for or against each other in civil cases; and, that without regard to the circumstance whether the fact came to them confidentially or otherwise, neither could be permitted, even after the marriage terminated, to testify concerning what transpired between them during the marriage, or came to their knowledge by reason of the relation of husband and wife.”

In the case of Hasbrook v. Vandervoort, 9 N. Y., 153, the action involved the wife's separate estate, but she was not a party to the record, though having an interest in the result of the suit. Her husband was offered as a witness. Held, that although his wife would be competent as a witness by reason of the incompetency of interest having been removed by the Code, the husband's incompetency was not removed. It is the settled rule in this State that the husband's incompetency rests on the marriage relation and not on interest.

“A husband is not a competent witness for or against the trustee of his wife's separate estate, in a suit between the trustee and a third person in relation to the trust estate. The principle which excludes the testimony of husband or wife, where the other is a party or interested in the suit, depends merely upon the relations existing between the witness and the party, and not at all upon the interest of the witness in the event of the suit.”

Judge Johnson, of the Court of Appeals, delivers the opinion of the Court, and goes through the text-books and the authorities, and, as I understand them, affirms the rules of law as existing in this State, as the common law, as being the same as those that I have stated. The true ground of the rule is also stated in the cases that I have just read from the American Reports.

“Upon them all it is entirely clear that the rule of the exclusion of husband or wife, where the other is a party or interested in the event, depends merely upon the existence of the relation, and not at all upon the existence in the party offered as a witness, of an interest in the event independent of that which the law could attribute to him by reason of the marriage relation."

The argument here was that our law having changed the rule of evidence that excluded interested witnesses, that the old rule of excluding a witness brought as this wife was proposed to be, rested on the ground of interest in the witness, and the Court exclude that idea and say no.

"The rule that excluded husband and wife in this regard was part of the rule of the institution of marriage, and the change of the rule in respect of interest as affecting witnesses in general, or parties in general, does not touch that relation, and the witness is still excluded."

"In any trial or inquiry, in any suit, action or proceeding, in any court, or before any person having by law or consent of parties authority to examine witnesses, or hear evidence, the husband or wife of any party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf any such suit, action or proceeding is brought, prosecuted, opposed or defended, shall, except as hereinafter stated, be competent and compellable to give evidence the same as any other witness on behalf of any party to such suit, action or proceeding."

Now, that section in terms, if the subject matter of the suit did not otherwise dispose of the question and make it unimportant, that section, in terms, would not admit Mr. Tilton, but would admit Mrs. Tilton, because Mr. Tilton is not the husband or wife of any party to this suit, but Mrs. Tilton is the wife of a party to this suit, to wit, the plaintiff. Now, in letting in the husband and wife there nevertheless was a statutory restriction upon the latitude of the evidence that should be allowed from either; and that I will read, if your Honor please, which is the third section, before I call attention to the second. I was saying, if your Honor please, that the enabling section which I have read, which lets in husband or wife in certain judicial inquiries is, nevertheless, limited; and I first call attention to the limitation before I consider the second section, which shows that this statute has no application to this case. Where they are competent and compellable, it is provided:

"No husband or wife shall be compellable to disclose any confidential communication made by one to the other during their marriage."

So, there your Honor perceives, even in case where they can be used as witnesses, there is a limitation upon the largeness of their testimony; and, though it would not strike a legal reasoner as very satisfactory that the limitation should be simply that a husband or wife should not be compelled to disclose confidential communications, and leave it therefore that they might volunteer, yet there is an attempt on the part of the Legislature to furnish a rule that protects to a certain extent the sacredness of confidential communications. Now, that act, and that act alone, has disturbed the rule of the common law on the subject of the admissibility of this witness, Mr. Tilton, here; and the reason that it has disturbed it is by the clause or section of exclusion—of the alteration of the statute upon a case such as is now pending before your Honor. And that is found in the second section:

"Nothing herein contained shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other in any criminal action or proceeding, except to prove the fact of marriage in case of bigamy, or in any action or proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, or in any action or proceeding for divorce on account of adultery, except to prove the fact of marriage, or in any action or proceeding for or on account of criminal conversation."

The Court conclude that:

"In consideration of the witness being incompetent at common law, and not upon the ground of interest in the event, he must remain incompetent until some statute shall remove that ground of incompetency."

SPECIAL REASONS WHY TILTON SHOULD NOT TESTIFY.

Now, a statute was passed in 1867 which opens the testimony of husband and wife to a certain extent and in certain cases. The report which I now read from arose after the passage and taking effect of that statute, the 40th New York reports, the case of Southwick vs. Southwick, page 510. It was an action brought by plaintiff against her husband to recover an alleged balance of moneys in his hands belonging to her separate estate and received by him as her agent. The defense was payment. On the trial, the defendant offered himself as a witness in his own behalf. The plaintiff's counsel objected that he was incompetent. There your Honor sees it was a mere money interest between husband and wife, in which the wife sued and the husband defended on the ground of payment and offered himself as a witness. Now, as I understand from an examination of this case, the competency of the witness for the evidence for which he was called was within the allowance of this statute, and the question was whether the principle by which death or divorce excluded at common law just as thoroughly as the continuance of the marriage relation excluded such testimony, whether this statute could be considered as letting in evidence arising in the course of a marriage, which evidence arose prior to the passage of the act. That was the solitary point there to be decided, and of course I do not cite the case for that purpose, because that is not pertinent here; but as a necessary foundation for the judicial determination of whether the witness there was excluded or not, it became necessary for the Court to determine what the rule of common law anterior to the Statute of 1867 upon this point was, and whether it did rest entirely and thoroughly not upon interest, but upon the marital relation. And they examined, therefore, this line of cases to which I have called your attention, even more particularly, perhaps, than the Court had had before them—had under view. And as I understand this case, it determines that the common law of this State, up to the time that this decision is given, is the common law as I have given it in the English authorities, and would exclude and does exclude any evidence of a husband bearing against the interest or character of his wife, or of the wife against the husband, as well as any question involving the interests of one or the other; and then the question was what had this Statute of 1867 done in reference to this relation of husband and wife and the introduction of either as a witness in a controversy in which the character or the interests of the other were concerned, and they held that the proposition of the appellant, that this Statute must be considered as enabling only for concurrences in married life subsequent to its date is untenable; that the common law, until changed, excluded upon the grounds of policy, but that the Statute of 1867 had changed the common law in its application to that case. We thus have the highest authorities of our State sustaining the proposition that, until Statute changes the common law rule applicable to a case of this kind, it remains the law of this State that a witness proposed as this one is must be excluded.

Now, at common law no party could be a witness, no formal party to a suit could be a witness. And in a large number of cases in which this question might have arisen, but for the fact that the witness was a party, it could not arise because the common law swept out at once all parties as witnesses. Our code has now put the matter of parties [and I think my learned friends will not question my proposition] simply upon this ground; that the party is not, from the fact of being a party, to be excluded as a witness, and the question when a party is called is the same as to his exclusion, as it would be if he were not a party. There is nothing, therefore, in that that changes the rule of the common law in this regard. Mr. Tilton is no more admissible for being a party here, than he would be if he were not a party. Then came the Act of 1867, which was intended to moderate and qualify, on matters of interest, the exclusion of husband and wife. For when the practice that interested witnesses should no longer be excluded came in, all efforts to introduce husband and wife on the ground that their exclusion rested on interest, failed before the courts, for they said: "No, it rests upon the marriage relation." Now, our legislation has varied the rule of the common law, and with specific intent to liberalize the production of evidence from husband and wife in matters in which they are concerned. That enactment is found in the Session Laws second volume of laws of 1867, page 2221. It is a brief law; your Honor, of course, has had it before you repeatedly.

The law stands, then, on the rule of evidence upon the common law; for the statute, with wise respect to the nature of the inquiry, has seen that no public policy could tolerate the admission of evidence of either party against the other in that inquiry, to any extent whatever, and that any careless expectation of legislation that you could introduce into such issues and such controversies, the testimony of either, and expect to limit, or reduce or confine it by any rule of protecting what was confidence, or excluding what was criminating, would be a vain and illusory effort that would leave both the marriage relation and the administration of justice in equal disgrace and danger. We have now this state of things, and I need only ask your Honor's attention to the decision of the General Term of the Supreme Court of this State in the Fourth Department, since the passage of this act, and in a crim. con. case—the case of Dann v. Kingham, in the first of New York Supreme Court Reports, page 462. Now, the single fact to which the plaintiff was proposed to be called as a witness in this case of Dann and Kingham (a plaintiff standing as Mr. Tilton stands here), was to prove the marriage between him and his wife. That is not a question arising in the confidence of marriage. A marriage is always celebrated in the face of the Church and the world; therefore, the proof of that fact did not come within any reason or any rule of exclusion from its arising in the confidence of marriage. It happened to be a very grave, practical question for the plaintiff. The marriage, we may suppose, was in common or humble life, and had occurred before a Justice of the Peace, and doubtless without any troops of attendants and friends; and the Justice of the Peace was dead, and the record or certificate which the law requires, and permits to be authentic when conformed to law when produced, was found to be defective, and it could not be used; and the plaintiff stood apparently as the witness that must prove the marriage, or it could not be proved at all, and he offered to prove it, and by the rules of the common law, aside from the marriage relation, he, of course, was a good witness: it occurred in his presence; he was attending to the subject, and knew all about it. He was excluded, and every effort of counsel, either arguing upon a change of policy, or upon statutory efficacy of the legislation of 1867, by which this witness could be called for "that single fact and act, was overruled by the Court; and although this statute had expressly provided that in a prosecution for bigamy the first marriage might be proved by the husband or wife, and that in an action of divorce, though the parties were excluded for every other fact, they could be admitted to prove the fact of the marriage that was sought to be dissolved, as no such saving right had been applied by the Legislature to the action of crim. con., though doubtless the same reason might apply. The Court could find no change in the common law as applicable to an action of crim. con., produced by the statute books of the State of New York. We are unable, if the Court please, to see any pretense that by the statutes of New-York Mr. Tilton is made competent. We see nothing to shake the proposition that by the common law of this State, if this action had been pending and he had been called before the passage of that statute, he could not be a witness, and he stands in the same position now.

A QUESTION OF LAW, NOT OF FAIRNESS.

Now, it may seem, if the Court please, that there is some notion of fairness in respect to the testimony pro and con. In this case, that the plaintiff might reasonably expect to be admitted as a witness if the defendant is. The difficulty is that he is tied by rules of law that relate to him and sustain against his will his loyalty to marriage and the wife, and in order that all other men may know that loyalty to marriage and the wife or husband reciprocally is a part of the law of our land not determinable by the caprice or will, vicious or benevolent, of any particular witness. But in a larger sense from how inequitable a change of law that should disturb the marriage relation in its sanctity, and should open the mouth of the husband and close that of the wife. What precludes Mrs. Tilton from being a witness in this suit? Is she to prove any disgrace upon her husband? None. Is she to prove any peril or ruin to her children? None. She is to testify against the money interest of this plaintiff in his action for damages from this defendant. She would uphold everything great and dear and permanent, but she affects the money recovery and the common law excludes her on that ground, and no change of the statute has introduced her. And yet it is supposed that the common law that shuts the mouth of the witness who knows the truth, and whom the law presumes innocent until she is proved guilty, says she cannot defend herself because she is the wife of this husband, and he can destroy her because he is the husband of this wife. I apprehend the common law has been guilty of no such folly since its foundations were laid, and on this, if your Honor please, we submit the proposition.

MR. EVARTS CONTROVERTED.

Gen. Roger A. Pryor, of counsel for the plaintiff, answered the argument of Mr. Evarts. His remarks were apparently as full of quotations of authorities sustaining his views of the question as were those of his opponent. He occupied the remainder of the session, and will resume his argument on Friday morning.

ARGUMENT OF MR. PRYOR.

Mr. Pryor—If your Honor please, I speak to the Court on a dry, technical question of law, and, accordingly, I shall adhere strictly to the point in dispute, and shall urge no topic which, in my judgment, does not bear directly on the solution of the problem. The question in its simplest form is this: Is a plaintiff in an action of criminal conversation a competent witness on his own behalf? Now, Sir, it is not pretended on this side that at common law the plaintiff would have been a competent witness. The common law, proceeding upon the hypothesis of the depravity of human nature and its inability to resist any the least solicitation of interest to speak falsely, arbitrarily and peremptorily excluded from the witness box all interested in the event of the cause, and, by consequence, the parties, the very persons who from the necessity of the case were most familiar with the facts in controversy, and most competent to shed light upon the litigation, were made incompetent to testify. These unphilosophical and mischievous ideas were exploded by the writings of Jeremy Bentham, who propounded and inculcated the principle that all persons should be admitted to testify, without respect of character or condition, and that their trustworthiness should be submitted to the discrimination of a jury; in other words, he promulgated the principle of credibility as a substitute for the old common law principle of competency. Nor, Sir, was it long before these speculations of the enlightened reformer were incorporated in the practical jurisprudence of Great Britain. In 1843, by Lord Denman's act, the disability to become a witness, arising from interest and infamy, was abrogated. In 1851, by Lord Brougham's act, the incapacity growing out of the relation of a party to a cause was removed; and in 1853, by Lord Campbell's act, the incompetency of coverture was abolished. Impelled by the same principle, and running along the same line, and by the same stages to the same end, was the legislation of this State. Hence, in 1846, by constitutional ordinance, the incapacity to be a witness arising from defect of religious principle was abolished. In 1848, the incompetency of interest was abolished. In 1857, the incompetency of a party to the action was abolished. In 1857, the incompetency arising from the relation of husband and wife to testify for and against each other was abolished; and subsequently we have attained in this enlightened and humane course, to the degree that now a criminal, indicted, is admitted to testify on his own behalf. I cite this course of legislation, if your Honor please, not in a vain display of information, but as showing that both speculatively and practically, both in the teachings of philosophers and in the acts of legislatures, the barbarous policy of incompetency has been removed, and in its stead the principle has been deliberately adopted by England and this State, that the question of evidence is determined by the more enlightened criterion of credibility.

Now, Sir, I have said that in 1857 an act was passed by the Legislature of New-York removing the incapacity to testify growing out of the relation of a party to the cause. The phraseology of that enactment is material to the present discussion;

"A party to an action or proceeding may be examined as a witness in his own behalf the same as any other witness," with certain exceptions not relevant to this inquiry or to this cause. You observe the phraseology—"A party to an action or proceeding may be examined as a witness in his own behalf, the same as any other witness." The terms of this statute, meanwhile, have been subjected to successive modifications, but, observe, never to the intent or to the effect of restricting or narrowing its operation, but always with the obvious object and irresistible result of enlarging and amplifying its consequences and efficacy. Hence, whereas the Act of 1857 merely admits a party to testify in his own behalf, by a subsequent alteration of its language, he was made compellable to testify against himself; and now that statute, that enactment, transferred to another section of the code, reads in these large terms:

"No person offered as a witness in any action or proceeding in any court, or before any officers acting judicially, shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action or proceeding, or because he is a party thereto."

This is the law which governs this case. This is the charter of this plaintiff's privilege and prerogative to tell in this action his own sad story of wretchedness and wrong.

Now, Sir, come back to the Act of 1857. Soon that Act, innovating upon the traditional principles of the common law, and so doing affront to all the prejudices of the profession, albeit so plain and unequivocal in its phraseology, was subject to discussion and to judicial construction. A series of cases were decided determining the meaning and effect of this Act of 1857, and which I beg to cite to your Honor. The question was this: although a party to the action may testify for himself, although the Act of 1857 did remove the disability upon a party to the action, the question under discussion and propounded for judicial construction was this: did the act have an ultra effect beyond that of removing the disability of a party, and did it operate to enable a party to testify not merely for himself, but for wife or husband, as the case may be? On the one side it was contended that the effect of the Act merely was to legalize and legitimate a party to the action as a witness, and that it was not the intent of the Legislature nor the effect of its enactment to accomplish this ulterior purpose, namely, to break down another distinct and special ground of incompetency, that of coverture. Now, Sir, it was upon that question that the decisions to which I beg to invite your Honor's attention were cited. The first, the case of Potter vs. Marsh (30 Barb., page 506, Supreme Court Decision in 1860) was an action of slander against husband and wife, for defamation of plaintiff by defendant's wife. Both defendants offered themselves as witnesses; first each in his and her own behalf; and, secondly, each for the other. The witnesses were excluded and plaintiff had a verdict. The case was appealed to the General Term, and the ruling of the Trial Judge reversed. The question, argued and adjudicated at General Term was, whether married persons, when properly parties to actions, are competent witnesses. The decision of the General Term sustained their competency, and this decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeals in 1863, as appears by reference to 24 Howard, 610, note. Not only was this decision of Potter vs. Marsh affirmed in the Court of Appeals, but was subsequently cited with approbation and recognition in the case of Wehrkampft vs. Willett (4 Abbott, Court of Appeals decision); a case reported also in 1st Keys.

In this case of Potter vs. Marsh, occurs the language which I beg to reproduce, because it answers much more logically, much more decisively, and with a greater weight of authority than I could pretend to, a large portion of the learned gentleman's argument. The Court says:

"But in this case, the defendants were offered as witnesses in their own behalf, as well as for each other. If the rational and common law rule for excluding husband and wife was based solely upon the union of interests created by the marital relation, that disqualification having been removed, it was that the parties to the record, the defendants in the case, were admissible as witnesses for each other. But whether the common law rule stood alone upon the grounds of interests or not, being parties to the record, and necessarily so, they are most certainly competent as witnesses in their own behalf."

Such is the letter and such is the spirit of the enactment.

"A party to an action or proceeding may be examined in his own behalf same as any other witness."

Then the Court proceeds and says:

"No limitation, no qualification, no restriction is imposed by the law-making power. What right then has the Court to fritter away, by judicial construction, the plain letter of the statute, to make an exceptional case, when one party shall be deprived of the benefit of his own testimony, while his opponent is permitted to testify? Clearly none."

—said the Court.

Barton vs. Gledhill, (12 Abbott, old series 246, New-York Common Pleas), decided in 1861. The action was by husband and wife, against husband and wife, for slander of plaintiff's wife by defendant's wife. Each plaintiff offered himself and herself as a witness, in his and her own behalf, and were rejected. Held, that Section 399 of the Code (1857) permitted husband and wife, though the husband or wife of a co-party, to testify in his or her own behalf. Section 399 of the Code is the Act of 1857. Your Honor will observe, it is here held, that Section 399 of the Code permitted the husband or wife, though the husband or wife of a co-party, to testify in his or her own behalf.

People vs. Chamberlain (23 N. Y., 85, Court of Appeals, 1861) was an indictment for perjury against a husband who swore in an action of divorce that he had no intercourse with his wife, the defendant. Held, that under Section 399 of the Code (1857), a husband, party to the action, was a competent witness against his wife, party to the action, and vice versa.

Hooper vs. Hooper, (43 Barb., p. 297, Supreme Court, 1865) was an action by plaintiff against defendant and wife for assault and battery by defendant's wife. Defendant's wife offered herself as a witness in her own behalf, and was excluded. Held, error; for by Section 399 of the Code (1857), the wife, as, and because a party to the action, was a competent witness in her own behalf, although joined as defendant with her husband. Now, Sir, what said the Court in this decision of Hooper vs. Hooper? They say this: "What did the Legislature intend by this amendment of the law of evidence?" referring to the Act of 1857 as amended.

"Did it intend by the words 'a party to an action,' a special or particular class of parties—parties who had nominal or real interests—parties who were feme sole or femes covert, the latter sued with or without their husbands? If we accept what the Legislature has said in very plain, concise, and unequivocal language, as an indication of its meaning and intention, we must adopt the conclusion that the disability to give evidence in one's own behalf is removed from all who may become or be made parties to actions and proceedings. If it was intended to include all parties, and extend to them the amendment, what other or better language could have been employed to signify such intention? I submit that none more appropriate or significant could have been employed. And if it was designed to perpetuate the disability of a particular class of parties—married women, sued or suing in conjunction with their husbands, I submit the Legislature would have said so in words, and not left it to inference and implication. When the Legislature speaks in plain, precise, positive and unambiguous terms, the courts are bound to accept what they have said for what they intend, rather than to seek an intention at variance with their expressed language in reasons and causes which, however cogent and controlling they may appear to us, may never have occurred to or influenced them. The framers of this amendment knew, quite well, that married women with their husbands were, in numerous cases, necessary and indispensable parties to legal proceedings, and without whose presence upon the record complete and adequate remedies could not be administered. And it is reasonable to think that if this numerous class were to be excepted from the effect of the radical innovation in the old law of evidence, the Legislature would have signified such intention in so many words."

Hall vs. Hall, 30 Howard, page 59, shows that husband or wife, parties to the action, are not competent witnesses for or against each other, yet still in such case each is admissible to testify in his or her own behalf.

White vs. Stafford, 35 Barber, page 419, rules that a wife, not a party to the action, was not then a competent witness for the husband; but that under section 399 of the Code, the Act of 1857, all parties to an action are competent in their own behalf.

Card vs. Card, 39th N. Y. Reports, page 317, holds that section 399 of the Code makes "a party to an action a competent witness in his own behalf, though associated on the same side with his wife as a party." (Opinion by Woodruff, J.)

Also, see Shirley vs. Vail, 30th Howard, page 407, Court of Appeals, per Grover, J.

Smith vs. Smith, 15th Howard, page 165, was a suit by a wife for divorce, on the ground of adultery, and the plaintiff was admitted as a witness. Held, error; for the Act of 1857 qualifies parties to an action as witnesses, yet, it does not enable husband or wife to testify one against the other, in an action between them.

In Maverick and wife against the Eighth-avenue R. R. Co., 36th N. Y. Reports (1867), it was held that "the husband, as a party, was a competent witness for himself, though suing jointly with the wife. The language of the Court there is extremely applicable and cogent upon the present discussion; but I do not mean to detain your Honor with a full production of it.

Wehrkamp vs. Willett, 4 Abbott, Court of Appeals decisions, page 548 (1867), was an action by a wife against the sheriff for levying on her goods under an execution against the husband. The contention was, that as the sheriff claimed the goods as the property of the husband, the husband was virtually a party to the action, and so plaintiff, the wife, was disabled to testify in her own behalf.

At page 558, Mullen, J., says—a single paragraph I cite :

"By section 399 of the Code it was provided that a party to an action, or special proceeding, may be examined in his own behalf or in behalf of any other, in the same manner and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness. This statute makes every party a competent witness. There is no exception; and the courts have no power to create exceptions to the operations of statutes, unless the exception is necessary to prevent injustice, or obviously at war with the intention of the Legislature that it should be excluded."

Carpenter vs. White, 46 Barbour, page 293 (1866), decides that in an action of crim. con. the wife is an incompetent witness, not being either nominally or really a party to the action. In such action, the husband is the only party in interest.

Babbott and wife vs. Thomas, 31 Barbour, page 277 (1859), was an action by husband and wife to cancel a bond and mortgage and to restrain the foreclosure of the mortgage. The husband offered himself as a witness to prove usury in the consideration. Held, that the husband was a competent witness in his own behalf, notwithstanding the wife's interest in the event of the suit, by reason of her inchoate right of dower in the mortgage premises.

In Schaffer vs. Reuter et al., 37 Barbour, page 44 (1862), it was ruled that, when husband and wife are co-defendants, she is a competent witness in her own behalf.

In Matteson vs. N. Y. C. R. R. Co., 62 Barbour, page 364 (decision in 1862), affirmed by the Court of Appeals, 35 N. Y. page 487, it was held that husband and wife are competent witnesses for and against each other in all cases where they are parties to the action.

Shoemaker vs. McKee (Supreme Court 1860, G. T.), 19 How: 86—was an action by a judgment creditor against husband and wife to set aside a fraudulent conveyance from the husband to the wife. The defendant, wife, offered herself as a witness in her own behalf and admitted. Held, no error—because, under section 399 Code, as a party to the action, she was a competent witness in her own behalf, though joined with her husband.

DEDUCTIONS FROM FORMER DECISIONS.

Now, Sir, what is the result of this line of decisions—decisions emanating not only from the courts of primary jurisdiction, but ratified and affirmed by your tribunal of last resort? What one principle is there—even when those courts differ upon another question—what one principle is there that stands out salient and uncontested? It is this: That a party to an action, being husband or wife, in every and in any action, when the husband and wife is not also a party to the action on one side of the record or the other; that then, in all these cases, that party to the action, he or she, husband or wife, is a competent witness in her own or his own behalf. And I challenge my learned adversaries, with all their extraordinary and admirable research, to find in the reports of this State, since the Act of 1857, one solitary decision which says that a wife or a husband, party to the action, testifying not for or against husband or wife, party to the action, that the husband or wife, when a party to the action, is incompetent to testify, when the husband or wife, as the case may be, is not likewise, and also a party to the action. Now, Sir, we have then this rule, this principle, peremptorily and imperatively established in the jurisprudence of New York, namely, that any person and every person, in any and every action, is entitled—because he is a party, and merely because he is a party—is entitled, has the right quâ party, because a party, and in consequence only of being a party—is entitled to be admitted to the witness-box and to testify in his own or her own behalf, provided he does not testify, or she does not testify for or against the husband or wife, likewise a party to the action. Now, I challenge a solitary decision in the Courts of this State since that time, in contravention of this rule, stating it, as I do, with its proper limitations and qualifications.

Wherefore, Sir, by virtue of this enactment of 1857, subsequently altered and modified down to 1869, in the phraseology in which it presents itself to us now and controls this case; wherefore, we say this plaintiff in this action is a competent and admissible witness.

But we arrive at the same conclusion by another process of reasoning. The law upon the subject as it now stands is in these words :

"No person offered as a witness in any action or proceeding before any Court or before any officer acting judicially, shall be excluded because he is a party thereto."

You observe the change in the phraseology of the statute from what it was in 1857. None shall be excluded "because of being a party to the action."

Now, Sir, this plaintiff presents himself, a party to the cause in an action of criminal conversation. At common law, as I have already shown indisputably, he would not have been a competent witness; and why not a competent witness at common law? Merely, solely and exclusively because he was a party to the action. That was the only disability which incapacitated him, and repelled him at common law from the witness box. So when the Legislature say that no party shall be excluded from the witness box because he is a party, then there is no other obstacle intervening between the plaintiff and his testimony in this case. In England they have a statute known as Lord Campbell's Act. That statute, like this, removed the disability of a party to the action to testify. Now observe, if your Honor please: "Removed the disability of the party to the action," and that is all it accomplished. It did not go further; but they added an exception that a plaintiff in an action of criminal conversation should not testify; showing plainly that when they removed the incompetency of a party that the plaintiff in an action of criminal conversation would be competent and admissible as a witness. Hence, the necessity of an exception repelling him from the witness box. There is no resisting that argument. If the removal of the disability of a party did not admit the plaintiff in an action of criminal conversation as a competent witness, then there was no occasion for that exception, and when they make a peremptory and positive exception to that enactment, to the effect that a plaintiff in an action of criminal conversation, should not testify in his own behalf, they concede that when you remove the disqualification of a party to the action, necessarily the plaintiff in an action of criminal conversation would be a competent witness. And, in effect, so says Judge Wright, I am compelled to hurry along so rapidly, I am almost afraid I do not make myself very clear.

Judge Neilson—Take your time.

Mr. Pryor—I say Judge Wright, in the case of Wehrkampft vs. Willett, admits the same principle. Pardon me, that was an action of conversion by a wife against the Sheriff for levying on her property under an execution against the husband. She was admitted to testify, which was claimed on the part of the appellant as being error, and he carried the case to the Court of Appeals, and his argument was this: Granted that the effect of the Act of 1857—this is the appellant's argument—was to permit any party to any action to testify on his own behalf, yet a husband, for instance, cannot testify for or against his wife when she is virtually a party of the action. And their second proposition was that inasmuch as in this case the Sheriff claimed through the husband, and inasmuch as he had an interest in the event of the action, because if the property, involved in the case, was adjudicated to be his simply, it went to the payment of his debts. Upon that species of argument they held that he was virtually a party to the action. You see the case is very important in many aspects. The point to which I allude is now is this, that Judge Wright concedes in his argument, assumes it as a postulate in his argument, as a first principle, whence to be argued, not a point of contention to be argued about; he assumed that when the statute removed the disability of a party to the action that then every other disability fell with it. I mean the disability involved in this case. The rule at common law did not prohibit husband and wife from testifying in a civil action, unless one or the other, or both, were parties, or directly interested in the subject of the action. The common law did not, I repeat, prohibit the husband or wife from testifying in a civil action unless one or the other, or both, were parties directly interested in the subject of the action. There the husband was not a party. The wife propounded herself as a witness. Nor had he such a right as would have disqualified the wife, by strict common law rules, from testifying. The action was in no proper sense against him. He made no claim to the property, and the Court held the wife a competent witness in her own behalf.

Now, thus I say, that in this action the plaintiff at common law would have been a competent witness, save for the fact that he is a party to the action; and that that disability having been removed, he is therefore validated by operation of old common law principles, as a witness, and made to testify here. So then, as well upon principle as upon authority, as well by precedent as by reasoning, we arrive at the settled conclusion that by virtue of the Act of 1857, as amended by subsequent statute, that this plaintiff as a plaintiff, because a plaintiff, consequent upon his relation of plaintiff to the action, was a competent witness in his own behalf. Then the question arises whether the Act of 1867 disfranchises, disables him to be a witness in the cause, makes him, as is contended by the other side, an incompetent witness the case.

MODERN LEGISLATION ON THE QUESTION.

Now, in view of the uniform traditional current of legislation and decision in England and in this State, as I have adduced them to your Honor, in view, I say, of this uniform and unbroken series of acts of legislation, all tending in one direction, without ebb or returning tide, in the direction of enlarging the sphere of competency, and removing all the obstacles to the admissibility of a witness—I say, in view of this series of legislation and adjudication, we are confronted at the threshold with an a priori argument relative to the Act of 1867, that it wrought no such change as contended for in the Act of 1857. It is not to be presumed, in the absence of express language to the contrary, that without adequate cause the Legislature would renounce its old principle, recede from its deliberately adopted pathway, and relapse into the obsolete, abandoned maxims of the common law. I say this is a valid, cogent and palpable argument—an argument irresistible before your Honor, unless it be met and overthrown by the language of the statute. Well, Sir, so far from being repelled and overthrown by the language of the statute, we find the title and text of the act conclusively establish and decisively clinch and determine the law as we maintain it, namely, show to a demonstration, beyond cavil, beyond question, that the Act of 1867 does not conflict with the Act of 1857—does not affect or impair its efficacy. Why, what is the title of the act?—"An act to enable husband and wife," not a restrictive, but an enlarging act; not a disabling, but an enabling statute. Hence, plainly, it was not within the intent of the Legislature, they did not design the effect by this act to disfranchise and to disqualify any man competent to be a witness; but they meant to create a new competency, and to bring upon the stage a class of witnesses, theretofore not qualified to speak. And, if your Honor please, let us look now to the very language of the act, to see whether or no it disqualifies and incapositates Mr. Tilton as a witness. The learned counsel on the other side relied with confident presumption (I will not say with presumptuous confidence) upon the phraseology of this act as disqualifying the plaintiff here from being a witness. If your Honor will do me the kindness to follow the terms of the statute. I apprehend there can be no question about it :

"In any trial or inquiry in any suit, action, or proceedings in any court, or before any person having by law competent authority, in any trial or inquiry, in any suit, trial, or proceeding, in any court, or before any person having by law the consent of parties or authority to examine witnesses or bear evidence of husband or wife, of any party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf such suit, action, or proceeding is brought, prosecuted, or opposed or defended, shall, except as hereinafter stated, be competent and compellable to give evidence, the same as any other witness on behalf of any party to such suit, action, or proceeding."

Now, what is the case provided by the enacting part of the statute? The case provided there is where a witness, husband or wife, as the case may be, is propounded to testify for or against husband or wife, a party to the action. These are the very words of the statute. Where the husband or wife, as a witness, is propounded against husband or wife, "party to the action." There is no escape. That is plain, intelligible, and not to be contradicted. Now, then, what is the exception? May it please your Honor, the office of an exception is to take something from the enacting clause of the statute—to abstract or deduct a particular thing which otherwise would have fallen under the class or category provided for by the enacting part of the statute.

Hence an exception necessarily covers the same thing that the principal provision does. Now, let us read the exception in that light:

"Nothing herein contained shall render any husband or wife competent to give evidence for or against the other, in any action of criminal conversation or adultery."

That is to say, husband or wife shall not be competent or compellable to give evidence against husband or wife in a case where he or she is a party to the action. There is no resisting that. First, it contemplates a case where the husband or wife, witness, is adduced to testify for or against husband or wife, and secondly and further, where he is so adduced to testify, not against a wife having a sentimental interest in the action, but against a wife or a husband, party to the action. That is the reading of the statute. Hence your Honor will perceive, in view of the uniform policy in this State, in view of the very title of the act, blazoned upon its threshold, so to speak, in view of the literal and the large phraseology and effect of the Act, in view of all this you perceive, that this Act of 1867 does not touch the Act of 1857. They move, so to speak, in different orbits, with no point of contact between them, in lines parallel that run on to infinity without intersection. They cover different subject matters; they contemplate different ends. The act of 1857 contemplated the witness in his absolute individuality, namely, as a party to the action, and provides that he might testify for himself. The act of 1867 contemplates the witness in his marital relation, in the relation of husband or wife, and provides when he may and when he may not testify for or against the other, husband or wife, as the case may be. So that the two acts, I repeat, are not in conflict or in contact either. On the contrary, the one is a supplement to the other. The first provides only when a husband might testify or a wife might testify by reason of being a party to the action. The other removes the bar which is interposed between husband and wife testifying for or against each other when they are parties to the action.

MRS. TILTON'S ATTITUDE TOWARD THE ACTION.

But it may be said on the other side, and in fact it was intimated—indeed we have a premonition of it from the declarations of my learned friend—it may be argued that virtually Mrs. Tilton is a party to this action; at any rate, that she has such an interest in the action as makes her, if not a titular, at least a virtual party to the action. Now, Sir, "interest," as applied to the qualification or disqualification of a witness, is a term well known to the law. Formerly, as has been already developed in the discussion, interest disqualified a witness. Well, what interest? Why, no other interest but a pecuniary interest. A pecuniary interest of six cents was sufficient to make a witness incompetent, but no other interest; and it is another illustration of the absurdity and barbarous jargon of the old common law, that, whereas an interest in the event of an action of six cents, made the most reputable man in the community an incompetent witness, yet no other interest, no matter what it might be, disqualified or affected him. Hence it was that while a person having this interest of six cents in the event of the cause was incompetent, yet a father might testify against a son, a brother against a sister, a daughter against her mother—might so testify, not only in a cause involving money, but testify in a cause involving liberty, reputation, aye, life itself. Hence I say that the word "interest" in the clause means a financial interest. Now, Sir, what financial interest, what pecuniary interest, what material interest has Mrs. Tilton in this action? I repeat, she has a prodigious interest; she has an interest of character; she has the same interest, however, that the children have, that the friends have, the same in kind, though not in degree. It is an interest of feeling; it is an interest of repute, but it is not the interest which the common law recognized as necessary and as efficacious, to constitute one a party in interest, a party to the cause, and so incompetent as a witness. Hence, in 46 Barbour, you will find the very point assumed in argument. It is the case of Carpenter vs. White, page 291; an action of criminal conversation, and the husband had the audacious impudence (my friends would say on the other side) to offer his wife as a witness to prove the fact of adultery. And by what argument did he undertake to prove that she was a competent witness? His first and major premise was that all persons who were parties to the case were by virtue of the Act of 1857 made competent witnesses. Now, this wife of this man is virtually (if not virtuously) a party to the case, is a person in interest, and therefore she is a competent witness. But the Court at General Term indignantly scouted it, and said that a wife, in an action of criminal conversation, has no interest in the cause—is not a party in interest—is not a party directly or obliquely to the action—but on the contrary that it is brought solely and exclusively for the benefit of the husband. Hence, if your Honor please, inasmuch then as the Act of 1867 excludes a husband and wife in an action of criminal conversation, from testifying for or against a party to the action; and inasmuch as Mr. Tilton here does not offer himself to testify against his wife, a party to the action, he is not within the terms or the spirit or contemplation of this statute. Mrs. Tilton is within the very terms of the act. Why? Because her situation answers to all the conditions which the statute prescribes as a ground of disqualification and incompetency. This is an action of criminal conversation. She is the wife of the plaintiff, and if she were to offer herself as a witness, or to be offered as a witness, then she would be testifying in an action of criminal conversation for or against her husband, party to the action. And that is what the law meant; and why it intended to exclude her is obvious enough. My learned friend could not with his ingenuity have failed to stumble upon the reason. A husband cannot bring an action for criminal conversation and then produce his wife as a witness in his own behalf, because there might be a corrupt conspiracy between them. That was the ground for it, and an all-sufficient ground. Then, Sir, having, I think, deferentially, submissively, may I say, demonstrated, that by the Act of 1867, this plaintiff in this cause is a competent witness in his own behalf, and having demonstrated that by the text of the statute—the letter of the statute—he is not specially disqualified, I come to consider, and we are now in the condition to consider, the citation of the authority to the contrary. It is the case of Dann vs. Kingman. Now, if your Honor please, I am not here to impugn the doctrine of stare decisis; on the contrary, if I know myself, I have an almost superstitious veneration for precedent. Nevertheless I have been taught by my reading that the authority may be taken away. Mr. Ram, in his exquisite treatise on "Legal Judgment," page 67, holds this language:

"A precedent possesses the binding force mentioned, either if in the mind of the Court it is wholly unimpeachable on the ground of want of principle, or otherwise; or, if impeachable, the objection to which it is so exposed, is not, in the consideration of the Court sufficient to exclude its title to be authority."

In a subsequent chapter, he enumerates the conditions and circumstances that discredit and debilitate and destroy a precedent as a binding authority. He says:

"One decision may not be a binding authority, if the principle or reason on which it is grounded, or some other cause, makes it defective. In an after case the soundness of the earlier decision may be inquired into, and if on examination it is in the mind of the Court thought to be unfit to stand, that decision it is allowed to reject as a binding authority. A decision may be so disregarded if it is contrary to reason and common experience and its effect would be to make confusion in property, or if it 'outrages all reason and sense,' or if, it being a case which turned on the construction of the terms of a particular instrument, 'the Court ought there to have come to a contrary conclusion,' 'the Court there had not adopted the true construction, nor that which was warranted by the ordinary rules of criticism or language,' or if the judgment was 'founded on a mistake of the law;' or if it does not appear that, in the case decided, the attention of the Court had been directed to a strong authority upon the point."

Now, Sir, in view of this canon of construction ascertaining or determining the effect of a precedent as a binding authority let us consider this case of Dann vs. Kingman.

The attention of counsel was here called to the fact that it was four o'clock, and the Court adjourned to 11 o'clock Friday.

FIFTEENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE QUESTION OF MR. TILTON'S RIGHT TO TESTIFY.

GEN. PRYOR CONCLUDES HIS ARGUMENT—MR. BEACH DRAWS A PICTURE OF MR. TILTON'S ALLEGED WRONGS—THE DEBATE CONCLUDED BY MR. EVARTS—THE DECISION TO BE RENDERED ON MONDAY.

The eloquent appeals made on Friday by the legal champions of Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, regarding the competency of the latter as a witness, were preludes prophetic of the flights of oratory that are to be witnessed toward the closing of the trial, when all the evidence has been heard. In that respect the day was one of the most notable ones on the calendar of scandal events. The verdict of the least intelligent part of the audience was that the proceedings were dull and uninteresting, and during the reading of the dry and technical points of law, and the arguments of the lawyers thereon, many heads in the gallery nodded with drowsiness, and the rustle of newspapers frequently arose above the speaker's voice. To the many lawyers present, however, the arguments were of the highest interest. Gen. Pryor resumed his argument, continuing until noon, quoting and explaining rapidly and with accuracy his authorities. His manner was more quiet than on Thursday, and he was evidently more at ease. He closed rather abruptly, having only referred during his entire address to the legal points of the case.

Mr. Beach, who unexpectedly arose and begged to touch upon some points not referred to by his associate, viewed the case from a social point of view, and drew such a picture of Mr. Beecher's alleged crime that the audience were fairly overcome. Mr. Beach had not concluded at 1 o'clock, and the court therefore adjourned for an hour.

Mr. Beach resumed his speech, and did not fail to take advantage of the door left open by Mr. Evarts in departing from the legal aspect of the case to speak of the asserted baseness of Mr. Tilton in wishing to testify against his wife. His retort was very earnest—almost passionate. Mr. Beecher sat immovable, and his face neither changed in color nor expression, while he looked fixedly at the chandelier below the center of the ceiling, and listened to the stinging words of the plaintiff's counsel.

Mr. Beach sat down, tired by his effort, and before he was fairly seated Mr. Evarts was on his feet. He did not think Mr. Beach's words called for, and he accused him of introducing at this time in the trial a speech which should have been delivered at the close, adding that the only excuse that the plaintiff's counsel could have was that the evidence at a later stage would not justify such words. Mr. Evarts did not again refer to this subject. Later on he challenged his adversaries to show any law making a husband and wife competent witnesses against each other. Mr. Beach immediately met the challenge, and a short passage at arms followed, Mr. Beach referring the Court to the case of Southwick against Southwick as answer. Mr. Evarts did not think that his argument had been answered, and continued. It was 10 minutes before 4 o'clock when he finished, and Mr. Beach then arose. Glancing at the clock he said that it had been his intention to reply to some of the opposing counsel's arguments, but, it being late, he would refrain and submit the case as it stood.

Judge Neilson said the argument had been of great interest to him, and he would give it all possible consideration. He would not write an opinion, as that would savor of pedantry; but he would give his conclusions on Monday morning.

Audiences every day crowd the court-room and listen to the eloquent appeals of the counsel for their respective clients, the learned arguments and clever repartee, but they have no idea of the great amount of labor and research that is performed by the younger and less prominent lawyers. One phase of that work is displayed by the struggle just concluded regarding Mr. Tilton's competency as a witness. Before the trial began counsel for the plaintiff did not anticipate much trouble in placing their client on the witness stand. But one day Mr. Pearsall discovered points in the Reports of the case of Dann against Kingdom, which might be damaging to the theory of the plaintiff's admissibility. This opened the eyes of his associates, and they instructed Mr. Pearsall to investigate the case further, and continued research brought to light the case of Petry against Howe, before the same judge, in which the former decision was reversed and the husband was allowed to testify. The result was as was expected. Mr. Evarts cited the case of Dann against Kingdom, and Mr. Pryor answered by quoting the case of Petry against Howe.

On the side of Mr. Beecher, Mr. Abbott, the author of "Abbott's Digest," has been an active though quiet worker; and while his colleagues have been placed prominently before the public and have been admired and applauded, he has been doing not less effective work in furnishing them with authorities for their arguments and statements.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

THE JUDGE'S REQUEST TO JOURNALISTS.

Judge Neilson—Counsel will remember that yesterday morning on objection being made to matter contained in a pamphlet, I said I would write to the editor. Afterwards, however, finding that it was not published by the editor of the newspaper but by an independent publishing house, I wrote to that house calling their attention to what they might see in this morning's paper by way of criticism, recommending them hereafter to refrain from prefacing each day's proceedings with comments objectionable; also saying I thought it hard that a citizen should not be allowed to attend here as a witness under a subpoena and perform his duty by way of testifying, without having personal filings and descriptions of him given. It is radically wrong, and an abuse. I also stated to the publisher I hoped the pamphlets hereafter would be so unobjectionable that I should have the pleasure of hearing counsel commend them instead of complain of them. The same writer that would give a personal description of the witness yesterday, Mr. Woodruff—a personal description offensive to him, doubtless, and to his family—might hereafter describe other witnesses as if they were angelic. and the contrast so sharp would operate improperly; and it is improper, utterly. I do not purpose, however, hereafter to, on my own motion, call attention to this subject. I have said to the press all I can say. I am compelled now to speak of it because my attention has been called to it by some of the newspapers who appeal to me and say I ought to suppress this, and by numerous letters received from very respectable gentlemen calling my attention to it; but I shall not on my own part voluntarily recur to the subject, but in this way commend it to the attention of those who have occasion to speak of the trial in their papers.

MR. PRYOR'S ARGUMENT RESUMED.

Mr. Pryor—If your Honor please, yesterday, on the adjournment, the immediate topic of discussion was whether the antecedent and independent competency of the plaintiff to be a witness on his own behalf had been impaired or affected—a competency, you will remember, conferred by the Act of 1857—had been impaired or affected by the Act of the 10th of May, 1867, and it was entirely obvious, it had been demonstrated by reference to the title of the Act of 1867, by reference to its text, by consideration of its pervading and prevailing import—it was demonstratively obvious that there was no clash or collision between the Act of 1857 and the Act of 1867; that, on the contrary, they covered different subject matters, contemplated different ends, and accomplished different and dissimilar results—were, indeed, component parts of an harmonious whole. Now, then, it is a familiar maxim of the law that a former statute is not repealed by a subsequent statute, except the provisions of the two are irreconcilably incompatible, and that if the two may stand together the two shall stand, and full effect and operation be given to each. So, then, it resulted logically and legally that the competency to be a witness in his own behalf, conferred upon this plaintiff by the Act of 1857, was not affected or disparaged by the subsequent Act of 1867. Nevertheless, the research of the learned gentlemen on the other side has discovered and produced a decision—for argument's sake, indeed, in candor I must allow it is not obiter dictum, and is an adjudication to the point—their research has produced a case of Dann vs. Kingdom, reported in 1 N. Y. Supreme Court Reports, wherein it is held, and as I have admitted, it is adjudicated that the Act of 1867 does disqualify the plaintiff to be a witness in his own behalf.

Judge Neilson—Is that the case in which Judge Smith wrote the opinion?

Mr. Pryor—That is the case, Sir. Now, please your Honor, if that were a decision of any superior tribunal, of your own General Term, much more if it were a decision of the Court of last resort—the Court of Appeals—then no alternative would be left to your Honor but to bow in submissive silence to the adjudication, no matter how repugnant to right and to reason. But this is not the decision of a superior tribunal. It is the decision not of the Court of Appeals or of your own General Term, but is the decision of the General Term of another Court of only co-ordinate jurisdiction, and therefore, albeit prima facie entitled to respect and consideration, nevertheless, it is open and accessible to criticism, and if it be plainly repugnant to reason and right, and to common sense, the privilege is conferred upon your Honor to scout and reject it.

JUDGE NEILSON INSTRUCTS THE COUNSEL.

Judge Neilson—I will mention to you the rule we adopt in this Court, Mr. Pryor. In respect to the decisions of Courts other than the Court of Appeals in this State, we accept them, and as far as we think they are sound and just, adopt and follow them; and in like degree, though perhaps in a less degree, we accept the decisions of other States, also of the Courts in England, holding to ourselves the right to consider—the right and duty to consider the weight of the opinion as resting upon reason and upon authorities cited from other sources, and which may or may not be commended to our judgment in the premises.

MR. PRYOR EXPLAINS HIS POSITION.

Mr. Pryor—I supposed, if your Honor please, as you have stated, that the criterion of authenticity and authority attaching to the decision of another Court, was its conformity to reason, and I was proceeding to exhibit conclusively, I deferentially submit, and with all respect to the learned Court by whom the decision was promulgated, that this decision is absolutely repugnant to reason, and has no shadow of foundation in the basis upon which it purports to be established. My learned friend, using the license legitimately belonging to counsel, imagined that this case had been argued by the profession with research and vigilance; but the report exhibits nothing of the kind, and the opinion of the Judge himself, as you will observe, is embodied in this brief, curt paragraph:

“The plaintiff was not a competent witness to prove such marriage. The Act of 1867, to enable husband and wife to be witnesses for and against each other (Laws 1867, Chap 887), expressly excepts the cases where the question of adultery of the husband or wife is in controversy, except to prove a former marriage, in case of bigamy, and the fact of marriage in actions of divorce.”

Thus you perceive that the learned Judge arrives at the conclusion by no process of reason, nor is he sustained in the conclusion by any citation of authority, but he merely reaches it per saltum, and announces it oracularly as an ipse dixit. And what is that ipse dixit? Why, that the Act of 1867 prohibits a wife in an action involving a question of adultery from being a witness. Now, Sir, the Act of 1867 accomplishes no such thing. The decision therefore is founded upon a plain, palpable misreading and misconstruction of the very Act upon which it purports to be founded. Bear in mind, now, the words of the Judge, that this second section of the Act of 1867 forbids a party in an action involving a question of adultery from being a witness, that is to say, from being a witness absolutely and unqualifiedly. He announced the proposition in general terms without restriction or modification; whereas, what are the terms of the Act itself?

“Nothing herein contained shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other.”

Not competent or compellable merely to give evidence, but competent and compellable to give evidence for or against the other

“In any criminal action or proceeding (except to prove the fact of marriage, except in case of bigamy) or in any action or proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, or in any action or proceeding for divorce on account of adultery (except to prove the fact of marriage) or in any action or proceeding for or on account of criminal conversation.”

Now, Sir, the sentence is long and involved, and likely upon a cursory perusal, inasmuch as the qualifying clause is found in the second line of the sentence, before the learned Judge arrived at the concluding line he had dropped from his mind and his memory those qualifying words, namely, “for or against the other.” So he announced that this Act, in peremptory and absolute terms excluded husband or wife from being a witness in an action of criminal conversation; whereas, the Act only excludes husband or wife from being a witness in an action of criminal conversation for or against the other.

TILTON NOT A WITNESS AGAINST HIS WIFE.

Now, Sir, this witness is not proffered here, this witness does not offer to take the stand and testify in this case, in legal sense for or against the wife. He presents himself to testify against the wife's alleged seducer. He proposes, under the solemnity of an oath, to swear to the adultery of Henry Ward Beecher.

It is not for or against the wife, in a legal sense, that he proposes to testify, and therefore his qualification or competency to be a witness is not affected or disparaged by this exception in the Act of 1867. Wherefore, then, this decision of the learned Justice, inasmuch as—and I beg your Honor to bear in mind—inasmuch as the learned Court put their decision exclusively upon the terms of this Act, inasmuch as they do not pretend or contend that, independently of this Act, he would not be a competent witness, but on the contrary, by implication assume in the argument that but for this Act, by the principles of the common law, and in conformity to the Act of 1857, he would be a competent witness; and repose their decision exclusively and alone upon the terms of this Act; and, that foundation sinking beneath them, vanishes out of sight and consideration their decision. But, Sir, I say that is the solitary decision in the books in support of the position of my learned adversary. Indeed, it is the solitary decision in the books expounding the particular meaning and effect of the Act of 1867, with the exception of a Special Term decision, to which my learned associate will call your Honor's attention—a Special Term decision of the Superior Court reported in 7 Robinson. Now, Sir, although that be the only decision in construction of the Act of 1867, it is not the only case that has occurred under the operation of the Act of 1867. In 49 Barbour you will find, at page 106, the case of Bunnell vs. Greathead, which was an action, like this, of criminal conversation, in which the plaintiff propounded himself as a witness, and was accepted as a witness, and was admitted as a witness, and testified as a witness, and he alone testified to the fact of the wife's adultery. Now, Sir, learned counsel appeared there on both sides—an able Court, the General Term of this Department, over which presided Mr. Justice Gilbert; and these able members of the bar and members of the bench, then having this Act of 1867 concretely applied to that case, brought to their attention, it never occurred to them that the Act of 1867 affected the competency of the plaintiff in an action of criminal conversation; but on the contrary, by concession, they admitted without question or cavil, that he was a competent witness, and so competent a witness, that he got a verdict of $10,000 damages, whereupon the cause was appealed to the General Term, and the defendant, of course, exerted himself, and the counsel—enterprising and ingenious counsel, Judge Nelson among them, Homer A. Nelson—exerted themselves with a view to annul and reverse that judgment and that verdict, and they tortured ingenuity and research to find some ground upon which to batter down that judgment; yet it never occurred to them to urge the objection that the plaintiff, under the Act of 1867, was not a competent witness. The judgment was reversed, but upon another ground, namely, that the husband had connived at the wife's adultery—reversed upon that ground, with no suggestion, with no intimation that he was not absolutely qualified and competent witness, not only to testify, if your Honor please, in popular parlance, in his own behalf, but to testify to the wife's adultery, and so against her.

Again, may it please your Honor, by reference to Vol. 4 New-York Supreme Court Reports, page 85, you will observe the case of Petrie vs. Howe, decided in 1874—whereas Dann vs. Kingdom was decided the year before—which case of Petrie vs. Howe was also an action of criminal intercourse, a very peculiar case in many respects, but decisive in the particular now under consideration. There the husband was permitted to testify, and was permitted to testify without question of his competency as a witness, permitted to testify to the result of obtaining a verdict. From the judgment entered upon that verdict an appeal was taken to the General Term, and the case was elaborately argued, we may suppose, by the bar, certainly elaborately considered by the Court, and there was no objection taken either by counsel or by the General Term of the Court that the plaintiff had been improperly admitted as a witness. There was no hint or suggestion that by virtue of the Act of 1867 he ceased to be a competent witness. On the contrary, the judgment was attacked for errors—errors in the admission of evidence—other evidence. But there was no hint or suggestion, I repeat, either by the counsel for the appellant or by the Court, that the witness was not an entirely competent witness. On the contrary, by implication, by omitting such an exception, they, in effect, admitted that he was competent.

A JUDGE'S WISE SECOND THOUGHT.

And observe, may it please your Honor, the opinion at the General Term was written by Judge E. Darwin Smith, the very Judge who pronounced the decision in Dann vs. Kingdom. Hence, what is the inference? That his own sober second thought, with a more deliberate consideration, had conducted him to the conclusion that his decision in Dann v. Kingdom was erroneous and could not stand. Be it how it may that he arrived at the conclusion, clearly it is that in this case of Petrie v. Howe, he silently, without objection, conceded the competency of the witness. Now, Sir, this then is the only decision in our path; a decision not of any superior tribunal; a decision perfunctory and ill-considered, and unsustained by any principle or authority, a decision which is manifestly repugnant to the very statute upon which it purports to be founded; and the question is, will your Honor be guided by that decision? You, Sir, are placed in this dilemma. Here is a peremptory, positive enactment of the sovereign people of the State of New-York declaring that no witness shall be excluded because he is a party. On the other hand, here is a decision characterized and discredited by the circumstances which I have recited, saying that he shall not be admitted. Which will you obey? I have no hesitation in conjecturing that your Honor will obey the imperative and plain mandate of the law, because this opinion, this decision, is too frail a yoke to subjugate your Honor's independent intelligence.

ANOTHER OBJECTION ANSWERED.

The learned gentleman urged another and an independent reason why the plaintiff is not a competent witness in this action in his own behalf, that reason being based upon this proposition of law which he promulgated, namely, that in a collateral proceeding, that is to say, in an action between third parties, neither husband nor wife can give testimony tending to criminate the other. Your Honor observes the terms of the proposition. Now, the first reply to that is this: that though the proposition be sound and valid, it does not go to the question here under debate. The question here under debate is whether this witness is a competent witness, whether he may be sworn as a witness; whereas, this proposition, if true, does not touch the question of his competency, but goes only to intercept the delivery of particular testimony—namely, testimony tending to incriminate the wife—so that upon the strength of that very proposition, if it be true, he is a competent witness, must be sworn, and is entitled to testify generally in the cause; but if the proposition be true, when he comes to deliver testimony incriminating the wife, then the gentlemen on the other side may interpose and arrest the evidence. But, if your Honor please, the proposition is not a valid, sound, true proposition of law. It is not law; it is not the law of England; pre-eminently and emphatically it is not the law of New-York, that in a collateral proceeding, that is, an action between third parties, husband and wife may not give testimony tending to incriminate one another. The earliest indication of that rule of law was thrown out in Rex vs. Cliviger; indeed, not only thrown out, but, I concede, adjudicated in that case, a case which my learned adversary either has not discovered to have been overruled, or else in the abandon of discussion, he forgot to call your Honor's attention to the cases which have rejected and overruled it; for, soon afterward, in the case of Rex vs. Bathwick, reported in the 2d of Barnwall & Adolphus; and then again in the case of Rex vs. All Saints, reported in 6th Maule and Selwyn, that very Court which originally promulgated this rule, retired from this position, renounced the principle, recalled the rule and effectually overruled it; and in those two cases the husband or the wife was admitted to testify in one case, although the testimony went directly to convict the husband of perjury, and in the other case went directly to convict him both of perjury and of bigamy. Now, thus the case was overruled there. But meanwhile the erroneous decision had got some headway, and your Honor knows with what fecundity erroneous decisions propagate themselves; so eventually that rule of law got incorporated in some books of no authority, and was adopted by some of the courts in this country inasmuch that although the rule has been renounced in England and the principle repudiated, yet I frankly admit that in some of the reports of this country it is still an actual living principle. But not in New-York; it never has been the law in this State, and it is not, therefore, law to-day. Nor has it been recognized as a canon in the law of evidence by any authentic and authoritative text writer. What says Greenleaf, Vol. I. of his treatise on evidence. Sec. 342?

"But they, the husband and wife, are not admissible as witnesses against each other where either is directly interested in the event of the proceedings, whether civil or criminal."—(Speaking of the common law.) "Yet in collateral proceedings not immediately affecting their mutual interest, their evidence is receivable, notwithstanding it may tend to criminate or may contradict the other, or may subject the other to a legal demand."

"Notwithstanding it may tend to criminate," Greenleaf announces that to be the rule of law. And so, Mr. Phillips, in his book—which I without invidious comparison may say stands at the head of the works upon the subject of evidence—announces the rule thus:

"Although the husband and wife are not allowed to be witnesses against each other where either is directly and immediately interested in the event of a proceeding, whether civil or criminal, yet in collateral proceedings not immediately affecting their mutual relations, their evidence is receivable, notwithstanding that the evidence of the one tends to contradict the other, or may subject the other to a legal demand or even to a criminal charge."

And in the latest work upon the same subject, I allude to Mr. Roscoe's book upon criminal evidence, at page 123 he dogmatically announces the law thus (adverting to the rule laid down in Rex vs. Cliviger, which I have already animadverted upon)—adverting to that rule, and then announcing the true rule, where husband and wife are excluded from testifying the one against the other at common law. May it please your Honor, he says:

"But the rule only extends to cases where the husband or wife are actually on their trial, that they may give evidence tending to criminate the one or the other, except where the person against whom the evidence points is actually on his trial. It was once thought otherwise, but the mistake (clearly a mistake) seems to have arisen from not having drawn the distinction clear enough between competency and privilege."

And so, in a recent case in this State, reported in Abbott's Practice Reports, New Series, Vol. V., at page 55, the title of the case, The Royal Insurance Company vs. Noble, Mr. Justice Barrett propounds the principle in these words:

"The evidence of husband and wife is undoubtedly receivable in a collateral proceeding for the purpose of proving any fact material to the issue, and that although the fact so testified to by the one may tend to criminate or contradict the other."

That, Sir, is the language of the law of the State of New York.

THE LAW IN RHODE ISLAND.

In Rhode Island, the rule as contended for by the learned gentleman on the other side, had been carried perhaps to as far an extent as in any other State. It was one of the States whose jurisprudence had been invaded and vitiated by the original error propounded in Rex vs. Cliviger, but in a recent case (The State vs. Briggs, IX. R. L. 361) the Court of Appeals of that State had the authority and the correctness of the old rule, the rule contended for by the gentleman on the other side, brought directly under criticism and review. The case is stated by Durfee, J.:

"The defendant was convicted in the Court of Common Pleas on an indictment for procuring an abortion on one Mary Jane Fisher. The case comes up on a bill of exceptions for alleged erroneous rulings of the Court below. The first two exceptions are based on the following grounds, to wit: That the said Mary Jane Fisher was, at the time of the alleged offense, a single woman, having never been married; that she afterwards intermarried with one Edwin A. Hackett; that said Hackett was the person by whom she was got with the child for whose miscarriage she was operated on; that said Hackett employed the defendant to perform the operation, and came to him with the said Mary Jane for the purpose of having it performed; that, on the trial of the defendant in the Court below, the said Hackett and his wife were called as witnesses for the government, and admitted to testify against the objection of the defendant, the objection being that the testimony of each of them would tend to criminate the other of an indictable offense, that is to say, here of the offense of fornication" (in Rhode Island fornication is a penal offense) "and his participation in the offense for which the defendant was indicted."

That is, being an accomplice in the abortion. Now, Sir, the Court, in pronouncing judgment, held the decision of the rule in the Court below to be correct in admitting the evidence, and say, reviewing the cases:

"Some of these cases recognize the distinction suggested in the cases of Rex vs. All Saints, and Rex vs. Bathwick, between testimony which is directly criminative and that which is criminative only when connected with other testimony, husband and wife being deemed competent witnesses to give testimony, in collateral cases, is of the former description. But upon principle we find no satisfactory ground for the distinction. The supposed disqualification of husband and wife to give, in collateral cases, testimony directly criminative of each other, is said to rest on the policy of avoiding dissensions between husband and wife; and, if so, the disqualification ought to be complete, for such dissensions, differing only in degrees of virulence, would be likely to result from testimony which tends to criminate, as well as from that which is directly criminative. There are logically only two alternatives, either to exclude the testimony entirely, or to admit it to any extent in collateral proceedings, provided that no use can afterward accrue therefrom in any direct proceeding."

They then say the true rule and the sounder rule, the logical rule and the philosophical rule, is to admit the testimony of the wife, and the decision below was ratified. Finally, by way of authority on this subject, I will cite to your Honor the opinion of one who was indeed an oracle of the law, I mean the late Judge Cowen, who in a note appended to page 69, volume 1, of "Phillips Upon Evidence," note 40, uses this language:

"Indeed, it would seem to be now the settled doctrine, both on authority and principle, that husband and wife may be received to contradict or criminate each other in a collateral matter, i. e., in all cases except where one is called to contradict or criminate the other as a party to some cause."

Now, Sir, thus stands the law, upon the best authorities; upon the weight of the preponderating decisions in England and by the uniform decisions in New-York, namely, that in a collateral proceeding—that is to say, in an action between third parties—husband or wife is competent and compellable; certainly competent (there was a question whether compellable) to testify, although that testimony tended directly to criminate the other, husband or wife, as the case might be. But, if your Honor please, though the proposition of law be sound, though the rule be valid as laid down by the learned gentleman, it does not touch this case. What are the terms of the rule? We are considering it now upon the hypothesis that it is sound law that neither husband nor wife, in a collateral proceeding, shall give testimony tending to what?—criminate the other; that is to say, tending to accuse or convict the other of a criminal charge. It was never heard, it was never hinted, that husband or wife was incompetent, in a collateral proceeding, to give evidence which tended merely to the disparagement or to the infamy of the other.

AN EXAMPLE FROM NEW-JERSEY PRACTICE.

Instead of wasting your time and wearing out your patience with copious citations of authorities which I have at hand, I have selected one authority from the State (New-Jersey) where the law, as contended for by my learned adversaries, has been carried to as extreme an extent as in any State. I have selected, I say, a case from that State wherein the limitation of the rule, as I now state it, is propounded by the Court—propounded, too, with avowed reluctance, yet propounded under the constraint of a uniform stress and strain of authority. The Court say in State vs. Wilson, 2 Vroom R.:

"But in the case now before this Court the charge of the husband was direct; his testimony was that he came upon his wife flagrante delicto.

"As the imputation was direct, the only consideration which remains is, was it a crimination within the meaning of the rule? As the wife had been tried and acquitted, the charge was of an offense for which she could be indicted."

Now, adultery in New-Jersey is an indictable offense. Mark, I read this only as an authority for the limitation upon the rule, as I have stated it. The Court say:

"It was not enough that it attributed moral turpitude; a technical crime, that is, an act in its nature indictable, must be the direct imputation of the evidence. It was admitted that this rule was an imperfect one, that accusations in the form of evidence proceeding from husband and wife, against each other, of acts highly ignominious and disgraceful, though not indictable, would be sure to occasion family dissensions; but the suggestion was rejected, and rule as above stated was adopted on the ground of its eminent practicalness. It was said in the language of the Judge delivering the opinion of the Court, 'what crimes involve moral turpitude we can settle with some degree of accuracy; but what charges, not amounting to crime, involve moral fraud and turpitude is exceedingly difficult of solution.' The object of the Court was to establish a uniform and practical rule, easy to be understood and applied; and the criterion adopted was that husband and wife were inadmissible for the purpose of directly charging each other with any offense which in its nature was indictable."

That is the extent of the rule.

"The disqualification does not arise from the hazard which might result to the party accused of becoming subjected to a prosecution by reason of the evidence—that would have been to put to the rule on the ground of interest—but from the fact that it was safe to assume that all offenses which were indictable were of such disgraceful character that if imputed by one married person against the other, ill-will and want of harmony would be the inevitable result. The indictability of the offense merely fixed the grade of crime which might not be charged."

"I think," says the Judge, "the rule thus adopted should not be narrowed. My inclination would be to extend it, if that could be legally effected, so as to prevent husband and wife from charging each other with any act which is essentially infamous in general estimation; but the authorities do not warrant such an amplification, and we must administer the law as it is handed down to us."

Thus, this Judge, eager himself under any circumstances to prevent husband and wife even in a collateral proceeding from testifying one against the other, impatient as he is of the limitation, yet frankly admits the restriction and says, although it may collide with his own ideas of propriety and of policy, that he has no alternative under the stress of traditional authority but to obey the limitation—which limitation is of the rule propounded by the gentleman on the other side. Admitting it, for argument's sake, to be sound, still in a collateral proceeding—that is, in an action between third parties—husband or wife can testify against each other, when their evidence does not tend to accuse or convict them of a criminal offense, an offense indictable in its nature.

FINAL CONCLUSIONS.

Now, Sir, suppose the plaintiff here is admitted to the witness box, and gives evidence tending to convict, or actually convicting, the wife of adultery. Does that convict her; does that tend to convict her; does that accuse her of crime? No, Sir; not in New-York. By the Levitical law, as your Honor is aware, both husband and wife were denounced to death for the act of adultery, which law, though severe, must be commended for its impartiality, in view of the tendency of disposition in modern civilization, which is rather to applaud the man for his exploits of antr'y, and to heap the load of ignominy upon the wretched and unhappy woman. So, in 1650, when the principles of Puritanism—principles borrowed from the Mosaic dispensation—were predominant in the Government of Great Britain, those bigoted fanatics passed a law denouncing death against adultery. But, upon the return of reason and the Stuarts, that law was repealed; and it never was the law in New-York, it never was a portion of the common law of England, that adultery was a crime. Open licentiousness is a crime, and indictable at common law, but adultery never was a crime at common law. The common law left adultery to the cognizance solely of the ecclesiastical courts, who chastised it pro salute animæ, as they expressed it. Adultery never was a crime by the law of New-York; is not a crime to-day with us. It is regarded as a private wrong, exposing the tort feasor to an action for civil damages, but it was never considered a penal offense making him obnoxious to a criminal prosecution. Hence, although the rule contended for by the learned gentleman be sound in all its parts, yet it is inapplicable here, because the testimony which the plaintiff may give, and will give, though tending to convict the wife of adultery, does not tend to accuse her of a criminal offense. So that for these reasons, without detaining you with any amplification of the argument, the second ground presented by the learned gentleman wholly fails—fails because, if sound, it does not go to the competency of the witness, but to the admissibility of the testimony he may give—inapplicable, because it does not tend to convict the wife of a criminal offense, and inoperative because, in truth, it is not the law of the State of New-York.

The learned gentleman endeavored to fortify his position against the competency of the plaintiff, by arguments drawn from general considerations of policy. Now, Sir, those topics, if addressed to a legislature meditating the adoption of an act upon the subject, would be relevant and might be persuasive. But your Honor sits there not to make, but to declare the law, and upon an inquiry what the law is, debate as to what the law ought to be is immaterial and irrelevant. So, then, notwithstanding the temptation presented to me by the field of discussion opened by the learned gentleman, I conceive that I have discharged the duty imposed upon me of demonstrating (I say it with becoming humility) that the plaintiff is a competent witness and should be sworn.

OTHER VIEWS OF PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL.

As soon as Gen. Pryor had finished, Mr. Beach, the senior counsel for Mr. Tilton, began an argument in further proof of the competency of his client to testify. His remarks occupied about three hours of the session.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor accept some few additional observations? The discussion of this question, Sir, has been anticipated by us, and the general conduct of the argument has been assigned to my learned colleague, who has just addressed you. The able, logical and exhaustive argument which he has submitted well justifies that selection, and little is left on the field of this discussion for me but to glean something of the fragments of it which have been left comparatively unnoticed. You will not expect me, Sir, nor shall I attempt to review or repeat, to any extent, the considerations which have been already presented, but shall confine myself in a great degree to remark upon those general topics which have been introduced by our learned adversary. Listening, Sir, to his brilliant and impressive exordium I was led to regret that I was not gifted with those qualities which would enable me in some faint and far off degree to emulate his sonorous rhetoric. I am not, and I shall not attempt it. But I am consoled somewhat by the reflection that this is an argument upon a question of law, addressed to a court of law; that I speak to a mind learned and experienced, and not likely to be moved from its self-possession by the declamation of counsel. That declamation, Sir, would, to my mind, have been far more impressive had it been uttered in the cause of one who had not forgotten the precepts taught by his professional representative; on behalf of one who has invaded the sanctity and privacy of domestic life, and who, as the evidence now stands, has seduced that wife from her allegiance and himself introduced her before his packed Committee to review the secrets of domestic intercourse—introduced, Sir, upon that occasion to vilify and abuse the husband who now seeks the occasion to vindicate himself from the aspersions; to tell to your Honor and to the community the true story of the sad, lamentable difference which has broken up a happy and honored home, scattered its inmates upon the cold charities of the world.

THE DEFENSE'S PROPOSITION UNJUST.

I do not accept, Sir, the issue tendered by my learned friend. Reduced to its simple proposition, in practical application to this case, the proposition of the counsel is that Henry Ward Beecher is a witness in this action, and Theodore Tilton is not. Whatever Henry Ward Beecher upon that stand may choose to say, however he may stigmatize Theodore Tilton, if perchance he should swear that from the lips of Theodore Tilton forgiveness has been liberally tendered—nay, if he should swear that he has paid Theodore Tilton for the wrong and received a discharge for his outrage upon his rights, the justice and impartiality of the law still excludes Theodore Tilton from answering the imputations. It presents, Sir, just that conclusion, and if your Honor yields to the proposition, it effects just that practical result, that Henry Ward Beecher is free and at liberty to testify to whatever his conscience will permit—the accused seducer may attempt as a witness to free himself from the accusation, and the wronged and outraged husband must sit with lips sealed by the law, and can offer to this Court and jury no testimony in support of his action. Before your Honor shall reach a conclusion of that character, so unjust in all its theory and mischievous in all its consequences, you must be driven to it by clear and satisfactory authority. It is contrary to our notions of justice. It seems to be contrary to the theory of our laws of evidence, and works a practical wrong which would outrage the common sense of the community.

GRAVITY OF THE QUESTION.

Now, Sir, I admit this is a grave issue, important not only as affecting this principle established by the wisdom and the experience of the past, but grave and important in its relations to those other subjects of domestic concern and public policy submitted to your Honor. I agree, Sir, that the law cherishes with tenderness the family and the home, and well it is, Sir, that it is so; for I too agree with my learned friend that upon them rests the true foundation of every well regulated society and Government. It is there that those lessons of purity and wisdom are taught, forming the mind for the discharge of those exalted duties which belong to every member of society, and from them must come the agents who are to carry onward and upward the great mystery of man's creation. I agree that no society or Government can stand—virtuously stand—except upon the maintenance of the sanctity and the virtue of the domestic circle. So I agree too, Sir, that there is much of beauty and sacredness in the idea of unity attached to the marriage relation. That idea of the confluence of two souls mingling all their affections and sympathies and interests in one, and hand in hand meeting the contingencies and adversities of life with mutual encouragement and love, is well calculated to excite the beautiful imagery of my learned adversary. It appeals, Sir, directly and feelingly to my own sympathies, but are we to forget that in what is called the progress of civilization that that idea has been mangled and torn asunder? Are we to be blind to the legislation of the present? Are we to ignore the fact that all these ideas have been exploded and destroyed by what I deem the vandalism of modern legislation? In 1848 that unity was effectually impaired under its notions and by the common law the wife could not sue the husband. She had no status in the Courts except in the wide discretion and the exalted equity of a Court of Chancery. Yet she may now bring her action. By the common law the wife could hold no separate personal property except by ante-nuptial settlement or by the decree of a Court of Equity, and yet now she may go out into the world and barter and trade and tussle with the energies of commercial and business life. Once her true sphere was in the domestic circle and around the hearthstone, cultivating those tender sentiments and qualities which were at once her grace and glory, but to-day by the voice and power of legislation she is ushered into the busy scenes of life and becomes an active and independent actor in all struggles. The counsel says this idea of unity, this consecration of the domestic circle cannot be torn by the rude hand of the law. Sir, it has been mangled and torn. That identity of interest, that union of soul has been separated not only by the voice of legal theory but by the practical application of it to the ordinary concerns of life. My learned friends have produced here, Sir, a wonderful mass of authorities gathered from the adjudications under the modern law both in England and in the States of this country. But, Sir, as you know the rules of evidence, nay, the principles of law as applicable to distinct communities and to the States of our own confederacy, are regulated by the special legislation of each State, differing in each, conflicting in each, founded upon adverse principles, sustaining diverse policies as they are instigated by the particular notions of the special communities to which they are to be applied.

MODERN IDEAS THE TRUER GUIDES.

And how is this question to be adjudged, Sir? By the law of England as it was, or by the law of England of to-day? By the legislation of our associated States, or by the legislation and the law and the policy of the State of New-York? Certainly, Sir, by the latter, and what need to gather those ancient authorities pronounced under a rule and a policy inapplicable to the present condition of our society, and asserting none of the rights which, by modern legislation, have been conferred mutually upon husband and wife. My friends have been digging among fossils of a past generation. They are gathering here the dead carcasses of exploded theories and adjudications, and confronting them in ghastly contrast with what professes to be the improvement of modern times. Sir, we are not to be governed by them. Your Honor is to decide this case in consonance with the ideas of this day, as they are established by the Legislature and the law of this State, guided, I admit, by those general considerations of propriety, and by those rules which govern the construction and applications of statutes and decisions. For examining those, Sir, in answer to the illustration of my learned friend, and to aid somewhat the idea of the real unpractical issue which is presented by this objection, permit me to follow him in an illustration. I imagine, Sir, a happy and honored and a cultured home. The wife a frail and feeble and delicate woman, eminently devotional and pious in all her impulses, and, as has been shown in this case, and will be shown hereafter, devoted to the husband of her early choice and the father of her children. She had a pastor, learned and eminent, gifted beyond his fellows, one who stood at the very head of his honored and sacred profession, one whose words were listened to with deference and with acceptance. Ah! Sir, he had those qualities of mind and heart; he had that persuasive power of eloquence, that insidious and silver tongue which would lure an angel from its paradise. He was her accepted and chosen teacher and guide. She looked up to him with a veneration second only to that with which she regarded her God. Nay, if an incarnate Christ had come down with the glory of Calvary upon his brow and the love or sacrifice in his eyes, she could not have bowed to him with more obedience and idolatrous deference than this woman rendered to her pastor and her earthly God. From her childhood, Sir, she was under his teaching and dominion. He was almost an inmate of her home. In the confidence of a husband and a friend, a pupil of this aged and venerable and gifted man, he was welcomed with confidence and affection. He exerted upon her, Sir, all his arts, his specious wisdom, his playful devotion. All the efforts of his gifted nature were banded to the seduction of this happy and beloved wife and mother, and she fell. And do you wonder, Sir? Is she to be blamed for the act? Is this a prosecution of her? Is the action thereafter brought by her wronged husband an action against her for her condemnation? Oh! no, Sir. Consider how strong he was, and how weak she was. Consider how submissive she was to his teachings, and imagine with what a specious and insidious tongue he propounded to her the theory which he advanced, that fornication was but a natural expression of love! He taught her to believe in pious adultery. By slow, but by steady steps, he led her along upon false paths to the precipice from which she fell. That seducer is brought into a court of justice to answer for his crime. Husband wronged, seducer guilty, stand before the immaculate justice of the law, and before which each has to answer for the deeds done in respect to this woman. And we are told, Sir—should be told, Sir, in such a case, according to the logic of my learned friend—that this aged and venerable and gifted seducer may take the stand and pollish and apologize for his guilt, and present all the defenses of his practiced and learned ingenuity, and that the husband must be still and silent, and that this is the law—the law which is not a respecter of persons, a law which holds out steady and even justice to litigants before it, and with all the sophistry of his great powers, my learned friend subsidizes them to establish that doctrine of injustice and wrong. I say again, Sir, before your Honor will adopt any such conclusion, before you will approve any such doctrine, you must be driven to it by the force of an irresistible and legal logic. Thank God there is, in my belief, no such rule in the law of this State! There is no such injustice in the policy of our Legislature.

A REVIEW OF THE AUTHORITIES.

I do not propose, Sir, to examine at any considerable length authorities referred to or commented upon; but I understand my learned adversary to declare that the policy of the common law, excluding a husband and wife as witnesses for or against each other, is founded upon the harmony and inviolability of the domestic relation. I deny that proposition, Sir. It is maintained, undoubtedly, by many of the English authorities, and is in one authority in this State alluded to as the ground of exclusion, but in later and better considered authorities, I submit to your Honor, the dogma has no support whatever. And I refer again, Sir, to the case of Marsh vs. Potter already spoken of, to the opinion of Mr. Justice James, which is the most elaborate and thorough examination not only of the policy but the state of decision upon this subject which can be found in our own, or, I think, in any other reports, and which has been adopted and affirmed by the Court of Appeals.

"Upon the competency of witnesses," says this learned Judge, "the common law proceeded in distrust of human nature. It believed a witness thus interested to be incapable of verity, and there consequently grew up under it a system of restrictions which rarely, if ever, allowed the facts in a given case to come out fully, and was often the occasion of great hardship and injustice. The objections to such a system were too manifest to escape attention. Many thought the attainment of truth would be best promoted by opening every source of information in a given case, and that all persons cognizant of any fact bearing upon the case, and especially those ordinarily most conversant with them, the parties themselves should be permitted to speak. They expressed confidence in man, and a belief in the existence of human integrity. They believed in the capacity of human nature, although interested, to speak the truth, and in the ability of triers of questions of fact to detect falsehood. From such a basis of thought there have sprung up within a few years in England, and in some of the States of this country, radical changes in the admissibility and competency of persons as witnesses. A new system has developed itself, whose foundations are laid in common sense and on enlightened policy, and its superiority over the old is no longer questioned, except by the few who have no confidence in the present, no hope in the future, and who deem our only safety is in keeping fast anchored to the past."

Omitting a few paragraphs, Sir, he says:

"Actions between married persons should constitute no exception to the general rule of practice. Each represent well-defined rights of action, both as concerns property and personal rights. Suitors can institute them, courts must entertain them, and triers must decide them. So, in actions where husband and wife are co-plaintiffs or co-defendants, husband and wife may sue and be sued, and the husband must, in some instances, be sued with the wife. Such actions must be entertained and tried by the courts. The simple question, then, is, shall such actions be tried in the ordinary way, or by some exceptional method? Will the law, while it entertains them, say—that they shall be decided rightly, so far as practicable, or that it is a matter of no consequence how they are disposed of? Or, if their decision is a matter of some concern to the law, shall the means most approved for arriving at a result consonant with the dignity of the law and the rights of individuals in other cases be employed in those actions, or shall the triers be left to grope their way through a partial darkness to a conclusion? In other words, shall the husband's mouth be closed in his own behalf, while his wife is a co-party, though permitted to speak if sued alone?"

Indeed—

"though permitted to speak if sued alone, it is a rule of the common law that husband or wife cannot be witnesses for or against each other. The first branch is based entirely upon interest; the second upon interest and public policy. All persons interested in the action were at common law held incompetent to testify therein. This, of course, excluded the parties to the records. At common law the wife's civil existence was merged in that of the husband, and the two were regarded as but one person. She had no separate right of property or of action, and hence was excluded from being a witness in her husband's behalf. This identity of interest was also the real support of the rule excluding the wife as a witness against the husband. In consequence of this identity of interest"—[and in both senses the word "interest" is italicized]—"husband and wife uniformly appeared before the Court in a friendly attitude. Legally their relation was one of mutual confidence and harmony. There was every reason to fear, therefore, that in the event of the introduction of one of them at the suit of an adversary of the other some testimony would be elicited which would be detrimental to the interests of the other, and therefrom domestic ill-feeling and discord result. The peace of families would thus be jeopardized merely to subserve the pecuniary interests of third persons."

And he proceeds, Sir, in citing elementary authorities, and he concludes by saying:

"I think it clear, therefore, that the true principle which excludes the husband or the wife of the party from being a witness for or against each other was the union of interest and privilege existing between them."

And that privilege refers, Sir, to confidential communications, and has no connection with the idea of public policy, or with the harmony of the domestic relation.

"It is true, authorities could be cited which state that it is with a view of preserving the peace of families, and where it is said that the admission of such testimony would lead to dissension and unhappiness, and, probably, to perjury, and that the confidence existing between husband and wife should be sacredly cherished. But if those cases are carefully examined it will be found that this question, in its origin and cause, was not fully considered."

And then he proceeds to examine them, Sir, and says:

"With respect to the protection of confident communications between husband and wife there is good reason for such protection at all times."

But no such principle has been brought into practice.

"The decisions excluding husbands or wives of parties are often accompanied with sacred declarations in favor of such protection; but is the exclusion extended to all the testimony, whether it was confidential or not? and, as no protection was given to conjugal confidence in respect to witnesses, these parties were as much within the reason of the rule, as it existed, as the other class, it may be safely affirmed that no such rule has as yet been established. As to the authorities, most of the decisions in favor of excluding the wives of parties were given in cases where the husbands were excluded, and, therefore, no matter how strong may have been the expression of public policy, and in favor of preventing domestic discord, &c., all those conditions are consistent with the principle that interest was the ground of objection."

He then proceeds to reason upon the effect of the Code abolishing the disqualification of interest, and finally holds, in consonance with the opinions I have read to your Honor.

I ask your attention, Sir, to the case of Wehrkampff vs. Willett, to be found in the 4th volume of Abbott's Court of Appeals Decisions, at page 548. That was a case where the wife was a party plaintiff, and offered herself as a witness, and where the question was whether the property which had been seized by the sheriff, against whom the action was brought, belonged to the wife or to the husband. The question was whether she was a competent witness. It was held she was. And I read this, Sir, for two purposes. First, to maintain the doctrine asserted by Justice James, that the exclusion of the wife or the husband, as the case might be, was not founded upon the idea of domestic harmony; and, second, to show that in an action like the present, even at common law, the objection of being a party removed the husband or wife as a sole party, the other not being a party would be competent as a witness. The Court says:

"The rule of the common law did not prohibit husband and wife from testifying in a civil action, unless one or the other or both were parties, or directly interested in the subject of the action. Here the husband was not a party, nor had he any such interest as would have disqualified the wife by strict common law rules. The action was in no proper sense against him. He made no claim to the property taken and sold by the defendant, and had no interest in the litigation, unless, indeed, to have his debts paid from property to which he laid no claim." * * * "The code provides that a party to an action, etc., may be examined as a witness in his own behalf, or in behalf of any other party, in the same manner, and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness," except "that neither husband nor wife shall be required to disclose any communication made by one to the other." * * * *

"The letter of the Statute certainly extends to married persons not having conflicting interests," [conflicting interest of parties.] "and the exception is a plain indication of the legislative intention to change or codify the common law rule as to the admissibility of husband and wife as witnesses."

And yet all the argument presented by my learned friend, all his glowing oratory concerning the sanctity and permanence of the domestic relation, are founded exclusively upon the doctrine of this law thus avowed by the Court of last resort to have been changed by the legislation of the present.

"The reason of the latter rule for not admitting husband and wife, as witnesses for each other, was because of an identity of interest; nor were they admitted against each other, because this was deemed contrary to the legal policy of marriage. 'Husband and wife,' says Blackstone, 'are not allowed to be evidence for or against each other, partly because it is impossible that their testimony should be indifferent, but principally because of the union of persons; and therefore if they were admitted to be witnesses for each other, they would contradict our maxim of law—'No one shall be a witness in his own cause;' and if against each other, they would contradict another maxim—'No one is obliged to convict himself.'"

And you see, Sir, upon what the policy of the common law rested; and you see how clearly this idea of unity, of identity of interest—I had almost said of person, certainly of heart—is abrogated by the laws of this State.

Says Baron Gilbert:

"If they (husband and wife) swear for each other, they are not believed, because their interests are absolutely the same, and therefore they can give no more credit when they attest for each other than when a man attests for himself; and it would be very hard if a wife should be allowed as evidence against her husband, when she cannot attest for him. Such a law would occasion implacable quarrels and divisions, and destroy the very legal policy of marriage; but of late years in this State, material and radical changes have been made in the law of husband and wife, and, in the law of evidence, and the competency and admissibility of witnesses, undermining, in a great degree, the uses of and practically abrogating the common law rule."

MR. FOLGER CITED.

Now, if your Honor pleases, it is the effort of my learned friend to re-establish that rule; to roll back the assumed course of progress and growth of legislation; to ask your Honor to reanimate the abrogated lessons and principles of the past; to rule in defiance not only of the policy but of the mandate of the present law of the State. And, hence, as I before remarked, all the authority, all the principles, all the notions of propriety, of delicacy, of public policy, which have been so eloquently advanced by my learned friend, are disposed of by these adjudications pronounced under a different policy and with different views; and which, as our Court of last resort says, "as abrogated by the legislation of the past few years. I ask attention again, for a moment, to the case cited and commented upon by my learned friend, of Southwick vs. Southwick (49 New York). In that case, if your Honor please, the question presented was whether, in an action brought by the wife against her husband to recover an alleged balance of money they were witnesses for or against each other in the action. Mr. Folger, eminent for his careful and learned analysis of the law, and for his patient industry in the formation of his opinions, says: "

"The first question made in this case is, whether the defendant was properly admitted as a witness in his own behalf against the plaintiff, his wife. It is claimed that the provisions of the Act of 1867 (3 Laws of 1867, p. 23-21), do not enable the defendant to become a witness against his wife in an action in which they are the only antagonistic parties. I have reached the opposite conclusion. It must be conceded that the object of the enactment was to alter the common law rule, which forbade the husband or wife being a witness for or against the other."

I noticed a current remark of our learned adversary that, by the first section of the Act of 1867, although it would enable the wife to be a witness against the husband in an action brought by him against a third party, that it did not render the husband competent. That question, certainly, was considered in this case. The Court stated what was the object and the spirit of the law; and if you will follow the course of legislation, the tardy and reluctant steps by which it has been driven by public sentiment to reach its present condition, even as declared it this very authority, your Honor will find that the law of 1867 was enacted as but a complement to the other invasions upon common law principles previously established; that it was enacted for the very and avowed purpose of making the husband and wife competent for or against each other, with certain exceptions provided for in Section 2; that it was intended to uproot the old policy of the common law upon this subject; and, that the sentimental theories upon which that policy was founded had been abandoned by modern thought and modern enactment—beautiful, charming as they are, and fit subjects for the oratory of my learned friend as they are, but not fit subjects for discussion in a legal argument to a court of justice.

Judge Folger continues:

"I have reached the opposite conclusion. It must be considered that the object of the enactment was to alter the common law, which forbade the husband or wife being a witness for or against the other. Its object was to make available, in the trial of issues of evidence, the classes of witnesses whom the rules of the common law excluded. It designated this class as a husband of any party to the action, and as the wife of any party to the action. It declared that all persons falling within these designations should be competent and compellable to give evidence the same as any other witnesses; it declared, further, that they should be thus competent and compellable on behalf of any party to the action."

Now mark, Sir, the next sentence.

"It is conceded that when the husband or the wife is a party to the action and the other is not, that the husband or the wife so being a party to the action, as the case may be, is within the language of the statute."

That is the statute of 1867, where he is competent and compellable to be a witness. It was conceded, Sir, and assumed by Court and counsel, although this was an action between husband and wife, that if one alone was a party to the action, that one might be a witness in the action. And, Sir, it was upon a grave discussion as to the spirit and effect of this statute of 1867 before a learned Court, conducted by learned counsel; and on all sides it was conceded, it was assumed and declared by the Court as the conclusion accepted by itself, that where the husband or the wife alone was a party as against the third person, that the husband or the wife, as the case might be, was a competent and compellable witness in that action. But it is contended that this language does not disclose an intention that he or she might be a witness for or against the other, where both are parties to the action and antagonistic in it. I ask your Honor's attention to another case in this authority. It is not necessary for me to read, Sir, the introductory review of the authorities—the English authorities and our own—preceding the paragraph which I think important. But speaking of the old rule, he says;

"It was to be maintained for the sake of the present and the future, that by an adherence to the rule, for the public good"—[The public policy of my learned friend]—"that by an adherence to the rule for the public good, married folks might be assured of secrecy; neither death nor divorce could abrogate the rule, so it continued imperative upon the courts, and must after death or divorce be enforced for the sake of the public, though it could no longer help or harm the parties. But the statute in question discards the rule of the common law and abrogates it; and for us, save as to confidential communications, it no longer exists. Husband and wife may now and for the future be witnesses as to all which passes between them not having that quality."

That is the quality of confidential privileged communications. But, Sir, it is said that this is a destruction of conjugal felicity; that in its practical effect it must necessarily introduce wrangle, dissension into the domestic circle, and uproot the policy of unity and union upon which the principles and the decision of the common law rested. Well, Sir, the law should be uniform; if a public policy of that character is to be pursued, it should be universal. There should be no conflict of inconsistency in its application to the varied cases of human life; and how is it to be preserved, if, as our Court of Appeals in this case ruled, husband and wife may sue each other, and husband and wife may be witness against each other? Does it not involve, just as equally as the present example, conflict with this idea of domestic harmony? Is not the unity of the conjugal relation just as directly assailed? Will not discord and enmity in the household be equally nurtured and propagated by allowing husband and wife not only to sue each other, but when they are parties to an action, to be witnesses against each other, each swearing in support of their discordant interest, each testifying to mutual transactions between themselves, each maintaining an opposite theory of fact, and each reflecting upon the credibility and integrity of the other; and if this beautiful idea of unity and union and harmony exists to-day, how comes it that the doctrine of this case is established?

Suppose another case, Sir; suppose a husband brings an action against a third party, not for the seduction of his wife, but for enticing her from his home. These actions are quite common, Sir. Is the husband a witness there, and will anybody dispute it? And, yet, does not that action necessarily involve the quarrels and dissensions of private conjugal life? And in a case of that character the husband was called as a witness, as I will show your Honor. The answer in the case supposed set up that the husband was brutal, unkind; that he provided poorly for his family; that the wife had just and reasonable cause for deserting her home. Why does that not at once suggest dissension, discord, separation, death to the family union? And, yet, the husband is a competent witness for or against himself, and may be called by the defendant against himself to ask the very facts alleged in the answer, and so, Sir, a witness for himself. And there, as between the husband and a third party, are introduced all the elements which strike at the very foundation and life of domestic felicity, utterly inconsistent, Sir, with the idea of my learned friend, and with a continuance of the common law upon which he rests his objection. I may as well here, Sir, refer to the case of 7th Robinson, 581, where, in an action for debauching and enticing away the plaintiff's wife, the answer alleged that the wife was compelled to leave the plaintiff's house by reason of his cruel and inhuman treatment, and immoral conduct, he having introduced a lewd woman into his house and kept her there for purposes of sexual intercourse. Held

"That the plaintiff being examined as a witness for the defendant before trial might be inquired as to the matter set up, and competent to answer."

It makes no difference that he was called against himself, for the rule of exclusion applied equally where the husband or wife was offered for or against her husband, and the principle of the rule of exclusion was equally applicable to the one condition as the other. Now your Honor will bear in mind that in this argument the question as to the inviolability of confidential communications is not involved at all. That is a question of privilege, not of the competency of the witness. As to all other matters husband and wife are competent, but they are not compellable to disclose these confidential communications. And I think, Sir, nine-tenths of the authorities produced by my learned friend from the common law but enunciate that doctrine; and all their beautiful theories are founded upon the idea in regard to these, the conferences and communications which spring out of the intimacy and the faith of conjugal life, neither husband nor wife can disclose them during the lives of the other nor after the death of the one. They are forever sacred—sacred to the privacy of that relation, while they are founded upon the faith of that privacy.

The progress, Sir, of legislation upon this subject has been very ably analyzed and presented by my learned friend; but will your Honor permit me to read again a short extract from the opinion of Justice James, upon which I have already drawn so largely. Your Honor will remember the slow and the struggling course of that legislation. First, Sir, the disability of interest was removed; then the disability of party, so far as to permit an adversary to call an opposite party; then it was removed as to all parties, with some exceptions, as connected with assignees, administrators, &c. Then you will perceive that, up to that period, all the impediments of the common law as to the competency of the witness were removed, except the single one of the disability of marriage. And then came the law of 1867, conceived in the spirit and enacted in the policy declared in the case of Southwick vs. Southwick, 49th N. Y. For the purpose of opening all the avenues of truth founded upon a confidence, not only in the integrity, but in the intelligence of human nature:—first, in the integrity that, under the solemn sanction of an oath, witnesses would tell the truth; and, second, upon the intelligence of the Court and jury, that, if the witness wandered from the truth, the error could be detected and repaired. And so, Sir, Mr. Justice James says:

"Of late years material changes have been made in the law of husband and wife, both in this country and in England, but particularly in this State. The wife has been admitted to separate rights of property, and as a consequence to separate rights of action, even as against the husband himself. The marriage contract has lost its ancient feature of indissolubility, and actions between parties for the breach of it are constantly before the Courts, in the case of an action between these persons, whether in regard to some disputed property, or by the husband for a divorce, or by the wife for a separation. It is idle to assert that they stand before the Court in that amicable attitude in which in civil suits they invariably stood at common law. Radical changes have also been effected within the last sixteen years in the law of evidence and the admissibility of witnesses. England took the initiatory step by the passage of Lord Denman's Act of 1843. Its general feature was that no person offered as a witness in a civil case should be excluded by reason of incapacity from crime or from interest, with the proviso that the same should not extend to the party to the record, and some others enumerated, nor the husband and wife of such person respectively. Lord Brougham's Act was passed in 1851. The first section repealed all the proviso of Lord Denman's Act except that relating to husband and wife. The second section made the parties to actions competent witnesses. The third section made husbands and wives of parties in criminal proceedings incompetent; and the fourth section rendered the statute inapplicable to actions founded upon adultery or breach of promise of marriage."

But, Sir, I will not trouble your Honor with reading more.

Judge Neilson—Will it be convenient to suspend here for recess?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; I had hoped to conclude my argument before the recess, but I can suspend here.

The Court then took a recess of an hour.

MR. BEACH'S OWN WORDS TURNED AGAINST HIM.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Beach resumed his address.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, as I understood the argument of the learned gentleman upon the other side, it was divided into two branches; the first rested upon the ancient rule and policy of the common law, and the other was founded upon the special legislation of this State. The first I have considered so far as it appears to me important or justifiable in view of the argument of my learned colleague, and I pass from it with the single remark that this case presents this singular peculiarity, that the defendant hitherto has published his demand to all the world for the production of all possible evidence that could be produced against him. To all the earth he has given a public challenge demanding that everybody who can throw any light upon this mixed and troubled controversy should appear and present it. To-day, through his counsel, he seeks to close the principal avenue of evidence. To his adversary, whom, a while ago, he called upon to appear before his chosen tribunal and exhibit his proofs, he makes the objection of incompetency. It is not for me to say, Sir, whether the confidence of that challenge rested upon the circumstance that the revelations were to be made before his own chosen judges, appointed by and ruled by himself, and that to-day that challenge is answered before a reliable and competent tribunal and under the sanction of judicial law. At any rate, it is a remarkable inconsistency, and the imagination will necessarily rove in the fancy for the reasons which should thus have altered the tone of confidence and defiance on the part of this defendant.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TRIAL.

But, Sir, this litigation, although represented by my learned friend as a mercenary pursuit upon the part of this plaintiff of money compensation, to which I shall allude hereafter, is by no means an action of that character. It includes questions of higher interest to the community and to the parties. Its object is far purer and mightier than the mere consideration of damages. It looks to the vindication of one for whom vindication is necessary—that is, the plaintiff in this action. It involves the question whether a prominent and eminent leader of the Christianity of the age is to be stricken down by the scorn and condemnation of mankind; and the vast interest which rolls around this case, as connected with these public and far-reaching consequences, is a far higher and greater consideration than the technical and simple question of the ultimate judgment for mere damages which is to be expected alone from this Jury. Undoubtedly, Sir, the counsel for this defendant, in the pursuit of their duty, are quite entitled to present any technical objection to the admission of evidence which may to their judgment appear appropriate and proper; but, whether they know it or not, those objections which seek to exclude light and to still hide in darkness the alleged sin of this defendant, reflect no credit upon his character, and will not aid in the effort at his justification.

MORE ABOUT JUSTICE SMITH'S DECISION.

I pass now, Sir, to a very brief consideration of the Law of 1867, and the decision of Mr. Justice Smith, and as I read that decision, Sir, far greater import has been given to it than it deserves. Your Honor will be good enough to perceive that the simple question decided in this case is that the husband, in an action brought by himself for criminal conversation with his wife, was not a competent witness to prove the fact of marriage, and that fact alone. He was not offered as a witness generally in the case to sustain the allegation of seduction, but, as the statement of the case and the opinion of the Court says, the single proposition of fact to which he was tendered was to prove the marriage between himself and his wife. And mark the reason of the Court. After the statement of the case, which is:

"At the trial at the Onondaga Circuit, the plaintiff, to prove his marriage, was offered as a witness on his own behalf. This was objected to by the defendant, the objection sustained, and the evidence excluded, to which the plaintiff excepted."

It is not necessary to state, Sir, the preliminary circumstances which led to the necessity of his being offered upon that single and exclusive fact, but the Court say:

"It has long been settled that in actions for criminal conversation and divorce, and in prosecutions for bigamy, an actual marriage must be proved, and that in these cases the cohabitation of the parties as man and wife, their declarations or admissions, or the reputation of an existing marriage, or the plaintiff's acknowledgment of the woman as his wife, and holding her out as such to his friends and acquaintances, and her reception in the family as such, are not sufficient to maintain the suit."

And he refers to a number of authorities, and says:

"The proof offered by the witness Dann, the plaintiff, was of the class held sufficient, and was properly excluded within these cases."

And that was the ruling, and that was the whole extent of the decision. Then it was argued on the part of the appellant that he was a witness, made a witness under the Act of 1867, and the Court passed upon that very grave and important question with the simple remark, read by my learned colleague, but which I wish to repeat: "The plaintiff was not a competent witness." For what? Not a competent witness in the case? No, Sir: he was not offered as such; he was not passed upon as such. The plaintiff was not a competent witness to prove such marriage, and to that extent, and to that only, did the Court construe the application of the Act of 1867. The Court proceeds to say:

"The Act of 1867, to enable husband and wife to be witnesses for or against each other, expressly excepts the cases where the question of adultery of the husband or the wife is in controversy, except to prove a former marriage in case of bigamy, and the fact of marriage in actions for divorce."

And with that single remark, Sir, without any examination of previous authorities, without any investigation of the principle or the policy of the Act of 1867, the Court passes that very important question. I submit to your Honor that in itself it is not a decision upon the point which is now presented, where the plaintiff is offered as a witness generally in the case, not only as to the fact of seduction or adultery, but to all the other questions of collateral importance, and upon collateral issues which have arisen and will necessarily arise in the course of the investigation. Now, Sir, I think I may be pardoned in making one single additional suggestion, sufficiently intimated perhaps, by my learned colleague, upon this law of 1867. It has been read to your Honor. By its first section it makes husband and wife competent witnesses in all cases, without any limitation. Comments upon this Act expressive of its spirit, and policy, and effect, I have read to your Honor from the decisions of the Court of Appeals. Its object, its purpose was to remove that single remaining impediment from the competency of all witnesses in all cases, subject to the limitations contained in section 2 of the Act. That is declared by the court of last resort. Now, the error of Justice Smith arose from a superficial consideration of the limitations contained in section 2. He evidently misapprehended the effect of that section; evidently he misapplied it, as the ordinary common sense and intelligence of any gentleman will lead him to perceive on listening to the simple reading of the section:

"Nothing herein contained shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other."

In any of the actions enumerated, of which we may assume this to be one. Now, Sir, the test, the soul of this section is the words "for or against each other." By the first section they are made competent witnesses in all actions and upon all occasions and between all parties. The Legislature then say that section shall not be construed as qualifying them as witnesses for or against each other. Is not that, Sir, the clear reading, the plain, intelligible, unambiguous language of the statute, and before either is disqualified under that section, must it not appear that he or she is offered as a witness for or against the other? And is it conceivable that any judicial mind brought deliberately to the consideration of that section can misconceive its import and the principle which it intends to announce, that principle being simply, although the impediments of the common law are removed, although the ideas of the unity of the marriage relation are exploded, although the fact of actions between husband and wife, and testimony from husband and wife, may destroy the sentiments of the connubial relation, nevertheless they shall not be witnesses for or against each other. Then the question at once arises, Sir, in an action of this character, brought against the seducer, is the husband competent to testify against him? And still, leaning upon the exploded notions of the common law, my friend contends he is not, because it would interrupt and destroy the unity and harmony of the conjugal relation.

But, Sir, this is not an action against the wife. She is not a party. As is conceded, she cannot be a witness. It seeks no remedy against her. It asks no judgment against her; and whatever may be the final determination of this action, she yet stands before the world and the law as the legal wedded wife of Theodore Tilton. Whatever judgment you may enter is powerless to strip her of a single wifely right. She is the wife of this plaintiff, entitled to all the legal consideration, a claimant for all the legal duties arising out of that relation. And how, then, can the testimony of the husband in this cause be considered as either for or against her? Those terms must be applied in a legal sense. He must be a witness against her in a legal meaning. She must be a party, or else the judgment must be such as will affect and conclude her interests. I have shown your Honor, I think, that no such consequences can be claimed from the result of this litigation. To-morrow or to-day she might file her bill for a divorce. To-morrow or to-day she might commence her action for a legal separation and for alimony. To-morrow or to-day, girded by the law of the land, notwithstanding her inexcusable desertion of her husband's home, she may appear on its threshold and demand admission as wife. Does anybody dispute it? Are the difficulties between these two parties at all affected by the miserable occurrence of the past year or of the past four years? No, Sir; and my friends perceive, must perceive, this attitude, this relation as between this husband and wife.

Now, my friend has referred you to the case in 46 Barbour, showing that this is the true construction of the language of this section, "for or against each other," showing in an action of crim.

con. as between the husband and the seducer, the wife has no such legal relation to the litigation as to constitute an interest in herself, and by abundant authority he has shown you that that other idea of the exclusion of the one or the other on account of the effect or object of the testimony when offered to stigmatize or criminate the other, is exploded by the authorities of this and of sister States. I will not again refer, Sir, as I had intended, to the decision of Southwick vs. Southwick, in the 49 of New York. If your Honor shall be inclined to examine the case, I think you will find that it sustains the views which have been presented.

CLOSING OBSERVATIONS ON THE OBJECTION.

Now, Sir, what is left of the objection? Under the light of this legislation and these authorities, with these judicial commentaries upon the spirit and effect of the successive acts remaining, the impediments to the introduction of witnesses, and to the light of all possible evidence, it being shown that the doctrines of the common law have been exploded by recent legislation, it having been over and over again asserted by the highest court of this State, what remains, I repeat, of the objection, and why is it, either upon authority or upon principle, that this plaintiff is excluded from that witness stand?

DARKER ASPECTS OF THE CASE.

I am at a loss, Sir, to perceive upon what theory, upon what principle, upon what principle either of policy or of law, that exclusion can be maintained. I know that evidence may be drawn from this witness, if sworn, which will reflect upon the chastity and the honor of his wife. I know that fact has given and will give to my learned friend an opportunity to decant upon the horrid and the barbarous appearance of such disagreement and controversy between parties so hoily and dearly connected; and he has drawn a painful and pitiful picture of the deserted and wronged wife, dishonored and crushed by the testimony of a husband in eager chase after the gold of his adversary. He has presented this wife in an argumentative allegory, as listening to the accusations of her husband, hearing the revelation of her confessed dishonor published to all the world, and yet compelled to sit silent, without a possible answer from her lips to the supposed calumny. But the answer of the law is that which I have already given, Sir, that she is not interested in the event of this suit, that her rights are unimpaired and untouched, and she may claim all the privileges of the relation existing between her and the plaintiff. But that picture, Sir, has another side. Will that be the first revelation of her asserted guilt? Will the testimony from the lips of the husband be the first dark shadow which gathers upon her womanly and wifely character? In this or in any other conceivable case of seduction, is it the action like this, or the testimony in the action like this, which crushes and ruins womanhood? No, Sir, no, Sir. The shame, the disgrace, the destruction which this wife suffers, and must suffer, starts earlier in the history of this unfortunate transaction. It is not the husband who reveals the wife's dishonor; it is the seducer, Sir. Long before this action was commenced, the dark cloud had enshrouded this wife. This action was not commenced until that wife, stimulated by her seducer, had deserted the house of her husband. This action was not commenced until that wife, led by that seducer, appeared before his chosen tribunal, and vented her spleen and indignation against this husband. Long before this action was commenced, the shadow had fallen over that household, and a happy and honored home was distracted and dissevered. The argument does not apply, Sir. The picture is not appropriate to this occasion or this case. It is not appropriate to any occasion, because I assert it as an invariable principle, that the dishonor and the ruin which follows the path of the seducer commences long before the husband is apprised of his own dishonor. It comes, Sir, in alienated love; it comes in inevitable discord and contention; it comes, at last, in the clear revelation to the distracted heart of the husband of his wife's seduction and dishonor. Whatever may be said by Theodore Tilton upon that stand will not add a jot or tittle to the agony, the shame or the remorse of that wife.

MONEY NOT BOUGHT BY THE PLAINTIFF.

But this is a suit for money, Sir; my client is represented as thus treading over the reputation and the honor of his wife in a greedy chase after the gold of this defendant. Why, Sir, did not the counsel know better? If not, his associate and your Honor know better. How long ago was it that in this cause, and before your Honor, the proffer was made to abandon this action for damages, if my learned friends would but press forward their intimation for a libel in asserting the adultery of this defendant with his wife. Theodore Tilton seeks no damages from this defendant. He would not stain and burn his palm with his gold; but he seeks, Sir, a vindication. The sin of this defendant has followed him with destructive efficacy. This defendant has gathered around him the comments and the condemnation of society; his fortunes have been prostrated. Those consequences which always follow in the path of guilt, and especially of this sin, have clung to him with an iron tenacity. Must he sit silent, Sir? Is there no redress? For the wronged husband and the violated home, does the law afford no vengeance? Why, Sir, it is, I think, a shame, although I believe I differ with my learned colleague in that respect; but I think it a burning shame to the law of this State, and of every other State where that law is wanting, that the seducer may not be pursued as a criminal; that licentiousness of this character is not punished by the heaviest judgment of the law, as it was condemned and punished by that infallible law which knows no error. But no remedy is given, Sir. What must Theodore Tilton do? Must he suffer the animadversions of society? Must he lose wife and home, and see the seducer triumphant flourishing, glorying in his impunity, the happiest man in all this assembly? [Applause.] Does the law afford no redress? None adequate, Sir; and the only resource left to my client, given him by the law, was this action, or to take that other remedy condemned by the law of the State, but sanctioned by the common law of humanity, which reaches the heart and the life of the seducer. And had he done that, Sir, instead of standing before your Honor in his appeal for vindication and justice, he would have been arraigned as a criminal, and in danger of his life. But yet my friends reproach us for bringing this action. "You should be quiet, Mr. Tilton; you should not venture to accuse Henry Ward Beecher of adultery, because, forsooth, it implicates and criminales your wife; you have lost her love and society; it has been won from you by the specious seductions of this defendant. Your home is desecrated and dishonored and your fortunes withered and destroyed, and the seducer, I repeat, is glorying in his impunity from punishment. But, still, be quiet; and, if you venture to adopt the only remedy which the law gives you, eloquent counsel shall hold you up to the scorn and contempt of a Court and a jury and all mankind."

Well, Sir, to my mind there is something excessively repugnant in this idea of a civil action founded upon seduction. It hurts the better sentiments of our nature. It revolts that affection upon which family and home rest, and upon which society and government depend. But, when the law leaves no other remedy than that; aye, Sir, when the law gives to the dishonored husband no other revenge but that, consistently with its own teachings, it ill becomes the ministers of the law to reproach the husband who resorts to that redress. Now, Sir, I am aware that these thoughts and remarks are not pertinent to this discussion. They do not belong to the law of this argument; and, it is only because my learned friend, in his specious and insidious way, sought to inculcate this idea of disgrace and dishonor from the mere fact of bringing this action that I have wandered from the correct path of discussion, for the purpose of remedying that great mistake and wrong. This is all, Sir, I have to submit to your Honor. I can but repeat the spirit of the argument which my learned colleague and myself have addressed to you. I can but implore you, out of regard for the great interests involved in your decision of this question, out of regard for those great questions of law and of public policy which are necessarily involved in the discussion and in the decision, to examine it with deliberation and care (if the attention of your Honor has not already been directed to this question), and to give us a decision which shall be in harmony with the spirit, if I may call it, of our present civilization; a decision which shall not stand in repugnance to the principles which have been announced so repeatedly, so emphatically, by the highest Courts of our State.

DEFENSE'S COUNSEL CLOSE THE ARGUMENT.

Mr. Evarts replied to the arguments of Gen. Pryor and Mr. Beach, closing—as he had opened—the question on the part of the defense. His arguments occupied the remainder of the day. Judge Neilson will deliver a verbal decision on the question Monday morning.

MR. EVARTS'S REPLY.

Mr. Evarts—The aversion that my learned friend avows to this money action by a husband respecting the honor of his wife is an aversion that is shared by the law, and by morals, and by society. And, what my learned friend well understands, and your Honor, it never was tolerated in the remedies of jurisprudence upon its own motive or for its own sake. It was in the system of the judicial procedures of the country from which we take our law, only as a step of sincere and honest investigation, before a jury, of the fact; because the final remedy of the law which gave, for this great cause, divorce, could only be exerted by Parliament; not upon petitions or examinations in committee rooms and by confessions and collusions, but what the law regarded as an open and sincere investigation of the fact, in which the husband, governed by every consideration that should withhold him if he was not sincere, impelled to it by no possibility of motive, except the requirements of the law that forbade his divorce, except by this public demonstration of the reality of the crime, should, before a jury and in the form of an action against the injurer of his domestic peace, establish the fact, in order that Parliament might grant him a divorce upon that established fact. And when the English law gave to ordinary judicial inquiries the method and the result of divorce upon judicial investigation, it suppressed the iniquity and the disgrace of the action for criminal conversation; permitted no husband, who did not pursue his wife with the honest purpose of divorce, to open his mouth or raise his hand against her in any court of justice; permitted only a union of a co-respondent, the deceiver as a part of the procedure of divorce, and excluded a husband who "had condoned his wife's fault"—and so never could be heard to ask for a divorce—from raising the question of inquiry or of proof against any alleged deceiver. And now it is to the credit of our jurisprudence, and the morality and dignity and manliness of our people, that while now for a long time our courts have had this jurisdiction of divorce, cases for criminal conversation have disappeared from the annals of our law, except in the very lower ranks of life and under the grave suspicion that it was for lucre's sake that the action was brought. And why? No longer necessary by a system of law that made the investigation useful or important toward a divorce, the sincerity of a husband who did not desire divorce and yet did desire money or vengeance (as my learned friend has not scrupled to call the motive of this action) was not treated by the law as consistent with the morals of society or with the purposes of the administration of justice. The solemn, the universal injunction of the law to a husband who finds fault thus in his wife is that he shall then speak or forever after hold his tongue; and if he pardons and renews the embraces of marriage, no Court hears his further complaint in any desire of separation from his wife. In England the same fact closes all inquiry, in every form, concerning the fact thus buried forever and destroyed.

Now, if your Honor please, in all that I had to say concerning the presentation of this plaintiff as a witness, to prove his wife's adultery. I spoke wholly upon the principles and the theory of law and society, I gave him the benefit of the proposition, of the basis of the argument, that he was coming here to prove the thing, and that it must be assumed, for the purpose of my argument, to your Honor that what proof he gave would tend in that direction, and might produce that result. And my learned friend has found in that an excuse, in the middle of the plaintiff's case, to assume for invective and vituperation, as in a closed and completed trial, the truth of the charges against this defendant. So imprudent, so injurious a method to the cause of this plaintiff, but one consideration could have misled my learned friend into, and that was this—that at no future stage of this case would the state of the proofs have given him such support and justification as now.

Now, if your Honor please, what is the question of law, and how have the authorities and the discussions of my learned friend varied from or impugned any proposition that I make? We are discussing the question of the admissibility of this plaintiff upon the law of evidence and the law of the married relation, as they concurrently exist in this State at the present time. And I submitted to your Honor, and I do not find any impression made to the contrary of this proposition, that, under the Code, dealing with the law of evidence in its general direction, there is no pretence that it opens the mouth of the husband or wife in any regard whatever where the principles of the common law excluded them. My learned friends have thought it worth their while to occupy a great part of their attention, and of the time of the court, in a careful examination of a series of decisions which were based upon a law of 1857, concerning evidence, a provision in the Code which, by some unhappy constructions, or some unfortunate looseness, let in the idea that in opening witnesses who formerly were excluded for interest, thereby husband and wife were admissible on the ground that interest was the basis of their exclusion. Those cases of Potter vs. Marsh, and Wehrkamp vs. Willett, and several other cases cited in that connection, whether the reason was good or bad, whether it was ineffectual or whether it gave some practical rule or not, have all become unimportant for this present discussion, because that regulation of the law of evidence has been repealed, and the general law of evidence stands now upon the Code as it has read since 1869, which by no possibility can be tortured into any other effect than the generalization that interest shall no longer exclude, and that the fact of being a party shall not place that party on any other plane of being a witness than if he were not a party. Now, my learned friend who first addressed you for the introduction of the witness no doubt undertook to say and to think that there was something in that state of the law that I have spoken of that in terms permitted the introduction of the husband or wife as witnesses. And so far as there was a phrase of that kind, it was, perhaps, in great part, the basis of the reasoning which finally came to an end by the experience of the community, of the profession, and of the Judges, which led to the final position on the subject of the general rules of evidence found in the Code of 1869. All the reasoning, then, of Judge James, in this case of Potter vs. Marsh, is wholly unimportant now. And that Judge James himself, before the change of the statutory law, did not regard the doctrine of competency for husband and wife, now contended for, as embraced in the then state of the law, is to be found in the case of Chamberlain vs. the People, in the Court of Appeals, in the 23d of New-York. I read from page 88:

"In thus holding, it does not follow that the evidence given on the hearing was admissible. On the contrary, I am clearly of the opinion that it was not. A rule of law intervenes to prevent it. It is well settled that neither husband nor wife are competent to prove non-access during wedlock, whatever may be the form of legal proceedings or whosoever may be the parties thereto"—citing the case to which I call your Honor's attention. "This rule was established independently of any possible motives of interest in the particular case, upon principles of public policy and decency, and it has not been and was not intended to be changed or affected by the Code."

Mr. Beach—Mr. Evarts, will you permit me to refer you to a paragraph in that case which adopts and approves the decision of Potter vs. Marsh, in the 30 of Barbour—a preceding paragraph which you did not observe?

Mr. Evarts—But the difficulty is that the Court did not concur in that observation.

Mr. Beach—Certainly; it was in the opinion of the same Judge.

THE GAUNTLET OF DEBATE DROPPED AND ACCEPTED.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, but not of the Court; the Court did not pass upon the question of the competency of husband and wife as witnesses against each other generally in a suit between them. Now, that was a point upon which Justice James continued his observations that he had made in Potter vs. Marsh. But, notwithstanding those observations and his adherence to them, he did not pretend that the rule, as he contended for it in Potter vs. Marsh, covered the proposition that the husband or wife could not testify against the credit and fame of the other. It must then appear very plain to your Honor that the law governing the admissibility of husband or wife as witnesses against or for one another in suits, all suits, finds its present home and support, limits and authority, in the statute of 1867. Will my learned friends point to any statute in this State that enables husband and wife to testify, at the present moment, except that statute of 1867? I challenge contradiction of that proposition. That law is the only statutory authority enabling or restricting—within the ability conferred—husband and wife to appear as witnesses for or against one another in the cases that are within its purview.

Mr. Beach—That challenge should not go entirely unanswered, Sir. By reference to the case of Southwick vs. Southwick in the 49th of New-York, your Honor will perceive, without an examination of previous determinations, that it was considered as an open question upon which there was considerable diversity of judicial sentiment, whether or not husband and wife were made competent witnesses for or against each other by the enactments of the Code of Procedure, by those enactments of the Code which at present abolish the incompetency on the ground of interest or of being a party to the action. And all the decisions which are culminated in the remarks in the 49th New-York were passed, not upon the peculiar provisions of the section of the Code of 1837, but upon the proposition that the disabilities of interest and of being parties to the action have been abolished.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I do not understand my challenge to be met, for I do not understand that there is now a proposition, in any of the courts of this State, that, under the general removal of interest as a bar to competency, husband and wife come in, or, that under the provision that being a party shall not exclude as a witness, there is any enabling authority in a party to testify beyond what he could as a witness if he were not a party. Now, the case in the 9th of New-York to which I call your Honor's attention, while these vague, uncertain determinations and loose language of the Code still remained the subjects of judicial debate, settled finally that the removal of the disqualification of interest did not introduce husband and wife, but that they stood upon the law of marriage. I need add but one authority to those to which I call your Honor's attention, and that is of the greatest authority, and the present modern law as declared by that great authority. I mean the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Lucas vs. Brooks, in the 18th of Wallace's Reports, page 452, decided in October, 1873. The first is that the Court refused to admit in evidence the deposition of Catherine Lucas, the wife of the defendant; that it is a rule of the common law, a wife cannot be received as a witness for or against her husband, except in suits between them, or in criminal cases where he is prosecuted for wrong done to her, is not controverted. But, it is argued, because Congress has enacted that in civil actions in the courts of the United States, there shall be no exclusion of any witness because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried, the wife is competent to testify for her husband. Now, that is the very question that has been argued at such length.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no—

Mr. Evarts—On the effect of these earlier statutes and of the Code.

Mr. Beach—Oh!

Mr. Evarts—The only question which you argued upon that, was precisely that. Undoubtedly the Act of Congress has cut up by the roots all objections to the competency of a witness on account of interest; but the objection to the wife's testifying on behalf of her husband is not and never has been that she has any interest in the issue to which he is a party. It rests solely upon public policy. To that the statute has no application. Now, in the case, "In re Rideout's Trusts," (10th of Equity Cases, Law Reports, English,) Vice-Chancellor James holds, when appealed to to say that this legislation in regard to the admissibility of evidence, let in the husband and wife—

Mr. Beach—What page is that?

Mr. Evarts—Page 44.

"Now, I do not like to say that the effect of the statute is to supersede the old rule. If it be so, it will now be in the power of any husband or wife alone to bastardize issue. I am afraid you must give me some other evidence."

Chief Justice Redfield, in Vermont, an authority well known to us both in his judicial capacity as general commentator, rules in the case of Manchester vs. Manchester, that a wife cannot become a witness under the Act of 1852 for or against her husband in any civil suit or proceeding, the Act of 1852 being the Act concerning the removal of disability of interest, and being a party and equal in all respects to our Statute. Word for word, my learned friend says, with our statute. And, may it please your Honor, by the law of this State, there never was any pretense that the rule of marital exclusion was restricted to cases where the conjux, the party in the marriage, to be affected is a party even to cases where at least one was a party. The rule was amended in Babcock vs. Booth, where neither was a party, a case precisely like Hasbrouck vs. Vandervoort in the 9th of New-York, where neither was a party and where the husband was excluded because his wife had an interest although his wife would have been competent.

In O'Connor vs. Majoribanks (5th Scott, new R.), neither was a party and yet the wife was excluded; and this, the leading English case, is fully recognized and adopted as representing the true rule of the Court of Appeals, as I have shown your Honor in the case of Hasbrouck vs. Vandervoort and Southwick vs. Southwick.

The case of the Royal Insurance Co. vs. Noble, in the 5th of Abbott, in the Court of Common Pleas of the City of New-York, a court of the same important jurisdiction with your Honor's Court, Judge Barrett says:

"I am still of the opinion that the facts stated in the affidavit of King are admissible. The evidence of husband and wife is undoubtedly receivable in a collateral proceeding for the purpose of proving any fact material to the issue, and that although the facts so testified to by the one may tend to criminate or contradict the other. The fact is admitted as bearing upon the issue, and that without reference to its tendency; but there is no authority for admitting either husband or wife in any proceeding whatever for the sole and direct purpose of impeaching the other's testimony."

And why not? Because it was an attack upon the other in regard to morality, in regard to crime.

Roscoe, on the law vis à vis, the same commentator whom my learned friend cited on the criminal law, says:

"So, though not a party to the suit, neither the wife nor husband of an incompetent witness was competent."

Now the proposition is made that, in the present state of our laws, although this husband would be excluded from maintaining, as a witness, the issue of his wife's adultery (which is the only issue in this case), although he be excluded from that, if adultery were criminally punishable in our courts, yet the rules of law which protect the husband and wife against each other's testimony are regulated and controlled by the proposition whether the public law makes it a crime. Well, now, that is a novel proposition, and for some causes in which the courts of other States have been led into the proposition rather apparently to find some rule of demarkation than being satisfied upon the principle, for the leading case from New-Jersey, relied upon by our learned friend, was a case where the learned Judge refuses the proposition made to him to enlarge the rule of admission even over that obstacle—refuses to do so, states his own opinion that it ought to cover the question of adultery, even when adultery is not a crime, and then excludes the witness because adultery was a crime, and therefore in either view the law was to be excluded. I say that is a novelty. For all the English doctrine grew up and was enforced under a system of the law where adultery was not a crime, and yet it is spoken of as a crime in the courts. It is spoken of as criminating the party. It is spoken of as within the rule that a witness is not compelled to criminate himself. He was not obliged to admit, in answer to questions for a true sexual connection, adulteries or not adulteries, that would criminate himself. When, therefore, our courts and the English courts lay down the rule that a husband or wife shall not be allowed to testify to any matters that criminate the other, nobody in England was shrewd enough to raise the objection that that means the crime that can be best punished by fine or imprisonment under statute or common law. These bastardy cases involved nothing but adultery, and yet the mouths of husband and wife were closed upon that. Why? Because it criminated the other party to the conjugal relation.

RECENT DECISIONS CITED TO SUSTAIN OBJECTION.

Now, the law of all these States confessedly excludes, both from the maintenance of the public justice or of any private remedies, the testimony of the husband or the wife to the adultery of the other. Maine, New-Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New-Jersey and North Carolina, those States also having statutes, make adultery criminal. Now, no case is produced in this State that undertakes to say that in an action of this kind the wife or husband may thus criminate the other upon an issue of adultery, because it is not made a public crime. And the English cases to which I now call your attention conclusively show that in that country the legal epithet and description of charges of this kind is criminal and incriminating. I refer your Honor to Faussett vs. Faussett, in the 7th note of ecclesiastical cases, pages 72, 94.

"It is true this is not a criminal proceeding,"—this was in the ecclesiastical court—"to lead to any punishment of the nature of fine or imprisonment, but nevertheless in every suit for a divorce by reason of adultery itself, a question of guilty or not guilty of a crime," and the evidence is excluded.

The case of King vs. King, in 2d Robertson English Ecclesiastical Reports, Dr. Lushington says:

"The right of a party to exclude answers depends on the form of proceeding. If the suit be prosecuted by articles, an account can answers be at all exacted. In a civil case a contrary rule prevails. Answers are due, but ingrafted on that rule is this exception: that the party giving his answers is entitled to object to answer to so much of a plea as may criminate him. The question which I have now to determine is whether the husband is entitled to final answers to his libel. When I suggested to counsel to confine themselves to the 16th article of the libel, I did so considering that the validity of the agreement would be better tried on that than the other articles. Looking at the averment standing in that article without reference to any other part of the libel it would certainly be extremely difficult for me to say there is any circumstance which could criminate the wife; but unless those averments tend in some way to establish the charge against her, I cannot understand why they were introduced. The chain of evidence is to be completed by a line of links. How far any one may be important or unimportant, I am not in a position to determine."

And that, at that stage of the proof, although on the mere purport of the questions, it might not appear that it tended to criminate her in this sense concerning adultery, yet that she should not be compelled to answer in that behalf until it appeared that the effect of the questions was wholly innocent.

The case of Schultes vs. Hodgson, 1st Adams Ecclesiastical Reports, English, the question was in an ecclesiastical case touching the party's manner of correction of his excesses, more especially touching and concerning the crimes of fornication, adultery and incontinency committed by him and complained thereof.

"In criminal suits the defendant's answers upon oath are not to be required even to thus adduce the positions which are not in themselves criminatory."

But that is enough for us, if your Honor please, on this question—enough of authorities on this question—which in my learned friend's apprehension has nothing substantial in respect to the quality of the acts complained of to base a decision upon. It is made to rest entirely, not upon the quality of the act as criminal and in the appreciation of society, but upon the pretense of the Legislature in making it, or not making it a public crime.

In the case of Southwick vs. Southwick, Rexford, in the 6th of Cowan, page 254, the question arises in the form of whether a witness was bound or not to answer a question that carried that degree of imputation to him of illicit sexual connection, and the testimony was excluded, and the Court of Error upheld it as justifiably excluded, on the ground that it came within the law which protects a witness against criminating himself, and yet there was no indictable offense.

Mr. Beach—On the ground that the witness was not compelled to disgrace himself.

Mr. Evarts—The very cases I have read, in England, on the crimes of fornication, adultery and incontinency, a witness would not answer, and yet they were not indictable offenses. A very famous case, in which Lord Mansfield laid down the general rules of evidence as bearing upon a case of this kind, that is, a case of criminal conversation, establishing the proposition as the English law, that the action was called a criminal, and treated as a criminal one, though treated on the civil side of the court, and the same rigor and fullness of proofs is required on the part of a plaintiff in an action of this kind, as is required by the law for the conviction of a defendant in a criminal case, and under that the rule was established which occasioned so much inconvenience in the case of Dann vs. Kingdom, that the marriage must be proved in an action of crim. con. with the same formality and distinctness as in a criminal indictment, and that marriage by reputation could not be proved. So much, then, for that view.

Now, the question is also raised by our learned friends that this is not an action in which the husband is on one side, and the wife on the other. Wherever, if your Honor please, the issue is of the wife's adultery it is not a collateral suit; it is not a collateral proceeding; it is not an action of libel for imputed adultery to the husband or the wife; it is not an action for perjury, concerning evidence given on such a trial; it is the very trial itself in which the plaintiff proposes, as the cause of his action in his complaint, the adultery of the wife, and seeks his remedy against the defendant as the guilty party accomplishing that adultery with his wife. And, now, what becomes of the provisions of this law of 1867, which expressly says that its enabling clauses in respect to removal of disqualifications of witnesses that are husband and wife, shall not include the permission of any wife or husband to testify for or against the other in an action of criminal conversation. Did your Honor ever hear of an action of criminal conversation in which the husband was the plaintiff, and the wife a formal defendant? And, yet, this whole statute is stultified if this antagonism between husband and wife on this issue of the adultery of the wife is not one of those issues, and thus a form of action respecting that issue, which the second section of the statute of 1867 has denounced as not being within the competency according to testimony of husband and wife. I think my learned friends can make no answer to that, nor can any judicial astuteness find a reply to it. The meaning of the Legislature is plain. It is a meaning based upon, and in conformity with, the exclusions which the English statutes have retained, although in the race of liberalism in respect to testimony the English statutes have, if anything, outrun our own. But they have held on to this, though they open the mouths of husband and wife, as our statute does, in ordinary forms of legislation, and on ordinary issues they have, and we, following them, have opened the mouth of husband and wife to no single jot or tittle of evidence in an action in which adultery forms the subject of inquiry, whether it be divorce, bigamy or criminal conversation.

Mr. Pryor—Or breach of promise of marriage.

Mr. Evarts—That is not necessary for my purpose. Now, in this very valuable treatise of Taylor on Evidence, Vol. 2. page 1172, where the statutes are reviewed and presented in due collocation, that have enlarged the competency of witnesses either in respect of interest or as parties, or in connection with the marriage relation, he says:

"The first class of persons whose evidence is in general excluded comprises the parties to any suit or proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery. Any proceedings which have their origin based upon a fact of adultery has the support of the judicial inquiry," and this following the statute it is applied—and the citation I now read from is on page 1,177—in terms of inclusion to these actions:

"Although on proceedings for judicial separation, by reason of adultery, for dissolution of marriage, and for damages against the supposed adulterer, the parties to the record are, except to the limited extent just mentioned, incompetent witnesses, this doctrine of exclusion does not extend to other statutes instituted in the Divorce Court,"

—that is, suits for separation for cruelty, as your Honor knows, and other classes of limited divorce by the English law.

Now, there is no case in our courts in which it has been held that a witness, as matter of law, that a witness, husband or wife, could be a witness in a crim. con. case since the enlargement of the law of evidence. In Bunnell vs. Greathead (49 Barb., 109) it does not appear that the objection was taken at the trial; and it does appear from the grounds on which the new trial was asked that the objection could not have been raised at the General Term. My learned friend has referred to that case as a case that was considered both at Special and at General Term. The exception was not taken at Special Term. Of course it could not be taken at General Term. The motion for a new trial at General Term was on the ground that the verdict was excessive; of surprise, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and of newly discovered evidence, not matter of error, as your Honor notices, any of them.

Now, in Dann vs. Kingdom we have the points here, and the matter was presented to the Court by the plaintiff there at General Term, and judgment of the Court in both, upon reason and authority, and the result of that judgment is as has been stated.

In Hicks vs. Bradner (3 Abb. Ct. App. Dec., p. 362,) the plaintiff was not a witness, and was not offered.

In Petrie vs. Howe (4 Supreme Ct. Rep.) the objection was not taken, as appears by the case and points.

In Taylor vs. Jennings, in the seventh of Robertson, the question of the exclusion of testimony injuriously affecting the con-jux of the witness was not involved. The question was whether (in an action to charge his wife with adultery) the plaintiff could refuse to testify as to his own adultery.

Now, my learned friends have said that Rex vs. Cliviger has been overruled, and the cases of Rex vs. All Saints, and Rex vs. Bathwick have been referred to. An examination of these cases will show what we supposed we well understood before, that Rex vs. Cliviger in its decision is not overruled, but only is a more comprehensive dicta or reason of the Court going beyond the decision here reduced by the subsequent reasoning of these cases. And, as we called your Honor's attention to the matter before, the value of Rex vs. Cliviger remains unimpaired for authority in this State, because it is expressly approved by the Court of Appeals in the case in the 9th of New-York, of Habrouck vs. Vandervoort, and no questions of its authority are presented.

Now, with the statute in its text, and some comments upon that, I shall have concluded my observations. Our learned friends seem to have a notion, at least the learned counsel who first addressed your Honor for the plaintiff seemed to have a notion, from his view of the law of evidence, as existing by statute at the time this statute was passed, that the rules of a general nature for the admission of parties or interested witnesses covered the case of husband and wife, and that this statute was to be considered, or that we considered it, as a sort of disabling statute. I confess I am unable to take any such view of the statute, nor did I understand that my learned friend's argument very well cohered on that subject. The Act as described is an enabling Act, and attention was called by my learned opponent to that: "An Act to enable husband and wife, or either of them, to be as witness for or against the other, or on behalf of any party in certain cases." Now, my proposition is that when this Act was passed, the rule of our State, as evidenced by the decision in Southwick vs. Southwick, in 49th New-York, and in the case in the 49th of New-York, was that a husband and wife could not testify in this case now pending. Does this Act enable either of them to testify here, is the sole question.

"In any trial or inquiry, in any suit, action, or proceeding, in any court, or before any person having by law or consent of parties, authority to examine witnesses or hear evidence, the husband or wife of party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf any such suit, action or proceeding is brought, prosecuted, opposed or defended, shall, except as hereinafter stated, be competent and compellable to give evidence the same as any other witness, on behalf of any party to such suit, action or proceeding."

Now, that would not admit either Mr. or Mrs. Tilton in this action. What were the exceptions? First of all, an exception limiting the privilege or the extent of testimony that could by compulsion be drawn. It was applicable to all cases in which a husband was a witness. That limitation was, "No husband or wife shall be compellable to disclose any confidential communication made by one to the other during their marriage."

Now, your Honor will notice that any qualification in regard to the range of evidence that could be obtained from them was a qualification that might be tolerated in the ordinary course of litigation in which they might be invoked as witnesses. It was a very difficult—a very perilous rule, it seems to me, in two particulars. In the first place, it did not limit in the least the voluntary volume of testimony that a husband or a wife could give; and to have a witness whose mouth is opened to volunteer statements, and then is closed by the law to compulsory searches for truth from the other side, is a very dangerous condition of the law of evidence, difficult for lawyers, difficult for courts, difficult for juries to determine the truth. If a witness comes upon the stand with the law not dominant over his will, but his will dominant over the law, I would like to know who would wish to be responsible for the trial of causes or their determination. But there is another very perilous and very difficult limitation, and that is the determination as a rule of demarkation between what is lawful and what is excluded, the exclusion being defined as "any confidential communication made by one to the other during their marriage." Now, I do not adduce these qualifications for the purpose of criticism or fault-finding with legislation, but simply to adduce them as necessary qualifications in the opinion of the Legislature, notwithstanding all defects of the prior administration of the limitations upon the introduction of husband and wife known in ordinary litigations. Well might the Legislature stand appalled at the notion of opening the mouth of husband or wife on a question of adultery of the other, and seek to have justice done consistently with limitations that it should be only when they volunteered, and never to compel them; that it should be limited only to what did not take place in the confidence of marriage, and leave out everything that did, and thus expose the defendant in a suit like this to a volunteer plaintiff to open his mouth concerning the relations, so far as he pleased, and close it against the probing of the testimony by the opposite side, and to indulge in evidence that bore against the defendant from his, the plaintiff's, the husband's, particular opportunities to know of his wife's actions; and then when the defendant, by his counsel, undertook to press him about the other things he knew in his wife's action and conduct that would exclude and defend the defense against his charge, that on his mere will he could say: "Oh, that is the province of what I learned by the confidential communications of marriage."

Now the Legislature, impressed with the difficulty of invading the rule of the common law under which we have prospered so long, yielded to the liberalization, but yet restricted it. It said, as the English law had said, with regard to any judicial action that arises in consequence of adultery, this enabling act has no effect, for we can put no limitations that will not do injustice, and we can see no expediency that will justify the admission at all. Consequently the exceptions that are stated in the first section, in its enabling clause, and taken out of its operation, includes what I now read:

The genius and the policy of the British limitation was followed strictly here. If as a citizen, if as a member of society, I look with horror at this invasion of the privacy of marriage, and have sought to enforce these considerations upon your Honor, I confess as a lawyer, owing a duty to the administration of justice, both to the learned Court and the jury, who hear all that we say and do, I feel entire incompetency to deal with a witness introduced into the trial of this cause, if I must examine him in vinculis, and he can close his mouth whenever I seek to compel his testimony. I look with dismay upon the sad disfigured fragments of evidence that the search after truth are to be displayed before this jury if this will of the husband is master over me, and not the law master over him. I look with dismay also upon the other current of separation, which is to withhold from me and from my client's cause the defense of penetration into the conjugal relations, that he can close under this law, as having been gained by confidential communications between himself and his wife.

Now, if the Court please, something has been said about the admission of the defendant and the exclusion of the plaintiff. I do not in the least qualify, nor did the law ever undertake to qualify, while its rules were as I have read them, and when its rules are still the same as I have proposed to your Honor, that in a certain sense it was a subordination of the full scope of the administration of justice, but only because it was to maintain the institution on which society itself rested. Who shall say that it is profane to swear by the gift on the altar, but not by the altar that consecrates the gift. All the efforts of law and of civil society are to maintain, invigorate, preserve, purify, exalt the structure that, as a perpetual habitation for liberty and justice, has been furnished by the wisdom and courage of our ancestors. [Applause.]

Mr. Beach—I did intend, Sir, to ask from the Court permission to notice the new authorities which have been presented by my learned friend, but the hour of adjournment is so near that I waive the privilege, and we submit the question.

A DECISION TO BE GIVEN MONDAY.

Judge Neilson—I can only say to the learned counsel, whose arguments have been of very great interest to the Court, that I will endeavor to give the subject, regarding it of grave importance, all possible consideration; not to write an opinion, however, which I do not conceive to be part of the office of a Judge presiding at Nisi Prius, and would savor somewhat of pedantry; therefore the learned counsel will expect nothing more than a statement of my conclusion, when we meet; and that I will endeavor to give frankly, so that either side can take advantage of any error I may commit.

Mr. Evarts—There is a single consideration I wish to state, in answer to some observations of your Honor. A considerable argument was made to reduce the authority of the case of Dann vs. Kingdom, on the ground that it was a decision made without due consideration. But your Honor will notice that Justice Talcott and Justice Mullen and Justice Smith concurred with the Justice who presided at the trial, making up the four of that department; and this authority is well understood in this State. But a proposition is made that, because your Honor's Court is not in the line of appeal to the Supreme Court, but stands upon equal footing of direct appeal to the Court of Appeals, this decision is not binding upon your Honor; and your Honor gave us to understand the general doctrines and feeling of the Court in that regard. Our proposition is this, if your Honor please, that, to a Judge at Nisi Prius, the decision of the General Term of the Supreme Court is binding as an authority, just as much in the courts of the Superior Court and Common Pleas of New-York, and the Buffalo Court, and your Honor's Court, which stand upon the same constitutional footing and have the same direct appeal. The Supreme Court has, by the Constitution, general jurisdiction of all cases of law and equity. It is the general court of law and equity of the whole State; and it is that court which preserves the unity of the law in its preliminary state; and, so far has the respect for the decision of a General Term of the Supreme Court been carried by the Legislature, that the decision of the General Term of the Supreme Court of the State—any General Term—protects all parties acting and relying upon it, although by subsequent appeal, the Act of the Legislature upon which such proceedings were supposed to be predicated, should be declared finally unconstitutional. Now, we submit to your Honor, that it is extremely inconvenient, if it should be held that, while this decision of the General Term that I have adduced, binds the Supreme Courts of this district, binds them (your Honor's friends and judicial associates) in all Nisi Prius proceedings in their Courts, it is less binding upon one of your Honors sitting at Nisi Prius in this Court. For then you have the most unseemly antagonism of competition, that the same population, governed by the same laws, governed by the same judicial fabric in general, have a preference and choice between the Supreme Court and your Honor's Court at Nisi Prius as to the prevalence of one or the other rule of law in the first instance for a trial.

JUDGE NEILSON INDUSTRIOUS.

Judge Neilson—I wish to ask the counsel, most of whom have occasion to come from New-York, whether they are not willing to work to-morrow. I think to-morrow is Saturday.

Mr. Fullerton—It is in New-York; I don't know how it is here. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—I have no hesitation in saying that I should not like to surrender my Saturdays to this case.

Judge Neilson—Then I wish to make this inquiry, whether it will be agreeable to the counsel if we should meet next week not at 11, but at 10:30 in the morning, and adjourn not at 4, but at 4:30, which will give us an hour more each day, and more than an additional day in the course of the week. I wish to know if counsel cannot be constrained to consent to that. I do not wish to be unreasonable, but I put it to you.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it is proper that we should say (and I know my learned friends will concur) that a case of so much magnitude and importance, and of so wide a range of consideration pressing upon counsel in respect of evidence, and the production of it, has, in my judgment, never been brought to a trial, in the experience of our profession, so soon after it was at issue, as this, that has thrown upon counsel, I doubt not, on both sides (probably less upon the plaintiff's side than upon ours, because they were masters of the situation, and could choose when to bring it on more than we)—has placed a very great and necessary labor upon us, and we have only the fragments of the day to consume in that way. We think that we save more time in Court, by having those portions of the day out of Court, than if we were in attendance here.

Mr. Beach—I agree entirely with the views of my learned friend.

Judge Neilson—I wish to ask Mr. Evarts, in relation to the question before us, before we adjourn: Suppose a husband indicted and on trial for an assault upon his wife, with intent to kill, or an assault upon one of their children with intent to kill, or for the crime of bigamy, can a husband, or not, under the Act of 1869, present himself as a witness, and be heard as a witness, irrespective of any limitation affecting the marriage relation, irrespective of the question how it shall smite the wife, or how affect her? And does that illustrate in any degree any tendency on the part of the Legislature to make free inroads upon that which had, long time before, been the settled rule of law?

Mr. Evarts—The terms of the statute should, wisely, be before us, if your Honor please. But we understand that that is a statute in its whole purpose, directed to placing defendants in criminal proceedings in a position to be witnesses if they chose and not compellable, and that it is declared by the Act itself to be subject to all possible limitations that would apply to other witnesses.

Judge Neilson—And no more.

Mr. Evarts—No more. I do not mean to all witnesses, but to any kind of witnesses.

Judge Neilson—All competent witnesses.

Mr. Evarts—All witnesses that stood in the predicament toward the evidence that they did. But whether that would aid us much on this point I do not see.

Mr. Fullerton—May I ask your Honor when the decision of this point which has just been argued will be announced?

Judge Neilson—At our meeting on Monday morning.

Mr. Shearman here handed up a printed copy of points to the Court, at the same time handing a copy to the counsel for the plaintiff.

Mr. Beach—I do not think it is proper to hand up a printed copy of an argument on the other side.

Mr. Shearman—I have given you a copy.

Mr. Beach—You have just handed one to me. A pretty time! Giving me no time to answer.

Judge Neilson—I do not need it. [The Judge refused to take the printed copy.] I was about to say in separating, not to meet again until Monday morning, that I would remind the jury not to read the newspapers. This intimation will be more acceptable from the observations which have fallen from counsel as to the comments of the newspapers and to the spirit in which some editors are disposed to refer to the case and to the parties in it, and to possibly discuss the questions. I said this morning that I was making the last appeal that I should make to the editors of the newspapers, and I should not occupy the time of the Court by reference voluntarily to that matter. I also mentioned that I had received letters from intelligent gentlemen abroad, complaining of some newspapers and calling my attention to the remarks of other editors in regard to what had been published. All this will admonish you more than my mere words can, to refrain from reading the papers. As I said, this is a solemn duty on your part and you must feel the weight of it, and I have no doubt you will carry out the suggestions made by the Court entirely, and with the best intention. We will now adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday morning.

The Court was then adjourned.

SIXTEENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

TILTON'S EVIDENCE TAKEN.

HE TELLS THE STORY OF HIS EARLY CAREER—HIS FINANCIAL CONDITION IN 1871—THE LETTER OF CONFESSION EXCLUDED.

At the opening of the Court in Brooklyn, on Monday, in the case of Mr. Tilton against Mr. Beecher, Judge Neilson decided that the plaintiff was a competent witness, but that he could not testify to confidential communications. Mr. Tilton was then sworn and was examined during the remainder of the day. The principal points reached were concerning the memorable interviews between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher on Dec. 30, 1870, and the subsequent meetings. The contents of the letter of confession offered from memory by the witness were ruled out. Mr. Tilton swore that instead of being a bankrupt in 1871 he owned property valued at $30,000.

The silence of the court-room was first broken on Monday morning by the deep voice of Judge Neilson announcing his decision that Mr. Tilton was (1) competent to testify in his own behalf, but (2) that he was not competent to testify to any confidential communications touching the principal question in issue.

Mr. Tilton ascended the stand. He stood with his back to the audience and took the oath, and then sat down. But before any questions were asked, Mr. Beach said that he had not taken an exception, because he supposed that the Judge meant by confidential communication the legal technical definition of that term. Judge Neilson suggested in a dry way that the counsel might better take an exception. Mr. Evarts then explained his view of the decision, ending by taking an exception to the ruling of the Judge. Mr. Beach, however, took none, and without further interruption the examination of the awaiting witness proceeded. In giving the names of his children the witness prefixed with emphasis and studied care the word "our," e. g., "our daughter Florence," "our son," etc. For the first time the details of Mr. Tilton's financial condition were made known, and according to the witness his property in the early days of 1871 was worth altogether about $30,000, his income consisting of interest on $1,000 or more in banks, $5,000 from lectures, $1,000 or $2,000 from his books, and $6,000 in the hands of Mr. Moulton. The meeting at Mr. Moulton's house between the witness and Mr. Beecher on Dec. 30, 1870, was fully described, every detail being narrated with precision from the time when, as the witness stated, he entered the room and locked the door, putting the key into his pocket, until Mr. Beecher left the house. The alleged verbal confession of Mrs. Tilton to her husband was repeated with painful exactness, there being no attempt to gloss over the literal language used.

A sharp debate followed the request of Mr. Fullerton that the witness repeat the contents of Mrs. Tilton's letter of confession, produced at that interview and there destroyed. Mr. Evarts opened the discussion and Mr. Beach responded. Clerks were sent out for authorities and returned with armfuls of law books. It seemed for a few moments that a long and severe struggle was about to begin, but Judge

Neilson abruptly closed it by asking that Mr. Fullerton go on temporarily, without touching the contents of the letter. Mr. Tilton's theory of his wife's asserted love for Mr. Beecher was repeated, and his former policy of excusing her action was strictly adhered to. Mr. Bowen's name was frequently mentioned in the testimony, his alleged accusations against Mr. Beecher being repeated so far as they were considered pertinent to this case.

After recess, Judge Neilson ruled out the letter of confession, hesitating when Mr. Beach brought further arguments to bear, but adhering to his decision after hearing both sides. The Court adjourned at 5 minutes before 4 o'clock.

THE WITNESS AND HIS HEARERS.

As Mr. Tilton ascended the witness stand and swore to tell the truth and nothing but the truth, every eye in the court-room watched his actions and his face with sharp curiosity. The people in the audience leaned eagerly forward and awaited almost breathlessly the first words to fall from his lips. Mr. Tilton did not seem to be at perfect ease at first, but in the hands of Mr. Fullerton he soon gained entire composure. During the examination he sat perfectly upright in his chair, his coat buttoned tightly about him, and while his demeanor in court has always been dignified it now seemed severe, and the little color he usually has in his face had entirely deserted it. He gave his testimony thoughtfully, choosing his words with great care, and speaking with almost aggravating deliberation. His replies almost always incorporated the question, so that without the queries his answers would make a continuous story. He seldom said "Yee" or "No," and his answers sometimes were long even to wearisomeness. Occasionally he would wander beyond the legal limits prescribed, and it was necessary to check him. During Mr. Tilton's examination on Monday he seemed to see no one except the person questioning him. His eyes never wandered toward his wife, and if he saw her at all it was simply in a sweeping glance. He looked first at the ceiling and then at the floor, meeting no one's gaze except that of Mr. Fullerton, whom he looked at steadfastly whenever he was speaking. Mr. Beecher's face was a study. During the entire narration of his accuser he looked at him unflinchingly, taking notes occasionally, but listening to every word with close attention. When Mr. Tilton described Mr. Beecher's agitation on various occasions, the latter smiled broadly, and laughingly whispered to his wife. He did not once change color, and there was never the slightest sign of agitation in his manner. Mrs. Beecher's face wore an amused expression nearly all day, and several times, as the witness told of matters which she seemed to consider absurd, she laughed and looked trustfully up into her husband's face. It was many minutes before Mrs. Tilton turned her eyes toward her husband. She was veiled, and while the first few questions and answers were given she sat with downcast eyes. After a time she ventured to glance toward Mr. Tilton and afterward watched him closely, not wavering even when he was giving the worst testimony against herself and her former pastor.

Theodore Tilton

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TILTON DECLARED A COMPETENT WITNESS.

Judge Neilson—In determining the question raised by this objection, the Court holds:

I. That the plaintiff is competent to be sworn and to testify in his own behalf.

II. That touching the principal question in issue, he is not competent to testify to any confidential communications.

It is considered that this qualified direction respects the present state of our law of evidence, as the same has received legislative and judicial expression, and also respects what may remain of the rule which imposes silence or restraint by reason of the marital relation, and on grounds of public interest or policy.

SCOPE OF JUDGE NEILSON'S DECISION.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception to Mr. Tilton being sworn in the case.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Theodore Tilton, the plaintiff, called and sworn on his own behalf.

Mr. Beach—In regard to your second ruling, on the part of the plaintiff, Sir, perhaps we ought to say that we understand that second proposition of the Court to rule the general principle, which we have not disputed, that husband or wife as a witness is incompetent to speak of what are technically called confidential relations between them. We take no exception, Sir, to that ruling, but I suppose it is understood that under that decision the question what shall constitute such a communication as arising from the confidence and faith of the conjugal relation, is an open question to be decided upon the particular circumstances of any such communication when it shall be presented to your Honor. If the decision is intended to be enlarged beyond that scope and meaning, why, we certainly should take an exception to it, but I do not so understand it.

Judge Neilson—The exception better be entered, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—We understand your Honor's ruling as on this head covering what we regard as the rule of law under that consideration, even where the law permits a married person to be sworn, and that it covers everything that grows out either in the way of oral communication or of personal observation between husband and wife, that arises during the confidence of their marriage. On another point discussed by counsel, that is, whether a husband or a wife can be heard to speak against the other upon a charge of adultery, your Honor has not determinately ruled, and probably some questions may come up that counsel will present to your attention for ruling as the inquiry proceeds.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will remember that upon the part of the plaintiff, there was no discussion whatever as to the character of confidential relations. What constitutes such a communication between husband and wife as to fall under that rule of exclusion was not at all discussed. We did not suppose it raised by the objection, which was one simply to the competency of the witness, and not to his capacity to speak as to particular subjects which may have transpired during the existence of the marriage relation, and we suppose that the admissibility of that class of evidence would be presented, if objection was taken in the course of the examination of Mr. Tilton, and that your Honor would then listen to such authorities and discussion as might be appropriate, and rule as you should understand the proof or evidence to be.

Judge Neilson—Still, I think the line of demarkation would be very simple. The counsel can easily observe it. It may be that I shall have occasion to hear you both perhaps on that matter.

Mr. Beach—I think, your Honor, that there are some authorities upon that subject which it may, perhaps, be proper to submit to you in a few days.

Judge Neilson—If there is occasion, I should be happy to hear you, Sir.

TESTIMONY OF THEODORE TILTON.

Mr. Fullerton—You are the plaintiff in this action, I believe, Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What is your age? A. About 39.

Q. Where were you born? A. In the City of New-York.

Q. How long have you resided in the City of Brooklyn? A. I think about between 20 and 25 years; I cannot fix the exact point.

Q. Where were you educated? A. In the City of New-York.

Q. When were you married? A. On the 2d of October, 1855.

Q. And by Mr. Beecher, I believe, as has already been proved? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What is the age of your wife? A. She is about 41.

Q. Older than yourself, then? A. She is between one and two years older; I don't know exactly how many months.

Q. How many children have you living? A. Four.

Q. Please state their names and ages. A. The oldest is our daughter Florence, who is about 18 years old; the next our daughter Alice, who is now about 16; the next our son Harold, who is about 12; and the youngest our son Ralph, who is about 6.

Q. Have you lost any children? A. Two.

Q. What were their respective ages at the time of their death?

A. They both died in infancy.

Q. State when they died? A. I don't think at this moment I can give the date of their death.

Q. What has been your occupation since your majority? A. A literary profession.

Q. And connected with what, if you please? A. My earliest literary employment was in connection with The New-York Churchman; then in connection with The New-York Observer; then in connection with The New-York Independent; then in connection with The Brooklyn Union; and, finally, in connection with The Golden Age.

Q. When did you become connected with The Independent? A. I think it was in the Spring of 1856.

Q. Who was the editor or editors of that paper at that time? A. The editors were three clergymen: Rev. Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., Rev. Leonard Bacon, D.D., and Rev. Dr. Storrs, of Brooklyn.

Q. When did they cease to edit that paper, and who succeeded them? A. I do not remember the year at which they terminated their engagement; they were succeeded by Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. And at what particular time did your connection with that paper commence? A. Mine commenced, as I have already answered, I think, in the Spring of 1856. I was on The Independent under its original three editors, in a subordinate capacity. I remained on The Independent in a somewhat advanced position under Mr. Beecher; and I afterward, on the occasion of Mr. Beecher's retirement from the editorial chair, became his successor, as the editor of The Independent.

Q. At what time did Mr. Beecher become editor of that paper, as near as you can recollect? A. I do not remember the year. Mr. Beach—Well, about?

Mr. Fullerton—As near as you can get at it? A. Well, I should have to guess if I answered; I think somewhere about 1860 or 1861; perhaps a little later.

Q. How long did he remain editor of the paper? A. He terminated his editorship after his return from England; I believe that was in 1863 or 1864.

Q. And what was the character of the relations existing between you and him during his editorship of that paper? A. Do you mean our official relations or our personal?

Q. Both. A. My official relation to Mr. Beecher during his editorship of The Independent was that of his associate—I was not technically called the managing editor; but I presume that designation is as accurate a one as I could give; I held under Mr. Beecher what has since been generally regarded as the office of managing editor, though I believe at that time that term was not in use.

Q. Socially, what were your relations? A. Mr. Beecher and I were very intimate.

Q. And up to what time did that intimacy continue? A. Until the Spring of 1870.

Q. During the period that you have spoken of, did you become connected with Plymouth Church in any way? A. I have been connected with Plymouth Church, in one way or another, ever since my boyhood.

Q. State, if you please, in what way? A. I at first became connected with the Sunday-School; I was a scholar in the school; I was a teacher in the school; I was the Librarian of the school; I was the Associate Superintendent of the school; I finally became the Acting Superintendent of the school. Then, in 1853, I became a member of the church, though the offices which I held in relation to the Sunday-School were some of them, before 1853, and many of them continued after that date.

Q. Who officiated at the ceremony of your introduction to the church? A. The pastor and all the congregation.

Q. The pastor, Mr. Beecher, at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. During all the time that you have spoken of, I believe, he was pastor of the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was your wife connected with the church? A. My wife became a member of Plymouth Church, I think, two years before I joined; I think her membership dates from 1851.

Q. Did she remain connected with the church, as a member, up to 1871? A. I think her name is still on the roll of membership; I will not be positive, however, as to that last answer.

Q. During Mr. Beecher's absence in Europe, of which you have spoken, state whether there was a correspondence kept up between you? A. Yes, Sir; I don't remember how often I wrote to Mr. Beecher; I wrote to him on several occasions, giving him the progress of affairs at home, and I received some letters from him at that period, one of which, a long and striking letter, was afterward published by Mrs. Stowe in her biography of him.

Q. Now, how long have you been acquainted with Francis D. Moulton? A. Ever since my school-days.

Q. State, as near as you can, when that acquaintance commenced? A. I should think as far back as 1848 or '49 or '50; somewhere there.

Q. And has it continued up to the present time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long has Mr. Moulton resided in Brooklyn? A. I think about ten or a dozen years; perhaps not quite so long.

Q. Were you in school together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where? A. At the institution which was then called the Free Academy, and which is now known as the College of the City of New-York.

Q. Have you been intimate friends during all that period of time? A. We were very intimate during our college days. When those days were over Mr. Moulton continued to reside in New-York; I came to Brooklyn; I did not then see him very often. At length he came to reside in Brooklyn in my own neighborhood, and then our early intimacy was renewed and has continued to this hour.

TILTON'S FINANCIAL INTERESTS.

Q. I want to ask you in relation to your property. In the month of December, 1870, what property were you the owner of? A. At what date?

Q. In December, 1870. A. Well, Sir, I shall have to speak—

Q. At the commencement of 1871. I don't want an exact account, but give me an approximate estimate of the property, and what it consisted of? A. I owned a house, in which I lived, No. 174 Livingston-st., which, with its library, furniture and pictures, I suppose was valued at about $25,000. I owned a piece of property in Llewellyn Park, New-Jersey, valued at about $10,000. I owned a share of THE NEW-YORK TRIBUNE, valued, I think, at that time, a little more than $10,000. I owned a small farm out West—

Q. What State, please? A. In Iowa; valued at about $1,500. I owned a piece of land, a little fragment of it, near Prospect Park, in this city, valued at about a thousand dollars. I had also some money at interest at that time, four or five thousand dollars. Those are all the items that occur to me at this moment.

Q. If there were any liens upon this property you will please state them? A. There were none except in two instances; there was a mortgage on my house, I think the amount was $7,500. There was a mortgage on another piece of property, or rather not a mortgage, but I had assigned it by a power of attorney to my father, valued about $10,000. With that exception every thing else was free and clear. I suppose I had at that time—you wish me to give you the sum total?

Q. The sum total, if you please? A. I suppose that on the occasion of my retirement from The Independent and The Brooklyn Union, which is the date at which you inquire?

Q. Yes? A. My property free and clear of all incumbrance would have amounted to about $30,000, perhaps $35,000.

Q. Now, after the 1st of January, 1871, were you in the receipt of any income, and if so, what income? A. Well, Sir, I cannot say that I was in the receipt of a steady income, but I was in the receipt of—yes, I was also—in the first place I had money at interest, about $4,000 or $5,000, which yielded me some income.

Q. Where was that? A. That was deposited with the firm of Woodruff & Robinson. I received also—

Q. Go on. A. If I understand your question, it is what sums of money I have received since?

Q. What sources of income had you after the 1st of January, 1871? A. Well, about $4,000 deposited with the firm of Woodruff & Robinson; about $1,000 I should say in round numbers, not able to be more accurate, in one or two of the banks in this city; $7,000 which I received under my contracts with Mr. Bowen; $5,000 in round numbers as the result of my lecturing season in the Winter of 1871-2; between $1,000 and $2,000 on my books from my publishers; $6,000 subscribed, as Mr. Woodruff has explained, as a capital for The Golden Age; in addition to that, about $6,000 in all from Mr. Moulton.

Q. Now, Sir, did you have any other incomes beyond what you have stated? A. No, Sir. I beg your pardon, Mr. Fullerton; did I mention my lectures? Yes, I did.

Q. You mentioned your lectures. Was there any income from The Golden Age at all? A. Yes, Sir; there was a large income from The Golden Age, but there was also a large outgo; there was no profit.

Q. Was there any net income? A. During that period?

Q. Yes. A. Oh! yes; I should think about $40,000.

Q. Net income over and above the expenses? A. Oh! no, Sir; I think not; very slight at all events.

Q. What debts did you owe at that time, if any? A. At what time, Sir?

Q. After January, 1871, over and above the liens upon that property of which you have spoken? A. Oh! I had no debts, Sir, other than the current household expenses; I don't think I ever was in debt over $1,000 at any one time.

Q. As to The Golden Age—state whether that was largely indebted, or otherwise? A. The Golden Age at the time of its commencement, as Mr. Woodruff has explained, owed $6,000 to the gentlemen who contributed it. They afterward returned me their notes, making that money a free gift. That canceled that debt. The only other debts which The Golden Age ever had were debts for current expenses, and I don't think that at any time they ever ran above $500, or $700, or $1,000.

Q. Not beyond that at any time? A. I don't recall any instance at present at which the debts of The Golden Age were over $1,000.

Q. You have spoken of $6,000 or thereabouts received from Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you know the source of that money? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you know that any part of it came directly or indirectly from Mr. Beecher. A. No, Sir; not a cent.

Q. When did you first learn it? A. When Mr. Moulton wrote the fact in his second statement, I think.

Q. In 1874? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you didn't know it until that time? A. Never until then.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, I want to call your attention to the month of December, 1870, the 30th day of that month, and ask you whether on that day you had an interview with Henry Ward Beecher? A. I had an interview with Henry Ward Beecher on the evening of that day.

Q. On the evening of the 30th of December, 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did the interview take place? A. It took place in the second floor, front room, of Mr. Moulton's house at his then residence, No. 143 Clinton-st., Brooklyn.

Q. What length of time did the interview occupy? A. I should think three-quarters of an hour, possibly an hour.

Q. Who were present at that interview? A. Mr. Beecher and I.

Q. No one else? A. Mr. Moulton at the first moment of it, but he instantly retired.

Q. Will you now state what occurred at that interview?

FIRST ARGUMENT OVER TILTON'S TESTIMONY.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I think it is proper that we should suggest to your Honor, and if you agree with us you may instruct the witness, that he is not at liberty to repeat in the testimony here anything that he said there that was derived by a confidential communication from his wife.

Mr. Fullerton—We suppose that your Honor will give the witness no such instructions as that, because it would not be in harmony with the decision that your Honor has just announced touching this very subject. I suppose I am at liberty to prove by this witness all that occurred between himself and Henry

Ward Beecher on the date embodied in the question—what he said to Mr. Beecher and what Mr. Beecher said in reply to him. It makes no difference where the witness learned the facts that he communicated to Mr. Beecher. Even if he learned them from his wife and communicated them to Mr. Beecher, we have a right to that evidence in this case. I suppose the objection is premature, Sir, or the request rather premature, because it would be better to wait until the particular question arises.

Mr. Evarts—The difficulty is that the question, which was proper enough in general, was a general question to draw out an entire interview, and under the ordinary rules of evidence it would be admissible, because it occurred with Mr. Beecher, and therefore I must intercept the illegal evidence at this stage, or run the risk of its being introduced. Now, the authorities seem to be very clear. In the case of Dawson vs. Hall (3 Mich. Supreme Ct., 390)—held, that it is a well settled rule that the declarations of husband and wife are subject to the same rule of exclusion which governs their testimony as witnesses. Greenleaf's Evidence (394, section 341) is to the same effect. In the case of Gardner vs. Klutts (8 Jones L.—N. C. 375, Supreme Court) it was held that as a wife is not a competent witness for or against her husband, it follows that her declarations cannot be evidence for or against him. Otherwise, in the language of the Court, "more weight is given to what she says when not under oath than to what she would say on oath, which is absurd." It is held that this applies to written as well as to verbal declarations. The fact that a wife cannot be examined as a witness by reason of her husband's being a party is not a reason for admitting evidence of her declarations. Now, your Honor will perceive that it is quite impossible to adhere to the proposition that the husband or wife cannot give evidence against the other upon the ground of public policy, and no protection of the marriage relation, when the point of evidence sought to be decided arises in the confidence of marriage. If that rule is to be transcended and trampled upon by the mere introduction of a communication, of that confidential communication made by the husband or the wife to a third person, and then in the shape of an introduction of the evidence between the husband and the wife and the third person, the confidence of marriage is violated. When I say "third person," I mean a person not one of the married pair. I don't mean a third person in respect to the controversy, but a third person in reference to the marriage. Now, when husband and wife violate the confidence of a communication made to them in that relation by communicating it to another person, that communication may be provable, but it cannot be provable by the husband or wife; that must make a part of that proof, the diverging of the confidential communication.

Judge Neilson—Within the ruling I intend to make, I should not receive any evidence of any statement or communication by the plaintiff's wife. This question, however, is very different. The question is, whether in a conversation (assuming there may have been some communication)—whether in a conversation between the parties, the conversation may not be given in evidence, although it may, in a sense, involve what may have been learned in that form of confidential communication? That rule will be transgressed from, if, in the conversation given between the parties, the party was allowed to state that his wife had given that information. I could not permit that, of course.

Mr. Beach—I hope your Honor will not rule that way without hearing authorities. Your Honor is anticipating a question which we have avoided discussion upon hitherto.

Judge Neilson—You may not quite understand me. I am strongly impressed with the belief that any conversation between the parties to this action may be given, but if that conversation reveals in any degree any communication received from the wife, although as part of the conversation with the defendant he is at liberty to give it, he would not be at liberty to go yet further back and state that the wife actually gave him that confidence as narrated in that conversation, whatever it might be.

Mr. Beach—That leaves the main question open for discussion, and I will not trouble your Honor with any remarks upon it unless it becomes necessary to do so. But I hope your Honor will hold your mind open to the discussion of the question of what constituted a confidential communication between husband and wife of which neither can speak, and what circumstances modify that communication, so that he may disclose it, and what is the state of our statutory law at this day upon that subject.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be good enough to note my exception to any evidence on this subject. The question is a proper enough question in its form. My objection, however, in advance of testimony is to any evidence on the part of this witness in answer to this general question that may contain a statement of any confidential communication from his wife, although it may have been communicated to Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Yes, I will note your exception.

Mr. Evarts—I want to raise that point of law, and I will take an exception if your Honor has decided not to exclude the testimony.

Mr. Fullerton—I think the question will not arise in the examination of this witness at all.

THE FIRST HOSTILE MEETING AT MOULTON'S.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, go on and state what occurred between yourself and Henry Ward Beecher on the evening of the 31st December, 1870, at Mr. Moulton's house? A. Mr. Moulton brought Mr. Beecher to the door, bowed to me and said, "I have brought Mr. Beecher at your request." Mr. Moulton then retired, closing the door behind him. I did not salute Mr. Beecher nor he me. He crossed the room and took an easy chair by the window. I crossed the room in the other direction, went to the door, locked it, took out the key and put it in my pocket. I then re-crossed the room, and sat in a chair opposite to Mr. Beecher. The conversation that took place I cannot undertake to repeat accurately. That is to say, I will not attempt to give the words, except at certain points, because what was said was mostly said by me, and I have no special gift at recalling words. I can better call what he said than what I said. I began, as I remember, somewhat in this way—I think I am entirely accurate as to the first words spoken, and they were these. I said: "I presume, Sir, that you received from me a few days ago, through Mr. Bowen, a letter demanding your retirement from your pulpit and from the City of Brooklyn." He said: "I did." I then said to him: "I have called you here to-night in order to say to you that you may consider that letter unwritten—unsent—blotted out—no longer in existence." He then said to me, bowing his head: "I thank you." I replied to that: "Your thanks should not go to me, but to Elizabeth. It is in her behalf that I hold this interview, and whatever I shall say here or in consequence of this meeting is not for your sake, nor for my sake, but for her sake." I then asked him whether Mr. Moulton had shown to him a statement which Elizabeth had written—

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I interpose an objection, that on the witness's own statement, this was an interview held in the confidence of the wife and in her behalf, and he cannot avoid it.

Judge Neilson—Take an exception.

The Witness—He said to me that Mr. Moulton had shown him no statement. I then said: "Do you not then understand the object of this interview?" "I do," said he, "in general terms." I then replied: "You should understand it more specifically. I will read to you a statement which Elizabeth has made. Mr. Moulton has the original; I have a copy; I will read to you the copy." I then put my hand into my pocket, took out some papers, and while searching for the copy which I had made of Mrs. Tilton's paper, he said to me: "Before reading that, Theodore, I wish you would tell me what Mr. Bowen has been saying against me." I replied to him that I had not summoned him to the interview for the purpose of discussing with him Mr. Bowen's affairs, but that he should go to Mr. Bowen himself. Nevertheless, as he asked me the question, I would say that Mr. Bowen, in an interview with me on the preceding day, had made a statement that: "You have been guilty of adulteries with numerous members of your congregation ever since your Indianapolis pastorate, all down through these 25 years; that you are not a safe man to dwell in a Christian community; that he knows numerous cases where you have shipwrecked the happiness of Christian homes; that he is determined you shall no longer edit The Christian Union; that you shall no longer speak in Plymouth Church, and he says distinctly that you are a wolf in the fold and that you should be extirpated." Mr. Beecher said it was a matter of amazement to him that Mr. Bowen should have so spoken: "For," he said, "when Mr. Bowen delivered to me your letter demanding my retirement from the pulpit he appeared to be friendly, and he offered me his friendly services in the matter." I then said to him that I had joined with Mr. Bowen at the beginning of the week in making that demand upon him to retire; that I had written that letter at Mr. Bowen's suggestion; that Mr. Bowen had requested that such a letter should be written, and had said that the reason why he could not write it himself was that in the preceding February—that is, February, 1870—he (Bowen) had had a reconciliation with Mr. Beecher, and that Mr. Beecher had begged his pardon and had bent himself on the floor and wept, and Mr. Bowen had freely granted him forgiveness for the crimes which he had committed, and that Mr. Bowen said in view of having granted that forgiveness he could not initiate proceedings against Mr. Beecher, but that if I would initiate them by sending such a challenge he (Bowen) would sustain that demand, and in the interest of morality and religion expel Mr. Beecher from his pulpit and from the city. That he furthermore had said that he (Bowen) had it in his power at any time to drive Mr. Beecher out of Brooklyn within twelve hours. Mr. Beecher again spoke of his astonishment that Mr. Bowen should have said such things to him—or to me—on Monday, and then have expressed himself in a friendly way, as Mr. Beecher described it, on the occasion of delivering him the letter. I then told Mr. Beecher that after I had had this interview with Mr. Bowen I had narrated the substance of it to my wife; that my wife was ill, and that this intelligence filled her with profound distress; and that she had instantly said to me that it was a violation of my pledge and promise to her, made in the preceding Summer, that I would never do the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher any harm, or ever assist in any exposure of his secret to the public. She said to me: "If Mr. Bowen makes a war upon Mr. Beecher, and if you" [that is, myself] "join in it, and if Mr. Beecher retires from his pulpit, as he must under such an attack, everybody will, sooner or later, know the reason why, and that," said she to me, "will be to my shame and to the children's shame, and I cannot endure it."

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, this indicates the nature of the communication concerning which my objection applies. I am understood, of course, as objecting distinctly to every branch of this.

Mr. Fullerton—Of course.

The Witness—Mr. Beecher then asked me what I meant by speaking in that way of Elizabeth and her shame; so I then read to him the copy of Mrs. Tilton's confession—a copy which I had made in the early part of the evening, the original of which was in Mr. Moulton's possession.

Q. What did you read to him?

Mr. Evarts—The paper.

Mr. Fullerton—Where is that paper? A. That paper has been destroyed.

Q. When was it destroyed? A. It was destroyed by Mrs. Tilton's own hand.

Q. The copy you took, I mean? A. The copy was destroyed that evening during the interview.

Q. During the interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In Mr. Beecher's presence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, the original? A. The original was destroyed two years later by Mrs. Tilton in my presence.

Q. Is that the one that Mr. Moulton speaks of in his testimony? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Destroyed immediately after the "tripartite agreement" was signed? A. Yes, Sir; after the tripartite agreement was signed at Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. That is the one Mr. Moulton spoke of as having been destroyed at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what was that paper that you thus read to Mr. Beecher?

ARGUMENT ON THE ADMISSION OF THE CONFES-SION.

Mr. Evarts—I object to the witness giving the contents of that paper, on the ground that it appears by the testimony of the witness that it has been willfully destroyed.

Mr. Fullerton—If the gentleman means by “willfully,” that it was destroyed “purposely”—

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; for the purpose of blotting it out of existence.

Mr. Fullerton—That does not prevent us from giving the contents of it.

Mr. Evarts—If we are to be judged by papers, let us be judged by papers, and not by papers that have been willfully destroyed; and when the parties admit that spoliation of evidence they must take the consequences of having destroyed the paper, and not reproduce not the paper but a remembrance of it.

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman is exceedingly anxious to be judged by a paper he knows is destroyed and cannot be produced.

Judge Neilson—It has long been settled that in a case where a party would have the right to prove the loss of an instrument, and so admit evidence of its contents, he cannot be allowed to do so, provided he himself has destroyed the paper. The question is, whether this is a destruction of a paper by this witness.

Mr. Fullerton—This paper was not destroyed at a time when any litigation was contemplated; it was not destroyed for the purpose of depriving anybody from any benefit that might arise out of its particular phrases or what was written in it at all—no such object as that, as your Honor will see after a moment. It was destroyed because it was not thought advisable to keep such a paper in existence. Your Honor understands perfectly well the circumstances under which the original was destroyed. That is already in evidence. Mr. Moulton says he kept it until after the Spring of 1872, when the “tripartite agreement” was executed, and then it was delivered up to Mr. Tilton; and Mr. Tilton says his wife, in his presence, destroyed it; and your Honor will perceive that there was a reason at that time for the destruction of this paper which it was very proper to execute and carry into effect. The only reason I ever heard why we cannot give parole evidence of a written paper that has been destroyed is because it has been destroyed in fraud, for the purpose of obliterating the contents of the paper so that an advantage might be obtained in giving parole evidence of it. No such object existed in the mind of any party at that time at all. That is very apparent. The rule does not apply to a copy of the paper at all; it only applies to the original.

Judge Neilson—I am in doubt about your right to give the contents of a paper written by Mrs. Tilton, even if the papers were hers.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, this paper was read to Mr. Beecher; it was a communication to Mr. Beecher by Mrs. Tilton. It was not a communication made to anybody else, and your Honor will perceive in a moment it was designed by Mrs. Tilton for Mr. Beecher, and originally in the hands of Mr. Moulton—was intended for him; it was not delivered by Mr. Moulton to Mr. Beecher, and for that reason the copy was resorted to. Now, what we propose to put in evidence here is a communication made by Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Under the ruling you have a right to do that. The question is whether you have a right to re-state a paper written by Mrs. Tilton. That is my doubt.

Mr. Evarts—A paper destroyed.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor has ruled your first proposition in regard to the right to re-state a paper written by Mrs. Tilton in your former decision. The only question now which is presented is upon the destruction of the paper.

Judge Neilson—I have not decided any such question.

Mr. Beach—I understand your Honor to decide that whatever was communicated to Mr. Beecher, although it may have been the statement of Mrs. Tilton, was admissible as between Mr. Beecher and the witness. Now, this witness states the contents of a paper not written by Mrs. Tilton, but written by himself, and which he says was in the possession of Mr. Beecher, being a copy of a statement originally drawn by Mrs. Tilton—that not being present. Now, the object of this evidence is not to prove any communication as between Mrs. Tilton and her husband: the purpose of it is to prove a communication made to Mr. Beecher, and to hear his answer to that communication—a communication which in itself, if your Honor please, reflects upon the conduct and character of Mr. Beecher, made under deliberate circumstances, at an interview called for the purpose of presenting to him a charge. The object and effect of this evidence is to show that either Mr. Beecher denied, or qualified, or admitted it. Now, no matter what the communication was, no matter from what source it originated, no matter in what form it was communicated, it is still a statement made to this defendant upon an occasion when he was called upon to defend himself from its force; and the character of the defendant presents the point and the pith of this evidence. Now, the paper referred to, in itself, did not prove the truth of what it contained. Any declaration that Mr. Tilton may have made to Mr. Beecher upon that occasion was not conclusive evidence of the proof of the charge. Its character as truth or falsehood depended entirely upon the conduct and the declaration of Mr. Beecher made in response to it. Suppose Mr. Tilton had taken from his pocket a paper and said to Mr. Beecher, reading it, “I accuse you of having illicit intercourse with my wife on a certain day;” that did not prove anything in itself; it was no evidence whatever to support the allegation. The force and effect of it depended upon the conduct and declaration of Mr. Beecher in answer to that accusation. Now, it does not involve at all a question of confidential communication as between husband and wife; and the only point of this objection, as I understand it, is that this paper was voluntarily destroyed by Mr. Tilton upon that very occasion; and, therefore, he cannot reproduce it from recollection. Now, I suppose we know very well what the rule is in regard to secondary proof of instruments lost or destroyed. I agree that, if this paper was destroyed with a fraudulent purpose, for the purpose of suppressing proof, for the purpose of advancing the interest of the party who then held it in possession, why, he cannot give parole evidence of its contents. But if it was destroyed, as we propose to show, by a joint agreement and understanding, an admission and acquiescence of both these parties, at the time, they being the contesting parties and the only parties to be affected by its operation, why, then there was a mutual arrangement that this paper was no longer necessary and proper to be preserved, and that it should be destroyed. Will it be said that where two parties thus agree to the destruction of an instrument that the mouths of both of them are forever closed from publishing its contents—that it was not an innocent destruction in the way of business or by agreement, as between parties, and not possessing the fraudulent characteristic which closes the mouths of both as to its contents? Allow me to read to your Honor from the case of Taylor vs. Riggs:

"It is not, by any means, a matter of course to let a party give secondary evidence, even where he produces proof of the fact of the destruction. If the destruction was accidental, and occurred without his agency or assent, or even if it was voluntary and his own act, but yet done under a mistake so as to rebut all idea of contemplated fraud, inferior evidence will usually be allowed."

Now, our purpose is to show your Honor the circumstances under which this paper was destroyed, repudiating utterly the idea that there was any fraudulent purpose in the act, or that there could be any fraudulent effect resulting from it.

"Thus, should a party destroy a paper under the erroneous impression that it could be of no further value, he may, notwithstanding, prove its contents by secondary evidence."

These parties had not only a conversation, but I may say a partial reconciliation upon this occasion. They came to an understanding in regard to the contents of that instrument, and the use of the contents at that time I may freely admit, as I understand that was the fact. Here, then, is a destruction of the paper not only upon the part of Mr. Tilton, with the idea that it could be of no further use, but with the entire concurrence of Mr. Beecher, the defendant, in that conclusion. That destruction by mutual consent under the idea that then the subject matter contained in that paper was forever closed as between them, however subsequent circumstances may have revived the subject and introduced it to this controversy, nevertheless in the fact of that destruction under the impression then entertained by both of them, it cannot close the mouth of either of them as to the contents of the papers.

"Or should he destroy a note on its being paid in bank bills, he supposing at the time that they were genuine when in truth they were counterfeit, the same result would follow."

Suppose it should turn out on this occasion that upon certain assertions and considerations presented to Mr. Tilton as to the time he was drawn to the conclusion that this paper would be of no further use, but that subsequent actions on the part of Mr. Beecher revived the necessity for its use, can it be said any more than in the case of a note paid with counterfeit bills, the note being destroyed under the idea that it would be of no further use, can it be said that secondary evidence under like circumstances and involving the same principle, cannot be given? Now, the rule is:

"But a party who, under no pretense of mistake or accident, voluntarily destroys primary evidence to prevent its being used against him, or to create the excuse for its non-production, to injure the opposite party or for other fraudulent purposes, thereby excludes himself from the benefit of inferior evidence."

It is only when the circumstances attending the destruction give rise to the imputation of a fraudulent intent, that a party is ever excluded from giving secondary evidence.

Mr. Evans—This paper formed, it is said, the basis of the errand and the basis of the communication between these parties. It was destroyed voluntarily by this witness; the original was destroyed afterwards voluntarily by himself and his wife. Whenever anybody undertakes to prove that Mr. Beecher destroyed either, or consented to the destruction of either, it will be time enough to talk about another basis of my objection than that upon which I now put it. Now, what does the law think of the kind of evidence—the oral substitute for such papers, or oral communications remembered years afterwards by a witness who says he cannot give the words? Let me read to your Honor from what Judge Redfield says, in his edition of Greenleaf, Sec. 200:

"In a somewhat extended experience of jury trials," says Judge Redfield in his edition of Greenleaf on Evidence, 239, § 200, "we have been compelled to the conclusion that the most unreliable of all evidence is that of the oral admissions of the party, and especially where they purport to have been made during the pendency of the action, or after the parties were in a state of controversy. It is not uncommon for different witnesses of the same conversation to give precisely opposite accounts of it, and in some instances it will appear that the witness deposes to the statements of one party as coming from the other, and it is not very uncommon to find witnesses of the best intentions repeating the declarations of the party in his own favor as the fullest admissions of the utter falsity of his claim. When we reflect upon the inaccuracy of many witnesses in their original comprehension of a conversation, their extreme liability to mingle subsequent facts and occurrences with the original transactions, and the impossibility of recollecting the precise terms used by the party, or of translating them by exact equivalents, we must conclude there is no substantial reliance upon this class of testimony. The fact, too, that in the final trial of open questions of fact, both sides are largely supported by evidence of this character in the majority of instances, must lead all cautious triers of facts greatly to distrust its reliability."

Now when that kind of evidence is sought to be substituted for a written letter, littera scripta manet, give us that and we shall know what they talked about and what was said. It is the destruction of that paper that has been the motive and the opportunity of keeping alive this scandal to this time. That paper, produced, would show exactly what was said and proposed as the subject of accusation and of consideration. That paper in the original, it is said, was in the hands of Moulton, and his pledge and promise to Mr. Beecher was that he would keep that paper, with the paper that Mr. Beecher surrendered to him, which was its retraction, so that the two should not be separated, and it should be known precisely, whenever any opportunity was raised for scandal, what the charge was and what the retraction was; and that trust assumed, upon which Mr. Beecher delivered to Mr. Moulton the retraction for safe keeping, that pledge was violated by the separation of the papers and the destruction of the one by Mr. Tilton and his wife. Now, the copy he has destroyed; and what is the rule of law in regard to persons who seek to adduce this unsatisfactory evidence which "cautious triers of facts" pay little attention to, in the place of what all of us desire to have here as the very written proposition that was considered. In the case of Blade vs. Nolan, 12 Wend., giving the decision:

"Held, that proof that plaintiff deliberately and voluntarily burned the promissory note on which his suit was subsequently brought, would not authorize the introduction of inferior or secondary evidence. And add, that the rule allowing secondary evidence cannot be extended beyond the case where the paper was lost or destroyed by time, mistake or accident (including loss by negligence or laches of the party as his attorney), and the Court add: "We know of no honest purpose for which a party, without any mistake or misapprehension, would deliberately destroy the evidence of an existing debt, and we will not presume one. From the necessity and hardship of the case, the courts have allowed the party to be a competent witness to prove the loss or destruction of papers, but it will be an unreasonable indulgence, and a violation of the just maxim that no one shall take advantage of his own wrong, to permit this testimony where he has designedly destroyed it."

If, then, the obliteration of this direct proof was the settled purpose of the witness who now appears to give its contents, that is enough. Other people's interests are not to be placed in a worse position when the motives upon which he destroyed the accurate evidence are replaced by motives for reproducing its older effect. In the case of Renner vs. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat, 581,

"The Court, Thompson, J., says: 'This rule of evidence must be so applied as to promote the ends of justice and guard against fraud or imposition. If the circumstances will justify a well grounded belief that the original paper is kept back by design, no secondary evidence ought to be admitted.'"

In the case of Broadwell vs. Stiles, 3 Halst. N. J., 58, it appeared that the plaintiff himself had obliterated the indorsements on a note, so that the handwriting could not be judged of, and he at the trial offered to prove by witnesses that the erased signature was not the genuine signature, which was permitted. The erasure was voluntary and not by accident or mistake. It was not pretended that it was by accident; it was voluntary.

The Court say: "He who voluntarily, without accident or mistake, destroys primary evidence, thereby deprives himself of the production and use of secondary evidence. The best evidence is required, and if a party having such in his power voluntarily destroys it, the law knows no relaxation for him, whatever may be given to accident or misfortune. The fact of destruction excites suspicion and unfavorable presumption. * * *

* * To admit of evidence under such circumstances is as repugnant to principle as to deny a party the cross-examination of the witness of his adversary."

Now, your Honor will perceive, it does not speak of fraud. Consider before you purposely destroy an instrument, whether or no you wish to preserve its contents alive. The destruction here was on the motive of suppressing the contents, and not having the paper known. Now, when the interests of other parties require that if the paper is produced in any shape it shall be produced in its real shape, it cannot be subverted by the act of the witness himself, that has substituted his oral memory for the written instrument, under its voluntary destruction. The Court say to do that is as repugnant to principle as to deny a party the cross-examination of the witness of his adversary. In 2 Abb. Ct. App. Dec. (1864) the exception to the rule admitting secondary evidence is stated thus:

"If the papers be purposely destroyed by a party having an interest in its contents, he shall not be permitted to substitute secondary evidence, because the willful destruction of the more reliable witness tends to throw suspicion upon the verity and authenticity of the inferior evidence."

Now, there was a single case before the Supreme Court of Massachusetts known as the Count Johannes vs. Bennett (5 Allen Mass., 169). Count Johannes being a suitor for the hand of a woman, her parents were greatly fearful that their daughter would accept him, and procured defendant, a clergyman who had formerly been the pastor of the family, to write her a letter dissuading her from the match. The Count received the letter from his intended wife, and the day before their marriage he burned it, and did not take a copy. He subsequently sued the writer for libel. Held, that it was error to allow him to testify to its contents without first rebutting the presumption against him arising from its destruction. It does not appear that this ground for the objection to the oral evidence was assigned at the trial. The Court say this "Was a violation of the cardinal principle that when it appears that a party has destroyed an instrument or document, the presumption arises that if it had been produced it would have been against his interest, or in some essential particular unfavorable to his claims under it."

Now, this is the inference the law draws, not dependent upon any fact. The rule of substitution is reluctantly accepted by the law, and only to avoid the greater injustice or misfortune of accident or mistake disturbing the authenticity of evidence. Now, the circumstances of this case are all one way in their indication. This interview thus held turned wholly on that paper. That was what this witness talked about; that is what Mr. Beecher talked about if he opened his mouth; that is the subject, the interest and the purpose he disclosed. It was that this communication should be the end of all. That is this witness's view. Now, this paper was destroyed. Mr. Beecher's only desire was that that paper, when it originally became the subject of consideration between him and Moulton, and he was asked to give up the retraction of that paper, that the papers should not be separated, that he should keep his own, or, if he gave it up, he should know that the paper to which it applied was kept in the same condition also for evidence. Now, whenever Mr. Beecher is shown as a party to the destruction of either of these papers, it will be time enough to suggest that the rule I have insisted upon is to be buried.

Mr. Tilton—Will your Honor have the kindness to inform me whether I can name the circumstances?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—There is a very prominent case of Farall vs. Farall, in 4 New-Hampshire, where it was held that where a grantee canceled a deed with the intent to re-vest the title (and the deed not delivered or recorded), that it would not have this effect directly, yet the destruction being voluntary, he could not give it in evidence, and so indirectly it should work the consequence intended.

Judge Neilson—The deed must have been delivered in that case.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; but probably not recorded.

Mr. Beach—This case last read by the learned counsel, I think, illustrates the proposition which I intended to submit to your Honor, that all these cases read by the counsel apply to examples where the instrument in question was in some degree the foundation of the action, or direct and influential evidence in itself of the action. Now, this paper, Sir, which we offer to prove the contents of, was an incidental circumstance in the course of the interview between the parties to this action. The counsel falsely assumes that it was the foundation of the interview. It may have been the instigation of that interview, but it was by no means the essential subject-matter of the communication which then passed between these parties. Had not that paper been produced and read from, had Mr. Tilton upon that occasion stated from recollection and by parole, as he did state to Mr. Beecher, the contents of that instrument, nobody would pretend that the paper itself must be produced. It was not what the paper contained; it was what Mr. Tilton stated to Mr. Beecher, the impression conveyed to the mind of Mr. Beecher in regard to the subject of the then communication made by Mr. Tilton. Whether it came from the paper or from the unaided recollection of the witness is totally immaterial. In the case of the deed, the deed was the evidence of title. In this case the paper which Mr. Tilton read from was not evidence at all as between the parties. Your Honor perceives at once that the declarations contained in the paper cannot be held as evidence of the fact which it recited. It was the statement which the paper conveyed to Mr. Beecher I repeat, and his acceptance or rejection of its truth, which constitutes the pith of the evidence, and whether Mr. Tilton stated the contents of that paper correctly or erroneously is a matter totally immaterial. It was the idea conveyed to the mind of Mr. Beecher, no matter what form of words, it was the substance of the fact communicated to him that he was called upon to meet upon that occasion. But will your Honor permit me to refer you again more particularly to the case of Riggs vs. Taylor, 9 Wheaton, 483.

"Thus, should a party destroy a paper under the erroneous impression that it could be of no further use, he may, notwithstanding, prove its contents by secondary evidence."

Now, Sir, that is the general principle applicable to all cases. And it is not true, as the counsel assumes, that the law permits this secondary evidence reluctantly. If a party destroys an original under a mistake of fact, under the idea that it is of no longer use, as if he destroys a paid note, supposed to be paid by genuine bank bills, or as if he throws aside a letter written in the ordinary course of business which he does not conceive important to preserve, whenever it becomes necessary to prove the contents of the note or of the letter, the law, in the pursuit of truth and justice, and with indulgence to the circumstances under which the paper may have been destroyed, permits the secondary evidence, and there is no reluctance on the part of the law in the permission; there is nothing in the rule which is an indulgence to either of the parties: and it is only when the destruction appears to have been not only voluntary, but fraudulent, that the party is concluded by its destruction; I conceive, Sir, that this law is abundantly established, not only by authority but upon principle. But your Honor will perceive that we propose to show this destruction was by the mutual concurrence of the parties to the interview on that occasion. Mr. Beecher concurred in it; and the result of that interview produced the destruction of the paper; and if subsequent developments between the parties renders the contents of that letter at all material, there is nothing in this rule which precludes either from testifying. The gentleman apprehends mischievous effects from this rule, and at the time of the decisions to which he referred, and upon which we must chiefly rely, there was some force in the suggestion as to a party who destroys a paper in regard to which he seeks to give secondary evidence, the lips of his adversary being closed as to its contents. But here Mr. Tilton gains no advantage. Mr. Beecher is a witness equally competent, we may assume equally credible, with himself, knows the contents of this paper, as communicated to him. He is at perfect liberty to dispute the testimony of Mr. Tilton, in regard to its contents, and may himself give the general idea and impression of the subject in the paper handed to him. Where is the mischief, Sir, where is the danger? If there is any misapprehension in the recollection of Mr. Tilton, it will be met at once by the conflicting memory of Mr. Beecher. The evidence of these gentlemen, their credibility being equal, is balanced upon that question, and it simply becomes a point of memory as between the two. And so far, Sir, as the argument of the learned counsel is directed to the question of the credibility and the effect of the confessions or declarations or proof of them made by parole, it is not necessary for me to discuss here that question. Counsel has used the occasion for the purpose of making some suggestions which may be pertinent in the ultimate argument of this cause, but do not seem to me to be so here; and I, therefore, submit to your Honor, as this paper is but an incident in a general conversation, a transaction as between these parties, and as it was destroyed by the mutual assent of both parties, nay, with the concurrence and at the request of Mrs. Tilton herself, I submit to your Honor that this evidence must of necessity be competent, and it is essential for the purpose of understanding what was the declaration by Mr. Beecher upon that occasion, and giving point and effect to those declarations.

Judge Nelson—Mr. Fullerton, proceed with your examination, omitting for the present the contents of that letter or paper.

THE VERBAL RECITAL OF GUILT.

Mr. Fullerton—What did you say to Mr. Beecher upon that occasion? A. After I read to him the paper he lifted his hand as if he were about to speak, and I said, "No, Sir; hear me through, and speak then;" and I then detailed to him what, by the ruling of his Honor, I am not permitted to disclose here, that is, the story which Mrs. Tilton had told me in the middle of the preceding Summer.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; that is not excluded.

Mr. Evarts—We object to it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is not excluded yet.

Judge Neilson—Well, give the conversation, whatever it was.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Give us the conversation. A. I told Mr. Beecher that in the early part of July, previous to that interview, Mrs. Tilton had come home unexpectedly from the country, and had said to me that the object of her return was to communicate to me a secret, which had long been resting on her mind like a burden, which she wished to throw off; that she had, on several previous occasions, come almost to the point of making such a statement to me, and once in particular while on a sick bed, but that she had never until then, having been restored to health, been brought quite to the point of courage to make the disclosure; that before she would announce to me what the secret was, she exacted from me a pledge that I would do no harm to the person concerning whom the secret was to be told, and furthermore, that I would not communicate to that person the fact that she had made such a revelation to me, because, as she said, she wished to inform him of that revelation herself; that I had given to her this pledge, my word of honor, that I would neither disclose her secret, whatever it might be, nor would I injure the person concerning whom the secret was to be told; that she then said to me that it was a secret between herself and the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, her pastor; that, as I was well aware, there had been, during a long course of years, a friendship between herself and her pastor; that this friendship, contrary to my expectation or belief, had been in later years more than friendship, it had been love; that it had been more than love, it had been sexual intimacy; that this sexual intimacy had begun shortly after the death of her son Paul; that she had been in a tender frame of mind, consequent upon that bereavement; that she had received much consolation during that shadow on our house, from her pastor; that she had made a visit to his house while she was still suffering from that sorrow, and that there, on the 10th of October, 1868, she had surrendered her body to him in sexual embrace; that she had repeated such an act on the following Saturday evening at her own residence, 174 Livingston-street; that she had consequent upon those two occasions, repeated such acts at various times, at his residence and at hers, and at other places—such acts of sexual intercourse—continuing from the Fall of 1868 to the Spring of 1870; that in July, 1870, she had made to me a confession in detail of those acts; that she had given to me also, during that recital, many of the reasonings by her pastor communicated to her to change what was her original scruples against such a sexual intimacy.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, do I understand that this is what you said to Mr. Beecher? A. Precisely, Sir; that she had in the early stages of their friendship been greatly distressed at rumors concerning Mr. Beecher's moral integrity; that she wished to shew to him that there was a woman who was superior to the silly flatteries with which many ladies in his congregation had courted his society; that she wished to demonstrate the honor and the dignity of her sex; that she had done so in her own thought, until finally she had been persuaded by him, that as their love was proper and not wrong, therefore it followed that any expression of that love, whether by the shake of the hand, or the kiss of the lips, or even bodily intercourse, since it all was the expression of that which in itself was not wrong, therefore that bodily intercourse was not wrong; that she had said to me that Mr. Beecher had professed to her a greater love than he had ever shown to any woman in his life; that she and I both knew that for years his home had not been a happy one; that his wife had not been a satisfactory wife to him; that she wished—that he wished to find in her, Elizabeth, the consolation, the help to his mind, and the solace of life which had been denied to him by the unfortunate marriage at home; that he had made these arguments to her during the early years of their friendship, and she had steadfastly resisted; that he had many times fondled her to the degree that it required on her part almost bodily resistance to be rid of him; that after her final surrender during the period of her sorrow, in October, 1868, he had then many times solicited her when she had refused; that the occasions of her yielding her body to him had not been numerous, but that his solicitations had been frequent and urgent, and sometimes almost violent; that she made this confession to me because the sense of deceitfulness in her mind was a pain to her conscience; that she had gone away from home in the Spring—parting from me—under a cloud, as I knew, and that I had written to her in her absence a letter, saying that unless she told me the truth, that if she ever lied to me as she had done in reference to a few minor matters, that I never again could hold her in any respect; that that letter had rankled in her thought and heart; that she felt that she never could look me honestly in the face again until she had made a full and free confession; that she had come down from the country on purpose to make it, and that she had made it with great modesty and delicacy and womanly feeling, without giving evidence that the great fact which she confessed was wrong, but that the wrong which she wished to throw from her mind was mainly the necessary deceit with which she had hitherto concealed it from her husband. In making this recital of what I said on that occasion to Mr. Beecher, I beg again to remind the Court that I do not undertake to repeat the exact language which I used. It was a long story. I told it from a little memorandum which I had made, of dates, times, extracts from letters—a little memorandum made on the back of the white envelope, unaddressed, in which Mrs. Tilton's statement that evening had been lodged; I had taken out the statement and handed it to Mr. Moulton; I had said to him—

Mr. Evarts—Well?

MRS. TILTON'S INTERCESSION FOR BEECHER.

Mr. Fullerton—You need not state that. A. On the back of that envelope I had made these memoranda; the copy was made on the same envelope, and in my narration to Mr. Beecher I unconsciously picked the paper to pieces, and at the end of my narrative I had destroyed not only the memoranda of the conversation but also the copy of the paper which Mr. Moulton possessed. I furthermore told Mr. Beecher on that occasion that Mrs. Tilton, after her confession in July, had gone into the country; that she had become a broken-hearted woman; that later in the Summer she had gone from her country avocation home, to the far West, or rather to a considerable distance in the West; that she had returned from the West a few weeks previous to this interview, I think about the 1st of December, this interview taking place on the 30th; that shortly after her return, or almost the first conspicuous incident that happened to her husband since her return, was the interview which I had had with Mr. Bowen on the 29th of December, which had resulted in my demand upon Mr. Beecher that he should retire from his pulpit. I told him that I had informed Mrs. Tilton of what I had done with Mr. Bowen, and that she received the intelligence with an expression of heart-break and grief. I believe, however, I have already recited that. I told him that in regard to the statement which she had written, that it had come about in this way: she had asked me as soon as I had informed her of the letter that I had written to Mr. Bowen—she had asked me immediately to send for Mr. Beecher, and to hold an interview with him in her sick chamber, that she might hear me say to him that that letter should be withdrawn, that she might hear with her own ears, immediately, and before he should have any time to be troubled about it; that though I had joined with Mr. Bowen in demanding Mr. Beecher's retirement from the pulpit, yet for my wife's sake, and for the word of honor which I had pledged to her to do Mr. Beecher no harm, that I should send for him and that she should hear me immediately and without delay take back that letter, and assure Mr. Beecher that I would not unite with Mr. Bowen in making any assault upon him, or in demanding him to quit the pulpit or the city. I told Mr. Beecher furthermore that I had refused to acquiesce in Mrs. Tilton's request that such a personal interview should be held between him and me, in my wife's chamber. I then told him that she had insisted four or five times, until finally she begged me to be the bearer of a letter to him; that I had then declined that; that finally, she asked me if I could not devise some method which would not be humiliating to my pride, to have an interview with him—a friendly interview, as friendly as possible, and after thinking the matter over, that I had said to her that if she would agree I would request Mr. Moulton to bring about such an interview between Mr. Beecher and myself. She said she was only too happy to hear me say so, and she wrote a statement to which I have referred, to be the basis of an interview between Mr. Beecher and myself which Mr. Moulton should bring about. After she wrote it, which was on the 29th of December, I still felt great reluctance that Mr. Moulton should know the facts of the case.

Judge Neilson—Better adhere to that in your conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—He is telling Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Oh!

The Witness—That I had carried that letter—

Mr. Evarts—Is this what you told Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; that I had carried that letter ever since yesterday, that is, since the 29th, and had only made up my mind a few hours ago, I said, to permit Mr. Moulton to know the facts, and to bring about the interview. I cannot remember distinctly all that I said to Mr. Beecher, the substance of it; the main portion of it consisted in the recital to him, as nearly as I could, of Mrs. Tilton's story. Toward the conclusion of it, I again reminded him of the object for which I had sent for him, which was that though I had communicated to him, through Bowen, a demand for his retirement from his pulpit, yet that, at my wife's earnest entreaty, I revoked that demand, and for my wife's sake, and not his or mine, I pledged to him my word that I would not assist Mr. Bowen in the hostility which he had meditated against Mr. Beecher.

Q. Are you through now with your narrative substantially?

A. At the close of the narrative, Mr. Beecher sat in his chair, and I thought he was about to speak; I waited a moment; his face, and his head, and his neck, were blood-red, and I feared for the moment that there would be some accident to him. He burst out with these words: "Theodore, I am in a dream; this is Dante's Inferno." I had meanwhile gone to the door, unlocked it, but partly opened it, and said to him: "You are free to retire." He did not seem to hear what I said; and I again pointed to the door and said that he might go. He rose and walked toward the door, as if he was going out without saying to me a word; then he suddenly turned, and looking me in the face he said: "May I go once again, and for the last time, to see Elizabeth?" I instantly answered no, and then, yes. If I am allowed to state the reason I will state the reason.

Q. No; state what you said? A. I said no, and then yes; then I said: "But in going to see Elizabeth, see to it, Sir, that you do not chide her for the confession which she has made. She is at home—sick, heartbroken. I charge you that you visit upon her no reproach for confessing to her husband; for if you smite her with a word," I said, "I will smite you in a ten-fold degree. I have hitherto spared your life when I had power to destroy it; I spare it now for Elizabeth's sake; but if you reproach her I will smite your name before all the world." As he turned to go away, I said to him—I don't think I can recall the exact words, but the substance was this, that I can remember—"that his duty was henceforth so to conduct his battle with Bowen that Elizabeth and her name and fame should not be involved." He stood a moment on the threshold, and putting both his hands, in this way, up to his head—the redness in his face increasing all the while—he said: "This is all a wild whirl!" and he left me and went down the stairs.

Q. Did you go to the head of the stairs? A. I did.

Q. State whether you saw Mr. Moulton when you arrived there? A. I saw Mr. Moulton at the foot of the stairs.

Q. Did you hear what occurred between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher? A. I did.

Q. State what it was? A. Mr. Beecher went down the stairs with his hand on the rail, staggering, and I thought he was about to fall; coming toward the foot of the stairs Mr. Moulton there stood and I heard Mr. Beecher say to Mr. Moulton: "Have you seen Elizabeth's confession?" Mr. Moulton bowed and said, "Yes; I have." Mr. Beecher then said: "This will kill me."

Q. And what became of these two persons then? A. Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton immediately went into the parlor and closed the door behind them.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose I need not commence a new topic, Sir; it is the hour of adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen will please keep their seats a moment. The Jury will be in their seats at two o'clock.

After recess the examination of Mr. Tilton was resumed, as below:

Mr. Fullerton—In that interview did you state to Mr. Beecher anything about the fact whether you had learned that no communication had been made to him of Elizabeth's confession to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you say upon that subject? A. I told Mr. Beecher that when I had written to Mr. Bowen, and had sent the letter demanding his retirement from his pulpit, that I immediately communicated that fact to Mrs. Tilton, who said at once that Mr. Beecher might not and probably would not understand the reason of that demand, because she had not yet communicated to him the fact that she had ever divulged to me the story of their criminal relationship.

Q. Did she tell you anything further upon that subject, about the communication of the fact to Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Evarts—With that we have nothing to do.

Mr. Fullerton—Which was communicated to Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Evarts—Well, I think we are entitled to have the question put distinctly. "Did you say anything further to Mr. Beecher?"

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that's the question I have put, only in my form instead of the gentleman's, that is all.

Mr. Evarts—No, it is not permitted to ask this witness to tell whether his wife told him anything.

Judge Neilson—Of course.

Mr. Fullerton—And for that reason I have not asked it.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! your question was, "Did she tell you anything else which you communicated to Mr. Beecher?"

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—And that is not allowable.

Mr. Fullerton.—Yes, it is allowable.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the Court has said otherwise.

Judge Neilson—Suppose you ask him whether he said anything to Mr. Beecher on that subject, and, if so, what.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well, Sir; let that be the question, then; all that I want is the fact. [To the witness]: Did you say anything further to Mr. Beecher upon that subject? A. I don't recollect anything in particular, except that I mentioned to him the reason why she had made a written statement of a fact which he, of course, knew as well as she, and that the reason for her communicating in writing the fact that she had confessed to me, was that she had never previously communicated that fact to him, namely, her confession to me—in other words that the letter—

Mr. Beach—Yes, yes, in other words: state—

The Witness—In other words, that the note or paper which

Mrs. Tilton wrote, and which Mr. Moulton then had in his possession, and of which I read a copy to Mr. Beecher, was written by Mrs. Tilton because she had not previously informed Mr. Beecher that she had made a confession to me, and that that was the method which she took to inform him that she had made to her husband such a confession.

Mr. Evarts—You told all this to Mr. Beecher, did you? A. The substance of it all; yes, Sir; I can't give the exact words in which—it was a long narrative.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I will put this question to you. State, as near as you can recollect, the contents of this paper which you read to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that we object to; you have destroyed it.

Judge Neilson—I must rule that out.

ANOTHER CONTEST OVER THE WRITTEN CONFESSION.

Mr. Fullerton—Enter an exception to that ruling. [To the Witness]: State as near as you can what you stated to Mr. Beecher from that paper which you held in your hand.

Judge Neilson—He has given us the conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—The conversation, Sir, which occurred subsequent to the reading of the paper.

Judge Neilson—I don't think this is a paper that ought to be repeated here in any sense. I so rule, and you take an exception, please.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I only put it in another form so as to save the exception.

Mr. Beach—But the proposition now is to prove what the witness said to Mr. Beecher was the confession or statement of his wife.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—He has stated that already.

Judge Neilson—In other words, giving him the contents of the paper.

Mr. Beach—Certainly.

Judge Neilson—Well, I rule it out.

Mr. Evarts—He said that he read it.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; I think we should understand this, Sir. Does your Honor rule this out upon the idea that it was a confidential communication?

Judge Neilson—Partially so. I don't think it is proper for me to receive anything that this lady writes under any circumstances, unless it comes in without objection. Two of her letters are in already, because they were read without objection. My ruling is on both grounds.

Mr. Beach—Well, is your Honor's mind open to approach on this subject?

Judge Neilson—Well, really, I hardly think it is now. I have a very firm conviction about it.

Mr. Beach—And your Honor will not listen to authorities in point?

Judge Neilson—Oh! I don't say that, Sir. I would be sorry to say that, even, unless it was some elementary statement which we ought both to know, of course.

Mr. Beach—Have you sent for Greenleaf?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—In a case before Lord Hardwicke, Phillips says, in the first of Cowen and Hills, notes upon the text :

"He would not suffer a wife to be a witness though her husband consented. 'The rule,' he said, 'is for the peace of families, and such consent should never be encouraged.' But in another case, Best, Chief Justice, expressed his willingness to receive the evidence of the defendant's wife, if the defendant consented ; but there he refused his consent. Where a party consents that his wife shall be examined as a witness against himself, there can be no violation of confidence, which is a principal ground of the rule of exclusion. But the probability that, if such evidence were generally admitted, family dissensions might be increased, is not altogether obviated by the circumstance of the consent."

Now, here, Sir, we show, not only the consent of the wife, but the express injunction of the wife that this should be communicated to Mr. Beecher. It was prepared for the very purpose of communication to him, and intrusted to her husband for that purpose. Here, then, are the two parties who are alone competent to insist upon the inviolability of what are called confidential communications, agreeing that they shall be communicated to another party, that party being himself intimately interested in the subject of the communication. Now, under this ruling, Sir, that here is the common consent of the parties to the communication of this matter to Mr. Beecher for the common safety and preservation of both the parties and with reference to a common desired result, it avoids entirely the objection of confidential communication.

"But the same reason applies to the declaration of the husband or wife. Where an action is brought by or against the husband, or by the husband and wife jointly, in right of the wife, the general rule is that the declarations of the wife are not evidence against or for the husband. In the action for trespass, etc.—in an action for goods supplied to the defendant's wife, who, as it appeared, lived separate, upon an allowance from him—it was held that her declarations as to the receipt of the allowance could not be admitted in his favor. A discourse between the husband and wife in the presence of a third person, may be given in evidence against the husband, like any other conversation in which he may have been concerned. Letters written by the husband or wife are subject to the same rule as their declarations."

Now, it makes no difference, Sir, that this communication came from Mrs. Tilton in the shape of a letter or a statement. I suppose it will be adjudged precisely the same as if Mrs. Tilton was present, making this declaration through her husband, authorizing the husband to make the declaration, or making to the husband in the presence of Mr. Beecher, the declaration contained in this instrument. Here is express authority, Sir, that such a communication between the husband and wife, in the presence of a third party, can be proved. And it seems to me, if your Honor recurs for one moment to the principle of the rule upon which this exclusion is founded, you will perceive that such declarations must be admissible. The rule of exclusion, Sir, is founded in the idea that the communication is made in the secrecy of the domestic household, and upon the faith of the relation between husband and wife; that it is a communication of secrecy which each understands to be inviolable, and which is necessary to be cultivated for the purpose of promoting the confidence of the marital relation. Your Honor will at once grant that this is the rule—the principle upon which the rule is founded. Here is a communication evidently not made upon such reliance. Mrs. Tilton never read this statement to her husband in the confidence and faith of their relation, and upon the belief that it would be confined to his own breast. On the contrary, it was made for the purpose of communication to the very man to whom it was communicated. Now, Sir, the idea of secrecy, the idea that there was any confidence or faith as resting upon the relation of husband and wife, between her and Mr. Tilton, is entirely disposed of by that consideration. And how will your Honor answer this express authority ?

Judge Neilson—I confess I think I should find it difficult, on second thought, to answer it. I would like to hear Mr. Evarts on that point.

Mr. Beach—I had a reference, Sir, if your Honor will permit me to refer the counsel to it. While the gentleman is addressing you, Sir, I will find the additional authority. I do not put my hands upon it at the moment.

Mr. Evarts—My learned friend puts it on the proposition, as I understand him, cited from "Phillips on Evidence," that a discourse between the husband and wife, in the presence of a third person, may be given in evidence against the husband like any other conversation in which he may have been concerned; that is the proposition. Now, that proposition, correct enough, no doubt, in the case in which it is laid down, would require a good deal of qualification as to its not being a confidential communication, notwithstanding there was a third person present, because there might be a third person in the position of counsel, or a third person in the position of physician, or a third person in the position of parent or adviser in the very confidence which was being reposed. But obviously that case was not concerned in an inquiry of that kind. Now, it is said, that this letter, or written paper, addressed by Mrs. Tilton to some one, I suppose—Mr. Beecher, perhaps—is not in the position of a confidential communication, because it was confided to the husband to be repeated to Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—That is the point.

Mr. Evarts—But, if your Honor please, the confidence in the husband by the wife was that it was to be repeated to Mr. Beecher in her interest and for the privacy of the matter and to avoid promulgation. I take the witness's own view of it. That was used in that interest and for that purpose, and the whole object of this interview was the securing, from Mr. Beecher of suppression of any controversy, in any tendency it might have, to involve this question of this wife. That is the story. One would suppose Mr. Beecher might be trusted if there was any truth in this matter to keep this thing private on his own account, as people usually do in their own interest. But that is the story; that is the proposition. And now, when the paper is destroyed, the proposition is to promulgate its contents (notwithstanding the destruction of its terms which the wife might be willing to be bound by and which could be read), as what she had consented to have communicated to Mr. Beecher, and, after the destruction of this little shred of protection of the wife's pa in her husband's mouth, on the plea, that it was not confidential, a reproduction of the destroyed paper. Now, if your Honor please, I have not heard any answer satisfactory to my views of the law, and I have not heard from your Honor that you had heard any such views as entitled this speaker to take the place of his wife's statement and of that written paper which he has destroyed. Is it pretended that anything that has fallen from him now, in the way of evidence about that paper, has changed it from the position in which it stood when he said that he had destroyed it, and when my learned friends propose to put the proposition of its introduction on the consent of Mr. Beecher to its destruction. We have had the narrative of picking a paper to pieces. Now, whenever that is brought up it may be time for me to remark upon that; but I stand now upon my proposition in the first place that the whole narrative is inadmissible, as proceeding out, on his own theory of it, from a confidence of the wife, the letter as much as any other part of it, and the letter itself, as an item of evidence orally, because it has been destroyed. Because, your Honor will notice that if there has been any change of this copy, in its manner of destruction, the original at least was destroyed voluntarily by this husband and this wife.

Mr. Beach—The additional authority to which I wish to draw your Honor's attention is contained in the notes to "Phillips on Evidence," by Edwards, in a note to the 65th page of the first volume:

"The husband being dead, the wife is not incompetent to prove a fact coming to her knowledge by the open declaration of her husband in the presence of other parties"—referring to the 14th of New-Hampshire and other cases.

"But she cannot disclose communications made to her alone."

Now, the rule of exclusion, as your Honor has already heard from repeated authorities, applies as well to the case where the husband or wife, one of them, is dead, or to the case of a divorce. And yet it is here held in our own courts, that she may testify to what is expressly called open declarations of her husband and in the presence of third persons. My proposition is that if Mrs. Tilton had been present at this interview between her husband and Mr. Beecher, that everything she and her husband said upon that occasion would be competent, because, in the language of the authority, it was an open declaration in presence of third persons, and avoided entirely the idea of confidence and faith in reliance upon the matrimonial connection. How is it possible, if your Honor please, to say that a communication which husband and wife make in the presence of a crowd, or in the presence of a single person, is a privileged communication upon the idea that it is communicated between the two as a secret extorted by the confidence and the faith of the relation between the parties, and as necessary to the continuance and the maintenance inviolable of that relation, and of all the associations which spring out of that relation. Here is a changed condition, Sir. Here is, as we must accept the evidence in its present condition, a dishonored wife making the communication of her disgrace to her husband, and directing that husband to have an interview with her seducer, and the whole subject of the crime conversed between the two. Can it be said that a communication of that character is a confidential communication, founded upon the relation of husband and wife and given only upon the faith of that relation and in the confidence of its inviolability. With great respect, Sir, may I not say, what utter nonsense it is to contend that any such confidence existed between these parties at that time, or that this communication was made in reliance upon it, when the wife in making it directs the husband to communicate it to her seducer? But, says the counsel, this was made for the benefit of the wife, to secure to her concealment and secrecy and immunity. What, according to the evidence, was the cause of this communication? Why, this husband had united with Mr. Bowen in a scheme to demand Mr. Beecher's retirement from the pulpit, and from his residence in the City of Brooklyn. It afflicted her sensitiveness and her sympathies. He was a great and good man, whom she loved, and whom she did not wish to be destroyed. She had extorted from her husband, at the time of her original communication, that he never would lift his hand in hostility against the person to whom the secret related, and in the pursuance of that feeling, and in its sympathy, when she found this husband uniting with the enemy of Mr. Beecher, she implores him to desist, in lists upon it as a concession from him to her, not for the purpose of protecting her from any disclosure but for the purpose of carrying out the original pledge which she in her love for this man exacted, given by Mr. Tilton at the time the original communication was made. It was to protect and preserve Mr. Beecher, it was to save him from the cooperation of her husband in the attack and hostility which that husband and the wife understood Mr. Bowen was then prosecuting against Mr. Beecher, and for his protection she directs her husband in pursuance of her wish to have an interview with Mr. Beecher to assure him of his friendship and his aid in opposition to Mr. Bowen. Now, your Honor, if it is to be held under these circumstances that a communication of this character, made for this purpose, stated to Mr. Beecher, is not to be received in evidence, I ask your Honor to find some way of escape from these authorities to the effect that declarations of this character are admissible—admissible under all circumstances and for all purposes. So far as the counsel's objection to the whole of this interview is concerned, I understand your Honor to have ruled that question, and I do not propose to discuss it unless your Honor wishes to hear further debate and further authority upon that question; but I am very well assured, your Honor, that, if, according to your Honor's ruling, we are entitled to give this interview between these two contending parties upon this subject, that this letter, the statement of which was made to Mr. Beecher, the contents of which he understood, and if we are further at liberty to prove the manner in which he met that statement, this letter, although it may be destroyed, must be evidence against him. Now, Sir, I was mistaken in stating to your Honor upon my former argument that this paper was destroyed by the mutual assent of the parties. From my general understanding of what the evidence would be I had supposed that there was a more deliberate and self-possessed conference between these two gentlemen, and that there was some agreement in consonance with the wish and desire of Mrs. Tilton; but it now turns out, Sir, that in the agitation of that narrative made by Mr. Tilton to Mr. Beecher he unconsciously destroyed this paper contained in the envelope upon which he had memorandums of the subject upon which he was communicating to Mr. Beecher. I have read to your Honor, that if a paper is destroyed by mistake, without any intention of suppressing evidence, without any fraudulent purpose, that secondary evidence of its contents is admissible. This rule applies, Sir, where there is an unconscious destruction, where it is done without any purpose, without any consciousness at the time that it is being destroyed, and doesn't it fall under that rule which holds that where papers are destroyed by mere accident, it is competent to give secondary evidence? I submit to your Honor that it does, that these authorities are so direct and pertinent upon this question, that there is no possibility, independently of the reasoning, upon principle for the exclusion of this paper.

THE WRITTEN CONFESSION EXCLUDED.

Judge Neilson—I still think, Sir, that I must rule out the paper. Take an exception.

Mr. Evarts—I now move, if your Honor please, to raise this question, which formed, no doubt, a considerable element in our discussions of last week, and which I do not propose to renew at any length. I move to strike out the evidence given of this interview, because it is evidence upon the part of the husband pertinent to the issue, if at all pertinent to the issue, with the purpose and the tendency to disparage the reputation of the wife, to wit, to prove her adultery. Of course it does not prove it. It is merely a statement by their witness of what passed between him and Mr. Beecher, as based upon something that may or may not have passed between him and his wife. Your Honor has not allowed that to be proved as a matter of fact. But now the purport and tendency of this evidence, to wit, as a link or part of the progress of the proofs toward the demonstration of the adultery of the wife, is apparent. The generality of the question permitted an exploring of the interview, and when it is given it shows that its tendency and pertinency, if it have any proper tendency, and have any pertinency, is to prove an adultery of the wife as a link or part of the proof. I move to strike it out, it not being competent by our laws for the husband or the wife to testify against the repute of another in that degree of crimination.

Judge Neilson—You must take an exception, Sir; I deny the motion.

THE UNEXPECTED MEETING AT MOULTON'S.

Mr. Fullerton—I then call your attention, Mr. Tilton, to an interview with Mr. Beecher on or about the 3d of January, 1871. Do you recollect such an interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did it take place? A. It took place in precisely the same room in which the other was held, that is, the second story, front room, in Mr. Moulton's house in Clinton str. et.

Q. Under what circumstances did you and Mr. Beecher meet there on that day? A. Under these: I went to Mr. Moulton's house during the forenoon, perhaps not long after the morning. Mr. Moulton had not yet risen, being slightly unwell. While I was sitting with him the door bell rang and suddenly, without any expectation on my part, and I think also without any expectation on Mr. Moulton's part, Mr. Beecher entered the room.

Q. Now, please state what occurred at that interview? A. I instantly arose from my chair, and what I did I do not exactly know. I only remember that Mr. Moulton suddenly said to me that I ought not to refuse to salute Mr. Beecher in his house. I said to Mr. Moulton, "How can you expect me to speak to a man who has ruined my wife, broken my home, and who then gets my permission, in a sad and serious hour, to visit that woman, and uses that permission for the purpose of dictating to her and making her write down a lie?" Mr. Moulton then said to me, "But, Theodore, you must remember that Mr. Beecher has sent to you a letter through me humbling himself before you as he does before God. What more can you ask of him? What more could you ask of any man in such circumstances as that?" "Furthermore," said he, "this is my house, and Mr. Beecher is at present my guest, and you will oblige me," said Mr. Moulton, "if you will speak to him, at least as much as to say, good morning." I did say, "Mr. Beecher, Good morning." Mr. Beecher meanwhile sat on the edge of Mr. Moulton's bed. He turned around to me and said: "Theodore, I don't marvel that you do not feel like speaking to me. I feel more dread of being spoken to by you than you can possibly feel repugnance in speaking. All I have to say is," he remarked, "that I hope you found it in your heart to accept the communication which I made to you through Mr. Moulton. I dictated it," he said, "out of heartbreak and anguish. It expressed my sincere feelings. Nevertheless," said he, "I know it was but words, and words are little and nothing, and no words of mine, nor any acts of mine can ever undo the great wrong that I have done to you and to Elizabeth." He then said, "I do not put in any plea for myself, but only for her. Indeed, if you wish to carry out the demand which was communicated to me in your letter of Christmas Day, that I should retire from my pulpit, you have only to say the word and I will retire. The renting of the pews shall not go on. I will bow my head and go out of public life; only," said he, "I have this request to make—that if it be necessary for you to make a public recital of this case, that you will give me notice in advance of your intention to do so, in order that I may either go out of the world by suicide, or else escape from the face of my friends by a voyage to some foreign land. And, furthermore," he said, "I ask you to do me this favor: that whoever else in the wide world is to be informed of the facts of this case, at least my wife shall never know anything on the subject, for she is not only your enemy but may very readily become mine. If you can spare her the pang of having these facts communicated to her, I will consider that it is an additional occasion of gratitude." He said also that he did not wish me to understand that he solicited any mercy for himself alone, but only for his family, and particularly for Elizabeth. He said: "I do not beg at all for myself, but for her. She was not to blame. I was altogether at fault. My sacred office and my years should have combined to have made me her guardian, not her tempter." He furthermore told me that the relationship which had existed between himself and Elizabeth, had not always been marked by sexual intimacy; that the earlier years of it were free from any such taint and crime, and that only during the last year, or a little more than a year, he said, and that year shortened by a country vacation, had that sexual intimacy existed. He furthermore said that he did not know how he could offer any mitigation or excuse for himself, and yet he said he wanted me to believe for Elizabeth's sake, and also for his own, that he had never sought her for any vulgar end, but that their sexual commerce had been through love, and not through lust; that he had never met any woman whom he had loved so well; that he had sought companionship in her mind; that he had taken manuscripts to her that she might be his critic; and that the blame—and this he repeated two or three times over—"The blame," he said, "belonged to me and not to her." And he added—and when he did so the tears came into his eyes—he added some words like these: "Tell me, before you go away, can you possibly ever reinstate Elizabeth in your respect and love?" He then buried his face in his hands; he sat on the edge or near the foot of Mr. Moulton's bed, and he used some figure of speech; I won't undertake to quote the exact words, but the picture was like this: he drew the figure of a man sitting on a brink, and said that he was dizzy, and was like one on the edge of hell. The only other words that I remember this moment, which he said, were to the effect that he was in great grief through Mr. Bowen's action in my case, the termination of my engagements with Mr. Bowen's papers, and said he felt that Mr. Bowen's suddenly changed mind had been largely due to statements which Mrs. Beecher had made to Mr. Bowen, and to statements which he himself had made, though he said that Mrs. Beecher had been more mischievous in her utterances than he. He mentioned also that he had voluntarily written a letter to Mr. Bowen, either that day or the day before, in which he had taken back some of the unkind references or injurious statements which he had made to Mr. Bowen concerning me.

Q. How long did that last interview last? A. I don't know how long Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton remained together. I remember that Mr. Beecher said something—I cannot distinctly bring it to my mind at this moment—which led him into a violent outburst of grief. He sat and wept again and again, and his face assumed a very peculiar redness, in the midst of which Mr. Moulton asked me if I would retire and leave the two together alone, which I did.

Q. Did you at that time leave the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Nothing further, then, occurred that day? A. Nothing further occurred that day. I am not able at this moment to say whether or not I have given you all the conversation that took place. I have a floating recollection in my mind that I have omitted something, but at present I do not distinctly recall what it is.

THE SECOND MEETING AT MOULTON'S.

Q. Then, if you please, we will go to the next interview, of January 7th, or about that date. Do you recollect on that day of having an interview with Mr. Beecher? A. I don't recollect precisely as to a date. I remember that after the interview which I have just narrated, either in whole or possibly only in part—a few days after that interview I was sent for by Mr. Moulton to go to his house. It was in the afternoon. He was in his parlor. He said that he had not been well enough to go out, and wanted to see me on a matter of importance. Mr. Beecher was present. The letter which I had written to Mr. Henry C. Bowen, dated the 1st of January, was under discussion. I had been sent for by Mr. Moulton—

Q. One moment. Look at "Exhibit No. 3," and see if it is the letter to which you make reference? [Handing witness "Exhibit No. 3."] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now you may go on. A. I had been sent for by Mr. Moulton to enter into some consultation in reference to that letter. That was the object of the interview.

Q. What occurred at the interview? A. Mr. Moulton read that letter aloud. He told Mr. Beecher that I had written it, feeling that I must make some explanation to the public for the sudden cessation of my relationship with The Independent and The Brooklyn Union. I say Mr. Moulton stated that; possibly it was I who stated that; I am not clear as to that point. At all events, either Mr. Moulton or myself—and on second thought I am rather inclined to think it was I who said that my relationships with Mr. Bowen had been suddenly terminated in a manner to excite public comment; namely, that the last copy of The Independent, or the one next to the last, in December, 1870, had announced to the public that I was to be no longer the editor of that paper, but its special contributor, and that I was to be five years the editor of The Brooklyn Union.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, do you mean you said all this? A. I said all this as part of the explanation which I gave for my action toward that letter. I said that the announcement had been made in The Independent, with a great flourish of trumpets and with much eulogy and glowing reference to myself, that I was to be hereafter the editor of a daily paper and to be special contributor to The Independent, and that Mr. Bowen had put forth the announcement in a very complimentary manner to myself, and that the next intimation which the public had concerning me, through the press at large, was, that those contracts had been suddenly terminated; that I was not to be a contributor to The Independent, that I was not to be the editor of The Brooklyn Union for five years, and no reasons were given; and I said, that in view of that extraordinary announcement, and in view of the sudden cessation of that promised engagement, some explanation was due by me to the public to account for that event, and that the explanation which I designed to make to the public was a plain and simple recital of the exact facts narrated by Mr. Bowen in an interview with me on the 26th of December; also the exact facts that occurred in an interview between him and me two or three days after, when he grew angry and violent; also the exact facts of his terminating my engagements with those two papers a day or two after that interview; that I felt that duty to myself required a plain statement of the facts in the case; that accordingly under that sense of duty I had written a letter to Mr. Bowen reciting all the facts; that I had written it very carefully, taking the advice of Mr. Jeremiah P. Robinson, of Mr. Moulton, of Mr. Gordon L. Ford, and that acting upon their advice, and particularly upon the advice of the oldest of those gentlemen, Mr. Robinson, I had studiously kept out of this letter all ground of difference between Mr. Beecher and myself. I had only stated in the letter the ground of difference between Mr. Bowen and myself, and I had prepared the letter and expected to publish it; that Mr. Moulton had counseled me not to publish it, and that that was the way the case then stood. My recollection is that at that point of the narrative, Mr. Moulton either said to Mr. Beecher that he had counseled me not to publish the letter, or else he said to me, "Theodore, you know that I have been opposed to the publication of this letter or to the recital to the public of any of the facts therein contained;" I cannot undertake to give all the conversation that ensued. The next point of the interview was, not as to the publication of the letter, for I yielded my acquiescence to Mr. Moulton's rather peremptory request and demand—

Mr. Everts—Confine yourself to what you said, Mr. Tilton.

The Witness—Yes, Sir. Mr. Moulton then held a consultation with Mr. Beecher as to the contents of the letter, the point of that conversation being this, as I remember Mr. Moulton said: "Mr. Beecher, I do not want to know anything from curiosity as to the truth or falsity of the charges which Mr. Bowen makes against you; I have no wish to inquire. Mr. Bowen is a man for whom I have very little respect, and I do not want to interfere in your affairs with him any further than I can be of service to you. Tell me this, however," said Mr. Moulton, "is there anything in this letter which you are afraid to meet in case it should be published? In other words, has Mr. Bowen any rod which he can hold over you? Has he any evidence to prove either these or any similar charges, or anything against your moral character?" Mr. Beecher in reply to that said, in substance—and he spoke with much anger, and I think he took the letter in his hands and pointed to some of the statements in it—he said in substance that so far from it being true, as Mr. Bowen had alleged, that he, Mr. Beecher, had made to Mr. Bowen any confessions of adultery, that he, Mr. Beecher, had a settlement with Mr. Bowen in the previous February, that that settlement had been reduced to writing, and signed at the time, that it contained numerous items and covered the whole field of their dispute, and there was in it no reference to any such thing as adultery—that he could produce, if necessary, to Mr. Moulton, the heads of that settlement, and Mr. Moulton would see for himself that there was no accusation by Mr. Bowen against him, Mr. Beecher, of any such crime as adultery. He said, furthermore, that so far as Mr. Bowen's general charges against him were concerned—I remember that he lifted his right hand and brought it down upon his knee with a good deal of force—says he: "I am not afraid to face Bowen either here or anywhere as to any statement he may make." He then said to Mr. Moulton, not to me, but in my presence: "Now, it may be very natural for you to suppose that, in view of such charges as these, I would deny the truth even if they were true; but in order to convince you that I do not deny the truth, I am going to admit that Mr. Bowen has pointed to a story in which there is some truth, though not as Mr. Bowen has stated it." Mr. Beecher then turned over the pages of the letter, and hunting through the pages, put his finger on a statement made in the letter to the effect that he, Beecher, had been charged by Mr. Bowen with a violent assault.

LAWYERS' SARCASM.

Judge Neilson—Does that relate to a third person?

Mr. Fullerton—I will stop him in a moment.

Mr. Everts—I don't understand the right of my learned friend to stop him.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't suppose my right depends on my friend's understanding of it, by any means. Whenever it becomes apparent that he is going to speak in reference to a third person, I will stop him.

Judge Neilson—[To the Witness.] I wish simply to say this, if the conversation relates to a third person you are not to name that third person.

Mr. Everts—That direction, if your Honor please, I except to, as I did before?

Mr. Fullerton—The learned counsel is at liberty to call it out, but I won't take the responsibility of calling it out. I will say, in justice to myself, that I shall not permit, without calling your Honor's attention to it, any further relation of that story.

Mr. Everts—The better way is to have the parts of the letter pointed out.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose it is sufficient to say it is the same part which Mr. Moulton's attention was called to.

Mr. Everts—The letter is before him, and he can call it out.

Mr. Fullerton—I leave that for the gentleman to do on cross-examination. [To the Witness.] Omitting that part, go on and state what else occurred during that interview, if anything did? A. Mr. Beecher said there was a peculiar malignity in Mr. Bowen's charge against him of having committed violence, because there had been no violence; there had been mutual acquiescence, that he had never committed any violence upon any woman, and God knew that he had committed no violence upon that woman.

Q. You need not go any further into that. Omit all that relates to that event, and state what else occurred in the conversation.

Mr. Everts—I object to that construction on the part of the counsel being permitted in the taking of evidence.

Judge Neilson—It is always proper to omit part of a conversation not necessary to the question under investigation.

Mr. Everts—It is a part of the testimony, if your Honor please, that they are giving and producing as pertinent to this investigation.

Mr. Fullerton—No; it is a part of the testimony I am not giving.

Mr. Everts—Now, the conversation concerning the letter is a part of the evidence that they introduce as binding.

Judge Neilson—Of course it is.

Mr. Evarts—And any interruption of instruction by counsel to a witness to omit a part of the truth, in my judgment is not authorized by the rules of evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor knows perfectly well why I omit it.

Judge Neilson—I instruct that it be omitted if it relates to a third person.

Mr. Fullerton—It does relate to a third person, and I don't desire to call it out on that account.

Mr. Evarts—All the charges relate to third persons. All the charges relate to immoralities with women.

Judge Neilson—We have nothing to do with immoralities with women.

Mr. Evarts—Then let the subject be left out and not introduce it until it becomes inconvenient and runs against contradiction; that cannot be tolerated.

Mr. Fullerton—It is inconvenient in no other respect than that it would be improper to introduce a third person into this trial when it can subserve no good purpose, but would subserve a bad purpose.

Mr. Evarts—The time to consider that is before you begin, and not when you get into the middle of it.

Judge Neilson—Let me ask Mr. Evarts if he thinks it would be incumbent upon him to omit part of a conversation, part of which may be pertinent to the issue on trial and part not—if he would be constrained to omit it all because part of it would not be properly receivable?

Mr. Evarts—I don't desire to go any further at present, than to say to my learned friend that the time to consider whether he would extract any evidence from this witness on the subject of the incident referred to in that letter was before he began upon it, and not in the middle of it.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't choose to put myself in any such attitude as that. I know what use the counsel would make of it if no reference were made to that subject, and I mean to deprive him of that weapon of attack on our side.

Judge Neilson—Let that pass over.

Mr. Evarts—Now he proposes to deprive me of both weapons.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—He proposes to deprive me of the weapon of admission because he don't admit it, and he proposes to deprive me of the weapon that would destroy the statement because he don't give the whole of it.

Mr. Fullerton—I have given you an opportunity to say something which was out of place, and that will probably make up for it. The gentleman can call out that branch of the conversation, if he is disposed to take the responsibility of doing so. We will see whether he will or not.

Judge Neilson—I think those last passages ought to be struck out; they are not necessary.

Mr. Fullerton—I haven't the slightest objection to striking out the last passages in the answer of the witness, and I only want them to go so far as to enable your Honor to see what interview I refer to, so that your Honor will see the motive which prompted me to leave it out, which would commend itself to every right-minded person.

Mr. Evarts—It cannot be with our consent that they undertake to produce before this jury evidence, and then stop it, and then consent, after it has had some influence, to have it struck out. When I propose to strike out, that is on my responsibility.

Judge Neilson—Go on. Pass to another subject.

Mr. Fullerton—And what I propose to leave out is on my responsibility.

Mr. Evarts—You propose to leave out part of it.

Mr. Fullerton—I have not put it in yet, and I don't mean you shall force me to do it. [To the Witness.] Now, I call your attention to an interview. Have you given all of that interview that you remember, leaving that part of it out? A. The interview was mainly devoted to a consideration of that which must be left out. I remember that towards the close of it Mr. Beecher said that though he had assured us that he was not afraid to face Mr. Bowen, on the ground that Mr. Bowen could produce no evidence against him, yet he did not wish to have this letter published, and if I could see my way clear to a justification in some other and less dangerous way he hoped I would adopt it, for he said that the public were only too willing to believe charges against a clergyman, and that if these charges which Mr. Bowen had made should be made public, many people would believe them, whether true or false, and that in proportion as people believed in Mr. Bowen's stories against him they would be likely to believe in any accusations that might—any rumors that might be set afloat concerning himself and Elizabeth, and just in proportion as rumors should get afloat in reference to himself and Elizabeth, people would be likely to go back and believe in the charges that Mr. Bowen had brought against him; so he said, for the safety of Elizabeth, and for his own protection, he hoped that I would not print that letter, but seek some other method of vindicating myself before the public.

Q. Was that letter then published? A. No, Sir, I never published that letter.

Q. Now what else occurred there, if anything? A. I don't remember anything at this moment.

Q. Did you break up then, and separate? A. My impression is that Mr. Moulton asked me if I would retire; that was his usual method in my interviews with Mr. Beecher. I was sent for, and the interview was held, and Mr. Moulton usually had something which he wished to say.

Q. It ended in that way, did it? A. Yes, Sir.

THE FEARS THAT MOULTON'S SICKNESS AROUSED.

Q. Then, I wish to call your attention to another interview in the same month, between the 15th and 20th of January, between yourself and Mr. Beecher. Do you recollect such an interview? A. I recollect that very shortly after the interview which I have been adverting to, Mr. Moulton was taken seriously ill, and at the height of that illness he lay at the point of death. I went to the house one day, and the servant told me that Mr. Beecher was up stairs. I did not go up; I remained in the parlor. Pretty soon Mr. Beecher came down stairs, and, noticing through the door that I was in the parlor, came in and said, with great agitation of manner: "Frank is very sick; he is at the grave's edge. I am afraid he will die, and if he dies, Theodore, what will then become of your case and mine?" He stood a moment, and when I made no reply, he said to me, with tears in his eyes: "Theodore, Frank has saved my life, and I would willingly, to-day, give my life to save Frank's;" and he stepped quickly forward towards me, and put both hands against my face in this manner (illustrating), and kissed me on the forehead, and suddenly retired from the room, and from the house.

Q. Now, do you recollect another interview with Mr. Beecher towards the close of the same month, and on or about the 28th or 29th of January; and, if so, tell us where it took place, and what it was. A. I recollect another interview with Mr. Beecher, though whether it was towards the close of that month, or in the beginning of the month following, I am unable to say. It was after Mr. Moulton had got well enough to receive guests, and to talk with us in his bed-chamber. I was sent for to that interview.

Q. And where did it take place? A. It took place in Mr. Moulton's sick room.

Q. Now, give us the interview as nearly as you recollect it. A. Perhaps I am wrong in that last answer. My impression is that Mr. Moulton was then well enough to go out of his room, and that we went into one room, and out of that into another; I won't be positive about that. The object of that interview—

Mr. Evarts—What took place?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, what took place?

THE MISCHIEF WORKED BY MRS. MORSE.

The Witness—I had been sent for by Mr. Moulton to come. When I arrived there Mr. Beecher was present. Mr. Moulton held in his hand a letter which Mr. Beecher had received from Mrs. Morse, Mrs. Tilton's mother. Mr. Beecher had brought that letter to Mr. Moulton, and there were some statements in that letter, concerning which I was asked to make explanation.

Now, one moment please. [Handing paper to Witness.] Look at "Exhibit No. 7," and say whether that is the letter of Mrs. Morse, of which you have just spoken? A. The letter of Mrs. Morse, which was then under discussion, had a date on the top. This seems to have no date. Still, Mr. Fullerton, I find, on looking at it, that this is the letter, though the top seems to have been cut off.

Q. That is as it has been published in the newspapers. What is the number of the Exhibit? A. Number Seven.

Q. You recognize that as the letter which was the subject of conversation then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Your attention was called to some particular part of it, I understand you to say? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, tell us the interview? A. Mr. Moulton wanted to know whether I had told twelve persons of Mr. Beecher's criminal relationship with Mrs. Tilton; I said I had not. Mr. Moulton then said that this letter of Mrs. Morse had made that charge against me. I said: "Let me see it." So I took the letter, and I read it, and I said: "Mrs. Morse's statement that I had told twelve persons the story was as false as another statement which the letter contained, somewhere in it, I won't stop to point out exactly, namely, that I had not money enough to buy my family food to eat." I turned to Mr. Moulton and I said, "You know well enough how false that statement is;" and I turned to Mr. Beecher, and I said, "Moulton understands well enough how false that statement is, because his firm are my bankers, and I have several thousand dollars there on deposit, now; I don't know how much." Mr. Moulton said he had already made that statement to Mr. Beecher; that he knew that one statement in this letter was false, namely, about my lack of money, and that he believed the other was false, namely, that I had told twelve persons. Mr. Beecher then asked me what persons I had told. I told him I had told some persons. I then said that after Mrs. Tilton had made her confession to me in July, 1870, that I had shortly after that informed Oliver Johnson and Mrs. Martha Bradshaw; that during the Summer I had informed no other person, but I told him possibly twelve did know of that fact. I said that shortly after Mr. Johnson and Mrs. Bradshaw were informed, Mrs. Tilton had informed her mother, Mrs. Morse. I said, furthermore, that during the Summer Mrs. Tilton's brother, Mr. Joseph H. Richards, had come to me one day, and asked me whether or not I had noticed Mr. Beecher's visits to my house, and whether I was quite sure that they were altogether of a pastoral character. I told Mr. Beecher, also, that Mrs. Morse, on hearing the story from Mrs. Tilton, had communicated it to Mr. Richards, and that I believed Mr. Richards had informed his wife. I told him, also, that Mrs. Morse was propagating the story in this way, namely, that she was saying among her family and relatives that Theodore made such and such charges against Elizabeth, and that her method of denouncing me for making such charges was a very fatal way of propagating the charges themselves. I told him that Mr. Moulton had informed his two partners, as necessary adjuncts to his own mind, in their consultations, and that so far as any other persons knowing about the tale, that intelligence must have been received through Mrs. Morse's very free communications, in the manner in which I have described. I told him that the only persons whom I had ever informed were Oliver Johnson, Martha A. Bradshaw, and Francis D. Moulton. Some other letters were there produced besides this one.

Q. [Handing paper to Witness.] In that connection I hand you a paper, and ask you whether that was produced at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who produced it? A. This letter was present at that time. I am unable to say whether Mr. Moulton produced it to Mr. Beecher. The letter was there.

Q. State whether it was the subject of conversation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was said in regard to it? A. I was asked whether or not I had made the charge which that letter contained.

Mr. Evarts—Wait one moment.

The Witness—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't offer it in evidence yet. I ask those questions preparatory to making the offer.

Mr. Evarts—I don't see that this letter affects me.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I will try and make it affect you. [To the Witness.]

Mr. Fullerton—What was said in reference to this letter? A.

I don't know who brought that letter to that interview. I was not for to be present at the interview, and letters were there brought me.

Q. What did Mr. Beecher say in regard to that letter? A. Mr. Beecher asked me whether or not I had ever said that he preached to forty of his mistresses, the allusion being to a statement contained in that letter. I told him that during the Summer I had very frequently made remarks to his detriment, that I had not spared him; but whether or not I had made that identical remark, I could not say. I called his attention to the fact that that letter was simply a copy of the letter which Mrs. Tilton had written to me during the Summer or the Fall, and that it was before I had received from him his letter which is now known as the letter of contrition, and before Mr. Moulton had undertaken to keep the peace between us. I told him I had made no such statement since the time of that letter, and that I could not say whether I had used such expressions as that letter contained, but I would not deny having spoken severely against him to some friends in the Summer.

Q. Did Mr. Beecher say in that conversation where he got that letter?

Mr. Evarts—He has not said that he had it.

Mr. Fullerton—He can say whether he had it or not.

Mr. Evarts—You have no right to assume anything.

Mr. Fullerton—No, I don't assume anything; I merely ask that question, whether Mr. Beecher said he had that letter.

Judge Nelson—Ask him where it came from.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it assumes something, and it is not necessary to lead the witness, either.

Mr. Fullerton—Then, I will put the question as your Honor suggests. All I care for is the fact; I do not care what particular question is put to elicit it. [To the Witness.] What was said, if anything, about the origin of that letter? A. I do not know that anything was said about the origin of the letter. The point of the conversation was the contents of the letter, and the fact that Mrs. Morse had been writing such things. And I remember asking Mr. Beecher whether or not he had among his papers any other letter of Mrs. Morse's, which, being opened by his wife, or by any other person, might give unconscious evidence against himself and Mrs. Tilton, and he said "No." I told him Mrs. Morse was a very dangerous woman, and that if she was in the habit of writing to him, he might expect letters from her at any time; that I had received letters from her threatening my life; that I had received letters from her threatening me with personal violence, and that I had received letters against my sanity, and letters describing me as a drunkard and a brute, and letters of various kinds; and she might take a sudden turn of mind and write him letters. I told him that Mrs. Morse had very freely spoken of the case in certain moods of her mind, not at all concealing but rather revealing her daughter's guilt; and that if he encouraged letter writing to him by Mrs. Morse, she would be likely on any occasion to send him a letter which, if the wrong person opened it, would let out the whole story.

Q. What else occurred there? A. I told Mr. Moulton, or both, that this letter—I don't now refer to the letter lying before you, but the letter which was dated January 28th, and which was made the origin of the interview, Jan. 27th—I told him that that letter should be answered; that, owing to Mrs. Morse's peculiar temperament, if he did not answer it, if he treated it with neglect, if he allowed it to go unnoticed, she might take offense and strike him and Elizabeth some unexpected blow. I told him that I had a long experience with Mrs. Morse and that she was a woman amenable to courtesy and kindness; but that if she took offense, she was very reckless in her conduct and utterances, and that for the safety of Elizabeth it would be necessary that Mrs. Morse should be dealt with in a very kindly way; and I recommended that the answer to that letter should be one which would convey to her a sense of Mr. Beecher's kindly feeling; and, also, that it should be such a letter as that Mrs. Morse, in some other mood of mind, could not possibly use to Elizabeth's detriment.

MRS. TILTON'S LETTER OF REMORSE TO HER MOTHER EXCLUDED.

Q. State whether the letter which it was proposed should be sent as a reply to Mrs. Morse was prepared at that time? A. A letter was prepared by Mr. Beecher in reply to that, and I have seen the manuscript of it; it is in evidence. I will not say—I cannot absolutely swear—that he wrote the reply on the spot; but I am very distinct in my recollection of this point, namely, that the spirit and the substance of that reply were agreed upon at that interview; whether the actual draft of the reply was then made, I have forgotten.

Q. Look at "Exhibit 8," and see whether that is the letter to which you refer? A. If this is correctly printed, it is the one to which I refer.

Q. Do you recollect anything else that occurred in that interview? A. Yes, Sir; during that interview I took out from my pocket and exhibited a letter which Mrs. Morse had addressed to Mr. Bowen; it was a little trifle; an anonymous letter she had sent to The Brooklyn Union, and which a young gentleman connected with that paper had sent to me. I do not know whether it is in evidence; the substance of it is this—

Q. You need not state what it was unless you read it there. A. I did; I read it as an instance of the peculiar kind of correspondence to which she was addicted.

Q. Pass over that, and state whether there was anything else in that interview which you remember. A. Nothing occurs to me at this time.

Q. This letter which I have shown you, which you say was there at that interview, in whose hands did you first see it? A. A. It is in Elizabeth's hand.

Q. No, not that; in whose hands did you see it at that interview; in Mr. Moulton's or Mr. Beecher's? A. I cannot say; two or three letters were there; this letter and a letter dated Jan. 28th; and my recollection is that there were one or two others that Mrs. Morse had written, but I will not be positive as to that.

Q. Was anything said by Mr. Beecher in regard to any parts of this letter? A. If you hand me the letter a moment, I will endeavor to refresh my mind.

Q. Look over it and see [handing the letter]. A. He asked me what I understood to be the state of Elizabeth's mind and heart; how she bore her burden; whether or not she could survive under the weight of the calamity that had fallen upon her. He asked me some very sympathizing questions, Sir, about that; I think perhaps they had better be omitted.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, we offer that letter in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I am at a loss to see on what ground. If your Honor please, this is a letter from Mrs. Tilton to Mrs. Morse—between third parties—and how it is evidence, I do not understand. They have given a conversation concerning one statement in it (that is, if there is such a statement in it). It is assumed that there is something there which introduces the idea of Mr. Tilton having asserted that Mr. Beecher preached to forty of his mistresses every Sunday, and the witness has testified about that. We cannot remember the identical expression; but he said something of that spirit during the Summer; and in regard to that, the conversation is legitimate; but the fact that there was a letter presented that suggested a topic of conversation, certainly does not give them the right to read a long letter between other parties. The letter was not the subject of discussion; but this matter, whether Mr. Tilton had said that he preached to forty of his mistresses, was the subject under discussion. Now, the fact that here is a letter which was talked about, certainly does not give them the right to read it.

Mr. Beach—It is offered on the same ground upon which we offered all the papers produced in evidence, that they were brought to the attention and observation of Mr. Beecher, and were known to him. Mr. Tilton was sent for, and found Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton in consultation over this letter and others, and one particular passage, referring particularly to Mr. Tilton, is presented to his mind,—and he is asked whether or not he made that statement. But the whole letter was before Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher, before Mr. Tilton was called to the conference.

Mr. Evarts—How does that give you the right to put it in evidence?

Mr. Beach—How does it give us the right! We find the letter in the possession of Mr. Beecher, and under his observation.

Mr. Evarts—Suppose it was here in our hands, as his counsel, having been in his hands for six months.

Mr. Beach—That would be a privileged communication between counsel and client.

Mr. Evarts—If this very letter had been in Mr. Beecher's hands for six months, and then put into our hands as counsel, would that give you the right to read a letter between third persons, because one party of the suit has got it in his hands?

Mr. Beach—Certainly, if it was the subject of consultation between Mr. Beecher and others, and the reply to be made to it; if there was anything in the letter which relates to the subject of litigation or this difficulty between the parties, it is competent.

Mr. Evarts—My learned friend is in confusion. This letter was not the subject of consultation; it was the other letter which was made the reply.

Mr. Beach—I am not in confusion. This letter was present, and the habits of Mrs. Morse and the necessity of making some reply and the subject matter of this letter were subjects of consultation, as between Mr. Beecher and the others.

Judge Neilson—The letter of Mrs. Morse and the reply are both in.

Mr. Beach—I know that.

Mr. Evarts—But that was a letter to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Beach—It was. What matter? If it was a letter before him, the contents or statements of which he was called upon to deny; if the subject of the letter was matter of consultation between them, so far as it was the subject matter of consultation, the letter is in evidence.

Judge Neilson—I don't think that what was said in regard to the letter is sufficient to justify us in receiving it. I think I will have to rule it out.

BEECHER'S LATER LETTERS TO MRS. TILTON.

Mr. Fullerton—I shall call your attention to the 7th of February. Do you recollect meeting Mr. Beecher on that day? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Do you recollect of having written a letter to Mr. Moulton about that date? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Look at that paper, and say whether it is the letter. It is the 7th of February, and is marked "Exhibit No. 2." Is that the letter you wrote on that date? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see Mr. Beecher soon after writing that letter? A. I saw Mr. Beecher about that time, once or twice, at Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. Do you remember what occurred on those occasions? A. He thanked me for writing this letter.

Q. What did he say in regard to this "Exhibit No. 2?"

Mr. Evarts—After he received it?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, after he received it. A. I do not remember the particular phraseology in which he expressed himself.

Q. Give the substance of it? A. He spoke to me about having seen the letter, and thanked me for writing it.

Q. Were you the bearer of a letter, about that date, to Mrs. Tilton, from Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; I was the bearer of two letters; I was the bearer of a letter which Mr. Beecher wrote to Mrs. Tilton, and as Mr. Beecher had at the same time, or about the same time, written a letter to Mr. Moulton, in which he referred to Mrs. Tilton and myself, I was allowed by Mr. Moulton to bear that letter to Mrs. Tilton, and I showed her the two, and then returned both to Mr. Moulton.

Q. Look at "Exhibit 10," and say whether that is the letter which Mr. Beecher wrote to Mr. Moulton, and which you showed to Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; that is the letter.

Q. Now look at "Exhibit No. 11," and say whether it is the letter written by Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton, and which you were the bearer of at the same time you showed "Exhibit 10?" A. Yes, Sir; this is the letter.

Mr. Evarts—The letter of Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton is in evidence; but the fact of showing Mr. Moulton's letter to Mr. Beecher is no act of Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—We do not give that.

Mr. Evarts—We object to that evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—The letter is in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—It is, and has been for some weeks.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not outlawed.

Mr. Evarts—But the fact of your witness taking Mr. Moulton's letters to Mr. Beecher is not the act of Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—I have not pretended that that was the act of Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—That letter was taken without Mr. Beecher's authority.

Mr. Evarts—The taking of that letter of Mr. Beecher to Mr. Moulton to Mrs. Tilton is not evidence. Whether it is of any importance I do not know.

Mr. Fullerton—Then, if you do not know whether it is of any importance, you should not object.

Mr. Evarts—I do not know whether you regard it of importance or not, but I think it is objectionable.

Mr. Fullerton—If you object to everything that I think important, you will be objecting a good while.

Mr. Evarts—I do not object to it because you think it important, but because it is illegal.

Mr. Fullerton—I have shown, if your Honor please, that the letter was carried by Mr. Tilton to his wife, and shown to her. That is an act; there is no communication connected with it. If I do not make any further use of that fact in this case hereafter, it will go for nothing.

Judge Neilson—It will be very harmless; we will let it stand for the present.

Mr. Fullerton—Unless I connect it.

Judge Neilson—Yes; but still the counsel had a right to call attention to it.

Mr. Evarts—When you connect it properly that will be another thing.

Mr. Fullerton—I cannot prove two things at once.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you recollect whether it was on the 7th of February that you were the bearer of this letter? A. No, Sir. I should not swear at all as to the date, except so far as the letters themselves bear date; the dates are on the letters, and not in my mind at all.

Q. You can state whether you were the bearer of this letter on the day it bears date? A. No, Sir; but about that time; I should say, perhaps the day after—a day or two after.

Q. When did you next see Mr. Beecher after you were the bearer of these two letters? A. I think my next interview with Mr. Beecher after that was just before Mr. Moulton was getting ready to go to the South; I sent for him to come to my house.

Q. Before going to that interview, I propose to ask you, did you learn from Mr. Beecher why you were made the bearer of that letter from himself to Elizabeth? A. Mr. Beecher, whenever he met me, and particularly at that time, always asked after Elizabeth—asked for her state of mind; asked whether or not she could endure to live; asked whether or not I was restoring her in any degree to my respect; he put such questions as these, if that is an answer to your inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—And he wanted me to be assured that Mr. Moulton, who was endeavoring to keep peace between us all, held her in kindly regard, and did not frown upon her because she had forfeited her honor; he was very anxious that Elizabeth should be assured of that fact.

Q. What was said, if anything, about the writing of this letter? A. He told me also that he wanted her to know that I had acted towards him in an honorable way. If you will permit me to say, Mr. Fullerton, that Mr. Beecher at that time dropped numerous expressions to me of profuse gratitude, which I feel I cannot, consistently with my proper sense of self-respect and pride, utter here. It was burdensome to me at the time, and it will be disagreeable to me to state it.

Q. Was it in consequence of anything he said to you that you were the bearer of this letter, dated February—the letter to Mrs. Tilton? A. Let me see if I understand the question?

Q. Was it in consequence of anything that occurred in that interview that you became the bearer of the letter dated Feb. 7th, from Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton? A. If you let me see the letter again.

Q. It is this expression, "This is sent with Theodore's consent, but he has not read it. Will you return it to me by his hands?" A. Ah! Mr. Moulton asked me if I would permit Mr. Beecher to write a letter to Elizabeth, and I told Mr. Moulton that he must act in that matter as he saw fit; that I should neither give nor withhold my permission; that my wife was a free agent, as I was; that I would neither accept from her permission or denial, and that I would not accord to her permission or denial; that she had a sovereign right to receive letters, and that Mr. Moulton himself should be the dictator in the matter as to whether any letter should be sent; Mr. Moulton then said to me: "I will construe that as a permission on your part."

Q. From whom did you receive this letter? A. This letter? I received this letter from Mr. Moulton's hand, I think; possibly from Mr. Beecher's; I will not be certain.

Q. By whom was it returned, if you know? A. From Mrs. Tilton?

Q. Yes. A. It was returned by me; I carried it to Mrs. Tilton and she read it; at the same time also I carried the other letter which Mr. Beecher wrote to Mr. Moulton.

Q. And to whom did you return that letter? A. To Mr. Moulton; I did so because the letter itself requested its return.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, the next interview to which I shall call the witness's attention, is a lengthy one, and I shall not be able to complete it to-night. As it is within four minutes of the hour of adjournment, I propose that we adjourn.

Judge Neilson—The Court will now adjourn. The jurors will be in their places promptly at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The Court was then adjourned until 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning.

SEVENTEENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. TILTON'S SECOND DAY.

EXPLANATION OF THE PLAINTIFF'S RELATIONS TO
MRS. WOODHULL—THE BOWEN ARBITRATION
PROCEEDINGS—THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT—MR.
TILTON'S NARRATIVE PROLONGED—ATTENTIVE LISTENERS TO THE TESTIMONY.

The trial dragged on Tuesday. Mr. Tilton ascended the witness stand at exactly 11 o'clock, and took up the thread of the story where it had been dropped the night before. He began with the narration of an interview in February, 1872, when Mr. Beecher, according to the witness, went to Mr. Tilton's house, and conversed in relation to the supposed shadow over the life of the boy Ralph. Mr. Tilton says that Mr. Beecher positively assured him that there was no shadow, and the interview closed amicably. The plaintiff described fully his relations to Mrs. Woodhull from the beginning of his acquaintance with her, soon after the publication of The World article, until their friendship was broken through disagreement. Mr. Moulton's statement that the woman was dangerous, and his advice that she be dealt gently with, was explained. The full story of the composition and revision of Mrs. Woodhull's biography was made public for the first time. Mr. Tilton says that the woman's husband wrote it; she brought it to him, and asked him to rewrite it. He did so, leaving out many extravagant statements, but Mrs. Woodhull was dissatisfied. She wanted him to put in the incident of her raising a child from the dead. "Without that incident," she said, "the book would be the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out." She also wanted it written that Demosthenes communicated to the world through her. The circumstances which led Mr. Tilton to preside at the Steinway Hall meeting were narrated, and the witness stated that the direct cause of his doing so was that Mrs. Woodhull was going on the stage alone, saying that there was no man brave enough to go there with her. Mr. Tilton evidently does not now court the friendship of Mrs. Woodhull, for he incidentally referred to her lecture on "Finance" as harmless and stupid. Much of the testimony tended to excuse Mr. Tilton's connection with Mrs. Woodhull, and in concluding his evidence regarding her the witness turned sharply upon the jury, and said: "I say before God that Mr. Beecher is as much to blame for my connection with Mrs. Woodhull as I am myself."

The wearisome story of the arbitration proceedings between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton was repeated, and Mr. Fullerton read effectively the article of Mr. Beecher in The Christian Union published about that time, in which Mr. Tilton was referred to as a brilliant young writer and orator. The reading of the note seemed to affect Mr. Tilton, for he closed his eyes and the tears rolled down his cheeks. Mr. Tilton next explained the circumstances of his membership in Plymouth Church, and why he severed the connection.

After the recess the various interviews and complications of 1872 were described. Letters and cards published and not published, conversations, interviews, covenants, etc., were given entire or in fragments, or merely referred to. At the meeting held late in 1872, at which Messrs. Moulton, Woodruff, Tracy, and Tilton and Mr. Beecher were present, Mr. Tracy was represented as promising Mr. Tilton "as a gentleman and a lawyer" that he would not appear for Mr. Beecher in case litigation arose between the latter and Mr. Tilton. A new document was added to the scandal literature in the form of a card written by Mr. Beecher denying in emphatic terms the crime of which he had been accused. Mr. Tilton said that the card was satisfactory to Mr. Moulton, Mrs. Tilton, and himself, but Mr. Beecher, for some reason, did not publish it. The time of the publication of the tripartite agreement on Decoration Day, in 1873, was at length reached, and Mr. Tilton said that he had nothing to do with having it printed. That publication was followed by the printing of a card by Mr. Beecher, in The Brooklyn Eagle, mentioning Mr. Tilton in connection with his accusers. Mr. Tilton then, he says, wrote a card vindicating himself, and signed Mr. Beecher's name. He sent it to the Plymouth pastor, and it was also published. About this time, in June, 1873, according to the witness, there was a stormy interview between himself and Mr. Moulton, after he had learned that Mr. Beecher had expressed an intention to resign from Plymouth Church. Mr. Tilton said he was very angry, and told Mr. Moulton that if Mr. Beecher resigned at that time, thus reflecting on the children of the witness, he (Tilton) would shoot Mr. Beecher. The charges of Mr. West against Mr. Tilton, as a member of Plymouth Church, for slandering the pastor, were very fully reviewed, and occupied nearly all of the last hour of the day's proceedings. In connection with that subject a letter written by Mr. Tilton to Samuel E. Belcher, a member of the Examining Committee, just before the meeting of the Church was held at which Mr. Tilton's name was dropped from the rolls, was introduced and read. In this Mr. Tilton wrote that he had "not accused Mr. Beecher falsely." Immediately after this part of the examination had been concluded, Mr. Fullerton laughingly remarked that a motion to adjourn was always in order, and as it was then several minutes after four, Judge Neilson ended the day's proceedings.

FACES IN THE COURT-ROOM.

The novelty of the trial appears to be about exhausted for the jurors. Most of them seem to accept fully the idea that they are to listen to the evidence and the ruling of the court without attending to anything else. The foreman, Mr. Carpenter, gives them a good example, as he sits in his chair close by the witness with his body turned so that he can look full in the face of the speaker. This watchfulness he keeps up during the entire day with an unchanging expression of interest. His face, against which he sometimes holds the ivory handle of his cane, is always grave. Upon it neither the dry wit of the judge nor the humor of the lawyers provokes a smile. The rest of the jury imitate their foreman in turning to the witness, but several of them do not appear to be so intensely interested in the proceedings, and during the afternoon session on Tuesday it was observed that one of the jurors on the front seat had his eyes closed. His attitude quickly changed, however, and his eye brightened when Mr. Fullerton said that a motion to adjourn was always in order. The rest of the jury leave the court with the air of men who have had hard work in attending for four hours to the great trial.

Mr. and Mrs. Beecher occupied their regular places during both sessions on Tuesday. The contrast between the bearing of Mr. Beecher and that of his wife was very marked. His attitude throughout the day was unchanged by anything either in the testimony or the disputes of the lawyers. His face was very calm and was almost constantly turned to the witness chair with an expression of quiet interest. His note-book was in his lap, but he did not make much use of it. It seemed to be his desire that he should not be conspicuous either to the spectators or the jury. Mrs. Beecher, on the contrary, was almost demonstrative in her expression of concern in everything pertaining to the trial.

THE PLAINTIFF AND THE LAWYERS.

Mr. Tilton's bearing on the witness stand was such on Tuesday that it leaves no doubt that he was nervous on the first day of his examination. The flurried and somewhat awkward manner exhibited on Monday gave place to coolness and ease during the last two hours of Tuesday's session, though his confidence is very different from that shown by Mr. Moulton. The latter's replies were short and crisp; Mr. Tilton's are longer and fuller, but he talks slowly and with great earnestness. Mr. Moulton rested easily back in his chair; Mr. Tilton half rises with interest and emphasizes his words with movements of his head. Mr. Moulton seemed candid and familiar; Mr. Tilton is comparatively distant and dignified.

A day seldom passes that Mr. Evarts does not perpetrate some dry joke, which generally has the effect of disturbing the person at whom it is pointed and causing a laugh among those who observe it. Mr. Tilton, in speaking on Tuesday of a certain interview with Mr. Beecher, said that he was writing at the time; "using such an inkstand as that," he added, pointing to the lawyers' table. "This one?" asked Mr. Evarts, rising and placing his hand upon an inkstand. "No; that one," rejoined Mr. Tilton, pointing to another. "Oh! that one," said Mr. Evarts, touching another one. It was not that one, but Mr. Evarts seemed determined to discover the inkstand which resembled that which the witness had used, and he continued his questioning until he did so. It served as a satire upon the extreme minuteness with which Mr. Tilton details incidents.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

A CURIOUS INCIDENT.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

While the Clerk was calling the list of jurors, the Count Johannes addressed the Court: "May it please your Honor—"

Judge Neilson—We do not pursue that practice.

The Clerk then finished the calling of the jury.

Count Johannes—May it please your Honor, I am a counselor of this Court, and I claim the privilege of addressing your Honor. In my absence yesterday my brother Evarts, who is my friend, quoted from a Massachusetts Report in reference to me, and, as published by the press, most injurious; and I believe it to be simply what took place. I do not believe there was any intention on the part of my brother Evarts to injure me. I have the honor of the acquaintance of the counsel on both sides. In Massachusetts I was approaching for marriage with a lady, and a revered gentleman interposed a letter of libel upon me and destroyed five visits to that lady [laughter] important; and on the day before the marriage in generosity I burned that letter; and on the next day after my marriage he wrote another letter. I brought my action, and for those five visits lost, the jury gave me one hundred dollars for each, for I have power of language as well as Henry Ward Beecher, and one hour with a lady is equal to three months with mere clods of humanity. [Loud and long laughter.]

Judge Neilson—That will do.

Count Johannes—I wish to vindicate myself. I see Judge Porter there in melancholy thought, and I know that he will upon every occasion do me justice.

Judge Neilson—Will the audience keep silent. I hope the audience will pay sufficient regard to this. The citation made by Mr. Evarts was from an authority; the citation was made correctly as stated in that authority, and I am very happy that there is no ground of complaint.

Count Johannes—Not the slightest, only that Allen, the reporter, was my enemy, and he did not report what was right. I say with Shakespeare, then, "I'll have no more reports." I am much obliged to your Honor. [Laughter.]

MR. TILTON DEMANDS THE TRUTH.

Theodore Tilton was then recalled, and the direct examination continued.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Tilton, I had, at the close of the session yesterday, followed this case down to February 7, 1871. I believe we concluded that interview. Do you recollect when you next saw and had an interview with Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did it take place? A. It took place shortly after that time.

Q. And where? A. At my house.

Q. Can you give us the date exactly of that interview? A. I have no means of identifying the date other than that it was shortly after the writing of those three letters, all of which bear date of February 7.

Q. You refer to the letters to which your attention was called yesterday, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir; at the close of the examination.

Q. You may now state what occurred at that interview. The jury will hear you more distinctly if you look towards them?

A. Mr. Beecher came to my house one morning, about the first or second week, probably the second week—yes, certainly, the second week in February, 1871. He had come in pursuance of a request which I had sent to him through Mr. Moulton. I had told Mr. Moulton that I wanted to see Mr. Beecher at my house. Mr. Beecher came in the morning, while I was at breakfast. I rose from the table, met him in the parlor, and told him to go up stairs into my study. He immediately went up, and I followed him. I closed the door behind me, and after he took his seat I said to him: "I have called you hither, Sir, in order that you may remove, if you can, a shadow from the future life of the little boy, Ralph. His mother has assigned to me a date at which your criminal intimacy with her begun. This little boy was born a few months after that. If the date which his mother has given is correct, it will save a dishonor attaching to his name. I want you to tell me, as before God, whether or not that date is right. I want, if possible, to shield him, but I want more than that to know the truth. Tell me the truth." And he told me, on his word of honor, as before God, that the date which Mrs. Tilton had assigned was the correct date. At that moment Mrs. Tilton herself, who had followed me up stairs, came into the room, and when I stated to her the point of conversation, she burst into tears, and asseverated, as she had once or twice done before, that the date which she had given was correct.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I ask to strike out, "as she had once or twice before done." That is no part of the conversation, and the wife's statements are not to be given in evidence.

Judge Neilson—It may be stricken out.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. If I understood the witness correctly, it was what Mrs. Tilton said upon that occasion.

Judge Neilson—It is simply the phrase, "as she had done once or twice before."

Mr. Fullerton—But it is what she said upon that occasion.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Fullerton—Please read, Mr. Reporter?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the passage referred to as follows: "and asseverated, as she had once or twice done before, that the date she had given was correct."

Judge Neilson—The phrase, "once or twice before," does not strengthen your evidence.

Mr. Evarts—No matter whether it strengthens it or not, it is within the rule.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not within the rule. It is not within the rule laid down by this or any other Court, that I ever heard of.

Judge Neilson—I think we will strike it out.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose your Honor strikes it out because it relates to a prior conversation between herself and her husband?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Not because she did not say it on that occasion?

Mr. Evarts—She did not say it on that occasion. According to his statement he interpolates in narrating what she did say, a confirmation of some previous statement that she had made.

Judge Neilson—It is stricken out simply because it is a previous statement.

Mr. Evarts—The objection to the other conversation is covered by my previous exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Tilton, state whether in that conversation that morning in your study the date was named, and, if so, who named it?

Mr. Evarts—I think we should have what was said, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Yes, first exhaust according to his recollection what was said, and then call his attention to anything he has omitted.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well. If such be the case we will do that.

The Witness—Mr. Beecher asked me what date Elizabeth had named. I told him Elizabeth had named as the date at which their criminal intimacy began, Oct. 10th, 1868. He replied that he had no faculty for dates and had made no record, but he believed in his soul that she had told me the truth. He said a few other things on that occasion which I trust I shall not be requested to reproduce here, since a proper delicacy would forbid their utterance.

Q. I shall not ask for them. Omitting those things to which you have now made allusion, state what else took place upon that occasion.

Mr. Evarts—If there are parts to be omitted they should not be characterized.

Judge Neilson—That is so.

Mr. Evarts—We do not like to have characterization and then omission from delicacy. If the parts are to be omitted, let there be silence about them.

The Witness—I will—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind, Mr. Tilton. Let it stand just as it is.

Judge Neilson—The witness had in mind, no doubt, the statement that he was omitting, and he took that form of expression.

Mr. Evarts—I am not criticising the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—It was very proper for the witness, being asked to give the whole interview, to say that he had omitted parts, and to give a reason why he omitted them. [To the Witness.] Omitting, then, that part of the interview to which you have made reference, state what else occurred at that interview? A. Some remarks were made which I cannot exactly recall that fell from Mr. Beecher's lips, expressing grief and misery, and he burst into tears. That was the actual remainder of the interview. He left and went to Mr. Moulton's house, and in the afternoon of the same day sent me a message, through Mr. Moulton, assuring me—

Mr. Evarts—No matter.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind that.

Judge Neilson—Well, he sent you a message through Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—How long did that interview last? A. Ten or fifteen minutes.

Q. Did Mr. Beecher say where he was going when he left? A. He did not; the only information I had as to where he did go was from Mr. Moulton's statement made to me during the afternoon that Mr. Beecher had visited him and left a message for him.

MRS. WOODHULL'S UNWELCOME SUMMONS.

Q. I pass over, then, to the publication of Mrs. Woodhull's card in The New-York World; do you recollect about when that occurred? A. Yes, Sir; perfectly well.

Q. State if you had any interview with Mr. Beecher in reference to it? A. I did, Sir.

Q. And where did it take place? A. It took place at Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. And in whose presence? A. Mr. Moulton's presence.

Q. Please state what occurred on that occasion? A. I told Mr. Beecher that after the appearance of Mrs. Woodhull's card of May 22d, 1871, she had sent to the office of The Golden Age a message that she desired to see me; that she had also come herself to the office and left in person a communication with my office editor that she desired to see me; that I went down to see her at her office, she being then a stranger to me; that on reaching her office she put into my hand a copy there of The World of the date of that day, and she asked me, pointing out a card which she had signed and which was there printed—she asked me to read it. I began to read it. She said: "I wish you would read it aloud." I then read the remainder of it which I had not already read to myself, I read the remainder of it aloud, including a statement to the effect that she knew that a public teacher in a neighboring city was living in concubinage with the wife of another public teacher in the same city, and that she meant to expose that relationship, and that she would do so regardless of the consequences and fearless of libel suits. I told him that I had read it with a shudder and that as soon as I had finished the reading of it and laid down the paper she turned upon me and asked: "Do you know, Sir, to whom I refer in that card?" I said to him that I replied in a cavalier way: "How can I tell to whom you refer in a blind card like this?" I told him that she had then said: "I refer, Sir, to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and your wife." I told him that this announcement filled me with astonishment, and that Mrs. Woodhull instantly said to me: "I read, Sir, by the expression on your face that my charge is true." I told him that I could not remember in what words I had met and endeavored to throw off her accusation; that she instantly followed it with a recital in vehement terms, in most excited manner, of a dozen or twenty particulars, extravagant and violent, all of which, or a portion of it, she afterward gathered together in the card of November the 2d, 1872.

Mr. Evarts—You didn't tell him that? A. No, Sir; I was explaining to the jury; I cannot remember all the particulars which she recited to me, only I remember that after they were printed that that brought it to my mind. The substance of the story which she told me was that there had been a criminal relationship between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton; that Mrs. Tilton had confessed it on her door steps, I believe, to Mrs. Davis, of Providence, and to other persons, and that when I had received the intelligence from her, I had used some violence upon her; that I had taken her down to Greenwood Cemetery, and in the presence of the graves of her children, stripped her hand of the wedding ring which I had once put there, and had trampled it with my heel into the sod of the grave of one of her children; that I had become a drunkard in consequence of that calamity, and had on numerous occasions struck my wife; that I had kicked her during pregnancy; that I had in every way vilified and abused her; that I had brought this crime to the attention of Mr. Beecher through Mr. Moulton, and that he had gone down—he, Mr. Moulton, had gone down—to Mr. Beecher and with a pistol pointed at his head or breast had demanded back some papers at the peril of his life. She went on in that strain. I will not undertake to give all the particulars, but as I said before I may repeat that I saw them afterwards gathered together in the article of Nov. 2d, 1872. I told Mr. Beecher that I had left Mrs. Woodhull to go to Mr. Moulton; that I had informed Mr. Moulton briefly and hurriedly of that strange interview; that Mr. Moulton had instantly said the woman must be crazy; she must be dealt with; I must see her. I told Mr. Beecher that in pursuance of that determination by Mr. Moulton he and I took a carriage I believe that very night, at all events a night or two afterwards, but very near that time, and we drove to Mrs. Woodhull's house; I told Mr. Beecher that we there—we, that is, Moulton and I—had had an interview with Mrs. Woodhull; that during this interview she occupied our attention not with the story, except in very slight part, but mainly with an extravagant account of her views of spiritualism; that she had stood in the middle of the floor, and had built a kind of ladder with her hands between the earth and the heavens, on which she said the angels ascended and descended; that there was communication between the two worlds; that she had referred slightly to my interview and to the scandal, and that Mr. Moulton had said to her that it was wrong for anybody to be vindictive, wrong for any woman to speak ill of another, and that she had only to go to Brooklyn to see Mrs. Tilton, and she would find in her delicate and gentle manners and life an entire refutation of any such cruel story. I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Moulton and I, on coming away that night, had discussed in the carriage how we should get along with Mrs. Woodhull; that Mr. Moulton expressed on that occasion his full conviction that the woman was not in her right mind, and that she must be dealt with as a dangerous person and by kindness, and I told him that if he had any suggestions in the matter as to how we should meet this new danger, confront this new enemy, I wanted to hear them; and it was in that way that Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton and I came into consultation as to how to treat with Mrs. Woodhull, and to deal with her threats to expose the secret between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton. From that time onward, for four or five months, Mr. Moulton, Mr. Beecher and I were in occasional consultation as to how to meet the dangers which were likely to arise to our cause from that quarter. I can detail, if you think it advisable, the successive steps that we took.

DESPERATE EFFORTS TO DISARM WOODHULL.

Q. I want to know what successive steps you took, and also what suggestions Mr. Beecher made, if any, from time to time, with regard to that apprehended danger?

Mr. Evarts—Those steps which Mr. Beecher did not know we will dispense with.

The Witness—There were no steps in the business with which Mr. Beecher was not as much connected as either Mr. Moulton or myself, from beginning to end.

Judge Neilson—The counsel meant conversations when Mr. Beecher was present. [To Mr. Fullerton.] You intend that, I suppose?

Mr. Fullerton—Undoubtedly, Sir; and the witness so understands it.

The Witness—Mr. Beecher at this interview was greatly agitated. Mr. Moulton told him he thought there was no cause for alarm; that we could bring influences to bear upon Mrs. Woodhull to quiet her and keep down the threatened publication. Mr. Moulton said he did not see what reason a woman could have who didn't know either Mr. Beecher or Mr. Moulton or myself—who could not be supposed to have any personal enmity against us or any interests in us. Mr. Moulton said he did not see what motive the woman could have for carrying forward any enmity, and that she needed only to be touched by kindness in order that all the enmity which had thus far exhibited itself in the threat might disappear. Mr. Moulton said that his method was—his proposition was—to treat her with kindness, do some service for her, put her under some obligation to us. Mr. Beecher said that he would very cheerfully co-operate in that plan, and he thought it was the best and the only plan. He asked me if I would co-operate. I said I would; and we agreed, as part of the method by which we should deal with Mrs. Woodhull, that we would become personally acquainted with her; that we would treat her as gentlemen should treat a lady, and that we would in that manner put her under obligation to us—social obligation, kindly obligation. We agreed, also, that as she was a woman we would put her under the restraint of womanly acquaintanceship; in other words, that she should make Mrs. Tilton's acquaintance and Mrs. Moulton's. Mr. Beecher said it was impossible for him to do anything in that regard with Mrs. Beecher; that she would never make any alliance with him to any such end; she was a hard woman to get along with, and she must be left out of that account. In pursuance of this conversation, Mrs. Woodhull was invited by me to come to my house. There she made Mrs. Tilton's acquaintance, much against Mrs. Tilton's wish. In pursuance of the same arrangement, she was taken to Mr. Moulton's house and was introduced to Mrs. Moulton, very much against her wish. Mrs. Moulton objected so strongly that she went to Mr. Beecher and Mr. Beecher had a personal interview with her—

Mr. Evarts—Well, now, you were not present.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that I assume from the language of the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—I would not offer it unless I would be able to connect it. [To the Witness.] You may state what, afterwards, Mr. Beecher said to you on that subject. A. Mr. Beecher told me that he hoped that the two ladies (referring to Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Moulton) would be able with our help to hold Mrs. Woodhull under kindly obligations to us, and that he hoped that neither of them would make any objection to her coming either to my house or to Mrs. Moulton's. He told me that he had spoken to Mrs. Moulton on the subject—he never told me that he had spoken to Mrs. Tilton on the subject. I don't know that he ever did speak to her. I know both from himself and from Mrs. Moulton, and from Mr. Moulton, that Mr. Beecher did have an interview with Mrs. Moulton on that subject, and request her to invite Mrs. Woodhull to her house in pursuance of that same arrangement a few weeks after the publication of Mrs. Woodhull's threatening card of May 22, 1871. I carried out my part in good faith by the publication in The Golden Age of an article alluding to various ladies connected with the movement for woman's enfranchisement, in which I alluded in a complimentary manner to Mrs. Woodhull.

Mr. Everts—Is that article here?

Mr. Fullerton—Not that I know of.

The Witness—Shortly afterward Mrs. Woodhull sent for me and told me that she had been engaged with Gen. Butler, and, I think, Judge Loughridge of Iowa, both Members of Congress and both members of the Judiciary Committee of Congress—that she had been engaged with those gentlemen in getting Congress, or a Committee of Congress, to report to this effect, namely, that the XIVth and XVth Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, strictly and technically interpreted, would accord, as they now stand, the right of suffrage to women, on the ground that those two amendments give suffrage to all citizens, and that women are citizens; therefore, by those two amendments women are likewise voters. She told me that Gen. Butler had written an elaborate report to that effect, but that it was not in such a shape as to command the popular attention. She told me, also, that her husband had written that same idea in an elaborate form, but that his writing was too didactic to command the popular attention, and she asked me if I would consider that topic, would take up the argument, handle it, master it, and would put it in popular form. I said I would look into it. I took up the argument, and, thinking thereby to do her a service, I spent a week in putting that argument in a close and compact shape, in as good English as I could command, and I addressed it in the form of a public letter or tract to Mr. Charles Sumner. That was one service which I did for her in pursuance of the arrangement to which I have already adverted.

HOW THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY WAS WRITTEN.

Some time after that—a few weeks—Mrs. Woodhull again sent for me and put into my hands a roll of manuscript which she said was a biographical sketch of her life, written by her husband; that it was not written as satisfactorily to her as she desired it to be; and she asked me if I would take it and read it, and either revise it, or amend it, or make it out anew, that it might the more readily command the popular ear. I took that manuscript and I read it, and I read it twice; and, instead of merely revising it, I sat down, and, at one heat, I wrote in a—in what I designed to be a newspaper article—the sum and the substance of that narrative, a biographical sketch of Mrs. Woodhull. After it was done I took it to her house in the evening. I read it to her. I had done it as well as I could. She expressed great dissatisfaction with it. She said to me: "You have left out the most important parts." "Well," I said, "I have left out some extravagant parts which I thought would mar the narrative." Said she, "I wish you would put them in again." "What?" I said, "Do you want me to say that you have called a dead child to life?" "Yes," said she, "I do; for to write my life and leave out that incident would be to play the part of Hamlet with Hamlet omitted." I said, "Do you want me to say, as this narrative has done by your husband, that you have had the power to heal the sick, like the apostles?" "Yes," said she, "I do, because that is the exact truth." And I asked her if she wanted me to say also that she had communication from the spirit world from the Greek orator Demosthenes; and she said, "Yes; for sometimes he speaks through me." "Very well," I said, "If you want them all in I will put them in." So I took that manuscript, which I thought I had completed, and I sat at the writing-table in her third room, her back parlor—it was a Summer night—and I spent two or three hours in writing in these supplemental incidents. I was until two or three o'clock in the morning. I completed the manuscript. When it was done I threw myself down on the sofa and slept all night, and took breakfast in the morning, and read it to the family. They pronounced it perfect. I went and published it. That is the history of that sketch. A few weeks after that, possibly six or seven, Mr. Moulton told me one day that he had received from Mrs. Woodhull a letter, or that he had received from Mr. Beecher a letter which she had written to him, asking that he might preside at a public meeting in Steinway Hall, and I went the next day to Mr. Moulton's house on purpose to be present at an interview appointed to be held between Mrs. Woodhull, Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton. I reached the house too late. Mrs. Woodhull had been there and had gone. Mr. Beecher then was there; Mr. Moulton was there. They told me the result of the interview. Mrs. Woodhull had urged him to preside at her lecture, and he had made objections to doing so. I told him that I thought he might preside; that I had once presided at a lecture for her; and, by the way, in my narrative I have omitted to state that one evening I presided for her at Cooper Institute when she delivered a lecture on Finance—a perfectly harmless and stupid production, of which I think nobody has heard since. I said, "I have once presided for Mrs. Woodhull; nothing came of it; no harm grew out of it, and if you will go and preside at her meeting you can do it without harm to yourself, and you will put her in that public way under such obligation to you that I think she has been put under to me. I don't think that woman can ever turn and injure me after what I have done for her, and if you will in some public way identify yourself as being friendly to her—not that you agree with what she says, but if you will go and preside at that meeting, I think she will consider that an act of courtesy done by you, and it will be a new bond by which we shall all be able to hold her against any ebullition of her strange mind." Mr. Beecher did not positively decline, but he didn't see how he could do it. Nevertheless, if during the afternoon, he said, he came to a different conclusion, he would go and preside. I went that evening with Mr. Moulton purely out of curiosity to the meeting; I had no expectation of going; I had not been invited to go, and nothing had been said to me about presiding. A great crowd was present; we were there a few minutes before eight. Mr. Moulton said, "Why we can't get in." I replied, "There are more doors than one to Steinway Hall, I have been here before; there is a rear entrance. I went around to the rear entrance; I went up stairs and I heard somebody say that there were no brave men in these cities, that several gentlemen had been asked to preside at that meeting, and no man had the courage. I saw Mrs. Woodhull, and she was weeping. She said she did not believe there was a courageous man on the face of the earth. "Well," I said, "that is a very singular accusation to make." Said she, "Nobody will preside for me; several gentlemen have been asked; everybody declines, and I am going upon the platform alone," and she started to go. I said, "Wait a moment, I will not have you go before that great audience alone. I was born in this city, and people will hear me, and I will introduce you," and I caught up my hat and my coat, and I stepped in front of her to the platform, and I made a little speech which Mr. Moulton repeated to you the other day. That is the history of the Steinway Hall meeting. That was the last public service, if it was one, that I rendered to Mrs. Woodhull. On the next day I went out of town for my lecturing season; this was in November, 1871. I was gone all the Winter, with occasional days at home, until the next March or April, and at that time Mr. Moulton and I made a call upon her, a friendly call, which he has detailed in his narrative to you.

Mr. Evans—It is not necessary to refer to Mr. Moulton.

MRS. WOODHULL UNSHEATHS HER SWORD.

The Witness—Two or three days after that my attention was called to what purported to be an article prepared and put in type for Mrs. Woodhull's paper, an article—I was trying to remember the title; it has slipped me at this moment—the title was "Tit for Tat." It was an article in which she violently assailed a dozen or twenty—

Mr. Evans—I suppose, if your Honor please, we can hardly have the contents of a long article recited.

Mr. Fullerton—Q. Well, without stating the contents of the article, state what took place in reference to it? A. I read that article. I went straightway to Mrs. Woodhull's office, and I saw her, and I asked her if she had written such an article, or had it written for her, or designed to print it, an article—

Q. Well, go on. A. She said it should not be printed, and I left. Two or three days afterward I found that it had not been printed, but that multitudinous slips of it had been struck off, and these slips had been sent about, so that, though it was not published in a technical sense, it had been really published. I then went down to her. I told her that I had defended her as a woman when she was attacked, and that now, as she had in return attacked other women, I washed my hands of her forever. I walked out of her office, and I have never seen her from that day. I will say further, that I reported the substance of that incident to Mr. Beecher at Mr. Moulton's house, and Mr. Beecher said to me he thought I had done an unwise thing to break my acquaintance with that woman; that she had been sufficiently dangerous even when we were on friendly terms with her, and there was no telling what she might do if we became her enemies, and he asked me not to exhibit enmity toward her. He urged me to continue with Mr. Moulton the same kindly services in order to strengthen the same influence to which I have adverted in the past months. I wish to say distinctly to the jury that my relationship to Mrs. Woodhull was a foolish one and a wrong one, as the event has justified, and I do not ask any man to defend me for it, but to blame me for it. But I say here before God that Mr. Beecher is as much responsible for my connection with Mrs. Woodhull as I am myself.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, I want to call your attention to the tract you prepared, and to the biography, and to ask you what knowledge, if any, Mr. Beecher had of their publication, and what he said in regard to them, if anything? A. Mr. Beecher never said anything to me in regard to any of the publications that I made in reference to Mrs. Woodhull, other than something to express his thanks multitudinously for all those services.

Mr. Evans—Now, wait one moment; what did he say? "He never said anything other than something." What he said is what we want.

Mr. Fullerton—That is what I am going to give you, and I will do it without any interruption.

Mr. Evans—I will interrupt the witness, because he is going to do otherwise than what is right.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, go on. A. Mr. Beecher very frequently inquired of Mr. Moulton and myself how we were getting along with Mrs. Woodhull, and I remember one particular occasion, when he was in peculiar agitation on the subject. The circumstances were these: Mrs. Stowe was writing a novel and publishing it in Mr. Beecher's paper, The Christian Union. Mrs. Woodhull sent for me, and asked me if I had read a chapter of it which contained a satire upon herself. I said, "No, I never read a word of it, and I didn't know there was any such satire." Mrs. Woodhull told me there was a certain chapter in this novel—I cannot point it out, for I did not read it myself—which was aimed directly at her, satirizing her under an assumed name, and that she meant to strike the Beecher family. She said that two of the sisters, Mrs. Stowe and Miss Catharine Beecher, had vilified her, and that Henry Ward Beecher, their brother, ought to stop that vilification; that she would hold him responsible for any satire published against her in his paper, and that she meant to strike him, and to pierce him to the quick. I said to her, "Mrs. Woodhull, if you will stop and think that in striking him you are striking yourself, perhaps you will not do it." She said, "What do you mean?" I said, "When ever a woman before the public is vindictive, and draws the dagger to attack others, the result is that she will, sooner or later, destroy herself." I said to her, "Now, if you wish to answer Mrs. Stowe's attack, do it in a way of superior gracefulness, gentleness and charity;" and her face lighted up at that suggestion; and I told Mr. Beecher what I had said to her, and he said, "What do you suppose the woman will do?" I said, "I think Mrs. Woodhull's paper next week will contain, not an attack upon you, but some kindly reference." The paper came out next week with a very kindly article.

Mr. Evans—Is that article here?

The Witness—I don't know that it is.

Judge Neilson—It came out next week with an article?

A. Yes, Sir; it came out next week with an article, and Mr. Beecher read it, and he said to me, "For the kindness that is here expressed I owe to you my thanks." I instance that as one of the numerous illustrations to show the anxiety which Mr. Beecher exhibited to Mr. Moulton and to me in reference to the manner in which we were dealing with Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Now, then, how long before going to Steinway Hall on the evening of her lecture, where you introduced her, had you contemplated going? A. I had not contemplated going at all.

Q. And you came to the conclusion to go about how long before you started? A. I should think about thirty minutes.

Q. You were under no promise to preside there that night? A. None whatever.

Q. You say you saw an article entitled "Tit for Tat;" where did you see it first? A. It was brought to me at my office by somebody; I have forgotten whom.

Q. Do you recollect who it was? A. I recollect now, Sir. It was brought to me by a lady from California; she came to show me a California statute, and this article fell out accidentally. I picked it up.

MR. TILTON ASSAILED IN PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. We will now pass over to December, 1871. If anything occurred during that month with regard to retiring from Plymouth Church, I want you to state what that was. A. In the first or second week, as near as I can remember, of December, 1871, Mr. Beecher came one evening to Mr. Moulton's study when I was present. It was either just before his Sunday night sermon, or before his Friday night prayer-meeting, I don't know which; I remember he said he had not much time to spend, because he had to go to his meeting. He asked me if Mr. Moulton had conferred with me on the subject of my formally retiring from the Church. I told him that Mr. Moulton had said something to me on the subject. I think I told him that Mr. Moulton had shown me a letter which he had written to me on the subject, but I told him that I had expressed to Mr. Moulton my reasons for not retiring from the Church. Mr. Moulton came in, and we had a little talk on the subject together. Mr. Moulton said that he had brought the matter to my attention—this he said to Mr. Beecher. He told Mr. Beecher that he (Moulton) had one view of the subject, and I had another; and, said he, "I will leave Theodore to explain his own reasons in his own way." Mr. Moulton then left the study, and what I said to Mr. Beecher was substantially this; it was a rather hurried interview. He said to me, however, in the beginning, that in view of the events of the Summer and Fall, by a publication of the Woodhull sketch and my presiding at the Steinway Hall meeting, and the little poem called "Sir Marmaduke's Musings," there had grown up in the Church a feeling on the part of the members and leaders that I had been an intense spiritualist, that I had wholly abandoned the orthodox faith, and that I had not attended the Church for a year or nearly two years, and as my name was being banded up and down the community, they felt that, as a Church, there should be some inquiry made into the matter.

Mr. Beecher said: "You know, Theodore, how dreadful and distressing this is to my feelings, particularly as I understand how you have come into your disrepute; but what can I do? How can I explain to my church members? They are crowding me on every hand. They are saying to me that here is a young man who has been your friend for many years; he has not been here to church for a year and a half, and he is the author of these strange publications, and he is entering into all manner of vagaries, and we must inquire into it." Mr. Beecher said to me: "Now, Theodore, I understand perfectly well the position you have taken, and which you took long ago, that you never again would come to the church, and that you considered yourself not a member of it; but you must remember that your name is still on the roll, and I don't know how I shall get along with our embarrassments. Will you not, therefore, make my position easy by writing to the church a formal letter asking your dismissal, and I will see that that letter is given to you without any reflection." I told him no. I said: "Mr. Beecher, in reference to any criticisms made upon me because I have made a sketch of Mrs. Woodhull's life, or presided at a public meeting on her behalf, you know perfectly well the reasons that have led me to do it, and you have no right to make these reasons a thorn in my side now." I said, furthermore, that as to any offense in the little verses called "Sir Marmaduke's Musings" you have only to treat it as a farmer treats a nettle; clutch it in your right hand and crush it; handle it boldly; put it into The Christian Union or read it at your prayer meeting; treat it as if it had been written by Mrs. Stowe, or by some of your friends; treat it as if it was a matter not dangerous to you at all. You can get rid of that very easily." I said: "As to the only remaining thing, my retirement from the church, get rid of that in this way: Say I told you, a year and a half ago, as I did at one of my earliest interviews, that I had then abandoned the church; it is known as a matter of fact that I have never crossed the threshold of the church since then; assume a power and take my name from the roll, or have a new roll printed with my name omitted. If it is dangerous to call attention to the fact that my name is there, get rid of it." I said: "I cannot, with any self respect, ask your church to give me a letter of dismissal after the lapse of this year and a half since I have dismissed myself, because now, if I write such a letter, it will impugn what I have been doing for the last year and a half, and, therefore," I said, "you will remember distinctly I told you I would never again cross the threshold of your church." I told him that I thought that would be very easily got along with if he treated the subject boldly, and assumed that my name ought not to be on the roll. I gave him some of the reasons why I could not consistently ask for any letter of dismissal. One of these reasons was this: "You put your request to me on the ground that my views are different from those of my childhood," but I said, "certainly they are; but allow me to remind you that my views are not different from the views of many members of your church in good standing. I am not more radical in any of my views than Deacon Freeland, or Mr. Cladin, or any other member in good standing in your church, and it would be a falsehood to say that I must retire from your church because of any liberality in my religious views, for," I said, "your church is well known throughout Christendom as being an asylum for all looseness and liberality of Christian views, and if I retire from your church, particularly as criticisms have been made against me for verging toward liberality of Christian sentiment, people would say 'Well, if Theodore has grown so loose and liberal in his views that he must on that account leave Plymouth Church, where, then, will he go?'" I said: "My views are liberal enough to entitle me to ask a letter of dismissal from an orthodox Congregational church, but they are too liberal to allow me to remain in good standing in the church, and on that ground I cannot ask any dismissal. Furthermore," I said, "although you must remember I have been absent from your church for a year and a half, still my wife and daughters remain members, and their names are on the roll, and that if I retire from the church, leaving them in their membership, it will not produce upon the public the impression that family difficulties have been obliterated, but that family difficulties have been created. I gave him further reasons on that occasion, all of which, perhaps, I have no need to detail here. At all events, as the substance of that interview, I peremptorily declined to ask a letter of dismissal from the church, and told him he must handle the subject in some other way.

THE INTERVIEW IN THE CARS.

Q. Do you recollect any time after the interview of which you have now spoken of meeting Mr. Beecher in the cars when going to Boston? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect about what time that was? A. I met Mr. Beecher in the cars one morning a very few weeks after the interview which I have just detailed; I don't remember whether I was going to Boston or coming away from Boston. I remember quite early in the morning, while I was sitting in the cars, writing from just such an inkstand as that I remember—

Mr. Evarts—Which inkstand? A. That one. [Indicating for the counsel.] Mr. Beecher was in the cars. He came up to me and he said, "How is it possible that you can write in the cars?" I said, "I have a travelling inkstand, as you see, and do a great deal of my work in the cars." "Well," said he: "What are you writing?" I was going to hold up my manuscript to him that he might see for himself. Said he: "I hope it is not another 'Sir Marmaduke' poem." I said: "No, it is prose; I am writing an essay on John Wohlmann." Said he: "May I look at the book?" I handed him the book which I was reading, and I said to him: "I read this book because it is a fountain of peace." He drew a long breath, and he said: "A fountain of peace! Tell me where it is; I want to drink of it." He said: "If there is peace in this book, in Heaven's name I must read it, for," he said, "I have come to the conclusion that there is to be no peace for me any more in this life." He then said that he had been thinking of my interview that he had with me at Mr. Moulton's, and that he was a good deal distressed the more he thought of it that I could not write a letter asking for my retirement from that church. He said: "I think trouble will grow out of it; I cannot give to my people the reason for your absence, and you are a public man, and they will inquire into you, and you have enemies in the church and I cannot suppress them." Said he: "I foresee trouble." I told him that I did not see how trouble could arise if he himself met it firmly. I told him I thought he was allowing one danger to grow up that he might suppress, and I mentioned to him that his newspaper, The Christian Union, had shown certain signs of unfriendliness to me. I said: "I don't care for the criticisms of your paper, but I don't think it will conduce to the public regard of our harmony to have your paper criticise me." "Well," said he, "Theodore, the people in my office are rather inimical to you, and I wish I might get some one here to whom I might intrust our secret, so that that paper might assume a more friendly face to the public," a suggestion which he afterwards carried out.

Mr. Evarts—I ask to have struck out the words: "A suggestion which he afterwards carried out."

The Witness—I refer to the introduction of Oliver Johnson, as the editor of that paper, at my request.

Mr. Evarts—Whenever that comes up as a fact—

Judge Neilson—Strike out those words.

Mr. Fullerton—It is perfectly immaterial.

The Witness—I told Mr. Beecher that whatever sources of anxiety he might have in the church on the part of gentlemen who wished to make inquiries into the scandal, which was then just beginning to rise, and which was limited and confined to a very narrow circle—I said: "You must remember there can be no inquiries which don't come through me; no harm can come to you unless I create it; no blow can be struck at you unless I strike it. Now," I said, "go on with your work; have no apprehension on my account." I said: "Of course, my anxiety is not for your safety—it is for Elizabeth; but in protecting Elizabeth I necessarily shield you. Now, you do your work, and don't be downcast, for Moulton tells me you are always full of heartbreaking anguish; relieve your mind from any apprehensions as to any possible danger that may arise through me." He took my hand and he shook it, and he thanked me, and tears came into his eyes, and he suddenly left me, in order, as I supposed, that the passengers might not witness a scene between us. That was the substance of that interview.

THE TILTON-BOWEN ARBITRATION.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, we come to the arbitration between yourself and Mr. Bowen. When did that occur? A. That occurred about four months after the interview which I have now described.

Q. Bringing it to some time in April, 1872? A. Yes, Sir; shortly after my interview with Mr. Beecher in the cars, which I have related, I went West on a lecturing tour. During that trip of travel I had inquiries put to me by people as to why I had so suddenly sundered my relationship to The Independent and The Brooklyn Union, particularly after the public announcement had been made that I was going to be connected with those two papers for a term of years. Lecture committees and friends throughout the West said unless there should be some explanation of that fact, the reasons of my withdrawal from this paper, permanent injury would attach to me. That impression was made very strongly on my mind during my journey, and when I came home, towards the last of March, I consulted with a few of my friends as to how I should remove that impression. One of those persons I remember was Oliver Johnson. I consulted also with others, and as the time had been so long since my retirement from those papers there seemed to be no other recourse—there seemed to be no other alternative left than to explain the fact of my retirement; and in order to explain that fact, in consequence of that fact, as I said a short time before, I wrote a proposed letter to Mr. Bowen, now in evidence, and dated January 1st, 1871. I resolved, in order to put an end to the scandals which were arising to my detriment at that time—scandals taking many different forms, one form that I had been dismissed for drunkenness; another form that I had been dismissed for this, that and the other cause—many different forms—said: "I will put an end to this business, and give the reason why I had suddenly retired from The Independent and The Union," and, accordingly, I published, or wrote, with Mr. Oliver Johnson's assistance and co-operation, my letter to Mr. Bowen dated January 1st, 1871. I designed to publish it. Mr. Moulton was violently opposed to the publication. He said to me: "Theodore, to right yourself in this case you are doing great injury to another, and I don't think your own justification will justify you in publishing this article. Mr. Moulton expressed himself, and I may say so strongly that I felt the force of his words. He took the article, and he said that he would endeavor to find some other way of rectifying that injurious impression. I ought to say that at the same time I had instituted, or rather Mr. Ward, my counsel in my absence, just before my return, had instituted a suit against Mr. Bowen for the payment of the unpaid money which he still owed me, and Mr. Moulton undertook to keep that case out of court, and at the same time undertook to keep this article out of the newspapers. He said, "Better have no litigation; better have no publication; the peaceful way is the best way." I said, "I am perfectly willing for peace, provided it can be peace based on justice, but I am tired of perpetual misrepresentation." He had an interview with Mr. Beecher, at which I was present—a very brief interview. The only feature of it, as connected with Mr. Beecher, as I distinctly remember, was, Mr. Beecher begged me, if possible, to find some other way than the publication of that article. "Why," I said to him, "You have always said that you were not afraid of Mr. Bowen, and, indeed, you have gone so far on one or two occasions as to say you wished your trouble with Mr. Bowen might be brought to a head; that you thought you could strike this away with one blow; that Mr. Bowen had no ground of grievance, and that he could bring no evidence against you." "I know" said he, "I am not afraid of Bowen if the fight comes, but," said he, "you must remember, Theodore, that a clergyman's reputation is like a woman's, to cast upon it a suspicion is almost as bad as to load it down with proofs." And he begged me very strongly not to publish the article, and his wishes had weight. I remember on that occasion that he wept. Perhaps, however, I ought not so frequently to allude to that.

Q. Look at the paper now shown you, being "Exhibit No. 64," and say whether it is the article you prepared? A. That is the article that Mr. Johnson and I prepared together.

Q. What part of it is in Mr. Johnson's handwriting? A. That is Mr. Johnson's handwriting, the manuscript appended to the article.

Q. The manuscript appended to the article? A. Yes, Sir; but Mr. Johnson had some share also in the composition of the article.

Q. What position did Mr. Johnson fill at that time? A. Mr. Johnson was then the editor of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE. The particular part of this article which came from Mr. Johnson—

Mr. Evarts—We have nothing to do with Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind that, then. Did you regard these stories which were afloat in the West, and which you heard of West when on your lecturing tour as detrimental and prejudicial to your character? A. Why, Sir, they were horrible stories. They were stories that I—

Judge Neilson—That answers the question.

The Witness—They were not detrimental to my character; they were detrimental to my reputation.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you regard it as necessary, for your reputation, to refute them by the publication of that article? A. I did.

Q. Had you any other object in view in preparing that article? A. None whatever.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that we have anything to do with that.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps that has gone far enough.

Mr. Evarts—People are to be judged by their conduct.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we will get at people's motives.

Mr. Beach—They are sometimes judged by their motives.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Facts can be shown. Horrible stories are shown.

Mr. Fullerton—We have a right to show what motives prompted that.

Judge Neilson—Still, in general, a motive is a mere inference from the act.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will understand a different motive is imputed to him.

Judge Neilson—You have the fact.

Mr. Evarts—That is the trouble, that they are not allowed to state what was the motive. His acts must be judged of by those to whom they are submitted.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not a good rule of law or philosophy either.

Mr. Evarts—You cannot examine him as to that.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—Had the preparation and the publication, or the proposed publication of that article any connection at all with your prosecuting the claim against Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to.

The Witness—Not at all.

Judge Neilson—The article is in.

Mr. Evarts—I have a right to cross-examine this witness about his motives; they have not a right to do so.

Judge Neilson—I think the objection is well taken.

Mr. Fullerton—I have a right to examine him about his motives, but not to cross-examine him about them.

Judge Neilson—If it appears from the article that it had some connection with the claim upon Bowen, then the inquiry would be proper, but if it does not appear from the article that it had some connection with the claim upon Bowen, then it is unnecessary.

Mr. Fullerton—I put the question for the purpose of having it remembered that I propose to prove it, because it may be necessary for me to do it in reply.

Judge Neilson—We will recollect it.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will be good enough to bear in mind that the proposition has been made.

Q. Do you recollect the occasion of the execution of the tripartite agreement, so called? A. I do, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—[To defendant's counsel.] Will you be kind enough to let me have the original? [To the witness.] I will put this other question, Sir; you need not answer it, Mr. Tilton, until you see what disposition is made of it. Were you advised at the time, and did you so believe, in good faith, that you were entitled at law to recover the $7,000 which you afterwards got from Mr. Henry C. Bowen?

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that; yes or no.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, that of course lets in my inquiries as to who gave him the advice, and on what it was founded.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—Am I to answer, Sir?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—[To the stenographer.] Will you do me the favor to again repeat it?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question.

Mr. Evarts—This inquiry, if it is allowed to be put, lets in the inquiry into what the advice was, by whom given, and on what facts it depends.

Mr. Beach—I do not see any necessity of your Honor ruling upon that just now.

Mr. Fullerton—When the question comes up—

Judge Neilson—I will rule when it does come up, but I only intimate now that I think that opens the door to them.

Mr. Evarts—My friend must not complain of surprise.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not surprised at anything.

Mr. Evarts—Well, you won't be.

Mr. Fullerton—No, not at all; but sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Judge Neilson—He don't object to your being surprised; he says you should not complain of it.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; I should not be surprised, nor will I complain of anything they do; but what I do not want is this: that the counsel upon the other side should ask your Honor to decide in advance upon a question that may come up some four or five weeks hence.

Mr. Evarts—You have heard his intimation as to that.

Judge Neilson—Read this question to the witness.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer repeated the question. "Q. Were you advised at the time, and did you so believe in good faith, that you were entitled at law to recover the $7,000 which you afterwards got from Mr. Henry C. Bowen?"

Judge Neilson—Say yes or no.

The Witness—Yes, Sir. I understand your Honor to limit me as to that answer, not to say who advised me.

Judge Neilson—No; that answers the question.

The Witness—Perhaps I ought to add, Sir, that I have that advice in writing.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Fullerton—I should have asked you in its proper connection whether you did write a letter to the church or any of its officers, in order to effectuate your intent, as expressed to Mr. Beecher in that conversation, in dissolving your connection, or in getting your name from the roll? A. At a later period, Sir, I wrote, at Mr. Oliver Johnson's request, a little note, which was to quiet the scruples of Mr. Halliday.

Mr. Evarts—Well, well! we don't want the matter characterized.

Mr. Fullerton—No, if you will just give us the note.

Mr. Evarts—The note will speak for itself. It is of no consequence at whose request it was written.

Q. Did you have the note published in your statement? A. I have never seen that note since.

Mr. Beach—They have got it.

Mr. Fullerton—They have got it. I have asked for it. Brother Shearman will find it, I guess.

The Witness—My impression is, however, that that note was not written until the Summer of 1873. It had no connection with the events that we have just been narrating.

Mr. Fullerton—I will pass from that subject, then, until you find the note.

Mr. Beach—They have got it.

Mr. Evarts—[Producing the papers.] They do not seem to be admissible as acts towards the church, but there is nothing in them that we have any objection to.

Mr. Fullerton—First, the letter from Oliver Johnson. [Reading:]

NEW-YORK, July 10, 1873.

MY DEAR MR. TILTON: I frequently hear it said that you are a member of Plymouth Church, whereas I have understood that you withdrew from it several years ago. Am I right or wrong? Yours truly,

OLIVER JOHNSON.

Marked "Exhibit No. 71."

Mr. Fullerton—I now read the answer to that letter:

BROOKLYN, July 11, 1873.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: You are right in your recollection. I am as much surprised as you are that anybody should consider me a member of Plymouth Church. It is now verging toward four years since I ceased my association with it. You know that I left it even before leaving The Independent. In my name is still on the records it is just as an old nest clings to a tree after the bird has flown.

Ever yours,

THEODORE TILTON.

Marked "Exhibit 72."

Mr. Fullerton—There is another letter in this connection that I desire to put in, but it does not seem to be at hand.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Tallmadge, I understand, will produce it this afternoon.

HOW OTHER CRIBS WERE HUSHED.

Mr. Fullerton—I will call your attention then to another subject. Something has been said as to a proposition to treat you different in The Christian Union. Just refer back to that subject. What was said upon that subject? A. What was said by whom?

Q. Mr. Beecher, when his attention was called to it? A. I think the first I heard from Mr. Beecher on that subject was in the interview which I held with him on the cars either going to Boston or coming away from Boston in the early part of January, 1872. At two or three times subsequent to that, during that same year, 1872, and particularly toward the close of the year, in November and December, Mr. Beecher said that in his judgment it would be necessary to have some one in The Christian Union, some editor of his paper who could handle that journal with more skill in reference to the scandal; hitherto, unkindly remarks had been made in his paper about me, and he wanted remarks of a different character to be made; he wanted the case now wisely handled, and he said: "I cannot trust any of my editors to do it, they are not friendly to you, and they do not know any of the facts in the case, and that is a great misfortune." I suggested to him that I could point out a way to remedy that difficulty. I said to him: "In the first place, your paper is dull and needs improvement, and if you will take my office editor, who used to be with me on The Independent, namely, Mr. Oliver Johnson, who knows all the facts in this case, or at least who knows the central fact, from my having confessed it to him in the Summer of 1870, and if you will make him your managing editor, he will greatly improve your paper for one thing, and he will handle this business with necessary skill and kindness for another thing." Mr. Beecher said that was a good suggestion. He said he would consult with his associates in the office about it. He afterwards told me that he had consulted with them; some of them were favorable, some were unfavorable. He reported to me from time to time during a number of weeks the progress of the negotiation, or rather the process by which he was attempting to open the door of The Christian Union for the admission of Mr. Johnson as its editor, without exciting any undue suspicion on the part of those gentlemen already there connected with the staff. Finally, Mr. Beecher told me that the way was clear to invite Mr. Johnson in, and he asked me what compensation I thought Mr. Johnson should have; what kind of arrangement ought to be made. I told him I thought Mr. Johnson was master of his profession and was growing old, and he ought to have $5,000 a year, and he ought to have a contract by which his relationship to the paper should be preserved and maintained for a term of years. I wrote that contract, and Mr. Johnson went into The Christian Union and became its managing editor, and is its managing editor to this day, I believe, under that contract which I wrote.

Q. Something was said, I believe, at one time, of the unfriendly character of some article in The Christian Union toward you; when was that conversation? A. At various times during the year 1872 Mr. Beecher spoke to me of the difficulties which he had in his office. There was a disposition, he said, on the part of gentlemen in his office to make flings at me; he generally kept them out of the paper; he told these gentlemen that they must not do such things; still he said that they would creep in; and the very fact that these gentlemen were writing such things, and he was put to the perpetual necessity of suppressing them—that that of itself was a cause of suspicion, and gave him great trouble and worry. That was one of the reasons why he wanted a managing editor who was friendly to me.

Q. I call your attention now to an extract from The Christian Union, on page 337 [referring to printed book], and ask what preceded it—the publication of it—between you and Mr. Beecher? [Handing witness the printed book.] A. After Mr. Bowen paid to me the $7,000 which the arbitrators awarded under the contract, Mr. Claflin asked me, or perhaps Mr. Moulton asked me as coming from Mr. Claflin, whether or not I would sign a document to the effect that if Mr. Bowen took back all the charges which he had made against Mr. Beecher, I would cease to circulate those charges. I said I would do so with profound pleasure, because I considered that every accusation set afloat against Mr. Beecher by Mr. Bowen or by anybody else, might, in the long run, add weight to the accusations which might arise against Mrs. Tilton. A paper was drawn, indeed it had been drawn on the day of the arbitration, perhaps the day before. After the arbitration that paper, with some changes—changes made at my suggestion, with a view more definitely to make clear the point which I have just stated, namely—

Mr. Evarts—The changes will speak for themselves.

The Witness—I signed that paper.

Q. Do you now refer to the tripartite agreement? A. I do, Sir. What was your next question, Sir?

Q. What preceded the publication of that extract from The Christian Union? A. After Mr. Bowen, on that evening, drew his check to pay me the money, which he did on the spot, he said to me that he had never entertained any—I beg pardon, Sir, for not addressing the jury—he said to me that he never had entertained any unfriendly feelings towards me, and that if I supposed he had, that I was mistaken, and that he desired to make any public reparation which I thought proper. I told him that I desired the publication in the subsequent Independent of a little note of mine, and of some proper answer on his part. He said he would make such a publication, and did make such a publication. In addition to that publication he sent to me two private notes, taking back—

Mr. Evarts—No matter about the contents of the notes.

Mr. Fullerton—No; do not give the contents of the notes.

The Witness—Well, I can give you the notes. All this was published in Mr. Bowen's paper, either on the first week or the second; at all events, the first issue that followed the arbitration, very highly—

Mr. Evarts—Well.

Mr. Fullerton—I will put it in evidence.

The Witness—Very well. In Mr. Beecher's paper of the week following, he took out what Mr. Bowen had published in The Independent, copied it in The Christian Union, and he accompanied it with comments in my justification and vindication.

Q. Is the article before you the commentaries of The Christian Union upon that occasion? A. Yes, Sir; I now hold it in my hand.

Mr. Fullerton—I now propose to read it.

Mr. Everts—The narrative of the witness includes the publication in The Independent as the text upon which this in The Christian Union is based.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not the opinion of Mr. Beecher in regard to the article in The Independent that I care about; it is the expression of his opinion irrespective of that article—although that was the pretext for it—in regard to Mr. Tilton himself.

Mr. Everts—The transaction, if it be given as a publication, should be given in its own dimensions, that we may have the benefit, on the one side or the other, of it—its true features, that is all.

Judge Neilson—In other words, you think The Independent should be put in as well as The Union?

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no objection to it at all.

Judge Neilson—Read this part first and consider the other in; and it can be marked hereafter.

Mr. Fullerton—I will read this part now.

Mr. Beach—I do not suppose it to be the rule, because we put in something that Mr. Beecher said, that we are obliged to put in what it is founded on.

Mr. Everts—No; but it does depend on whether you now agree to put it in or not. I will go on with my objection if you do not.

Mr. Fullerton—I do not agree to put it in, because I do not know that I can find it yet; I have never seen it myself; I have only seen the commentary from The Christian Union upon that article, and the independent opinion which Mr. Beecher expressed in regard to Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—I think it will be well to put the article in hereafter, when it is found.

Mr. Beach—We have not the slightest objection.

The Witness—I will state.

Mr. Fullerton—That the article in The Independent to which you refer is partly quoted in the page before you.

Mr. Everts—Which makes it still more important that we should have the whole.

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Judge Neilson—I think it is just as well.

Mr. Fullerton—This is from The Union, of April 17th, 1873:

This honorable testimony from Mr. Bowen ought to clear away the misconceptions which have shaded the path of this brilliant young writer. We have never parted with our faith that time would reconquer for Theodore Tilton the place in journalism, literature and reform to which his talents and past services entitle him. * * * * Upon this testimony of the estimation in which his principles and character are held by a wise and strong man, who was closely associated with him for fifteen years in the conduct of The Independent, the public must needs put aside prejudices of judgment which they have permitted to cloud this young orator and writer. Those who know him best are the most sure that he is honest in his convictions, as he is fearless in their utterance, and that he is manly and straightforward in the ways in which he works for what seems to him best for man and for society.

We trust that the gold in The Golden Age will not grow dim, but that, dropping its dross in the refining fires, it will shine with the luster of gold seven times refined and purified.

Marked "Exhibit No. 73."

MR. TILTON AGAIN SUGGESTS RESIGNATION.

Q. Do you recollect the occasion when Mr. Beecher dined at Mr. Moulton's and you were present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect when it occurred? A. I cannot fix the precise date. If anybody knows the night on which I spoke in the Academy of Music during the Greeley campaign, it was that night.

Q. It was that night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was in the Autumn of the year, then, 1873? A. It was October, I think.

Q. Do you recollect anything that occurred at that time? A. The only feature of the occasion which can have any reference to the subject now in hand is this: Mr. Beecher said to me either that he was going to have or had had a silver wedding in his church—the celebration of the twenty-fifth year of his ministry. I do not remember whether it had just passed or was just to come; at all events it was still fresh; it was a topic then in his mind, and he brought it to my attention. He spoke to me about his popularity and the strength of his friends and his friendships, of his coming to the acme of his life, and he told me also that it was a great delight to him to hear that I had gone during the Summer at the head of troops of friends, likewise, resuming my public career. He said to me that he had noticed however, in human affairs, that when men were at the point of their prosperity, they were sometimes nearest to their downfall, and he asked me if there were any particular, pressing and eminent dangers in our case. I said to Mr. Beecher on that occasion that I had a suggestion to make to him, which perhaps would not come with a good grace from me; nevertheless I did it in the interest of Elizabeth and future peace. I said to him, "You have terminated or are to terminate with great honor the 25th year of your ministry. It is a good time for you to resign. You can hope for nothing better in this world in the way of honor in your pulpit than you have achieved. You are writing the Life of Christ, the second volume is not completed, and you will have a good excuse to go to the Holy Land. It can be known to all the world that you have gone to see with your own eyes the footprints of the Master whose life you are now writing, and if you now resign it will be a fitting time to do so, and such a resignation, which heretofore would have been accompanied with suspicion and danger, would be now, in my judgment, the surest way to provide peace for the future." I said, "I do not ask you to do it, but I am in constant apprehension that something will arise where there are so many curious eyes prying into our secret, and so many gossiping tongues talking of our affairs—I fear," I said, "that something will arise to make it dangerous for you to continue longer in your pulpit, and you will never have such an opportunity to resign amid the world's good opinion as now. I ask you to think of it." That was the substance of what I said. He said he thought the suggestion was a good one and he would think of it. That is all that I remember that occurred on that evening.

MRS. WOODHULL'S ATTACK.

Q. I then pass to the publication of the Woodhull scandal, so called, of November, 1872. Do you recollect its publication? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, if there was a meeting subsequently to that publication between yourself and Mr. Beecher, I want you to state what it was. A. That publication was made while I was in the northern part of New-Hampshire concluding my labors in that campaign. I came home to Brooklyn on the morning of the Presidential election, which I think was November the 5th. As soon as I entered the house, Mrs. Tilton, with great distress, put into my hands a copy of Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, which was the first knowledge I had of the publication of the story. I read it twice over, as swiftly as my eyes would run up and down the columns, and I made haste to Mr. Moulton's house, and he sent for Mr. Beecher to meet me, and we had an interview. I was informed at that interview either by Mr. Beecher or by Mr. Moulton—I have forgotten who; perhaps by both—that the paper had been before the city for a week or ten days. My impression is that it had been the town talk not merely from the date of its publication, which was November 2d; I was informed, I think, that it was widely circulated up and down the streets several days previous to its actual date, some time towards the end of October; in other words, that it had been going up and down before the public for a whole week, and perhaps more, during my absence. That morning, however, was the first intimation that I had that any such publication was in existence. They informed me that they had had a talk about it, and that the best judgment to which they could arrive after these talks was that the story would be best killed by silence, and they wanted to know if I had any suggestion different from that. I do not know that I can repeat the conversation on that occasion. The substance of it was that no other course was left than silence, but I remember that silence was determined upon, not because the story could not be denied, for the particulars of the story were but the truth—

Mr. EVARTS—Well, we better have what passed.

Mr. BEACH—If anything was said upon that subject the witness can state it.

The WITNESS—Mr. Beecher said the reason why he felt that the best policy would be to say nothing on the subject in public was this, that if any denial was made it would only provoke the Woodhulls to reproduce the story in some other form, to reiterate it; that a denial would not quell it; that they evidently meant mischief, and that they would repeat it in one form or another; and that if it was denied once it would have to be denied twice, and perhaps three times, and many times. That was the reason why the policy of silence was agreed upon, and not because the story could not in its essential parts—

Mr. EVARTS—Not "because." What was said in the reasons given by him?

Mr. FULLERTON—Was there more than one meeting on that subject? A. Yes, Sir; there were several.

Q. Where did they generally take place? A. Always in Mr. Moulton's study.

Q. Do you recollect anything else that was said by Mr. Beecher at any one of those meetings? A. At one of those meetings a little later than that, he said that he had changed his mind in regard to the policy of having nothing said in public; he said that he thought that I ought to publish a card; and he prepared a card. That card—I think it has been given in evidence. I told him that the objection to publishing any card was, by me, that I was the wrong man to say anything on the subject; that as the story connected Mrs. Tilton with himself he was the proper person to publish anything, if anything was to be published. I said, "The public at large will understand that I am the third party in the case and that it would be very natural for a husband to deny such a story concerning his wife; that I was not the proper person either to deny or to explain or to do anything about it."

Q. Look at the card now shown you, and say whether it is the one proposed by Mr. Beecher upon that occasion [handing witness Exhibit No. 23]? A. Yes, Sir; this is the card.

Mr. FULLERTON—It is the one commencing "In an unguarded enthusiasm I hoped well and much of one who has proved utterly untrue. I shall never again indorse her story, and now utterly repudiate her story as concerning me and mine."

To the WITNESS—What became of that card: was it published? A. This piece of paper?

Q. No; was it published; that is what I want to get at? A. No, Sir; I objected to it in toto.

Q. What objections did you raise in the presence of Mr. Beecher? A. I told Mr. Beecher that I was not the proper person to publish anything whatever on the subject; that he might do as he choose; he might deny it, and I would never contradict his denial, but that I would publish nothing, that I ought to publish nothing, and in particular I would publish no such flimsy card as that. I said to him that he knew very well that my relations with Mrs. Woodhull had not been prompted by an unguarded enthusiasm; that I had gone to Mrs. Woodhull, deliberately, and by design, to protect Elizabeth; that he had been a partner in that design, that it was no unguarded enthusiasm by either him or Mr. Moulton or me; and I said furthermore, "Suppose I should publish this card, what would the public say of it? They would simply say this: that 'Mr. Tilton's wife has been violently attacked in the public prints, and what does he do in view of that attack? He simply publishes a card vindicating himself, shaking himself free and clear from the odium that had hitherto attached to him for his associations with Mrs. Woodhull.'" I said: "This is not a card in vindication of Elizabeth, nor in vindication of you, but in vindication of me; and the attack is made upon you and upon her, and no vindication of myself by my pen will answer the purpose." I rejected the card. I said that I would have nothing to do with any such publication; and I told him, furthermore—and I was very angry when I said it—that I was aroused and indignant to think that he endeavored to put upon me the responsibility of meeting that Woodhull story. I told him that he was involved with Mrs. Tilton, and that if her vindication was to come, if he was a brave man it should come by him at whatever cost, and I rolled upon him whatever responsibility was to be assumed in the case.

Mr. Fullerton—I shall not finish another topic, Sir, if I take it up.

The Court then took a recess until 2 p. m.

THE TRACY INTERVIEW AT MOULTON'S.

After recess the direct examination was continued as follows:

Mr. Fullerton—I call your attention next to an interview at Mr. Moulton's house, soon after the publication of the Woodhull story, where Mr. Tracy was present; do you recollect such an interview? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Who were present at that interview? A. Mr. Tracy, Mr. Franklin Woodruff, Mr. Francis D. Moulton and myself.

Q. And it took place, I believe, in the study of Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What occurred after you joined those three gentlemen?

Mr. Evarts—Won't you give the date?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; soon after the publication of the Woodhull Scandal.

The Witness—As to the date, my impression is that it was on the first Sunday night succeeding, but I will not be—I will not swear that that is the accurate date. The interview took place not far from that time.

Q. Was it the first Sunday evening after you returned from New-Hampshire? A. I think it was; at the same time I could not bind myself to that statement.

Q. Now, please state what occurred? A. I cannot state what occurred at the whole interview, for I—

Q. What occurred after you joined the party, my question was? A. I was sent for to go to Mr. Moulton's house; Mr. Moulton met me in his front room on the second story—I think in the early part of the evening, I will not be accurate as to that—and told me—

Q. No; you may omit what Mr. Moulton told you. Relate only what occurred after you came into the presence of Mr. Tracy? A. Well, Sir, I went into the presence of Mr. Tracy.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will notice, this is an interview at which Mr. Beecher was not present.

Judge Neilson—Subject to the same question that was raised when Mr. Woodruff was examined.

Mr. Evarts—We object to any evidence concerning it.

Mr. Fullerton—Precisely the same question, and relates to the same interview.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note my exception.

Judge Neilson—Now, begin at what you first heard and follow through.

The Witness—Well, Sir, I don't see how I could make intelligible to the jury what I said to Mr. Tracy at first without an explanation of how I came to say it.

Q. Well, that is our misfortune; just state what took place after you arrived in the room? A. Well, I went up into the study—I there saw Mr. Tracy and Mr. Woodruff; Mr. Moulton had accompanied me to the study: I was the first to speak, and I said, as nearly as I can recollect: "Mr. Tracy, this whole interview is without my consent and against my protest; I have not authorized you in any way, through any party, to be the custodian of any of the facts in this case. I now learn that some of them have been communicated to you, and that you are to see the rest, and to examine the papers. I have not been consulted, and I protest; but," I said, "as the case has gone so far, as Mr. Moulton informs me that by Mr. Beecher's advice, and Mr. Woodruff's, and his own, you have been taken without my knowledge into consultation on this case, I want to exact from you a pledge and promise in advance." He said, "What is it?" I said, "I am not a lawyer, Sir, and do not understand the etiquette of your profession; but I want you, either as a lawyer or a gentleman, to give me your word of honor, that if Mr. Beecher and I should ever come into collision, he on the one side and I on the other, you would not act as his counsel against me. I will not consult with you unless you give me that pledge." He said, "Mr. Tilton, I give you that pledge both as a lawyer and as a gentleman." I said, "Very well;" and we then proceeded to a consultation.

Q. Now, Sir, what occurred further at that consultation? A. The first incident which I remember distinctly was the handing over to Mr. Tracy by Mr. Moulton of the document now in evidence, and known as the letter of contrition. In other words, Mr. Beecher's communication to me through Mr. Moulton, dated January 1st, 1871.

Q. Did he peruse it? A. Did Mr. Tracy peruse it?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; he held it in his hand; it consisted of three sheets, and he read one and put that under the bottom, and then the other and that under the bottom, and then the other; and I think he read it in that way four or five times over; and at the conclusion of the reading he laid the paper down on the table and, said he: "Great God! I have never known anything like this!" And, said he, "The man who could dictate such a paper as this, who could express so much grief and heartbreak, has already been punished enough; and he ought not to be further exposed; his griefs ought not to be exposed to the world."

Q. What further occurred at that interview, if you recollect? A. Mr. Tracy told me that it was a case which ought to be very summarily treated. He said that he had told Mr. Woodruff, and had told Mr. Moulton, and he would tell me, that while in the ordinary affairs of life lying was not justifiable but was reprehensible, yet this was a case in which the truth ought to be denied, and that lying was right. He said, furthermore, said he: "I address that statement, Mr. Tilton, particularly to you as I have done to them, for the reason that if the facts in this case are ever made public, if the story is ever confirmed, it will not only ruin Mr. Beecher and your wife—of course," said he, "it will ruin them; but it will also ruin you, because the world will never forgive you for having condoned your wife's crime."

Q. Well, Sir; if you recollect anything further at that interview, you will please state it? A. Mr. Woodruff was very emphatic in his prohibition to Mr. Moulton, of what seemed to have been Mr. Moulton's purpose—to publish a card of denial. I do not—I do not remember distinctly how much of the previous interview—how much of the earlier portion of the interview at which I was not present, was communicated to me. I remember most distinctly Mr. Tracy's remarks, because he was, at that time, to me a stranger, or almost entirely a stranger—the upshot of the interview was that—

Mr. Evarts—Well, we do not want the upshot.

The Witness—That nothing could be done except silence.

Q. What reply, if any, did you make to the observation of Mr. Tracy that it would ruin Mr. Beecher, and your wife, and yourself, in case this thing was ever promulgated? A. I told him that I was perfectly well aware that it would be ruin to all parties, and that my great solicitude was the protection of Elizabeth; that as to the other persons in the case, they were both men, and might take their chances. Ruin would not so absolutely ruin them as it would the woman, and my chief anxiety was the protection of Elizabeth's name and fame.

MR. TILTON'S DIPLOMACY WITH MRS. HOOKER.

Q. Do you recollect, soon after this, that Mr. Beecher came into your presence, and brought some correspondence—some letters from third persons? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect when it was? A. I am able to identify the date by reference to the proximity of that occurrence to the death, or funeral—I have forgotten which, but either the death or the funeral—of Horace Greeley. It was in the latter end of November, or the beginning of December.

Q. 1872? A. 1872.

Q. Where did the interview take place? A. It took place in the same familiar spot at which most of the interviews were held—that is, in Mr. Moulton's study, in the upper part of his house.

Q. And who were present? A. Henry Ward Beecher, Francis D. Moulton and myself.

Q. And what occurred? A. The substance of what occurred was this: Mr. Beecher brought a number of letters, or, at all events, a handful of writings by his sister, Mrs. Hooker, saying that Mrs. Hooker had threatened to come down to Brooklyn and invade his pulpit—

Mr. Evarts—He said?

Mr. Fullerton—No; Mr. Beecher said, presenting the letters, saying—

Mr. Evarts—That is what I want to know, if the letters said so, or if he said so.

The Witness—Didn't I say that Mr. Beecher said so?

Mr. Evarts—You said, "presented the letters, saying, 'Haven't I a right to know which it is?'"

Mr. Fullerton—And haven't I a right to tell you if you want to know. I can quote his language as well as he can—

Mr. Evarts—I haven't found any fault with his language. I have a right to understand the witness as he goes on. It is a part of my duty.

Judge Neilson—Certainly.

Mr. Evarts—And when a phrase is used that might apply to either speech or letters, I have a right to know which the witness means.

Judge Neilson—I think it was well to have it understood.

Mr. Fullerton—I think there can be no misunderstanding as to the meaning of the term; and I quoted so that he might understand it. The word "saying" don't refer to the letters; it refers to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—That is exactly what I asked.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason I quote the language so that you might know.

Mr. Evarts—We won't dispute about it. We have found out now. It is a right I shall exercise.

The Witness—Well, am I to begin again?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, please.

The Witness—Mr. Beecher came into Moulton's house about the time I have mentioned—I think it was between the death and the burial of Mr. Greeley—saying with a good deal of excitement of manner, and holding out some papers in his hands which he said he had received from his sister, Mrs. Hooker—he said that his sister had threatened to come down to Brooklyn and to invade his pulpit, and to read from the desk a confession of his relations with Mrs. Tilton to the entire congregation, and said he, "What shall I do?" and he showed Mr. Moulton and me the letters. Mr. Moulton read them; I read them. Mr. Beecher said: "What do you think of the condition of a man who gets such letters as this from a member of his own family;" and he expressed profound grief, great agitation, excitement, and he repeatedly asked: "What is to be done. Is there no end of trouble and complication." Mr. Moulton asked me what I thought ought to be done. After some reflection, I said: "Give me the letters, and I will go and see Mrs. Hooker. I will stop this mischief;" and I took the letters, and I saw Mrs. Hooker, and I stopped the mischief.

Q. Nothing occurred in the way of carrying out the threat that was revealed to you there, on the part of Mrs. Hooker? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where did you see Mrs. Hooker? A. I saw her at the residence—I don't know how far your Honor permits me to mention the names of third parties.

Q. No; just say where you saw her. A. I saw her in the city of New-York, at the residence of a friend of hers.

Q. How long after this conversation was it that you saw her?

Mr. Evarts—There is not the least objection to the names being mentioned, so far as we are concerned.

Judge Neilson—You can interrogate, if you think it is proper or necessary.

Mr. Fullerton—I do not think it is necessary. It has no connection with our testimony.

Mr. Evarts—None of our friends—we have no hesitation—

The Witness—I have restrained from mentioning the name solely because it was a lady. I think the names of too many ladies have been brought in this controversy already.

Q. How long was it after the interview that you saw Mrs. Hooker?

FUN FOR THE GALLERY.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, that carries some aspersion upon a lady to say that there was any lady—that the fact that Mrs. Hooker was an inmate of her house assumes an aspersion. Why, you might as well object to saying that she was at the Astor House or anywhere else. No aspersion comes from Mrs. Hooker's being anywhere.

Judge Neilson—No; I don't understand so.

The Witness—I desire to say, your Honor—

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment, Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—The lady who occupied the house can be named if you require it when you come to cross-examine; it seems to me immaterial.

Mr. Evarts—Very likely it is immaterial; but don't couple it with the question of delicacy as the witness does.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; he don't.

Mr. Evarts—He said that too many ladies' names had been mentioned already.

Judge Neilson—Well, that was an unnecessary remark.

Mr. Evarts—There have been ladies on the other side, not on our side, that there has been any objection to be made about.

Mr. Beach—That is quite a mistake.

Mr. Fullerton—And a very grave one. The gentleman almost provokes me to say something, probably that he won't relish very much.

Judge Neilson—Don't get provoked.

Mr. Fullerton—No, I will not, only it is well to warn the other side not to open that question. I say it was very proper to withhold that lady's name, not because it was any reproach to Mrs. Hooker or the lady, but because it was entirely unnecessary to mention her name in connection with this controversy.

Mr. Evarts—It was not proper to couple it with the suggestion of delicacy by which other people's names had been omitted.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it was our delicacy and not yours. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Your delicacy required those other names to be omitted, but we have no such delicacy in regard to any of ours.

Judge Neilson—The difficulty with the Court, gentlemen, is that you are both right on this occasion. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—Then that is the first time my friend has gained an advantage.

Mr. Fullerton—How long was that interview with Mrs. Hooker? A. How long was the interview?

Q. Yes. A. I should say, perhaps an hour or more.

Q. Did you see her more than once? A. I saw her only once on that business; I met her at Mr. Greeley's funeral by accident.

Q. Did you communicate to Mr. Beecher the result or substance of the interview that you had with Mrs. Hooker? A. I did, Sir.

Q. How soon after the interview took place? A. Well, I don't know whether it was on that day or the next; it was as soon after as convenient.

Q. Without stating what the interview was, what did Mr.

Beecher say in regard to it? A. I don't remember the phraseology which he used.

Mr. Evarts—How can that be material if we don't know what he was replying to?

Judge Neilson—It might be difficult to understand it, perhaps; we can tell better after we see.

Mr. Fullerton—What was the substance of what he said? A. The substance of what he said was that he was profoundly thankful that he had escaped a great danger which menaced him from a member of his own family.

Q. Now was there any other meeting with Mr. Beecher? A. He made certain other remarks about that member of his family, which I thought ought not to be repeated.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't care for them; I don't ask for them at all. All I want is to get out the material part of the interview.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, we don't like these aspersions. As I have frequently had occasion to say, if topics are not proper to be introduced let them be left out.

Judge Neilson—The counsel has said to the witness that he does not wish to interrogate him on that subject.

Mr. Fullerton—That is just the principle that I wish to adopt.

Mr. Evarts—No; but is accompanied with suggestions that they are suppressed on some ground of delicacy.

Mr. Beach—Well, that is the ground; that is the reason they are suppressed, and we avow it.

Mr. Evarts—That carries an aspersion.

Mr. Beach—Very well, if it does we can't help it; it is true.

Mr. Evarts—You can't help it! If you don't ask for a conversation nothing is said about it. The witness is responsible for giving conversations that you do not ask for.

Mr. Beach—We did ask for it. But this idea that we are to be lectured by the counsel every time we leave out immaterial matter which we think not necessary and which might reflect upon this defendant, we are about tired of. We exercise our right professions to do that, and when we are called upon we say we do it because we do not wish to state anything unnecessary or offensive.

Mr. Evarts—Then we say that the only proper rule for counsel is to omit the introduction of the evidence, and not to bring it in and suppress it with an aspersion concerning it.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir, we will be guided by our own sense of propriety; we ask for a portion of an interview, and we say we omit the rest because we do not want unnecessarily to reflect upon or injure the feelings of anybody.

Mr. Evarts—That is exactly the point.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; that is the point, and if the gentleman has other ideas of professional propriety he can practice them; we will follow our own. [Appause.]

Mr. Evarts—I shall appeal to the Court also. Now, there is no right of counsel to say that he suppresses a statement because it will be injurious to the defendant.

Mr. Beach—I didn't say to the defendant.

Mr. Evarts—It has been said in this very discussion.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—He did not say injurious to the defendant.

All I could say is, that counsel in examining the witness and calling his attention to an interview, may interrogate him as to so much of that interview as is material to the question being tried, leaving the rest out.

Mr. Evarts—That there is no doubt about.

Judge Nelson—And your position is that it shall be left out without being characterized. Nothing is gained by characterizing it, of course. Proceed, Mr. Fullerton.

THE POLICY OF SILENCE ABANDONED.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not a characterization at all. It is simply omitted. [To the witness.] I want to call your attention next to an occurrence after the publication of the Woodhull scandal—some proposition to counteract it. Do you recollect such an interview—such a meeting? A. I do, Sir.

Q. State, if you please, when it took place, as near as you can recollect? A. To the best of my recollection, about a fortnight more or less after my interview with Mrs. Hooker, and the suppression of her attempt, Mr. Beecher came to Mr. Moulton's study, and I was present, and he said that, in his judgment, the time had passed when silence concerning the Woodhull scandal was a wise policy, there was so much clamor on the part of the public as manifested in the press; so much inquiry in his church and congregation; so many demands made upon him by his friends, that the pressure was getting to be unendurable. He said that he thought at that late day, which was five or six weeks after the publication November the 2d—he said he thought that no card of denial would then answer, but that a plan might be devised to explain to the public, to give to the press, what might have been—what the public might regard as the true nucleus of the scandal, and his suggestion was this—I remember he said: "People argue in this way, not that the Woodhull story is true, because its extravagance is against it, but that they naturally say, 'Where there is so much smoke there must be some fire,' and that though that story is not true, nevertheless something must be true; in other words, under the surface of the story which was published there must be something of a black and damnable character. Now," he said, "suppose we should appeal to that sentiment in the community; suppose for instance that some reputable paper speaking semi-officially as authorized by the parties in the case—say THE NEW-YORK TRIBUNE—should publish an editorial to the effect that there was some ground for Mrs. Woodhull's publication;" not the ground which she stated, but that that ground existed in certain stories which Mr. Henry C. Bowen had told a year or two previous against Mr. Beecher and which Mr. Bowen himself had in a written instrument six months before, namely, April 2d, 1873, retracted. "Now," said he, "suppose we get some semi-editorial utterances, not signed by our own names, to that effect, that there was this ground for those stories. Let that be stated and let us cut from the tripartite covenant the section which Mr. Bowen signed, retracting those stories, and let us put that into the newspapers. It will satisfy public curiosity; people will say, 'Well, we always knew there must be something in the Woodhull story, and now we know what it is; it is a collection of stories which Bowen has told and which Bowen has retracted.' " Mr. Beecher suggested that as a device, in the middle of December, 1873, to meet and counteract the Woodhull tale.

Q. Now, what was said in reply to that suggestion? A. Mr. Beecher asked Mr. Moulton's opinion of it and Mr. Moulton turned and said: "Theodore, what is your opinion." I said: "My opinion of it is that it will be fatal policy." Mr. Beecher asked why. I said: "In the first place, Mr. Bowen did not willingly sign the tripartite covenant, and he has always said since to his friends, making no hesitation in the statement, that he did not retract anything; that that covenant was so loosely drawn that he could drive a coach and four through it; that the retraction was no retraction; that any lawyer could pick it to pieces; that he had signed it at Claflin's request, and that it was no denial practically." I said furthermore that if Mr. Bowen was the same man then that I had known him to be in years previous, and I thought I knew him as well any other man did, for I had served with him fifteen years, I said: "If you drive Mr. Bowen to the wall, and he has got any evidence in his possession against you, he will turn and fight, and he may strike you a death blow before you are aware." I said: "Beware how you put Bowen in a corner unless you are sure that he has got no evidence." Then followed a discussion as to whether Mr. Bowen had any evidence. Mr. Beecher said that Mr. Bowen could not possibly bring any evidence against him of any of the general charges that he had made, and the only danger that he apprehended was that in a certain particular case there might be some scrap of writing; he didn't know whether there was. Then followed an interview, Sir, which I think I have no right to repeat.

Q. No; don't mention that interview. It is an interview with a third person, where Mr. Beecher was not present at all? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That brings me to December, 1873? A. Pardon me, Sir, we are already in December; that last interview—

Q. Well, that brings me later in December. If you recollect anything else that occurred at that other interview you may mention it. What else occurred at that interview, if there is anything? A. I have my doubts whether I have a right to state it. The substance of it was that a request was made to me by Mr. Beecher to ascertain—

Q. No, I don't want that part of it. If there was anything else, omitting that, you may state what it was? A. No, Sir; nothing else.

Q. I supposed that was all; I will call your attention, then, to a later day in December in which the letter of Mrs. Tilton to Dr. Storrs was under consideration; you recollect such an interview. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Relate what occurred at that time.

Mr. Evarts—Was Mr. Beecher present?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—Toward the close of December I had an interview with Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton, at which a discussion was held as to the propriety and feasibility of publishing a statement which I had meanwhile devised with a view to offset and confront the Woodhull tale. The subsequent stages of that interview I see no way of making plain, except by a narrative of the facts which intervened.

Q. Well, state nothing except when Mr. Beecher was present? A. I told Mr. Beecher that the suggestion which he had made a few weeks before—a few days before, perhaps, a fortnight before—as to introducing the tripartite covenant, or a section of it, into a proposed card to the public, had led me to consider the propriety of publishing, or, at all events, of writing, a story at some considerable length, including that covenant and including certain other documents in the case, all which, taken together, might give to the public some satisfactory solution of the original of the Woodhull scandal without at the same time confessing the whole truth. I told him that his suggestion of publishing a portion of that covenant had inspired me to the preparation of a document, in which the entire covenant should be included, together with other papers. I told him, furthermore, I had consulted on that subject with Rev. Dr. Storrs of this city; that I had gone to him as a good man, a calm man, and a wise man, and had asked him what, in his judgment, the public sentiment of Brooklyn required at my hands in this business, and that Dr. Storrs had advised me to act calmly; to put together the facts, and papers and documents, in the shape in which they could be proved, and then submit them to him, and after I had given him facts in that accurate shape, he would give me the best judgment that he could form. I told Mr. Beecher that, in pursuance of that suggestion I had once or twice seen Dr. Storrs, and that one occasion I had requested Mrs. Tilton to go with me, but she had preferred not to do so, but had written a statement or letter which I had shown to Dr. Storrs; that I had included that letter thus written by Mrs. Tilton to Dr. Storrs—that I had included it in the proposed statement which I meant for the public.

Q. One moment; in this connection I want to prove by you—to identify rather, the paper already in proof: I refer to "Exhibit 57." You may go on with the narrative, then, Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—The last you said was that you had included that letter in your proposed statement? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I will ask you this question, did you refer to Elizabeth's letter, dated December 16th, 1872, commencing "In July, 1870, prompted by my duty," &c.; A. Yes, Sir; that is the letter.

Q. Very well, that identifies it? A. Mr. Beecher uttered an exclamation somewhat to this effect—I think, in these identical words, "Oh! Theodore, of all men in the world I wish you had kept clear of Dr. Storrs." I told him that I had gone to Dr. Storrs, because I thought that no man in the city of Brooklyn more thoroughly understood the sentiment of the Christian community here, and that he had never been an intimate friend of mine, and that I should get from him not partisan advice, but cool judgment. And I said, furthermore, "Why should you object to my having gone to Dr. Storrs? I have all ways supposed that for twenty-five years he had been one of your most intimate friends." "Ah," said he, "that is the reason why I object to your going to him; I shall never be able to meet Dr. Storrs again on that account." Mr. Moulton asked me to read to Mr. Beecher the proposed document. I told him that it was not completed; that it was completed to this extent—the framework of it was written, but that it included documents, and wherever a document was to be inserted, as I didn't have the originals, and, in some cases, not the copies, I could not give him a very clear idea of the document itself. I said: "For instance, I have no copy of the tripartite covenant; that I must get from Mr. Claflin; but," I said, "I will read to you a part of it, and if you can stand that, you can stand the rest." So I took from my pocket the original letter of Mrs. Tilton, a copy of which I expected to embody with the covenant, and I read that to Mr. Beecher, and after I read it to him he turned to Mr. Moulton and he said, "This will kill me; you need not read any more," and I instantly determined not to print the document; not to publish it. That was between Christmas and New Year's; I think it was the day after Christmas; that is my impression now. I went home that night and I prepared, in conjunction with Mrs. Tilton, a little card, reading it to her—a card subsequently known as the "Letter to a Complaining Friend." That was published, I think, on the 27th of December. Greatly to my chagrin, it had some ugly comments prefixed to it in The Brooklyn Eagle. Mrs. Tilton, who had joined with me in approving the card—

Mr. Evarts—Well—

Mr. Fullerton—Omit that, Mr. Tilton. If Mr. Beecher said anything in regard to that letter or card.

The Witness—I told him the reason why I had published it, thinking that it would conduce to peace, but that Mrs. Tilton had been so greatly disturbed by the comments which that card elicited, that she asked me whether it would not be possible to deny the whole story out and out. And she suggested, and this I communicated to Mr. Beecher, that the true policy ought to have been in the beginning to have denied the story; that we were all foolish for not having denied it; and that, though time had elapsed, it was not yet too late to deny it; and she wanted to write a denial on her own account, and wanted Mr. Beecher to co-operate in that denial. I told her that anything that she wanted done she might do on her own responsibility; and, I think, on the 28th of December—

Mr. Evarts—You related all this to Mr. Beecher as what you had told her?

The Witness—Yes, Sir; on the 28th or 29th of December she wrote a card which I produced to Mr. Beecher; and in producing it I said to him that it was her request that he should write a similar card of denial; this interview was at Mr. Moulton's house; I think on the last day of the year, or one of the last days of the year, very near the last day of the year; and Mr. Beecher said that if I would never turn back upon him he would join with Mrs. Tilton in making a denial. "But," said he, "it will be idle for me to deny this story leaving you at liberty at any time to publish my letter to you through Mr. Moulton; but," said he, "if you will give me your word of honor that you will never, under any circumstances, make my denial of no effect, I will join in such a card." I told him that he might never—that he never would have anything to fear from me, except he himself should become the aggressor; and that then I should defend myself at all hazards; but that if the peace was to be kept it was in his power to keep it. Mr. Beecher then sat at Mr. Moulton's table and wrote a card; and after he wrote it he dictated it to me; and I have a phonographic copy of it. I have never seen it in print—

Mr. Fullerton—[To the defendant's counsel]: You have the original of it?

The Witness—It was a card, the object of which—

Mr. Fullerton—No; I will put it in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—[Searching among papers.] Suppose you read a few lines.

Mr. Beach—No, no; we call for that card.

Mr. Shearman—That is all; I just want to identify it.

Mr. Beach—You know what card I mean.

Mr. Shearman—I do not; I know I have some, of course.

Mr. Beach—Well, it is a card Mr. Beecher wrote—

Mr. Shearman—We do not know at all whether it is the same thing. I do not know about his notes.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Beecher knows what card he prepared.

Mr. Morris—Let us have the paper and we will tell whether it is the one we want.

Mr. Beach—It is no question of Mr. Tilton's notes; we call on you for an original paper.

Mr. Evarts—We want to know what the paper is which you ask.

Mr. Fullerton—It was a denial prepared by Mr. Beecher at that time, and exists still, I believe, in your possession, in his handwriting.

Mr. Morris—That is what we want—you know what we want Mr. Shearman.

Judge Neilson—If the witness can read the first line and the last line, would that not assist in identifying it?

Mr. Fullerton—There is but one paper of that character, and it was prepared at that time.

The Witness—It was offered here in court the other day.

Mr. Fullerton—It is here, and reference was had to it.

Mr. Beach—The witness can soon tell whether that is the paper or not.

The Witness [To Mr. Beach]—Let me read this to you.

Mr. Beach—Oh! no. [To defendant's counsel.] This is not the one, gentlemen. [To the witness] Did you look on the inside?

[The witness here compared his shorthand copy of the letter and the letter itself, with THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Mr. Fullerton—Is that the paper? A. That is the paper.

Mr. Fullerton—When I said, your Honor, it was not the paper, I didn't observe that there were two documents upon one sheet. The inside of the paper I had not seen. I now offer it in evidence [reading]:

BROOKLYN, December 29th, 1872.

I solemnly deny the scandalous charges made against me and Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton. Especially and emphatically I deny that there has been any criminal intercourse, or any color of a reason for such a charge. My acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton has inspired me with the highest esteem for her modesty, propriety and womanly graces. I authorize her or her husband and children, to make use of this declaration, and I desire to state, in addition, that Mr. Tilton, during the whole of this shameful scandal has uniformly spoken in the highest terms of his wife, and has shown to me the highest proofs of friendship.

(Signed) HENRY WARD BEECHER.

The Witness—The expression I have here is, "her modesty, propriety and womanly graces."

Mr. Evarts—No matter about your comments.

The Witness—[To Mr. Fullerton.] I don't think you read that correct. I recognize the error because Mr. Beecher put in that phrase about Mrs. Tilton at my request, and I was the author of that sentence, and would like to have it read correctly.

Mr. Beach—State your correction.

Mr. Evarts—No; you cannot correct an original paper by a copy.

Judge Neilson—The suggestion was that, perhaps, it had not been read correctly.

The Witness—That is a mistake.

Mr. Fullerton—I read it correctly, then?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

[Paper marked "Exhibit No. 74."]

Mr. Fullerton—Go on with the narration as to what occurred at the time of the preparation of that letter just read.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Fullerton, was Mr. Moulton present at this time?

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness.] You may answer that question.

The Witness—Mr. Moulton was present at the early part of this interview; he was very busy that morning, and said that he would have to leave us. Mr. Beecher sat at the table and wrote this card, and prefixed to it a little private note to Mr. Moulton, which he had not read, and of which I have a copy, however, the object of which was to form part of the card. The two notes together were to form part of the same card.

Q. It appears on the same sheet there? A. Yes, Sir. Read it.

Mr. Fullerton—I read that note in evidence [reading]:

MY DEAR MOULTON: I promptly comply with your suggestion of giving an explicit denial of the stories which connect my name criminally with Mrs. Tilton. The very thought of being obliged to say anything to clear her fair name shocks me, and I have hitherto acted under advice in refraining

Very truly yours,

(Signed) HENRY WARD BEECHER.

The Witness—After Mr. Beecher wrote his card he asked me—

Mr. Evarts—This card?

Mr. Fullerton—This paper just read.

The Witness—After Mr. Beecher wrote that paper, two notes, he asked me if I thought it would be satisfactory. I told him I would rather have Mrs. Tilton's opinion on the subject, and I would send for her. It happened that just at that time Frank Carpenter called at the house, and I requested him, as a favor, to go to my house and bring Mrs. Tilton. Mr. Carpenter went around to my house and brought Mrs. Tilton to that interview. This card was read to her, and it was entirely satisfactory to her. Mr. Moulton was absent; he had gone to the river front. Mr. Beecher said he would take the card which he had written, and would consider it during the day. In the evening I asked Mr. Moulton if he had seen Mr. Beecher, and what had come of the card. He said he had not seen Mr. Beecher, and had heard nothing of him. I made another and similar inquiry the next day, and the next, but nothing ever came of the card. It was not published.

Q. State whether Mrs. Tilton prepared a card at that time? A. She prepared a card the day before, which I brought out that morning and exhibited to Mr. Beecher, as being Mrs. Tilton's wish—that card is already in evidence—and said that Mrs. Tilton's desire was that Mr. Beecher should prepare a companion piece to that card, so that hers and his might be published, but neither was published.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] Look at that paper, marked "Exhibit D 44," and say whether it is the card prepared by Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Which you brought and exhibited to Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, if anything was said upon that occasion as to your joining in such a card, I want you to state what it was? A. Nothing was said to me about my joining in such a card. Mr. Beecher said to me, in going away, that there was only one danger in publishing his card, which was, that on some future occasion, if he and I should be at disagreement, and I should publish his letter from me to Mr. Moulton—

Mr. Everts—That you have just stated.

Mr. Beach—Go on.

The Witness—That his card would put him at a disadvantage before the public, because it would convict him, not only of his original crime, but of his subsequent lie to hide it.

Q. Did you say anything to them about publishing this card on their own responsibility and not upon yours, and, if so, what was it? A. I said I was perfectly willing they should publish that card, and I told Mr. Beecher that the only possibility of his ever coming into collision with me, or of my ever coming into collision with him, would be in consequence of some injustice; that I should never lift my hand against him except in self-defense, and that if he should refrain from striking me I would never do him any harm.

Q. When was this letter to "A Complaining Friend" published? A. I think it was published on the 26th or 27th or 28th of December, somewhere in that week. The letter itself is dated and will be authority.

Q. Will you state what Mr. Beecher said in regard to the letter? A. He told me he thought it was a very injudicious statement, that it would excite the very comment which I had expected it to quell.

Q. What was the occasion for the difficulty at that time which called forth the letter to "A Complaining Friend"? A. Why, Sir, during that month of December, 1872, the public pressure put upon me to do something in regard to Mrs. Woodhull's story was utterly beyond the power of any language to describe. Every newspaper throughout the land was demanding that some explanation should be made—demanding that Mr. Beecher should make it, demanding that Mr. Bowen should make it, demanding that I should make it, demanding that we all should make it, and there was a pressure in the City of Brooklyn, and there was a pressure in the church and everywhere—the very air seemed to rest upon us.

Q. What did Mr. Beecher say in regard to that state of things, as to the necessity of doing something? A. I have already mentioned that about a fortnight before the interview I have just given Mr. Beecher had devised, as a plan of meeting it, that we should cut the tripartite covenant in two and take out Mr. Bowen's part and charge him with all the slander, and make him bear the burden of retracting it.

Q. And this letter to "A Complaining Friend" succeeded that? A. Yes, Sir; about ten or fifteen days.

Q. And arose out of the same emergency? A. Yes Sir. I will also say that during that month of December I prepared another statement, the long document, which has become technically styled, I don't know why, "The True Story," for it was not a true story, it was a false one, as Mr. Beecher said he could not bear the publication of that, that it would kill him, and as the card to "The Complaining Friend," as he expressed it, only caused the very comment which I sought to quell, I prepared another statement—a brief letter to a friend out West, I think—yes, Sir; it has been read in evidence. It bore date, I believe, on the very next day, perhaps the very last day of the year, or, at all events, it was written with a view to herald in the New Year season. There were a dozen different devices—some by Mr. Moulton, some by Mr. Beecher, and some by me—in that month.

Mr. Everts—This general interview we must object to; I ask that that be struck out. He says there were a dozen devices.

Judge Nelson—That may be struck out.

Mr. Fullerton—I will put something better in its place.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to ask you whether this story entitled the "True Story," and the letter to "A Complaining Friend," and the letter out West, as it may be known, were all prepared during this emergency that you speak of, growing out of the pressure brought to bear upon you in regard to this scandal? A. Yes, Sir; they were all written within ten or fifteen days when the whole community was hounding us to make some explanation, and we were seeking to make some explanation which would not utterly destroy us all.

Q. I want to call your attention to the publication of the letter to Mr. Bowen which you prepared, January 1st, 1871, in The Brooklyn Eagle, I think it was, or The Brooklyn Sunday Press, whatever its name is.

Judge Nelson—I think we had no Sunday Press at that time.

Mr. Shearman—1873.

Mr. Morris—Sunday Press?

Mr. Fullerton—Sunday Press.

The Witness—That letter was published in the Brooklyn Sunday Press in April, 1873.

Mr. Morris—April, 20th?

The Witness—April 20th.

Mr. Fullerton—That is in evidence.

Mr. Morris—Yes; that letter is in evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—How long after its publication did you see it? A. I saw it the next night in The Brooklyn Eagle.

Q. Did you take the paper at the time? A. The Sunday Press?

Q. Yes, Sir? A. No, Sir; I don't think I ever saw the copy.

Q. Did you see the copy with the paper published in it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who drew your attention to it? A. I saw it in The Eagle the following night.

Q. It was extracted in The Brooklyn Eagle? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And there is where you saw it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What connection had you with the publication of that letter? A. None whatever.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge how it got in the paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of your own knowledge? A. Not of my own knowledge, except that so far as the gentlemen are here present who published it, and they told me.

Q. I will ask a broader question. Had you any connection, directly or indirectly, with the publication of that letter? A. Not a particle.

Q. Had you any knowledge that it was to be published, before it was published? A. None whatever.

Q. Any intimation that it was to be published? A. None.

Q. Or suspicion that it was to be published? A. None.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I guess that covers the ground. Now, was there a proposed card after the publication of that letter? A. I proposed then a form of card for Mr. Beecher to publish, based upon his proposed form of the preceding November, but I don't think it was brought to Mr. Beecher's attention at all by Mr. Moulton. I drafted it, and showed it to Mr. Moulton, and I think that it was the end of it.

THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT.

Q. I then pass to the month of May, 1873. I believe the tripartite agreement was then published, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What occurred after the publication of that tripartite agreement? In the first place I will ask you if you had any connection with the publication of it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you connected, directly or indirectly, with its publication? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you know that it was to be published? A. I did not.

Q. Now, what occurred after its publication? A. You mean what occurred between Mr. Beecher and me?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. The tripartite covenant was published on the morning of Dedication Day, Friday, May 30th, 1873, and published with a prefix attached, signed "Suffolk," written by Samuel Wilkeson, Mr. Beecher's business partner.

Mr. Evarts—You don't know about that. You were asked what it was signed.

The Witness—It was signed "Suffolk."

Mr. Evarts—It is no matter who wrote it.

The Witness—And the explanation given why it was published was that Mr. Bowen, who had the year previous retracted those stories, was still repeating them.

Mr. Evarts—You mean in the paper?

The Witness—An explanation was given in the paper; yes, Sir—the prefatory note signed "Suffolk."

Judge Neilson—That speaks for itself, Mr. Tilton. We always take the paper.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Have you got that letter signed "Suffolk?" A. No, Sir; I am not my brother's keeper.

Q. You may go on and state what occurred between you and Mr. Beecher in reference to it? A. The tripartite covenant being in the journals of Friday morning, May 30th, 1873, was accompanied with comments in many cases to this effect, namely, that there was evidence that Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton had committed some nameless and horrible crime against Mr. Beecher, for which he had graciously pardoned us, but that in so doing he had committed an offense against society, that instead of pardoning us he should have had us brought into the Courts of Justice and had us punished for slander and sent to jail.

Mr. Evarts—Is this what you said to Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—This is part of a newspaper.

Mr. Beach—It is part of surrounding circumstances.

Mr. Evarts—That must be struck out. The question was a very proper one—what passed between himself and Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—And he how states what passed, which is proper.

Judge Neilson—It may be struck out.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; I will put it in in another place.

Mr. Fullerton—What occurred between you and Mr. Beecher? A. I went around to Mr. Moulton's house on the next morning, and I told Mr. Beecher then that I had on the previous evening consulted with some of my friends in New-York.

Mr. Evarts—Was Mr. Beecher there? A. Mr. Beecher came there in a few minutes, for we sent for him.

Mr. Fullerton—Commence the narration when he got there? A. Mr. Beecher was sent for. Mr. Moulton had some conversation with me regarding the publication of this tripartite covenant. Mr. Moulton characterized it as an act of bad faith, because the tripartite covenant had been the joint property of the three signers—Mr. Bowen, Mr. Beecher and myself—and that neither one of those signers had a right to publish it without the consent of both of the others; that it had been published in an unwarrantable way, and that the criticisms it had produced were of such a character that no man could be expected to hear them and not make answer. I told Mr. Beecher that the comments which that publication had elicited in one day made it necessary that there should be a prompt and emphatic disclaimer either by him or by me, I didn't care which, of any such intimation as that I had committed against him a crime, when he knew that it was he who had committed against me a crime. I told him I would not permit the public press to put me in the position of having been pardoned by him for some atrocity, which was all the greater in the public imagination because it was not named, and that he must correct, or that I would, the impression which that publication produced. I told him that I had, in consultation with friends on the previous evening, resolved on my method of preventing it, if my method was to be adopted, and that method would be to publish in a brief card Mr. Beecher's letter, now known as the letter of contrition, dated Jan. 1, 1871, with a comment appended; that the public would see from the above card whether I had committed a crime against Mr. Beecher, or Mr. Beecher had committed a crime against me; but I told him I didn't wish to resort to such a severe method as that, which was the only method I could adopt, if the matter of the correction was left to me. I said that he had better correct it himself; that he could do it in a milder way, without involving such a cost to his feelings. I had prepared a card to that effect for publication in The Brooklyn Eagle of that night. Mr. Moulton dissuaded me from publishing it that night, saying: "Give me a little time; let Sunday intervene; it will do on Monday; meanwhile we will have opportunity for reflection." I presented to Mr. Moulton a complete clean draft of a card which I proposed, in case the responsibility of correcting that impression should devolve upon me, in case Mr. Beecher would not accept what I presented to Mr. Moulton—the form of this card I proposed to publish in The Brooklyn Eagle on the following Monday; and I left that to be conned over by him, and for Mr. Beecher to discuss it, and for them to come to some conclusion about it, and I left. The next incident in the matter occurred during the evening of that day. I went around to Mr. Moulton's house on Saturday evening. That would be May 1st, 1873. I was going up into the study. Mr. Moulton told me not to go up, for Mr. Beecher was there, and he did not wish us to meet. I remained down stairs. Pretty soon Mr. Moulton came down to me and said that Mr. Beecher was in great despondency, and had proposed, as his method of settling the case, to resign his ministry. Mr. Moulton dictated to me from memory a copy of the letter of resignation which he said Mr. Beecher had on that night brought. Mr. Moulton said to me: "What do you think of that as an expedient?" I said, "You may tell Mr. Beecher if he resigns his ministry in this crisis, flinging back that shadow on my family, I will shoot him on the street." Whether he communicated that to Mr. Beecher or not I don't know.

Q. Is that the proposed card of which you have just spoken? A. Yes; that is it.

Q. The part of it in print; what was it taken from? A. The part in print was taken from The N. Y. Express. Whether this identical fragment was taken from The Express or not I cannot say. But my impression is that this article appeared in The Express of Friday afternoon, and was copied into some of the New-York papers of Saturday morning—I won't be certain of it—or went into The Brooklyn Eagle.

Q. At all events it was a commentary of the press upon your attitude? A. Yes, Sir; that is the identical commentary.

Mr. Fullerton—This is "Exhibit No. 25."

Mr. Fullerton—[Handing paper to witness.] Now look at the paper which I show you and tell me what that is. A. This is a copy of a card which I proposed to Mr. Beecher on that occasion to sign, in order to get rid of that one.

Q. In order to get rid of "Exhibit No. 25," you proposed that one in your hand? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—And that will be marked—

Mr. Evarts—Let us see that.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That is new.

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir.

[Paper marked for identification "No. 75."]

Mr. Fullerton—The last paper is marked "Exhibit No. 75." Did Mr. Beecher see this "Exhibit No. 75?" A. Yes, Sir, he must have seen it, because he published the next day almost the identical reproduction of it.

Mr. Evarts—The fact is that he saw it.

Mr. Fullerton—[Handing paper to witness.] Look at "Exhibit No. 77," and say whether it is the card prepared and published by Mr. Beecher in lieu of this—

Mr. Evarts—I don't know anything about that. Let us see. This paper is proved by this witness having been drawn by him, and of course the right to offer it in evidence will depend on its having been submitted to Mr. Beecher, or in some way having received his sanction as part of the transaction. Whenever that is supplied it can be read.

Mr. Fullerton—"Exhibit No. 75" was not published, I believe. What was published? A. What is "Exhibit No. 75?"

Q. The proposed card which has been called to your attention. A. Yes, Sir; it was published the next day, with one or two trifling alterations. The substance of it was published in The Brooklyn Eagle, Jan. 2d, 1873.

Mr. Fullerton—That is sufficient now.

Mr. Evarts—We don't think it identifies it. That paper was published, no doubt, and is in proof. This witness drew a card; that might be proper, if he can say it was shown to Mr. Beecher. We don't want an argumentative statement that Mr. Beecher saw it, because he published something different from it, although like it. The question is whether he saw the paper.

Mr. Fullerton—What did you do with "Exhibit No. 75?" A. I will tell you. After Mr. Beecher, on Saturday evening, May 31, 1873, had prepared his letter of resignation, and I had sent him that message through Mr. Moulton, that he must find some other way, I went early next morning, or pretty early the next morning, to Mr. Moulton's house, to see what had been the result of Mr. Beecher's later consultations with Mr. Moulton on that Saturday night after I had left the house, for in leaving I had left them together. Mr. Moulton told me—

Q. No; not unless Mr. Beecher was there. Don't state anything Mr. Moulton told you, unless Mr. Beecher was there. A. I was about to say that he showed me a letter just received from Mr. Beecher.

Q. Is that in evidence? A. Yes, Sir. I asked Mr. Moulton—

Q. [Handing letter to witness.] Is that the letter which he showed you at that time from Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir. I asked Mr. Moulton what Mr. Beecher had resolved upon, whereupon he showed me that letter.

Mr. Morris—"Exhibit No. 26."

Mr. Fullerton—Without relating what occurred between you and Mr. Moulton, tell us what you did with "Exhibit No. 75," the letter addressed to Mr. Kinsella? A. I don't understand any art of answering that question, unless I mention what precedes it, because this hung on a previous occurrence.

Q. After you prepared it, what did you do with it, where did it go, into whose hands did you put it? A. I put it into Mr. Moulton's hands to be communicated to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all I want.

Mr. Beach—That paper he says was published the next day.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—With some trifling alterations.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir.

Judge Neilson—The relation and connection of the two papers, we can spell out as well as the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I offer it in evidence.

Judge Neilson—I think you can put it in.

Mr. Evarts—Why didn't you put it in.

Mr. Beach—Because it is the same thing Mr. Beecher reproduced in print the next day.

Mr. Evarts—How do we know it was connected with Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—Because he says it was published.

Mr. Evarts—You can't make an argumentative proposition that Mr. Beecher had copied that from this.

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, I will inform you that Mr. Beecher copied his from mine.

Mr. Evarts—Did he do it in your presence? A. He did not do it in my presence.

Mr. Evarts—Then you cannot testify in regard to it.

Mr. Beach—Unless he knows it from some subsequent interview with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—If Mr. Beecher told him he copied it, that brings a recognition of the paper. When you bring that recognition, then you can offer it in evidence.

Mr. Beach—I don't know of any better recognition that can be given of a paper than the fact that it was sent by the draughtsman to Mr. Beecher, and that Mr. Beecher published it in hæc verba the next day, with a few trifling alterations. I think that is a pretty substantial recognition of the paper.

Judge Neilson—I think, upon that view, the paper can be put in, as I suggested before.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note my exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton (reading):—

DEAR KINSELLA: I have maintained silence under the continual slanders that have for some time followed me. I do not now propose to defend myself. The recent publication of a document which bears my name among others, was made without consultation with either Theodore Tilton or myself, or our authorization. If that document should lead the public to regard Mr. Tilton as the author of the calumnies to which it alluded, or any other slander against me, it will do him great injustice. Mr. Tilton's course towards me has been that of a man of honor and integrity.

Yours,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

[Paper heretofore marked for identification No. 75, now marked "Exhibit No. 75"].

Q. Now, who was Mr. Kinsella? A. I don't know, Sir.

Mr. Beach—What was his business and situation? A. Oh! I thought you meant what was his function in this case.

Mr. Fullerton—No.

The Witness—Oh! Kinsella was the editor of The Brooklyn Eagle.

Q. In which the publication appeared? A. Yes, Sir. Perhaps I ought to mention. Mr. Fullerton, that the alterations in that card were submitted by Mr. Beecher to me, through Mr. Moulton, before they were made, on Sunday night.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor has my exception to the reading of this paper.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON PACIFIES MR. BEECHER.

Q. We will now pass to 1873, Mr. Tilton, the month of June; do you recollect an interview on Sunday night, at Mr. Moulton's house? A. That is the interview that I have just been mentioning, Sir, Sunday night, June 1st, 1873.

Mr. Beach—Upon that night you did not see Mr. Beecher, I believe? A. Mr. Moulton would not permit us to see each other, and kept Mr. Beecher up stairs and me down. He said the two men were not in a frame of mind to meet each other.

Mr. Fullerton—What effect did this card of Mr. Beecher have on himself? A. On Mr. Beecher?

Q. Yes; in what frame of mind was he after its publication?

Judge Neilson—In other words, did you see him again?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes. A. I do not at this moment remember the first day I saw Mr. Beecher after that publication.

Q. Do you recollect anything that occurred about the 10th or 12th of June, soon after? A. The 10th or 12th of June?

Q. Yes; do you recollect sending him something to the church? A. Do you mean a little scrap of paper?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I don't know that I could fix that little scrap of paper to the 10th or 12th of June. The circumstances, as they lie in my memory, are these: The publication of this little card of the 2d of June, 1873, excited a great deal of comment. Mr. Beecher told me that all his friends were pressing him to know why in the world he had published such a card exonerating me, saying that I was not the author of the scandals, and giving me a good character before the world; he said he had been pestered by his friends to know the reason, and that he was like a lamb in a thicket in the midst of those criticisms, and that the inquiries into the reasons for that card had given him great perplexity. I think he told me also that there was a threat at that time on the part of Mr. West to institute inquiries into the case; at all events Mr. Beecher said to me that the troubles which had grown up in consequence of the publication of that card were so great as to throw him into great depression. He communicated that to me and to Mr. Moulton, and two or three different times during that month of June; and one morning when he was in a particularly low state, so Mr. Moulton informed me, I sent him a little scripture text, a favorite text of his, from which he used to preach in the past days. I wrote it on a scrap of paper and sent it up into his pulpit—"Grace, mercy and peace,"—and signed my initials to it. He found it in his pulpit when he went to preach. He told me a few days afterwards that there never had been a sunbeam that brought him more brightness than that. He said that my spirit toward him lifted him up or cast him down, and thanked me for it very profusely. But I won't undertake to fix the exact day of that little paper. It did not have any date, only it was in that time of great depression when he was cast down, and Mr. Moulton asked me to lift him up.

PLANS FOR EVADING THE WEST CHARGES.

Q. Do you recollect the letter of Mr. West to Mr. Beecher, foreshadowing the charges that he afterwards preferred? A. I do recollect seeing the letter. I think I had never seen it until this legal proceeding, but I remember a letter was sent by Mr. West to Mr. Beecher. Mr. Beecher came round to Mr. Moulton and to me and said that Mr. West had made up his mind to institute charges against me, and Mr. Beecher wanted to know what was the best policy to do—to proceed upon—in reference to that forthcoming inquiry.

Q. What occurred? A. All that occurred was—on my part at least—was simply this, that I did not see how they could make any inquiry unless I consented to go there and be inquired into, and that there could be no investigation of any sort if I kept away; that it would take seven chains to drag me down to the church to that investigation; he might rest assured that no harm would come through me. Then, either Mr. Moulton or I, or Mr. Beecher, I don't know who, suggested that, as a temporary relief, it would be well to treat the charges with some little kindness, not to rebuff them, not to say, "No, we shall never look into these;" but to say, "The time of year is bad; it is June; July is upon us, and the Summer vacation has come. Throw this thing over until the Autumn; give them a half welcome and a half rebuff." That was the policy agreed upon.

Q. Anything said at that time as to whether you were subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, or was that subsequently? A. The West charges occupied the attention of Mr. Moulton and myself at intervals during the Summer. Mr. West made me a visit during the Summer, though I think that was during Mr. Beecher's absence in the country. I don't remember precisely the date of Mr. West's call. I think it was in the early part of August. He came to see me. He was then a stranger to me. I did not know him by sight.

Mr. Evans.—It is no matter what passed between you.

Q. Pass, then, to the month of October, if you please. What occurred then in regard to the West charges? A. At some time in the month of October—I don't remember the date, though the paper itself bears a date—I was waited upon at the office of The Golden Age, by Mr. Tallmadge, the clerk of the Examining Committee of Plymouth Church, who presented to me a formal copy of the charges which Mr. West had made against me, to the effect that I had been slandering Mr. Beecher.

Q. These charges, I believe, that were thus served upon you, are in evidence? A. Yes, Sir, the identical paper.

Q. Look at "Exhibit No. 29," and say whether you recognize it as the charges referred to. [Handing to witness "Exhibit No. 29."] A. This is a printed copy.

Q. Well, there are the originals. [Handing witness papers.]

A. That is the paper, Sir,—two papers.

Q. The letter accompanied it also, did it—of Mr. Tallmadge?

A. Yes, Sir; both papers—as you see them.

Q. They have been read in evidence. How long after that did you see Mr. Beecher? A. I don't know how many days, but speedily after that. I did not see Mr. Beecher; Mr. Beecher saw me.

Q. Where did he see you? A. At Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. What occurred? A. He wanted to know what we would do in reference to Mr. West's revival of his charges.

Q. State whether the charges were there, and exhibited? A. I do not know whether they were or not.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Beecher saw them? A. I don't know.

Q. Well, go on with your narration. A. He spoke to me about them. I had received my copy. I don't know whether he had ever seen that identical copy or not.

Q. What occurred there in regard to them? A. He said to me that everything depended on me. I told him if that was true, I could very easily handle the case. I then informed him that Mr. West had visited me during the Summer, and that he had substantially indicated to me, though he did not say it in plain words, that he (Mr. West) had originally instituted these charges against me in June, because he thought I was really guilty of slandering Mr. Beecher; that during the Summer he, Mr. West, had changed his mind on that subject, and had come to the conclusion that Mr. Beecher was the guilty man, but that, having brought his charges before the church in the regular way, he desired that they should be called up in the Autumn, and urged upon me, as a matter of duty and for my own vindication, that I should appear before the church to answer the charges; that in answering them I would throw the blame where it belonged, and clear myself. I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. West was a stranger to me, and that I entered into no obligations with him, and that I had told him very frankly that I had been for nearly four years out of the church, that I had never crossed the threshold of it, never attended services there, never expected to do so so long as I lived, and that nothing would now induce me to return to the church, and least of all would any temptation lure me to go there for the sake of mingling in an investigation into a scandal. I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. West had argued with me about my duty to go, and had said to me that my name was on the roll, and that I was still a member, and that the church had authority over me, and that he, Mr. West, had taken the advice of well-known congregational clergymen, who understood the order and polity of the church, and that when the Autumn came he meant to call up these charges and to assume that I was a member, and to treat with me as a member, and to force me to trial. I told Mr. Beecher that I had informed Mr. West that no powers could force me to trial, that I should take the ground, which was the true ground, that I was not a member of Plymouth Church, that I had informed the pastor to that effect three or four years ago, that I had never been in the church and was not a member, and that the error was in supposing that the mere fact of the accidental retention of my name on the roll could create a member of a man who had no membership. I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. West pressed me, and said that in a friendly spirit toward me he meant to call up the charge. I told him, however, that Mr. West was guarded in his expression; he would not say absolutely that he believed in Mr. Beecher's guilt, only that if Mr. Beecher was guilty he was acting during the Summer as a guilty man would act, and exactly as an innocent man would not act. I told Mr. Beecher that now that the charges had been presented to me in a regular form, I would assume toward them the same attitude which I had previously announced to him when the first premonitions were given in the month of June and July, that I should stand on my non-membership; that I should say I was out of the church; that the record was wrong; that they should revise the roll. He said to me: "Theodore, if you take that ground all will be safe; but if by any means they can bring you before us for examination everything will be lost." I said, "They cannot carry me before the tribunal of the church without my consent, and I shall never give my consent." I then told Mr. Beecher that he must assist in fighting off Mr. West's charges. He said that the trouble was to deal with those members of the church who took the technical theory that because my name was on the roll and because I had never asked for letters of dismissal, that therefore the church was in duty bound by its own precedents and policy to try me as if I was a member. He said there was a number of gentlemen in the church who took that ground, and that they were the difficult members to deal with; and in view of that difficulty I suggested to Mr. Beecher a form of action to which he approved. That form was this. I said, "Suppose you draft a resolution something like this: 'Resolved, That as Mr. Theodore Tilton has not been, for four years, a member of this church, that the roll that contains his name be amended in accordance with that fact.'" That was my proposition for satisfying the consciences of those gentlemen who thought I was a member because my name was on the roll. Mr. Beecher approved that proposition, the essence of it being that I was not a member, and that the roll should be amended to recognize that fact. That was the policy that we agreed upon.

Q. Did you write to Mr. Tallmadge? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Is that the letter which you wrote? [Handing witness a paper.] A. That is the letter, Sir.

Q. I offer it in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—That comes under the same objection and under the same rule of admitting it, I suppose, that the charges do?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Therefore, if your Honor will only note my objection and my exception to its admission.

Judge Neilson—It comes in collaterally—incidentally.

Mr. Fullerton [reading]:

174 LIVINGSTON STREET, )
BROOKLYN, October 23d, 1873. }

Mr. D. W. TALLMADGE (Clerk):

My Dear Sir: I have received from you an official paper addressed to me, as a member of Plymouth Church. Nearly four years ago I terminated my connection with that church, and am not now a member thereof. Therefore, the document addressed to me in that capacity I cannot receive. To avoid any seeming discourtesy in returning it herewith, I retain it, subject to your discretion. With my best wishes for the prosperity of the church. I remain,

Yours truly,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 76."]

Q. Did anything else occur after the proposition of this resolution which you proposed should be adopted? A. After I sent that letter to Mr. Tallmadge I was in at Mr. Moulton's house one morning—I think it was the very day after the letter had been delivered—or if it was not the next day it was very shortly afterwards, and Mr. Beecher came in, and on seeing me he came up to me and caught my hand in both of his, and said: "Theodore, God inspired you to write that letter."

MR. TILTON'S LAST VISIT TO PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. What action did the church take in regard to it? A. On the morning of the 31st October, 1873—I believe I am correct in the date—it was the morning of the day on the evening of which action was to be taken by the church in reference to these charges; on the morning of that day I saw in one of the New-York papers—I forget which—I think The Sun—some intimation that the action that night, instead of being in accordance with the bargain made between Mr. Beecher and me, namely, that the roll should be amended in accordance with the fact of my non-membership—I saw an article saying that the action that night was to result in my excommunication from the church, on the ground that charges had been brought against me for slandering the minister; and that when I was cited to appear before the church to answer them, I had, in a mean-spirited way, put in the plea that I was not a member, and had shirked my responsibility, evaded my duty, and in that manner was to be dealt with by the church and to be punished with expulsion. I went around to Mr. Moulton's house and I called his attention to that statement and I asked him to send for Mr. Beecher, which he did. Mr. Beecher came. I called Mr. Beecher's attention to that statement and I asked him what was to be the action that night. I said: "You and I have agreed what the action shall be. I have written a letter to the church saying that I am not a member, but I have written that letter in your interest. I have written that letter for the purpose of fighting off this investigation. I did not write that letter with a view to evade any duty. I am perfectly willing, if you are, to go down to the church and face this investigation. Tell me, what is the action to-night to be, and what is the meaning of this newspaper forth-putting, and threat and premonition that I am to be expelled? He said he did not know exactly what the action was to be, and he spoke some very severe words against Mr. West, and he said he was in great trouble. I told him I could not afford the risk of any mistake that night; that if this newspaper foreshadowed the true action, namely, that I was to be held up before the public as having made charges against him and as having meanly shrunk away from my duty of answering them by so base a plea as non-membership, that I never would submit to it. He begged me to consult Mr. Samuel Belcher, a member of the Examining Committee. He said Mr. Belcher could tell me exactly what the action was to be. I told him that I would write to Mr. Belcher. I told him that I would not permit the church to put me on record, for my future to be clouded by, as under any such base insinuation that I was not able to meet any such charges. I left Mr. Beecher, or rather Mr. Beecher left me; he left the house; I went up into the study and I wrote to a member of the Examining Committee, Mr. Samuel E. Belcher, a letter.

Q. Is that the letter you wrote him [handing witness a letter]? A. Yea, Sir; that is the original draft of it; I made a clean copy and carried it over to him, and delivered it into his hand in person.

Q. Go on with the narrative now. A. I carried it over to New-York.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the question whether Mr. Beecher—

Judge Neilson—You delivered it to Mr. Belcher. That is all you can say about it.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all; that is all I propose to have him say now. [To the witness]: Go on with the narration.

A. I delivered it to Mr. Belcher; I then went to my office and I prepared a copy of it which I sent to Mr. Tallmadge, the clerk. The substance of the letter was—

Q. No, never mind that; I will read the thing itself by and bye. When was the action of the church to be had? A. That night.

Q. Did you go to the church that night? A. I did, Sir.

Q. What occurred there? A. I rose and made a speech.

Q. Just tell us from the time you entered the church until you left, what occurred in the presence of Mr. Beecher? A. About eight o'clock I went into the church. The prayer-meeting was in progress. I waited through it to the end. At the end the meeting resolved itself by Congregational custom into a business meeting, and one of the members was appointed Moderator, and the action which had been heralded in the newspapers of that morning was brought forth for consummation.

Mr. Evarts—What took place?

The Witness—In other words, a series of resolutions was read; I cannot repeat them, but the substance was that I had made charges against Mr. Beecher, that I had been summoned to answer for them, and that my answer was, that I was not a member, and therefore dropped my name from the roll; and as soon as I heard that record read I rose to my feet, and I made a brief statement to that congregation to the effect that if I had slandered Mr. Beecher I was there to answer for it to his face; and Mr. Beecher rose and said that he had no charges to make against me. The entire proceedings are given in the chronicles of the day. I won't undertake to repeat the exact words.

Q. Did Mr. Beecher say anything about the letter to Mr. Belcher after that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he say? A. Mr. Beecher told me that he was afraid that trouble might arise in view of my letter to Mr. Belcher, not because I had sent it to Mr. Belcher, for he was his friend, but because I had sent a copy of it to Mr. Tallmadge, and he said that he did not then know whether Mr. Tallmadge was inclined to be friendly or hostile to the investigation, but he said he had procured the copy of it and it was in his possession. I do not distinctly remember whether he said Mr. Belcher's copy of it or Mr. Tallmadge's copy of it; at all events he told me that there was no danger of that letter going on the church records.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to read it now.

Mr. Evarts—The same objection, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton [reading];

BROOKLYN, October 31, 1873.

MR. SAMUEL E. BELCHER.

My dear Sir:—As you are a mutual friend of Mr. Beecher and myself, and as you are likewise a member of the Examining Committee of Plymouth Church, now occupied with an unhappy scandal, I desire to put into your hands, to be used publicly or privately at your discretion, the following statement, namely,

I wrote a few days ago to your Committee, stating that I had not for four years held any connection whatever with Plymouth Church, and, therefore, could not with propriety act the part of a member in any proceedings.

But, since writing that note, I learn from the public papers that because my name still appears on the church books, I am therefore still considered a member, sufficiently so at least to be indicted by one of the members for slandering the pastor. A hint is also thrown out that I am thus refusing to submit myself to the church tribunal, in order to escape the responsibility of my slanderous words.

I therefore say, first, I have never spoken against Mr. Beecher falsely; and, second, if either he or the Church Committee shall request me to waive my non-membership and take my position once again, I will do so as a member long enough to appear this evening at the meeting to answer, before the assembled congregation or Committee, the following question, either from Mr. Beecher or the Committee; namely:

"Have you, Theodore Tilton, ever spoken against Henry Ward Beecher, falsely?"

I request you to show this letter to Mr. Beecher before the action of the Committee to-night. Let me add that my explicitness in this matter is solely with a view to protect myself against any unjust suspicion or reflection in future that I have ever sought to evade any just responsibility of mine to Plymouth Church.

I retain a copy of this letter to be used as I shall see fit.

Fraternally yours, THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 77"].

Mr. Fullerton—A motion to adjourn is always in order, I believe.

The Court thereupon adjourned to eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning.

EIGHTEENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

QUESTION AND CROSS-QUESTION TO MR. TILTON.

WHY THE PLAINTIFF WROTE HIS LETTER TO DR. BACON—A PART OF THE FAMOUS CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. TILTON AND HIS WIFE READ—MR. EVARTS BEGINS THE CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Mr. Tilton's testimony on Wednesday was not startling, but from beginning to end the interest in it was not once allowed to droop. The testimony first adverted to the Congregational Council in 1874, to the time when Mr. Tilton first heard of its organization, and to what followed. The familiar occurrences surrounding the famous Bacon letter were lightly touched upon. It was soon after this that Mr. Tilton last met and spoke to Mr. Beecher. He told Mr. Beecher on that occasion that Dr. Bacon had called him (Mr. Tilton) a knave and a liar and a creature of Mr. Beecher's magnanimity, and added that Mr. Beecher must deny Dr. Bacon's statements or he (Mr. Tilton) would. Mr. Beecher made no reply and went away. Until they met in the court-room, the two men did not again see each other. A letter from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Beecher, dated in May, 1874, was introduced, in which the writer wrote that he had heard from Mr. Carpenter that Mr. Beecher desired to offer Mr. Tilton pecuniary aid. The latter closed by declining money directly or indirectly, and Mr. Fullerton read it with the grieved expression which the writer evidently intended to convey. Another communication, written to Mr. Shearman and other members of Plymouth Church, was read. It contained quotations from the Bacon letter, and said that if it was desired to try Mr. Tilton for the charges against him he would appear at the bar of Plymouth Church and answer them.

This brought the examination to the events connected with the Plymouth Investigation Committee. The witness said that Mrs. Tilton first informed him of the Committee's existence about 10 o'clock one night early in July. The letter of Mr. Beecher appointing the Committee appeared in the newspapers the same week, and Mrs. Tilton left her home on the day when it was published. The examination then went back to the time when Bessie Turner entered Mr. Tilton's house, who knew her as Lizzie McDermott, "a little waif of a thing," as he described her. When asked whether the story about his having acted improperly toward the girl was true or false, the witness replied emphatically, "Not a word of truth in it, nor a fact for its foundation. Pure fiction." A debate arose regarding the next topic which was about one of the proposed reports of Mr. Tilton to the Investigating Committee. Judge Neilson was at first inclined to rule out the details of the interview at which that report was suggested, as asserted, by Mr. Tracy, but Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Beach brought to bear very strong arguments for its admission, and finally won their point.

Judge Fullerton then announced that the direct examination was ended, with the exception of the reading of some letters written prior to the alleged commission of adultery. These would be read later. Mr. Evarts, who was to conduct the cross-examination, decidedly objected to that arrangement, and he continued to protest, when Mr. Beach explained that the letters bore reference simply to damages. A heated but amusing skirmish of words followed this misunderstanding. Mr. Beach said that counsel for the plaintiff would be obliged to occupy the next few hours in identifying all the letters, three or four hundred in number, and they would introduce afterward the few they desired to read. "You must introduce them before I cross-examine," exclaimed Mr. Evarts, decidedly, emphasizing with equal force every word and syllable. "No, we won't introduce them before you cross-examine," replied Mr. Beach, jerking out each word with a shake of the head. "We'll see," rejoined Mr. Beecher's senior counsel, in a drawling schoolboy fashion, which was exceedingly funny. After Mr. Beach had responded, "We will see," there seemed to be nothing further to say, and Judge Neilson, apparently amused by the quarrel, suggested that there ought to be some way to agree. Mr. Fullerton replied that the plaintiff's counsel had hundreds of letters, but only wished to introduce about a score of them. There was a momentary pause, both sides being stubborn and determined not to compromise. Then Mr. Evarts said, with a yawn, "Well, gentlemen, we've nothing to do with your case."

"Thank you for that," retorted Mr. Fullerton, shortly, while Mr. Beach added, "We've considerable to do with yours."

This provoked the first laughter of the day, in which all the counsel joined. It was finally agreed to adjourn until 2 o'clock, it being then about 12:30.

After recess, the direct examination was continued. Mr. Tilton said that during his lecturing tours he wrote to his wife every day, and she wrote to him as often. About 20 of the letters, written in 1867 and 1868, were then read by Mr. Fullerton. They are the poetical letters of love between the plaintiff and his wife which have been so much commented on, and Mr. Fullerton threw into the reading of them much sympathy and fervor. The direct examination was concluded without further questioning at 3:05.

Interesting as had been the morning session, it was reserved for later hours of the day to develop one of the most striking features of the trial—the cross-examination of Theodore Tilton by William M. Evarts. Mr. Evarts arose slowly from his seat, and without formality put his first question, while Mr. Tilton changed his position and answered it with composure. The questioning was unbroken by any misunderstanding until Mr. Tilton was asked whether Mrs. Tilton's residence had been at Mr. Ovington's since she separated from him. He declined to say that it had been, and finally said, "Her residence is at my house." Then Mr. Evarts asked the witness what he meant when he said that his age was about 39, to which Mr. Tilton replied that he meant exactly what he said. After this there were frequent sharp exchanges of words between the examiner and the plaintiff, but always in good nature, Mr. Evarts being invariably suave and Mr. Tilton extremely dignified. Mr. Tilton did not lose an opportunity to praise his wife, and once when asked whether she enjoyed and sought the company of people with great minds, he replied, "No; she rather went to the lowly and unfortunate. She was a lovely woman." "I agree with you," commented Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Tilton's religious views were next inquired about. Mr. Evarts examined him closely on that subject, as to whether Mr. Tilton's change in belief had caused his wife much sorrow, and whether there was also a great difference in the religious views of Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher. The political controversies between the two men were next taken up, and the events following the Cleveland Convention, when Mr. Tilton severely attacked Mr. Beecher, were reviewed. Before this subject was exhausted the hour of adjournment arrived and the examination was abruptly broken off.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

THE COMMOTION MADE BY THE COUNCIL.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Theodore Tilton was called, and the direct examination continued.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Tilton, when did you first hear of the proposed Council of the church? A. I think, Sir, that the first intimation that I had that a Council was likely to be held was given to me by Mr. Beecher, at Mr. Moulton's house, one Sunday afternoon; I think the second Sunday after my appearance in Plymouth Church at which I made the speech. The date, therefore, was in the early part of November.

Q. 1873? A. 1873.

Q. Now detail, as near as you can recollect, the conversation that you had with Mr. Beecher at that time? A. I stepped into Mr. Moulton's house one Sunday afternoon, and Mr. Beecher was there, and he said to me that trouble had arisen out of my speech at the church, and out of the action of the church in particular reference to Mr. Halliday's card. Mr. Halliday had published a card as clerk of the church certifying that my retirement from the church and the erasure of my name from the roll was without reflection upon me. That card had been printed in The Sun. Mr. Beecher said that a good deal of comment had been made by that card, mischievous comment in ecclesiastical circles; that some of the neighboring churches, and I think he said in particular Dr. Storrs's church and Mr. Buddington's church, or leading members of those two churches, were taking the ground that it was against the Congregational order that a member should be dismissed as I was, while charges were pending against me, and still be allowed to carry off from the clerk of the church a certificate that it was without reflection. He said he thought mischief would grow out of it, and that intimations had been given to him that a Council would be held. I think also he told me that certain papers had been sent to him introductory to that end, namely, the holding of a Council. On second thought, I now do remember he spoke of papers, and told me that while he could not state their contents exactly, if I would go and see Mr. Halliday I would be able to judge for myself the danger which then threatened.

Q. Did he make any observation at that time in respect of your joint action with reference to that proposed Council? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he say upon that subject? A. He told me that a Council was always a dangerous thing; that nobody ever could tell where such a body would end, what proceedings they would resort to, what the issue would be; and he asked me if I had any advice or suggestions to give in the matter. I told him that I was not an ecclesiast and knew nothing about the management of Councils. He then said, as near as I can recollect his words: "Theodore, all will depend on you in this case, as in other cases; if you will stand by me, if you will not turn against me, if you will not lend any influence to an investigation or to a Council, Dr. Storrs can do me no harm." I told him that I should lend myself not at all to any investigation, or any Council, or to any such proceedings—he might rest assured of that.

Q. Well, was the Council called? A. The Council was not called at that time.

Q. Afterwards I mean—was it afterwards called? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And after it convened did you have any conversation with

Mr. Beecher in regard to it? A. The only conversation that I now distinctly recall with Mr. Beecher subsequent to the interview which I have related occurred one night in the street. It comes to me at this moment. If you will wait a moment I will endeavor to fix the time. It was on the night when Mr. Beecher made in Plymouth Church a speech referring to Dr. Storrs, saying that he was sorry that Dr. Storrs's ability and his great genius were not appreciated, that he ought to have been brought up in the West. It was on that night. Mr. Moulton and I were anxious to know the result of the church meeting that night.

It was one of the preliminary pieces of business before the calling of the Council. I was particularly solicitous to know what the church was going to do in reference to an invitation from the two sister churches to meet in Plymouth Church lecture-room and have a friendly talk as to the action taken in my case. I went down with Mr. Moulton to the prayer meeting; I did not go in, but I waited until it was over; Mr. Moulton and I both waited, anxious to know what action the church had taken or would take. Mr. Beecher met us, and said to Mr. Moulton: "I am all in a dripping sweat. I have just been making the greatest speech of my life. My church will do just exactly as I say. We are going to stand on an independent basis. We can whisk the Council down the wind. We can set them all agog." He then turned around and recognized me. This was in the dark, and he told me the substance of what he had said; he said he had never been so roused in any public speech in his life. He was quivering from head to foot, and he would have to stand against an iron railing or lamp-post to steady himself. I thought he was going to fall in the street. He told me he thought the danger was past; that the church would do exactly as he wished.

Q. When, in reference to this event that you now speak of, was the Bacon letter published? A. Oh, the Bacon letter was not published until June, 1874.

Q. After its publication did you call the attention of Mr. Beecher to it? A. No, Sir; I never met Mr. Beecher since the Bacon letter, save as I have met him here in the court-room.

MR. TILTON'S LAST WORDS WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. Did you ever have any talk with Mr. Beecher in regard to the Bacon letter? A. I had a talk with Mr. Beecher, not in regard to the Bacon letter, but in regard to the charges which Dr. Bacon had made.

Q. I did not frame my question as I meant to have done. With regard to the charges referred to in the Bacon letter, I should have said? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that conversation? A. I cannot fix the precise date, but it was an interview held in Mr. Moulton's study, I think about the middle of April, 1874, just after the Council.

Q. And what part of the charges of Dr. Bacon against you did you call the attention of Mr. Beecher to? A. Dr. Bacon had charged me with being a knave and a dog.

Q. What did you say to Mr. Beecher upon that subject? A. I told Mr. Beecher that that was a very grave charge to come from Dr. Bacon, the leading Congregational clergyman of New-England, my former senior editor of The Independent; that it might as well be made against me by Mr. Sumner; that I could not sit still under any such imputation, and I said: "Mr. Beecher, you must correct this or else I shall be compelled to do so. You may correct it in your own way, in any mild and gentle way. If it is left to me to correct, I must do it in a more serious way." He said to me on that occasion, or rather I said to him on that occasion: "I am not willing, Mr. Beecher, to be put before the world as the creature of your magnanimity, whereas you know that you are the creature of mine." Perhaps I ought to say, to make that entirely clear, that this was an interview which I had with Mr. Beecher, to which I had summoned him, in order that he might be present when Mr. Thomas G. Shearman presented to me his written apology for having insulted Mrs. Tilton in public, at the Plymouth prayer meeting.

Mr. Evarts—We will have that stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Strike it out, unless the counsel require it.

Mr. Fullerton—It is immaterial.

Mr. Beach—I do not want to strike out the fact. I suppose that he had summoned Mr. Beecher to that interview.

Judge Neilson—No, Sir; from that.

Mr. Fullerton—You recollect anything else that occurred at that interview? A. I recollect my talking with Mr. Shearman, and my receiving his apology.

Q. I mean with Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; Mr. Beecher left, and that is the last time I ever spoke with him.

Mr. Evarts—That will have to be stricken out also.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; not with our consent.

Judge Neilson—The answer will be: "No, Sir; Mr. Beecher left." If the counsel wishes to learn more, he may inquire.

Mr. Evarts—This constitutes a part of the conversation with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Beach—I understand that Mr. Beecher was present at this interview.

Judge Neilson—Ascertain how that is; ascertain if there was any reference to Mr. Shearman's matter while Mr. Beecher was yet there.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—We do not care about that.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't care about that. The correspondence between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Shearman is already in evidence as a part of the Bacon letter.

Judge Neilson—It is as well to leave it there.

Mr. Fullerton—What reply, if any, did Mr. Beecher make to the suggestion that that must be corrected, either by himself or you? A. Mr. Beecher made no reply whatever, from being restrained by Mr. Shearman's presence, who had not yet learned the facts in the case.

Mr. Evarts—That is not evidence.

Judge Neilson—The word "restrained" is not.

Mr. Beach—Was Mr. Shearman then present?

The Witness—Mr. Shearman was then present.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman just then came in, did he? A. No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—He was in? A. Mr. Beecher was summoned to that interview to be present by previous arrangement.

Mr. EVARTS—That is not evidence.

Judge NEILSON—That we have down.

Mr. BEACH—I don't know whether it is evidence or not. He says by previous arrangement. We will see whether it is evidence.

Mr. EVARTS—Of course if you had a previous conversation with Mr. Beecher you can give that. I make no objection to anything which Mr. Beecher said.

Judge NEILSON—All the counsel now seem to call for, is the conversation with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. EVARTS—Now, he says that Mr. Beecher made no reply, and he then proceeds to state, because he was restrained by Mr. Shearman's presence. That is not proper.

Mr. FULLERTON—Was Mr. Shearman present during that interview? A. Yes, Sir; that was an interview called for the reception of Mr. Shearman's apology.

Q. Did Mr. Shearman and Mr. Beecher leave together? A. No, Sir; Mr. Shearman remained.

Q. Which left first? A. Mr. Beecher.

Q. Mr. Shearman remained behind with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How was Mr. Beecher summoned there? A. By me.

Q. Through whose instrumentality? A. Through a telegram in Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. Sending a telegram? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you inform him in that telegram?—A. I did not address the telegram to him; Mr. Moulton sent him the telegram.

Q. Was that the last meeting you had with Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; the last time I ever exchanged a word with him, according to my present recollection.

MR. BEECHER'S OFFERS OF MONEY FOR THE GENERAL GOOD.

Q. Tell me, if you please, in whose handwriting that letter is? [Handing letter to witness.] A. It is in mine, Sir.

Q. Did you send it to Mr. Beecher? A. I did, Sir.

Mr. FULLERTON—The letter is produced by the other side, upon my call, and I offer it in evidence.

Mr. EVARTS—This is a letter from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Beecher, received by him, and I suppose is admissible as evidence of that fact, that he wrote such a letter to him. It carries no evidence further than that.

Judge NEILSON—No, Sir.

Mr. EVARTS—It is not evidence of the truth of it.

Mr. FULLERTON [reading]:

THE GOLDEN AGE, May 2d, 1874.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

SIR: I have just this morning learned, to my surprise and sorrow, that Mr. F. B. Carpenter, whose good will toward both you and me is unquestionable, has consulted you concerning the use of your money, influence and good offices for the enlargement of the capital of The Golden Age. Mr. Carpenter mentions to me also your saying to him that, under certain conditions involving certain disavowals by me, a sum of money would, or could, be raised to send me with my family to Europe for a term of years. Of course you need no assurance that such an application or suggestion is wholly unauthorized by me, and is inexpressibly repugnant to my feelings. The occasion compels me to state explicitly that so long as life and self-respect continue to exist together in my breast I shall be debarred from receiving either directly or indirectly any pecuniary or other favor at your hands. The reason for this feeling on my part, you know so well, that I spare you the statement of it.

Truly yours,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked "Exhibit 78."]

Mr. FULLERTON—I have called upon my friend Mr. Shearman for a letter of May 4th, and inasmuch as he does not find it at once he consents kindly that I should read it from the book.

Mr. EVARTS—It is a letter to the three jointly, is it not? If it was delivered to Mr. Beecher, it will come within the same rule. But if it was delivered only to Mr. Shearman, I don't see that it would. The way a letter comes to be evidence that passes from A. to B., is the fact that B. receives it. No letter proves its contents, but the fact that it comes to a person is the substantive fact. Now, a person by writing a letter to three men and proving that he gave it to one of them, you cannot read it in evidence against the other two, unless they are partners or something of that kind.

Mr. FULLERTON—Unless we bring it home to Mr. Beecher's knowledge of course it will go for nothing. That we propose to do.

Judge NEILSON—Do you expect to do so?

Mr. FULLERTON—Yes, Sir.

Judge NEILSON—Go on.

Mr. EVARTS—Your Honor will note our exception.

Judge NEILSON—Yes; it is accepted on the assurance that he expects to bring it home to the knowledge of Mr. Beecher.

Mr. EVARTS—There may be some circumstances where it is a matter in of difference, but here is a long letter, to which, perhaps, importance is attached, I dare say—I don't know how that may be—by my learned friends; and it is hardly right, it seems to me, that we should be called upon to submit to the reading of that paper, on some notion that Mr. Beecher has something to do with it, without having the link supplied.

Judge NEILSON—I propose in this instance to accept the statement of counsel that he expects to connect it, perhaps by some other witness.

Mr. FULLERTON—By some other witness not yet called.

Judge NEILSON—I think he may read it on that assurance.

Mr. EVARTS—That is no doubt within the discretion of the Court, but we submit it is not a case where that allowance should be permitted. Your Honor will note our exception to the evidence on its face.

Judge NEILSON—Yes, Sir.

Mr. FULLERTON [Reading]:

BROOKLYN, May 4, 1874.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Pastor of Plymouth Church; Rev. S. B. Halliday, Associate Pastor, and Mr. Thomas G. Shearman, Clerk.

GENTLEMEN: I address, through you, to the Church of which you are officers, the following statement, which you are at liberty to communicate to the Church through the Examining Committee, or in any other mode, private or public.

The Rev. Leonard Bacon, D. D., LL. D., Moderator of the recent Congregational Council, has seen fit, since the adjournment of that body, to proclaim, publish and reiterate, with signal emphasis, and with the weight of something like official authority, a grave declaration, which I here quote, namely:

"It was for the Plymouth Church," he says, "to vindicate its pastor against a damaging imputation from one of its members. But with great alacrity—the pastor himself consenting—IT THREW AWAY THE OPPORTUNITY OF VINDICATION." * * * "That act," he continued, "in which THE PLYMOUTH CHURCH THREW AWAY THE OPPORTUNITY OF VINDICATING ITS PASTOR, was what gave occasion for remonstrances from neighboring churches." * * * "There are many," he says also, "not only in Brooklyn, but elsewhere, who felt that the Church had not fairly met the question, and by evading the issue had THROWN AWAY THE OPPORTUNITY OF VINDICATING ITS PASTOR."

The Moderator's declaration is thus made three times over that the Plymouth Church, in dealing with my case, THREW AWAY ITS OPPORTUNITY OF VINDICATING THE PASTOR.

This declaration so emphatically repeated by the chief mouth-piece of the Council, and put forth by him apparently as an exposition of the Council's views, compels me, as a third party to the controversy, to choose between two alternatives.

One of these is to remain contentedly in the dishonorable position of a man who denies to his former pastor an opportunity for the vindication of that pastor's character—an offense the more heinous because an unsullied character and reputation are requisites to his sacred office.

The other alternative is for me to restore to his Church their lost opportunity for his vindication by presenting myself voluntarily for the same trial to which the Church would have power to summon me, if I were a member: a suggestion which (judging from my past experience) will subject me afresh to the unjust imputation of reviving a scandal for the suppression of which I have made more sacrifices than all other persons.

Between these two alternatives—which are all that the Moderator leaves to me—and which are both equally repugnant to my feelings—duty requires me to choose the second.

I therefore give you notice that if the Pastor, or the Examining Committee, or the Church as a body, desire to repossess the opportunity which the Moderator laments that you have thrown away, I hereby restore to you this lost opportunity as freely as if you had never parted with it.

I authorize you (if such be your pleasure) to cite me at any time within the next thirty days to appear at the bar of Plymouth Church for trial on the charge heretofore made against me, namely, that of "circulating and promoting scandals derogatory to the Christian integrity of the pastor and injurious to the reputation of the Church."

My only stipulation concerning the trial is that it shall not be held with closed doors, nor in the absence of the pastor.

I regret keenly that the Moderator has imposed on me the necessity for making this communication, for nothing but necessity would extort it.

The practical good which I seek to achieve by this proposition is that whether accepted or declined, it will in either case effectually put an end forever to the Moderator's grave charge that Plymouth Church has been deprived through me of an opportunity to vindicate its pastor, or that its pastor has been by any act of mine deprived of an opportunity to vindicate himself.

Truly yours,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 79."]

THE CHURCH COMMITTEE AND KINDRED TOPICS.

Q. When did you first hear of the appointment of a Committee of Plymouth Church to inquire into this scandal?

A. I first heard of it one evening, about ten o'clock, from Mrs. Tilton, who had come in—

Q. Well, don't state what she said. Do you know what day of the month it was? A. I think it was in the early part of the week that began with the 5th, 6th or 7th of July; shortly after the 4th of July; a few days after.

Q. Was the correspondence, at that time, published which called the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. It had not yet been published? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long after that event, that is to say, when you first heard that there was a Committee, was that correspondence published? A. Several days afterwards. The correspondence, I remember, which called the Committee into action was published on the 11th of July—Saturday morning, the 11th of July; I believe I am accurate in that date—1874.

Mr. Fullerton—I offer in evidence the correspondence which resulted in the appointment of that Committee [reading]:

BROOKLYN, June 27, 1874.

GENTLEMEN: In the present state of public feeling I owe it to my friends and to the Church and the Society over which I am pastor to have some proper investigation made of the rumors, insinuations or charges made respecting my conduct as compromised by the late publication made by Mr. Tilton. I have thought that both the Church and the Society should be represented; and I take the liberty of asking the following gentlemen to serve in this inquiry and to do that which truth and justice may require; and I beg each of the gentlemen named will consider this as if it had been separately and personally sent to him; namely:

From the Church—Henry W. Sage, Augustus Storrs and Henry M. Cleveland.

From the Society—Horace B. Clafin, John Winalow and S. V. White.

I desire you, when you have satisfied yourselves by an impartial and thorough examination of all sources of evidence, to communicate to the Examining Committee or to the Church such action as then may seem to you right and wise.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 80."]

Q. When did you first know of the existence of that letter?

A. I first saw that letter in print on the morning of July the 11th, Saturday, if I am correct as to the date. I saw either that letter or a similar letter in manuscript the night before, in the hands of Mr. Henry M. Cleveland, on the occasion of my first appearance before the Committee, the Committee being then an exclusively private body, its existence not having been heralded to the public.

Q. And when did you first know of the existence of the Committee? A. I first learned of the existence of the Committee in the early part of that week, I think, or several days previous.

Q. How long after the date of this letter, June 27, 1874? A. I think the day on which I learned of the existence of the Committee was possibly July 6th or July 8th, and this letter was dated June 27. It must have been nearly two weeks.

Q. Up to that time had your wife remained under your roof? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did she leave? A. She left on the morning of the publication of that correspondence by Mr. Beecher, informing the world that he had appointed a Committee.

Q. That was July the 11th, I understand? A. I believe that was July the 11th.

Q. As near as you can recollect? A. That is the best of my recollection. It was a Saturday morning.

Q. Did she leave with your consent? A. No, Sir.

Q. Against your will? A. She left early in the morning.

Q. How early? A. She did not leave against my will, Sir. No, Sir; because she was a free, sovereign actor in the business. She never did anything against my will. She had a will of her own and acted according to it.

Q. But it was not at your request? A. No, Sir.

Q. Consent? A. It was not with my consent. It was to my great surprise and grief. At the same time I did not undertake to restrain her, Mr. Fullerton. I never applied any coercion to her any way.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the generalities, if your Honor please, are not evidence. I ask that they be struck out.

Judge Neilson—No, they are not—the simple fact that he did not try to restrain her.

Mr. Evarts—That he never applied any coercion to her on any subject, is not evidence.

Q. Now, I want to ask a few miscellaneous questions. Do you recollect the proposed report to the Committee of Investigation that has been put in evidence? A. Well, Sir, there were three or four proposed reports, all of which I believe have been put in evidence, one by Mr. Beecher and two by me.

Q. The one that you prepared for the Committee? A. I prepared two for the Committee.

Q. There is only one in evidence, however? A. Ah! I beg your pardon, Sir.

Q. I limit my question to the proposed report for the Committee, in evidence. Is that the short one or the long one? A. It is the short one.

Q. It is the short one. I want you to state under what circumstances the short report was prepared? A. The circumstances were these. Mrs. Tilton came home one evening, and informed me that she had been down—I beg pardon for not addressing the jury—Mrs. Tilton came home one evening about 10 o'clock and informed me—this was the 6th or 8th of July—informed me that she had been down to a Committee of Plymouth Church, and I asked what committee. She said a Committee to inquire into my letter to Dr. Bacon, to do away with the scandal, and she said that she had denied everything—blotted it all out.

AN OLD TECHNICAL QUESTION REVIVED.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, the occasion of his preparing this report may, perhaps, justify an allusion to what passed between him and his wife as the basis of that, but that occasion does not give the right to detail conversations between himself and his wife.

Judge Neilson—So I think, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, this interruption should have come a little earlier, Sir; but if any of it is stricken out, what has been taken in regard wholly to that interview should be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Well, it fixes the occasion; that is the effect of it.

Mr. Fullerton—It is certainly proper and important that this jury should be informed of the circumstances which led to the preparation of that report, because it cannot be properly understood unless those circumstances are proved.

Judge Neilson—One is the circumstance that she had been before the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; another is that she had informed him that she had denied the whole thing.

Judge Neilson—I don't think you can give that.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, that is the gist of the whole affair.

Mr. Evarts—That is already in evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—The report was based upon that fact.

Mr. Evarts—That is all in evidence. That I have not objected to. That is an occasion. I don't know, of course, what did pass between this gentleman and his wife afterwards, only it is not a matter that by fixing an occasion by an introduction to the report, gives an opportunity to go on and give a conversation between them.

Judge Neilson—I think not, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I think it should go no further—that is, no further in respect to the conversation.

Judge Neilson—I think he can say, after giving the conversation, that in consequence of what was said he was led—if that was one of the circumstances that led him—to make the report.

Mr. Fullerton—Then it will not appear that this report was the natural result of what was communicated to him.

Judge Neilson—I think he can say that in consequence of what was communicated to him he was led to the idea of making this report, without giving the conversation; then you have it.

Mr. Fullerton—The report may be a non sequitur. It may not be the natural result of the conversation. It may be thus argued. It is certainly proper for us to show the basis of that report, the information that was communicated to him, because if he is to be judged by the act, then, as a matter of course, it ought to be in the light of surrounding circumstances.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; but we cannot take the conversation between them, in my judgment.

Mr. Evarts—The substantive fact that she told him that she had been before the Council and denied all the charges, is already in. That is sufficient foundation, it seems to me.

Judge Neilson—You will agree with the counsel in that, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—The counsel says that the substantive fact that she had been before the Council and denied the charges is already in. That covers the fact.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; not by any means. We either want the whole or none. They cannot wait until a part of it is out and then object to the balance.

Judge Neilson—You cannot take the conversation any further, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I suppose it all goes out.

Judge Neilson—Oh, no! I think it stands where it is. It appears now that she communicated the fact that she had been before the Committee and denied all the charges.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, but I want what further she said. I want to show why she denied them, the reasons that she gave for it. Why, it cannot be that this conversation is to be chipped in two suddenly in that way, and the reason that she gave for denying this story before the Committee not given.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take it.

Mr. Beach—Why, your Honor, is it permissible for counsel upon the other side to permit us to examine in regard to a conversation between Mr. Tilton and his wife, and allow them to proceed to a certain stage and then object; and your Honor excludes what follows, and they retain the portion that has been given? Is that possible? If it is improper for us to give the balance of this conversation, it was improper for us to give any of it; but counsel sat quiet while the witness upon the stand was detailing this conversation between himself and his wife, until it reached a particular point where they desired to get the fact that Mrs. Tilton upon that occasion said that she denied before the Committee the whole of the fact, and then object and shut out the answer which Mr. Tilton made to that announcement that she had given the denial. Your Honor surely will not permit that injustice to be practiced. The counsel should have objected the moment we entered upon this conversation if he intended to raise the question of its inadmissibility, and not allow it to proceed to a particular stage where it was favorable to them, and when we ask to give the answer—the explanation on the part of Mr. Tilton—then to exclude that. The whole must be given, or the whole stricken out, I submit to your Honor.

Judge Neilson—It may be hard, Sir, but I think the objection must be sustained at the point where it was made.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not a question of whether the objection should be sustained. The question is whether the whole conversation is to go out, inasmuch as the balance of it—

Judge Neilson—There has been no motion to strike out as yet.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, it is my suggestion, that if they deprive us of the benefit of the whole of the conversation, that the part of it already given in evidence should go out with it.

Mr. Evarts—Do you make a motion to strike it out?

Mr. Fullerton—I make that suggestion to the Court.

Mr. Evarts—Until you make the motion I won't discuss it.

Mr. Beach—Well, we do make the motion, Sir. Your Honor ruling that we can go no further with the conversation, we now move to strike out that which has been given.

Mr. Evarts—To strike out the whole?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, some criticism has been made on my position. Will the stenographer be so good as to read the question which was asked to this witness?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows: "I want you to state under what circumstances the short report was prepared?"

Mr. Evarts—Now, is there anything in that question that I ought not to have objected to? When my learned friends ask a question of this witness, saying, "State a conversation between yourself and your wife," and I sit still and allow him to go on with the conversation, then it will be time enough to criticize me for stopping him and not letting him go through.

Mr. Beach—Well, that was just the criticism in which I indulged.

Mr. Evarts—I know you did; but your question was not that Your question was, "Under what circumstances was this paper prepared?" and under that he starts off to give as an inducement to the paper a communication of a situation, before this Committee, of his wife.

Judge Neilson—That was probably directed to the commencement of the circumstances under which the witness prepared it.

Mr. Evarts—Any circumstances. Now, any other circumstances can be given—such as, after that this was done or that was done—that is, if they come from parties that are properly before us. It is not a criticism upon me for allowing a part of the conversation thus asked for. It will be time enough, I say, when a question is asked or a conversation, to say if I will allow a part of it I might allow the whole. But the question was of the circumstances—in respect to an inducement. Then I say, "Do not, under cover of that, go on and narrate a conversation between husband and wife."

Mr. Beach—The issue between us, Sir, cannot be avoided by the gentleman. I say that he sat still while this witness detailed a very considerable part of a conversation between himself and his wife, and that it was the duty of the gentleman, if he intended to object to any part of that interview, to interpose the objection when the narrative on the part of the witness commenced, and that it is unjust and illegal to permit the half of that conversation to be given until it reaches the point so far satisfactory to the counsel upon the other side, and when they apprehend that the remaining portion of it will be unfavorable to their interest, then to shut the mouth of the witness by an objection, I say it is untimely and inadmissible; but if, under the ruling of your Honor, the objection is to be sustained, that the whole conversation should be given—that it cannot thus be mangled and misrepresented—in its true scope and effect to place the party who offers it in a disadvantageous position—if your Honor will permit me, Sir, a moment, I think I can refer to authorities upon the subject. I do not wish to detain the Court, Sir, but I will present it to your Honor hereafter.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will proceed, Mr. Fullerton, reserving this until I can hear the counsel further on the subject; I would be very happy to hear him, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will bear in mind while considering it, that this report was not written because Mrs. Tilton made that declaration (that she denied the whole story), but the report was written and presented for other reasons, which will be manifest when that conversation is divulged. I will pass to another topic. [To the witness.] Did Mr. Beecher ever inform you who published the tripartite agreement? A. I do not remember that the publication of it was made a matter of talk between us, other than that the fact of its publication needed an answer. I know who published it.

Q. Well, did you learn it from him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or, was it ever spoken of in any conversation between you and him? A. I do not remember that it was. It was published by Mr. Wilkeson and Mr. Cleveland.

Judge Neilson—He did not ask who it was published by.
The Witness—I beg your pardon, Sir.

A LITTLE HISTORY OF BESSIE TURNER.

Q. Mr. Tilton, who was Bessie Turner? A. She was a little girl who came to our house; I cannot well remember how many years ago, under the name of Lizzie McDermott; I should think perhaps—well I should have to guess—a dozen or fifteen years ago. She was a little waif of a thing. If you wish me to state something about her—

Q. Well, under what circumstances did she come in your family; from whence did she come? A. My impression is that, in some way or other, through an old Sunday-school teacher either of myself or of Mrs. Tilton's; indeed I—my present recollection is that Mr. Libby, of the firm of A. T. Stewart & Co., knew something of her. I won't be accurate; I would not undertake to substantiate that, however. She came there through Mrs. Tilton's invitation, I believe, just as it might be given to any servant, any girl—any office boy—came there to help do the work of the house, take care of the children.

Q. And how long did she reside with you? A. I do not know whether she resided continuously at our house until 1870 or not; I think that in the Summer of 1870 she was away in the West at Mrs. Putnam's house, at Marietta, but at all events, the period of her residence at our house must have terminated somewhere in 1870. Then she came back from the West with Mrs. Tilton and was a day or two at the house; and then she was sent off to school by Mr. Beecher.

Q. What time? A. She was sent off two or three weeks after the writing of what is called the letter of contrition.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Mr. Beecher in regard to her absence at that time? A. In regard to her absence?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. The only conversation I have ever had with Mr. Beecher on the subject has been from time to time to answer an occasional question whether or not she was prattling or making mischievous talk.

Q. Where was she when those conversations occurred? A. Where was she?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. She was away in Ohio, at school.

Q. At school? Now, who made the arrangements for her departure? A. Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Moulton together.

Q. Do you recollect the time of her leaving? A. I think she left very speedily after Mr. Beecher sent me his letter through Mr. Moulton; some time in January, 1871.

Q. Some time in January, 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I want to ask you this general question, whether, from first to last, Mr. Beecher ever denied the criminal intercourse with Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir. [After a pause.] I would like to amend that answer, Mr. Fullerton, by saying that whenever he spoke of it he always said that the criminality attached to him alone and not to Mrs. Tilton; always insisted that she had not been to blame; he was the person on whom the condemnation should fall.

Mr. Evarts—Well I object to that last, if your Honor please, as not responsive to the question, and if it is intended to draw it out, to its being made the subject of a question. The question was fully answered; it was a very plain one. It was not whether he had ever denied the criminal intercourse of Mrs. Tilton with him, but whether he had ever denied criminal intercourse of his with Mrs. Tilton, if a distinction is sought to be established.

Mr. Fullerton—It is a proper piece of evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I am not yet through. And, if your Honor please, it is a piece of evidence which if sought to be extracted by a question, I should object to—the question. It is not responsive, and if it is not a proper subject of evidence, why then it must not be introduced. It must be shut out at present and introduced by some question to which I will object. I have a right to object to answers, when they come out not responsive to a question.

The Witness—I would like the—

Mr. Evarts—And the generality of such testimony, of course, is inadmissible. It is inadmissible to say that he always said so and so, because it does not mean what he always said, I suppose, even in that sense. At any rate the proper way is to give evidence of what he said and when he said it, etc., and then we will judge of its connection. I ask your Honor that it should be struck out. If my learned friend thinks he is entitled to draw it in, why, then, let it be drawn in by some question that will raise the point.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose it is a proper piece of evidence, and it makes no difference whether it is in response to a question put directly for the purpose of extracting it or whether it is given as it was given by the witness. The manner in which Mr. Beecher spoke of that intimacy is competent proof. If he took the blame all upon himself and excused the lady, why it is proper that we should know that fact. It is hardly worth while to call his attention to the various conversations that he had with Mr. Beecher upon that subject, to know the particular words that he used to convey that idea, so long as that idea was conveyed.

Judge Neilson—I think we will let it stand. The learned counsel has the benefit of an objection to it substantially as if the question were put in form.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; I move to strike it out and your Honor overrules the motion.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—I move to strike out the last clause.

Judge Neilson—The last clause, yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—We except to the refusal.

Mr. Fullerton—I will call your attention again to Bessie Turner. What was her age when she left you in 1871? A. I don't think that any of us knew her age.

Judge Neilson—Well, about; as near as you can guess.

Mr. Fullerton—Judging from her appearance what would you say her age was? A. When she left us in 1871?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Well, I should have to guess; I should say 15 or 16, perhaps.

Q. Not older than that? A. I don't know; I think not.

Q. How? A. I think not; I don't know how old she was; perhaps she might have been older.

Q. Did she act in the capacity of a servant in the family while she was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have heard during the progress of this case, something said in regard to improper conduct on your part in connection with that girl. Now, I wish to ask you in reference to that, did anything occur such as is shadowed forth in the testimony, namely, that you went to her bedroom in the night and took her screaming from her room to your own bed? A. There is not a word of truth in it, Sir, nor any fact to found it upon; pure fiction.

Q. Anything improper ever take place between you and her? A. No, Sir; I never showed her anything but kindness during all the years of her residence in my house.

THE DISCUSSION RENEWED.

Mr. Fullerton here asked Mr. Beach in regard to the authority which he had undertaken to read to the Court.

Mr. Beach—At this instant I am not able to lay my hand upon the authority, but can when I have an opportunity at the library. But I find an intimation of the rule under the commentary in Cowen and Hill's Notes upon the question of secondary evidence, where secondary evidence is offered, the primary not being present. And Mr. Edwards, the commentator on the original text of Cowen and Hill's Notes, says:

"We have seen that where secondary evidence is offered it must be objected to in season, or its competency cannot be questioned," etc., referring to variety of authorities.

"It has been held too late to object if the testimony on the side of the party offering the secondary evidence is closed. The objection should be made when the evidence is offered, so as to afford the party an opportunity of obviating it."

Though this does not meet the precise question, Sir, or give the true reasons for exacting a timely objection where incompetent evidence is offered, yet I submit to your Honor it is a parallel rule of evidence. I do not care to repeat to your Honor the suggestions which I urged upon you before; that it is highly unjust to permit evidence which may be objectionable to be in part received, especially to the extent to which the narrative of this witness as to the interview between himself and his wife was offered, and then by an objection, after resting until he had got sufficient of the interview to satisfy his purpose, shut out the explanatory portions of the interview which followed. Now, the defendant, by resting upon his objection, has permitted us to proceed in the detail of that interview to the Court and the jury so far as to get a communication by Mrs. Tilton to him that on appearing before the Committee she denied the whole charge. And there we are interrupted and we are not permitted to give the reply which was made by Mr. Tilton, or the subsequent declarations of Mrs. Tilton, showing the reasons why she made that denial, or perhaps qualifying the character of the communication that she made to Mr. Tilton. We submit to your Honor that we should be permitted to give the whole of that interview, or else that the part which has been given should be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—I should be very sorry to deprive you of any right you have in the matter, and the question can be held until you have an opportunity to look at it.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir, that will do.

Mr. Fullerton—I intended to put in those reports after that question was determined. It is a little embarrassing to continue that line of investigation without having this question disposed of; however, I will endeavor to do so. I will hand the short report to the witness and ask him a further question in regard to it. [Paper handed to the witness]. Look at "Exhibit No. 50" and state whether you recognize it as one of the reports alluded to? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I understand it has been marked for identification, but never put in.

Mr. Fullerton—What did you do with that report—"Exhibit No. 50?" A. I think I showed this report, and also another, to Gen. Tracy, who told me that—

Mr. Evarts—That we object to.

Judge Neilson—You must not tell what he said, Sir.

Q. What did you do with the report?

Mr. Evarts—If Mr. Beecher is to be affected when—

Mr. Fullerton—It is shut out.

Mr. Evarts—I am not speaking of the answer he was making, but of the general inquiry. There is evidence about this report given by Mr. Moulton?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Under which it has been received in evidence. Now, whatever this witness can properly bring into the evidence now must be received from something that has passed between him and Mr. Beecher, concerning it, I suppose.

Judge Neilson—That is so, certainly, as to conversations. He may, nevertheless, state what he did by way of showing an act, as that he put it in, or did something with it.

GEN. TRACY'S ADVICE ADMITTED.

Mr. Fullerton—What did you do with the report?

A. I put this report and the other into the hands of Mr. Moulton, in pursuance of a suggestion from Gen. Tracy.

Mr. Evarts—That part I object to—"in pursuance of a suggestion."

Judge Neilson—Strike out the "in pursuance."

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, it is a part of the res gestæ.

Judge Neilson—Oh! no. He put that in the hands of Mr. Moulton; that is all you inquired for.

Mr. Fullerton—May I not ask at whose suggestion?

Judge Neilson—It is not material, I think.

Mr. Evarts—No; not unless it was ours.

Mr. Fullerton—In the first place I would not put the question to you; I did not ask for your suggestion.

Mr. Evarts—Our parties I mean.

The Witness—Mr. Tracy said if I made any report short of charging—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind what Mr. Tracy said; it is ruled out. Under what circumstances did you prepare that report? A. Under a suggestion from Gen. Tracy.

Q. I put the question now—what was that suggestion? Don't answer it.

Mr. Evarts—That we object to.

Judge Neilson—I think it is sufficiently in that he made the suggestion at that time.

Mr. Fullerton—Had you at the time of the preparation of that report heard that any evidence had been given before the Committee? A. I had only heard that Mrs. Tilton had been before the Committee—

Q. Had you heard what evidence she had given? A. Gen. Tracy had told me.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Sir, I propose to show what General Tracy told him in regard to that. I will put the question. What did General Tracy tell you in respect to the evidence that had been given before the Committee when you prepared that report? You need not answer.

The Witness—You say I need not answer?

Mr. Fullerton—No; it is objected to, I suppose.

Judge Neilson—I do not think it has been objected to. Ascertain if it is objected to.

Mr. Everts—(after consultation)—We see no foundation for any such question as this, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Do I understand you to object to it?

Mr. Everts—We object.

Judge Neilson—I think you cannot give it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it seems hard, Sir, that Mr. Tilton should be judged by a paper which he drew, without letting in the circumstances under which he drew it, the information which he had received which led to it. His information was received from a person intimately connected with that investigation. Your Honor has learned during the progress of this case that there was a movement made every now and then, for the purpose of accomplishing some object, without developing the truth. What was done was to cover up the truth and not to expose it. Now, if Mr. Tilton, for the purpose of accomplishing any object like that which was in harmony with the wish of all parties concerned, and interested in the question, has prepared a paper, why then surely he ought to be judged by the paper and the circumstances together.

Judge Neilson—I think you have it—

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—I think the motive in preparing it is plain enough from all the evidence. It has been spoken of before, you know, by another witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir. It has been spoken about before by another witness, but that witness was not qualified to speak of the motives which actuated the writer. He alone can speak of those.

Mr. Beach (to Mr. Fullerton)—Why, Mr. Moulton gave that interview. It is in evidence.

Mr. Fullerton (after consultation with Mr. Beach)—I am reminded by my associate of the testimony of Mr. Moulton upon that subject, which had escaped me for the moment.

Judge Neilson—I think he explained it.

Mr. Fullerton—Then is there any objection to having it explained twice? I didn't know that it was improper because it had been once given in evidence. Mr. Moulton testifies that Mr. Tilton was much softened in his feelings by what Mr. Tracy revealed to him as to the nature of the testimony given by Mrs. Tilton before that Examining Committee, and in order to effect her purpose—the purpose that she had in view, in denying the truth of the story which was afloat, and which had led to the investigation—I say, in harmony with that he prepared this report for the purpose of covering up this great scandal.

Judge Neilson—That is your inference from your comprehension of the whole evidence so far. You think that is properly drawn from the evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—Properly drawn from what I know is in the mind of this witness and from the evidence he can give if it is permitted.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor is under an entire misapprehension in regard to the testimony of Mr. Moulton. It was called out by the other side that Mr. Tilton, being highly incensed at the appearance of his wife before the Committee, was bent upon some hostile action; that he then had an interview, in the presence of Mr. Moulton, with Mr. Tracy, and Mr. Tracy then represented to him the character of his wife's evidence, so that he was mollified and softened, and was induced to prepare this report. Now, they gave him evidence the interview at which Mr. Tilton was present, and now—Mr. Tilton being on the stand—we ask him to detail that interview—the same thing—the same subject matter which they gave in evidence, and it certainly is not objectionable as cumulative evidence.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Beach—And they having introduced the interview and the facts which there occurred, certainly we are not precluded from proving the same interview by another witness.

Judge Neilson—Well, then, call his attention to the interview and then learn—

Mr. Beach—That is just what we are trying to do, Sir.

Judge Neilson—No, no; learn if he was induced to prepare this report in that way.

Mr. Fullerton—That question covers the exact ground on which I have already put it.

Mr. Everts—We would like to be pointed to the evidence that is said to have come in on our examination, if that is the basis of the allegation.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will take it on that basis.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the Witness.] Now, under what circumstances did you prepare that short report?

Mr. Everts—If your Honor please, we don't assent to that.

Judge Neilson—No; your objection is noted.

Mr. Everts—No; but it is a question of fact, not of law. We only ask that we may be referred to the evidence upon our part that is now claimed.

Judge Neilson—My recollection is general that there was evidence of that character.

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir; but it was on their own part.

Judge Neilson—I don't recollect who called it out.

Mr. Everts—That is the very point I want to be satisfied on. Your Honor allows the evidence. We must make our objection.

Judge Neilson—Well, proceed.

Mr. Everts—Note an exception to its admission.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, if that report was drawn by you in consequence of any communication made to you by Mr. Tracy, of which Mr. Moulton spoke in his testimony, you go on and state it.

Mr. Evarts—That question I object to, if your Honor please, Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I had two interviews with Gen. Tracy; two or three.

Judge Neilson—Come to the one mentioned by Mr. Moulton, if you recollect it.

Mr. Evarts—With reference to this statement

The Witness—I think Mr. Moulton mentioned all those interviews because they all had reference to the same thing.

Mr. Beach—Yes, he did mention them all.

Mr. Evarts—They hadn't all reference to this paper.

Mr. Beach—Well, we want to give this evidence in regard to this interview of which Mr. Moulton spoke.

Judge Neilson—As leading to this paper.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, in reference to anything.

Mr. Evarts—Very well, I object.

Mr. Beach—That is your right.

Mr. Evarts—The only ruling has been that you had a right to call his attention to what passed leading to the preparation of this paper.

Judge Neilson—As a circumstance leading to its preparation.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, this paper or any other.

GEN. TRACY AS A PEACE-MAKER.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, go on and state. A. Gen. Tracy told me that I need have no anxiety concerning the formation of a Committee; that Mrs. Tilton had gone down to the Committee, at Mr. Ovington's house; that previous to the assembling of it, he, Gen. Tracy, had instructed her what to say and how to say it—put the questions to her, that she might make no blunders in answering them; that when she came before the Committee she astonished and surprised all of them with her eloquent allusions to her pastor and to her husband; that she denied everything; that there had been any wrong between herself and Mr. Beecher, or that there had been any proposal of wrong by him towards her, or that there was any foundation whatever for the scandal; and Gen. Tracy, in making this narration, wept. [Laughter.] He said he never had witnessed such a spectacle in his life. "Now," said he, "if you take right advantage of Mrs. Tilton's appearance before that Committee, and of the tender hearts of those gentlemen towards all the parties in the case, and particularly towards you," he said, meaning myself, "now is an opportunity to suppress the scandal forever. It is a woman's right," he says, "to deny it; let her deny it; let her stand on the denial. Now, coöperate with that denial, and it can be made a success." What Gen. Tracy said to me made a great impression on my mind. I said: "If there is any chance of saving Elizabeth, or of saving her name and fair fame, and blotting out the scandal on her name forever, I will be only too glad to coöperate with it." I told Gen. Tracy I would like him to explain to me what the method of procedure would be by the Committee. He said something like this: "There are a number of gentlemen, and they can summon whom they choose. They can summon Mr. Beecher, and he can say what he chooses, little or much; they can summon Mrs. Tilton, and she can say what she chooses, little or much; they can summon you, and you can say what you choose, little or much, and the Committee will be bound to make their report, not on the basis of the truth, for they won't inquire enough to get the truth; they will be bound to make their report on the basis of what those people choose to put down before them, and what you will choose to put down before them; only," he said, "a proper, gentlemanly and respectful report would be to the advantage of all parties." That was Gen. Tracy's language. I told him I would coöperate with the plan.

Judge Neilson—Thereupon what did he do? A. What did Gen. Tracy do?

Judge Neilson—That is my suggestion to you: Thereupon what did he do?

Mr. Fullerton—The "thereupon" don't quite come in quite yet, if you please. [Laughter.]

The Witness—Gen. Tracy then asked me what sort of a report would satisfy me, what kind of a report I would stand by. I told him I would stand by any report which did me no injustice, and which reinstated Elizabeth. "Well," said he, "all I want you to bear in mind is this: you may make any kind of report you choose which don't charge Mr. Beecher with adultery, or with any such crime as that he cannot maintain his pulpit. Make the offense anything you choose, and I will procure the passage of the report, only," said he, "of course the Committee could not bring in a report that he was guilty of adultery, or of anything that compromised his character and standing as a clergyman. Make a report of that kind, and you can make it ad libitum, according to your own wish and will." In accordance with that suggestion I made two drafts of that report. This [referring to the written report the witness held in his hand] is one, and the other is the long one.

Q. Now, look at the other one. Is that the other report you spoke of. "Exhibit D, 45?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Why were two reports prepared at that time? A. The first one which I prepared I dictated to Mrs. Tilton. This is it.

Q. That is "Exhibit D, 45?" A. Yes, Sir, the long one; I read it to Gen. Tracy, and he said that some alterations, or suggested that some alterations, might be made for its improvement. I then thought that, perhaps, if the Committee's proceedings were to be made public—

Mr. Evarts—No matter what you thought.

The Witness—That a brief report would be better, and I prepared this.

Mr. Fullerton—You wrote a brief report? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—And thereupon you were led to make the brief report? A. Yes, Sir; I presented both reports to Mr. Moulton, and said that I would be satisfied with either, but that Mrs. Tilton was more pleased with this one, the large one.

THE QUESTION OF DAMAGES.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, I desire to give in evidence, before the case is closed, some correspondence which took place between Mrs. and Mr. Tilton within a year, probably, next preceding July, 1870.

Judge Neilson—On the question of damages?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; so as to show the relations existing between them. I suppose I can find that correspondence in a moment, probably.

Judge Neilson—You can refer to that, and put it in when you find it.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, I wish to ask that privilege. If a little time is given us, I can shorten the examination considerably.

Judge Neilson—In the meantime you can refer to this other question, if Judge Beach thinks proper to consider it further.

Mr. Fullerton—That closes the direct examination.

Mr. Everts—We would rather not, if your Honor please, proceed with the cross-examination until this very important part of it, to wit, the correspondence which is named, is given in evidence.

Judge Neilson—That will relate to another question.

Mr. Everts—No, Sir; with great respect to your Honor, that is an important matter; it is a part of the substantive relations between the husband and wife, running through a year, and evidenced by written communications.

Judge Neilson—But bearing upon the question of damages.

Mr. Everts—I don't understand that to be the purpose.

Judge Neilson—I understood it so.

Mr. Beach—Of course.

Judge Neilson—Their right to introduce the correspondence would be with reference to that question, the question of damages, up to the time of the proposed offense.

Mr. Everts—It is a part of their right in the action to show certain relations between the parties in the suit, and the degree of impression that comes from the proof is to be disclosed when the proof is in; but your Honor sees that is an important thing for us to know, although they may have the motive of damages, yet the correspondence may be important to us in other relations as bearing upon the question of principal proof on the principal issue, which, of course, affects the character and conduct of these parties; and this plaintiff being the witness, I think your Honor will see that parties have a right to be more imperative than usual in inquiring in regard to it.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to have the direct examination closed before the cross-examination is commenced, if you think proper.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor please consider that the correspondence to which we refer embraces a bundle of about that magnitude. [Referring to a bundle of papers in the hands of counsel.]

Mr. Morris—Oh! three times that.

Judge Neilson—You should make some selection.

Mr. Beach—We don't propose to introduce the whole of that correspondence. What we want is an opportunity to select from it such portions of different dates, giving their general character, as will support our view of those relations. Now, will your Honor permit me to say that all we require from this witness is the simple identification of the papers. He gives no substantive evidence himself beyond that, and it is a matter entirely within the discretion of your Honor whether that branch of the examination shall be suspended until a future occasion. It is quite evident, if your Honor please, that this correspondence can have no possible relation to this case, except upon the question of damages.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Beach—For whatever may be the result which this correspondence may show between the parties, even if it was hostile, and quarrelsome, and restrained, I don't understand that that affects the principal question, or would justify Henry Ward Beecher in seducing the plaintiff's wife.

Judge Neilson—Oh! no; it would not go to that question at all.

Mr. Beach—It is only to the question of damages.

Judge Neilson—It is a question now of mere economy whether the counsel cannot consent to proceed with the cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—I will make this proposition to the other side. I can have this correspondence ready to-morrow morning, and can have the letters identified and put in evidence, so that they can proceed to cross-examine whenever they see fit.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Everts.] I think that will save your rights. It might be an economy of time to do so.

Mr. Everts—The difficulty is this: we have made no suggestion that quarrelsome couples should have their privacy invaded by anybody. My only proposition is that I wish to have all the evidence that is to be produced from this witness before the Court before I cross-examine him. I do not know how much any future evidence may be affected by my cross-examination, and though we are very unwilling to put our learned friends to inconvenience, yet they have had possession of these papers always, the parties and themselves, and they can go on with another witness, or they can have an adjournment, if they wish. I do not now propose, by any consent of my own, to undertake to examine him, or to have this witness examined upon our part unless he is through on his own part, and your Honor, I think—

Judge Neilson—I recognize that fact, if you think it proper to hold to it.

Mr. Beach—We will occupy the time of your Honor, by identifying every one of them. We will introduce them by and bye.

Mr. Everts—You will introduce them before I cross-examine him.

Mr. Beach—No, we won't introduce them before you cross-examine him.

Mr. Everts—Then, we will see.

Mr. Beach—Then, we will see.

Judge Neilson—I think it would be better to agree upon a theory that will save time.

Mr. Beach—I quite agree with that suggestion, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—I think before they finish the cross-examination they ought to see these letters.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor won't compel us to produce our evidence until we are prepared to produce it. I suppose your Honor will recognize our right to identify the papers, and then produce what will seem proper to us.

Judge Neilson—I don't say the contrary of that, but they would still have the right to cross-examine him on any paper you introduce.

Mr. Beach—Certainly they can, when we introduce it, but they cannot compel us to introduce it now.

Mr. Everts—Well, that depends—

Judge Neilson—Proceed, gentlemen, and identify your papers; it may take time.

Mr. Fullerton—It will take time, if your Honor please, for there are some hundred of them, not over a score of which do we propose to introduce.

Mr. Beach—Oh! not so many.

Mr. Everts—[To plaintiff's counsel.] Well, gentlemen, we have nothing to do with your case.

Mr. Fullerton—I am very thankful for that.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Everts.] But we have considerable to do with yours.

Mr. Fullerton—I have sent for the letters. They will be here in a moment.

Judge Neilson—[To the Jury.] Gentlemen of the Jury: In order to economize time, and to give these gentlemen an opportunity to select papers, those that are found to be proper, we will take our recess now, and until half-past one o'clock.

Mr. Beach—That won't help us.

Judge Neilson—Yes; you can select them in that time.

Mr. Beach—We cannot do it; we cannot go over 200 or 300 letters in that time, and at the same time get reasonable refreshments.

Judge Neilson—Can you proceed with another witness, and let this witness stand aside until to-morrow morning?

Mr. Beach—We can do it, if your Honor will give us the usual time of adjournment, until 3 o'clock.

Judge Neilson—Do you mean from now until 3 o'clock?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Will the officer see that that place is cleared. The jury will remain in their seats. [To the jury.] Gentlemen, please be in your seats at 3 o'clock.

MRS. TILTON'S LETTERS TO HER HUSBAND.

The Court met at 2 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment, and the direct examination of Mr. Tilton was continued.

Mr. Fullerton—At what time did you usually go away on your lecture season? A. Sometimes in October, and sometimes in November.

Q. And how long would you generally be absent from home? A. Sometimes until February or March.

Q. Succeeding? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you in the habit of visiting home in the interim? A. I was, whenever my engagements would permit me to come home. The season ordinarily occupied about from seventy to eighty engagements, inclusive of Saturday nights.

Q. And during this absence, did you correspond with your wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently did you write to her usually? A. Excuse me, what was your question?

Q. How frequently did you write to her usually? A. Oh! I always wrote to her every day.

Q. And how frequently did she write to you? A. Every day, I think. There may have been occasional exceptions. That was the rule.

Q. Every day? A. I wrote to her every day, and she wrote to me every day. That was the rule of correspondence.

Q. [Handing letters to witness.] State whether those are some of the letters written to you by your wife during your absence in 1897? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I offers these letters in evidence. [Reading:]

AT YOUR DESK—MONDAY, JAN. 7th, 1897.

MY PRECIOUS HUSBAND: I find our language very poor in superlatives when I attempt to describe my soul's love. What a delicious way you have of rebuking and reaching me! I will never again forget to date my letters, be sure, yet as I have written daily to you I supposed you would receive them in regular succession, and it did not occur to me that the date was always necessary.

And then, my sweet, will you talk to me as you write? pretending always that you think I am the loveliest and best of little wives.

My bump of approbateness is so thoroughly satisfied when you praise me—tho' it be true or not, I am content. I go singing and light-hearted about my work, every difficulty is straightened, and life is sweet.

Yes, darling, I will join you in your New Year resolution, as far as possible. I will go hand in hand with you, yet you know your strides will far outreach mine.

Skipping a part, she says: "What a blessing you are to me in every way. Mrs. Belcher made a long call on me to-day, and sent much love to you. Mattie and Katy Bradshaw also called. Please mention Mr. Ovington in some of your letters, it would so gratify him that you remembered him. I bless God for your continued good health. Do not go to places off the railroad, where you must expose yourself by long rides. You cannot afford to risk your precious life thus. The little girls I'm afraid are going to have their wish by having the whooping cough; they cough dreadfully. Good-night, love. Shall we ever be done with our caressings, when this long waiting is ended? Yours entirely,

ELIZABETH.

Mr. Fullerton [reading]:

THE SHIP'S CABIN, AT MY DESK, JANUARY 9th, 1897.

MY BELOVED: It is quite time you should have a little insight into the manner in which I am using your hard wrought earnings. I sent you a list of my receipts and outlays since your departure. My heart is sick at the figures, while I make confession with shame and sorrow that I can do no better in my situation.

Had my bumps of benevolence and approbateness been smaller, then would I more nearly realize your ideal! Yet I could change the color of my eyes as well as change in these respects, I fear.

Journey's bill, White & Nichols's, Valentine & Bergen's, Roland Johnson and others have sent in again at the New Year, so I have thought it necessary to ask of Mr. Storrs their amount, as you said I might do. Please answer this letter with particular rebuke, if you feel it. I wait to hear. About this time every year my vital forces grow poor, and this, therefore, I have endured, felons and other eruptions. I have now an inflamed eyelid and looseness of the bowels, which renders my coming to you impracticable, if no other obstacle offered itself.

I know there is an undercurrent of hope in your heart that I will be in Chicago, as with me I have hoped that somehow I would go, but I cannot.

Last night I went alone to Mr. Blanchard's reading of Dickens, which I enjoyed. I called a few moments before the reading on Mrs. Ford, who is to be sick next week. Mrs. Robert Benedict called here to-day. One of the greatest causes for gratitude which I have, is in your continued good health.

Once more I would bless you for your delicious letters. They will be a legacy to my children when I no longer live to preserve them. I will try to take better care of my wretched self because the best man in all the world loves me.

Yours, with entire devotion, WIFEY.

Mr. Fullerton [reading]:

OUR HOME, Jan. 10, 1867.

MY DEAR ONE: I feel how poor and meagre my letters are in comparison with yours.

When the envelope inclosing an account of your Saturday night's lecture at Mt. Vernon, and Sunday's reflections on the forest walk in Winter, together with a letter to Libby, and one to the little girls, was received to-day, a happier household it would be impossible to find than we were while reading them. We all bless you, love you, and pray for you.

Now, I fain would delight and comfort you in like manner, but the gift is nae given to me. Ah, well, my darling, it is my love that makes you happy, so all those parts of your letter which give me your soul, tho' extravagant, thrill me all over with ecstacy. My great bugbear and nightmare is, that I will hide my love or treat you ill when you return. Better that I die ere we meet again!

It rejoices me to hear you are happy and enjoy your life. The children and myself have never been so happy in our lives as this Winter in our home. Its beauty continues, nay, grows. So full of your dear self. May no unclean spirits enter here to defile it!

I have not been out to-day, nor had company. A snow storm raged this morning. I am reading the histories to the children. I accomplished very little of what I expected to do this Winter—have reached the height of my attainments in human learning I fear. Perhaps I may learn a more excellent love of the "Great Teacher." For this knowledge I hunger and thirst. How delightful that we are of one mind. You call me your "heart's twin." I want to be.

My eye is better to-day, but an influenza threatens me. The children's cough continues the same. Pray without ceasing that God would perfect our love. Good night. Sometimes I lie awake hours because I cannot nestle in your arms.

ELIZABETH.

"WED., Feb. 13th, 1867.

"What shall I give to my beloved" to-day? He has my heart—my entire life. Is there aught else a woman can give? But it hath little power to cheer or bless, parted by time and space! We will be very happy when again we reunite our lives. I feel so buoyant and yet so fearful lest I fail to bless you.

I have been again with Mr. O. He is not well to-day. Mr. and Mrs. Belcher took tea with me last eve. A good time we had chatting of you and singing hymns. My children are a perpetual delight to me. Were ever parents so rich in the almost perfect natures of their children?

Mr. Chittenden was burned out yesterday; a very heavy loss. You will doubtless hear of it through the papers.

I shall go to-night to hear Mr. Beecher open the Fraternity course. I am more and more inclined to have you break loose from The Independent and lead a more perfect literary life, or else start a new paper which shall be more for you. How good

Oliver's personal looks. I have read it three or four times already. "Theodore will close his Western engagements at Salem, O., Mar. 5, after which he will return to New-York."

Pray take care of your precious body, for tho' I am your sole lover still we manage very poorly in this world without the body.

Q. [Handing letters to witness.] Look at these letters of 1868, and say whether they are letters written by your wife to you?

A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton [reading]:

SUNDAY MORNING, Jan. 28, 1868.

MY BELOVED: Don't you know the peculiar phase of Christ's character as a lover is so precious to me because of my consecration and devotion to you? I learn to love you from my love to Him. I have learned to love Him from loving you! I couple you with Him, nor do I consider it one whit irreverent as a man, bowed with grief for my sins. And as every day I adorn myself consciously as a bride to meet her bridegroom so in like manner I lift imploring hands that my soul's love may be prepared. I wished the little girls after you left us, with overflowing eyes and hearts, consecrated ourselves to our work and to you. Do not fear but that God heard, well pleased, the aspirations of those little children. I will arouse all my energies to make them happy, that they may not suffer with loneliness for you—while I constantly inspire them with reverence and love for you. My waking thoughts last night were of you; my rising thoughts this morning were of you. I bless you. I know you. I love you. God sustain us and help us both to keep our vows.

Yours entirely,

ELIZABETH,

Wife.

The children each send their love to you.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 85."]

TUESDAY, Feb. 4, '68.

MY DARLING: I write to you now in the morning instead of the evening, because the shadows of loneliness fall on me then, and I fear to darken your spirits.

Yours, inclosing $100, from Newcastle reached me last night. I have now rec'd $300—$110 is my salary up to Feb. 1st. I feel the credit of my reputation as a financier depends upon the judicious manner I lay out these precious funds. I see in those bank notes the brains and blood of my heart's treasure, and the cause of the mutual separations!

If you expect me to save every month, as when I paid the carpet bill, I cannot, darling; for to do that I had to encroach upon this month's salary. However, I do expect to do something, and rest assured I will not involve you any more. I am obliged to pay for the repairing of the roof of our house; this last storm of snow made havoc in the ceilings of the spare room and my sitting room. I shall pay for it directly, so as not to incur another debt."

Mr. Fullerton—The rest is of a personal character. [Resuming the reading:]

You say that the four miles walk at Newcastle was a whole gospel to my soul. I read that over and over, and thanked God with all my soul for giving you that experience. I see you now walking in the sunshine, heartfelt, joyful, praising God. You did not need me then, but I follow on; and would fain catch the hem of your garment as you pass along, that I too may have a blessing.

I yearn and pray unweariedly to grow worthy of your love.
Bye.

Yours, undividedly,

WIFE ELIZABETH.

Mr. Fullerton [reading]:

FRIDAY EVENING, Feb. 14, 1868.

My —: Supply to gratify your own heart most perfectly some endearing epithet. I sent you my valentine this morning, and because I have laid out work for the morrow with the little girls, I come again to you to-night, that you may not miss my Saturday's letter.

Blessings on you, blessings on you, beloved. Yours from Crawfordsville—I shall ever remember that place with gladness—came to-day. To hear that you are happy, cheerful, and loving me, is more than even my faith could hope. I wept over it, I laughed over it, I prayed over it, and in the midst of my exultation Mattie called in, and tho' I was under vows not to read your letters, I did the next best thing, which was to get the bottle of wine you sent me the night you left and drink your bodily and spiritual health. While we were doing so, Mrs. Rooker called, and I got her a glass that she might mingle her blessing with ours upon you; I am sure they will follow you. Mattie has hungered to hear from you. I think she feels a little sore that Mr. B. visits here. See how great a power he and your dear self have over the heart. She said, 'Lib, I heard through Mrs. Morrill that Mr. B. called on you Wednesday. I believe he likes you ever so much.' Now, my darling, I have often urged him to visit Mattie, believing he would find her more comforting and restful than I can be. She would be refreshed and cheered, while for me, I who am rich in the fullness of your delicious love, have no need. Save for his sake, I am gratified if I may minister and thank God the while. Oh! dear Theodore, husband, how much I rejoice in your love—am kept in perfect humiliation—that he who knows me so well should love so grandly. This is the theme of all my thoughts. No other sentiment or creature have power to move me.

The cords of my heart are set to the harmony of love for you. Now, how I may be able to express this to you, when you return, I know not; that the flame will always burn I know, but that by reason of infirmities it shall glow through the cheek and through the eye, I know not. In God is my trust; He knows my heart's desire. I implore you to live by faith, and not by sight, with regard to your dear little wife. Now, to Him who is able to keep both soul and body, I commit you this night. Farewell.

Yours devotedly,

ELIZABETH.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 87."]

SUNDAY EVENING, March 15, 1868.

My Dearly Beloved: I find myself running to the calendar as often to discover the date of your return, as before my babes are born I watch the date of their birth. I have settled my mind to receive you two weeks from to-day; do not disappoint me. But I shall have nothing to say to you save love, for have I not faithfully told you each day's events and experience? Now, this is unfortunate. There remains naught for me to recapitulate, and I crave your patience in advance. If the thought of seeing you is so delicious, what will be the reality? To-day I have had great satisfaction with my dear family. I have one supreme wish for our children, that they may now learn and accept the intimacy of the friend, God, which will help them rule their own spirit—conquerors they will there be. Kate kindly spent the day with me, going to church for the first time in many years. I know you are nowise interested in her or in her family, yet I am to her the one and only one bright spot in the world; were I to neglect that or be indifferent to her, all faith in God and humanity would be blotted out; it is almost moral night with her, yet there is a ray coming from my sympathy which lightens and cheers her.

Be not displeased with me therefore. I have been asked to be relieved of this burden for your sake, but it still remains, and I feel it my duty.

Kate McElrath is to be married on the 7th of April. Her mother sent me an urgent wish that we both might be present. Charity Whitney—that was—had a little son born yesterday. Edgar is here visiting. Sis. will go to-morrow to Sarah Storrs's for a few weeks. There is left upon my sheet a short space which I wish to fill up with thanks abundantly for your beautiful loves expressed in your letters. Think not my appreciating a pleasure comparable to the space I allow for expressing it!

I love you solemnly, utterly, truly. Come to me,

Your own

ELIZABETH.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 88."]

Q. Look at the letter of 1869, and say whether it was written to you by your wife? [Hearing witness a paper.] A. Yes, Sir.

THURSDAY, NOON, January 26, 1869.

Dearly Beloved: It is with delight and for refreshment that I hasten, as opportunity offers, to sit down without interruption to write and think of you. Is it not true that I write of you as well as to you? Oh! my own dear husband, could I but enjoy your companionship now a little while. I cannot understand why the demons weariness, fault-finding, ungenerous selfishness, and many hateful little spirits, perpetually hang about me when you are with me, to modify and lessen our possible enjoyment.

Will you write to Mattie? I am starving for a letter; none since Thursday last. Mr. Maverick and father had a long discussion of three hours here this morning. They confessed that each for ten years have not been allowed to talk, Mr. Maverick, like mother, saying I have no time to talk, it's all waste time to argue, etc. Father will see Mr. S. this afternoon, and told Mrs. M. that he would like nothing better than to bring about a reconciliation between her and her husband. Darling, Mrs. Wheeler expressed a great deal of affection and interest for you, and your work—sent her love expressed in any manner as I thought best to convey it. This pleased me very much, as I should be happy to have all my friends love you. Ira made his speech Sunday, and will give you an account of it, though Kit says he does hate to, but will keep his word. It is now 5 p. m., and Carroll is waiting to take this rambling letter to the office.

Good bye and good night.

Your own dear wife, who is proud and fond of her husband.

MR. TILTON'S LETTERS TO HIS WIFE.

Q. Look at the letters I now show you and say whether they are the letters, or some of them, which you wrote to your wife during your absence [handing witness letters]? A. Yes, Sir.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, IND.,
SUNDAY MORNING, Feb. 9, 1898. }

My Dear Angel: I dreamed of you all last night, and awoke thinking of you this morning. How much I want to see you! How I yearn after you! How my soul blesses you day by day! I can never describe how precious your love of your husband has appeared to him during these few weeks past. Your singleness, your fervor, your purity, your devotion—they fill my mind and heart with reverence, adoration and humility.

I regard my last evening spent with you at home as the most memorable point in my whole life. You opened for me, that night, the gate of Heaven, which had so long seemed shut.

Ever since, I have had nothing but glory, thanksgiving, and praise. If ever a man was made a new creature, that man was I: no more despondency—no more repining—no more vain regrets—no more loss of self-respect—no more groveling in the dust. On the contrary, I am once again a man among men, and a Christian among Christians. Now, this transformation I owe to yourself, to your irrepressible love and devotion, to your ceaseless prayers, and to your victorious faith.

You always have in your power either to crown or dethrone me. You have the chief ruling influence of my life. Your words, your wishes, your looks, your thoughts, act on me like magic. When I am doing you an injury, or slight, or hardness, I am made so miserable that I do not wish to live. When I am making you happy, I walk like a Prince newly come into his kingdom.

Your letters, since I have been from home this last time, have been the dearest you have ever penned. They are loyal in their tone. Each one fills me with renewed pride and joy in my wife. O, my darling, in comparison with such love as you express, how poor is the friendship of all other friends! I have never seen any one who loves as you do. You have the richest of all human hearts. I am pledged to you forever. My vows I shall keep and not break. With God's help and with yours I shall be the faithful-est man in the world. Blessings on your soul this Sabbath day.

Ever yours, THEODORE.

CLINTON, IA., Feb. 20, 1898.

Pat: Helgho! Five of your letters have just come to me all in a bunch! "Here's richness!" They have put me into such a merry humor that my blood has been laughing up and down my veins. They made an actual handful—nay, more than that—a heartful.

Hereafter give yourself a longer interval between the day of writing and the day when you expect that I will receive the letter. Perhaps a week is not too much.

I am sorry to learn that the letter from Warren, Ohio, in which I enclosed you a $50 bill, has not reached you. I have just dropped a note of inquiry to Warren on the subject. This town is on the west bank of the Mississippi. I have just come to it late in the afternoon, and expect to fly away from it in the train immediately after my lecture. I am spending the few remaining minutes of sunlight in perusing these lines—the only chance I shall get to write to you from Clinton at all.

My last was from Crawfordsville. My second visit to that little college town was full of pleasure. I was very cordially received, had a crowded house, got the boys out of debt and went away in fine humor, reaching Chicago at 9 in the evening. I was met at the station by Col. Elliott who said that Betsey was at the Opera hearing Janauschek. "Accoutered as I was" he took me around, and I heard two-thirds of the German play of Adrienne Le Couvreur. Anna Dickinson sat two seats in front of us. I spoke to her after the lecture, and introduced Betsey and the Colonel. I slept at 698, and left early this morning.

The picture Madonna had arrived in good condition, and was hanging on the wall. It is very neatly framed, and looks pure and royal. Betsey was pleased, but the old fragrance has gone out of "the prairie rose." The flower is still comely, interesting and agreeable, but I marvel at myself for once thinking it so fragrant above all the rest of the garden. It is gone forever! It can never be to me henceforth anything but a common plant. This figure of speech is a mystery which I think you will understand. I intimate no names. The corner of this sheet crowds itself against the pile of letters as they are lying on the table—just as I would like to crowd my hands into yours, or both of yours into both of mine, at this blessed moment.

How I would like to be at home to-day! Or else how I would like to see you here! The weather is warm enough for grass to grow, birds to build, and hearts to love. You ask me if I like to read the recitation of your love. Yes, my darling! Every bird loves to hear his mate sing. Your love for me, as expressed in your letters, is my chief joy and rejoicing in this world. It makes life seem a braver thing to me. It makes my journeys nothing but bright trifles, and my hardship a bagatelle. It puts vigor into my step and joy into my work. I look round at my fellow-travelers in the cars, and my co-workers everywhere, and ask myself, "I wonder if these people have as much spring and motive for work as I now have?" The thought of giving you a home free and clear of debt is a tonic to my whole system. I am somewhat wearied, thin, and pale, but never was so cheering in all my life, never so free from fretfulness, never so thankful for my prosperity, and never so happy in my love for wife and children. This makes a man of me day by day.

I very rarely have any depression of spirits. The old claim has gone away entirely; the day has dawned. I have been trying to get a chance to write to the children, but the people who are to see me will not permit me to do so this afternoon. Give the chicks my truest love, and a kiss all around.

Faithfully yours, THEODORE.

That word "faithfully" means a great deal.

[Marked "Exhibit No. 91."]

MONONGAHELA HOUSE,
PITTSBURGH, PENN., Jan. 10, 1890. }

My Darling Wife: I owe the short remainder of this evening to you and shall fulfill my debt.

I was unable to keep my promise (made in the previous letter) to write you on Sunday. Early on Sunday morning I went to see a lawyer to study from his books the legality or illegality of the New York Legislature's revocation of the Fifteenth Amendment. In the afternoon I addressed a meeting of children. In the evening I wrote an editorial article—reaching past midnight. All this you know was not here in Pittsburgh but in Tidoute. This morning, since my editorial could not go fast enough by mail to reach the office before Tuesday afternoon, I telegraphed it in full. It contains both legal and poetical quotations, and I am curious to see how many blunders will be made in transmitting it. The title is "The Mutineers at Albany." I had previously sent a leader on "Mr. Pip and his great Expectations." My sojourn in Tidoute was made very agreeable by kind and hospitable friends who entertained me with the piano, the flute, the vox humana, the voices of two canaries and a mocking bird.

My journey from Tidoute to Pittsburgh (which I was nearly the whole day in making) lay all the way along the banks of the Allegheny—one of the most wild, picturesque and romantic of rivers. The weather was lovely and the scenery charming. I do not know of a more beautiful panorama from a car window. I alluded to it to-night in opening my lecture.

The house was crowded, every seat in the Academy of Music being filled, gallery and all. After I have spoken in Pittsburgh I always feel that I have got through with the most Important occasion which my western trip presents. Pittsburgh is my western Boston.

I send you herewith a sorrowful letter from a stranger in Wisconsin, which, if you care to do so, you may answer.

With the exception of your lead pencil note from Garrison's I have not heard from home since I came away. I suppose, of course, that you have written, but all the mail trains seem to be out of joint, and nothing arrives in time. My last week's earnings I sent to Frank Moulton, in order that he might pay for the share of The Union stock which I purchased of La Famee. I had given my note to La Famee for $450, payable Jan. 1st. So that debt is out of the way. I now owe Mr. Johnson $500, and Mr. Storrs $500. And I am keeping an accurate account of what I owe to you. Paying my debts is as intoxicating as wine; it is one of the chief delights of life.

You have never seen the oil regions. I have been in them four days. During the time have seen hardly less than a thousand oil-wells, some of them a thousand feet deep; some of them yielding a hundred barrels a day, and making their owners as rich as princes; and some of them dry, useless and profitless—a means of ruining many speculators. I must have passed the very spot to-day where Washington crossed the Alleghany on a raft. If that thrifty gentleman had suspected the existence of petroleum, he might have spent his life in sinking wells, building derricks, and tanking oil, and have never become the Father of his Country.

I have received to-night a telegraphic dispatch from Steubenville, O., inviting me to make my sojourn to-morrow at the Female Seminary in that place, which I expect to do.

Give my love to the children, and say that I shall take an early opportunity to write them a letter. But, as a general rule, my only chance to get a pen in my hand is between my lecture and my bed-time; and oftentimes the Committee steal away even this little bit of coveted leisure. So my letters cannot be numerous.

My remembrances to Sophia, and to the other members of "my house and heart."

Lovingly yours,

THEODORE.

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO,
Sunday Night,
January 16, 1870. }

My dear Wife: A fierce rain is falling, and the window panes are pelted with it. My sojourn is in a stately house, on a high ridge of land, and overlooking the Lagonda Valley. The exposed, commanding situation gives me all the voices of the storm. Heaven's great organ blows to-night. I repeat my cry of "No letters." One letter, indeed, I did receive last evening, but it was the one which you had sent to Tidioute a week before. I have received none direct from home. It was because I worried myself with thinking that something was wrong that I sent you the telegram from Columbus. The answer to that telegram came promptly—I received it on the same day that I sent the dispatch.

I am writing these lines from the most vexatious of ink-stands, a little, aged glass bottle, with an ebb-tide of muddy ink at the bottom of it. I want to write you a long and gossipy lingo, but here, in a rich man's house, I have hardly ink enough to sign my name.

Mem: When strangers, particularly if they are literary men, make a visit to our house, provide them with good ink even if you have to give them a bad breakfast.

What you said in the delayed letter from Tidioute about finance, and about your new-found pleasure in financiering, has determined me to make you my banker for the funds which I receive during the rest of my journey. Deposit them in the savings bank.

A happy pair, a ten weeks' bride and groom, are in the house—both young, handsome and jubilant; the light of the honeymoon shines in their faces—youth at the prow, and pleasure at the helm. Oh! the merry, merry days when we were young! I worked all night long on Friday in writing my comments on Mr. Stowe's "Lady Byron Vindicated." I wrote the entire article between bed-time and morning. After all I fear that the slow mail trains pay such respect to the Sabbath as will detain my letter too late for next week's paper.

Frank Moulton will take care of the business on which La Famee called. I cannot pen with this pitiful ink the love which my heart prompts me to send, for there is only one more drop in the bottle, and that I must save for directing the envelope.

Affectionately yours,

THEODORE.

DES MOINES, IOWA,
Sunday Evening,
January 30th, 1870. }

My Dear Pet: In this far-away town, the extreme limit of my journey, I feel my homesickness more than ever before. To-morrow morning I begin a slow march eastward, but I shall feel like a sailor tossed on the sea until I get to my final haven of rest in my own house. There is but one home. Yesterday I made a visit to the Legislature, which is now here in session. It is a fine looking body of men. During my brief presence in the Senate, an old law which did not permit a mother to inherit a dead child's property on equal terms with the father, was taken up, discussed, put to vote and unanimously repealed. Think of it! An advanced measure like this receiving no dissenting vote! I was never before so greatly pleased with any spectacle in a legislative body. It will not be a dozen years before woman suffrage will be the law of Iowa. One hundred members of the Legislature were present at my lecture last evening. This afternoon I took a long walk with Gov. Merrill and Attorney-General O'Connor and visited the grounds of the projected capital of the State.

My room at the hotel has been constantly filled with callers ever since I came here yesterday morning. The town is full of public men. I have received much kindness from many people. Every year I get more and more Westernized. I shall send Cad. to begin his fortunes on the west bank of the Mississippi. The supper-bell now rings, and I am waited for at the table by some gentlemen with whom I have promised to drink a cup of tea.

Respectfully, yours,

THEODORE.

My Darling: This is the last night of my dreary correspondence and homesick absence. I feel like one, who, having waited through the night, now watches for the morning. Wednesday at Whitehall (on Lake Champlain) will complete my programme. Then, as Browning says:

"Only a touch and we combine."

Affectionately yours,

THEODORE.

Q. In some of these letters Mrs. Tilton made reference to her salary. What did that mean, Mr. Tilton? A. Well, it meant that she had all the money that I had; I usually sent her my earnings. Perhaps that particular letter, if you can give me the date of it, may bring some special arrangement to my mind; I don't remember now.

Q. I don't recollect its date. A. There was a time when she had a bank account of her own; I don't know whether it was that time or not.

Q. Was there any allowance made her or any specific sum at any time during any period, for pin money, or anything of that kind? A. I don't remember that, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Something was said about $40 a week.

The Witness—That was two or three years afterwards, 1872. She had a bank account. I sometimes used to deposit money to her credit when I went away, and she had a bank account in one or two of the banks in Brooklyn; not two at a time; sometimes at one bank and sometimes at another.

Mr. Fullerton—Something has been said about $40 a week; what does that mean—in one of the letters read some days ago? A. Oh! my impression is that that refers to the Fall of 1873. I had forgotten it. All I know about it is what the letter itself mentioned.

Q. In some of your letters you say you have received no letters from home since you left. Did you afterward receive letters which had been forwarded to you but which had failed to reach you? A. Yes, Sir; I was frequently subject to accidents on the trains, running into the snow and getting detained, and then going to the post-office I would find no letters there. Sometimes they would be sent on from one office to another. One letter has pursued me through three or four towns. Occasionally half a dozen letters would come together. For instance, a letter would go to one town after I had left and it would be sent to the next town, and it would reach town after I had gone and it would be sent to the next, and reach that town after I had gone; so, sometimes, half a dozen letters were made up in a bundle by some kind postmaster who knew where I was, and they would come to me all in a heap.

Q. Before the recess you said something to the effect that Mr. Beecher had sent Bessie Turner away. What knowledge have you of any act of Mr. Beecher's in that respect; I mean your personal knowledge?

Mr. Evarts—From Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; from Mr. Beecher.

The Witness—My knowledge was derived from Mr. Moulton.

Q. Not from Mr. Beecher. Very well. During Bessie Turner's absence at school did you furnish any money directly or indirectly for her expenses? A. Did I?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. No, Sir; not any, not a penny.

Mr. Fullerton—I believe that is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. EVARTS.

The cross-examination of Mr. Tilton was then begun. Mr. William M. Evarts, the senior counsel of the defense, himself conducted the examination. The separation of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton was first considered, and then the questioning of the counsel branched off on Mr. Tilton's views of churches in general.

THE SEPARATION OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, from the time you were married until your wife left you as you have stated, about the 8th of July, 1874, was there any separation of home or residence between you other than such as happened by journeys or engagements that took you apart? A. No, Sir. Perhaps I should qualify that answer by saying that in the early part of December, 1870, Mrs. Tilton went two or three days to her mother's house, at her mother's request, and came back.

Q. Well, leaving you? A. Well, it has since been called a separation. I did not regard it so at the time. I wish to be entirely accurate in my answers.

Q. It was a separation in the sense of her being away from the house and at her mother's a certain period of time? A. Two or three days, I think.

Q. And with that exception you lived together as man and wife from your marriage until she left you on the 8th of July?

Mr. Morris—The 11th.

Mr. Evarts—The 11th; is it the 11th? Well? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, just preceding this 11th of July, did you leave her and the house in the sense of intended or purposed separation? A. I did, Sir; on the night of Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday—I don't know which—of that week, but it was the night on which she came home and reported to me that she had united with Mr. Tracy to deny the story.

Q. No, no; the night that you have spoken of that she told you that she had been to the meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you did then leave as with the purpose of separation. Did you take leave of her in that sense? A. I left the house—yes, Sir.

Q. Now when did you come back; can you give us this day? A. Well, it was the night of her appearance before the Committee and of her announcement to me that a Committee was in existence. If you can give me that date that would be the date.

Q. This appearance of Mrs. Tilton before the Committee we understand to have been on the 6th of July? A. What day of the week was that, Mr. Evarts?

Q. That I don't know.

Mr. Beecher—Monday, Mr. Shearman says.

Mr. Evarts—If the 11th was Saturday then the 6th was Monday. A. Yes, Sir; that was the night.

Q. Very well. Were you at home when Mrs. Tilton came to the house that night? A. Yes, Sir; I was in my library.

Q. And that was late at night, wasn't it? A. Not very; about ten o'clock.

Q. Now, when did you leave her and the house as with the purpose of separating? A. About an hour afterwards.

Q. That same night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What day did you return and what part of the day? A. I returned the next morning to see Gen. Tracy.

Q. Well, I mean to return to your house? A. Well, Gen. Tracy gave me such an account—

Q. No matter about that. A. —of her appearance before the Committee that I went back home to see her.

Q. No matter. Mr. Tilton, will you really be so good now as to answer my questions? A. I shall endeavor to do so.

Q. When did you return to the house? A. I think the next day, possibly the next afternoon. That is my present impression.

Q. And did you thereafter remain with your wife as you had been before? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Now, are you able to say distinctly whether that was the 7th that you returned, or the 8th? A. What day was Monday?

Q. Monday was the 8th. A. My impression is—

Q. Or was it in the night between those two days; late, I mean, in the night between those two days? A. No, Sir, I don't think

It was late in the night. My impression is that it was the next day, in the afternoon; still I won't undertake to state that positively.

Q. Well, it is not material. Now, what time of the day did Mrs. Tilton leave your house on the 11th? A. I should think about six o'clock in the morning, possibly a little later.

Q. Did she take leave of you? A. Yes, Sir; she woke me up and bade me good-bye, and said she was going to go away forever.

Q. And did she tell you where she was going? A. She did, Sir; she told me she was going to Mr. Ovington's.

Q. And did you afterwards follow her or see her there? A. I did. I went down and took breakfast there.

Q. With her? A. And with the family.

Q. Where she was; and, so far as you know has she resided in that family ever since? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. So far as you know? A. She has been out of town in Connecticut, I understand, since.

Q. But as a residence, so far as you know, has it been there? A. I have heard of her being there and at other places. Whether it is her residence or not I cannot say.

Q. Have you heard of her being at any other place as a residence than Mr. Ovington's? A. I don't know what you mean by residence. I have heard of her being in Connecticut and being in New-Jersey.

Q. You know the difference, I take it, between a visit and a residence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now will you answer? A. I don't understand that her residence is at Mr. Ovington's.

Q. Where do you understand it is? A. I understand it is at my house.

Q. Yes; very well. Have you heard of her being at any other place as a residence except Mr. Ovington's? A. I never have heard of her being at Mr. Ovington's as a residence.

Q. You think she still resides at your house? A. I think that is her residence; she does not reside at her residence. (Laughter.)

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, will you please be quiet.

Q. I observe you say, when asked your age, that you are about thirty-nine. What do you mean by that? A. I meant exactly what I said.

Q. Don't you know your age? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what is it? A. I am about thirty-nine.

Q. When were you born? A. October 2, 1835—1835.

Q. Now, at the time of your marriage, what was the situation or employment in which you were? A. I was connected, I think, at that time with The New-York Observer; yes, Sir; I believe I am correct in that.

Q. And what was your wife's position in respect to residence or occupation, if any, at that time? A. My wife resided at No. 48 Livingston-st. with her mother.

Q. Who was then a widow? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And had no employment other than as a member of that family, I suppose? She was not in any pursuit of life; she was not a teacher? A. Do you now refer to her mother or herself?

Q. To herself. A. No, Sir; she had no occupation.

Q. And what were your respective ages at that time? A. I was married on the day I was twenty years old. Mrs. Tilton was between one and two years older than I.

Q. And how had your acquaintance which led to your marriage been formed, and where? A. I became acquainted with her when I was about ten years old. Her family then lived in New-York on the same square with my father's house. I was a schoolmate of her brother, Joseph H. Richards. I knew her when she was a very little girl.

Q. And were you familiar as play mates or school mates? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At that early age? A. Yes, Sir; I was more familiar with her brother at that early age than I was with her, because I went with him to school and saw her frequently at his mother's house.

Q. And how long prior to your marriage had the ordinary attentions leading to marriage commenced? A. I think, Sir, from about the time I was sixteen years old.

Q. So that you were very well acquainted with her at the time you married her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And she with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And from that time till she left you, was not the intercourse between you that would make two persons understand and know one another as close and intimate and constant as is possible in human affairs? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, what estimate do you put upon the intellectual powers of your wife? A. I think she has more than common brain.

Q. What upon her education? A. I was about to say she had more than the ordinary education; but perhaps I ought not to make such a statement. She was educated at the Packer Institute in this city—went through a full course, I believe. She has the ordinary education of a young woman who has gone through a female college.

Q. That is the formal education? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then in the discipline of literature and companionship, with elevated characters, and the discipline of life, how do you place her in respect of education? A. She has always been fond of books, she has read constantly, I won't say to any very profound degree. She was fond of reading aloud to me and of being read aloud to by me. She was always fond of whatever was good in literature, art, or music. She was fond of poetry.

Q. Well, now, in association with men of elevated talents and character, what have been her opportunities? A. Do you mean that as another form of asking me what public men have been in the habit of coming to my house?

Q. I do not care to get at names, you know. My object is to show whether she has had associations with elevated and cultivated people during the course of her married life. I have no objection to any names, but, then, it is with no such purpose? A. Well, Sir, during all our married life we have had guests at our house, and we have very frequently visited other houses, and she has seen very many men and women of rank and cultivation.

Q. And appreciated and shared with you that companionship, has she not? A. Yes, Sir; to a certain degree. I do not think she ever cared very much for men because of their rank or fame.

Q. Not externally, but their characters and faculties—didn't she estimate men according to them? A. I think that she always took the greatest interest in those who were most necessitous—those that were most suffering. I do not think that she looked to the high estates of the world, but rather bent to the lowly and to the unfortunate.

Q. She was of a kindly nature and a charitable disposition? A. She was a very lovely woman, Sir.

Q. Now, your career during this time since your marriage has been that of a journalist in his different stages, and of a writer and of a public speaker either at the lyceum or at the hustings, has it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And your habits at home, so far as you have been at home, as your engagements permitted, have been those of a reader and writer, have they not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did your wife participate in those interests and employments of yours with you? A. Yes, Sir; I very frequently read to her what I had written. Sometimes she acted as my amanuensis.

Q. And did she give you the benefit of her sympathy and aid in any way that you needed in that regard? A. She did, if she agreed with what I wrote. If she did not she gave me the opposite.

Q. But at any rate, the subject was shared between you, either in concurrence or in opposition, was it? A. Yes, Sir; she always knew all my thoughts, all my labors.

Q. And you hers? A. I think not, as the result has proved.

Q. Well, but for the result which is the matter now in dispute? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Leaving that out? A. Yes, Sir; I had perfect confidence in her. I am speaking now of the earlier years.

Q. Well, you mean—well, we will go into that more in particular hereafter. Now, Mr. Tilton, what about her domestic occupations and interest; did they soon after your marriage and so on occupy a good deal of her time, her strength, her affections and her interest? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And those were wholly of your and the children's comfort and well-being, were they not? A. No, Sir; they always included the well-being of all persons who came within the sphere of her influence. She was in no sense a selfish woman.

Q. I spoke of within the house. She had no interest inside the house but yours and the children's, had she? A. She was not selfish to that degree, Sir. She was a very liberal, catholic-minded woman, and did good to whosoever she touched; all guests, all relatives, her family and my family, her mother and my mother.

Q. And guests at her house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From that connection and otherwise? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And for all she cared and labored as a wife should? A. Yes, Sir; most beautifully.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, you were both members of Plymouth Church when you were married? A. I think that—well—let me see; she became a member in 1851, I became a member in 1853; we were married in 1855—yes, Sir.

Q. And in joining that church, and in the religious sentiments and opinions which led to that solemnity, did you share each other's feelings and purposes at the time? A. I think we did, Sir, completely.

Q. And at that time there was a harmony between you and her, both in religious opinion and religious feeling and affections; was there not? A. Yes, Sir; very strong.

A DELINEATION OF MRS. TILTON'S CHARACTER.

Q. Were either of you, from that early time, and how long, occupied in labors of Christian charity or service connected with the church or as a part of the church's duty to those who needed aid and instruction? A. I don't know that I understand exactly what you refer to; we were both connected with the Sunday-school. Is that the line of labor, Sir, that you refer to?

Q. That is included, no doubt. A. As for works of charity, she has always been engaged in them.

Q. And did you participate with her? A. Well, sir, I was not her equal in those directions; very few people are.

Q. How long did those labors and habits upon her part in this direction of Christian duty continue? A. I presume they continue to this hour. Understand me, I am not referring to any association of hers with the church or the Sunday-school at present.

Q. No, I understand. Do you remember one form of her labors in connection with the church or religion, a Bethel school? A. I do, sir.

Q. And what was that? A. At the school called the Bethel connected with Plymouth Church; there was a large class of women residing in the poorer neighborhoods. I believe as a necessary condition of membership in that class they must be mothers—that is my present recollection; and she was their leader and teacher.

Q. And how long was that particular form of her labors? A. I cannot answer as to the date.

Q. But a series of years? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. And do you remember what years it embraced? A. I do not.

Q. Well, within some reasonable limits can you tell? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. Did it cover the years from 1865, we will say, to 1870? A. I should not like to give any date from my recollection—I have a very poor memory of dates; but it was a long period, and her service was very devoted.

Q. And she was greatly interested in it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How much time did it consume, and on what days? Was it on Sunday that the actual teaching was given? A. The actual teaching was given on Sunday, but it consumed more time—she prepared herself, her whole heart was on her duty. She made little notes and sketches in advance of the lessons which she was going to teach them; occasionally some of the women of her class would call and see her.

Q. Now, in regard to the disposition of your wife; was she of a sympathetic and affectionate nature? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very notably so? A. Yes, Sir, to a very rich degree.

Q. Leaving out, now, a consideration of this matter in issue here, what have you to say regarding your wife's opinions and feeling's concerning feminine chastity? A. I think my wife loves everything good and hates everything bad; and I believe to-day she is a good woman—

Q. Well, we do not differ from you.

Mr. Fullerton—She was, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Now—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; he was going to make—

The Witness—I was going to say that I have never blamed her for the blame which belongs, not to her, but to her betrayer.

Q. Well, I desired to omit that subject. We shall come to that before we get through, but, still, the point is whether she was—whether you observed and can speak of her as to her character in that particular of feminine delicacy and pride in woman's chastity? A. I don't think that that topic ever came up for discussion with her or for any signal appreciation; and I do not think that the theme at all entered into her mind.

Q. Have you not said of her that she was a great stickler for the purity of her sex? A. She became so after her downfall.

Q. Well, a great champion of the purity of her sex; have you not said that of her? A. She is a great champion of the industrial and educational and political rights of her sex.

Q. Well, have you or not expressed that view of her character—that she was a great stickler for the purity of woman? A. Yes, Sir; for all—

Q. A great champion of the purity of her sex? A. All that is included in the dignity and nobility of womanhood. She has always had great pride in her sex; she has always considered that her sex was the equal of ours, and therein I have always agreed with her.

Q. And that its virtue was a supreme interest of the sex? A. I do not think that in considering the sex she has ever singled out the one quality of chastity for any especial thought or comment. I do not think that that subject ever floated through her mind. The interest which she had in her sex was in its general elevation, its education, its enlargement of opportunities, its widening of privileges.

Q. Now let me ask your attention to this observation, and see whether you will recognize it as having been made: "Elizabeth always felt that when Mr. Beecher went to such and such a place there were women who would flatter him; I don't think she did at all; she has always been a stickler for the honor of her sex. She said to herself, 'I will represent my sex' " ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I read from the 64th page; those are your opinions about her now, are they? A. Oh! certainly; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, as to delicacy of behavior on the part of women towards the other sex, what was her disposition and habit in that regard? A. She was a perfect lady, Sir.

Q. And what was her exaction in that respect from other women with whom she had or professed friendship? A. I don't think she had any friendships for any women from whom she had to make any such exactions. She associated with ladies like herself.

Q. Was she not distressed at any suggestion of impropriety on the part of women in their relations with men? A. Why, Sir, every lady would be, and she was a lady.

Q. You think that she was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, in regard to your own habits of mind as bearing upon this question of evidence, you have made several statements for publication growing out of this matter, have you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have appeared before the Committee and some sort of an examination has been had? A. I appeared before a Committee, but no sort of an examination was had.

Q. Well, you didn't consider it any sort of an examination? A. No, Sir; there was—

Q. There was time occupied about it? A. Oh! yes, a whole Summer.

Q. Not with you? A. Either with me or concerning me.

Q. Well, well; I mean your own presence and examination there? A. No.

Q. Now how is your memory as to dates, and the order and sequence of occurrences? A. I have always thought that my memory of dates was rather below the average.

Q. And in regard to memory have you not stated as the character of your mind that you remembered by pictures? A. Yes, Sir; I remember many things by pictures.

Q. And that was rather the habit of your memory of what was vivid in the shape of a picture being retained—has not that been your expression? A. If I understand what you mean—for instance, I should remember this scene which I now witness rather by the picture itself than by the date; that is to say a year hence, if you endeavored to bring up to my mind to-day's scene, I should do it not by the date but by the picture in my memory.

Q. Have you not said in some of these examinations that you remembered by the reproduction from your imagination? A. I don't think that would be a possible process of the human mind; don't think I could have said it.

Q. Think you said anything of the kind? A. I think we remember through the memory, not the imagination.

MR. TILTON'S RELIGION.

Q. Now, in regard to this association and sympathy in religious opinions and feelings with your wife—you have suffered some change in theological opinions and in religious feelings, have you not? A. I have not suffered that change, Sir; the word suffering must not be applied to that change except in its transitory state of suffering for a time.

Q. Well, I don't use suffering in a sense of anguish? A. I have rejoiced in the change.

Q. Well, we will take that—suffering change is being the subject of change I suppose in English—however you have rejoiced in the change? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, at what period of time did this change in your theological opinions, in which you rejoice, occur? A. Well, Sir, to give you an answer that shall be entirely clear, perhaps I may be permitted to say that I was brought up from childhood in the Old School Presbyterian Church of which Dr. Alexander was pastor in New-York; that my earliest religious bent was toward extreme Calvinism; that that tendency in my later years received a good deal of modification perhaps I might say liberalization through Mr. Beecher's preaching in Plymouth

Church, and that when I approached my thirtieth year my religious views passed through a still greater change in the direction of what might be called Unitarianism, though I am not a member of that body.

Q. Well, that included a surrender of the doctrines of the divinity of Christ and of the atonement, as understood in orthodox or Calvinistic opinions? A. I don't know what you mean by a surrender, Sir.

Q. A parting with? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It did? A. I do not reject the divinity of Christ; I do not accept the theory of Christ's deity. I do not regard Jesus Christ as the Jehovah who made the world, but there is a very large and sweet sense in which I think any thoughtful man would accept the divinity of Christ.

Q. Well, you gave up the doctrine as it was understood in Calvinistic teachings, in which you had been reared? A. I gave up the doctrine which I could not understand. I never gave up any doctrine which I thoroughly understood.

Q. Yes; I didn't ask you if you understood it, but as it was understood did you or did you not—as it was held? A. As it was held by whom?

Q. In the Calvinistic teaching in which you had been reared? A. Oh! yes, Sir. I abandoned that when I became a member of Plymouth Church.

Q. Well, had this second change that you made in 1865—that comes to about '65 I think, about the time you were thirty? A. Yes, Sir; I won't be positive as to that date.

Q. Well, I am not particular as to the day; perhaps you cannot date from a single day. A. No, Sir.

Q. A gradual process—but by that time that you have mentioned, when you had come to be about thirty, you then gave up the doctrine of the divinity of Christ as held in the orthodox churches, and believed no more than is held in the Unitarian churches? A. Well, I don't know how far that doctrine is held in orthodox churches, and I don't know exactly how far there is a difference in that doctrine as in Unitarian churches. The views which I have concerning the character of Jesus Christ are those which I have already stated—that Jesus Christ was not Jehovah—

Q. No matter if you have already stated them. Do you know enough about it to know whether the concurrence of opinion on these subjects, which prevailed between yourself and your wife when you were married, was broken by this progress or change in your opinions? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that by the time you reached the age of thirty you and she no longer agreed in views concerning those doctrines of the Christian religion? A. I should rather say, Sir, that perhaps we had agreed in those features until I was thirty, and that at that time we began to disagree.

Q. Then this change occurred? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You then disagreed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what effect or impression upon your wife and her happiness did this change in your opinions produce? A. In one sense the change in my religious views produced upon her mind a good deal of unhappiness. She wanted me to believe as she did; in fact she wanted me to become a clergyman.

Q. And a clergyman of the faith in which you had both been brought up? A. She wanted me to agree with her.

Q. And you did not? A. I did not.

Q. Now, did it or not cause her great anguish of spirit and great suffering in her life? A. There were times and hours in which she wrestled with herself, and with me and with God, that my views might exactly harmonize with hers.

Q. And hers remained the same that they had been, did not they? A. I think that in two or three essential respects her views have changed; I think, in other words, that she grew to abandon the notion of a hell; she followed the lead of Plymouth Church in that abandonment.

Q. Now, have you not used this expression in this connection: "If I had been a minister, none of this trouble would have come; she was always in sorrow that I was not a minister"? A. Well, Sir, I can't say that she was always in sorrow; her regret was that my professional career had not been that of a clergyman.

MR. TILTON'S ATTITUDE TOWARD CHURCHES IN GENERAL.

Q. Well, now, at this time had you not come to such a pitch of feeling in regard to clergymen and churches, that you were actually hostile to them, and despised and hated them? A. There came a period, in 1870, when my views of clergymen changed; not until then.

Q. Well, I have asked you about another period?

Judge Neilson—He says not until then.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! I did not understand you. You say not until then? A. Not until then; no, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Very well, then, that is an answer.

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, permit me to say that I do not wish to overcloud the fair fame of all clergymen with the sins of one.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I haven't asked you to do so, and we will not take that as part of an answer to any question I put.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know; that is a qualification to the answer which he gave, and properly, I think.

Mr. Evarts—Not very important when it is not an answer.

Mr. Beach—Well, I think it is to the other clergymen.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Sir, have you not said that your hatred to churches commenced upon, and because of, the slavery relations of the churches? A. I have never spoken of hatred to the churches. I know what you are reading from, Sir; it is the report of my cross-examination, which I disavow.

Mr. Evarts—No matter what I am reading from; it is for you to answer the questions which I put you.

Mr. Beach—Well, it is proper for him to speak of a time when he used that term.

The Witness—I took this ground, that, during the anti-slavery controversy, I was an extreme Abolitionist, and the great enemy that we had to encounter in our labors as Abolitionists was the Christian Church, and the Rev. Albert Barnes of Philadelphia, the author of "Barnes's Notes," said distinctly, and it was a watchword of our enterprise, "The American church is the bulwark of American slavery." Therefore we struck at the church for the sake of striking asunder the slave's chain. In that sense I was opposed to ecclesiastical organizations; I had no hatred to individual churches, or members, or ministers.

Q. Well, of course we will assume that in regard to individuals. You did under these influences of a public nature that you have spoken of, come to have feelings of hostility and bitterness concerning church organizations, did you not? A. Concerning ecclesiastical organizations, concerning churches, not in their religious features, but in their ecclesiastical features; concerning churches as governing bodies.

Q. Now, in that connection did you not come to the feeling and opinion of despising ministers generally, and the church as it existed in this country from these antagonisms? A. I thought that in the early stages of the anti-slavery movement the clergy, like all other professional men, were, like Erasmus of old, cowardly; that they were not leaders of 'public sentiment, but rather the followers of it. There were many noble and conspicuous exceptions to that, and in those days Mr. Beecher himself was a shining example.

Q. Nevertheless the point comes—did you not, from these motives, and under those antagonisms, come into hostility or hatred of the churches and contempt for the ministers that were of the position that you have ascribed generally to the clergy? A. I think I should answer your question no, Sir, and yet if I could explain I could give you more fully my views.

Q. Well, I have no objection to your explaining. A. I think this—that when any great public measure arises and is new; when any great reform starts which the world needs, the last help it generally gets is from the old conservative organizations called churches; that is what I mean.

Q. And from the ministers of those churches? A. Well, from the churches as bodies.

Q. Yes; and the ministers of them? A. I don't know that it applies any more particularly to the ministers than it does to other members.

Q. Other members of the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Collectively. Well now these feelings of yours in this regard were not conceded from your wife—they were known to her, were they not? A. These views were taught us in Plymouth Church; that was the doctrine of Plymouth Church. My wife believed it and I believed it, and we all despised the slaveholding Christianity of that day; we were all of one mind concerning it. Mr. Beecher preached against it. He used to say frequently that he was ashamed of his calling; that is to say, that he was ashamed of the men who were in it because they were cowardly.

MR. TILTON'S FIRST DISPUTES WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. Very well; now when did you first come to any occasion of public contest or disagreement with Mr. Beecher, in the course of your and his public life and employment? A. Well, Sir; we had a friendly discussion in 1859 or 1860, concerning the disposition of some missionary funds.

Q. That was in Plymouth Church, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was a somewhat animated and serious dissent between you, wasn't it? A. Well, Sir, it was like the dissent between you and Mr. Beach, entirely fraternal. It was a contest, but it was marked with great friendliness; there was no enmity between us.

Mr. Beach—What date was that? A. That, I think, was in the Winter of 1859 or 1860, possibly '60 and '61.

Q. Well, these were between yours and Mr. Beecher's opinions, not as representatives of clients or third persons? A. It was not a clash of opinion, Sir; we were alike in opinion. It was simply a question as to whether Plymouth Church, as an anti-slavery organization, ought to contribute its missionary funds to a society out West that held men in bondage. I took the ground that our church ought not to do so. He took the ground that our church ought to do so, and we discussed it.

Q. The details of it are not important; but it was an animated and somewhat severe dissent between you, wasn't it? A. It was as severe as this: he met me just before I went into the pulpit that night to make my speech, patted me on the shoulder, and said, "Theodore, go and do as well as you can;" and the next day, after the discussion was over, he came around to see me, and said, "Theodore, I am proud of you." That was the severity of the discussion.

Q. Oh! I don't mean personal animosity; I speak of your difference of opinion on a public question. Don't you recognize that fact now? A. I don't recognize the applicability of your word "severity" as applied to a difference of opinion.

Q. I have asked you for the first; was that the first occasion of any public difference or debate of any serious character between you? A. I don't know but that on several occasions previous to that, in the discussions in the church meetings, I may have taken ground one way and he another on certain topics. He always encouraged the utmost latitude of discussion.

Q. If there was nothing noticeable, I don't care to inquire into it, and so you may have— A. Oh! there never was a more friendly discussion than the one between Mr. Beecher and myself concerning those missionary funds.

Q. And in that discussion you were of opposing opinions, and so continued to be notwithstanding, for the— A. No, Sir; we were not of opposing opinions; we were of the same opinions, but the question was whether we could, as anti-slavery men, apply those opinions to a certain particular case.

Q. Well, I mean opposing opinions concerning the subject of actual debate; that was so, wasn't it? A. Yes; the difference being as to whether the money should be applied or should not be applied; it did not reach to a difference on moral or religious views—a question of the distribution of money.

Q. Now, after this, did there arise an occasion of political difference between you, as public men, on a question that generally you had concurred in before? A. How soon after this?

Q. O, I can't tell when it was—not connected with this. A. I don't remember that there was any serious difference between Mr. Beecher and myself on any political question until he took the ground—in a sermon, I think, in 1860 perhaps—no, perhaps later—that a military emancipation was impossible. I resisted that sermon. A military emancipation was afterward wrought out. I think that is the first disagreement we had as to political views.

Q. Well, then, afterwards there was a Cleveland affair, was there not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. I don't remember the year.

Q. Well, can't you tell us about when it was in connection with the public events or affairs of politics? A. Well, Sir, I am ashamed to say that I don't fix it in the almanac of my memory. Somebody here present, though, must know the date of the Cleveland Convention.

Q. Well, it was at the time of the Cleveland Convention, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what was that Convention, a political Convention?

A. Well, I can't—yes, it was a political Convention—O! yes.

Q. It was in connection with the politics of the country? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And there you took decided, opposite grounds to him, did you not? A. Yes, Sir; very decided.

Q. And was that a broad, a severe difference of opinion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was? A. I thought he was wrong, and I said so.

Mr. Evarts—We will stop at this stage, if your Honor please.

The Court then adjourned until 11 o'clock on Thursday.

NINETEENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. TILTON'S FURTHER CROSS-EXAMINATION.

POEMS, EDITORIALS AND LETTERS ON LOVE, MARRIAGE AND POLITICS READ IN COURT—THE SOCIAL AND PUBLIC RELATIONS OF THE WITNESS TO MR. BEECHER—THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY RULED OUT.

A brilliant light was turned on Thursday upon the obscure and sensational events of the great trial now pending in Brooklyn. A stranger not familiar with court procedure might in the morning easily have thought himself in a place of amusement, for Mr. Tilton's examination and its surroundings resembled more a literary entertainment than a trial. The audience was certainly a large and an appreciative one, while those who interested them were prominent and able. The programme did not lack novelty. The reading of a beautiful song of love written by Mr. Tilton and read by Mr. Evarts; discussions about politics, woman's rights, and free love; newspaper satires and editorials on the same subjects, and a long debate on the rights of editors, a pleasant vein of humor running through the whole—this is an outline of the progress made. During the forenoon only the brighter, fresher pictures of Mr. Tilton's and Mr. Beecher's intercourse were shown. Its darker phases were for a time hidden, but during the last hour of the proceedings the curtain was drawn aside and events bearing more directly on the scandal were dealt with. Mr. Evarts first produced a copy of the letter of Mr. Beecher to the Cleveland Convention in 1866, which Mr. Tilton so severely condemned at the time. The witness declined to identify it because it was a newspaper slip and had many corrections in the margin, and took occasion to say that in that controversy Mr. Beecher and Mr. Evarts were on the side of President Johnson, while he was on the other side. Mr. Evarts rebuked Mr. Tilton very sharply, saying that his name should not be dragged in. The testimony of this witness frequently brings Mr. Beecher's name before the jury. When he was asked to date the time when he began to take an interest in the cause of woman's rights, he said that it was after he heard Mr. Beecher's speech on that subject at the Cooper Institute; and again he said, "I modified my views upon social questions and have published my principal denunciations of social crimes since Mr. Beecher's invasion of my home came to my knowledge in 1870." Several times afterward Mr. Beecher's name was thus connected with various matters in which Mr. Tilton had taken an interest.

Mr. Evarts asked the witness when he entertained discussions on the "new social opinions" in regard to the social connection of sexes. Mr. Tilton inquired what was meant by the "new social opinions." Mr. Evarts did not wish to apply the opprobrious term free love, and so he defined it in the following admirable words: "The opinions that assert greater freedom in the matter of marriage and its dissolution, and its maintenance only during continued attraction or affection."

Considerable amusement was provoked when Mr. Shearman approached the witness staggering under the weight of a large file of The Independent for 1870. Mr. Beach laughingly went to his assistance, and they held the volume before Mr. Tilton, who was asked to identify the leading editorial entitled "Love, Marriage, and Divorce;" this he did, and it was read by Mr. Shearman. A satire directed at Mr. Tilton in The Hearth and Home was next read. It first praised him very highly as an orator and writer, speaking of him as a children's friend, and quoting Mr. Tilton's little nursery rhyme beginning "Baby bly, here's a fly," and other poems; the article afterward expressed grief for his connection with Mrs. Woodhull, and closed with a pretended obituary of him. Mr. Tilton's reply to that article was also read; it contained a reference to Mrs. Woodhull.

Perhaps the most entertaining part of the entire proceedings was the reading by Mr. Evarts of Mr. Tilton's exquisite poem, entitled "French with a Master," each verse of which closes with the words Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre (To love, to love, this it is to live). The poem lost nothing in the hands of the reader. The constant repetition of the words Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre caused a ripple of amusement to run throughout the room, which swelled each time the line was repeated, until, when the last verse closed, there was an outright burst of laughter, in which the Judge, the jury, Mr. Evarts, and Mr. Tilton joined heartily. After quiet had been restored, a copy of The Golden Age containing Mr. Greeley's letter on the question of marriage and Mr. Tilton's reply to it was produced, and it gave Mr. Fullerton an opportunity to show his readiness at reply. The Judge had ruled that the defense were not obliged to introduce every part of those letters, adding to Mr. Fullerton that it might be a burden to him to read them in the re-direct examination. "Ah, no," rejoined the counselor, "it is never a burden to me to read anything Mr. Tilton has written." As Mr. Shearman began to read, Mr. Tilton asked Mr. Evarts as a personal favor to read the article. The latter declined, however, saying that "it would be contempt of court."

An animated and interesting discussion arose at this point regarding the rights and responsibilities of editors and publishers, caused by an attempt to read a paragraph quoted from a Troy newspaper in The Golden Age, giving a part of a lecture by Mrs. Woodhull. Mr. Tilton laid down the precept that "sole editors are those who least read their own paper," and he added: "The Golden Age, like any fair-minded or liberal newspaper, prints the news. That is an extract from a speech of Mrs. Woodhull's, printed without comment, exactly as it would in the same column print an extract from the speech of Mr. Evarts." Mr. Evarts, with a wry face, answered that that would be an empty compliment, as nothing of that kind was ever done by him, and Mr. Beach laughingly said to him, "It proves you cannot save yourself from distinction, no matter how you try." The paragraph was ruled out. An article in The Golden Age, which Mr. Tilton said he did not write, was then shown. A rather remarkable incident occurred at this moment, in Mr. Tilton's calling his examiner to his side and speaking confidentially to him for several moments. Mr. Evarts then walked back and resumed his examination, in the course of which Mr. Tilton appealed to the Judge and asked that he be not obliged to give the name of the writer of the last-named article, as it was a lady. He said that he had just given Mr. Evarts the hint that the writer was a lady. Mr. Evarts retorted that he had not divulged it. The witness made a rejoinder, and while Mr. Evarts was replying to him, Mr. Beach, glancing at the clock which then indicated that it was exactly 1 o'clock, suggested that Mr. Evarts and the witness be allowed to continue the discussion during recess.

The afternoon session began with a discussion over the introduction of Mr. Tilton's biography of Mrs. Woodhull. The book was ruled out by Judge Neilson. The Cleveland letter in perfect form was next introduced and read by ex-Judge Porter, which is the first public service in the case he has performed since his illness. The relations between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton were again made the subject of investigation. Mr. Tilton thought, when he first became acquainted with Mr. Beecher, that the latter was "a big boy, companionable and winning." "Guileless?" queried Mr. Evarts. "No. The craftiest persons I know of are boys—newsboys, for instance." In later years, Mr. Tilton said, "the fine gold of his idol became dimmed." Mr. Beecher's visits to the house of Mr. Tilton were the next subject entered upon, and it was shown that Mr. Beecher had at first to be urged by Mr. Tilton to visit the latter's wife. The witness paid an enthusiastic tribute to Francis D. Moulton, saying that he was the successor of Sir Philip Sydney. At this point the examination was broken off for the day.

Judge Neilson was more lenient than usual on Thursday with the laughter in the court-room; partly, perhaps, because it was in the main confined to the lawyers and those most interested in the suit, and partly because the wit and humor of the day were irresistible. He reproved the audience only once, and then very gently. His leniency was not abused, however, and the spectators were very orderly during the day, except just before the adjournment of the court, when a considerable disturbance was made by several persons leaving the room together.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

A BRILLIANT CROSS-EXAMINATION.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Tilton was recalled, and his cross-examination was continued by Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—[Paper handed to witness.] Mr. Tilton, that seems to be rather an imperfect print of a document. Please look at that and see if that is the political situation, and that the document called the Cleveland letter. It seems to be a Western print of some kind, and been corrected by city paper; but we could not get a file taken from the office without more trouble than it was worth. A. Well, Sir, I should not like to give you an opinion upon that.

Q. Well, I don't ask your literary opinion; I ask you to look at that, if that is the Cleveland letter, as it purports to be—if that is the situation and that the action on Mr. Beecher's part which we were last talking about when we left the stand? A. Do you mean is this the letter which Mr. Beecher sent to the Cleveland Convention?

Q. Yes, the Cleveland Convention. A. Well, Sir, I have not read that letter since that time. Here are three sheets marked with one hundred corrections. I should not like to say whether it was or not.

Q. Well, can you, judging for yourself by looking at that, recall enough of the situation to know whether that was the Cleveland letter? A. Well, Sir, I should not.

Q. Could not do that? A. I could not say whether that was or not. If it were my letter I should pronounce upon it, but as it is another man's I don't want to give an opinion.

Q. And you cannot say then, whether, looking at this paper, you can see from it that this was the occasion of that political difference between you and Mr. Beecher? A. That appears to be a letter addressed by Mr. Beecher to that Convention, which somebody has corrected, marking on the margin corrections to the number, I should think, of a hundred. Whether the text is the original, and whether the corrections belong to it, or whether it is genuine, I am unable to say, since I was not the author of it.

Q. Now, I have not asked you any of those questions, but have asked whether, by looking at this paper, you can recall to mind whether or no this is the situation in politics which this letter refers to that was the subject of the dissent between Mr. Beecher and yourself? A. The subject of dissent between Mr. Beecher and myself grew out of the political situation at that time; Mr. Beecher and you were on the side of President Johnson, but I was opposed to him; that is all I remember.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Tilton, I beg you not to introduce me into your testimony. I am not here under your action at all. You are here—

Mr. Beach—I object, Sir, to the gentleman—Wait one moment.

Mr. Evarts [continuing]—To answer my questions.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, put your questions.

Mr. Evarts [continuing]—And under cross-examination, and there is not any occasion for any answers that do not proceed from a question.

The Witness—I thought I was giving you a very direct answer.

Judge Neilson—The practice is to answer the question put as distinctly as you find yourself able to do, and not refer to the counsel in your answer.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; but the question was in regard to the political situation at the time of the difference between Mr.

Beecher and himself, and as Mr. Evarts was a principal part of that political situation, it was not improper for the witness to refer to it.

Mr. Evarts—Why, I didn't have anything to do with it, that I know.

Mr. Beach—Well, the witness was telling you you did.

Mr. Evarts—Not in the least.

Judge Neilson—Well, you may be forgiven if you had anything to do with it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, these allusions are not of any interest, and I at least do not wish any responsibility for making myself important. [To the witness.] Do you think that by reading what purported to be a letter of Mr. Beecher, as sent to them, you could determine whether or no it was the one that you considered and replied to, or discussed, in your difference with him? A. I do not need, Sir, to hear any letter, true or false, correctly or incorrectly printed, to recall the differences which I had with Mr. Beecher at that time; it was a difference known and read of all men.

Q. Now, for the date of it. A. That I don't remember.

Q. Do you think that it was in August or September, 1866? A. I don't remember, Sir. If you say that is the date I will accept it.

Mr. Evarts—I don't say anything about it; this letter purports to be of that date, but then I supposed you might know a little something about the date of the matter in reference to your mutual affairs. Was it in the year 1866? A. That I do not remember now.

Q. Now, had that discussion a relation to the then current policy or politics of the Republican party, to which you both belonged? A. What discussion do you refer to?

Q. This Cleveland matter? A. I don't remember it as a discussion. Do you mean Mr. Beecher's letter?

Q. No; this situation in politics which you say you don't need to have recalled by Mr. Beecher's letter in order to know what the matter was? A. Well, do I understand you to ask me that a situation in politics has reference to a political matter? Of course it does.

Mr. Evarts—I ask you—Will the stenographer please repeat the question?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer [reading]: "Q. Now, had that discussion a relation to the then current policy or politics of the Republican party, to which you both belonged?" A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON DENIES BEING A RADICAL.

Q. And was it a matter of considerable excitement and attention in the councils of the party and of its adherents? A. Yes, Sir; I think the Republican party very generally believed that Mr. Beecher at that time betrayed it.

Judge Neilson—He don't ask you that.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! that answers my question. [To the witness.] The general opinion of the Republican party was that Mr. Beecher then betrayed it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You then took quite the opposite and hostile position to that? A. I stood with the main body of the Republican party and made a protest against Mr. Beecher's action.

Q. And did you make his letter and his position a matter of public discussion on your part in the sense that you have now expressed yourself? A. I did, Sir, in a very direct manner.

Q. Now, in both these differences that you have spoken of—in the discussion about the application of the funds of the church in reference to a charitable society, and this about the crisis in politics, if we may call it so, of 1866—were you on what was considered and called the more radical side and view, and Mr. Beecher the other way? A. No, Sir; I was then with the general bulk and body of the Republican party, and Mr. Beecher was in a small wing that went over to the support of Mr. Johnson. The radicals in politics were far ahead of both of us.

Q. Now, about the church—about the missionary society—that hadn't anything to do— A. What was your question about that?

Q. Whether you, on that question of the missionary society—you know what I refer to. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The differences you had—whether you there were on the more radical side and Mr. Beecher on what was called the more conservative? A. No, Sir; I was on the true, solid and old-fashioned conservative ground, and all the liberal members of the missionary society sustained me in it, and printed my speech on that occasion for general distribution—stood on the early ground of the fathers.

Q. Well, there you had, as you think, the support of the greater portion of the good opinion of the party or the community? A. Of the religious community; yes, Sir.

Q. And in the other of the political community? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, from that time forward, were there any particular public questions or occasions which brought you into public antagonism? A. No, Sir; not that I remember, and I think there were none.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS AND ITS EARLY ADVOCATES.

Q. Now, Sir, how early did you take part in the movements in reference to women's rights, or woman suffrage, or that topic of public consideration? A. I think that shortly after Mr. Beecher made a speech in Cooper Institute, declaring for women's rights, Mrs. Tilton said that I ought to join in that enterprise, that it was right and proper, and I entered in it.

Q. You need not mention what Mrs. Tilton said; I ask to have that struck out, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Q. I ask you a certain time, and only desire that you will consider the question? A. Well, the best date that I can give you is to go back to Mr. Beecher's public declarations in Cooper Institute. He made a speech there which was printed as a tract. I rather think that that was the beginning of my espousal of that cause. If you know the date of that, it begins there.

A. Well, I am sure I don't know; I never had one. A. Oh! yes, Sir, he made a very magnificent speech on that subject.

Q. Well, you know it but I don't. Now the point is to get the date, if I can. If you will remember something of which you can get a date in order to remember that date? A. Well, I remember that occasion, Sir; I don't remember the date of it. I told you yesterday that I remembered occasions much better than dates.

Q. Have you any idea about when it was, in the course of years? A. Fifteen years ago, I should think, at a rough guess.

Q. Well, that is about 1860? A. I think it was before the war; it may have been twenty years ago, for aught I know.

Q. Well, on that question were you on the side of the advanced opinions in regard to women's rights and suffrage, etc.? A. Well, I suppose that all persons who have espoused the cause of women's suffrage may, in one sense, be regarded as on the side of advanced opinions. In so far as that is true, I was on that side.

Q. You were in the advanced opinions on that subject? A. Well, there was only one opinion on that subject.

Mr. Beach—On what subject?

Mr. Evarts—Women's rights and women's suffrage—there was but one? A. There was but one opinion on that subject; and the great world regarded those who held it as being in the advance; I suppose it may be naturally called, properly called, an advanced opinion.

Q. Well, then, from the best faculty that you have of understanding my question—advancement—you think so; and that you were in favor of the advanced opinions on that subject? A. Well, Sir, I was in favor of woman suffrage, if that is an advanced opinion. It is a pretty old one now.

Q. Now, with whom among the votaries or champions of that opinion did your espousal of it bring you in connection? A. Chiefly with Henry Ward Beecher and Mrs. Elizabeth Tilton, and all the other advocates of it who came up afterward and in due order.

Q. You had known both those persons before, had you not? A. Before what?

Q. Before you went into this movement? A. Yes, Sir; I had known them from childhood.

Q. Now, with what other persons did your association or espousal of this cause bring you into connection? A. Well, Sir, I should think sooner or later in association more or less intimate with a thousand writers and speakers, and advocates and thinkers, good men and women who held that view.

Q. All eminent? A. No, Sir; there are not a thousand eminent people in the country.

Q. Well, will you give us the names of some of the more eminent and noticeable of them? A. Gen. Butler was one, Chief-Justice Chase was another, Mrs. H. B. Stanton was another, Isabella Beecher Hooker was another, Lucretia Mott was another, Wendell Phillips was another, William Lloyd Garrison was another, Anna Dickinson was another; why, Sir, if I should write that goodly catalogue it would take me a long time.

Q. Well, did you name Miss Anthony among them? A. I have forgotten whether I did or not; I ought to name her at all events.

Q. Intended? A. No list of those advocates ought to leave out her name.

Q. Exactly. Now, through what channels of public influence of the press or otherwise, did you advocate that cause?

A. Through The Independent, and through all the journals that I have had any control of, and the public platform.

Mr. Beach—And tracts?

Q. Did you publish tracts also? A. Oh! yes; down in the late times, after it got popular.

MR. TILTON'S OPINIONS ABOUT DIVORCE.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, at what period, if at all, did you entertain discussions in any public prints of which you had control of the new social opinions and views in regard to the regulation of the social connections of the sexes? A. Well, Sir, will you tell me a little more distinctly what you mean by "the new social opinions?"

Q. Well, I don't wish to give it an opprobrious name, nor do I wish to characterize it improperly, but the opinions that concern greater freedom in respect of marriage and its dissolution, and its maintenance only during continued attraction or affection, and not permanently after those sentiments had changed? A. Well, Sir, I think the chief denunciations which I have made against looseness in the marriage relations have been published since Mr. Beecher invaded my house in 1870. My attention had not been specially called to the subject before that. I afterwards published some tracts.

Q. Now, will you give us the time in which you had given place to discussions in any journal under your direction in favor of the liberality of divorce and looseness of marriage? A. Yes, Sir; the date of that began with Mr. Beecher's performance of the Richardson and McFarland marriage in the Astor House. I defended him for that in The Independent. After I established The Golden Age I admitted large discussion in favor of liberality of divorce. Can you oblige me with the date of that performance?

Mr. Evarts—I know nothing whatever about that, if you ask for information.

The Witness—I ask for the date.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know anything about it.

Mr. Beach—He is just as bad at dates as you are.

Mr. Evarts—No; I am not under examination about things in which I have taken part.

The Witness—Well, I took no part in that ceremony.

Mr. Evarts—Well, you referred to it, but I prefer not to have these discussions; I will endeavor to be polite whenever you ask for information outside of the case, but anything further—

Mr. Shearman—[Handing witness a large file of The Independent.] Independent of Dec. 1st, 1870; look at that article. A. Yes, Sir; I see it.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Shearman]. I will help you, Mr. Shearman. [Laughter.]

Mr. Shearman—I am quite able to stand it; I am only afraid of troubling the reporters.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Beach.] I did not know that you had got into position.

Mr. Beach—I have.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton cannot see it so far off.

The Witness—I don't need to see it.

Mr. Evarts—You looked at that article under the date of that issue? A. Yes, Sir; I see it.

Q. You were the editor at that time, were you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That article was published as the leading editorial of that day, was it not? A. Well, yes, Sir; there it is; it speaks for itself.

Q. And was it written by you? A. It was, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I now read from The Independent of December 1st, 1870. The column reads as follows:

The Independent.

THEODORE TILTON, Editor.

HENRY C. BOWEN, Publisher and Proprietor.

NEW-YORK, December 1, 1870.

LOVE, MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

"To love, to love—this is to live."

So sang a poet of France. If this is French sentiment, it is also apostolic philosophy.

"He that hath loved another," said St. Paul, "hath fulfilled the law." And, as if to give to this truth a stamp of universal currency he recoinced it into the golden text, "Love is the fulfilling of the law." This is another way of saying that love is the supreme function of life.

But what is love? Who has analyzed it, of what gossamer is it woven or out of what adamant is it hewn? What are its quintessential elements? and especially does it outlive life or must it die with death?

The poets sing a various song on this wondrous theme—jarring their harps to a strife of clashing sounds. Here, for instance, is William Morris, making Andromeda, in "The Earthly Paradise," say to Perseus:

"Oh, love, to think that love can pass away!
That, soon or late, to us shall come a day
When this shall be forgotten! E'en this kiss,
That makes us now forget the high God's bliss,
And sons of men, with all their misery."

And, furthermore, in the same poem:

"Love while ye may: if twain grow into one,
'Tis for a little while—the time goes by.
No hatred 'twixt the pair of friends doth lie;
No trouble break their hearts; and yet, and yet,
How could it be? We strove not to forget;
Rather in vain to that old time we clung;
Its hopes and wishes round our hearts we hung;
We played old parts; we used old names. In vain.
We go our ways, and twain once more are twain."

But, as if to give a sweet lie to all this doleful prophecy, Mrs. Browning, the St. Cecilia of her sex, exclaims:

"Say never, ye loved once!
God is too near above, the grave below.
And all our moments go
Too quickly past our souls, for saying so."
* * * * *
"Love strikes one hour—LOVE. Those never loved
Who dreamed that they loved once."

To which let us add the following snatch from a German song:

"Child, tell me how love cometh?
It comes unsought, unsent.
And tell me how love goeth?
That was not love which went."

Now, if it could be settled that human love, is, in its essence, immortal; that death does not cut, nor the grave rot the silken cord; then, in approaching the problem of marriages, we could definitely say: "There is but one bond, and it knows no breaking; it binds two souls for time and eternally, so that nothing, either in this world or the next, can divide them from each other, any more than either can be divided from itself. It creates and justifies the instinctiveness exclusiveness—the unselfish selfishness—whereby love claims its own and no; another's; yearning only for its only mate. It gives a reason for one of the prejudices which many hold without reason; we mean the building of a second marriage like a monument on the sepulchre on the first."

But the common voice of mankind replies, "Marriage is dissolved by death." Now, of the soul's dearest passion this may be a righter a wrong philosophy; but accepting this universal opinion as correctly interpreting our inherent nature, the question arises, since marriage is dissolved by death, is it dissoluble by anything else? If so, by what?

To answer what breaks we must inquire what makes the marriage bond.

The Divine Moralist who preached the Sermon on the Mount when He said, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect," held up an ideal of human character impossible of mortal attainment—the despair of flesh-clogged souls. In like manner, in the few and fragmentary notes which his biographers have saved of his utterances on marriage He holds up an ideal, the highest ever conceived, beautiful to struggle after, but impossible to attain. He did not rest marriage on the mere legal union of two persons whom the law, uniting, enacts to be one flesh; but transcending this tie and hallowing it, He taught a spiritual union, which should be so subtle in its willing band, so exclusive in its mutual allegiance, and so reverent of its married mate that "the brief indulgence of a single vagrant fancy" was an infidelity to such wedlock. Who can abide this test? Judged by so immaculate a morality, "there is none good; no, not one."

Nevertheless, as the only just ideal of human character is after all, the divine, and nothing short of it, so the only right ideal of a true marriage is impossible—the perfect picture which Christ sketched. But as there is an approximate realization of this character, notwithstanding the weaknesses of human nature, so also there is a reasonable approach to this marriage, notwithstanding the vicissitudes of human love. Thus a husband and wife—if they have rich hearts and generous minds—if their sympathies interflow like confluent streams—may love each other with such devotion, with such exaltation, with such coronation as to attain to the royal estate which Shakespeare called "a measureless content;" realizing in each a faithfulness of love that could not possibly betray or deceive its other self; a love so infinite that it could contain only its own fullness; a love which, like the sea, could never depart out of its own bosom.

Now, this is the love and the only love that spiritually constitutes marriage; and marriage, however legally enacted, yet without this "spirit of unity" to "create its bond of peace" can be, under Christ's theory, nothing but divorce.

The greatest question which has been propounded to modern society is: What is to be the legal status and what the social fate of persons who find themselves married, but not mated? The common and pusillanimous answer is: To remain in a bondage which it is ostracism to break. But a just moral sense, piercing a sham morality, which is only another name for custom, asks, What excuse can be given to God and to virtue for keeping two human beings in an enforced union which each knows to be degrading to both their souls? A public opinion which compels the juxtaposition, or which forbids the disconnection of an unmated pair, who are tied, not knit—chained, not wedded—violates the ethics of Him who, preaching from the mountain-top of morals, taught so terrible a distinction between love and lust. Marriage without love is a sin against God—a sin which, like other sins, is to be repented of, ceased from and put away. No matter with what solemn ceremony the twain may have been made one, yet, when love departs, then marriage ceases, and divorce begins. This is the essence of Christ's idea. To say that He granted divorce only for a gross and fleshly crime is to forget that He called the eye a paramour and the heart of wanton's bed. Even granting that one of his speeches seems to call adultery the only divorce, yet in His other maxims in illustrating what He meant by adultery, He set forth an ideal of so faithful a fidelity that most marriages estimated by this standard would be proved adulterous and be pronounced by His withering judgment null and void.

How shallow, then, it is to say with the Roman Church, that there shall be no divorce, not even for fleshly lust; or with the Episcopal, no divorce except for just this and this only; or, with the Presbyterian, no divorce except for this and for desertion; or with the Methodist missionary board, no divorce except for these and for heathenism; or, with the civil laws of some of our States, no divorce except for a few of the more common and hideous offenses which daily report themselves to our Courts.

John Milton was right in declaring (we do not quote his words, but only his meaning), that whatever nullifies marriage justifies divorce. With faint echo we repeat the same truth, which, to our mind, seems so true as to be fundamental. Nor, in following Milton, do we wander in a dangerous path. This man was no loose philosopher—no blasé gallant—no free lover. For, though his voice thundered for freedom of divorce, it pleaded with sweet eloquence for strictness in marriage. Learning as well as we may from so illustrious a teacher, this journal, with its liberal views on divorce, remains an austere moralist on marriage. It utterly spurns, rejects and repudiates the doctrine of free love. It stands at the very antipodes of this philosophy. It holds that a man and woman whose mutual love is not sufficient to inspire mutual fidelity, prove thereby that they have never known the fullness, purity and all sufficiency of the one love which makes marriage sacred, and which keeps it so. The only marriage worthy to be called by the name of that great sacrament is the exclusive union of one with one, not the patriarch union of one with many, and not the modern sub-rosa union of many with each other. Marriage, if it be marriage at all, is the unswerving faithfulness of husband and wife, admitting no intervening mistress for the one, no supplemental paramour for the other.

But this idea (and this idea cannot but be true) carries with it as its logical sequence (and this too cannot but be true) the irresistible conclusion that marriage, if broken, and whether broken by the body or the soul, is divorce. Infidelity of the body is not so great a sin against marriage as the infidelity of the soul. If there is divorce for the one, there should all the more be divorce for the other. Human society needs, for its purification, a more chivalrous fidelity to marriage—a more honorable respect for divorce. A nation without marriage would be without civilization. A nation without divorce must be without virtue. In France, the law tolerates no divorce; and so the people practice universal license. In Prussia, the law opens seven gates of exit from marriage, and so the fashionable standard of morality is almost puritanic.

Now, the proverb warns us that "history is philosophy teaching by example." Apply this philosophic warning to our own land. Our American society is covering itself with a growing mildew of free love. This corroding fungus is everywhere so plain that all eyes are beginning to see it. What is the cause? And what the cure?

The cause is twofold. First, in the injudicious and lamentable haste with which the law is invoked to tie a knot between two persons who only fancy, but have not proved their fitness for each other; and second, in a public opinion which, forbidding the dissolution of such ill made contracts, forces imprisoned spirits, fretting at a captivity from which they cannot openly break, to take covert refuge in secret sin.

The cure is likewise twofold. First, in a higher and holier idea of marriage—including the chastity which should accompany it, the devotion which should foster it, and the love which should hallow it; and next, in public opinion expressed authortatively in our civil statutes, enacting that whatever in point of moral nullifies marriage, should in point of law authorize divorce.

God grant that there may come a time in the legislation of our country when the laws of the land shall be founded on the facts of the soul!

Mr. Evarts—[Handing paper to witness.] Will you look at that and say whether you recognize that as a production of yours—I am sure I don't know whether it is or not? A. I should have to compare that with the original. It strikes me on the first glance that it is a garbled copy. I have not read the original since it was first published. I can—

Q. You can verify it, can you? A. I can produce it to you. I don't impute everything to a person because I see it in print. I know nothing about it. It is an imperfect copy, I think.

Q. [Handing paper to witness]: Do you recognize that as The Graphic newspaper? A. No, Sir, I do not; it may be so, but I don't recognise it; I can procure for you though, a correct copy if you desire it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I will. I will have this marked for identification as the paper shown the witness.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no; it is not identified.

Mr. Evarts—It is marked for identification as the paper shown the witness.

Judge Neilson—It is produced as the original until the original is substituted.

Mr. Beach—It should not be marked until it is identified.

Mr. Evarts—We don't mark papers as exhibits until they are identified. I marked this as a paper I have submitted to the witness.

Judge Neilson—So that it may be held until the production of the other paper.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Will you produce that in the morning or after the recess? A. The original was printed in The Golden Age, and if it will be any pleasure for you to have it, I will send over and beg the gentleman who owns the paper to procure a copy or else lend you the file.

Mr. Evarts—I don't wish to put you to any unnecessary trouble. This professes to be an entire poem, I think. [Handing paper to witness.] Look at that date and say whether that enables you to remember or not—I don't know anything about it—about the time you wrote it? A. August 1st, 1873. This is the date of an advertisement on the back of the paper.

Mr. Evarts—It only shows that is about the date of the newspaper. Of course it may have been written years before.

Mr. Fullerton—What paper was it published in?

The Witness [To Mr. Evarts]—What question do you wish me to answer?

Mr. Evarts—I only asked you if you can remember now about the date of its being written, whether that assists you anything about it. A. No, Sir; but I can procure for you the original.

Q. And the date? A. Yes, Sir; the paper which contains it.

Q. Will you look at that first article and say if that was written by you? [Handing witness a copy of The Golden Age.] A. No, Sir; the first article is a selection from Hearth and Home.

Mr. Beach—What was the question?

The Witness—He asked me if the first article was written by me, and I said no.

Mr. Evarts—If you look at it you will see what the text is.

The Witness—The second article was written by me, not the first.

Q. The first was taken from the newspaper, and you wrote underneath it a reply to it? A. A reply to it; yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Is that from The Golden Age?

Mr. Evarts—From The Golden Age.

The Witness—Perhaps I ought to inform you, Mr. Evarts, that that article was one of the numerous devices.

Mr. Evarts—Well, now—

The Witness—Which Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton and I entered into.

Mr. Evarts—Wait until I ask you.

Judge Neilson—Wait until the counsel interrogates you.

Mr. Evarts—There will be an opportunity for you to explain on the re-direct examination, anything that I omit.

The Witness—I don't care to make the explanation, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Very well, then, as we none of us care about it.

Mr. Shearman—I read from The Golden Age of October 14th, 1871. There are two articles; one is written in reply to the other. I shall read only a part of that, to which it is a reply—just enough to explain the second. [To Mr. Beach.] Do you say you wish me to read the whole of what Mr. Tilton said?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman [reading]: "In Memoriam—Theodore Tilton."

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is from The Hearth and Home.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir; I read from The Hearth and Home of October 14th, 1871:

IN MEMORIAM—THEODORE TILTON.

[From Hearth and Home October 14, 1871.]

It is with peculiar sadness that we write these words. They recall the vision of the young man who sprang all at once into public favor, giving such evidence of genius as few men have furnished. Writing double-leaded leaders full of force and fire, singing songs full of sweetness, uttering orations full of wit and eloquence, his sunny looks wore at once the "triple crown of editor, orator and poet." Succeeding to the vacant chair of Beecher, he more than filled it. He introduced a new era in religious journalism. In those golden days he made his paper all that the name Independent could mean. It bowed neither to sect nor party, and its words scorched a villain in the ranks of its own friends as fearlessly as they did an opponent. The paper under his editorship scorned to follow its party. It led. Like a new knight, the gallant young journalist uttered his battle cry and rode bravely to victory. Men laughed at him, but they followed him. He had a noble ideal of journalism. He wrote witty things against an opponent, but did not use his columns to gratify personal spleen. And when the worst attacks were made upon him he said to a friend, "I must not let these things sour me. I cannot afford to let my own temper become spoiled. And I want to leave journalism better than I found it." His enemies said that he greatly over-estimated his own position. Perhaps he did. But there was no wronged or down-trodden person appealed to him in vain.

Mr. Shearman—The counsel for the plaintiff desire me to read the whole, including the poetry. The Court will pardon me for introducing so much poetry into the case.

He was a singer of sweet songs—songs full of brave cath-

Mcity of spirit, full of deep religious feeling, full of high moral sentiment—songs full of lofty patriotism. Nothing shows a man's freshness of heart more than his ability to please children. And from one ocean to the other, little children sang with him that most perfect nursery rhyme which begins :

"Baby Bly,
Here's a fly:
Let us watch him, you and I,
How he crawls
Up the walls,
Yet he never falls!
I believe with those six legs,
You and I could walk on eggs!
There he goes
On his toes,
Tickling baby's nose!"

In times of patriotic fervor his great "Bell Roland" rang out with no doubtful peal. The religious heart was touched with the sad minor key of such poems as "The Crown of Thorns," in which there is devoutness enough of feeling and wittiness enough of conceit, to make it worthy of Jeremy Taylor. There is a solemn genuine faith in his words,

"So in my heart of stone
I sepulchre thy death.
While thoughts of Thee, like roses blown,
Bring sweetness in their breath.

"Arise not, Oh my dead!
As He whom Mary sought,
And found an empty tomb instead,
Her spices all for naught.

"Oh Lord! not so depart
From my enshrining breast,
But lie anointed in a heart,
That by Thy death is blest,

"Or, if Thou shalt arise,
Abandon not thy grave.
But bear it with Thee to the skies,
A heart that Thou shalt save."

And then he wrote "A Layman's Confession of Faith," every line of which is worthy of quotation in an obituary such as this. There is one passage in it, which in this day of Woodhulls and free love advocacy we cannot forbear quoting :

"I love one woman with a holy fire,
Whom I revere as priestess of my house;
I stand with wondering awe before my babes,
Till they rebuke me to a nobler life."

Never did this young Apollo write more fervently and gracefully than when he spoke of his wife and his home, and it is gratifying to know that his gallant devotion, so often expressed, so gracefully wreathed in his dedication of his poems to the sweetness and sanctity of home life, was an inspiration in the same direction to his crowd of admirers.

It is with inexpressible sadness, for we admired and loved him, that we bring this memorial article to a close. Can it be possible that we shall no more hear that brave voice pleading the cause of right and duty—that we shall no more hear that poetic gift breathing out sweetness, devoutness and purity of feeling. Can it be that he who struck down with remorse his best friend when he thought that friend recreant, shall not live to speak now against those who would defile the sanctuary of the home to which he was so devoted, teaching their doctrines of devils as a cloak to their lust? What would we not give for one stroke of that old scimeter at those who put darkness in the place of light. But we must bear our sorrow, mournfully reflecting on the light so brilliant that has gone out in darkness as utter.

We know there is a pseudo-Tilton who uses the graces of rhetoric to gild the character of a woman about whom it is enough to say that she edits a paper abominable in morals and coarse in its utterances! There is a Tilton who writes insane things about spirits of ancient Greek orators inspiring the meretricious rhetoric of a woman who advocates free love! There is a Tilton who sees a Golden Age in French Communism. But that is quite another affair. We have hastened to pay our tribute to the memory of Theodore Tilton, ere this later and counterfeit Tilton should cause the world utterly to forget the brave deeds of Theodore Tilton the lamented.

MR. TILTON'S REPLY TO THE ABOVE.

To the Editor of The Hearth and Home:

MY DEAR SIR: I am fond of wit, even at my own expense. Your clever satire of last week, speaking of me as one dead, and giving me (as Captain Luce of the Arctic had) an opportunity to read, before I did, the estimate which my fellow countrymen will put upon me after my death, has almost tempted me into sending you a retort in kind—just for jest.

But I remember a story told of Dr. Williams and Dr. Emmons—two old Congregational clergymen whom you and I reverence more for their characters than their creeds.

They agreed with each other that as soon as either should die the other should preach the funeral sermon. Dr. Williams shortly afterward retired from the ministry, and, having nothing to do, composed with ornate pen a flowery and funereal tribute to his friend—under some such heading, I suppose, as "In Memoriam—Dr. Emmons." When the brilliant panegyric was finished, its author carried it to Dr. Emmons (just as you sent me last week's Hearth and Home) and treated him (as you treated me) to an ante-mortem monument to undeparted worth. The strain of compliment being high, Dr. Emmons, who thought he was getting more praise than he deserved, interrupted the reading by saying, "Is there not too much encomium?"—to which the reader suddenly replied, "Hash, Dr. Emmons, you are dead!"

But Dr. Emmons was not dead to the fine flattery of his friend, nor am I to yours. Furthermore, as in my case, the praise is tempered with blame, the latter, perhaps, being better deserved than the former. I will substitute for my first thought, which was fun, a sober second thought, full of serious intent.

If, therefore, amid the roses which you have heaped upon me, I can detect the red thorns or exact points of your criticism, they seem to be—

First. That I am an advocate of "Free Love."

No, my friend, you are wrong in this supposition. When and where have I ever advocated "free love?" In what writings or speeches of mine have you ever seen any vindication, or anything but condemnation, of the idea popularly known as "free love?" I have characterized this phrase as "a beautiful term designating a revolting thing." The original coiners of the word flung it as a reproach at certain socialists; and they meant by it the promiscuous intermingling or commerce of the sexes—an idea, which, to me, is an affront to our higher human nature—a degrading of men and women to a level with a lower world. "Free love," thus defined and practiced, is treason to good morals; and I am therefore opposed to it or to any other baseness.

But, in justice to a number of noble reformers (to whom more honor will be rendered in the next generation than they can look for in this), I ought to say that this term is used by them in a technical sense, as meaning "love, free from the civil law;" or, in other words, that marriage and divorce should be (at least to a great extent) removed from the realm of legislation and left (as religion is left in free countries) to be governed by its own higher law. If this definition shall be popularly and permanently attached to the term "free love," then, as I thoroughly believe in this idea, I shall cheerfully accept this designation.

My opinions on marriage and divorce are the same now as when I first formed them, which was during my college days, by reading the writings of John Milton. I teach no different doctrines now from those which I first faintly sounded on entering (somewhat premature) into public life. Milton's essay on Divorce—which I studied for style and logic, and with a boy's natural repugnance for the whole subject—became, by that study, as much a part of my intellectual constitution as Blackstone's lectures are to a lawyer. If that great essay—by one of the first minds of the world—has ever been answered, I have not seen the answer. True, my friend Mr. Greeley sometimes overthrows it with a hasty paragraph or two, but it will live after THE TRIBUNE is forgotten.

Secondly, you chide me for vindicating a lady who has suffered more private sorrow, and more public obloquy than fall to the lot of ordinary mortals. This criticism I accept with pride. When I know a woman well, and believe her to be honorable and pure, and she is attacked by "the mob of gentlemen who write with ease," and is reviled by slanderers who strike at her from the safe shelter of an anonymous press, I hope I shall never be coward enough to withhold my own poor pen from her defense. I have an extensive acquaintance among public men and women of our time, including many whom I believe to be uncommonly pure and white in their moral and social character; for instance, Lucretia Mott, Horace Greeley, Mrs. Stanton, Charles Sumner, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Wendell Phillips, Laura Curtis Bullard, and others; and among these—the peer of any in all that constitutes personal purity of life—I place Victoria C. Woodhull. I speak from knowledge; I weigh my words; I mean what I say; and I stand by it. But I am ashamed of my many brethren of the press who, without evidence, without provocation, and without inquiry, have made haste to strike a woman whose private life is a white lily of blamelessness, and who, if altogether a fanatic, is also altogether a Christian.

Thirdly, you call me a Spiritualist. Well, so was President Lincoln. Why should you assassinate me on this account? There are more Spiritualists than Methodists; and the one sect has just as much right to its opinions as the other—at least, in a country which professes to tolerate all religions. But the truth is, that although I have seen many marvels of so-called spirit manifestations, I have no satisfactory theory on the subject; and I know too little of Spiritualism to write with authority concerning it, or even to bear the honorable name of membership in its fraternity. But I think I have enough fairness of mind to write a biography of Bishop Simpson from a Methodist point of view, or of Elder Evans from a Shaker point of view, or of Mrs. Woodhull from a Spiritualistic point of view—even though I am not a Methodist, or Shaker, or Spiritualist.

Fourthly, speaking like a Paris prefect of police, you denounce me as a Communist. Yes, I am. I accept your indictment as I would a rosette, and wear it in my button-hole. I never saw Henri Delescluse, but he was a man after my own heart, and I mourn him as I would any other hero or martyr. Communism is not agrarianism, as many people ignorantly imagine; it is republicanism, and Americans ought everywhere to honor it. The Commune offered to France what the Republic refused it—namely, local self-government. Among all the semi-successful frauds of our time, the greatest is the pretended Republic of which Thiers is at the head to-day, and of which I trust he will be at the foot to-morrow. The atrocities in Paris did not come from the Commune, but from Versailles. It was the Commune, not the Republic, that should have triumphed. A few writers and speakers among us have had the courage to applaud the Commune; such as Wendell Phillips, Charles A. Dana, George Wilkes and John Russell Young; and I rejoice to remember that not one of these clear headed men was ahead of myself, either with voice or pen, in vindicating the noblest attempt at political liberty which Europe ever saw or crushed. But the Commune will yet arise and reign! God speed it!

In conclusion, let me add that I have never been a contributor to Hearth and Home, nor do I know that any of my writings (except your last week's quotations from the poems of my "green and salad days,") have ever been reprinted in your columns; but if you will give me a brotherly hint that I shall be welcome to the space of a second letter for the purpose of stating my views on the social questions now stirring the public pulse, I will gladly enable your readers to judge for themselves whether these views are right or wrong.

Meanwhile, for my own "hearth and home" (to which you so kindly allude) I send to yours (at which all the public find a weekly welcome) the fraternal greetings of yours, forgivingly,

THEODORE TILTON.

ANOTHER POEM ADMITTED.

Mr. Evans—My learned friends say that this effusion may be read now [referring to the poem "French with a Master"] to be corrected afterwards, if it is found to be different. It is apparently complete. [Reading:]

FRENCH WITH A MASTER.

A NEW POEM BY THEODORE TILTON.

*Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre,
[To love, to love, this is it to live.]*

Teach you French? I will, my dear!
Sit down and con your lesson here.
What did Adam say to Eve?
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Don't pronounce the last word long;
Make it short to suit the song;
Rhyme it to your flowing sleeve,
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Sleeve, I said, but what's the harm
If I really meant your arm?
Mine shall twine it (by your leave),
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Learning French is full of slips;
Do as I do with the lips;
Here's the right way, you perceive,
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

French is always spoken best
Breathing deeply from the chest;
Darling, does your bosom heave?
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Now, my dainty little sprite,
Have I taught your lesson right?
Then what pay shall I receive?
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Will you think me ever bold
If I linger to be told,
Whether you yourself believe,
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Pretty pupil, when you say
All the French to me to-day,
Do you mean it or deceive?
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Tell me, may I understand
When I press your little hand,
That our hearts together cleave?
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Have you, in your tresses room
For some orange buds to bloom?
May I such a garland weave?
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

Or, if I presume too much,
Teaching French by sense of touch.
Grant me pardon and reprieve!
Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

..... Sweetheart, no! you cannot go!
..... Let me sit and hold you so.
..... Adam did the same to Eve!
..... Aimer, aimer, c'est à vivre.

[Masked "H. D. 54."]

[Upbraiding laughter.]

Judge Neilson—That is quite sufficient, gentlemen—quite sufficient. ....

Mr. Morris—I guess we better accept that as the original.

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—For fear the original is not as good as that, Sir, we will accept that as the original.

MR. TILTON'S FREE-LOVE DISCUSSIONS.

Q. Look at this article, Mr. Tilton, the article which contains the parts pencil marked there, and say if it was written by you and published in your newspaper? [Handing witness a copy of The Golden Age.] A. Yes, Sir. I beg your pardon, Mr. Everts. Did you call my attention to any special article?

Q. I asked about the article that has some pencil marks drawn against portions of it? A. Yes, Sir, I wrote that. My name is signed to it.

Mr. Beach—What is it?

Mr. Shearman—It is an article entitled "Mr. Tilton's Rejoinder to Mr. Greeley."

Mr. Morris—What is the date of it?

Mr. Shearman—Published in The Golden Age of September 9th, 1871. This is a long article constituting eight paragraphs. As only one of them is material to this point—

Mr. Everts—The others relate to other topics.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir, they relate to other topics.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you read the article to which it is a reply?

Mr. Shearman—It is not published in this paper.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, it is published there.

Mr. Shearman—Oh, is it?

Mr. Everts—The rejoinder is published here.

Mr. Fullerton—If we have the sermon, let us have the text.

Mr. Beach—Then we shall have to read the whole of that article.

Mr. Everts—Well, we will read our part.

Mr. Shearman—I read the third paragraph of Mr. Tilton's rejoinder.

Mr. Morris—Just read Mr. Greeley's letter first.

Mr. Shearman—No, it is not necessary.

The Witness—Won't you read the whole article?

Mr. Beach—I think it is the rule, Sir, that where an answering letter is read, the letter to which it was a reply should be read also.

Judge Neilson—I think that is the rule. Perhaps if counsel will look at it they can judge whether it is material.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor, we understand exactly what the rule is. All that can be claimed by our learned friends is that it gives them a right to read any part of the paper to which it is a reply, if they see fit. They cannot make us read it.

Mr. Beach—I differ with my learned friend in regard to the rule.

Mr. Everts—We had the opposite view in the early part of this trial.

Mr. Beach—Never, Sir, in this trial.

Mr. Everts—I think so.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir. You are mistaken.

Judge Neilson—I have had occasion to say that where one party puts a paper in they were at liberty to read a part of it.

Mr. Beach—No doubt, Sir.

Judge Neilson—But it was deemed all put in by them, and the other side could read any portion of it they thought proper.

Mr. Fullerton—That does not present this case.

Judge Neilson—No, Sir.

Mr. Everts—How does it fall to present this case? Supposing it is all in, are we obliged to read it all? Is not that precisely the question, and in accordance with every ruling, that a party reads what he thinks is important to himself, and the other side have a right to read what they think proper?

Mr. Fullerton—Then his answer is incomprehensible without we have the article to which it is a reply.

Mr. Everts—That is a misfortune.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to mend your misfortunes as well as I can by proposing that the whole article be read in the first instance, and then see whether we think the reply is appropriate.

Mr. Everts—I do not understand that we are obliged to read the whole article to get at the point which is important to us.

Judge Neilson—I think the whole must be deemed put in by you.

Mr. Everts—That may be.

Judge Neilson—And you read such part as you now think proper, and they can afterwards call attention to other parts. I think that will answer. [To Mr. Fullerton.] It may burden you with subsequent reading perhaps.

Mr. Fullerton—It won't be any burden for me to read anything that Mr. Tilton has written, Sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. Everts—This discussion between these two gentlemen—Mr. Greeley and Mr. Tilton—which was somewhat elaborate, represents other subjects, as I understand—I have never seen the letter—other subjects than this, and we have found a paragraph of Mr. Greeley's that seems to relate to this topic. If our learned friends prefer—

The Witness—The whole subject is one.

Mr. Beach—But this is offered as an admission or statement made by Mr. Tilton. Mr. Tilton says that "if a person, in making an admission against his own interest, refers to a written paper without which the admission is not complete, the contents of the paper ought to be shown before the statement can be used as evidence against the party."

Mr. Everts—Shown to the witness?

Mr. Beach—Shown to the witness? No, Sir; shown to the Court and Jury, who are to understand the admission and construe it.

Mr. Everts—Well, that is the rule of evidence that your Honor has passed upon, that it gives the right to the other side to use it. There is not any rule by which we are obliged to read everything that they have a right to. It certainly has not been applied in this case.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will apply that now, leaving the other side to read, as yours, any portion they may think proper hereafter.

Mr. Shearman—I read now an extract from Mr. Greeley's letter, including the whole of one separate paragraph. The paragraphs are numbered 1, 2, 3.

The Witness—Mr. Everts, will you do me a personal favor, Sir? Will you do me a personal favor? Read this article yourself.

[Mr. Shearman laughed scornfully.]

Mr. Everts—It would be a contempt of Court, I am afraid.

Judge Neilson—Which part do you read; which section; which number do you read now?

Mr. Shearman—From the paper of September 9th, 1871.

Judge Neilson—The number of the paragraph you read?

Mr. Shearman—The first paragraph of Mr. Greeley's letter? [Reading:]

I. You ask me what I mean by "Free Love." Let me illustrate:

Here are a husband and wife, each fifty years old, who have lived in wedlock a quarter of a century, and have had six or eight children, of whom half survive. The pains and cares of maternity have nearly worn out the wife, while the husband is still in the prime of manly vigor and strength. He has filled a wider sphere and enjoyed better opportunities for mental culture than she has, and feels himself her intellectual superior. Among his acquaintances is a younger, fairer, fresher woman, not so richly dowered with worldly wealth, who admires and is admired by him—who, in fact, is willing, if invited, to be his "affinity," and he is more than willing that she shall. If they "take up" with each other, their arrangement, or whatever you please to call it, is just what I execrate as "Free Love." You know that such alliances exist. I feel that they are abhorred of God and a chief cause of human degradation, family disruption and general wretchedness. In short, I hold the man who has sworn to love and cherish one woman till death, not free to love another while that woman lives and strives to fulfill toward him the duties of a loving wife. Hence, I intensely hate "Free Love;" and I hate all inculcation that a marriage may rightfully be dissolved, except for flagrant, deliberate adultery, while husband and wife both live.

I now read the third paragraph of Mr. Tilton's reply, which is as follows, in this letter in which this subject is referred to:

III. A just inference from your letter is that I advocate Free Love. On the contrary, I stiffly oppose it. The latest bulletin of Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews castigates me because I hold that the heart's ideal is monogamic marriage—the supreme love of one man for one woman through life, and (I hope) beyond death. But this is only my own view—I do not judge for others. Furthermore, I hold that love, and love only, constitutes marriage; that marriage makes the bond, not the bond marriage: and that as the contract is to "love and honor," so when the love and honor end, the contract dissolves, and the marriage ceases. I cheerfully relieve Mr. Henry B. Blackwell and other martinets in Boston by frankly acknowledging that I differ in these views from most other woman suffragists. But I am willing to take all the obloquy which this difference invokes on the few who are right from the many who are wrong. I would no more permit the law of the land to enchain me to a woman whom I did not love, or who did not love me, than I would permit the same law to handcuff me as a slave to a master on a plantation. There are higher laws than civil statutes, and I am a rebel against the State's too impertinent interference between man and wife. Love should be like religion—free from mandate by the civil law. Now, you may strike me for saying this, but the next generation will gild this sentiment with fine gold. As Kossuth said, "I can wait."

[Paper "Marked D 54."]

Judge Neilson—There is something farther.

Mr. Bench—It is, nevertheless, an answer to the paragraph read by Mr. Greeley.

Judge Neilson—It should be read now, I suppose.

Mr. Fullerton—It is our right to read it now, if they do not, I believe.

Mr. Shearman—We will read it—the 4th and 5th:

IV. You say, "I hate all inculcation that a marriage may be rightfully dissolved except for flagrant, deliberate adultery, while husband and wife both live." I am ashamed of such a sentiment from your pen. Thousands of good women, like Mrs. McFarland, have obtained divorces from drunken and beastly husbands, not on account of adultery, but of sottishness or cruelty. By what right, divine or human, shall you remand these emancipated women to the loathsome embraces of men from whom they have fled in fear of their lives? Thousands of women, appealing to merciful and humane courts, have obtained divorces because husbands have deserted them, or mangled them, or starved them, or otherwise wrongly treated them. Why will you cruelly affront all womankind, by saying to each one of these suffering women, "Your divorce is stripped of all moral sanction, and I point at you the finger of obloquy, because you have asked the law to deliver you out of the jaws of death, and out of the gates of hell."

V. You have instanced a married pair who, after a quarter of a century of wedlock, exhibit the husband in his prime, the wife in her decay. "He," you say, "has filled a wide sphere and enjoyed better opportunities for mental culture than she has, and feels himself her intellectual superior." What an innocent confession you here make of your own damning theory of marriage! Doom a woman to be man's inferior from the very beginning of her married life, and what can you expect her to be at the end of it? Why does a woman, after twenty years of wedlock, show more physical and mental dilapidation than a man? It is because, during these years, you and your fellow thinkers sentence her to be man's subordinate, not his equal—his servant, not his mate. Why should "the pains and cares of maternity wear her out," except that you enacted a common law of marriage which either tyrannously forces or tacitly expects a woman to bear more children than she wants? Why should she be intellectually stupid and empty, except that, all her life long, you and THE TRIBUNE have shut her out from her husband's opportunities? Why should her husband have "a wider sphere" than hers, except that you and he have conspired to crowd her into a narrower one? Why should he enjoy better opportunities for mental culture than she, except that you have written and published your threats that even if your own daughters should attempt to fit themselves for something higher than household employment, or, in other words, should try to rise to the level of their father's genius, you would step down like Jacob sorrowfully into the grave? I frankly assert, because I solemnly believe, that the young men and women who marry to-day, and who derive their notions of the marriage relation from such teachers as you, will inevitably grow apart, until, at the end of a "quarter of a century of wedlock," they will find themselves in the very antithesis which you have described. Beware lest they curse your memory for bringing them to it!

IMPERSONALITY IN JOURNALISM DISCUSSED.

Mr. Evarts—[Handing paper to witness.] Look at that issue.

The Witness—Will you read it?

Mr. Evarts—No; nothing exhibitary is admitted in a court of justice.

The Witness [after a pause]—Did you ask me a question, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—I asked you to look at that and at the issue of the paper, and see if that appeared in the paper when you were its editor? A. Yes, Sir; it is an extract from The Troy Times. I didn't write it.

Mr. Evarts—No; it don't purport to be written by you.

The Witness—I don't think I ever saw it until this moment.

Mr. Evarts—Still it is in your newspaper. [To the Court.] I propose, if your Honor please, to read this article which I showed my learned friends.

The Witness—It is a little extract made in the news column from a Troy paper.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will see what it is.

Mr. Beach—I understand the counsel to propose to read an extract from The Troy Times, which was published in The Golden Age during Mr. Tilton's proprietorship of that paper. Mr. Tilton says he does not know that he ever saw it until it is shown to him now on the stand.

Judge Neilson—It cannot be read, therefore.

Mr. Morris—He says he thinks he did.

Mr. Beach—We object to it.

Judge Neilson—It cannot be read.

Mr. Evarts—We offer to read this paper, The Golden Age, of which Mr. Tilton was sole editor and proprietor if I understand the evidence.

The Witness—The sole editor is always the man who least reads his own paper.

Mr. Evarts—Well, some of the subscribers, perhaps, don't read it any more. [Laughter.] I don't know how that can be; but the proposition is, if your Honor please, that by his publication of it in this paper Mr. Tilton ostensibly holds himself out as the presenter of these propositions to his people—his public. Now, by itself it would amount to perhaps very little, but having shown by the articles already written, and in some degree, perhaps a less degree, by the oral evidence of this witness, his relations to the opinions of Mrs. Woodhull, we think we have a right to present to the Court and the jury this publication of those opinions without dissent or reproach as the position of his paper on this subject thereby shown.

Judge Neilson—I think you cannot read it unless it appears it was published with his knowledge. My friend, the late District Attorney, suggested that question the other day. He indicted the editor of a local paper for an article published in it, and the indictment failed because the article appeared in the paper without the knowledge of the editor. I always thought that principle was correct as applied to his case. There are very many things in a paper that an editor may not see, that may be put in by a subordinate, which he may not think of sufficient importance afterwards to correct.

Mr. Evarts—I agree. It is not on the ground of a personal approval of a particular difficulty.

Mr. Fullerton—Especially if the editor is absent three months in a year lecturing.

Mr. Evarts—But if a public editor presents an article of this kind in consonance with the direct editorial views of his own putting forth in the same paper, we consider it as an element of the paper's position on that question, to wit, the paper of which he is the responsible and continuing editor. I will ask him about that.

The Witness—"The editor holds himself in no wise responsible for the views of the correspondents," printed over the top of the paper.

Mr. Evarts—This is not the views of the correspondents, and so far as that goes perhaps it is an advertisement, but you hold yourself responsible for all the rest. However, I will ask you now whether you saw that article and approved of that extract? A. I don't think that I ever saw it until this moment.

Q. And approved of its insertion in your paper? A. I neither approved nor disapproved of it. It is the habit of The Golden Age, and of any other liberal, fair-minded newspaper, to print the news, and here is an extract.

Q. From a speech of Mrs. Woodhull? A. From a speech of Mrs. Woodhull, printed without comment, exactly as in the same column an extract from the speech of Mr. Evarts might be printed without comment. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—He means the Boston gentleman. However, it had better be omitted. It cannot be read.

Mr. Evarts—It is rather an empty compliment, for nothing of the kind has ever been done for me.

Mr. Beach—It proves you cannot save yourself from distinction, however much you may try.

Mr. Evarts—I have not assumed that form, so far, in The Golden Age, I believe. [To the Court.] Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[Handing paper to witness.] Here is an issue of Sept 16th, 1871—an article on marrying and unmarried. That is your newspaper? A. That is my newspaper, Sir.

Q. And that is not an extract from any other paper? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I offer to read this article.

Mr. Fullerton—That does not entitle the gentleman to read it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't know that—extracts from other papers, anything that appears in quotation marks, is the question disposed of heretofore. Now, I propose to hold an editor responsible in the sphere of public opinion and morality for articles that are published in his newspaper, whether he is personally the writer of them or not, if they appear as the issue of his paper and not credited to any other source.

Judge Neilson—Original matter?

Mr. Evarts—Original matter.

Mr. Fullerton—That is a different question. Does this appear to be original matter? He has not yet shown that.

Judge Neilson—Inspect the paper and see.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't want to inspect the paper and see.

The gentleman has not made his proof and laid the foundation for the production of it.

Mr. Evarts—My proposition is that an editor and publisher of a public newspaper is responsible to public opinion and public morals for the original articles which are put forth in his newspaper, whether he personally writes them or not. The very essence of the independence of journalism as now claimed (and it is not for me to say it is not justly claimed either) is that there must be an impersonality in regard to what a newspaper itself proposes and sets forth as its, the newspaper's, utterances to the public. Now, the other question was of an extract from another paper, and it was a very different matter.

Mr. Beach—They defended it on the same principle.

Mr. Fullerton—The proposition is this, that Mr. Tilton shall be judged by everything that appears in The Golden Age, except that which is an extract from another paper.

Mr. Beach—You are right.

Mr. Fullerton—I am right. That is the proposition of the other side, and it is an extraordinary proposition. How can we hold Mr. Tilton responsible for what appears in that paper without his authority and without his knowledge or sanction in any way? Surely that cannot be done. Your Honor will perceive that correspondents claim the right to be heard in the public press, and they are given an opportunity to be heard, not because their sentiments are in harmony with the sentiments of the editor or proprietor of the paper, but they may be admitted for the purpose of combating them. That is often the case. Now, there is not the slightest proof in this case, so far as this article which they now propose to read is concerned, that it was ever brought under the observation of Mr. Tilton, or that he ever knew that one line of it had ever been published in The Golden Age. Now, until they bring the knowledge of it home to him, to show that he approved it, he is not to be responsible for it. It certainly would be extraordinary if an editor was responsible for an article extracted from another paper and published in his own paper, when he put it there for the purpose only of combating it and showing its falsity, and showing its immorality. An editor is sometimes held legally responsible for everything that appears in his paper, but that question arises in a different way and under different circumstances, and in a different case from the one now on trial. They seek to hold him morally responsible for what is in his paper. They seem to say those must be his sentiments because they are published in his paper; but that is a non sequitur. They are not his because they appear there at all.

Mr. Beach—May I add a single word, if your Honor please? I think, with reference to the principle and the object with which this character of evidence is offered, we can very readily discern the principle by which its admission should be governed. These articles are offered as declarations made on the part of Mr. Tilton, expressive of his sentiments in regard to topics which are considered on the other side odious, for the purpose of identifying him with what are called the "advanced or libertine opinions on the subject of marriage," and that relation. It is now offered to prove an article which was published in the paper, of which the plaintiff was proprietor. It is sought to prove that that article is an expression of the opinions, upon a given subject, of Mr. Tilton. There is not proof that he knew of the publication of the article. There is not the slightest proof that he approves of the sentiments which it expresses. But now, Sir, looking at the purpose and effect of the proof, upon what principle is it that Mr. Tilton is to be judged, by an article which appeared in a paper with which he was connected, when it does not appear, even presumptively, that he was acquainted with the contents of the article; and when it may, on perchance does, express opinions which would be entirely repulsive to his judgment and heart? Look at it in another light, and by analogy. A principal is sometimes held to be responsible for the declarations of his agents where these declarations are authoritative and made in the course of the business which has been confided to the action of that agent. That is not the relation as between the proprietor of a newspaper and the paper itself. These are not declarations made by an agent empowered to express the sentiments of Mr. Tilton upon the marriage relation. The relation of principal and agent is not established, nor is the extent of the authority established which would confer upon a writer for that paper, although in the employment of Mr. Tilton, to express or reveal the opinions which Mr. Tilton may entertain upon this subject, and in whatever light you may regard it, Sir, as it now stands unaided by proof of knowledge or approbation on the part of Mr. Tilton, it is simple declaration of a third party made through an organ which was generally controlled by the plaintiff. Now, I submit to your Honor with great confidence, but with respect, that articles of that character, expressions of that character not traced to Mr. Tilton or to his approval, should not be received for the purpose of characterizing his sentiments upon any subject. But your Honor has decided that question. I submit it is precisely in principle the same proposition which was submitted when the extract from The Troy Times was offered to be read. That was published in Mr. Tilton's paper. It was his paper, in some degree his agent or his oracle, but yet he is not responsible—when his private and personal opinions are sought to be attached to him he is not responsible for all the expressions which may appear in the paper. If this is admitted, why was not the extract from The Troy Times admissible? If without any proof, knowledge or approval, he is to be judged by this article, why not by the article which appears in his paper, whether it be an extract from another or not. This is not his composition, this is not his declaration of sentiments. It is the expression of a third party, precisely the same as the article from The Troy Times expresses the opinions and sentiments of another, and it seems to me the principle applicable to the two cases is perfectly identical, and it must be recognized as a sound principle.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor will observe the attitude which Mr. Tilton and his newspaper occupy to the subject under discussion, and in reference to which the testimony is pertinent, if pertinent at all. Having shown that Mr. Tilton is the editor and proprietor of this newspaper, whatever is the character of his newspaper as put forth in its issues to the public, upon which the public pass in denouncing his publications and his position as a publisher of opinions in this community, calls upon him, not on the question of his individual responsibility as author of this or that paragraph, but upon his editorial, his proprietorial responsibility for diffusing these sentiments through the community. He is held civilly responsible for trespasses upon individual rights in an action of libel, no matter whether he wrote it himself or not. The law has settled that question, that he who publishes is responsible for the publication; and in the case of criminal responsibility, the law is no doubt as your Honor has suggested. But it is prima facie enough to hold criminally an editor, that the complained of article for which he is criminally prosecuted is in his paper; and it depends upon him to prove, not only that he did not write it—that would have been no excuse for him—but that it was not inserted with his knowledge and under general authority which he had given to a subordinate in relation to such matters; but beyond that, that when its existence was brought to his notice, he did all that he could to extirpate it from the paper and exclude it from circulation, as in the case to which your Honor refers, in the matter of the prosecution of the editor of The Argus; for I assume that is the case to which your Honor was alluding. Now, as bearing upon the fortunes and prosperity of this Golden Age, the credit and esteem of Mr. Tilton with the community. No discriminations, as matter of fact, are made by the readers of a journal of those who approve or those who denounce such sentiments, whether it is known that they are from the pen of Mr. Tilton. They are from his office, from his issue, from his presentation to public influence, and for public results of those doctrines in his newspaper; and it might be, if it had been important, that a ground might have been found to press upon your Honor that when he puts forth speeches of this or that public orator, whether Mrs. Woodhull or any one else, that his paper becomes an organ and a means of dissemination of those opinions, and if they are odious, if they are offensive, if they are destructive, and the paper is systematically made the means of their dissemination, why, on the sphere of criminality and morality, which is the sphere which we are now discussing, the editor is responsible as being his issue of those sentiments, whether he wrote them with his own hand or not.

Judge Neilson—In the case of an action of libel, the responsibility for the publication of the article, although it may be taken from another paper, rests upon the principle, that the third person injured—the plaintiff in the case—is to be protected, for his individual protection. The case of an indictment where that is referred to, the Court had reference to the public interest, the public security. The other question, to wit, whether articles published tended to make The Golden Age a good and proper paper, or leave it subject to criticism, and so fall into disrepute and generally inculcate bad manners, is not a moral—is not the question before us. The question before us has to do with the individual sentiments of this witness.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; we agree to that.

Judge Neilson—If the case before us involved the question whether he was a good editor, whether he kept his contracts as published, or not, that again would be different; but this goes to the state of morals of the witness, to his individual sentiments, and I, therefore, think the inquiry should be confined to articles written by himself, or published with his knowledge and sanction; and as the proof now stands I think this article cannot be read.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON SHIELDS HIS CONTRIBUTORS.

Mr. Evarts—[Handing paper to witness.] Look at that article and say if you wrote it?

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, will you step here a moment. [To the Court.] May I speak confidentially to the counsel a moment, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir, if he permits it.

[Mr. Evarts and the witness here consulted together for a short time.]

Q. Now, I ask you if you wrote that, Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it published with your knowledge and approval? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you in any way exhibit, either in that issue or in any subsequent issue, any disapproval of that article? A. I didn't observe either this article or the other, until two or three weeks after my attention was publicly called to it. Then I ascertained to my great astonishment—

Q. You mean the one that was excluded? A. Yes, Sir; they were both written by the same pen.

Q. That purported to be a speech of Mrs. Woodhull? A. No, Sir. Here are two articles printed from a correspondent.

Mr. Evarts—No, I have not asked you that.

The Witness—I thought this was another. There are two in succession.

Mr. Beach—You were asked if you expressed any disapproval? A. I did; I expressed a good deal of dissent and regretted their publication.

Mr. Evarts—Don't talk about their publication, who was the writer of that one? A. I find on looking at this one that it is written by a member of an orthodox Congregational church and a contributor to The Christian Union, and a member of Mr. Beecher's coterie of writers.

Mr. Evarts—Now, we may as well have the name—otherwise we will all be aspersed. Who was the writer?

The Witness—[To the Court.] I ask your Honor's permission to shelter the name of the writer, it being a lady.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know who the lady is, nor do I care who she is, but it seems to be some disparagement—

Judge Neilson—I hardly think so. I think the witness should omit it.

Mr. Evarts—The whole circle seems aspersed.

The Witness—I called Mr. Evarts to me and gave him that hint in private.

Mr. Evarts—I told you I had not asked you who wrote it.

The Witness—But I told you it was written by one of Mr. Beecher's personal friends.

Mr. Evarts—You gave it to me in confidence, and I didn't divulge it.

The Witness—But you mean to put a question to me to make me divulge it.

Judge Neilson—You can answer whether you wrote it.

Mr. Beach—I think the witness and Mr. Evarts should continue this discussion during the recess. It is now one o'clock. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—We should lose our audience, which is the only motive for its continuance. [To the witness.] Now, you have not answered, I think, my question whether you had, either in this issue, or in any subsequent one, said anything in your paper in discountenance of this article or approval of it? A. No, Sir: I spoke personally about it.

Q. You mean to the writer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Not to the public? A. To some of the writer's friends.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I apprehend, if your Honor please, that I am entitled to read the article.

Judge Neilson—The same ruling as to the other.

Mr. Morris—He says he disavowed it.

Mr. Evarts—He says he did not in his newspaper disavow it, but spoke to the writer about it. We so understand him. He spoke to the writer, he says.

Judge Neilson—He didn't disavow it in his paper. He did otherwise disavow it. I think I shall rule it out.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception. The article has so bad a name, I think it ought to be read on its own account to show that it is not so bad as it is represented.

Judge Neilson—We will now take our recess. [To the jurors.] Gentlemen, please be in your seats punctually at 2 o'clock.

THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY AGAIN RULED OUT.

After recess the cross-examination was continued as follows:

Mr. Evarts—[Paper handed to witness.] Look at this and see if that is an issue of your press? A. All except "B. F. Tracy, January 22, 1874."

Q. Well, that happens to be the name of the owner of it, that is not printed, is it? A. No, Sir.

Q. That hardly could be an issue of any man's press, could it? A. Certainly not of mine.

Q. Well, I ask you if that was the issue of your press? A. I say all but the written name on it.

Q. This is the Life of Mrs. Woodhull, about the manner of composition of which you testified in your direct examination. A. Not her life, Sir, but a narrative of it.

Q. Well, a biographical sketch of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is the paper, the production, of which you spoke as to the manner of its composition? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I offer this in evidence now. The witness has given us statements concerning its composition, as your Honor will remember. In his direct examination introduced by my learned friend. I suppose, of course, I am entitled to put it in evidence.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, I do not deem this publication admissible. It has been once ruled out by your Honor. Perhaps the circumstances are somewhat changed under which it is now offered. But it appears that that sketch of Mrs.

Woodhull was corrected after preparation by her husband by Mr. Tilton, and certain parts of it which were not his authorship, as they were prepared by the husband of Mrs. Woodhull, were omitted in the sketch which was written and prepared by Mr. Tilton, with which he was not in harmony, and that it was, so far as he had any connection with it, prepared and issued in pursuance of an arrangement between himself and Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton for the purpose of suppressing the scandal which is now under examination. It is offered for the purpose of concluding Mr. Tilton, or identifying him, at least, with the opinions of that lady, which she expressed. And when it appears as plainly as it does under the evidence as it now stands, without contradiction, that they were not his own opinions in regard to that person; when it is clear that it was prepared for a common purpose between the plaintiff and Mr. Beecher, it seems to me that it is immaterial. The object of its production, as I said, was to identify Mr. Tilton with certain opinions and sentiments, and to prove his approbation in regard to the public history of this lady and her opinions. When it is perfectly apparent that it is not a real expression of his views; that it was a device or stratagem arranged upon between these parties for a specific purpose, acknowledged and known to be a mere device, and not a candid and sincere expression of an opinion on the part of the writer, it seems to me that the introduction of such a paper is wide from the purpose for which it is offered, and that it is in itself immaterial. I therefore submit to your Honor that the general opinions which may be given by Mr. Tilton in regard to the character of a public personage, even if they were the expression of his own real sentiments in regard to that person or to the doctrines which she might advance, are immaterial to any issue in this case. But your Honor will further perceive, so far as I have observed the nature of the evidence now offered, that it is not by any means in itself an adoption of the opinions which are imputed to that lady. It is a sketch or history of a public person in connection with the particular subject out of which, or in connection with which, she has grown notorious. Now, how does that become material, Sir, in this action? It is only upon the argument and theory that such a sketch or history of a public personage is an approval of the doctrines or opinions which that person may be supposed to maintain. I submit to your Honor that a history either of a nation or an individual, is not, in its whole, matter of evidence as against itself, either in regard to the facts or the events which it may detail, and that the approbation of a historic personage by a historian is by no means an adoption of all the opinions or an approval of all the acts which may be attached to that person. The effort is, by the production of this sketch of the life of Mrs. Woodhull, to connect and identify Mrs. Tilton with all the opprobrium, whether just or unjust, which the public may have attached to her supposed notions or doctrines. Now, your Honor must see in the production which is offered, some direct approval or adoption of those supposed sentiments, that a historian cannot be charged, as I have said to your Honor, with the character of the nation or individual which may be the subject of his writ ing. And in that view, if your Honor please, you have heretofore excluded this article as a whole, and have permitted only, I believe, a certain extract or certain extracts to be read from it for the purpose of applying or characterizing certain other testimony.

Judge Neilson—It was the other article.

Mr. Beach—It was from the other article, then, I understand. Now, I submit to your Honor, that before this paper should be received as a whole, it should be submitted to your Honor in some form, either by reading or by personal examination, so that you may understand the nature of its contents and see how far it may be material and appropriate to the issue we are trying. Because, your Honor will perceive, the examination and cross-examination thus far have raised the necessity, and this will but increase the necessity of examining in regard to the real sentiments which Mr. Tilton may, at the time, have entertained in regard to this person, or in regard to the opinions and tenets which were publicly imputed to her at the time. It seems to me we are wandering far off into ranges of collateral inquiry, which are unnecessarily occupying the time of the Court, and will not tend to any elucidation of the particular interests which are to be passed upon by your Honor and the Jury. We, therefore, object to this article as it is offered, in bulk.

Mr. Evans—This seems to be the simplest matter in the world, if your Honor please. Evidence has been introduced in the direct examination of this witness concerning his composition of this book; how, at one stage of its progress, it had dissatisfied the subject of the sketch; and how he subsequently completed it that night, occupying the greater part of the night, and read it to the family of that household the next morning, and it was pronounced a perfect success; something of that kind; some very high encomium passed upon it by that lady and her family. Now, when we undertake to show the thing that he did, they say we cannot show the thing that he did; the manner of its being done, is the only thing that is suitable in evidence. Now, that seems a monstrous proposition. They can introduce in direct evidence from this witness, the author of this book, of the way he wrote that book, and that is pertinent evidence; and then, when we undertake to prove the thing that he did, that is not pertinent evidence. Now, in regard to some general views, they won't, it seems to me, bear examination any better than this particular objection. My learned friend speaks of the state of the evidence as uncontradicted in regard to the degree of harmony that existed between the opinions of this witness and author and this lady, the subject of the memoir. Well, it does not follow that because testimony is not contradicted that it is accepted, and in the same sense in which my learned friends may wish it to be by the triers of questions of fact. But under the evidence it certainly is a question for this Jury to determine if it be a subject to be discussed as an element of fact in this case, what the degree of sympathy, of unity, of confederacy between this lady and this witness and author, in respect to the dissemination of these doctrines and the glorification of the chief champion of them in this country creates. I know no better or safer way for the witness than to take his own eulogy upon the woman, coupled with his own explanation of how he happened to give the eulogy. There is no injustice done in that. In regard to a supposed concurrence on Mr. Beecher's part in this production—well, that seems rather fanciful, because all that has been said about Mr. Beecher in the connection was that he approved of stopping the dissemination of these slanders by kindness and influence with this lady. He never has been heard to approve of this Life of Victoria Woodhull, or its sentiments, or its applause. But if he had it would not make it any less important that, instead of the vague, uncertain and nebulous views about the lady and about the author in connection with the work, the work itself should be the subject to which attention is to be directed—whether Mr. Beecher on the one hand or Mr. Tilton on the other is to be held responsible for it. Now, the connection of this subject with the issues in this cause is two-fold: First, in its primary relation as the evidence of sentiments, of associations, of commitment, of involvement, in these doctrines and with their representative as bearing upon his position then before maintained in reference to the more accepted views of religion and of morals, and the more acceptable organs of public influence through which Mr. Tilton had been acting. It bears also strongly, as your Honor will well remember, upon the question of the swift destruction upon the interests of The Golden Age and its proprietor, of his position and repute before the public which followed from this publication—this very publication, and to meet any ideas that are to be introduced that any harm has come to his prosperity or his fortunes in consequence of the complaint he now makes of the injury which he has suffered from this defendant, and which from the principal issues and the issues on which the whole case depends. Now, if your Honor please, on the simplest proposition, if evidence concerning the thing has been given, the manner of its composition, why then the thing itself may be shown, and then on the grounds I have mentioned it seems to me clearly admissible.

Mr. Fullerton—I think it would be well, if the Court please, to understand the exact attitude of the persons interested in suppressing this scandal in 1871, when this so-called biography was published. Your Honor will recollect that, prior to its publication, this card of Victoria Woodhull appeared in one or more of the New York papers, in which she foreshadowed an intent upon her part to publish this scandal to the world. As a matter of course, this was a cause of great alarm and apprehension, an alarm which reached Mr. Beecher as well as Mr. Tilton. If it lay in the range of human effort it was to be suppressed. They came to the conclusion to leave nothing undone which could be done for the purpose of silencing this threatened exposure. They met together; they consulted as to what should be the course they should adopt to accomplish a common end and to effectuate a common purpose. They supposed that the scandal was effectually suppressed at that time, but here a new danger had arisen, a lion in the way, or, considering the sex of the person who threatened the exposure, I may term it a lioness in the way, not the less dangerous. And it was agreed that Mr. Tilton should go forward to extract the teeth of this dangerous animal, and to substitute the kindly purr for the wicked and threatening growl. He went forward to accomplish that end, not only on his own behalf but on behalf of Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, and with his approval. And, Sir, he wrote that biography for a common purpose—to repress this scandal for the benefit of the one as well as for the benefit of the other, and when his labors closed he received his commendation. I suppose that if to accomplish that object, Mr. Tilton had been called upon to write a glowing eulogy upon Judas Iscariot he would have done it, and it would have received the defendant's blessing. And now, Sir, it is with a bad grace that Mr. Beecher, the defendant in this case, turns upon Theodore Tilton and holds him responsible for the sentiments expressed in that biography, holding him up as an immoral man and promulgating immoral and dangerous sentiments in the community, for the purpose of relieving himself from the consequences of the charge now preferred against him. I call your Honor's attention to these circumstances to the end that you may see that as the proof now stands, Mr. Beecher is to be held responsible for this publication as well as Mr. Tilton. If it should reflect, peradventure, upon the one it reflects equally upon the other. Mr. Beecher will be held responsible for it under the evidence in this case as much as Mr. Tilton, and I think that neither, under the circumstances, is to be held responsible for it. When your Honor views the circumstances which gave rise to the writing of that life, the object which these parties had to effect, and that they effected it by the publication of this biography, you will see that it is improper testimony in this cause, and can serve no good purpose if it is read in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I am at a loss to perceive, if your Honor please, why, because Mr. Beecher will be effected by it, it makes it any the less improper to be offered in evidence.

Mr. Beach—I think, your Honor, that in making these objections the usual order of argument should be pursued.

Mr. Evarts—Why, then, these new suggestions?

Mr. Beach—There are no new suggestions; they are only amplified and enforced.

Mr. Fullerton—I shall not fail to make a suggestion for Mr. Beecher's benefit, if the other side fail to do so.

Mr. Evarts—And, after all, what you say in his favor may not go very far then.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it may go far enough to reach him and do him good.

Mr. Evarts—And get his thanks.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, as Tilton did.

Mr. Evarts—Moulton has had so many! Now, if your Honor please, this is really a matter of considerable importance in regard to the effect of the evidence in this cause. Here is a proposition to prove. We now agree when it is in it may be wrested or probably used by my learned friends to the destruction of the defendant. That is not the question now. And ever since the judgment of Solomon as to the mother of the child you can generally tell which has the true affection for the piece of testimony, the one that wants it in or the one that wants it out.

Judge Neilson—I think I must rule it out, Sir; I can not receive it.

Mr. Fullerton—Solomon's judgment was as to the child, not the mother of it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the child; this is the child.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, but it turns out to be an illegitimate one.

Mr. Evarts—Mark this for identification.

[Book marked for identification.]

Judge Neilson—I ask the reporters to remember that any movement on their part or any conversation on their part, however low, is fatal to the hearing of the reporter who happens to be further off, and is very oppressive. They ought to be considerate towards one another.

THE CLEVELAND LETTER ADMITTED.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception to this ruling. The Cleveland letter, Sir, of which we have now a better record from the files of the Herald, is produced. [Book shown to witness.]

Mr. Shearman—Date of September 2d.

The Witness—Well, what of it?

Judge Neilson—See if you recognize that as the Cleveland letter.

Mr. Beach—Whose? Mr. Beecher's?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; Mr. Beecher's letter. [To the witness.]

Look at it at your leisure.

The Witness—Do you wish me to read it?

Judge Neilson—At your leisure. Look through it enough to see whether it is the letter.

Mr. Evarts—[Producing a sheet.] Here is a more manageable form of it. I suppose it is the same thing.

The Witness—Well, I will read it.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps by recalling the mode of statement or argument—

The Witness—Here is a letter dated "Peekskill, August 30, 1866," signed "Henry Ward Beecher," and I presume it is the Cleveland letter.

Judge Neilson—See if you recognize the sentiment or argument.

The Witness—I don't think there was any argument used. [Examining the paper.]

Mr. Evarts—Have you looked at it, Mr. Tilton? A. Satisfactorily, Sir; for what?

Q. To answer whether that was the basis of the controversy.

A. I have no manner of doubt, Sir, that this is the letter.

Mr. Evarts—I offer it in evidence.

Mr. Beach—We object to it.

Judge Neilson—I think we will receive it, Sir. It is supposed to be the basis of some departure between them.

Mr. Beach—That may be, but it is not at all admissible.

Mr. Morris—Well, that, if your Honor please, will render it necessary to read the speech of Mr. Beecher, in reference to that letter, in the Academy of Music, subsequently. It will let on the whole of that matter, that it will take a week to read.

Mr. Beecher made a speech in the Academy of Music shortly after, retracting that letter, a long speech which I had the pleasure of hearing—about two and a half hours. It will be necessary to show it.

Judge Nelson—No. The proof of the general fact that he made it will be sufficient.

Mr. Morris—No; we will have to read the speech to show that he did.

Judge Nelson—I think this is admissible under the evidence.

Judge Porter [Reading]:

LETTER OF HENRY WARD BEECHER ON NATIONAL RESTORATION.

In their letter of invitation to Mr. Beecher to act as chaplain, the Special Committee of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Convention, to be held at Cleveland on the 17th, say: Your name has been selected by the Executive Committee from sincere admiration of your character and as the only tribute within their power to pay in acknowledgment of your noble devotion to the cause of the Union and your earnest and increasing efforts in behalf of our soldiers and sailors during the recent war.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER'S REPLY.

PREAKILL, Thursday, Aug. 30th, 1866.

CHAS. G. HALPINE, Brevet Brig.-Gen.; H. W. SLOCUM, Maj.-Gen.; GORDON GRANGER, Maj.-Gen., Committee.

GENTLEMEN: I am obliged to you for the invitation which you have made to me to act as Chaplain to the Convention of Sailors and Soldiers about to convene at Cleveland. I cannot attend it, but I heartily wish it and all other conventions, of what party soever, success, whose object is the restoration of all the States late in rebellion to their Federal relations.

Our theory of government has no place for a State except in the Union. It is just taken for granted that the duties and responsibilities of a State in Federal relations tend to its political health, and to that of the whole nation. Even Territories are hastily brought in, often before the prescribed conditions are fulfilled, as if it were dangerous to have a community outside of the great body politic.

Had the loyal Senators and Representatives of Tennessee been admitted at once, on the assembling of Congress, and, in moderate succession, Arkansas, Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina and Virginia, the public mind of the South would have been far more healthy than it is, and those States which lingered on probation to the last would have been under a more salutary influence to good conduct than if a dozen armies watched over them.

Every month that we delay this healthful step complicates the case. The excluded population, enough unsettled before, grows more irritable; the army becomes indispensable to local government, and supersedes it; the Government at Washington is called to interfere in one and another difficulty, and this will be done ineptly, and sometimes with great injustice—for our Government, wisely adapted to its own proper functions, is utterly devoid of those habits, and unacquainted with the instruments which fit a centralized government to exercise authority in remote States over local affairs. Every attempt to perform such duties has resulted in mistakes which have excited the nation. But whatever imprudence there may be in the method, the real criticism should be against the regulation of such duties of the General Government.

The Federal Government is unfit to exercise minor police and local government, and will inevitably blunder when it attempts it. To keep a half score of States under Federal authority, but without nationalities and responsibilities; to oblige the central authority to govern half of the territory of the Union by Federal civil officers and by the army, is a policy not only uncongenial to our ideas and principles, but preëminently dangerous to the spirit of our Government. However humane the ends sought and the motives, it is in fact, a course of instruction, preparing our Government to be despotic, and familiarizing the people to a stretch of authority which can never be other than dangerous to liberty.

I am aware that good men are withheld from advocating the prompt and successive admission of the exiled States by the fear, chiefly, of its effect upon parties and upon freedmen.

It is said, that if admitted to Congress, the Southern Senators and Representatives will coalesce with the Northern Democrats and rule the country. Is this nation, then, to remain dismembered to save the ends of parties? Have we learned no wisdom by the history of the last ten years, in which just this course of sacrificing the nation to the exigencies of parties plunged us into rebellion and war?

Even admit that the power would pass into the hands of a party made up of Southern men, and the hitherto dishonored and misled Democracy of the North, that power could not be used just as they pleased. The war has changed not alone institutions, but ideas. The whole country has advanced. Public sentiment is exalted far beyond what it has been at any former period. A new party would, like a river, be obliged to seek its channels in the already existing slopes and forms of the continent.

We have entered a new era of liberty. The style of thought is free and more noble. The young men of our times are regenerated. The great army has been a school, and hundreds of thousands of men are gone home to preach a true and noble view of human rights. All the industrial interests of society are moving with increased wisdom toward intelligence and liberty. Everywhere—in churches, in literature, in natural sciences, in physical industries, in social questions, as well as in politics—the nation feels that the Winter is over, and a new Spring hangs in the horizon and works through all the elements. In this happily changed and advanced condition of things, no party of the retrograde can maintain itself. Everything marches, and parties must march.

I hear with wonder and shame and scorn the fear of a few that the South once more in adjustment with the Federal Government will rule this nation! The North is rich—never so rich; the South is poor—never before so poor. The population of the North is nearly double that of the South. The industry of the North, in diversity, in forwardness and productiveness, in all the machinery and education required for manufacturing, is half a century in advance of the South; churches in the North crown every hill, and schools swarm in every neighborhood; while the South has but scattered lights, at long distance, like light-houses twinkling along the edge of a continent of darkness. In the presence of such a contrast how mean and craven is the fear that the South will rule the policy of the land! That it will have an influence, that it will contribute in time most important influences or restraints, we are glad to believe; but if it rises at once to the control of the Government it will be because the North, demoralized by prosperity and besotted by groveling interests, refuses to discharge its share of political duty. In such a case the South not only will control the Government, but it ought to do it.

It is feared, with more reason, that the restoration of the South to her full independence will be detrimental to the freedmen. The sooner we dismise from our minds the idea that the freedmen can be classified and separated from the white population, and nursed and defended by themselves, the better it will be for them and us. The negro is part and parcel of Southern society. He cannot be prosperous while it is unprospered. Its evils will rebound upon him. Its happiness and reinvigoration cannot be kept from his participation. The restoration of the South to amicable relations with the North, the reorganization of its industry, the reinspiration of its enterprise and thrift, will all redound to the freedman's benefit. Nothing is so dangerous to the freedman as an unsettled state of society in the South. On him comes all the spite and anger and caprice and revenge. He will be made the scapegoat of lawless and heartless men. Unless we turn the Government into a vast military machine there cannot be armies enough to protect the freedman while Southern society remains insurrectionary. If Southern society is calmed, settled and occupied, and soothed, with new hopes and prosperous industries, no armies will be needed. Riots will subside, lawless hangers on will be driven off or better governed, and a way will be gradually opened up to the freedmen, through education and industry, to full citizenship, with all its honors and duties.

Civilization is a growth. None can escape that forty years in the wilderness who travel from the Egypt of ignorance to the promised land of civilization. The freedmen must take their march. I have full faith in the results. If they have the stamina to undergo the hardships which every uncivilized people has undergone in their upward progress, they will in due time take their place among us. That place cannot be bought, nor bequeathed, nor gained by sleight-of-hand. It will come to sobriety, virtue, industry and frugality. As the nation cannot be sound until the South is prosperous, so, on the other extreme, a healthy condition of civil society in the South is indispensable to the welfare of the freedmen.

Refusing to admit loyal Senators and Representatives from the South to Congress will not help the freedmen. It will not secure for them the vote. It will not protect them. It will not secure any amendment of our Constitution, however just and wise. It will only increase the dangers and complicate the difficulties. Whether we regard the whole nation, or any section of it, or class in it, the first demand of our time is, entire reunion!

Once united, we can, by schools, churches, a free press and increasing free speech, attack each evil and secure every good. Meanwhile the great chasm which rebellion made is not filled up; it grows deeper and stretches wider! Out of it rises dread spectres and threatening sounds. Let that gulf be closed and bury in it slavery, sectional animosity and all strifes and hatreds!

It is fit that the brave men who on sea and land faced death to save the nation should now by their voice and vote consummate what their swords rendered possible.

For the sake of the freedmen, for the sake of the South and its millions of our fellow-countrymen, for our own sake, and for the great cause of freedom and civilization, I urge the immediate reunion of all the parts which rebellion and war have shattered.

I am, truly yours,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

MORE OF MR. AND MRS. TILTON'S LETTERS TO BE INTRODUCED.

Mr. Beach—We are, Sir, in our examination of the letters of Mrs. Tilton and her husband, falling upon one occasionally which we would like to introduce at some stage of the examination.

Judge Neilson—You can at the close of the cross-examination.

Mr. Beach—Very well.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—I will reserve that right.

Mr. Evarts—Well, your Honor, we both agree that they should be introduced as soon as we find them.

Judge Neilson—It will break the continuity of your examination.

Mr. Evarts—No, not at all; we would rather have them in because we would have to have a re-direct on them.

Judge Neilson—Just as you please.

Mr. Beach—We will read them as we find them. We will go over, Sir, more accurately this correspondence in the course of the evening, and in the morning we will state the result, or very soon.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, the witness has been subpoenaed on our part to produce various papers, among them the letters between himself and his wife, and we have endeavored to make a memorandum of those which at present we wish, and have handed it to the counsel. We are desirous of them as promptly as may be. I only give notice to the counsel that it is at the approaching stage of my examination that I shall want to use them—the letters of Mr. Tilton and of Mrs. Tilton. If at the same time you can give us those that you wish to ask about—

Mr. Morris—Well, that we can't do to-night.

Mr. Evarts—Until I get the whole of the letters I shall be unable to go on further with any consideration of this present topic. I have got through with the publications.

MR. TILTON'S EARLY ACQUAINTANCE WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, I will ask you concerning your personal relations with the defendant, Mr. Beecher. In general we know their origin and progress, by your direct examination. Now, did you become well acquainted with Mr. Beecher, in the years of your knowledge of him, prior to the year 1870? A. I thought I knew him thoroughly, but I found I was mis taken.

Q. Well, that is a subsequent discovery? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Up to that time; you thought you knew him very well, did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And your intercourse with him was such as would lead you to suppose that he knew you very well? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, won't you describe to me the early sentiments that you entertained toward Mr. Beecher, say up to the time when you became an assistant editor—I think you did—of The Independent; he became editor and you became an assistant editor, did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, we will take it up to that time; what time was that—about 1860 or 1861? A. When I became editor-in-chief?

Q. When you became assistant editor. After his return from Europe you became editor in full. You did not become editor-in-chief until after Mr. Beecher returned from Europe, I understand? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you became assistant editor— A. In 1864.

Q. As early as 1856? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, we will say up to that time. In the first place, your acquaintance with him commenced when you were how old? A. I shall have to guess.

Judge Neilson—The question is, about how old?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—You objected to my answering that way yesterday. Will you do me the favor to put it in some form, so I can make you a correct answer?

Q. At what age—about what age were you when you first became acquainted with Mr. Beecher? A. I think when I was about 16 or 17 years old, perhaps a little older.

Q. But was that acquaintance cotemporaneous with your taking up your residence in Brooklyn? A. I think it began a little before that.

Q. Now, in what form of association or acquaintance were you at first connected with him? A. I used to go his church at first; I then went to his Sunday school; I then became associated with him in The Independent; and in all of those ways I was more or less intimate with him.

Q. But he was a man in maturity of life and strength and repute when you first became acquainted with him, was he not? A. I don't think he had reached his maturity of life; I don't know at what age you fix the maturity of life.

Q. Well, I am not speculating about it as a general thing. I am asking you a plain question. A. I don't know Mr. Beecher's age at that time. I don't know it at the present time.

Q. Well, you know something of it, don't you? A. Something of his age?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I think he is between—

Q. Some general notion. A. Between sixty and sixty-five, if I understand anything about it. Still, I won't undertake to speak another man's age.

Q. Well, now we will take the best answer you can give us. [To the stenographer.] Now, will you read the question?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows:

“Q. But he was a man in maturity of life and strength and repute when you first became acquainted with him, was he not?” A. I don't think he had come either to the maturity of his strength or repute at that time.

Q. Do you use maturity, then, in the sense of zenith or culmination? A. I use it in the sense in which I suppose you wish me to answer.

Q. Was he a man of mature years and settled position in his profession and before the public? A. Well, Sir, when I knew him I always regarded him as a big boy rather than a man at all. He was a man of large fame and had a great church and was in the exercise of very manly and illustrious powers.

Q. Well, in what sense do you wish to be understood that he seemed to you like a big boy? A. Because his manner was large, and hearty, and gay, and companionable, and winning.

Q. Guileless? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Don't that come within the description of “like a boy”? A. Well, Sir, the craftiest people I know of are boys; news-boys, for instance.

Q. Well, I don't know them.

Mr. Beach—They know the gentleman very well.

Q. Well, do you not use this phrase “like a boy” in the sense of frankness and generosity of character and demeanor? You have used the phrase; now I suppose that that is the reasonable sense of it? A. When I say that Mr. Beecher in his earlier years was like a big boy, I mean to say there was a certain bouncing character to his life and manner. He was very companionable hale-fellow-well-met, fond of a joke and a frolic, fond of the things which boys liked. That made him very companionable to us, for I was very little more than a boy myself.

Q. And all the other young people? A. Yes, Sir; I thought he was the most charming man I ever saw.

Q. You thought so then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And in looking back you think so of that period? A. Do I think now that that was my thought at that time?

Q. Yes, Sir; in looking back upon him as you remember him, you think of him at that period as the most charming man you ever knew? A. Yes, Sir; I have since met men, who in all those qualities I think excel him very greatly, but at that time, in those early years, Mr. Beecher was my man of all men. I had not seen the world so extensively, and had not measured him with other men.

Q. Well, I don't now speak so much of admiration or abilities as of the regard for his character, and these qualities that you have mentioned. You say you thought he was charming? A. I loved him, Sir, next to my father.

MR. TILTON'S ESTIMATE OF MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, up to what period of your acquaintance with Mr. Beecher did you retain these opinions concerning him and these feelings towards him? A. Well, Sir, as I grew older and mingled with the world and saw other men, the fine gold of my idol gradually became dim. I saw that he was not the greatest man in the world, nor the pleasantest man in the world, nor the frankest man in the world. I met other men his peers, other men his superiors, as time grew on and I grew older. I suppose that is the common experience with all young men—that they have idols in their youth, and as they grow older their idols are overthrown. That has been the case with most of mine.

Q. Did these successful rivals of Mr. Beecher in your estimation come into as intimate and constant companionship with you as he did? A. I don't know to whom you refer when you speak of successful rivals.

Q. You have just described them; that you found better, &c.—in your esteem? A. For instance when I came to know Mr. Charles Sumner, I ranked him very much beyond Mr. Beecher, both intellectually, morally and in every other way; when I came—

Q. About what date was that?

Mr. Beach—Let him answer.

The Witness—When I came to know Mr. Greeley intimately I put him at a considerable height above Mr. Beecher, both in point of intellect, of morality, of sincerity and of unselfish devotion to the public good; I might mention other men, but if you mean to ask me whether the men who in my later years were high in my affection and admiration—if you mean to ask me whether I ever became as intimate with those men, as in my early life I had been with Mr. Beecher, I should have to say no, unless, perhaps, Mr. Greeley formed an exception.

Q. Now, about the dates of these elevations above Mr. Beecher which your larger acquaintance among men assigned to the new acquaintances. You have given us only when you got acquainted with Mr. Greeley and when you got acquainted with Mr. Sumner. Now, if you can, give us the date—my point was—when you began to change in your estimate of Mr. Beecher—about, of course? A. My only answer to that question is, Sir, that in proportion as I enlarged my acquaintanceship among public men, here and there one rose around me to a greater height than Mr. Beecher. He stood among them; he was among the great men of the country; but there were great men before Agamemnon, and there will be great men after.

Q. Well, that still leaves us a little vague as to when the time was, for we don't know all these facts that you do, and we are trying to get at it. A. Well, Sir, the process of change that brought up other men in my estimation to an equal rank with Mr. Beecher, and brought up some of them to a superior rank, began so long ago and was so imperceptible in its progress that I could not note its beginning. I should not be able to fix any such date in my own mind.

Q. Now, how early did there come to be, if at all, any cooling or break in regard to the sentiments and affections which you entertained towards Mr. Beecher? A. I don't know, Sir, that there was ever any actual break between Mr. Beecher and myself through any of the political divergencies to some of which you have alluded, and the chief of which was consequent upon the Cleveland letter. He would be better authority on that subject than I am. I have reason to believe that he was very sore touching the comments which I made on the Cleveland letter, still it did not break our friendship. I remember distinctly having a talk with him only a few days after the publication of that letter and of my comments on it. What I mean distinctly is, Mr. Evarts, that I ceased, as I grew older, to look upon Mr. Beecher as a leader, either in politics, or art, or religion; not that I dethroned him in my respect, but that he was less to me, as I grew older, a leader than he had been originally.

Q. Do you ascribe that change to him, or to yourself? A. Well, Sir, I think quite likely it was due to my own growth to a certain degree. I think if any other man had occupied the same position in my heart's affection in my youth, I should probably have thought less of him, or at least less of his great superiority over other men, as time progressed, but I was not responsible for Mr. Beecher's betrayal of the Republican party in 1865. That he was responsible for, and his church rose up against him.

Q. Oh! well, now. A. And he retracted it in the Academy of Music.

Q. I won't go into any church dissensions. It is only your relations to Mr. Beecher. Now, when did you come to a pretty firm notion that Mr. Beecher was not as great and important a person intellectually as you had supposed? A. Well, when I was perhaps 25 or 26 or 27 years old; still I must give you that answer very indefinitely.

Q. And that opinion has increased, has it not, since then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember—? A. Do not understand me, Mr. Evarts, as disparaging Mr. Beecher's intellectual powers now, not at all.

Q. You still have a certain respect for him? A. I have a respect for his strength. I respect the giant's strength, as the poet says; though it is base to use it with a giant's strength.

Q. Do you remember coming to a conclusion that Mr. Beecher had got his growth and was to decline in public power and influence and others were to pass beyond him? A. I do not understand your question, Sir.

Q. The stenographer will repeat it.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer repeated the question.

Mr. Beach—Do you mean intellectual growth?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; not his bulk.

Mr. Beach—It may be growth in public estimation, not necessarily bulk.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it means his intellectual position and the public's opinion.

The Witness—I don't know, Sir, that I ever stopped to consider the question whether Mr. Beecher, in my judgment, had come to his intellectual growth or not. I don't know whether he has come to it yet.

WHERE MR. TILTON ESTEEMED HIMSELF MR. BEECHER'S SUPERIOR.

Q. Do you remember comparing yourself with him upon the occasion of your discussions about church missionary appropriations, if that describes the occasion, and that you had overmatched him in that controversy? A. That speech is in a pamphlet, Sir; it will speak for itself. I know he was wrong; it is very easy to beat a man any time who is in the wrong.

Q. Well, now, rather it is your conclusions and consciousness about it than the fact that I am asking whether you then came to the conclusion that you had quite overmatched him in that fight? A. Well, Sir, if I had come to that conclusion, I should not have any right to state it here.

Q. You are excused from any immodesty in the statement, for it is required from you as a part of your testimony. A. If I should say that I have overmatched him in that struggle it would be immodest. If I should say that I had not I should lie.

Q. Very well, now we have got the truth. Now, in the Cleveland letter controversy and the political diversions and antagonisms that grew up then, did you then think that you had overmatched him in sagacity and authority, both in the principles you assumed and in their acceptance with the party? A. No, Sir, there was no discussion at that time; all that I did toward the Cleveland letter was simply to use the journal which I edited, and which was, to a great degree, the mouthpiece of the Republican party. All that I then did toward the Cleveland letter was to enter my protest against that crime against liberty which that letter committed.

Q. Crime against liberty? A. Crime against liberty. And if you will ask me what that crime was, I will state it.

Q. No, no.

Mr. Beach—We will ask that.

Mr. Evarts—If it is important to my learned friends they will draw it out.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, we will get it.

Q. Now, this feeling toward Mr. Beecher, as you have described it, and its modifications, as I understand you now, met with no serious catastrophe of any kind, until this matter of 1870? A. No, Sir: we always remained personal friends until 1870.

MR. BEECHER'S RELATIONS TO MR. TILTON'S FAMILY.

Q. I judged that from your last answers. Now, during all this period, what were Mr. Beecher's relations to your family or your household? A. Well, Sir, I was married in 1855 by Mr. Beecher.

Q. Run through your residences, if you please. You were married in 1855? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, where did you reside first, and for what period? A. I resided first at No. 48 Livingston-st., Brooklyn; I don't know how long.

Q. At your mother-in-law's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Morse's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or Mrs. Richards, she was then, I think? A. Yes, Sir; I then resided in Oxford-st., Brooklyn.

Q. Have you stated how many years you resided in Livingston-st.? A. I don't remember.

Q. Well, several years, wasn't it? A. Yes. I don't know how many several is. Then I returned to Livingston-st. and bought a house, where I now reside.

Q. Well, then you went to Oxford-st., and was that residence at some greater distance from Mr. Beecher's than your more recent residence? A. Yes, Sir,

Q. It was in another quarter of the town? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did you live in Oxford-st? A. That I could not say.

Q. Well, a number of years? A. Yes, Sir; a number, I think.

Q. And you cannot give us the beginning or the end of the period? A. My impression is, that I moved away from Oxford street about eight years ago. I won't be certain; eight or nine years ago.

Q. Did you go from Oxford street immediately to your present residence, or did you go back to Mrs. Morse's family? A. My impression is I went directly to my house which I had bought, but all such dates lie in my mind in great obscurity. Still, I will endeavor to find them for you.

Q. How far back, then, does your present memory place the date of your going to your present Livingston street house? A. I should think eight or nine years ago.

Q. That would be about 1855? A. 1855.

Q. 1855 or 1856? A. I think I went there in the Fall of 1856. That is my present recollection.

Q. Now, Sir, in the early years of your married life, was Mr. Beecher in the habit of coming to your house, while you were in Oxford street, we will say, and previous to that? A. No, Sir.

Q. He was not. Were you and your wife in the habit of going to his house? A. I was in the habit of going to his house, but my wife was very shy and modest, and very seldom went with me.

Q. But you went there very frequently in connection with your employments? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Your employments were such as to carry you to his house? A. During the early stages of my assisting Mr. Beecher, when he was chief editor of The Independent, I went to his house carrying him proofs and having consultations and so on quite frequently.

Q. Didn't you report his sermons, or something of that kind, before that? A. Yes, Sir. He did not deliver his sermons in his house.

Q. But I didn't know but the proofs, &c.? A. I don't remember that that took me to his house so much as when I became his assistant editor of The Independent.

Q. Now, during these earlier years, did you urge upon Mr. Beecher to be more frequent in his visits to your family—to your house? A. Yes, Sir; I always used to be glad of his coming, and always asked him to come again, and scolded him when he did not come.

Q. You understood at that time that your wife had a great admiration for him, did you not? A. I don't think I asked him to come so much on her account. In those early years, she regarded him as so great a man that she was a little afraid of him.

Q. Yes, that I understand, or at least I have seen it so stated. But don't you remember urging him to come because your wife had so great an affection for him, and you wished him to come? A. Not exactly that. I used to urge him to come for this reason. I always wanted Elizabeth to share in anything that I had. I thought that Mr. Beecher paid a great deal more respect to me than he did to my wife, and, therefore, I wanted him to come and make himself a guest in my house, not merely for my sake, but also for hers.

Q. Did you not feel in these early years, until you urged him to visit your house, that in comparison with some other of his parishioners, considering your intimate relation with him, he rather slighted your family? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So you urged him to repair that wrong and please your wife by coming there? A. Please me by coming there.

Q. Pleased you by coming to see your wife? A. Yes, Sir, I always considered that any honor paid to her was a great delight to me; and if he slighted her I obdied him for it.

Q. Did he ever slight her in this sense? A. He used to be very frequently with me, walk the street with me, went to picture galleries with me, into the libraries with me, everywhere around the town with me, and he very seldom came to my house. I thought I was stealing away too large a share of him and that my wife ought to have a larger part of him.

Q. It was for that that you chid him and urged him to come to your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you not use expressions of this kind to him, that there was a little woman at your house that loved him dearly, and urge him to come? A. I don't know whether I did or not, but if I did it would have been perfectly true.

Q. Now, after your removal to your present house, after you left Oxford street and before the period of 1858, we will say now, were not Mr. Beecher's visits at your house more frequent than they had been at Oxford street? A. Oh, yes. I don't remember that he was ever in my Oxford street house once. Perhaps he was, but I don't recall it.

Q. At any rate there was a very great difference in that respect. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when did you begin to be absent from your family for the purposes of your lecture engagements; I mean for any lecture season or period of time? A. I am afraid I cannot answer that question. My present impression though—I fear it will not be altogether accurate—is that my first prolonged trip of lecturing in the far West was in the Winter of 1864 and '5, somewhere there. Perhaps I am wrong about it.

Q. Well, and from the time that that habit of your life commenced, did it continue every season, and up to what time? A. It continued almost every season. My impression is that in the Winter of 1870 and '71—yes, more than my impression, my exact knowledge is that I did not lecture.

Q. Yes; that has been stated before. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then you did lecture in 1871-'2? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that the last year—your season of lectures? A. It is the last season in which I made any extensive trip.

Q. Then from 1864-'5—if that was the commencement—up to 1871-'2, with the omission of 1870-'1, you had this employment of a portion of your year? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was it substantially the same portion of the year; was it from Fall into Spring? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, in reference to your lectures and this employment—this adoption of that mode of public influence—was that a subject of conversation between you and Mr. Beecher; was that one of the things that his interests made the subject of conversation with you, or your confidence in him the subject of conversation with him? A. I don't remember of ever having any talk with him in regard to my lecturing. If I had it does not come up to my mind at present.

Q. Before going on these seasons of lectures, do you remember having desired Mr. Beecher to call upon your wife during your absence? A. I don't think I ever made him any such request later than the time of the Cleveland year; perhaps I did, but I don't think I did.

Q. You mean later than until after that occurrence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But before that you did? A. I think quite likely I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Was it a habit of your wife, in your daily letters that you have spoken of to you, to mention Mr. Beecher's calls? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently were you and your wife visitors or guests at Mr. Beecher's house, and through what period of time? A. The last time I was ever at Mr. Beecher's house that I remember was when our army lay at Bladensburg, if anybody knows that date, when I came home from Washington with a commission for his son in the artillery.

Q. You connect it with that occurrence? A. Yes, Sir. It was when Simon Cameron was Secretary of War.

Q. That was about 1861. You think that was the last time you were ever at his house? A. I believe that is the last time; nevertheless I may have been there since; if so I don't remember it now.

Q. Your not going to his house after that period is not an indication that there was any change in your relations with him at that time, is it? A. No, Sir; not with him personally.

Q. Not with him personally? A. No, Sir; I could not explain why I didn't go there after that period without involving the name of a lady of his household.

Q. I suppose it is not necessary to go into details, perhaps, but was your absence owing to any disposition on your part toward Mrs. Beecher, or any disposition on her part toward you? A. Yes, Sir; owing to a disposition on her part toward me.

Q. Now, this occurrence that brings Bladensburg to your mind was an occasion on which you performed what Mr. Beecher regarded as a very great personal service for him, was it not? A. He so regarded it. Yes, Sir.

Q. And so far as your disposition in that act, he was entitled to regard it as an act of friendship upon your part, was he not? A. I always thought he overestimated the service, and gave me more gratitude than my act required.

Q. That is in amount; but your disposition was as friendly as the act was friendly? A. My purpose was not only friendly, but it was affectionate and loyal.

Q. And he so understood it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And, perhaps, overestimated it? A. I think he did.

Q. But you have always known that he regarded that as a very gracious service that had been rendered to him in a point in which his affections were greatly interested? A. He told me that I had saved one of the members of his family from destruction; I didn't see the imminent destruction.

Q. It had relation to his son's position in the army, had it not—one of the sons? A. I would rather not say to what it refers.

Judge Neilson—General facts.

Mr. Evarts—General facts.

Q. It had relation to his son? A. I don't know how I could explain it without casting some disparagement on the member to whom I allude.

Q. You can say whether it alluded to the son in the army? A. I will say it if you take the responsibility of evoking it.

Mr. Evarts—I don't provoke any answer than that—

Judge Neilson—"Evoked" was the word he used.

The Witness—I simply say this, that under the direction of the Court I undertake to keep out the names of third persons in my narrative, particularly where to mention them would be to disparage them.

Mr. Evarts—I have offered you an opportunity of saying yes or no to a question.

The Witness—Ask me the question; I will say yes or no.

Mr. Evarts—The last question I put to you was whether that service had relation to his son in the army? A. It had relation to his son out of the army.

Q. His son who had been in the army? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And who afterward went back into the army? A. Yes, Sir.

PAIGE'S PORTRAITS OF TILTON'S FRIENDS.

Q. Now, do you remember having a portrait of Mr. Beecher painted, and what time it was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. To the best of my recollection, Mr. Beecher began to sit for that portrait in the Fall of 1866, and the picture was finished in the Spring of 1869.

Q. In what way and at what time did you propose to him that he should allow you to have his portrait painted? A. I told Mr. Beecher that I wanted the portraits of a few of my personal friends, the men who had been a good deal to me in my public life, and who had been connected with the cause of liberty, and I named Wendell Phillips, Horace Greeley, Charles Sumner and Henry Ward Beecher. I proposed to have the portraits of those four men painted by William Paige, whom I regard as the first of our American artists. The first of the portraits painted was that of Wendell Phillips, which now hangs on my wall.

Q. And the next? A. Mr. Beecher's was the second. Mr. Greeley had made one or two calls to the studio to have his portrait painted. Mr. Sumner had done the same.

Q. You did not actually succeed in getting portraits of the others? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember when that portrait was sent to Mr. Moulton's house? A. I cannot remember the exact date. I think it was some time in the Fall of 1870, or perhaps in the first month or two of 1871.

Q. And there it has remained ever since. A. Yes, Sir. My recollection was that it was sent there in the Summer of 1870—my best recollection at present.

Mr. Beach—What is that?

The Witness—I was saying that my refreshed recollection is that it was sent there in the Summer of 1870—still I may be wrong about the exact date; but I may be totally wrong as to that date, because I have not thought of it since.

Mr. Everts—You mean the date when it was sent to Mr. Moulton's house? A. Yes, Sir. But I remember the date of the receipt.

Mr. Everts—We will put this paper in evidence, if your Honor please. [Reads]:

Received by Theodore Tilton, by draft from Aurora, N. Y., dated February 25, 1869, $500, being payment in full for portrait of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

April 1st, 1869.

Q. That is your writing, is it not? [Handing paper to witness.] A. It was my money that paid for it.

Q. That is your writing? A. Yes, Sir; all except the signature, which is William Paige's.

Q. Signed by William Paige? A. Yes, Sir.

[Marked "Exhibit D 58."]

Q. You say the date of sending to Mr. Moulton you cannot fix with any certainty, as you have never thought of it since? A. I have never thought of it since as being connected with any particular event or date.

Q. Now, up to the time of July, 1870, had you observed in the demeanor of Mr. Beecher towards your wife, or of your wife towards Mr. Beecher, any variance from that ordinary relation which you had been familiar with? A. No, Sir. One or two little incidents happened a number of years before that, which Mrs. Tilton explained away and which left no impression on me.

Q. They passed by? A. Yes, Sir. They had gone by.

Q. There was nothing in the later years that you noticed in their demeanor towards each other different from what you had always seen? A. No, Sir.

THE TILTON-MOULTON FRIENDSHIP.

Q. Now, with regard to Mr. Moulton, you have given us the general circumstances of your acquaintance with him and familiarity. How confident and intimate were your habits of companionship with him in general? I mean, now, to leave out any relation to this subject which has been testified to by him? A. Well, Sir, for many years Mr. Moulton and I have been bosom friends—a very high, noble man, and much beloved. My affection for him was very strong, and we were very intimate.

Q. And his disposition towards you of the same character? A. I think I may say that it has always been so.

Q. And that carries you back to your boyhood? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And continues up to the present time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you in the habit of having amusements together, such amusements as men have?

Mr. Beach—Well, that is very general.

The Witness—We had not time for many amusements. We used to go fishing occasionally.

Q. Go to places of amusement together, and the theater? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. And such like? A. Yes, Sir, we have gone to the theater together, and to the opera. I thought you meant sports like fishing.

Q. It covers the whole matter that would be the natural companionship between intimate friends in regard to amusements, or the habits of Mr. Moulton and yourself. A. Well, Sir, I don't know that—that if you mean whether we played cards together, or played billiards together, or anything of that kind, we never had any such amusements.

Mr. Everts—Well, it is time enough for you to impute that to me when I ask it.

Mr. Beach—I think your question embraced that class of amusements.

Mr. Everts—Especially as I never play.

The Witness—I may have misunderstood you. I intended to answer your question properly.

Mr. Beach—The answer was perfectly proper.

Mr. Everts—I didn't seek to inquire into the particulars of your amusements.

The Witness—I thought you asked me whether we had the amusements that men ordinarily have.

Q. Those which you usually took, did you usually take them together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how much were you in the habit of being at his house at meals as a formal guest or as a social guest? A. After the destruction of my own house, Mr. Moulton's house was really my home—that is to say, it was the home of my thought and solace.

Q. Now, how about the meals; how much were you in the habit of taking meals there, either as a formal guest or socially? A. Oh! I was there a great deal, a very great deal.

Q. And from what period did that form of intimacy date, or habit date? A. From the first of January, 1871.

Q. Now, throw this outside of any of these dates—that we may very well understand, but we will say prior to the first of January, 1870, which is a year before, what were your habits of personal and social intimacy in that regard, about being often at his house at meals, either socially or as a formal guest? A. Oh, very rarely at his house at meals before that.

Q. Very rarely? A. I took my meals at my own house before that; after that, I very rarely sat at my own table.

Q. And generally at his? A. Not generally, but very frequently.

Q. Now, when you had occasion to seek a confident friend, as I suppose that you had—I understood that you had, in this month of December, 1870—was there any one else that was at all comparable in his relations with you, to Mr. Moulton, as the person that you should confide in? A. There was no man among my personal friends at that time in whose ability, integrity and loyalty, all combined, and in whose genius of administration and great courage of thought and action, that I could compare with Francis D. Moulton.

Q. And you resorted to him in that view, and in the relation that he then held to you as a friend? A. I did, Sir; and had occasion to be thankful for it ever since.

Q. And that selection on your part has, in your judgment, been justified by his conduct towards you since? A. Yes, Sir; I think that Francis D. Moulton is the successor of Sir Phillip Sidney in all that is honorable, manly and magnificent in friendship.

A FIVE MINUTES WRANGLE.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Morris.] Now, have you got those letters ready?

Mr. Morris—We have not, Mr. Evarts; I find they are written on different sheets, and they were not pinned together, and we will have to select them to-night. I had my young man assorting them out, but he brings parts of them here only. We keep them separated.

Mr. Evarts—Those you have got together, will you let us have them that we can look over them to-night—those that are within our call.

Mr. Morris—You have got all that we have got perfected. We will have them ready for you in the morning.

Mr. Evarts—I say those that you have got, if you will let us have them to look over to-night.

Mr. Morris—I say you have got what we have got perfected. We have got some parts here, and we will get the balance.

Mr. Tracy—We have only got three letters.

Mr. Beach—And that is all you will get.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all you are entitled to.

Mr. Evarts—We can subpoena the witness, I suppose, and get them.

Mr. Morris—Subpenaing the witness would not entitle you to take the letters from the Court. You don't propose to take the letters from the Court.

Mr. Evarts—We don't ask to take the mass of letters; we propose to take what you have selected so that we may save time to-night as well as you.

Mr. Morris—I say we have those.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I pass to another subject, in which I need all these letters to be here that I can get. [To Mr. Morris.] Why don't you produce them?

Mr. Morris—Because you are not entitled to them.

Mr. Evarts—Why should we not have them as we had them before?

Judge Neilson—I understand the counsel promises to produce the letters in the morning.

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir; but we produce them when the Court opens in the morning. They cannot call for letters and take them away.

Judge Neilson—I understand you will produce them here in the morning.

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—If the witness insists he will not part with letters over night, that is all right.

Mr. Morris—He does insist upon it.

Mr. Evarts—I suggested that we should have them in order that we might save time as well as you.

Mr. Morris—We propose you shall have them.

Judge Neilson—Is the jury ready to retire?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, if your Honor please.

Mr. Evarts—[Handing letters to witness.] Look at those letters and say if they are letters from your wife. One of them is incomplete, is it not? A. Those two are letters, and this is part of a letter.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Morris.] Mr. Morris, this is incomplete.

Mr. Morris—Yes, I know it is.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Morris.] See if you can restore the balance, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Morris—We can if we have the parts we have got.

Mr. Evarts—I believe this has been printed.

Mr. Morris—No; only a portion of it.

Mr. Evarts—The letter of February 8d, 1868, which I put in evidence, will be marked "Exhibit D 59;" the letter of February 20th, 1868, will be marked "Exhibit D 60," and the letter of—

The Witness—Let me look at that again.

Mr. Evarts—The imperfect one?

The Witness—No, the one you think is imperfect.

Mr. Evarts [handing letter to witness]: Yes, Sir; that is the one.

The Witness—That is imperfect, evidently.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; there is no doubt about that. The letter dated February 26th, 1868, will be marked "Exhibit D 61."

[The letters were marked respectively "Exhibits D 59, 60 and 61."]

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Evarts]—Which of those is incomplete ?

Mr. Evarts—It is the first one, February 3d, 1868.

Mr. Beach—I don't know that this incomplete letter—how happens this ?

Mr. Morris—They were on different sheets of paper and they became separated.

Mr. Beach—It seems to me in its imperfect condition it ought not to be introduced. I have not the letter to see.

Mr. Evarts—Then we will take all we can get.

Mr. Beach—Well, not when you can have the whole of it.

Mr. Evarts—If we don't get the whole of it, we will take this part of it.

Mr. Beach—That is all right.

Judge Neilson—Our uniform plan is to have the jury pass out first, and I wish very much that gentlemen will retain their seats for a few moments. [To the Jury.] Gentlemen, be in your seats at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Mallison—This Court stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court was thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock on Friday.

TWENTIETH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. AND MRS. TILTON'S CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS BETWEEN THE PLAINTIFF AND HIS WIFE
PRIOR TO 1868—A DAY DEVOTED TO THEIR READING—ABSENCE OF THE USUAL INTEREST IN THE CASE.

There was nothing all day but the monotonous reading of Mr. Shearman, relieved occasionally by Mr. Evarts going over the correspondence of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, covering the years between 1865 and 1868, inclusive, extracts from which have already been published. There were blinking eyes and nodding heads in the gallery, and looks of weariness upon the faces of the idle counsel. It was without doubt the most uninteresting day of the trial.

A discovery which caused some comment was the result of the comparison of an extract from a letter of Mrs. Tilton, in Mr. Tilton's "Statement," and an original copy of the letter itself. It was found that Mrs. Tilton's language had been changed in the Statement. She wrote, "To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse your gift of influence is a sin." In Mr. Tilton's Statement the sentence read, "To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse the gift is a sin." Mr. Tilton said that the statement was in Augustus Maverick's handwriting.

Mr. Tilton came into court a few minutes before 11 o'clock on Friday, and going directly to the witness-chair waited for the proceedings to begin. His cross-examination was not resumed for a little time, no one appearing to be in a hurry to enter upon the day's work. Mr. and Mrs. Beecher came in a few minutes after Mr. Tilton. Mr. Beecher's face was very ruddy, and wore a pleasant smile as though the walk from Columbia-st. in the cold wind had raised his spirits and animated him. He and Mr. Beach shook hands and chatted together with an appearance of pleasant cordiality.

During the reading of the letters by Mr. Shearman, Mr. Tilton sat quietly in the witness-chair. His eyes were turned during most of the time to the sunlight on the window curtain behind the jury. He apparently took very little interest in the letters read, but was ready in giving all the explanations asked of him by Mr. Evarts.

Francis D. Moulton came into court soon after midday, for the first time since the conclusion of his testimony. He took a seat behind the jury, from which Mr. Tilton alone, of those interested in the case, could be seen by him. He only remained in court about half an hour.

Judge Reynolds occupied the bench with Judge Neilson during the afternoon.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. BEECHER'S EARLY REGARD FOR MR. TILTON

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Morris.] Have you got the letters ?

Mr. Morris—We cannot find them according to the dates here. I have got them sorted out in years. I cannot find the dates as they are on the schedule handed to me. The dates do not seem to correspond.

Mr. Evarts—Well, give us the year then, and we will see if we can find them.

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Most of them have been the subject of publication—parts of them. I will go on for a moment with some of the others.

Theodore Tilton was then recalled, and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—Look at that, Mr. Tilton, and say in whose handwriting it is. A. It is in Mr. Beecher's.

Q. Do you remember the occasion and the circumstance under which you received that ? A. I remember the occasion to which it alludes. I cannot remember the exact place and time of receiving that little note.

Q. Oh ! well, I don't care for that. I mean the occasion. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it in regard to that service in respect of his son, which you have before spoken of ? A. It was in regard to what he called that service, Sir.

Mr. Evarts [reading]:

MY DEAR THEODORE: I should be glad if whenever you use this inkstand you shall be reminded of my gratitude to you for love services rendered.

H. W. B.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 62."]

Mr. Beach—Any date?

Mr. Everts—There is no date.

Q. [To the Witness.] This relates, as its occasion, to the service which you had performed and which he regarded very highly, as you have stated, in reference to his son, does it not?

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was accompanied with the gift of an inkstand? A. Yes, Sir. Permit me to say, Mr. Everts, that I have nowhere said that he regarded it very highly.

Q. He thanked you very highly? A. Yes, Sir; he did. I always thought he overestimated the services, but I never—

Q. Well, that I have understood you to say. A. But I never allowed myself to refer to that, or to say to anybody about it that I regarded it as a very momentous service done to him. I have very rarely alluded to it myself.

Q. Look at that, and say in whose handwriting that is? [Handing witness a letter.] A. Mr. Beecher's.

Q. And that envelope? A. In the same handwriting.

Mr. Everts [Reading]:

MARCH 17th, 1864.

MY DEARLY BELOVED THEODORE: I thank you. I read your notice of father and mother with tears. All others that I have seen are cold by its side. I felt its sympathy and love deeply.

Yours ever,

H. W. B.

[Letter and envelope each marked "Exhibit D, 63."]

MR. BEECHER PREDICTS THE GROWING INFLUENCE OF SCIENCE OVER RELIGION.

Q. Look at that and see if it is Mr. Beecher's—say in whose handwriting it is? [Handing witness a letter.] A. It is in Mr. Beecher's handwriting, Sir. I should like to look at it, it is so long since I have seen it.

Q. Well, I will read it aloud to you. A. I was afraid that letter had been lost. I am glad somebody has found it.

Mr. Everts [Reading]:

JUNE 3d, 1867.

MY DEAR THEODORE: In thinking over our conversation respecting your position on religious matters, it occurs to me that you are liable to do yourself an unnecessary injustice by supposing or affirming that you have wandered from received opinions, whereas it seems to me that you have simply entered that stage of development in which every active mind explores the grounds and reasons of belief for himself. Now, it is impossible for one, unless cautious even to coldness, to pursue such investigations without great oscillations of belief, without seeming at one time averse to one view, and then again seeking it with greater avidity than ever. It is a question so wide, so grave, that one ought not to commit himself upon the hasty result of a year or several years' reading. You seem to me to follow your sympathies largely in investigation. This has its advantages, and is one way of study; but it requires far more time and caution, inasmuch as it will surely lead you to accept things from poetic or emotive reasons, which are but half true, which need and will get by longer experience much modification. The formation of opinions upon religious questions in such a nature as yours is a matter of growth more than of logic. Under such a state of facts, therefore, I would submit whether you can wisely or even truly say you stand on this or on that ground, and whether you do not, in justice to your own final self, acquire all the privileges accorded to those who are investigating. In part I write from experience. I look back upon periods when, if I had expressed the then results of thought and reading, I should have committed myself to views which I have outlived or left behind. I find myself, slowly but surely, going toward those views of human nature and of divine government which have underlaid for a thousand years the Evangelical churches. It seems to me that I discern, arising from studies in natural science, a surer foothold of these views than they have ever had, in so far as theology is concerned. If I have one purpose or aim, it is to secure for the truths now developing in the spheres of natural science a religious spirit and a harmonization with all the great cardinal truths of religion which have thus far characterized the Christian system. I turn with more and more chill and dread from that bleak and fruitless desert of naturalism which so many are hailing as a second paradise. I regard the labors of naturalists as indispensable to the final adjustment of truth, and I would encourage such men as Spencer to say whatever is given them, not because they bare the full truth, but because they bring out the truth, and because the human mind must pass through that stage before it will come to the rest and glory of the final Christianity, the second coming of Christ—morally, not historically—in which He shall reign in heaven and on earth over faith and science, and unite and harmonize both. Believe me, Theodore, that I have great sympathy in your developments, and affection for you, and should be glad to help and sorry to hinder.

I have given up the idea of starting a newspaper. I am sure that I could not bear the strain and yet carry on my church. I am truly yours,

H. W. BEECHER.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 64."]

Q. Mr. Tilton, when your wife left your house, as you have stated, did she leave the house and what was in it, or did she take anything with her? A. I don't know that she took anything with her, except my love and good will.

Q. Very well. And that she has still, has she? A. I cannot answer for her. Sir; I don't know what mischief Mr. Tracy has made in the business.

HOW THE CORRESPONDENCE OF HUSBAND AND WIFE WAS PUBLISHED.

Q. Now, Sir, there was a publication made of a selection from your and her letters; I mean by "selection" that it was not the entire correspondence. Was that made by you, or through your procurement? A. No, Sir; it was neither made by me nor through my procurement; it was made somewhat against my wish and will.

Q. But pray who did make it? A. Who did make what, Sir?

Q. That publication. A. The Chicago Tribune.

Q. Were not those letters left in the house when your wife left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How did The Chicago Tribune get access to those letters?

A. Through the advice and desire of my friend and counsel, Judge Morris.

Q. Ah! did he have the ransacking of the whole of them? A. I think, Sir, he is too much of a gentleman—

Q. I didn't ask about that. I don't know whether he had the opportunity. A. What do you mean by ransacking?

Q. The opportunity for examination.

Judge Neilson—He means did he have the whole of them—did he have an opportunity to examine the whole of them? A. All letters found in the house?

Q. Yes. A. He did; I believe he did.

Q. Was that by the advice of counsel?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment! One moment! I do not see the pertinency of these inquiries.

Mr. Evarts—Then he should not have made the answer about his counsel.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! that was your question.

Mr. Evarts—I did not ask about the counsel. He threw that in.

The Witness—Do you mean that Mr. Morris did that by the advice of counsel?

Mr. Evarts—No.

The Witness—He is himself counsel?

Mr. Evarts—I mean whether this giving of all these papers to The Chicago Tribune, or to its representative, was by advice of your counsel.

Mr. Beach—It does not appear that The Chicago Tribune had the letters to themselves.

Mr. Evarts—He has just said they had the opportunity.

The Witness—Ah! you are mistaken, Mr. Evarts; the extracts that were published were communicated to The Chicago Tribune; those extracts were made by the advice and at the suggestion of my counsel.

Q. Very well; I thought that I asked you whether The Chicago Tribune had access and opportunity to examine all those papers. A. I didn't understand you to put the question so; I understand you to ask whether Judge Morris had the ransacking of those papers.

Mr. Beach—That was the question.

Mr. Evarts—No; you are all in error. The question will speak for itself. In answer to one of my questions the witness said that whatever he then spoke of, it was done by the advice of his counsel. Then I afterwards asked him—or what I intended to ask him was—whether The Chicago Tribune had the opportunity to examine all the papers. Now, it seems the witness understood me as applying that question to Judge Morris.

Judge Neilson—Let the stenographer read the question.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question.]

Judge Neilson—The witness understood "he" to apply to Judge Morris, and I myself so understood it.

Mr. Evarts—I didn't so understand it, and I had no such intention, and therefore did not understand why that answer should be given.

Q. Now, then, you understood my question to refer to Judge Morris, and not to the representative of The Chicago Tribune? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—It was The Chicago Tribune—the neuter gender.

Mr. Evarts—But it was the representative of the paper.

Mr. Evarts—Now, any communication or opportunity to examine or know of the letters themselves given to The Chicago Tribune or its representative, were they selections or portions that were furnished to it? A. Yes, Sir; the representative of that paper did not see the original manuscript.

Q. How is it you say that they were not published by your act or procurement? A. I will tell you, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think that is proper.

Judge Neilson—They were published by his act and procurement, through his counsel, Mr. Morris, and by his advice.

Mr. Evarts—I have a right to ask the witness what he meant when he said they were published rather against his will.

The Witness—Do you wish me to answer?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. During the early consultations I had with my friend, Judge Morris, I put into his hands the papers. He read them and said: "These letters ought to be published, or, at least, liberal and copious extracts from them." I said: "No, they are private letters, and I think there is an impropriety in publishing them." He said, on the contrary, the case was of such seriousness and gravity and had been so greatly misrepresented, that he thought justice required they should be published. He then suggested that good taste, perhaps, would lead to their publication, not here in Brooklyn, in either of the local papers, but at some distant point; and at that time a visit was made to my house by an agent of The Chicago Tribune; Judge Morris made his acquaintance, and communicated to this agent written extracts from those letters, and in that way they were published.

Q. Did you in any way communicate with your wife and get her assent to this publication? A. I did not, Sir; my wife was not then living at my house; she had deserted me.

Q. We knew that. Now, in whose handwriting were those extracts which were delivered to the newspaper, as you know or believe? A. In the handwriting of some stenographic reporter. We had half a dozen in our service at the time; I don't remember at this moment who it was that made the copy.

Q. His name is not material. It was a person in that relation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From whose dictation did he take them down? A. Nobody's.

Q. You mean he copied them himself? A. Yes.

Q. In shorthand? A. I don't know how they were copied.

Q. No matter; he copied them from the papers? A. Yes.

Q. Let me call your attention to the last part of the sixth article—from there to there, and read it [handing witness his own published statement.] After you have looked at it I will ask you a question. [Witness looks at the paper.] Is that an extract from a letter of your wife as given there? A. I don't know how correctly that is printed, Sir; but if it be printed correctly, as taken from my sworn statement, it is an extract.

Mr. Evarts—The passage is this—

Mr. Fullerton—Wait a moment. What is this?

Mr. Evarts—I am going to read the passage for him.

Mr. Beach—We object.

Mr. Evarts—He says if it is correctly printed as he wrote it in his statement it is correct.

Mr. Fullerton—But it does not follow that you can read it.

Mr. Evarts—I propose to read it out and let him see if it is correct.

Judge Neilson—That can be done, and it can be corrected if not correctly printed.

Mr. Fullerton—But the possibility of correcting it does not make it admissible at this stage of the case. In the first place there is the original of this paper somewhere, and it can be produced and not a copy.

Judge Neilson—I understood the witness to recognize that as part of his statement.

Mr. Evarts—And he is now on cross-examination. Part of my substantive proof is that this is the statement.

The Witness—I do not understand you. The passage you want me to read was no part of my statement, but an extract from one of Mrs. Tilton's letters.

Q. But it is in your statement. A. You asked me if it was part of my statement. I said it was, if correctly printed. The original letter is here.

Q. The original of what? A. The original letter from which that extract was made.

Mr. Evarts—I will now read this:

To love is praiseworthy; but to abuse the gift is sin. Here I am strong. No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood.

Q. Please look at your statement, and say, after looking at it, whether you can give the date of the letter from which that extract is taken? A. There is no date here.

Q. But what precedes it? A. Do you wish me to read what precedes it?

Q. No; I wish you to look at it and then say if you can give the date of the letter from which that extract was taken? A. I can give it by referring to the letter itself.

Q. I don't ask you for that letter, Mr. Tilton. It is your own sworn statement which is now before you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You cannot answer? A. You say it is my sworn statement. Here is a printed document full of corrections.

Q. There are no corrections that I know of. A. What are these marks?

Q. These are my notes on it. [Laughter.] A. Oh! Now, what is your question?

Q. My question is, after refreshing your recollection by looking at this print of your sworn statement, whether you can say what the date of the letter was from which you extracted that passage that I have read? A. I just now discover, in looking at that a second time, that in between your pencil marks there is a date here—February—something, 1868.

Q. Are your eyes good? A. Not so good as some people's; that looks like Feb. 8th; perhaps it is Feb. the 3d or 8th—I do not know which.

Q. Well, I don't see how my pencil marks interfere with it? A. I didn't notice that line.

Q. Well, is it Feb. 3d, 1868, isn't it? A. Yes, Sir; I think it is.

OTHER LETTERS OF MRS. TILTON TO HER HUSBAND.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I will read that.

The Witness—I don't know whether that date is correctly printed in that transcript, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Very well, we will see. We want the letter itself. This is "Exhibit D, 59." [Reading]:

MONDAY, February 8d, 1868, {
9 o'clock (I think it is) a. m. }

What may I bring to my beloved this bright morning? A large, throbbing heart, full of love, single in its aim and purpose to bless and cheer him. Is it acceptable, sweet one? As my body grows daily in strength, my enthusiasm bubbles up perpetually, so that I even felt I saw you reflected in my eyes this morning, when my thoughts of you literally filled me as to gush out of my face. Most truly do I love, and I am resolved nevermore to repress the expression of it. I have lived under the fatal mistake that I would make you selfish, but oh! what it has cost me to learn that a large, generous love cannot, in its very nature, minister but to our best and holy states! The picture of your dear face, most constant with me, is one glowing with love, but always bearing the look of one that has suffered. Can I, who am the cause thereof, ever again be indifferent? Nay, the little life which remaineth is consecrated to restore, if possible, the beautiful image I have marred. There is no sacrifice too great that I would not enthusiastically make to this end. If God will only consider me worthy to work with him. I have been thinking, my darling, that knowing as you do your immense power over an audience to move them at your will, that same power you have with all public men over any woman whom you may love. To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse your gift of influence is a sin. Therefore I would fain help restore to you that which I broke down—SELF-RESPECT. Your manhood and its purity and dignity if you feel it is stronger than even love itself. I know this because here I am strong. No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood. You have not yet replied to my inquiry whether the giving you my whole heart in my letters offends you. I was with you all day yesterday, Sunday. What holy associations cluster around that day in our own experiences. The morning hours suggesting Mattie's death, and who can tell what that hath done for us, and now the evening memorable forever of confessions, with repentings, cleansing and sacred vows! I wanted to write to you, but could not. I went to church in the morning, was blessed, spoke with Mr. Bowen, who was cordial, and Professor Raymond. He commences another course of readings at the Packer to-night with Henry the 8th—$5 a course. Were you out—

Mr. Evarts—There the letter terminates, it being an imperfect one. [To the witness.] Now, Sir, will you look at that which is not printed and say if that is a page of your original statement in your handwriting? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—It is not in his handwriting, Mr. Evarts; it is sworn to.

Q. It is not in your handwriting? A. It is not in my handwriting.

Q. Do you recognize it as a copy of a paper written by you? A. It is in the handwriting of Mr. Augustus Maverick, and I presume from what you show me, these are two leaves from the copy of my sworn statement which I left with the Committee. Let me look at it, please?

Q. And which was signed by you? A. Signed by me.

Q. See if that is the last page of it? [Handing paper to witness.] A. It seems to be all right, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I will read this now. This passage from the letter, your Honor will notice, is of the date of February 3d, 1868, quite anterior to any dates of difficulty or difference between this pair. I read as it is here.

To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse the gift is sin. Here I am strong. No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood.

Mr. Beach—Do you want these marked. [Referring to the slips last shown witness.]

Mr. Evarts—No; I will take care of them.

Mr. Beach—I do not wish to take care of them, but I want to know—

Mr. Evarts—As I get on.

Mr. Beach—[To the Court.] The counsel, after proving these two pages, has read a portion of them, and I ask that they be marked.

Mr. Evarts—That is for me to say, Sir, when I offer them.

Mr. Beach—But he has read from them. He has read them in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I will take care of my own examination.

Judge Neilson—He purposes to offer them, I suppose.

Mr. Beach—Well, he has read them; we have some rights with those papers.

Mr. Evarts—You will have all your rights, but I will take care of my present examination.

Mr. Beach—I am not troubling your examination; I am asking that a paper from which the counsel reads shall be marked by the Court so that we shall know what it is.

Mr. Evarts—It is unnecessary to mark it at this instant.

Judge Neilson—It should be marked, but perhaps he will read more of it; it must be marked.

Mr. Beach—Well, that is all I insist upon, that it must be marked; we want to use it.

Mr. Evarts—I now read the passage from the original, beginning and ending where this supposed extract does:

To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse your gift of influence is a sin, therefore I would feign help restore to you what I broke down—self-respect. Your manhood and its purity and dignity if you feel it is stronger than even love itself! I know this because here I am strong. No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, these two leaves will be marked as the paper shown by me to the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—And as read.

Mr. Evarts—From which I read a passage—to wit, an extract from a letter.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; which is a part of the paper.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is not the whole of it.

[Two sheets each marked "Exhibit D, 65."]

Mr. Evarts—This letter of the 3d of February which I have read, the original letter—the passage that I have read from it—beginning, "To love is praiseworthy," and ending, "No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood"—did you not understand from that letter that your wife then considered adultery a sin? A. Yes, Sir; I quoted it as a beautiful illustration of her own sense of the dignity of her sex and of herself as respecting it. That was the use which I made of that extract in my sworn statement to certify to her strength of character at that time.

Q. Exactly; and that she then regarded adultery as a sin? A. Yes, Sir; I think she does now.

Mr. Shearman—May it please your Honor the letters which I now read to the jury are letters written by Mrs. Tilton to her husband. [Reading]:

MONDAY, JAN. 29th. (Probably 1867.)

MY BELOVED: I am very sorry my letters are lost, they contained so much that stranger eyes should never see.

I was obliged to omit my Saturday and Sunday letter as usual.

Mr. Haakell came over Sunday afternoon. We went to hear

Mr. Beecher, who preached an uncommonly fine sermon on the divinity of man, from the text "Ye are Gods." In the morning Dr. Storrs preached for us. A collection was taken up for our city missions, amounting to nearly $6,000.

Mr. B—called Saturday. He came tired and gloomy, but he said I had the most calming and peaceful influence over him, more so than any one he ever knew. I believe he loves you. We talked of you. He brought me two pretty flowers in pots, and said as he went out, "What a pretty house this is; I wish I lived here." It would make me very happy if you could look in upon us without his knowing it.

Deacon Freeland called in to-day. He wanted to know if I was good enough to live in so pretty and tasteful a home.

Mr. Shearman—I will pass over a passage relating to other matters.

The picture which came from Springfield has just reached me. I do not like it. It is old, thin and cold looking.

Nevertheless I talk to it, love and caress it. It would please you to know how much Carroll talks of you—often cries to see you.

The children are passing through the stages of the hooping cough very comfortably—thanks to homeopathy. It is nearly 12 o'clock and I must say good night, adding with it my very best love. Soon I shall look again upon your dear face and be satisfied. But if I was traveling about with you I know my body is not in the condition to bear journeying without great fatigue, and though I might look upon your face, yet absent from these children in Winter. I could not say I am satisfied, but when you are in your own home once again I shall then be perfectly at rest. "Oh, haster 'round ye wheels of time!"

God keep us both.

YOUR DARLING

[Marked "Exhibit D, 66."]

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Shearman.] Is that marked?

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know about this letter.

Mr. Shearman—I read what I found written.

Mr. Beach—No, you didn't.

Mr. Shearman—"Probably 1867," is written in ink.

Mr. Beach—Who by?

Mr. Shearman—Not by us; that is very certain.

Mr. Beach—I don't know whether it is very certain or not.

Mr. Shearman—It came directly from your associate.

Mr. Evarts—It was not shown to the witness. It was taken directly from you.

Mr. Beach—The difficulty is, if your Honor please, that Mr. Shearman read the date as if it had been dated 1867.

Mr. Evarts [Handling letter to witness]: That is your wife's handwriting, is it not, except that little memorandum? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is not hers? A. No, Sir.

Q. Whose handwriting is that? A. I should judge, looking at it, that it was in the handwriting of one of the stenographers; it may possibly be my own with a steel pen. I very rarely write with a steel pen. I am inclined to think it is my own.

Q. Is that in ink? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Pale ink. The date of the letter, if your Honor please, as given by the writer, Mrs. Tilton, is marked "Monday, January 29th." Then under it is written, in different ink, a memorandum, "probably 1867," and that Mr. Tilton says is either the stenographer's or possibly his own.

The Witness—Possibly mine.

Q. You suppose that to be the real date of the letter, do you not? A. Yes, Sir; it would be easy to ascertain by finding out whether January 28, in the year 1867, fell on Monday.

Mr. Evarts—Of course that would help, yes, no doubt. That would fix it really, for within any range we have, there would probably be but one.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I was going to ask you, in regard to some of the contents of this letter, that perhaps will fix the date. You heard the letter read, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir; I heard part of it read.

Q. You heard all that was read? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Perhaps you didn't listen to it. I don't know how that was. A. I was not listening very attentively.

Q. [Handing letter to witness]: I want to know whether, by looking at that letter, you can remember whether the delicate condition of health that Mrs. Tilton refers to as preventing her journey to the West to meet you—whether she was then recently getting up from her confinement? A. I don't remember, Sir, from the date.

Q. You cannot give the birthdays of your children from memory? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you no mode of giving us the exact birthdays of your children—any family record—any Bible? A. When I had a wife in my house I always referred to her for such information; I have none now, so I have to go without it. There is no record in my Bible; I went the other day to see—I thought there was—but there is none.

Mr. Evarts—We should like these dates, if we could get them, but we have no means of getting them.

The Witness—I presume if you refer to Mrs. Tilton, she can answer you immediately on the spot.

Mr. Shearman—January 28, 1867, came on Monday.

Mr. Evarts—January 28, 1867, Mr. Shearman says, did come on Monday.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—We have a calendar here.

Mr. Evarts—So that letter dated January, 1867, written very soon after your new house was occupied by you, refers to the house—the present house, &c.? A. I think so.

Q. The Fall of 1866 you went in there? A. I think I did; yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know about the dates of these births, but it occurred to me that I had seen something to fix them. Perhaps it is not so. Now, go on, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman [Reading]:

SUNDAY EVENING, Feb. 2d, 1867.

MY DEARLY BELOVED: I bless the inventor or creator, whatever his name—who made the calendar, and February the shortest month in the year. My thoughts now are ever on your home coming, and it is a daily growing anxiety how I shall present myself and abide in your love. Our children will delight and satisfy you for they have grown in every good work and way and are altogether lovely.

Carroll is certainly the personification of love itself.

If love be the fulfilling of the law, when are not the conditions for his highest life established?

I realize with the Vicar of Wakefield, how great a wealth we have in our children. They are already high up—beyond us—as Christ looks upon pure living. He has revealed himself to my babes. Blessed be his name.

The Church, to-night, was filled with medical students, Mr. B— preaching before their Christian Union. He certainly is greatly roused this Winter, and works most earnestly.

Will you not on your return throw in your inspiration and join us in fulfilling our vows as members of this Christian Church? Your beautiful spirit would help many there, as it does everywhere. And to me there is no spot so sacred in all this earth as Plymouth Church! Full of delicious memories. If we now, with all its members, bring into it our various rich and growing experiences, its later days would gloriously fulfill the enthusiasm of its beginning. These are my own thoughts, darling, and I feel that of late years we have both come short of our duty here.

I, with all my soul, have joined with you whenever any line of duty seemed plain to you; and from henceforth have I more utterly consecrated myself thereto. Now, therefore, I write your sympathy of thought and action with me. This Winter has blessed us both; though suffering, I rejoice unutterably that your bodily vigor is sustained, and even better than when you left home. I am not as well in body, though I do feel I have made some victories over my temper. I have striven for Christ's sake—who has been most precious to me—and for yours to array myself with purity of thought and action—and you know what it costs of struggle!

Once more my beloved, accept my most devout thanks for your patience and fidelity to help me onward and upward. Yet I dare not invite you to come and live again with me lest I bring disappointment and misery upon you. My soul is full, my eyes overflow while I write.

I must be victor! But I will sin if I go not to bed and sleep. At church, to-day, Mr. Studwell wished me to thank you for the reply to his letter, as you had paid no attention to it. Good night. Your own.

Mr. Fullerton—These letters don't appear to be marked as we go along.

Mr. Shearman—I will have them marked.

[Letter dated February 3, 1867, marked "Exhibit D, 67."]

Mr. Shearman [Reading]:

SATURDAY EVENING, February 1st, 1868.

MY BELOVED: The last day of the week I have been accustomed to look for your home-coming, so that to-day and this evening I am peculiarly lonely. Your precious letter from Pittsburgh came in your stead, which I have read four times already. Blessings on you, dearest, they have the last Winter's ring in them. I did not dare expect you would remember your aforesaid punctuality. Your closing lines are, "have I not a great heart when all its foundations are stirred?" Yes, most truly. Beloved, generous, noble, pure, I do thoroughly feel beyond all other men. Forgive me for telling you when forbidden. By so much as you are great. I too stretch out to reach you and thus we do lift up each other. God forbid I may never more drag you down!! Oh, well I know as far as I am capable I love you. Now, to keep this fire high and generous is the ideal before me. I am glad you carried a trunk, and are comfortable. I realize with mingled pain and pleasure, how much more satisfactory your physical life is away from home, and may be an ideal wife and children are in fact more helpful to you even as the memory of my Father has been more of an inspiration to me than his presence would have been. In this, separations become blessings; yet, with myself, darling, in my present growing passion and admiration and sympathy, I am only perfectly contented and restful when you are with me. These latter months, I have thought, looked and yearned for the hour when you would be home with longings unutterable; surely you must have felt the joy in my eye. I know that now mother, children or friend have no longer possession of my heart: the supreme place is yours forever; are you really glad to hear this, my sweet? When you speak your love for me it is delicious harmony to my soul.

The flowers you ordered came to-day; I kissed every one, then I gave them over to Flory to arrange, as she desired to. I gave a few to gladden Carroll, and as I read the line to him in your letter where you say you were "more proud to be loved by your little children than to be the President of the United States," large tears filled his eyes, and he said, "I do love my Papa." We do not at all realize the blessings we have in our children! I have filled my sheet with the tale of my love—so old but ever fresh and gushing in me. I will now tell you of the guests I have had since I wrote you yesterday.

Susan Anthony came to tea last night, and went away after breakfast. I learned nothing particular from her; was entertained with her talk; and regarded your wish by curbing my enthusiasm for you, while I must impress unmistakably the minds of all I meet the single end and aim of my life—to be faithful in so far as I know to the great privilege whereto I am called. "Elizabeth, thou art highly favored, chosen among women," are words ever sounding in my ears.

About eleven o'clock to-day, Mr. B. called. Now, beloved, let not even the shadow of a shadow fall on your dear heart because of this, now, henceforth or forever. He cannot by any possibility be much to me, since I have known you. I implore you to believe it and look at me as in the Day of Judgment I shall be revealed to you. Do not think it audacious in me to say I am to him a good deal, a rest, and can you understand it I appear even cheerful and helpful to him. He told me in confidence that Mrs. — and his family were at his house; that Mr. G— had sold most of his insurance policies; what remained was not equal in amount to what Mrs. G— had been accustomed for pin money—that on Monday she with her three younger children would return to their place in the country, while he, Mr. B—, kept the three older sons at his house, for they could not even pay the cheapest board, and on a personal matter he intended to get employment for them—they having been with their father in business only. He said his sympathies had gone out for them more than if they were his own—they all as a family seemed so unfitted for poverty.

After seeing the children, I asked him if he would go with me to Mattie's and see the bust—without any hesitation he said he would. I immediately got ready, and I took my first walk to the Court-st. cars, without much difficulty, so that I feel free again and will walk out every pleasant day. We found neither Mattie or Mack at home to my great disappointment, seeing only Laura Bradshaw and Gip—and your dear head, darling, which on second seeing is more than ever to me. Mr. B— expressed great satisfaction with it, feeling it was far better than he expected to find it, and he believed as correct a likeness as you could have. He is very desirous for Mack to try him. We came directly home, nothing noteworthy occurring, save that he left at the door with the remark that "he had had a very pleasant morning."

You once told me you did not believe that I gave you a correct account of his visits, and you always felt that I repressed much. Sweet, do you still believe this? I strive in my poor word-painting to give you the spirit and impression which I give him, and he to me. It would be my supreme wish and delight to have you always with me. This trinity of friendship I pray for always. I gave Miss — her money. She desired me to thank you sincerely for your generosity. Carroll will come down for dinner to-morrow.

I will try to have a letter awaiting you at every appointment. Now, darling, good-night. I hope to dream of you, love.

Tell me frankly what I can be or do for you, because I am altogether
YOUR OWN.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 68."]

Mr. Shearman [Reading]:

NURSERY, Sunday eve, March 8, 1868.

MY BELOVED: All alone, save Eliza in the kitchen and the children all asleep about me, while I have been trying to imagine my state when I shall again live with you and behold your precious form. This, I think, I have decided—no more chidings, scoldings! An inexpressible tenderness has grown up in my soul towards you. I never saw my path as clear as now—that whatever you may do, say or be, it becometh me to be the Christian wife and mother! The full meaning of those words, when developed from a nature impotent as mine, I most thoroughly understand. If I may lead my children now to an intimate love and trust in God, He manifesting Himself to babes, as He has promised, then to this great source of happiness strong bodies be added, I will risk intellectual training and knowledge. You say in your last, you are so drained and wearied, that when you come to me you can but bring "skim milk." It hath been so in all times past with both of us. Perhaps we have not had our love up high and supreme; the one delight of our lives, or maybe our frailty—weak bodies—have not been able to meet the demands of society and home duties. Mr. Beecher gave us a pleasant episode yesterday—a visit of more than an hour. He said, with great earnestness, you never could know the gratification your letter appreciating "Norwood" gave him. He meant to give you the American edition and me the English, or vice versa, so that we may have one each.

* * * * *
That I may be acceptable to you is my constant prayer.

Good night.

WIFE.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 69."]

Mr. Shearman [Reading]:

FRIDAY MORNING, January 23, 1869.

MY DEAR BELOVED: Your Monday's letter from Clinton, Ohio, telling me of your convalescence I have just received, and if my poor, dull, heavy "letters do you any good as a medicine," I have cause for gratitude. I'm sure, now that you have actually begun to speak every night, the necessity for constant effort, I hope, may keep off despondency—and I will promise to write more cheerily because of my successful efforts to live better.

My heart aches this morning at the death of Mrs. Monroe. She was the first of the three friends to go—mother and Mrs. Lombard remain. I am praying for mother all the time. You remember that she came over most sympathetically to dear Paul's funeral. * * * * *

Forgive me that I want so much love—yet my soul cries, "Give, give!" I believe I am big enough to supply even your big heart with love—if you'll only let me.

Farewell,

WIFE ELIZABETH.

Mr. Shearman—In passing over a passage or two, I say that none of these passages that are omitted reflect anything on any one; they are all perfectly proper, of course, but they have some allusion to the lady's domestic affairs, and to the domestic affairs of other ladies. Everything that is omitted is eminently proper, but I try to omit anything that might disclose family affairs of other ladies; but in doing so by accident I omitted this clause, not that it is of any importance, but I will read it:

"Phoebe and Alice have sent me their autographs, so I have them all now but yours. Frank Moulton came round to read me his letter from you. It delighted him greatly. Flory appears now quite well again."

[Marked "Exhibit D, 70."]

Mr. Shearman—There were two exhibits that were put in last night that were not read, which I will now read—two letters of 1868. One has been read. [Reading]

THURSDAY EVENING, February 20, 1868.

MY BELOVED: I am so lonesome and heartsick for your companionship to-night that I hesitate to write lest my mood may depress you. Yet I cannot wish you home, for I am persuaded you are happier where you are. While I long to be with you, I am haunted continually with fears that your cheery face will soon be shadowed and the dear head droop! This thought is agony to me, and I have spent many hours since your absence weeping because of it.

I would fain make the path smooth for your feet, or in other words direct the children and the household that they minister harmony only, but I know I cannot, and I am afraid! You are at Clinton to-night. I try to fancy each night where you are, when you begin your lecture and when end, the lonely bed after the weary day, &c. But I know you are happy and make others happy. This is a comfort to me. I bless God for your health and your generous love to me. I took my second lesson on the melodeon to-day, to my great satisfaction. The most that I have yet learned is, how very little I know. This knowledge is stimulating. Oliver told me that Mr. Hatfield had written to Gilbert Haven urging him strongly to accept The Independent office. But I hear that the Methodists will make him a bishop. I am greatly interested in the paper and all that pertains to it. Will you talk with me in the future about all that interests you? Let us be more frank and free toward each other. The children are all well.

I have paid all your bills but Journey's, but in order to do so I drew on my salary, $40; the losing of the $50 from Warren would have prevented that; as it is, I am very much pinched, as I could not spare $30 last month and $40 this. Our household expenses are nearly the same as when you are home, for the family is large and we eat good food, though no dainties. Bessie is doing better since her head is clearer by being left alone from her unfortunate relatives. I do not scold her any more, darling. She has been the one cause of trouble between us since we have lived in this house; but, as I said before, I cannot bear to make you miserable by my harshness. I think in this you will find a change in me.

Good night. "Good angels guard thy sleep."

WIFE.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, who is "Oliver," referred to—the first name, Oliver; your wife speaks of Oliver? A. Oh, Oliver Johnson.

Mr. Shearman [reading]:

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 26, 1868.

MY DEAR HUSBAND:

Let me tell you of the events—

Mr. Evarts—What is that date?

Mr. Shearman—February 26. It is in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting.

Mr. Evarts—The only date is Wednesday, February 26th, put in by the writer. There seems to be a memorandum. [Handing witness the letter.] Say whose that is? A. I judge it to be mine, Sir, written with a steel pen.

Mr. Evarts—Probably 1868. The same reference to the calendar will settle that.

The Witness—Judge Porter can settle that in a moment.

Mr. Shearman—The stenographer will understand that these two papers that I have here were marked last night—"D, 60," and "D, 61."

Mr. Evarts—It appears that Wednesday was the 26th of February, 1868.

Mr. Shearman [reading]:

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 26, [1868.]

MY DEAR HUSBAND: Let me tell you the events of yesterday. Directly after breakfast I read aloud the entire editorial sheet and the Washington letter of THE TRIBUNE, concerning the Impeachment. I wish I might be with you at these times. Andy has gone a little too far. Congress acted promptly at last. I know how this turn in affairs affects your spirits. God is showing His face again after so long an hiding. How blessed is this re-assurance. Now, I say to myself—with Andy removed, and your wife restored, and your debts most paid, what remains but to be happy? I feel jubilant, for God is good. After reading I went to the Police Station, where I met seven other ladies, and their seven clocks all waiting for the Judge to hear our complaints; he did not come until near 4 o'clock—losing my dinner and my patience, besides my clock will be of no value probably as they have all been at the pawnbroker's, knocked about, cases broken and works destroyed to many of them. Then I went to Aunt Hannah's, as I knew her enthusiasm over the day's news needed an outlet to a sympathizing ear, and staid there to tea. Was too tired to write you on coming home and went to bed.

I forgot to tell you in my last that on Monday eve I heard Mr. Raymond read "Othello" to my great delight and profit, I trust. I am going to-day to visit Mattie, making the most of Mrs. Mitchell's stay with me. Mr. B— put our baby to sleep, laid him down and covered him up, the last time he was here—said whenever we could not quiet him, send for him, and he would come. His call amused the children very much. This crumpled sheet is the only scrap of paper in the house. Excuse it and the writing, my sweet. Oh, how proud I am of you. I'm sure we will be happier in the future—Had we begun our lives where now we start! All well; expect your mother this week.

Farewell.

YOUR OWN.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 61."]

SUNDAY, Feb. 7th, 1869.

MY BELOVED: I have just finished reading to Emma Lowell's "Extreme Unction," and the chapter in "Norwood" of Parson Buell's grief in the death of his wife. It is very touching, and I realized for a moment what that agony must be, the parting at the river between a husband and wife who have truly loved—how inevitable it is! God only can sustain the one who remains, while He enables the one who departs to say, "I shall be satisfied!"

Allow me to say, without cant, that God has given me a blessing to-day. He has enabled me to do something for Him, and that conscious privilege overflows my heart utterly. At home he helped me to be patient, willing, yea, glad, to spend myself for others; and in the Bethel—my little room was crowded—the interest increases in my class. They all love me. I feel it, because I too love every one. I do indeed feel grateful for the encouragement they give me in these new labors. I tell you rather more at length than usual of my work here, because I earnestly wish your sympathy and to feel free to talk with you of everything in which I am interested—as in "Auld Lang Syne." How'er imperfect we may appear to each other, yet the dear Lord does not hesitate to use us. Now, to-night, I give myself to you—my best, my worst, "just as I am," take me once again into your confidence; bear with my follies as in early days. I consecrate myself to you so long as I shall live, before God this night as a fitting close of this Sabbath day. Forgive all my infirmities and help me to overcome to final victory. Wilt thou? So will I you, if you permit. The freedom with which you write of Paul gives me great pleasure. Then the fountains are unsealed and we flow together. I talk not so much of him—yet this new mysterious feeling I know, which I never before have uttered—a kind of awe, or waiting, listening to learn what he will do for me—and an agony of fear at times lest I should fall by reason of sin what he could bring. Already in many things I am a changed woman through his precious ministrations; yet, fearing such a statement may be too positive, let me modify it by a woman changing.

Your change of route upsets my reckoning, and I am not able to place you to-night, which I regret because, as I told you before, I have known not only what place you are each night, but also which letter of mine you will find there. After Friday I shall be all right again; meanwhile I hope you will enjoy to the utmost your recreation with dear friends.

I have no items of news to-day. I am trying to be a cheerful, good woman—that's good news.

Good-night. If I might only write an easy, flowing, beautiful letter to my Beloved!

ELIZABETH, Wife.

P. S.—Lizzie Wood sent her love to you to-day, which I forgot, and Frank Moulton called to say that he had spoken to the prisoners at the Penitentiary and would write you about it. Mattie mailed you a letter for Danville.

All these things I forgot earlier in my letter.

YOUR OWN.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 71."]

Mr. Everts—Mr. Tilton, this refers to a domestic affliction in the death of your child Paul, does it not? A. Well, Sir, my mind was wandering away during the reading.

Q. I only wanted to fix a date if I could? A. If you will let me see the letter a moment.

Q. This letter is dated Feb. 7, 1869. I call your attention to this: "The freedom with which you write of Paul gives me great pleasure." A. That was our little son who died.

Q. He died the preceding Summer, did he not? A. Yes, Sir; in 1868.

Q. "Mattie mailed you a letter from Danville." Who is Mattie? A. She, Sir, was our dear and honored friend Mrs. Bradshaw.

Q. The lady who has been a witness? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And there is a reference in one of the letters to May—by the name of May, and in reference to a bust of yours. Who was May? A. That was a reference to Miss Mary Bradshaw, the daughter of Mrs. Bradshaw.

Q. The daughter of this same lady? A. Yes, Sir; she is now the wife of a professor in Washington, and was at that time an art student, and had made a bust of Mr. Beecher, and also one of myself.

Mr. Shearman [Reading]: "August 8, 1869."

The Witness—Mr. Everts, before the next letter is read, perhaps I ought to modify my last remark. I did not get the date of the letter that you read, and possibly those two busts had not then been made, but were made afterwards.

Mr. Everts—Oh, well, but the letter refers to one bust—your bust, and to Mr. Beecher's wish to have another.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—It was not at the time of the last letter, but the previous letter.

The Witness—Very well.

Mr. Everts—The letter itself indicates that. They were looking at her bust of you, and then Mr. Beecher said he would like to have her make one of him.

The Witness—And she made one of him afterwards.

Mr. Everts—Afterwards.

Mr. Shearman [Reading]:

AUGUST 8, 1869.

MY DEAR HUSBAND: My heart sorrows to-night for my loss in the death of Mrs. Elliott. Pity dear mother, as one after one of her friends leave her. Minister to her if you can, my darling.

Oh, dear Theodore, may I not persuade you to love the Lord Jesus Christ? Do not let this entreaty estrange us more, for my pillow oft is wet with tears and prayers that we may come into sympathy in our religious natures. Do have patience with me, for, as the time remains to us, I feel as though my heart would break if I did not speak to you—not that I am right in any sense, and you are wrong; God forbid! but we are not one in feeling, and it is impossible for me to be indifferent, especially while God blesses me with dear children.

I once again ask forgiveness if I have offended you by showing my heart. Our dear baby grows finely. Carroll suffered much to-day by having nitrate of silver put upon his fingers, but he desired it himself; he is desirous to reform this habit.

I am extremely glad that Mr. Greeley is to be with you. I hope you will have unalloyed comfort with him. Give him my love, as you know I have it for him. Make him as comfortable as you can. Your letters coming daily are my sustenance really, although they give me only your other life.

I commenced a letter to-day to Mrs. Moulton, acknowledging her kindness. I weigh 108½ pounds. I hope to reward your loving care by an increase of ten or twelve pounds when next you see me. Good night! Your dear wife,

ELIZABETH.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 72."]

Mr. Shearman [Reading]:

SUNDAY EVENING, Feb. 28th, 1869.

MY BELOVED: "This is the last day of Winter," little Carroll said as he got into bed to-night. "Papa will soon be here." "Yes," I replied, "Spring will certainly come, and I hope in three Sundays more Papa will come as surely!"

We had a delightful "sing" after tea—read in turns two chapters in the Bible, then followed our little prayer meeting. I felt it was good and acceptable. You were not forgotten, be assured. Blessings must follow the prayers of little children for their parents.

My Bethel meeting to-day was good. I am sure no one of the little band went away uncheered. How munificently God rewards the faintest, feeblest efforts we make for the good of others.

I will go back a little and tell you yesterday's story, a day so full as to crowd out entirely my writing you. First of all, then, my heart overflowed toward you, because of your generous, kind letter concerning mother. She was quite touched by it, and desired me to give you her thanks for your sympathy, saying again, as she has often said before, "Because I made an idol of you, Elizabeth, is why Theodore has made me so wretched. I have felt he did not appreciate you, and often neglected you, but I want to forgive all the agony he has caused me."

This was the first time your name has been mentioned since her stay with me. Forgive the indelicacy of quoting her remark; it seemed to me a concession on her part toward you; the least sign I must welcome as a promise of the fulfillment of my life-long prayers—my married life, I mean.

My head and heart have been so full of divorce cases since you left—this difficulty of mother's following on the heels of Mrs. —has been a kind of experience of which I have had quite enough. Were I a lawyer I would certainly change my profession or beg, rather than investigate such miseries.

Now, my sweet, after so long a tale let me for our mutual refreshment turn to our own sweet love. I bless God that it abideth! Among the terrible changes of many hearts, God has kept us steadfast, with a growing love, admiration and respect for each other. Oh, let us praise His name forever! All the differences, misunderstandings, we have had are as Whittier says "like mountain ranges overpast."

"If God be for us, who can be against us?"

Give me your patience while I spread out before you the fruitage of your beautiful love, like the rare-cut flowers of a bouquet. They are the closing words of your letters—select and precious, reminding me of the soul-stirring benedictions of the Apostles' Epistles.

Fruit No. 1.—"But among all my losses, I have lost no jot or tittle of my ever-increasing love for the sweetest of wives, and the fairest of children." "My heart longs for you to-day."

"Grace, mercy and peace.

Ever thine."

"You and the chicks, and the house, and all are in my thoughts every day and hour."

"Good bye, and all hail!

Ever yours."

"With overflowing love I am now and ever, yours devotedly."

"I send you now, as ever, the fervid love of yours devotedly."

"I think you and I are yet to walk in Paradise together."

"I would rather have my wife and children at this moment than all the honors under the sun."

"Every day of my life I love you more and more, and shall unto the end." "With my whole soul I am yours faithfully."

"If now I had a little personal comforting and petting from the little lady at No. 136, I would be perfectly satisfied."

"But Paul and I keep our companionship. To you, his mother, be God's peace." "I love you fervently and entirely. Blessings with you always." Then, fearing that these extreme delights "would make a woman mad outright," you have six epistles ending: "Yours in dust and ashes." "Yours doggedly." "God help your sorrowful and groaning husband." "Yours achingly," &c.

How like you the receiving a letter from yourself? I keep a list of these delicious tit-bits. Most tenderly believe it. Thou knowest that I love thee.

Good night.

WIFE ELIZABETH.

Mr. Shearman—There is a postscript, though not marked so. [Reading]:

A little home news. Went with Mattie to the organ concert. I send the inclosed programme.

* * * * *
Do you remember when you returned last year Mr. Mitchell brought little Paul down in the parlor to see you, and the smile of welcome he gave? I wish so it might be that the dear little expected might be brought to you in like manner. You would then avoid my suffering, and all would then be happiness. Flory says: "Oh, Mamma, if you were not obliged to suffer and be sick, how happy we all should be."

I have a great unwillingness that those who love me should suffer for me.

Once more, good night.

YOUR DEAR WIFE.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 78."]

Mr. Evarts—It is past our hour of adjournment.

The Court here took a recess until two o'clock.

ANOTHER INSTALMENT OF LETTERS.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, we owe to your Honor and the jury an apology for being a little late. We were engaged in the examination of some papers, and the lapse of time did not strike us as of very much concern.

Mr. Shearman—I am sorry that we have to read the letters a little out of order. There is some difficulty in finding them.

Mr. Shearman then read the following letter, which was marked "Exhibit D, 74."

FRIDAY NIGHT, Dec. 28th, 1866.

MY OWN TRUE MATE:

One of the most severe days we have had. Have not been out except to call on Mr. Ovington. A consultation was held upon his case to-day, resulting in assuring his wife that with great care, he might recover. I seem to have some power to cheer him, wherefore I give about an hour a day to him. I was obliged to call in Dr. Barker, for Flory was sick this afternoon, and already his remedies have helped her. She had anticipated much during the holidays—a visit to Jo's, and other places have been given up—but she bears it well.

Annie had a fine time at Emma Beach's party last night—it was a grand affair. She will not go back to Nyack—stay with me awhile, and I hope you will decide to send her to Lexington, tho' perhaps rest from study this Winter would be best. She seems very happy with me, and while you are away I am glad of her company—since she has learned to be agreeable, and is far more helpful than of old. Burrows's wife has a son two weeks old. I have not been there.

My beloved, I have been thinking of my love for Mr. B—considerably of late, and those thoughts you shall have. I remember Hannah Moore says: "My heart in its new sympathy for one abounds towards all." Now, I think I have lived a richer, happier life since I have known him. And have you not loved me more ardently since you saw another high nature appreciated me? Certain it is that I never in all my life had such rapture of enthusiasm in my love for you—something akin to the birth of another babe—a new fountain was opened, enriching all—especially toward you, the one being supreme in my soul. "I love thee with the breath, smiles, tears, of all my life!—and if God choose I shall but love thee better after death."

It is not possible for any human creature to supersede you in my heart. Above all you rise grand, highest, best. I praise God that He is teaching me of His great mercy and love, shown by His gift of so great a heart as your own, to be mine. For many years I did not realize the blessing. What remorse it brings to me! Memories bitter, awful! But to return to Mr. B—. He has been the guide of our youth, and until the three last dreadful years, when our confidence was shaken in him—we trusted him as no other human being. During these early years, the mention of his name, to meet him, or, better still, a visit from him, my cheek would flush with pleasure—an experience common to all his parishioners of both sexes. It is not strange, then, darling, that on a more intimate acquaintance my delight and pleasure should increase. Of course I realize what attracts you both to me is a supposed purity of soul you find in me. Therefore it is that never before have I had such wrestlings with God, that He would reveal Himself to me, and ever in my ears I hear "The pure in heart shall see God." Oh, fulfill this promise unto me, my Lord and my God! Darling husband, I have endeavored to express to you, without cant or any such thing—my true feelings, as they appear to me. It is true that I live in an agony of soul daily; nevertheless I am profoundly happy in my privileges, opportunities and blessings.

God is with us. We have had great experiences this Winter. He will keep us, I am sure—our trust is in Him.

Let us pour out our souls in prayer that we may never sin as before, when we meet again. Will it be possible that I shall ever again cause you a pang. God in great mercy forbid!!

Good night.

Oh, for one embrace. My whole being goes out toward you. I believe it does. May I not hope now that between us there is a true union of souls? Holy Spirit, searcher of all hearts, incline us wholly toward one another!

Yours,

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, I will ask you one question about this Annie. She appears to be mentioned in some other letters also? A. Mrs. Leslie.

Q. She was then a young lady? A. She is still, Sir.

Q. I was going to ask about her age? A. A grown young lady. What was the date of that letter?

Q. A grown young lady at that time? A. Yes. What was the date of that letter?

Q. December 28, 1866. A. Well, she was a young maid at that time.

Mr. Shearman—Have you any more letters, Mr. Morris?

Mr. Morris—Here are some on the list we have not found yet.

Mr. Shearman—I will now read this letter:

MONDAY MORNING, Feb. 24th, 1868.

MY DARLING OF DARLINGS: I am most happy to sit down in writing talk with you. This is my first break in my daily correspondence. Saturday to Monday, owing to Sis and Eddie, Joe and Fanny coming up on Saturday to spend Sunday with me, and Sunday, when I yearned to write to you after church, was prevented by calls from Mr. Ovington and friend, Mr. Augustus Storrs, Mr. Freeland, and the Rev. Mr. Adams, which occupied the whole afternoon. Then I gave an hour to my children, to our mutual delight, and the evening passed with Joseph and Fanny, until weary, I was forced to go to bed without giving you my Sabbath love. To-day I thank you; I thank you for a look into your heart—for, with one or two exceptions, you have not shown it to me since you went away. Your work and fatigue is the cause I know. Oh! my beloved, I feel unutterable love and sympathy for you in your anguish and "heart-break," as you say. It is too true you have given largely, grandly, and bountifully of your best love to friends, aye even to your wife, while in return you have received most often indifference, and at best, love not deserving the name, in comparison with thine own. Do you wonder that I couple your love, your presence, and relation to me, with the Saviour's? I lift you up sacredly and keep you in that exalted and holy place, where I reverence, respect—and love with the fervency of my whole being. Whatever capacity I have, I offer it you. The closing lines of your letter are these words: "I shall hardly venture again upon a great friendship—your love shall be enough for the remaining days." That word enough seems a stoicism in which you have resolved to live your life. But I pray God He will supply you with friendship pure and wisely love, which your great heart demands, withholding not himself as the chief love, which consenteth not tho' it burn, and whose effects are always perfect rest and peace. Again, in one of your letters you close with "faithfully yours—that word 'faithful' means a great deal." Yes, darling, I believe it, trust it, and give you the same surety with regard to myself. I am faithful to you, have been always, and shall forever be, world without end. Call not this assurance impious. There are some things we know. Blessed be God. I sorrow more than you can, for your lost friendship—as my soul stings with remorse that I was the cause—and yet for all this, you love me. Henceforth let no one point the finger at your Christianity. The love which is in Christ Jesus abounds in your soul. Flory is persistent in her wish to unite with the church. Shall she do so when you return, at the May communion—that—

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, Feb. 18th, 1868.

MY DARLING HUSBAND: You have made me rich to-day; your letter from Lincoln came this morning, and this night Eliza brought me the full epistle from Chicago. I read every word eagerly; drop instantly whatever I am doing when the postman comes, and give myself up utterly, body and soul, locking the doors to prevent intruders, just as we are wont to do after an absence. I am heartily glad you are with the dear good friends in Chicago. How I wish I could have been with you? I hope you have impressed upon Elizabeth my profound respect and love for her. How grateful it was to your poor tired head to rest there in the bosom of those dear ones! I am so glad, so thankful, the opportunity was given you, even tho' it cost the Des Moines appointment and two letters of mine awaiting you. I never realized as now I do, your arduous labors, and the great hindrance and drag I have been to your young, beautiful life.

I yearn to caress and tenderly care for you, read, sing, and gladden those dear eyes once again. I feel as never before, how dreadful a thing it is to wound or stab any human heart by sharp, stinging words. Perhaps the dear Father has given me another lease of life, that I may learn this lesson. I praise him for his goodness. Then again, darling, I have felt so heart-sick that there are so few great men and women. The idea of a faithful, true marriage will be lost out of the world—certainly out of the literary and refined world—unless we renew it.

It amused me much to hear of your namesake, Tilton Prince. Prince Tilton is our pet's name. I shall have much to tell you of our dear friend, Mr. B—. He has opened his heart, as you would love and admire him. To believe in one human being strengthens one's faith in God. Now, what shall I add of love? I am devoted to you. I want that your latter days may be the brightest and richest of all your life. It is fearful to contemplate the wrecks there are in human life.

Believe in me,

Yours always,

ELIZABETH, WIFE.

Mr. Shearman here paused, looking for some letters.

Mr. Morris—We have here more of hers, that are not on your list, however.

OTHER LETTERS OF MR. TILTON TO HIS WIFE.

Mr. Shearman—While searching for one or two more of Mrs. Tilton's, not found easily at present,—counsel not agreeing as to them,—I will read some letters of Mr. Tilton to his wife.

Mr. Shearman then read the following, which was marked "Exhibit D, 77."

AT THE OFFICE,
Tuesday Morning, Aug. 21, 1866.

MY WELL-BELOVED WIFE: I enjoyed your recent visit as I never enjoyed a similar occasion in all my life—in some respects, more than any preceding similar visits. The memory of it lingers in my mind, as the fragrance of a garden clings to one's garments long after walking through it. It is only now and then, I suppose, in the lives of the best of good people, that they appear to each other at the very brightest point of moral development and spiritual ripeness. But it is certain that you showed yourself very lovely to me on that beautiful Sunday evening. I register that scene in my memory, classing it with the other choicest remembrances of my whole life, ranking it among the joys that are never to be forgotten. I would to God I were not so easily overcome by my own worldly-mindedness as to be brought so quickly and fatally down from my heavenly moods and the earth. But this belongs to the infirmity of human nature. I have walked like a king ever since that evening. No labor has been too arduous—no sacrifice too great for me. It is such fruition that our mutual love ought always, or oftener, to bear. May God make us wise, rich and pure.

Forever yours,

THEODORE.

Mr. Shearman next read the following, which was marked "Exhibit D, 78."

LAFORTE, INDIANA, Dec. 6, 1866.

MY DARLING: I have ridden all day long, and am just arrived, at dark, about an hour before my lecture. I am so excited in mind by a sense of my being imprisoned away from home, barred out by impassable walls, hindered from seeing you by cruel obstacles, that I can do nothing at this moment but make an outburst of feelings. I ought now to be composing myself for my task, but I feel more like taking flight eastward, in the next train. All day long I have been reading "Griffith Gaunt." Go to the bookstore, buy a copy, and read it—that is, if you would like to be doing the same thing with myself. I am not yet far enough in the story to know its moral meaning, but it has excited me considerably. It turns on jealousy. I am not jealous. Nor do I know the feeling. I think any man is a fool who is jealous. If he is jealous without cause, he is foolish: if with cause, more foolish. But I am somewhat disturbed, and have been for a long while past, at the diminishing faith which I entertain for human nature. Human characters do not seem so lovely to me as they once did. Perhaps this view is temporary—the result of a passing shadow. Or, rather, perhaps it is because I do not entertain so fond an opinion of my own character—its moral strength and unbending rectitude—as I once supposed I could justly entertain. During my travels, I have had profound reflections on my life. I am a weak man, supposed to be strong; a selfish man, supposed to be the world's lover and helper; an earthly minded man, supposed to be more Christian than my fellows. I cannot endure the mockery; it breeds agony in me. At this moment I am completely wretched, yet expect in ten minutes to step forth to a public welcome. The outside life is one thing, the inside another. I dare not show the inside to the world. And yet I must show it perpetually to God. I am endeavoring to live a manly life—not what the over generous world shall so esteem, but what in my inmost conscience I shall know to be such. I have had many wrestlings of my soul with Heaven, of late. I feel myself scarred, spotted, miserable and unworthy. From this feeling dawns the day. I have taken refuge in my lecture at night, sometimes turning it almost into a sermon. I have come to feel exactly as the Prodigal felt. An inward revelation of a man's self to himself is an awful thing. It lifts my face to the eternal world. Henceforth my prayer is that God may keep me nearer to Himself. My life is so unprofitable that I sometimes dare not turn round and look upon it. You cannot guess for what one thing I most yearn to see you. It is to kneel by your side at our familiar evening prayer. My prayers of late have seemed all spiritless without you. I am never so true a man as in my prayers—when I have prayed with my arm around your neck. It seems to me now that I cannot live this Winter without at least seeing you once or twice—if for no other moments than just these greater of all moments. I see with agony in the retrospect, how my life has been marred by social influences coming from your mother—how they disastrously have affected us both. If you should ever appear to me anything less than the ideal woman, the Christian saint that I know you to be, I shall not care to live a day longer. I cannot write further. I must stop to go to my audience. It is dreadful to be so full of feeling as I am at this moment.

God bless you!

THEODORE.

Mr. Shearman then read the following, which was marked "Exhibit D, 79 :—"

IN THE CASE,
NORTHERN INDIANA, }
Dec. 7, 1886.

MY DARLING: This rattling train shakes my pencil, but I must endeavor to write to say that I have just finished "Griffith Gaunt."

It is a powerful and interesting story, well constructed, though not remarkably well written. I don't care particularly whether you read it or not. It has not baptized and anointed me like our mutual reading of "Felix Holt." Do you not often recall that sweet evening, in Twelfth street, when late at night we finished that heroic story? I can see you at this moment, lying propped on the sofa, your red shawl around your shoulders, and your waterproof cloak over your feet. That night and the day that followed it filled me as full of human happiness as my heart could hold. "Griffith Gaunt" ends in a far sweeter and more agreeable manner than one expects when he is in the midst of its pages. But I have never met a character in any romance equal to one which, if I were a romancist, I could draw from a certain woman I know. The novels turn too much on love as a passion, as a jealousy, as a madness, as an intense adoration for the time being, and it is only here and there that one sees in a novel the true and perfect love of a true and perfect woman—the love that swells in the soul rather than in the heart. Men and women who have the mere natural instinct for loving love with the heart; but they who have a true genius for loving, love with the soul. The noblest part of love is honor, fidelity, constancy, self-abnegation—not the clasp of the hand, nor the kiss of the lips, nor the ecstasy of fondness. Sometimes that which most delights the heart most cheats the soul. It is for this reason that lovers ought sometimes to be separated. Now, to bear each other in memories, in daily and hourly pictures of the fancy, in constant mutual communings of soul, without a contrast of the flesh, in perpetual nearness, notwithstanding miles of distance, in an abiding reverence, unfeigned, lofty and ennobling. This is the great prerogative of true love.

No man loves a woman as a woman loves a man, until he has attained to such an experience as this of the union of two souls by their noblest possible interchange. But, in some lives this comes not at all; and, in the best lives, it comes only at the crowning moments. O that we were heroic enough to seek always to live our best possible life! I am trying more than ever.

God help us both. Thine immortally,

THEODORE.

QUINCY, ILL., Dec. 12, 1886.

MY DARLING OF DARLINGS: I have just written two letters to the little girls, and have only a minute left for adding a kiss for their mother. Oh, how I long to see you! I yearn, and long, and pine to be at home. I never knew the strength of my home attachments till this Winter. I never fully comprehended how thoroughly we are a part of each other till this separation. I bleed like a grape-vine broken off. But I cannot say that I am not cheerful. My work seems important, and my Winter (if I am spared through it) will be the most useful one of all my life. I am lecturing in dead earnest. I have a message to deliver. I could not endure to speak night after night on any merely literary or entertaining theme. I believe I love my country purely and passionately and seek her honor and integrity. I must write while yet the strength and life last. I have always had a sense that neither would last for many years.

Ever yours,

THEODORE.

DUBUQUE, IOWA, Dec. 27, 1886.

MY DARLING: I came hither this morning, and found your letter awaiting me. Hereafter I trust I shall receive all your letters. This makes the third time I have crossed the Mississippi, not counting recrossings. The beautiful river this morning was nowhere to be seen. It flows silently under a bridge of solid ice. I crossed in a sleigh. The ride was more than a mile from bank to bank. The far-western atmosphere, by which I mean Iowa, Minnesota and Kansas, is very pure, dry and healthful. To-day is a perfect specimen of such atmospheric healthfulness. After breakfast I toiled up the steep bluffs, clad in my furs, to keep off Jack Frost. My panting and struggling rewarded me with rosy cheeks; but I had no wife near by to kiss them. My health is excellent, but I think I am looking older than usual. Last night the villainous time-table robbed me of my rest. But I am having a long day of leisure to make up for the theft. I have been busy about three hours in getting off answers to lecture-committees. If I had six tongues instead of one, I could employ them all, and every night. I had a touch of home sickness this morning. It came from the sunshine that poured into my room from the lustrous south-east. The walls, the carpet, the chairs all glowed and glittered under the touch of the Goldsmith. I wanted then a certain shining face to sit in my rocking chair, on whose eyes I might look, and on whose lips I might hang. I allow these and such like words to fill me awhile with a delicious sadness, and then I fight them down and go to work. I don't expect, however, to be lonesome much longer, for I am to meet you in Chicago. Now that the other man has gone off lecturing (as your letter mentions) you can afford to come to me. You ought to be enjoying what I am enjoying on this magnificent trip—for instance, this afternoon, a dinner-party. Leave home, children, kith and kin, and cleave unto him to whom you originally promised to cleave. You promised the other man to cleave to me, and yet you leave me all alone and cleave to him. "O Frailty! thy name is woman." If you can get anybody to pour tea for you, and to take sauce from the servants, and to receive pastoral visits, I shall expect to meet you under the roof of Robert Hatfield.

Yours eternally,

THEODORE.

BATTLE CREEK, Michigan, Jan. 30, 1867.

MY OTHER SELF: I cannot tell you how much pleasure I find in just sitting down, at odd moments, and dropping you a few hasty lines, either about something or nothing, or midway between. This daily, and sometimes twice-daily habit, has done more to keep me cheerful under my inevitable home-longings than I before supposed possible. There is something in the exchange of letters that ranks next to the greeting of palm to palm. When I receive one of your letters the sheet seems to contain more than your mere writing; it is something which has been touched by your hand, which has caught a pulse of your feeling, and which represents more than the words can possibly say. I have always felt a little guilty after throwing away even an envelope on which you had written my name. Think, therefore, what a bankruptcy I suffered when I lost the packet of all your daily letters for six weeks! I lost them from my too great care; for I carried them in my pocket, which I could always reach, and would not trust them to my valise, which was not always under my eye. I had filed them carefully, put each in its order of date, interleaved them with the few letters which the children wrote, and kept the roll as sacred archives. I meant, on my return home, to put them in an iron safe, and bequeath them to the children, to show to Florence's sons and daughters how much their grandfather and grandmother loved one another in the olden time. But those delightful manuscripts belong now to the lost literatures of the world.

Ever yours,

THEODORE.

ON THE CARS, CHICAGO TO MILWAUKEE, {
Tuesday, Feb. 14th, '67.

MY DARLING: I wrote to you a hurried sheet this morning from the Sherman House, while waiting for Henry M. Smith to breakfast with me. He did not come; I ate my breakfast alone. Once again on the cars, and once again confronting a lecture-appointment, I feel that I am once again at work, after my two days of pleasant rest.

And I confess that rest is sweet. I do not mean rest for wearied limbs, though that, too, is sweet; but rest for one's spirit; rest in the midst of a circle of kind and loving friends; rest to one's own vagrant, untamed and unconquerable homesickness; rest in the tranquillity of spiritual peace.

I have been enjoying two days of such rest. The spell is still on me this morning. I rode five hours to Princetown yesterday afternoon, and five hours back, after midnight, on purpose to spend a long and delicious evening with the Lovejoy family. This family and its influences have helped to make me a better man. The very roof seems to spread over me a benediction. I am grateful for the Providence that ordered my steps last December to the threshold of this cottage. Tarrying with these dear people has been a new experience in friendship—a new delight of life.

The whole subject of friendship has been much in my mind this Winter.

I am satisfied that whoso makes no intimate or confidential friends, both among men and among women, friends with whom he girdles himself round about as with a halo—friends who are prone to keep him lifted perpetually toward his highest life—friends whose friendship is a kind of sacred wedding that knows no sex—such a man neglects one of the greatest of human opportunities for intellectual, moral and spiritual growth. * * * The old religious teachings, the orthodox view, the dread of punishment, the atonement, have less and less power over my mind. Of course you will mourn over this. But I must be an honest man. I don't believe in orthodoxy, and therefore I will not pretend to do so. From you as from God, I have no secrets. So I tell you day by day my thoughts. And these are my thoughts this morning. But the car is now growing crowded; a man has taken a seat at my elbow, and I must stop writing. Blessings on your saintly head!

Ever yours,

THEODORE.

[Marked "D, 83."]

Mr. Shearman—I asked for a letter of Feb. 14th, 1867, and it looks as if there were two letters of that date; you have only given us one of that date.

Mr. Morris—That is the only one we have.

Mr. Shearman—This is not the one that is printed. The letter which has been handed us was originally dated Feb. 14th, 1865. It is then altered to 1867. I do not know how to account for that; but it does not correspond with the one that is published, dated Feb. 14th, 1867.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! yes, there are two of February 14th.

[A consultation here took place among counsel.]

Mr. Evarts—In regard to this letter of January 31st, 1866. Do you consider your search such as to show that it is not in existence or cannot be found?

Mr. Morris—Well, I don't know.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I would like to read this copy.

Mr. Morris—We don't know whether that is a copy of the letter.

Mr. Evarts—We are entitled to one or the other; we want the letter for other reasons. It seems there is only a part of it that is printed here, and we want the part that is printed here if we cannot get the rest.

Mr. Beach—What did you do with this letter of February 14th, 1867?

Mr. Evarts—That is not the one; there are two of that date; that is not the one.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, in the last exhibit which was presented [No. 83] Mr. Shearman read I think from the printed book and not from the original, and he has omitted several portions of the letter, they having been omitted in the book, and we think they should be read in connection.

Mr. Evarts—We will read it all; it is Mr. Tilton's letter.

Mr. Shearman—I had no objection to read the letter, but it struck me it was getting on private families.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; it strikes you in a tender spot, in my judgment.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, I will read the passages that were omitted; I glanced hastily at it as I was reading it. [Reading:]

I have had abundant occasion this Winter to test the impressions which different kinds of new friends make upon my mind and heart. "Ye have not many fathers in Israel," said Paul; in addition to which I have also found that one has not many mothers, or sisters, or brothers, or friends. The number of people who mate each other—who fit one another exactly—who are (to use your word) "counterparts," is very small. A man must see in his friend something that supplements himself. That for which we hunger in another is that which is needed to keep us from being incomplete ourselves. The best type of friendship, therefore, is that which excites the souls of true friends to their highest spiritual states. My friends are legion, and yet only here and there one affects me powerfully in my moral nature. By most of my friends I am influenced (so far as I can see) for neither better nor worse; but by a few whose names are precious, I am purified and ennobled. Their society is like a ministry of angels. To talk with them, to live among them, to be near them, or simply to be thinking of them is a blessedness.

I have lately realized this in an exquisite and delightful degree.

And this fact reveals the one prolonged mistake of my past life—my association with your mother. I can now plainly see what I might have been if, for instance, I could have lived under such a roof as sheltered me in Princeton, instead of breathing, during all these years, the atmosphere of Livingston-street. If my mother-in-law had been such a woman as Mrs. Lovjoy, and the influences of Brooklyn had been like the influences of Princeton, I believe that I might have grown by this time as unselfish as a good woman. How much more I would then have been to yourself and the children! How many pangs you might have been saved! How many unknown joys you might have experienced! I have not been a wise man or I would not have consented, eleven years ago, to pitch my tent in a bank of fog. Moreover, let us beware of the tragic and dreadful mistake of teaching to our children that when they shall be married their first and chief allegiance will still be to their parents as heretofore, and that only a secondary fealty is sufficient between husband and wife. I have never seen so plainly as I have seen this Winter what Livingston-street mildew I have been carrying on my garments for eleven years. Six months ago I was accustomed to say to myself in my secret hours, "Theodore Tilton, it is time for you to die; your soul grows not whiter but darker; die soon and save yourself from total destruction." But, I believe that if I shall return to Brooklyn at all, I shall return a different man. God grant it! I know that I have tried to wash myself clean at the fountain of a better life."

Then follows the passage: "The old religious teachings, etc."

Mr. Beach—That is February 12th, 1867?

Mr. Shearman—February 12th, 1867. I now read the letter of March 18th, 1867.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1871.
OSWEGO, N. Y.

MY DEAR WIFE: Although it is now near midnight, and I am much fatigued and very sleepy. I will not retire without first dropping into the mail a line of remembrance and message of love to a woman whom I sometimes vex but whom I always revere.

I spoke in Troy last evening to a large audience—as many as could be crowded into the Brooklyn Athenæum, but I spoke with wretched hesitation and broken fluency—often using ungrammatical expressions, and thoroughly displeasing myself with my performance. But to-night, before an equal and even better audience, I was myself again—easy, hearty, and victorious. So you see that the temporary moods of my mind color all my work, for the time being, with their own passing hues, whether dark or bright.

But I cannot afford thus to be led away captive of gloominess and bad blood. I must endeavor more completely to conquer myself in future. "Greater is he who ruleth his own spirit than he who taketh a city."

Despondency is my lurking enemy. It lies in wait for me in my most familiar haunts. And it most often entraps me under my own roof.

But I think my two or three recent days of darkness have been, on the whole, a moral benefit, in that they have revealed to my mind its most easily temptable points. It was good for the Pilgrim to go into the Valley of the Shadow of Death. "No chastening for the present is joyous but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it worketh out the peaceable fruits of righteousness."

So, after my overthrow, I rise once again out of the dust, to re-begin the battle of self-conquest—to be again, I doubt not, defeated a thousand times. Well, during all the Winter, I was as one clothed in kings' apparel: and it is very high time, therefore, that I should, for a little while, wear beggars' rags. The soul's life must have its needful changes from joy to sorrow.

I came home from the West respecting myself too highly. My crown there was suddenly taken off and cast to the earth. I am now dispossessed of my portion, and wander like an exile banished from my former complacent self. But, O, happy misfortune! that carried a man first into miserable wretchedness in order that it may then carry him, like the prodigal, back to his Father's house.

As Luther thanked God for his sins, so I, too, can thank Him for my sorrowful glooms.

Be assured that whatever happens, whether cloudy or clear skies, I love you boundlessly and forever.

THEODORE.

[Marked "D, 84."]

ROCHESTER, N. Y., March 21, 1867.

MY DEAR PET: I am, in this midnight hour, in the same hotel, and in the same room wherein you and I were quartered eleven and a half years ago on our wedding tour! What a history these years unfold to our backward gaze! Gray hairs have stolen upon us since then; time and care have jointly wrinkled our brows; joys and sorrows have checkered our path; four children have been given to us on earth, and one of these has been taken back to heaven. You have had sickness; I have had toil; both of us may now look back to that wedding pilgrimage and smile at how little we then knew of human life! Thank God, the years grow richer as we grow older! Not yet conquerors of ourselves, we are nevertheless nearer the victory now than then. I would not exchange the present for the past! With what self-complacency I looked upon my life in those "green and salad days!" How strong I thought myself for the battle! The revelations of later years subdue a man's pride by teaching him his weakness. At this retrospective moment, in this charmed chamber, I am humble, sad and calm. Life is sober, as I now look upon it. Death is near, as I now think of it. Heaven is sweet, as I now wait for it. I have not made the best or even a good use of my last ten years. I have less faith in my usual integrity now than at any former period of my life. It is hard to live well. Nevertheless, my dear pet, we will try again to realize more perfectly our ideals. May God bless us both, now and ever. Adieu.

Yours, THEODORE.

FLINT, MICHIGAN, Feb. 6, 1867.

MY QUEEN AND MISTRESS: I have been thinking of you all the livelong morning, and it is now afternoon. My two letters of yesterday, which I left behind me at Ypsilanti to be mailed to-day, were too barren, dry, and worthless to be sent to such a dear woman as you are. Your own sweet letter, received to-day, makes me chide myself for such chaps as I unwillingly sent you last night. No letter of all the dear, delightful many that you have written, has filled me with more pleasure than to-day's. It is the one which you may recall when I mention that it inclosed Alice's note and the enigma cards. (Thank the dear little girl for writing to her papa, and tell her that this very morning I bought valentines for all my children, including Libbie. Tell her, also, that I have puzzled my brain over the enigma, but cannot solve the mystery.) But I was speaking of your letter. It is so full of your love, that you have, this day, set yourself unconsciously before me in such noble proportions as to hide all the rest of the universe; and nothing, either in Heaven above or Earth beneath, seems at this moment so great, so pure, or so beautiful as your own, true, wifely love for your unworthy husband.

In fact, this morning I was suffering from undue fatigue, owing to an entirely sleepless night; and my mind was in an unclean and groveling frame—haunted with low thoughts. I am a hard subject for self-conquering—as you know. And this morning I could not get any honorable or manly mastery over myself, although I tried hard for the victory.

But when your dear letter came my soul took wings like a lark. "A word in season, how good it is." A little piece of white paper, with a loving woman's handwriting on it changed the whole face of nature, and the whole temper of my spirit, in a single moment. How powerful and how beneficent is the influence of love! And I now see, by the light of my Winter's experience, that you have been profoundly right in demanding, not only a constant mutual love, but a constant mutual expression of it. Hereafter, I shall judge the needs of your heart by the needs of mine, and be more prodigal in my daily outpouring of what hitherto has been too often unexpressed or half expressed. Sometimes we allow our loves simply to be taken for granted, whereas we would both enjoy each other's love the more by coloring our own into a repeated confession of words. "Confession is good for the soul," says the poet; and I hereby confess that I love you as fervently as any man ever loved any woman on the earth, or perhaps in the heavens.

My disappointment at not meeting you in Chicago was as great as virtually to strike me soul-dead for several days thereafter. I wasted on that blighted hope the juices of one whole week of my pilgrimage. The reaction left me without the power of experiencing and enjoying any high and devout emotions. My heart seemed awhile to be gone, and in its place there was an insensibility to joy. That Chicago expectation was one of the "supreme moments" of a lifetime.

And Alice's letter seems to intimate that you are coming to meet me on my way. Can this be true? I do not allow myself to believe it. For I shall not build such another air-castle as I reared on Wabash avenue, only to have it fall, like Samson's temple, on my head. No; I look forward to the end of my Winter's work, feeling that I shall be repaid for my whole long separation by my first kiss of welcome under my own roof. Dearly beloved, God bless you forever more. Yours,

THEODORE.

LA CROSSE, Wisconsin, Feb. 21, 1867.

MY DARLING: This day I have received your pleasant letter of a week. I look forward eagerly to each new place on my programme for the sake of the letter which I am there to find awaiting me. Your letters have been and are my daily meat and drink. This last letter of yours inclosed your sweet note of Elizabeth Lovejoy—which I shall immediately mail to her in Princeton. In return for the great kindness of the Lovejoys, I sent them some books from Milwaukee—Mr. Towson's writings on Art, the Golden Treasury, a copy of Tennyson, and other volumes. I hope I may get a chance to spend another evening in their college before my return, but I do not see how I can arrange to do so. I inclose to you Oliver's letter, received this morning. So you see that there are men, as well as women, who love your husband. I am sorry to hear that Mr. Beecher had a poor house in Brooklyn. In view of his kind attentions to you this Winter, all my old love for him has revived, and my heart would once more greet him as of old. I sometimes quarrel with my friends on the surface, but never at the bottom. With yourself, oh! friend above all friends! I am a perpetual love.

Yours,

THEODORE.

Mr. Shearman—I now read a letter dating back to 1865, a letter of Mr. Tilton to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—What date?

Mr. Shearman—January 18th, 1865. [Reading]:

WEDGELL HOUSE, CLEVELAND, Jan. 13, 1865.

MY DARLING WIFE: I have omitted another day to write to you. No help for it. Forgive me.

Yesterday morning, still maintaining headquarters at Cincinnati, I was invited by Rev. Dr. Reed, Editor of The Western Christian Advocate, to cross the river to Covington, Kentucky, to visit the father and mother of Lieut. Gen. Grant. I was greatly interested in this visit. * * *

SOME WORDS ABOUT GEN. GRANT EXCLUDED.

Here follows a long account of General Grant's private history.

Mr. Beach—Better read it.

Mr. Everts—We do not desire to read it at present, and therefore omit it.

Mr. Beach—That is not permissible in this case.

Mr. Everts—That is permissible both in this case and in every other case. It is considered in for anybody to read the rest, and to read it as our evidence.

Mr. Beach—Well, I maintain that it is not perfectly settled in this case, or any other case in regard to a letter.

Judge Neilson—The question has not been spoken to as to the effect of a letter. I think you could take time to read it, perhaps.

Mr. Everts—There is no compulsion on the counsel at any stage of the case, to read any part of a letter that they do not consider pertinent to their case, and if the other side thinks any part of it pertinent to theirs they can read it as being the evidence of the other side and not their own. That I agree to.

Judge Neilson—That was the rule we applied to other papers. Still I think it would save time to read it, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Everts—What? By reading the whole? This is a matter that has nothing to do with any relations between those parties, a long affair about General Grant's father and mother.

Mr. Beach—I don't know what it is; they have read a portion in regard to General Grant.

Mr. Everts—We say that we don't wish to read the rest.

Mr. Beach—I have heard you say that—

Mr. Everts—And we don't propose to read it.

Mr. Beach—That I have understood before; that is what I was objecting to. [To Mr. Shearman]: Wait one moment; don't go on just yet.

Mr. Everts—Look at the letter as long as you please.

Mr. Beach—I shall not be long about it. I don't know but it may bear on the Third Term, &c.

[Letter submitted to Mr. Beach for inspection.]

Mr. Shearman [Reading]:

* * * * *

The next time I go on a long journey I will take you along, if for no other reason than to do the mending!

This afternoon's train brought me to Cleveland—the most beautiful city of the West. I immediately searched out the Rev. Samuel Wolcott, who delivered to me your dear, kind letter of January 5, which is the latest I have received from you. I am hoping to get another to-morrow. Your letters are like wine to my thirst. On opening the envelope, I am always disappointed if the letter is not a long one. I am glad Mr. Beecher called on you. I will write to thank him for it. I have not had a line from him, but I have had two brief notes from Mr. Greeley.

My speech in Cleveland is to-morrow night—after which I shall spend Sunday here, and return by way of Pittsburgh, hoping to reach home by Wednesday or Thursday. But I may delay a day or two longer on the road if a good reason arises.

You say, I am glad you write you are homesick. I reply, I am glad you write the same. If God spares me to return, I am sure our loves will be nobler than ever. I feel myself spiritually profited by my experiences of travel. I have clung to you as with an anchor every day of my absence. The thought of your constant love fills me with tenderness and yearning. And the dear children grow dearer and dearer. Kiss them all for their father's sake. Remember me always in your prayers.

Dear, sweet pet, good night.

MRS. TILTON'S LETTERS AGAIN.

Mr. Shearman—We now return to the letters of Mrs. Tilton to her husband.

FRIDAY EVE., Jan. 25th, —.

There is no year given by Mrs. Tilton to the letter, but it is marked both in pencil and in ink in another hand, "1867."

Mr. Fullerton—January 25th?

Mr. Shearman—January 25th. Friday did come on January 27th, 1867. No doubt this is right. [Reading].

FRIDAY EVE., Jan. 25th, 1867.

MY OWN DEAR HUSBAND:

Four letters from you reached me to-day, including one to Mrs. Desmond and Oliver's letter to you. I did not go to Mrs. D.—'s wedding as it was celebrated at Mrs. Merriam's in Springfield. Mother went on and has not yet returned. I will forward your letter though not the kiss. I think in reference to Oliver's opinion of Mr. B.—as his rewards were made to Mr. Bowen, and they are embittered toward one another, that what Mr. B.—said of you may appear very different through the coloring that Mr. Bowen may give it. Oh, how my soul yearns over you two dear men! You, my beloved, are higher up than he; this I believe. Will you not join me in prayer that God would keep him as he is keeping us? Oh, let us pray for him! You are not willing to leave him to the evil influences which surround him. He is in a delusion with regard to himself, and pitifully mistaken in his opinion of you. I can never rest satisfied until you both see eye to eye, and love one another as you once did. This will not come to pass as quickly by estrangement. But with all the earnestness of my being, I commit you both to God's love. He has signally blessed you both, and he will keep his own beloved. Why I was so mysteriously brought in as actor in this friendship, I know not, yet no experience of all my life has made my soul ache so verily, as the apparent lack of Christian manliness in this beloved man. Mattie feels as I do. I saw her to-day. She said she recd. two letters from you to-day. I do love him very dearly, and I do love you supremely, utterly, believe it. Perhaps if I by God's grace keep myself white, I may bless you both. I am striving. God bless this trinity! I can nor will no denial take.

I will be more patient and forbearing toward Libby from henceforth. I pen you my vow. Hereafter I guard my temper. You shall have a soul-pure wife by 'and bye. I am ashamed that I am so often unattractive to the Great Lover of my soul. I am striving to make myself beautiful that He may admire me! You know full well how far short I come, but this is my aim. If He can only say my life is blameless, you and I will then be satisfied. Cheer up, my darling, the work is mighty to which you are called, and you are doing it nobly. I love you like Mrs. Browning loved. Don't you know it? Pray for me always. I pray for you, though I have such assurances of God's love and care for you, that you seem high up and safe. If I could sit in your lap, and look into your dear eyes now, I'm afraid 'twould be more than I could bear. At any rate I should have a good cry, that I am now going to have without you. It always baptizes me—to use your word. Carroll is with me in bed. Annie is at mother's. I have had only two or three guests with me all night since you've been gone. Angels guard all.

Good night.

YOUR OWN WIFE.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 89."]

WEDNESDAY MORN., March 4th, 1868.

Yes, darling, I know you want me! If ever I may serve you it is when overtaxed and weary. I am most grateful that then you turn to me. Oh, how almost perfectly could I minister this Winter, my heart glows so perpetually. I am conscious of great inward awakening toward you—if I live I shall teach my children to begin their loves where now I am. I cannot conceive of anything more delicious than a life consecrated to a faithful love. Oh, why did I sleep so long?

The check for Journey's bill has arrived, but no tidings from the Warren letter. It makes me very happy to pay this bill, which I will to-day. The procuring of my clothes has always been a great trouble to me.

Mattie took tea with me Monday night, and we went to the closing reading for the Winter of Prof. Raymond's course. He read the "Tempest" finely. She returned with me and staid all night.

Fanny Kemble is in N. Y. I should be satisfied could I go with you to hear her.

Beaule is improving, or rather I am.

No callers for some days. The weather is very cold; the deepest snow this Winter has fallen since Sunday.

Will you go to Marietta? I insist that I miss you more than you do me. I am alone a great deal, and choose it. But soon I shall see my beloved! I must now to my work. Adieu.

YOUR OWN DEAR WIFE.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 90."]

THURSDAY EVENING, January 13th, 1870.

MY DEAR HUSBAND:

You once said; and often acted, that I was always craving sentiment. It is, verily, true! I am what I am. Therefore, to such a nature as mine Jesus Christ, as he discovers himself to me, is unutterably precious. Let my tongue cleave to my mouth if I fail to bear testimony to His unchangeable love.

Your letter reached me yesterday. How it lightened my day like a glory. You are well beloved by one human, and therefore it is love struggling and unperfected. I do not, however, comfort myself in my humanity, rather whenever I am victor over it. Oh! how slow is the warfare. Yesterday Sophy went to Mrs. Ely's, and is there still. Parker Pillsbury and Susan Anthony took tea with me, and stayed all night. I have called for a meeting of the ex-committee that I may send Mattie to Washington in my stead. Mrs. Hooker has written me that Mrs. Stowe sailed to-day for Florida, and that she should like to take her place as guest at Senator Pomeroy's. I therefore wrote to the Senator if such a change would be agreeable. Sophy will go if Mattie goes. I wish the three ladies might be entertained under that hospitable roof.

To-day has been a quiet day. Mr. Beecher called. He is in fine spirits making calls. He devotes Wednesdays and Thursdays "till further notice;" has 300 to make; made twenty to-day; enjoys it immensely. Called on the Wheelock's to-day, and kissed them all round, Lizzy Wood included, he said [Laughter.] I told him that Alice had named her doll Rose Wentworth. Mrs. Beach and Emma called on mother to-day, greatly to mother's gratification, as she has had very few calls since her separation. Eva and Annie Tilton are getting up a surprise party for her next Tuesday night, and I have invited her old friends, including Mrs. Wheeler and Ira. Jo and Fanny are coming, and Dr. Talmadge.

I read the dear children your letter. Was glad you spoke to children last Sunday. The baby has recovered. Alice goes to school until 12 o'clock daily. Carroll is well, but Flory is still quite sick and low spirited; cries often. I still sleep on the lounge beside her. The diphtheria is a much to be dreaded disease; it goes hard with the darling, her tonsils being weak from a former attack. This enas another of my matter of fact epistles, but so endeth not the love of your darlings, wifey and four precious children.

[Marked "Ex. D, 91."]

Mr. Evarts—I will read a letter from Mr. Tilton to his wife, dated Nov. 3, 1868. [Reading:]

AT THE OFFICE, Nov. 3, 1868.

MY DEARY: Your kind and loving note falls so pleasantly on my spirits that I would immediately go home this afternoon were it not that I have engaged to go out this evening.

There is so much sunshine pouring into my little office at this moment that I think I never knew a brighter day in my life; and I hope that some of the light and warmth will steal into and remain within my cold and cruel heart.

It is the greatest regret of my life that I do not seem constituted so as to make you as happy as you deserve to be; but I have the best of intentions—and the worst of success.

The cause of so much trouble at home is my general anxiety about everything. Latterly I worry more or less concerning every matter which I touch. I have hardly ten minutes a day of uninterrupted free from care. This may seem an exaggerated statement; but it is the painful truth. I feel as if I were growing old before my time. Lights that used to burn within me have been quenched. Hopes are faded; ambition is killed; life seems a failure.

As I cannot bear to see any expression of pain, or sorrow, or regret, on your face, I cannot bring myself to speak to you familiarly on any subject connected with any of our sorrows—not even Paul, our chief. I am literally tormented at having no grave for his crumbling clay. Every allusion to the subject has been a pang through my heart.

Then, too, all my religious doubts and difficulties have been, and are, and I fear must be, shut within myself, because I cannot open my mouth to you concerning them without giving you a wound. You are the finest fibered soul that ever was put into a body; you jar at my touch, and I am apt to touch you too rudely.

As for my own character, I saw, at the time of Paul's death, what it was to be a man, and how far short of it I am myself; and I have ever since been utterly overwhelmed with my own worthlessness, selfishness, degradation and wickedness. At some time I expect to recover from this slough of despond, but not now; I must remain longer in suffering before I can emerge into peace. I have been overthrown, and, before I rise, I must be made to feel, like Antæus, that strength comes from touching the ground.

But the chief of all my miseries is this: that I impart them to others. Let me say, with the utmost fervor of protestation, that neither you, nor the children, nor the house, nor the servant, nor anything that is within our gates—not one alone—nor all combined—no, none of these persons or things has the slightest originating share in my troubles. Those troubles (such as they are) are of my own making. Would to God they were also of my own enduring! But they have to be inflicted upon others—upon yourself and the children. It is this fact that doubles my affliction.

But your kind and tender words, pencilled in the studio this morning, were very precious to me—sweeter than honey in the honeycomb. I write this letter on purpose to thank you for them. God bless you evermore.

Lovingly yours,

THEODORE.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 92."]

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, this was written at your office in New-York, I suppose? A. Will you let me see it, Sir [looking at the letter]; yes, Sir.

Q. And the studio referred to in the last paragraph. "Your kind and tender words pencilled in the studio this morning;" is that Mr. Paige's studio? A. I presume, Sir, it is Mr. Paige's studio where she was sitting for her portrait.

Q. Have you the note to which this letter refers? A. I think probably it is among the papers.

Mr. Evarts—[To plaintiff's counsel.] I should like that note.

The Witness—I do not recall it at present.

Mr. Morris—I have never seen such a note.

Mr. Beach—November 3, 1868?

ANOTHER BATCH OF LETTERS TO BE PRODUCED.

Mr. Evarts—It would be on that date, probably.

Now, if your Honor please, there are three letters of Mrs. Tilton's that we desire to have the first thing on Monday morning, if our friends can find them in the interval—January 31, 1868.

Mr. Morris—Just hand us a list.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I am giving them to you now. January 31 1868; March 6, 1869; August 13, without a date, but I suppose about 1869, though it is not printed with the date of that year, but it is printed among the letters of 1869, and is found at the foot of the page on which the letter of August 3, 1869, which has been produced and been given in evidence, is found. The letters of Mr. Tilton I will give you next. Letter of October 25, 1865; of December 2, 1866; February 14, 1867; January 15, 1869; August 23, 1869, and July 31, 1865. That will probably conclude the exhibit of letters.

Mr. Morris—Mr. Shearman, you have some letters that I have used in evidence; will you be kind enough to return us those? There is quite a large number that have not been read in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I have handed back several.

Mr. Morris—Yes; but only a small portion of them.

Mr. Porter—I handed to Mr. Evarts all that I had except those that were put in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—There may be some by accident. I guess you will find them.

Mr. Porter—You handed me some, and I handed them to Mr. Evarts and Mr. Evarts handed them back, all except those that were read.

Mr. Evarts—Some of them we did put in evidence.

Mr. Morris—I want those that have not been read in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Exactly; but we have given them back.

Mr. Morris—I think, if you look, you will find that you have not,

Mr. Evarts—We will look for them.

Mr. Morris—Those that have been read in evidence are marked.

Mr. Evarts—If we find them they will be handed to you, without doubt.

Mr. Shearman—We read all that are on our list.

Mr. Morris—That is not what I refer to. If you will just take the exhibits that have been read, they are marked, and you have some letters that have not been read in evidence.

Mr. Porter—They are those that I handed to Mr. Evarts, and which Mr. Evarts handed back.

Mr. Evarts—It may be that some letters that you handed to Judge Porter have not been handed back to you; so we will look for them and find them.

Mr. Morris—It would not take but a moment, because the exhibits are marked.

Mr. Porter—The gentleman does not seem to understand me. Mr. Shearman was engaged in reading at the time he handed me a package of letters. I handed them over to Mr. Evarts for examination. Two of them we have selected out and have since given in evidence; the rest were handed over by Mr. Evarts to them.

Mr. Morris—My impression is that you are mistaken, Judge Porter.

Mr. Porter—We cannot be, for we have not been out of this room.

Mr. Evarts—It may be some have got in among the exhibits. We will look for them now. It has reached the hour of adjournment, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, we separate now, with the admonition you have heretofore heard in respect to the case, and your duty in regard to it, which I need not repeat. I trust it is all fresh in your minds. As the learned counsel cannot attend to-morrow, we separate now until Monday morning at 11 o'clock, at which time you will please attend.

Mr. Mallison (Clerk)—The Court stands adjourned till Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

TWENTY-FIRST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. TILTON CLOSELY QUESTIONED.

MR. BOWEN'S BUSINESS RELATIONS WITH THE PLAINTIFF—THE EFFECT EXPECTED FROM THE LETTER OF DEMAND—OLIVER JOHNSON'S CONNECTION WITH THE CASE.

Mr. Tilton's sixth day in the witness-chair was one of the most trying ones for him of the examination. The first hour was devoted to gathering and reading the last scraps of the correspondence between Mr. Tilton and his wife previous to 1870. These letters, like the others before read, were mainly in regard to personal and family affairs, Mrs. Tilton's writing being always hopeful; her husband's generally desponding. In the first letter which was read, the plaintiff discussed the career and character of Jesus Christ. Nearly all of his letters, in fact, contain some reference to religious subjects. In one epistle, written while lecturing in the West, Mr. Tilton deploras his disappointment in Mr. Beecher, and makes this resolve: "Henceforth I take no pattern after public men—great men—famous men."

After the reading of the letters, Mr. Evarts resumed the questioning by inquiring regarding the connection of the witness with Oliver Johnson. Mr. Tilton described Mr. Johnson as "an old gentleman living in New-York." This part of the examination led to a very sharp encounter between Mr. Evarts and the witness. Mr. Evarts seemed curt, as if intending to repel any familiarity on the part of the witness, while Mr. Tilton appeared inclined to argue questions with his examiner. Mr. Tilton's career on The Independent was next reviewed, Mr. Evarts questioning the witness as to whether the circulation of that paper had increased during his editorship of it, but he would only testify to what Mr. Bowen had told him. After this the cross-examination proceeded for a short time in a more pleasant tone. The relations between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen were thoroughly sifted, the interview between the two men on Dec. 23, 1870, being again reviewed. The scandals circulated about Mr. Tilton, which were the subject of that meeting, were inquired about, Mr. Tilton denouncing all of them as lies.

After recapitulating the circumstances of the writing of the letter demanding Mr. Beecher's retirement from his pulpit and from Brooklyn, were related. Mr. Tilton said that he believed then that Mr. Beecher would be driven from Brooklyn, adding "as he will be." There was a very amusing descent from a high pitch to absurdity when the witness was under questions about the angry interview between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton on the day subsequent to the sending of the letter of demand. Mr. Evarts became more vehement than he had been before since the beginning of the cross-examination, and, advancing toward the witness, and shaking his long finger toward him, he asked in harsh voice: "Did you at your house that day, your first visit to it after this interview with Bowen, say to the nurse and others there, others than your wife, that you were ruined?" "No!" replied Mr. Tilton, firmly; and then, soon after, he asked, "Who was the nurse, Mr. Evarts?"

The witness was obliged to again repeat the names of the persons whom he had informed of Mr. Beecher's alleged impurities, before they became a matter of general circulation. During the examination on this point, all the pleasant humor which had been shown before seemed to have suddenly gone out.

Mr. Evarts made an exceedingly searching inquiry regarding the so-called confession of Mrs. Tilton, and the copy of it made by Mr. Tilton, both of which, the latter says, were destroyed—the first by his wife, the copy by himself. No question touching this topic was left unasked, and the witness positively asserted that the original “confession” and its copy were destroyed. The conversation between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton on the night that the former first saw Mrs. Tilton’s “confession” was referred to, and Mr. Evarts was questioning the witness regarding his wife’s health at that time when the hour of adjournment arrived.

Mr. Tilton appears to be somewhat captious at times, as when Mr. Evarts asked him if he was “sure,” etc., and he answered that he was “certain,” etc., following his reply with an explanation of the difference between the meaning of the two words. If these criticisms annoyed Mr. Evarts, his conduct did not indicate it. At other times Mr. Tilton’s exactness was amusing, and caused Judge Neilson more severely to admonish the audience than he has had occasion to do for several days.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

STILL ANOTHER FLOOD OF LETTERS.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Theodore Tilton recalled. Cross-examination continued.

Mr. Evarts—Our learned friends have produced us, I think, all the letters we have asked for, excepting one that we can read from the book, they say, and which they do not find, but one of them is somewhat imperfect. First a letter of Mr. Tilton to his wife. [Reading]:

MR. TILTON SPECULATES ON POSSIBILITIES IN THE LIFE OF JESUS.

OSKOSH, WIS., Feb. 14, 1867.

MY DEAR ORTHODOX WIFE: I have been speculating considerably lately on the character and career of Jesus, and I wonder whether you will be shocked when I mention one of my meditations. It is this: How would He have appeared in the character of a married man? Certainly, even to your reverential and adoring view of Him as “God manifested in the flesh,” there ought to be nothing profane in the supposition. If He consented to be born of a woman, why might He not have consented to be married to a woman? And, if He was the son of an earthly parent, why might He not have been the Father of a mortal child? He loved some of His disciples better than others, as, for instance, John. He undoubtedly loved some few women devotedly, perhaps passionately. Now, why might He not have loved one, chief and chosen among those women, on whom He might have poured the whole fullness of His heart, and on whose finger He might have set a marriage ring, making her, indeed, like the Church, the “Bride of Christ?” I confess that if a new historic investigation should reveal the proof that Jesus was a married man, instead of an unmarried lover of all the world, I would see an additional glory in the most wonderful of all historic characters. Nor do I know of any evidence to show that He was never married.

If either Mary or Martha, or any other saintly woman, had been His wife the fact would probably have been mentioned, and yet what would we have known of His friend Peter’s wife except for the fact that her mother was once sick of a fever? Men’s wives are not necessarily known to history. Of course, the probability is that Jesus was never married; yet this is by no means a certainty. And as there remains a possibility that he was, it is a pleasing reflection for me that, while he was living in Capernaum, in the house of Peter (one of His disciples), He might there have enjoyed also the still sweeter companionship of a wife of His own. I know that even Renan says, “Jesus never married.” Even admitting the fact, however, this does not deny the propriety of His marrying, if he had chosen to marry.

But, if Jesus had taken a wife and fathered a family, I believe that this fact would have so completely humanized Him in the eyes of all the world that He never would have been regarded as God, or the Only-Begotten Son of God. And yet, if, as the son of Mary, He had become the husband of a Galilean girl, and these twain had dwelt in a cottage by the Lake of Genesareth, and unto them had been born children like those of whom He said, “Suffer them to come unto me,” let me inquire whether or not you would love the character of Jesus any less than you love it now? Answer. Your Heterodox husband,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked “Exhibit D, 93.”]

MR. TILTON LAMENTS PERSONAL AND FAMILY EXTRAVAGANCES.

Mr. Evarts—I read a letter of Mr. Tilton to his wife:

AKRON, O., Jan. 15, 1869.

MY DEAR WIFE: Ever since last October I have been lecturing every week,—sometimes every night, and the proceeds have all been swallowed up in my extravagant debts. If this spendthrift tendency of mine is ever to be curbed it must be by your helpful criticism of it—not by a parallel liberality of outlay by yourself. I am putting myself daily to as much fatigue as human nature can endure, in order, if possible, to clear off my obligations to my creditors, and to keep afterwards abreast with the world. Your letter, a few days ago, stating that you could not live on your salary, made me sick at heart, and temporarily I felt like giving up my journey and going home. To-day you send me a bill of $58 for Cad’s clothes—an amount which I regard as so great for a family of our moderate resources as to be almost as wicked as my own outlays for pictures. In all the three weeks of my last absence I have not made, above expenses, $400. Not one penny of all my lecture earnings for years has ever yet gone into a bank. I look upon our money-spending tendencies as cruelly wrong. At this moment I am well-nigh broken down in voice, and know not how I shall get through with to-night’s lecture. Am I wrong when I say that I cannot look with equanimity on squandering so much money in fine dresses for the children? My heart suffers a pang in saying this, but I cannot help saying it. We must either sell our establishment in Brooklyn or else manage it on a less expensive scale. I have made a vow to buy not another picture, and not another unnecessary article, during the present year. It is with something like a shudder that I look forward to the prolonged slavery of public lecturing every Winter, and if the proceeds are to be freely thrown away by both of us I may as well stop it now. I have suffered for ten days past an agony of remorse at the fruitless exertions I have made by three years of speaking—fruitless, because their harvest has been unprofitably spent. Judging by all the families I visit, I know that we are literally throwing away our inheritance. At last I am aroused; and I appeal to you to put a peremptory check upon any and every unnecessary expenditure which you see me make. Dress the children in calico for a year, and let me get out of my misery.

Yours in dust and ashes,
[Marked "Exhibit D, 94."] THEODORE TILTON.

MRS. TILTON GRATEFUL FOR CONFIDENCE.

Mr. Evarts—I now read a letter from Mrs. Tilton to her husband :

FRIDAY, Jan. 31st, 1868—11 o'clock p. m.

MY DEAR HUSBAND: I have just returned from Mattie's, and saw your bust; loved it, and could not bear to leave that precious head behind me. I felt a sense of cruelty. Oh, Theodore, darling, I am haunted night and day by the remorse of knowing that because of my harshness and indifference to you you were driven to despair—perhaps sin, and these last years of unhappiness. I sometimes feel it to be the unpardonable sin. God cannot forgive me. But if you only may be restored to your former loveliness, I shall be content to live my life in penance, yea, in disgrace. I am the chief of sinners!! I understand perfectly how you have felt. I carry in my soul this burden black of sin, yet appear to my children and friends calm and happy. "Woe unto you, whited sepulcher," I hear perpetually. I will carry these agonies gladly, for I know a life of happiness awaits you.

To return to the bust. The spirit of your face is caught in its earnestness; the eyes do not quite suit me, but this must ever be the fault of statuary. I received this morning your letter from Syracuse inclosing check for $100. It makes me very happy that you give me an exact statement of your affairs. I appreciate the confidence, after all you have suffered through me, to the depths of my soul, and shall try to follow your wish in every particular, and tho' I'm a poor housekeeper and provider, I never felt so great an impulse to use my judgment and all my faculties to help you. If the past were not ever present, I believe I might yet bless you. You are the only human being I have harmed! Oh! wretched woman that I am!

I learned from Mattie that Mrs. Gibson was left entirely destitute, Mr. G——having even sold his life insurance a few weeks before his death. Mrs. Gibson and all the family are visiting at Mr. Beecher's since the funeral. I have not seen him since you left, nor do not wish to unless he believes in and loves you perfectly.

Darling, we must both cultivate our self-respect by being what we seem—then will be fulfilled my ideal marriage—to you and you only a wife—but contact of the body with no other—while then, a pure friendship with many may be enjoyed, ennobling us. Let us have not even a shadow of doubt of each other—tho' all the world are weak yet will we be strong.

God accept and bless us both.

Now are we one.

By bye,
Faithfully yours,

Be not offended that I iterate and reiterate my love. I must, but destroy all my letters.

Mr. Evarts—I now read a letter from Mr. Tilton to his wife, dated Dec. 2d, ('66 in pencil). [To witness.] Mr. Tilton, here is a memorandum in pencil, as of the year, which does not form part of the original. Is that your memorandum? A. I cannot say it is mine, but it is probably mine. It is marked "'66" in the same manner in which other letters have been marked; that is to say, on referring to the almanac I saw that Sunday night fell on Dec. 2d, in the year 1866.

Q. And that is your mark as the year this letter was written? A. I presume it is.

MR. TILTON TIRED OF PUBLIC LIFE AND PUBLIC CHARACTERS.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading]:

SUNDAY NIGHT, AKRON, OHIO, }
December 2d, '66. }

MY DARLING:

I have just been moved to write a long letter to Mrs. Bradshaw about May. It is chiefly about having a purpose in life, and how to carry it out. Of late, I have been thinking much of my own life. You know that I don't attach as much importance as many do to certain churchly ideas of the Christian life. It seems to me that the truest method, and the surest, of developing a Christian character, is never to swerve from one's own inward ideal of right, whether or not this ideal be in conformity with the prevailing conventional notions of good men, or of the best of men. I have been looking back upon my ten years of public life, and judging of its motives. Looking back thus, I can see that I have been always earnest and straightforward, but always too much in the interest of myself, and too little willing to be counted as nothing in comparison with the work which I have been set, as an instrument, to perform. Lately I have been endeavoring to ascertain what are my earthly ambitions; to struggle with them and conquer them. I have no ambition to be rich—and never had; none to be in political office; none for social or fashionable pre-eminence; none, that I can detect, for oratorical distinction; and not a great deal for a literary reputation. My public notoriety occasionally flushes me with pleasure. But on the whole, I believe I can truthfully say that I have in great measure put aside the idols which I used to worship. I once believed, judging by my personal experience, that public life—particularly such as life as that of a young man prematurely famous—was bad for the character; crippling to the soul. I used to feel this at times in many keen self-reproaches. But when one has at first tasted the sweets of reputation, and at last of their insipidity, I think he gets a more sober, philosophical and just view of what is valuable, and what is valueless in life, than in almost any other way. As a consequence, many of the men of great fame whom I intimately know, make no such ruling impression on my mind as many of my private friends do. But if I had no reputation myself, I should still be dazzled with theirs, as I was once dazzled years ago. For instance, I like Mr. Beecher in many respects as well as I ever did. But he has ceased to be my soul's prop—ceased to inspire me to my best life. I believe he is not as morally great as he once was. I do not now refer at all to his political views. His political views have made no change in my feelings toward him as a friend. But there was an older virtue which has since gone out of him—an influence which used to brighten my life when I came under its ray; an influence, however, which became gradually quenched like a vanishing sunbeam. Henceforth I take no patterns after public men—great men—famous men. They are not so good as my wife and children. Half an hour's talk with Mrs. Bradshaw makes me a better man than a half dozen sermons could do. I have had a sweet Sabbath day—one that has baptized my soul. I spoke to a thousand children this afternoon, and I have been in a glow ever since. This will account for the fact that I have written two such sermonic letters. But now I send, good-night.

Forever yours,

THEODORE.

MRS. TILTON GLAD TO BE RELIEVED OF BESSIE TURNER.

[This letter was marked "Exhibit D, 96."]

Mr. Shearman—I read a letter from Mrs. Tilton:

SATURDAY, A.M., Mar. 6, 1869.

MY DARLING: I have looked with great annoyance and pain on the map to learn your whereabouts, and realized the immense labors you were going through before your letter just now rec'd, desired me to do so. Don't make a Western tour again; with your salary and the engagements near home, we will try to pay off our debt and educate our children. Besides, the little new baby will reward us both for our labors I feel sure. The snow is falling fast; how full of happiness I should be, could I comfort you to-day!

Kitty Belcher is visiting Flory, and they are making caramels in the kitchen.

The note from Philadelphia is very curious. Beattie is all right. She comes to Sunday-school every Sunday, and visits me once a fortnight: is boarding at the Home, and has fallen in with some rich families in Fifth-ave., where she has found enough to do sewing by the day, and they pay her amply. She has been to several concerts in New York, and received a very gay valentine, and on the whole appears quite contented. She does all the playing for the Institution, every evening, for the girls to dance. Has had but one sick headache. I feel thankful daily that I am relieved of her care.

Do you not know when I may look for you? I have come to the end of my printed list; now only the few changed appointments remain.

Mother's affairs stand at status quo. She sleeps well. This change I never expected. All under my roof seems marvelous to me.

That luxurious ride in the cars was followed by weariness, vexation and disappointment. How very, very often has it been thus with us in our life.

And I am impotent to help you. Farewell.

Your dear WIFE.

I mailed a hasty line to you last night to Kokomo—so did Frank Moulton. I only now discovered the mistake.

[This letter was marked "Exhibit D 97."]

Mr. Shearman then asked for a letter of August 28, 1869, from Mr. Tilton to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Morris—You have read that letter.

Mr. Shearman—No; we have read everything we could get.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no objection to their reading it again if they wish to.

Mr. Shearman—That was another letter, New-York, Aug. 28. This letter I want is dated, "Saturday Night, Brooklyn, Aug. 28, 1869."

Mr. Morris—We have no such letter as that.

Mr. Shearman—Oh, yes; there is such a letter.

Mr. Fullerton [searching in his side pocket]—The reason they could not find it is, I had it. [Produces letter.]

MR. TILTON UNFASTENS THE FLOODGATES OF HIS LOVE.

Mr. Evarts—I will now read this letter:

SATURDAY NIGHT.
BROOKLYN, Aug. 28, 1869. }

MY DEAR WIFE: I find myself alone, but hardly lonesome, wearier but not sleepy, restless but not without peace of soul to-night; and so I turn my thoughts to you and the children in your mountain nest.

My letters of late have been so hurried and barren that I have sometimes wished I had not sent such and such a one. I know your sensitiveness to my words, and I have been chiding myself for allowing you to see by pen and ink that I have been greatly driven day and night, for two or three weeks past, to the apparent neglect of you and your cares. But to-night, although my table lies covered with unfinished work, I end it with abruptness for the sake of expressing to you some thoughts which have lately been occupying my mind, or rather some feelings which have been stirring my heart, in reference to our married life.

I will confess frankly that I have passed the most wretched Summer of all my life, and no one knows it but myself—indeed, no one who has been with me has seen me other than outwardly gay and cheerful. All the exhibitions which I have made of myself to my friends have been of unusual hilarity. This has been the utmost shallowness of superficiality. One thing I have enjoyed, that is, my work. It has been unusually heavy, and therefore unusually beneficent. But, leaving my work aside, all my other pleasures have been pains. For two or three weeks I resolutely repressed all allusions to my feelings, when writing to you—not wishing to mar your vacation. But as the time of your home-coming cannot be very far off, I open the floodgates to-night. I will therefore say that I have missed you for the past month with something of the same awfulness and heart-break as if I had lost you forever by death. The idea has haunted me that perhaps I should never see you again, and this has prostrated my spirit to an agonizing humility, and led me into ten thousand self-reproaches for the past. Of course I do not lay any stress on any superstition. I expect to see you again, and hope to do so as soon as you think advisable for the children to return. But I have discovered, by searching the depths of my soul, that I love you more than any human ought to love another. I have seen some noble women this Summer—whom I admire, and whom, in a certain way, I love. All my life I have known something of the nature and experience of true friendship. From my early years I have loved and loved you. But all the past experiences of my heart's affections have been as nothing compared with the unusual and solemn sense which I have had during all the hilarities of this Newport week, that the only human being who touches my highest nature is yourself. This being the case, I am filled with distress to think that I must keep you uninformed, for the sake of your own tranquillity, of many of my thoughts, and of some of my conduct. I would to God I were a man worthy of your goodness, your self-denial, and your singleness of heart. Occasionally, in some supreme hour, I am your fit mate; but at all other times you are high above me. But if you could know the inward reverence which I have borne toward you for many days past, even while appearing to be absorbed in the companionship of other ladies, and particularly at Newport, I am sure you would almost dread to be so much loved by any human (and, therefore, infirm and wayward) creature like myself. I have several times tried to keep myself from writing you any such letter as this, because it is unlike most of my past correspondence. It is my request that no other eye shall ever see it except your own. Indeed, after this letter is in the mail, I shall probably grieve to think I wrote it. But, on the other hand, I shall never feel content until I have in some measure confessed to you that, all Summer long, I have trembled at the thought that you are almost as much to me as God himself, and yet that I am constantly treating you as ungratefully as I treat Him.

One thing more, but I do not urge it, or even request it. I only state it. If you could come here and stay with me two or three days in this house, with no other person to intrude upon our communion, I would bless you for it as long as I live. I want to show you my heart, and its too great load.

Yours in frankness, THEODORE.

During the reading of this letter Mr. Porter handed a printed edition of the letters to Mr. Evarts, telling him he would find it easier to read.

Mr. Evarts—There are some words in the original which appear to be omitted in the printed copy.

Mr. Evarts here puzzled over a word, which he read "codicil," and Mr. Tilton said: Bring it to me, Mr. Evarts, and I will interpret it.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, the language is clear enough; it is only the writing I find difficulty with.

Mr. Tilton—It is not a codicil; it is my will. [Laughter.]

[This letter was marked, "Exhibit D 98."]

MORE ABOUT THE PUBLICATION OF THE LETTERS.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, you have said something about the publication of these letters having been arranged to be made at a remote point, rather than here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember making an application to one of the leading papers in this city to republish them, here in New-York, from the Chicago papers? A. No, Sir; I made no such application. One of the leading daily newspapers of New-York made such an application to me for permission to print them, which I refused.

Q. What paper was that? A. THE NEW-YORK TRIBUNE.

Q. Do you remember making an application to The Herald? No, Sir; I remember The Herald making an application to me for my sworn statement; that also I refused.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, well, I am not talking about that, and I ask if your Honor please to have that struck out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; strike it out. It was not called for by your question.

Q. And you are quite sure that you did not make any application or suggestion to a New-York paper to republish from the Chicago paper these letters? A. To republish?

Q. Yes. A. Oh, that is quite another matter; I trusted—

Q. That was my first question, I think. A. Oh I didn't understand you, Sir. After the letters were published in Chicago it was my wish, or rather it was Judge Morris's wish, that they might be republished here, and when Mr. La Fontaine, then the managing editor or city editor of The Herald, told me that he was going to republish part, but not the whole, he requested me to use my judgment in the selection of such parts as I would prefer to have printed. I made that selection; I think about one-half of the letters were republished in The New-York Herald, the selection being made by myself in connection with Gen. Pryor; Gen. Pryor and I went over to The Herald office one night and did it.

MR. TILTON'S RELATIONS WITH OLIVER JOHNSON.

Q. Who is Oliver Johnson, and what relations had he to you in business, or in personal intimacy or family friendship? A. Well, Sir, that is a pretty long question, it will require a pretty long answer.

Q. Yes. A. Who is Oliver Johnson; I begin with that?

Q. Yes. A. Oliver Johnson is an old gentleman, living in New-York, who used to be editor of The Anti-Slavery Standard, who afterwards became my associate editor in The Independent, and whom I afterward put into The Christian Union to help Mr. Beecher carry his case, so that the public eye could not see it, and who is now on that paper.

Q. That is not my question? A. I thought you wanted to know his connection with this case.

Mr. Evarts—I ask to have that struck out, please. I have asked who Oliver Johnson was.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—That is the head that he is now on, and argumentative observations about—

Judge Neilson—That last remark about getting him into The Union is not necessary. Strike that out.

Mr. Beach—It already appears in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—It does not appear as part of my evidence.

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, you will excuse me. I understood your question to refer to Mr. Johnson in his connection with this case.

Mr. Evarts—I have not said a word about his connection with this case; not a word.

The Witness—Well, Sir, if you wish then to know who Mr. Johnson was I can answer that very accurately by giving you a written biography of him which he has prepared for me to use; to print after his death. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—That is not an answer to his question. You have already stated what he was.

Q. Is that the best answer you can give to my question who Oliver Johnson is? A. You asked me who he was, Sir, not who he is; "Carthago fuit."

Q. Tell us, if you can, who Oliver Johnson is, what his relations were to you in business, what in personal intimacy and what acquaintance with your family—which is my original question? A. Well, Sir, didn't I answer it?

Mr. Evarts—Don't ask me whether you have answered it. Go on and answer it now. A. Well, I think I have answered it. I told you that so far as Mr. Johnson was related to me, he was my associate editor in The Independent. What else do you wish to know about him?

Q. I want to know your personal intimacy with him. A. For a number of years Mr. Johnson and I were very intimate.

Q. When did that intimacy begin? A. I think when I was about twenty-one or two years old.

Q. And have you been acquainted with him ever since? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And are you acquainted with him now? A. I think not, Sir; I should not recognize him in the street if I met him; for that reason I should say I am not acquainted with him.

Q. You would know his person, wouldn't you? A. Oh, yes, Sir; that is all I should care to know. [Laughter.]

Q. Now, how long did the intimacy which began when you were twenty or twenty-one years old continue? A. Continued until after I put him in The Christian Union.

Q. Until you put him into The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Which was about four years ago? A. No, Sir.

Q. Three years ago? A. That comes of the error of using the word "about." I recognize the correctness of your criticism the other day; it was about two years ago.

Q. About two years ago—well, you are now about thirty-nine; this was about two years ago—37—21—that would be sixteen years of intimate acquaintance you had with Mr. Johnson? A. Well, Sir, you are better in figures than I am. I will take your word for it.

Q. Now, Sir, what was Mr. Johnson's employment in connection with newspapers, and what your association with him during that period of time? A. When I first became acquainted with Mr. Johnson he was then the editor of The Anti-Slavery Standard in New-York; he afterward became my associate in the editorship of The Independent.

Q. From what date this latter fact? A. Well, Sir, I cannot give it to you exactly; I think Mr. Johnson was about seven years with me in The Independent; we retired about the same time; he lingered two or three weeks longer than I did, but we practically retired at the same time; he went out because I did; that retirement was at the close of the year 1870. My impression is that he remained with me about seven years, though I won't be positive as to that.

Q. Now, part of that time you were assistant editor under Mr. Beecher, and part of that time you were editor-in-chief, were you not? Part of those seven years that you speak of you were editor of The Independent under Mr. — O! no; you date from 1863 when you commenced; you were editor-in-chief the whole of these seven years? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Johnson was not in The Independent while Mr. Beecher was there.

Q. No; he began then with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Began with you and left with you? A. Yes, Sir; he did not begin with me; I began many years earlier in The Independent.

Q. I mean began with your being editor-in-chief? A. I don't think that is true either; still it may be.

Q. You have already told us that you began as editor-in-chief after Mr. Beecher's return from Europe? Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well, that was in 1863? A. I think you are correct.

Q. Very well, Mr. Johnson came in in 1863 and went out— A. I don't say that he did.

Q. You said seven years? A. I said seven years, perhaps; I wish to be accurate.

Q. Well, as far as you recollect, Mr. Johnson came in with you, and went out with you? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect that at all. I had been fifteen years in The Independent. Mr. Johnson about seven years.

Q. Well, I mean came in with you when you became editor-in-chief, and went out when you left it? A. Well, that may possibly be so, but as I am under oath I will not swear to what I do not accurately know.

Q. Now, during that period, what degree of personal intimacy, outside of business relations, did you also have with him? A. Very great.

Q. And how frequent and how acceptable a visitor was he in your house? A. I always liked him, but Mrs. Tilton never did; never wished to have him come.

Q. Well, did he come? A. He came very frequently; yes, Sir.

Q. Very frequently, notwithstanding? A. Well, I say very frequently—no, not very frequently, for I was away lecturing most of the time, and he came occasionally. She thought he was a heretic in religion and did not wish me to bring him there.

Q. Now, when he left The Independent, at the same time that you did, what employment did he then go into? A. He became the editor of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE, under Horace Greeley.

Q. And your friendship and intimacy continued with him during that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then, in 1872, about two years ago, you had some hand, as you have stated, in placing him in The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was about the beginning of 1873; that is my impression; I won't be accurate as to the date.

Q. Well, about two years ago—and has he remained there ever since? A. I don't know anything about that, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, in these lecturing tours of yours that preceded 1870—that is, preceded the season of 1870 and 1871—take, for instance, the last two years 1868-'69 and 1869-'70, what was the aggregate of your receipts or emoluments from that source of income? A. You mean each season?

Q. Yes? A. Well, I don't know that I can answer from memory. Wasn't there some statement in one of the letters read this morning? My impression is, in the rough, that for a number of years in succession I received from my lectures about $8,000 or $9,000, from which my travelling expenses had to be deducted. I don't know the net increase.

Q. Well, it would leave $7,000 or $8,000 or something? A. I should think so; yes, Sir.

Q. Each year? A. Yes, Sir; I think so; about that.

THE INDEPENDENT UNDER MR. TILTON.

Q. Now, when you took possession of The Independent as editor-in-chief, and Mr. Beecher left it, what was its strength in circulation, and its credit and repute in the country? A. It had a very good circulation, and had a very fair repute, except in orthodox circles. Mr. Beecher had cast over it a reputation for heresy, and I had cast upon it a reputation for extreme radicalism in the anti-slavery movement. Still, as both those reputations were in my judgment good, I think I may say The Independent stood well.

Q. And can you give us about what its circulation was? A. I don't remember, Sir; that is Mr. Bowen's secret.

Q. You have some notion about it, haven't you—did you know at the time? A. I haven't any means of fixing the circulation of The Independent.

Q. Did you know at the time? A. I presume I did, from time to time.

Q. You have forgotten, have you? A. Forgotten, I think.

Q. Now, can you remember whether its circulation was increased under your administration? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Wasn't it very largely increased? A. Mr. Bowen always said so; whether or not that was exactly true I don't know.

Q. What made you doubt?

Mr. Beach—He does not say that he doubted.

Mr. Evarts—He says he does not know whether it is true or not.

The Witness—Well, the publishers of newspapers always draw a long bow, Mr. Evarts, in making their prospectuses.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't know how that is; I have never published a newspaper.

The Witness—The Independent was always put—

Q. You were editor, and you must tell us, if you can, whether it did not rise very largely under your administration from the subscription list as it stood when Mr. Beecher left? A. Why, Sir, I think The Independent, for the last fifteen years, under Mr. Beecher, under Dr. Thompson, under myself, has had a steady growth, until the time when the anti-slavery movement was settled and the war was over. After that I don't know anything about it.

Q. Well, but you know it from the time of 1863 to 1870 while you were the principal editor of it, do you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now, that is the very period, and the only period I am asking you about. A. I remember this—this I have a dis-distinct recollection of, that just at the time of my retirement, either that week or the next, Mr. Bowen published in The Independent a highly flattering article concerning the prosperity of his paper, in which I remember he gave a long list of 10,500 post-offices to which it had gone; pointed to that fact as an instance of its unparalleled prosperity. I happen to remember that.

Q. What was its circulation when you left? A. That I do not know, Sir, except that it went, as I say, to 10,500 post-offices.

Q. Then you cannot tell us whether the paper had gained in strength and circulation under your administration or not? A. Yes, Sir; I know that it had; I know from constant proclamations which the publisher made year by year. He had a habit of occasionally putting before the reader the past history of the paper, comparing the receipts of the first six months of this year with the first six months of last year; and all these showings always made for the prosperity of The Independent. That journal was like a revolution which never went back; at least, according to the statements made by its publisher.

Q. And yet you cannot give us any notion of what its real strength and circulation was, or what you suppose it to be, at or about the time that you left it? A. I don't think I ever asked any question about it, Mr. Evarts. I was in the—

Q. And your own observation and interest as an editor of the paper did not lead you to have any knowledge on the subject? A. I unquestionably, from time to time, knew something about the circulation of the paper, but it was constantly fluctuating; and as I have been out of it for four years, I would not undertake to say what the circulation was. I have an indistinct recollection that when I first went into The Independent, Mr. Bowen then told me that the circulation was 17,000. I remember these figures; but what it was when I left I do not know. I suppose, perhaps, it was 50,000; 60,000; perhaps; I don't know; but that is a very rough guess, and I may be doing great injustice to much higher numbers.

Q. Well, that was something of a growth, then; from 17,000 to 50,000, wasn't it? A. Well, I think I might say so; yes, Sir; I agree with you in that.

Q. What was your contract or relation with The Independent, securing or providing for your position as editor? A. Well, Sir, I had a great many contracts with The Independent. I went into The Independent on a salary of $700; I left it on a salary of $7,000.

Q. No; as editor-in-chief—editor-in-chief, if you will listen to my questions—. A. I did not hear you say "editor-in-chief."

Q. As editor, what was your contract with The Independent, in which your position and emoluments were provided for, from the time that you became the chief editor, in 1863? A. When I was editor-in-chief, in 1863, I do not remember what my salary was; it was not a very large one. From time to time during the following seven years my salary was increased; I do not remember the successive steps.

Q. Well, what had it come to be at or before December, 1870? A. At or before?

Q. Yes, Sir? A. It will require two answers, because at December, 1870, was one thing, and before that was another.

Q. Well, give us both answers if you please, then? A. In the early part of December, 1870, Mr.— Perhaps I ought to go back a step earlier than that. During most of the seven years of my chief-editorship of The Independent I had an arrangement with Mr. Bowen, by which I was permitted at the same time to lecture; my nights were free; the duties which my contracts compelled me to perform did not exceed the writing of the leading article every week, together with the general supervision of the paper, so that I was free to lecture; and during a number of years my income from my lecturing under that liberal arrangement of the publisher was about the same as my salary. Then, when I came home—

Q. Now, as my only object was to get at your salary, will you be so good as to state what it was? A. Well, Sir, I do not understand what you mean by getting at my salary.

Q. You have given me an answer that your salary was about what you got from your lectures? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, will you tell me what your salary was; I care nothing about your lectures? A. Well, Sir, you differ in that respect from most of your fellow-citizens.

Q. I have got through with it; I have asked you about your lectures, and got through the $7,000; now, will you tell me what your salary was? A. I will, if you will tell me at what time you want to know it.

Q. Before December, 1870? A. Well, Sir, my salary was at various points, fixed at various times before this.

Q. Give me all of them? A. Well, I told you a little while ago that I went into that paper on a salary of $700; it was variously increased—

Q. Now, as editor-in-chief, what were your respective salaries through that period of your editing? A. That I do not remember; you will have to refer to Mr. Bowen when you get him on the stand.

Q. Do you mean to say that you can give no information to us concerning your salary at different periods during the seven years of your editorship? A. Mr. Evarts, I mean to say exactly that I do not remember what my salary was in The Independent ten years ago; I remember that it was advanced by successive steps until it came to be, from $700 a year to $7,000 a year; that is what I remember.

Q. When did it come to be $7,000 a year? A. I think in the year 1869, but I won't be certain of that.

Q. Now, what was it immediately before it was changed to $7,000? A. That I don't remember; I think it was about $5,000, together with some percentage of the profits, though I won't be certain of that.

Q. And how long did that arrangement continue—$5,000 and a part of the profits? A. I don't know; it is so long since I have had any such income as that, that all is a dim haze and fog in my mind. It is a pleasure to me, Sir, to have you revive it, even in that unsubstantial way.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it would be a greater pleasure to me if I could revive it a little better.

The Witness—Well, Sir, if you could make it actual it would be a supreme delight. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—I am afraid the community must do that for you.
Judge Neilson—I really wish the audience would be quiet.

Q. Now, what was it at the stage before it was fixed at $5,000 and a share of the profits? A. Well, Mr. Evarts, I have already told you I don't know; I can tell you again I don't know.

Q. Didn't it, when you became editor-in-chief, in 1863, then become $5,000 and a share of the profits? A. That is my impression, but I will not be certain—you say in 1863, $5,000 and a share of the profits.

Q. When you became editor-in-chief? A. No; I don't think at that time it was as large as that.

Q. What do you think it was at that time? A. I don't remember, Mr. Evarts; I will send over a respectful request to the office of The Independent that those figures may be given to you. I have no authority over there; I have not been in there for four years; but I have no doubt they would be happy to oblige you.

Mr. Evarts—It is not my affair, it is yours.

Mr. Fullerton—It is what you want to get.

Mr. Evarts—I want to get it from him. [To the witness.] Now, as I understand, at the beginning of December, 1870, your position, vocation and income was your position as a lecturer and a writer, and in your salary from The Independent? A. Excuse me, Sir; I don't understand your question.

Q. At the beginning of December, 1870, your position and vocation was in regard to employments and emoluments—your position as a lecturer, as an author, if you please, and as editor of The Independent, with your salary of $7,000 a year? A. You are entirely wrong there, Mr. Evarts; at the beginning of 1870—

Q. December, 1870? A. At the beginning of December, 1870, I was not a lecturer; I was then editor of The Independent and editor also of The Brooklyn Union, having assumed those later functions to the exclusion of lecturing.

Q. Editor of The Union? A. Yes, Sir; I was going to tell you a little while ago when you interrupted me.

Q. Had you formally abandoned lecturing, do you mean? A. Why, certainly, I had to give them up when I became editor of The Brooklyn Union.

Q. So that 1869 and 1870 terminated your distinct vocation as a lecturer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now when did you go into The Brooklyn Union? While you were editor of The Independent were you also editor of The Brooklyn Union? A. For a few months; yes, Sir.

Q. That was a secular paper, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir; so was the other.

Q. The Independent? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when was the period of your editorship of The Brooklyn Union? A. It began May 1st, 1870, and ended December 31st, 1870, at 9 o'clock at night.

Q. What was your position of salary or compensation in The Brooklyn Union? A. I think, Sir, it was $100 a week.

Q. Well, then, that was your position at the beginning of December, and your two salaries in these newspapers and such occasional employment as an author as might be? A. No, Sir; I hadn't any occasional employment as an author, because I bound myself not to be an author.

Q. Not to be an author? A. That is to say, I bound myself to limit my labors to those two papers, and not to write outside.

Q. Very well, then, at the beginning of December the salaries from those two newspapers were your whole income from your labors? A. Yes, Sir; except so far as I had some little money at interest.

Q. Well, that was not from your labors? A. Not from my labors? That is the only way I ever got it.

Judge Neilson—Your answer was correct as first given.

Q. Well, money from investments and not money earned—and that money at interest you have stated to us as being a balance that was, afterwards perhaps, deposited with Woodruff & Robinson? A. Yes, Sir; only a trifle.

MR. TILTON'S WEALTH.

Q. Now, you have spoken of your property as of this period of time, the first of January, 1871. What property had you that brought you any income or emolument? A. At that time?

Q. Yes, Sir; the first of January, 1871? A. I don't think any of it brought income.

Q. Except this money on deposit? A. That is all.

Q. That is all? A. That is my recollection at the present moment.

Q. Was not all the rest of it an occasion of expense and taxation, or otherwise? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you have assigned the sum of $25,000 as the value of your house and furniture and books; and what you include in your domestic establishment, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir; pictures, musical instruments, and so on.

Q. How much of that $25,000 do you attribute to the house, and how much to the furniture, pictures, &c.? A. I suppose my house to be worth—

Q. At that time? A. About $17,500, I should say, house and lot.

Q. And there was a mortgage of $7,500 on it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have spoken of a share in THE TRIBUNE as composing part of your property? A. Yes, Sir; I also spoke of a part of my property held by my father under power of attorney. That was the part I alluded to.

Q. The nominal value of that was what? A. I was once offered for it $10,250; I don't know what it is worth now.

Q. Had you, treating it as of that value, any interest in it, coming to yourself beyond what went to others. A. I never allowed myself to use a penny of it.

Q. I don't speak of that as using it? A. It always went to my parents.

Q. And you did get no income from it to yourself personally? A. Never a cent from the beginning.

Q. Now, you have spoken of some property at Llewellyn Park, I think? A. Yes Sir.

Q. Do you still own that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What value did you assign to that? A. Mr. Huscull, of whom—

Q. We won't take the particulars, but what value did you assign to that in your estimate of your property in 1871?

A. About $10,000 nominally. I was told, then, by Mr. Huscull it was worth $15,000.

Q. You assigned $10,000? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you still own it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it under any mortgage at that time? A. Not a cent—free and clear.

Q. Do you understand what its value now is? A. It ought to be worth more, I should think.

Q. Do you know anything about it? A. No, Sir; very little.

Q. Is it now subject to a mortgage? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you more than one piece of real estate over there in Llewellyn Park? A. No, Sir; three acres lying side by side like three eggs in a nest.

Q. Do you say that that is not subject to any mortgage? A. I don't think it is subject to any mortgage; I don't know. It was free and clear when I purchased it. I have never mortgaged it since.

Q. On what present basis do you put the idea that it has continued to be worth $10,000? A. Well, I didn't want to say it was worth more than that, though, as I say, the original projector of the park told me never to sell it for less than $15,000. I have always estimated it at about $10,000.

Q. Have you offered it for sale for less than $10,000? A. I have tried to get Mr. Moulton to buy it, but he preferred not to take property of mine, but to lend money—to crowd money upon me.

Q. Was any rate fixed at which you would part with it—that he might take it at? A. I told Mr. Moulton and Mr. Woodruff, either of them or both of them, that they might have it for whatever they in their business judgment considered it to be worth, but nothing came of the offer.

Q. Do you remember $2,500 being an estimate that was put upon its value? A. What, Sir?

Q. Do you remember $2,500 being an estimate that was put upon its value? A. No, Sir.

Q. At any time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, your Prospect Park lot; you put that at about $1,000? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What became of that? Have you got that still? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. Have you got that still? A. Yes, Sir: I have it still, unless some one has run off with it for taxes. I understand Mr. Shearman has been looking it up, and, perhaps, he can tell you better. They told me Mr. Shearman had been making some inquiries about it the other day. I understand it was sold for taxes—that there were $8 taxes on it.

Q. Do you know it has been sold for taxes? A. I don't know. It is the first time I have thought of it in two or three years; I almost forgot it until it was revived the other day in Court here.

MR. TILTON'S LATER DEALINGS WITH MR. BOWEN.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, at some time in the month of December—I don't know that you have fixed the date—you ceased to be the editor of The Independent, and were put upon some other establishment with that paper, were you not? A. Yes, Sir; the other establishment was The Brooklyn Union.

Q. No; some other establishment with the The Independent, not that of editor. At some time in December you ceased to be editor of The Independent, and had your relations fixed with it upon some other basis? A. Yes, Sir; I thought you spoke of some other establishment.

Judge Neilson—In that department? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, when was that done? A. I think the date of that settlement, or the assigning of the new contracts, what you call the new establishment—

Q. The new basis? A. Was December 20th or 21st or 22d; somewhere there, towards the latter part of that month.

Q. How long had that arrangement been in contemplation or negotiation before it was thus consummated? A. Well, Sir, a number of weeks.

Q. And how was it brought about—by you or Mr. Bowen's first moving in it? A. Well, Sir, do you wish me to narrate the steps that led to it?

Q. Briefly; I don't care about them; I have no interest in the details; I only want to know how the transaction went on. A. Mr. Bowen, somewhere in the month of November, I should say, of the year 1870—possibly a little earlier, possibly a little later—told me that, in consequence of various reasons pressing upon his own mind, he wanted to become editor-in-chief of The Independent. One of those reasons—

Mr. Evarts—Well, its no matter; I don't care about that.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know; you asked for the steps, and you will get them.

Mr. Evarts—I don't care what his reasons were.

Mr. Beach—What he stated is proper.

Mr. Evarts—He opened the matter to you, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He opened the matter, and told you that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. What was proposed, if anything, by him, as to the termination of your editorship, or any substitution or replacement of your employment in another form? A. When Mr. Bowen informed me that he wanted to become editor of The Independent, I instantly—not instantly, but a few days afterwards—resolved that I would no longer remain in The Brooklyn Union.

Q. That is, if you left The Independent? A. If I left The Independent. In other words, I wanted to be free to lecture; I didn't want to stay at home and bind myself to one paper. Mr. Bowen gave me a notice some time in November, or the early part of December of that year—notice, legal and proper under our then existing contracts, that he wanted to possess himself of his own paper at six months hence. That would have been about June, 1871. In pursuance of that notice, or in answer to that notice concerning The Independent, I told Mr. Bowen at the same time, namely, June, 1871, about six months hence I would yield up The Brooklyn Union.

Q. You each had that right toward the other under your contracts? A. Yes, Sir; under the then contracts.

Q. To terminate in six months? A. To terminate in six months. He did not wish me to give up The Brooklyn Union. I had then only been a few months connected with it, and he said it was prospering, and we had a number of friendly interviews, the purport of which was whether or not we could come to some arrangement by which I could go on with The Brooklyn Union, and at the same time write for The Independent, so that from both newspapers my soon forthcoming and expected income would be as much as I could get from devoting my whole labor to the lecture and lyceum platform. As the result of that conference, or of those conferences, toward the end of September, about the 20th, as I say, somewhere there, I signed a contract with Mr. Bowen to become the editor of The Union for five years, at a salary of $5,000 a year, with ten per cent of the profits.

Q. Have you those contracts? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Morris.] Will you produce them?

Mr. Morris—They were left with the arbitrators; they were yielded up then.

The Witness—I signed, also, a contract the same evening to become special contributor to The Independent for a term of years, I have forgotten how many, for $5,200 a year. That arrangement left Mr. Bowen free and clear to be editor of The Independent in chief, and me free and clear to be editor of The Union in chief.

Q. $5,200, each of you? A. Yes, Sir, each of us.

Q. Each $5,200? A. Yes, Sir; only that in case of The Union there was an addition to the $5,200, namely, ten per cent of the profits of the establishment.

Q. Those contracts were given up at the time of the arbitration, were they? You say you have not got them now? A. Oh, they were given up; yes, Sir, canceled.

Q. Ended, as papers?

Mr. Beach—Not at the time of the arbitration; they were not canceled then.

Mr. Morris—They were canceled before the arbitration.

Mr. Evarts—The contracts were canceled, substituting contracts, but the papers themselves were given up, as I understand? A. I gave up the two papers themselves, having written the word "canceled" on them.

Q. At the time of the arbitration? A. I gave them to Mr. Bowen on the night he paid me the $7,000.

Q. So you have not got them now? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, what provision did these contracts contain in regard to the right on one side or the other to terminate them? A. Those contracts were written by me, and contained these provisions, namely: they might be terminated by the death of either party; they might be terminated by one party giving to the other six months' notice in advance, or they might be terminated at once by either party paying to the other a forfeit equal to one half year's income under the contracts.

Q. That is, either contract might be terminated in these ways? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. They were not tied together so that if one was terminated the other must be? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, your valedictory was published, I think in The Independent—it has been stated the date, I believe. Do you remember the date of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The 22d of December? A. December 22d, 1870.

Q. Now, when first did anything come up between you and Mr. Bowen in disturbance of, or in connection with the newly made contracts? A. Nothing came up in connection with the newly made contracts until they were suddenly broken.

Q. When first did anything come up between you and Mr. Bowen in regard to your continuing in or ceasing to be in his employment under one or both of those contracts? A. Nothing, until the contracts were broken.

Mr. Beach—He asks the date.

The Witness—December 31st, 1870.

Mr. Evarts—How was that notified to you, this occurrence on the 31st of December? A. I think Mr. Bowen sent me round a little note.

Q. Have you that note? A. I have not been able to find it. I don't know whether that note was surrendered on the night of the tripartite covenant or not. My impression—I have some indistinct impression what that note was—that Mr. Bowen wanted back the paper which I had. I rather think I sent him back the note in connection with another note, but I won't be certain.

Q. You received it on the 31st of December? A. Yes, Sir; late in the evening. Perhaps I ought to mention that a few days before that I had a quarrelsome and angry interview with Mr. Bowen, in which he stated that if I did a certain thing he would terminate my relationship to him—a sort of a threat.

Q. Do you remember what the date of that was? A. Yes, Sir. No, I don't. It was either one or two days after December 26th; whether it was the 27th or the 28th I don't know.

Q. It was either the 27th or the 28th? A. I think so. At all events it was a day or two after that.

Q. That is your recollection; it was either the 27th or the 28th of December? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, had you prior to this interview that you have now alluded to, and subsequent to the signing of your new-made contracts, any interview with Mr. Bowen concerning yourself as employed, or to continue to be employed in these newspapers? A. No, Sir; none whatever; I had an interview with Mr. Bowen on the morning of December 26th, but it was not in reference to any termination of any contract, or the reversal of any contract, or the shaping of any business arrangement; it was an interview of my own making.

Q. And didn't relate to any question of your personal acceptability or continuance there? A. No, Sir; Mr. Bowen had been talking—how people had been talking of me to Mr. Bowen, and I went down to see about it. I thought the frank way was to have an interview with him face to face.

Q. That was the 26th? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that the first occasion of an interview after the signing of the contracts on the 26th? A. Was that the first interview I had with Mr. Bowen?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. The first one I remember. I don't know. I think quite likely I may have met him every day at the office.

Q. But no interview that had any significance or made any impression on you? A. Perhaps I ought to say this was Saturday evening.

MR. BOWEN'S SUDDEN COLDNESS TOWARDS MR. TILTON.

Q. Which would have been the 24th? A. Yes, Sir; which would have been the 24th. I think Mr. Johnson came around and took tea at my house, or, at all events, he came to my house and told me some one had been speaking evil of me to Mr. Bowen. Mr. Johnson was a warm personal friend of mine at the time. I asked him to go with me to Mr. Bowen's house. We went down early in the evening. Mr. Bowen came to the front door, I think, robed in his dressing-gown. I asked him what he had been hearing to my prejudice. He said, "Mr. Tilton, I have got all my new editors here now in a consultation, and I don't want to waste the time. Monday will be a holiday; wont you come around Monday morning and see me about it?" I said, "Yes, I will come around Monday morning." I asked Mr. Johnson to be there, and he was there.

Q. Then it was that Mr. Johnson had communicated to you that there would be some, or was some occasion, or there would be some propriety in your seeing Mr. Bowen, was it? A. No, Sir; Mr. Johnson told me that somebody had been speaking evil of me to Mr. Bowen. I said, "Very well; if that is the case I will go and see Mr. Bowen at his house," and asked Mr. Johnson to accompany me.

Q. Didn't Mr. Johnson suggest to you that you had better see Mr. Bowen about it? A. I think not; I think that was my own spontaneous impulse, that I asked Mr. Johnson to go with me; still he might have suggested it or acquiesced in it, as he was a discreet man.

Q. Didn't you understand Mr. Johnson had come over to see you that afternoon for the purpose of suggesting this? A. That I don't remember; still, it would have been just like him to do so.

Q. And in your interest, and as a friendly act? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, about what time of day on Monday did you go to Mr. Bowen's? A. Oh, in the afternoon, sometime.

Q. And Mr. Johnson was with you during that whole interview? A. No, Sir; Mr. Johnson left before the interview was ended.

Q. Before it was ended? A. I think Mr. Johnson left in time to go over to New-York for the Christmas dinner. That is my impression.

Q. Then it was a long interview? A. I don't think it was very long.

Q. About how long? A. Well, I don't know; perhaps an hour and a half; perhaps longer; perhaps shorter.

A. And about how much of that time did Mr. Johnson remain? A. I could not say at this length of time.

Q. Perhaps you can tell us whether he was there during the greater part of the interview or not. Your saying leaving to get the dinner would not carry him over very early necessarily? A. My impression is that Mr. Johnson was there during the greater part of the interview, but not during the most important part of the interview.

Q. The most important part occurred after he left, you think? A. The most vivid parts; yes, Sir.

Q. You mean by that the most violent part? A. No; the most dramatic part.

Q. Now, who introduced that conversation, and how was it introduced? A. That morning?

Q. Yes. A. Oh! I don't remember that. Probably I did my self.

Q. You cannot tell us what you said to Mr. Bowen at the outset? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you tell us what Mr. Bowen said to you at the outset? A. I think he said "Good morning."

Q. Can you tell us what Mr. Johnson said at the outset, if he said anything? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did have some conversation there, you three together, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir; I can tell you the substance of the conversation.

Q. Well, I will go on with my question. Now, did you or not inform Mr. Bowen that you would come there for the purpose of talking with him in regard to any stories that he had heard against you? A. I came there, Sir; I went there.

Q. Did you tell him that? A. I don't remember what I told him, but I quite likely told him just that for that was precisely the object of the interview.

Q. Did he then tell you what the stories were? A. No, Sir; he only told me there were stories, I pressed him to know what they were, but he would not tell me.

Q. Did he tell you what the nature of the stories was? A. He told me the stories were coming down on me like an avalanche. That I remember. Mr. Bowen is given to metaphors.

Q. And the nature? A. Threatening to sweep me away; stories of immoralities; stories of atrocity. He pictured the scenes very vividly.

Q. He did? A. Yes, Sir; but he would not tell me what they were, and he would not tell me who told him; but the substance of the interview I had with him was: "Mr. Bowen," I said "bring here to me in your presence everybody who has anything against me, and let us have it out face to face." He said, "That is fair." Then we went to another topic.

THE COMPOSITION OF MR. BOWEN'S AVALANCHE.

Q. Now, was not enough said there to make you understand that the stories related to immorality or profligacy with women? A. Stories, Sir, concerning my relations with women, and my drinking, and my brutality, and other things—a dreadful volume of it—all that went to make Mr. Bowen's avalanche. He told me that they came to him from all quarters of the world, all of a sudden. [Laughter.]

Q. And did you suggest in any way, or did it come to be a matter considered there, that if these stories were true you would have to leave his employment? A. No, Sir; he said if those stories were true I ought not to live a day longer, and I agreed with him in that sentiment. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Silence!

Q. Didn't you understand that the reason for your seeing Mr. Bowen, or your friend, Mr. Johnson, thinking it proper for you to see Mr. Bowen was that the stories that had been told him concerning you were such as would not tolerate your continuing in his employment? A. Not at all,

Sir; for Mr. Bowen had for fifteen years retailed himself just such stories concerning Mr. Beecher, and he had all that time been Mr. Beecher's chief pewholder, and Mr. Beecher had been his chief writer, and no such stories as those would have affected Mr. Bowen's regard for any man in his employ, whether as minister or editor. [Murmur in the audience.]

Q. Well, that is very bad for Mr. Bowen. He was above prejudices of that kind? A. Yes, Sir; entirely so. He abolished them all in the House of God. [A louder demonstration.]

Judge Neilson—Will the audience keep quiet? The business is interrupted by it.

Q. Now, were you aware at that time of the particulars of any injurious stories respecting yourself in this direction? A. No, Sir; the horror of the whole business was that it was all unknown; it was an avalanche coming upon me in the dark. I didn't know what it was, but I felt that my first duty as a gentleman was to go and see Mr. Bowen face to face, and, as I said before, the substance of the conversation was—

Q. No matter, that is not what I am now asking? A. To bring the accusers face to face. He said that was fair.

Q. That you have said already; but my question now is whether you were not yourself aware of the alleged circumstances of profligacy or immorality that were told to your prejudice. A. No, Sir; I did not know them until a few days afterwards, when Mr. Beecher certified that he had been my slanderer by taking it back in writing.

Q. And you had never heard any of these rumors concerning your conduct in this relation, prejudicial to you until Mr. Bowen told you that there was an avalanche upon you? A. In what relation?

Q. In these relations with women? A. No, Sir.

Q. You never heard of it? A. Just about that time, either before or after, there was a little evening newspaper in New York scandalized the community by saying that I was going to Europe to elope with a lady. [Laughter.] She had already gone several months before—a few months before. That is the only story I ever heard. That was a lie.

Q. Well, I am not speaking of the truth of the stories. I only want to know the state of your knowledge or mind at that time. Well, that you had been aware of, that imputation? A. I am not certain at this distance of time whether it occurred a little after or a little before.

Q. Well, isn't it very probable that it was before? A. I don't know, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, no matter about probabilities.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I ask, isn't it very probable that it was before? A. I don't know whether it was or not. There is no end to the probabilities of slander.

Q. I agree. A. Or the improbabilities.

Q. I only want to find the state of slander as it became known to you. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did this imputation, that you were aware of, contain any particulars as to person or circumstances? A. Yes, Sir; there was a bold and vulgar allusion to a very honored lady in this city.

Q. Very well; I didn't care to disturb the matter further than to know what you had heard concerning stories about yourself. A. Yes.

Q. Had you heard prior to this of stories to your prejudice connected with any transaction at Winsted, Connecticut? A. No, Sir; oh, yes, there had been a long time before, a story published to the effect that I had gone to Winsted with a lady not my wife—published some time during the political campaign.

Q. The political campaign of what year—1868? A. I don't remember. I was away off in the West, and Oliver Johnson sent that out to me. That was three or four years before that.

Q. That you had heard of them. A. That was an old tale; yes, Sir.

Q. Still, you had heard of it? A. Yes, Sir, years before.

Q. Now, had you heard of a story injurious to yourself in connection with any female at Faribault, in Minnesota? A. No, Sir; never have heard any such story until now. I didn't know that there was such a one.

Q. Well, that you had not heard of? A. No, Sir; what is the story?

Mr. Beach—Oh, no!

The Witness—Let us have it.

Mr. Beach—No; we are getting enough that is immaterial and incompetent now.

Mr. Evarts—I don't propagate the stories. I want to know the state of your knowledge; that is all. Do you mean to say, then, that this information from Mr. Bowen that there were current these stories to your prejudice was a surprise to you? A. Yes, Sir; I should think it would be to any man.

Q. Well, I don't know that. I am only asking of yourself.

A. Well, I am only speaking for myself, Sir.

Q. It was a surprise to you that there should be such stories? A. Yes, Sir; it was an astonishment.

Q. Please look at this letter and at the date of it, and see if that is not a mistaken date. Shouldn't it be January, 1870? It is a common error, you know, of keeping the old year. I, of course, know nothing about it? A. You must let me read the letter.

Q. Oh, Yes; you may read the letter. [Handing witness the letter.] A. Now, Mr. Evarts, will you ask me again what question you desire to put?

Q. My only question was whether, upon looking at that date, you could say whether that was an erroneous date, that it was really 1870 instead of 1869, or not. You know it is a common error at the first days of a new year that one may make; whether there is anything about that letter that enables you to say whether that is the true date, 1869, or whether the true date is 1870? A. This is dated Tidoute, Pennsylvania, January 8, 1869. I was unquestionably lecturing there. I might refer to some little memorandum book of my lectures. I could not say from anything here.

Q. Well, you remember writing the letter, and the occasion of its being written, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But you cannot say now whether it was written in 1869? A. I think Mr. Johnson wanted me to write something; that is my impression.

Q. No matter. I only want to get at this date. You cannot give it, you say? A. No, Sir; but I can look on my memorandum book and see whether I was in Tidloute in 1869 or not.

Q. Of course, on its face, it would be perfectly regular that it should be 1869? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I propose to read that. [Handing the paper to plaintiff's counsel.] Your Honor, it has reached the hour of adjournment.

The Court here took a recess until 2 p. m.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Theodore Tilton was recalled and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—Have you been able to fix in any way whether that should be a date of 1870 or 1869? [Handing witness a letter.] A. I have not given any thought to the subject, Sir. I didn't go to my own house during the recess.

Mr. Evarts [to plaintiff's counsel]—Will you give us the 1869 and 1870 letters? [To the Witness]: Where is this place of Tidloute? Is that the proper pronounciation of it? A. No, Sir.

Q. How is it pronounced? A. Pronounced "Tidlute," I think.

Q. Where is it? A. In Pennsylvania somewhere. I lectured there once; that is all I know about the place.

Q. Somewhere in the oil-regions? A. I don't know about that now.

Q. Now, don't you remember whether you were there in January, 1869, or January, 1870? A. I don't remember anything more than the date of the letter, Sir.

Q. Won't you look at this collection of letters? [Handing witness the book.] There are some dates in January, 1869, about this time. A. Are these correctly printed?

Q. I suppose they are; I know nothing about them. We have assumed them to be so. A. Well, Sir, what do you wish me to do with these?

Q. Look over those of 1870 and see whether from those dates, supposing them to be correct, it would not be the year 1870 when you were in Tidloute on the 8th of January, and not 1869? A. I think that certain letters have been put in evidence already from Tidloute. I presume they have dates. I don't remember at this moment whether I lectured there more seasons than one or not.

Q. But you would not have been in Ohio on the 10th if you were in Tidloute on the 8th, would you? A. Well, Sir, I can't understand why.

Mr. Fullerton—It is very easy to travel that distance.

Mr. Evarts—Well, but he was on a lecturing tour. Both 1869-70 and 1868-69 you were on a regular lecture tour, were you not? A. How is that?

Q. Both the seasons of 1869-70 and of 1868-69 you were off on a lecture tour? A. Yes, I think so.

Q. You have read this letter, haven't you? A. You handed it to me this morning. I glanced at it hastily. Do you desire me to read it?

Q. Yes; you may read it if you wish to. I want to ask you whether in reading the letter you then can recall whether the incident which that letter refers to, occurred in 1869 or 1868. It had occurred prior to that letter of course? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Evarts, I will tell you how to fix the date exactly. Produce in court Mrs. Tilton's memorandum books or diaries for the last four or five years. She took them away from the house. It was at her request that I took this protegee of hers there. She will fix the date exactly by her diary.

Q. I am not talking about the contents of the letter at all; I want the date of it.

Judge Neilson—He wants to know whether you can fix the date? A. May it please your Honor, the date is here—Jan. 8th, 1869.

Q. Do you think that is the correct date? A. I should have said it was the correct date, and then Mr. Evarts casts a doubt upon it.

Q. Can you see by to-morrow morning whether it is correct or not? A. Well, I have no access to Mrs. Tilton's diary.

Q. We are not talking about her diary.

Mr. Evarts—No! no! we have nothing to do with that.

The Witness—I will look, Sir, through my own—

Mr. Evarts—Your own letters, if you have the originals of those that are printed, will show you where you were on the 10th of January, in both of those years? A. Mr. Evarts, you have had the originals in your hands of all those letters.

Q. I have not read all the letters. A. You have had them, as I understand.

Q. All that have been printed I have not had, except what I have read. A. They are at your service.

Q. All that have been read are in evidence, of course; but all that have been printed have not been read in evidence; but as you have the originals here in your own handwriting, you can tell by them whether you were in the oil-regions on the 8th of January, 1869, or the 8th of January, 1870? A. Well, Sir, the letters will speak for themselves. There they are; and if the letters don't speak for themselves, I think, perhaps, my little books of record, my little lecture note-books, of which I have several at home, may fix the date. I do not see, though, why the date should not be correct as it is written.

Q. Of course, only you know that in the first days of January it is a common error to put the wrong year. That you know, don't you? A. It is with some people, Sir.

Q. Well, it happens to anybody, I suppose; it certainly does to me? A. Yes.

Q. And I suppose it happens to any one. Well, now, can you remember whether this matter of Winsted did occur antecedent to January, 1869, or only antecedent to Jan. 8, 1870? A. My impression is that it was a considerable period before that, but as I said before my memory of dates is not very good unless associated with some event which bears a date. Mrs. Tilton can tell you all about it, Sir.

Q. Well, I don't know how that is. I don't know what she has to do with this? A. Well, I will tell you what she had to do with it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—No, no.

Judge Neilson—No.

The Witness—I beg your pardon.

Judge Neilson—Don't refer to Mrs. Tilton again, please.

Q. Now, look at that letter and say if that refers to what has been spoken of here, and I think on Mr. Moulton's examination, as the Winsted letter? [Handing witness letter.] A. Yes Sir.

Q. And my only object is to get at the date of it—if I can. You spoke of it as being an old story? A. Yes, Sir, a very disgraceful one, too.

Q. Well, I dare say. That we have nothing to do with. It is only the question of the stories that were presented. A. I supposed that it was in that particular that it interested you most.

Q. We are quite aware that persons are scandalized. You may have been as well as other people; but the date of it, and your knowledge of it are important to me, and if you can fix that by an examination of your original letters, or if you will take this printed pamphlet that will fix it, I suppose? A. I will do my best to oblige you.

Q. Now, at this interview between you and Bowen, was there a particularization or a reference to a charge that had been made against you to Mr. Bowen on the part of a lady that was connected, in some way, as contributor, or otherwise, with the paper of which you were the editor? A. Not that I know of, Sir; nothing of that sort was mentioned.

Q. Well, of course I am speaking of what was mentioned. You say, then, that at that interview Mr. Bowen did not inform you that he had received an accusation against you on the part of a lady that was employed in connection with those newspapers? A. No, Sir; he never in his life gave me any such information—never, from that day to this.

Q. How did this part of the interview, then, that related to yourself, and yourself alone, close—that Bowen was to confront you, or that— A. It closed in this way: I told Mr. Bowen that if anybody had anything to say against me let him invite that person, and also invite me, to a personal interview, face to face, in Mr. Bowen's presence. Mr. Bowen replied, "That is fair."

Q. And that is the way that branch of it closed? A. Yes, Sir, that is the way it ended.

Q. Now, you have stated that at that interview, Mr. Bowen opened upon charges against Mr. Beecher? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. Mr. Bowen at this interview opened upon charges against Mr. Beecher? A. Opened upon charges?

Q. Yes. A. He opened the charges; he didn't open upon them. [Laughter.]

Q. My question will stand, and we will take your answer. What had led to that in any previous conversation on that occasion that you had had with Mr. Bowen? A. This, Sir; after Mr. Bowen said that that would be fair, he changed the subject; he said to me that in view of my recently formed contracts to write for The Independent, and to become editor of the The Brooklyn Union, that he hoped I would put my whole life and fire into The Brooklyn Union, that I would treat all Brooklyn topics with great particularity, and that I would make among them one conspicuous and chief, namely, Plymouth Church and all its affairs, for he said: "That church has a large congregation, and many of the readers of The Union are there," and he then said, "I notice that you have not given particular attention to the church, and indeed you have not attended the church for some months, and your absence has been rather noticed by me." I told him that I never again should cross the threshold of Plymouth Church.

Q. Mr. Johnson was present at this part of the conversation, was he not? A. I think he was, but I would not be quite certain at what time Mr. Johnson left. I think Mr. Johnson threw in some such remark as this: "Perhaps Mr. Tilton has a reason for not going to Plymouth Church;" something of that kind.

Q. You think he was there? A. I think he was there at a part of that conversation.

Q. And that he did throw in an observation? A. I think he did; yes, Sir.

Q. Of that character? A. And I think that Mr. Johnson very shortly afterwards left. In other words, when the conversation concerning the stories about me was ended, Mr. Johnson left, either then or a little afterwards. He did not stay long to hear our discussion about the papers.

Q. But staid until after Mr. Bowen had opened on this subject of using The Brooklyn Union in discussion of Plymouth Church matters? A. Well, I think he did; at all events, Mr. Johnson made some remark about reasons which I might possibly have for not going to Plymouth Church. That is as near as I can recollect.

Q. And you then made the observation that you have just repeated? A. I don't know that I made it then; I think perhaps I might have made it before, or possibly I made it after.

Q. You mean before Johnson's; you made it either before or after Johnson's remark? A. Yes, Sir; I made it sometime during the interview.

Q. In this connection his observation was made in connection with yours, or yours in connection with his, was it not? A. Yes, Sir, but it was not so much in reference to the paper as it was in reference to my going to church.

Q. Well, I am not talking now about the paper, I am talking now about the observations? A. Yes.

Q. Well, how did the matter go on then on Mr. Bowen's part after that observation of yours? A. After Mr. Johnson left?

Q. No, I don't care. I will find out whether he was there or not, if I can, but after this observation of yours? A. I don't think very much was said until after Mr. Johnson left, when Mr. Bowen put some questions to me to know why it was that I did not go to Plymouth Church. That is the part that I now distinctly remember.

MR. BOWEN'S DENUNCIATION OF MR. BEECHER.

Q. When did Mr. Bowen commence stating his accusations or imputations against Mr. Beecher? A. I can't remember exactly at what part of the conversation he did. Some of them were stated before Mr. Johnson went away; others were stated after he went away.

Q. Well, did he pursue the matter at some length? A. Well, yes; at some length, necessarily.

Q. You have given on the direct examination, have you not, substantially what he said? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As you remember it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you say after he had completed the accusations against Mr. Beecher? A. I don't think he did complete them; I think he kept reiterating them.

Q. Well, but he left off some time or other, didn't he? A. Not until I left the house.

Q. Didn't he? A. No.

Q. Well, when he had got through with them for the first time, what did you say—anything? A. Do you mean what I said at such a particular moment? I don't identify any such particular moment.

Q. It is not as to the lapse of time; it is as to the stage of the conversation. If you don't remember, why I can't help it; if you do, I want to know. A. Mr. Bowen was very solicitous to know from me what Mr. Beecher's relation had been to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And asked, did he? A. Yes, after Mr. Johnson went away. I had said before Mr. Johnson went away that Mr. Beecher had been guilty of dishonorable behavior towards Mrs. Tilton.

Q. That you stated while Mr. Johnson was there? A. Yes, Sir; or that in substance.

Q. When did the suggestion of the preparation of this letter of demand on Mr. Beecher come up? A. I think that came up in Mr. Bowen's private conversation with me, toward the close of that interview.

Q. Which suggested it, you or he? A. Mr. Bowen suggested it. He said that Mr. Beecher ought not to be allowed to preach in his church.

Mr. Evarts—[To plaintiff's counsel] I would like this letter of demand, one of the early exhibits, No. 4.

[Mr. Morris produced the letter called for.]

Q. Take this, if you please, Mr. Tilton. [Handing witness the exhibit.] Now, the suggestion first came from Mr. Bowen. What was that suggestion? What did he say? A. Mr. Bowen said in substance that Mr. Beecher ought not to be allowed to remain in his pulpit or in the city; that he ought to be driven out. Mr. Bowen then said that he could take no steps towards the accomplishment of such an object as that, because he had in the previous February received from Mr. Beecher a humiliating confession of his guilt, and that Mr. Bowen had given him pardon.

Q. Well, that you stated in your direct examination? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Bowen, however, stated that if I would make this demand, which he could not in honor, as he stated, initiate, that he would substantiate it and would bring the volume of evidence which he possessed to see that it was carried into execution. That is the substance of it.

Q. I believe you said that on your direct examination. Now, he having so stated it, how did you give your assent to acting in the manner that he suggested? A. I said to him, "Give me a pen and a sheet of paper and I will write it." He said, "I will carry it."

Q. Is that the original draft that you wrote? [Referring to a paper.] A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, have you the original draft? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At any rate it was amended before it was finally copied there, was it? A. What is that?

Q. The draft as originally written was changed in some words before it was copied? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember what the change was? I don't care anything about the paper. A. Well, I remember, perhaps, with sufficient accuracy to say that this clause was admitted, "for reasons which I explicitly understand." Whether the original draft was in precisely these words I don't know, but that is the substance.

Q. Was all the original draft, including the amendment, in your handwriting? A. The original draft did not include the amendment.

Q. Well, including the amendment that was put upon it, wasn't the amendment put on the draft? Of course it may not have been. A. I think not, Sir; perhaps it was not; still I will not answer positively, Sir.

Q. I supposed the amendment was put on it and then the complete copy taken from it. I don't know? A. It may be. I think the paper exists.

Q. Very well, that is the change, at any rate. And the address, is that your own also? [Showing witness the address.] A. Yes, Sir; I wrote it all except the small writing there; that is Mr. Moulton's.

Q. Well, we can tell. All that belongs to it as a letter and an address is in your handwriting? A. Yes, Sir; every bit of it.

Q. Now, when you gave this letter to Mr. Bowen was the envelope closed or sealed? A. I think it was open, Sir; that is my impression.

Q. It was given to him, was it not, by you, and taken by him to be carried as an open letter to Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; that is my recollection. Is not the envelope open now?

Q. It is open now? A. I mean has it been sealed?

Q. You may see whether it has been sealed. [Handing witness the envelope.] It now bears the marks of having been closed? A. Yes, Sir; it was not closed by me.

Q. And was not intended to be? A. No, Sir; it was an open letter as I wrote it. Mr. Bowen must have opened it before delivering it.

Q. It was intended to be carried by Bowen open? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Intended by you to be carried by him open? A. Yes, Sir; and mentioned and described by me to Mr. Moulton that afternoon.

Q. So that this closing it which has taken place— A. Was not by me.

Q. Was not by you or by him with your consent or purpose? A. Not at all, Sir. Still I didn't lay any injunction upon Mr. Bowen not to close it. That was no feature in the case. Mr. Bowen well knew the contents of the letter. It was an open letter, he and I were jointly responsible for it.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading]:

Henry Ward Beecher.

December 26th, 1870.

Sir: I demand that for reasons which you explicitly understand, you immediately cease from the ministry—

Mr. Beach—Why is it read now?

Mr. Evarts—Because I want to use its contents [continuing to read] from the ministry of Plymouth Church, and that you quit the City of Brooklyn as a residence.

[Signed] THEODORE TILTON.

Q. That was written so, I suppose? [Referring to the word "Signed."] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, how soon after this did you inquire, and how soon after inquiring did you hear, what had happened concerning and at the delivery of this letter? A. I made no inquiry about it, Sir.

Q. Well, how soon did knowledge come to you concerning it? A. The first knowledge that came to me concerning it was through Mr. Beecher's own statement to me on Friday night of that week, Dec. 30th, that it had been delivered. I took it for granted, however, that it had been promptly delivered. That is my recollection at present.

MR. BOWEN REGRETS HIS HIGH WORDS.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, let me recall your attention to the fact that prior to that interview with Mr. Beecher, to which you have now alluded, you had an interview with Mr. Bowen. A. I did, Sir.

Q. What day was that interview? A. I don't remember whether it was Dec. 27th or 28th.

Q. It was one or the other? A. One or the other; I think so.

Q. Now, at that interview did not the question on the subject of this letter being delivered by Bowen to Mr. Beecher, and the occurrence thereupon, become the subject of conversation between you and Mr. Bowen? A. No, Sir; Mr. Bowen was in a wild anger and I had no conversation with him at all. It was the last interview I had previous to the tripartite covenant two years after.

Q. Now, how did this interview on the 27th or 28th with Bowen come about? A. I will tell you exactly, Sir.

Q. Did he send for you or did you go to him spontaneously? A. Neither, Sir.

Q. Well, how did you get together? A. I will tell you. After I had written this letter on the 26th of December, I told Mr. Moulton about it that afternoon. He told me with great emphasis that I was a fool.

Q. Well, that you have told us. A. Yes, Sir; so that either the next morning or the morning after—my impression is the very next morning—I sent a message to Mr. Bowen by advice of Mr. Moulton, or rather, not by his advice, but by my own judgment, growing out of a suggestion of his, namely, that Mr. Bowen's name ought to have been attached to such a demand, inasmuch as he was to have sustained and enforced it; so I sent a message—I forgot whether by note, I think by note—to Mr. Bowen, informing him that I was going to have an interview with Mr. Beecher, face to face. Mr. Bowen came pell mell around to the office and then came the angry interview.

Q. What time of day was this interview? A. It was in the forenoon sometime.

Q. Can't you now recollect whether it was the 27th; whether it was not the very day after—? A. Well, I don't know; it was either that or the day after.

Q. Wouldn't you have probably learned something about the letter on the next day if you had heard nothing from him about it? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. Wouldn't you have sought for some information concerning this letter on the next day if you had not heard from him on that day? A. From whom should I seek it, Sir?

Q. Mr. Bowen. A. Why, I had parted from him in anger. I would not have met him; I would not have spoken to him.

Q. No, no; not at this time. You had not parted with him in anger then when you sent him off on this errand to Beecher? A. I don't understand your question.

Q. Well, now, just listen. If you had not heard something from Bowen on the day immediately following the 26th, wouldn't you have been likely to have sent for him to learn about the reception that the note sent to Beecher had met?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. I think this case will be long enough without such speculative questions as that.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that. A. If I understand the purport of your question, the answer is this: that if Mr. Bowen had come around on that morning in an equable frame of mind, I should certainly have said, "Mr. Bowen, tell me the fate of the letter," but he came around in great anger and there was no conversation between us.

Q. That is not my point. The point is that he did come around the very next morning, and if it had not been that he came you would have been likely to have made some inquiry on that day concerning the reception? A. I think quite likely, yes, Sir; it may be true.

Q. So I supposed. A. I don't say for certain that he came that morning; yet perhaps it was that morning.

Q. That it was the very next morning? A. Yes; but still I won't say for certain.

Q. Now he came around and saw you in your office alone, I suppose? A. He and I together, yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you were alone—nobody else there? A. Nobody there.

Q. Now, can you tell us what the first thing said at that interview was? A. Oh, I don't know the first thing.

Q. Do you know which spoke first? A. No, I don't know. Mr. Bowen was in a great state of excitement. His face was as white as a wall.

Q. Now, do you mean to say, upon reflection, that not a word was said about the delivery to Mr. Beecher, and his reception of this note? A. I mean to say exactly that, Sir. Mr. Bowen was in great anger. The substance of what he said was, that if I divulged to Mr. Beecher the accusations which he, Mr. Bowen, had made against Mr. Beecher, that he, Mr. Bowen, would cease all his relations to me, and that I should never again cross the threshold of his office, or enter his house. He said that with great vehemence and emphasis. That was the substance of the conversation. It was a very brief interview; he allowed me no time to ask questions of any sort.

Q. Do you mean he left without giving you an opportunity to say anything to him? A. I think the sum and substance of what I said to him was to answer pride for pride, scorn for scorn; that I would not be deterred by his threats; that I should tell Mr. Beecher or any other person, utterly uninfluenced by any denunciations of that kind. That is all I remember of the interview.

WHAT MR. TILTON EXPECTED OF THE JOINT DEMAND OF MR. BEECHER.

Q. And you had no curiosity about the delivery of the note or its reception? A. I did not have a great deal of curiosity about it.

Q. Why didn't you ask Bowen about it? A. Well, because Mr. Bowen was not a man to be asked questions of then. He went out of the office slamming the door behind him. I was not the man to seek him out afterwards. The only persons that knew anything about the matter were Mr. Beecher and Mr. Bowen. I could not see either of them.

Q. Well, Mr. Bowen was there. A. Mr. Bowen left.

Q. Now, when you sent—when you wrote this demand on Mr. Beecher and sent Mr. Bowen, or delivered it to Mr. Bowen to communicate as your joint act, as you have stated— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was your object in sending it; what result did you expect from sending it? A. My object was to strike him right to the heart, Sir.

Q. Now, what result did you expect from thus striking him right to the heart? A. That he would be pricked and wounded as he has been.

Q. And nothing more? A. Nothing more.

Q. You did not expect that he would be driven from the pulpit or from Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. You did? A. Yes, Sir; and he will, too. [Sensation.]

Q. Then you did expect— A. I certainly did, Sir.

Q. That from the delivery of that message to him he would be driven from his pulpit and from Brooklyn? A. Mr. Bowen said that he could drive him out of his pulpit in twelve hours. I believed what Mr. Bowen said.

Q. And you thought this would do it? A. Yes, Sir; I thought that Mr. Bowen would do it.

Q. Well, this method would do it? A. I didn't think that my little letter alone would do it.

Judge Neilson—He says "this method."

The Witness—This method. Mr. Bowen said that he would drive him out of his pulpit in twelve hours.

Q. And you believed him? A. I believed him; yes, Sir.

Q. And you together sent, as your joint act, this letter? A. Yes, Sir; we did.

Q. And you expected that result from it? A. Yes, Sir, I did.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, how soon did you go to your house that day, after this interview with Mr. Bowen, the 27th or 28th—whatever it was? A. You mean on the day that I sent the letter demanding Mr. Beecher's retirement?

Q. No; on the day of your last interview with Mr. Bowen? A. I do not remember.

Q. Your usual time, so far as you remember, was it? A. I cannot say that.

Q. What was your usual time of going home from your office under ordinary circumstances? A. Usually I went home and took lunch at 1 o'clock.

Q. And returned to business? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when you returned to your house that day, were you excited and did you exhibit excitement in your house; I leave out all reference now to any interview or intercourse with your wife? A. I cannot remember that, Sir.

Q. You do not remember being excited? A. No, Sir; it would be quite likely.

Q. In consequence of this interview with Mr. Bowen? A. I don't remember being in my house; I do not bring up the circumstance.

Q. You don't remember being in your house at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you at your house on that day, on your first visit to it after this interview with Mr. Bowen, say to the nurse and others there (others than your wife) that you were ruined? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Nothing of that kind? A. No, Sir; I was not ruined.

Q. I did not ask you whether you were ruined; I asked you whether you told the nurse and other persons than your wife (whom I leave out of the inquiry) that you were ruined? A. Well, I answer you no.

Q. Well, so let it stand? A. Yes, Sir; I was not in the habit of talking of my business affairs to the nurse. [Laughter.]

Q. I was not arguing about it; I only want you to answer my questions.

Judge Neilson—Please only to answer the questions. I wish the gentlemen would be quiet in Court.

The Witness—I do not remember who the nurse was. What was the nurse's name, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—My dear Sir, when I am on the witness stand I will answer all I know. [Laughter.]

Mr. Beach—That will take a very long answer.

Mr. Evarts—Do you think so? [To the witness.] Be kind enough just to answer my questions.

Judge Neilson—Only answer the questions.

The Witness—Mr. Evarts sets me the example of stating everything he knows.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, no. Do you remember being in any excitement or having any impression that the result of this attack upon Mr. Beecher was going to be disastrous to you? A. Not at all, Sir. How could it have been disastrous?

Q. I do not reason with you. I only ask whether you had that impression? A. I had not.

Q. Do you not remember on that occasion of coming to your house on that day, after this interview with Mr. Bowen, that you got out your valedictory in The Independent, and paced up and down, and exhibiting great excitement, and immediately went to work preparing papers connected with this subject? A. No, Sir, I have no such recollection.

Q. You recollect nothing of the kind? A. Nothing of the sort, Sir.

Q. Did you inform Mr. Moulton of this angry interview with Bowen? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. And did you then plan any step, in connection with Mr. Beecher, thereupon? A. No, Sir.

Q. None whatever? A. Not that I recollect.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, you knew of The Christian Union, Mr. Beecher's newspaper, at the time of its establishment, did you not? A. When was it established?

Q. Well, that is exactly what I was going to ask you. [Laughter.] I understand that it was established in the beginning of the year 1870—January, 1870; in other words, that it had been in existence through the year, the month of December of which we are now talking about? A. I could not have answered that question, but I take your statement for it.

Q. Do you recall enough of the situation to know that Mr. Beecher's newspaper, The Christian Union, had been established before this month of December, in which your connection with The Independent terminated? A. That it had or had not?

Q. That it had? A. My impression is Mr. Beecher was writing editorial articles either in The Church Union or Christian Union for a number of months previous to that, but I will not be positive.

Q. Do you mean that you, being the editor of The Independent all through that year of 1870, did not know whether Mr. Beecher's paper, The Christian Union, was in existence during that time? A. The Christian Union or The Church Union he had some connection with; my impression is that his connection with a newspaper at that time was with The Church Union, and not Christian Union.

The Church Union was turned into the The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir; but I do not remember what name the paper bore at that time.

Q. I don't care which name it bore, but Mr. Beecher was the editor of this religious paper, in Brooklyn, wasn't he? A. Brooklyn?

Q. Or New York? A. I think he was.

Q. Prior to this time of which we are speaking? A. Whether editor-in-chief of The Church Union I am unable to say; I do not recollect the precise nature of his relation with the paper; the only recollection I have is that, during 1869, he resumed editorial labors in some form; I have an indistinct recollection of that.

Mr. Everts—[Looking for a letter.] Have you that letter, Mr. Shearman?

The Witness—I think in my letter the name of the paper is given—in my letter to Mr. Bowen; whether it was The Christian Union or The Church Union I do not exactly recollect.

Q. Oh, this is the letter [showing letter]—a letter from yourself to Bowen, January 1st, 1871? A. That mentions the paper; that will give the correct name.

Q. It is in evidence here. Just look at this letter and see if it will not recall the name? A. Yes, Sir; it was called The Christian Union at that time; it had been previously called The Church Union.

Q. And, it was a part of the conversation of Mr. Bowen in regard to Mr. Beecher, that the letter should demand not only Mr. Beecher's abdication of his pulpit, but the cessation of his writing for The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir; that is what Mr. Bowen demanded.

Q. But that was left out of the letter or summons? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, at that time, do you know how large the circulation of this paper of Mr. Beecher's had become? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. And at this time—and if so, how long before, if you know, had there been started a rival paper at the West, which interfered with the former ground of patronage of The Independent? A. I do not know of any such paper, Sir. Do you refer to The Advance?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Old Sidney Morse used to say that all newspapers helped each other, and I do not think that any one paper injures another.

Q. Did you know of the establishment of The Advance as a newspaper in the West? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Appealing for patronage to the religious community? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that established? A. I should think in 1868 or 1869; I think about that; I cannot remember distinctly.

Q. And do you know that it was established because of dissatisfaction in some circles, or quarters or sections of opinion at the West with The Independent? A. I think it was; yes, Sir; I think that was one ground; The Independent was too liberal.

Q. And this paper was meant to be more orthodox? A. Oh! I don't know about being more orthodox; I think The Independent was orthodox; orthodoxy is my doctrine; heterodoxy is yours, Mr. Everts.

Q. Heterodox in the sense that you mention in your letters; this paper was more orthodox, and yours "liberal"? A. Yes. The Advance, as I understand, was started to be a representative mouthpiece of the Congregational denomination. The Independent had cut loose from that denomination; had swung clear, and declared itself no longer an organ of the denomination; there was an organ of the denomination in Boston called The Congregationalist. There was no organ of the denomination in New York when I ceased to have The Independent their organ; they wanted such an organ in the West, and they started The Advance. That is the best account that I am able to give of the starting of that paper.

Q. And that had been going for two or three years—about two years? A. I will not be accurate as to the date.

Q. Now, how was Mr. Bowen overruled in not including in this summons upon Mr. Beecher that he should retire from supporting The Christian Union? A. After I wrote that note Mr. Bowen said, "Why did you not put in that he should not write for The Christian Union?" I said, "I have put in enough."

Q. And he yielded? A. He said nothing more about it.

MR. TILTON'S INSINUATIONS AGAINST MR. BEECHER'S MORALITY.

Q. Now, Sir, you have stated that in the interview with Mr. Beecher on the 30th of December you had narrated to him, as communicated to you by your wife, certain conversations between your wife and him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you gave us, as a part of what you stated to him, that this communication had come to you in July, 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, between July, 1870, and the 30th day of December, 1870, had you spoken in any terms to anybody concerning any relations between Mr. Beecher and your wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you named in your direct examination all the per-persons to whom you had said anything in that interval concerning any relations between your wife and Mr. Beecher? A. I think I named that I gave Oliver Johnson, and Mrs. Bradshaw, and Mr. Moulton the entire truth; I spoke to certain other persons to whom I did not tell all the story; Mr. Bowen was one of those.

Q. I do not know what you said, but you told him the entire truth—you said that you spoke to him. Now, did you speak to any other parties? A. Members of the family?

Q. Members of your own family. A. I suppose I may call my mother-in-law a member of my own family; I spoke to Mr. Richards and to his wife about it.

Q. You did yourself? A. I think I did.

Q. To all these people? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have, in your direct examination, spoken of these last named people as having been spoken to by some persons? A. By Mrs. Morse; yes, Sir.

Q. But do you now say that you spoke to them yourself? A. They had been spoken to by Mrs. Morse, and I then spoke to them; I did not tell the story originally to them.

Q. Now, in the same interval you had, in general terms of imputation upon Mr. Beecher, in respect of morality, used severe language—had you not? A. I believe that I had once or twice spoken roughly of him; I don't remember that I did, but words were brought to me afterwards as coming from me, and I think quite likely that I used them; I refer, now, to a remark that I had said that Mr. Beecher preached to his mistresses; I don't remember having made it, but I presume that I did.

Q. The language that I understand you to have spoken about in your direct examination, which was imputed to you, was that you had said he preached before forty of his mistresses? A. I do not undertake to be accurate, Sir, as to the number.

Q. That may be; but the words which were imputed to you as having been said were "forty of his mistresses." A. It was put to me that I had said that he had preached to his mistresses; it might be "seven" or "several."

Q. You are mistaken; it was put to you, by reading from a letter, that you had said he had preached to forty of his mistresses. A. Yes, that was stated to me; that was afterwards, in the charges brought by Mr. West—it was stated that I said that he had preached to "seven" or "several" of his mistresses.

Q. I don't mean those charges by Mr. West; I am speaking of a long time afterwards; that was in 1867, and that was two years afterwards. Now, I understand you to answer that you cannot remember that you expressed the number of mistresses? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But that you did express that sentiment, during this interview? A. Understand me correctly; I do not remember having made such a remark; but it was attributed to me, and I think all the probabilities are that I made such a remark; but I do not remember whom I made it to.

Q. But it was attributed to you at a point of time very near the transaction, on that occasion? A. On what occasion?

Q. The occasion of your making this charge; this letter that was before you, in which the inquiry was put to you whether you had said that, was in the month of January, 1871, was it not? A. No, Sir; that was in the month of November, 1870.

Q. No? A. Yes, Sir. I beg pardon.

Q. You do not know what I am talking about. A. I do know exactly, Sir.

Q. No, you do not know what I am talking about. A. I do, Sir, exactly.

Q. No; there was a certain meeting in 1871. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And at that meeting Mr. Beecher, and Mr. Moulton and you were together, and a letter containing such a charge was presented to you to know whether you had said so? A. That is correct so far as it goes.

Q. That was in January? A. Yes, Sir; I had received the letter in the previous November.

Q. I don't know anything about that: I do not care about it, and I do not inquire about it. It is enough that in January the question was put to you, whether you had not, in the preceding few months between July and that date, made that imputation. Then the matter was fresh in your mind, was it not, in January, 1871, when Mr. Beecher, and Mr. Moulton, and yourself were present? A. It was.

Q. Whether or not you had accused Mr. Beecher of preaching to forty of his mistresses or not, during the preceding Summer? A. Yes, Sir; I made answer that probably I had spoken very roughly, that I had not spared him.

Q. And you believe you did say that? A. I will not say I used such an expression; I think the probabilities all are that during the Summer I made use of that expression, or its equivalent, without any definite accuracy as to the number.

Q. To whom did you make use of that expression? A. I think quite likely to Mrs. Morse or to Mr. Richards; I don't know to whom; as I said before, I don't remember having made the remark; but as it was brought home to me in one of my wife's letters during the Summer, the chances are that I said it; that is what I mean.

Q. Now, beyond these general statements to Mr. Beecher's prejudice during that period of time, and these statements, whatever they were, that you had made to the persons you have named, had you said anything to any one else? A. Well, sir, I would not like to answer that question; perhaps I had; because from July, 1870, to the end of that year, I was not under any restraining influences to Mr. Moulton, and I spoke my mind very freely sometimes.

Q. And for aught you know you mentioned this thing at some times to other people besides? A. I am very certain I did not say anything to Mrs. Tilton's detriment, except to those three persons that I have named, but I did not spare Mr. Beecher.

Q. You mean to Moulton and Johnson and Mr. Bradshaw? A. Yes, Sir; I had some conversation with Judge Morse; I don't know how far that went, nor do I know whether he first obtained what he knew from me or from some one else.

Mr. Everts—I did not ask that.

Mr. Beach—It is very proper for him to mention.

Mr. Everts—It may be proper for him to say when some one asks him.

Mr. Beach—It is proper for him as a qualification of his answer.

MR. TILTON'S OPINION OF THE EXAMINING COMMITTEE.

Mr. Evarts—Do you remember about an attendance before this Church Committee and an examination by question and answer there—do you? A. No, Sir; remember going before the Committee; I decline to have it called an examination; it was not.

Q. No matter what it was. You remember being there, and questions being put to you and your making answers? A. Yes, Sir; that I remember.

Q. Now, Sir, did you not say on that occasion in answer to this question: "I ask what evidence you stated against Mr. Beecher to Mr. Bowen,"—in answer to that question, did you not make this answer: "I must answer your questions in my own way. I came to tell you the whole truth, and not fragments of the truth. Mr. Bowen wanted me to speak more in the paper of Plymouth Church. Mr. Johnson said: 'Perhaps Mr. Tilton has a reason for not going to Plymouth Church,' and thereupon Mr. Bowen was curious to know the reason. I, in a solitary phrase, said that there was a personal, domestic reason why I could not go there consistently with my self-respect; that Mr. Beecher had been unhandsome in his approaches to my wife. That is the sum and substance of all I have ever said on this subject, to the very few people to whom I have spoken of it?" A. What is your question?

Q. Didn't you in answer to the question read to you, make that answer? A. I didn't make the last part of that answer, Sir, and I repudiated in a public card that report of my interview. I distinctly, before the Committee, charged Mr. Beecher with adultery, and they did not put it in the report.

Q. Well, now, I am not asking you about that. It has nothing to do with it. I have asked you a simple question, whether in answer to the question I read to you, you did not make the answer that I read to you? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Very well; what you did afterwards I have nothing to do with.

The Witness—I did not, Sir; in other words, that Committee were informed by me—

Mr. Evarts—No matter.

The Witness—It is the last clause.

Mr. Evarts—I have not asked you anything about it.

Mr. Beach—Well, he has a right to answer that he made a part of that reply and part he did not. That is just what he was saying when you interrupted him.

Mr. Evarts—No, he was not.

Mr. Beach—Well, I say that he was.

Mr. Evarts—I say he was not.

Mr. Beach—The minutes will show.

Mr. Evarts—He was talking about his repudiation of the report.

Mr. Beach—He was not, Sir, when the counsel last interrupted him.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I say he was.

The Witness—That was the substance of what I said to Mr.

Bowen. I didn't tell him the whole story, but I had told others the whole story, but very few.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I have not asked you. You say that you did not make that last part of the answer? A. No, Sir; I say that the answer is imperfect; part of it is omitted; that is the answer that I generally made. There were a few exceptions to that answer, namely, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Moulton and Mrs. Bradshaw.

Q. Well, with those exceptions, was the sum and substance of all that you had ever said to the persons to whom you spoke, that Mr. Beecher had made unhandsome approaches to your wife? A. Yes, Sir; impure proposals; that is the sum and the substance. I did not wish to incriminate Mrs. Tilton.

Q. No matter what you wished; the fact was that that is all that you said? A. That is all I said.

Q. With the exception of these three persons? A. Well, understand me, Mr. Evarts, the three persons to whom I allude are persons to whom I told the story—there were other persons to whom I talked, to whom Mrs. Tilton told the story, and Mrs. Morse told the story.

Mr. Evarts—That you don't know anything about?

The Witness—I do know all about it.

Q. I am talking about persons to whom you communicated information. A. Yes, Sir, but I volunteered the whole story to those three persons, with the addition, perhaps, of Judge Morse.

Q. About him you don't remember? A. I don't remember the exact extent of that conversation with him.

Q. Now, when you were communicating the whole story, that is another matter—but with the exception of those three persons, the sum and substance of what you communicated yourself to other people was the unhandsome proposals, or the impure advances? A. Yes, Sir; and then perhaps I ought to mention that there was a chance interview in my house between Mrs. Tilton and myself, at which Bessie Turner heard the whole story.

Q. I have not asked you that. I ask you a voluntary communication which you made to outside people? A. I don't remember any other voluntary communication to outside people.

Q. Now, Sir, when you first spoke to Mr. Moulton on the subject of any relations between Mr. Beecher and your wife, was not all that you told him, that Mr. Beecher had made unhandsome approaches or impure proposals to your wife? A. Yes, Sir, that was December 26th. That is all I told him on that day.

Q. That is all you told him that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was the first time that you had spoken to him at all on the subject? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S PRAISE OF HIS WIFE.

Q. On this same examination, in answer to this question: "Have you not frequently asserted the purity of your wife?" did you make this answer: "No, I have always had a strange technical use of words; I have always used words that conveyed that impression?" A. I cannot see any sense in that word "strange," Sir; I think there must be some misprint; what I meant was that I had always tried—

Q. Well, I ask whether you made that answer or not? A. Well, I did not make use of any such words as "strange technical use;" it is evidently a misprint; you can see it yourself.

Q. I don't know anything about it. You say you did not make that answer? A. Why, I say, Sir, that of course I did not make any such answer: "A strange technical use of words!" There is some other—it is wrong—bad English—it is not right. I will tell you what I said—

Q. Well, did you say, "I have always used words that conveyed that impression?" A. I did, Sir, and I always used such words on purpose, to convey to everybody the impression that she was a pure and good woman, and if any word of mine will carry that impression around the earth to-day, I should like to utter it from this stand.

Q. Well, then, you did use words that were intended to convey the impression of the purity of your wife? A. I did, Sir. But I did not use it in that form. I did not use the word "purity." I used other words. I think she is a pure woman.

Q. You used words that conveyed that impression? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But used other words to do it, with the intention to convey? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And with the effect of conveying? A. Yes, Sir; with that deliberate design, for I hold, with Mr. Beecher, that she is guiltless.

Q. And with that constant effect? A. Yes, Sir.

THE FIRST HOSTILE INTERVIEW REHEARSED.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, you had at one time in your possession a note or memorandum of some kind, as you have stated in your direct examination, written by Mrs. Tilton on the 29th of December, 1870, which you gave to Mr. Moulton when he went to bring Mr. Beecher to the interview with you on the 30th? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At what part of the day of the 29th was that paper obtained? A. Well, Sir, at this moment I don't recollect.

Q. Don't you recall to yourself the occasion and the scene on which you obtained it. I don't ask you to describe it, I only want to know whether you recall or not, to yourself, the occasion on which you received that paper from Mrs. Tilton? A. I didn't see it written, Sir.

Q. What? A. I didn't see it written at all; not that I remember.

Q. Well, after receiving that paper, did it remain in your possession, and uncommunicated to any other person during the whole of the 29th and during the whole of the 30th, until you handed it to Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir; nobody else saw it but Mr. Moulton.

Q. And Mr. Moulton did not see it until you handed it to him at his house when he was starting to go to Mr. Beecher's? A. Not until then.

Q. Now, Sir, was that written on an ordinary note paper of your wife's? A. It was—what do you mean by an ordinary note paper? My recollection is that it was quite a petite note sheet. Whether it was ordinary or extraordinary, I could not say.

Q. Well, I said ordinary note paper of your wife's. We have various exhibits here—what you call a small piece of note paper? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. "Petite," you call it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it in an envelope? A. It was inclosed in a white envelope without direction on it.

Q. And that was of the ordinary size for such a note? A. Well, I don't remember the size of it.

Q. Well, it was an ordinary letter envelope or note paper envelope for such a note, wasn't it? A. That I don't remember—whether the envelope exactly fitted the paper or not; I don't recall.

Q. Well, you received them both together, did you not? A. Yes, Sir, I think I did.

Q. And from your wife, I suppose? A. My recollection is that she handed it to me in that condition; this little memorandum inclosed in a white envelope, unsealed; that is my best recollection.

Q. Unaddressed and unsealed? A. Unaddressed and unsealed; that is my recollection.

Q. Very well; now, when you went to Mr. Moulton, had you prearranged the transaction that you proposed to carry on on the 30th? A. I don't think I understand your question exactly, Sir.

Q. Had you preconceived with Mr. Moulton the course of your proceedings on the night of the 30th of December? A. No, Sir; Mr. Moulton, as yet, knew nothing of my plan; nobody but Mrs. Tilton knew anything about it.

Q. Then, whatever you said or did with him that night was the first, and all that you said or did with him previous to the interview on the subject of that interview? A. I don't—Do you mean to ask me whether I had had any conversation with Mr. Moulton at all between the 28th of December and the 30th?

Q. About procuring this interview of the 30th? A. Oh, no.

Q. Nothing before? A. No.

Q. Very well; you went, then, to Mr. Moulton's house with this note inside this envelope? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, why did you give him the note to carry to Mr. Beecher? A. I will tell you exactly why. I asked Mr. Moulton if he would go down and bring Mr. Beecher to me for an interview on a matter of great importance, concerning Mr. Beecher's relations to my family. Mr. Moulton said he would; "But," said he, "it is prayer-meeting night, and it may not be convenient for him to come." I told him it was on a matter of very great importance I wanted to see him, and I suddenly took that paper out of my pocket, and I said: "Mr. Beecher will come, without doubt, when he knows the object of this interview. At the same time I don't care to have you state the object of the interview if he will come without it; I would rather break it to him myself. But if he makes any objection to coming, then you may take this paper and show it to him; then he will come."

Q. And he took it and left the envelope with you? A. I took it out of the envelope; put back the envelope—I made a copy of it right on the spot on that envelope. Mr. Moulton read it, and expressed great amazement.

Q. Well, he took off this paper—this original paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And left you with the envelope? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You then and there copying on the envelope? A. I did not copy it after Mr. Moulton went off; I copied it before he went off.

Q. No; I say, you then and there copying it on the envelope before he went? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when you thus copied this letter, this note, on the envelope, there was nothing written on it at all? A. Yes, Sir; there was the copy which I had just made.

Q. Well, that is after you had done it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But there was no writing on that envelope? A. No, Sir.

Q. Until you made this copy? A. Nothing at all on it; no, Sir; I made that copy in a few little shorthand lines.

Q. And I suppose upon the smooth side of the envelope? A. Well, Sir, I presume so.

Q. Now, between the time that Mr. Moulton went away and Mr. Beecher came to the interview did you write anything else on that envelope? A. I did, Sir; I took my pencil and I made two or three little dates, memoranda, and so on, all in shorthand notes.

Q. And nothing else? A. No, Sir; not that I recollect.

Q. Do you recollect what those dates and memoranda were? A. Yes, Sir, they were little dates connected with Mrs. Tilton's narrative to me, and also some little extracts which were then fresh in my mind from her letters in the West—broken-hearted letters which she had written; they were little memoranda of some things I wanted to say to Mr. Beecher when he came.

Q. Did you make whatever entries of extracts or allusions to her letters that you have now spoken all from memory, or did you have the letters there? A. O! simply from memory.

Q. Simply from memory? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. During this interview, from its commencement to its close, had you in your possession or hands, for use in that interview, any other written paper than this envelope on which you had made these notes? A. No, Sir.

Q. None whatever? A. No, Sir; not that I recollect; I don't remember any.

Q. And that has been destroyed? A. That I picked to pieces in talking.

Q. Now, just answer my question: that has been destroyed? A. Yes, Sir; that is all I remember.

Q. Now, Sir, when did you receive back the original note or memorandum of Mrs. Tilton that you had handed to Mr. Moulton for the particular use you have described? A. I received it back shortly after the signing of the tripartite covenant in April, 1873.

Q. Yes; for what purpose, and what was done with it? A. I did not want to die leaving that paper in existence; I begged it from Mr. Moulton, carried it back to Mrs. Tilton; she destroyed it.

Q. In your presence? A. Yes, Sir; in my presence; I saw her destroy it.

Q. And you know that it was the very paper? A. That it was the very paper.

Q. Yes; do you know that the paper thus destroyed was the very paper that you had that night? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. Then every original paper, or copy, or memorandum that was before you, or that was used in this interview of the 30th of December has been destroyed, hasn't it? A. There was only that one; only that little envelope.

Q. Everything has been destroyed that was in writing, either an original, or copy, or memorandum? A. Well, there was nothing but that little envelope—one thing.

Q. Well, that is so; it has all been destroyed, whatever there was? A. Well, this is the only thing that was destroyed.

Q. Well, two things, because your wife's original note—A. That was not before us that night; Mr. Moulton had it.

Q. Well, it had been before you; you had it and gave it to Mr. Moulton? A. Well, but it was not present at that interview.

Q. Well, I know I have not confused the matter at all; every paper you had that night in reference to this interview, either the original or this memorandum, copy, or the memoranda of notes for that interview have been destroyed? A. The little envelope which contained the copy and the memoranda was destroyed that night, and the original confession itself was destroyed two years afterwards; that is the whole story.

Q. Now, when Mr. Beecher came and took the seat as you have described, the first thing you said to him was about your previous demand, wasn't it? A. I said something to him about his having received, I presume, the letter of demand.

Q. You have stated it in your direct examination; that was the first matter that you introduced to his notice—an inquiry whether he had received it or not, and that he had received, as you presumed? A. No, Sir; I did not ask if he had received it; I told him that I presumed he had.

Q. Well, that was a form of inquiry, as I understand it. However, that was said; and that was the first thing that you did say, and he assented to the fact that he had received it, didn't he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what did you say to him then on the subject of that order or demand? A. I told him that I wanted him to consider that demand unwritten, not made—blotted out.

Q. You wished then to put yourself towards him as if you never had sent that demand? A. Precisely that.

Q. Precisely that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You did not occupy, then, the same position, or have the same disposition in regard to that demand at that moment that you had, at the time you had sent it on the preceding Monday? A. No, Sir; I did not. On Monday I forgot my wife; and afterward I remembered her.

Q. You had entirely changed your position in that regard? A. Yes, Sir; for my wife's sake I had.

Q. And you wanted the thing undone? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And intended that it should so stand between you and Mr. Beecher, if it could? A. Yes, Sir; told him so very distinctly.

Q. Now, do you remember whether, in that interview, you were seated, or whether you maintained a standing position while Mr. Beecher was sitting? A. I remember exactly.

Q. And you are sure that you were seated during the whole of that interview? A. I remember that Mr. Beecher was seated. Did you ask me about myself?

Q. I am asking about yourself, whether you did not maintain a standing position while Mr. Beecher was seated? A. I think I sat part of the time and stood part of the time. I am not so positive about myself at this moment. I think I sat too.

Q. How will you have it? A. I don't know at this moment. The scene is not so vivid in my mind at present. I have been all day long under a very severe and painful illness.

Mr. Evarts—I am very sorry for that, but I would like to get at the fact.

The Witness—Mr. Beecher remained seated during the whole; that I remember very distinctly.

Q. That you have stated, and I didn't ask you generally. Then you cannot say whether you were seated, or whether you were standing? A. I think I sat part of the time, and stood part of the time.

Q. Now, before you entered upon recounting the narrative or address to Mr. Beecher concerning his relations with your wife, there was also some other topic of conversation, was there not, after you told Mr. Beecher that you wished that summons or demand, whatever it was called to him, treated as if it never had been made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. There was some conversation between you and him before he commenced to state his relations with your wife? A. When I was putting my hand in my pocket to find the memorandum I remember he asked me what Mr. Bowen had been saying against him. I then narrated what I put in my direct examination.

Q. You told him the substance of what Mr. Bowen had said? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he gave you certain answers of surprise, &c., at that, did he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As you have stated; A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And not until you got through with both of those subjects did you introduce this matter of his relations with your wife. A. What do you mean by "both of those subjects?"

Q. Why, about the demand and about what Mr. Bowen had said about Mr. Beecher? A. I introduced the whole evening by referring to the letter of demand, and also to my wife's request that it might be recalled. When I was taking it out Mr. Beecher asked me what Mr. Bowen said, and I told him. The whole interview was in reference to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. No matter what it had reference to; I only want to get at what occurred. Had you this memorandum before you, made as you have now stated, when you went on with this discourse with him that you have given? A. I cannot say it was a discourse.

Q. Well, address? A. No, Sir; it was not an address; it was a statement.

Q. Well, a statement to him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was interrupted by him, was it? A. I remember his making a little attempt to interrupt at one time, and I told him to hear me to the end. There was practically no interruption on his part.

Q. What form of demonstration did you recognize as an attempt to interrupt you? A. I thought he was going to speak.

Q. He made a motion as if he was going to speak? A. I don't distinctly remember it.

Q. Something you treated as a purpose of speaking? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At what stage of your statement was that purposed interruption; do you remember? A. I think it was at the conclusion of my reading Mrs. Tilton's confession.

Q. This little paper which you had—you call it a confession? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was this little paper which you had on that table? A. Yes, Sir; that is my present recollection.

Q. Did you read that at the outset of your statement to him? A. I read that; it was not the first of the interview; the first part of the interview, as I remember, was my reference to his having received a letter.

Q. Oh, well; I agree. But after you got through that, after you had got upon the matter of his relations with your wife, was the reading of that paper the first thing that was done? A. I don't remember whether that was at the very beginning, or whether it was somewhere in its proper place in the narrative; that I do not recall at the present moment.

Q. You cannot say whether it was at the outset, or near the outset, or not? A. No, Sir; there was no formal manner of presenting the case.

Q. But as soon as that was brought to his notice he made as if to interrupt you by speaking? A. He made as if to say something; yes, Sir.

Q. Then how did you arrest that purpose? A. I said simply, "Hear me to the end;" something of that sort.

Q. Now, when you had got through—he did listen to you to the end—didn't he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Without interruption? A. Yes, Sir.

A BIT OF LITERARY CRITICISM.

Q. And when you had got through, did he not say this: "Theodore, this is all a dream?" A. As near as I remember, he said: "Theodore, I am like one in a dream. This is Dante's Inferno," or "I am in Dante's Inferno;" some such expression as that.

Q. Are you sure that he referred to Dante's Inferno? A. Yes, Sir; I am not sure, I am certain.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't know the distinction; but there is some, I suppose.

Mr. Fullerton—He is certain.

The Witness—Excuse me, Mr. Evarts; I did not mean to be captious as to the word. I am certain the sun rose this morning, and I am sure it will rise to-morrow morning. I am certain as to past facts, and I am sure as to future facts, which must, in the necessary order, come about. I beg your pardon for being so critical in that small degree.

Mr. Evarts—I am not so sure you are right about it.

The Witness—I am certain I am right about it.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, do you remember Mr. Beecher expressing a doubt, or intimating a doubt, as to whether Mrs. Tilton had written any such paper? A. No, Sir; he never intimated any such thing.

Q. You are quite sure of that? A. No, Sir; I am quite certain.

Q. Now, don't you remember that on an expression of doubt or surprise concerning Mrs. Tilton having written any such paper as that—you had no original before you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You then said to him, "It is but a few squares to my house; go and ask Mrs. Tilton for yourself whether or not she wrote that letter?" A. Ah! but that was my suggestion, and not his.

Q. I ask you whether you did not say that to him? A. I don't remember using any such expression as that. Do you take that from my examination before the Committee?

Mr. Everts—Well, I will show you where I take it from before I get through. [Laughter.]

THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE CONFESSION.

The Witness—As I understood you to say, you asked me whether Mr. Beecher threw any doubt—

Mr. Everts—Yes.

The Witness—*—*as to whether Mrs. Tilton had made that confession?

Mr. Everts—An expression of doubt, or uncertainty, or surprise, as to Mrs. Tilton having written any such note? A. Ah! what I think he expressed was a great deal of surprise that she should have written that, not any doubt as to its character or contents, and that he wanted permission to go again and see Mrs. Tilton, and I said he might go.

Q. I am not asking you that; I am asking you whether he used language to carry that impression to you of doubt or uncertainty in his mind, or surprise in his mind, at Mrs. Tilton having written any such note? A. No, Sir; but great grief and surprise.

Q. At what? A. At having done it—not doubt, but surprise.

Q. Great surprise at her having done it? A. There is difference between casting a doubt on the character of—

Q. I am not asking you that; I am trying to get facts. In answer to that expression that you describe as surprise, did you say, "It is but a few squares to my house. Go and ask Mrs. Tilton for yourself, whether or not she wrote that letter?" A. Well, I may, perhaps, have used some such expression as that; I don't remember, but it was not in reference to any doubt.

Q. Well, no matter, you used the expression? A. But only as to surprise.

Q. Now, thereupon did he indicate a purpose of going? A. He went staggering down stairs.

Q. Did he indicate to you a purpose of going to your house? A. No, Sir; he didn't say anything on the subject that I remember now.

Q. Didn't you know that he was going to your house then? A. I presumed he would go; I don't remember that he said he was going.

Q. I ask you if he didn't indicate to you, so that you understood him, that he was going then and there to your house? A.

I don't know that he indicated in any way other than by asking me if he might go, or my saying to him he might go.

Q. You said that, we will suppose. I want to know whether, when he made a movement to leave the room and the house, you didn't understand he was going to your house? A. Ah! I did, but did not frame any special indication he made. He and Mr. Moulton went out together, and I understood they went to my house, and afterwards I learned that they did.

Q. And when Mr. Beecher came back that night you had no further conversation with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you see him again? A. I did not see him at all. He came into the parlor, and he had a conversation with Mr. Moulton that night with me.

Q. And that terminated the transaction that night between you and Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, what was the condition of Mrs. Tilton's health from the 24th of December until the 12th of January following? A. She was getting better every day from an illness.

Q. She suffered a miscarriage, did she not, on the 24th of December? A. I am not sure that was the date, but quite likely it was—somewhere about there.

Q. Her illness, whatever it was, arose from a miscarriage? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And had she, during that preceding Summer or Autumn, had a similar illness from miscarriage? A. What, Sir?

Q. Had she, during the preceding Summer or Autumn, had an illness from a miscarriage? A. Not that I now remember.

Q. You don't remember that? A. She never had but one.

Q. That year? A. I don't think she ever had but one in her life.

Q. Of course I do not desire to inquire? A. I have never heard of any but one.

Q. Now, who attended her as physician during that time? A. My recollection is Dr. Skiles did, but I won't be certain about that.

Q. If not he, who else? A. Well, I don't remember anybody else.

Q. Do you know what nurse attended her? A. No. I don't recollect.

Q. Did you know at the time that a nurse did attend her? A. Well, I presume I did, but I don't remember now of a nurse.

Q. Now, was she seriously sick during the week from the 24th of December to the 31st of December? A. Well, Sir, on the 24th of December, if that was the date, I thought she was seriously sick, but the seriousness passed away. She got up very shortly.

Q. But shortly after when—the 24th? A. Yes, Sir; I mean to say that she was on her way to recovery; that was the serious date; she began to get better every day.

Q. Still, was she confined to her sick chamber and to her bed during that month? A. During the remainder of the month?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I think she was; I don't remember when she first got around the house.

Q. It was at least later than the 1st of January? A. I think it was.

Q. So that she was, during this whole period, under this sickness, and confined to her room and her bed? A. She was to her room, I think; I won't say about her bed all the time.

Q. Substantially to her bed, was she not? Didn't you know about it at the time? A. I knew about it, but it is impossible for me to state the day on which she first began to walk around her room. That is the point of difficulty.

Q. I am only asking you if it didn't continue a week? A. That is exactly what I am saying I cannot tell.

Q. She was under the physician's care, was she not, during the whole of that week? A. That I don't remember, but I presume she was. She always was when she was sick.

Q. And under the care of her nurse all that week? A. I don't remember about the nurse, but I presume she was.

Mr. Evarts [To Judge Neilson]—It is four o'clock, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen will please keep seated for a moment. Will gentlemen wait a moment until the jury pass out? [To the jury]: Gentlemen, be in your seats to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned to 11 o'clock on Tuesday.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

CHRISTMAS WEEK IN 1870.

THE PLAINTIFF'S RELATIONS WITH MRS. WOODHULL AGAIN EXAMINED—HIS CONTRACTS WITH MR. BOWEN AND HIS BUSINESS COMPLICATIONS LOOKED INTO—MRS. TILTON'S CATHERINE GAUNT LETTER—THE MEMORABLE INTERVIEW OF THE PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANT.

TUESDAY, Feb. 9, 1875.

The gloomy and mysterious events of Christmas week, 1870—the meetings of the plaintiff with Mr. Beecher, Mr. Bowen, and Mr. Moulton—were again gone over to some extent to-day, but the statements elicited did not seem to add to the character of the evidence, but only to the bulk of it. The form of the defense is gradually unfolding itself, and Mr. Evarts seems to be a master of the facts in the possession of his side. The questions asked to-day made it evident that Mr. Tilton's business troubles with Mr. Bowen and his private controversies with Mr. Beecher, which were crowded into that last week of 1870, are to be connected in the theory of the defense. The plaintiff's connection with Mrs. Woodhull is also brought out in strong colors. One of the leading questions of the counsel was whether the witness ever went to his house with Mrs. Woodhull in a carriage, left her and went into the house, getting the papers in this case, and returning and talking to her about them. Mr. Tilton denied that there ever was such an occurrence.

Mr. Evarts endeavored to connect Mr. Tilton with Mrs. Woodhull in regard to a procession in this city to the memory of Rossel, the French Communist, who was executed. The witness said that he did not know that Mrs. Woodhull was in the procession, and that he walked in the line with John Swinton. 'Did you walk all the way with him?' asked Mr. Evarts. All the answer the plaintiff made to this was to wheel quickly in his chair and inquire in the blandest tones of Mr. Swinton, who stood behind him, "was it all the way?" Mr. Tilton took occasion to eulogize Rossel highly, and told Mr. Evarts that it was an insult to suggest that the Communist was executed for having put to death the Archbishop of Paris.

Before the court adjourned for recess, Judge Neilson announced that he had received a letter saying that persons standing behind the jury-box had, within hearing of the jurymen, made remarks about the case. He commented severely upon this, and threatened summary punishment to any one caught in such an act. At the suggestion of Mr. Evarts the Judge decided that no one be allowed to stand behind the jury thereafter. After the interval for lunch, Chester Carpenter, the foreman of the jury, arose with his associates, and addressed the Court, saying that they had heard nothing improper, and that the communication to the Judge was an unjust reflection upon them. Judge Neilson replied that he was happy to know that there was no cause for complaint.

The document known as the "Catherine Gaunt letter" was made an important point at issue, and Mr. Evarts introduced it for the purpose of showing that in the copy of that letter made by Mr. Maverick and introduced into Mr. Tilton's statement to the Plymouth Investigating Committee Mr. Tilton had omitted an important part; also that in subsequent publications that part of the letter was left out. As presented to the Committee a portion of the letter was omitted, but Mr. Tilton swore that he had the original with him when he presented his statement, and subsequently a copy of The Graphic, with the letter printed in full, was shown. The third attempt on the part of the defense to introduce the Woodhull biography was made, and this time, after a short discussion, with partial success. This little pamphlet has been the cause of more or less debate at different times ever since Mr. Moulton took the witness chair, and the parts which Mr. Evarts was allowed to read were listened to with great interest.

The poem "Sir Marmaduke's Musings" was introduced, and four or five verses of it read, peculiar stress being laid upon the clause about the disappointment in love. Mr. Evarts asked Mr. Tilton if he did not believe that this admitted reference to his wife would be understood by the public, and thus again "stir up" the scandal. Mr. Tilton said that if he had thought that the poem would have such an effect he would have cut off his right hand before he would have written it. After this the inquiry went back to Mrs. Woodhull and her connection with the case, Mr. Evarts asking Mr. Tilton if he could tell how it was that Mr. Beecher knew before its publication of the intended printing of the scandalous account in 1873. The witness replied that Mr. Beecher had told him that a man had called upon him with proofs of the article and that Mr. Beecher had suggested that it was an attempt at black-mail. At this point the court was adjourned.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. TILTON'S EXPERIENCE WITH MORTGAGES.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Theodore Tilton was recalled and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Tilton desires, Sir, to make an explanation in regard to an answer he gave yesterday.

The Witness—Your Honor, I made an answer yesterday, Mr. Evarts, to a question that you put to me concerning a mortgage on my house. I find on inquiry that the circumstances are these, somewhat or slightly different from the narrative yesterday: There is a mortgage on my house of $7,500. That is a principal mortgage. Collateral to that, not to increase the debt, however, there is a mortgage on the property in the Llewellyn Park. I was not aware of that fact until this morning.

Mr. Evarts—That is, you did not recall it? A. I was not aware of it, Sir, until it was brought to my attention this morning.

Q. Well, do you mean it is a mortgage that you did not make? A. It is a mortgage that I did not know was made. I deposited in the hands of a friend of mine, who held the mortgage on my house, the deed of this property in Llewellyn Park as collateral; that is to say, so that in case of any depreciation of property my house in Brooklyn, on being sold, should not pay the mortgage, that here might be another piece of property which might supplement that deficiency. I was not aware until this morning that a mortgage had been put upon the Llewellyn Park property.

Q. An additional mortgage to secure the same debt that the principal mortgage did, but not increasing the debt? A. Not increasing the obligation.

Q. To whom was the principal mortgage, and to whom was the collateral mortgage? A. To Mr. Franklin Woodruff.

Q. And who was the friend with whom you intrusted this discretion of giving the additional mortgage? A. Mr. Franklin Woodruff.

Q. Mr. Franklin Woodruff? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The mortgagee was Franklin Woodruff? A. Yes, Sir; I was not aware of the inaccuracy until Mr. Woodruff called this morning.

Q. Well, I don't get it through my head yet. Mr. Woodruff was the mortgagee; that I understand. He was the person to whom you owed the money? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And to whom the mortgage on your Livingston-st house had been made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And to whom this collateral or additional mortgage was made? A. Yes, Sir; as further security.

Q. Well, I understand that; there is no difficulty about that; but who executed this collateral mortgage to Mr. Woodruff? A. Well, I presume he executed it himself; that is to say—

Q. That is the part I cannot understand? A. Well, I will tell you the story, Mr. Woodruff—Mr. Evarts, I mean.

Judge Neilson—The counsel's idea is that you must have executed the mortgage though you have forgotten it.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't understand that there was any mortgage any way; it was a deposit of a deed of the Llewellyn Park property, as an equitable mortgage, if you please.

Mr. Evarts—We don't know.

Judge Neilson—That is the way of it?

The Witness—Mr. Woodruff called on me this morning and said there was an inaccuracy there, and perhaps I better correct it. I was not aware until he mentioned to me the circumstance this morning, and I confess I do not now quite understand it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I still less.

The Witness—I have been in Court a good while, but am not yet a lawyer.

Mr. Beach—The probability is that you executed a collateral mortgage.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that, Sir—

Judge Neilson—Or deposited a deed as an equitable mortgage.

The Witness—I remember that I deposited the mortgage.

Mr. Evarts—At any rate, it would be no evidence—our conjecture.

Judge Neilson—It is a correction.

Mr. Evarts—It is a correction I agree, so far as that goes. [To the Witness]: Now, have you any idea or recollection, Mr. Tilton, of having authorized anybody else as your attorney or representative to make a mortgage on your Llewellyn property? A. No, Sir.

Q. Quite sure of that? A. I know; quite certain of that.

Q. Well, I suppose the shortest way would be to have these mortgages brought into Court. Mr. Woodruff has got them, hasn't he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And we can see what they are—if they are important? A. Mr. Woodruff is a very clear business man, and he will explain everything to you, Sir, in a few words.

Q. You have spoken of the value of that Llewellyn Park lot.

What did you pay for it? A. I bought it piecemeal at different times.

Q. What did you pay or it piecemeal at different times? A. My impression is that I paid about $4,500 for a portion of it in the advertising columns of The Independent.

Q. That is, by advertising? A. Yes, Sir; that is to say, that a portion of what would have been my due from The Independent went to the payment of advertising in that journal, those advertisements being inserted by the gentleman of whom I bought the property.

Q. Yes; in other words you— A. And an acre of the property was made to me as a gift by the same man.

Q. $4,500 was for the advertisements, and was not the rest for the editorials about the property? A. No, Sir; I never sold my editorials, Sir.

Q. Well, who was this gentleman that made you this gift? A. Mr. Llewellyn Hascall.

Q. The founder and promoter of that enterprise? A. The founder of the park, an old friend of mine; yes, Sir. Many years ago he gave me an acre of ground there to tempt me out there to live, and afterwards bought some other.

Q. Well, no matter. So that you did not pay any cash for it? A. Yes, Sir; I paid cash for a portion of it. I loaned him some money when he was in tight place; I have forgotten how much; $600 I believe.

Q. Yes. A. And I had some land afterward, so that finally I had three acres instead of one.

Q. Now, don't you know now, since the matter was recalled to you by Mr. Woodruff, that there is a mortgage on record on that Llewellyn Park property? A. I only know what he mentioned to me this morning, Sir. I had a very hurried interview with him, and I don't understand the legal transactions; but Mr. Woodruff will explain it to you, Sir.

PURPOSE OF THE CONFESION EXPLAINED.

Q. Yes, very likely. I am not certain that I am right, Mr. Tilton [looking over some memorandums], as to whether your contract made on the 20th or about the 20th of December, with Mr. Bowen, so far as respected The Independent, was a five years or a two years' contract? A. Well, Sir, I don't possess those papers. I remember very distinctly that the contract with The Union was five years.

Q. Yes, that I understand. A. I don't remember so distinctly how long the contract with The Independent was; my impression is, two or three years; I won't be certain, though.

Q. Now, let me recall you to that. Wasn't it two years, on your best recollection now? A. I should not say distinctly, Sir; I don't know; perhaps it was, perhaps it was; still I won't be accurate.

Q. Now, Sir, when you gave to Mr. Moulton, on the night of the 30th December, this letter in your wife's handwriting, or this document in your wife's handwriting, you say that you thought that if Mr. Beecher interposed objections to coming, that that would induce him to come, didn't you? A. Words to that effect; yes, Sir.

Q. And that it was not to be used unless necessary for that purpose? A. I didn't say that exactly, Sir. I said that I didn't wish Mr. Moulton himself to break that subject to Mr. Beecher unless it was necessary.

Q. I mean used by Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Not to be used by Mr. Moulton on that occasion? A. No, Sir.

Q. With Mr. Beecher, unless it proved necessary? A. No, Sir; that was my intent.

Q. Now, you thought that that note would fetch Mr. Beecher to this interview, didn't you? A. I knew it would; yes, Sir.

Q. You knew it would? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, wasn't it got for that purpose? A. For what purpose?

Q. To fetch Mr. Beecher to that interview? A. No, Sir; it was got for the purpose of being the basis on which I, as an honorable man, maintaining my self-respect, could hold that interview with him.

Q. Very well; when did it first occur to you to use it for that purpose, of fetching Mr. Beecher? A. Will you state your question again, if you please?

Q. When did it first occur to you to use it for the purpose of fetching Mr. Beecher to the interview? A. On the day in which the interview was held. It was written the day before.

Q. No matter; we won't go away from it. My question is when did it occur to you to use that paper for the purpose of fetching Mr. Beecher? A. That thought never occurred to me, I think, until Mr. Moulton suggested, a few minutes before going, that possibly he might not come.

Q. Well, that is your best recollection, is it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But it was a sudden use of the paper? A. The object—I don't understand your question, Mr. Evarts.

Q. That it was a sudden use of the paper not premeditated? A. By Mr. Moulton?

Q. By you? A. I designed to use the paper in my interview with Mr. Beecher.

Q. That I understand, but the using it to fetch Mr. Beecher was a sudden and not a premeditated use? A. It was a spontaneous impulse; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, I understand you to have said in your direct examination that the motive and object of this interview with Mr. Beecher had solely relation to the protection of the relations between your wife and Mr. Beecher being brought out into publicity or discussion by reason of, or in connection with, any controversy that might arise between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher? A. Well, Sir, if I understand your question, that was the purpose.

Q. That was? A. Yes, Sir; that is to say, the object of that interview was to protect Elizabeth.

Q. Yes. Well, and in connection with the fear of publicity growing out of a controversy or agitation between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, that was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you afraid? A. No, Sir.

Q. Wait a moment; I haven't got through with the question. [Laughter.] As a naked question, I dare say you are never afraid, but that is not my question. Were you afraid— A. No, Sir; oh, I beg your pardon; I thought—

Q. Now, I warned you, Mr. Tilton, it was not my whole question. A. Well, Sir, I accept your warning, Sir; I am sorry you are disconcerted.

Judge Neilson—Wait till the question is put, Mr. Tilton, and then answer it.

Q. Were you afraid that Mr. Beecher would give publicity to these supposed relations? A. Oh, no, Sir.

Q. What? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not the least? A. Not at all.

THE HELPING HAND OF MR. MOULTON.

Q. Now, Sir, you received late, you say, on the night of the 31st, from Mr. Bowen, notice of your dismissal—of the termination of your contracts. That notice is not here—not to be found. Did that notice include also a statement that he was ready to pay or settle all demands, and wished to do so? A. I don't remember as to that, Sir; very brief letter; note, as I recollect it. My impression is that Mr. Moulton had those notes; I won't be certain about it.

Mr. Everts—We should like it if we could get it; if any of you gentlemen can give it to us, we, of course, will not inquire about its contents.

Mr. Morris—I haven't got it.

Mr. Everts—We have understood before that it could not be had; isn't that so, Mr. Morris?

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir.

Q. Wasn't the notification that you received from Bowen that your engagement with The Independent and The Union would then and there terminate, and that he was ready to settle with you in full of all demands? A. I don't remember the contents of his note; all I remember about it now, at this distance of time, is that it was a brief note—I think two notes—one as publisher of The Independent and one as president of The Brooklyn Union Association. I gave them to Mr. Moulton; that is all I recollect about that.

Q. Can you say now that they did or did not contain this latter clause, that he was ready to settle with you in full of all demands? A. I have given you all the recollection that I have touching the document or note at present.

Q. Well, you can't say? A. Not at present; no, Sir.

Q. You will not say that they did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, at what hour in the evening did you receive that notification? A. I should think about nine o'clock, or half past; somewhere in the middle of the evening.

Q. That was Saturday night? A. It was the last night of the year; yes, it was Saturday night.

Q. Now, you received it at your house, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what did you do with it, or about it, after receiving it? A. Went around to Mr. Moulton's house with it.

Q. Had you seen him before that evening? A. Had I seen him before that evening?

Q. Yes? A. Why, Sir, I had known him for fifteen years.

Q. No; had you seen him that evening before? A. Oh, I think not, Sir.

Q. You think you hadn't seen him? A. I don't remember that I had seen him; my present impression is that I had not; I think I had been at home all the evening.

Q. And your occasion and errand was from the receipt of this from Mr. Bowen, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir; I went around to talk to him about it.

Q. Where did you see him then? A. Mr. Moulton was not at home.

Q. Well, what happened then? A. I sat there at his writing-desk and began a reply to Bowen's letter.

Q. Well, when did he come in? A. Mr. Moulton came in from Mr. Beecher's house a little later in the evening.

Q. Well, he came in at any rate? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He came in? A. Yes.

THE SOOTHING INFLUENCE OF CHURCH CHIMES SOUGHT.

Q. And then, did you continue an interview there, or did you go out into the streets? A. We continued an interview there, and I think that later in the evening, as the year was waning, and the bells of St. Ann's began to ring, I think we went out in the street to listen to them; that is my recollection.

Q. Well, do you recollect that you went out into the street? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, when you first saw Moulton at his house, didn't you invite him out of doors? A. When I first saw him?

Q. That evening, then? A. Why, no; I didn't.

Q. Didn't invite him out of doors? A. I did not immediately; he invited me to read the papers which he had got from Mr. Beecher first.

Judge Neilson—From Mr. Bowen, you mean?

The Witness—No, Sir; Mr. Beecher. He had just brought home the retraction.

Q. Now, do you remember how many hours you walked the streets that night with Mr. Moulton? A. Well, I don't think we walked a great many hours, Sir.

Q. Well, give us how many about? A. My recollection is that just as the year was stepping across the bridge into the new one, we went out to hear the chimes of St. Ann's.

Q. Well, when the chimes were over did you separate immediately? A. I don't remember whether we did immediately, Sir.

Q. Didn't you have a prolonged interview in the street, proposed by yourself to be in the streets, which occupied one or two hours? A. I had a walk with Mr. Moulton late at night; I had been greatly aroused by the information which he had brought to me from Mr. Beecher's, and late in the evening, as my habit is, I walked—he walked with me—and the New Year overtook us there.

Q. That is all you can say about it? A. That is all I can say.

Q. You cannot say whether it was two hours you walked together that Winter night? A. No, I can't say.

Q. And you are quite certain that you did not take him out into the streets at the first of your call that night? A. No, Sir, because at the first of my call that night —

Q. No matter about the reason; are you certain? A. He was not there at the first; he came in afterward.

Q. Are you certain that you did not take him out as soon as he came in and you saw him? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. You think so? A. Because he had a message to communicate to me.

Q. I don't care what the reasons are; are you certain that you did not take him out? Couldn't he communicate his message to you in the street as well as any other talk? A. I think quite likely he might have done that; that is to say, he had the ability to do it.

Q. Yes, Sir; now, what is your recollection? Did you take him out into the street for this interview of yours with him from the beginning of your seeing him that night? A. I don't think that I did, Sir; I have an indistinct recollection that I went home hurriedly to inform Elizabeth of the return of the papers, and came back for Mr. Moulton—still I won't be positive about that—and that then we walked the streets; I won't be certain of that.

Q. Now, Sir, New Year's was Sunday; when did you prepare—begin to prepare—the letter to Mr. Bowen of the date of the 1st of January? A. I began to prepare it the night before.

Q. That is the night of the 31st? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when did you finish it? A. Well, Sir; I think it was finished the next day with the exception of some revisions which were incorporated into it after consulting with Mr. Jeremiah Robinson, Franklin—no Mr. Moulton, Gordon L. Ford and others.

Q. Now, Sir, there is nothing in that letter about Mr. Beecher's relations to you or your wife? A. No, Sir; all that matter was designedly omitted.

Q. By you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did these gentlemen advise you to leave out any such matter? A. Mr. Robinson advised me to carry myself out of the case entirely; that was his expression.

Q. Well I mean about this letter; I am not going into any general conversation; they gave you some advice about this letter? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Robinson in particular.

Q. Now, did they in the preparation of that letter, and while that was going on, advise you not to have any of the relations between Mr. Beecher and your wife in that letter? A. I had written the letter and submitted it to Mr. Robinson, and his suggestion to me was to keep myself out of the letter—my own case out of the letter.

THE RESTRAINING INFLUENCE OF MR. TILTON'S FRIENDS.

Q. But you were out of it—you had finished the letter? A. I was somewhat in it, Sir.

Q. Do you mean you altered the letter afterwards? A. I did, in obedience to their suggestions afterwards.

Q. Ah! Then you had meditated putting them in. A. No, Sir; my letter was too personal and fiery as I first wrote it. Mr. Robinson said to be calm and judicious, and so I took out certain phrases of the letter. I do not know what they were. He said if my letter was published, it would have a better effect if it was perfectly calm and judicious, and I thought his advice was good, and so I omitted certain phrases which I thought were too impetuous and wrathful.

Q. As towards Bowen? A. Yes, Sir, as towards Bowen; the idea being that there was something in the letter.

Mr. Everts—No matter about that. This is a cross-examination.

Mr. Tilton—[continuing his answer]: That would reveal something hidden.

Q. No matter about your idea. Now, you showed it to Mr. Ford? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the state it was when you showed it to Mr. Robinson? A. No, Sir; Mr. Ford saw it, I think, on Sunday morning—New Year's day; I was in the act of composing it, I think, and he came upon me in my parlor when I was writing it.

Q. And you showed it to him? A. I read it to him; at least I read to him all there was of it then, in the state in which it was then.

Q. Was not the whole of it finished? A. I showed him all there was of it.

Q. Was not the whole of it there? A. No, Sir; there was not; that is, the letter was not in its completed state until certainly, January the 2d.

Q. Have you not told us that the whole of the changes were there, that you took something out? I want to know when you showed it to him whether it had all in it that ever was in it? A. Mr. Ford? I do not remember precisely the condition that that letter was in on New Year's morning, when I showed it to him; I think the essence of it was the same as it is now, only the phraseology may have been a little indiscreet.

Q. Did he advise striking out anything? A. No, Sir; he did not give me any advice whatever; I didn't ask him for any advice; I simply read it to him.

Q. Did you understand Mr. Ford's relations to one of the ladies referred to in that letter? A. I do not understand any relations that Mr. Ford had to any lady except his wife.

Q. I am not speaking of improper relations; I am speaking of relations?

Mr. Beach—He is not speaking of immoral relations.

The Witness—Please to ask your question again?

Mr. Everts—You say you do not. You are not aware of his relations as trustee to one of the ladies referred to in that letter to Mr. Bowen?

Mr. Beach—I do not understand that any specific lady is named in the letter.

Mr. Everts—I do not say named; I say referred to.

The Witness—I do not understand your question.

Q. Did you know that Mr. Bowen stood in the relation of trustee to one of the ladies referred to in your letter to Mr. Bowen? A. I did not, Sir, and I do not know it yet. I never heard of any such fact.

Q. At all events, Mr. Ford did not advise you to leave out a part of the letter? A. I don't think Mr. Ford gave me any advice on that subject.

Q. I thought that you left out of this letter all reference to your wife's affairs on the advice of Mr. Robinson, Mr. Ford and some others? A. No, Sir; I wrote it, and I said that Mr. Robinson had advised me.

Mr. Morris—He did not say that he left them out on their suggestion, because he did not state there was anything referring to his wife, or anything of that kind.

Mr. Everts—That would be "taking" them out; I said "leave" them out.

Judge Neilson—I got the impression from the witness that it was his original purpose to leave out all reference to his wife.

The Witness—There was no word of disparagement of my wife in that letter.

Q. I agree to that. We have it here? A. I mean in the original draft—the original design.

Q. Have you not said that you left out any connection of your wife's affairs with the concurring advice of these gentlemen? A. I said nothing of the kind.

Q. What did you say? A. I said this: that I had advised with Mr. Robinson about that letter, who instructed me to make it more calm and temperate and to carry myself out of it—my personalities—my fire and feeling; I never for one moment thought of introducing my wife into this letter with any disparagement; there never was any allusion to her in it.

Q. Now, Sir, in your direct examination did you not say this [referring to this letter and the preparation of it], that "acting under a sense of duty I had written a letter to Mr. Bowen, reciting all the facts; that I had written it very carefully, taking the advice of Jeremiah P. Robinson and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Gordon L. Ford, and that acting upon their advice, and particularly upon the advice of the oldest of these gentlemen, Mr. Robinson, I had studiously kept out of this letter all grounds of difference between Mr. Beecher and myself?" A. Yes, Sir, I said something of that kind.

Q. Very well? A. The conversation I had with Mr. Ford, I think, was about the phraseology of it.

Q. That is true as you stated it in your direct examination? A. Yes, Sir; but I did not discuss with these gentlemen Mr. Beecher's affairs with me.

Q. No matter—this is a cross-examination? A. Yes, Sir,

Q. Now, when did you hand that paper—that Bowen letter—to Mr. Moulton? A. I don't remember the day. It was one of the very first days of January—as soon as it was completed and a clean copy made of it.

Q. Now, upon giving that letter to Mr. Moulton, did you express a wish or desire to have your affairs with Mr. Bowen speedily settled or closed? A. No, Sir; I expressed that desire—

Q. No matter; you say you did not at this time. A. I did not say that I didn't at this time; I did at this time, but not in connection with that letter.

Q. At this interview? A. I do not remember the interview; I saw him about every day at that time; I gave Mr. Moulton a specific note authorizing him to settle my affairs.

Q. That is not what I am talking about. That is in evidence already. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you on giving that letter to Mr. Moulton explain to him the desire that your pecuniary affairs (not using that phrase necessarily, but referring to them) should be speedily settled with Mr. Bowen. A. No, Sir; I do not think that Mr. Moulton had this copy of the letter until a day or two after the authorization.

Q. You do not think you told him so? A. I do not say I did not; I told Mr. Moulton that I wanted my affairs settled, and I gave him a note to Mr. Bowen authorizing him to settle.

Q. You did tell him that you wanted your affairs settled up as soon as might be? A. Yes, Sir; that was the 2d of January that I gave him the note; that will speak for itself.

Q. You gave him the letter to Mr. Bowen, I suppose, at the same time? A. My impression is that this letter was not clearly copied until the 3d or 4th—perhaps the 3d.

Q. Did you—at that time and at that conversation in which you gave him that letter, and at which you expressed the desire to have the matter speedily settled—ask him (Moulton) to be one of the arbitrators to close this? A. I did, Sir. I made him the request; whether it was in the act of giving him the letter I do not remember.

Q. At that stage of the business and before you made him an attorney, of course? A. Mr. Moulton is not an attorney.

Mr. Morris—That is argumentative.

Mr. Everts—I know it is, and it is quite within my privilege.

Mr. Morris—I think not.

Mr. Everts—Did you name the other arbitrators at that time, or either of them? A. What other arbitrators?

Q. Of the three. You asked him to be one of three arbitrators? A. I don't think I had any right to name any of the others.

Q. I did not ask you what you had a right to do; I asked you what you did? A. I don't remember the name of the three; I did subsequently select three out of the list presented by Mr. Bowen.

Q. That is quite another matter; but you asked him to be one of three arbitrators. Did he not on that request of yours desire you to commit your case to his care? A. Yes, Sir; he did.

Q. He did? A. I don't know whether it was immediately consequent upon that request; but he desired me to submit it to him.

Q. Do you think now that it was not consequent upon that request? A. I think about that time.

Q. It was before you gave him the power? A. I gave him the power.

Q. After that suggestion? A. In consequence of his request—yes, Sir.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] That is the paper that you gave him, is it not? A. This is a paper in Mr. Moulton's handwriting; it seems to be a copy of a letter which I gave him; I take it for granted that the copy is accurate.

Mr. Everts—This is in evidence, is it not?

Mr. Fullerton—Let me see.

Mr. Everts—Mr. Shearman, did you not give me this as an exhibit?

Mr. Shearman—It came in the papers as "Exhibit D, 4." [Looking at it.] Yes; that is the only one we have had; it is Mr. Moulton's copy.

Mr. Everts—Has it been marked?

Mr. Shearman—Yes; it is marked "D, 4."

Mr. Everts—Where?

Mr. Shearman—It must have been marked on the envelope; the stenographer had better mark it now. He marked it on the envelope instead of on the paper.

Mr. Everts—But it is in evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—It is already marked.

Mr. Everts—It is supposed to be marked, but the mark is not on it.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer here marked the paper "Exhibit D, 4."]

Q. Now, Sir, did you place in Mr. Moulton's hands, at that time, anything but this letter to Mr. Bowen, of the 18th of January? [Turning to Mr. Shearman; What is that Exhibit?] No matter. Did you place in Mr. Moulton's hands, at that time, anything but this authorization and the letter to Bowen?

Mr. Beach—That implies an assumption, I think, that he placed both papers in his hands at that time.

Mr. Everts—I do not mean to reconsider what he said. Did he place anything?

Judge Neilson—You do not mean to imply that they were both handed to him together?

Mr. Everts—No, Sir; that is not my question.

Mr. Beach—The question implies that.

Mr. Everts—No; you handed that to him?

The Witness—Mr. Everts, if you wish to know the papers that I put into Mr. Moulton's hands, I can tell you.

Mr. Everts—At that time, in reference to Mr. Bowen?

The Witness—Yes, I will tell you. I gave him three papers—one, a little note, authorizing Mr. Moulton to settle my affairs with him; the other, a copy of my contract with The Independent, and the other a copy of my contract with The Brooklyn Union; these were the three papers that I put into Mr. Moulton's hands. Further than that, I do not know that I put anything into his hands.

Q. Did you give him the Bowen letter that you testified to? A. Yes; but I did not put it into his hands; I sent it down to Mr. Bowen; but he declined to take it to Mr. Bowen.

Q. What? A. He did not want to take it to Mr. Bowen.

Q. Then you offered it to him? A. My first proposition about that paper was to publish it; Mr. Moulton did not wish it published; I then wanted him to deliver it to Mr. Bowen; he took charge of it.

Q. And he did take charge of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you gave it to him? A. What do you mean by "giving it to him?"—that I made over a deed of it?

Q. Handed it to him? A. Yes, Sir; I handed it to him; that is the only way that he could have got it.

Mr. Everts—I think so, unless he ravished it. [Laughter.]

The Witness—He read it to Mr. Bowen about the 8th or 10th of January.

Q. Very well; no matter. There has been testimony to that purpose, I believe; something about that. Now, Sir, when did you first learn from Mr. Moulton, or anybody else, that Mr. Bowen did not pay that money? A. I do not remember the exact date of Mr. Moulton's first interview with Mr. Bowen; some time early in January.

Q. Immediately after that, was it, that he made some report to you about it? A. Yes, Sir, very shortly.

Q. And that report at least included the fact that Mr. Bowen refused to pay? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, then, what did it include? A. I think the first report that came from Mr. Bowen was the payment of $1,000 to me, which he owed me upon some notes I held; that is my best recollection, but I will not be accurate as to the time. Mr. Bowen wanted an arbitration—wanted not only a settlement of our pecuniary matters, but he wanted a settlement of other matters.

Q. I did not ask for that? A. What is it that you ask for, Mr. Everts?

Q. I ask when you first received notice, through Mr. Moulton, from Mr. Bowen that he did not pay these liquidated damages? A. I do not know the date, but it was very early in January.

Q. Now, did you also learn that he also wanted an arbitration? A. Yes, Sir; we both wanted it.

Q. Both wanted an arbitration? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Moulton forbade it.

Q. That was at an early stage of the matter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Moulton prohibited it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, the actual arbitration was not held until somewhere in the Spring—April, I think—of 1872, was it? A. It was held on the 2d of April, 1872, I think.

Q. Now, you never saw Mr. Bowen, I suppose, personally about these matters at all? A. I do not remember that I exchanged a word with Mr. Bowen from the day that I left him in The Union office in 1870 until the 2d of April, 1872; if I did it was an accidental meeting in the street.

Q. I don't know anything about that; that is your view of the matter. From that break in your employment until the time he paid you your money you had had no intercourse with him? A. I have an indistinct recollection that on New Year's Day I met him at somebody's house.

Q. But that was casually, if it occurred at all? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you have stated, I think, in your direct examination that Mrs. Tilton was informed of (I don't know whether you used the word "trouble" or "business affairs") as they went on, have you not? A. What business affairs?

Q. With Bowen? A. What week do you allude to?

Q. That week in December? A. There are four weeks in December.

Q. You have no idea of what week I am referring to? A. No, Sir; I have not; I suppose you are referring to the early part of December.

Q. I will tell you what week I am referring to—from the 24th to the 31st of December? A. I had no business affairs with Mr. Bowen during that week.

Q. Had you an interview with Mr. Bowen during that week? A. I had an interview with Mr. Bowen on the 26th of December.

Q. And another on the 27th or 28th? A. Yes, Sir; not about business matters; quite different from business matters; matters of scandal and the expulsion of Mr. Beecher from his pulpit.

MRS. TILTON'S MEDIATION.

Q. Yes, we have heard exactly about that. Now, have you not on your direct examination said that Mrs. Tilton was informed of these occurrences? A. Yes, Sir; but you have described them as "business" occurrences.

Q. I consider them business occurrences in my view of it. A. But I did not interpret to Mrs. Tilton your views of the case, Mr. Evarts.

Q. No, not at all. And it was in consequence of this information, as I understood you on the direct examination, that she felt solicitude to have some intercourse between you and Mr. Beecher? A. Well, Sir; my answer to that question is this—

Q. I don't ask for any conversation, I only ask whether you have not said on your direct examination, that in consequence of this threatening controversy between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher, your wife felt anxiety; and that that led to your interview with Mr. Bowen? A. Mrs. Tilton thought if Mr. Bowen and I drove Mr. Beecher out of his pulpit, all the world would know the reason, and that would convict her.

Q. I didn't ask you that. I asked you if you did not say that on your direct examination? A. I stated the substance of that.

Q. That it was in consequence of your wife knowing of the threatened trouble between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher that she was solicitous you should have an interview with Mr. Bowen? A. Yes; her fear and anxiety; that was it.

Q. Now, you went on and you came to the transactions of the 7th of February, where three letters were written and communicated to the persons to whom they were addressed; after that, as I understand, there was no trouble of any kind or concern in reference to any publicity until the Woodhull card of May 22d, 1871; is that so? A. That was the first threat that was published. Mrs. Woodhull published a card, dated May 22d, 1871, threatening to expose these stories.

Q. We have got that in evidence and we do not need to repeat it. That was the first, wasn't it? A. The first one I knew anything of.

Q. I am taking your knowledge. Now, during how much of that time had Mr. Moulton—this interval between Feb. 7th and this 22d of May—how long a part of the time had Mr. Moulton been absent? A. Mr. Moulton went to Florida in that interval; I do not remember exactly the date of his going and returning; I should think he was gone about six weeks.

Q. And before his leaving that serious illness occurred, didn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he went, probably, on account of his health? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that he had been shut out pretty much all the while from the date of his—how long did that sickness continue before he went South? A. My impression is, he was sick about—I think the culmination of his sickness was about the middle of January, and that it was a very slow recovery.

Q. So that from the middle of January until his return from the South, he was pretty much shut up from any activity in any matter, wasn't he? A. He was not shut up when he was on his way to the South.

Q. Shut out from any activity in any matters here? His absence and his sickness covered pretty much from the middle of January until his return from the South? A. Yes, Sir; but that is quite another thing from his being "shut out." Mr. Moulton carried on his business in his sick-bed, like a general in his tent. He never was "shut out" from any activity.

Q. But he didn't go about much? A. No, Sir; not when he was confined to his room.

Mr. Evarts—During that period he did not, of course.

WHO GAVE MRS. WOODHULL THE STORY.

Q. Now, Sir, as I understand the matter, all that had passed between you and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher regarding any relations with your wife during this period were confidential, and for the purpose of being kept secret and assisting in keeping secret whatever those relations were? A. Yes, Sir; and that was the design of Mr. Moulton's labors in the matter.

Q. And the conferences and actions towards that design were not intended to be made public, were they? A. Not at all, Sir.

Q. Not in the least. Now, Sir, did you ever suspect Mr. Beecher of having communicated to Mrs. Woodhull the basis of her threat of May 22d? A. No, Sir, nor to any other person.

Q. You never suspected him? A. Not at all, Sir.

Q. That I suppose; it may be inferred from your views of this case. Did you ever suspect Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir.

Q. —of communicating to Mrs. Woodhull any of these matters? A. I answered that question before you asked it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, you know what the Scriptures say about a man that answers a question before it is asked?

The Witness—Mr. Moulton is above suspicion.

Mr. Evarts—You say you did not? A. I did not.

Q. I understand you, then, that when you first went to see Mrs. Woodhull on the appearance of that card, which was only a premonition, she then gave you substantially all the matters that she published in the Fall of 1872? A. Yes, Sir; all the horrid incidents, and more besides. She didn't connect them with various persons, as she did then.

Q. I gathered from your examination that there was nothing that she knew in the Fall of 1872, or professed to know, that she didn't know or profess to know in May, 1871? A. Well, for instance, she didn't tell me in May, 1871, that she had carried the proof of her Steinway Hall speech into Mr. Beecher's study, and had there given it to him. That was the subsequent fact. What she told me was in the various, vivid and extraordinary instances of criminal relationship which existed.

Q. And the pistol scene, and all that? A. Yes, Sir; not as it happened, but as it didn't happen.

Q. Well, as she stated it she told it to you then? A. She told me—

Q. Now, no matter; I don't care what she told you. I only want to know whether I am right in understanding your direct examination. A. What is your understanding of it?

Q. This: that all the matters that related in her article of 1872 to Mr. Beecher's relations to your wife, and to any operations or movements of yourself or Mr. Moulton with Mr. Beecher in the same connection—all that was contained in her article of 1872 tha had any bearing and relation she mentioned to you in May, 1871? A. I won't undertake to say that she mentioned in May, 1871, every identical particular which she afterwards put into her story of November, 1872. I do undertake to say that all the extravagant incidents of that story of 1872, namely—well, I won't rehearse them.

Mr. Evarts—Well, no matter.

The Witness—They were spread out in a very violent and energetic speech by her to me in May, 1871.

Mr. Evarts—That is what I understood.

The Witness—But when she told me her story in May, it was unconnected with the various persons, ladies and gentlemen.

Mr. Evarts—Other people? A. Yes, Sir, whom she first named as her authorities.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we don't care about that. I am not talking about that. At that time, in May, 1871, she didn't give you any authority? A. No, Sir, I asked her and she declined to give me any.

Mr. Evarts—Now, you say you read that note with a shudder? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And had you any doubt when you read it that that reference to a distinguished teacher and the wife of another distinguished teacher would be understood by the public in Brooklyn as relating to Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir, I had not any expectation; I had not any thought that the public would understand it; but when she put it into my hand, and I read it, I swiftly interpreted it to myself, and as it contained a threat of exposure and publication I shuddered from head to foot in contemplation of it.

Q. It didn't strike you, then, that that publication would risk the public having an idea that your family and Mr. Beecher's were referred to by it? A. No, Sir, not the card itself; but the card itself contained a threat to expose those facts dimly hinted at in it, and it was that threatened publication which would have carried dismay through our household.

Q. Exactly; I only wanted to know what the state of your mind was. You considered, then, that the publication of Mrs. Woodhull, so far as it stated that she knew of a case, &c., unconnected with any threat of giving more particulars? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You thought that would be a harmless publication in these communities, did you? A. No, Sir; I didn't think it would be a harmless communication, but I didn't suppose, if the card had stood just at that point, that the great public would have imagined Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton to be meant.

Q. You didn't think anybody in Brooklyn, where there are so many teachers, would have thought which ones of them they were? A. There would have been a small, narrow circle which would have known, but the great public would not have known.

Q. Does not a small, narrow circle in scandal tend to become a large, wide circle? A. I think it does; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, have you any doubt that that publication stopping, as I have suggested, and as you have accepted, with that announcement of the fact, that she knew that that of itself carried danger of scandal concerning your family and Mr. Beecher, whether there would be any truth or falsehood in it? A. Why, Sir, inasmuch as a certain number of people must have known to what it referred, there would have been to that extent danger; still, I don't think that that card of itself would have multiplied the number of people who did know; it was the threat of the publication which the card contained that was the menace of evil.

Q. And the actual publication of that, without the particulars, you did not consider as conveying any spark of scandal in these communities? A. Oh, I would not say it was not a spark; I think any such publication would be a spark.

MR. MORSE DECLARED THE TATTLER.

Q. Well, I suppose so. Very well. Now, as you did not suspect Mr. Beecher or Mr. Moulton of having informed Mrs. Woodhull, how did you imagine she had got her information? A. Through the open gate of the lips of Mrs. Nathan B. Morse.

Q. That was your theory? A. Yes, Sir; not that it went from Mrs. Morse directly to Mrs. Woodhull, but that it went through many mouths. Mrs. Morse was in the habit of saying that I made such and such charges.

Q. No matter; I didn't ask you that. A. And they got to Mrs. Woodhull's ears.

Q. I didn't ask you a word about that. You suspected, then, that what Mrs. Morse had publicly said— A. Privately said.

Q. Well, privately said with the publicity that had reached Mrs. Woodhull, because you don't mean that she whispered it in Mrs. Woodhull's ears? A. No, Sir; she didn't whisper it in any one's ears; she spoke it loud.

Q. Well, that is what I call public. You thought that was the source of Mrs. Woodhull's information? A. Yes, Sir; the original source, that the stories went from her. They certainly did not go from me, nor from Mr. Moulton, nor from Mr. Beecher.

Q. And I understand you to say that neither of you had communicated any of the occurrences during this confidential intercourse in the early month of 1871 and the close of 1872? A. What is that you understand?

Q. That neither you, nor Mr. Moulton, nor Mr. Beecher, had communicated those stages and conferences that took place between you three to anybody? A. I cannot speak for Mr. Beecher or for Mr. Moulton; I spoke to a few of my friends about some of the maneuvers that had been made.

Q. During this period? A. Yes, Sir; for instance, I said to a number of friends that Mr. Beecher had gone and got a retraction.

Mr. Evarts—I won't take any instance; this is a cross-examination.

The Witness—Don't make it more cross than is necessary. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—No, it is mild in manner, no doubt.

The Witness—I don't think it is.

Mr. Evarts—But it is an examination that authorizes no spontaneous statements.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] The practice is to answer questions simply.

Mr. Evarts—Answer the question; that is my right, and you have a right to stop then. I have a right to limit my question, and you have a right to stop. Now, you had then, during that interval before May, 1871, told more or less of confidential friends, had you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of the steps and stages of the confidential communications? A. Yes, Sir, I had.

MR. TILTON'S ACTUAL DISPOSITION TOWARDS MR. BEECHER.

Q. Very well? A. I cannot answer whether Mr. Beecher had, or whether Mr. Moulton had, but I had.

Q. That you can answer for? A. Yes, Sir; and I undertook to tell you that when you said you understood to the contrary.

Q. Well, I think I did understand to the contrary. I now understand it both ways.

The Witness—But understand that, in communicating that, I never spoke to Mrs. Tilton's disparagement. I had never been very particularly anxious to save Mr. Beecher.

Q. You were not? A. No, Sir.

Q. You were not anxious to save Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Q. Although it led to disclosures about your wife? A. No, Sir; the only protection I put over Mr. Beecher was just so far as it was necessary to protect Mrs. Tilton; and if it had not been necessary to protect Mrs. Tilton I should have allowed Mr. Beecher to go to his destruction four years ago.

Mr. Evarts—That I understand to be your disposition.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; I don't wish to disguise it.

Mr. Evarts—It would be difficult if you did; that we agree about. But, still, all the motive for going to Mr. Beecher was solicitude to protect Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And yet, after that, you did not scruple to tell as much as you chose of the confidential matters between you and Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton? A. I never had a confidence with Henry Ward Beecher in my life.

Q. Will you answer my question now? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Read the question.

The Witness—I have answered it in that statement.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question to the witness.]

Mr. Beach—The answer is proper.

Judge Neilson—It is proper so far. He can add whether he scrupled.

Mr. Evarts—Is that all the answer you can make? A. Well, Sir, I think that is a very comprehensive answer.

Mr. Evarts—Well, there may be a difference of opinion about that.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not worth while to explain that.

Mr. Evarts—No, we won't debate that. [To the witness.] I understand you to say, that notwithstanding the whole motive of this interview of the 30th, and of what followed, it was to protect your wife, and not with love to Mr. Beecher; yet you didn't scruple immediately after, or while they were going on, to disclose as much as you pleased of what was going on? A. Yes, Sir; I should—

Mr. Evarts—Very well, that is enough.

Mr. Beach—No, that is not enough.

The Witness—I mean to say, Mr. Evarts, that I was under no obligation to keep any secret. I had kept the transaction secret on my wife's account, but not from any obligation that I was under to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. I have not asked you anything about that. I asked you whether you kept it secret? A. I did from any persons except from the few who knew the essential facts in the case.

Q. You did except from those to whom you told it? A. Yes, Sir; except from those to whom I had originally told the crime.

Q. But you didn't scruple to tell to whom you pleased, what you pleased, concerning these transactions while they were going on?

Judge Neilson [to the witness]—Now, say you did or did not?

The Witness—Must I answer, your Honor, as to the scruple which I had?

Judge Neilson—Whether you did or did not, and then explain, if you wish.

The Witness—I have told you, Mr. Evarts, to whom I spoke.

Mr. Evarts—You selected who you would speak to, and you told them what you saw fit? A. I selected whom I would speak to.

Q. And you told what you saw fit? A. Yes, Sir; and not what I did not see fit.

Q. Now, so far as you know, was it not from your utterances that there ever came the first leakage of the transactions thus purposed and carried out during that early season, that finally reached Mrs. Woodhull? A. No, Sir; it was from Mrs. Morse.

Q. Yes, but how did she find out what had passed, confidentially or privately between Mr. Moulton, Mr. Beecher and yourself? A. Because I told her and she told all the world.

Q. She is one of the persons— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That you told? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you knew her infirmity before you told her? A. Yes Sir; I did. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—I shall be obliged to adjourn the Court. I will not sit here and attempt to administer justice with this disposition on the part of the audience. It is perfectly amazing. All the gentlemen in my view are respectable and intelligent, citizens, and yet without respect to the occasion or the Court, they continually interrupt the proceedings. I regret it very much; it disturbs the counsel; it is disrespectful to the Court; it does no good.

Mr. Evarts—Well, was any part of your shudder, when you read this card to Mrs. Woodhull, occasioned by your fear that your imprudence might have contributed to her knowledge? A. I don't understand how to divide a shudder into parts.

Mr. Evarts—As I recollect it was a spasm of agonized feeling on my part. What its component parts were I don't know.

Q. And a complete surprise, was it not? A. It certainly was a complete surprise.

Q. You didn't then have in your mind that you told Mrs. Morse and knew her infirmities of speech before you told her? A. I instantly imagined whence the stories came.

MR. TILTON'S COUNSEL IN THE BOWEN TROUBLE.

Q. Well, that is what I call making it a part of the shudder. Now, up to this stage of the matter no particular progress—this is through that Winter; I have now come to a date in May—up to that time no particular progress had been made in collecting your money from Mr. Bowen? A. I don't know that Mr. Moulton made any effort to do so. He was sick. Perhaps he did some.

Q. As a matter of fact, there was no particular progress made in that matter? A. The money was not collected. I don't know what progress was made in the matter.

Q. You didn't know of any progress? A. All I knew was that the money was not collected.

Q. Now, when was it that you took advice concerning that pecuniary interest between you and Mr. Bowen?

Mr. Beach—When first?

Mr. Evarts—He has spoken of it in his direct examination.

Mr. Beach [to the witness]—He means legal advice.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir. You have spoken in your direct examination of having taken advice. A. I consulted Frederick A. Ward; I don't remember the date; I think a year elapsed, though.

Q. Was Mr. Ward alone in business, or was his a partnership? A. No, Sir; Mr. Ward was the law partner of Judge Reynolds.

Q. Of the present Judge Reynolds, who was then at the bar? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you took advice with them in regard to the collection of that claim? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Well, what did you do? That is what I asked you, when you took advice concerning the collection of your claim against Mr. Bowen? A. I didn't understand your question in that way. I understood your question to be when I took legal advice in reference to this business.

Q. My friend, Mr. Beach, asked me if I meant legal advice, but I didn't intend to give up the rest of my question. My question was when you first took legal advice concerning the collection of your claim against Mr. Bowen? A. I never took any advice as to that point.

Q. Never at all? A. No, Sir. The legal advice was as to the validity of the contracts.

Mr. Evarts—I did not ask you that.

The Witness—Whether the contract was good—

Mr. Evarts—Still—

The Witness—Perhaps in a secondary sense it might be regarded as advice concerning the collection of the claim.

Q. I should regard it so; still, I cannot tell how that is. You did, then, take legal advice as to the validity of your pecuniary claim against Mr. Bowen upon the contracts of these gentlemen that you have named. A. I took advice as to this point, namely, whether those contracts which I had drawn, I not being a lawyer, were good for the $7,000. Judge Reynolds said they would stand till doomsday, that they were as good as any one could have made.

Q. That was, the damages for an immediate dissolution? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, come to the $7,000. It would be $5,200, and where did the other $1,800 come from?

The Witness—I beg your pardon; I didn't hear; I was coughing.

Mr. Evarts—I will ask you. There is a penalty—I have understood it was half the salary—which would be beyond $5,000.

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir, and a certain percentage.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I am asking you (the Witness). There was some penalty for breaking the contracts without notice, was there not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was that named as half the annual salaries on the two papers, or was it named as $5,000 in a round sum? A. It was not named in a round sum.

Q. Very well; it was half the salaries. Well, that would be $5,200? A. I don't think it was half the salaries. Permit me to explain. I think the penalty for breaking the contract with The Independent was half the salary. The penalty for breaking the contract with The Union was half the salary, together with half the profits of that year.

Q. The percentage? A. That is my recollection of it; I won't be positive of it.

Q. That is half of your percentage of the profits? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was in that way that $7,000 came to be the sum; it included this percentage? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is so, is it not? The sum of $7,000 that is spoken of was made up of half the salaries and of half the supposed percentage? A. Together with some unpaid salary.

Q. That is what I want to get at, whether the whole $7,000 was in the nature of penalty, or whether it included a debt for past due arrears or something of that kind? A. I think there were certain sums for money due on my salary that had not been paid; I don't remember all the items.

Q. And they were counted into the $7,000? A. Yes, Sir; together with the interest.

Q. Now, did you take advice at the same time, or at any time before the collection of the matter, respecting the validity of Mr. Bowen's defenses against its payment? A. No, Sir; he had not any.

Q. Well, he didn't pay? A. No, Sir, he didn't pay immediately; he did afterwards.

Q. He hadn't any good defense perhaps, but he didn't pay? A. Well, he had not any at all.

Q. Why didn't he pay you then? A. I will tell you why he didn't pay me.

Q. Well? A. Mr. Bowen wanted to arbitrate. In the beginning of January, 1871, he wanted to make the payment of the money he thought I needed, and he wanted, through the payment of that money, to get me to sign a paper to the effect that he and I would keep the peace. He was afraid, in other words, of the storm which he had raised between himself and Mr. Beecher, and he wanted an arbitration in order that not only business affairs but other difficulties should be settled. I understand exactly the reason why he wanted an arbitration. Mr. Moulton forbade it.

Q. Did he give you that reason, or was this only your understanding? A. No, Sir, he didn't give it; I extracted it from his mind.

Q. That is your understanding of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But he didn't give it. Now, did Mr. Bowen ever admit to you, after you began to collect or wished to collect those liquidated damages or what not—did he ever admit to you that he owed any part of it? A. I have already told you I never laid eyes on Mr. Bowen, at least for a personal interview, between December 26th, 1870, and the night when he paid me the $7,000 in 1872.

Q. Then he never did admit to you that he owed you a dollar? A. I never exchanged a word with him on any subject.

Q. Well, it is an argumentative mode of putting it. A. He never admitted or denied; I never conversed with him.

Mr. Morris—You mean the 27th or the 28th. A. Yes, Sir; the 27th or the 28th.

MR. TILTON'S EARLY QUARRELS WITH MR. BOWEN.

Q. Now, Mr. Bowen did make you a payment of a certain amount at that time, or very early in January; didn't he? A. He didn't make it to me; he made it to Mr. Moulton.

Q. Well, under that authority that Mr. Moulton had? A. Oh! no; that was quite another affair; these were notes that I held.

Q. Well, he did pay you some money, anyhow? A. Yes, not having any reference to my business with The Independent, or with The Union. I held Mr. Bowen's notes for $4,000, or thereabouts, a matter entirely distinct from my business.

Q. They were not then arrears of salary, or anything of that kind; the notes were not for arrears of salary or anything of that kind? A. Oh, no, Sir; no, Sir; nothing of that sort.

Q. Money loaned by you, were they? A. My impression is that I had sold to Mr. Bowen some shares in The Brooklyn Union stock, which I held at an early period, and also my impression is that he took some notes from Mr. Gibson.

Q. Well, we won't go into details. A. At all events I held Mr. Bowen's notes for between $4,000 and $5,000.

Q. And they were not for arrears of salary or past dues? A. No, Sir; they had nothing to do with The Independent or The Brooklyn Union.

Q. That is enough. Now, do you remember a short time before these matters between you and Mr. Bowen arose, the situation in which, from some difference between you as to the support by your paper of a political candidate here, there was a trouble between you and Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, that is The Brooklyn Union.

Q. I mean that. That was a secular paper. Now, didn't Mr. Bowen then intimate to you that he might terminate your connection with that paper for that difference of opinion? A. I will tell you what Mr. Bowen said. He came into the office one day during the local campaign, I think August or September, and there was a certain candidate for office—I need not mention him.

Q. For Congress, I suppose. A. Well—

Q. Well, it is of no consequence? A. I better not name him.

Q. It was very public at the time? A. A bolt in the Republican party had been made on his account. A certain section of the party wanted to repudiate him. I didn't know very much about the matter, but I took the paper in the line of the bolters, because they seemed to be the most respectable part of the community. Mr. Bowen came down from Connecticut and wanted me to support him. I declined, and he pressed the matter. I said, "Mr. Bowen, I am the editor of this paper by a contract, and it is impossible." He said to me that there was one way by which he could become the master of his own paper, and I said "Yes, and there is only one. So long as I am the editor by contract, I shall not support that man." It was a little flurry between us, the first and only one that we had had in 15 years.

Q. Well, he told you that there was one way, and that was by changing the editor? A. Yes; I told him that that was the only way—he must break his contract and take the penalty.

Q. And you went on, and the candidate was defeated, wasn't he?

Mr. Beach—Oh! well! well! well! that is quite unimportant.

Mr. Fullerton—We will keep out of politics, I guess.

Mr. Evarts—You persisted in your course with the paper? A. I certainly did, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Bolts don't often succeed, except in Carpenter's case.

MR. TILTON'S INTRODUCTION TO MRS. WOODHULL.

Mr. Evarts—Now, when you went over to see Mrs. Woodhull on this sort of summons, in May, 1871, she was not—her person was not a stranger to you, was it? A. What visit do you allude to, Sir?

Q. When you went over after the sort of summons she sent you to come and see her in reference to her publication of May 22d, 1871? A. I had seen her once and been introduced to her.

Q. When was that, and under what circumstances? A. One day—I can't recall the date—shortly before that occurrence, a gentleman called at my office, and in the course of some conversation asked me if I had ever seen Mrs. Woodhull, the Broad-st. broker. I said no, I never had. He told me she was a very remarkable woman.

Q. I don't care about all this detail, you know, I only want the circumstances. A. I walked down town with him into her office and was introduced to her. I had an interview I suppose four or five minutes long. That was the first time I saw her. After that, very shortly after that, came this card, when she sent for me.

Q. About how soon was this; about what date was this previous interview? A. My impression is that it was a very short time previous to the publication of this card.

Q. Do you think during that month of May? A. I think so; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, there you saw her alone in her office? A. No, Sir; I saw her husband there and one or two other persons. I don't remember all the persons there. It was a sort of levee.

Q. Did this gentleman go with you? A. Oh! yes; he introduced me.

Q. Introduced you, and remained, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But it was an interview in her office, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Only yourself, and your friend, and— A. My impression is that others were there.

Q. And this lady and her husband? A. Yes, Sir. I think that others besides were there in the office; that is my impression. There was quite a number of people there, but I won't be certain about that.

Q. Now, Sir, when did you last see Mrs. Woodhull? A. The last time I saw her, Sir, was in the month of April, 1872, shortly before the Cincinnati Convention that nominated Mr. Greeley.

Q. And what interrupted or broke off your intercourse with her at that time? A. Did I not give that in my direct examination?

Mr. Beach—Never mind—never mind; he wants you to repeat it.

Mr. Evarts—I don't care about it being the same; I only want the fact.

The Witness—My attention had been called about that time to an article, the proof slip of which was shown to me, in which Mrs. Woodhull proposed to vilify and blacken the names of a dozen or fifteen well-known ladies connected with the Woman's Suffrage Movement. I went down to see her, and asked her whether or not that was her article, whether it had been prepared by her, whether she designed to publish it; and the substance of the reply that she made was that she did not design to publish it, that she had not written it, that she did not approve of it; but a few days afterwards I learned that though the slip had not been published, still proofs had been taken of it, and it had been sent hither and yon, I was told, to the various editors and other people, and I then went down and upbraided her for that, and had an interview with her such as I have related, and turned my back upon her, and never saw her since.

Q. Well, that is the article that you have spoken of—either you—you have spoken of it; I don't know whether you gave it the name of the Tit-for-Tat article? A. That is my impression as to the title; yes, Sir.

Q. That is the title? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And among these ladies thus exposed to public comment were acquaintances of yours, were there not? A. Every one of them was an intimate acquaintance.

Q. Every one of these fifteen ladies? A. Yes, Sir; I knew every one, I think, personally. I knew all the ladies connected with the women's suffrage movement more or less intimately.

Q. And that was your personal feeling or resentment about the matter, that these ladies were among your friends, and persons for whom you had respect? A. Yes, Sir; I told Mrs. Woodhull that I felt outraged, that a woman whom I had defended against the attacks of others, should now herself turn around and attack other women. I washed my hands of it from that moment.

EXTENT OF THE TILTON-WOODHULL INTIMACY.

Q. How frequently had you seen Mrs. Woodhull during the period that your intercourse did continue? A. My acquaintanceship with Mrs. Woodhull began—

Q. Well, we have got the date? A. Wait a moment!

Q. And the end. Now, how frequently during that? A. Well, during the eleven months, from the beginning to the end, I had a long lecture season in the Winter, and I think a Summer vacation. That left perhaps five or six months, during which I saw her; perhaps six or seven months. Does that answer your question?

Q. No, not in the least. A. Well, what is it you want to know?

Judge Nellson—How often.

Mr. Evarts—How frequently did you see her?

The Witness—Oh, I beg your pardon. I saw her very frequently—sometimes at her house and sometimes at her office, generally at her office.

Q. Did you see her elsewhere than at either her house or her office, and elsewhere than on the occasions that have been spoken of at your house or at Mr. Moulton's? A. I saw her at Mr. Moulton's house, and saw her at my house.

Q. Well, that we will leave out; we have had that? A. I don't remember ever seeing her anywhere else.

Q. Have you seen her at your house at other times than any that you have mentioned? A. No, Sir; I think she was three times at my house.

Q. Well, those are mentioned; do you remember an occasion during that Summer of your acquaintance with her in which you went down with her to Coney Island? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And bathed? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't remember the bathing? A. No.

Q. Well, was she at your house before you went down with her to Coney Island that day? A. I think that she and her husband came and stayed all night at my house one Saturday night, and part of Sunday; during which Mr. Beecher made them a visit in the afternoon, Mrs. Tilton later in the afternoon. Whether they stayed at my house two nights or one I have forgotten; possibly two nights.

Q. Well, had that any connection with this visit to Coney Island? A. I think, Sir, that when we went to Coney Island it was a Saturday afternoon, and that on coming back it was the same Saturday evening that they stayed all night; I won't be positive about that.

Q. See if you can refresh your recollection; do you remember taking a carriage? A. The carriage took me.

Q. [After a pause.] At your house and her in it with nobody else, and going to Coney Island and there bathing together? A. No, Sir; I was never in the water with her, except in the hot water in which I have been put these last years. [Laughter.]

Q. And returning and going to Mr. Moulton's house with her, and then going in this carriage to her house in New-York late that night? A. No, Sir; I don't remember that, but quite likely it may have occurred, all except the bathing.

Q. The rest you think is very likely? A. There is nothing improbable in it.

Q. Do you remember on returning from Coney Island with her, stopping at your house, leaving her in the carriage, going in, getting some manuscripts, talking with her about them and showing them on your way to Moulton's, and that they related to this business with Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. You don't rememoer anything of that kind? A. No, Sir; no such incident ever occurred.

Q. Nothing of that kind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, when you went thus late at night after the Coney Island excursion to her house, did the carriage leave you there and was it dismissed? A. I don't remember, Sir; I don't remember the circumstances.

Q. No; but you say it may have happened, all but the bathing? A. Yes, Sir; it may have happened.

Mr. Morris—He didn't say it did happen.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it was natural.

The Witness—I showed her a great many courtesies; I don't remember precisely whether that was one.

Q. Whether that was one of them you don't remember? A. No, Sir. But I never showed her any manuscripts having reference to Mr. Beecher or this business; that I know, Sir.

Q. That you are quite certain of? A. That I know.

Q. No narrative? A. No, Sir.

Q. No cards, no proposed publications? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nothing? A. No, Sir; there were no proposed publications to be made until long after—

Q. Well, don't argue about it, the facts are all I am looking for. A. I am giving you the facts, not the argument.

Q. Very well; you say there were none; all I want is your memory. A. I say there were none that were proposed to be made until long after my acquaintance with her ceased.

Q. Now, Sir, do you know how Mrs. Woodhull got her reference in her article to the Catherine Gaunt letter, as it is called, that your wife wrote you? A. I don't know what reference you alluded to.

Q. If there is such a reference, do you know where she got it? A. No, Sir; except that I talked very freely among my personal friends about Mrs. Tilton and her letters.

Q. At all times did you? A. Not at all times; no, Sir; at fit times, certain times.

Q. Yes. You did not then respect your wife's solicitude that no eye but yours should see her letters? A. I obeyed no such injunction as that, Sir; I talked with the few people who knew the facts.

Q. Among those few people did you talk to Victoria Woodhull about the Catherine Gaunt letter? A. No, no, Sir; never; nor any other letter of Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. Then, so far as you know, if there is a reference in the Woodhull publication to the Catherine Gaunt letter of your wife, you don't know how she became possessed of the fact that there was such a letter? A. Why, except that she became possessed of it as she got possessed of the other particulars through circumstances floating to her ear through other persons; didn't get them from me.

Q. And thus floating they must have originally started from your references to the Catherine Gaunt letter? A. Anything that anybody knew of the Catherine Gaunt letter must have come originally from me, because that letter was written to me; yes, Sir.

Q. That is exactly what I want to know. A. But I didn't state it to Mrs. Woodhull.

MR. TILTON AS A DEFENDER OF THE COMMUNE.

Q. No, so you say. Now, Sir, do you remember an incident in which you and Mrs. Woodhull and her sister appeared in a public procession on Sunday in honor of the Commune in the streets of New-York? A. I remember a procession, Sir, in honor of the Commune, in which I appeared, and in which I afterwards understood that they appeared, but we did not appear together, and thousands of persons appeared in that same procession. I walked arm in arm with my friend John Swinton on that occasion.

Q. All the way? A. Oh! I don't know. [Turning to Mr. Swinton.] Was it all the way?

Q. Now, did you carry a banner in that procession? A. I did not.

Q. No part of the way? A. No part of the way.

Q. Neither in a carriage nor on foot? A. Neither in a carriage nor on foot. That was a procession in honor of the revered memory of Rossel, whom the French Government put to death, and whose name ought to live, being the synonym of liberty.

Q. Exactly; he was one of the Communists, wasn't he? A. Yes, Sir, and a sublime man.

Q. And he was put to death? A. By judicial murder.

Q. By judgment for having executed the Chief Justice of France and the Archbishop of Paris? A. No, round the world, no; it is an insult to his memory to suggest it.

Q. They were executed, were they not, by the Commune? A. Yes, Sir—no, not by the Commune.

Mr. Evarts—The Chief Justice of France and the Archbishop of Paris were—

The Witness—[Interrupting.] I say here under oath that the memory of young Rossel is sweet and clean, and I honor him before all mankind.

Mr. Evarts—Now, that is an episode.

Mr. Beach—Well, I think you are getting up an episode if you are going into the history of the Commune.

Mr. Evarts—I understand it, but I didn't introduce the episode.

Mr. Beach—Well, this is your cross-examination, you introduced the Commune.

Mr. Evarts—I did the public procession with these ladies; that I introduced.

Mr. Beach—We don't want an examination into the history of that trial upon this.

Mr. Evarts—Well, he had gone into a eulogy of Rossel.

Mr. Fullerton—As he properly might. He had nothing to do with that procession, at all.

Mr. Evarts—Only I want to see the grounds of the eulogy.

Mr. Fullerton—You have seen them.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, if you was satisfied with them—

Mr. Evarts—I am entirely satisfied with them. [To the witness.] Now, you say that until after that procession on that Sunday, you didn't know that Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin, an unmarried lady I believe, were in it? A. Never knew anything about it, Sir, until it was all over.

Q. And did you see it in the papers for the first? A. I don't remember how the information came to me; however, my impression is that I called at the house that evening and there ascertained it; that is my recollection, but I won't be certain about it.

Q. Went to Mrs. Woodhull's? A. Yes, Sir; I think I did; but I won't be sure of that.

Q. That was on the 21st of December, wasn't it? A. I don't know.

Q. Or 17th of December? A. Don't know.

Q. Well, you remember it was cold weather? A. Don't remember anything about that; I remember it was a Sunday. The police of New-York were going to deny us the right of making an exhibition.

Q. And you made it? A. Yes, Sir; we did, believing this to be a free country.

Q. Well, you don't seem to have been interrupted by anybody. Then you think no such scene as your carrying a banner and their holding the tassels could have occurred during that procession by any possibility. A. Why, Sir, it could have occurred very easily, but it didn't.

Q. Well, I mean could not have occurred as matter of fact? A. Yes, that is the only way it could have occurred.

Q. On that occasion without your knowing it now? A. Do you mean to ask me whether I could have carried a banner on that occasion without my knowing it?

Q. Without knowing it now? A. Well, Sir, I didn't carry a banner on that occasion; I walked arm in arm with my personal friend.

Q. And nobody else during the whole procession? A. Yes, Sir; but allow me to observe, Mr. Evarts, that if I had carried a banner it would only have been to my honor, and not discredit; I had no objection to carrying a banner to the memory of such a man. He went to the scaffold, Sir, with a Bible in his hand, kissing it, and his soul went up to God. No man need be ashamed of carrying a banner for him.

Q. Very well; you are entitled to that view. Now, how frequently did you, during this period of your acquaintance with Mrs. Woodhull, go with her to Coney Island? A. I recollect going with her once; perhaps I went twice.

Q. Didn't you go more? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. Are you certain you didn't go more? A. No; I ain't certain about anything.

Q. And did you go boating, if you didn't go bathing? A. I went once rowing on the Harlem River with Mrs. Woodhull and her husband.

Q. Was that on Sunday? A. I don't remember; quite likely.

Q. Were these visits at Coney Island on Sunday, any of them? A. My impression is that they were on Saturday; I won't be certain, though.

Q. It might have been Sunday? A. I have been there Sunday; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, with her. I have nothing to do with your other amusement. A. It may just as well have been on Sunday as any other day.

Q. On any other day, so far as you were concerned? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or she? A. I think quite likely.

Judge Neilson—I wish to say that a communication has been handed up from a very respectable person stating that yesterday the persons standing behind the jury—not the same persons there now—were heard to make remarks in respect to this case in the hearing of the jury, and that is the subject of the complaint. I want it understood that that is a grave offense, and one which the Court would punish severely and summarily, without respect to the person who might be guilty of it, and I hope no such thing will occur again, and if it does, I charge the officers to notify me of it on the instant. The gentlemen present have seen my solicitude to enable the jury to go out without being subject to the casual observations that people might think proper to make, and I think it is hard that citizens should so far forget the respect due to the jury as to indulge in observations in their presence.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I have observed (without thinking any evil of it, though of course), that sometimes the spectators or audience would lean over that rail, immediately behind the jury, and, of course, would bring themselves quite in proximity, and although of course, there is a desire that there should be as much space for visitors as possible, yet it really seems to me as if that space behind the jury might be kept clear.

Judge Neilson—Well, Sir, it shall be so hereafter.

The usual recess was here taken.

THE CATHERINE GAUNT LETTER AS WRITTEN AND AS PUBLISHED.

The Court met at 2 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment. Theodore Tilton was recalled, and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Carpenter (foreman of the jury)—May it please the Court, I am requested by the jury to say that there never has been an improper word expressed in their hearing by any person in the rear.

Judge Neilson—I am very happy to hear it.

Mr. Carpenter—And they consider that communication sent to the Court as an unjust reflection upon them.

Judge Neilson—It may have arisen from some misapprehension. I am very happy to hear it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Please look at that letter, and say if that is the Catherine Gaunt letter, so-called?

Mr. Fullerton—What page is that, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—I don't know; there is no paging by which we can find it.

The Witness—This seems to be a reproduction, Sir; I don't know whether it is correctly printed or not.

Q. Well, of course—the question of printing. We have got the original letter here. Now, that is produced by you, is it not, in your sworn statement, as it is called? A. I think it is, Sir.

Q. Look at that letter, as there printed, and see if that purports to be a whole letter; whether any omissions are noted? A. I could not say whether any omissions are made here. The whole letter was lithographed in The Graphic, I believe—my impression is.

Q. Well, I only ask you whether there are noted any omissions in this? A. Well, Sir, I could not answer as to that, except—

Q. I did not ask you whether any omissions are made, but whether any are noted, whether there is any indication of omission. A. Here?

Mr. Beach—What? In the print?

Mr. Evarts—In that print; yes.

Mr. Beach—I don't think that is proper, Sir.

The Witness—I don't understand your question, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Beach—If the object of that examination is to show that any part of the letter was suppressed intentionally, unless it is shown that Mr. Tilton had something to do with the printing, it cannot be important; I object, therefore, to that question.

Mr. Evarts—You object because the printing does not affect him?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I remember that the Catherine Gaunt letter has never been printed correctly that I know of, except in the lithographic transcript in The Graphic newspaper. I think it was printed there; it had many errors.

Q. Is the lithograph in this book? A. I think very few of those transcripts are put in that book.

Mr. Beach—No, I don't think it is. Yes, that must be.

Mr. Evarts—No, it don't seem to be here. [To the witness.] You speak with some assurance, Mr. Tilton, but was this Catherine Gaunt letter ever lithographed at all. A. Well, Sir, it was given to The Graphic office to be lithographed. I cannot say for certain whether everything was lithographed that was sent over there. I know I sent it there myself.

Q. To be lithographed? A. Yes, Sir; I think a number of the letters that were sent there were not lithographed. Whether that was included, now, or not I don't know.

Q. Look at those leaves? [Handing witness some half sheets of legal cap.] A. This is Mr. Maverick's handwriting.

Q. You recognize them as Mr. Maverick's handwriting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And as the Catherine Gaunt letter? A. No; not as the Catherine Gaunt letter, but it appears to be a copy of it, or of a part of it. I don't know whether it is all here or not.

Q. Well, that is the letter—that is a reproduction of the letter that we are talking about? A. It is a reproduction either of the letter or a part of the letter, I don't know which. You can easily compare it with the original, if you have the original.

Q. Yes; I understand that. Now, those leaves—do they purport to be a whole letter? A. I don't think they do.

Q. Is there any mark on those of asterisks or omissions of any kind? A. I don't see any.

Q. Anything to indicate that that was not the whole letter? A. I don't see any; nor is there anything to indicate that this is a quotation at all. My recollection is, Mr. Evarts, that that letter—that there was some blunder in the printing of it, that some line or two was left out, and I recollect of sending it over to The Graphic. It was lithographed there, I think. My impression is that you will find it lithographed in one of the impressions from The Graphic office, but I won't be certain.

Q. Well, if there is a passage left out there that is not from a blunder in printing, is it [referring to the manuscript?] A. No, Sir; I don't know whether it is left out there or not.

Q. No; it does not appear.

Mr. Fullerton—Let it appear.

The Witness—I remember that after that sworn statement was published I made some little comparison between that and the original manuscripts, and found some little errors, some little omissions.

Q. Yes, Do you remember that there was one in the Catherine Gaunt letter? A. It strikes me that there was, of some sort, Sir. I don't exactly know.

Q. Unimportant?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment! We object to that.

The Witness—I don't know what you consider unimportant.

Mr. Evarts—Why is it objectionable—whether it is unimportant?

Mr. Fullerton—Let us see what it was, and then we will see whether it was important or not.

Mr. Beach—The omission will show for itself whether it is important or not.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, but a man's notice of an omission may show whether he thought it was important.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the question before the Court.

Mr. Evarts—That is my question.

Mr. Fullerton—Not now it is not.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] Did you see an omission that struck you as important, or was it only unimportant? A. I remember that when that sworn statement was printed, as it was printed without my authority, and without my revision, I feared that there were many typographical errors in it. It was printed with an omission in one part, asterisks being thrown in. I remember some time afterward looking to see how far the documents had been incorrectly or correctly printed. I remember there was an error in Mr. Beecher's letter of the 1st of January. It said their "breasts" would ache instead of their "hearts," and there was an error I remember of the word "never" instead of "not," somewhere else, and my impression is that there was some omission in the Catherine Gaunt letter, and one or two other letters, and I sent that over to The Graphic office, I think, to have it reproduced.

Q. Lithographed? A. Yes; my impression is that you will find it printed there.

Q. Now, I will repeat my question. When you saw an omission, if you did see it, in the print of the Catherine Gaunt letter, as compared with the original, did the omission strike you as important, or only as unimportant?

Mr. Beach—The witness does not state positively that he saw any omission in the Catherine Gaunt letter.

The Witness—I don't remember particularly, Sir.

Mr. Beach—It is assuming it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness:] What do you say to that?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. He won't say anything about it.

Mr. Evarts—What is the objection?

Mr. Beach—I object to it as assuming that there was an omission in the printing of the Catherine Gaunt letter.

Judge Neilson—The question rather is if he did observe an omission, did it strike him as important or not.

The Witness—I think there was a sentence or so left out.

Judge Neilson—The question is whether it struck you as important.

Mr. Evarts—Or unimportant.

The Witness—Important to what end?

Mr. Evarts—To any end—to the truthfulness of the publication of the letter. A. No, Sir; it did not.

Q. It did not? No, Sir.

Q. Well, we will see. A. My recollection is that there was something in it about a renewal of a marriage vow—something of that kind.

Q. You look at the print while I read you the original. [Reading]: “My dear Theodore.” This is dated “Schoharie, June 20, 1871. My dear Theodore.”

Mr. Morris—One moment, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, I beg your pardon.

[Mr. Morris searches for the letter in the printed book.]

The Witness—I ought to mention, Mr. Evarts, that I never compared that with the printing in this book, but with the printing in The Argus newspaper.

Mr. Evarts—Well. [Reading]:

MY DEAR THEODORE: To-day, through the ministry of Catherine Gaunt, a character of fiction, my eyes have been opened for the first time in my experience, so that I see clearly my sin! It was when I knew that I was loved, to suffer it to grow to a passion. A virtuous woman should check instantly an absorbing love. But it appeared to me in such false light. That the love I felt and received could harm no one, not even you, I have believed unflinching until four o'clock this afternoon, when the heavenly vision dawned upon me. I see now, as never before, the wrong I have done you, and hasten immediately to ask your pardon, with a penitence so sincere that henceforth (if reason remains) you may trust me implicitly. Oh! my dear Theo., though your opinions are not restful or congenial to my soul, yet my own integrity and purity are a sacred and holy thing to me. Bless God, with me, for Catherine Gaunt, and for all the sure leadings of an all-wise and loving Providence. Yes; now I feel quite prepared to renew my marriage vow with you, to keep it as the Saviour requireth, who looketh at the eye and the heart. Never before could I say this.

Mr. Porter—From what you now read is omitted.

Mr. Evarts—From what I now read is omitted.

DISCUSSION UPON THE GAUNT LETTER.

Mr. Beach—I object to it. I object, that remarks of that kind should be made in the presence of the Jury and the counsel.

Mr. Evarts—I am comparing the published letter with this letter.

Judge Neilson—The form of publication is utterly immaterial unless the witness had the control and supervision of the publication.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt; no doubt.

Judge Neilson—Therefore a variance would not be of any moment.

Mr. Evarts—I have shown him the text of this letter in the handwriting of his friend, Mr. Maverick, who copied the statement that he presented to the Committee.

Judge Neilson—That don't advance you a single step, because he may not have copied correctly.

Mr. Evarts—He may not, but there are no suspicions of that kind.

Judge Neilson—If he did not copy correctly, is the witness responsible for that?

Mr. Evarts—It is the original presented to the Committee.

Mr. Porter—And sworn to by Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—That has not yet appeared. That is the answer to that.

Mr. Porter—I said it was in his sworn statement.

Judge Neilson—It does not appear in what form it is in that statement, if it be there at all.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I have produced it to him and asked him if it purported to be there a whole letter.

Mr. Beach—He has presented to Mr. Tilton a professed reprint of his statement.

Mr. Evarts—I presented to him his copyist's copy—Mr. Maverick's copy.

Judge Neilson—Was he his copyist?

Mr. Evarts—Yes; he stated that fact.

Judge Neilson—It don't appear.

Mr. Tracy—This is the original. It is a copy which Mr. Maverick, and which he testified before, when we had another letter up, was the copying of Mr. Maverick, his clerk, and that that copying went before the Committee.

Judge Neilson—I did not recall the fact, Mr. Evarts, that the paper you showed the witness before, and which was in Mr. Maverick's handwriting, included the Gaunt letter.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, it does not appear.

Judge Neilson—It was another part of it.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor is quite right about it. I did not then show him the Gaunt letter in that connection, but I now show him the Gaunt letter in this same handwriting of Mr. Maverick, which he recognizes.

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, let me say—

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment, now.

Mr. Beach—It may be necessary.

Mr. Evarts—Well, Mr. Tilton, what have you to say?

The Witness—I would like to say this: that if there is any error in the copying it should not be accredited to Mr. Maverick, because he is a very methodical and accurate man. If there is any blunder it is probably mine.

Judge Neilson—Are you conscious of any change or alteration? A. No, Sir; not at all.

Q. Did you direct any? A. I did not, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! well, if your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—Well, you have the witness.

Mr. Evarts—The witness is mine.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no; not yours beyond the control of the Court.

The Witness—I simply do not wish another man chargeable with any error of mine; that is all.

Mr. Evarts—No, no; we will take care of that. Now, I propose to read the omission.

Judge Neilson—I think you may proceed.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, let us understand ourselves exactly. What is this paper that they show to the witness which they call the Catherine Gaunt letter? It is stated to be a part of the statement of Mr. Tilton which was sworn to and which went before the Committee; but that is a bare statement of counsel; it is not proved in the case yet, so as to be a part of the case and of which action can be predicated. Now, until that is put in evidence so that that fact will appear, why, as a matter of course we cannot take it for granted, simply because it is asserted to be so, that the Catherine Gaunt letter is a part of that statement, and that that is here now in Court. Mr. Maverick did make a copy of Mr. Tilton's statement; but is this a part of the copy of which Mr. Tilton speaks? Mr. Maverick may have made more than one. He may for some purpose of his own have made another copy. We know nothing upon that subject at all. Now, surely your Honor would not permit them to point out discrepancies between this paper which they have in hand and the witness's statement, without laying the foundation for such proof, because it is undoubtedly the object of the other side to hold Mr. Tilton responsible for some kind of change in that document.

Mr. Evarts—We certainly do.

Judge Neilson—It has also been stated that it was a sworn statement. Have we any such statement before us?

Mr. Fullerton—Not at all, and that is what I am speaking about now. There is no such statement before the Court at all.

Judge Neilson—Then it is improper to speak of it as a sworn statement.

Mr. Fullerton—It is now proper to speak of it as a sworn statement, and it is improper to speak of it as his statement that Mr. Maverick copied, until we are informed of that fact in the proper way.

Mr. Beach—They do not show the statement here that Mr. Maverick copied.

Mr. Fullerton—No. They produce some loose leaves, a part of what they call a statement, and ask in whose handwriting it is. That is as far as they have gone. The statement is either to be in evidence, or out of evidence, one or the other.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, the point of imputation is this, and it is a very serious one. The point of imputation is that Mr. Tilton has presented before the Committee of the church—

The Witness—That identical letter you hold in your hand, the original manuscript. I carried it there.

Judge Neilson—One moment; don't interrupt the counsel.

Mr. Evarts—And has published, in the same manner, a letter of his wife, presented as a vital point affecting her, that is not a letter of his wife, but the omission of the part omitted changes its sense and effect. Now, that is the imputation.

Judge Neilson—Now, the question is, whether, in order to support that suggestion, it is not necessary for you to produce the statement, which, it is said, has been sworn to, so it may be compared with the letter.

Mr. Evarts—Now, all that I propose to produce—and that I will do in fairness to the witness, that he may give any explanation that he can in advance of the reading of the true letter, and of a scrutiny of the difference, of how there happened to be that omission. I hand him a printed book containing that letter, and ask his attention to that letter, and nothing else, as thus printed, and he says he cannot be responsible for the print. I then hand him the letter, and nothing else, as in the handwriting of his amanuensis, and as laid before the Committee. That is the letter. I do not want anything to do with his statement.

Mr. Fullerton—It does not appear that that letter was before the Committee.

Mr. Evarts—And I then ask him whether that letter purports to be a whole letter, as thus written, and contains any indication of omission, to get rid of any difficulty about printing; and I understand the witness that it does not. Then he has given us statements that he observed, or may have observed, some time or other, that there was a difference between the Catherine Gaunt letter as printed, as used, and the Catherine Gaunt letter as written by his wife, and that he sent it over to The Graphic, he thinks, to be lithographed, or, as he first stated, it was lithographed in The Graphic, as I supposed he remembered; but now he does not remember that it was lithographed, but that he sent it, and supposes, no doubt, that it was. Well, whether it was lithographed will appear from The Graphic itself whenever we look back. Now, I am reading, as is my right, the true letter by his wife, and I have a right, as it seems to me, to show every publication of that hitherto under the supervision of that witness in any degree, has omitted this passage, and sacrificed, in so far, the truthfulness of this letter; and then the magnitude of the sacrifice will appear by comparing the letter as printed, and used, with the letter as written by the wife.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to read the letter, but the production of the statement itself is as necessary to support your suggestion of discrepancy as the production of the letter itself would be.

Mr. Evarts—How does your Honor mean as to the production of the statement otherwise than of the manuscript letter as contained in the statement?

Judge Neilson—Here is a detached leaf written by the same party, it is said. It does not appear that it was a part of the statement. It may have been incorrectly written. I don't see how you can institute a comparison between the letter and the statement without both being here. The presence of one is as necessary as the presence of the other.

Mr. Evarts—I understand your Honor perhaps to lay down some proposition that may be necessarily observed, but whether it has not been abused is the question. It is not certainly necessary that I wish to compare a letter contained in a publication for which this witness is responsible, with a letter as written, to show the difference, that I should use the statement in the rest of it, because I have nothing to do with that.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to show that he published it untruly; no doubt about that.

Mr. Evarts—Now, your Honor thinks that on the present proof concerning the statement already in, that does not appear.

Judge Neilson—So it strikes me, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that we already have in.

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, may I borrow the manuscript a moment?

Mr. Evarts—Certainly. [Handing witness Mr. Maverick's copy.]

The Witness—I mean the letter.

Mr. Evarts—The letter itself.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Yes. [Handing the witness the letter.]

The Witness—My impression is that those little marks on top show that it has been lithographed in The Graphic office, I feel morally certain of it; at the same time, I will not swear to it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't know, of course. The Graphic will speak for itself whether it is lithographed.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, look at that letter and say whether you believe that manuscript which I place in your hands to be the manuscript of the letter as it was presented before the Committee?

Mr. Fullerton—That we object to.

The Witness—I presented—

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment; we object to it; he asks for the mere matter of belief of this witness as to a matter that can be certainly proved more satisfactorily by the statement itself.

Judge Neilson—He should ask if he knows.

Mr. Evarts—Well, do you know or believe? I have a right to either.

Mr. Fullerton—You have a right to put it either way.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; and I have a right to an answer.

Mr. Fullerton—And I have a right to object before you get it.

Mr. Evarts—Do you know or believe that that manuscript of this letter, which you now hold in your hands, was in those very leaves as they are now in your hands, a part of the statement as you personally laid it before the Church Committee?

Mr. Fullerton—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—I think I will take the answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Whether he knows or believes?

Judge Neilson—Whether he knows.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is not the question, Sir; that is not the question, whether he knows it; the question is, whether he knows or believes it.

Mr. Evarts—I think we are entitled on cross-examination to the witness's belief about the fact.

Mr. Fullerton—If they want to compare the Catherine Gaunt letter with anything that was placed before the Committee, why, as a matter of course, they have a right to do so. But they must show, in the first place, what was placed before the Committee.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, and I am going to show.

Mr. Fullerton—This is a mere matter of belief on the part of the witness.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! well, well, well!—On a cross-examination—

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will recollect the rule of law, I think, that where a witness is cross-examined in regard to the contents of a paper, the paper itself must be introduced and submitted to his inspection. It is so decided in the Court of Appeals.

Judge Neilson—Oh, yes; I do not mean any decision by that.

Mr. Beach—Well, then, they present to him something in the handwriting of Mr. Maverick and do not ask him whether that was a part of the statement, but whether he believes it was a part of the statement, or a copy of a portion of the statement which was submitted to the Committee.

Mr. Evarts—No; not a copy—the identical leaves that were presented.

Mr. Beach—Very well; whether he knows or believes that that was a part of the identical statement submitted to the Committee.

Judge Neilson—The belief is objectionable, if it savors of speculation. The inquiry is as to the knowledge of the witness.

Mr. Beach—Well, I suppose it is sufficient to present that part of the paper to which the question refers, and if the witness can identify that as a portion of his statement, why I certainly have no objection to that.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; very well. Now, Mr. Tilton—

The Witness—What is the question?

Mr. Evarts—Read the question to him, please.

[Question read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Mr. Evarts—I asked you to read the last one; there were some variations in the general phrasology of it.

The stenographer stated that the question read was the last one.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I will make a new question, and take your Honor's ruling. Now, if you will write down, Mr. Stenographer, my question. [To the Witness]: Do you know or believe that the written leaves which you hold in your hands, are the copy of the Catherine Gaunt letter, that you personally laid before the Committee on the Church examination? Now, wait if they object to that question.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that. Look at the paper?

A. I have every reason to believe, Sir, that this is Mr. Maverick's copy, or a few leaves of Mr. Maverick's copy of the sworn statement which I laid before that Committee, which statement included a copy of the Catherine Gaunt letter, and which statement, in being laid before the Committee, was accompanied also with the original manuscript of the Catherine Gaunt letter which I carried to the Committee, which manuscript you now hold in your hand.

Judge Neilson—But the question also was whether you recognized these papers as parts of your statement, those leaves?

The Witness—Your Honor, those leaves—

Mr. Evarts—What was your Honor's remark?

Judge Neilson—I suggested to him that I thought your question also involved this, whether those leaves were part of his statement.

Mr. Evarts—No; I did not include that—whether those were the very leaves that he laid before the Committee. I do not care what they were in.

Judge Neilson—Do you say they are the very leaves?

Mr. Fullerton—No; he says he has reason to believe.

The Witness—I say I have every reason to believe, Sir, that those few leaves are part of Mr. Maverick's copy.

Judge Neilson—They do not ask you that; no matter about his writing.

Mr. Evarts—Of course that is unnecessary.

Judge Neilson—The question is, whether those leaves formed part of the statement—those very leaves.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, we will have, if it is proper—

Judge Neilson—Well, you interrogate him.

Mr. Evarts—It is not in that view I was speaking. I was going to say if your Honor will think it proper, we will have the answer as the stenographer has taken it down.

[Answer read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Mr. Evarts—Very well; all very well so far—now I will ask another question. Those very leaves that you hold in your hand, were they or not the very leaves, so far as they went, of the statement that was put before the Committee? A. Well, Sir, I have every reason to believe they are.

Q. Yes, that I understand. A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—What? That those were placed before the Committee?

Mr. Evarts—Those very leaves were before the Committee.

The Witness—I have every reason to believe that those pages 92, 93, 94, 95 and 96, were part of Mr. Maverick's copy of the sworn statement which I laid in person before the Committee.

Judge Neilson—No; the inquiry is whether it was a part of the sworn statement itself.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it precedes—if your Honor please: "A copy of which I in person laid before the Committee"—he has just said that.

Judge Neilson—But suppose he does say that is a copy of the paper which he laid before the Committee?

Mr. Evarts—He does not say that. I beg your Honor's pardon. He says: "this is Mr. Maverick's copy, which copy I, in person, handed to the Committee."

Judge Neilson—Is that so, Sir?

The Witness—Yes, Sir, I say I have every reason to believe it is so.

Judge Neilson—I understood you to say that you had every reason to believe that this was a copy of your statement, of so much of your statement.

Mr. Evarts—No, it was the copy made for the purpose and which he handed to the Committee.

Judge Neilson—And which was copied in the statement, those very leaves?

The Witness—If your Honor please, I wrote a statement; my handwriting was bad and I had it copied, and I laid the clean copy, which Mr. Maverick had the kindness to make, before the Committee. I laid the copy before the Committee; the original I kept myself. This is part of the copy which I laid before the Committee. That is it.

THE OMISSIONS FROM THE GAUNT LETTERS.

Mr. Evarts—Now, you have said that at the same time, you laid before the Committee as I understand you, this letter! A. Yes, Sir. I carried to the Committee at their request, a great package of Mrs. Tilton's letters; all the letters, and proposed to read them, but I was interrupted on the ground that it would take too much time—this letter being among them—but a special Committee was appointed, consisting of Mr. Winslow, to call on me and see these letters.

Q. Well, now, was not this about the way the matter went, that you carried a quantity of letters and other manuscripts for—what I mean— A. What is that?

Q. You carried a quantity of manuscripts there, including this letter? A. I carried Mrs. Tilton's letters; yes, Sir.

Q. And your own? A. I don't think I carried mine.

Q. You carried a quantity—you did not carry the whole, did you? A. I did carry every letter I had of hers.

Q. The whole? A. Yes, Sir; a package as large as that.

Q. And none of them were read? A. Yes, Sir; two or three of them were read; I began to read them.

Q. By you? A. Yes, Sir; by me; and somebody made a motion or a suggestion that it would take too much time, and then Mr. Winslow, if I remember right, was appointed by the Committee to wait upon me and make an examination of these letters at his leisure. That is my recollection of the circumstances.

Q. And this letter itself was not read before the Committee that night. A. No, Sir; it was not the night: it was the day. I began chronologically to read them and was interrupted.

Q. Didn't get to this? A. No, Sir; but it was there before the Committee. It was in the Committee room.

Q. It was in the Committee room and in your possession? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—As you now state. Now, we will point out the omissions if your Honor please. I will begin at this paragraph. [Reading]: "Yea, now I feel quite prepared to renew my marriage vow with you and to keep it as the Saviour requireth it, who looketh at the eye and the heart. Never before could I say this. I know not"—tell me when I resume what is printed—"Never before could I say this." Now I begin. "I know not"—is that in?

Mr. Porter—That sentence is not in the printed book.

Mr. Evarts—Now, tell me when I read anything that is in there. [Reading]: "I know not that you are yet able, or ever will be, to say this to me. Still, with what profound thankfulness that I am come to this sure foundation, and that my feet are planted on the rock of this great truth you cannot at all realize."

Mr. Porter—All that portion is omitted in the copy furnished to me.

Mr. Evarts—I will begin again. [Reading]: "When you yearn toward me with any true feeling"—

Mr. Porter—The word "any" is omitted.

Mr. Evarts [reading]—"with any true feeling, be assured of the tried, purified and restored love of Elizabeth. Schoharie, June 29th, 1871."

[Letter handed to stenographer to mark]

Mr. Beach—Well, you are going to put that Maverick copy in, ain't you? You want it?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; I will mark it for identification, if you choose.

Mr. Beach—Well, it will be marked as evidence, I suppose.

Judge Neilson—Certainly; it has been read.

Mr. Evarts—I mark it, Sir, as an identification of the paper that I showed to the witness, and only such.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, that paper, the Maverick copy, has been held by one of the counsel, and statements made to the jury that certain passages were omitted from it. Those statements are not evidence; to prove the omission, I insist that the Maverick copy should be in evidence.

Judge Neilson—It is not before us with any such view to correction unless it is evidence.

Mr. Beach—The statements of counsel are not evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I put a certain paper in the witness's hands, and he states that that is a paper that, as a copy of the Catherine Gaunt letter, was placed by him before the Committee, and I then read the Catherine Gaunt letter as it was written, and the comparison follows in the province of the jury and of the Judge, by looking at those two papers.

Judge Neilson—Well, to the end of that comparison, one paper must be before the Court as well as the other.

Mr. Evarts—And to the end of that comparison, I now mark the paper that I showed the witness.

Mr. Morris—In evidence?

Mr. Evarts—Mark it as in evidence, as shown to the witness; that is all.

Mr. Beach—Well, I ask from the counsel an avowal, whether that paper, the Maverick copy, is presented in evidence?

Mr. Evarts—And I state to the gentleman that I have it marked to identify it, just as I offered it in evidence, to wit: a paper shown to the witness.

Mr. Beach—Oh, well, if it is in evidence, that is all I want.

Judge Neilson—It is before the Court, or we know nothing about it.

Mr. Morris—Unless it is in evidence, we say that that is precisely as the original letter is, verbatim.

Judge Neilson—The comparison goes for nothing.

Mr. Beach—I move now to strike out from the stenographer's minutes, all allegations of counsel, that there was any omission in that Maverick copy of any part of the Catherine Gaunt letter, as read by the counsel.

Judge Neilson—That is granted, unless they put the Maverick paper in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—The statements of counsel are quite unimportant for comparison of papers; we will reproduce them at the proper time.

Judge Neilson—I suppose they are regarded as before us.

Mr. Evarts—This is the paper I showed to the witness, and what I showed it to him for appears in his oral examination. I now have it marked as shown to the witness.

Judge Neilson—That is a matter of form undoubtedly, but the jury have before them certain statements in regard to the discrepancy, and those statements in regard to the discrepancy are not proper here unless the papers are before us.

Mr. Evarts—There is no doubt that they are to depend upon the comparison of the papers, and all that has been done as we went on with the case is, we have compared written letters with printed ones, and pointed out the differences as we read them.

Judge Neilson—They are both considered as read then.

Mr. Beach—And both in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir, unless in evidence you have no comparison; we have been wasting our time.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt, no doubt. Unless the paper that he says he put before the Committee in these leaves is in evidence, there is no comparison.

[Letter marked "D, 99;" Maverick copy marked "D, 100," on each sheet.]

THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY DISCUSSED.

Mr. Evarts—We were proceeding with your intercourse with Mrs. Woodhull when this Catherine Gaunt letter came out in connection with it. Now, do you remember any public services that you performed for Mrs. Woodhull, except the presiding at her meeting, and the writing of her biography, and the writing of a letter to Mr. Sumner, I think, on the XIVth Amendment, wasn't it—Woman's Suffrage? A. I wrote also a letter to Senator Carpenter.

Q. What was that for? A. Same subject.

Q. Same subject? Those were the public topics? A. Those are all that I remember, Sir, now.

Q. Now, about how long after this 22d of May introduction, or after this 22d of May visit, was it before you wrote this Life of Mrs. Woodhull? A. That is, do you inquire concerning the interval of time between my—between Mrs. Woodhull's card of May and the writing of that?

Q. Yes? A. This was written about the first of September, I think, the same year.

Q. Along after—the same year? A. Yes.

Q. And when was the subject of writing it first introduced to you? A. Well, shortly before it was done, I think.

Q. And in that time, that space of time, you had become very well acquainted with her, had you not? A. Well, Sir, I thought I was

Q. Her traits of mind and of heart, disposition, and her relations and purposes toward the good of society, etc.? A. I thought I understood them, Sir; but I found I was mistaken.

Q. You afterward found you were mistaken? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But then you thought you understood them well? A. I made the same mistake in her that I had in Mr. Beecher.

Q. Now, here is a marked copy, "Exhibit D, 86;" just look at that while I read from this—

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir; what do you propose?

Mr. Evarts—Well, you will hear in a minute.

Mr. Beach—You propose to be reading from something?

Mr. Evarts—I do.

Mr. Beach—Well, what was it you propose to read from? I want to know. [To the Court.] I ask the counsel what he is proposing to read from; he has not the kindness to answer me.

Mr. Evarts—No; I had the kindness to answer you, which was that you would hear when I made my question; I am going to make it now.

Judge Neilson—It will appear in the question. Well, let us see.

Mr. Evarts—Please listen to this passage which I read to you, and say whether it is your composition, and expressed the sentiments, as you then held them, about Mrs. Victoria Claflin Woodhull?

Mr. Beach—I object to that, Sir, as immaterial. Counsel, I understand, is reading an extract from the life of Mrs. Woodhull, which your Honor has once excluded.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; but excluded, I think, on the ground that it did not follow that a person was responsible for the opinions expressed in the biography of this or that person, and, to meet that difficulty I am asking him whether he did write this, and whether it expressed his opinions as he then had them.

Mr. Beach—It was not upon that ground alone that your Honor ruled. Your Honor ruled that his expression of opinions in regard to the character or mission of Mrs. Woodhull were immaterial, incompetent evidence. I do not understand, Sir, that the opinions which this witness entertained of that lady, at any particular period of her public or private career, are at all important in this investigation; and I understand that to be the sentiment which your Honor entertained at the time we had the discussion over the admission of the Life.

Mr. Evarts—We have had no ruling, and it would be quite contrary to the course of this evidence to hold, and your Honor has given no such intimation, I am sure, as that an exposure of this witness's relations to these opinions and these votaries of them, was not an important part, of greater or less importance, as it may be, in this case. The point was that, although I had identified Mr. Tilton as the writer of this Life and the publisher of this Life, yet that I could not read from that Life as evidence of what his opinions and views concerning the private and public relations of this lady were, because the mere printing and publishing, as my learned friend said, of a history, did not prove that the writer entertained those opinions concerning the history, or approved the facts that he narrated. There are some passages in this Life, that, with your Honor's permission, I propose to read, as expressing in terms, this writer's opinions concerning this lady and her character, and her principles; and to ask him if those were not his real opinions at the time, and thus avoid the difficulty of doing injustice to him, by treating a literary production as if it were an avowal of his own sentiments.

Judge Neilson—My ruling had this additional basis; to wit: that it appeared before us that her husband had prepared this document; had made a draft of it; perhaps, not being a writer, he had left it in a rude state, and, as we may suppose, the witness put it in a style fit for publication. That had something to do with my ruling.

Mr. Evarts—That was the original view presented; but this witness displaced that view by his own statement of the way that he wrote the paper—that he wrote it "all in a heat"; that it was not a correction of the manuscript, but he wrote it and presented it to the lady, and she pronounced it a failure; he made it better, and then she pronounced it perfect.

Judge Neilson—She pronounced it a failure, because he had omitted some extravagant parts which her husband had put in, and which she wanted replaced. If this were only a single question, I would be disposed to allow it. Do you intend to go into the whole matter?

Mr. Evarts—No, I intend to confine myself to a few points of this writer's opinions concerning this lady.

Mr. Beach—I don't understand how this becomes evidence in any way. I don't entirely comprehend the view with which it is offered. The plaintiff appears as a witness on the stand. I suppose this evidence is offered with a view to impeach his credibility. They propose to show, by the evidence now offered, that this witness eulogized this lady in a review of her course and career. How do we know, Sir—what evidence is there in this case to show what were her sentiments, or what was the conduct of this lady?

Judge Neilson—Up to that point of time.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; up to that point of time. How are they laying the foundation to impeach the credibility of the witness, by proving his opinions or sentiment of the conduct of a woman, whose sentiments or conduct are not the subject of proof before the Jury, where the Jury must be held to be entirely ignorant of the subject of the biography? It is a simple proposition to prove a eulogistic history of a woman with whom or about whom this Jury cannot legally have any knowledge or connection.

THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY ADMITTED.

Judge Neilson—If we receive this, we are to receive it as if he read some expressions from a newspaper, and asked the witness if those were his sentiments.

Mr. Evarts—If he was the author of them, and if they were his sentiments.

Mr. Beach—If it is proposed to read something that has not a legitimate and material effect upon some material issue in the case, as the credibility of the witness, or some other issue, it is totally immaterial and inadmissible. Now, I ask, your Honor, what legal effect will it have upon any aspect of this case, or upon any party or witness in this case, to prove that Mr. Tilton, in this publication, approved of the character or conduct of Mrs. Woodhull? What knowledge—what legal knowledge have we of Mrs. Woodhull? What representation has been given here which should render the testimony of this witness entitled to less credibility because he had connection with Mrs. Woodhull, or association with Mrs. Woodhull, in any way. There is no evidence at all, Sir. I do not understand the counsel to propose to give any proof in regard to that. Your Honor or the jury cannot take judicial information as to the tenets or career of Mrs. Woodhull; and in that sense, I submit to your Honor, it is entirely immaterial evidence, unless my friend intends to go further and enlighten us somewhat in regard to the doctrines and course of life of this lady.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take the answer to the question, and you can have your exception, Mr. Beach.

Mr. Evarts—You have this life? A. I never wish to see it again.

Q. The heading is "Mr. Tilton's account of Mrs. Woodhull." You gave that title to it? A. That is the biography.

Judge Neilson—That is not properly a part of your inquiry; not necessarily a part of your inquiry.

Mr. Evarts—No, it is not a part of this inquiry. I read:

I shall swiftly sketch the life of Victoria Claflin Woodhull, a young woman whose career has been as singular as any heroine's in a romance, whose ability is of a rare and whose character of the rarest type; whose personal sufferings are of themselves a whole drama of pathos; whose name (through the malice of some and the ignorance of others) has caught a shadow in strange contrast with the whiteness of her life; whose position as a representative of her sex in the greatest reform of modern times renders her an object of peculiar interest to her fellow-citizens; and whose character (inasmuch as I know her well) I can portray without color or tinge from any other partiality save that I hold her in uncommon respect.

Q. Did you write that, Mr. Tilton. A. I did, Sir.

Q. And did that, as I have thus read it to you, express your opinions as then entertained? A. When I wrote that biography I believed a good portion of it; I made an extravagant statement of it with a view to conduce to the purpose—

Q. For rhetorical effect? A. No, Sir; not for rhetoric.

Q. For what? A. I have already told you that Mr. Moulton, Mr. Beecher and I were set on the enterprise of hardening and controlling that woman, and I believed, to a considerable degree, during my early months of acquaintance with her, that she was much tranced. I did not believe in her extravagances.

Q. I am speaking of the period when you wrote this? A. I wrote that in the first months of my acquaintance with her.

Q. You wrote it in September? A. Yes, Sir; and I had been acquainted with her three or four months.

Mr. Beach—The gentleman has succeeded in interrupting the answer of the witness.

Mr. Evarts—That is my right.

Mr. Beach—No, he has not the right to interrupt the witness's answer.

Judge Neilson—If the answer is responsive?

Mr. Beach—It was responsive.

Mr. Evarts—That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Beach—Let us hear the answer of the witness.

[The TRIBUNE stenographer read the question and answer.]

Mr. Beach—[To the witness]: You had got so far; now finish your answer.

Mr. Evarts—We will see about that. My question was if he wrote that and if these were his opinions at the time.

Judge Neilson—He stated they were, in part, and in part they were not.

Mr. Evarts—That is a certain point of time. Now, how he came to have those opinions is nothing to do with the question. The point is whether he held them when he wrote them.

Judge Neilson—The witness has answered that he did in part and in part he did not.

Mr. Beach—He went further; the witness said that he wrote extravagantly with a view to conduce to a certain purpose. The question counsel then presented to him was, "With a view to rhetoric?" and he answered, "No," and he went on explaining the view with which he wrote it, in answer to an interrupting question put by the counsel.

Judge Neilson—I think that is proper that we have down.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; it was interrupted.

Mr. Evarts—That is down, and then I was going on—

Mr. Beach—This is most astonishing. Your Honor heard the question and the answer read, and the interruption, and it was right for the witness to explain.

Judge Neilson—But still the question is if he has not substantially answered the question; I think he has.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Beach.] You can draw it out further on re-direct examination.

Mr. Morris—But is it not the right of the witness to answer fully?

Judge Neilson—I believe he has answered that he did believe it in part, and he did not believe in the extravagancies.

Mr. Fullerton—He went on further and said that himself and Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton had agreed upon a line of conduct with reference to this woman, and in making the explanation he was interrupted.

Judge Neilson—He said that and it is down.

Mr. Fullerton—One-half of what he said is down and the rest of it is not down on paper.

Mr. Evarts—That is only a reproduction of what he said on his direct examination. He referred very clearly to that before. Now, I will read this extract. [Beginning to read]:

Judge Neilson—Turn over a page or two, Mr. Evarts. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Oh! yes, Sir; I have but very few passages to read, and this is quite short. Please listen to this and see whether you wrote that, and whether it expressed your sentiments at that time. [Reading]:

One of her texts is, "I will lift up mine eyes to the hills whence cometh my help—my help cometh from the Lord who made Heaven and Earth."

The Witness—I believe in that.

Mr. Evarts [continuing to read]:

She reminds me of the old engraving of St. Gregory dictating his homilies under the outspread wing of the Holy Dove.

Did you write that? A. I did.

Q. Did it express your sentiments at the time? A. That was not a sentiment; it was a reminiscence of a picture that hangs in my library; that is to say a woman who had this text (she had it written somewhere on a card over her desk), and it reminded me of that picture; any one who could habitually live with such a text as that, and whose life, whether truly or falsely, pretends to be guided by such a text, reminded me of a picture in my library of St. Gregory dictating his homilies under the outspread wing of the Holy Dove.

Q. You knew that lady, and had known her for months? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—He says that reminds him of this picture,

Mr. Evarts—That is what he said—that it reminded him of the old engraving of St. Gregory.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not worth while to let us have it again; if there is any other question to put, let us have it and make some progress.

Judge Neilson—He has answered that.

Mr. Evarts—Please listen to this, and say whether you wrote it, and whether it expressed your views concerning her and her opinions, as you then entertained them:

On social questions, her theories are similar to those which have long been taught by John Stuart Mill and Mrs. H. B. Stanton, and which are styled by some as free-love doctrines, while others reject this appellation on account of its popular association with the idea of a promiscuous intimacy between the sexes—the essence of her system being that marriage is of the heart and not of the law, that when love ends marriage should end with it, being dissolved by nature, and that no civil statute should outwardly bind two hearts which have been inwardly sund-red; and finally, in religion, she is a spiritualist of the most mystical and ethereal type.

Did you write that, or did that express your views concerning her opinions as you then entertained them? A. I wrote that, and I think that is an accurate statement of her opinions as she then held them; that is not an expression of my opinions, but of hers.

Q. That is a statement of her opinions as you understand them? A. Yes, Sir; when that statement was made she had never made any extravagant utterances on the subject of free-love: she always quoted Stuart Mill and Mrs. Stanton as her exemplars.

Q. Now, please answer this, which I am happy to say is the last sentence of the biography, as well as of my inquiries:

Known only as a rash iconoclast, and ranked even with the most uncouth of those noise-makers who are waking a sleepy world before its time, she beats her daily gong of business and reform with notes not musical, but strong, yet mellows the outward rudeness of the rhythm by the inward and devout song of one of the sincerest, most reverent, and divinely-gifted of human souls.

Q. Did you write that, and did that express your opinions then? A. I wrote that, Sir; that is no part of the extravagances in the sketch; it culminated in that.

Q. And that is the end? A. Yes; I had not so high an opinion of her as that, Sir.

Q. But still your opinions were in that direction, though they did not get so high? A. What, Sir?

Q. Your opinions were in that direction, although they did not reach so high? A. No, Sir; that was part of the design; that was part of the little sketch, to make it thoroughly acceptable to her, so that it might accomplish its service.

COUNSEL MAKE A CORRECTION.

Mr. Fullerton—There is one question here in reference to the publication in The Graphic. You asked whether there was not an omission in the Catherine Gaunt letter. You spoke of The Graphic. I find The Graphic here and the part which was omitted is lithographed. I think the witness ought to answer the whole question.

The Witness—I respectfully ask the Court that Mr. Evarts may do me justice in respect to the Catherine Gaunt letter.

Mr. Evarts—It is not necessary; I stated that when the publication in The Graphic was produced it would of course speak for itself.

The Witness—I desire also, Mr. Evarts, that it shall speak for me. Be kind enough to inform the jury that it was there lithographed as it was written exactly. I would do the same for you under the same circumstances.

Mr. Evarts—I will do exactly as I said I would, that when The Graphic was produced with it in I would present it. That I will do.

The Witness—Thank you.

Mr. Evarts—But I looked over what appear to be a reproduction of The Graphic—what do you call them?

The Witness—Fac-similes; it is an exact one.

Mr. Evarts—And the Catherine Gaunt letter is not among them in this book.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the difficulty. That book no one seems to be responsible for; it is nullus in filius.

Mr. Evarts—That I agree to. I do not want to hold any one responsible for it; it was the only material we had.

Mr. Evarts—Now, this is The Graphic of September 18, 1874, and that was the first, perhaps the only issue of this? A. That is the only time I ever published the Catherine Gaunt letter, and that publication is correct.

Q. Now, look at that paper, and say whether it is the issue of The Graphic in which the publication—the lithographic publication or fac simile publication of certain letters was made by you and at your request? A. It is, Sir.

Q. And were any such papers so published as fac similes in any other issue. Do you know whether that included all, or were there any others? A. There were very many documents published in fac simile in connection with Mr. Moulton's statement. This letter was published in connection with mine.

Q. And this is the only publication of fac similes in connection with your statement that you made? A. Yes, Sir; this is the only time that I published the Catherine Gaunt letter, and I published it exactly correct.

Q. That speaks for itself. But my point is this—whether you made any other publication of fac similes except what is found in this number of The Graphic? A. I never made any other publication of this letter in fac simile or any other way but that which is in your hands.

Q. I do not confine myself to the Catherine Gaunt letter. Did you publish any statement or number of fac similes of any of the documents or papers except what are on these sheets which I now hold? A. No, Sir; the other statements were published by Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Evarts—Now I have it. Now, the letter, as here fac similed, contains the omitted passage and the omitted word "any," and it answers entirely I presume to the original letter. This is The Graphic of September 18, 1874.

The Witness—I thank you, Sir.

Q. Now, you furnished this? A. I did, Sir.

Mr. Everts—I suppose this had better be marked.

Mr. Beach—Oh! no, for Heaven's sake; there are enough.

Judge Neilson—The statement is taken in evidence.

Mr. Everts—It may be marked for identification.

Mr. Beach—There will be no trouble about it.

Judge Neilson—The stenographer has down the date of the paper, probably.

Q. Now, after this September publication of yours—this was published in The Golden Age and Golden Age Tracts? A. It was not published in The Golden Age.

Q. Published in The Golden Age Tract alone? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was there a larger circulation of them? A. I don't remember about that.

Q. You know there were a good many thousand of them distributed by you?

Mr. Fullerton—We object to that.

Judge Neilson [To the witness]: You may give the general fact.

Mr. Fullerton—How does it become material in this case?

Judge Neilson—I don't see, but still I think we will take the general fact.

Mr. Everts—Were there a good many thousand of them sold? A. No, Sir. I think not, Sir; I think that it was reprinted in the newspapers; I don't think very many copies of the tract were sold.

Q. The market was spoiled by reproduction in that way? A. No, Sir; I don't know whether the market was spoiled or not.

Q. You presented it in that light, that it was multiplied in the newspapers, and so there were less sales than there might have been? A. You can judge of that as well as I, Sir.

Q. You brought it out. You said it was published in the newspapers. In what connection did you bring that out? A. In answer to your question.

Q. Bearing on the question of the sales in this form? A. No, Sir. You asked me how widely it had been circulated. I didn't understand you to ask me how widely it had been sold.

Q. Yes, Sir? A. I don't remember that the sales amounted to very much.

Q. Do you remember that they were announced in your paper as having been sold to the amount of twelve thousand? A. Copies?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I do not remember.

Q. Do you remember what the emoluments were from the publication?

Mr. Fullerton—Is that proper?

Mr. Everts—Why not?

Judge Neilson—I do not see.

Mr. Beach—Why is it? I cannot see what it has to do with the issue.

Mr. Everts—It is not of itself very material. It is a single circumstance. It is not very material, but it is good evidence, I suppose.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't see that it has any allusion to this.

Mr. Everts—You don't see any application of the Woodhull matter to this case, I suppose?

Mr. Fullerton—No; I did not.

Mr. Everts—That is the difficulty. We passed that a long while ago.

Mr. Fullerton—It was a matter got up by Mr. Beecher, the witness and Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Everts—I don't care enough about it, if you object to it.

Judge Neilson—The question assumes that there were emoluments, and there may not have been any.

THE STEINWAY HALL SPEECH.

Mr. Everts—If the objection is insisted upon, I will waive the question. [To the witness]: Now, Sir, you made a speech at this Steinway Hall meeting, at the opening of it. A. I said a few words, which Mr. Moulton quoted the other day.

Q. Can you give that speech? A. No, Sir; nor any other that I ever made.

Q. You cannot give it, then, from memory now? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you hear it as given by Mr. Moulton the other day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How did that reproduction of it strike you, from your own memory of it? A. Well, Sir; it struck me as being a very fair one.

Q. Now, do you remember an interruption or disorder occurring at that meeting at which you intervened. A. I have a dim recollection that somebody in the gallery tried to interrupt the speaker, and I stepped forward and made some remark; I have forgotten what.

Q. Let me see if I can recall to you a passage in the speech—in the lecture, if it was a lecture—of Mrs. Woodhull. Do you remember her saying in the course of this lecture or address, that Congress ought to pass a law liberating all persons from their marriage relations, and leaving them to seek such affinities as they pleased? A. No, Sir.

Q. And that on that there arose disorder in the audience? A. I don't remember any particular passage in the speech whatever.

Q. You cannot say whether that was the one on which that disorder arose. A. No, Sir. The scene that arises in my mind, in reference to your question, was an interruption by some persons who tried to interject some remarks, and my recollection is I said; "Wait until the speaker gets through, then there will be an opportunity for any one to reply." That is my recollection of it.

Q. My question is whether that interruption—which was one of dissent or disapprobation, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. My question is whether that interruption was not upon her promulgation of that proposition? A. I don't remember at what particular point the interruption was.

Q. Do you remember whether your call or statement to the audience was, that you knew what was in, or to be in her address, and there would be nothing worse in the rest of it than what she said, and that they might as well hear her through? A. Oh! No, Sir; I didn't know what she was going to say.

Q. Did you or not have in your hands the slips of her speech while she was delivering it? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not? A. No, Sir.

THE WORLD CARD.

Q. Now, as I understand you, Mr. Tilton, your acquaintance and intimacy, of the degree that it had attained with this lady, would have continued, for aught we have now heard, except for this "Tit for Tat" article coming up? A. I cannot answer as to that, Sir.

Q. That is the only interruption that you have spoken of? A. Well, when the interruption came, that ended it.

Q. Well, we know you said so. Now, Sir, after the publication of this card of Mrs. Woodhull in The World in May, did not that publication attract comment and scandal concerning Mr. Beecher and your family? A. I don't think it did. I don't now remember that the card attracted much attention, and I cannot recall any instance of any person, outside of the very intimate circle of my acquaintance, who had any idea to whom that was pointed.

Q. Very well. That was the happy state of things, was it not, in the community in that regard, that nothing was moved or agitated by that card? A. I cannot say.

Q. So far as you knew, or so far as you observed, nothing material? A. I cannot say the card produced no impression.

Q. Nothing material—nothing that occasioned solicitude or attention from you? A. No, Sir; I think not, because the threat which the card contained had not been carried into execution.

Q. We have heard the card. No harm came from it.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness]: You don't understand his (Mr. Evarts's) question.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Fullerton]: Anything you want with me?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir. [To the witness.] You don't understand his (Mr. Evarts's) question. He was answering it when you (Mr. Evarts) used another word, whether it occasioned solicitude or attention from him.

The Witness—I understood you to ask, Mr. Evarts, whether the publication of Mrs. Woodhull's card in 1871, with these blind allusions to Mr. Beecher and to Mrs. Tilton, produced public comment.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, produced any comment, and then I used another word, or attracted any solicitude or attention on your part? A. On my part?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Oh! it attracted great solicitude on my part.

Q. It is not whether the card attracted it, but whether anything arose. You told us about the card, and your going there. Now, did there follow from that, in the comments of scandal, anything that excited your solicitude or attention? A. My impression is that in The World newspaper some time afterwards there were some references very pointed, and still rather blind, at Mr. Beecher—mischievous articles, which some people might understand, and which the great public might not; I have a recollection of that sort.

Q. But still nothing that came to any head? A. I don't know what you mean by coming to a head.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I cannot explain. It is one of those things—

Mr. Fullerton—That no fellow can find out.

MR. TILTON'S SIGNIFICANT POEM.

Mr. Evarts—That no one can make any more simple. [To the witness.] Now, when did you publish "Sir Marmaduke's Musings?" A. The poem bears its own date.

Q. Well, I know it does, but I don't know that it appears it was published at that time or not. It was published about the time it is dated—about the time of its date it was published? A. Oh! yes, Sir, somewhere about that time.

Q. So I supposed. Now, at this date, November, 1871, there was a condition of quiet and freedom from agitation about this scandal, was there not? A. The scandal had not yet been made public. It was not made public until a year afterwards, until Mrs. Woodhull's tale of November, 1872.

Q. This affair had reached no further than Mrs. Woodhull's card, and no public attention had followed from that card to your family or Mr. Beecher's? A. Well, Sir, I cannot say that no attention had; I don't think the newspapers spoke in an unkindly manner, either of Mr. Beecher or of Mrs. Tilton, in consequence of Mrs. Woodhull's card of May, 1872. How far private talk goes, I cannot understand.

Q. What you didn't hear you cannot speak of; but you knew of no public attention to it? A. No, Sir, not such as followed a year after.

Q. Where did you publish this poem of yours? A. In The Golden Age.

Q. And published it under your own name, did you not? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not? A. No, Sir, as you will see by looking at it.

Q. I do not find anything here. A. It is over my own name, Mr. Evarts.

Q. Oh, well, well; as matter of fact, without discussing the criticism, it is under your own name as it is here.

Judge Nellson—[To the witness.] It is put out with your name?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, it reads here: "Sir Marmaduke's Musings, by Theodore Tilton," and then follows the poem? A. Yes, Sir; it was not published in that way by me.

Q. You signed it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was this in its conception by you a personal experience of yours that you meant to put forth? A. Well, Sir, I suppose that the only answer I can give to that is that every man who writes must write out of the fountain of his own experience. How far that is fanciful, how far it was personal at the time of its composition, I could not at this late date say. It must be judged, as all literary productions are judged, taking their color from the mood of the writer, from his experience of life, hope or despair.

Q. Well, do you mean to say that there is no part of this poem that in its conception took yourself and your experience of life as its subject? A. Yes, Sir, one stanza.

Q. And only one, you think? A. Well, one in particular, and the others in a modified form.

Q. Very well. Now, we will see. I will read you this clause and see whether that includes your personal experience? A. If you will allow me to say, at the beginning, the subject of that little poem was to express, in the form of a soliloquy, the grief and sorrows of a man utterly broken down in every one of the points in which a successful life might have been continued as a success.

Q. And which are named here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well, I suppose so. I will ask your attention to this phrase, and see if it was to that intent:

I won a noble fame,
But, with a sudden frown,
The people snatched my crown,
And in the mire trod down
My lofty name.

Was that an expression of your sentiments in regard to yourself and your own position? A. No, Sir, not in any other degree than as a hint or suggestion of a man who had stood well with the public, and who had lost something of the tribute which the public had theretofore paid to him.

Q. Of course I do not mean to hold you for mere poetic licence or expression. Now, this:

I bore a bounteous purse,
And beggars by the way
Then blessed me day by day,
But I, grown poor as they,
Have now their curse.

Was that also an expression of your sentiments? A. That is poetic licence.

Q. A little extravagant? A. Yes, Sir; for I never bore a very bounteous purse, and I don't think any beggar ever had any occasion to curse me. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—[To the audience]: Now, be quiet.

Mr. Evarts—

I gained what men call friends,
But now their love is hate,
And I have learned, too late,
How mated minds unmate,
And friendship ends.

Was that an expression of your sentiments and feeling? A. No, Sir; I don't think there was anything particularly pointed in that to my case; on the contrary, my friends, perhaps, were closer to me than ever.

THE POEM NOT AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL.

Q. So you think there was no appositeness in that phrase to your experience in life? A. That is to say, it was not an autobiographical transcript of my particular experience.

Q. And that carries no parallel with any experience of yours, you think? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[reading]:

I clasped a woman's breast,
As if her heart I knew
Or fancied would be true.
Who proved—alas! she too—
False like the rest.

Did that refer to any experience of your own, as you intended to express it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you not suppose that the public who read that under your name would carry some connection from it to your wife and your family? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. It never entered your head? A. No, Sir; it may have been a rash heedlessness on my part to fling it before the public. If I had the slightest thought that the public would have gathered from those little lines any reproach on Elizabeth they never should have gone into print.

Q. Now, Sir, this was six months after the card of Mrs. Woodhull, in May, and was after there had been in circulation enough of imputations upon your wife to have reached Mrs. Woodhull in May, and yet you think in November following a publication by you in your own newspaper of that verse could carry no danger towards your family as being its subject. A. I will answer you, Mr. Evarts. If I had stopped to reflect that the publication of that little poem which I wrote one day on a railway train, would have led any human being to have supposed that I meant Elizabeth, I would have cut off my right hand rather than have printed it.

Q. What motive led you to print it? A. The same motive which leads me to print everything which I write.

Q. And no other or more important motive than that? A. None whatever.

Mr. Evarts—Now, we have another verse:

I am now all bereft,
As when some tower doth fall,
With battlements and wall,
And gate and bridge and all,
And nothing left.

Was that a parallel in the conception of this poem to your own experience of life? A. No, Sir; I do not think it was particularly. I had my children left.

Q. Now, Sir, as I understand it, the principal and most important trait that is included in that poem is the verse that refers to your deceit in love—being deceived in love? A. State that again, if you please.

Mr. Evarts—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Read the question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question.

A. Yes, Sir.

HINT OF A BLACKMAILING SCHEME.

Q. And you were absent on a political campaign at the time the Woodhull publication of 1873 was made, as you have stated? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see or hear of that publication, or any portion of it, being in slips and proposed to be published before it was published? A. No, Sir; all I ever heard on that subject was after I got home, through Mr. Beecher, who said that it had been presented to him, or at least he had been spoken in advance of its publication; and, as I understood, some blackmail had been leveled on him.

Q. You have made some statement about that representation not in your direct examination.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

The Witness—Oh, no Sir, I never saw any slips of it; I did not know it was going to be published.

Q. Whatever you did do, since you have begun it, we will hear now. What did you hear through Mr. Beecher about the Woodhull publication having been brought to his notice before it appeared? A. My impression is that he made a statement to the effect that a few days before it was published some person had called upon him and notified him that such a publication was going to be made, and that he considered the call in the light of a threatening visit, and had rebuffed the man.

Q. Sent him away? A. Yes, Sir; that is the substance of it.

Q. That is all? A. I don't know who it was that made the call; my impression is that he made some allusion to that in some of his public utterances.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; in some one of his statements. [To the witness.] Now, when did you leave New York to start on this tour on which you were absent at the time of the publication? A. Well, Sir, I spent nearly all the time between the Cincinnati Convention in May and the Presidential election—nearly all the time.

Q. You mean the campaign in general? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, this particular absence I refer to. How much were you in New-York in the month of October? A. My impression is that I came home after the Maine election and spoke in the Academy of Music, and then hastily returned to New-England, in order to fill up a part of the time in the State of New-Hampshire.

Q. Then you think you were not much in New-York in October? A. No, Sir; not much.

Q. Did you have any communication of any kind, either personal or by letter, with Mrs. Woodhull from the time that you broke off about the "Tit for Tat" letter until this publication of the Beecher scandal? A. Until then?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I had not then.

Q. Well, I say until then. I am not asking you about any other thing than that? A. The last time I had any communication with Mrs. Woodhull was in April, 1872. I have never had any communication with her since, from that time to this.

Q. That is exactly what I have asked you—no written or personal communication with her? A. No, Sir; I have not had any interchange of any sort.

Q. Did she have any personal communication, or send any written communication to you? A. Not that I know of.

Q. In that interval? A. Not that I know of, Sir.

Q. It didn't come to your notice, if she did, you say? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To the Court.] We have reached the usual hour of adjournment, if your Honor please.

The Witness—Or, if she did, I have forgotten it. At all events, I have never made any answer to any.

Judge Neilson—[To the Jurors.] Please attend to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Mallison [the Clerk]—The Court now stands adjourned until Wednesday morning at eleven o'clock.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

CROSS-QUESTIONING NEAR ITS END.

THE WOODHULL RELATIONS FURTHER PROBED—

MR. BOWEN'S PARTICIPATION SIFTED AGAIN—
DETACHED LEAVES OF THE "TRUE STORY."

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 10, 1875.

The stream of testimony to-day flowed in smoothly; it was only once or twice ruffled, and then only slightly. It became evident after the first hour or two that the cross-examination was drawing to a close. Mr. Evarts dwelt on many of the occurrences of the past four years, some of which were fresh in the minds of those who have followed the progress of the trial, while others were new. The so-called Winsted scandal was first taken up, and Mr. Evarts read a letter written in Tidioute, Penn., in January, 1870, to a Mr. Hastings, in which were explained the circumstances of Mr. Tilton's visit to Winsted, Conn., during which scandal arose.

A half hour or more was devoted to-day to Mrs. Woodhull's relations to the case, the main matter inquired about being whether the witness had heard before November, 1872, that slips of the publication in Mrs. Woodhull's paper were in existence several months previous to its publication, Mr. Tilton replied "No," squarely. He was questioned about the frequency of his calls upon Mrs. Woodhull at her office and at her home. Very close inquiry was made regarding the manner in which Mr. Tilton spent the 3d, 4th, and 5th of July, 1871, the examination being pressed to ascertain whether the witness passed a part of each of those days and one or all of the nights at Mrs. Woodhull's house. The witness did not recall any such occurrence, and insisted that he never passed more than one night under Mrs. Woodhull's roof. Mr. Tilton's reasons for publishing fac simile copies of his letters in The Graphic were asked for; he said that he had been accused of forging letters, and it was to remove that imputation that he thus printed exact copies of the originals. There was a long examination about the manner in which the plaintiff regained possession of his infant child during the time in 1870 when Mrs. Tilton was living with her mother, having left her husband, carrying the child with her.

The queries then jumped to the consideration of events four years later, and to the plaintiff's appearance before the Plymouth Investigating Committee. Mr. Evarts read from Mr. Tilton's cross-examination on that occasion the latter's explanation, or theory, of his wife's alleged crime. Other parts of that examination were read, some of which the witness admitted, while others, he asserted, were wrongly reported. Mr. Evarts now asked Mr. Tilton if he was an expert phonographer, whereupon the witness quoted Solomon's words, "Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth." Mr. Evarts demanded rather sharply what Solomon had to do with this case, and insisted on Mr. Tilton's answering, which he did in the affirmative. This led to inquiries as to what letters from Mr. Beecher to Mr. Moulton had been copied by Mr. Tilton. He named some of the letters, saying that he had only copied a few. Further inquiries were then made respecting Bessie Turner, Mr. Bowen, and various interviews held during 1870 and 1871. The deprecatory and sympathetic letter of Mr. Beecher written to Mrs. Tilton subsequent to the publication of the scandal in 1872—six months afterward, Mr. Tilton says—was read by Mr. Evarts. Although this letter has been published before, its contents were listened to with evident interest by the audience.

The conversation with the Rev. Mr. Halliday, at which, in the presence of Mr. Bell, Mr. Tilton is alleged to have earnestly denied the story of the scandal, was brought by means of questions before the witness. This interview seemed to be very dim in Mr. Tilton's memory. Many of the statements ascribed to him he described as very weak, and others he could remember nothing about. The statement of Mr. Tilton in 1872, known as "The True Story," was very minutely considered. It appears that, besides the paper shown to various persons, there was an original draft, which only a few saw. This, Mr. Tilton says, was destroyed when the other copy was made. The second copy, the witness testified, was shown to Wm. C. De Witt, Geo. A. Bell, Gen. Tracy, Franklin Woodruff, John W. Harman, and a few others. The original draft Dr. Storrs, Mr. Clark of The Golden Age, and others saw, either in whole or part. Mr. Tilton last saw the second copy in the Spring of 1873, when he gave it to his wife. She told her husband (he says) that she had destroyed it, but after she left his house he found a few of the last pages in a bureau drawer.

Afterward the attention of the witness was turned back to January, 1871, when he contemplated the publication of Mr. Bowen's letter. His reasons for this purpose, he said, were that on his lecture-tour in the West many scandals were circulated, arising from his separation from The Independent and The Union, and it was reported that he was an embezzler, had been divorced, etc. The people demanded an explanation, and he wished Mr. Bowen's letter published to clear his name. The tripartite agreement was next put to the test, and the manner of its composition again investigated.

One of the numerous good points which Mr. Evarts daily makes, and which from their very dryness frequently pass unnoticed by the audience, was put to-day when Mr. Tilton so far forgot himself as to violate a rule in the use of language which he laid down to Mr. Evarts on the day before, at the risk of being captious, namely, in the signification of the words "certain" and "sure." The witness said that he was "sure." "'Certain,' you mean," said Mr. Evarts. But Mr. Tilton continued, apparently oblivious of the correction of the examiner, who was obliged to laugh heartily at his own joke, while Judge Neilson's eyes twinkled with merriment.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

THE WINSTED SCANDAL.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Theodore Tilton was recalled and his cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, you were to attempt to verify the question of whether that was a correct date or a mistaken one. [Showing witness a letter.] A. I have done so, Sir.

Q. What date was it? A. I will give it to you, Sir. [Referring to a memorandum book.] What is the date of that letter, Mr. Evarts?

Q. The date is January 8, 1869—Tidioute, Pennsylvania, January 8, 1869? A. Yes, Sir. Well, I have consulted a memorandum book of my lecture season in 1868-'9 and find that on January 8, 1869, I was at the Ohio University, Delaware City. I find also on application to Mr. Mumford, my lecture agent, that I was at Winsted—or rather that I was at Tidioute, Pennsylvania, January 8, 1870; also that I was at Winsted December 28, 1869.

Q. December 28, 1869? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then you say that the proper date of that letter should have been— A. Should have been 1870; yes, Sir. It must have been just such an error as you pointed out, customary with writers at the beginning of a new year.

Mr. Evarts—I will read this letter. [To Mr. Fullerton.] Have you seen it?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; I have seen it.

MR. TILTON'S EXPLANATION OF THE WINSTED SCANDAL.

Mr. Evarts [reading]:

TIDIOUTE, Pa., Jan. 8, 1869.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: The "lady" to whom you refer is a young school girl who was spending a holiday vacation at our house, and who, since I was not going to lecture any nearer

New-York than Winsted, went with me to that place to hear the lecture.

Arriving at Winsted (where I expected to be sent to a private house), I was put into a room in the hotel which had fire, and she into one which had no fire. I could not exchange rooms with her, for I could not be without a fire myself. So I called for two rocking chairs, and she sat at my stove and read to me till I threw myself on the bed and went to sleep.

This was in the afternoon—just after dinner.

Pretty soon some gentlemen called (perhaps yourself—for I cannot remember names), and I went to the church to fix the platform, then went to the scythe factory, and about town, hardly returning till near dark, or very late.

Meanwhile the "lady" had gone to sleep and wakened again, and was sitting by the stove when I returned.

If any servant saw her with her "dress unbuttoned," it must have been while she was asleep, and when he took advantage of my absence to intrude upon a young girl in a lone and strange place.

I never saw her with her "dress unbuttoned."

Shortly after my return from the scythe factory, the minister called to see me, and it was then that I ordered cider, and we drank it together—all three of us. He remained with me till the lecture, and after it was over took my young companion and myself to his own house, gave us supper and more cider, and accompanied us back to the hotel, when, without going into my room at all, the child went straight to bed in her own, and I saw no more of her till morning. But perhaps the servant stole in upon her a second time, and saw her with her "dress unbuttoned."

I wish you would say to the proprietor of the hotel (for I cannot recall either the name of the place or the house) that his servant who would thus treat his master's guests—and who, particularly, would associate such indelicate thoughts with a mere child—and who would tattle concerning what he saw in rooms whose occupants themselves summoned him in freely, is what, among honorable men, passes for a sneak.

This, since you ask for it, is the exact statement of the case.

I am yours, truly,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 101."]

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, that is the matter that is known and has been spoken of as the Winsted imputation, or scandal, or whatever it has been called? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was more recent in its relation to the period of December, 1870, than you had supposed, is it not? A. Well, six or seven years ago.

Q. I thought you spoke of it in your testimony as an old story? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This occurrence was in a year of the time that Mr. Bowen and you were talking about the charges against you? A. It seems now, by the date—by the correct date, to have been little over a year. I had supposed that it was perhaps a year or two—two or three years, somewhere in the past.

Q. I thought you said it was the 23th of December, 1869, that you were at Winsted. A. I learned that fact yesterday by telegram.

Q. Well, I know. That was less than a year from the time that you were talking with Mr. Bowen? A. Does it say 23th? Yes, it is about a year.

Q. I do not mean that it was less than a year; it was just a year. we will call it? A. The difference between Dec. 25th and 23th or 29th.

Q. This letter appears to have been written to some friend or acquaintance in answer to some inquiries or suggestions about this occurrence, was it not? A. I cannot recall who the gentleman is, Mr. Hastings by name, to whom it is written. My recollection is of the matter that while I was off lecturing somewhere in Pennsylvania or the West, Mr. Johnson, who was then my associate in The Independent, had received some question from some member of a committee there—

Q. At Winsted? A. At Winsted; yes, Sir—or some statement that the story was being used to my discredit, and he wished some explanation of it. That is my recollection.

Q. And this letter was written to this gentleman, whoever he may be, in consequence of your hearing of some reproach to you in this connection, and this is given as the explanation of it? A. Yes, Sir; that is the best recollection I have on the subject, now. I had forgotten the name of the gentleman until you revived it yesterday.

Q. And at the time that you wrote that letter, of course you had a fresh recollection of the occurrence. It was written within ten days after it happened at Winsted? A. Yes, Sir; so it seems by the dates. I had forgotten that fact when you spoke of it, yesterday.

CIRCULATION OF THE WOODHULL SCANDAL.

Q. Oh, well, of course. Mr. Tilton, did you know or hear of the existence of slips in advance of publication of the Woodhull scandal, before it was published? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you— A. Let me amend that, Mr. Evarts. Perhaps I did not understand your question. After my return from New-Hampshire to the interview at Mr. Moulton's house—

Q. You have told us that—

Mr. Beach—Let him finish.

The Witness—I was then informed that either slips or the story in some shape had been presented to Mr. Beecher a fortnight previously.

Q. That I understand; but you then heard it for the first time? A. Yes, Sir; for the first time.

Q. After the publication, as you have stated? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you never heard that for several months before the publication of the Woodhull scandal slips of it were exhibited in the different newspaper offices of the City of New-York, or some of them? A. I have heard in late days a statement to this effect, that certain newspapers had the essence of the story, but in what shape I never understood.

Q. Well, the essence of the story that afterward appeared in the Woodhull publication you mean? A. Well, the essence of the story of Mr. Beecher's relationships with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Well, you did hear— A. For instance, I had heard that some gentlemen in The Eagle office have said that they knew the story a long while ago—had it in their office—but what the foundation for the statement is, I have never understood.

Q. Well, I have made no inquiry concerning anything except this publication that the Woodhulls made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember to have heard that that publication of the Woodhulls, as it appeared in November, in whole or in part, had been put into the shape of slips or type, and had been exhibited in some, or one, of the newspaper offices of the City of New-York other than Mrs. Woodhull's own publication office? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, Mr. Evarts, when did you ask as to his hearing this?

Mr. Evarts—I will follow it up, you know, as to the time, when I get the fact. [To the witness.] You say you never—

The Witness—In this way—

Mr. Beach—Wait.

The Witness—In this way—

Mr. Beach—When I ask you to wait, will you please wait? I object, Sir, to his asking from this witness whether he has ever heard this up to this day.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Evarts.] I think you mean prior to its publication?

Mr. Evarts—I have a right, I think, your Honor, with great submission, in a cross-examination to find out first whether he ever heard, and then find out what time it was.

Judge Neilson—Was not your inquiry confined—

Mr. Evarts—No, it was not confined in terms. The point of the inquiry will now turn upon whether I get his knowledge prior to that time, but I must submit that I am not obliged to ask him in the first instance in a cross-examination if I want to get at a fact of that kind; I may first get at the fact whether he ever heard, and then I may fix the time when he heard it.

Mr. Beach—I submit, if your Honor please, when the answer to that question might essentially be that Mr. Tilton had heard of it since publication, or within a very recent time, that it would be incompetent evidence, and therefore I submit to you that the question shall be limited to the time of publication, or before the publication.

Mr. Evarts—That would be requiring a cross-examiner to tell the witness what was the point that he wished to arrive at.

Mr. Beach—There is no necessity for any great concealment, Sir, about a question of this kind.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, I agree.

Mr. Beach—The witness is asked—is sought to be asked, and the evidence is sought to be extracted from him, that prior to this publication he had heard of the fact that there were slips in existence of the whole or part of it. Now, that is material, and that alone is material, and to present a question which calls for information or rumors after that period, of the witness, is totally immaterial.

Judge Neilson—He should distinguish, certainly. I think he may answer. I think he has answered.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Tilton. [To the stenographer.] Won't you please read the question, Mr. Stenographer?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows: "Q. Now do you remember to have heard that that publication of the Woodhulls, as it appeared in November, in whole or in part, had been put into the shape of slips or type, and had been exhibited in some, or one, of the newspaper offices of the City of New-York other than Mrs. Woodhull's own publication office?"

Mr. Beach—I object to your question, unless it is limited to the time prior to the publication; but I do not understand that that is related.

Judge Neilson—Take an exception.

Mr. Evarts—Now, please to answer.

The Witness—I never heard any such story as that until within the last year or two; I think I read it in The Brooklyn Eagle, a statement that the story was an old story, and had been known to some editors a long time: that is the substance of what I know about it.

MR. TILTON'S CALLS ON MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Now, will you be so good as to give me some notion, as near as you can, of the frequency with which you were in Mrs. Woodhull's publication office, or business office, which ever it was, during the period of time that you have assigned as the space of your acquaintance? A. I think I said yesterday that I was there very frequently; I don't know how frequently.

Q. Were you there every day? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you there several times a week? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you there every week? A. I do not know that I was; I went whenever occasion required it.

Q. Well, I want the fact, how often you went? A. Well, with no regularity; a good many times altogether.

Q. Now, can't you recall to your mind that you went there at least once a week on the average? A. No, Sir.

Q. During that time? A. I should not like to say that, because there was no regularity in my going; I went when occasion required.

Q. Occasion required? A. Yes, Sir; sometimes when it did not require.

Q. Do you remember whether you went habitually when you were sent for, or went spontaneously? A. I always went when I was sent for.

Q. And did you sometimes go spontaneously? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you give me any notion of the number of times that you were a visitor at the house of Mrs. Woodhull during that period of your acquaintance? A. I should say, perhaps, in all, ten or a dozen; still I won't be accurate—won't be positive.

Q. Can you give us any notion of the number of times that you passed the night under her roof? A. Yes, Sir; exactly.

Q. How many? A. Once.

Q. And once only? A. Once only.

Q. And that was in September? Well, I don't know that—I don't know that you fixed the date of that. A. That was on the occasion to which I referred in my cross-examination.

Q. Yes, on the occasion. But have you fixed the date of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The date of the occasion—was it September? A. It was the month of September; I do not remember the precise date.

Q. Very well, that is near enough. Now, can you tell me where you were from the 3d to the 5th of July, 1871? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. Can you tell me where you were from the 3d to the 5th of July, 1871? A. Well, Sir, I have no data in my mind to answer that question on the spur.

Q. Well, you notice that the 4th of July came in between those days? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you tell us how you spent the 4th of July, and the day before and after it, in that year? A. Well, I do not remember, Sir.

Q. Did you spend those days, or any part of them, in the company of Mrs. Woodhull? A. Well, that I do not remember.

Q. Did you spend those days, or any part of them, at the house of Mrs. Woodhull? A. That I do not remember.

Q. Did you spend either of the nights connected with those days at the house of Mrs. Woodhull? A. I was never at Mrs. Woodhull's house on any night, save one; the one which I have named.

Q. Then, I will ask you now this direct question: whether those three days, the 3d, 4th and 5th of July, 1871, you were not in the company of Mrs. Woodhull, or at her house, and did not spend either those three nights, or one of those nights, at her house? A. I will answer part of that question, Sir, with a peremptory no; I did not spend either one, or two, or three of those nights; whether or not during those three days I saw her, I cannot at this distance of time say.

Q. Do you mean to say that, in regard to an occurrence as far back as July, 1871, and relating to the mode of spending that holiday and the days about it, you have no recollection whatever? A. I have not any, Sir, at all.

Q. None whatever? A. If anything noteworthy had occurred on that day I should have remembered it, but it is all a blank in my mind.

Q. Do you mean by noteworthy anything worth repeating? A. Anything that would be salient in my memory, Sir; anything that I should make a feature of in my thought or remembrance.

Q. Then, if you had spent those three days in her company, leaving out the nights, that would not have been a salient fact in your intercourse with that lady that would fix itself in your memory? A. That would have depended entirely on what transpired.

Q. The passage of the three days in her company, consecutively, would not have been a noticeable fact in the course of your intercourse with her that Summer? A. Yes, Sir, it would have been a very noticeable fact.

Q. Very? A. Yes, Sir—I never passed three days—

Q. Now, will you tell us whether you did or did not pass those days, or some part of them, in her company that Summer? A. Well, Sir, I never passed any three days in her company; whether or not I passed any part of three days, or fragment of three days, that I cannot say.

Q. Parts of three days—you cannot say whether you passed a part of three consecutive days surrounding that holiday in her company? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. And that, if you had done it, would not have been such a noticeable fact in your intercourse with her as would impress itself on your memory? A. Yes, it would, Sir; if I had passed any considerable portion of three days with her I should have remembered it at this moment; if I had seen her in a chance way, three days in succession, I could easily have forgotten it.

Q. In a chance way? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But would you regard a visit to her, at her own house on three consecutive days, a chance occurrence that would leave no impression on your memory? A. I think if I had gone there three days in succession I should have remembered it, because there must have been some particular occasion to have required it, and I should have remembered the occasion if

Q. Do you remember where Mrs. Tilton was three days of July, 1871? A. No, Sir; not without some—

Q. She was in the country, was she not? A. I don't ber; what year do you now allude to?

Q. 1871? A. Well, I can answer that question by referring to some of her correspondence here; I think that she was at that time in Schoharie, by the date of the "Catherine Gaunt letter" which you read yesterday.

Q. Very well, that is all I want, where she was. A. I think so; yes, Sir; but that is the only way I know it; could not remember it of itself.

Q. It is immaterial to me how you know, if your recollection, the best of your memory, is that she was at Schoharie. A. Well, I know she was if her letter was dated July; but that is the only way I know it.

Q. Very well, she was at Schoharie?

Mr. Fullerton—No; he does not say that.

Mr. Evarts—Connected with the "Catherine Gaunt letter."

Mr. Beach—He says he knows by that letter.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is not the 4th of July.

The Witness—My impression is, Sir, that in my statement there is a little letter from Mrs. Tilton, dated July 4th, Schoharie, or July 1st or 2d, Schoharie. That is the only way I remember it.

Q. But the best recollection that you have in your mind is that your wife was at Schoharie at that time? A. That is, provided those letters confirm that recollection.

Mr. Evarts—Well, no matter; if you find occasion to correct yourself hereafter, why of course you will have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Beach—Well, he has a perfect right to qualify his answer now by reference to those letters.

Judge Neilson—Yes, he has a right to do that.

Mr. Evarts—Not in the least, I suppose; he has a right to answer my question whether he remembers where his wife was.

Mr. Beach—He says he does not remember except by reference to the date of certain letters from his wife.

Mr. Evarts—He says he has no doubt of it.

Judge Neilson—I was about to suggest to counsel that it was quite proper for the witness to add, if he wished to, she was at Schoharie, but he is aided to get at the fact by a letter of hers written from that place.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is the way he happens to know.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he does not say that.

Mr. Evarts—It is not of the least consequence to me what he says, if he will only say what his recollection is.

Judge Neilson—Aided by her letter.

Mr. Evarts—I don't care what he gets it by.

Mr. Beach—He answers that he has no recollection of the fact independent of the dates of these letters.

Mr. Evarts—That is all very well; but from that recollection he thinks she was at Schoharie.

Mr. Beach—Exactly.

Mr. Evarts—Very well.

Mr. Beach—That is not a recollection, it is a dependence upon the letters.

Mr. Evarts—Very well. [To the witness.] The date of the Catherine Gaunt letter is June 29th, 1871? A. I did not base my answer altogether on that letter, but also on another letter of Mrs. Tilton's, quoted in my last statement, which I think is dated July.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind; we won't speak of anything that is not in evidence.

GEN. BUTLER AND MR. TILTON VISIT MRS. WOODHULL.

Mr. Evarts—We don't care anything about any other letters. Do you remember an occasion during that period of your acquaintance with Mrs. Woodhull in which you and she were together in the company of a lawyer of Lowell, a Mr. Cowley, in the City of New-York, either at one of your offices, yours or Mrs. Woodhull's, or any other place of meeting, in which you heard Mrs. Woodhull narrate to him the substance or subject of her subsequent publication in 1872? A. No, Sir; I was in company with Mrs. Woodhull and a lawyer from Lowell, but that lawyer was Gen. Butler.

Q. At that time were you? A. I don't remember any other lawyer, and I do not remember the person whose name you now mention.

Q. Well, I am not inquiring about Gen. Butler, you know. You have said something about him; did you mean to say that you were in Mrs. Woodhull's company with Gen. Butler during that period of your acquaintance? A. I mean to say that one evening Gen. Butler and I were at Mrs. Woodhull's house.

Q. During that period of time? A. Oh! I can't remember the date.

Q. Well, during the period of this intercourse or acquaintance between you and Mrs. Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir; I was not there at any other period.

Mr. Evarts—Very well; that is all I asked. However, if your Honor please, I have no occasion to retain this matter in regard to Gen. Butler. I made no inquiry concerning it.

Judge Neilson—I think it is proper to let it stand.

The Witness—I know no such person as you mention.

Mr. Evarts—I haven't made the least inquiry.

Judge Neilson—I know, but still it is proper.

Mr. Beach—You asked him if he meant to say that he was in company with Gen. Butler.

Mr. Evarts—After he had mentioned it.

Mr. Beach—If you go on inquiring about it, you make it your evidence.

Mr. Evarts—It is not a matter that I care anything about, only it is not introduced by me.

Judge Neilson—Except your inquiry related to a lawyer of a certain name—

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Cowley.

Judge Neilson—And his answer relates to a lawyer of a different name. It may as well stand as it is.

Mr. Evarts—Very well; it is nothing that I care anything about, only I didn't introduce it.

Judge Neilson—You are not chargeable with introducing his name here at all.

Mr. Evarts—Now, you don't recall the name, then, of any lawyer, named Cowley, of Lowell? A. No, Sir; never heard of such a name until you just mentioned it; don't know the man.

Q. And you don't remember the fact of being in the presence of some third person while Mrs. Woodhull narrated the substance of her subsequent publication? A. Only Mr. Moulton; I heard her once speak of it in his presence, and no other persons.

Q. No other persons? A. No, Sir.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] Please look at the passage I have marked (in pencil), and see if you find in that an allusion to the Griffith Gaunt letter? A. That is an allusion to the Griffith Gaunt letter; yes, Sir.

Q. And this paper is an issue of Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly of May 17th, 1873, is it not? A. Yes, Sir; of 1873.

OBJECT OF THE FAC-SIMILE PUBLICATIONS.

Q. Mr. Tilton, now that we are on this letter for a moment—What induced the fac-simile publication of such letters and papers as were thus published by you? A. I will tell you, Sir. I had been accused by some of Mr. Beecher's friends with having forged documents; I wished that the document that I had, should be exhibited to the public as correct and genuine. I adopted this very admirable method of fac simile to prove that fact.

Q. And that publication was after the commencement of this suit of yours, was it? A. I don't remember when the suit began; that publication of mine was made last September.

Q. Yes; we have shown the paper, haven't we. A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—There is no dispute; the suit was commenced on the 19th of August, I think; is there, Mr. Morris?

Mr. Morris—I think that was the date.

Mr. Evarts—The suit was commenced on the 19th of August. [To the witness:] In the publication of the letters of yourself and your wife as now found in this book, this pamphlet, they have headings, as edited or described by the headings; did you furnish those headings?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment—I object; the fact is not in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—You object to the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I do.

Mr. Evarts—Very well; I will ask another one.

Mr. Fullerton—That is right.

Mr. Evarts—Not necessarily.

Mr. Fullerton—No; not because you do it.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Tilton, as you saw the letters as published in The Chicago Tribune—as you have spoken of the fact of their publication—had the headings or descriptive titles to them been furnished; and, if so, did you furnish them?

Mr. Fullerton—The same objection, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that.

Mr. Evarts—How is that, Mr. Tilton? A. Well, Sir, it is a long time since I have seen the letters in The Chicago Tribune, and I have forgotten the exact shape in which they there appeared.

Q. Did you, in advance of their publication anywhere, furnish titles or descriptive headings for them? A. I don't remember that.

Q. You don't remember whether you did or not? A. No, Sir; I don't remember whether I did it or Mr. Underhill did it, at this moment—my stenographer.

Q. You know that it was done by one or the other of you? A. No, Sir; I don't know that it was done at all. Mr. Underhill and I together—though he principally—had to do with the preparation of these manuscripts for the press; exactly how much he did, and exactly how much I did, I don't remember, and at this moment I don't remember exactly what was done.

Q. Then it is not fastened on your memory now whether in the Summer of last year, in preparing or proposing the publication of yours and your wife's letters, which was actually made, you furnished the titles or descriptive headings of those papers? A. I don't remember at this moment; no, Sir.

MRS. TILTON'S FIRST DESERTION OF HER HUSBAND.

Q. How long before this illness of your wife, in December (the date of which I think we fixed as commencing after the 24th of December), how long before that was it that she had left your house and gone to her mother's? A. She didn't leave my house and go to her mother's; she came home from the West, and on the day of her home-coming, I think, she went to her mother's; that is my recollection of it.

Q. As to the fact; you have not given us the date any otherwise? A. I think her return from the West was the first of December; possibly the last of November; I don't know the exact day. By the way, Mr. Everts, I am reminded just at this point, that I wish to make a slight correction in the report of my testimony; it is concerning the report as it appears, of Mrs. Morse's conversation with me; those conversations were held during the Summer and the Fall of 1870, while she was first my neighbor, then my housekeeper; I had no conversations with Mrs. Morse after she left my house in the Autumn of 1870; I think that during the four years that followed, I never had seen her or spoken to her. I make this correction because in one of the journals, this morning —

Mr. Everts—No matter what was the cause of the correction—you make this correction? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—He is stating what called his attention to it.

Mr. Everts—It is an explanation of his testimony. I have no objection to its being made. [To the Witness.] Mr. Tilton, you had among your acquaintances and contributors to The Independent, at that time, a clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Gilbert Haven, had you not? A. I don't remember whether he was a contributor at that time; he had been for many years a personal friend of mine.

Q. You knew him very well? A. Yes, Sir; he was one of my most intimate friends.

Q. He is now a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember of his being at your house in November of that year, and spending some days there—spending at least one night there? A. Bishop Haven has been at my house perhaps a hundred times. I cannot say he was there in November, or at any particular date.

Q. You cannot. Then you cannot recall, perhaps, whether at the time he made that visit and spent the night at your house—about that season or in that season—Mrs. Tilton was back from the West and was at your house? A. I simply recall the fact that Bishop Haven—both before he became a bishop and after—made many visits at my house.

Mr. Everts—I beg your pardon, I was not listening. A. I simply was saying that I recall the fact that Bishop Haven has for many years past made many visits at my house. I cannot recall the time.

Q. I understand that, and it is immaterial that you should not be able to remember. But you do not remember, as matter of fact, that at the time that Rev. Mr. Haven did make that visit to your house, about that time, in November, that Mrs. Tilton was there, back from the West? A. I do not remember that now; no, Sir.

Q. Now, upon further consideration can you or not tell us whether Mrs. Tilton did not come to your house from the West, and whether she did not remain there for at least a week or ten days before she left and went to her mother's? A. I cannot answer positively; my recollection is that on the morning she came from the West, she went to her mother's house; that on the morning she came from the West she first came to my house, and during the day she went to her mother's house, and then returned and told me that her mother insisted that she should no longer live at home.

Q. I do not care for the conversation. A. My recollection is that she then departed; whether that day or a few days after I will not be positive.

Q. When she arrived from the West did you not receive her at the cars? A. I did; I went over in the carriage and received her.

Q. To New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And she came to your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She went to see her mother that day—you are sure of that? A. I think she did.

Q. And she came back to your house from her mother's? A. Yes; at all events she told me; the point I remember is that she told me of her mother's conversation.

Q. You remember that she did come and talk with you, and therefore you know that she was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you recollect it was not until a week or ten days after that first return of hers, and her visit to her mother, and her return to your house from her mother's—that it was not until a week or ten days after that that she left your house and remained away? A. It may have been, Sir; I cannot testify positively.

Q. Now, how many days was she so absent and at her mother's on that occasion? A. My recollection is, two or three; I have no means of identifying the number.

Mr. Fullerton—Two or three what? A. Two or three days; that is my recollection; it may have been longer or shorter.

Mr. Everts—Now, do you remember her coming to your office during the time of her absence from the house or not? A. Yes, Sir; I remember sending for her to come down to the office of The Brooklyn Union, one day.

Q. And she came? A. Yes, Sir.

HOW MR. TILTON REGAINED HIS CHILD.

Q. Now, had she with her, at her mother's, in this absence, her infant child? A. I think she had, Sir.

Q. And do you remember during her call at your office, at your request, sending for the infant child, and taking it from Mrs. Morse, in your wife's absence, to your own house? A. Not during Mrs. Tilton's call at The Union office, Sir; I remember sending for the child very peremptorily, but it was not during Mrs. Tilton's call on me at The Union office.

Q. Was it not during Mrs. Tilton's absence from her mother's, upon your invitation? A. No, Sir; Mrs. Tilton made the call on me at the Brooklyn office, on a matter of business.

Q. When you sent for her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. My inquiry is whether, during her call, and that absence thus procured, you did not send for her infant child and take it away from her mother's, and bring it to your house? A. No, Sir; my sending for the child had nothing to do with the interview, and was not at the time; at all events, it was not at that time of the day.

Q. When was it that you sent for the child? A. I cannot identify the date. I think I wrote a note; if that note exists, and has a date, that will identify it, but my memory does not.

Q. Do you remember by whom you sent it? A. I have a recollection it was sent by Miss Ellen Dennis, the housekeeper; that is, I will not be sure of it.

Q. And did she know the contents of it, and the errand on which she was sent? A. I do not remember at present.

Q. Did she bring the child to your house, and separately from the mother? A. That I do not remember.

Q. You do not remember? A. I cannot remember whether she brought the child; the child came.

Q. It did not come alone? A. No, Sir; the child came; but whether Mrs. Tilton brought the child, or not, I do not know; the circumstance is utterly indistinct.

Q. You do not remember whether the child was brought to your house upon that message? A. That I remember, Sir; but who brought the child I do not remember.

Q. And brought separately from the mother? A. I remember this—that Mrs. Morse had taken Mrs. Tilton away from her home, which is forbid, and I sent for the child—to have the child brought back—

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I must insist upon the witness not putting in that which is not responsive.

The Witness—[Continuing.] But who brought the child back I cannot remember; the child was brought back at my command.

Mr. Evarts—I must object to this answer. I ask that it be—Well, it is not material. [To the witness.] And do you now remember that after this possession, acquired of the infant child, Mrs. Tilton returned to your house? A. Mrs. Tilton returned.

Q. And after you had the child? A. That I do not remember.

Q. But it was not before? A. I do not remember that.

Q. She did not come, leaving the infant child, did she? A. I have a recollection that Mrs. Tilton, about that time, went to New Brunswick, to see her daughter who was there at school.

Q. Well, what is your best recollection, Mr. Tilton? A. I have just given it to you, Sir.

Q. Is it that Mrs. Tilton returned to your house after you had possession of the infant child? A. I do not remember, Sir; the point at which my memory fails me is this—whether or not the child was brought back to my house while Mrs. Tilton was away, namely in New Brunswick; I have some recollection of that, but I don't fix the time; the child was brought to my house by my order: that I remember very distinctly.

Q. And in your wife's absence, as you believe? A. That I do not know.

Q. You don't know about that? A. No, I am not certain about it; I will not swear to it.

Q. The best recollection you have about the matter is that in the mother's absence you got the child? A. That is my best recollection; I will not make oath to it.

Q. And that after that she came back to your house? A. I don't remember whether she then considered my house her home, or not, because it all hinges on whether she was in New Brunswick at that time.

Q. I do not ask you that. I ask whether she came to your house, not whether she thought it her home or not? A. Yes, Sir, she certainly did come.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] Please look at this and see if that is the message that you sent for the child? A. I judge it to be so, Sir.

Q. Have you any doubt about it? A. None whatever.

Mr. Evarts—I will now read this:

"Ellen, wrap the baby very carefully and bring him home immediately.
THEODORE TILTON.
6:15 p. m."

Q. Who is "Ellen?" A. Miss Ellen Dennis, my housekeeper.

Q. Have you any doubt now that the baby came back under that message, and in the manner there directed? A. I have never had any doubt; I told you the child came by my order, but by whose hand I do not remember.

Q. Have you any doubt now that it came by the hand of Ellen, in pursuance of the errand on which she went? A. All I know of it is what that paper states; I know I sent for the child, and the child was brought to me.

Q. Do you mean that you have no recollection whatever concerning that transaction, except what this paper furnishes?

Judge Nelson—Oh, no!

Mr. Fullerton—He does not state that at all.

Judge Nelson—No; I understand him to say that he has no recollection of who carried the child back—whether Ellen or somebody else.

The Witness—That is so, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Let me read the note again.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no dispute as to the contents of the letter.

Mr. Evarts—But I asked him, on refreshing his mind by looking at this letter, whether he has now any doubt that the child was brought back under that order and according to that direction?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that—one moment.

Judge Neilson—I think he can answer that.

Mr. Fullerton—That question has been answered twice.

Judge Neilson—I think it has, but he may answer it again. [To the witness.] Have you any doubt on that subject?

Mr. Fullerton—I think it is time my learned friend should become satisfied with two answers to the same question, without requiring it to be answered a third time. But if your Honor will take notice, that has been the practice of the learned counsel.

Mr. Evarts—It is very easy to satisfy me with one answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Then you ought not to put it again. If you put it after you are satisfied, it is all the worse.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer was here called upon to read the question and answer as given, and the question was repeated.]

The Witness—My answer to that is, that the note does not, in the slightest degree, refresh my mind; I stated before that the child was brought back under my order; I would not now be willing to swear, after having seen the note, that the little babe was brought by Miss Ellen Dennis, because a servant might have brought the child; I have no personal knowledge as to the child having been brought back to my house by this person or by that person; my knowledge is that the child was away, and that I sent for the child, and that in obedience to my order the child was brought back.

Q. And this was the order? A. Yes, this is the order. Have I made it clear, Mr. Evarts?

Q. Were you at home when the child came. A. I don't remember that.

Q. You observe that this note is dated 6:15 p. m.? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you not remember whether you were at home when the child came? A. I remember nothing about it except that note.

Q. Do you remember how old the child was at that time?

Judge Neilson—Counsel means about how old.

The Witness—That is a sort of problem which always puzzled me. The child was born in June, 1869, and that was December, 1870. How old would that be?

Mr. Fullerton—Nearly eighteen months.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That shows how old it was. Do you remember whether the child was then sick? A. No, Sir; the child could not have been very sick or it would not have been moved.

[The note was marked "Exhibit D, 102."]

MR. TILTON'S ANSWERS TO THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Mr. Tilton, upon the occasion of your attendance and hearing and answering questions before the Committee of the church, please say if this occurred: Did you, upon being asked this question, "You say, Mr. Tilton, for a year after what you stated as Mrs. Tilton's confession, she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow?"— In answer to that, did you say: "Yes, Elizabeth was in a sort of vaporous, light cloud; she was between light and dark; she could not see that it was wrong; she maintained to her mother, in my presence, that she had not done wrong; she cannot bear to do wrong; a sense of having done wrong is enough to crush her; she naturally seeks, for her own peace of conscience, a verdict; she never would have had these relations if she had supposed, at the time, that they were wrong. Elizabeth never does anything that at the time seems wrong. For such a large moral nature there is a lack of a certain balance and equipoise; she has not a will that guides and restrains, but Elizabeth never does, at any time, that which does not have the stamp of her conscience, at the time, upon it." Did you say that in answer to the question that has been read to you? A. I said something like that, Sir; I do not know how accurately it is reported.

Q. Substantially, did you say that? A. There is a phrase there about her saying that she had not "violated her marriage vow." I think that as I put it was that "she thought she had not"—not that she positively insisted she had not; but the substance of that statement, I think, is very true of Mrs. Tilton. If you will let me look at it now, or read it over again—

Mr. Evarts—I will do so.

The Witness—Then I will tell you where I think it true, and where I think it is not.

Q. I will ask you another question and then hand it to you; they are connected. On this answer being made by you, so far as it was made, were you then asked this question: "Do you say that she did or did not insist that she had—" [To Mr. Fullerton.] I suppose the question should read "not" violated her marriage vow—it reads "violated" her marriage vow.

Mr. Fullerton—You must not appeal to me to know how it should read; I do not know anything about it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, in answer to the question put to you, did you say: "She always was saying that it never seemed to her wrong; and 'Theodore, I do not now see that I have wronged you'?"

A. She frequently said that during the year.

Q. Did you make this answer? That is all I have asked you I asked you what she said? A. Something like that.

Q. You did? A. I won't make oath to the words. I should like to read it a little more carefully before I answer it definitely.

Mr. Evarts—That is enough for me. We have got your answer now, and if you wish to look at the passages I have read you can. [Handing book to witness.] Look at the passage included in brackets.

The Witness—With some little corrections I would be very happy to have this statement stand, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Well, now.

The Witness—Shall I make the corrections?

Mr. Evarts—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Won't you read the answers?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the answers.

Mr. Evarts—I am satisfied with those answers; I don't ask anything further of this witness in that regard. [To the witness]

Q. On that occasion were you asked this question, and did you make the answer that I shall read, following it? This is the question: "Q. Well, she is a character who could have an intimacy and reverence and enthusiasm for a man of Mr. Beecher's temperament and religious convictions and teachings, and carry it to an extreme length without the thought of passion or criminality?" A. I do not think the thought of passion and of criminality were in her breast at all; I think they were altogether in his. I think she thought only of her love and reverence." Did you answer that? A. I don't remember whether I did or not, Sir; but if I didn't then I answer it here now. That is the truth.

Q. Were you then asked, "Such a character would not excite the thought of jealousy as to her?" A. Not in the slightest; I never had the slightest feeling of jealousy in regard to Elizabeth." A. What is your question?

Q. Whether you were asked that question, and made that answer? A. I don't remember, Sir; but it is true. I had unlimited confidence in her.

Q. Were you asked this question immediately following what you have now been inquired about—this is the question: "The fact that she was manifesting this enthusiasm and all that would not lead you to suspect her motives and purity originally?" Did you answer: "It would not; later it did." A. I don't remember the latter clause of that. Evidently the answer which I gave to that question was that never until the disclosures came out had I put any other than an innocent interpretation on her relationship to Mr. Beecher.

Q. So that you say now, no; never until those alleged disclosures, did you put anything but an innocent interpretation upon it? A. No, Sir; never until then.

Q. Never until then? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you then asked this question, and did you make this answer: "For how long a period?" A. I do not know; I remember I wrote, Sir, some letters which, if she has kept them, would fix the date. There was a time when I felt that Mr. Beecher was using his influence greatly upon her." A. Yes, Sir; but that was not in any passionate way.

Q. You made that answer? A. I don't remember my answer to the Committee. I am speaking now the truth as it exists.

Q. If you made that answer, you say you didn't mean to convey it in any passionate view? A. No, Sir; I meant, Mr. Evarts, to say that until the story was told me by her own lips in July, 1870, I had put no harmful construction on her relation, having, as I have just stated, unlimited confidence in my wife.

Q. Excepting that (I do not take your answer as to anything that came from her which I have not asked about, and which the law excludes), you mean to say until the date in July, that you have referred to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you then following, and in this line of inquiry, asked this: "To control her in her domestic relations with you?" A. No; but to win her. He was always trying to get her to say that she loved him better than me." A. No, Sir; that was part of the story which she told me in July.

Q. You don't admit this? A. No, Sir; that came to me—

Q. That question and answer you don't recognize? A. No Sir; I do not.

Q. Are you quite sure that the question and answer were not as they read here? A. They could not have been in that connection.

Q. Very well; that is your answer? A. But I remember her saying—

Q. Were you then asked this question: "She never would say?" and did you answer, "I don't think she ever did?" A. That is part, also, of her statement which she made to me.

Q. I don't ask you that. My only question to you is, and your answer must be confined to it, whether that question was put to you and whether you made that answer to it? A. Mr. Evarts, I have no knowledge of the questions put to me on that occasion, or the answers I made to them, other than the imperfect record in that purported cross-examination, which I repudiated, except to say that now, when you put the questions to me again, I must answer them out of my memory as to the exact truth.

Q. No, you must answer as to the exact truth about which you are asked, which is whether that question was asked you and whether you made that answer. That is all. I am not asking you whether it was true, but simply whether such a question was asked you, and whether such an answer was made by you? A. I have given you the answer I must have made to the question. Those answers, there are some of them correct and some of them incorrect; there is a great deal of bungling.

Q. I am taking your statement as to whether such a question was asked you and whether such an answer was made by you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is the end of my question, and the answer to the same. It is not a question concerning the truth, but whether that question was asked and answered? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you then asked this question: "You do not believe she ever felt or believed it, do you?" A. What is that, Sir?

Q. The previous subject was whether she ever would say she loved Mr. Beecher better than you, and now follows this next question. The answer, as I have read it to you, was that you don't think she ever did. You don't, as I understand it, recognize these questions and answers. Then I asked you this one. Now, following that, were you asked this question: "You do not believe she ever felt or believed it, do you?" And did you answer to that question, "No; that is to say, in one sense, she loved him. She loved his religious views; she loved him as an evangelical minister, and I don't think that, on the whole, he was as much to her as I was. Still, of course, Mr. Tracy, I cannot question her motive. If she should say he was more to her than I was, I could not dispute it." Did you hear such a question, and did you make such an answer on that occasion? A. I don't remember either the question or the answer; but what is incorrect in the answer is the phrase, "I don't question her motive." There is no sense in the phrase in that connection. What I evidently meant to say was, that I would not question her own assertion. In other words, if she should say that she loved Mr. Beecher more than she loved me, why, I would take her word for it.

Q. With that correction, do you, or not, remember that such a question was asked, and whether such an answer was made? A. No, Sir; I don't remember either the question or the answer.

HOW MR. TILTON USED HIS SHORTHAND.

Q. Mr. Tilton, you are an expert phonographer, are you not—a practiced phonographic reporter? A. Well, Sir, I am a phonographer.

Q. And you have had a long practice in it as part of your profession? A. I studied phonography when I was a boy; I have not practiced it very much since.

Q. Didn't you, during a good many years, practice phonography? A. No, Sir; oh! well, incidentally, not professionally.

Q. Well, for some years, you did professionally? A. I have reported some of your speeches, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that would not give you much practice, for I made very few.

Mr. Beach—I don't know. They were pretty long when they were made. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Tilton, will you tell us, or not, whether you are an expert phonographer? A. Solomon says: "Let another praise thee, and not thine own lips."

Q. Well, what has Solomon to do with your case? A. He is the wisest man I know of myself.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] The question is whether you consider yourself an expert phonographer.

The Witness—Well, Sir, I shall have to answer yes, but it is under compulsion.

Judge Neilson—Certainly.

Mr. Evarts—That will stand, and that is an answer to my question. [To the witness.] Now, during the period of the conferences and consultations and reading and hearing papers which have been spoken of in your own direct testimony, in which you and Mr. Beecher, or you, Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton took part, were you in the habit of making phonographic copies of all papers that were in Mr. Moulton's hands, that came to your notice or knowledge? A. No, Sir; I made some notes of some which I thought important; not a great many.

Q. Did you not habitually and systematically take phonographic copies of all papers that were brought to your notice during these conferences and consultations?

Mr. Fullerton—That is the same question right over again, precisely.

The Witness—[To Mr. Evarts.] Oh! no, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I am willing he should answer it; but once is enough.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] You did not? A. No, Sir; I did not; I made notes of very few of them; not one-twentieth part of the whole papers. That is a rough guess.

Q. Can you state those that you did thus copy? A. Well, Sir, if you will bring me my last statement I can point out to you those which I made copies of.

Judge Neilson—He wants your present recollection.

Mr. Beach—It will probably be refreshed by his statement.

Mr. Evarts—I have nothing to do with refreshing his recollection.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] Then you are not bound to refresh your memory; let it be.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] I will take your answer: can you state those of which you did make copies in the way that I have inquired of? A. If you will pass the papers under review before my eye, I can tell you every one; but I cannot evoke them out of the pile and make them stand before my memory.

Q. Your memory regarding the transactions as they occurred, and the papers as they arose in these transactions, does not enable you to remember any paper that you copied? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. Now, will you give me those? A. I was simply saying I should not like to recite here from memory, under oath, all the papers that I copied.

Q. I asked you to name those that you did. A. You asked me to name all; now you ask me to name one.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Name those that you did copy.

Mr. Evarts—Name all that you remember? A. I made a copy of Mr. Beecher's letter of January 1st, 1871, called the letter of contrition.

Q. When did you do that? A. On the same evening when I saw it.

Q. Now, go on with any others. A. I made a copy of the letter of the 7th of February, which Mr. Beecher sent to Mrs. Tilton through my hands; also a copy of Mr. Beecher's letter of the 7th of February.

Q. And at the time, I suppose? A. At that time, which I borrowed to shew to Mrs. Tilton, I made both of those; I remember that.

Q. That is the letter to Mr. Moulton of the 7th of February? A. Yes, Sir.

A. And those you made at the time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The copies you made at the time? A. I made copies of my own letters.

Q. You kept copies of your own letters, or made copies of them? A. Yes, Sir; for instance, my letter to Mr. Bowen of January 1st, 1871, and generally of my own letters. My impression is that of all the many letters outside of those which Mr. Beecher sent to Mr. Moulton—forty or fifty, are there not?

Q. I don't know. A. That I made a copy of a fragment of two, namely, part of the letter of June 1st, 1873, and part, or two parts, of Mr. Beecher's letter dated February something, 1872.

Mr. Morris—February 5th.

The Witness—The "ragged edge letter," as it is called.

Mr. Morris—Yes, February 5th.

The Witness—Just at this moment I don't remember making any other copy, still I won't stand on it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I understand that. This is your present recollection? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, are you quite certain that you did not copy the whole of these two last named letters—that of June 1st and that of February 5th? A. I am quite sure, Sir.

Q. "Certain," was my question? A. Yes, Sir; no, I only had parts. That letter of February 5th, 1872—is that the "ragged edge letter?"

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Yes, Sir, I had a copy of fragments of that, and afterward made the error in my sworn statement of supposing they were extracted from two different letters.

Q. Now, that is the basis of your present recollection as to your making copies of papers as they passed along? A. Well,

Sir, if you would give me all the papers, all the letters in the case; that I may take them up one by one, I think then I can tell you whether I copied this or didn't copy that.

Q. But, without that aid, this is all you can now remember? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And, as I understand you, you are quite certain that, as a general thing, you did not so copy them? A. Oh! as a general thing I did not, Sir; I copied very little—very few. There was a multitudinous correspondence of four years, of which I copied a very small portion; indeed, I saw a very small portion of it.

Q. Now, did you, on this examination before the Committee, in answer to a question, make the answer which I will read: "Q. Can you produce a copy? A. I do not know, and I am sorry I cannot tell you. I have a mass of phonographic notes. Whenever these letters came, whenever there was anything in them that Frank wanted me to see, he would read them to me. Whenever Mr. Beecher said anything that he thought, being read to me would gratify my feelings and conduce to a compromise of peace between us, speaking of the kindness with which I had treated him, or of the difficulties, Frank read them to me, and, as I wrote shorthand, I always used to make a copy of them." A. I did not say "always;" I said I sometimes did, very rarely.

Q. You think that, in your answer, you used the word "sometimes" instead of "always"? A. Well, I don't know what I said in my answer other than what is there. I know exactly that a little handful of notes—

Q. My only question is whether you were asked that question, and whether you made that answer to it? A. It is utterly impossible that I should have said "always," because I did not always make them; I very rarely made them.

Q. That is a question of morals, whether a man may say a thing he didn't do. My question is whether you did, or not? A. Well, Sir; I don't remember either the question or the fact, telling you the fact.

Q. That I didn't inquire about; I have got through with that. Now, will you tell us what system of phonography it was that you practiced? There are systems of various names, are there not—various styles? A. Well, Sir, when I learned phonography it was called Pitman's System; I don't know that it has been changed since. My friend, Mr. Munson, has introduced some improvements, and I believe the new system bears his name. Phonography is distinct from stenography.

Q. You practiced phonography? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was Pitman's system? When was it you learned it? A. Oh, when I was quite a boy.

Q. After you had left the Academy? A. Oh, no, Sir! long before I left the Academy.

Q. Before you left the Academy? A. When I was a boy at a public school.

NO LETTERS DESTROYED BY MR. TILTON.

Q. Now, Sir, have you at any time destroyed any of Mr. Beecher's letters that passed or came to your notice during these transactions? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. Have you at any time destroyed any of Mr. Beecher's letters that passed in these transactions, or came to your notice at any time? A. I never had any of Mr. Beecher's letters,

Sir. Mr. Beecher never wrote me any letters. I don't understand what you refer to.

Q. Well, I will have to repeat my question. Have you at any time destroyed any letters or papers from Mr. Beecher, that came in any of these transactions, conferences, or consultations, or came to your notice during the period between the 28th of December, 1870, and the present time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Very well. A. I never had any to destroy.

Judge Neilson—That is not necessary to the answer. Say "No;" that answers it.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you destroyed any papers or letters of Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir; not one.

Q. That arose in the same way and during the same period? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or any of your own, either to Mr. Beecher or to Mr. Moulton, or that was used or shown to either of them during the progress of this—of these consultations between you? A. No, Sir; none whatever. May it please your Honor, I think perhaps that answer ought to be amended to this extent. Mr. Moulton is in the habit very frequently of writing me two or three little lines, saying, "Dear Theodore, come around and join me at supper"—something of that sort. I never kept any such notes as those.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to qualify it.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! Of course.

The Witness—I didn't quite understand the purport of your question, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—You understand the meaning of it now? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You don't understand the objects you mean. A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, I didn't intend to tell you. A. Well, how can you expect me to give you a proper answer?

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't know.

Mr. Beach—I think the object is very apparent.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the witness says it is not to him.

Mr. Beach—He attributes that to your mystery, which I do not.

Mr. Evarts—I haven't any mystery about it, not the least.

The Witness—I have just said under oath that I have not destroyed any of Mr. Moulton's letters in the last four years. I presume I have destroyed many little notes.

Mr. Evarts—Well, you may make any qualification, of course.

Judge Neilson—Well, you have never destroyed any notes or letters except little notes? A. Yes, Sir; I have destroyed no important paper.

Mr. Evarts—My inquiry was substantially, of course, confined to papers that had arisen and been the subject of consideration? A. Yes. Well, I wish to make my answer consistent with my oath.

BESSIE TURNER'S LETTERS.

Mr. Evarts—Of course it is entirely proper. Do you remember, Mr. Tilton, that very soon after the 1st of January, 1871, an inmate of your house, Miss Bessie Turner as she has been called, left it and went to the West? You remember that fact? A. I remember that she went to the West, but—

Q. Well, that is all that is asked. A. You spoke of her as an inmate of my house, which leads me to say that notwithstanding the fact that I answered you a day or two ago that she had resided there until 1870, I find, on reflection, that previous to that time she had gone to a public institution of some sort, I don't know exactly what, and had also resided awhile in the family of Mr. David Dewa, of New York. I think those circumstances had faded from my mind when I answered. In other words, she had not been living in my house—

Q. Continuously? A. Continuously. I don't think she was there during the year 1870 at all.

Q. That is, not continuously from the time when she first came to you until the time she left? A. No, Sir.

Q. She was not there continuously during that whole period? A. No, Sir. I don't think she had lived there for a considerable period preceding that.

Q. Now, can you give me the periods of these absences that you have now adverted to? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. Can you state what year either or both of them were? A. Either or both of what, Sir?

Judge Neilson—The absences.

Mr. Evarts—The absences. Can you state the year during which either or both of the absences occurred? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. Very well. A. Yes.

Q. Was it near this time of 1870? A. My present impression is that possibly, in 1868 and '69, she was away, either at this institution or at Mr. Dow's family, and then she went away to the West and was there when Mrs. Tilton was West, and returned with Mrs. Tilton from the West. That is the best recollection I have.

Q. That is, during that year 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that your idea, so far as you have it in your memory, is that the year, 1870, was the time of these absences? A. Either that year or the year preceding, but I cannot speak definitely.

Mr. Beach—I understood him to say that his impression was that she was not there during 1870.

Mr. Evarts—I say, these absences occurred during the year 1870.

The Witness—A. Yes, Sir; my impression is, she did not reside at my house during the year 1870 nor 1869. That is my impression.

Q. Both years? A. Yes, Sir; that is my recollection?

Q. Then substantially both those years she could not be considered a member of your family? A. Yes, Sir; still I may be wrong about it.

Q. Very well; I don't know how that is; I want to get it straight before we start.

Mr. Beach [To Mr. FuHerton]—He has just started.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; on this I have just started. [To witness]—Now, before she went to the West she wrote, did she not, two letters? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. Before she went to the West, in January, 1871, or after January, 1871, she wrote two letters, did she not, which have been given in evidence here? A. Yes, Sir; I presume they are hers. I didn't see her write them. Her name is signed to them.

Q. You know what letters I refer to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. They are in evidence here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have them in your mind sufficiently to be a basis — A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To the Court.] I am reminded, Sir, by my associate and my opponent together, that it is one o'clock.

Judge Neilson—Wouldn't it be convenient to close your cross-examination before the recess?

Mr. Evarts—That would depend entirely, Sir, upon how convenient it would be to postpone the recess until I had finished my cross-examination. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Will gentlemen keep their seats a moment. [To the Jury.] Please return at two o'clock.

Mr. Mallison—[Clerk.] The Court will now take a recess until two o'clock.

A POSSIBLE SCANDAL FORGOTTEN.

After recess, the cross-examination of Mr. Tilton was continued as follows:

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, before Miss Bessie Turner left for the West, in or after January, 1871, were any letters taken from her, written by her, except these letters that have been given in evidence—these two that I asked your attention to? A. I know nothing of any such circumstance, Sir.

Q. Of any other letters? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, that is what I understand—that you don't know of any other letters having been taken or written by her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, Mr. Tilton, whether, upon the occasion of the conversation between you and Mr. Bowen on the occasion when Oliver Johnson was present at a part of the interview, in December, before the 26th or on the 26th of December—do you remember whether or no, in regard to any stories about you as there made the subject of consideration, there was any reference to an occurrence with which you were charged with being connected in Northfield, Minnesota? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember when you were in Northfield, Minnesota, in one of your lecturing tours? A. Could not fix the date.

Q. But do you remember of being there at all? A. Remember of lecturing there once.

Q. Now, do you remember when that was? A. I could not fix it.

Q. Which season? A. It is a good while ago; several years ago; six or seven years ago, I should think; I remember staying at the house of a clergyman.

Q. Well, I want to fix the date of that if I can, if your memory will enable you to do so. Was it in '67-8 or '68-9, or earlier? A. I could not fix that, Sir, but I think I can get the date for you by applying to my lecture agent, as I did yesterday for the date at Tidlouta.

Q. Well, we will have to get the date, of course, correctly, if it is to be had at all. A. What circumstance do you refer to?

Q. Well, I go on now. You remember lecturing there, and being the guest of a clergyman there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the date of that we, perhaps, would like. Well, do you remember, as among the stories or imputations, without regard to the question whether there was anything in it or not, that there was a topic or subject of imputation or charge against you in reference to your conduct while there? A. Never heard of it, Sir, until this moment.

Q. Never heard of it up to this time? A. No, Sir.

Q. And it was not a topic mentioned or referred to, so as to define it—mark it, in that conversation between you and Mr. Bowen? A. No, Sir; I have never heard anything about it until your mention of it now.

Q. Very well; you have referred to an occurrence, Mr. Tilton, upon an occasion which you put somewhere I think, from the 15th to the 20th of January, 1871, an occasion during Mr. Moulton's serious illness, in which Mr. Beecher accosted you, meeting you at the house of Mr. Moulton as he was leaving it, and saluted you with a kiss on the forehead? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember that occurrence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, in the years of your acquaintance with Mr. Beecher, and up to the time of any estrangement at whatever date you put that fact in your intercourse, were you and Mr. Beecher in the habit of saluting one another with a kiss? A. No, Sir; we had done so in earlier years occasionally.

Q. Well, I have asked you up to the period of any estrangement between you? A. Oh, I beg your pardon: I thought you asked me during these last four years.

Q. Oh, no, I say up to the period of any estrangement between you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you been in the habit of saluting one another with a kiss? A. Not in the habit, Sir; but it had been done.

Q. Well, was it a frequent occurrence? A. No, Sir; not frequent.

Q. But it was occasional? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. There was nothing marked or unusual, was there, during the period of this friendship of yours that you should salute one another with a kiss? There was no habit, Sir; it was rather a noticeable event that any such thing happened.

CHRISTENING OF THE LETTER OF CONTRITION.

Q. It would be rather a noticeable occurrence, yes. Mr. Tilton, when did this name for the paper of the 1st of January, 1871, of the Letter of Contrition first come to be given to it? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. Was it not spoken of and described, so far as you know, up to the time of this trial, as an apology?

Mr. Beach—I submit, Sir, that that is wholly immaterial what it may have been spoken of abroad.

Judge Neilson—Do you mean spoken of between the parties?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; between the parties.

Mr. Beach—Between the parties, well that is not the question.

Judge Neilson—I cannot conceive it would be proper except in that view.

Mr. Evarts—People that hadn't anything to do with it, of course, I don't care what they called it. [To the witnesses]: Hadn't it been in any descriptions of it so far as you know occurring between Mr. Moulton and yourself or in which you gave publicity to any descriptions of it, spoken of as the apology until the time of this trial? A. Do I understand you now to refer to the manner in which it has been characterized by Mr. Beecher in talking with me?

Q. By you or Mr. Moulton in any description, public or private, that you have given of it, hasn't it been called an apology? A. Mr. Beecher always characterized it as my letter through Mr. Moulton—that was his word; there was never any characterization put upon it until I characterized it in the Bacon letter as an apology.

Q. As an apology. Then, up to the time of this trial, so far as any characterization by you was concerned, it had not been called an apology? A. No, Sir; I don't think that any characterization was given to it until—certainly not by me—until the narrative which I designed to publish in the Fall or Winter of 1872. I think there I characterized it as an apology.

Q. I don't ask anything about the contents of any paper. So far as you know, in any reference to it by descriptive titles, had it been called by you an apology up to the time of this trial? A. Well, it had been called in various ways; it depended on the person that I spoke to. I once or twice referred to Mr. Beecher—I once or twice spoke to Mr. Beecher on the subject, always speaking of it as his letter.

Q. Well, I don't ask you any conversation. I only—

Mr. Beach—Yes, you do.

Mr. Evarts—No, I don't ask for any conversation at all.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't see how anybody can characterize it without conversing.

Mr. Evarts—I only ask for a single fact, whether he had described it, when he had given a descriptive title to it—not when he had spoken about it—by any other description than that of an apology.

Mr. Beach—Well, he was about to tell you?

Mr. Evarts—He was about to tell me the conversations that he had had concerning it, which I did not ask for.

Judge Neilson—This might be answered yes, or no.

The Witness—Well, Sir, I don't remember making any description of it whatever.

Mr. Evarts—What is the answer? A. I said I did not recollect ever having made any special description of it.

Q. Yes; except in the Bacon letter. There you called it an apology? A. Oh! yes, Sir; there it was characterized as an apology.

Q. Now, when and how did this descriptive name for it that has been used in this trial—of "The Letter of Contrition"—originate; did it originate with you? A. My impression is, Sir, that when a portion of the letter was printed, in what is called the Bacon letter, the newspaper press very generally characterized it as Mr. Beecher's letter of contrition.

Q. You think that name is taken from that public criticism upon it? A. That is my best recollection, Sir.

Q. Were you in your examination before the Committee asked this question, and did you make the answer that I read to it? [Reading:] "Did you, or did you not, as a matter of fact, accept the apology which Mr. Beecher made and forgive the offense?" A. I accepted the apology and forgave the offense with as much largeness as I thought it was possible for a Christian man to assume." Were you asked that question, and did you make that answer? A. I think quite likely, Sir; I have no distinct recollection of it.

Q. Were you asked this question, and did you make this answer upon the same appearance before the Committee, and examination [reading]: "I ask you whether your relations and feelings towards Mr. Beecher, since January 1st, 1871, have not been friendly?" A. Yes, Sir; my relations and feelings toward him since January, 1871, when he made the apology, down to the time when the church began to put out its right hand and take me by the throat, were friendly."

The Witness—Well, Sir, friendly in the sense that they were not hostile.

Q. Well, I ask you only whether you were asked that question and made that answer? A. Well, Sir, will you be kind enough to read a little further; and I think you will come to a modification of the statement.

Mr. Evarts—I will read the next question. I only want, however, your answer whether you made that?

Mr. Beach—Well, he says with a modification.

Mr. Evarts—No, he does not say a modification; he made it in the next one.

The Witness—Please read a little further, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—I will. I will read the next, but that has not disposed of the present question. I ask you whether that question was asked you, and you made that answer? A. Well, Sir, all I can say about that is, that I don't remember either the question or the answer, except as I have read both question and answer in that report; that is all the aid I have to my memory on the subject.

Q. Well, I must take your answer, whatever it is. Was that question asked you and did you make that answer? A. Well, Sir, I say I don't know whether it was asked me, and I don't know whether I made that answer; the probability is something like that was asked me and that I answered something like that, only that I beg you to do me the favor to read a little further, for I think there is a modification of the answer.

Q. I told you that I would, but that does not dispose of the question whether that was asked and answered.

Mr. Beach—Well, he has disposed of it.

Mr. Evarts—I know. This is the next question; and I ask you whether this question was asked you, and whether you made the answer [reading]: "They are not now friendly, but they were friendly up to the beginning of the action of the church?" A. Yes, Sir; that is to say, they were friendly in the sense that we were not in collision with each other."

The Witness—Yes, Sir; that is the only sense in which Mr. Beecher and I have been friends for the last four years.

Q. Now, these two questions and answers, you think, then, were asked and made? A. All I know about whether they were asked or answered is simply the record of them in that book, that report; I have no recollection other than that record of it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, my only point is, to find out from you whether they were asked and answered.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he has answered the question three or four different times.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; I won't criticise him, however; it is not my business to do that. What do you say? Were both these questions asked and both answered?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, he has asked the question three times.

Mr. Evarts—Now, which way has he answered it?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am not here to tell you.

Mr. Beach—He has answered it by saying that he has no recollection independent of the record in this book.

Mr. Evarts—I do not understand that. Will you read the answer that has been made, stenographer?

[Last answer of the witness read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Q. Now, upon that record and that recollection, will you say whether or not the questions were asked and the answers given? A. Cannot say, Sir. The chief questions which I recollect in regard to that Committee were the questions which were not asked me.

MR. BEECHER'S LETTERS ABOUT MRS. WOODHULL'S STORY.

Mr. Evarts—No matter; I don't ask you anything else; I am not asking for any new information—only, whether you did, or not, say a certain thing at a certain time. Just look at that letter, Mr. Tilton, and say in whose handwriting it is? [Letter handed to the witness.] A. It is in the handwriting of Mr. Beecher, Sir.

Q. Do you remember receiving that and conveying it to your wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You received it from Mr. Beecher personally? A. No, Sir.

Q. From Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. There is no date on this; do you remember, in any connection, what time, what year, what part of a year it was? A. My recollection is, Sir, it was written about six months after the events to which it alludes; and the date was omitted in order—

Q. Well, no matter about it; I only want to get the fact.

The Witness—To make no inconsistency.

Q. You think it was written in the—? A. Spring of 1873.

Mr. Evarts [reading]:

MY DEAR MRS. TILTON: I hoped that you would be shielded from the knowledge of the great wrong that has been done to you, and through you to universal womanhood. I can hardly bear to speak of it, or allude to a matter than which nothing can be imagined more painful to a pure and womanly nature. I pray daily for you "that your faith fail not." You yourself know the way and the power of prayer. God has been your refuge in many sorrows before. He will now hide you in his pavilion until the storm be overpast. The rain that beats down the flower to the earth will pass at length, and the stem, bent, but not broken, will rise again and blossom as before.

Every pure woman on earth will feel that this wanton and unprovoked assault is aimed at you, but reaches to universal womanhood.

Meantime your dear children will love you with double ten-deanness, and Theodore, against whom these shafts are hurled, will hide you in his heart of hearts.

I am glad that this revelation from the pit has given him a slight of the danger that was before hidden by specious appearance and promises of usefulness.

Mr. Morris—It is a misprint here (i. e., in a book which he held).

Mr. Evarts—"Specious," it is here—"by specious appearances and promises of usefulness. May God keep him in courage in the arduous struggle which he wages against adversity, and bring him out, though much tried, like gold seven times fined.

I have not spoken of myself. No word could express the sharpness and depth of my sorrow in your behalf, my dear and honored friend. God walks in the fire by the side of those He loves and, in heaven, neither you nor Theodore, nor I, shall regret the discipline, how hard sever it may seem now.

May He restrain and turn those poor creatures who have been given over to all this sorrowful harm to those who have deserved no such treatment at their hands.

I commend you to my mother's God, my dear friend! May His smile bring light in darkness, and His love be a perpetual Summer to you!

Very truly yours,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Q. The occurrence to which this refers is the publication of the Woodhull scandal, is it not? A. Yes, Sir; which had taken place several months previous.

Q. Well, which had taken place; we know when it took place. What it refers to is the Woodhull scandal? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The publication of the Woodhull scandal.

[Letter marked "D, 103."]

WHAT MR. TILTON SAID TO MR. HALLIDAY.

Q. After the publication of the Woodhull scandal in November, 1872, did you have a conversation with Mr. Halliday on the subject of that scandal, or anything that should be said or done in consequence of it? A. I remember a conversation that I had with Mr. Halliday in company with Mr. Bell; I do not remember the date precisely.

Q. Very well; that is the time to which I refer. A. Yes.

Q. Where was that? A. At Mr. Halliday's house.

Q. And by previous appointment? A. That I have forgotten, Sir.

Q. Well, I don't know, I am sure. You were together there; you three persons were together there on this occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it by previous appointment or not? A. I have already answered you, Sir.

Q. Well, you mean that you don't know; is that your answer, that you don't know? A. I have already answered that I did not recollect.

Q. Very well; then so far as you remember about it, it was mere chance that you three were together, was it? A. I have already answered that, Sir.

Q. Well, do you answer it in that way, that it was mere chance that you came together, so far as you know? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, what is the answer? A. I have told you that I did not recollect whether it was by previous appointment. I could not say it was by mere chance unless I knew it was by mere chance.

Q. Well, so far as you have any recollection concerning the circumstances, it was a chance interview, was it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, how otherwise? A. I have no recollection whether it was a chance interview, or an interview by appointment. I have no recollection on the subject.

Q. Were you then in the habit of being at Mr. Halliday's? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you say whether this was on the 18th of November? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or about that time? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—What year?

Mr. Evarts—1872—very shortly after the publication. [To the witness.] What degree of acquaintance had you with Mr. Halliday prior to that interview? A. Very slight, Sir; I don't know that I had had any.

Q. Now, upon coming into Mr. Halliday's presence, or at the commencement of any discourse or conversation with him, did you say, "I want to see you?" A. I don't remember that, Sir.

Q. Do you remember how the conversation was introduced? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, at that stage of the matter, taking a seat? A. No, Sir.

Q. On the sofa? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't remember whether you continued standing or sat down? Did you then say, "I came at the request of my friend, Frank Moulton, to speak with you concerning the Woodhull scandal?" A. I don't remember whether I did or not, Sir. The circumstances have passed out of my mind, so that I cannot answer positively.

Q. Do you remember, then, upon Mr. Bell's concluding some conversation he had with Mr. Halliday, and rising to leave, your saying to him, "George, don't go?" A. That I said "George?"

Q. "Don't go;" yes, to Mr. Bell. A. No, Sir; I never called him George in my life.

Q. Very well. A. I may have asked him not to go, but I did not address him that way.

Q. Well, you may have asked him not to go, but you do not think you addressed him by his first name? A. I don't think I did.

Q. Were you not well acquainted with Mr. Bell? A. I have known Mr. Bell from my boyhood, but not intimately; I don't think I ever should have ventured to speak to him with that degree of familiarity.

Q. Well, I don't care about that; but you knew him; he was not a stranger to you, as Mr. Halliday was? A. Not at all—a man whom I hold in very high respect.

Q. And you knew him quite well at that time. And then did Mr. Halliday, in answer to a look of Mr. Bell's to him, say: "Don't go; if Mr. Tilton wants you, stop?" A. I don't remember that, Sir.

Q. Did you then, in the presence of those two gentlemen, say this: "I have called to see Mr. Halliday at the request of my friend, Frank Moulton, to speak with him concerning the Woodhull scandal. I have come to deny it. It is as false as can be. There is not a word of truth in it." Did you say that? A. I don't remember that I did, Sir; it is quite likely that I did, though; either that or the substance of it. Mr. Moulton and I pursued the same plan of denial.

Q. Now, don't qualify. I am asking you simply whether you said this or that thing. [To the Court.] I ask that anything be struck out, your Honor, that is not an answer to that.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know. What do you want struck out?

Mr. Evarts—Well, I ask his Honor to so rule.

Judge Neilson—The witness will confine himself to your questions.

Mr. Evarts—And what he has said in addition I ask to have struck out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—That leaves it quite uncertain what is struck out. Judge Neilson—That last remark.

Mr. Beach—Very well—about Mr. Moulton. That we have no objection to.

Q. Did you then say that the whole thing was a mere fabrication? A. I do not know that I used that phraseology, but I remember using some very energetic words, to blot out from their minds the idea that there was anything in that story. I do not think I used any such weak stuff as that. [Laughter.] I think I swept it away at a breath.

Q. This is less strong than you put it, is it? A. I trust so; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you disclaim all knowledge of its publication? A. I don't remember that; probably I did.

Q. Did you state that you were away campaigning when it made its appearance, and were perfectly astonished when it was printed? A. I don't remember that I said that.

Q. Did you, referring to that publication, also say, "It is just as false as it would be for me to go over to New-York and say that the tree in front of Mr. Halliday's house was covered with five hundred flags, representing all nations of the earth?" A. I don't remember that, Sir. I didn't know that he had a house in New York.

Q. I will read the question to you again? A. Thank you, Sir.

Q. Did you say, "It is just as false as it would be for me to go over to New-York and say that the tree in front of Mr. Halliday's house was covered with five hundred flags, representing all nations of the earth?" A. I don't remember any such expression as that.

Q. Is that weak, do you think? A. I should think it was rather weak; yes, Sir. I don't mean to say that it was not mine because it was weak.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, don't let us take a week to dispose of it. I am tired of this.

Q. Did you then, or did you during that conversation, and after the points as to which I have questioned you—did you say to Mr. Halliday and Mr. Bell, "My wife is as pure as light?" A. No, Sir. I will tell you what I said at that point. I wanted to say something more assuring than that to those gentlemen. I said, as I remember, something like this: "You won't regard my testimony as of any avail.

Go to Mr. Beecher and he himself will tell you that Elizabeth is as pure as gold, as pure as light," or some such expression as that.

Q. Well, that is the very next question I was going to ask you. Now, I want your answer to this one, whether you did not say, "my wife is as pure as light?" A. I don't remember whether I did or not; but if I did not then, I say it now.

Q. Yes; and did you not add, "You ask Mr. Beecher; he will tell you she is as pure as gold?" A. Well, something of that sort.

Q. Something of that sort? A. Yes.

THE WRITING OF THE TRUE STORY.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, I understand that somewhere along towards the end of December, 1872, there was in existence, or in course of preparation, a paper which has been here, I think, called or described as a "True Story?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who wrote that paper? A. I wrote it.

Q. When did you write it? A. The latter end of December, 1872.

Q. Was it written out with all the documents which its frame included at that time? Was it in a complete form of composition, which included the documents that it embraced in its scheme? A. My impression is that one or two documents were not in; for instance, the tripartite covenant. I think that I had no copy of that. Mr. Claflin possessed that. My recollection is that the document was to be included.

Q. But with that exception you think it had been reduced to a complete form, so that an ordinary reader could take it up and follow it? A. My impression is that perhaps one or two other papers were not in.

Q. But otherwise it was in a shape that any one who could read writing could read it and understand it? A. Could understand all that was there.

Q. It was not phonographic or stenographic characters merely? A. No, Sir.

Q. It was in English? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. It was in English, and in our ordinary— A. As good English as I could write.

Q. Yes. Now when if at all was that document ever made complete by including what may have been the omitted document? A. I do not think, Sir, it was ever made complete by the inclusion of the tripartite covenant. That is my best recollection.

Q. Or any otherwise than as it then read? You have said you thought perhaps some other papers might have been omitted? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it all written out in a more complete form than it then was? A. My recollection is that it was never in manuscript so complete as it ought to have been for publication, if it had been sent to press; that is to say, the tripartite covenant was never incorporated into it. Nevertheless, I am not positive as to that.

Q. But there was a place designated for that to come in, was there? A. Yes, that is my recollection.

Q. So that the bringing of that document and inserting it would have made the paper complete? A. There may, perhaps, have been two or three other breaks.

Q. Have you any recollection that there was? A. I will not speak positively, it is so long since I have seen the manuscript.

Q. Now, Sir, how bulky a paper was that? A. I think it would have occupied about two or three columns of a newspaper, printed.

Q. It was written on—what was it on—foolscap paper? A. I think it was; yes, Sir.

Q. And written on one side only? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, about how many sheets of foolscap? A. I don't remember.

Q. How? A. I don't remember.

Q. Well, a good many? It would take a good many? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I don't know so much about columns of a newspaper as an editor? A. I don't know how many sheets it was.

Q. It would take a pretty thick pamphlet, wouldn't it? A. Well, it would be as thick as your hand perhaps, rolled up.

Q. I mean of the foolscap; not more than that? A. I should think it was perhaps—well, a little thicker than that. [Referring to stenographer's note-book, about half an inch thick.] I don't know how thick it was, Sir.

Q. How many copies of that were ever made by you, or to your knowledge? A. No copy of it.

Q. No copy of it made? A. No, Sir; not by me or to my knowledge. I never saw any copy of it.

Q. Was that paper ever destroyed? A. To my best knowledge it was destroyed by Mrs. Tilton. She told me so. Whether that is—

Q. No matter about the communication from your wife? A. That is all I know about it.

Q. But so far as you believe, it was destroyed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But not by you personally? A. Not by me.

Q. Not by your design? A. No, Sir; she told me that she had destroyed it.

Q. Well, I don't care for any conversation between you and your wife. You believe it was destroyed, but not by you, and not by your design? A. I believe so; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when did you last see that paper in existence, or know of its existence? A. A great while ago, Sir; I don't remember.

Q. How long, about, so far as your recollection goes, did it continue to be in existence to your knowledge? A. I don't know, Sir. I only know that last Spring, I think, Mrs. Tilton told me that she had destroyed it. When she destroyed it, I don't know.

Q. I don't ask for anything that comes from your wife to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then so far as you know of its existence—and my inquiry was solely how long you continued to see it, or to know of its existence otherwise? A. I don't remember that I ever saw it since the Spring of 1873; somewhere about that time.

Q. And you did see it to your recollection as late as that? A. I don't think I saw it very long after the time it was written. I was put away in an iron safe. Perhaps I did; I don't remember.

Q. You don't remember how late? A. No, Sir.

Q. But some months at least it existed, did it not? A. I cannot answer as to that; I have no distinct recollection about it.

WHO HAD ACCESS TO THE TRUE STORY.

Q. Do you remember handing that paper to any person and leaving it for perusal? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At the will of that person? A. Yes, Sir; several persons.

Q. Now, Sir, can you give us the names of those persons? A. I showed it to the Hon. William C. DeWitt, of this city, for one.

Q. And when? A. I don't remember when.

Q. Anybody else? A. I showed it to Mr. George A. Bell.

Q. When? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Now, in showing it to Mr. DeWitt, did you leave it in his possession? A. I did, Sir.

Q. And for how long did he retain it? A. A day or two, I think.

Q. And with Mr. Bell, how was it? Did you leave it in his possession, and how long did you leave it? A. I should think he had it a day or two; I don't remember how long.

Q. Now, to whom else did you show it? A. I think I showed it to Mr. Duncklee of this city; I don't remember his first name.

Q. Well, he is a well-known person, is he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. D-u-n-c-k-l-e-e? A. I don't know how he spells it.

Q. And did you leave it with him? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. Give me any other person, if you please, that you remember. A. I don't remember them at present, but I showed it to a number of persons.

Q. And those are the only names you can give? A. Those are the only names that occur to me at present.

Q. Did you so show and so leave this "True Story," as it is called, with Mr. Goodrich—William W. Goodrich? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not? A. No, Sir; I never showed it to him at all.

Q. Did you show it to or leave it with the Rev. Dr. Storrs? A. I read the original—

Q. Now, my question, if you please— A. No, Sir; not the completed manuscript.

Q. Did you show it to or leave it with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. As a whole? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, you did read some part of it? A. The—

Q. No matter; I don't ask you what part. A. I didn't read any part of it to him.

SHARP WORDS BETWEEN THE LAWYERS.

Q. You did not show any part of it to him? A. No, Sir; not of that paper.

Judge Neilson—Let us get the answer.

The Witness—That answer is not correct.

Judge Neilson—I understand him to say that he read a portion of the draft.

Mr. Evarts—No.

The Witness—Well, Mr. Evarts, I am under oath, and I desire that my answer may be correct.

Mr. Evarts—Of course.

The Witness—I didn't show that document to Dr. Storrs; that is to say, the document which you have now described. You have asked me about the pamphlet, how thick it was, &c.

Mr. Evarts—Exactly.

The Witness—And I say the sum and substance of it—

Mr. Evarts—Well, I am not now—

Judge Neilson—I think he has a right to answer that, otherwise it would be a misconception. That paper was, in a sense, the foundation of this.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, am I not permitted to inquire concerning a complete paper?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I mean the physical pamphlet, and nothing else; with whom he left it, and to whom he showed it. Now, if not leaving that with Mr. Storrs, and not showing him the whole of it, he had read a part of it or showed a part of it, that very pamphlet, to him, why that would have been a proper interrogatory.

Judge Neilson—Now, I understand the witness states he read a part of the draft to him.

Mr. Evarts—That is also a matter of subsequent inquiry.

Mr. Beach—Permit me to say, Mr. Evarts, that the question was not as to that specific paper, the pamphlet.

Mr. Evarts—Well, Sir, if I haven't it so, it is my mistake.

Mr. Beach—Allow me to make—

Mr. Evarts—Well, I want to say—

Mr. Beach—Do you persist in interrupting me when I address the Court?

Mr. Evarts—No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I ask you to wait until I continue my remarks?

Mr. Evarts—Well, now, if you choose to continue.

Mr. Beach—I do choose to continue; but I desire you not to interrupt me in that way.

Mr. Evarts—I interrupted you to say that is my question.

Mr. Beach—I understand your question as well as you do. The question that was put to the witness was whether that paper which was called the "True Story," was read or shown to Dr. Storrs. The question was not whether the specific pamphlet which he had inquired about, was read or shown to him, as the stenographer's minutes will show. This draft was a part of the "True Story," was the preparation of the "True Story," and it necessarily called upon the witness for the explanation which he sought to give.

Judge Neilson—And the general denial could not well be reconciled with the fact that he had read a portion of the draft of that paper to Dr. Storrs.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, if the witness has supposed that at any stage of these questions concerning the persons to whom he had shown, or with whom they had left this paper, I referred to anything else except this completed manuscript, of which there was no other copy, then I will allow his answers to be corrected in any way that is proper.

Judge Neilson—We understand that now.

Mr. Evarts—But that I have a right to confine my question to that completed pamphlet and nothing else, I think cannot be denied.

Judge Neilson—Well, if that is avowed—

Mr. Evarts—Of course it is avowed.

Judge Neilson—And the witness is allowed to explain, then there is no misapprehension; otherwise there is room for criticism.

Mr. Evarts—I agree. So far, I say, if your Honor please, if there is the least doubt that the preceding questions and answers have been correctly understood by the witness, as applying to that completed pamphlet, as I have definitely reduced it to existence, why, I am willing any modification should be made which you please.

Mr. Beach—The stenographer will please read the last question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read as follows:

Did you show it to or leave it with the Rev. Dr. Storrs? A. I read the original—

Q. Now, my question, if you please? A. No, Sir, not the completed manuscript.

Q. Did you show it to or leave it with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. As a whole? A. No, Sir.

THE READERS OF THE TRUE STORY.

Mr. Evarts—Now we are right about it—that the completed manuscript, as I have reduced it to existence, and as you have answered about it, you did not exhibit to Dr. Storrs? A. No, Sir.

Q. And did not hand to him or read to him anything out of that paper? A. No, Sir; because I had already read the substance.

Mr. Evarts—No matter what your reasons were. We will have that struck out. You did not do it. Did you show that manuscript, completed as it was, to Charles Storrs, and if so, did you leave it with him? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Did you show it to or leave it with. (and I now speak of the pamphlet itself—the written manuscript) to Mr. Paige, the artist? A. I do not remember whether I did or not; I think not, but still I will not be certain.

Q. Did you to Mr. B. F. Tracy—that very paper? A. Yes, Sir; I read him every word of that from beginning to end.

Q. Did you to Mr. Franklin Woodruff? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you to Mr. Frank D. Moulton? A. I don't remember whether I ever read it to Mr. Moulton or not.

Q. Do you remember whether you ever left it in his hand? A. It was practically in his hands most of the time; it was under his control.

Q. Yes, Sir—you mean in his possession. That is what I mean by being in his hands. Did you leave it in his possession? A. It was in his control.

Mr. Beach—Oh, answer the question directly.

The Witness—My impression is that Mr. Moulton had it in his safe for a time; that is my best recollection.

Q. Very well; then it was in his possession. Did you show it to or leave it with Mr. James B. Mix? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know him? A. Very well.

Q. Is he a Brooklyn man? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you show it to or leave it with Mr. F. B. Carpenter? A. My impression is I showed him the original draft—read him the original draft.

Q. I am not asking a question about the original draft; I am asking questions about the completed paper. A. I showed him either one or the other, I cannot say which.

Q. And you cannot say but that you did show him the completed paper? A. No, I cannot say which.

Q. Did you show it to or leave it with Mr. Samuel E. Belcher? A. I think not, Sir; I think I showed him—

Q. No matter what else you showed him—did you show him that? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Did you show it to or leave it with Mr. John W. Harman? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Both showed it to him and left it with him? A. Yes, Sir; I think I did.

Q. Did you show it to and leave it with Mr. James Redpath? A. No, Sir, I think not; I don't remember about it.

Q. You know Mr. Redpath? A. Perfectly well.

Q. And were in the habit of seeing him at that time? A. Mr. Redpath lives in Boston. He came over to my house and stayed there.

Q. Stayed at your house as a friend? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what do you say as to him? A. I have already answered.

Q. Have you no recollection of having showed it to him? A. I have already answered you, Sir.

Q. Well? A. If I had any recollection, Mr. Evarts, I should tell you cheerfully.

Q. I have no doubt of that. Do you recollect that you did not show it to him? A. I have already said that I had no recollection on the subject; how then can I recollect? I cannot.

Q. You have no recollection on the subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you show it (this completed manuscript) to, or leave it with Mr. Thomas Kinsella? A. No, Sir.

Q. Neither showed it to him nor left it with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you show it to Mr. William T. Clark, or leave it with him? A. I don't remember about that.

Q. Was Mr. Clark the assistant or editor of your paper? A. He was my associate editor; yes, Sir.

Q. He is the gentleman, I suppose, you refer to? A. My doubt as to Mr. Clark is, Mr. Evarts, whether he saw the completed copy or the original draft; I make the same answer concerning him that I did concerning Dr. Storrs.

Q. Now, I understand you to be clear that you never showed the complete paper to Dr. Storrs? A. I say I make the same answer to that concerning Mr. Clark; my recollection is that I showed him the original draft.

Q. I have not asked about anything else but the completed paper; you think you did not show Mr. Clark that—I do not know which way your answer is. Do you say whether you did, or did not, show Mr. Clark the completed paper? A. I don't know which it was—the one or the other.

Q. Did you show the paper to Mr. Whitney—Ald. Whitney I believe he is called? A. I think not, Sir; I showed him a copy of Mr. Beecher's letter of contrition.

Q. No matter about anything else; I am not inquiring about anything else. If your Honor please, I ask that his answer about anything else be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—That is proper.

The Witness—I think not.

Q. Do you remember offering it to him, rolled up, and his not taking it? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't remember that occurrence. Now, Sir, the previous or earlier draft, if there was such a paper in any complete form (and you may describe how complete it was, if you please), did you show that to any of the persons that I have named? A. Well, Sir, I have already told you I showed it to Dr. Storrs.

Q. Now, we will see. What was this first draft?—how complete was it? A. It was just like the other; the other was a copy of it; the first draft was criss-crossed with interlineations of composition.

Q. Then, as I understand you, the matter of the first draft was the same as of the other paper? A. Yes, Sir, perhaps I ought to mention, Mr. Evarts, since you ask me as to the pamphlet completed, that very few persons ever saw the pamphlet with its final additions—namely, the two letters, one by Mrs. Tilton, and one by Mr. Beecher, written on almost the last day of the year.

Q. Which are in evidence here? A. Yes; these were written in afterwards; I do not think any one ever saw it with them.

Q. With these in it? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will remember that both of these letters are in evidence here. They are the two letters of Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher, written in the end of December, 1872, which were proposed to be published, but were not published. Now if I can get the numbers of these exhibits, we can make this answer definite, if your Honor please, so that we can understand it.

[Mr. Shearman here handed Mr. Evarts "Exhibit D, 44."]

Q. [Showing paper to witness.] This is one of the letters to which you refer? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—"Exhibit D, 44;" this is Mrs. Tilton's letter. Now, I ask for the plaintiff's "Exhibit No. 74."

Mr. Fullerton—"No. 74" instead of "44"?

Mr. Evarts—No; I mean the other one.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Pearsall.] Hand him "Exhibit 74."

Mr. Pearsall—I have it here in the printed form.

Mr. Evarts—That will answer every purpose—to show it to him in print.

[Mr. Evarts then handed the witness the printed copy.]

The Witness—Now, what is the question, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—The question is whether that is the other letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have seen the original of the other. I understand you as now saying, as a part of, or applicable to all your answers in regard to what is called the complete statement, that probably at the time it was shown to either of the persons to whom it was shown, it did not contain these papers, "Exhibit D, 44" and "Exhibit 74"? A. No, Sir; you misunderstand me. The persons who saw the document before these two cards were written, of course could not have seen the cards copied in it. The persons who saw the document after these two cards were written, saw these cards copied in it.

Q. That is your explanation. Let us make this plain. Do you remember when these two documents "Exhibit 74" and "Exhibit D, 44" were added or supplied to this "True Statement"? A. I think I copied them in as soon as I received them.

Q. As soon as they came into existence, about? A. That is my impression; yes, Sir.

Q. And that all persons to whom you showed the "True Story," in its complete form, after that date, saw it with these letters; and those to whom it was shown prior to that, saw it without them? A. Yes, Sir; very few persons saw it prior to that time, because it was not written until between Christmas and New Year's.

Q. You say, then, very few people saw it without those letters in? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is your idea; I thought it was the other way. Now, this original draft—did you show that or read it to Dr. Storrs? A. Yes, Sir; I read it to him.

Q. Read him the whole of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when did you do that? A. When did I do it?

Q. Yes. A. I did that, I should say, somewhere about the 20th of December.

Mr. Beach—Name the year.

The Witness—1872.

Mr. Evarts—1872; it is all 1872.

The Witness—I am not testifying as to the date exactly.

Q. About that time—about the 20th of December, 1872? A. Somewhere about that date; that is my best recollection.

Q. Now, did you show the draft, in the shape it was perfected, to Mr. Charles Storrs? A. I don't remember that I did, Sir.

Q. Did you show it to Mr. Paige, the artist? A. I do not remember that.

Q. Or to Mr. Dunklee? A. My impression is that Mr. Dunklee saw the complete pamphlet. Mr. Evarts calls it a "pamphlet." It was not a pamphlet; it was simply a roll of paper.

Mr. Beach—You had better not call it a pamphlet, because he does, improperly.

The Witness—He has misled me; it was a roll of paper.

Mr. Evarts—I understand that; there is no dispute what it was. It was written out and reduced to complete form, so that the documents appeared exactly that you have named. Did you show this draft to Mr. James B. Mix? A. I showed Mr. Mix some loose sheets—a portion.

Q. You did not show him the whole? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you leave these loose sheets with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you show this original draft to Mr. Samuel Belcher? A. That I do not remember.

Q. Did you leave it with him? A. I do not remember.

Q. Did you show that original draft to Mr. Redpath? A. I do not remember.

Q. Now, what became of this original draft? A. As soon as I copied it—made a clean copy of it—the original sheets, I think, went into my waste basket.

Q. So that is not in existence now? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Do you know of any copy of that paper being now in existence? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, I have understood you to say that you read the complete paper to Mr. Tracy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you mean not the draft? A. The completed paper.

Q. Yes, the completed paper. Now, when and where was that? A. In Mr. Moulton's study.

Q. In an interview which has been made the subject of testimony here? A. Well, Sir, it seems to me something has been said about it; I think it was between Christmas and New Year's.

Q. Between Christmas and New Year's? A. Somewhere about that time.

Q. Now, Sir, when you say that this paper and this draft of it are destroyed, and you do not know of any copy of it in existence, I understand you that you mean that the whole of them are destroyed. A. There was no copy, Sir, that I know of; and this one being destroyed by Mrs. Tilton, I do not know of any other being in existence.

Q. All parts of it were destroyed? A. No, Sir; two or three of the final pages of it remain.

Q. Of what? A. Of this document.

Q. That includes these letters; doesn't it? A. I don't know exactly how much.

Q. Then you do understand that two or three pages remain; you say it is the last part? A. Two or three of the final pages which were written on, together with several blank sheets not written on, I found in my wife's bureau, after she deserted her home. I have those sheets still.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton announced that fact to us the other day.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—My object is to get at the facts; that is all I am after.

Q. And, excepting this, no part that you know of, either of the completed paper, or of the draft, or of any copy of them in existence?

The Witness [to Judge Neilson]—I do not know whether I should answer that yes or no.

Judge Neilson [to the Witness]—You can answer; he says so far as you know.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; the point is, I don't know whether my answer grammatically required "yes" or "no" to the question.

Judge Neilson—I think either will be right, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, gentlemen, will you produce those parts that are preserved?

Mr. Fullerton—We cannot at this moment, because, I believe, they are not here.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is a good answer for this time, of course.

Mr. Beach—A good answer for the day.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; for the day. I asked for them; my friend says they are not in Court, which is of course satisfactory.

Q. Mr. Tilton, let me recall your attention a moment to the date of any supposed interview in which you showed this complete statement to Mr. Tracy. Do you now say that it was between Christmas and New Year of 1872? A. I think it was, Sir; it was either then, or, possibly, a little later.

Q. Not earlier? A. Oh! no; it could not have been earlier, because the completed manuscript was not in existence earlier.

Q. Very well. Then, if you did show him something in this nature earlier than Christmas, it was not the completed paper? A. I didn't show him anything earlier than Christmas.

Q. Have you not in your previous examination put the date of this interview with Mr. Tracy earlier than between Christmas and New Year's? A. The interview which I had with Mr. Tracy, Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Moulton occurred in November, six weeks previous to this.

Q. At that time did you show him—I won't say the completed paper, because it was not then completed—but did you show him the draft of this statement, or read it to him? A. No, Sir; it was not in existence. The draft didn't come into existence until a month or so after. I didn't show anything to Mr. Tracy in that first interview. Mr. Moulton showed him the letter of contrition, and certain other papers.

Q. Now, at the interview at which you did show the contemplated paper, as you think—as you say, to Mr. Tracy, who were present? A. Mr. Francis D. Moulton.

Q. And nobody else? A. Nobody else; three of us in the study.

Q. Where was that? A. Up in the study in Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. And that is distinct from the interview at which Mr. Woodruff was also present? A. Oh, yes, Sir, they were nearly two or three weeks apart—six weeks, or two months apart, those two interviews.

Q. Now, Sir, was not the interview at which you showed Mr. Tracy any paper or draft of the "True Story" about, or exactly the 15th of December? A. No, Sir, it was either two, three or four weeks after that.

Q. That is, it was either between Christmas and New Year's, or later? A. Or else later, yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you give us the date of the destruction of the draft otherwise than that it was done as soon as you had completed the original? A. Oh! I think that as fast as I copied the sheets they went into the waste basket. That is all I recollect about it.

Q. You have no other recollection concerning it than that? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you cannot give us more exactly the day or the date on which you did make that copy of this paper? A. I should think that—I have a recollection that Mr. Carpenter has a note in his diary that it was finished on Christmas day.

Q. That the copying was finished? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is not good evidence.

The Witness—No, not the copying.

Mr. Evarts—The copy?

The Witness—Yes, Sir, the copy.

Mr. Evarts—That is not good evidence.

The Witness—You asked me to fix the date. I may be wrong about it.

Mr. Evarts—As far as you can fix it, it was Christmas? A. Somewhere about that time.

Q. Now, how early did you begin the writing or drafting of the original? A. I should think somewhere about the 20th of December, perhaps.

DR. STORRS'S ADVICE ABOUT THE TRUE STORY.

Q. How are you able to fix that date, and with what assurance? A. I fix that date by the date of a visit which I made to Dr. Storrs, to which I carried Mrs. Tilton's letter of December 16th.

Q. Yes; well, you mean that the 20th of December was the date of the visit to Dr. Storrs? A. No, Sir, I think the date of that letter, namely, December 16th.

Q. Then, at the time of that visit you had not commenced the draft?

Judge Neilson—The copy.

The Witness—I think I had, perhaps, put together some notes of a draft, or I had possibly made some copies of the paper that I might read them to Dr. Storrs, that I might have his judgment, which I did get, and out of that judgment I wrote the paper.

Q. Well, no matter about that. I want to get at the date when you began to prepare what was physically the draft of this "True Story"? A. My recollection is about the middle of December—from the middle to the 20th.

Q. I mean this actual draft that you have spoken of as a paper in existence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did you begin that? A. I think somewhere about the middle of December.

Q. That is all that I ask? A. That is my best recollection.

Q. And you then had an interview with Dr. Storrs, had you? A. I had two or three interviews.

Q. Well, you had one, then, on the 16th of December? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And at that time you had not commenced the draft, had you? A. I don't remember whether I had commenced it, or not.

Q. You cannot say that you had any part of the draft with you when you went to Dr. Storrs? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect.

Q. Now, when next did you see Dr. Storrs? A. I don't remember the date.

Q. Be as clear as may be? A. I saw Dr. Storrs three or four times; I don't remember the dates of these interviews. One was in November, one was in the early part of December, and another was, perhaps, towards the middle or towards the close; I cannot recollect.

Q. My only point at present is to know what state this "True Story," in draft or completed copy, was when you showed it to Dr. Storrs? A. I read to Dr. Storrs the loose sheets of the substance of the whole paper; I don't remember on what day I did it.

Q. Did you read then from this physical paper that has been called the draft? A. Physical paper called the draft?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Certainly; yes, Sir.

Q. You did? A. I read to him the paper which was afterwards copied in a more cleanly way—

Mr. Evarts—Well!

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

The Witness—and which were stitched together and constitute what you call the pamphlet.

Q. Called the completed copy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then this draft was the paper which you had when you showed Dr. Storrs any part of it; that is, when you showed anything that was in the shape of a composition called the "True Story"? A. Well, Sir, I am not sure, but think I had two interviews with Dr. Storrs, one in reference to the documents themselves, before they were joined together in a draft.

Q. That might be, but that I am not inquiring about. A. What is it you are asking me about, Mr. Evarts?

Q. I want you to fix the date of the interview with Dr. Storrs in which you had physically present the draft, or any part of the draft of the "True Story" A. Well, Sir, I cannot fix the date.

Q. You cannot? A. No, Sir.

Q. But it was subsequent to the 16th of December? A. To the best of my recollection.

THE STORIES THAT CAUSED THE BOWEN LETTERS.

Q. I come now to the period of the meditated publication of your letter to Mr. Bowen of the 1st of January, 1871. You had returned from the West, as I understand? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And found a condition of rumor and implication here that made you think it was necessary to have some publication? A. Yea, Sir.

Q. You had been on a lecturing tour, had you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was the season of 1871-'2? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton accompany you on that tour? A. She did, on a part of it.

Q. How many months or weeks? A. I don't remember that. We went away off into the North-West, I think.

Q. The greater part of the tour? A. I think not; a portion of it.

Q. Now, as you traversed this region for the purposes of your lecture, as I understand, you found prevalent there stories which I think you have characterized as horrible stories to your prejudice? A. No, Sir, I didn't.

Q. I thought you had? A. No, Sir, no such characterization.

Q. Well, what was it? A. I will tell you what I found in the West. I found this, a good deal of mystery growing out of the fact that at the close of December, 1870, The Independent had in a eulogistic way announced that I was to be editor of The Brooklyn Union, and to contribute to that paper, and that then very suddenly the newspaper press of the country announced that my relationship with those two papers had been sundered, and people wanted to know the reason why; every one said I must make an explanation.

Mr. Evarts [reading from THE TRIBUNE report]:

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind that. Did you regard these stories which were afloat in the West, and which you heard of West, when on your lecturing tour, as detrimental and prejudicial to your character? A. Why, Sir, they were horrible stories.

A. I thought you were referring to the interview I had with Mr. Bowen, Dec. 26th, in which I quoted his word "Avalanche."

Mr. Evarts—Oh! no, I am referring to this very period.

Judge Neilson—This relates to stories which he heard while he was on his lecturing tour.

Mr. Evarts—While he was out West.

Judge Neilson—And not after his return.

Mr. Evarts—Of course that is what I am asking him. I understood the witness, on his direct examination, to say that on his return from the West he thought it necessary that some publication should be made to meet a state of things that was then in existence.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; the mystery was why I should be so suddenly retired, and many people were filling the gap with all sorts of explanations, stories and the like.

Q. I understood you said that on your direct examination, and I am now recalling your attention to that period. Now, what was the nature and character of these horrible stories that you heard out West? A. Well, I heard one story to the effect that I had become a drunkard; I heard another story to the effect that I had been divorced; I heard another story to the effect that I had embezzled money—I don't know what the stories were.

Q. Well, these stories were discreditable, of course, in their nature? A. Yes, Sir; they were.

Q. And on your return you brought up the matter of publishing this Bowen letter? A. Yes, Sir; to explain the true reasons why I went out of those two papers.

Q. When was this return, and when was it, as matter of fact—no point of date—that you commenced preparing and indicating a purpose of publishing that letter? A. I think it was the month of March, 1872.

Mr. Beach—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Please read the question.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question.]

Mr. Evarts—If the question is incorrect I will correct it.

Mr. Beach—I think it is.

Mr. Evarts—Preparing for or indicating a purpose of publishing that letter. [To the witness.] Now, with whom did you confer, if with any one, concerning the preparation of any statement to accompany the publication of that letter? A. I conferred with Mr. Oliver Johnson, to the best of my recollection, and with Mr. Moulton. I don't know that I conferred with any one else; if so, I have forgotten at the present moment.

Q. Well, how early was the new matter that was to accompany the republication of the letter itself completed and put in type? A. I don't understand that.

Q. How early was the new matter that was to accompany the reproduction of the Bowen letter itself prepared and put in type? A. You mean the exact date?

Q. Yes, Sir, as near as I can get it. A. I don't remember.

Q. I want to know. Was it before the end of March? A. I don't remember that; I should think somewhere towards the end of March.

Q. Somewhere towards the end of March? A. I should think so, Sir. I have no means of fixing the exact date.

Q. But that is your best recollection? A. Well, Sir, I have no recollection other than that which attaches to the date of the signing of the tripartite covenant, which was April, 1872.

Q. Exactly? A. The preparation of the article was shortly before that, and that is what fixes it.

Q. And it was put in type shortly before that, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, to whom, when this was put in type, was it shown? A. Mr. Moulton showed it; I don't remember that it was shown to anybody other than the persons concerned in its preparation—Mr. Johnson and Mr. Moulton; Mr. Moulton, I think, showed it to Mr. Beecher.

Q. I believe that has been spoken to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To whom did you show it? A. I don't think I showed it to anybody: I don't remember that I did.

Q. Was it not shown to Mr. Bowen? A. Mr. Claflin showed it to Mr. Bowen, I think.

Q. You know that Mr. Bowen saw it? A. I don't know it in the sense that a man can testify under oath. I was told Mr. Claflin took it to Mr. Bowen; I was not present.

THE CHANGES IN THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT.

Q. And that was before the tripartite agreement was signed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The tripartite agreement is in evidence, and it was dated the 2d day of April, do you remember? A. Yes, Sir, that is the date of it.

Q. Now, before the tripartite agreement was reduced to its actual form in which it is signed, and brought in evidence here, had there been a previous preparation of any clause in it in which you were concerned? A. Yes, Sir; there was a previous preparation of that paper by Mr. Wilkeson, containing a clause which I declined to sign.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Shearman]—Have you got that paper, the tripartite agreement?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir. [Handing paper to Mr. Evarts.]

Mr. Evarts [handing paper to Witness]—Take that, if you please. Now, before that was signed, as it now reads, there was a draft or proposed agreement for signature that differed from that? A. Yes, Sir; differed very greatly from this.

Q. Now, have you a copy of that as proposed? A. Only such a copy as exists in the printed books.

Q. You have not the paper itself, have you? A. No, Sir.

Q. In which clause, if it was confined to one clause of that agreement, was this difference—in which clause was this difference of the preparation? A. If you show me the book I will point it out to you.

Judge Neilson—He means which clause in that before you. Is it numbered?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—This is the completed draft, your Honor; he is speaking of the original draft.

Mr. Evarts—My question is, in which of the clauses, as they now appear in the completed paper, was the difference between the paper and the draft—in which of those clauses? A. Changes were made in two clauses.

Q. Then give us both? A. In Bowen's clause and in my clause.

Q. They are numbered there, are they not? A. Yes, Sir; Mr.

Bowen's is No. 1, and mine is No. 2. Changes were made in both before Mr. Bowen signed, and before I signed.

Q. The difference between those papers as actually signed, and the draft as considered before, was in the first and second clauses? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was there any difference in the third clause, or Mr. Beecher's clause, that is, I suppose? A. All I know about it is what I see in this book, and I am just reminding myself that I have testified to what I don't know really of my own knowledge, only as I see it here.

Q. Well, you have a right to refresh your recollection from anything in which you have reasonable confidence. You have that book before you, have you, in which that statement is? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, with that advantage, or without that advantage, you recollect that there was a difference between the draft and this paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And in the clause that was to be signed by you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As well as in that which was to be signed by Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you know of any preservation of the original draft? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether the original paper itself is in existence, or not? A. I do not; all I know is what I see here in this book, which purports to be a copy of the original draft.

Mr. Evarts—I believe it is in existence, and, if your Honor please, we would wish to go on with that. It is in our possession if it is in anybody's. If it is insisted upon, we can have that here to-morrow morning, if your Honor please. The material point that the paper itself should be here is to proceed with the inquiry.

Judge Neilson—[To the Jury.] Gentlemen, please be in your places at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. Mallison (Clerk)—The Court stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned until eleven o'clock on Thursday.

TWENTY-FOURTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MISSING FRAGMENTS OF THE "TRUE STORY."

THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT AND THE BOWEN ARBITRATION—PART OF THE "TRUE STORY" PRODUCED BY MR. TILTON—THE REMAINDER, SUPPOSED TO BE DESTROYED, BROUGHT IN BY THE DEFENSE—THE CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. TILTON ALMOST COMPLETED.

THURSDAY, Feb. 11, 1875.

The tripartite covenant may be an important weapon in the hands of the defense. The direction in which Mr. Beecher's counselors expect to wield it was more than faintly foreshadowed during the two hours that it was the object of Mr. Evarts's questions to the plaintiff to-day. As Mr. Moulton has sworn, the tripartite covenant was completed by the affixing of the signatures on April 2, 1871, while the arbitrators in the case of Mr. Tilton against Mr. Bowen made their award earlier on the same day. The defense may try to show that the two transactions hinged upon each other; to that end Mr. Evarts's inquiries yesterday tended. His questions, put seemingly with little thought as to their consecutive order, were in regard both to the tripartite covenant and to the Bowen arbitration, and so skillfully did the examiner "dove-tail" his queries about the two subjects that they seemed to become inseparable events. The meeting at Mr. Moulton's house in regard to the covenant was first described by the witness, who said that he, then and there, expressed his willingness to sign the agreement "twenty times over," if Mr. Bowen would sign, but when he more fully comprehended the clause touching himself, he declined to put his name to it, and that brought about the change. The next questions were as to whether Mr. Tilton received the check for $7,000 from Mr. Bowen before or after he signed the paper. The witness said it was before. There was a very minute examination of the manner in which the covenant was composed and signed, and the witness gave, as the best of his belief, that Mr. Bowen signed it first; himself second; Mr. Beecher last. The well-known Bowen letter, which formed a part of the tripartite agreement, and was published in a Brooklyn Sunday newspaper some time afterward, was closely traced from the day on which it was printed on "slips" in The Golden Age office. Mr. Tilton said that he knew nothing of the manner in which the Sunday newspaper obtained a copy of the letter, although he had thought, because Mr. Kinsella had said that Mr. Beecher had shown him the tripartite covenant, that it was through Mr. Kinsella that the letter had found its way into print.

Mr. Evarts now called for the portion of the so-called "True Story" in the possession of the prosecution, but it was found that Mr. Tilton had it at home. He promised to produce it after recess, and Mr. Evarts proceeded to other subjects to fill the remaining few minutes of the morning session. The questioning then brought replies that from 1866 to 1870, inclusive, the witness attended Plymouth Church eight or ten times a year; that he never except once remained at Mrs. Woodhull's house until midnight; and also that he had no access to the papers in Mr. Moulton's hands after the appearance of the Bacon letter.

A DOCUMENT THAT SEEMS TO BE A SURPRISE.

The most interesting occurrence of the week was the production of a copy of the so-called "True Story," written by Mr. Tilton in the latter part of 1872, subsequent to the publication of Mrs. Woodhull's story. After recess Mr. Tilton took from his pocket the pages of the statement which Mrs. Tilton left in a bureau drawer after she left his house last Summer. They are ordinary foolscap sheets, unnumbered, and written very carelessly. The edges of one side, which had been stitched together, are much mutilated. They constitute the concluding pages of the "Story," and were supposed by Mr. Tilton to have been destroyed by Mrs. Tilton. Mr. Evarts took the pages from the witness and all of Mr. Beecher's lawyers examined them carefully, after which they consulted together for a few moments. Then Mr. Evarts arose, and from a bulky book which he held in his arms, he read this sentence: "One day last month when I was in Northern New-Hampshire, a scandalous publication burst like a cloud over my home in Brooklyn, and shed a sudden shadow on my wife's good name."

He then asked Mr. Tilton whether that was the way in which the "True Story" began. From this question and from those following, it was evident to the counsel for the plaintiff that the defense were in possession of a copy at least, of the "True Story." It was not until after several questions had been answered by Mr. Tilton (who did not remember the phraseology but admitted that such statements were contained in the "True Story") that his counsel ventured to offer a protest. Then Judge Fullerton, and afterward Mr. Beach, insisted that the defendant was giving secondary evidence of an instrument, the loss of which had not been proved. Judge Neilson ruled that Mr. Evarts was in order, and the latter declined to give his opponents any clew regarding the document from which he was reading. There was a great deal of speculation as to the manner in which the counsel for the defense had obtained the copy.

The "True Story" comprises charges against Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Beecher, Mr. Bowen, and Mrs. Morse, the writer being very vehement against the two men, while he accuses Mrs. Morse of making malicious and cunning statements against her family, and Mrs. Beecher of being his enemy for years, and of having attempted to injure him. The charge against Mr. Beecher is that he had asked Mrs. Tilton "to be a wife to him together with all that this implies."

After the reading of each sentence Mr. Tilton was asked whether that clause was included in the "Story." The phraseology seemed dim in his memory, but he generally testified to the correctness of the substance of the sentences. In one place where the action of his retirement from The Independent is discussed, occurs the sentence: "I took off my crown and laid it at his (Bowen's) feet." "Is that yours?" asked Mr. Evarts. "It sounds just like me," replied the witness, with the shadow of a smile on his face; "I think I must have said it." Mr. Evarts laughed, and was joined by the audience. It was nearly 4 o'clock when the subject of the "True Story" was exhausted.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. TILTON CANNOT INDICATE THE CHANGES IN THE COVENANT.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Theodore Tilton was recalled and his cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—We were speaking, Mr. Tilton, of the transaction of the tripartite agreement, and of the previous draft differing from the actual paper, you remember? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have no copy of that draft, as you have stated, I believe? A. Not unless the printed book is a copy.

Q. Yes, unless the printed book is a copy. Now, I ask you to look—that purports to be a copy—in this printed book, and see if you recognize that as the draft that was replaced by the actual paper? [Handing witness the book] A. I cannot say whether this was the original draft or not. It purports to be.

Q. Look at it and peruse it, if you please, and say whether that now seems to you to be the draft? A. All I can say is, Sir, that it purports to be; I cannot say that it is not, nor that it is.

Q. Well, have you no recollection concerning the draft, the paper which was altered, and altered by your request, or altered in consequence of some suggestion of yours—can't you, from any recollection placing you back in the transaction, say whether or not that is a faithful copy, so far as substance and any sense of the thing is concerned? A. I recollect very distinctly, Sir, that there was a draft presented to me which, when I carefully read it over, I declined to sign; and that I made alterations or amendments in that draft, perhaps re-wrote a part of it; and that the paper that I signed was not the first one, without the alterations, but the second one, in which my alterations had been made.

Q. That we understand. A. Now, whether this is a copy of that first draft as it originally came from Mr. Wilkeson's hand, I have no other knowledge than the mere fact that this book says so.

Q. Well, won't you read the article that relates to yourself, not aloud, but read it, and see whether that article is in your recollection—to the best of your belief, the article relating to yourself in the draft? A. I could not swear, Mr. Evarts, that this was the identical phraseology which Mr. Wilkeson first submitted to me.

Q. On perusing that article to which I have last called your attention, does anything occur to your memory as having been in that article in the draft—that is, not there now—that is, not in the print before you? A. No especial phraseology or sentence.

Q. In so reading what is now before you in that article, does it occur to your memory that there is anything omitted in the print before you that was in that article in the draft? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then, so far as you know and believe, that article, as in print before you, is in substance and meaning as it was in the draft? A. Well, I could not say that, Mr. Evarts.

MR. WILKESON'S DRAFT OF THE COVENANT.

Q. Well, you remember nothing wanting, and you remember nothing additional in the draft? A. I don't remember the phraseology of that original draft distinctly enough to compare it in my recollection with this printed form. I cannot swear that this was that draft or not. I won't swear that this is not.

Mr. Evarts—We will have this identified in some way.

Mr. Fullerton—What page is it on?

Mr. Evarts—It is blank.

Mr. Morris—It is in Mr. Wilkeson's statement.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, it is not necessary to have any further identification.

Mr. Morris—No.

Mr. Evarts—That it is the supposed draft that is contained in this book.

Mr. Fullerton—It is in Wilkeson's statement.

Q. Now, in whose handwriting was the draft as it was before you while the transaction was going on? A. I have an impression that it was in Mr. Wilkeson's handwriting, but I am not very positive as to that. I notice that the tripartite covenant in its final shape as signed by the three of us, and which you put into my hand yesterday, was in Mr. Wilkeson's hand.

Q. And your recollection is that the draft was in his handwriting? A. No, Sir; I didn't say that.

Q. Well, state it yourself again, if you please? A. That is my impression, but I am not positive that the original draft was also in his hand.

Q. Mr. Samuel Wilkeson? A. Mr. Samuel W. Wilkeson, I think. I don't remember whether there is a middle name or not.

Q. Well, it is Mr. Samuel Wilkeson? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, who were present when this draft was thus shown to you as you have stated? A. You mean the original draft, or the final one?

Q. The original draft? A. I don't know whether it was shown to me at all. I think it was read, and I think the occurrence took place in Mr. Moulton's study. The scene as it rises to my mind now seems to include Mr. Claflin, Mr. Wilkeson, Mr. Moulton and myself. That is my best recollection at present.

Q. And was it a pre-arranged meeting? A. That I don't remember, Sir.

Q. You cannot say but it was casual? A. I don't remember any previous appointment; I think Mr. — I don't know; I couldn't answer.

Q. Do you think it was a chance gathering of these four people? A. I should not think it was a chance gathering.

Q. What hour of the day was it? A. This meeting at Mr. Moulton's?

Q. Yes. A. That I don't remember.

Q. Do you remember whether it was day or evening—morning or evening, or what not? A. I cannot speak positively as to that. I have a kind of impression that it was evening; still—

Q. Still it might have been the morning? A. Well, I would not want to swear positively to that which is so indistinct in my mind.

Q. Well, either way—either way it is indistinct; whether it was morning or evening is indistinct? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was the paper as thus before you, read to you, or shown to you, proposed for your then present signature? A. I don't remember that, Sir.

THE PROPOSAL OF THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT.

Q. Did you, on reading or hearing read that draft on that occasion, express your readiness to sign it, and offer to do it immediately? A. My recollection about the circumstance is this: that Mr. Claflin asked me, either on that day or perhaps a preceding day, whether or not, in case Mr. Bowen could be induced to withdraw the statements which he had made against Mr. Beecher, and would withdraw them in writing—whether or not I would bind myself in writing not to make any use or circulation of Mr. Bowen's statements, and I answered with great readiness I would. My further recollection is that the original draft was brought to this occasion—to the interview of which I am speaking—with a view to accomplish that end. My still further recollection is that the draft was read, and when the paragraph assigned to Mr. Bowen had been read I burst out with the expression, "Mr. Bowen will never sign that." Mr. Claflin said something like this: "Mr. Bowen has got to sign it." I don't remember very distinctly about the concluding part of the covenant. I recollect this, however, saying that if Mr. Bowen would sign that I would sign it twenty times over; in other words, that if Mr. Bowen would blot out so sweepingly—

Mr. Evarts—No matter.

Mr. Beach—Yes, he is stating.

The Witness [continuing]—As that paper, I would sign it.

Mr. Evarts—He is giving—

Mr. Beach—He is giving the substance of what he said.

The Witness—I told Mr. Claflin very distinctly that I didn't think Mr. Bowen would sign it. Mr. Claflin said Mr. Bowen would have to sign it. I said, "If Mr. Bowen will blot out his own words in that way I will sign any such paper a dozen times over." But the discussion of the paper was had in reference to the clause concerning Mr. Bowen. Afterwards, when it came to what was written for me to sign, I declined to sign my paragraph.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is after. I think that this may be struck out.

Judge Neilson—I think it is proper.

Mr. Evarts—I have not asked him any question as to what transpired after.

Judge Neilson—It relates to the general inquiry.

Mr. Evarts—Will your Honor allow the question to be read?

Judge Neilson—You have been taking his general recollection of what was said.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will see by the reading of the question what my inquiry was. Will the stenographer read the question?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows: "Did you, on reading or hearing read that draft on that occasion, express your readiness to sign it, and offer to do it immediately?"

Judge Neilson—I think that calls generally for all that was said on the occasion, as bearing on that. It is a very comprehensive question, unlike most of your inquiries.

Mr. Evarts—It strikes me, on the other hand—if your Honor will allow me to state—that it was emphatically a question, on the cross-examination, that admits of an answer, yes or no, and requires nothing more.

Mr. Beach—He was asked, if your Honor please—

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't propose—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Evarts—I don't propose to discuss it any further.

Mr. Beach—Well, I do. He was asked whether he offered to sign it. He goes on to state what he has stated in reference to the clause concerning Mr. Bowen, and was then proceeding to say that when the clause relating to himself was read he found fault with it and refused to sign it in that shape, and just at that point the counsel interrupted the witness.

Judge Neilson—Your theory is that if the counsel wants his question answered yes or no, he should have intervened at once.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Instead of allowing him to proceed with a general explanation?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think we will let it stand as it is.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, well, I don't object, only I didn't want it to go on continuously, as if it were an answer to my question.

WRANGLES OVER THE LEGALITY OF ANSWERS.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, well, if your Honor please, I don't object to that, only I do not want to let him go on continuously as if in answer to my question. [To the witness.] Now, did you then and there, after this statement that you were ready to sign it a dozen times, or twenty times, whichever it was, did you then and there offer and propose, by movement or words, to actually sign the paper at that moment? A. I remember, Sir, as a gesture expressive of my willingness to sign such a paper, I took up a pen and made a motion like this—"I will sign it twenty times over."

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—But when I come to look closely at the paragraph, Sir, and saw—

Mr. Evarts—That is an answer.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; it is not. The question is whether he offered to sign it, or made any gesture—

Judge Neilson—Suppose he qualified that; I think we ought to take the whole statement.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, how can I conduct a cross-examination if it is in the power of this witness—and I do not speak of him differently from any other witness—if it is in the power of this witness to interpose explanations that are not a part of the answer to my question. He has abundant opportunity, your Honor knows—

Judge Neilson—He ought to confine himself to your question, of course.

Mr. Evarts—He has abundant opportunity to explain on re-direct examination, or a subsequent explanation may be given.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think when a statement is taken in part it ought to be taken entire.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that would expose one very much to the mercy of the witness.

Mr. Beach—I insist, Sir, that in the answer to that question whether he then offered to sign that paper, that the witness having said that, when the article relating to Mr. Bowen was read, he took up his pen and manifested his readiness both by gesture and declarations to sign, that he should be permitted to conclude the balance of the answer which he has undertaken to give; that when he saw or heard read the paragraph relating to himself, he then refused to sign that paper.

Judge Neilson—Without modification.

Mr. Evarts—I do not so understand that he has said anything of that kind; nothing of the kind.

Mr. Beach—Well, we will see whether he has.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] Had not the whole paper been read to you when you offered to sign—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; I object to the question; do not answer the question. I submit that, before this counsel shall be permitted to put another question, the witness shall be permitted to answer the question he has undertaken to answer and partly answered.

Judge Neilson—I think so. The inquiry was whether this gentleman was not ready and willing and did not offer to sign. He proceeds to state, illustrating his answer by the flourish he made at the time. I think he should be allowed to add, if he saw occasion to change his mind—allowed to add that.

Mr. Evarts—That is a subsequent matter. I want the fact as it occurred; and it is that he was then and there ready to sign, and took a pen for the purpose.

The Witness—I was ready to sign exactly what I stated, whether the other two—

Mr. Evarts—Well, now, I have not asked him as to what his readiness to sign was.

Judge Neilson—I think what he was proceeding to answer was called for by your question.

Mr. Evarts—I asked him what he then and there did.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—I asked for gesture or word.

Judge Neilson—Yes; he gave it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, then, there is an end of it.

Mr. Beach—No; it is not.

Mr. Evarts—How has he a right to go into what he was thinking about.

Mr. Beach—Nobody asked that.

Judge Neilson—But he has a right to this: if you fix him to the point that he was ready and willing and by a flourish of the pen he did offer to sign it, as he states, a dozen times, that would fix him to the fact that he had bound himself to sign it, or had promised to do so, and recognized it as correct; and, therefore, the witness ought to be allowed to say whether, upon further noticing the paper, he saw objection.

Mr. Evarts—That he would be allowed to say on the re-direct examination, perhaps.

Judge Neilson—It would be an awkward thing to stand, I think, on the cross-examination.

Mr. Beach—It would not be a true answer to the question which he was undertaking to answer.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I have asked him, and given him the full liberty of the word and gesture then exhibited, and now I take the word and gesture in full; I won't cut out anything of that, but as for interposition of what he and why, in his own mind, he was ready to do, I must insist it is no part of my examination.

Judge Neilson—If he saw, then and there, occasion to qualify the expression of readiness to sign, he should be allowed to state it.

Mr. Evarts—If he did there; but that is not the point of what he is going on to say. I will take all that occurred from this witness at that interview.

Judge Neilson—At that interview; that is all.

Mr. Evarts—Very well; but I will take it, with your Honor's permission, in my own inquiries.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you will take it in his answers also.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor will recur to the stenographer's minutes, you will get the precise phrase of the witness at the moment he was interrupted. He gave the gesture of his readiness to sign, and then went on with a "but," to say: "When I saw the paragraph relating to myself;" and there the counsel interrupted him.

Judge Neilson—I think he has a right to state that. Otherwise, he stands as a person who agreed or consented to sign. Whatever he said and did at that interview, he has a right to say.

Judge Neilson—Did you, at that interview, see the paper; did you inspect it? A. I don't think, Sir, that I saw the paper at all.

Judge Neilson—Well, now that disposes of it.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—I am adopting your theory, now.

The Witness—Your Honor understood me, of course. I saw the paper in the hands of the gentlemen there, but I don't think I had it in my own hands at all.

Judge Neilson—You did not examine it to see what it contained? A. No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Now, I adopt your theory.

Mr. Beach—But it was read to him on that occasion.

Judge Neilson—Was it read at that time.

The Witness—I don't remember distinctly whether the concluding paragraphs were read or not.

Mr. Evarts—Now, we will go on.

Judge Neilson—Yes, we will go on, please. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Tilton, before you made this gesture and this statement of readiness to sign, had you read or heard read the whole paper? A. I don't remember, Sir, whether the remaining portion was read or not; I know that—I remember by the impression which the reading made upon my mind, namely this, that when the long and effusive and glowing paragraph was put into Mr. Bowen's mouth, of retraction of all that he had said, I burst in, saying, "If Bowen will sign that, I will sign it twenty times over;" something of that sort. It was that part of the document brought to my attention; whether the remaining portion of it was then read or not, I don't know. I know this, however, that as soon as that document with its remaining portions was before me for my signature and I read it carefully, that I utterly repudiated it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we won't take that answer. It is to come yet from further questions if it comes at all.

Mr. Fullerton—It comes now.

Mr. Evarts—I submit to your Honor that it is not within the rule.

Judge Neilson—We will let it stand.

Mr. Evarts—I ask to have it struck out, if your Honor please; it is not the statement of anything that he said or did in answer to any question.

Judge Neilson—I think it is proper, as qualifying the other part of the answer, Let it stand.

WRANGLES OVER THE LEGALITY OF QUESTIONS.

Mr. Evarts—Will your Honor be so good as to note my exception. [To the witness]: Do you mean to say, Mr. Tilton, that when you heard or knew of only the part that affected Mr. Bowen's signature, you were ready to sign?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment—I object to that.

Mr. Evarts—That is my question.

Mr. Fullerton—I know it is your question; that is the reason I do object to it; he has already stated the fact that when that paragraph was read he expressed a willingness to sign, and he has repeated it over three times, and now the question is put for the fourth. I object upon the ground that the question is distinctly, emphatically and repeatedly answered already.

Mr. Evarts—No such question has been asked. Whatever has been said has been said by the witness voluntarily, and I now ask this question.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer.

Mr. Fullerton—It is only a consumption of time for nothing.

[Last question repeated by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, after having said it, he asks him if he means to say it; that is the import of the question.

Mr. Evarts—Exactly. He has voluntarily made a statement not in answer to any question of mine.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, you ask him if he means to state it.

Mr. Evarts—I do, and I have got his answer.

Judge Neilson—We will allow that.

Mr. Evarts—That you mean to say? A. What was that?

Q. You do; you have answered, haven't you? A. Well, I don't understand now what your last question was.

Mr. Evarts—Won't you read the question again?

[Question again read.]

A. My recollection is, Sir, that I burst in with an extravagant expression that, "If Bowen will say that and sign that and blot that out, I will agree never again to circulate it; I will sign it twenty times over;" something like that; that is my best recollection.

Mr. Fullerton—Same thing over again.

Mr. Evarts—Are you finding fault with me or the witness?

Mr. Fullerton—I am finding fault with the mode of examination.

Mr. Evarts—I have never asked him the question over again.

Mr. Fullerton—No, but you have asked him if he means to state, and now he has said the same thing over again.

Mr. Evarts—He has said exactly the same thing.

Judge Neilson—Well, you seem to agree, gentlemen; go on.

Mr. Fullerton—Impatience at the repetition of the same thing over and over again which we had all day yesterday—

Mr. Evarts—Yes.

Judge Neilson—We cannot try the counsel, you know; we have got enough to do without that.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't want to try him; I only wanted to suggest to your Honor that there is a great deal of time lost in the repetition of answers and questions.

Judge Neilson—Well, that ought not to be, of course.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will go on. [To the Witness.] When you made the gesture or expressed the purpose of readiness to sign, what prevented your execution of that purpose? A. Why, Sir, because a man makes a gesture he does not go and perform the act.

Q. I asked you what it was that prevented you? A. Prevented what?

Judge Neilson—That is implied plainly enough; he says, "If Bowen will do so and so." Mr. Bowen had not then signed.

Mr. Evarts—Does your Honor hold that my question is illegal?

Judge Neilson—I merely suggest that it does not seem to be necessary. The statement was that "If Bowen will sign that I will sign it a dozen or twenty times." Well, he had not signed it.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, my question is either allowable or not allowable.

Judge Neilson—I make the suggestion.

Mr. Morris—Well, I object. The question assumes a fact that has not yet been proven, and I ask that the stenographer read the question. The witness has not pretended that he attempted on that occasion to sign that paper. The counsel assumed that he had.

Mr. Evarts—We won't discuss the past.

Judge Neilson—What is the question?

Mr. Beach—Well, that is a proper suggestion ; we wont discuss the past.

Mr. Morris—I ask that the question be read ; I say it is an improper question, as assuming a fact that has not been proved.

Mr. Evarts—That is very proper, that the question be read.

Mr. Beach—The point is that the question assumes that there was a present purpose at the time of that gesture on the part of the witness to sign immediately the paper. No such thing appears.

Judge Neilson—Well, I suggested to the counsel that the whole thing was problematical, depending on the action of Mr. Bowen. Mr. Bowen had not yet acted, however. Go on.

Mr. Evarts—I am endeavoring to get the scene as it occurred. I have no knowledge concerning it that I shall venture to interpose in place of that of the witness. I must get it from him.

Judge Neilson—Although it appears that Bowen had not signed, and the statement is “if he will sign.”

Mr. Evarts—Well, isn't this a little discussing the effect of the evidence rather than the—

Mr. Beach—No, it is the character of the question that it assumes something that is a false impression.

Judge Neilson—Read that question. All this trouble arises from my departing from my usual course in making a suggestion perhaps. I will not do so again.

[Question read : “When you made the gesture or expressed the purpose of readiness to sign, what prevented your execution of that purpose ?”]

Mr. Beach—We object to the question upon the ground that it assumes that the witness then expressed a purpose of readiness to sign.

Mr. Evarts—We have had that over and over again.

Mr. Beach—No we haven't.

Mr. Evarts—That something or other prevented it.

Judge Neilson—I don't think you have got the correct conception of the evidence, allow me to say, as given. When Bowen had not yet signed, the witness says : “If Mr. Bowen will sign—do all that—I will do so and so.” It is hardly proper to understand that as a declaration of readiness and willingness, then and there, on the part of the witness to sign, Mr. Evarts—I don't propose to discuss the weight with the jury of this or that exhibit of an occurrence.

Judge Neilson—Well, you are entitled to all that took place there.

Mr. Evarts—Now, my question is, I suppose, a proper one ?

[Question again read.]

Judge Neilson—Now, I disallow that, unless you leave out the word “purpose.” He did not express a purpose to sign it then and there ; he had expressed a willingness. Strike out the word “purpose,” and I will allow the question.

MR. BOWEN'S CONSENT MOST DOUBTFUL.

Mr. Evarts—I will. [To the witness.] What prevented the then present signing of it ?

Judge Neilson—Modify it in that way, Sir. [To the witness.] Now, answer it.

The Witness—Why, Sir, the paper was in no condition then to be signed. Mr. Bowen had not seen it—had not been seen either by Mr. Bowen or Mr. Beecher, so far as I knew.

Q. How did you know anything about that ? A. That is my recollection of it now.

Q. Who told you that ? A. My impression is that the paper was brought there fresh that day by Mr. Claflin, possibly by Mr. Wilkeson—the purport of their inquiry being this: whether or not, in case Mr. Bowen should sign such a paper, would I then sign it ; that is my recollection of the object of the interview. I said : “If Mr. Bowen will, certainly I will—twenty times over.”

Q. Now, what is your answer to the question, what prevented you then and there signing it ? A. I don't know that anything prevented me ; I might have signed it if I had chosen. If I had insisted on signing, I presume I could have signed it, and they would have been only too happy to have had me do it.

Q. Then, so far as you can now state to us, nothing prevented the signing of it that came from anybody else ? A. I don't know of any purpose to sign it ; I expressed my willingness to sign it, not my intention to sign it—my willingness.

Q. You took a pen in your hand, didn't you ? A. I took a pen in my hand and made a gesture, just as you are doing at me ; that is my best recollection ; yes, Sir. I was sitting at a table and took up a pen in this way. I said : “Bring me that paper if Mr. Bowen will sign it I will sign it,” and took up a pen, &c.

Q. Now, do you remember some one saying to you, “Don't sign it first, or perhaps Bowen won't be so willing to sign after you have ?” A. No, Sir ; I don't recollect anything of the kind.

Q. Are you certain that nothing of that kind was said ? A. By whom ? Mr. Claflin—Mr. Wilkeson ?

Q. By anybody ? A. I don't remember anything of that kind being said. Mr. Moulton may have expressed some doubt that Bowen would sign it ; I expressed a doubt ; I think both expressed doubts.

Q. Well, have you no recollection or impression that some one said what I have embodied in my last question ? A. What was that, Sir ?

[Question read by TRIBUNE stenographer—“Now, do you remember some one saying to you, don't sign it first or perhaps Mr. Bowen won't be so willing to sign after you have ?”]

The Witness—I don't recollect anything of that sort ; my impression is that Mr. Moulton said that he didn't believe that Mr. Bowen would sign it, or something of that kind ; throw the same kind of doubt on it that I had thrown.

Q. Do you remember whether Mr. Claflin said anything at this point ? A. I remember Mr. Claflin clinching his hand together in this way, saying : “Mr. Bowen has got to sign it.” That is what I remember.

Q. Do you remember Mr. Claflin saying you better not sign it before Bowen does, for perhaps he won't be so willing to sign after you have signed ? A. No, Sir ; I don't remember that.

Q. Are you certain he did not say that ? A. Oh ! I won't be certain, but I have no recollection on the subject.

Q. Now, Sir, do you think that the whole of that paper was not read by you, or read to you, that evening at that interview ?

A. I have already said, Sir, that I don't remember whether it was or not.

Q. Whether it was or not? A. This is true, however; that if the remaining paragraphs were read, they were glazed over; they were not talked about and my attention was not specifically drawn to them, for I remember being struck as soon as I took the paper myself the next day and read it carefully over, with the extraordinary words that were put into my mouth, which I said I would never sign to the day of doom.

Q. Very well, now; is it your best impression that at that interview, occurring to see whether you would sign the paper, the parts of it that affected yourself were not made the subject of consideration? A. I don't think they were, Sir, any further than that—would I be willing, in case Mr. Bowen signed, to sign myself.

Q. And how was it to be decided or determined whether you would sign the paper if the parts that were to affect you were not considered? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. How were you to decide whether or no you would sign that paper if the parts that affected you in it were not considered? A. Why, Mr. Everts, the part which I was to assume in that agreement had already been spoken of, namely, would I pledge myself, in case Mr. Bowen blotted out his charges against Mr. Beecher, not to circulate those charges after he had blotted them out; we had orally talked of it.

Q. With whom? A. Mr. Claflin.

Q. Anybody else? A. Well, Mr. Moulton.

Q. In company with Mr. Claflin? A. I think so.

Q. Yes. Very well, when were those previous conversations? A. I think Mr. Claflin came to Mr. Moulton's house one day about it.

Q. While you were there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long before this? A. Well, I should think a day or two.

Q. A day or two? A. Yes, Sir; but that is a little distinct in my mind. I remember having a conversation with Mr. Claflin, in Mr. Moulton's parlor.

Q. Upon some day—a day or two, or about that, before this meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are quite confident of that, are you? A. I think there were two or three interviews with Mr. Claflin, mainly held, however, by Mr. Moulton before this agreement culminated.

Q. Well, I only speak of those at which you were present? A. Yes, Sir, I distinctly remember being present at two with Mr. Claflin—the one was in Mr. Moulton's parlor, another in Mr. Moulton's study. At the same time they may be two parts of one interview.

Q. Still, your best impression is that a day or two or more before this occasion where the paper was present you had had a discussion with Mr. Claflin and Mr. Moulton about a paper to be prepared? A. I don't think we had had any discussion about a paper.

Q. Well, about the subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was afterwards contained, more or less, in the paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, who took away that paper? A. What paper, Sir?

Q. That draft. A. I don't remember.

Q. That night—that interview? A. I don't remember.

Q. Did you take it away? A. I don't remember that; don't remember whether I took it away, or saw it the next day in Mr. Wilkeson's office, or a day or two after.

Q. Now, did you see it again and when? A. When I was asked to sign it I declined to do so; I declined to sign the paragraph attributed to me.

Q. That is not my question.

Judge Neilson—The question was when did you see it again?

The Witness—Well, it was when I was expected to sign it; I don't remember that particular date—about that same time.

Q. Can't you tell me when, in relation to this interview which you have described, when the draft was there, when you next saw it? A. I don't remember the day or the hour.

Q. No; but how near the time? A. Oh, I should think very near.

Q. And where? A. My recollection is that it was in Wilkeson's office, in what used to be the North Pacific Railroad; that is my best recollection.

Q. In whose possession was it then? A. I think it was in his.

Q. Well, did you call for it? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Was it reduced? A. Why, it was there between us.

Q. Whether you asked for it or not, you don't know? A. I do not remember; whether or no, I had had it meanwhile, in order to change my paragraph, I don't know—

Q. No matter—the fact, that is what I am trying to get at? A. I do not remember.

Q. At the fact whether you had it or not? A. Well, I do not remember.

Q. Now, at this interview—this meeting with Mr. Wilkeson, when this draft was again before you, did you then peruse and consider the whole of it? A. That I cannot answer; my recollection is, Mr. Everts—

Q. Well, that is all I have asked you—you cannot say whether you perused it, considered it?

Mr. Beach—Then?

Mr. Everts—Then I mean, of course, I have your answer.

Mr. Beach—Yes, but you broke him up in an addition to the answer which might have been acceptable.

Q. When again did you see that draft? A. I don't remember the date.

Mr. Beach—Do you understand him to say that it was the draft he saw?

Mr. Everts—Yes.

Mr. Beach—I don't.

Mr. Everts—Well, I will get that right. [To the witness.] I have asked you about the draft; it was the draft you saw at Wilkeson's, wasn't it? A. I was going to tell you what my recollection was, and then you stopped me.

Q. Stenographer, you read my last question to see if I didn't get an answer to it. Was it the draft that was before you and Wilkeson, at this interview at the Northern Pacific Railroad office? There was some paper before you—was it the draft? Now, that is the only question. A. I do not know whether it was Wilkeson's draft of what he proposed for me to sign, or whether it was my draft of what I proposed to sign; it may have been both drafts.

Q. Can you or no tell me whether or not Wilkeson's draft which had been before you at the interview with Clafin, Moulton and himself was before you, too, before Wilkeson and yourself at this interview at the railroad office? A. That may have been; if so, then it was there in order that my proposed change should be put into it.

Q. No matter what it was there for. I have not asked you what it was for when there. I asked you if it was there? A. I don't know.

Q. You don't remember? A. No.

Q. Either way? A. No.

Q. When, if at all, was that draft taken into your possession and made the subject of amendment or change by you? A. I do not remember the exact date.

THE WAY THE AWARD WAS MADE.

Q. Now, have you a copy of the award that was made by these arbitrators. A. Yes; it consisted of Bowen's check for $7,000; I believe I have it; that is the only copy.

Q. You got the check? A. I do not know whether I have or not; I got the money.

Q. Well, I would like to see it.

Judge Neilson—You would not naturally have the check. A. I do not know whether I have it or not; Mr. Bowen has it—

Judge Neilson—It would go back to Bowen, of course. A. Yes.

Mr. Evarts—But I do not know whether he has it; of course, he would not keep the check as a security for money.

Judge Neilson—He would not delay drawing the money.

Mr. Evarts—It has been already proved that the money has been drawn and deposited; it is the paper itself that I would like to get.

Mr. Morris—Well, we haven't got it, of course.

The Witness—What paper do you refer to?

Q. Mr. Bowen's check. A. Well, no, Sir; I had Mr. Bowen's money; that is what— You asked me if I had a copy of the award; I told you that the only award was Mr. Bowen's check—there was no other paper. That is all I cared for—cared for to get.

Q. Now, was Mr. Moulton with you when you received that check? A. My impression is that all the arbitrators were there.

Q. Mr. Moulton was not an arbitrator? A. No, Sir. He was there too; it was held in his dining room.

Q. Well, I am asking for the fact; was Mr. Moulton there? A. Yes, Sir; he was there.

Q. And did you then and there hand over to him the check? A. No, Sir; he then and there handed over to me the check.

Q. No; but to Mr. Moulton, I am talking about? A. Oh! I don't remember that—my impression is I kept it.

Q. Well, do you remember Mr. Moulton was there? A. Yes.

Q. Now, my question is, did you then and there hand the check to him? A. Mr. Moulton?

Q. Yes. A. I think not; I think I took the check home; showed it to my wife.

Q. Have you a clear recollection of that? A. No, Sir; not very clear; I think I gave the check next day to Franklin Woodruff for deposit.

Q. As a deposit? A. Yes, Sir; that is my recollection.

Q. Next day after you received it? A. I think so; perhaps two days after.

Q. And not to Moulton personally? A. I think not, Sir.

RECORDS OF THE CHANGES IN THE COVENANT.

Q. Now, where have you any draft or record of any changes you have made in this original draft? A. Have I any draft of them?

Q. Have you any draft; yes? Any draft or record? A. No, Sir; but Wilkeson has.

Q. Of the changes? A. He has the paragraph which I proposed; it was in my writing: I displaced his paragraph and substituted my own; he has that.

Q. He did have it at that time? A. Yes; and he copied from that—made the clean copy in his own handwriting.

Q. It was left in his possession—that draft? A. Yes, I believe it was.

Q. Your draft, as you remember, then, the article relating to this in the tripartite agreement, is in your own language? A. I do not know whether it is entirely in my own language; I think it is in my own handwriting. My recollection is (if you will hand me the book) that I adopted a part of Wilkeson's paragraph.

Q. That, of course, may be; I mean to say that the paragraph as it appears, was as you presented it in shape? A. I do not think I composed the entire paragraph. I think I took a part of his composition and changed it—but my recollection is that the whole paragraph which I proposed to sign he handed over to me in my handwriting; and that he then made the clean copy of the covenant with my section copied from my handwriting in it, and that then I signed it.

Q. Then as it reads it is as you presented it for insertion? A. Yes, Sir.

HOW THE SIGNED PAPER WAS EXECUTED.

Q. Now, when you presented this paragraph for insertion, was the copy ready for signature, prepared, in your presence? A. That I do not remember.

Q. By Mr. Wilkeson? A. I don't remember that.

Q. You do not remember it? A. No, Sir.

Q. You do not remember whether you signed it at that interview? A. I don't remember; no, Sir.

Q. Do you remember that you signed it the first of the parties? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Do you remember whether the parties were together when it was signed, and signed it in the presence of each other? A. I remember that they were not; they never were together.

Q. Never were together? A. No, Sir.

Q. And what signatures were on it when you signed it, if there were any, you do not know? A. I don't remember; my impression is that Mr. Beecher signed it first.

Q. That it was on when you signed? A. That is my impression; I will not be certain.

Q. And that Mr. Bowen's was not on when you signed? A. I don't remember, Mr. Evarts; on second thought, my impression is that Mr. Bowen signed it first; that I signed it next and wrote my name over his; and that Mr. Beecher signed it last, and wrote 'his name over mine; fulfilling the Scripture, that "the first shall be last and the last first;" that is my recollection. I will not be positive.

Q. That differs from your recollection a moment ago? A. Yes, Sir; it comes to my mind.

Q. Was this paper executed in triplicate? A. No, Sir; there was only one copy.

Q. Only one copy? A. Yes, Sir; that was the understanding; that understanding was not kept, however, for Mr. Wilkeson retained a copy, and afterwards published it without authority.

Mr. Evarts—I ask to have all that stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Strike it out, undoubtedly.

Mr. Evarts—I asked you if it was in triplicate, and you said there was only one copy? A. No, Sir; I did not say that. I said the solemn agreement was that there should be only one copy, but that was broken.

Q. That is not my question; I asked whether it was executed in triplicate, or if there was only one copy executed? A. I say that our understanding was that there should be only one copy, but there were two copies; Mr. Wilkeson made one and kept it.

Mr. Evarts—That is not my question. I ask if it was executed in triplicate? A. Only one paper was signed.

Mr. Evarts—That is all my question. I ask that all the other part be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Certainly; the rest can be inquired of afterwards.

Mr. Evarts—Undoubtedly, if important.

OTHER CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE COVENANT.

Q. Who kept that single copy? A. Mr. Horace B. Claflin.

Q. Was it delivered to him in your presence? A. I do not remember.

Q. In whose hands did you leave it when you signed it? A. My best recollection is it was—perhaps Charles Storrs; possibly Frank Moulton's; still—

Q. Charles Storrs was one of the arbitrators? A. Yes, Sir; I will not be positive about that.

Q. But he was one of the arbitrators? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. Now, who were present when you signed it? A. I do not remember that.

Q. Well, somebody was; you remember some one? A. I don't remember that anybody was; I don't remember now; I don't remember where I signed it.

Q. Well, was Mr. Wilkeson present? A. That I do not remember.

Q. Was Mr. Claflin present? A. I do not remember that.

Q. Was Mr. Storrs? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Was Mr. Freeland? A. I don't remember; I remember that he was not.

Q. You remember that Mr. Freeland was not? A. Yes, Sir, because he had nothing to do with the business.

Q. No matter about your reason. You remember that he was not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Bowen present? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Moulton present? A. Possibly; he may have been; I am not sure.

Q. But this scene is not before you? A. No, Sir.

Q. So that you can reproduce it at all, in the persons that were there? A. No, Sir; I do not remember the place or the time that I put my name on that paper, and that is the reason of my indistinctness.

Q. You have nothing before you now—no picture in which you can present it at all? A. No, Sir; it does not come up to my mind.

Q. And can you not tell us at all whether it was left in your hands, after you signed it, or whether it was left in some one else's hands, after your signing it? A. Well, Sir, my memory is too indistinct to answer that; my impression is that the paper lingered for several days before all the signatures were got; whether Charles Storrs got them or Mr. Moulton got them I do not know.

Q. Now, Sir, do you remember whether or no you had received the check of Mr. Bowen before you signed this paper? A. I received the check of Mr. Bowen on the night of the arbitration. I don't think the paper was signed until a few days after that.

Q. Are you certain of that? A. I think I am positive of that, Sir.

SEVERE STRICTURES ON MR. WILKESON.

Q. Upon reflection, can you recall whether you had not signed the paper, and were without your money after it was signed? A. No, Sir; no such incident occurred. That was Mr. Wilkeson's statement, and it was a falsehood, put before the Investigating Committee; Mr. Wilkeson published a statement to the effect that I declined to sign the tripartite covenant, because Mr. Bowen had not paid me; that was a lie; Mr. Bowen paid me on the spot, the spur, within half an hour from the arbitration.

Q. Now, your recollection is distinct, is it, that you had the check before you signed the paper? A. My recollection is this, Sir, that the check was paid to me on that very night of the arbitration; and the paper was signed some days afterwards—first one signature, then another, and then another.

Q. It is your own signature that I speak of? A. My impression is that my signature was two or three days afterwards; that I had had this discussion with Mr. Wilkeson about the paragraph that I was to sign.

Q. Are you certain that you received the check before you signed the paper? A. Yes, Sir, because the paper was not signed until afterwards.

Q. Now you say you cannot remember when or where you signed that paper? A. I don't remember the exact spot; I remember there was a discussion which followed it, of two or three days.

Q. Nor the exact time? A. No, Sir; only I remember this very distinctly, that the signing of the paper had nothing to do with the arbitration, or the payment of the money.

Mr. Evarts—That I did not ask you, and I will ask to have it struck out. Mr. Stenographer, that will be struck out.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Morris]—Now, gentlemen, have you the pages of the “True Story,” as it is called?

Mr. Morris—No, Sir; I have not got them.

Mr. Evarts—I ask now, if your Honor please, from the counsel of the plaintiff, the production of the preserved pages of the “True Story;” I gave them notice.

Judge Neilson—They will undoubtedly give them up if they have them.

Mr. Evarts—I gave them notice to produce them yesterday—that I would need them this morning.

Mr. Beach—They ought to have been produced. What is the reason they have not, Mr. Morris?

Mr. Morris—I have not got them in my possession.

The Witness—I didn’t understand that I was requested to bring them.

Mr. Evarts—No matter.

Mr. Beach—Oh! yes; it is matter.

Mr. Evarts—I was not asking him any question; I was asking the papers from counsel.

The Witness—I will bring them to you at 2 o’clock.

Mr. Morris—[To Mr. Evarts.] I didn’t have them, Mr. Evarts.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Evarts, perhaps if you proceed to some other topic, they will bring them at 2 o’clock.

Mr. Beach—Yes, we will bring them to you at 2 o’clock, after Mr. Tilton goes home from the witness stand; he didn’t understand that he was to bring them; he thought that the request was addressed to counsel. I didn’t think of attending to it, as I supposed Mr. Morris had all the papers.

THE READERS OF THE BOWEN LETTER.

Mr. Evarts—We will pass, then, if your Honor please, to another subject. [To the witness]: Now Mr. Tilton, you prepared for publication, or put in type, Mr. Bowen’s letter, with comments—do you remember? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, has the date of that been fixed—the date of this publication? [Turning to Mr. Shearman.] Has that been fixed, Mr. Shearman?

The Witness—The end of March, 1872.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; I think you did fix it.

The Witness—I mentioned it to you yesterday.

Q. Yes; now, when you put that in type or shape, as it is here, as an exhibit, to whom did you show it? A. I don’t know that I showed it to anybody after it was in type; I discussed it with Oliver Johnson before it was in type.

Q. That we have; now it was put in this slip form? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. My question is to whom did you show it?

Mr. Beach—After that?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, after it was in that shape.

The Witness—I don’t recall, at this time any one to whom I showed it; Mr. Moulton had it and showed it to Mr. Beecher, I think.

Q. Oh! that is what he did; I ask what you did? A. My impression is that Mr. Beecher was present, and that Mr. Moulton showed it to him, and that I was present.

Q. And in your presence? A. I think so.

Q. Now, to whom else did you show it? A. Outside of my counsel, I don’t remember anybody, at present.

Q. You think you did show it to your counsel? A. I think I showed it to Mr. Ward; I don’t know whether I showed it to Judge Reynolds or not.

Q. Are you confident in your recollection, Mr. Tilton, that you did not show this, at that time, to any one but Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher and your counsel? A. I think at that time nobody saw it; after that time a number of people saw it.

Q. I speak now of that time. A. I don’t remember now that any one saw it, except through Mr. Moulton; Mr. Claflin saw it, and Mr. Bowen, but not through me.

Q. I speak of what you did? A. Still I may be wrong about it; I don’t remember.

Q. And how soon after this do you think you did begin to show it to other persons? A. My impression is that nobody saw it until after the Woodhull publication, in November, and I was joining with Mr. Moulton in making devices, as part of the—

Mr. Evarts—No matter. I ask that that be struck out. It is the date that I am asking for. Was it not in December, 1872? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember whether you showed it to Mr. Wilkeson before the tripartite agreement or covenant was signed? A. Why, it was part of the tripartite agreement—the article.

Q. Before it was made a part of it? Why, of course.

Q. Before it had been agreed upon? A. It was a part of the tripartite covenant—pasted fast to it.

Mr. Evarts—I understand that.

Mr. Beach—It must have been shown, then, to Mr. Wilkeson.

Mr. Evarts—We will see. [To the witness]: How early did you show it to Mr. Wilkeson? That is the fair way to put it. A. Do you mean on that day?

Q. How early in the transaction of the tripartite agreement did you show that paper to Mr. Wilkeson? A. I don’t remember, Sir.

Q. Did you show it to him before it became part of the tripartite agreement, and before the text of the tripartite agreement had been presented? A. Why, of course.

Q. Very well? A. How otherwise could it have been made a part of the agreement?

Q. It is not necessary to reason with me about it. I take your answer—“of course you did.” Now, can you tell me at what time you did show it to Mr. Wilkeson? A. No, Sir; while these negotiations were pending—while this discussion was pending.

Q. And before the tripartite agreement had received the consent of the parties, or it had been adopted—before it was ever written by Wilkeson? A. Why, yes, Sir; for the writing of it referred to this paper.

Q. Did you show it to him before the arbitration was agreed upon? A. I don’t remember.

WHEN THE ARBITRATION WAS AGREED TO.

Q. Now, when was the arbitration agreed upon?

A. That I don't know. You will have to ask Mr. Moulton.

Q. And how long a time before the tripartite agreement, or the award, you cannot tell? A. Oh, a few days before.

Q. Recently—quite a few days. And up to that time no arbitration had been fixed? A. To what time?

Q. Up to this time—just a few days before the tripartite agreement and the award, or either of them. No arbitration had been agreed upon for the differences between Mr. Bowen and yourself. A. No arbitration save that one; there was only one arbitration; that was only a few days before.

Q. It was ended by an award? A. Yes, only a few days; I do not know; I don't remember how many—not many.

Q. Had you then any suit pending—commenced against Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what court? A. Well, I don't know in what court—perhaps this one; Mr. Ward commenced a suit in my absence.

Q. There was a suit pending, which had been commenced during your absence? A. I don't know whether it was a suit, or whether it was what you call supplementary proceedings. Is that a suit?

Mr. Belcher [laughing]—Oh, no.

The Witness—To take testimony, or something of that kind.

Mr. Evarts—I once heard of a young lawyer who commenced a suit by a fi fa; and in that sense it might be a suit.

The Witness—Mr. Ward can tell you just what it was.

Q. It was a suit or some proceeding? A. Some proceeding; I don't know whether it was a suit.

Mr. Evarts—Some proceeding at law, for the collection of a claim—is your notion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I have gone back, I think, from the question. You said December. Now, who did you show this article to in December, including the Bowen letter—this slip? I don't remember that I showed it to anybody, simply as an article by itself, but only in connection with what was called the "True Story;" perhaps, however, I did to Mr. Belcher; I think I did to Samuel Belcher.

Q. Now, I am inquiring about nothing at present except this article put into slip form, in type, by itself and as a separate paper. You think you showed that to Mr. Belcher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And at this time, in December? A. I do not remember; it may have been earlier than that.

HOW THE PROOFS OF THE LETTER WERE GUARDED.

Q. Do you remember how many slips you had of that paper? A. Three slips were printed, I think; I afterwards learned that a printer had found one and showed it—

Q. I do not ask that; I ask how many slips were made? A. I think three slips.

Q. If there were more printed let me know it? A. I afterwards learned that a copy had been dropped, as I was told, from my pocket in my printing office; whether that was true I do not know; but I was told that a printer found it and showed it to the Rev. Dr. Field, editor of The Evangelist, whose printing office was on the next floor to mine.

Q. This was all rumor? A. It was not all rumor, for the Doctor told me that he saw it.

Q. I thought you said that you were told; you say he saw it? A. Yes, Sir; but he did not see it through me; he saw it through another party.

Q. You did not show it to Dr. Field? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. And you knew only of three slips? A. That is all; I think there was a third; I think only three altogether.

Q. Now, what became of these three slips? A. One went to Mr. Wilkeson, and is imbedded in the tripartite covenant, and is here in Court; the other is in our possession, with Mr. Johnson's amendments.

Q. We have that here.

Mr. Morris—It is in evidence.

The Witness—Is it?

Mr. Evarts—That is two.

The Witness—I have the idea that there was only one completed slip.

Q. That is two. Now, where is the third? A. Only one completed slip. I have given you an account of them.

Q. I have had two, give us the third? I have already told you that one copy was picked up by a printer.

Q. You heard that? A. I think that was an incomplete copy, without Mr. Johnson's manuscript amendments. The copy which Judge Morris and I have is incomplete, except so far as it is completed in Mr. Johnson's handwriting; I think the copy in the tripartite covenant is complete in type; still I will not be certain.

Q. Well, now, these three slips are all you know of? A. They are all; perhaps I had a complete one myself; I do not know; I think it was quite likely I had.

Q. Then one was lost, and the other two are produced here? A. Yes, Sir; I think I had a complete slip of my own, on second thought.

Q. Besides? A. I think I had.

Q. What became of that? A. I think that was the one I showed to Mr. Belcher; I don't know what has become of it; I think I showed it to Mr. Harman; I don't know what has become of it.

Q. That would make a fourth? A. Yes, Sir; that would be a fourth.

Q. Now, were these slips struck off at the same time? A. I think they were; I think they were struck off at two different times; that is, I think, after Mr. Johnson's amendments were written in manuscript on the proof, then the proof was corrected.

Q. Exactly; but I mean at the same period of time? A. Yes, Sir, within a day or two; then the type was distributed.

Q. Yes; now, Mr. Tilton, are you quite certain that the type was not preserved in that shape, for a considerable length of time, and not distributed? A. I gave orders that the type should be kept, meanwhile, in Mr. Russell's care, and that no printer should get access to it, and the moment the slips were made the type was destroyed.

Q. Was that done, as you understood? A. I have every reason to believe it was.

Q. Then you do not know that after being preserved in your safe, or the safe of the establishment, in the composition of the type? A. It never was preserved in any safe; it was locked up over night, in order that nobody might surreptitiously get a copy of it.

Q. Then, in December, there were no slips, except such as had been made in the preceding March? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, did you give one of those slips to Mr. John W. Harman in December? A. I loaned him one.

Q. Well, you left it in his possession? A. Yes, Sir; I will not be sure of the date; it may have been November; I rather think it was.

Q. About that time; it was after the Woodhull publication? A. I think I showed it to Mr. Harman long before that.

Q. Before the Woodhull publication? A. Yes, Sir; and then I showed it to him afterwards. He wanted to borrow it afterwards. Mr. Harman was an intimate friend of mine, and I consulted him frequently about my affairs, and I showed him that slip.

Q. I didn't understand you as saying, just now, that Mr. Harman was one of those you showed it to.

Mr. Beach—He did.

Judge Neilson—He mentioned his name before.

Mr. Evarts—I understand that, but I understood he mentioned that as having been shown to him after the Woodhull scandal.

The Witness—I think he sent a request to me that he might see that proof, to refresh his mind with the contents.

Q. That is, after the scandal he sent that request? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you think you showed it to him before? A. Yes, Sir; I think he also wanted to see Mr. Bowen's letters to me.

Q. No matter about anything else. Strike out all that relates to that.

Q. Now, do you remember, in November or December, after the Woodhull scandal, handing this to Mr. Harman upon his request, or otherwise, and saying to him that you didn't care what he did with it? A. No, Sir; I don't remember that. Mr. Harman borrowed my letters from Mr. Bowen, and that slip—

Q. I am not asking you that. No matter, Mr. Tilton; I am not inquiring about that. I am asking about this very slip, whether you handed it to, or left it with, Mr. Harman upon his request, or otherwise, after the Woodhull scandal was published, and told him you didn't care what he did with it? A. No, Sir; I gave no such—

Mr. Evarts—Well?

The Witness—You must allow me, Mr. Evarts, to speak the exact meaning. I committed it to Mr. Harman's discretion, that he might make such use of it as he, in his judgment, thought right. I didn't say to him I didn't care what he did with it; I cared a good deal what he did with it.

MR. TILTON DISTRUSTS A BROTHER JOURNALIST.

Q. What form of words did you use in confiding this discretion to Mr. Harman? A. Words to this effect: that I committed it to his judgment and care. Mr. Harman had it two or three times. On one occasion I remember that a gentleman from a newspaper office had called to see me, and wanted very much to see that proof, and I didn't show it to him. I think he said that Mr. Harman had spoken of it. I went to Mr. Harman's house with the proof; Mr. Harman was not there. I left it with him—I left it at his house, inclosed in a note; I don't know what that note said.

Q. But that note confided the discretion, did it? A. Yes, Sir. In other words, I would not show it to this gentleman from a newspaper office on his request, but I went to Mr. Harman's house to see him. He was not there. I left it in a sealed envelope with him with some request; I don't remember the phraseology.

Q. But expressive of submitting it to his discretion to do what he thought best with it? A. I committed it to Mr. Harman's discretion to do what he thought right under the circumstances.

Q. Who was the newspaper man who came to you? A. [Pointing.] That man over there, Mr. McKelway.

Q. Mr. McKelway of The Eagle? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And after that did he apply to you for it for publication? A. Mr. McKelway?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I don't remember whether he did or not.

Q. What is the best recollection that you have? A. My impression is that he wanted to see it. I didn't feel safe in showing it to him. He intimated to me that he had talked on the subject, I think, with Mr. Harman; at all events, I knew Mr. McKelway was a very enterprising newspaper man and I didn't wish to put it into his hands for publication.

Q. You understood that, in his enterprising way, he had come to you with the purpose of publishing it, if he could, didn't you? A. No, Sir; I don't think he came there with such an intention; I think he came as a personal friend; I think he came disavowing any desire to publish it, but rather to know the circumstances.

Q. Are you sure he disavowed the purpose of publishing it? A. Mr. McKelway made a very kindly and pleasant call on me one evening to sympathize with me in regard to this scandal.

Q. Well, no matter about the generalities. In consequence of that call from Mr. McKelway you put this in the hands of Mr. Harman? A. It had been in Mr. Harman's hands before.

Q. I understand that, but you put it in this sealed package with this note? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. McKelway wanted to see it, and I didn't want to show it to him.

Q. And you submitted it to Mr. Harman to decide? A. Yes, Sir; I thought if Mr. Harman was willing Mr. McKelway should see it—if his judgment dictated it, he might do as he chose with it.

Q. Now, Sir, that paper was published in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How soon after you had put this sealed in Mr. Harman's hands? A. I should think five or six months afterward.

Q. Five or six months? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you have any notice that it was going to be printed or published before it was published? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was your seeing it in The Eagle—as you have stated, I believe—

Mr. Beach—No.

Mr. Evarts—He says he saw it copied into The Eagle.

The Witness—It was copied into The Eagle one Monday night.

Mr. Evarts—That is where you saw it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was your seeing it in The Eagle the first suspicion you had that it was going to be published? A. I don't know whether I saw it in The Sunday Press or not.

Q. Or in the other papers? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I thought you were uncertain about seeing it in The Eagle, and that is the reason I put it in this way? A. There had been two or three threats to publish it before that, and I wanted to see Mr. Van Anden about it.

Q. Who had made these threats? A. I don't know; there had been some talk that that letter was in The Eagle office, and I once had a little conversation with Mr. Van Anden—

Mr. Evarts—Well—

Mr. Beach—Wait, wait!

The Witness— —and I told him that to publish anything of that sort would be only to publish part of the story.

Mr. Evarts—If the witness will only wait, I am objecting to his answer.

Mr. Beach—Well, so am I.

Mr. Evarts—I beg your pardon. [To the witness.] Now, Mr. Tilton, who made these threats of publication? A. I don't remember; I think it was simply the floating gossip of the town that The Eagle had possession of a scandal which it might publish if it would. I don't know that any threats were made; I should not call them threats; it was gossip.

Q. Do you know Mr. McDermott, connected with the press in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was he connected with The Sunday Press at the time this paper appeared in it? A. I afterward learned that he was.

Q. Now, do you remember his seeing you in advance of any publication of it in The Sunday Press or The Eagle, and informing you that it was going to be published? A. No, Sir. I remember that after he had published it, he came into my office of The Golden Age and I ordered him out.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I ask to have that struck out.

Mr. Fullerton—That he was ordered out.

Mr. Evarts—Yes. The stenographer will strike that out.

AN OLD JOKE REVIVED.

Mr. Evarts—Are you quite sure that Mr. McDermott didn't tell you in advance of that publication that it was going to be published? A. Yes, Sir, as certain as that the day of judgment will come.

Q. As that is a future event, you should say "sure," should you not? A. That is one of those things of which we are all certain. It is a saying of the Almighty.

Q. But still it is the future? A. The Great I Am; The Evermore Present.

Mr. Evarts—Well.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Evarts.] You give it up, do you?

Mr. Evarts—You mean by that that you are entirely certain that he did not come to you? A. I did not know Mr. McDermott—I didn't know him until he came into my office and presented his card after the publication. I asked him if he was the man who published that paper, and he said he was, and I ordered him out of the office.

Q. That is all very well. You did not know the man? A. I did not know him at all.

Q. Do you know that any one came to you and told you in advance of its publication that it was going to be published? A. No, Sir, I have no recollection of any such thing.

Q. Are you certain that nobody came to you and told you that it was going to be published in advance of its publication? A. No, Sir, I have no recollection of any such thing at all.

HOW THE BOWEN LETTER REACHED THE PUBLIC.

Q. As far as you know and understand, Mr. Tilton, this slip that you had confided to Mr. Harman was the source from which the publication came, was it not? A. Not at all.

Q. Well, what slips do you understand it came from? A. My understanding is this: I never quite comprehended until a few days ago how that slip came to be published. When I saw Mr. Kinsella's correspondence published, he said in that that Mr. Beecher had shown to him the tripartite covenant, or, at all events, Mr. Bowen's denial, and I saw there an explanation of how, possibly, The Eagle might have got hold of that article.

Q. Well, that is, you saw that the tripartite covenant might have furnished the means of the publication? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was your own imagination, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That it did? A. I never have known until this day exactly how The Eagle got hold of the paragraph.

Q. Then you don't know that the copy given to Mr. Harman by you was the means or source of the publication? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Did you ever receive back from Mr. Harman that slip that you confided to him, or did it ever come back into your possession? A. I think he gave it back to me.

Q. When? A. I think about that time.

Q. About what time? A. Shortly afterward. That is my impression. Shortly after the time when it was—

Q. Published? A. No, Sir. Shortly after the time when it was confided to him.

Q. That is your impression? A. I think so. Mr. Harman would know better about that than I.

Q. Where is it? A. Well, Sir, my—I don't know where it is if it is not the same proof that we have here in evidence.

Q. You have but one, have you? A. It may have been that one or it may have been another. If it is another, I don't know where it is.

Q. Have you any recollection that it ever was returned to you? A. I think it was returned with Mr. Bowen's letters. That is my impression. I won't be certain, because once or twice Mr. Harman and I saw the paper and talked the matter over.

Q. You won't be positive that it ever came back to you? A.

Mr. Harman will know better about it than I; I think it did, though, come back.

Q. I have understood you to say, Mr. Tilton, that there were but three copies, either in the incomplete or the complete form, of this slip? A. I said afterward there might have been another.

Q. Well, I remember that, of course. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That would make a fourth? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That, perchance, is a fourth? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But that is all, complete or incomplete? A. That is all that I remember of.

Q. That you know of? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON AS A CHURCH-GOER.

Mr. Evarts—We will have the True Story here at two o'clock, if your Honor please. I can occupy the space between now and then, with some things I omitted. [To the witness.] Do you remember, Mr. Tilton, whether or not you had left off going to Plymouth Church, or did leave off going to Plymouth Church as early as 1866? A. No, Sir, I had not; I went occasionally all the way down until the Spring of 1870.

Q. Now, how often do you think you went to that church in the year 1866? A. I don't remember.

Q. Did you go more than twice in that whole year? A. Oh! I went several times; I used to go occasionally.

Q. Not more than two or three times in a year, did you? A. Oh, yes.

Q. Just give us the fact? A. I know nothing about it; I went to church down until the Spring of 1870.

Q. 1866 I am asking you about? A. I don't remember the year; I cannot remember how many times.

Q. You did go occasionally in 1866? A. And in 1867, 1868, 1869 and 1870.

Q. Now, did you go more than two or three times in that year? A. I don't remember, Sir. I should say I went probably eight or nine times, perhaps a dozen times.

Q. Now, in the year 1867, did you go at all, and, if at all, did you go more than two or three times? A. I cannot say how many times.

Q. And, in the year 1868, what was your habit of attending that church? A. I think I went to church about as other people do.

Q. There is a great difference in that. A. What is that?

Q. There is a great difference in people as to the frequency with which they go to church. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I would rather have your personal recollection? A. My recollection is that I went to Plymouth Church with more or less frequency while I was in town during all the years up to the Spring of 1870. You must remember, Mr. Evarts, that I was always away lecturing during three months of the year.

Q. We have got the history of it. A. And then Plymouth Church was closed two other months of the year.

Q. We won't argue about it; the fact about it is what I want if I can get it, whether you went in the year 1868 more than two or three times to that Church? A. I think I went with more or less frequency all the way up to 1870.

Q. Will you tell me how many times you went? A. I don't know how many times I went.

Q. So, in 1869, did you then go more than two or three times? A. I think I shall make the same answer; I don't know how many times.

WHAT PREPOSSESSED MR. TILTON IN FAVOR OF MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. You have said, Mr. Tilton, in regard to your visits at Mrs. Woodhull's house that you never passed but one night there? A. Yes, Sir; I have said that.

Q. Now, how late have you been there on those occasions? A. I should say eleven o'clock, perhaps.

Q. Not later? A. I guess not.

Q. Not till one, two or three or four in the morning? A. No, Sir; never in the small hours.

Q. Left at twelve? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you ever on the second floor or the bedroom floor of that house? A. Yes, Sir; I went all through the house once in order that Mrs. Woodhull might show to me that every room was as bare as a barn. There was only one room occupied in it. That was her room, her husband's study, and another room which Mr. Andrews occupied. Every room in the house, from the top to the bottom, was as bare as a new house.

Q. Had it ever been stripped? A. I don't think it had ever been furnished.

Q. When was that? A. The circumstances are these—

Q. I am asking you the time of the year—when? A. I don't remember the date. I remember the circumstances. The circumstances are these: she asked me—

Q. I don't ask you for the circumstances; I ask you to give me the time as near as you can? A. Well, I tell you I cannot.

Q. You know whether it was in September or whether it was in June, or whether it was this or that part of your habit of visiting there? A. In the very early part of my acquaintance.

Q. In the very early part of your acquaintance? A. Yes, Sir; she wanted me to go through the house to see that there was nothing in it.

Q. And it was substantially bare? A. Yes, Sir; it was as bare as a new house.

Q. Was it a large, fine house? A. It was a splendid house.

Q. A double house? A. I don't know what you call a double house.

Q. A house with rooms on both sides of the door? A. I don't remember that; there was only one room furnished and that was the parlor.

Q. Did it continue to be in this condition during the whole period of your visiting there? A. I don't remember; I never went up stairs but that once.

Q. And that is all you know about it? Yes, Sir.

Q. As I understand you? A. That is all I know about it; yes, Sir. She told me her house had been called a house of ill repute, and she wanted me to see the whole of the house throughout, that there never was a chair nor a bed nor any article of furniture in it from the top to the bottom, save only the room she occupied and the room Mr. Andrews occupied and I think one which her mother and her sister occupied; otherwise it was a great, empty, bare house. That was one of the circumstances that impressed me with the idea that she was a trauced woman.

Q. Do you understand whether it had been stripped by the lease or executions, or anything of that kind? A. No, Sir; I simply understood that it was an unoccupied house—that is to say, an unfurnished house.

Q. And had always been so? A. I never asked any question about it; I never thought on the subject from that day to this.

Q. Well, Sir, do you mean to say that you don't know whether it was ever refurnished? A. I don't know anything about it; I never heard anything about it. I don't know whether it is or not,

Mr. Morris—"Refurnished" implies that it had been furnished.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I never understood anything about it; I never knew.

Q. During the period of your acquaintance you never knew whether it had been furnished? A. No, Sir.

Q. In whole or in part, beyond what you then knew? A. No, Sir.

MR. MOULTON DECLARED A FAITHFUL STEWARD.

Q. How early after the publication of the Bacon letter by you—your letter to Dr. Bacon—how early after that did any more papers, or copies of papers, which had been in Mr. Moulton's hands, connected with this matter, come into yours? A. My present impression is that none of them came into my hands. That is to say, when I made my sworn statement, which was a month after the Bacon letter, I then had no access to the papers. Then they were published in Mr. Beecher's statement.

Mr. Evarts—I am not asking you anything about Mr. Beecher's statement.

The Witness—Am trying to work it out in my own mind.

Mr. Evarts—I don't want you to work it out loud. I am willing you should reflect on it, of course; but my question is only in regard to a point of time.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I understand the question to ask when they came into his possession.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, that is so, in point of time.

The Witness—Well, Sir, they never came into my possession. I have seen the papers since this suit has gone on.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the question is this: How soon after the publication of the Bacon letter did either the papers themselves, that had been in Mr. Moulton's possession, or copies of them, and which were not already in your possession, come into your possession? Now, you say—

Mr. Morris—He has answered.

Mr. Evarts—I understand he has answered.

The Witness—I don't understand your question now.

Q. I asked you yesterday about the paper you had and what copies of papers you had. A. Yes, Sir; and I told you as well as I could.

Q. Well, we agree. That is all ended. Now, how soon after you published the Bacon letter did any papers that were not before that time in your hands, or any copies of papers that were not before that time in your hands, of the papers which were in Mr. Moulton's hands, come into your possession?

Mr. Morris—You are a little mistaken, Mr. Evarts, in regard to your recollection of what occurred yesterday. Your inquiries yesterday were solely with reference to the copies that he had made of papers, and not whether any letters were in his possession or not; and he didn't speak of any letters as being in his possession, and you are assuming, Mr. Evarts—

Mr. Evarts—I am not assuming anything.

Judge Neilson—His question also reaches copies which may have been published.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; but it improperly includes original papers, assuming that some had come into the possession of Mr. Tilton before that.

Mr. Morris—And there is no evidence that he had any—none whatever.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that question.

Mr. Evarts—I don't want to assume anything, but I want to find out when any papers he had beforehand came to him.

Judge Neilson—Or copies.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, your Honor, the question of the counsel, I think, improperly assumes that there were papers—original papers—which had been in Mr. Moulton's hands, that had been transferred to Mr. Tilton's possession before the Bacon letter.

Mr. Evarts—I don't think it does, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Well, read the question. You don't intend that, I suppose, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—No, Sir, I want to get at when papers which he had not beforehand came to him. If he didn't have any before, why, then, let him say so, of course.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir, but it rather misleads the witness. You don't want to do anything improper, I suppose?

Mr. Evarts—No; I only want his knowledge as to that point of time. [To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Please read the question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the following question:

"Q. Now, how soon after you published the Bacon letter did any papers that were not before that time in your hands, or any copies of papers that were not before that time in your hands, of the papers that were in Mr. Moulton's hands, come into your possession?"

Mr. Evarts—I don't think that assumes anything.

The Witness—I don't remember that any papers or any copies of papers came into my possession from Mr. Moulton's hands.

Q. From Mr. Moulton's hands, at all? A. I don't remember any. Mr. Moulton published, after that in his own statements, the documents which he had.

Judge Neilson—Those copies came to your notice? A. Those copies came to my notice.

Mr. Evarts—The witness understands the inquiry—what came from Mr. Moulton's hands. [To the witness]: I understand you to say that none did? A. I don't recollect of any, Sir. I recollect very distinctly going to Mr. Moulton, before my sworn statement was made, and asking that I might see some of the papers; and he declined—peremptorily refused.

Q. That you remember distinctly? A. Yes, Sir; and I had to make my statement on the basis of very meager materials, which I had in my own possession.

Q. [Handing book to witness]—Now, Sir, if you will refresh your recollection by looking at that last clause of the preliminary statement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, upon looking at that will you tell me when the papers, or copies of papers, that you there refer to, did come into your hands? A. Will you allow me to read this sentence?

Mr. Evans—Yes, Sir, that sentence. This is part of my sworn statement: "I will add that the original documents referred to in the ensuing sworn statement are, for the most part, in my possession, but that the apology and a few other papers are in the hands of Francis D. Moulton." The original documents which I introduced into my sworn statement were, for the most part, Mrs. Tilton's letters and mine.

Mr. Evans—Well, no matter what they were.

Judge Neilson—I think he has a right to say what they were.

Mr. Beach [to Mr. Evans]—When you produced that and referred to the evidence, he has a right to refer to the other.

Mr. Evans—Now, whatever papers you there refer to, how long had they been in your possession? A. Ever since they were enacted—years.

Q. Of course your wife's letters and your own, we assume they had been. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, had you not, when you were preparing your statement for the Committee, received from Mr. Moulton any statement or copies of papers which, up to that time, you had not in your possession? A. No, Sir, Mr. Moulton was—

Mr. Evans—Very well, that is so.

The Witness—Close as an oyster; he denied me every scrap. That is the reason my sworn statement is so meager, and contained some errors.

Q. No matter about your sworn statement. The fact is that, between the time of publishing the Bacon Letter and the time you made your sworn statement, you had not received from Mr. Moulton either documents in his possession or copies of documents in his possession that you did not have, and took during the course of the transactions themselves? A. No, Sir; Mr. Moulton—

Mr. Evans—Well?

The Witness—Very angrily refused me any such assistance.

Mr. Evans—Well, that emphasizes it; that is all. [To Judge Neilson]: Now, if you please, it is our hour for taking a recess.

Judge Neilson [To the Jury]: Jurors will return at two o'clock, gentlemen.

Mr. Mallison—The Court will now take a recess until two o'clock.

FRAGMENTS OF THE TRUE STORY PRODUCED.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Tilton's cross examination was resumed.

Mr. Evans—[To plaintiff's counsel.] Have you those papers?

Mr. Beach—Yes, the witness has them.

The Witness—There they are, Mr. Evans. [Handing Mr. Evans the papers.]

Mr. Evans—Mr. Tilton, these papers now produced by you—are they parts of the draft or of the completed copy? A. The completed copy, Sir.

Q. But there seem to be blanks in them? A. Seem to be what?

Q. Blanks. A. Yes, Sir; a space not filled up. I mentioned to you that there were one or two documents that had not been copied in.

Q. This is what you call the completed copy? A. Yes, Sir. You see where it has been stitched together.

Q. Perhaps that is the only blank there is? A. You notice here where the stitching has been?

Q. Yes, I see. I am only asking you whether this is what is called the completed copy, or the draft? A. Yes, Sir. You remember, Sir, that I told you that even the completed copy had never been absolutely completed, so as to suit it for publication.

Q. Yes; I am not questioning the copy, but wish to know which of the two concerns these belong to. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, these are all that you have been able to find, or that you know of being in existence? A. Yes, Sir; that is every scrap.

Q. And there is no copy in any form of any of the rest of it? A. Not that I know of.

Q. That you know of? A. None, in my knowledge.

THE FRAGMENTS READ.

Q. Mr. Tilton, please listen to what I shall now read you and say if you recognize it as the commencement of this "True Story": "One day last month, when I was in the north of New-Hampshire, a scandalous publication burst like a cloud over my home in Brooklyn, and shed a sudden shadow on my wife's good name." Do you remember that as the first sentence of your "True Story"? A. I don't remember that distinct phraseology. My recollection is that it was something like that. I cannot positively swear that that is the accurate sentence.

Q. "A week afterwards, when I returned and first saw the libel, I wrote a card denouncing the outrage, but acting on the advice—" (There is a blank in this, and that I cannot fill.) "withheld it from the press and maintained a contemptuous silence." Do you remember that? A. No, Sir; I could not swear that that was a sentence of it.

Q. Well, do you recognize that as in substance what it was? A. Well, perhaps I might say in substance.

Q. "Moreover, no form of card that I could devise, though I drafted two or three, seemed an adequate answer to the circumstantial details of the calumnious indictment." Do you recognize that? A. That may have been correct, Sir.

Q. "Instead of a card, I then proposed an explanatory narrative, meeting the false heads point by point, but this also I was advised against, particularly by Mrs. Tilton, who from the beginning begged me to publish no vindication of her whatever." A. Something of that sort.

Q. "The ingenious and plausible statement put forth against her could be thoroughly refuted only by a plain recital of the true story to contradict the false one, and as the true story involves a disagreeable reference to other names, some of which have not hitherto been mentioned in the case, she prefers to suffer obloquy herself, rather than fling it off to fall as a stain upon others, and withholds from me her permission to unvail the whole facts." A. I cannot swear as to the accuracy of that, Sir. It was something in that vein.

Q. "But even against her will I am going to put them in writing, not, however, for the use of the public, but only of a few personal friends. I do this for two distinct purposes: first, for her sake, because a constrained silence will permanently injure her reputation; and next, for my sake, because I owe to these friends a frank explanation of what they have deemed erratic in my public course for the last two years, or since my retirement from The Independent and The Brooklyn Union." Do you recognize that as a part of your statement? A. No, Sir; I don't remember it; but if you say it is, it is.

Q. Oh, I don't; I, don't say so. A. It was something in that spirit.

Q. In that spirit? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "About ten or eleven years ago Henry C. Bowen, for whom I was then working as a subordinate in The Independent office, told me one evening while crossing the Fulton Ferry that Henry Ward Beecher was guilty of adultery, a practice begun in Indianapolis and continued in Brooklyn." Do you remember that? A. I don't remember that as part of the statement. I remember Mr. Bowen telling me that.

Q. You recognize this as in accordance with the fact, if you had stated it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "Between the years 1860 and 1870, Mr. Bowen repeated the accusation not less than a hundred times, frequently exhibiting the deep sense of a personal injury, and sometimes saying that if he were so minded he could drive Mr. Beecher from his pulpit?" A. I guess that is correct, Sir.

Q. Do you recognize that? A. I do not remember the phraseology, but that is in substance correct.

Q. "During part of this time?" I am only asking you whether it constituted a part of your statement, you know? A. Well, Sir, I simply say, in answer to that, that I cannot remember—

Q. The words? A. The words or the phraseology of a statement written so long ago? I should not like to swear that that identical expression was in the statement; still, as you read it, the narration revives to me with some distinctness.

Q. "During part of this time Mr. Beecher was editor in charge of The Independent, and I was his lieutenant. Afterward he retired, and I succeeded to the chair. Both before Mr. Beecher's retirement, and afterwards, Mr. B. was in the habit of saying that the pastor of Plymouth Church was a dangerous visitor among the females of his congregation." Do you remember that as a part of your statement? A. I do not distinctly remember it as a part of my statement. I very distinctly remember it as a part of Mr. Bowen's statements.

Q. "This gossip I always heard with unwilling ears, having no more taste for scandal then than now, and I would not note it here except that it is one of the pivots on which the ensuing history turns." Do you recognize that sentence? A. No, Sir; I do not remember that sentence.

Q. How? A. I do not remember that sentence. I do not remember accurately enough to swear to it, Mr. Evarts.

Q. But does it strike you— A. If you will put that entire document into my possession, and let me read it from beginning to end, I think I could tell you whether it was an accurate transcript of that paper or not; but I cannot swear, sentence by sentence, to a paper which was written a long while ago, and which I have not seen for a year or two.

Q. You have a right, of course, to qualify your statements concerning it?

Judge Neilson—It being understood all the time, Mr. Tilton, that the counsel hardly expects you to recollect the very words.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Judge Neilson—But the substance, the sentiment, rather than the very words.

Mr. Evarts—You are quite at liberty to qualify your statements of recollection or non-recollection. [Reading:] "As a further statement still more unwillingly opened, yet necessary to an explanation of the subsequent complication of circumstances, I must say that in the Summer of 1870, a few months after I had undertaken, in addition to editing The Independent, to edit also The Brooklyn Union, Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, my wife, made to me a communication concerning Mr. Beecher, which, to use her own words, lest I should wrong him by using mine, she afterwards noted down in a memorandum as follows: 'Mr. H. W. Beecher—'"

THE FRAGMENTS OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Evarts, let us understand what we are doing before we go any further. We ought to know whether the counsel on the other side have the true statement. If so, it ought to be produced and speak for itself.

Mr. Evarts—I think I am quite in order.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, so am I. I think it is proper for us to ask whether they have got that true statement?

Judge Neilson—Well, what does the counsel say to the request?

Mr. Evarts—At a proper stage of the matter they may ask. At present I think I am quite in order, if your Honor please, in reading to him.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't know what they are reading from.

Mr. Evarts—Nor is it at all material.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not merely for you to know, but it is for me.

Mr. Morris—We may want to read the balance.

Mr. Evarts—Perhaps there won't be a balance.

Mr. Fullerton—That is a novel way of getting in as evidence a statement, if that is what they are doing. I do not understand that they can read paragraph by paragraph in that way and ask if it was a part of the statement.

Judge Neilson—They ought not to, if they have a correct copy. If they have not I think they can read this.

A HINT THAT THE TRUE STORY WAS PRESERVED.

Mr. Fullerton—They may have the original for aught we know.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, no, scarcely.

Mr. Fullerton—You may have a correct copy, then.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! it is possible.

Judge Neilson—If they have a correct copy they might produce it.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly, that is what we propose. We have no objection to their offering the copy in evidence if they have it, and if they have it I think that good faith requires that they should announce it, so that we understand exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Evarts—It may be very proper at some stage of the trial to raise some of these questions, but I take it I am quite in order in asking these questions.

Mr. Fullerton—No; I think not.

Mr. Beach—Well, we will see. The objection, Sir, assumes this form, that they are now giving secondary evidence of an instrument the loss of which they have not proven. There is no evidence but what the original exists in their possession, or in the possession of some person over whom they have apparently absolute control, and until they prove the loss of the instrument they cannot resort to this mode of proving it.

Judge Neilson—Has it been traced into their possession?

Mr. Evarts—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—It has not been traced to their possession?

Mr. Beach—It has been traced to the possession of Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—By whom it was destroyed?

Mr. Beach—By whom this witness was informed that it was destroyed, but it turns out that a portion of it was afterwards found by this witness, after Mrs. Tilton left his house. Now, whether or not she has the possession of the other portion of this original document does not appear.

Judge Neilson—She might have it and it could not be got.

Mr. Beach—Very well, that they do not show. They have given no proof of the loss by tracing it from the hands of the person into whose custody it was originally put. Another proposition, Sir, that if the original instrument is lost there is a copy of it—an authentic copy of it, the possession of which they do not disclaim, that is the best secondary evidence of the contents. Now, my objection is, Sir, that without any of this proof giving them license to introduce secondary evidence, the course now pursued by the counsel is improper.

Judge Neilson—I think, in view of the circumstance that the paper was in the hands of Mrs. Tilton, and understood to have been destroyed, but a small portion of it finally found—only a portion of it—this witness, ignorant of the existence of any more, he may take this course, but I at the same time think that counsel might well be interrogated and might well answer frankly whether he has got a correct copy or not.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, ought they not to show, before they are permitted to give secondary evidence of the contents of this document, that they have at least applied to the party in whose possession it was? It does not follow, Sir, because Mrs. Tilton may have told her husband that it was destroyed, or because he understood that it was destroyed, that that was actually the fact. They show no application made to the party in whose custody the instrument was when this witness had the last knowledge of it. Now, I think, Sir, that your Honor should require at least that we should have proof of an application to that source of information in regard to the existence of the original document. And if it should appear that they have made that application and were unable to obtain it, why, it might be a satisfactory answer to the rule; but without that, I submit to your Honor that we have no adequate or sufficient proof of the loss, nor any search made for it, that would justify the introduction of secondary evidence.

Judge Neilson—I should feel the force of that much more strongly if the witness had not found and produced this fragment of it, but finding and producing a fragment of it helps the suggestion that the rest may be destroyed.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, your Honor, but they are not reading from the fragment; they are not using the fragment, they are using something else, which presupposes that something else in the shape of a copy or original exists. That is the difficulty about it.

Judge Neilson—I don't know but you ought to use this method. I think we will go on, gentlemen. Take an exception.

MORE QUOTATIONS FROM THE TRUE STORY.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I must begin again.

Judge Neilson—Don't commence at the commencement.

Mr. Evarts—No; but this sentence that I was reading: "As a further statement still more unwillingly opened, yet necessary to an explanation—" A. "Still more unwillingly" what, Sir?

Q. "Opened"—"as a further statement still more unwillingly opened." A. I don't understand that.

Q. "Yet necessary to an explanation of the subsequent complication of circumstances, I must say that in the Summer of 1870, a few months after I had undertaken, in addition to editing The Independent, to edit also The Brooklyn Union. Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, my wife, made to me a communication concerning Mr. Beecher which, to use her own words, lest I should wrong him by using mine, she afterwards noted down in a memorandum, as follows:—" A. Now, Mr. Evarts, if you will let me interrupt you.

Q. Well, I will not. A. The document that comes there is the document in evidence, and I can tell by holding the original document, whether you are reading what follows correctly.

Q. I will not be interrupted, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, you have been.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading]: "Mr. H. W. Beecher, my friend and pastor."

The Witness—Will you hand me that?

Mr. Fullerton—No! Just one moment! You don't want to look at anything. We will regulate it.

Mr. Evarts [Reading]: "'Mr. H. W. Beecher, my friend and pastor, solicited me to be a wife to him, together with all that this implies.' I borrow the above fact from my wife's handwriting, and forbid myself from pausing at this point either to blacken it with epithet or to lighten it with any explanation." Do you recognize that statement as being a part of your "True Story"? A. I should strike out the word—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, now! Do you recognize it as a part of the "True Story"? That is the question—as it is read.

Mr. Evarts—Now, will you go on and answer; you would strike out what?

Mr. Fullerton—No, I object.

Mr. Evarts—It is a cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—I know it is a cross-examination, but I want the question answered correctly.

Mr. Evarts—I never heard that counsel could stop a witness on a cross-examination in that way.

Mr. Fullerton—You have often done it, Sir, in this trial.

Judge Neilson—I think counsel could stop a witness if the witness were departing from what he thought to be an answer to the question put by his opponent.

Mr. Fullerton—It admits of yes or no, and I want an answer.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! ah! Now, does your Honor understand that when I am cross-examining the witness, counsel on his part have a right to object that he must answer yes or no?

Judge Neilson—I think the counsel can make suggestions to that effect.

Mr. Evarts—I agree, but are they proper suggestions; do they stop the witness's mouth?

Judge Neilson—Then again it is not quite worth while to emphasize the fact that it is a cross-examination. This is a new matter brought out by you.

Mr. Evarts—Well, Sir; we will not dispute about that.

Judge Neilson—Now, I think the witness could answer yes or no, whether he does recognize it or does not. If any explanations afterwards are called for of course he can make them.

Mr. Evarts—Does your Honor instruct the witness that he must?

Judge Neilson—I instruct him that he should.

MR. TILTON JEALOUS OF HIS ENGLISH.

Mr. Evarts—I mean that he should. Will your Honor be so good as to note my exception to that instruction? [To the Witness]: Now, Mr. Witness. A. I think I should say, Sir, that the substance of that was mine, but I think that if you have copied it from the original, there are two words incorrectly copied.

Q. What are those? A. One is the word "opened," and the other "any."

Q. What should the word "opened" be, do you think? A. I don't know, but it seems to me to have no sense there.

Q. And the word "any" in what connection? A. It spoils the antithesis. Read it.

Q. The very last sentence? A. Yes, Sir. Read it?

Mr. Evarts—[Reading]: "I borrow the above fact from my wife's handwriting, and forbid myself from pausing at this point, either to blacken it with epithet or to lighten it with any explanation." A. "Blacken it with epithet or lighten it with explanation."

Judge Neilson—In other words, that is the way you think you would have written it?

The Witness—Yes, Sir, I think so; but your Honor will understand I cannot swear that I wrote it as it stands there; but I certainly do not think I wrote it as you have read.

Mr. Evarts [Reading]: "The subject of my wife's recital was communicated a few weeks afterwards by me to O. J. and F. D. M., and by my wife to her mother, and thence to some relatives. Mr. Beecher was absent from the State at the time, it being his vacation." Do you hear that? A. I do not remember the initials.

Q. How? A. I did not write it in initials. I wrote the names in full if I wrote it at all. I didn't do it in that blind way.

Q. Well, otherwise than that? A. I cannot swear positively.

Q. "During the Summer and Fall of the year 1870, I spoke of the case to a few friends, exhibiting more anger than charity towards Mr. Beecher, though to Mr. Bowen, whose two papers I was then editing, I was silent and unwilling to add any fuel to his indignation against the man whom he seemed preparing to destroy." Do you remember that?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir. That, I take it, is a leading question, and it is evidence in chief of the other side; it is not cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—Well, your inquiry in the sense of it is, whether he recognizes that as a part of what he wrote.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, and it admits of yes or no. It is a leading question if a leading question can be formed.

Judge Neilson—He is obliged to ask a question in that leading form somewhat, in order to get at the fact.

Mr. Fullerton—Ah! Sir, but if they have got a copy they can hand it to him and ask him the direct question.

Judge Neilson—Well, take an exception.

Mr. Evarts—My learned friend does not propose as a rule of examination that a cross-examination cannot lead?

Judge Neilson—I have ruled on this.

Mr. Evarts—You can lead a hostile witness even in a direct examination.

Mr. Fullerton—I hold you cannot get a copy of a paper in evidence in that way.

MRS. MORSE'S INFIRMITIES DESCRIBED.

Mr. Evarts. Ah! [Reading]:

"My wife's mother now began to play an important part in my relations to Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher, and in the relations of these two persons to each other. This lady has been for years a chronic subject of manias and frenzies, and notoriously irresponsible in her tirades on any subject that excites her morbid feeling. One of her physicians, the late Dr. Barker, of Brooklyn, recommended several years ago that she be treated to an—"in," it seems to be—"an institution for the insane."

A. What is that, Sir?

Q. "One of her physicians, the late Dr. Barker of Brooklyn, recommended several years ago that she be treated in an institution for the insane?" A. Oh, "in." I thought you said "to,"

Q. "Among her eccentricities which I allude to, not to reprobate their author, whom disease may largely exempt from censure, she attempted, about that time, to take the life of her husband, the Hon. N. B. Morse, by clutching his throat and strangling him with such powerful energy that her grasp was loosened with difficulty by the inmates of the house, and her fury quenched with chloroform; a circumstance speedily followed by a legal separation between her husband and herself."

A. Is that "cutting his throat?"

Q. "Clutching." A. Oh! "cutting;" yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recognize that as a part? A. I do not remember the exact statement. I know the facts to which the paragraph points.

Q. But was that subject included in your— A. I think, Sir, that there was a very sharp statement of Mrs. Morse's troubles and mine included in the statement, but I don't know whether that is one or not.

Q. "In a less degree she had used violence towards other members connected with her by blood or marriage, and had frequently written letters to me threatening my life;" do you recognize that? A. I don't remember that statement. I remember the fact of her writing such letters, threatening my life.

Q. "In a less degree she had used violence toward other persons connected with her by blood or marriage, and had frequently written letters to me, threatening my life—" Do you recognize that? A. I do not remember that statement; I remember the fact of her writing such letters, threatening my life.

Q. "Her ingenuity of statement against her relatives during the spasms of her insane hysterics is cunning and malicious in the extreme. At the same time, in saying this, I bear testimony to the innate kindness and beautiful affection of her nature. By those who knew her well, her peculiarities are understood; but, to her casual acquaintances, they generally remain successfully hidden in the—" There is a blank here—a single word, I suppose. "—demeanor of one of the most peaceable and fascinating persons."

Q. Do you remember that as part of your true story? A. No, Sir; but, if that blank was supplied, I think it would be a very accurate statement of the lady's character and habits.

TROUBLE ABOUT IDENTIFYING THE STORY PIECE-MEAL.

Q. "The unhappiness which she has occasioned to every member of my own family had increased year by year, until, at last, Mrs. Tilton and I had been compelled to forbid her to enter our house—" Do you remember that? A. I do not remember it as part of the statement; no, Sir. If your Honor will instruct me in regard to these answers; I am constantly recalling to myself that I am under oath, and I wish that my answers may be consistent with the solemnity of that oath. Here a series of sentences are brought up before me, and I am asked to swear whether or not two or three years ago I wrote such and such sentences. I am unable to say positively that I did; it would be very easy to put an incorrect sentence before me and make me think, for the time, that it was part of a document which I wrote—I do not wish unwittingly to swear to a wrong; and I now again—I was about to say, I request (perhaps I have no right to make a request)—at the same time I will state that if that document be put into my hands, so that I can read it from beginning to end, I think I should have no difficulty in identifying it as the document alluded to; identifying it as a whole.

Judge Neilson—If it be the document.

The Witness—If it be the document?

Mr. Fullerton—And that is what we think ought to be done.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tilton, as the counsel read a sentence to you, if you recollect it, or recognize it, as portion of what you wrote, you will so answer; if you do not, you will answer that you don't. If, in substance, it seems to be what you wrote, though it may not be in the very words, you will answer that way; but in no instance recall what was stated to you outside, either by Mr. Moulton or Mrs. Moree. The question all the time to you is whether, according to your present recollection, you recognize what is read as part of what you wrote; that is the only suggestion.

The Witness—I will ask your Honor one further instruction: if I answer, sentence by sentence, "It was something like that," without saying, "It was exactly that?"

Judge Neilson—Well, you have a right to do that—have that privilege; or, in substance—or, if you do not recognize it.

Mr. Beach—There is no occasion for the witness saying whether or not the statement as read to him was the fact or not.

Judge Neilson—No; that I suggest to him.

Mr. Beach—That is wandering from the question entirely.

Mr. Everts—That is so; my inquiry is only as to its being a part of his statement.

Judge Neilson—Will you take the original when you come down to it? Will you take the original part when you come down to it?

Mr. Everts—Oh, I dare say I shall—I can't find there is anything in it.

Mr. Beach—Where is the original?

Judge Neilson—All the time you understand that we might have received this—if you had an opportunity to read the paper at large deliberately.

The Witness—Your Honor will please understand that all the precaution I desire to take is not to be run into taking a false oath concerning a technicality difficult of remembrance.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—I think I left off the clause, Mr. Tilton, which spoke of the fact—which says—"until, at last, Mrs. Tilton and I had been compelled to forbid her to enter our house—"

Do you remember whether what I now read was a part of your statement? A. I cannot say, Sir, with sufficient accuracy to swear to it.

Q. "As illustrations of the mischief which Mrs. Morse had wrought against us, she spoke of Mrs. Tilton two years ago to our oldest daughter, Miss Florence Tilton (then thirteen years old), in terms of crimination revolting to any pure girl's mind, and most terrible when spoken to such a girl against her own mother, being nothing less than the central accusation in the great scandal, which another mad woman afterwards published to the world."

Q. Do you remember that as a part of your statement? A. I do not remember the phraseology, Sir.

Q. "Mrs. Morse once went to a lawyer in Brooklyn, and with a plausible air consulted him about a divorce between my wife and me—a fact which we learned only by accident not until it had spread its bat's-wings and gone flying abroad?" A. I think that was in it, Sir.

Q. Yes. "She wrote to sundry journalists anonymous letters to prejudice me in their estimation, and I trace to her fertile brain the tale that I once took my wife by the hair of the head and kicked her during illness. But I forbear to narrate a hundred instances which come to my mind of her mischief-making propensities. It is sufficient to say in reference to my case with Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher, and to the case of each against the other, that she made a careful and malicious use of the few facts in her possession and of the many fancies which there engendered in her diseased and unhappy mind?" A. I can't swear to the words, Sir.

Q. But in the substance does it strike you as part? A. Well, that passage does not arise to my mind; I won't say that it was not in it.

Q. Very well. "Mrs. Morse, in plotting her insane mischief, chose a confederate for a brief time in Mrs. H. W. B."—Beecher, I suppose—"another lady of abnormal type, whose peculiarities, having less aggravation, are also less pardonable than Mrs. Morse's." A. I think that was in it, Sir, or something like it.

Q. "For eleven years, Mrs. Beecher and I have not been on speaking terms, nor have I ever had so relentless an enemy. Strange it is, the cause of the hostility was an act of kindness which I performed for one of her children, an act for which her husband has never ceased to speak gratefully, and which he commemorated at the time, by sending me a beautiful gift in bronze. She never spoke to me afterwards." Do you recognize that? A. Something like it was in the statement.

Q. "To the readers of these manuscript pages, which are chiefly for Brooklyn use, she needs no description here." A. I think that was there, Sir.

THE WEBSTER DIFFICULTY WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. "In the Fall of 1870, Mr. Bowen urged me to support, in The Union, Mr. E. D. Webster for Congress, a Republican nomination which many of the best citizens of that party had publicly repudiated, against one a meeting at the Academy had made, Judge George Reynolds being the chief speaker." Do you remember of there being anything about that Webster matter in the— A. No; I don't remember that.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I will read it.

The Witness—Moreover, Sir; I am very sure that in speaking of Judge Reynolds, I should have given him his full name, George C. Reynolds.

Q. George G. Reynolds, isn't it? A. George G.—

Q. Oh, I dare say. "I declined to support Mr. Webster, though as I knew nothing against him personally, I made no war on his character. Mr. Bowen repeated his plea in Webster's behalf, and I repeated my refusal. Mr. Bowen then stated there was one way in which The Brooklyn Union could be made to support Mr. Webster, and that was by dismissing its editor. I answered: 'Yes; but that is the only way.' This was the first instance, in all my relations with Mr. Bowen, covering fifteen years, in which I had ever known him to attempt to bend the integrity of my mind. Mr. Webster was defeated, and he credited his misfortune to me, and maligns me for it to this day." Do you remember that as part? A. No, Sir; I don't remember any part of that.

Q. Don't remember anything about that. "After this difficulty, Mr. Bowen gave me to understand that as he owned two newspapers, he meant to edit at least one of them; accordingly he chose the lion's share, taking The Independent for himself and leaving The Union for me." Do you remember that? A. Don't remember that expression. No, Sir,

Q. The sense of it do you remember as being included in your— A. No, I don't bring it up to my mind.

Q. "He said, that he could not reasonably hope for more than ten remaining years of active life, and that if he was to win any fame or position to bequeath to his children, he must do it within that time. So without a murmur, I took off my crown and laid it at his feet, and said 'God save the King!'" Do you remember that? A. No, but it sounds just like me. I think I must have said it, [Laughter.]

Q. "We never made a treaty"—

Mr. Beach—"We then made."

Mr. Evarts—"We then made a treaty, and two contracts were drawn up between us, by which Mr. Bowen was to be editor-in-chief of The Independent, as I had been, and I its leading special contributor, as Mr. Beecher had been in the days of the Star Papers." Do you recognize that? A. I don't recollect the expression.

Q. But the sense of it? A. I don't remember that any such statement was in my story. Of course I don't say that it was not there, Mr. Evarts.

Q. No; that I understand, of course. Do you remember whether any statement about your business affairs was in the statement? A. Oh, yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Very well.

The Witness—I tried to make that statement very ingeniously.

Q. Yes. "This arrangement to last two years at $5,000 a year. Furthermore, I was to be also the editor-in-chief of The Union, giving up my lectures, an arrangement to last five years at $5,000, together with ten per cent. of the net profits, which promised to be $5,000 more, making all told, my yearly income $15,000. Do you remember that as a part of your statement; your True Story? A. I think there was something like that in the statement, but I am very sure that I should have said, not $5,000, because it was $5,200 in each of these two cases. The probability is that I would have been absolutely accurate; both salaries were $100 a week.

MR. TILTON'S GIFT TO MR. JOHNSON AND MR. BOWEN'S TO MR. TILTON.

Q. "When these negotiations were accomplished, I stated them, or notified them privately to Oliver Johnson, my assistant on The Independent, and sent him my gold watch as a parting tribute to the faithfulness with which he had toiled at my side, and to the love which I cherished for the man." Do you remember that as being in your statement? A. I remember, making an allusion of that kind to Mr. Johnson. I don't remember the—

Q. Words? A. "Stated" or "noticed;" what is that sentence, please read it again.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the word is "stated" or "noticed."

Mr. Beach—It could not have been "noticed."

Mr. Evarts—Well, I say I do the best, I can. The proper English word would be "communicat."

Mr. Beach—"Stated" is just as good English.

Mr. Evarts—Yes. "In answer to this token, there came the following fragrant, precious letter from his pen"—which letter I haven't here.

The Witness—Please read it, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—I haven't the letter.

The Witness—I will furnish you the original. Will you do me the favor to read it?

Q. It is still in your possession? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "In addition to the above letter, which is the chief letter, merely, I now cherish of long editorship of The Independent —"

The Witness—What is that, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is a little blind; I will read it, however, the best I can.

Mr. Beach—It is elliptical; it is not complete.

Mr. Evarts—Yes. "I received from Mr. Bowen a gift of a gold watch, to replace the one I had given away."

The Witness—Yes, Sir. That is the watch. [Taking his watch from his pocket.]

Q. That happened? A. Yes, Sir; I know it.

Q. You still have it? A. That is it, Sir; that must be true.

Q. "Then under date of December 23d, 1870, The Independent contained the following valedictory and response."

The Witness—Under date of what?

Q. Under date of December 22d, 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "The Independent contained the following valedictory and response?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Those are not here, but those are printed papers? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Not in.

Mr. Evarts—Not in this paper that I have.

Mr. Beach—And not in evidence yet.

The Witness—You will do me the favor to read them when I present them, will you, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—Oh, yes. I am willing they should be read. "Two days later, namely, Saturday, December 24th, Mr. Johnson mentioned to me that some strange tales concerning me had been planted like seeds in Mr. Bowen's ears, and that Mr.

Bowen, without specifying them, was annoyed by them." Do you remember that as being in your statement? A. I don't remember that phraseology, Sir.

Q. "Later, on the same day, Mr. Johnson said that Mr. Bowen had received a report that I was about to abscond to Europe to join"—a blank which I will not fill—"who was already there. On the following Monday, December 26th, 1870, in a conversation with Mr. Bowen, Mr. J. being present, a budget of Mrs. Morse's ingenious fiction, together with some other gossip, was referred to and discussed, and Mr. Bowen dismissing the subject, said that as I was to be for five years the editor of The Brooklyn Union, he hoped hereafter that I would devote more attention than I had previously done to Plymouth Church." Do you recognize that as part of your statement? A. Something like that. I don't know whether that is correctly stated or not.

Q. "He instanced my not attending service there any more, and begged me to be a constant witness of all the proceedings, with a view to make them topics of remark. I then informed him that I had not been at the church for months past, and should probably no more be seen inside its walls, which opinion I stated to him in a few words in Mr. Johnson's—" "I stated to him in a few words in Mr. Johnson's presence, my wife's communication concerning Mr. Beecher—"

Mr. Beach—Well, that is blind.

The Witness—That is bad English.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, that I understand.

Mr. Beach—It is unintelligible.

Mr. Fullerton—It is a good question, though.

Mr. Evarts—"Occasion," instead of "opinion," "and should probably be no more seen inside its walls, on which occasion I stated to him in a few words, in Mr. Johnson's presence, my wife's communication concerning Mr. Beecher." Do you remember that as a part of your true statement? A. I don't think there was any such bungling sentence as that in it.

Q. Well, aside from the words, the substance of it? A. I think the substance was probably there.

Q. "Mr. Bowen's indignation at Mr. Beecher was extreme. He arose from his chair, talked vehemently, gestured angrily, and said that Mr. Beecher must be made to quit the pulpit. He then reiterated all the charges that he had made many times before, and said, in addition, that Mr. Beecher had, in February, 1870, confessed his adulteries to Mr. Bowen, and implored his forgiveness with tears." Do you remember that as a part of your statement? A. Something like that.

THE CAUSE OF MR. BOWEN'S ENMITY SUGGESTED.

Q. "The interview at which this confession took place I think he said was held at Mr. James Freeland's house?" A. I don't remember that.

Q. "I forgave him," said Mr. Bowen, "but he still goes on with his crimes and criminal attempts just the same as ever. You ought to proceed against him instantly. Don't let him preach another sermon. If I was free to take action as you, I would expel him from his pulpit and he should never write a word again for The Christian Union." I then said, "Mr. Bowen, why are you not still more free than I am?" Do you remember that as a—? A. Something like it.

Q. "Because," said he, 'Mr. Beecher made a confession to me and asked my pardon, which I granted, and I cannot re-open a settled quarrel; but if you will make a charge I will furnish the proof?' A. Something like that.

Q. "At a later period of the conversation, and after Mr. J. had left, Mr. Bowen rose to a still higher heat, brought me pen and ink, and challenged me to write to Mr. Beecher, demanding that he should retire from the pulpit and The Christian Union." A. Something like that.

Q. "I will bear a letter to him," said Mr. Bowen, 'and will sustain the demand with proofs. There will be no resistance. Mr. Beecher will not deny, cannot deny, dare not deny them.' A. Something like that.

Q. "Mr. Bowen put his case with such energy, and with such a passionate plea in it that I would enable him, without his breaking his treaty with Mr. Beecher, to reopen his old warfare upon him, and excited within me such a revived remembrance of the wrongs which Mr. Beecher had done to my own heart that I wrote a draft of a note, which I altered and rewrote and left finally changed as follows:

DECEMBER 26th, 1870. }
BROOKLYN. }

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Sir: I demand that, for reasons which you explicitly understand, you immediately cease from the ministry of Plymouth Church, and that you quit the city of Brooklyn as a residence.
(Signed) T. T.

Theodore Tilton? A. No, Sir; it was never signed "T. T.;" it was signed by my whole name.

Q. Yes; we have had it in evidence? A. Yes, Sir; well, I didn't do it in a half way.

Q. This, I believe, agrees with the—"I put the above letter into Mr. Bowen's hands, to be immediately delivered by him in person to Mr. Beecher, and then I went home. During the afternoon Mr. Moulton called on me and I mentioned to him the occurrence of the morning ending with the letter. He called me foolish, 'because,' said he, 'you ought never to have written a letter at all, but if written it ought to have had Mr. Bowen's signature to it as well as your own. You have left him a chance to play you a trick. You have made your demand all alone. What if he leaves you to support it all alone? Mr. Moulton then took a sheet of paper and entered on it the following memorandum: 'Brooklyn, December 26th, 1870. T. T. informed me to-day that he had sent a note to Mr. Beecher, of which Mr. H. C. Bowen was the bearer, demanding that he, Mr. Beecher, should retire from the pulpit and quit the City of Brooklyn. The letter was an open one. H. C. Bowen knew the contents of it, and said that he, Bowen, would sustain T. in the demand.' Do you remember putting that memorandum into your "True Story"? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. "A day or two afterwards, prompted by my wife's wish and Mrs. M.'s advice, I resolved that I would send for Mr. Beecher to meet me at a personal interview, either in their presence, or with me alone. I dispatched to Mr. Bowen a messenger with a notification of this intention. On the receipt of this intelligence by Mr. Bowen, which I supposed would gratify him, he came into my editorial chamber, and, with a look of desperation on his countenance such as I had never seen there before, and with an anger and passion of which I had never dreamed him capable, and with the manner more of an insane than of a rational man, began to threaten me that, if in any interview I might have with Mr. Beecher, either then or at any other time, I should divulge to Mr. Beecher what he (Bowen) had said against him, or should intimate that he (Bowen) had any hand in the letter requiring Mr. Beecher to vacate his pulpit, I would be cashiered from The Independent and The Union, and that the police should be called to cast me into the streets." Do you remember that? A. I cannot swear to the phraseology.

Q. Or the substance? A. Well, yes, in the main, I think; I cannot know all the details; I cannot say how I stated it precisely.

Q. [Reading:] "After, some words of indignation which I uttered in reply, Mr. Bowen abruptly retired from the office, leaving me in as great a state of astonishment as I had ever experienced." Is that part of your statement? A. I don't recollect that.

Q. [Reading:] "I informed my wife and Mrs. Moulton, and afterwards Mr. Johnson, of this incident, concerning which Mr. Moulton remarked that it did not surprise him in the least; and then, by the joint advice of all, I determined to summon Mr. Beecher to the contemplated interview." Do you remember that as a part of your statement? A. No, Sir.

Q. [Reading:] "To this end Mrs. T. wrote a brief note, addressed to Mr. Beecher through me, stating that she had given me the disclosure of July 1st, 1870, concerning him, and that her husband would speak to him face to face." Do you remember a statement of that kind? A. I don't remember the phraseology of it.

Q. [Reading:] "On Friday evening, December 30th, I went to Mr. Moulton's house. Mr. Moulton went after Mr. Beecher, and brought him. This was early in the evening, Mr. Beecher leaving his prayer meeting, usual on that evening, to go without his leadership. My interview was with Mr. Beecher alone. I read to him my wife's letter, and said to him what I shall not here repeat. He sat like a statue under my brief remarks, and at the close bowed to me and said, 'This is all a dream.'"

The Witness—I don't remember that.

Q. Don't remember that? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—How was that? A. I don't remember the exact phraseology in which it is put there.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading:] "He affected to disbelieve that Mrs. Tilton had written the letter, and denied everything with a royal negative."

The Witness—Yes, I remember putting that in, in order to cloak the statement—make it easy.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! Well, I did not ask you that; my sole question was whether this was in your statement. A. Yes, Sir, it was in—put in there for a purpose.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that will all be left out—the purpose that it was put in for.

The Witness—I remember that being put in.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I ask that that all be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—The answer is "he remembers it;" very well.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, that is all; the rest must go out.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading:] "I then said, 'it is about a few squares to my house go and ask Mrs. T. for yourself whether or not she wrote the letter'; he went and returned in half an hour." Is that part of your statement? A. I don't remember that.

Q. You don't remember that? [Reading:] "I did not see him. Mr. Moulton asked him what had taken place at Mrs. Tilton's? He remarked that he had seen that lady; but he did nothing more, and left. This was about 11 o'clock at night."

The Witness—I don't remember that.

Q. [Reading:] "Shortly after he left, I left. On reaching home I found that Mrs. Tilton, who was then seriously ill and in bed, was agitated and distressed. She said that Mr. B. had been there, telling her that she had pursued and slain him."

The Witness—Done what, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—"That she had pursued and slain him."

The Witness—I do not remember any such expression as "pursued;" there must be some mistake there.

Mr. Evarts—"That he would be tried by a counsel of ministers and his career ended, and that he was a dead man unless she would save him from his fate. She said, moreover, that, after talking to her in this strain, and exhibiting great and terrible feeling, Mr. B. went to her writing desk, and taking out pen and paper, brought them to her bedside, and putting them into her nervous hands, dictated to her, what she copied—a paper of which she could not recall the phraseology." Was that in your statement? A. Something like that, I think.

Q. Something like that? But I should have added, "could not recall the phraseology, nor, to a certainty, the substance and meaning," which completes the sentence. It was at the foot of the other page. [Reading:] "Shortly after narrating to me the above occurrence she resumed her pen and ink and wrote the following statement." That is the statement that is in evidence here?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. But is not on this paper. [Reads again:] "The next morning, in response to a note from me, Mr. Moulton came to my house, and, after an interview with my wife, received from her, in writing, a request to procure the return of the paper which, in her agitation, she had given to Mr. B. the night before—a paper all the more important for, as it is seen, she was uncertain of its real design."

The Witness—I don't remember that.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading:] "That evening, which was Saturday, brought to me a new surprise, closing a week of sensations with one which fittingly capped the climax, namely, a notification from Mr. Bowen that my engagements with The Independent and with The Union would then and there terminate, and that he was ready to settle with me in full of all demands." Do you remember that being in your statement? A. I do not remember.

Q. Well, was the substance? A. I do not remember that.

Q. "In these words Mr. Bowen broke his two contracts which he had just made with me, which were also"—

The Witness—There is something wrong there.

Mr. Evarts—"And which were also then a week old," it is so here, "and to each of which was attached a provision that it could be terminated by death or by six months' notice, or immediately on paying a forfeit of $2,500, but in no other way."

The Witness—Please read that phrase, "in these words." What does that mean?

Mr. Evarts—"In these words, Mr. Bowen broke his two contracts which he had just made with me."

The Witness—Well, in what words?

Mr. Evarts—Well, that I have just read.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind, Mr. Tilton, let them read their own paper in their own way.

Mr. Evarts—The witness has a right to his explanation.

Mr. Fullerton—So have I a right to say to him what I do.

The Witness—I think that must have been "in other words."

Judge Neilson—"In these words" refers to what immediately preceded, if it refers to anything.

The Witness—But no words were quoted from Mr. Bowen.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is immaterial. You think it should be "in other words."

The Witness—Well, I merely want to know what I have got to swear to, that is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you have not got to swear to anything but what he reads as a part of your statement; if it is not, you will say so.

Mr. Evarts—And in what respect it is.

Mr. Beach—He is not obliged to answer in that way.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Judge Neilson—He does not suggest that it should be "other words."

Mr. Evarts—He doesn't? I thought I understood him to say so.

The Witness—I simply thought it might be so.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; it came from him, Sir.

Judge Neilson—As better English—better sense?

The Witness—That is all.

Judge Neilson—Not as being in that paper?

The Witness—No, Sir; I don't remember any such unimportant sentence as that.

Mr. Evarts—I did not make the sentence.

Judge Neilson—That is true. It was his criticism.

Mr. Evarts—I will read it either way. [Reading:] "In these words Mr. Bowen broke these two contracts which he had just made with me, and which were also then a week old, and to each of which was attached a provision that it could be terminated by death, or by six months' notice, or immediately on paying a forfeit of $2,500; but in no other way."

Q. Do you remember a statement concerning the contracts in your paper? A. I do not remember distinctly—no, Sir.

Q. [Reading:] "Mr. Bowen thus suddenly laid himself liable to pay $5,000, for breaking his two contracts together, of course, with 10 per cent. of The Union's profits, due to me up to date, from May 1st to December 31st—eight months."

The Witness—I do not remember.

Q. Don't remember that being in the statement? A. No, Sir.

Q. [Reading]: "I received this notification late in the evening of the last day of the year, after which I first informed my wife, and bidding her not to be troubled, then sought Mr. Moulton's house; I invited him out of doors, and paced with him the wintry streets, till the chimes of St. Ann's rung out the old and rung in the new year." Do you remember that being in the statement? A. I remember the chimes; I think there must be some sentence left out there.

Mr. Evarts—Well, none that I am aware of.

The Witness—Still, I don't know; I don't know whether I put the whole Saturday night in or not; perhaps only a part of it.

Q. [Reading]: "The next day I furnished a New Year's gift for Mr. Bowen in the shape of the following letter." That refers to the letter of January 1st? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. [Reading]: "After writing the above letter, I gave it to Mr. Moulton to be by him delivered to Mr. Bowen; and as I wished speedily to settle my affairs with my late employer, I asked Mr. Moulton to be one of three arbitrators for the purpose. Mr. Moulton desired me to commit the whole case to his hands, lest in the hands of myself I should be tempted to do injury to Mr. Beecher. I consented to write the following"—which is the authority.

The Witness—Well, that is badly bungled, Sir. I don't think I wrote it in that way.

Q. You don't remember about that?

Mr. Morris—He doesn't mean by that to say that he doesn't remember any authority.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, no. [To the witness]: Do you remember whether the authority was put into the "True Story"? A. My authorization, do you mean?

Mr. Evarts—Yes; was it included in that paper? A. I don't remember, Sir; but I think quite likely it was.

Q. "On the night of January 1st, 1871, Mr. Moulton called on Mr. Beecher, and after a protracted interview returned, and immediately gave to me an account of the interview, which I took down from his lips in phonographic notes; these notes, after two years, I now reopen for the first time and digest therefrom the following report."

The Witness—"Reopen?"

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Strange word.

Q. "These notes, after two years I now reopen for the first time, and digest therefrom the following report." A. I don't understand that word "reopen."

Q. Well, it is not for me to suggest, except that they might be closed up in an envelope or shut up in a drawer? A. Well, perhaps they were; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what do you think of that; do you think that was in your statement? A. I don't remember the phrase; I remember that I took from Mr. Moulton's lips the narrative.

Mr. Beach—Well, you are stating now as to the fact, and not as to the contents of this statement.

The Witness—And afterwards used a part of the narrative, and put a frame it into the statement.

Mr. Evarts—The question is only whether this was in your "True Story" as you composed it? A. Well, it is very difficult for me to swear exactly what was in and what was not. I have to go by the facts themselves rather than by the mere statement of them.

Mr. Beach—That is the only safe way.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I proceed to read them: "I called at Mr. Beecher's. He was not at home. I left my card; presently his son came running after me saying his mother knew where his father was, and that he would go for him; I went back to the house and Mr. Beecher came in; he invited me up stairs; I told him he would probably consider it the strangest interview he ever had with mortal man. Said I: 'Mr. Beecher, I wish to tell you first how minutely I recollect your conversation of last evening. I came to tell you as a friend meaning to do you as good service as ever any friend did to another. On our way to my house I asked you if any one had seen the letter besides yourself, the letter of T. T. demanding your retirement from the pulpit; you said none save one, besides myself. I asked if that one was H. C. B. You made no reply. You recollect it, do you not?' He said, 'I do.' 'I do not press any answer from you now; so far as you do not answer me you do not respond to the friendship which I profess for you.'" Do you remember that part of your statement? A. I remember there was something like that; I don't know whether that is accurate or not.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I am sorry to say that that is all I have of the True Statement—the "True Story" in any form.

Mr. Fullerton—I am sorry to say that it does not appear to be, in part, the "True Statement."

The Court—How is it as to the portion preserved?

Mr. Beach—That is not all that you have. You have these three or four pages.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I say all that I have of my own source.

MR. TILTON'S DEFENSE IN THE TRUE STORY.

Mr. Evarts—I will now read from this paper.

[Taking up the preserved sheets.]

Mr. Beach—What are you reading from?

Mr. Evarts—I am reading from the original paper produced by Mr. Tilton. "Mrs. Davis, in The Springfield Republican, December 9th, 1872"—

The Witness—It was put into my hands at the time; I don't know whether it was from The Springfield Republican or not.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] This printed paper was put into your hands—this statement?

The Witness—Certainly.

Mr. Evarts [reading]:

A WITNESS WHO REPUDIATES.

"Mrs. Paulina Wright Davis, of Providence, was given as a chief witness in Mrs. Woodhull's scandalous Beecher-Tilton libel. But in a note just received from her in Europe, Mrs. Davis thus utterly repudiates, in gross and in detail, the statements concerning her relation to the case, and gives the most damaging direct blow to the whole libel that has yet been rendered: [This appears to be quoted.] "In relation to the Tilton versus Beecher affair, I have only this to say: I was never on any terms of intimacy with the families of either party; I never visited at Mr. Tilton's but once in my life, and that was ten years ago, in company with Mr. and Mrs. Johnson. A year or two ago I called at Mr. Tilton's house for some books which I had lent to Mr. T. I then saw Mrs. Tilton for ten or fifteen minutes. I have met Mrs. Tilton two or three times at the houses of mutual friends; but at no time has there been the slightest approach to a confidential conversation between us, nor have I insinuated that there had been. If Mrs. T. has ever in my presence spoken of Mr. Beecher, it has been in terms of respect, as a man of honor and her pastor. I did believe that Mrs. Woodhull was going to do a great work for woman; I am grieved that she has failed in what she gave promise of doing."

[Reading from the "True Story:"] "I have not seen the original manuscript of Mrs. Davis's letter, as above printed, nor do I know to whom it was addressed; but a similar letter was sent by her from Paris to Oliver Johnson, which I have seen and here transcribe as follows:" That does not seem to be transcribed?

The Witness—No, Sir; Mr. Johnson showed me the letter, but I failed at the time to take a copy of it, and afterwards I did not get the copy.

Mr. Evarts—He, perhaps, has it. [Reading:] Mrs. Stanton, in a letter to a friend in New-York, dated Boston, November 5th, 1872 (a few days after the Woodhull publication appeared), says:

[MRS. STANTON'S STATEMENT.]

"I have had a grand time visiting friends here, but my pleasure has been fearfully marred by this Woodhull paper. I thought it dead. 'False in one point, false in all,' is a good old Latin motto. The filthy words—" [Pausing.]

The Witness—I will read it for you if you wish, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—"The filthy words—language," I think it is.

The Witness—I guess it must be a mis-writing; I guess it is "the filthy language she puts into my mouth." I have written it "words."

Mr. Evarts—"The filthy language she puts into my mouth is utterly false. I never spoke to that woman but once on the subject, about five minutes, fortunately in the presence of one witness, a gentleman, and simply replied in general terms to a question that I had heard the rumor. 'Say this to T. T., and tell him I shall stand by him in the hour of need.'

With kind regards, ever yours,

(Signed by) MRS. H. B. STANTON."

["Note.—I possess the original of the above letter.—T. T."]

Mr. Evarts [reading from the loose sheets]: "In addition to the testimony of Mrs. Davis and Mrs. Stanton, above given, my wife's own solemn and truthful declaration, is as follows:

[MRS. TILTON'S STATEMENT.]

The statement that Mrs. Davis was ever intimate with me, or a frequent guest at my house, is a fabrication. Many years ago, nearly a dozen, when we lived in Oxford-st., she once spent part of a day with me, in company with Mary Ann Johnson. Two or three years ago she called for a few minutes with Mrs. Stanton, at our house in Livingston-st. With these two exceptions, certainly ten years apart, Mrs. Davis has never been under our roof. I know her very slightly indeed. I never had a confidential talk with her on any subject, and never told to Mrs. Davis or to any other person, the preposterous and wicked slander put upon me in Mrs. Woodhull's libel. ELIZABETH R. TILTON."

Mr. Evarts [Reading:]: "My family and others by bringing these same stories—" There is apparently, Mr. Fullerton, some leaf missing; this is not continuous.

Mr. Fullerton—It is more than "apparently," Sir; it is so.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will see. I understood the witness to bring all that he had.

The Witness—Perhaps you read the sheets out of their order, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—I may have done so. They are not numbered at all that I see.

The Witness—No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—There is a break there.

Mr. Evarts—What I have read thus far has been continuous and this is not. However there is no paging. [Reading:] "My family and others by flinging these stories broadcast to all the world as she has since done."—It is a complete sentence. "To complete the chain of documents belonging to this case, I now insert the two of chief importance, namely, the direct testimony of Mrs. Tilton and of Mr. Beecher as to the alleged criminality of their relations."

[MRS. TILTON'S STATEMENT.]

Mr. MOULTON—My Dear Friend: For my husband's sake, and my children's, I hereby testify with all my woman's soul—

The Witness—Those are the two cards already in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; I know they are; but here is a word I cannot make out:

that I am innocent of the crime of impure conduct alleged against me.

I have been to my husband a true wife. In his love I wish to live and die. My early affection for him still burns with its maiden flame; all the more for what he has borne for my sake, both private and public wrongs. His plan to keep back scandals long ago threatened against me I never approved, and the result shows it unavailing. But few would have risked so much as he has sacrificed for others, ever since the conspiracy began against him two years ago.

Having had power to strike others he has forbore to do it, and allowed himself to be injured instead. No wound to me is so great as the impression that he is among my accusers. I bless him every day for his faith in me, which swerves not, and for standing my champion against all adversaries.

ELIZABETH R. TILTON.

[MR. BEECHER'S STATEMENT.]

MY DEAR MR. MOULTON: I promptly comply with your suggestion of giving an explicit denial of the stories which connected my name criminally with Mrs. Tilton's. The very thought of being obliged to say anything to clear her fair fame shocks me. And I have hitherto acted under advice in refraining.

Very truly,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Mr. Evarts—Then it goes on:

BROOKLYN, Dec. 29.

I solemnly deny the scandalous charges made against me and Mrs. Eliz. R. Tilton. Especially and emphatically I deny that there has been any criminal intercourse or any color of reason for such a charge.

My acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton has inspired me with the highest esteem for her modesty, propriety and womanly grace.

I authorize her or her husband and children to use this declaration.

I desire to state in addition that Mr. Tilton, during the whole of this shameful scandal, has uniformly spoken in the highest terms of his wife, and has shown to me the strongest proofs of friendship.

Mr. Beach—[Handing the missing sheets of "The True Story" to the witness]. Take those.

The Witness—I don't want them.

Mr. Beach—You may as well keep them.

The Witness—An lar: they to go in evidence?

Mr. Beach—Keep them, I tell you.

MR. TILTON'S ALLEGED TESTIMONY TO MRS. WOODHULL'S VIRTUE.

Mr. Evarts—Do you know Jackson S. Schultz of New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long and how well have you known him? A. I have known him a number of years, but not very well.

Q. Was he one of the subscribers to your fund for The Golden Age? A. Yes, Sir; he subscribed $750 for it.

Q. And his partner, Mr. Southwick, another? A. Yes, Sir; a similar amount.

Q. Do you remember in a conversation with Mr. Schultz in the Spring of 1871 or the Winter of 1871-'2, either time, saying to Mr. Jackson S. Schultz that Mr. Beecher was responsible for your quarrel with Mr. Bowen, and that the whole Plymouth Church crowd were hypocrites, that you would expose them all, and could and would blow the roof off unless they came to your terms, and settle with you on your terms? A. No, Sir, the man who threatened to blow the roof from Plymouth Church was Oliver Johnson.

Q. Now, I never asked you that, and I will have that struck out. That will be struck out, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—The answer as it stands is "No."

Mr. Evarts—Did you say to Mr. Schultz, on either of these occasions, in substance or effect what I have said to you? A. No, Sir, I did not; my interview with Mr. Schultz—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

The Witness—Was in the presence of Franklin Woodruff.

Mr. Beach—Wait, Mr. Tilton, when you are asked.

Mr. Evarts—No matter; you said nothing to him; you remember distinctly that you did not say anything to him of the substance or effect of this statement? A. I had some conversation with Mr. Schultz—

Q. Nothing? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Evarts—It is right enough he should say that.

Judge Neilson—I don't know, under your former rule perhaps it is. It is put down—"I had some conversation with him."

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—You had some conversation with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you refer to that conversation with him yesterday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was that? A. At his own house.

Q. In New-York City? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where you had gone for the purpose of seeing him? A. Yes, Sir; with Mr. Woodruff.

Q. Which Mr. Woodruff? A. Franklin Woodruff.

Q. Do you remember when it was? A. Yes, Sir; it was in the early Winter of 1871.

Q. 1871-'2? A. It was in the early year, January, 1871—January or possibly February, 1871.

Q. Of 1871? A. Yes, Sir; and I remember exactly what I said to him.

Judge Neilson—He didn't ask you that.

Mr. Evarts—That I don't ask. [To the witness]: In that conversation, or in any other conversation with him, you didn't say anything of that kind? A. No, Sir; I never used any such language to anybody.

Mr. Evarts—I have not asked you about the language; I have asked you about the substance.

Judge Neilson—We have the fact. That is all.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Did you, in that conversation with Mr. Schultz, of which you have spoken—as you had a conversation—or at any time during the year 1871 or the year 1872, say to him, in answer to his inquiry whether Mr. Beecher had improper relations with your wife that your wife was as pure as the driven snow—that she was as pure as an angel? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Mr. Evarts—You did! [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Silence.

Q. You know Mr. Southwick? A. Yes, Sir; in about the same way I know Mr. Schultz.

Q. And he, as you have stated, was one of the contributors to your Golden Age fund? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember meeting him soon after the publication of the life of Woodhull on the ferry-boat, and his asking you if you were out of your mind and you replied to him; "I know what you mean. You refer to my life of Woodhull, which I glory in," or words to that effect? A. I don't remember anything about that.

Q. You don't remember? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember any conversation with him? A. Oh, I have met Mr. Southwick many times on the ferry-boat; I don't remember any one in particular.

Q. Do you remember anything in connection with this subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you proceed to say on this occasion to Mr. Southwick, "I took an oath before Almighty God, on my bended knees, when I was oppressed by H. C. Bowen, that the first poor creature who applied to me for assistance I would aid him or her, and that poor creature came in the person of Mrs. Woodhull, whom I know to be a natural lady and as pure as an angel?" A. I don't remember anything about it, Sir; I think that is a fiction.

Q. You don't remember any such conversation? A. I had a great deal of conversation with Mr. Southwick on the ferry-boat from time to time about Mrs. Woodhull—a great deal of satirical talk, battledore and shuttlecock to and fro; I don't remember any of the particulars of it. I remember one day he said to me: "Holloa, how are the Woodhulls," and I said: "Holloa, how are the Claffins," he being one of them. All

I remember about it is our chaffing about it in a friendly way—a semi-satirical sort of way.

Q. You don't remember saying this to him? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Either chaffing or not chaffing? A. No, Sir; I do not. If I did, it was chaffing.

Q. Well, you didn't say it? A. No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Is that all of the cross-examination?

Mr. Evarts—No, not quite, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson [To Mr. Evarts]—Proceed, Sir. I think you had better close now. I think it is due to your opponents that you should close now, so that they may know what their to-morrow's work will be. I will remain as long as you wish.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor requires it, that we should break the rule and go on now, of course I submit.

Judge Neilson—I don't require it, Sir; I only earnestly wish it, Sir. You will not be long in the morning.

Mr. Evarts—No, Sir. I have stated to your Honor that the conduct of a four hours' cross-examination, and the preparation in the interval for it, is as much as I think I could properly do.

Judge Neilson—I think it is.

Mr. Evarts—And I must ask your Honor to allow me to finish this in the same way.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir. [To the audience]: I wish, gentlemen, you would keep your seats until the Jury retire. [To the Jury]: Please be in your seats to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. Mallison—This Court now stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock on Friday.

TWENTY-FIFTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE ICE BLOCKADE MAKES A HOLIDAY.

MR. EVARTS, TWO ASSOCIATES, AND A JURYMEN DELAYED IN THE MORNING—AN ADJOURNMENT TO 2 O'CLOCK—FURTHER PROGRESS POSTPONED TILL MONDAY.

FRIDAY, Feb. 12, 1875.

There was an abrupt and unexpected halt to-day in the proceedings of the Beecher-Tilton trial, on account of the enforced absence of Mr. William M. Evarts, ex-Judge Porter, and Mr. Abbott, of the counsel for the defense, and of John M. Taylor, the eighth jurymen. Judge Neilson was on the bench 10 or 15 minutes before 11 o'clock and listened to an argument in an equity case, which occupied the time until the hour for opening the great trial. The plaintiff's lawyers were ready, but Mr. Evarts and two of his junior associates and one of the jurymen were not in their places. It was soon ascertained that the ice in the East River was the cause of absence. The minutes slipped away until it was nearly half an hour after the usual hour for opening. Mr. Beach and Judge Fullerton had come from New-York at 10 o'clock, and no other boats followed the one on which they crossed for an hour or more. Therefore, at the suggestion of Mr. Beach, with the concurrence of Mr. Shearman, the court was adjourned until 2 o'clock, the hour for the afternoon session.

Soon after the adjournment, Judge Neilson received a telegram from Mr. Evarts saying that there was a prospect of considerable delay at the ferry, and that one of the jurymen was on the same boat with himself. This boat was the Pacific of the South Ferry, which had started from Brooklyn about 8 o'clock, and after cruising about the river for several hours, put into Fulton Ferry on the New-York side. The Pacific, in returning, made a landing at a pier near the Wall-st. Ferry, after floating about for one hour and a half. The counsel were not worried by the delay, as they knew the trial could not proceed without the jurymen who was with them. It is said that as the boat was drawing near the landing, Mr. Evarts laughingly cautioned Mr. Taylor, the jurymen, to be careful in getting ashore, saying, "if you should be lost all our labor in the case would be for naught, for a jury cannot be replaced. If one of the counsel should be lost some substitute could be obtained."

Judge Neilson resumed his seat at 2 o'clock, and all the jurors were in their places. Mr. Tilton took his seat in the witness-chair, and in a moment the counsel filed in. Mr. Evarts and his colleagues were warmly greeted by Judge Neilson and the jury. Mr. and Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton and her friends came in about this time. The audience was very large, and many of the persons present had been waiting in their seats during the prolonged recess, afraid of losing their places. Mr. Evarts and Mr. Beach were observed to go up to the bench and engage in a whispered conference with Judge Neilson, after which they resumed their places. Mr. Evarts then addressed the Court, saying that he had an imperative engagement in New-York at 4:30 p. m., and that Mr. Beach had an appointment at 5 o'clock. If the trial were continued, there would be danger that they might fail in their engagements. They therefore asked for an adjournment until Monday. Mr. Beach concurred, and Judge Neilson complied with the request. Among those in the court-room to-day were Judge Kirkpatrick of Pittsburgh, Penn., and Francis J. Dupignac.

From the first days of the trial a class of unscrupulous pulous meddlers have been sending anonymous letters to the jurymen with the idea of poisoning their minds. These letters are generally given into the hands of Judge Neilson, who destroys them, as it is impossible to detect the writers. Mr. Carpenter, the foreman of the jury, received a letter to-day written apparently by a lady. He informed Judge Neilson of the fact and was instructed to destroy the letter.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

THE ICE EMBARGO CAUSES ADJOURNMENT.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Mr. Evarts and ex-Judge Porter, of defendant's counsel, being detained by the ice embargo, an adjournment was had to 2 o'clock.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, it is very obvious that some of our friends on the other side are detained by the ice-block in the river, and it is suggested by some of the jurymen that we might as well take our recess at this point until 2 o'clock, as there is no likelihood of the river being open until that time, and that they can employ themselves in their business for an hour or two.

Judge Neilson—What is your view about it personally? You came over this morning, didn't you?

Mr. Beach—We came over, Sir, early, we came over at ten o'clock, and soon after that the passage for the boats was closed.

Judge Neilson—What do you think about it, Mr. Shearman?

Mr. Shearman—Well, I think, your Honor, we might about as well adjourn, at any rate, until one o'clock.

Mr. Beach—Oh, we don't want to come here at one. That is the hour of adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Well, gentlemen, that seems to be the view, then.

A Juror—We are not averse to one o'clock, if that is the order of the Court.

Mr. Beach—It might as well be two

Mr. Carpenter [Foreman of the jury]—I think we better say until two o'clock.

Judge Neilson—Will gentlemen please keep their seats a few minutes? The Court has not adjourned.

Mr. Fullerton—I suggest that Mr. Shearman, in the meantime, go over to New-York after them. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—We will meet at two o'clock, gentlemen of the jury, please.

The Court then took a recess until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

[The five sheets of the original of the "True Story" were each marked "Exhibit D, 104."]

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor is probably sufficiently aware of the condition of navigation between New-York and Brooklyn, to know that it accounts for the absence of the jurymen, who, unfortunately, was on that side of the water, and of the counsel for the defendant, who are always there at night; and we now present to your Honor this state of circumstances. Our boat was an hour and a half on the water, to say nothing of the delay before starting. I have made the only appointment that I have been able to make during the week, at the close of the court, to complete some very important matters that are to be sent to Washington to-night, and I do not wish, if I can avoid it, to be under any difficulty or danger of not being at my office at half-past four o'clock. My friend Mr. Beach, also, has some important engagement, which requires him to be in the city at the hour of five, I believe; and under these circumstances, upon conference, we feel that unless your Honor should feel that the progress of the trial should constrain you to the contrary, that we should really lose but little now in taking our adjournment until Monday; otherwise we might lose all opportunity of getting across and be placed at great disadvantage.

Mr. Beach—Under any circumstances, Sir, we should be compelled to ask your Honor to make an earlier adjournment this afternoon than is usual, and I do not think any substantial progress could be made in the examination, or the close of the examination of Mr. Tilton, before we should be compelled to present that request to your Honor, and I do not think we should make any available progress by proceeding for the remainder of the day which, under those circumstances, would be left; and, therefore, we concur in the request of Mr. Evarts that your Honor should adjourn now until Monday.

Judge Neilson—Well, in view of the uncertainty of your being able to return, of which you have a better means of judging than I have, having seen the condition of the ferry, and regarding your engagements as very important, and your chance to keep them precarious if we continue the business, I think I ought to comply with your request. [To the jury.] When we adjourn, gentlemen, we do so until Monday morning at 11 o'clock. Gentlemen will keep their seats a few moments. [To the Clerk.] Adjourn the Court and let the crowd go away.

Mr. Mallison (Clerk)—The Court stands adjourned until Monday morning, at 11 o'clock.

Judge Neilson—The jury will please remain a moment. Now, those gentlemen that could not wait until the jury are gone, will please retire. [To the jury.] Now, gentlemen of the jury, you will please retire. I hope to see you safe here Monday morning.

TWENTY-SIXTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE PLAINTIFF'S CROSS-EXAMINATION ENDED.

HIS THREAT TO SHOOT MR. BEECHER—WHY THE LETTER TO DR. BACON WAS WRITTEN—MR. MOULTON'S FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS WITH MR. TILTON—THE WITNESS EXPLAINS HIS THEORY THAT HIS WIFE IS PURE AND YET GUILTY OF ADULTERY—INTRODUCTION OF EIGHT PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. BEECHER FOUND IN A CLOSET AFTER MRS. TILTON LEFT HER HUSBAND.

MONDAY, Feb. 15, 1875.

Promptly at 11 o'clock to-day Mr. Evarts resumed his cross-examination of Mr. Tilton. From the first it was evident that the questioning by the defense was drawing to a close, and when recess arrived Mr. Evarts announced that he would finish with the reading of three letters after the interval. The queries followed no regular line of examination, but were intended to close all the gaps in the investigation by the defense. The first question was regarding a statement in the "True Story," about Mr. Beecher's alleged immoralities, which Mr. Evarts said he overlooked when reading it last week. The stereotyped reply of the witness, that he did not remember the exact words, was given. The examiner next inquired what the witness meant when he said that he would shoot Mr. Beecher if he resigned from Plymouth Church, casting a shadow on his (the witness's) family, and Mr. Tilton replied that he meant just what he said. "Would you have shot him?" asked Mr. Evarts, with a tone of surprise. "I presume I should," replied Mr. Tilton in the most listless manner.

After bringing out the denial of the witness that he wrote or dictated the letter of Mrs. Tilton in September, 1872, in which she denies the story of crime, Mr. Evarts passed to the consideration of events surrounding the conduct and support of The Golden Age. The letter from Mr. Clarke, formerly its associate editor, in which the writer said that Mr. Tilton's name was a millstone on the paper, was offered for the third time, and again ruled out. This letter was first introduced by the plaintiff and objected to by the defense, and ruled out. Twice after that the defense has attempted to introduce it but has not succeeded, but to-day most of its contents were made known by putting the statements contained in it in the shape of questions. The witness was asked if he had heard of a project of starting a new political paper founded upon the situation of politics existing at the time of Mr. Greeley's death. He had heard of such an enterprise, but had no part in it. Then the witness was asked if he were ever editor of the paper The Revolution, and he said he was not. A prospectus of that periodical—a little sheet of paper—was shown, and it gave occasion for the first joke of the day, which was the observation of Judge Neilson that if that was The Revolution it was a very small revolution. It was ascertained that Mr. Tilton received nothing for The Golden Age when he disposed of it to Mr. Clarke. The witness was next asked what induced him to write the Bacon letter. He gave five or six reasons, which he said made the provocation. The questioning brought a statement that the witness believed that after 1872 Mr. Beecher intended to strike him down at the first opportunity. The witness was asked about some of his statements while under examination before the Plymouth Investigating Committee, particularly in regard to his letters written to the Congregational Council, he having said, as is alleged, that he did not care whether the scandal came out as a result of these letters or not. There was also close inquiry about the manner in which his "Statement" came to be published in The Brooklyn Argus. The witness said that he was at Delmonico's when he first heard that it had been published. He repeatedly asserted that he had no hint of its intended publication before it was printed.

Mr. Tilton, it seems from his testimony, has had no employment since he left The Golden Age, though he has an income. The witness swore that Mr. Moulton had contributed nothing toward the expenses of this suit. At this stage the hour of recess arrived, and the court adjourned for an hour. The cross-examination only lasted fifteen minutes after the interval, that time being occupied by the reading of three letters from Mr. Tilton to his wife, written in 1868. Without formality Mr. Evarts sat down, his task finished, and ex-Judge Fullerton arose and began putting the questions of the redirect examination. The first matter of importance reached was, whether Mr. Tilton knew that his wife was to leave him, as she did in 1874, soon after her appearance before the Investigating Committee. He said that he did not. Perhaps the most comprehensive explanation that the witness has yet made regarding his remarkable theory of his wife's alleged sin was called out by Mr. Fullerton's question, how he reconciled the statement that his wife loved everything good and hated everything bad, with the fact that she is charged with adultery.

Still more literature was added to the already large collection now in the hands of the lawyers. Besides the letters read during the last moments of the cross-examination, Mr. Fullerton introduced Mr. Tilton's protest in The Independent against Mr. Beecher's letter to the Cleveland Convention, which the defense had introduced; also the portions of the plaintiff's reply to Mr. Greeley's letter regarding woman's rights, which in its reading the defense had omitted.

The witness was made to give his views of marriage and divorce. The former he said was the union of one man to one woman for life, and possibly beyond life, for better or for worse. His views of divorce, he said, were shared by the mass of the people of the United States. In the New-England States, and in nearly all of the Western States, a woman may get a divorce from her husband if he treats her brutally, neglects to support her, is an habitual drunkard, or for other reasons. New-York, Mr. Tilton proceeded to say, has a unique code, which is out of harmony with the sisterhood of States, allowing divorce from only one cause. The witness denied that he ever had other views of divorce, or that he believed in "free love" doctrines.

The little poem entitled "French with a Master," the reading of which by Mr. Evarts has been one of the bright episodes of the trial, was referred to by Mr. Fullerton as having been introduced by the defense as an expression of indelicacy. To show that such a meaning was not intended, Mr. Fullerton read one of the verses in which "orange buds" are mentioned, and asked the author to give the prose of his poetry, which he did, saying that it was the story of a lover teaching French to his sweetheart and proposing marriage to her.

The most notable incident of the day was the introduction by Mr. Fullerton of a little box containing eight photographs of Mr. Beecher, taken in different positions and most of them at different times, which Mr. Tilton testified he found in a little closet in which his wife kept her letters and gifts from Mr. Beecher. Mr. Evarts objected to putting in evidence regarding the contents of the closet. Judge Neilson decided, however, that Mr. Fullerton might "open the closet," to which the counsel rejoined that he had it open already, but his opponent wished to close it. The photographs were passed among the jurymen, and examined with interest. They are all cabinet photographs, except a carte de visite on which Mr. Beecher's autograph is written, and a "tin-type," locket size. The last half hour of the afternoon session was given to an examination regarding Mr. Tilton's religious views—his early belief, the cause, time, and nature of the change in them, and his present convictions.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

ANOTHER BIT OF THE TRUE STORY.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Theodore Tilton was recalled and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—I find, if your Honor please, in looking over the notes of the testimony, and this paper, that I omitted a paragraph in my inquiries of this witness, which I will now put to him.

Judge Neilson—In the so-called "True Story"?

Mr. Evarts—In the so-called "True Story." It immediately precedes that which relates to Mrs. Morse. It is a short paragraph which escaped my eye. [To the witness.] I ask you whether this was a part of your "True Story:" "At the same time, by other persons and from other quarters, stories were set afloat concerning Mr. Beecher of the same damaging kind; for instance, there came from Washington a statement, traceable I know not to whom, that Mr. Beecher preached every Sunday to a dozen of his mistresses." Was that in your true statement? A. I cannot swear positively that it was.

Q. You cannot swear that it was not? A. No, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S THREAT TO SHOOT MR. BEECHER.

Q. Mr. Tilton, you remember, in the course of the direct examination, the stage of this matter when Mr. Beecher proposed a resignation of his pastorate? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You remember that? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To plaintiff's counsel.] That was not an exhibit?

Mr. Morris—No, Sir; Mr. Moulton stated the contents.

Mr. Evarts—I was looking for it as an exhibit.

Mr. Fullerton—It was not an exhibit; Mr. Moulton gave it from recollection.

Mr. Evarts—Exhibit No. 26 I want. It is another matter. I shall want that in a moment.

[Mr. Morris produced Exhibit No. 26.]

Q. I understand you to have stated, in connection with that resignation—which we do not find for the moment; perhaps it is sufficiently in your mind—I understand you to have stated, upon hearing that resignation recited to you by Mr. Moulton—the proposed resignation recited to you by Mr. Moulton—that you stated that if Mr. Beecher resigned you would shoot him in the street? A. Not that, Sir.

Q. What was it you said? A. I said that if he resigned, flinging back a shadow on my family, I would shoot him in the street.

Q. You meant by that, that if he resigned with such a resignation as that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was read to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That if he wrote that resignation and resigned, you would shoot him in the street? A. Yes, Sir; because he alluded to my family in it.

Q. What did you mean by that? A. Exactly what I said.

Q. And if he had resigned, you would have shot him in the street, would you? A. Well, I presume I should.

Q. Here it is:

"I tender herewith my resignation of Plymouth Church. I have stood among you in sorrow for two years in order to save from shame a certain household, but since a recent publication makes this no longer possible, I now resign my ministry, and retire to private life."

That is the resignation, is it not? A. I don't remember the phraseology of it. I remember that the resignation contained a pointed allusion to my family.

Q. Well, that is the paper? A. I did not object to his resigning. I only objected to his flinging back a shadow on Elizabeth.

Q. Yes; very well. Now, this was about June, 1873? A. It was May 31st.

Q. Well, I say about June, 1873? A. It was May 31st; Saturday night.

AUTHORSHIP OF ONE OF MR. MOULTON'S LETTERS QUESTIONED.

Q. On the 1st of June you were at Mr. Moulton's house? A. Yes, Sir; that was Sunday.

Q. 1873. Do you remember, Mr. Tilton, at what hour of the day you were there first, if you were there more than once? A. My impression is I was there twice—once during the day and then during the evening. That is my present recollection.

Q. How early in the day were you there? A. That I don't remember.

Q. Was Mr. Moulton then abed? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Look at this Exhibit D, 43, which is Mr. Moulton's letter of that day to Mr. Beecher, and say whether you were present when that letter was written? [Handing witness Exhibit D, 43.] A. No, Sir; I was not.

Q. When did it first come to your knowledge that it had been written? A. I do not think I ever saw the letter until this—until it appeared. I think, in one of the statements last Summer. I remember, however, that during the day Mr. Moulton informed me that Mr. Beecher had written him a letter, and he had written a reply, but he did not show me the reply.

Q. And you were not at Moulton's, you think, until after he had received Mr. Beecher's letter and written his reply? A. That is my recollection, Sir. I think the letter which Mr. Beecher sent to Mr. Moulton on that day was sent early in the morning, that is my impression, and was received by Mrs. Moulton before Mr. Moulton had arisen.

Q. Well, we have the evidence on that subject. A. And that this reply by Mr. Moulton was written in bed; but I don't know those facts from personal knowledge.

Q. You are quite certain, Mr. Tilton, are you, that you were not present and did not take any part in the preparation of this letter? A. Oh, not at all, Sir.

A LETTER OF MRS. TILTON'S ATTRIBUTED TO MR. TILTON.

Q. Let me call your attention now, Mr. Tilton, to a letter of your wife's in the end of December, 1872, beginning, "My dear Friend: For my husband's sake and my children's." You remember the letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you write that letter? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you draft it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it written by your wife without any intervention from you? A. It was written by my wife in consultation with me. She wanted to have it written. She wanted a card denying Mrs. Woodhull's story.

Q. Well, that has all been testified to. A. I think she consulted me as to the phraseology of it, in parts.

Q. I think you have said that Mr. Beecher and yourself and your wife were together at Mr. Moulton's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At this time, the time that these two letters were considered before you? A. Mrs. Tilton's letter had been written, I think, before that. She was present in order that Mr. Beecher's card might be seen by her and be judged satisfactory by her.

Q. Well, she was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. We won't repeat the matter, for that is testified to. Now, when you came there, or when your wife came there at this interview, and for this interview, was that letter then there in your handwriting, and was it then and there and afterwards copied by your wife and signed? A. I don't remember whether I took the original letter of Mrs. Tilton's there, or whether I took a copy of it; at all events, either the original or a copy was there, in order that Mr. Beecher might see exactly what Elizabeth desired to do and had done; in other words, to see her card to which he was requested by her to present a companion piece.

Q. Well, I understand. You think then that the letter which appears as your wife's may have been produced there at that interview in your handwriting? A. I think that either the original in her handwriting, or a copy in mine, was there. I know the card was there in some form.

Q. That we understand. A. Then she afterward came herself.

Q. But the proposition that I wish to ask your attention to is this: that it was there in your handwriting, and was then and there copied by her and signed? A. No; it was not so.

Q. That is not so? A. No, Sir.

Q. Wasn't it on that occasion complete as her writing and with her signature? A. I think, Sir, it had been written complete by her signature and all, either the day before or that morning. I know the first idea of that interview did not contemplate her presence at all, but her personal presence there was in order that she might see Mr. Beecher's card and pronounce her opinion as to that.

Q. You cannot say, then, as I understand, whether there was at any time, at that interview, then present, this letter in her handwriting and signed by her? A. Well, I have already said that either that letter, in her handwriting and signed by her, was there, namely, the original, or else that I had carried a copy of it there.

Q. In your handwriting? A. Yes; I don't know which.

Q. And which, you cannot say? A. I cannot state now which; no, Sir.

THE CLARKE LETTER AGAIN PRODUCED.

Q. [Letter handed to witness.] Look at this paper, which is marked for identification 49, known as the Clarke letter, and read the letter, if you please? A. Do you wish me to read it, Sir?

Mr. Everts—Yes. [Letter read by the witness.]

Q. Did you see that letter, or know of its being written, at the time that it was written? A. No, Sir; I do not think I did; Mr. Moulton and Mr. Clarke were very intimate personal friends, and I very frequently was present with them at their talks about the paper; I don't think I saw this letter until it was turned up here during the trial. Still, I may have done so; it has escaped my mind if I have.

Q. Mr. Clarke at that time was the managing editor, wasn't he, of The Golden Age, or in some way associated in its conduct? A. He was an associate editor; yes, Sir.

Q. Were you aware at this date, or about this time—beginning of the year '78—of a purpose or wish that The Golden Age should be disposed of? A. Wish on my part?

Q. Yes. A. Well, Sir, I have had that wish for a long while; I don't remember exactly the date at which it began.

Q. Well, were you aware of efforts to dispose of it? A. I was aware of this—Mr. Clarke, my associate, who had been previously editor-in-chief of a newspaper, had several times talked with me about the possibility of his becoming owner of The Golden Age, and being editor-in-chief of that; and it was a project which I always favored. I desired a long time ago to abandon the newspaper, and go into other literary toils. He was solicitous to have the paper, and very frequently talked on that subject; but I could not fix the date at which those talks first began.

Q. Well, were you aware, Mr. Tilton, of the sentiments or prejudices regarding your connection with that newspaper—which affected its commercial prosperity, its pecuniary prosperity—in the sense in which this letter of Mr. Clarke presents it? A. Well, Sir, I do not know—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, one moment; that question is predicated upon a letter not in evidence.

Mr. Everts—But I have shown it to him.

Mr. Fullerton—That is very true, but his answer will be unintelligible unless the letter is in.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—We should be very glad to get it in.

Mr. Beach—No doubt about that.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Everts.] Cannot you frame your question omitting the letter?

Mr. Everts—[To the witness.] Were you aware that in the efforts to dispose of this newspaper it was found that those to whom it was offered had such a painful impression, if not seated prejudice, against Mr. Tilton that they were unwilling to even seriously consider the matter, and that Mr. Clarke had been blamed for retaining a connection with such a man and paper? A. No, Sir; I was not aware of it, for he states in the letter that he did not inform me—

Mr. Beach—Wait, wait!

Judge Neilson—"I was not aware of that"—that is the answer to it.

Q. Were you aware of the feeling in regard to the paper from your connection with it, even with those who had no prejudice against you, that they saw no field and no future for the paper, and that they advised its giving up, especially as its editor was a millstone upon it? A. No, Sir; was not aware of that.

Q. You were not aware of that? A. No, Sir.

Q. And yet you don't feel sure but that you saw this letter? A. Well, I cannot say that I did not see the letter; I have no recollection of the letter; I would not swear positively that I had not seen it; I don't think I ever saw it until it was produced here.

MR. TILTON'S HEALTH ALWAYS GOOD.

Q. Were you aware at this time that it was proposed or considered, on the part of Mr. Clarke or any other of your friends interested in you and the paper, that you ought to go abroad into another atmosphere and new scenes? A. I don't remember that anybody spoke to me on the subject.

Q. You don't remember of that being considered by Mr. Clarke and yourself, or other friends, in connection with your then position in The Golden Age and the situation of that paper? A. No, Sir; some friends of mine, after I got through writing a book, which was a number of months later, thought that I had better go abroad and get rested. I don't remember any such suggestion at the time of that letter.

Q. Who were those friends? A. Well, I think Mr. Clarke was one, possibly Mr. Carpenter—some personal friends; I had been working a year very hard and they said, "Run over and spend a Summer vacation in Europe."

Q. Were you aware that at this time your condition of health and spirits gave uneasiness to your friends in regard to your health? A. No, Sir.

Q. They desired some change of scene for your recreation? A. I don't know of any ground for such anxiety, Sir; my health has always been very fair until I got into this trial—bad atmosphere.

Q. Have you any doubt that at this time Mr. Clarke, in his conversations with you, did advise your going abroad? A. Well, Sir, I don't remember that, whether he did or not; I cannot fix any—the date of any—conversation with Mr. Clarke. I remember that, as I said before, after I got through writing the book and had prepared it for the press, Mr. Clarke and a few other friends said, "Now is the time for you to run over and spend a Summer vacation in Europe;" that did not take place until several months after this letter was written.

THE CLARKE LETTER AGAIN RULED OUT.

Mr. Evarts—I now offer, if your Honor please, to read this letter which has been twice proposed—once by my learned friends, and then again on our part.

Mr. Beach—The situation is not changed, Sir, since your Honor ruled it out.

Judge Neilson—The first time the suggestion was that the letter of Mr. Clarke was shown to Mr. Beecher; then there was an attempt to identify it as the one shown on your objection of failure to show that, and an offer on your part and an attempt to identify it. Have we now anything additional?

Mr. Evarts—I now offer it as shown to Mr. Tilton, leaving it a question on his statement which is not positive that it was or that it was not.

Judge Neilson—I don't think a paper becomes evidence by merely proving that it was shown to the witness.

Mr. Evarts—No, but to the party; not merely to the witness but to the party. Mr. Clarke and he were in this relation of association and interest in regard to The Golden Age, and this is a letter to Mr. Moulton concerning that affair.

Judge Neilson—By Mr. Clarke?

Mr. Evarts—By Mr. Clarke; and the witness says that he cannot say that it was, or that it was not, shown to him.

Judge Neilson—I don't think that it is evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I suppose that it may be a question, under the circumstances, whether or not the jury would conclude that it was shown to him or was not shown to him.

Mr. Beach—It is not a question for the jury, Mr. Evarts—I beg pardon.

Judge Neilson—I don't think it is admissible.

Mr. Beach—I was going to remark, if the counsel will permit me, that it is a question for the Court to determine the facts in regard to the competency of evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; it is for the Court, no doubt, but the Court often determines such questions by saying: "There is dispute here whether that is so or not; that is a question of fact, and upon the determination of that question of fact it will be determined whether this evidence is admissible or not."

A PROJECT BORN OF THE POLITICAL EVENTS OF 1872.

Judge Neilson—That would be a correct disposition of the question where there was some evidence on each side, and some doubt, and where the matter in its nature was material. I don't think this is evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good, then, as to note my exception. [To the witness.] Do you remember about this time, which you will notice was at the close of the political campaign and after the death of Mr. Greeley—do you remember in the latter part of that year or the beginning of the following year of a project being considered by you, of the establishment of a new political paper founded upon the then situation of politics and of Mr. Greeley's death, and so the effect that had or might have upon the already established paper THE TRIBUNE? A. No such project was considered by me; I heard of some such project talked of by others, but I had no part or lot in it.

Q. Well, but was that project entertained by your friends in reference to a connection of yourself with it? A. Not in the slightest degree that I know of; I never had any idea of joining any such enterprise.

Q. Well, did you hear of that at the time?

Mr. Beach—Hear of what?

Mr. Evarts—Of a project on the part of some of your friends.

Mr. Beach—On his behalf?

Mr. Evarts—No; of establishing such a newspaper—of establishing a newspaper.

Mr. Beach—Well, what if he did hear of it?

Judge Neilson—He has said that he did. [To the witness.] I understand you so.

The Witness—I heard of two or three different projects talked of, but they were not my projects.

Mr. Evarts—That I have understood you to say. Well, who were these friends of yours that you understood were entertaining or talking about such a project?

Mr. Beach—He did not say that any of his friends talked about it. You are assuming it.

Mr. Evarts—I submit it to your Honor. [To the witness:] Now, is that so?

The Witness—Ask your question again.

Q. Were those friends of yours that you understood were entertaining a project of establishing a new paper? A. Well, friends in one sense—I think the enterprise came from Mr. Cornell; I don't know that I ever saw him. There were two or three enterprises started.

Q. Connected with a new paper? A. Yes, Sir; I had nothing at all to do with it whatever; all I know on the subject is my remembrance of the gossip at the time.

Q. And it was at about this period—the end of the year 1872 or the beginning of the year 1873, wasn't it? A. My impression is that that was later. I refer to certain enterprises which culminated in the newspaper called The Republic, lately established in New-York and—

Q. Well, that is a very recent matter? A. Well, it was talked of a long time before. Do you allude to The Brooklyn Union, Mr. Evarts?

Q. Oh, no. A. Because some gentlemen in this city wanted to buy that for me and I declined.

MR. TILTON DENIES ANY INTEREST IN THE REVOLUTION.

Q. Oh, no. During what period of time was there a newspaper published here, either in Brooklyn or New-York, called The Revolution? A. Well, Sir, it was published for a number of years; I don't remember its beginning or end.

Q. About when? A. Can't say.

Q. Well, it was somewhere within these years that we have been talking of, wasn't it? A. My impression is that it began before the affairs that have been discussed.

Q. Before 1870? A. Oh, yes; many years before.

Mr. Beach—Oh, yes; it was discontinued before 1870.

The Witness—I think not.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir, it was.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I am trying to get at the fact.

Mr. Beach—Well I took it through all its existence.

Mr. Evarts [To the witness]—Well, we will take the best of your recollection when this Revolution newspaper existed and was published. A. I can't say when it was founded, Sir.

Q. Well, you can't recollect sufficiently to state when that affair—that newspaper was current? A. It was founded by Miss Susan B. Anthony and Mrs. H. B. Stanton, but in what year I don't remember; I should say, at a rough guess, somewhere about 1835, but I may be wrong about it.

Q. And when do you think it terminated? A. Well, Mr. Beach says before 1870, but I am inclined to think that it lasted longer than that.

Q. And were you, at any time, editor of that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who were editors of that paper at the time that you knew of its existence?

Mr. Fullerton—It seems to me that that is foreign to this issue.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that depends.

Mr. Fullerton—That depends on something you have not suggested yet.

Judge Neilson—I don't see the materiality of it. As, perhaps, counsel does, I think he may answer it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I think the Court ought to see the materiality of it.

Mr. Evarts—I have never heard before, if your Honor please, that the question of relevancy or materiality applied to a cross-examination, except under the restraint of the Court when it perceives manifestly either a trivial or a prolix inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—That is just the character of the inquiry I suggest.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is not so polite as it might be. As it is the first question that is asked, it could hardly be said to be within that rule.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I think it is prolix; it is not impolite to suggest that.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you will have to stand it, then, because it is prolix.

Mr. Evarts—The cross-examination may be prolix, but the topic is not, because I have just begun on it.

Mr. Beach—Well, the discussion is—

Mr. Evarts [To the witness]—Who were the editors? A. It was edited from time to time by Mrs. Anthony, Mrs. Stanton, Mr. Pillsbury and Mrs. Bullard; I don't know whether she was the last editor or not—yes, Sir; there was one other editor later, Mr. Clarke.

Q. Perhaps this may refresh your recollection as to names. [Offering a paper to witness.] A. No, Sir; my recollection don't need any refreshment about that; I know it perfectly.

Q. Well, that is dated— A. I think I have given you all the editors of the paper.

Q. That is dated June 2d, 1870.

Judge Neilson—Is that the paper?

Mr. Evarts—This is the prospectus of it.

Judge Neilson—Oh!—I was going to say it was a small revolution if that was the paper. [Laughter.]

Q. Were you the editor or assistant editor at that time on that paper? A. No, Sir.

Q. Please look at that article and say if that was written by you? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Well, do you recognize this style as yours? A. Well, Sir, I could not say at this—perhaps it was, perhaps not; there is nothing very particularly noticeable about it. I may have had something to do with the article; perhaps I did.

THE TILTON-MOULTON-TRACY INTERVIEW.

Q. You have spoken of an interview between yourself, Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tracy, alone, subsequent to an interview in which Mr. Franklin Woodruff, you remember— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you fix the time at which this interview at which you and Mr. Tracy and Mr. Moulton were together and no others—can you fix the time that that occurred? A. I fixed the time the other day, Sir; between Christmas and New Years, or else later.

Q. Do you remember what day of the week it was, or don't you know? A. No, Sir.

Q. Whether it was a week day or a Sunday? A. I do not.

Q. Do you remember whether it was in the day time or in the evening? A. It was in the evening.

Q. And do you remember how that meeting came about; how it was produced? A. I do not remember, Sir.

Q. Was it a casual meeting? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Do you know how long it lasted? A. I know it lasted so long that General Tracy went to sleep. [Laughter.]

Q. And at what hour of the night did it terminate? A. I don't remember that.

MR. MOULTON'S PRINCELY GENEROSITY.

Q. Have you any account of the money transactions between you and Mr. Moulton? A. No; other than the firm of Woodruff & Robinson show on their books.

Q. What amounts of money— A. Ah! I ought to say the books of The Golden Age.

Q. The books of The Golden Age also contain an account? A. Well, the books of The Golden Age will contain an account of moneys paid to it.

Q. Paid to it? A. Yes, Sir; at least I presume they do. I am not the owner or bookkeeper; I have not seen the books for a long while.

Q. Who has those books now? A. The present proprietors of the paper.

Q. Who are they? A. Well, they are strangers to me; they are gentlemen lately connected with The Christian Union; I think one is Mr. Wetherby, the other Mr. Johnson; I think also Mr. Clarke. I don't know the exact proprietary status of the paper.

Q. Well, they have the establishment, and you suppose the books of the old concern are with the new? A. Yes, Sir; that is my supposition.

Q. Now, can you tell us what amount you are now indebted n to Mr. Moulton? A. I don't know I am indebted to him at all, Sir; it was with Mr. Moulton's free consent that I sold The Golden Age, with all implied obligations resting upon it, which came from the moneys that he advanced, amounting to a few thousand dollars, perhaps $5,000 or $6,000.

Q. How much were you at any time indebted to Mr. Moulton? A. I should think, perhaps, in one view of the case, I was indebted to him five thousand dollars, or six thousand dollars.

Q. At what date had your debt come to that amount? A. I should think about the time I sold the paper.

Q. When was that? A. The first of June, 1874.

Q. Had you at any time repaid to him any loan, or reduced in any way your debt to him? A. No, Sir; Mr. Moulton would not take anything in return; I tried to get Mr. Moulton to take my property at Llewellyn Park; he said, "No, wait;" then I tried to get him to take one-half, or one-third, or one-quarter of The Golden Age, and he said he would in due time, if there was no reimbursement in any other way; Mr. Moulton told me to be very much at my ease about it, which is just like him, for he is a princely man.

Q. At the time of this conversation with Mr. Moulton, was the amount of your debt named or spoken of between you? A. During the year, while I was writing a book—which was from September, 1873, to September, 1874—I very rarely went to the office; I stayed all the time at my house, and Mr. Moulton told me that he would see that the paper was kept going during that time, not to disturb myself about it; once or twice during that year, I spoke to him about his kindness to the paper, and told him that I was carrying an obligation which I did not know how I was going to pay. He always said to me, "Be quiet and easy in your mind, for if there is no other way of payment, I will take one-half of the paper or one-third of the paper, and reimburse myself in that way."

Q. It appears by the evidence, as I understand it, that commencing with a certain sum of $1,000 on the third of May, 1873, you received, between that date and the end of May, 1874, the sum of $5,000 or thereabouts from Mr. Moulton. How did you receive those sums of money? A. I think they were generally paid by Mr. Moulton to Mr. Ruland.

Q. Have you any mode of verifying the fact? Will the accounts of The Golden Age show? A. I don't know whether they will or not; I have not looked at the accounts; I never kept them, and I never looked three times into the books of the paper; my impression is that Mr. Ruland generally got a check, and came to me to indorse it, or something of that kind.

Q. When the first note was sent to you, and a voucher required of you, you declined to become a debtor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you then immediately received the $1,000? A. Shortly afterwards, Sir.

Q. Well, the next day, or some days afterward, did you not? A. I don't remember how soon; the circumstances were there—

Q. Now, did not you consider yourself a debtor when you did take that money? A. Yes, I did.

Q. Very well; that is enough? A. In a moral sense.

Q. And so thereafter, with all the sums that you received from Mr. Moulton, you considered yourself his debtor, did you not? A. I certainly did; I would not take money from any man without a desire to return it.

Q. What distinction, then, did you draw between willingness to be made a debtor, without a prospect of repaying, and willingness to give a voucher for the debt? A. Mr. Moulton sent to me one day a check for $1,000, desiring me by the hands of the messenger to give a note for it, or something of that kind—I do not know exactly what; I returned it, saying that I could not borrow the $1,000, for I did not see my way clear of paying it back; Mr. Moulton then came to me in person and said, "Now, I know you need the money; never mind giving any obligation about paying it back; I have trust in your good fortune and your integrity; consider yourself under no obligation." Under these circumstances I took the money and applied it to the paper. He said that he would reimburse himself in some other way if I could not pay him the money.

Q. Did he name the way in which he would reimburse himself? A. Yes, Sir. He said: "There is the Llewellyn Park property, and there is the paper;" and, said he: "I can reimburse myself at any time, so don't you be disturbed."

Q. Then you understood that he was satisfied to give you the money without any voucher or security other than your property and a belief in your integrity? A. I understood it was more—an act of friendship between Mr. Moulton and myself; not a business transaction between one man and another, but the act of the loving friend, who, out of his abundance, was willing to help me in my necessities.

Q. And who, being aware of your property and trusting in your integrity, he told you he could get the money when he needed it?

Mr. Fullerton—He did not say that.

Mr. Evarts—I think he did. I understood it so.

The Witness—No; he said he knew that if ever my fortunes came again to flood tide, I would repay him, and he said, "at all events, without that, if you should die, you have property enough to reimburse me; so take it and make yourself comfortable about it."

Q. Very well. A. It is not every man that would have done it; but Mr. Moulton was just the man to do just that.

Q. Now, when did that course of his liberality and of your acceptance of it terminate, and how? A. I don't think it ever has terminated.

Q. You mean that he has continued to advance you money up to the present time? A. No, Sir; I think he would if I needed it.

Q. What I inquire is, when the actual advance of money to you by Mr. Moulton in the course of this his liberality, and your acceptance of it came to an end, and how? A. Well, Sir, the principal need of money was to float the paper along; after I sold the paper, that necessity ended with that sale; from that time to this, Sir, I have been in a better condition.

SALE OF "THE GOLDEN AGE."

Q. On the sale of this paper what did you receive?

A. The paper was somewhat in debt—perhaps about $1,000, or a little less, I think; it was in another sense more largely in debt to Mr. Clarke, to whom I had paid a very meager salary—less than his services were worth; I always considered that I owed him $5,000 or $10,000 more than he had been paid, and I sold the paper to him on condition that he would assume all the obligations and would consider it a settlement in full as between himself and me.

Q. So that on the sale nothing passed to you of a pecuniary benefit? A. No, Sir; none at all.

Q. Can you fix definitely the time of that sale? A. June 1st, 1874; possibly July 1st—June or July; I won't say which.

Q. Now, this last payment to you, on Mr. Moulton's account, or according to Mr. Moulton's account, was on the 26th day of May, 1874. Did you or not ascertain that you were to receive any further advances from Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir; I do not remember anything of that kind; I had for a year begged Mr. Moulton to let the paper stop; he did not want it to stop; I wanted it to stop; I wanted to get out of it; he forbade it, and said "if the paper stopped the case would be injured and I owed it to all the parties to keep the paper going."

Q. This money then received by you from Mr. Moulton was in part applied to your family expenses, wasn't it? A. I made whatever use of it my needs required.

MR. MOULTON WITHOUT SECURITY FOR HIS LOANS.

Q. Have you ever given Mr. Moulton security for any of these advances upon your pictures, or any of them? A. Never, Sir, at all.

Q. Have you ever sent any of them, except this one—the portrait of Mr. Beecher—to him or to his house? A. Oh, at various times in early years I used to give him an engraving.

Q. I am not speaking of gifts? A. Oh, I have never since that; no, Sir.

Q. In no other sense? A. I gave him my own portrait; Mr. Paige painted Mr. Beecher and myself.

Q. That was a gift, a present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember a painting of the Saviour that was produced by Mr. Paige for you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that retained at your house, or was it sent to Mr. Moulton's? A. About two or three years ago Mr. Moulton borrowed it for awhile, and it hung a week or two on his wall while he had some guests there, and then it was brought back again to my house.

MM. TILTON PREPARES FOR AN EXPECTED MOB.

Q. Where is it now? A. It is now in the house of Mr. Franklin Woodruff; I was told that I was going to be mobbed by the same congregation that mobbed Mr. Moulton, and I took the picture out of the house and sent it to his for safe-keeping.

THE PROPOSED HELP OF ANOTHER FRIEND.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton communicate to you, Mr. Tilton, the fact that some friend had proposed to make an advance of $5,000 in aid of your necessities, or those of your new paper? A. No, Sir; I never heard of any such proposition.

Q. You never heard of that? Then, before this $1,000 was sent to you by Mr. Moulton, do you mean to say that you had not been made aware that some friend or well-wisher of yours had proposed to Mr. Moulton a loan of something like $5,000? A. No, Sir; Mr. Moulton informed me that a friend of his and mine had proposed a loan of $1,000; and I objected to it.

Q. Then this transaction, which Mr. Moulton has testified to, of a proposition of a friend to make this advance, had not been communicated to you? A. I do not remember any such proposition, Sir, of $5,000; I remember Mr. Moulton speaking to me of a friend who had, through him, desired to contribute to the capital of The Golden Age $1,000.

Q. Yes; well? A. I remember that, but I do not remember any proposition of $5,000 from anybody.

Q. Did that precede this advance of the $1,000? A. I do not remember when it was made; I do not think that I was informed of it at the time; I think intelligence was brought to me of it afterwards in casual conversation.

Q. Then I understand you that the transaction which Mr. Moulton has testified to, of somebody's proposition of $3,000 or $5,000, or any sum, which he had told Mr. Beecher you could not properly accept—that that transaction never became known to you? A. I never heard any transaction in that amount, Sir; I only know the proposition of a friend to contribute $1,000 to The Golden Age; I never heard of anything else.

Q. Now, when was that? A. I do not remember the date at all.

Q. Well, who was that friend?

Mr. Fullerton—I think it is not worth while to go into that; we object.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know anything about this transaction; I want to inquire about it.

Mr. Fullerton—Your not knowing anything about it does not make it evidence.

Mr. Beach—I don't know why the counsel should know anything about it.

Judge Neilson—Probably it is the same thing that we had up before.

The Witness—Precisely the same, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that; it certainly is a different sum.

Judge Neilson—On that occasion we took some pains to exclude the names; at least, I recommended that and you acquiesced.

Mr. Evarts—The difficulty is that this witness has put this in the place of that transaction, and not as that transaction; I have endeavored to get from this witness whether that transaction, concerning which Mr. Moulton testified, had been communicated to him.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, no.

Mr. Evarts—And I understand that he rejects that, and does not believe that he ever heard of it.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! no, no.

Mr. Evarts—How do I know but this is the same transaction with the $3,000 which Mr. Moulton spoke of?

Judge Neilson—It is utterly immaterial whether it is or not.

MR. MOULTON'S TESTIMONY QUESTIONED.

Mr. Evarts—That is another view, if your Honor please, whether it be material or not. I am entitled, I assume, to show whether or not Mr. Moulton's statement of that transaction, as communicated to him, and his answer to it—if that occurrence took place. Now, if he admits the transaction in the shape that Mr. Moulton puts it, that is very well—that is the end of that; but he does not; he excludes it entirely and interposes some other transaction entirely different in its features.

Judge Neilson—He says that no $3,000 transaction was communicated to him.

Mr. Evarts—The question was only whether it was $3,000 or $5,000. However, we will not repeat the testimony; it is all written down. Now, on this cross-examination, this $1,000 may or may not stand as a substitute for this other transaction; but it is for me to find out whether it does or does not.

Judge Neilson—You have just got the information from the witness on that $1,000 transaction.

Mr. Evarts—Not definitely.

Judge Neilson—Well, add to its definiteness, and let us see what it is.

Mr. Evarts—I have Mr. Moulton's testimony concerning a large sum of money, and that he communicated the facts about it to Mr. Beecher, and communicated Mr. Tilton's dealing with the proposition to Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—The witness does not recollect that transaction at all, but he does recollect a proposition of $1,000; I may be mistaken; it may be the same transaction or it may not; in either event it is utterly immaterial; it is a suggestion not carried out—a bare suggestion—a naked suggestion—a fruitless suggestion, utterly fruitless. However, interrogate him if you attach any importance to it.

Mr. Evarts—It certainly is material whether Mr. Moulton has stated the truth about it or not.

Mr. Fullerton—The counsel on the other side is laboring under a very grave mistake in regard to the evidence in this case as it now stands. Mr. Moulton testified that there was a proposition made by a third person to contribute $1,000 to the capital of The Golden Age through him; that he communicated that proposition to Mr. Tilton, and it was rejected, and that the note was sent back—the note for $1,000 returned to the person making the proposition. Mr. Tilton has, within the last few minutes, stated to the counsel on the other side that that was the $1,000 of which he has been at present speaking; so that the two transactions are identical; there can be no doubt about that. Now there never has been any proposition to contribute $3,000 to the capital of The Golden Age by anybody; no such sum has ever entered into this testimony, except what was incorporated into a question put by the counsel on the other side during the present cross-examination, is that the proposition made by Mr. Beecher to contribute to The Golden Age is entirely different from the proposition of the other person to contribute $1,000.

Judge Neilson—Separate and apart. Go on, Mr. Evarts, we will see.

Mr. Evarts—My inquiry is, from whom this $1,000 proposition you speak of came?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, because it did not come from Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Then it is immaterial, utterly immaterial, and rule it out; there should be an end somewhere.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, is it to be held that it is immaterial for me to show that Mr. Moulton's statements in regard to the matter were not the truth?

Judge Neilson—This matter about the $1,000 is utterly immaterial; I rule out your last question; that is the extent of my ruling.

Mr. Evarts—If you Honor please, note my exception to your ruling.

Mr. Evarts—When was this proposition of the $1,000 advance made to you? A. I cannot fix the exact date; all I know about it is what Mr. Moulton told me; that is very indistinct in my recollection; I never knew anything about it of my own knowledge at all.

Q. What did Mr. Moulton tell you? A. I don't remember that very distinctly, except that the substance of it was that a friend of his and of mine had proposed through him, in a delicate way, to buy a share of The Golden Age to the amount of $1,000, and I rejected the proposition; that is the substance of it, Sir.

Q. And that was anterior to the receipt of this $1,000 that Moulton sent you? A. Well, I cannot fix the date, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S PURPOSE IN THE BACON LETTER.

Q. When you wrote the letter to Dr. Bacon, Mr. Tilton, what had occurred in reference to this scandal, so-called, that induced you to write that letter? A. There had occurred a series of measures in Plymouth Church detrimental to me; there had occurred a council growing out of these measures, wherein Plymouth Church was arraigned, and there had occurred a defense on the part of Plymouth Church to that Council, which represented me as having brought dishonor on the Christian name, whereas it was another man that had brought such dishonor.

Mr. Evarts—We will not go into that now.

The Witness—And there had occurred a public lecture by Dr. Bacon, the moderator of that Council, when he went home, after the Council was adjourned, and he said publicly in New-Haven, summing up the results of the Council, that I was a knave and a dog, and Mr. Beecher the most magnanimous of men; and there had occurred also after that a series of articles in The Independent by Dr. Bacon, five or six in number, emphasizing that idea. There had occurred also a public insult to Mrs. Tilton and me by Mr. Thomas G. Shearman, clerk of Plymouth Church. There had occurred also an apology by Mr. Shearman to me, and there had occurred a proposition on my part towards Mr. Beecher, that this mischief which Dr. Bacon had done to me should be corrected by Mr. Beecher; and there had occurred an interval of three months wherein he had taken no measure to correct it. Then I corrected it myself by writing my letter to Dr. Bacon. All these measures are set forth in the letter to Dr. Bacon, now in evidence.

Q. Now, did you regard your letter to Dr. Bacon as disclosing an imputation against the honor of your wife and your children? A. I did not, Sir; on the contrary, I took particular pains in framing my letter to Dr. Bacon to speak in complimentary phrase of my wife; and I intended that letter, while vindicating me, should also vindicate her.

Q. You did not then consider that letter as carrying any imputation upon the honor of your wife or of your family? A. I did not, Sir; on the contrary, I considered it carried her vindication and mine also, and I think, if you refer to the letter, you will see that it does.

Q. Well, that is your view of it. As I understand you, the object of writing that letter was your own vindication? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Against the imputations that had been thrown upon you in the various ways that you have suggested? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you regard Mr. Beecher as in any way responsible for this Council that had been got up against his church? A. The Council was got up with reference to actions in Plymouth Church which he might have controlled and suppressed.

Q. And which you think he did not, when he might? A. Yes, Sir; I think he did not.

Q. And in that way, then, you think he is responsible for the Council? A. Oh! I don't know how to trace responsibility for a public body, to any individual man.

Q. Do you think Mr. Beecher was responsible for any of Dr. Bacon's speeches or articles in The Independent? A. Mr. Beecher had given the occasions concerning which Dr. Bacon wrote them, and in that degree he was responsible.

Q. How do you mean the occasions? A. Mr. Beecher's affairs; Mr. Beecher's crime; Mr. Beecher's measures against me in the Church; Mr. Beecher's defense before the Council, which was to my detriment—all those together were the text of Dr. Bacon's articles.

Q. What measures against you in the Church had Mr. Beecher taken? A. Mr. Beecher, as I have just said, was arraigned before the Council—practically, morally—and his defense was a paper presented before the Committee, the essence of which was that my retirement from the Church should not fling a shadow on the Church, because I had brought dishonor on the Christian name. They had given me no letter of recommendation, they said. If you will read the documents sent by Plymouth Church to the Council you will see Mr. Beecher vindicated himself at my expense.

Q. Where is this paper of the Church, as you say, or of Mr. Beecher, that takes any such grounds as that? A. I presume it is in Mr. Shearman's tin box.

Q. Are you speaking of the action of the Council? A. No, Sir; I am speaking of the documents which Plymouth Church itself sent to the Council to be its own vindication in that body. It was an unmanly vindication, by striking me.

Q. Very well; you thought, then, that this vindication of Plymouth Church before the Council carried an imputation upon you? A. I know it did, Sir.

Q. That was your opinion at the time? A. No, Sir; Dr. Bacon took it up and quoted it in his letter, and threw it at me as straight as an arrow to a mark. Dr. Bacon said, in so many terms, that Plymouth Church accused me of bringing dishonor on the Christian name.

Q. I know what Dr. Bacon said, but I am trying to find out what Mr. Beecher said? A. Oh, then, you must ask him. [Laughter.]

Q. What was there in that situation that made Mr. Beecher responsible for any of those offenses against you that you find in Dr. Bacon's letter? A. I will tell you, Sir. Mr. Beecher came out of his church one night, as I have described in my direct examination, meeting Mr. Moulton and me against the iron rail—

Q. Well, we have had that once. A. Saying he could control his church; that they would do exactly what he wished; that he held them in his right hand, and any action which Mr. Beecher had designated for Plymouth Church to do, as necessary to this case, Mr. Shearman and the other managers would have done. Mr. Beecher was thoroughly and absolutely responsible. They would have done anything he said.

Judge Neilson—At any rate, that is the view you took? A. Yes, Sir; that is the view I took.

Judge Neilson—Those were the motives of the witness in writing it, whether he was mistaken or not.

Mr. Evarts—That was your view? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That those slurs upon you could have been prevented by Mr. Beecher, and were not? A. I know they could have been; yes, Sir.

Q. And were not? A. Yes, Sir; and were not.

Q. And that was the offense of Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir, that was not the whole offense of Mr. Beecher; it was part of it.

Q. I mean in this connection, as against you? A. If you read the Bacon letter you will see the whole volume of it set forth. It is not an offense which one phrase of a sentence can carry. It was an offense of great magnitude, many incidents in detail, stretching through four years.

Q. You mean to say that, during the whole four years, you have understood Mr. Beecher to be ready or desirous to fasten affronts upon you, and cause irritation with you? A. No, Sir; I don't think he was ever ready or desirous to do that. I think that, perhaps, his wish was to the contrary; but he was in the midst of a Church which he might have controlled, but which he had not the courage and the nerve to control. He is the unwitting author of his own exposure.

Q. Then you don't impute, or didn't impute, in your opinion any design on his part in this relation, but inability or want of courage to exercise a will that he might have exercised? A. I think in the year 1871 and 1872 it was mere lack of courage; I think that later Mr. Beecher felt that, as soon as the opportunity was safe in which he could turn upon me and strike me down, he meant to do so. That is my judgment. I submit it with deference.

Q. How early did you come to that latter conclusion?

A. I came to that conclusion after my last interview with Mr. Beecher, in Mr. Moulton's study, in which I gave him the opportunity to rectify the mischief which the Council had done, and which Dr. Bacon had done, and which the Church had done; and during the three months which followed, when he did nothing, I came to that conclusion, that Mr. Beecher was going to turn upon me, to strike me, and I then said to myself: "The time has come in which I must defend myself against him and the Church," and hence the Bacon letter.

Q. And you then resolved, did you not, that you would vindicate yourself, no matter what happened about the scandal, or your wife and family? A. No, Sir; I then resolved that I would vindicate myself, and I sought my wife's vindication in mine; and the Bacon letter includes my wife's vindication in mine, like a jewel set in a ring, with honor and praise. I never sought any vindication at the expense of Elizabeth.

MR. TILTON'S LETTERS TO THE COUNCIL.

Q. Did you write letters to the Council when it was in session? A. Yes, Sir; I wrote two.

Q. On your examination before the Committee of the Church, were you asked this question, and did you give the answer that I will read: "You knew that the effect of your letters to the Council would be to revive the scandal, did you not?" A. No, I did not; I wrote them to vindicate myself. I did not care whether they revived the scandal or not." A. I don't remember that.

Q. Were you then asked this question, and did you make the answer which I will read: "Didn't you know what the effect would be? A. I thought of vindicating myself. I had been attacked, and I wrote a defense. The scandal had to take care of itself. I was not so tender toward the scandal that I should refrain from defending myself, if it would revive it even?" A. I don't remember the phraseology.

Q. Did you make statements equivalent to those? A. I don't remember.

Q. Do you remember, when you were before this Committee, this question being asked you: "Have you the letters here?" A. No, Sir?" A. I don't remember that.

MR. TILTON'S DISTRUST OF THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Then this question being put to you: "I thought that you were to bring them?" A. All the originals from which I have quoted I will carry before Judge Reynolds, or any Judge, in the presence of General Tracy. I have great confidence in you, gentlemen, but I don't propose to produce the originals here. If you will release one of your number to go with me before any magistrate I will produce them; Mr. Moulton will, of course, be asked to produce his for examination, line by line; I do not suppose you would snatch them away, or keep them, but at the same time, I propose that if you would see the originals General Tracy should go with me." Do you remember that? A. I don't remember proposing that General Tracy should go with me; my idea is that I asked that Mr. Winslow might go; that is my recollection, still I may be wrong about it.

Q. Subsequently I think it was arranged that Mr. Winslow was to go? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But that is not my present point. Do you think you were asked that question, and that you made that answer? A. I remember not exactly the question, nor exactly the answer, but something like that. In other words, I remember telling those gentlemen, in substance, that I was there, one man, alone, without counsel, without a secretary, without a friend, and I had been warned not to take those papers down among those gentlemen, and I told them so frankly to their faces.

Q. Then you do not remember the principal fact, that you didn't have the letters there, and that you refused to bring them there, and put them before them? A. Why, Mr. Evarts I took the letters there before my examination was concluded. I was there four or five days. On one of the days I took before that Committee as large a bundle of letters as we brought into the church—yes, as large as that. [Indicating.]

Q. You receded, you mean, from this position which you took? A. Well, those gentlemen seemed to think that I had entertained an erroneous notion, that they were not unfriendly to me but friendly. Mr. Clafin, I think, said that the letters would be all safe; I don't know but Mr. Tracy said the same thing. At all events, I think Mr. Tracy asked me to recall the remark, and I said: "Very well, I will do it; I will bring you the letters."

Q. And then you brought them there in bulk? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At a subsequent meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On this appearance before the Committee of the Church or Society were you asked this question and did you make this answer: "You have brought forward the letter of your wife where she describes herself as having received new light, as having read the character of Catherine Gaunt in Griffith Gaunt. Have you read the character of Catherine Gaunt?" A. Yesterday I said no, but I have an impression that I have. A friend of mine yesterday morning said 'it is a singular result from a Terrible Temptation.' Charles Read has written a book called 'A Terrible Temptation.' I have never read that book, but, on second thought, I think I have read 'Griffith Gaunt.' My impression is that I wrote something to Elizabeth about it, and asked her to read it." Were you asked that question, and did you make that answer? A. I think something like it.

Q. Were you then asked this: "Did you think that the guilt of Catherine Gaunt was adultery?" A. I had no idea that I did." A. I think quite likely I did.

Q. On this examination were you asked this question, and did you make the answer that I shall read? "Did Mrs. Woodhull know of the antipathy of Mrs. Tilton to her?" A. Yes, Sir; you could see it in the woman's eyes; they flashed fire. The moment they saw each other their eyes flashed fire?" A. That was true, Sir, of one special occasion.

Q. Did you make this answer? A. I don't think I made it as it stands there. I think I gave a narrative of one particular occasion to which it referred. It was only true in one instance.

Q. Were you ever asked this question immediately following: "It was perfectly evident, then, when the women came together, that they were thoroughly antagonistic?" A. Oh! yes; thoroughly?" A. It was true of that occasion; yes, Sir.

Q. I ask you if you made that answer? There is no occasion that I know of. A. Well.

Q. Then, were you asked this question: "Bitterly so? A. I cannot say that Elizabeth had bitterness. She had a certain strong, moral and religious repugnance." Were you asked that question, and did you make that answer? A. I think quite likely.

Q. Were you asked this question before the Committee, and did you make this answer: "You say that you have not reported this scandal to the Woodhull women or woman, but you do not deny that you had frequently spoken harshly of Mr. Beecher to her? A. Oh! Not harshly; I have spoken critically of him, but always with a view to have her do no harm to him. I expressed my opinion about it." A. I don't remember that, Sir.

Q. Can you say that you were not asked that question, and that you didn't make that answer? A. I have said I don't remember anything about either question or answer.

THE SURREPTITIOUS PUBLICATION OF MR. TILTON'S SWORN TESTIMONY.

Q. Mr. Tilton, the proceedings of this Committee, at the time that you appeared before them and presented a statement, were secret, were they not? A. No, Sir; they were published every day in The Brooklyn Eagle.

Q. When did you publish—did you make public your sworn statement that you made before that Committee—that you presented to that Committee? A. You ask me when did I?

Q. I asked you if you did? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. When did you know of its being in a public newspaper? A. I was in New-York on the night of the day when it appeared in Brooklyn, if you remember what day that was—I think July 20 or 21. Was it July 21? I was in New York, up town, at Delmonico's, with several friends, and in the evening, I think about nine or ten o'clock, a telegram was sent up there to one of those gentlemen there, he being the editor of a newspaper, that this publication had been made. That is the first knowledge I had of it.

Q. Was it the very day that you had presented it to the Committee? A. No, Sir; it was the next day.

Q. The next day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you given a copy of it for publication? A. I had not.

Q. Was it published from the copy that you had presented to the Committee? A. It was not.

Q. How do you account for its publication? A. It was published by Mr. Augustus Maverick, who made the copy which I laid before the Committee. He made, unbeknown to me, a copy, as I am informed, during the very night when I was before the Committee, and on his own responsibility, and without my knowledge, but thinking to accomplish thereby my vindication before the public, he published that statement in The Argus of July 21.

Q. Was Mr. Maverick your friend—confidential friend? A. Mr. Maverick had been a friend of mine for many years. He was my groomsmen on the occasion of my marriage.

Q. He is the gentleman who was a witness here in your cause, was he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did your friendship remain unbroken after its publication? A. It did, Sir.

Q. He was an editor, was he not, a manager of a newspaper?

A. He is the managing editor of The Brooklyn Argus.

Q. And was at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that you knew? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Tilton, were you asked before the issue of that paper, The Argus, containing this statement, by any one connected with that newspaper, whether the copy they had was a correct copy? A. I didn't know they had any copy.

Judge Neilson—Well, answer the question.

The Witness—What is that, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Say yes or no.

Mr. Evarts—Say yes or no. Were you asked by any one connected with the newspaper, establishment of The Argus, in advance of the appearance of the paper which contained this statement of yours, whether the copy that The Argus had and was to publish was a correct copy or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you no interview of that kind in which the fact appeared that that paper had a copy and was going to publish it, and you were consulted as to whether it was correct? A. No, Sir; no such interview; no such topic; no such hint or suspicion on my part.

Q. Did you receive information that Maverick was proposing to publish it, before it was published? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you receive from Mr. Moulton that night warning that Maverick would publish it? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Do you know, Mr. Tilton, whether the copy from which Mr. Maverick made this publication bears your actual signature at the end of it? A. What is that, Sir?

Q. Do you know whether the copy from which Mr. Maverick made his publication bears your signature? A. No copy of it bore my signature, save my own original copy—save my own original draft.

Q. Then he had no copy that had your signature? A. No, Sir; he had my original draft, which he copied for the Investigating Committee, and I presume he made from that the copy which was published in The Argus—if it was his copy; I don't know that The Argus published it from his copy. I never inquired who did; I don't know who made the copy.

Q. Well, did the draft contain your signature? A. Well, that I don't remember.

Q. And did he have possession of the draft? A. He did.

A. And retain it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With your knowledge? A. The circumstances were these: My original draft was almost illegible from the numerous alterations in it. Mr. Maverick made a copy for presentation to the Committee. I asked him if he would make for me at his leisure during the week a copy for my own use—preservation—inasmuch as my original draft could not be read by anybody without much pain, and he said that he would come the next evening after the paper was out, and perhaps during two evenings make a clean copy for me to preserve. In that way he had the original in his possession for that use—to that end.

Q. At the time of the publication, had he the original? A.

No, Sir; he had brought it back the next morning to my house, with three or four pages copied, saying to me that he had been busy, and that he would come in during that evening or the next evening, and complete the copy. That was in order to make the deception more complete, the stratagem perfect.

Q. Was Mr. Moulton at your house the night before the publication? A. Mr. Moulton came around about twelve o'clock that night, I think, with Mr. John Russell Young. Mr. Young besought me to give the manuscript to The Herald.

Q. Did he come to you, or find you, at a subsequent interview later in that night—did Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir; Mr. Moulton, Mr. Young and I were all together that night.

Q. Well, now, after that interview, did Mr. Moulton come to you later that night and see you again? A. I don't remember that he did.

Q. Between one and two o'clock in the morning? A. That I don't remember.

Q. Where were you that night? A. At my own house.

MR. TILTON'S HARD BATTLE TO KEEP UPPERMOST.

Q. Since you left The Golden Age, Mr. Tilton, what have your occupations been? A. Well, Sir, mainly struggling to live in a city in which Plymouth Church has three thousand men seeking to put me down. I have been mainly dealing with this scandal since last May, fighting for life.

Q. Have you had no avocation, or employment, or income? A. I have had no settled employment; I have had an income. My hands have been very full with this case, Mr. Evarts, ever since last May.

Q. Well; now do you— A. They bid fair to be until next May.

MR. MOULTON NO CONTRIBUTOR TO THE COSTS OF THE SUIT.

Q. Do you know of Mr. Moulton contributing anything towards the expense of this suit? A. No, Sir; I do not. He has never contributed anything towards my expenses in this suit; I know that.

Q. And to your knowledge he has not contributed anything towards the expenses of this suit? A. No, Sir; not to my knowledge.

Mr. Evarts—There are three letters, if you Honor please, that we asked for this morning and which we will put in evidence, and then my cross-examination will be closed. They are of some length. Perhaps they had better be read after the adjournment. It will take no more time than now.

Judge Neilson—The gentlemen of the jury will retire. Be in your places at 2 o'clock, gentlemen.

The Court then took a recess until 2 p. m.

MORE OF MR. TILTON'S LETTERS TO HIS WIFE.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Tilton's cross-examination was continued.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, I want to fix one or two dates. Do you remember whether the death of your son Paul was the 25th of August, 1869? A. It was not, Sir; it was in the latter part of August, 1863.

Q. I mean in 1868; I beg your pardon? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was the latter part of August, 1868? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, whether you have given the day of the birth of your youngest child— A. I think it was the 21st of June, 1869, but I—

Q. I thought you had given it; I remember it has struck me. I believe it is the 20th? A. 20th or 21st; I always speak with some apprehension of dates.

Mr. Evarts—That is all, I believe.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, I will now read some letters, Sir, from Mr. Tilton to his wife.

[Reading]:

MUTUAL CONFESSIONS GIVE PEACE TO THE HUSBAND.

HUDSON RIVER R. R., 31st-ST. DEPOT.
Jan. 26, 1868. }

MY DARLING:

I am housed in the sleeping car for the beginning of my westward journey. Last Winter, I began it in the morning; this Winter, at evening. On that memorable morning last Winter, I went away dispirited, and only half a man; to-night, I am full of courage, hope, and high resolve.

You have never seemed so noble to me as during last evening and this day. You are not only all, but more than all, that any man can need or ever can deserve. Life never seemed to me to be more full of objects and ends worth living for, than since our recent long interview and mutual confessions. I am by nature so frank that the attempt to hide my feelings, to cloak my shortcomings, to deny utterance to my inward sorrows, had lately driven me almost to despair.

The secret of all my long-continued moodiness has been—dissatisfaction, not with you, but with myself. I was once well enough content to be esteemed at something better than my merit, but of late all such estimates of me have been horribly repulsive to my mind. They have revealed me to myself in the character of a hypocrite, a deceiver, a whitened sepulchre filled with a dead man's bones. Above all things it has been dreadful for me to hear praises of myself from you and Florence. I could not rest content under the idea that either of you felt that my gloom was occasioned by anything lacking in yourselves, but only in my own self.

Mattie's company to the depot was very comforting. She is without her equal in her way. She is the personification of moral uprightness. You and she were formed by nature for mates. If women could marry women, you ought to marry each other. She is a strong pillar; I lean against her and feel steadied. Just as I was coming away from the office I received a present of a bottle of wine, made by the Rev. Dr. Holland, a friend of mine. I sent the bottle by Mattie to you, that you and she together might drink it when you meet, and particularly that you might drink it to my health and happiness.

The little children seemed very lovely to me as I parted from them this afternoon. I see all your faces in my mind's eye at this moment, as you appeared at the windows with tears in your eyes. That picture I shall carry with me in all my journey. And I hear myself saying my last words over again, "Peace be unto this house."

All this day has been full of victory. It has been a better day to me than any day for a long, long time past. The first nightfall of my journey fulfills the promise that "at eventime there shall be light." I am writing these lines, using for a desk the large-printed New Testament which you gave me. Florence will know where I am, when I say that I am standing in the wash-bowl nook of the sleeping-car. My berth is "number 7, lower." I wish she were to be its joint occupant with her father to-night. I believe that Alice would like sleeping-cars, for they would make her think of dolls' houses.

I hardly realize that I am outward bound on so long a journey. In fact I am at this moment to be more in Livingston, than here. Since I have been in the car, I have been wondering if any of my fellow-passengers have left such beautiful families as mine behind them. I think sometimes that I have the sweetest family that God ever gave to a man. God grant that I may return to you all.

With unutterable * * * I am yours "now, henceforth and forever."

THEODORE.

Mr. Evarts—"Mattie" there referred to is Mrs. Bradshaw, isn't she? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—From the next letter I will omit simply some private, personal matters, with the consent of counsel:

THE MUTUAL CONFESSIONS AGAIN MENTIONED.

MONONGAHELA HOUSE,
PITTSBURG, Jan. 30, 1868. }

It is now about midnight and I ought to be snug in my bed, for I have had a hard day's and also a hard night's work. But your letter of this afternoon was so full of affection and so beautiful in the manner of its expression that I must do something for the sake of expressing my heart's feelings. I have never loved you more than now, nor have I ever had a more serene, cheerful, hopeful and patient spirit than at this very time. Our memorable interview on the evening before I left you lingers with me like a sunset in the sky; it makes all my thoughts rosy and all my feelings pure. I seem, all of a sudden, to have grown ten years younger in hope and ten years older in strength. The knowledge of your love, your confidence, your respect, your satisfaction in me, this is more than all that the rest of the world can give, and far more than I can ever deserve.

Mr. Shearman—I will read an additional passage, the concluding passage of this letter. [Reading:]

My mind of late, or rather my heart, has gone out very tenderly toward the children. I am made more proud to be loved and yearned after by them than to be the President of the United States. But, most of all, my strongest passion in this life is to be greatly loved by their mother. Oh! my sweet wife, I have a great heart when its fountains are stirred and loose, have I not?

Affectionately thine,

THEODORE.

Mr. Evarts—That is all.

Some delay here occurred in looking for another letter.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Fullerton, it is not necessary to delay the examination. We want this paper if you can find it, but if we have any occasion to ask the witness about it it will be an isolated matter, unconnected with anything else.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. TILTON.

This closed the cross-examination of Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton immediately began the re-direct examination.

MRS. TILTON'S FIRST DESERTION AGAIN DESCRIBED.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Tilton, calling your attention to the various letters that have been introduced, both on your own behalf and on behalf of the defendant, I desire to ask you this general question, whether they were received about the time of their respective dates? A. Yes, Sir; the only exception I now think of is in the case of Mr. Beecher's letter written to Mrs. Tilton after the Woodhull story. That was written a number of months afterwards, but I believe that has no date.

Q. No. On the cross-examination you were asked in regard to the absence of your wife some time in December, 1860, at her mother's. I think you stated that it was immediately upon her return from the country—where had she been? A. She had been spending the Autumn in Marietta, Ohio.

Q. Do you recollect the time of her leaving to go to Marietta?

A. I can't fix the exact date.

Q. How early in the Autumn do you think it was? A. I should think it might have been the last of September—possibly the 1st of October.

Q. With whom did she remain there? A. She remained with a friend of our family, Mrs. Putnam.

Q. And, according to your best recollection now, how soon after her return from Marietta was it that she went to her mother's house? A. Well, Sir, my recollection is—although I won't be positive about it—that she returned to my house, having been brought there by me in a carriage, and that during the day she went to her mother's house, then returned and told me that her mother insisted that she should no longer live at home with me, and that she then went, either that day, or a very few days after to her mother's house.

Q. You met her in the carriage on her return from Marietta, did you not? A. Yes, Sir, I went over to the depot.

Q. And escorted her to your house? A. I did.

Q. And how did you learn of her coming? A. Why she notified me by letter.

Q. Where did her mother then live? A. 'Round the corner from my house.

Q. Were all the children taken with her to her mother's, or, did some of them remain with you? A. I don't remember that any of the children were taken, except perhaps the baby.

Q. Now, will you tell us how old that child was called "the baby?" A. Well, I remember that the child could walk and talk a little baby talk—why the child was born in September—in June, 1869, and this was December, 1870; the child was eighteen months old.

Q. Yes, that is the child that you had a correspondence about, wasn't it, where you wrote a peremptory order for the nurse? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To bring it home? A. The little boy Ralph.

Q. How long did she remain away at her mother's at that time? A. Well, my recollection is, only two or three days; I don't know that she remained as long as that. During that interval I think she went to New-Brunswick, New-Jersey, to make a visit to my daughter Florence, who was there at school. My recollection is that during Mrs. Tilton's absence in New-Brunswick I sent for the baby, not being willing that the baby should be in the hands of Mrs. Morse.

Q. Well, beyond saying that her mother insisted upon it that she should not live there any longer—was there anything said indicating an intention upon her part to remain permanently away?

Mr. Evarts—This is an inquiry for conversations between husband and wife, which I have not gone into.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, yes; you did go into them.

The Witness—No, Sir; I don't remember any such thing as that.

Q. How long before she returned? A. She returned from New-Brunswick a few days before her sickness; her sickness was dated—her sickness occurred on the 24th of December; she returned from New-Brunswick just a few days before that.

Q. How long was she absent from your house, after leaving it, before she returned? That was my question. A. Well, Sir, only a few days; I can't say how long; I have no means of fixing the date.

MRS. TILTON'S SECOND DESERTION.

Q. Well, your attention has been called to an absence of hers from the house on the 6th of July, I think it was, 1874. Do you recollect that—when she went to Mr. Ovington's? A. The 6th of July—if that be the date at which she went before the Committee, then the circumstances are fresh in my mind.

Q. That was the date to which Mr. Evarts called your attention as the day which she left? A. My impression is that there is a little confusion in the evidence as to whether she went before the Committee on the 6th or 8th. Which date was it, the 6th or 8th?

Mr. Evarts—The eleventh she left.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well; it is a misprint then—whatever day it was in July, 1874, when she left your house. A. Oh, Sir, that was July 11, Saturday.

Q. Well, I want to call your attention to that evening, and state what occurred when she did leave? A. She left at six o'clock in the morning, or between six and seven, telling me that she was going to leave me permanently, forever. I was greatly surprised at the announcement; I had not yet risen to the—; in fact, I was waked out of my sleep in order that she might deliver that message to me. She left, saying that she was going to the Ovingtons. I rose and went down there myself; made a call; took breakfast with the family.

Q. Well, now, was she the day before at home? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the evening before? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had she expressed any determination to leave on the day or the evening before? A. Not the slightest.

Q. This took you, you say, by surprise? A. Yes, Sir; the greatest surprise I ever had in my life, except one.

Q. Well, had she spent that night in your house? A. She had.

Q. Was she dressed in the morning when she announced this to you? A. Yes, Sir; bonnet and gloves.

Q. Did you know that she had been in the act of dressing prior to her appearing before you? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Had you any intimation, directly or indirectly, up to that moment, that she intended to leave you? A. Not a shadow of it.

Q. It had not been fore-shadowed by any word or act on her part? A. Not in the slightest degree.

Q. How long was that after she had been before the Committee? A. She had been before the Committee on a night of that same week, either Monday, July 6th, or Wednesday, July 8th. I don't think that day has been definitely fixed in the evidence, and it is not definitely fixed in my mind.

Q. Did you know that she was going before that Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. When she went did you know of the existence of her

Committee at the time that she went before it? A. No, Sir; I had never heard of any Committee.

Q. It was done secretly then, and without your knowledge? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And from whom did you learn what took place before that Committee, when she was before it? A. I learned first from her own report on the night when she came back. Afterward, I learned from Gen. Tracy.

MRS. TILTON'S RELIGIOUS SENTIMENTS HER FATAL ENEMY.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, I want to ask you with reference to Mrs. Tilton, and as to the facility with which a person with whom she was well acquainted, and whom she admired, would influence her action. What was her disposition in that regard? A. She was an extremely sympathetic woman, taking the ideas of others readily—not that she lacked ideas of her own—ready to yield to advice. If I understand your question, Sir, that is the answer to it.

Q. Yes, Sir, that is it? A. Yes, Sir, that was her characteristic in an uncommon degree.

Q. Would she be the more readily influenced if her religious feeling or sentiment was appealed to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you think she would the more readily yield if she thought her action would promote the cause of religion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the view that she took of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In answer to a question put by Mr. Evarts with regard to your wife, you answered, "I think my wife loves everything good and hates everything bad, and I believe to-day she is a good woman." Now, Mr. Tilton, I want to ask you the foundation for that belief in view of this charge which has been preferred against your wife—in other words, how you reconcile that statement of yours with the fact that she is charged with adultery? A. Well, Sir, that is a sad question.

Q. Well. A. I can answer only for my own judgments of her behavior, not for other people's opinions. You must remember, Sir, that I knew Elizabeth when I was ten years old; that I became her confessed lover at sixteen; that I was married to her at twenty; and that, for fifteen years of her married life, I held her in my reverence perhaps almost to the point of making her an idol of my worship; and when she came to her downfall, it was the necessity of my own heart—I must find some excuse for her; other people might blame, but I must pardon her. I found that excuse in the fact that she had been wrapped up in her religious teacher and guide; she had surrendered her convictions to him; she followed his beck and lead trustingly; she would go after him like one blinded; I think she sinned her sin as one in a trance; I don't think she was a free agent. I think she would have done his bidding if, like the heathen priest in the Hindoo-land, he had bade her fling her child into the Ganges or cast herself under the Juggernaut. That was my excuse for Elizabeth. May I add another word, Sir?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

THE BIBLE PROPOSED IN EVIDENCE.

Mr. Tilton—Where is the Bible? [The book handed to the witness.] I will give you a better answer, Sir, than my own, if I can find it. [Searching in the book.]

Mr. Evarts—I think I must object to this, if your Honor please. The witness is apparently proceeding to read a portion of the Sacred Scriptures.

Mr. Fullerton—Well?

Mr. Evarts—It does not strike me—

Judge Neilson—Do you think that would be incongruous?

Mr. Evarts—It gives us a right to put in the whole book, if he reads a part. [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, that would bring on your own condemnation. Well, never mind, Mr. Tilton.

[The book was closed and laid away.]

THE DIFFERENCES CAUSED BY THE CLEVELAND LETTER.

Q. The next subject to which Mr. Evarts called your attention was this political difficulty between yourself and Mr. Beecher, and to the Cleveland letter. In what was your protest, as you termed it upon your cross-examination, published—the protest to that Cleveland letter. A. Published, Sir, in The Independent, immediately after the publication of the Cleveland letter.

Q. Did that lead to any alienation between you two? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. After the publication of the Cleveland letter and your protest, was your intercourse as friendly as it ever had been? A. As far as I now remember.

Q. Now, in what respect did you disagree with the sentiments expressed in the Cleveland letter, which was read here in evidence? A. Do you ask me, Sir, the grounds?

Mr. Beach—What was the point of difference?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; the point of difference between you and Mr. Beecher. A. Why, Sir, it was a very manifest one.

Q. State it, if you please? A. In order to make it plain, you must go back to the political situation in the year 1866, must you not?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Mr. Beecher and I were members of the Republican party. The Independent, of which I was then the editor, was, if I may be allowed to say so, one of the most conspicuous, and perhaps also one of the most reliable mouthpieces of the Republican party. I was bound in honor to illustrate and defend the views of that party, inasmuch as I was the custodian of one of its great journals. Mr. Beecher's Cleveland letter was an offense against the Republican party, and that offense consisted in this fact: He recommended in the Cleveland letter the restitution of the Southern States to their representation in Congress without the prefixing of any conditions to secure the liberty of the negroes, by whose aid we had conquered the Rebellion. For instance, the position of the Republican party was this: we had just ended a revolution in which the Free States had conquered the Slave States. The question was what shall be the terms proposed by the conqueror on the conquered. The Republican party said: "We will admit the Southern States on certain conditions, namely—they must blot out every ordinance of secession, they must repudiate the rebel debt, they must acquiesce in the Constitutional Amendments abolishing Slavery, and they must secure to the negro the elective franchise." The Republican party made all these conditions. The Republican party said to the Southern States: "Accept these conditions, and then you may return to Congress." Mr. Beecher, on the contrary, and the fragment of the party that he represented, said: "No; return to Congress first and then settle the conditions afterwards." The point of dispute between Mr. Beecher and myself, or rather, I may say, between Mr. Beecher and the Republican party, at that time was simply this: he wanted the Southern States to come back without conditions, and we wanted the Southern States to come back with conditions, the main and central condition being the right of the negro to his franchise.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, won't you step down and look at that, and say whether it is your protest? You can do that better than I can carry it to you. [Referring to a bound volume of The Independent.] A. [Looking at the article.] Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to read that in evidence [Reading]:

MR. BEECHER.

With profound surprise and grief, we have read Mr. Beecher's letter to the Cleveland Convention. Our friends will find it in another column. Would to God it needed no other commentary in this journal than a regretful silence! But a sense of duty constrains us to accompany its publication with a solemn protest against the public course to which it commits its author. This letter quenches our last hope that Mr. Beecher was to unite with the friends, instead of the enemies, of his country. We know and love him well. No man's motives are purer; no man more affectionately reveres his native land. But, under the spell of an unhappy blindness which has rested on his eyes for a year past, he has done more injury to the American Republic than has been done by any other citizen except Andrew Johnson. We had secretly cherished the conviction that Mr. Beecher, during his last few months of silence concerning public affairs, had been a sad and thoughtful witness of the mischievous policy of the President. We could not force our mind to believe that, in the great civil struggles of the approaching Autumn, the minister of Plymouth Church would be found on the side of Clement L. Vallandigham, the pirate Semmes, and the murderers at New-Orleans. Of course, Mr. Beecher loathes these men; of course, his letter is in a loftier and purer strain than the common tone of Copperhead politics; but the humiliating fact remains, that Mr. Beecher deliberately and officially, under his hand and seal, has entered into league and covenant with the Johnson party; a party whose only hope of victory is by a league of traitors against loyal men. This is Mr. Beecher's position! It is a solemn hour for the nation. "He that is not for us is against us." By Mr. Beecher's past record, by his inherent sympathy with universal liberty, by his ancient scorn of treachery in public men, he belongs to the loyal party from whom, like a self-dishonored leader, he has become a voluntary deserter. Mr. Beecher's public attitude at the present moment is the attitude of a man who is putting a great reputation to the ignoble use of debasing his country. If, in view of this awful fact, this journal were to lend through silence a seeming acquiescence, or even an implied palliation, we would justly be held an accomplice in the guilt. Since the case, therefore, compels us to speak, we have no other alternative than to choose the strongest possible words of condemnation. We have only to add that if any of Mr. Beecher's friends, or of our own, shall feel pain at reading this protest, let them imagine the greater pain of writing it.

Q. I understand you now that that article did not break up your friendly relations at all? A. No, Sir; not in the least. Mr. Beecher felt hurt and sore, but we met and conversed as we had done before. It did not occasion any cessation of our friendship.

Q. Were you present at any time after the writing of that protest in the Academy of Music, when Mr. Beecher addressed an audience upon the subjects embraced in his Cleveland letter? A. I have an indistinct recollection of a speech which Mr. Beecher made at the Academy of Music, at the close of which I was called out to make a reply, but the speech and the reply are filmy before my mind, and I do not bring them up readily. I do know, however, that Mr. Beecher made a very elaborate oration at the Academy of Music, in which he substantially receded from the position taken in the Cleveland letter, a position to which he was pushed by the great mass of the Republican party, and by the powerful pressure in his own church, and by, I believe, the public prayers in his behalf of Mr. Shearman, the Clerk of the church. [Laughter.]

MR. BEECHER AND MRS. TILTON LEADERS IN THE RANKS OF WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Q. Now, Sir, we come to the subject of Woman's Rights, or Woman's Suffrage, and you were asked how early you took part in movements in reference to those subjects. Your reply to that question called attention to something that occurred at Plymouth Church. Do you know what Mr. Beecher's views were on those subjects? A. Oh, Sir, Mr. Beecher's views on the subject of Woman's Suffrage were expressed. I think, earlier than almost any public man of equal rank and fame in this country. He was always a chosen leader and favorite orator of that movement, ever since the movement had any head or front.

Q. And what part did Mrs. Tilton take, if any, in regard to that matter? A. Mrs. Tilton was a very active agent in the management of that cause in the City of Brooklyn. When the great meetings were held here, at the Academy of Music, over which Mrs. Field presided, and at which Mr. Beecher spoke, Mrs. Tilton was generally the Committee of Management, sometimes the head of the Committee on Resolutions; and when the American Woman's Suffrage Society was founded, of which Mr. Beecher was the President, Mrs. Tilton was the one and only representative in the officership of that society for the whole State of New-York.

Q. When did she first avow her sentiments upon those subjects, do you know? A. Oh, Sir, many years ago; before I did. It was she who inspired me to take those views. They are correct views, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S VIEWS OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Q. Your attention was also called, Mr. Tilton, to the subject of the liberality of divorce and the looseness of marriage. I want to ask you what your views are on that subject? A. Well, Sir, that is two subjects. Looseness of marriage is one thing, and liberality of divorce is quite another.

Mr. Beach—Well, upon both-subjects.

Mr. Fullerton—Upon both subjects. Take them in order, if you please.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, the only pertinency of these inquiries was in respect to the relations of this gentleman with his wife, from this discord in their social and religious opinions. Now, as the testimony shows that was an occasion of discord, it certainly is not of the least consequence what his present opinions are on any subject of morals or ethics. The question, I say, becomes pertinent only as its creating discord of sentiment between him and his wife, which has been abundantly proved out of his own testimony.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension in regard to it. He undertook to prove what the witness's views were in regard to these subjects—I suppose for an entirely different object—and I have no doubt that these views, as he regards them, will be used for a different purpose hereafter. It certainly is competent for us to show, in reply to what they have shown, what his views really were, at the time, upon these two subjects.

Judge Neilson—In the way of correcting the impression that might have arisen on their examination.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Where is the cross-examination?

Mr. Fullerton you will find it commencing at page 463.

Mr. Evarts—This cross-examination, which seems to be the basis of the present inquiry, arises in this way:

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, at what period, if at all, did you entertain discussions in any public print of which you had control, of the new social opinions and views in regard to the regulation of the social connections of the sexes? A. Well, Sir, will you tell me a little more distinctly what you mean by the new social opinions?

Q. Well, I do not wish to give it an opprobrious name, nor do I wish to characterize it improperly; but the opinions that concern greater freedom in respect to marriage, and its dissolution, and its maintenance only during continued attraction and affection, and not permanently if those sentiments had changed?

Then he gives an answer which certainly is no basis for this inquiry; and so on. Then I give the sentiments as he published them in his newspaper—my point being, not what his opinions were, if he had secret opinions, but as to the opinions that he promulgated; and I proved them by their promulgation. There are several aspects, no doubt, in which this proof is pertinent; but it has to do with the public position that this witness took on the subject, and which I have proved by his publications. Now, my learned friend, as I understand, asks him what his real opinions were at that time. That is quite immaterial if they were different from his published opinions; and if they were the same as his published opinions, why then, of course it is immaterial.

Judge Neilson—I suppose they intend, in some degree, to qualify or illustrate.

Mr. Evarts—How would it qualify the publication of them to have it said that he now entertains different views?

Judge Neilson—I don't say it would.

Mr. Evarts—If they will show a publication that qualifies them, that would be in the line of inquiry which I pursued; that would be legitimate, no doubt.

Judge Neilson—I think there is a deeper sense, a much deeper sense, in all that testimony, if I understand your theory, that perhaps goes to the moral status of the witness.

Mr. Beach—Exactly.

Judge Neilson—His integrity.

Mr. Beach—Exactly.

Judge Neilson—A departure from what seems to be the proper state in which a man's heart ought to be; and possibly that might be the subject of inference which this may explain.

Mr. Evarts—But even then we have a right to infer from the publications of his views.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Evarts—Which I have given in evidence. Now, to show that his real opinions were different from his publication of them would not tend to reinstate, in regard to weight.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't propose to prove that his real opinions were different from his published opinions at all; that is not my object.

Judge Neilson—I will take it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Tilton, will you go on and give us your views in relation to marriage.

Mr. Beach—As they existed at that time in these publications which have been given in evidence upon the other side.

The Witness—Well, Sir, I have never since I can remember, since I came to the years of having any thoughts at all, entertained any other views on the subject of marriage and divorce than those which I will express now very briefly. First, as to marriage, I hold concerning it the one common opinion entertained throughout all Christendom—held, I believe, in all civilized society, by all good men and women—that it is the union of one man and one woman for life, for better or worse, through storm and calm—not only for life perhaps, but possibly beyond life. As to divorce, I hold the common opinion entertained not in this State, or in our Knickerbocker legislation, but that wider and more general opinion which is incorporated in the legislation of the New-England States on the one hand, and the Western States on the other. It seems to be not generally known that the State of New-York has a very singular, unique and exceptional code of divorce. This State is out of harmony with all the sisterhood of States on the subject of divorce. For instance, here, under our legislation, there is divorce for one solitary cause, and for that alone; whereas, in Connecticut, in Massachusetts, in New-Hampshire, on the one hand, and in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and in all the Western States on the other, there is divorce for a multitude of reasons. I will give an illustration. I hold, for instance, as the great body of the American people do, that if a woman's husband treats her brutally, she is entitled, if she wishes it, to a divorce. I hold that if he neglects to support her, and allows her to go into extreme poverty and privation, she is entitled, if she wishes it, to a divorce. I hold that if he is an habitual drunkard, rendering the life of his wife and children dangerous from his frantic spasms, that she is entitled, if she wishes it, to a divorce. So I might state other grounds on which a woman is entitled, if she wishes it, to a divorce. Now, Sir, those grounds are held legal and valid for divorce in almost every State of the Union except New-York. A woman who goes into a court in New-Haven and says to a judge and jury that her husband brutally treats her, will get a divorce, because the law don't interfere, the law permits a divorce; but if that same woman living, not in Connecticut but in Brooklyn, should go into Judge Reynolds's court and carry the same evidence before a judge and jury she could get no divorce, and the judge's reply would be, "Madam, however just your cause is, the law of this State peremptorily forbids divorce save for one cause." Now, I thought that the civilization of our day, the good of society, the peace of the family, the sanctity of marriage, all combined to demand that we should change our New-York code of divorce, and adopt in its place the New-England code or the Western code. Does that answer your question?

Q. Giving divorce for different causes? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is not your doctrine, then, that husband and wife should be separated at will according to their own notion of propriety, but it should be regulated by law? A. Why, certainly, Sir. My only point is that the law should not interfere in such cases as I have named. Let me give you another illustration. For instance, the law of New-Hampshire permits divorce for desertion, the time being one year; that is to say, in New-Hampshire, which is a good old New-England State, if a man runs away from his wife and stays away a year, the law gives her, if she wants it, a divorce; but, in the State of New-York, a man may run away from his wife and go to China and live 70 years, and she cannot get, however much she may desire it, a divorce. Now, I would like to ask the intelligent judgment of the world why there should be such a law in New-Hampshire giving divorce for desertion for one year, and why there should be a prohibition of divorce in New-York State for desertion for a lifetime.

Q. Then it is not your doctrine, Mr. Tilton, as I understand you, that a man has a right to desert his wife simply because he thinks he has discovered an affinity in another woman? A. No, Sir; that is the doctrine of devils and damnation.

MR. TILTON AN ENEMY OF FREE LOVE DOCTRINES.

Q. That is the doctrine of free-love, is it not? A. I didn't know that free-love had any other doctrine except the secrecy of bad behavior.

Q. Well, this doctrine of free-love—have you ever advocated it? A. I have never, Sir, and all my writings, and they are a volume, on the subject, contain repeated references, over and over again, of condemnation of free-love, long before I had any occasion to find my own heart pierced with the bitter reflection that there had been free-love in my own house, and that my family had been destroyed thereby.

Mr. Beach—There was something said in these publications which have been read, Mr. Tilton, toward the sentiment that marriage should continue no longer than there was union of soul; what do you mean by that expression?

Mr. Fullerton—Do you mean anything else than that the principle prevailing in the State, if you please, of Connecticut, should prevail everywhere, that a court of competent jurisdiction should pronounce between a couple where there was such an incompatibility of temper as that they could not live together in harmony and peace? A. That is precisely what I mean. That is precisely what is forbidden here in the State of New-York by law. The Court may be willing to grant it but the law is against it. In Connecticut the court is willing to grant it, and the law is not against it. It is all in a nutshell, Sir. I simply wish that the law of our State should be made to resemble the law of the New-England and the Western States.

Q. Well, you have never advocated any such doctrine as this, that the civil law, as you term it, should have no control over the subject of divorce? A. Not at all, Sir; not at all, Sir.

Q. Your doctrine is that the law should regulate it, and be more liberal in providing causes. A. Precisely. Marriage under the civil law is a contract, and I want the civil law to regard the contract liberally.

“FRENCH WITH A MASTER” EXPLAINED.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, a poem was read here by Mr. Everts, entitled, “A New Poem by Theodore Tilton. French with a Master.” I see in it there is a reference to orange buds in this way:

Have you in your tresses room
For some orange buds to bloom?

Why was allusion made to orange buds in that poem? A. Why, Sir, I think the meaning must be very apparent. The little poem was the story of a teacher sitting down giving a lesson to his pupil, and falling in love with her, and ending by a proposal of marriage. He asks her if she has room in her tresses for some orange blossoms. Orange blossoms are the symbol of marriage. A bride wears orange buds in her hair. To ask a lady if she will accept an orange bud is the oriental way of proffering marriage.

Q. And it was to that that you had reference in constructing this poem, wasn't it? A. Certainly.

Q. And you did not mean to convey any indelicate or immoral idea in the construction of that poem at all, did you? A. On the contrary, Sir, I endeavored to convey the purest idea.

Q. I suppose it is very apparent, but our friends upon the other side did not seem to regard it so. A. The only thing bad in the poem is the French. That line is not correctly printed. Very well, never mind.

Q. Well, it is good enough French for me.

Mr. Beach [To Mr. Fullerton]—That line suited Everts exactly.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—It should be Almer, almer, ah! c'est nînre.

Judge Neilson—That is a misprint? A. Yes, Sir; but I am afraid I am responsible for the blunder. I am not much of a Frenchman.

MR. TILTON'S OLD-TIME DISCUSSIONS OF WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Mr. Fullerton [To defendant's counsel]—Now, if you will give me The Golden Age of September 9th, 1871, the one from which you read the reply to Mr. Greeley.

Mr. Shearman produces the paper called for.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to read Article VII., contained in the reply of Mr. Tilton, his “Rejoinder to Mr. Greeley,” from which the other side read Articles V. and VI. It is as follows:

I cannot overrate my sense of the importance of Woman's Suffrage. It is an infinitely higher question than the abolition of Slavery. Anybody with a human heart could see that the slave ought to be set free. But it takes a finer discernment, a deeper penetration, to discover that woman must be enfranchised. You have proved yourself competent to the lower, but incompetent to the higher reform. It must go on without you. It loses much by losing your stout pen, but you, lose more by losing your golden opportunity to make THE TRIBUNE its banner of battle. Womanhood is a sacred thing, and yet THE TRIBUNE insults it every day. The center of the world is home, and yet you bind a chain on the freedom which should reign within it. The chief hell on earth is a marriage profaned, and yet you lock the door to all escape from it. The industrial necessity of our day is better pay for woman, and yet you deny them the ballot to procure it. The incentive to prostitution is hunger, and yet you give its victims only a tenth part of man's opportunity to save themselves from it. You are working a cruel wrong to society—undoing the beneficence of a lifetime, and now you quench all hope of your ever showing any future and growing kindness toward woman's enfranchisement. Nothing remains for its friends but to fight you as its enemy. Consider, therefore, that war is declared.

MRS. MORSE'S THREAT TO DESTROY MR. BEECHER'S PORTRAIT.

Mr. Fullerton—I now come to the portrait of Mr. Beecher, which is said to have been removed from your house. Do you remember when it was removed, Mr. Tilton? A. I cannot fix the date, Sir, but it was several years ago.

Q. Well, perhaps you can tell us the occasion for its removal? A. Oh, yes, Sir.

Q. Tell us, if you please, what it was? A. Mrs. Morse had threatened to cut it to pieces.

Q. State the circumstances under which that threat was made? A. In the Autumn of 1870—

Mr. Everts—Well, if your Honor please, we are not to have the conversation between Mrs. Morse and this witness on any act in this case.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, if it shows the reason for the removal of this portrait.

Judge Neilson—If you have the fact that its removal was caused by some threats of hers, without the threats, will not that do?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir. It is imputed to Mr. Tilton as an offense, in some way or other, that this portrait was removed from his dwelling. I don't know what use the other side intend to put it to.

Judge Neilson—You have the right to ask why it was removed.

Mr. Evarts—And the witness has already said that it was because Mrs. Morse threatened to cut it to pieces.

Mr. Fullerton—Let us see whether the threat was such a one that she was determined to carry it out.

Mr. Evarts—He has given the threat, that it was cut to pieces, and that he sent it away.

Judge Neilson—That it was sent away to preserve it. That is as much as you want.

Mr. Beach—It does not appear whether the spirit in which the threat was made was such as to cause an apprehension of its being carried out.

Judge Neilson—You can ask whether it was said in jest or in earnest.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to show that it was not through any feeling of affection that it was made.

Mr. Evarts—That will be assumed, that it was not. Besides, this is not introduced under any cross-examination of mine upon the subject.

Mr. Beach—You brought the thing in on the cross-examination of Mr. Moulton, and then you renewed it on the cross-examination of Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—I think you have a right to account for its removal, but not to put in the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—That is all I object to—the conversation; I do not object to their accounting for its removal.

Mr. Fullerton—What kind of a threat did Mrs. Morse make in regard to this portrait?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to. He has already stated that she threatened to cut it in pieces.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to ask the question that your Honor allows.

Judge Neilson—Yea.

Mr. Evarts—Will your Honor be kind enough to note my exception?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—She threatened to plunge her scissors into it.

Q. Did you believe at the time that she intended to carry her threat into execution? A. Yes, Sir, I did.

Q. What was her demeanor, her manner, at that time?

Mr. Evarts—We object.

The Court—You may say whether it was in jest or in earnest.

The Witness—Oh, Sir, it was in earnest; it was a frenzy.

Mr. Fullerton—Where was the portrait hanging at the time? A. It was not hanging.

Q. Where was it at the time? A. It was in my house; it was standing on the floor; I had taken it down from the wall shortly after July 3d. I am not permitted to state the cause.

Q. Well? A. And a very short time after that Mrs. Morse, having received the same—

Mr. Evarts—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—Mrs. Morse made this threat? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you removed it for its preservation? A. I put it in a closet first, yes, Sir; and I was afraid she would invade the house, and seek it out and cut it, so I had it sent to Mr. Moulton's.

Judge Neilson—That accounts for its removal.

THE TELL-TALE ARTICLES LEFT BY MRS. TILTON.

Mr. Fullerton—You have been asked whether your wife took anything with her when she left your house. I want to ask you this other question, Mr. Tilton, — what she left behind her when she left the house, in the shape of correspondence, do you recollect finding any correspondence left, with Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did you find it? A. I found them in a little out-of-the-way closet, under lock and key. I found a number of letters written by Mr. Beecher to her, some of them without signature; letters that have been given in evidence, together with a box of photographs of his face.

Q. What among—among what? A. Among various books that he had given her—quite a little library of books.

Mr. Evarts—I object. Now, if your Honor please, how does this become a pertinent subject of inquiry in respect to any cross-examination of mine? The whole inquiry of mine, was whether she took anything with her when she left the house, and the answer was that she took nothing but his love and good-will. Now, is that a basis for them to introduce all that was left in the house?

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Fullerton—Strictly speaking, I should have put this question upon the direct examination.

Judge Neilson—If it is a mere inadvertence or omission you can supply it now.

Mr. Fullerton—It was, Sir, an omission.

Judge Neilson—Then you can supply it now, they having the right to cross-examine on it. My experience is sufficient to know that the most able counsel will sometimes overlook a matter.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if my learned friend puts it upon that ground.

Judge Neilson—I understand it so.

Mr. Beach—A portion of the fact did not come to our knowledge until after the direct examination had been through.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will recognize the propriety of holding counsel to the strict rule, when a party is being examined.

Judge Neilson—Yea.

Mr. Fullerton—Look at the box now shown you and its contents and say where you found it. A. I found it, Sir, in the same spot in which I found Mr. Beecher's letters to Mrs. Tilton; the letters which have been given in evidence.

Q. Describe the spot more particularly. A. It was a little closet about as high as that (holding up his hands).

Q. Don't say as high as that; but say how high it was. A. A little closet about three feet high and two feet wide, in a corner of the room. It was filled with gifts which Mr. Beecher had made to Mrs. Tilton—many of them books.

Mr. Evarts—I object. That is not a description of the closet.

The Witness—And I found these pictures among those books.

Mr. Evarts—I object. When he is asked to describe a closet, he introduces gifts made by Mr. Beecher. That does not come within your Honor's ruling.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, it does; it describes the closet by describing what is in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—No; my learned friend cannot describe it in that way.

Mr. Beach—When you describe a man, you describe what is in him pretty much. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—It is very well, perhaps, to point a witticism, but it is not a description of the closet to give the contents of the closet. If you have a right to give the contents of the closet, that is one thing.

Mr. Fullerton—The objection, then, is just this—that the evidence is not responsive to my question; not that it is improper in itself.

Mr. Evarts—The objection is this—that it is evidence in chief, not given at the outset, and now not covered by this inadvertence.

Mr. Fullerton—It is covered by the ruling of your Honor, however, that, being omitted through an inadvertence, it can now be given.

Mr. Evarts—I don't understand my learned friend to say that all the evidence concerning this subject of gifts or what not, was omitted by inadvertence. Whenever my learned friend puts himself upon that—that the whole line of evidence touching gifts between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton was omitted by inadvertence, then we will have to deal with it upon that proposition. But I have not understood him to put himself upon that.

Mr. Fullerton—And the reason my friend has not understood it so, is because I have not done it.

Mr. Evarts—Exactly.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, if your Honor please, we propose to show where this box was found, and where these letters were found; I propose to show the character of the closet, what it was used for; and for the purpose of showing the intent of putting these things there, I propose to show what was there; that it was a place for keeping these gifts; that they were kept secretly, out of the way, where they did not meet the eye of any one about the house; and I submit that it is proper for me to show that.

Judge Neilson—If you say this subject did not occur to you on the direct.

Mr. Fullerton—I knew nothing of this box and its contents at all on the direct examination; it has come to my knowledge since. I knew, however, of these three or four letters which have been admitted, which were left behind by Mrs. Tilton at the time of her abandoning her home; but I did not know that they were found in this closet; and I intended to ask Mr. Tilton on the direct examination if he found these letters in the house after Mrs. Tilton left.

Mr. Evarts—That is covered by the inadvertence, and is covered by your Honor's ruling. Now, all the rest is not introduced by any examination of mine, and is not under the plea of inadvertence, and, therefore, is not a proper subject of inquiry.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Fullerton—The reason why I did not inquire as to the contents of the closet, was that I did not know of it; I was ignorant of this closet.

Judge Neilson—I think, under the circumstances, you can open the closet and let us see what is in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—We have got it open, if your Honor please, but they don't want to let us see what was in it.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, how does it affect Mr. Beecher where this lady kept the presents that he gave her. If he gave her any presents clandestinely, that is one thing; but if they were given openly, and were afterwards kept in a closet, how does that affect the character of the gifts?

Mr. Beach—A present generally keeps the character that is impressed upon it when it is given.

Mr. Fullerton—I think if we could show that this lady wore a concealed locket, given to her by Mr. Beecher, with his portrait, we should be permitted to show it.

Mr. Evarts—You would, no doubt, show it, if you could.

Mr. Beach—I don't know about that; we might have a little compassion for the lady.

Mr. Evarts—I object to the inquiry.

Judge Neilson—We will take it.

Mr. Fullerton—You found this box, with its contents, in this closet? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was this closet used for?

Mr. Evarts—I object.

The Witness—It was a little bit of a closet; I do not know that it was used for any other purpose than the preservation of these gifts.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. BEECHER PROPOSED IN EVIDENCE.

Q. Are these all likenesses of Mr. Beecher? [Handing witness photographs]. A. Yes, every one.

Q. Are they all different likenesses, taken in different attitudes? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, I offer these in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Let us look at them.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly; [counting] there are six of them.

Mr. Evarts—Are these offered in evidence?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—For what?

Mr. Fullerton—To show that they are good likenesses, in the first place, and in the second place, that they were in the possession of Mrs. Tilton. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—I do not know, if your Honor please, what there is about this evidence that is considered of any importance. These are photograph likenesses.

Judge Neilson—I think it would answer your purpose, Mr. Fullerton, if you would have him state the number of them.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—To state how many there are.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Beach]: I am willing the jury should see them.

Mr. Beach—Well, the counsel says that he is willing the jury should see them.

Mr. Evarts—I am willing the jury should see them, but I do not see what evidence they are in this case; they might have seen them at Sarony's, where they were taken—as many of them as they wished.

Mr. Fullerton—They could not have seen these at Sarony's when they were taken.

Mr. Everts—Sarony took more than one copy.

Mr. Fullerton—But he did not keep them.

Mr. Everts—You don't know about that.

Mr. Fullerton—He did not keep those that were found in the cabinet, any way.

Mr. Everts—Now, this illustrates the point of the objection. Anything you trace to Mr. Beecher in the way of presentation of photographs may have such weight as my learned friend may choose to give it, and your Honor and the jury may think it deserves; but the fact of finding half a dozen photographs of Mr. Beecher in the possession of this lady certainly does not tend to prove anything that is in issue here. We would, all of us, be very unwilling to judge from any such trivial circumstance as having a print of a public picture in the possession of a person.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, a single one might not be suspicious, but when you find seven of them then you begin to regard it with some degree of suspicion. I think the force of the inference to be drawn from this fact does not depend at all upon whether Mr. Beecher gave the pictures to this lady or not. I think there is an inference to be drawn from the fact that pictures of him were found in her possession.

Judge Neilson—Yes; but as the learned counsel says, it does not implicate Mr. Beecher. It might all be without his knowledge.

Mr. Fullerton—It is very true that it might be without his knowledge; but it tends to show to some extent the degree of regard and affection that this lady retained for him. It may enable the jury to come to a conclusion in regard to another branch of the case with some facility; in connection with the affectionate letters written by her in regard to him, I think they are very potent evidence in this case; and the fact that I want to call attention to largely, is the fact that no two of the pictures are alike.

Judge Neilson—We have the fact that they were found there, and I suggest that we may take down a description of them, with the fact whether they were all taken by the same artist.

Mr. Beach—That is enough, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—The most of them were taken by the same artist, but in different attitudes, and the inference is that they were taken at different times.

Mr. Everts—I don't know what that inference has to do with it.

Judge Neilson—That inference may account for having so many—that they are different.

Mr. Everts—Still, they might have been taken at the same time.

Mr. Fullerton—But not in the same attitude.

Mr. Everts—My learned friend exposes the defect of his offer. If we were trying Mrs. Tilton, then the possession of these pictures might be some evidence against her, because it would be, in some degree, her act. But they say that Mrs. Tilton's act in getting these pictures, not from Mr. Beecher, but from any source, and having them in her possession, is evidence against Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—No; they do not quite say that. Well, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—Look at the two letters I now show you, being "Exhibits 13" and "18," and say whether they are among those you found in the cupboard when Mrs. Tilton left?

Mr. Everts—Are these the ones already in?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, they are already in.

THE PHOTOGRAPHS ADMITTED.

Mr. Everts—I would like to know if these photographs are in evidence or not.

Judge Neilson—No; we have a description of them; they are not in evidence; they cannot print them in the case; they cannot make an exhibit of them; they are described on the notes.

Mr. Fullerton—They are in evidence, however, Sir.

Judge Neilson—That is, they have been read to the jury.

Mr. Fullerton—Shown to the jury—exhibited to the jury; they are in evidence the same as an instrument is put in evidence in a case of homicide; it does not go into the case bodily, but it is an exhibit.

Mr. Everts—I want to know, with a view of taking my exception, if these heads have been put in evidence?

Judge Neilson—I think they are not in evidence, but a description of them.

Mr. Everts—If your Honor please, note my exception to the fact of the pictures or their description being admitted in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

THE LETTERS FOUND IN THE CUPBOARD.

Mr. Fullerton—What do you say as to those two letters? A. What is your question?

Q. Look at that signature and state in whose handwriting it is? A. Mr. Beecher's handwriting.

Q. Mr. Beecher's own handwriting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "H. W. Beecher" is in his own handwriting? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is a good enough description of that one.

Mr. Everts—I don't think, if your Honor please, that there is any point to be taken between the pictures and their description—I mean as to the force of the legal objection. I would as soon have the pictures in as their description; the legal point is the same.

Judge Neilson—I don't know whether it is exactly.

Mr. Everts—It so strikes me. If they are entitled to prove, as against Mr. Beecher, anything concerning the pictures, I would as lief have the pictures as the description.

Judge Neilson—It is a mere circumstance. Let the stenographer read what has been said upon that subject.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer then read:]

Q. [Handing letter to witness.] Look at that and see whether you found that letter in the closet after your wife left? A. I did.

Q. Exhibits No. 12, 13, and 20 were found in the closet after your wife left? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I would like to learn definitely from the Court how far these are to be regarded as in evidence, because it will be necessary to show them to the jury and call attention to some facts connected with them.

Judge Neilson—In order to save the rights of your opponent, I shall regard them as in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will please note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Then they will be marked.

[The photographs of Mr. Beecher shown witness were marked respectively Exhibits 96, 97, 98, 99, 100 and 101.]

Mr. Fullerton—If the Court please, I have found another picture of Mr. Beecher, but it is a very small one.

Judge Neilson—Has that picture been framed?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, except in a paper frame.

[Marked Exhibit 102.]

SOME OF THE HUSBAND'S LETTERS EXPLAINED.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, Mr. Shearman did not read all of the letter of January 30th, 1868, dated at the Monongahela House, and I want to read the balance of it. [Reading]:

MONONGAHELA HOUSE,
Pittsburgh, Jan. 30, 1868.

My Darling: I am here in one of my old, familiar, and favorite hotels. A good welcome has always awaited me in this smoky, Presbyterian city. From the beginning, my audiences here have been large; none ever larger than to-night's, which filled every tier of the Academy of Music. I had full liberty of utterance, and spoke as well as I usually succeed in doing, when I do my best.

I crump your loving letter, which awaited my arrival, and greeted me as with a kiss, had something to do with my good spirits and my evening's success.

All the colored men in this hotel know me and are full of attentions. My face gets shaved with unusual care, my boots get blacked to an unwonted polish, and my hot-bath is arranged with noticeable nicety.

I am now well established in my new housekeeping. My plan of traveling with a trunk, instead of a mere carpet-bag, is a great addition to my comfort; in fact, it is a positive luxury. My little reticule has become quite a curiosity shop. It contains my New Testament; the North American Review; a new English tooth-brush; a long, patent-pointed lead-pencil; a little portfolio for writing in the cars; a comb and brush; a wisp-broom; a railroad map; a roll of letter-stamps and a wad of ice-cream candy.

My trunk is carefully set right once a day, but gets dreadfully topey-turvid in the baggage-man's hands. In opening it, I always find the stockings sticking among the shirt-bosoms, and the handkerchiefs scattered about among the legs of my flannel-drawers. It is lucky that I carry no bottles of wine, for they would be broken a dozen times a day, and my shirts made of the color of robin redbreast's bib.

A gentleman to-night said that the Pittsburgh papers had lately quoted your remark about your four children; and he wondered whether or no so young a looking man as I could lawfully have so many!

All this day, while riding thither in the cars from Cleveland (for I had to go all the way to Cleveland to get here in time for my lecture to-night), I spent in writing an article to The Independent, entitled "The Tongue of Fire; or Extemporaneous Preaching."

I inclose a hundred dollar bill. Perhaps it is risky to send money by the mail, in large amounts, but I must leave too early in the morning to get a draft at the bank. Use it according to your discretion in paying the debts. I hope I do not frighten you with the long list of them which I sent in my last letter. I simply made that exact statement in order to appoint you my cashier and business agent—the balance of it Mr. Shearman read. I will call your attention, Mr. Tilton, to this other letter read by Mr. Shearman, dated January 26th, 1868.

Mr. Beach—Written in lead pencil in the cars.

Mr. Fullerton—Written in lead pencil at the depot. I call your attention to this paragraph:

The secret of all my long-continued moodiness has been dissatisfaction not with you, but with myself. I was once well enough content to be esteemed at something better than my merit. But of late all such estimates of me have been horribly repulsive to my mind. They have revealed me to myself in the character of a hypocrite, a deceiver, a whitened sepulchre filled with dead man's bones. Above all things it has been dreadful for me to hear praises of myself from you and Florence, &c.

I ask you what occasioned you to write in that strain at that time?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—I will take it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The language must speak for itself.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; if there is any circumstance, though, he may state it—a circumstance causing him to write that.

Mr. Evarts—This is calling for matter that is no evidence against us. This letter, on one side or the other, was put in in regard to the disposition of these parties towards each other, my friends having taken the lead in introducing it.

Judge Neilson—But this is a letter put in by you [Mr. Evarts].

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, and we follow it.

Judge Neilson—And they call, perhaps, for some circumstance that tends to illustrate that.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Perhaps it is imaginable that there would be some answer that would be within the rule of evidence.

Judge Neilson—Simply with that view I admit this.

Mr. Evarts—But to ask a witness to explain the moods and feelings that he has expressed, it does not strike me that it is within the matter, and if it relates to anything that was in confidence between the husband and the wife, it should be excluded.

Mr. Beach—Where they give in evidence the declaration of a party, I submit that it is always proper to ask the party that is to be affected by that language, what was the sense in which he used it?

Judge Neilson—What led him to use it?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; and in this connection I will call his attention to this other letter of a similar character, where he appears to be in a melancholy mood, signing himself, "Yours in dust and ashes," &c.

Mr. Evarts—This opens a large door, if, whenever he writes a letter, it is to be shown how he came to write it.

Mr. Fullerton—It does open it. If my learned friend put in a letter written by Theodore Tilton with a view of using what he there said against him in this case, it is proper that he should explain that.

Judge Neilson—There are certain things proper in that view, undoubtedly. We will take this, and see what it is.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will please note my exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—My question is, what occasioned you to write letters of that character and description, to which I have called your attention?

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] I would get that letter of January 26th, 1868, first, separately.

THE REVOLUTION IN MR. TILTON'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness.] Speak, if you please, of the letter of Jan. 26th, 1868, to which I first called your attention? A. I have no particular recollection of that letter more than the other letters, or of that special mood more than the other and similar moods. The reading of the letters has thrown up to the surface many similar experiences, all grounded in early religious convictions, which, in later years, were passing through my mind, causing me great suffering. I can only explain it, Sir, by reference to myself, which, perhaps, may not be appropriate to give.

Mr. Beach—It is necessary you should do so, Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, I hope you will do it, Mr. Tilton.

The Witness—I was brought up from my early childhood under the dominion of the extremest school of the old Presbyterian faith. I learned it when I was a boy—a very small boy, under ten years of age. I received it from the hands of Dr. Alexander, and from my early childhood I was accustomed to take those dread and majestic views of life and of the future, the magnificence of God's greatness, the perfection of His purity, in comparison with which any human character was dwarfed and shriveled. All the early years of my life I spent very much—I was going to say—like a monk in a monastery. I was a religious ascetic. I would have cut off my right hand rather than have written a letter on the Sabbath day. I was extreme and rigid. The scenes of the other world were powerful with me. I was brought up to the conviction that all men were miserable sinners, and when I came, in later years, to abandon that view of God and of human character, still the resonance of those views have ever left their echoes in my mind; I always heard them. Walking along the street, and hearing the touch of an organ in a church, will, at this very hour, bring back to me all the reverberations of that old theology, and so my letters, many of them, written in a languid mood, or after having exhausted my physical strength, going to the hotel between ten o'clock and midnight, express those words. I cannot describe to you, Sir, the intellectual suffering that I had for two or three years, based upon that early trouble in which I was very severely grounded, and which caused me four years of struggle and laceration to get through with. It made me a moody man—at times a disagreeable man. Looking into myself, I thought myself a bad man. I humbled myself in dust and ashes; I think any man does who has a sense of God. Never mind what his later views are, the early education comes rolling up like a wave. It comes upon me now just the same as ever. I don't know whether my description is intelligible to you or not.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, in this connection—

Mr. Evarts—Does your Honor consider this evidence as within the rule?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir, precisely as it would be proper to allow a man to testify when he wrote a certain letter that he was sick, or had the gout, or had been three nights without sleep, or any other circumstance of that kind qualifying his then condition.

Mr. Evarts—The trouble is that the witness says he has no recollection concerning any particular impressions that he had. Judge Neilson—Except a general statement.

Mr. Evarts—And then he relates the experience of his early years.

Mr. Beach—No, he does not say he has no recollection of any particular impressions. He said he had no recollection of that particular letter.

Judge Neilson—I think we will let it stand.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my motion to strike it out, and your Honor's ruling, and my exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I understood you to say, Mr. Tilton, that it gave you great pain and anguish when you were undergoing this change of religious sentiment in giving up the old views for the new? A. Yes, Sir; for a period of four years there were many days and hours in which, if I should describe my inner life, I should have to borrow Cowper's figure, where he speaks of the frog creeping through the ooze of the Acheron.

Q. Are those expressions of humility and self-abasement which are found throughout this correspondence the result of this change in religious sentiment?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to. The generalization of all this kind of correspondence, and the assigning of a reason by a leading question of that kind, I think is not within the rule of a re-direct examination. I am willing the letter should be inquired about, and if there is anything in his memory that enables him to assign any fact that bears upon the letter, why that is one thing; but a good many letters have been read, and a good many forms of expression have been used, and now my learned friend asks him whether, in the course of this correspondence, those moody phrases were not the result of this religious experience.

Judge Neilson—The question ought not to be leading, otherwise I think he may ask it.

Mr. Evarts—It is opening very widely the explanation of written words by external feelings not otherwise expressed.

Mr. Fullerton—This question runs through many years, and at times we find Mr. Tilton in moods of despondency.

Judge Neilson—And you think you will account for it?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—And he seeks to account for it in this way.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; he seeks to account for it in this way. It is altogether proper he should explain it, because these expressions of humility and self-abasement will be referred to and differently accounted for unless they are explained. [To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Read the question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question, as follows:

Are these expressions of humility and self-abasement which are found throughout this correspondence the result of this change in religious sentiment?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to.

The Witness—[To Judge Neilson.] Am I to answer, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I object to it, both in substance and as leading.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is leading.

Mr. Fullerton—What is that?

Judge Neilson—He [Mr. Evarts] suggests the question is leading; it is leading.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is somewhat leading, it is true, but it is allowable under the circumstances, and considering the subject of inquiry.

Judge Neilson—I think you can easily modify the question so that it will not be objectionable.

Q. What occasioned those expressions of yours of despondency and humility found in your letters, to which attention has been called?

Mr. Evarts—That we object to.

Mr. Fullerton—That we understand.

Mr. Evarts—And we except to your Honor's ruling.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—They were occasioned by the inward struggles which I have already described.

Q. I call your attention to a letter of your wife's put in evidence by the other side, dated February 28, 1869, in which she quotes from your letter as follows—

Mr. Beach—Various expressions used in such moods, and then goes on to quote them as follows:

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading]:

Then feeling that these extreme delights would make a woman mad outright, you have six letters ending: "Yours in dust and ashes;" "Your sorrowful and groaning husband;" "Your suffering husband;" "Yours doggedly," and "Yours in agony."

A. I cannot account for them in detail. I don't know what individual letter any particular sentence there quoted may have applied to, but the general mood out of which each letter was written was that mood of self-abasement which so often came upon me in consequence of my early education, and which still clouds me at times.

Q. In this connection I will ask you what change your religious sentiments did undergo—

Mr. Evarts—What is the question?

Mr. Fullerton—The question is: I will ask you what change your religious sentiments did undergo, and as it meets another branch of the case to which I shall put a question by-and-by, I may as well dispose of it now.

Judge Neilson—I know it does.

The Witness—I hardly know in what words to state accurately the change. It was a passage from extreme Calvinistic views, not merely rigid Presbyterian views, but extreme, severe, overpowering Calvinistic views. I passed from those to a more genial view of God and of His kindly disposition towards man. I think I removed from my mind the apprehensions of future judgment, the wrath to come. I suppose the one great point, that on which my chief struggle took place, was as to what theologians call the Deity of Jesus Christ. I had been brought up to recognize Jesus of Nazareth as the Lord Jehovah, and I passed from that to the Unitarian view, which recognizes Him as the Master and Teacher of us all, still less in degree than God the Father. I had held the one view with such tenacity, and it had gone down to the depth of my conviction so far, that the displacement of it shook me to the very foundations of my life; I reeled under it; and the misery which it brought to me was all the greater because I was not able to speak about those views to Elizabeth without giving her great pain; so my mouth became closed. Perhaps I ought to say, also, in accounting for some of the letters, that I had made her a pledge some years ago when I first went on a journey that I would always write her my exact thoughts, whether they were good or bad. I made it a point of honor with me to tell her all my behavior, whether it was fretful, selfish, or peevish, or whether I thought I was conquering myself. I never hid anything from her, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton—

Mr. Evarts—I move to strike that out as not responsive to the question.

Judge Neilson—I think I will let it stand. It is a negative, and does not do you any harm.

Q. Can you give me the date of the commencement of this change in your religious views? A. I cannot fix the day or the month, but I know the circumstances out of which it grew.

Q. State them, if you please? A. I became editor of The Independent when I was quite young, and my hands were immediately filled with public questions—the Anti-Slavery movement, the prosecution of the war, the reconstruction of the Union. I used that journal, which was ostensibly a religious and theological newspaper—I used it not for any religious or theological purposes, but for those numerous questions. I occupied my mind with those; and during that occupancy—during that busy employment with public questions, I never had leisure to examine the foundations of those religious opinions in which I had been brought up from childhood. But, when slavery was abolished, and the war was over, and my occupation, in a certain sense, was gone, on finding a religious paper on my hands, I turned to examine the theology in which I had been trained from childhood, and it gradually faded away before my inquiry. Then came the struggles to which I have referred.

ORIGIN OF MR. TILTON'S LATER RELIGIOUS BELIEFS.

Q. And where were you attending divine service during this period? A. Plymouth Church.

Q. Had the doctrines taught there anything to do with this change? A. Yes, Sir; I think that the doctrines taught there were the origin of the change; I think I simply carried the change which Mr. Beecher has introduced into modern theology and thought a step or two farther than he has carried them.

Q. You believe in the existence of a God? A. Yes, Sir; very profoundly.

Q. In his omniscience and omnipresence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you believe in the divinity of Christ? A. I do, with a proper limitation as to the meaning of the word "divinity." I believe in the divinity as contradistinguished from the deity of Christ; in other words, if you will permit me to explain—

Q. Certainly. A. Perhaps you noticed that, in one of the letters which Mrs. Tilton wrote to me, she speaks of a sermon by Mr. Beecher, with a title "The Divinity of Man." Now, I hold, in a still larger, and broader, and more far-reaching sense, the divinity of Christ. At the same time, I do not rank in my thought the functions and character of Jesus Christ with the functions and character of God the Father; I did in my childhood; I have ceased so to do, and that is the principal point of change in my faith.

Q. It amounts to about this, then, I think, Mr. Tilton, you are nearer to a Unitarian than anything else? A. Yes, Sir, I am not a church member of any sect.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, it is after the time for the adjournment, and I propose to stop here.

Judge Neilson—Very well, [To the jurors]: Please be in your seats to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned till 11 o'clock on Tuesday.

TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

A NEW WITNESS FOR THE PLAINTIFF.
A FORMER SERVANT IN MR. TILTON'S FAMILY GIVES UNEXPECTED TESTIMONY—WHAT SHE SAW, AND
WHAT SHE HEARD MR. BEECHER AND MRS.
TILTON SAY—AN ATTEMPT TO INTRODUCE MR.
TILTON'S SWORN STATEMENT—LONG DISCUSSIONS
BY THE COUNSEL.

TUESDAY, Feb. 16, 1875.

The testimony elicited from Mr. Tilton to-day was fragmentary in its character, and every step in the way of the re-direct examination was contested by Mr. Evarts. Mr. Fullerton's first question was in regard to Mr. Tilton's religious belief, and in answer the witness said that he believed in the immortality of the soul.

Section VI. of Mr. Tilton's Statement, containing the sentence, "To love is praiseworthy," etc., a part of which was misquoted, was offered and objected to by the defense. The objection was overruled, and Mr. Fullerton was allowed to read the section, after which the witness testified that he did not purposely misquote Mrs. Tilton's letter, his object being to compliment his wife, not misrepresent her. The "True Story" was then turned to, and amid the frequent objections of Mr. Evarts, and the consequent discussions, the witness was allowed to testify as to his object in writing the "True Story."

The most important discussion of the day took place over a motion of the plaintiff to introduce a part of Mr. Tilton's "Statement" containing Mrs. Tilton's alleged confession. When Judge Neilson allowed Mr. Tilton to testify, he ruled out confidential communications between the witness and his wife. This excluded the "confession," and Mr. Tilton's lawyers watched closely for some way to get it in, in some shape. When the defense, in the cross-examination of the plaintiff, asked a question referring to "Mrs. Tilton's confession," the plaintiff's lawyers thought they saw a chance, and so asked what confession was referred to. The defense having in a question during the cross-examination referred to a confession, Mr. Fullerton contended that the plaintiff might find out what that confession was, and so the Judge ruled after a long debate. But this was only one point gained. The next purpose was to read Mr. Tilton's sworn statement before the Committee, which would let in Mrs. Tilton's confession. Mr. Evarts was very persistent, and brought every argument to bear out his point, but the Judge decided that Mr. Beach might continue to read.

At this point the witness, Mrs. Carey, was introduced. After her testimony had been taken, Mr. Fullerton attempted to find out what it was that Mrs. Tilton maintained when, as was brought out in the cross-examination, the witness had said: "She maintained before her mother that she had done no wrong." Mr. Evarts objected to Mr. Tilton's testifying what his wife had "maintained" to her mother. Forty minutes of hot debate followed the protest, and Messrs. Beach and Fullerton gained their point.

An unexpected episode took place to-day—the introduction of a new and hitherto unheard-of witness—a servant in the family of Mr. Tilton in 1869. In the midst of Mr. Tilton's examination, in the afternoon, Mr. Fullerton stopped and asked Judge Neilson if he might, at that point, introduce a witness whom they had summoned from New-York, supposing that they would finish the examination that day. The witness was a lady in delicate health, and it was absolutely necessary that she should return to New-York that night. Mr. Pearsall entered the court-room at this moment with a woman of middle age, who took the witness chair, Mr. Tilton slipping down and seating himself with his counsel. Being sworn, the new witness gave her name as Mrs. Catharine Carey. She was evidently suffering under severe illness, being very pale and thin. During her entire examination she held a handkerchief before her mouth, and occasionally seemed in pain. She gave her testimony in a clear voice, and is apparently an intelligent though uneducated woman. She became confused only once or twice in trying to understand some of Mr. Evarts's long and intricate questions. Mrs. Carey was the wet nurse in Mr. Tilton's family after the birth of the boy Ralph in June, 1869. She testified that she was in the house two weeks before Mrs. Tilton went to Monticello, and that during this time Mr. Beecher called four or five times. On one of these visits Mr. Beecher, the witness said, went into Mrs. Tilton's bedroom, and Mrs. Tilton closed the folding doors which divided the bedroom from the room in which the witness was. After Mrs. Tilton returned from Monticello, the witness stated that one day about dusk, while going into the dining-room to get a drink of water, she saw Mrs. Tilton sitting upon Mr. Beecher's lap with her arm upon his shoulder. She heard Mr. Beecher say, "How do you feel, Elizabeth, dear?" To which Mrs. Tilton replied, "Dear father, I feel so-so."

Mrs. Carey testified that she left the Tilton family in consequence of a "fuss" with Bessie Turner. The direct examination lasted less than 15 minutes, and Mr. Evarts then began to cross-examine the witness. He followed her career after she left the Tilton's up to the present time, she being now in Bellevue Hospital, suffering with lung disease. About Mr. Beecher, she said that she had never seen him before he came to call on Mrs. Tilton, but she had "heard tell of him." The cross-examination developed that at the time Mrs. Carey was in Mr. Tilton's house Mr. Beecher sent Mrs. Tilton baskets of flowers which stood about her bed. The arrangement of the rooms at Mr. Tilton's house were described to the best of the ability of the witness, but she did not make it very clear.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. TILTON BELIEVES IN THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

The Court met at 11 a. m. pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Theodore Tilton was recalled and his re-direct examination resumed

Mr. Fullerton—At the close of yesterday's proceedings, Mr. Tilton, we were dealing with your religious faith. I believe there is one other question I desire to ask you on that subject. Do you believe in the immortality of the soul? A. I do, Sir.

Q. And in a future accountability? A. I do, Sir.

THE CORRESPONDENCE PRINTED BY COUNSEL'S ADVICE.

Q. I pass from that then to the publication of the letters in The Chicago Tribune. You stated in your cross-examination that you had been greatly misrepresented, and that your counsel thought that justice required that those letters should be published. In what respect had you been misrepresented, and in what respect would the publication of those letters, or any part of them, do you justice?

Mr. Evarts—What is that? [To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Won't you read the question before it is answered?

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question.]

Mr. Evarts—You mean the publication of the wife's and his?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; the correspondence in The Chicago Tribune.

The Witness—Do you wish me to answer, Sir?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir. A. Well, Sir, during the early part of the Summer, when this case was began to be talked of in the newspapers, charges were brought against me in various journals to the effect that I had been for years a very brutal man in my family, that I had ill-used my wife, that I was given to drunkenness and orgies, that I was in every respect a savage, and my friend and counsel, Judge Morris, said that that popular impression was working me great injury and detriment, and after he read the correspondence which during all those many years had passed between my wife and myself, he suggested the propriety of publishing it, or extracts from it, in order to do away with that popular impression, which was certainly unjust and very injurious.

A MISQUOTATION IN THE SWORN STATEMENT ACCIDENTAL.

Q. Your attention was called to an extract from a letter, on your cross-examination, dated February 3, 1883, in which appears the extract, "To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse the gift is sin," &c. From what did you make the copy of that letter to insert in your statement—from the letter itself or from the publication in The Chicago Tribune? A. I do not think, Sir, the publication in The Chicago Tribune was made at that time. I think I made it from the letter itself.

Q. Well, it is said that a part of the quotation is left out—a part of the letter. I want to ask you whether you did it purposely or was it accidental? A. No, Sir; I was not aware that any part had been omitted until my attention was called to it. It was pure accident.

A SECTION OF THE SWORN STATEMENT ADMITTED.

Mr. Fullerton—I now offer in evidence Section VI. of that statement, in which that extract from the letter appears.

Judge Neilson—A part of that has been read, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—I object to that, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—It is on the ground that a part of that document has been read.

Mr. Everts—I have not read any part of that document.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, the gentleman has read a part of the document.

Mr. Everts—I think not. I have cross-examined the witness in regard to his former publication of this letter now produced here, which differed from that letter, and that fact and that single fact is all that I have proved. I have read no line of that statement whatever.

Judge Neilson—I think you are right—

Mr. Everts—I put that in his hands and called his attention to it, and thereupon asked him if that was a publication of the letter authorized by him. He said something, that he could not answer for the correctness of the printing. I then produced him the writing which he recognized as that of his amanuensis, and then I confined myself entirely to that letter and to the publication of that letter.

Judge Neilson—I think you are right, Mr. Everts, and still, if your examination tended to show a mispublication of the letter, I think he may explain that if he can, and this calls for that explanation, and for that end it is proper that the clause should be read.

Mr. Everts—If your Honor please, he has already explained it, and said he didn't know until it was produced here that there was a difference.

Judge Neilson—I think he may read it. It has been sufficiently referred to.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton [Reading]:

VI. That previous to the aforesaid criminal intimacy, one of the reasons which Mrs. Tilton alleged for her encouragement of such exceptional attentions from the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, was the fact that she had been much distressed with rumors against his moral purity, and wished to convince him that she could receive his kindness, and yet resist his solicitations; and that she could inspire in him, by her purity and fidelity, an increased respect for the chaste dignity of womanhood. Previous to the Autumn of 1868, she maintained with Christian firmness towards her pastor this position of resistance, always refusing his amorous pleas, which were strong and oft-repeated; and in a letter to her husband, dated February 3, 1868, she wrote as follows: "To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse the gift is sin. Here I am strong.

No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood."

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, I understand you to say that you did not purposely misquote that letter? A. No, Sir; I think that must be very evident from looking at it. The object of the quotation was the very last sentence, namely: "No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood."

Mr. Beach—As written at the date of that letter? A. Yes, Sir. The whole object of the quotation was to adduce her own testimony to her own integrity of character at that time, not to misrepresent her, but to compliment her.

MR. TILTON'S SHORT-HAND NOTES OF CONVERSATIONS.

Mr. Fullerton—Your attention has been called to the so-called "True Story," and to the fact that Mr. Moulton called on Mr. Beecher, and, after an interview with him, returned to you, and immediately gave to you an account of the interview, which you took down from his lips in phonographic notes. Did you take down the narration that Mr. Moulton gave to you of that interview? A. I did, Sir, on the spot.

Q. Have you got those phonographic notes? A. I have got all that are left of them. There seem to have been some pages lost.

Q. Where are the original notes—have you them with you? A. I saw them two or three days ago.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Morris]—Have you got them?

Mr. Morris—No.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness]—Where are they? A. They must be there, I think, in that bundle.

Q. Look at the paper which I now show you, and say whether it is a correct translation of them? [Handing witness papers.] A. I don't know about this, Sir. I can look at the notes themselves.

Mr. Morris—I don't know anything about them. I haven't them, that I am aware of.

The Witness—I saw those notes only a day or two ago.

Mr. Fullerton—I supposed they were here. In whose handwriting is that paper? A. Mr. Eddy's.

Q. Do you recollect translating the notes to him and having him write them out? A. I recollect making a copy of the notes. I don't know how this came to be made. I could not certify that this is a correct copy, but I can read the notes themselves.

Mr. Fullerton—I will see if they are here; I will pass it for a moment.

Mr. Everts—Well, when the notes are produced it will be time for us to make our objection.

MR. TILTON'S OBJECT IN SHOWING THE TRUE STORY.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Tilton, this "True Story" has been the subject of a good deal of inquiry. You have testified that you showed that "True Story" to several persons? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With what object did you show it to them?

Mr. Evarts—What is this question to show?

Mr. Fullerton—To show the "True Story."

Mr. Evarts—I don't know what we have to do with that.

Judge Neilson—It is like asking, how came you to do so—what occasion had you to do so? I think those inquiries are proper.

Mr. Evarts—People are to be judged by their actions, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Evarts—I suppose his object in showing it was that the people he showed it to might see it. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—That is one object.

Mr. Evarts—And that is a consequence or a purpose that the law imputes to the act.

Judge Neilson—There are very few acts that may not be characterized and explained—very few.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; but there are very many that the law does not allow the actor to characterize and explain.

Judge Neilson—I think this witness can tell how he came to show this paper, as you referred to it—how he came to do it—what led to it.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; but that is not exactly the point of my friend's inquiry. You might prove a fact or an act of somebody else, as asking him to see the paper, or something of that kind.

Judge Neilson—Then there would be no question.

Mr. Evarts—That might be, of course, an inducement to the act; but my learned friend's question is, What was his object in showing this paper to the people that he did show it to?

Judge Neilson—I think that comes to the same thing. It doesn't affect the paper. It leaves the principal fact standing where it stood before.

Mr. Evarts—Of course.

Judge Neilson—I think it has some bearing on the quo animo of the witness.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; and we raise the very question, whether the quo animo can be shown by the witness to distinguish the act from the character that the law imputes to the act, to wit: he showed it that it might be seen; that is all.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception.

Mr. Fullerton—Seeing it would not accomplish his object. [To the witness.] Now, Mr. Tilton, you will state your object in showing the so-called "True Story" to the persons to whom you exhibited it. A. Well, Sir, I think, in order to state that with absolute correctness, I should first state why I wrote it—my object in writing it.

Mr. Evarts—That I object to in answer to this question, and if any such question as that is put—

Mr. Fullerton—[To the Witness.] Well, answer the question I have put already.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Put both together.

The Witness—I showed it there after it was written.

Mr. Evarts—Am I to understand, if your Honor please, that the witness is confined in his answer to one question?

Judge Neilson—He is confined to one question.

Mr. Evarts—His object in showing it.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Evarts.] Apply your objection to that.

The Witness—My object in showing the paper to a select number of intelligent people was in order that I might get from them a judgment such as the great public at large would have rendered in case it had been published. I didn't know how it might affect the public, and I thought that if I gave it to one and to another, and to a dozen or fifteen or twenty intelligent persons, they generally would make up a judgment which would be to me like the judgment of a jury, or the judgment of the public.

THE EXPECTED RESULT OF PUBLISHING THE TRUE STORY.

Q. Now you may state what object you expected to accomplish if that was published, or by its publication.

Mr. Evarts—Wait a moment.

Judge Neilson—There is no objection to that; I think he may answer that.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, counsel asks him what object he expected to accomplish if it was published. Now, it never was published, and therefore there is not any act of his that needs explanation.

Judge Neilson—The limited way you called it out on cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—I will alter the question. What object did you expect to accomplish by writing that paper?

Mr. Evarts—That matter has been introduced by them on their direct examination, and the witness has stated that it was written and proposed as a form of publication, and that it was read to Mr. Beecher, and that an interview took place concerning it. In regard to that I have asked no question, and the new matter of my cross-examination is only in respect to the exhibition of this paper.

Judge Neilson—Yes, if that is so, you (Mr. Fullerton) are not at liberty to put this question.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, he has inquired in regard to the "True Story;" he has read many parts of it to the witness, and then asked him whether they were correct, and he has received his answers. Now, it is proper for us to show what object he had in writing that paper—what was the condition of things at that time which in his judgment made it necessary. I could not ask that question until the contents of "The True Story" were made known by the other side. Now, they have been made known in part, and it is certainly desirable that this jury should know what object this gentleman expected to accomplish by the preparation of such a paper as that.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer the question.

Mr. Evarts—That does not displace the fact that it was a part of their original inquiry—what the object of "The True Story" was.

Judge Neilson—The use you made of it.

Mr. Evarts—I made no use of it but to show what it was. I could not affect in the least his knowledge of what it was, nor his knowledge of the time it was prepared, concerning which he has testified and regarding which I have asked him no question whatever.

Judge Neilson—You brought the contents to his knowledge and recollection as they had not been brought before.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that. I don't know that it was in his recollection.

Judge Neilson—That it was brought to his recollection here is what I speak of.

Mr. Evarts—But that adds nothing to the author of the story that had composed it, and told why he composed it, and for what purpose, concerning which I have asked no single question, and now—

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer the question, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception to the ruling.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, proceed to state, Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, you will please refrain from expressing any opinion on this point; it is not called for at all. Retain that in your mind until you get home.

Mr. Fullerton—Go on.

The Witness—My object in the preparation of that narrative was this: Mrs. Woodhull's tale, blasting my family, had been six weeks before the public; the policy of silence which we had originally agreed to meet it with was proving every day more and more disastrous, and carrying my house down to ruin in the public estimation. I undertook the preparation of a narrative which on being published would create in the public mind an impression like this, namely: "We never believed that the Woodhull story was true because it was so extravagant, but we always believed there was some foundation for it. Now, at last, we have the 'True Story,' and it is not as bad as originally reported, and it exonerates Mrs. Tilton." My only object was to pluck up by the roots Mrs. Woodhull's poisonous tale, and to plant in its place a story less deleterious, and which would not criminate my wife.

ARGUMENT ON THE ADMISSION OF DR. STORRS'S ADVICE.

Q. What did you say to those gentlemen to whom you showed it at the time of exhibiting it?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—We will take that.

Mr. Evarts—Conversations with third persons.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; the act of showing it, you having proved that act.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception.

The Witness—Well, Sir; I said to Dr. Storrs, for instance, by whose advice I prepared it—

Mr. Evarts—What I object to, if your Honor please, is what passed between him and Dr. Storrs.

Mr. Fullerton—Go on; omitting that.

Mr. Evarts—No; I object to any narrative of what passed between him and Dr. Storrs as having been already introduced on direct examination.

Judge Neilson—Well, pass him; I think that is so.

Mr. Evarts—I have not asked a single question concerning him.

Judge Neilson—I think so; I think we will leave the interview with Dr. Storrs where you (Mr. Fullerton) left it.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, I have not left it at all yet. I want to show he took that paper to Dr. Storrs.

Judge Neilson—That paper?

Mr. Fullerton—I want to show what he said to Dr. Storrs at the time he left it. They proved he showed it to Dr. Storrs, and I have a right to prove what he said at the time of exhibiting the paper—the act. They took that proof cum onere, and they opened the door and they must take the consequence.

Judge Neilson—They proved it was exhibited to Dr. Storrs.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly.

Judge Neilson—Then you may ask the question.

Mr. Evarts—This witness had been introduced to this inquiry, and what passed between him and Dr. Storrs, so far as it was lawful. Now, this paper was shown to Dr. Storrs. I asked him for a list of the people he showed it to, and he names Dr. Storrs among them. What right does that give them to go into the further inquiry concerning an interview between him and Dr. Storrs, which interview they have introduced and followed, and concerning which I took up no inquiry.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Evarts.] This interview you referred to in your cross-examination, and had him state the fact.

Mr. Evarts—I referred to that interview! Now, we will see the fact. It is on page 427 of the pamphlet.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Evarts.] Can you recall my attention to what took place in regard to the meeting with Dr. Storrs on the direct and then on the cross? I suppose I can take your recollection for it; I don't like to trust my own.

Mr. Evarts—The difficulty is I cannot take mine, and I therefore have the text here before me, at page 427 of the pamphlet.

Judge Neilson—If the interview with Dr. Storrs is there, you ought not to go further.

Mr. Evarts—I read from the direct. The witness is now narrating a conversation with Mr. Beecher:

I told him that his suggestion of publishing a portion of that covenant had inspired me to the preparation of a document, in which the entire covenant should be included, together with other papers. I told him, furthermore, I had consulted on that subject with Rev. Dr. Storrs, of this city; that I had gone to him as a good man, a calm man, and a wise man, and had asked him what, in his judgment, the public sentiment of Brooklyn required at my hands in this business, and that Dr. Storrs had advised me to act calmly; to put together the facts and papers and documents in the shape in which they could be proved, and then submit them to him, and after I had given him the facts in that accurate shape, he would give me the best judgment that he could form. I told Mr. Beecher that, in pursuance of that suggestion, I had once or twice seen Dr. Storrs, and that on one occasion I had requested Mrs. Tilton to go with me, but she had preferred not to do so, but had written a statement or letter which I had shown to Dr. Storrs; that I had included that letter thus written by Mrs. Tilton to Dr. Storrs; that I had included it in the proposed statement which I meant for the public.

Judge Neilson—That is on the direct?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; and there I left it.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] I think you had better pass that.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, I wish you would hear me. This is what Mr. Tilton narrated to Mr. Beecher; it is not the interview between him and Dr. Storrs, except as it passed through that gentleman. Your Honor will perceive there is a very great difference between this evidence and what I now propose to give. Following that up, on the cross-examination, my learned friend on the other side put the question to Mr. Tilton: "Did you show that paper to Dr. Storrs?" He had already testified that he had told Mr. Beecher he had done so, and my learned friend on the other side proved that he had done so. I had not proved it. I could not prove it. Now, having proved that he had this conversation with Dr. Storrs, in fact, and having proved that he presented this document, the so-called "True Story," to Dr. Storrs, I propose to follow it up and avail myself of that rule which is known to all men, that the act of a man may be qualified by his words spoken at the time.

Judge Neilson—Well, Mr. Evarts, that last consideration, I think, deserves an answer; what is it?

Mr. Evarts—Very well, Sir.

Judge Neilson—First you had the narration to Mr. Beecher of an interview with Dr. Storrs; then we have, on your examination, the fact that that paper was presented to Dr. Storrs, and then we have invoked the rule that when an act takes place the conversation that forms part of the act must be given, and that is the rule he invokes.

Mr. Evarts—I have a narrative from this witness, which he is not to impugn, of his statement concerning an interview with Dr. Storrs, in which, as my learned friend now concedes, he stated that he had shown Dr. Storrs this paper, and he has given in his narrative, which he cannot impugn (although it does not bind me, it does bind him), to what occurred when he so showed it; and I, in my cross-examination, have not touched what occurred when he so showed it.

Judge Neilson—Except that he showed it.

Mr. Evarts—I, having had a draft and a copied manuscript, undertook to find out the circle of people that he showed it to, and Dr. Storrs is introduced into my inquiries, and into his answers only as one of the persons that he showed it to. He might have left it indistinct whether it was the draft or the copy; whether it was an incomplete or a completed statement that was shown to Dr. Storrs, and I have identified the paper that he has spoken of as having been shown to Dr. Storrs, and nothing else. And now, because I have identified the paper that he has spoken of as having been shown, and being attended with conversation, and have confined myself rigidly to the identification of the paper, my learned friend says that he is at liberty to give conversations that attended the exhibition of the paper; that is the proposition. I apprehend that there is no foundation for that proposition in this case, because he himself has put in evidence in a shape that binds him, and has introduced to my cross-examination this conversation, which I abstained from cross-examining him upon. Then I only identified the paper as having been shown to Dr. Storrs.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor can now see the force of the learned gentleman's observation, that he could not trust to his own memory as to what took place.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Will you permit me, Mr. Fullerton, before you go on with this examination, to read a portion of the testimony? Mr. Evarts put this question [reading]:

Q. Now, how early did you begin the writing or drafting of the original? A. I should think somewhere about the 20th of December, perhaps.

Q. How are you able to fix that date, and with what assurance? A. I fix that date by the date of a visit which I made to Dr. Storrs, to which I carried Mrs. Tilton's letter of December 16th.

Q. Yes; well, you mean that the 20th of December was the date of the visit to Dr. Storrs? A. No, Sir; I think the date of that letter, namely, December 16th.

* * * * *
Q. And you then had an interview with Dr. Storrs, had you? A. I had two or three interviews.

Q. Well, you had one, then, on the 16th of December? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And at that time you had not commenced the draft, had you? A. I don't remember whether I had commenced it, or not.

Q. You cannot say that you had any part of the draft with you when you went to Dr. Storrs? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect.

Q. Now, when next did you see Dr. Storrs? A. I don't remember the date.

Q. Be as clear as may be? A. I saw Dr. Storrs three or four times; I don't remember the dates of these interviews. One was in November, one was in the early part of December, and another was, perhaps, towards the middle or towards the close; I cannot recollect.

Q. My only point at present is to know what state this "True Story," in draft or completed copy, was when you showed it to Dr. Storrs? A. I read to Dr. Storrs the loose sheets of the substance of the whole paper; I don't remember on what day I did it.

Q. Did you read then from this physical paper that has been called the draft? A. Physical paper called the draft?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Certainly; yes, Sir.

Q. You did? A. I read to him the paper which was afterwards copied in a more cleanly way—

Mr. Evarts—Well!

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

The Witness—And which were stitched together and constitute what you call the pamphlet.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, if your Honor please—

Mr. Evarts—Wait one moment.

Mr. Fullerton—No, when it comes your turn.

Mr. Evarts—No, I will ask him (Mr. Beach) to read.

Mr. Fullerton—I will consent to that, because it will be part of my speech and not part of yours.

Mr. Beach—I will read anything the gentlemen wishes me to read [reading]:

Q. Called the completed copy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then this draft was the paper which you had when you showed Dr. Storrs any part of it; that is, when you showed anything that was in the shape of a composition called the "True Story?" A. Well, Sir, I am not sure, but think I had two interviews with Dr. Storrs, one in reference to the documents themselves, before they were joined together in a draft.

Q. That might be, but that I am not inquiring about. A. What is it you are asking me about. Mr. Evarts?

Q. I want you to fix the date of the interview with Dr. Storrs in which you had physically present the draft, or any part of the draft of the "True Story?" A. Well, Sir, I cannot fix the date.

Q. You cannot? A. No, Sir.

Q. But it was subsequent to the 16th of December? A. To the best of my recollection.

Mr. Evarts—That is exactly what I want.

Mr. Beach—The previous question had been in regard to the time.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, your Honor can plainly and distinctly see the attitude which they occupy in reference to this question. It did transpire on the direct examination that a paper was prepared called the "True Story," but its contents were unknown. It was at one time supposed to have been destroyed—the whole of it—and I so announced it. Afterwards, your Honor will bear in mind, having discovered that a few loose leaves of the draft were in existence, I stated that fact to the Court.

Mr. Evarts—Not draft.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir. On the cross-examination the learned counsel upon the other side read to the witness what purported to be a copy or the original, I don't know which, of the "True Story," and the witness was interrogated from time to time as to whether the parts thus read were correct, and whether they constituted a part of that "True Story," and your Honor recollects his answer. Then the learned counsel called for those few leaves of the original which had been preserved, and which were in our possession, and being furnished to him he read them in evidence. He didn't stop there. He went on to question the witness as to whom he had exhibited that "True Story" when it was in existence as a whole, and among others he mentioned the name of Dr. Storrs. Now, your Honor will perceive that when I left the matter upon the direct examination, the contents of the paper not having been made known, it didn't operate either one way or the other as against the cause of the plaintiff. But when the counsel makes known the contents of the paper, and the witness is to be judged by what he has written, then, if he shows that that paper has been exhibited to A, B and C, it certainly is my province to show what he said at the time of the exhibition of that paper. This question arises upon what the counsel on the other side has elicited from the witness. Why, Sir, I never heard it disputed before but that a man could prove what he said at the time of doing an act. The words qualify the act.

Judge Neilson—That will be admitted. The learned counsel on the prior discussion spoke of it as a verbal act, that is, being part of the act itself.

Mr. Fullerton—When this paper was taken by the witness to Dr. Storrs and it was read to him. That they proved; that I didn't prove.

Mr. Evarts—That you proved.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; I did not prove it. The contents of that paper were made known to Dr. Storrs by the witness, and that fact has been proved by the other side, and not by us at all. Now, when he read that paper we have a right to show what he said in regard to it. It is his words qualifying his act.

DR. STORRS'S ADVICE ADMITTED.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think I will allow the question, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—On the basis of this last statement, that they never proved the paper was shown to Dr. Storrs. The basis is suggesting this was the day, and that all I undertook by a cross-examination was to find out whether it was a completed paper or a draft, and what the date was, and that I limited my inquiry to that.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take the answer, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, go on and answer. What did you state to Dr. Storrs at the time of reading that paper to him?

Mr. Evarts—I understand your Honor confines the right of the inquiry and the answer of the witness to the spoken act that accompanied the delivery of the paper to Dr. Storrs.

Judge Neilson—In that very connection.

Mr. Evarts—In that very connection, and not to include what passed in conversation between him and Dr. Storrs?

Mr. Beach—Yes; it includes part of the conversation at the time.

Judge Neilson—As part of the act.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, there is a vast difference between a witness saying "I have brought you this story to read, Dr. Storrs"—being an accompanying verbal act, and then a conversation between him and Dr. Storrs concerning the contents of the paper, and this, that and the other.

Judge Neilson—He don't inquire as to what Dr. Storrs said.

Mr. Evarts—No, so I understood.

Mr. Fullerton—Go on and state—

Judge Neilson—What you said to Dr. Storrs in the act of presenting the paper.

Mr. Fullerton—Go on and answer my question.

Judge Neilson—Read the question; sometimes the witness don't remember the question.

Mr. Fullerton—The question is a very simple one, has been put two or three times, and is well understood.

Mr. Evarts—And the Judge's instruction to the witness was very definite also, and I understood you to countermand it.

Mr. Fullerton—The Judge has not instructed the witness. All the Judge said, that was not a part of the present question, but will be a part of the next one.

Judge Neilson—Read the question to the witness.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer [reading]: "Now, go on and answer—what did you state to Dr. Storrs at the time of reading that paper to him? A. As soon as I had read the paper there was a sudden pause—a silence."

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I object to his going any further. It does not appear that anything was said, except reading the paper, and whatever afterward occurred must have been a discussion about it.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Evarts—Note my exception if it is allowed.

The Witness—Dr. Storrs turned to me and said, "Mr. Tilton, before I speak"—

Mr. Evarts—I object to what Dr. Storrs said.

Judge Neilson—It is only taken with a view to elicit what else was said. Go on.

The Witness—Dr. Storrs turned to me and said, "Mr. Tilton, before I can consult with you on this subject or give you any advice worth anything you must answer me one question." I said, "What is it?" He then said, "I want you to tell me whether this narrative which you have read is the plain and honest truth—what is called in a court the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth." I said "I will answer that question if you will promise not to ask me any further questions on the subject." "Well," said he, "I will not catechize you against your will or wish." I then said, "It is not the whole truth, it is only a part of the truth; it is an under statement, but it is all I am willing to give to the public." "Then," he said, "I advise you not to publish it."

Mr. Evarts—Well, now, I move to strike that out, Sir, as not being any verbal act of the witness accompanying the reading of the paper.

Judge Neilson—I think I will allow it and note your exception.

Mr. Evarts—Note my exception.

Q. Do you now recollect any other person to whom you showed the True Story than those you named in your cross-examination? A. Well, Sir, I don't recall at this moment the persons named in my cross-examination.

Q. Well, there was Mr. De Witt, and Mr. Clarke, Mr. Dunkley, Mr. Bell, Mr. Tracy, Mr. Woodruff, Mr. Harman? A. I don't think at this moment of any others. There were others though. I showed it to quite a large circle of persons—perhaps twenty or twenty-five—with a view of getting from them a judgment such as I supposed the public would render if it were published—

Mr. Evarts—I suppose that is not admissible, if your Honor please.

Mr. Beach—That has been already admitted, and under your objection. I don't see why the objection should be renewed.

Mr. Evarts—I should be permitted to repeat it. It is either admissible or not admissible.

Mr. Beach—Well, it was admitted under your objection.

The Witness—You remember, Mr. Fullerton, that I showed it to Mr. Beecher and he replied that it would kill him.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I ask to have that struck out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, because we have it before.

Mr. Evarts—And because it was not responsive to any question.

Mr. Fullerton—It was responsive to a question.

Judge Neilson—Well, you have it on the minutes before.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I ask to have it struck out now as illegal.

Judge Neilson—Yes; it need not be repeated; it is on the minutes already.

Mr. Evarts—I object to this here as an improper statement.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not an improper statement, because in reading the names of the persons to whom he read this paper, I omitted Mr. Beecher, and he reminded me of it, and it was proper for him to do so.

Mr. Beach—Then the answer was proper, or else it would appear that the witness had omitted in his enumeration of the witnesses Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is proper to mention Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—Well, does this stand or not?

Judge Neilson—It stands so far as in answer to the question—it stands so far as to show that he mentioned those names; that is all.

Mr. Evarts—The rest is struck out?

Judge Neilson—Yes, it is struck out, because it was mentioned before.

Mr. Evarts—It is struck out.

OBJECT OF MR. TILTON'S INTERVIEW WITH MR. HALLIDAY.

Mr. Fullerton—It is struck out of this place, but it is in another one. [To the witness.] You were asked in reference to the conversation that you had with the Rev. Mr. Halliday, and you were asked whether you did not state to him that you called to see him, at the request of Mr. Moulton, to speak to him concerning the Woodhull scandal. Do you recollect that conversation with Mr. Halliday? A. I recollect the substance of it.

Q. What was the substance of it? A. The substance of it on my part was the denial of the Woodhull story and the vindication of Mrs. Tilton, but I dropped some words in reference to Mr. Beecher which troubled Mr. Halliday somewhat. I don't know what they were; cannot recollect them very distinctly.

Q. Do you recollect a letter in evidence in which Mr. Beecher says that your interview with Mr. Halliday was disturbing? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long prior, if prior, to the date of that letter was this conversation? A. My impression is that the conversation immediately preceded the letter; the letter grew out of the conversation. Mr. Halliday went to Mr. Beecher, and Mr. Beecher went to Mr. Moulton, and Mr. Moulton came scolding me.

Q. And what was your object in having that conversation with Mr. Halliday?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—We will take it, Sir.

The Witness—Am I at—

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note my exception.

The Witness—The object was this, Sir: It was to blot out from his mind, as the second officer of Plymouth Church, the idea that there could be any possible truth in Mrs. Woodhull's story against my wife. I said to Mr. Halliday what I said in substance to other parties. I denied it.

Mr. Evarts—That I object to, if your Honor please, and ask to have it struck out—"I said to Mr. Halliday what I said in substance to other persons." The inquiry is concerning what he said to Mr. Halliday and does not admit of generalization or what he said to other persons.

Judge Neilson—I think the question did not call for it. Strike it out.

MRS. TILTON'S CONFESSION AS STATED BY MR. TILTON OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, it is quite immaterial. [To the witness.] On your cross-examination this occurred, Mr. Tilton. [Reading]:

Q. Upon the occasion of your attendance and hearing and answering questions before the Committee of the Church, please say if this occurred: Did you, upon being asked this question, "You say, Mr. Tilton, for a year after what you stated as Mrs. Tilton's confession she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow?"—In answer to that did you say, "Yes; Elizabeth was in a sort of vaporous-like cloud; she was between light and dark; she could not see that it was wrong. She maintained to her mother in my presence that she had not done wrong. She cannot bear to do wrong; a sense of having done wrong is enough to crush her; she naturally seeks for her own peace a conscientious verdict; she never would have had these relations if she had supposed at the time that they were wrong; Elizabeth never does anything that at the time seems wrong; for such a large moral nature there is a lack of a certain balance and equipoise; she has not a will that guides and restrains, but Elizabeth never does at any time that which does not have the stamp of her conscience at the time upon it"—did you say that in answer to the question that has been read to you? A. I said something like that; I don't know how accurately it is reported.

Now, I want to ask you this question: What confession was it that you referred to giving that answer?

Mr. Evarts—Confession?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, wait a moment.

Mr. Fullerton—You can have the paper.

Mr. Evarts—Now, you ask what that confession was?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, which was the subject of conversation there.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, the question arises in this way: I asked the witness whether he, in answer to a certain question, made a certain answer—it being my right to inquire concerning what he had said at other times, and the whole point of the inquiry being whether he had or had not said so and so. That question, as in the examination before the Church Committee, is this: "You say, Mr. Tilton"—calling his attention to something he had said—"You say, Mr. Tilton, for a year after what you state as Mrs. Tilton's confession, she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow;" and then he goes on and makes the long answer. Now, under cover of that inquiry, which elicits from him the fact that in answer to that question he had made this answer, my learned friend asks him what that confession was, being a direct offer to prove a confidential communication between his wife and himself.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Let me hear you on that.

Mr. Evarts—Merely because I have asked a question whether on being asked a certain question he made a certain answer. He could have said yes or no, and that would have been the end of it.

ARGUMENT OF MR. FULLERTON.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it would seem extraordinary, Sir, if they can talk about confessions, and ask questions in regard to confessions, and after getting answers that suit them, that I cannot go on and pursue the same line of inquiries.

Judge Neilson—No; the Church Committee asked him questions and his answer is recorded here, and then the learned counsel interrogates him to see whether that question was put and that answer made, and he does so remember, and beyond that the confession is referred to.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, it is precisely the same as if he put the question to the witness whether he had not stated such a thing the day before, or the same day that he was examined and received that answer.

Judge Neilson—Yes, the form is not material, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly. Now, he has asked him a question about a certain confession. I want to know what confession he alludes to—what was embodied in it. It is certainly very plain that I have a right to pursue this upon the re-direct examination to know what he meant by what he stated on the cross. They are very sensitive now about confidential communications. They were not so a short time ago when they pursued inquiries in regard to them.

Mr. Evarts—I never asked anything about a confidential communication.

[Last question read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Mr. Fullerton—I don't ask what the confession was, I ask what confession he referred to. I am pursuing the re-direct examination with reference to a subject opened upon the cross. It is not now for them to say that it is a confidential communication and that it cannot be exposed.

Judge Neilson—Isn't it the same precisely as if you in your interrogatory referred to a conversation of the day before, and asked him: "Didn't A. B. meet you and put you a question, and didn't you to him make this answer, and in that answer didn't you refer to a confession?" Then, may he not ask what the confession was, and if—

Mr. Evarts—If the inquiry is confined. Here is a question asked him, he then is asked a question concerning something that he had said—"You say, Mr. Tilton, for a year after what you stated as Mrs. Tilton's confession she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow?" Now, that is the only question that is put to him, whether—the point of the inquiry is, "for a year after what you have stated as a confession, did she or not—have you or not—did you not say that, for a year after what you state as Mrs. Tilton's confession, she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow;" and the answer is read to him, and he says substantially: "I gave that answer to that question." Now, of course it makes no difference whether it was yesterday or a month before, or anything of that kind; but the present inquiry, as I understand it, undertakes to show by this witness, as a matter of fact, a confession.

Mr. Beach—Oh! no, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if it is limited to inquire as to the date of the supposed confession to which he referred, that is another matter.

Judge Neilson—It refers to the character of the confession evidently. This question refers to the character and nature of the confession. I think we may take it.

Mr. Evarts—That is what I say he has no right to inquire about. I am only fixing the date of this witness insisting upon his wife's not having violated her marriage vows—a period of a year after an alleged statement by him.

Mr. Fullerton—It was more than the date the counsel was after.

Mr. Evarts—It was the year's occurrence of this witness, insisting that his wife had not violated her marriage vows, not withstanding his statement that she had made some confession.

Mr. Fullerton—After reading the question that was put to the witness before the Committee, and his long answer, he then put this interrogatory: "Did you say that in answer to the question that has been read to you?" and he answered that he did. Now, the counsel on the other side expects hereafter to hold Mr. Tilton responsible for what he said there in answer to that question, and he means to argue that the wife of the plaintiff had not been guilty of adultery; that she had committed no crime; that she had not violated her marriage vow. Well, Sir, in order to get at the full meaning of this question and properly to interpret the language then employed, we must know what had taken place theretofore with regard to the confession; we must learn the nature and the extent and the scope of the confession, or else how are we to understand the meaning of these words? The gentlemen certainly cannot eliminate from a long examination a single question and a single answer and hold us to sentiments therein expressed, without giving us an opportunity of laying before this jury the context to show what preceded it. Why, your Honor will perceive that this question breaks right into medias res; that something has gone before it, which we do not understand and which we cannot understand unless I am permitted to interrogate this witness. The word confession here is introduced, and it is introduced in this way—"Did you upon being asked this question"—"You say, Mr. Tilton, for a year after what you stated as Mrs. Tilton's confession, she insisted to you, etc., etc., etc." Now, Mr. Tilton is made there to have stated something in regard to the confession. I want to get what he did state in regard to that confession before that inquiry was put to him, in order that we may properly interpret this language here employed. The counsel upon the other side, if he sees fit to walk upon dangerous ground, must take the consequences of it. He did put these inquiries; he got that answer, and he means to make use of it hereafter, and there is no way for us to turn his weapon aside, except it is to put in evidence, here, all that occurred upon that subject, in order that the jury may have a clear and comprehensive understanding of the whole matter that took place there.

GENERAL DISCUSSION.

Judge Neilson—I think I must disallow the question, Mr. Fullerton. I overrule it. It may seem hard to you, but I think I will have to do it.

Mr. Fullerton—I think it is harder upon the law than it is upon me. Still, I submit.

Judge Neilson—Well, I admit it is a nice question that is worthy of consideration, but I think I should overrule it.

Mr. Beach—They accede to the question, Sir, so far as it calls for the date or the time of the confession.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is not the scope of his inquiry; it goes beyond that.

Mr. Beach—Well, it may go beyond that. You may restrict the answer, but you certainly will allow us the answer, so far as it is conceded by the defense.

Judge Neilson—Within such limits as he consents to, of course I will.

Mr. Fullerton—What does your Honor understand my question is?

Judge Neilson—I understand your question calls for the character of that confession. Your argument maintains that at any rate.

[Last question read by TARBURN Stenographer.]

Mr. Fullerton—Does your Honor rule that out?

Judge Neilson—Yes; on the assumption that it would call for the terms, contents or substance of the confession; that is its character.

Mr. Beach—We except, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Mr. Tilton, what else took place—

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Don't abandon it.

Mr. Fullerton—No; I won't abandon it. I am going at it again. [To the witness.] What else took place at the time that question and answer was put and made before that Committee?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—That is proper.

Mr. Evarts—What else took place?

Judge Neilson—Certainly. You refer to a certain occasion, before a Committee or not—call his attention to a question and answer. He has a right to state anything else that occurred on that occasion.

Mr. Evarts—On the whole occasion?

Judge Neilson—In that connection.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! If there was any qualifying question and answer to my point or inquiry, which was solely to this point—"Did you or not state that for a year after an alleged confession to you, you said that your wife did not think she had violated her marriage vow?" If there was any following question or attending question that bears on that, that is proper.

Judge Neilson—The question stands as if you had taken a part of a conversation, leaving them at liberty to call for the residue of it that is germane to the matter.

Mr. Evarts—On that point.

Judge Neilson—Yes; connected with that point.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; but my learned friend doesn't confine himself to that. Your Honor understands the point of these inquiries that are made to a witness situated as this gentleman is. It is that he has made statements with deliberation, or casually, as may be, in conversations or in more deliberate examinations, that are inconsistent with the view that he presents now presently on the stand. What he says here in court is the basis of what his actual testimony is, and the basis of the inquiries in regard to contradictory views. Now, the point is, that he has made contradictory views, and the question is wholly whether he has or has not made them. Not whether he has made, in other circumstances, on other occasions, in reference to other matters, confirmatory declarations; that he is not allowed to give, but the point also of the contradiction is not permitted to be varied, by proving which is the true and which the false. The question is not which is the true or which the false, so far as it is raised by these inquiries concerning contradictory statements. The fact of the contradictory statements is an imputation upon the integrity of the story one way or the other.

MR. TILTON'S STATEMENT OF THE CONFESSION RECEIVED.

Judge Neilson—Well, now, you having taken part of what he said on a certain occasion in the form of answer to a question, may he not interrogate as to what else took place on that occasion in reference to that subject matter?

Mr. Evarts—To that question and answer, that I agree—whatever qualifies and makes appear correctly; whatever this witness said concerning his wife's persisting that she had not violated her marriage vows, that comes in within the colloquium in which this question and answer occurred. But my learned friend has asked him what else occurred on that occasion, to wit, the occasion of his appearance before this Church Committee.

Judge Neilson—I think I will allow the question, Sir. Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—Go on, Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, the case of Rouse v. Whitehead, as I am told, in the Court of Appeals, is decisive upon this point, unless your Honor intends to confine it to a qualification of this question and answer.

Judge Neilson—It is so confined, no doubt; but yet this question might call for a more extended answer, as, for example, being asked what else took place upon that occasion, or what took place, he might answer some general matter tending to characterize the occasion or the situation.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, I am not asking him what took place before that Committee; I am asking him whether he has not stated to somebody somewhere—it makes no difference where it is—so and so. Now, it is undoubtedly fair and just that whatever be said in that colloquium on that subject, qualifying his statement there given, and a part of the statement concerning which I am inquiring, may be brought in.

Judge Neilson—This very question might reach an instance where a man, on being interrogated, makes such an answer as you drew out, and where he was then forcibly or otherwise interrupted and prevented from saying anything more; and the subsequent revelations are sufficient to show me that I cannot rule out this testimony. The general proposition is correctly put by you, but it does not relate to this.

Mr. Evarts—But, if your Honor please, is not the rule the other way—that this question might include everything that occurred during the examination, and that the question must be pointed, therefore, to what occurred in reference to this particular point of inquiry, or otherwise it is inadmissible.

Judge Neilson—Of course it must relate to this subject matter.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I object to the question as not limited in its terms to the inquiry concerning this question and answer. The case of Rouse v. Whitehead, 25th of New-York, 170, reversing 25th Barbour, 279, is to the point that the question is confined to those parts which qualify or explain the statement already proved; and this question I understand to be a general one, and therefore exceptionable.

Mr. Fullerton—No; my question is in harmony with that decision. All that I wish to know is what else was said at that time, in that examination, with regard to the subject matter embodied in the question and inquiry.

Judge Neilson—It is a natural, elementary principle of law, not needing any decision from the Court of Appeals; a business man might recognize it. Now, confine yourself within that.

Mr. Evarts—The trouble is the question is not confined. Your Honor gives directions.

Mr. Fullerton—I will put a question. [To the witness.] Mr. Tilton, having heard the question and answer embodied in the question put by Mr. Evarts upon the cross-examination, I ask you what further was said by you before that Committee with reference to the subject matter of that question and answer? A. Well, in the first place, Mr. Fullerton, it seems to be forgotten that when Mr. Evarts the other day put to me the question whether or not I had said that to the Committee—whether, or not, I had said to the Committee that Mrs. Tilton had insisted that she had not violated her marriage vow—it seems to me, with all respect, both you gentlemen have forgotten that I said the substance of my remark to the Committee was that, during that time she thought she had not violated her marriage vow; it did not appear to her that she was violating her oath—that it seemed to her as if her mind were in a maze. I made that qualification.

Mr. Fullerton—No, I had not forgotten it, at all.

Mr. Evarts—That appears in the answer.

The Witness—Yes, then as to what further transpired in the committee, the main point which does not appear in the examination as reported, was the statement of my charge against Mr. Beecher, before that committee, of criminal relationship with Mrs. Tilton; the confession of the same, made by Mrs. Tilton in July, 1870, and made by Mr. Beecher, half a year afterward to myself, to Mr. Moulton, to others. I do not know that I apprehend your inquiry.

Q. It is to be inferred from the question which, it is alleged, was put to you before the Committee, to wit: "You say, Mr. Tilton, for a year after what you stated as Mrs. Tilton's confession, she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow?" Had you stated anything before that Committee, with regard to Mrs. Tilton's confession, which led to that question, and if so, what had you stated?

Mr. Evarts—I do not object to an inquiry whether he had made a statement concerning her confession which was alluded to, but then the statement of what she had stated I object to.

Mr. Fullerton—That is to say, he does not object to the question that is put, but would object to it if it was put in another way. I do not see the propriety of the observation.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if it is limited; that is the point. I won't object to what is legal, but if you make it larger than the law allows, then I do object.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, the counsel must judge of its size by what it appears to be. I have put the question, and he knows exactly what it is. If it is objectionable, let us have the objection; and if not, let us have the answer.

Judge Neilson—Well, it amounts to a suggestion that the witness will keep within the limited interpretation of your question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, then it is not an objection to the question, but an objection to the answer that has not been given.

Judge Neilson—It is a suggestion.

Mr. Evarts—I think, if the question is read, your Honor will see that it is objectionable.

Judge Neilson—Like most questions it might be abused, no doubt.

Mr. Evarts—We will have it read, if your Honor please.

Mr. Fullerton—That is no reflection on the question.

Judge Neilson—But it justifies the counsel in making a suggestion on the subject. [Question read.]

Mr. Evarts—"And if so, what had you stated?"—that is the objectionable part.

The Witness—May I not answer that?

Mr. Fullerton—I ask him if he stated anything, and if so, what he stated?

Judge Neilson—Anything that led to that.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note my exception to the question.

The Witness—I had stated to the Committee in writing, with my oath appended, the substance of the confession made by Mrs. Tilton to me in July, 1870, and made by Mr. Beecher to me in December and January following, made to Mr. Moulton and to other persons.

DISCUSSION OVER MR. TILTON'S ANSWERS TO THE COMMITTEE.

Q. What was that confession? A. It was a confession—

Mr. Evarts—What is this? I object.

Judge Neilson—What did you state there before the Committee?

Mr. Evarts—No; I object to that, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—He may state that; that is a part of the subject matter. What did you state there in that connection?

Mr. Evarts—Concerning her confession?

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—There your Honor has directly the point. All my inquiry was, "Did you answer this question?" [giving it]—and the question has nothing to do with any inquiry about the truth or falsehood of the confession or its terms, but only whether for a year after that occurrence, whatever it was, she insisted she had not violated her marriage vow.

Judge Neilson—What did he state to the Committee on that subject, which led to that inquiry?

Mr. Evarts—Not exactly that, if your Honor please; I don't think your Honor allows that. But, whether he stated something, and if so what, which led to that inquiry. His answer to that was, "I had stated a confession." That is in the question we start with, from the Committee's transactions. It is in reference to the fact that he had said something about a confession; that is the witness's course—the witness's statement in regard to his wife's declaration, after the confession is brought in. Now, if your Honor please, the witness, under cover of a narrative conveyed to Mr. Beecher, has been allowed to state what he delivered to Mr. Beecher as being a confession, but has not been allowed to state what did occur between Mrs. Tilton and himself. Now, if your Honor please, what right has this witness to answer interrogatories in his own behalf that are simply reproductions of what he has stated elsewhere?

Judge Neilson—Simply because on the occasion respecting which you make the inquiry, and on the same subject, he may have made a further or other statement which led to that inquiry. That is all.

Mr. Evarts—But, my inquiry was, to show before the Committee whether in reference to what he has already said he has not also said so and so. And he answered that he had.

Judge Neilson—And then they ask what else he said.

Mr. Evarts—No, not exactly that, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—It seems so to me.

Mr. Evarts—Not in connection with that point, which was his statement concerning his wife's declaration that she had not violated her marriage vow. Anything in qualification of that is one thing. All that we start with is whether, after supposed confession, "which you have referred to, you have not said that for a year she denied that she had violated her marriage vow." Now, if your Honor please, when the witness answered as he did, "I did say so," does that allow the counsel to ask what he had formerly said?

Judge Neilson—No; on that occasion.

Mr. Evarts—Well, on the one occasion—what he had said concerning her violating her marriage vow.

Judge Neilson—When you inquire as to a part, they may inquire as to the rest of the statement on that subject—the subject being material.

Mr. Evarts—On the same occasion, and as a part of the same conversation.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—Now, this affair lasted several days; it must appear that they are limited in the inquiry as to what was said on that occasion when this answer was made. I understand that your Honor does not intend to hold a different rule of law from what we are insisting upon. I can see that a qualification then and there made to this Committee, explaining to them what he meant by saying that his wife insisted for a year that she had not violated her marriage vow, would be within the purview of the law.

Judge Neilson—Suppose he makes a statement on Monday evening, and, growing out of that, an interrogatory is put on Tuesday noon, all on the same subject, except as affecting the convenience of the Committee in adjourning.

Mr. Evarts—But, if your Honor will be good enough to notice, anything that qualifies this witness's statement, that his wife had insisted for a year that she had not violated her marriage vow would be apposite to my inquiry, and a qualification of his answer. But this inquiry does not touch that at all. The very inquiry concerning which I now ask your attention, assumes that he had alleged a confession to the contrary; and the only point of inquiry is "Did you or not say that for a year after the alleged confession she insisted that she had not violated her marriage vow;" and he answers, he did. Now, anything that qualifies that is admissible, but any reproduction of the confession, as then stated or not then stated, has no appositeness to my inquiry; and I ask your Honor's attention to the case of Downs vs. N. Y. C. R. R. (47 N. Y., p. 83), which holds that the declaration must be simultaneous and connected. You must never overlook that point, if your Honor please, that the inquiry is introduced to show an inconsistent statement of the witness.

SOME OF MR. TILTON'S WORDS TO THE COMMITTEE RECEIVED.

Judge Neilson—You had better call his attention to the question, as some time has elapsed since the question was put.

Mr. Fullerton—On the cross-examination Mr. Evarts called your attention to this question which it is alleged was put to you before the Committee: "You say, Mr. Tilton, that for a year after what you stated as Mrs. Tilton's confession, she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow." I ask you what took place before the Committee, at the time, with reference to any alleged confession, which led to that question?

Mr. Evarts—I object.

Mr. Fullerton—That we understand by this time.

Judge Neilson—He may answer that.

Mr. Evarts—I except to its admission.

The Witness—If I understand the question, it is, What accusation or charge had been made to the Committee which led to their asking me that question.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—Is that your question?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes. What took place before the Committee which led to the asking of that question on that occasion?

The Witness—I had laid before the Committee a sworn statement, in which I had charged Rev. Henry Ward Beecher with relations of sexual intimacy with Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, from the Fall of 1868 to the Spring of 1870.

MR. TILTON'S SWORN STATEMENT OFFERED IN EVIDENCE.

Q. Can you turn to it there? [Showing a paper.]

A. It was in the form of a sworn statement, and I have it in my hand here. These are the exact words in which the narrative was given.

Q. And this paper which you now furnish is what had been laid before the Committee prior to the examination of you? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I propose to read this.

Mr. Evarts—That we object to. Now, if your Honor please, you see the point to which this comes. They propose to prove the entire inquiry before the Committee, based on a single question which I put to the witness.

Judge Neilson—I think, Mr. Fullerton, you have gone far enough. I don't think this is proper.

Mr. Beach—It will make it clearer if this is read.

Judge Neilson—It may; but I don't think it is proper.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor sees that some member of the Committee, in their presence, referred to the confession which had been stated to have been made by Mrs. Tilton and embodied a question based upon that fact. Now, is it not proper for us to know what was before the Committee at that time with reference to that confession?

Judge Neilson—He has stated that.

Mr. Beach—But so long as it was a sworn statement, ought it not to be given before the jury, in order that they may see what it was, and how made, and in what terms. It seems to me entirely proper; because the examination of the witness before the Committee had reference to that allegation; it was an indictment, it contained a charge against Mr. Beecher. He was questioned and interrogated with reference to that charge. Now, I think the jury ought to see exactly the length, and breadth, and height, and depth of the charge as it was there put in writing, sworn to before the Committee.

Judge Neilson—Well, the question now is as to the reading of a portion of that statement.

Mr. Evarts—Now he proposes to put in evidence the whole statement. Now, it is just as if the witness on the stand at a trial has given evidence in a case on a particular point, and is examined as to whether he did or did not in answer to a question, make a certain answer, and he admits that he did, and then that being in a case in which there was a sworn bill in equity put in by him, you get up and ask to put in his bill in equity. That is precisely the situation. Everybody knows that Mr. Tilton had made an accusation against his wife, and that this Committee was considering it, and because I have asked him as to a question and answer that he made, now they say, "We can read his sworn accusation against his wife and against Mr. Beecher."

Judge Neilson—That is the question, whether when you interrogate a witness as to a question and answer contained in an examination which has been reduced to writing, the other side can in virtue of that put in that examination. That is the point.

Mr. Evarts—This is a sworn accusation. This is not a part of an examination. What have we to do with that?

M. Beach—It is a part referred to by the question.

Mr. Evarts—I don't see that it is.

Mr. Beach—Well, we propose to show it.

Mr. Fullerton—They need not have anything to do with it if they had kept their hands off of it.

Mr. Evarts—We have not had anything to do with it, nothing whatever.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes you did.

Mr. Evarts—We have pursued the right of our inquiry, to wit, a contradictory statement on a particular point, under the rules of law; and the decisions are well defined. This is no new inquiry, and it is not a subject of new consideration. Our Court of Appeals has passed upon it in strict limitation within the last few years. Now, this is precisely the point, that when a contradictory statement, at variance with the views that the witness now presents, is answered by him admitting it, then they seek to show that he has made other statements that were confirmatory of his present views, and not contradictory; and you cannot make anything more out of it than that.

Judge Neilson—We have allowed that as far as the occasion—the very occasion, as a part of the evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Now, the law has said, as I understand—and I have asked your Honor's attention to the authorities—that the occasion is the qualifying limitation, if anything occurred in the very conversation concerning the question and answer; and they seek to bring here this witness's bill of accusation or indictment against his wife.

Judge Neilson—Oh, no, not against his wife.

Mr. Evarts—That is the whole point of it.

Judge Neilson—That is not material, but it is not against his wife.

Mr. Evarts—It is in this connection.

Judge Neilson—That is mere talk.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor, I am right, I think, in that proposition.

Judge Neilson—No. It is not a moral argument here, and it was not a moral argument there, as I understand it, to show that there was an accusation against his wife. I do not regard it so at all, but that is not material.

Mr. Evarts—We will look at the point. The point is that when I have undertaken to prove that he had made statements exculpatory of his wife, they seek to meet them by proving sworn statements to the contrary in respect of his wife.

Judge Neilson—The wife was not on trial there, and she is not on trial here.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is as it may be, in some views and connections. I say that the only pertinency on which they introduce it here is to break the force of his statements that his wife had insisted she had not violated her marriage vow, by proving a sworn statement or accusation on his part that she had.

Judge Neilson—I understand you, I think. [To defendant's counsel.] Gentlemen, let me hear you further on the subject.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, I think the point under discussion has two aspects, which arise from the character of the question and answer which was called out on the part of the defense. Your Honor has said that the examination of Mr. Tilton before that Committee, upon the subject matter which was pending before that Committee, however long it may have continued, is to be regarded as a unit.

Judge Neilson—Well, is that correct?

Mr. Beach—Undoubtedly correct, Sir. If the witness is under examination before your Honor here, as has been the case for eight days, and, upon an occasion hereafter, his testimony in an action in which he is interested is in part given in evidence against him, the rule of law applies that whatever he may have said upon the same subject during the whole of the examination is admissible. It must be so, Sir.

Judge Neilson—That was my impression.

Mr. Beach—That is law, and it is justice.

Judge Neilson—That was my impression, but it was suggested that the Court of Appeals thought otherwise.

Mr. Beach—The Court of Appeals, Sir, have simply decided this, and nothing more, that where a part of the declaration of a party, whether it is an unsanctioned or a sworn declaration, is given in evidence against him, all the part of that declaration which is kindred to the subject, to the part which is given against him, is admissible, and it is not a new rule of law, Sir; it is a mere affirmation of the ancient doctrine of the law of evidence. Now, they give in evidence a portion of the testimony of Mr. Tilton before this Investigating Committee. What is our position, Sir? Not that we may give the whole complaint, the whole indictment, or the whole evidence which may relate to matters not essentially and intimately connected with the particular part given by the defense, not necessary to qualify or explain every subject matter which they have given in evidence, but simply that part of the proceeding before the Committee on the part of Mr. Tilton which reflects light upon the portion which they have proven. Our object is, Sir, to get the whole truth, to get all that Mr. Tilton said upon the particular point as to which they have extracted a single question and answer of that examination. And who will dispute the propriety of that, Sir? Who will attribute to the law any principle which shall prevent Mr. Tilton from giving all that he said before that Committee upon the subject on which they have introduced but a part of his declarations? That examination, Sir, was conducted by query and answer. The examining counsel had a perfect right to change the subject at any time and at any point in the examination. Very often the same subject matter is inquired of again and again, as your Honor has occasion to know by experience upon this trial. Now, is it to be said that a single question and answer upon any given subject shall be selected by an adversary and the witness concluded, when, in the same examination and under the sanction of the same oath, before the same Court, he has qualified that answer, or explained it; and is that the principle upon which the law of evidence is founded, to exclude truth instead of reaching the whole of it? If you receive a portion of Mr. Tilton's evidence before that Examining Committee, you may convict him of inconsistency. If you receive the whole, the explanation which he gives of this question and answer, the kindred portions of his examination, intimating what he intended to express by the answer which has been given in evidence, you place him in an entirely false position, and do gross injustice to the administration of the law, I say, with great respect, Sir. Now, allow me to refer to this question: "Did you, upon being asked this question: 'You say, Mr. Tilton, for a year after what you stated was Mrs. Tilton's confession?'" This refers, Sir, to the statement previously made by Mr. Tilton. It was upon that statement that this query was addressed to him by the Committee. Does not the question refer to and adopt that statement Sir? "You say a certain thing, and upon that statement which you have made, I ask you this question." I submit, Sir, that the statement which had been previously made, inducing the particular question which was here put and given in evidence, is by adoption and reference part of the question itself, becomes a part of the interrogatory, and for the purpose of understanding what that statement was, what is the foundation of this interrogatory, we ask the witness what was the statement which is referred to in this question. Does your Honor see any impropriety in it, any possibility of wrong? If, in connection with that statement, Mr. Tilton had made qualifying expressions or statements, do they not become a part of this question, and necessary to a perfect understanding of the question? But, Sir, they get this answer—and this question and answer, and the significance of this discussion, has a far broader import than has been given to it—they get an answer from Mr. Tilton, that for a year after a given period his wife had persistently said to him that she had not violated her marriage vow. “Did you say that, Mr. Tilton?” A. Yes, Sir, I said that. We ask Mr. Tilton, “What else did you say upon that subject of the adultery of your wife? What else did you say explanatory of this answer? What else did she say to you upon that subject which you have testified to in this examination.” Is not the subject kindred, Sir? If Mr. Tilton, in answer to a question immediately preceding this interrogatory, had said: “My wife conceded to me that she had had sexual intercourse with Mr. Beecher, but in consequence of certain relations which she bore to him, pious or religious or what not, in consequence of the deep reverence which I entertain for him, in consequence of my conviction that my intercourse with him was a rest to him, healthful to him, inspired and animated him in the pursuit of his holy profession; under the seductions and impressions that a yielding to him would be an aid to the cause of Christianity and religion, I submitted myself without an impression of wrong or sin to his solicitations,” would not that be evidence, Sir, evidence explanatory of this answer that “my wife during that year insisted that she had committed no sin?” Cannot the answers of the witness given in the same examination, explanatory of the sense not only in which he gave that answer, but explanatory of the meaning under which Mrs. Tilton insisted that she had been guilty or no wrong, be permissible in a Court of Justice? Now, the rule is, Sir, as everybody concedes, that where a portion of a declaration is given in evidence all the remaining part, tending to qualify or explain that portion which is given in evidence, is admissible. The question here is the assertion of Mr. Tilton that his wife insisted she had been guilty of no corruption: Mr. Tilton, in another portion of his examination, explains the circumstances, the theory, the impressions, the doctrines upon which that assertion was made by him, and the principle or the theory upon which Mrs. Tilton made this assertion in regard to her own moral purity. Now, under the rule strictly, Sir, announced in the Court of Appeals, I submit to your Honor that the whole of Mr. Tilton's testimony upon that subject is admissible; and you will see, Sir, that it is necessary for the ascertainment of the truth. The charge to be made against Mr. Tilton is, in the argument to this jury: “You have said that your wife for a year insisted upon her purity. Under what circumstances did you make this assertion? Why did you concede your wife to be a pure woman? What was the influence under which she was acting which led you to that conclusion; and why do you exonerate her from the horror and shame which womanhood naturally and instinctively would consider the deepest crime against her nature?” May not Mr. Tilton explain it, Sir? Is he to be carried falsely to this jury with the assertion that he considered his wife pure who had sold her body to the adulterer, and no explanation, no qualification given of the act? Why, my friend says: “That is the purpose of our evidence; it is our design to argue that question to this Court and jury; that notwithstanding Mr. Tilton accused his wife of this adultery he nevertheless held her as pure and unstained.” And can he not say why? “What were the communications between you and your wife upon that subject, from which you derived that impression? Upon what principle of morals or of virtue is it that you made the declaration that your wife was sinless and pure?” It seems to me your Honor, that upon a technical view of this question, and upon a consideration of the principle which is involved in the objection made by my learned friend, the attitude in which they present Mr. Tilton, by this question and answer, we are entitled to this evidence. Now, Sir, in this statement, which was the statement referred to by this question, Mr. Tilton does state in writing some of the circumstances and impressions that led him to this answer. I will not read them, Sir, but I offer them, and they are contained in Articles III. and IV. of this statement, relating to the very subject of this question, and to a degree explaining the motives which led Mr. Tilton to give the answer, the answer adopting this statement to that extent as the foundation upon which it is addressed to the witness. It is essentially a part of the question by the very phraseology of the inquiry, and it is a part of the answer, the substance of the answer to the question, upon the same subject, expressing the same idea, not as my friend says, contradictory of the answer, by any means, or a statement of a foreign fact, which will conflict with the answer, but a deliberate, prepared, written statement, explaining to a certain degree the views which are contained in that answer. I submit to your Honor it is admissible.

Mr. EVARTS—I propose now to close the argument, if my learned friends have said all they wished to say.

Mr. BEACH—Well, I hope that will be a practice that will continue during the trial, that the objector shall close the argument. It has not heretofore.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. EVARTS—My learned friend who has last addressed your Honor, has wandered very far from the inquiry. It is not an inquiry at all what Mr. Tilton thought of his wife's innocence or of his wife's purity; what theory he had of an adultery that left an adulteress pure; not a word of that kind. The question had nothing even to do with any theory or scheme or reasoning of Mrs. Tilton, if she had any, by which an adulteress was nevertheless pure, from the holy character of an adulterer. The question is this, and a plain and simple one, and has to do with the direct test, not of these vaporous and cloudy schemes of innocence and guilt, but whether as matter of fact, after an imputed confession on the part of this husband alleged, the wife had not insisted on—purity? No. On exculpation because of the circumstances of guilt? No. But on the simple straightforward question. "You say, Mrs. Tilton, for a year after what you stated as Mr. Tilton's confession, she insisted to you that she had not violated her marriage vow." Now that is a question of fact, whether a woman has violated her marriage vow. An intelligent woman knows whether she has violated her marriage vow. It is not metaphysical, it is not mystical, it is not in Heaven's high Court of Chancery whether the temptations or the overshadowing influence shall excuse or pardon. It is the fact of the adultery of the body, as known and understood of all men and all women. And he answers that he did say so, that she did say so; that he did say that she did say she had not violated her marriage vow; and that is a contradiction of an assertion that she had violated it.

Judge Nellson—Where is that assertion—in the statement that they propose to read?

Mr. Everts—That she had violated her marriage vow, that she had committed adultery. That is the very point of the inquiry, and now they seek, not as they profess, in obedience to the requirements of the rules of evidence, some statement then and there made, in the sense that the law considers it then and there made, in qualification of this husband's assertion that his wife had insisted that she had not violated her marriage vow—they do not seek to say, to explain by that that he did not mean that she had not violated the marriage vow, for that has nothing to do with the question; but the question is, whether he made a qualifying statement reducing, impairing, affecting his recognition of his wife's statement for a year, that she had not violated her marriage vow. And what do they propose in reduction of that? Why, his accusations; that is all. Does that qualify his statement that his wife insisted she had not violated her marriage vow?

Mr. Beach—Permit me to interrupt you, Mr. Everts, by saying that this answer goes far beyond that simple question whether or not the wife had violated her marriage vow, as your Honor will see by reading or hearing read the question; "In answer, did you say 'yes, Elizabeth was in a sort of vaporous, like cloud; she was between light and dark; she could not see that it was wrong; she maintained to her mother in my presence that she had done no wrong;'"—and going on with a much longer answer to the question, and all presenting the real question by this answer in the mind of Mrs. Tilton as to whether the accepted act of the violation of her person was a moral wrong, or adultery, in the sense in which the gentleman says all the world understands it.

Mr. Everts—Now, that does not touch the point. He finds the qualifying circumstances in the answer itself.

Mr. Beach—Some of them.

Mr. Everts—Let him find other qualifying circumstances.

Mr. Beach—That is just what I propose to do.

Mr. Everts—Oh! but you do not. You do not propose to show that this witness, in answering that question, and in connection with that question, of whether his wife had not insisted that she had not violated her marriage vow, had made qualifications of that in so insisting. Now that the husband charged his wife, that he charged her before the Committee, that he charged her in the publication—that is not a matter of dispute. We start on the basis that there is an accusation and an inquiry; and then one point of evidence comes out on that inquiry, and now the distinct proposition to your Honor is, that this witness's—present witness's bill of indictment, his liber of accusation, in the phrase of the civil law, is to be put in evidence as bearing upon the questions of whether or no he did not make that answer to that particular point of inquiry. Now, that is all. Now, the paper by itself can be no evidence at all. It is his own act of accusation. How can it be a form of secondary evidence concerning any principal fact that is alleged within it, especially when that principal fact, if it relate to any communication between husband and wife, of the nature your Honor rules, and under the requirements of the law, be made the subject of inquiry? Your Honor sees the hardship upon this wife and upon this defendant, if when the law professes to seal from inspection, in the pursuit of justice, confidential communications between husband and wife, there is this avenue open of secondary and irresponsible, not traversable and not searchable presentations of what so happened, by these second hand narratives. Now, in regard to what has been narrated to Mr. Beecher by this witness under the ruling of your Honor, that of course came in view, not as having occurred between him and his wife, but as being a narrative that he had conveyed to Mr. Beecher. Now, when testimony cannot be taken from this witness on the question of what did actually occur, they seek to put in evidence a form of accusation that he has presented before some tribunal; and I think your Honor will see that if it were a Divorce Court, an equity suit, a proceeding concerning divorce between these parties, that the introduction of the complainant would not be permitted, under cover of a refutation or qualification of an inconsistent answer that had been made by a witness. Now, I have before me the two cases from the Court of Appeals, one of Downs vs. The N. Y. Central R. R. Co., in which the answer was excluded, the only pretense of introducing it being that it formed a part of a conversation that had been introduced on the other side; and the Courts say:

The question was objected to as leading, and that it was incompetent to prove the plaintiff's declarations. The evidence was not inconsistent with the declarations proved by the defendant, but it tended to corroborate the testimony of the plaintiff by the fact that his statements had been consistent. This was not allowable. The conversation was not proved to have been a part of the same given in evidence by the defendant.

Judge Nellson—That would have been fatal proof, of course.

Mr. Everts—[Reading]:

Had it been so the evidence would have been competent. The plaintiff could have proved the whole of a conversation, a part of which the defendant had given in evidence if it was connected, and all related to the same subject.

Judge Neilson—That is found in every text book we have on evidence for half a century.

Mr. Everts—Nevertheless, Courts are used, your Honor, in order to apply them to particular circumstances.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—And it is not, I take it, to be imputed to me as inconsiderate to ask attention to the last consideration of the subject by the higher Courts of the State.

Judge Neilson—Oh, no.

Mr. Everts—In the case of Rouse vs. Whited:

The plaintiff showed that his property had been applied to the defendant's use in payment of a note made by the defendant and indorsed by the plaintiff. Proved that the defendant pointed out the property to the Sheriff and declared that it was the plaintiff's. Held, that the defendant was entitled to prove his statement in the same conversation, that the note was the plaintiff's debt and he was to pay it.

And it is put expressly upon the ground that the law rests upon the rule that when the plaintiff avails himself of a statement or admission of the defendant to charge him, the defendant may avail himself of any other statement made by him, at the same time tending to destroy or modify the use which the plaintiff might otherwise make of the admission or statement first called out by him, but it is only whatever is such qualification and modification arising as a part of that statement. Now, whenever a libel in a divorce suit, a bill in equity, can be put in as evidence per se in favor of the party who signs and makes it to qualify a statement that he has specifically made on an examination, whenever an authority to that extent can be produced, then, perhaps, the present proposition of my learned friend, which is to introduce the bill of accusation in qualification of a specific answer, may find some strength.

Mr. Beach—Let me correct that, Mr. Everts. This is not a bill of indictment, Sir, or an equity bill. It was a sworn statement of facts, of evidence submitted to this Examining Committee upon their call upon this witness as a witness before them. It was a part of his evidence submitted to that Committee.

Judge Neilson—I still think that I cannot allow you to read that paper. It was a paper previously prepared. It is not a part of the conversation in respect to which they inquired, but an independent, deliberate act of the witness, a presentation upon which inquiry and examination was to be made, and afterwards, as has been proved, was made. I think you cannot read that paper.

Mr. Beach—Nor any portion of it, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Besides, I think this supposed discrepancy has been clearly explained. We have his theory.

Mr. Beach—That may be, Sir. We shall want to offer—

Judge Neilson—You have a right to offer specific points in order to point an exception, being reasonable in that respect, of course.

The Court here took a recess until 2 p. m.

ANOTHER EFFORT TO GET THE SWORN STATEMENT BEFORE THE JURY.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor having rejected the third and fourth paragraphs of the sworn statement of Mr. Tilton, with reference to the question I put to him, I make an offer of them.

Mr. Everts—I submit to your Honor that you have ruled upon the question of the written paper, and it is not necessary that any part of it should be read to your Honor. Your ruling was made upon grounds quite irrespective of anything that is in it, and I must object to its being read.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor has passed upon that question twice, and it has been the habit of the counsel on both sides to do this.

Mr. Everts—No; not where the Court passes upon it irrespective of anything that is in the paper. There is no possible ground for reading anything, when the question is passed upon on grounds irrespective of the contents; and it is not pertinent to the point of inquiry.

Mr. Beach—How shall we see that it is not pertinent, without making an offer of the paper?

Mr. Everts—Whenever you make your bill of exceptions, then you can introduce it.

Mr. Fullerton—The bill of exceptions will be made by you, I apprehend. [Laughter.]

Mr. Everts—I was only advising you when you will have an opportunity of introducing it, if you want to do so; when you make your bill of exceptions you can then use it.

Mr. Beach—This is no new question, Sir; it has been passed upon at different times.

Judge Neilson—The objection is that the ruling is not based on anything contained in the paper, but is independent of its contents, and therefore it is not necessary to read it.

Mr. Beach—Can we not make an offer of proof, Sir?

Mr. Everts—You are under the direction of the Court.

Mr. Beach—Therefore I ask the Court if it prohibits us from making an offer of proof.

Judge Neilson—In the other instances where papers were excluded, certain clauses in the papers were referred to to point the exception.

Mr. Beach—I would like to know, if your Honor please, whether it is to be ruled that we cannot make an offer of proof.

Judge Neilson—I think you can.

Mr. Everts—I object to counsel reading any part of this paper which your Honor has excluded.

Mr. Beach—I am not reading anything; I am going to make an offer of proof.

Mr. Everts—Let us see. Counsel must be held to their own proposition. The counsel has said that, your Honor having excluded the third and fourth paragraphs of the sworn statement, he now proposes to read them.

Judge Neilson—He now proposes to make a certain offer.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will please to recollect that you permitted them, in regard to the "True Statement," to read the whole of it in sections and offers to prove it. You did the same thing in regard to the Woodhull story. You have done it—

Judge Neilson—In regard to the Woodhull scandal?

Mr. Beach—Yes; and also in regard to the Biography of Mrs. Woodhull by Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—And, although it was then ruled out, it was embraced in the form of offers by the learned counsel.

Mr. Evarts—I am prepared to discuss these propositions. In the first place, what might have seemed an evasion of the rule was introduced by my learned friends when they were going on with their case. When it was proposed to read from the Woodhull Life the Court ruled it out on the ground that the plaintiff could not be held responsible for opinions expressed in a biography any more than a historian. Therefore, upon my cross-examination I introduced no parts of it but those which purported to express the individual opinions of this witness of Mrs. Woodhull and her tenets; and I asked him the distinct proposition whether these were his sentiments; and in that light, and in that light alone, the passages were introduced. With reference to the Woodhull scandal, I had a right to prove, after it had been offered on the direct examination—they having said that the Woodhull scandal and the Woodhull story was made a subject of discussion between Moulton and Beecher and Tilton. I had what I thought was a clear right thereby to prove the Woodhull story; and your Honor limited me to that part of it that I could produce as being the subject of consideration before them, and I adhered to that. Now, Sir, the last case is that of my proving by this witness a destroyed paper. Having proved its destruction, and that no copy was preserved, I then read to him and asked him if that was not a part of the paper. It was direct proof; it was a mode of proof which was allowable by the law in respect to a destroyed paper. And that case has nothing to do with this.

Mr. Fullerton—How about the Clarke letter?

Mr. Evarts—That has been ruled out.

Mr. Fullerton—But you read part of it.

Mr. Evarts—I asked him whether that was submitted to him as a matter of treaty and negotiation by Mr. Clarke.

Mr. Beach—You asked him if he did not make certain statements which you read from the Clarke letter.

Mr. Evarts—I asked him a two-fold question, and I had a two-fold object. I asked whether he had seen the Clarke letter, and he said that he could not say if he had not, and he could not say if he had. I then asked him concerning the Clarke letter, and things that were, as matter of fact, in the Clarke letter, and only such—whether those propositions were made to him by Clarke, and were the subject of negotiation, as a matter of fact, as to the abandonment of The Golden Age or giving it up, or this, that, and the other. So that has nothing to do with this question. Now, here is a document, known and understood, which they claim a right to put in evidence, and which your Honor has excluded, and now they propose to read, as a part of their offer to your Honor, parts of that statement. It is like reading a deposition, or any other document which the Court has ruled out as inter alios, and not to be read. Now, there is no point to any exception to be gained by the particular contents of this paper. The proposition has been made to your Honor, and you have disposed of the question, that it does not come within the rule of reduction or qualification of the particular statement concerning which the witness has been examined; that all the qualifying circumstances are perhaps contained in the paper itself. At all events, that this document, this accusation or indictment, whatever it is, is not admissible. Now, what rule of evidence is there that admits the reading of any part of that paper which your Honor says shall not be read. It is not because of anything in the paper—it is the paper itself that your Honor has ruled is not to be evidence.

Mr. Beach—I offer to prove, Sir, that upon the same examination, before this Committee, when he gave the answer to the question which has been given in evidence by the defendant, he also made this statement, and I propose to make the statement to your Honor, if you allow me to do so.

THE SWORN STATEMENT RULED OUT.

Judge Neilson—I propose to allow you, in order to fix and have the benefit of the exception, to make an offer, although that offer may (I don't know that it will) involve the reading of some part of the paper before you. The paper itself is ruled out; and if, in making your offer, you use the expressions of the paper it will be again ruled out, probably. But I allow you to make your offer in such terms as you propose.

Mr. Beach—Then I make the offer under the statement that we propose to prove that Mr. Tilton, upon the occasion which I have stated, made this statement orally to the Committee:

That about nine years ago the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher began, and thereafter continued, a friendship with Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, for whose native delicacy and extreme religious sensibility he often expressed to her husband a high admiration; visiting her from time to time for years, until the year 1870, when, for reasons hereinafter stated, he ceased such visits; during which period, by many tokens and attentions, he won the affectionate love of Mrs. Tilton, whereby, after long moral resistance by her, and after repeated assaults by him upon her mind, with overmastering arguments, accomplished the possession of her person; maintaining with her thenceforward during the period hereinafter stated the relation called criminal intercourse; this relation being regarded by her during that period as not criminal or morally wrong—such had been the power of his arguments as a clergyman to satisfy her religious scruples against such violation of virtue and honor.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I object to the evidence thus offered, as ruled out by your Honor already, and therefore, needing no argument upon its merits; and I object to any further reading from the paper, as a necessary means, or an appropriate, or admissible means of bringing to your Honor's notice the point of evidence concerning which you ruled.

Judge Neilson—This offer I overrule.

Mr. Beach—And we except.

THE VEXED QUESTION AGAIN DEBATED.

Mr. Evarts—If the paper needs to be identified by your Honor it may be so marked; but as for this right, when there is the exclusion of a paper, independent of its contents, to read it—

Mr. Beach [interrupting]—It seems to me, if your Honor please, that the counsel should not be permitted to reargue the question upon which your Honor has ruled.

Judge Neilson—It may be beneficial to me, perhaps.

Mr. Beach—Is he asking you to review the decision which you have made?

Judge Neilson—No; I do not so understand it.

Mr. Beach—Then there is no question before your Honor.

Mr. Evarts—I do not know that. This is, in a certain sense, within the discretionary control of your Honor, (perhaps not governed by any rule of law to that extent); but when the procedure of the learned counsel has indicated that it is the reading of a paper which has been excluded, I then submit that it is within the rule which excludes a paper, and its reading cannot be permitted.

Mr. Beach—In the first place, I deny that it is within your Honor's discretionary power to forbid my making an offer of proof; and, in the next place, when I make such an offer, I have a right to derive my information from any source, and it is not for the counsel or the Court to decide whether I shall hear it from my learned associates, or read it from a written offer prepared, or draw it from the evidence actually given before the body to which the question relates.

Mr. Evarts—There I think my learned friend is wrong. [Laughter.] The Court has a restraint over all such proceedings. The general proposition, no doubt, is this, that in restraint of counsel and their zeal in a cause, the better rule is to confine them to questions, without offers. Offers, however are admitted in the discretion of the Court, whenever it appears to the Court's observation that an offer is apparently necessary, or useful, to raising the point to be decided by the Court better than by a mere question. Now, when after the decision of the Court, that the paper shall not be offered in evidence, nor received in the cause, counsel thereupon undertake to read the paper as a renewed offer to prove, the Court sees that it is but a substitution, in a form that introduces the excluded matter, for the same ruling that has been given to exclude the matter.

Judge Neilson—Allow me to remind you, Mr. Evarts, that that is the precise position in regard to the Bessie Turner letters.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor means the Clarke letter.

Judge Neilson—No, the Bessie Turner letters. They were offered in evidence and excluded, and then, if my recollection serves me, they were read in this precise manner. Mr. Beach made the objection first, and then in your offer, Mr. Evarts, you stated the contents, and Mr. Beach withdrew his objection to the first letter, and then, in like manner, to the second.

Mr. Evarts—In that case, if your Honor please, after you had ruled out the letters, had I not the right to ask this witness whether these reasons were the reasons for Bessie Turner going away?

Judge Neilson—And in doing that you read the letters.

Mr. Evarts—It does not follow that I could not read a paper as the basis of a proper inquiry to the witness, because it had been ruled out as evidence. I never have contended for that doctrine.

Judge Neilson—The letter had been rejected?

Mr. Evarts—It had, as evidence per se; but it did not follow that I could not make it the basis of an inquiry to the witness. It might be made evidence by the witness's statements concerning it. But my proposition to your Honor is that this is nothing but the reproduction of a proposition of evidence in a form that produces the matter of a paper that has been excluded, which paper your Honor has excluded, whatever its matter was.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor has permitted me to present a part of my offer, and the counsel then interrupts me, in the course of my proposition, with the objection that there is some sort of professional impropriety in the course which I am taking, as it introduces the immediate subject matter, in the shape of an offer, proposition or question which had been excluded by the Court. Your Honor excluded the Victoria Woodhull biography; your Honor excluded the Victoria Woodhull statement of this scandal; your Honor excluded the Clarke letter; and yet, in each and every of these particulars, introducing the very subject matter which you did exclude, and for the purpose of getting it before the Court upon the record, the counsel read the very matter which had thus been excluded, and now he appears with the objection to my imitation of that example.

Judge Neilson—Am I right in my recollection about the two Bessie Turner letters.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I ruled them out.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—On your objection Mr. Beach?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Then the point is, that in the form of an offer they stated the contents, and you withdrew your objection to the first letter, and in like manner to the second.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Now you have a right to make your offer to the Court.

Mr. Evarts—I have, I believe, the right to close the objection.

Mr. Beach—I do not know whether it follows that the gentleman has the right to close the objection when I make an offer.

Mr. Evarts—I object to your offer, and I have the affirmative of the proposition.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; I have the affirmative of the proposition, in making the offer.

Judge Neilson—I think so. But still I would like to hear Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor thinks me right, I hope you will give me the benefit of being right occasionally.

Judge Neilson—Hereafter, yes, Sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, here is a paper written and signed by the witness, it is said, which has been offered in evidence. The Bessie Turner letters were letters written by a third person, and as so written, equally with the Clarke letter until they were brought into some connection with the witness, with the party, the plaintiff—they could not be given in evidence. I thought they could be read under the degree of evidence that had affected them. Your Honor thought not, and they were excluded therefor, being the acts of third persons and so inter alias until such evidence was given connecting the party with them. Now, I, having information that the Bessie Turner letters conveyed to me, and that the Clarke letter conveyed to me underlook to extract from the witness his testimony that the statements therein contained had been brought to his notice and to inquire concerning them, and there was my examination, and only there, I submit to your Honor. Now, this point that I have submitted to your Honor, that the Court will exclude a reproduction in an oral form of a document that is excluded, when all that is served is to get a ruling of the Court upon an oral presentation in place of that already given upon a written one, is carried so far in some of the Courts of the neighboring States that they will not permit it to be made a subject of oral examination in Court when a basis is proposed to be raised—desired to be raised—for introducing the instrument. Now, in our Courts we have not gone so far as that on the ground, as I am advised, that that rule of the sister States' Courts, which requires a basis to be made by affidavit to be laid before the Judge, would be, if enforced with us, contrary to our notions of the right of cross-examination, concerning any matter that came to be the subject of evidence. But of the general proposition that offers are not to take the place of excluded testimony, and that when the Court has before it definitely the proposition that the document excluded is so excluded irrespective of anything that is in it, and that the renewed form of offer is nothing but an oral production of the document, I apprehend there is no diversity and no lack of distinctness in the rulings of our Courts upon that subject.

THE FINAL DECISION ON THE SWORN STATEMENT.

Judge Neilson—I do not rule that the counsel shall be allowed to make an offer for the sake of reproducing part of the document ruled out. I simply allow him to make such offer as being professional, if he feels called upon to make it with a view of an exception which he may wish to take, supposing that to be material to his rights.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor please remark, in making that ruling, that our previous offer was to read from the statement?

Judge Neilson—I will note it.

Mr. Beach—I have proposed now to prove that this witness orally made the statement which I am about to submit in my proposition, to the same tribunal, when he answered the question which has been given in evidence by the counsel on the other side and in regard to the same subject matter that he so stated before the Committee.

Mr. Evarts—Well, do you mean that he read his statement to the Committee?

Mr. Beach—I mean just what I say.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I think I am entitled to an understanding of it.

Mr. Beach—Well, that depends upon whether I consider your understanding pertinent to my purposes. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—I think it is.

Mr. Beach—Well, I do not.

Mr. Evarts—The purpose for which we are here.

Judge Neilson—Well, I have been waiting for some time for your offer.

Mr. Evarts—I except to your Honor's ruling that the offer may be repeated in the form that is now allowed.

Mr. Beach—And under the same conditions as the offer just rejected, Sir, I offer to prove that upon the occasion referred to Mr. Tilton stated to the Committee that on the evening of October 10th, 1888, or thereabouts Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton held an interview with the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher at his residence, she being then in a tender state of mind owing to the recent death and burial of a young child, and during this interview the act of criminal commerce took place between the pastor and this parishioner. The motive on her part being, as before stated, not regarded by her at the time as criminal or wrong, which act was followed by a similar act of criminality between these same parties at Mr. Tilton's residence, during a pastoral visit paid by Mr. Beecher to her on the subsequent Saturday evening, followed also by other similar acts on various occasions from the Autumn of 1868 to the Spring of 1870, the places being the two residences aforesaid, and occasionally other places to which her pastor would invite and accompany her, or at which he would meet her by previous appointment, these acts of wrong being on her part from first to last not wanton or consciously wicked, but arising through a blinding of her moral perceptions occasioned by the powerful influence exerted on her mind at that time to this end by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, as her trusted preceptor and guide.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out; the offer is denied.

Mr. Beach—And we except, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S EXAMINATION TEMPORARILY SUSPENDED.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, at the close of yesterday's proceedings we supposed that the re-direct examination and the re-cross of Mr. Tilton would occupy but a small part of to-day, consequently we provided ourselves with a witness from the City of New-York who is now present waiting to be examined. She is in very bad health; has been for a long time under medical treatment, and is still under medical treatment, and it is absolutely necessary, I think, for her health, that she should return to the city to-day. I therefore ask your Honor's permission to suspend the further examination of this witness, to examine the witness to whom I refer.

Judge Neilson—What do your opponents say to that? I have no objection to it.

Mr. Fullerton—It is very short and will not occupy more than a few minutes.

Judge Neilson—Is that agreeable, Sir. Is that arrangement satisfactory, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—We ought to be entirely certain, if your Honor please, that the witness will be able to attend if the cross-examination should be prolonged.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; certainly; that is our hazard by law.

Mr. Evarts—Well, you say that she could not be able to come to-morrow.

Mr. Fullerton—I say that she is under medical treatment and desires to return to the City of New-York to-night, and must do so, and I have no doubt but what her direct and cross-examination will be completed before the hour of adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Then the anxiety is about the cross; whether she could attend to-morrow.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, she will have to attend to-morrow if they do not get through, however inconvenient it may be; but I apprehend the necessity for her return will not exist at the close of the day.

Mr. Beach—Why, it is very well understood, Sir, that we lose the benefit of her examination if we do not produce her.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! I know—your examination—I know his Honor don't think so entirely about those results.

Judge Neilson—I assent to this cheerfully if the counsel will agree to it. You may leave the stand, Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—It is all within the province of the Court, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I don't understand there is any objection, if you agree to produce the witness for cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—Of course we must, Sir, or lose her testimony.

Mr. Evarts—It is within your Honor's control, no doubt.

The witness referred to here stepped to the stand and the oath was administered by the clerk. When he had recited the formula she repeated after him: "I solemnly swear the truth I will tell and nothing else."

Judge Neilson—Kiss the book.

Q. About two weeks? A. About two weeks. The child was two weeks old when I went there. I was the first nurse.

Q. I thought you said "witness." I beg your pardon. I thought you were there at that time. Well, about a fortnight after the birth you were there, and what time of the year was that? A. Well, to my recollection, it was about in June, Sir; some part in June.

Q. Six with Bessie Turner? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton was there at what times of day? A. Well, some days he would be home about four o'clock; some days late, and some days early.

Q. Did he stay there during the day any times that you were there? A. No, Sir; not as I know of.

Q. All day I mean? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you known Mr. Beecher before? A. Never seen the gentleman in my life, Sir; I often heard tell of him.

Q. And when did you know that it was Mr. Beecher that made a call and how? A. The upstairs girl named Teresa Burke, told me.

Q. Told you it was Mr. Beecher? A. Told me it was Mr. Beecher.

Q. Now, as I understand it, when Mrs. Tilton was in what you call her bed room, you, with the child, were occupying the room that communicated by folding doors? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you there slept? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Having the care of the child also? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very seldom went into her room? A. Very seldom went into Mrs. Tilton's room.

Q. Well, were not the doors usually open? A. Yes, Sir; they were open every day to air the room; windows, too.

Q. Well, were not they generally kept open? A. No, Sir; they were shut a great many times in the evening; they would be shut when she would be in her room.

Q. But through the day, and as a usual arrangement, were not those folding doors between those two rooms open? A. Through the day; yes, Sir.

Q. Yes? A. Only this time, when Mr. Beecher sent word up that he was down stairs, and would like to see her.

Q. Very well, now. Sometimes you say they were closed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was there always some reason for closing them? A. That I do not know, Sir.

Q. Well, I mean how did it occur. Was there a habit of shutting them at any particular hour of the day, or were they closed if there was somebody there, or this or that reason? A. Well, when she would be dressing she would close them.

Q. Close them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But there was no habit of closing them at any particular hour of the day? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or evening? A. No, Sir.

Q. So that when they were open, as they were usually through the day, they would remain open in the evening until something occurred as a reason for closing them? A. When she would go to bed she would close them.

Q. Yes; close them when she went to bed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well, when you occupied the other room with the child through the night, when you were composed for the night, the doors were usually closed? A. No, Sir, open.

Q. They were open? A. Open while I was in that room, and they changed me to the other room, next to Mr. Tilton's room.

Q. Yes. Then, as I understand it, while you occupied this communicating room, where the folding doors were between, were the doors always open? A. In day time, Sir.

Q. Yes; in day time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But at night, when you were both arranged for the night, both Mrs. Tilton and you, were the doors thus open? A. The doors were shut, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Well, that is what I understand you; they were shut.

Q. Now, at what stage of your service there did you leave this communicating room—this folding-door room, and were lodged in some other room? A. They had not a room—a bed in the first room I went to, and the baby and me could not get along on the lounge, and when they had the room next to Mr. Tilton vacant they gave me that room?

Q. When that was vacant? Yes, Sir.

Q. Who vacated that room to accommodate you? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. You don't know who had occupied it before? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long after you went there was that change made? A. About three weeks.

Q. She was sitting up? A. No, Sir; she was in bed—poorly.

Q. When? A. When the message came up to her.

Q. I understand that, or at least I don't know how that was but she closed the folding-doors? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you ever see Mr. Beecher there again, except while you were occupying this folding-door room? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you fix the time of this visit that you have described as the first time you saw him in reference to the length of time it was after you went into the service—how long after you first went there was this visit of Mr. Beecher's? A. Two weeks.

Q. Two weeks? A. Two weeks.

Q. About four weeks, then, after the confinement of Mrs. Tilton? A. She was up; she was going on three weeks confined.

Q. From the time you went there? A. Four months altogether; I received $100.

Q. Four months' wages you received? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that, from the end of June, that would be July, August, September and October? A. Something about that.

Q. Something like that. Did you leave before your month was up, or exactly when it was up, or how? A. Well, I could not say, Sir.

Q. Now, you say that you saw Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher together in a room down stairs afterwards? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that after their return from Monticello? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long after the return from Monticello, or how long before you left the service? A. It was about three weeks after we came from Monticello—three or four weeks.

Q. Where were you when Mr. Beecher came into the house, or didn't you know of his coming into the house? A. I was upstairs in the nursery when Teresa Burke brought the news up to Mrs. Tilton that Mr. Beecher would like to see her. I heard the words.

Q. I beg your pardon; Mrs. Tilton went down? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then you had occasion to go down? A. I wanted to go down before that, but I could not.

Q. What was the occasion for your going down that you had? A. I wanted a drink of ice-water.

Q. And you had been delayed? A. Yes, Sir,

Q. By your duties with the child, or something? A. I was nursing the baby at the time.

Q. Now, you went down. How are these rooms arranged down stairs? Are they communicating by folding doors? A. Yes, Sir; the dining-room has folding doors; it goes to the back parlor.

Q. Is the house three rooms deep, or only two? A. There are two back parlors, and a dining-room, and a small room on the side going in.

Q. There is a front room, I suppose, along the hall? A. Yes, Sir; a little small room like a receiving room.

Q. A reception room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then there is a parlor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Into which you go, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From the hall at the end? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then is the dining room another room? A. Yes, Sir; it goes from the back parlor, and the folding doors go into the parlors to cut off the back parlor from the dining room.

Q. Then I imagine, from your description, that the back parlor and the dining room together go the whole width of the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is so, is it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the hall, therefore, does not run through the house? A. The hall is a very small hall.

Q. And does not run through the house? A. And does not run through the house; no, Sir.

Q. Now, which is the largest room, the dining room or the back parlor? A. The back parlor.

Q. And are the folding-doors usually open? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Between those two rooms? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go to take your drink of water to the sideboard? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then the sideboard was in —? A. The ice-pitcher was on the dining-room table by the window.

Q. And there is where you went? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And got your drink of water? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This time you think was about three weeks after you came back from Monticello? A. From Monticello; I think it is about that.

Q. That would be about the month of August, would it not? A. I don't know, Sir; it was about three weeks.

Q. Or the end of August, or some such time. You cannot fix the time? A. No, Sir, I cannot.

Q. How soon after your return from Monticello have you stated this was? A. We didn't stay more than three or four weeks in Monticello.

Q. After you got back, how soon was this visit of Mr. Beecher in which you said you saw him? A. About three weeks, Sir.

Q. About three weeks? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was the first time you had seen him after the return? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From Monticello, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you were familiar, I suppose, with these parlors and the furniture in them, were you not? A. Yes, Sir; I was often in the parlors.

Q. What chair— A. It was a large arm chair, with a soft bottom.

Q. And where was it seated? A. In the corner.

Q. Where was it placed? A. In the corner.

Q. In the room? A. Facing the windows—by the window.

Q. Which corner? A. This corner (indicating), and there was a window just as you turn in from the dining-room.

Q. Was it a chair that was usually there? A. That I don't know.

Q. Now, how many windows are there in the back parlor? A. Two windows.

Q. And one in the dining-room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Which of these windows was this chair near? A. It was nearer to the dining-room window. It was not near the window at all. It was in the corner coming out from the dining-room.

Q. It was not near the window? A. It was not near the window. The folding doors from the front parlor and the dining-room door, there was a corner there, and the chair was in that corner.

Q. I thought you said something about a window? A. The window was on the other side. The chair was not near the window; it was facing the window, you understand.

Q. It faced the window? A. Yes, Sir, in that corner.

Q. Which window did it face, the one nearest the dining-room or the one farthest from it? A. The one nearest the dining-room.

Q. How near was that dining-room window to the wall of the dining-room, between it and the dining-room? A. There was not much space between.

Q. It was very close, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then this chair that you speak of was near the wall, between the dining-room and back parlor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How close to the wall was it? A. As close as it could go.

Q. As close as it could be? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To that wall? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The wall that separated the dining-room and the parlor? A. And the parlor.

Q. Close to it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, where did you stand in the dining-room when you saw— A. I was getting the glass of water at the ice pitcher when I heard whispering, and I looked in, and I saw Mr. Beecher sitting down, and Mrs. Tilton sitting on his knee.

Q. Yes; that you have stated. A. That is what I was doing, getting the water, standing by the table.

Q. Now, did you see this without an effort to see it? A. I saw it.

Q. Did you put your head into the back parlor? A. No, Sir; the folding doors were open.

Q. Wide open? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Catharine, are you a married woman? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And your husband is living? A. No, Sir; he is dead.

Q. Now, I think you have said—well, after you had seen what you did see where did you go to? A. I went up to my nursery.

Q. Did you say that at this time that you saw Mrs. Tilton sitting on Mr. Beecher's knee—that she had her hand on his shoulder? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was it at that time that you heard the conversation that you have given? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was loud enough for you to hear, was it not? A. I heard them whisper, but all the words I heard said was, "How do you feel, Elizabeth, dear?" "Father," she said, "I feel so so." That is all I heard. [Laughter.]

Q. That is all you heard? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Could you hear that without an effort, or did you put your ear into the room to hear? A. When I went into the dining-room I heard the words.

Q. And you heard them? A. I heard them.

Q. Was the door that you went into the dining-room by opened by you to go in? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And closed by you after you? A. It don't be closed; it is always left open—the dining-room door.

Q. I asked you just now if you opened it? A. I did not open it. It was open, and I left it so.

Q. Now, you saw Mr. Beecher, or you knew of his calling at the house at other times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S PRESENTS OF FLOWERS.

Q. Do you know how many times, or do you think you know, of his having called? A. He came three or four times before we went into the country, and sent her baskets of elegant flowers to keep around her bed. She had them on large dishes.

Q. And they were there, were they not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And everybody saw them? A. Yes, Sir; she told—

Q. And everybody knew where they came from? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was Mr. Tilton there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where was Mr. Tilton? A. That I don't know, Sir.

Q. All the time that you were there? A. Oh, he was there; but he was not there when Mr. Beecher was there.

Q. Oh, I am asking you about those flowers? A. Mr. Tilton was there, and he saw the flowers.

Q. He saw the flowers? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he knew where they came from? A. I don't know anything about that.

Q. But every one else did? A. The servants in the house all knew it.

Q. They all knew it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Tilton knew, I suppose, whether he had sent the flowers or not, didn't he? A. Mr. Tilton did not send them, for her own lips told me Mr. Beecher sent them.

Q. Now, did you never see Mr. Tilton looking at the flowers? A. Mr. Tilton?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Never? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you never see him in his wife's bedroom during her confinement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You say he called four or five times before you went into the country, you think? A. Yes, Sir; about that, I guess.

HOW MRS. CAREY CAME TO BE A WITNESS.

Q. Now, when did you first mention to anybody that you had observed anything of the matters that you have now testified to? A. Last Friday, Sir.

Q. For the first time? A. For the first time.

Q. And to whom? A. To Mrs. Lines, who visited Bellevue Hospital to see the sick.

Q. A charitable lady who visits there for that purpose? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you volunteer—did you of your own accord mention this to the lady? A. No, Sir; she told me that after I got well she would get me an elegant place in Brooklyn. I told her I had lived in Brooklyn. She said: "Who did you live with?" I told her who I lived with, naming the parties, and I said I lived with Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Elizabeth Tilton, and wet-nursed a baby for her. She sat down and asked me more questions, and, of course, I answered her. She asked me what I thought of such a thing, and I said I didn't know. She asked me what I seen and what I heard, and of course I told her.

Q. And that is the way you came to be a witness here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Much to the discomfiture of your health, I suppose. Do you remember the first time that Mrs. Tilton went out to church after her confinement? A. I do not. She went before we went in the country.

Q. And do you remember whether she continued in feeble health up to the time of going into the country—whether she remained in feeble health? A. Her health was very poor. She had milk legs.

Q. She suffered from her malady attending upon her confinement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was a great sufferer, was she not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And so continued until she went into the country? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you have any quarrel or difficulty at that house while you were there as a nurse? A. No, Sir; only what I had with Bessie Turner.

Q. That was between you and her, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir; when she took Bessie's part, I broke her chain—Mrs. Tilton's chain. I was making a chain for Bessie Turner, and she struck me with a hair brush.

Q. Who—Bessie? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Oh! I don't care about those quarrels. Mrs. Tilton had nothing to do with that; at any rate I don't care if she had. but did you have any difficulty in the house between yourself and your employers, Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. Not a word, Sir.

Q. No trouble about your neglect of the child? A. Not a word, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To Judge Neilson.] That is all, I think, Sir.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] That is all.

MR. TILTON RECALLED.

Theodore Tilton was recalled, and his re-direct examination continued.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Mr. Tilton, after this episode I will ask you something more with reference to that answer that you gave to the question before the Committee. You say there: "She maintained to her mother in my presence that she had not done wrong." Was that so?

CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN THIRD PARTIES OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Evarts—I object to that, if your Honor please. It is an inquiry as to some matter of fact that occurred on the part of his wife towards her mother. I only asked him whether he made a certain answer, and he says that he did.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take that.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—We cannot take that.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, that proves that this witness made use of a certain expression before the Committee.

Judge Neilson—Yes. Now, you wish to go back of that to a conversation between Mrs. Tilton and her mother.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask him if he didn't say so and so—if he didn't say a certain thing.

Judge Neilson—He says he did.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I have a right to show why he said that.

Judge Neilson—Not if it involves a conversation with Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—Didn't they bring out that conversation?

Judge Neilson—In that form to which the witness made the answer.

Mr. Fullerton—It is no matter in what form they made it; they brought it out, as a declaration of his.

Judge Neilson—That he made that answer?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes Sir.

Judge Neilson—I don't think that justifies you to go beyond that and prove a conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—May I not ask him how Elizabeth maintained her innocence to her mother?

Judge Neilson—I think not.

Mr. Beach—Why not? I showed your Honor the other day that that is not a confidential communication made in the presence of a third person.

Judge Neilson—I think it is, when it is between the wife and the mother.

Mr. Beach—There is no authority for that.

Mr. Fullerton—A wife cannot make a confidential communication to her mother.

Judge Neilson—That is the way it is stated in the answer?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; she wanted to vindicate herself to her mother from the accusation that she did anything wrong. I want to know how she did that—by what mode of argumentation.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Evarts suggests that they stand precisely the same as if Mrs. Tilton had been talking with a third person, not her mother.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, the point is this. I am not disposed to think that communications between husband and wife are not confidential, when the subject matter is confidential, because the mother happens to be present; I don't believe that the law treats them otherwise than as confidential, but the difficulty is deeper than that. I have asked this witness whether he made certain statements or not, and he is to say whether he made them or not, and if he made them, and then said anything that qualified them, that is another matter. But the fact that a witness is thus called upon to say whether he has made statements, whether the result is contradictory of himself, and whether he denies them or not, and they are proved afterward against him, has nothing to do with the question approving what the facts were in reality, the whole point being what he said, and you don't prove what he said by either proving or disproving the truth of what he said. Now, my learned friend, because, in an answer to a question of whether he did not make a certain answer, which answer includes in it this passage: "She maintained to her mother in my presence that she had not done wrong"—admitting that he made the answer, undertakes to prove here, as new matter of evidence, what occurred between her and her mother.

Judge Neilson—That is how she maintained.

Mr. Evarts—Yea. What occurred between her and her mother—that hasn't anything to do with the question of what this witness said before the Committee, not the least. Either she did or did not say or do,—say or act in reference to her mother as the witness said. Either way, that she did or did not, is not a matter of proof here. It has nothing to do with the question of whether he said so.

Judge Neilson—Well, the fact being that the witness said so, and the fact being that she, in a certain manner and form which we have not got now, maintained her innocence to her mother, the question is whether they can inquire how she maintained her innocence—that is, in what form or terms.

Mr. Evarts—That is the very point, Sir. Now, it does not tend in the least to affect or vary his statement before the Committee what the terms were. He did not state the terms to the Committee. Whatever he said to the Committees in qualification or reduction or explanation of the part of the statement that I have given, comes within the colloquium which explain the statement. But nothing is better settled than that when the whole point of evidence is what a man said, that it does not license the other party to prove the truth of what he said by the facts concerning which he spoke, because whether it was true or not, had nothing to do with it. It was what he said to the Committee. Now, this is not a novel point of evidence. It arises, and has been often decided, until I supposed that it was well settled, that it is not admissible in corroboration of a view of what a man said, to prove the truth, and therefore argue that he probably said so; or a falsehood, and therefore argue that he did not say so.

Judge Neilson—That is not the question here. The question is here in view of his stating that Mrs. Tilton maintained a certain thing to her mother "in my presence" whether the witness can state in what terms or manner she so maintained it, assuming that this answer is strictly true.

Mr. Evarts—Whether under the license of my inquiry concerning what he said before the Committee it is admissible for them to prove the truth of what he said before the Committee.

Judge Neilson—No, the manner.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the fact concerning which he spoke, when all my evidence was what he said, not anything about the fact at all, but simply his statement. Now, it comes down, as I think your Honor will see, to the inquiry whether you can prove the fact as it did occur, whether it is in mode or form as your Honor intimates, or whether it is the truth of it. The fact cannot be inquired of, when the only inquiry on the other side has been what he stated. It is hearsay evidence about what is not made evidence by any inquiry of mine.

Mr. Beach—The fact they attempt to prove, Sir, by this line of inquiry is that Mrs. Tilton made statements in the presence of her husband to her mother, in which she maintained her innocence. The inquiry of the counsel, and the answer of the witness, does not give the expressions—the language which was used by Mrs. Tilton. It contains the conclusion, the judgment of the witness, derived from what Mrs. Tilton stated to her mother. When the witness says she always maintained, in the presence of her mother that she was innocent, why that is a mere conclusion. It is not giving the details of what passed between herself and her mother leading to that conclusion. Now, the question which we propose to this witness is ask this witness to explain what he meant by the term "maintain;" and how it was that Mrs. Tilton, under these circumstances, maintained her innocence to her mother. The fact that we are getting at the fact that will be used against Mr. Tilton as the evidence now stands will be that he declared that Mrs. Tilton did maintain her innocence. Now, in answer to that, Sir, we have a right to know the particular manner and form of language and expression which Mrs. Tilton used in conveying that impression and conclusion to the mind of this witness which he expressed to the Committee that she thus maintained her innocence. Now, it must be proper, I think, where the counsel by a question calls out a conclusion which must be founded upon the declaration of a party, that we may get the precise declaration from which that conclusion is derived; and that is the precise mode of examination which we propose to pursue, and the precise object which we wish to reach. Their object, and the effect of this evidence, is to show that Mr. Tilton declared that his wife did a certain thing, and we ask to show the manner in which she did it, and that is the whole of this question, if your Honor please, and I know no rule of law which should exclude it; and I know no principle of evidence which leads to the investigation, and the establishment of truth, which should exclude it.

Mr. Evarts—I have offered no evidence whatever as to anything that passed between Mrs. Tilton and her mother, or Mrs. Tilton and this witness. There is my learned friend's mistake. If I had drawn from this witness a piece of evidence that his wife did maintain to her mother, in his presence, her innocence, then my learned friend would be within a rule that could show the particular facts that occurred, I having drawn out the fact of this maintenance by the wife to her mother.

Mr. Beach—That is the very fact you did draw out.

Mr. Evarts—I did not draw it out; I haven't said a word about it. I have asked this witness whether he said so, and nothing else.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps the counsel considers it drawing the facts out.

Mr. Beach—It is proving the fact by the declaration of the party.

Mr. Evarts—I do not prove the fact in the least. It may have been an entire falsehood, just as consistently with any question I have asked, or any answer I have got, or any use to be made of any answer I have got. If I were appealed to for my belief whether it were true or not—

Judge Neilson—You would not say.

Mr. Evarts—I should not say under your Honor's admonition that I should not. [Laughter.]

Mr. Beach—I understand Mr. Evarts's proposition to be that when he proves by the declaration of a party a certain fact that he does not produce it in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Does not draw it out.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—My learned friend cannot misunderstand me, it would seem to me. Certainly he is able to understand the difference between my asking this witness "did your wife maintain to her mother her innocence?" and his answer that she did, giving a right then to pursue the tenor of the conversation on a re-direct that I had drawn out. When I have asked any such question, when I have sought any such evidence, when I have any such evidence, it will be time then to apply the proposition that, having drawn out the tenor of a conversation by my inquiry concerning the conversation, they can draw out the particulars to correct the tenor.

Judge Neilson—But is there a substantial difference between the case before us, where you draw it out in this form—

Mr. Evarts—I did not draw it out.

Judge Neilson—You have it in the answer.

Mr. Evarts—I haven't it in the answer.

Judge Neilson—But the answer says so.

Mr. Evarts—I haven't it in the answer.

Judge Neilson—Read the answer, please.

Mr. Evarts—I have nothing but his statement that he said so. It is not drawing it out at all, if your Honor please. The only thing that I draw out is that this witness has made a statement concerning his wife's innocence.

Judge Neilson—The statement; not a statement, but the statement which you read to him.

Mr. Evarts—Well, a statement. I asked him if he did not make that statement.

Judge Neilson—That statement.

Mr. Evarts—He has made it. Included in that statement is a recital of his own, that his wife had done so and so. That don't prove that she had done so and so by anything that I had asked.

Judge Neilson—The question is whether you did not draw it out in that form.

Mr. Evarts—Am I not at perfect liberty to contend that there is not a word of truth in what he said—not a word of truth.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Evarts—May that not be the whole point of my inquiry, that he told something that was untrue.

Judge Neilson—When you make an inquiry that calls out the fact that he did state before the Committee, or did state to anybody else, that his wife had always, in her mother's presence, maintained her innocence, is not that the same thing, substantially, as if you had asked him in another form, and getting substantially the same answer.

Mr. Evarts—I think not, if your Honor please, in the least, and I think the cases do distinguish, as I think the necessary sense of the matter is. I do not undertake to examine this witness as to what passed between his wife's mother and her, nor do I undertake to prove the truthfulness of anything that is contained in that answer of his. He has given a certain line of testimony here, bearing upon the question of whether his wife is, or is not, guilty of adultery. I say: "Have you not said so and so?" Now, he denies it, or he admits it, as the case may be. In this case he admits it, as I understand. If he had denied it, why, then, my only point would be to prove, not that his wife had said so and so to her mother—I would not have been allowed to do that, to contradict him, and all I would be permitted to prove was what he had said on the subject, and then I could not confirm, or emphasize, the weight of that proof concerning what he had said, by proving the truthfulness of what he had said. That I understand, if your Honor please, to be an entire distinction—to be the clear distinction between undertaking to give evidence concerning a fact and undertaking to give evidence that a witness has said so and so. Now, I believe nothing is better settled in the law of evidence than that this inquiry into the truth or the fact of a statement concerning which statement alone the witness has been called to give testimony is well settled.

Judge Neilson—I think that is settled.

Mr. Evarts—Now, the counsel hands me a case in Massachusetts. [Reading:]

A witness having testified to negotiations for exchange of horses, another witness was called to prove that the former witness had previously given a very different account of what was said at the time referred to. The former witness was then recalled, and explained that the circumstances testified to by the second witness were those of another exchange on a different occasion. Held, that it was not competent to corroborate him by proof that the other exchange thus referred to actually took place.

Well, you could not confirm it by himself, any more than by any other witness.

Where a witness denies that he stated a fact as another witness has testified that he did, and testifies that he stated a different fact, evidence that the fact existed which he testifies that he stated is inadmissible to corroborate him.

And all turning upon the point that the only inquiry being, not what was true, not what did take place, but what did you say, that that is the end of the inquiry, and that neither on one side nor the other, can the fact be inquired into.

Judge Neilson—The cases are remote, not only geographically, but remote from the very question in issue here. The question is this: You have before you, in the printed book, the question which was put to the witness, and his answer, before the Committee. You cannot be taken by surprise. Having words before you, you interrogate him: "Was this question put to you, and did you answer as here stated?" reading the answer; and he admits he did, and in that answer is this statement: "That she always maintained her innocence, in my presence, to her mother." And now the simple question is whether the witness—you having introduced the subject in that form—whether the witness can state how or in what manner she maintained her innocence to her mother, not proving that what he did say was true, or contradicting what he said, but simply following out the line further as to the manner in which he stated what you have proved was stated.

Mr. Evarts—But is not the whole point, if your Honor please, the line, as your Honor indicates, the whole line, as to what he said to the Committee, and nothing else. If he went on and explained to the Committee how it was that she maintained before her mother, and if we reduced or qualified what he had stated, then it would be admitted, as a part of the qualification that he gave, but as he did not give it to the Committee it forms no proper qualification of his statement to the Committee.

Judge Neilson—It does not come in as a part of the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—No, not at all; and therefore it comes within the rule that an inquiry into what a witness has said does not admit evidence pro or con as to the truth of what he said.

Mr. Fullerton—The inquiry is as to what a party has said.

Mr. Beach—The counsel overlooks entirely the distinction which is to be taken between a disinterested witness, sworn in a cause and a party produced in the cause. The effect of this declaration, which they have drawn from Mr. Tilton, is to prove the fact declared that his wife maintained her innocence. That is the ultimate fact, object and effect of this evidence coming from the party which is said to be proved, and is proved, and unless it is contradicted by superior evidence that declaration of the party, that his wife uniformly maintained her innocence, is an established fact in this case, and upon which counsel can argue, and upon which this jury in their judgment can rely. Now, these cases, which are produced by the counsel, relate entirely to a witness who is sought to be contradicted by proof of inconsistent statements made out of court, and there it is ruled that where the witness answering the impeaching witness, referred his testimony to a different occasion than that to which the impeaching witness testified, that it was not competent to prove, as a matter of fact, that this other occasion really existed. It has no relation whatever to the point that is in dispute before your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Nobody can doubt that the witness or the party might say that the transaction related to a different exchange of horses.

Mr. Beach—Yes, undoubtedly.

Judge Neilson—The question was whether he could call some other person to swear to the fact that there was such an exchange.

Mr. Beach—Exactly. Now, they proved that Mr. Tilton, in his examination before the Committee, declared that his wife maintained her innocence under certain given circumstances. I repeat, Sir, that that is not a rehearsal of what passed between Mrs. Tilton and her mother. It is not giving the evidence, the facts upon which he drew the conclusion that she maintained her innocence. It is a mere expression of the judgment of the witness upon the language which Mrs. Tilton used. Now, we are not seeking to contradict that; we are not denying that; there is no question of impeachment or contradiction. We simply ask the witness to explain what he means by the term "maintained," in what way his wife maintained her innocence, so that he declared that as his conclusion from what he heard her declare. Now, it is said, Sir, in an authority handed me, that "in the re-examination of a witness it will be allowed to ask him any questions necessary to explain matters elicited from him in his cross-examination." Well, what is a very familiar rule, Sir. It is not announcing any new doctrine. Isn't it necessary, Sir, when they can go to your Honor and this Jury with the declaration of Mr. Tilton, that Mrs. Tilton maintained her innocence, in explanation of that declaration of Mr. Tilton to that effect? Isn't it proper to ask this witness how, by what language, by what form of expression Mrs. Tilton thus maintained her innocence? If the declaration of Mr. Tilton to that effect upon a solemn occasion establishes the fact in the absence of all other evidence, that is, that his wife did so assert her purity, isn't it proper for him, in explanation of that declaration, to show in what manner she made that assertion? The fact is, Sir, the proven fact by this evidence is, that she did so in some way, either express or modified, more or less emphatic; and that is arrayed, Sir, as a fact contrary to the charge which is made by Mr. Tilton in this action. Mr. Tilton says Mr. Beecher was guilty of improper connection with his wife. Why, they say, "No; Mr. Tilton, your wife constantly denied this; you acquiesced in it; you promulgated that denial upon an occasion when this very subject was under examination." Now, isn't it proper for us to show, Sir, what were the circumstances which induced him to make this declaration, and how it was that the declaration happened to be made; how the circumstances and surroundings, as well as the character of the language used, modified the force and effect of the declaration which he made in proof of the fact which they seek to establish, that Mrs. Tilton thus asserted her innocence? And is it possible that a party upon the stand can be placed in that position of making a naked declaration which, uncontradicted, is conclusive against him of a fact asserted, without having from him any explanation of the circumstances out of which that declaration arose; and what was the meaning and the purpose of the declaration as qualified by these circumstances? It seems to me, your Honor, to be admissible.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please—

Mr. Fullerton—Just wait one moment, if you please.

Mr. Evarts—I want the closing.

[Mr. Fullerton consults with Mr. Beach.]

Mr. Beach—The suggestion of my learned friend is that this brings the question to a very simple and present test. Suppose, instead of putting this question—the effect would be the same precisely, as your Honor will perceive—they had asked—this witness now upon the stand, "Have you ever said that your wife always maintained her innocence?" and he answered "Yea." That is just the result of this evidence. It is a mere change of circumstance; it is not altering the substance or the tenor, or the legal effect of the question. Now, if that question had been thus put, and thus answered by this witness, might we not ask him how she maintained her innocence?

Judge Neilson—The suggestion is that it does not depend upon a matter of form.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—My learned friend has suggested now, for the first time, that the rules of evidence are different in respect to a party who is a witness and one not a party, but nothing is more familiar since the introduction of parties, than that they are to be judged in regard to their capacity to give evidence precisely upon the rules that apply to other witnesses.

Mr. Beach—I have not asserted that the rules of examination are different, Sir. I have maintained no such proposition.

Mr. Evarts—Why was the distinction referred to?

Mr. Beach—The distinction was referred to because when you get a declaration from a witness as to what he has said, in an attempt to impeach him by contradictory statements, it is no evidence of the fact which is embodied in the language which he may have used; but when you get that declaration from a party, Sir, it is evidence against him, it proves the fact unless it is overborne by other witnesses or explained.

Mr. Evarts—Well, but if it don't affect the rule of evidence why is it referred to.

Mr. Beach—It does affect the law of evidence, but not the rules of examination, as the gentlemen said.

Mr. Evarts—There is some difference, I suppose, or else it could not be insisted upon.

Mr. Beach—Yes, I should think there was.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I am insisting that you say that there is a difference, and then I understood you to disclaim it. Now, if your Honor please, nothing is truer than that when a party is offered as a witness he stands upon the rules of evidence for his examination and his cross-examination that attend the examination of every other witness, and this is wholly a question of the course of examination, whether our course of cross-examination lets in a certain line of proof for re-examination, and that being a question of the production of the evidence of a party, like the production of the evidence of any other witness, this rule of the consequence of his own line of examination leading to a right of this or that extent is the same for a party as for a witness. Now, there are other rules of evidence that are different in respect to a party, from what they are to a witness; that is to say, to contradict a witness by counterstatements he has made out of Court, it may be necessary to lay the foundation, by inquiries of him, but to contradict a party by statements that he has made out of Court, whether he is a witness or not, you do not need to lay any such foundation. But that is aside from this inquiry. Now, my learned friend insists upon putting it, that the subject-matter of my cross-examination has been what took place between Mrs. Tilton and her mother and Mr. Tilton, or some two of them. There is the complete mistake. I have not asked a single question concerning any such transaction. I have only asked him, "Did you on a certain occasion, in answer to a certain question, make a certain answer?" and then all that re-direct-examination can do for that situation is to introduce any explanatory observations that he made as a part of that conversation, or within any such range of conversation as the law shall tolerate as forming a part of it; but that is all he stated in qualification, and not any recurrence to the facts of the case concerning which his statement was made.

Judge Neilson—Will you allow me to look at the book, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—At the question and answer? The pamphlet—your Honor asks for the pamphlet?

Judge Neilson—Whatever you read from.

Mr. Evarts [To Mr. Shearman]—The yellow pamphlet.

Mr. Fullerton—We have got the yellow pamphlet.

Mr. Evarts—Well we have got plenty of them.

Mr. Fullerton—There is a copy. [Handing a book to the Court.] It is marked, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will observe that the fact, whether the wife admitted or denied her guilt, cannot be evidence for or against either party.

Mr. Beach—That is quite a mistake, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, his Honor has said so.

Mr. Beach—His opinion will be changed upon reference to the authorities, then.

Mr. Evarts—I understand it to be that.

Mr. Beach—I understand it not to be that.

Mr. Evarts—We will see.

Mr. Beach—We shall see.

Mr. Evarts—That ultimate fact is not a matter introduced in evidence on either side.

Judge Neilson—Where do I find this question? Is it marked here?

Mr. Fullerton—It is encircled; it is surrounded with a red line.

Judge Neilson—You extorted from the plaintiff the admission that "she maintained to her mother, in my presence, that she had not done wrong." When you put the question, you had this in print before you, and saw what it was.

Mr. Fullerton—And read it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt I read it.

Mr. Fullerton—Not only saw it, but read the whole of it.

Judge Neilson—Did it advisedly?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—It was no ground of surprise. No matter whether it was advisedly or not. "She maintained to her mother in my presence that she had not done wrong." The inquiry now is, how did she thus maintain to her mother—isn't it?

Mr. Evarts—Yes. Now, if I had extracted from him, or extorted, as your Honor's phrase is, that fact, that she maintained her innocence to her mother, if I had inquired concerning any conversation between her and her mother on that subject, they could have gone into the conversation; but I did not.

Judge Neilson—The question is whether you virtually and substantially do not do so here.

Mr. Evarts—Then it comes to this, if your Honor please, whether, when I ask a man if he said so and so, that is equivalent to asking him whether the fact is so and so.

Mr. Fullerton—But the fact is proved against him if he is a party.

Mr. Beach—It is proving by the declarations of a party, a fact.

Judge Neilson—That is the distinction between examining a witness and a party.

Mr. Evarts—There is not any difference between the examination and the cross-examination.

VAGUE RULES OF EVIDENCE DEFINED

Judge Neilson—I think I will allow him to answer the question.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception. It is the usual hour of adjournment, if your Honor please, and after. [To plaintiff's counsel.] Well, is it long or short?

Mr. Beach—It is short, I suppose. We may as well take the answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is pretty broad at any rate.

Mr. Beach—Suppose it is. Please oblige me.

Q. Mr. Fullerton—Well, go on and answer the question, Mr. Tilton. I am willing to go on. In what way did she maintain her innocence in the presence of her mother? A. She always used to say, Sir, that she was not to be judged either by her mother or by me, but by God. She believed that God would judge her tenderly. She said she loved God, and she did not believe that God would have permitted her to enter into those relations if they had been sinful, and she said particularly that neither her mother nor I had made it the business of our lives to understand what was right and wrong as Mr. Beecher did; that Mr. Beecher was a clergyman; that he was a great and holy man; that he had repeatedly assured her that their relationship was not sinful, and she did not see how it could be sinful; that he had told her that love justified all things; that love had various expressions; that one expression was the shake of the hand; another expression was the kiss of the lips; another expression was sexual intercourse, and it made very little difference what the expression was; if that love was right, the love itself made rightful or justified all the various expressions of it, and that she believed before God that her love for Mr. Beecher was right and his for her was right; and therefore she did not see how any of the various expressions of it could be sinful. She said she rested on Mr. Beecher's authority for that; that he had told her so over and over again.

Mr. Evarts—Now, your Honor, I move to strike out all this answer.

Judge Neilson—We will take this up in the morning and see.

Mr. Evarts—My motion will be entered.

The Court then adjourned until to-day, at 11 o'clock.

TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. TILTON'S TESTIMONY FINISHED.

THE PLAINTIFF'S LAWYERS TRY UNSUCCESSFULLY TO INTRODUCE IN ANOTHER FORM ADMISSIONS FROM MRS. TILTON—LONG ARGUMENT OVER AND FINAL ADMISSION OF ONE OF THE MONTICELLO LETTERS—SHARP RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION—MR. BOWEN'S $7,000 CHECK PUT IN EVIDENCE—A JURYMEN FAINTS IN COURT.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 17, 1875.

In opening the court to-day Judge Neilson delivered a severe reprimand to the audience for expressing opinions and interrupting the proceedings with remarks to each other, and with grimaces signifying satisfaction or dissatisfaction. He reminded the spectators of what Hamlet said about silent protest. Mr. Fullerton resumed his re-direct examination of Mr. Tilton by reading for identification portions of the cross-examination of that witness in the Plymouth investigation which contained references in a complimentary form to Mrs. Tilton. The alert Mr. Evarts sprang to his feet at the next question asked by Mr. Fullerton, which was put to discover the nature of the interview between Mrs. Tilton, her husband, and Bessie Turner, at which Mr. Tilton says that the truth of the scandal was stated. This was another effort to get in evidence what would practically be a confession of Mrs. Tilton, and after a long discussion over Mr. Evarts's objection, Judge Neilson allowed the witness to say when the interview occurred. What was said during it was ruled out. Mr. Tilton was asked to remove, if possible, the apparent inconsistency in his testimony in the matter of the interview with Mr. Beecher of Dec. 30, 1870. The "True Story" states that he told Mr. Beecher to go and see Mrs. Tilton, while in his direct testimony he asserted that Mr. Beecher asked if he might go. The Judge allowed the explanation of the witness, despite objection, saying that he saw no inconsistency. The defense having drawn out that Mr. Tilton told Mrs. Morse of his wife's alleged sin, knowing his mother-in-law's infirmity for tale bearing, Mr. Fullerton asked the witness if he thought at the time that Mrs. Morse would repeat what he told her. Mr. Evarts quickly objected, and even after Judge Neilson decided that the witness might reply, he continued to argue tenaciously. The next topic was concerning the Catherine Gaunt letter, the examiner asking the witness if Mrs. Tilton might not have communicated its contents to anybody. A sharp legal skirmish followed this, and Mr. Evarts met with partial success. Mr. Tilton's views regarding the Commune were asked for, and he answered that the French Communists were those people in Paris who believed in governing that city just as Brooklyn is governed. In other words, said he, the aim of Communism is for local self-government as established in every American city. Rossel was again highly eulogized. The "Winsted affair" was briefly touched on, the witness testifying that his companion at Winsted, whose presence with him there caused the scandal, was a school girl about 16 or 17 years of age.

An interesting discussion, lasting nearly an hour and a quarter, followed on the heels of the attempted introduction by Mr. Fullerton of two letters of Mrs. Tilton to her husband, written from Monticello, New-York. With the rather scanty collection of law books before the lawyers they began to search for law decisions authorizing the rejection or admittance of such letters under the circumstances. Clerks were immediately dispatched to the offices of the counsel near by for more authorities, while Mr. Beach and Mr. Fullerton made addresses covering all the points which suggested themselves in the absence of law authorities. They finished speaking a few moments after 1 o'clock, and notwithstanding it was the hour of recess, Mr. Evarts began his argument. He paused at 1:10, however, and at the suggestion of Mr. Beach the court adjourned to 2:15. After the interval Mr. Beach again took up the line of argument, quoting various law decisions, etc., to show that the letters might be read. Mr. Evarts followed him, and Judge Neilson decided to admit one of the letters, because he thought that the letter affected the question of damages. The letter admitted was written by Mrs. Tilton to her husband, and was dated July 4, 1871. Mr. Fullerton read it with decided effect, giving peculiar emphasis to the words, "Oh, my dear husband, may you not need the further discipline of being misled by a good woman, as I have been by a good man."

Soon after this Mr. Fullerton announced that he was through, and then Mr. Evarts began the re-cross-examination. His questions with Mr. Tilton's answers lasted through the remainder of the afternoon session, and they were carried on sharply and with rapidity, Mr. Evarts pressing inquiries apparently with the intention of concluding with the day. The most important development was the fixing of the day on which Mr. Tilton received the $7,000 from Mr. Bowen. The witness had said that the money was paid two or three days before the signing of the tripartite agreement, which took place on April 2, according to that document. The check for $7,000 was produced and bore date of April 4. If Mr. Tilton signed the tripartite agreement on the day it was dated, the check indicates that he received the money two days after signing it, instead of two or three days before.

With a few questions regarding the knowledge of the witness of Mr. Beecher's gifts to Mrs. Tilton, the volume of testimony of Mr. Tilton was shut, and he stepped from the chair.

Just as Judge Neilson's gavel, adjourning the court, dropped at the close of the afternoon session, William H. Davis, one of the jurymen, was observed to close his eyes and suddenly grow pale. Judge Neilson noticed his condition before any one else, and immediately ordered one of the large windows to be opened, the man being evidently about to faint. Mr. Davis partially recovered, and expressed his ability to care for himself, but as he arose to go, he fell helpless into the arms of his fellow-jurymen. He was carried behind the jury seats, and the strong breeze from the open window was allowed to blow over him; cold water was dashed upon him, and a physician sent for. Judge Neilson directed Officer Spaulding to accompany the sick juror to his home.

Mr. Tilton was declared competent to testify on Monday, Feb. 1, and took the witness-chair on that day. His direct examination continued two days and a half. The cross-examination occupied eight days, and the re-direct and re-cross-examination one day and a half more.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

DEMONSTRATIONS BY THE LOOKERS-ON REBUKED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Neilson—The experience of yesterday makes it necessary I should ask the audience to be more quiet hereafter. I think a witness ought to be called here and examined without any gentleman present testifying what they think of it, without gentlemen turning to those who sit near them and making remarks about it and making faces, either by way of approbation or disapprobation. And the significance of this you might understand well, if you remember what Hamlet says about silent protest, or silent expressions of opinion, or recall the effect of pantomime, as a very eloquent mode of expressing opinions. As a matter of decency and respect to the Court, and respect to the oath taken by the witness, I must ask that it be discontinued; and I shall make direct personal appeal to any gentleman that I see hereafter offending against this rule.

Theodore Tilton was then recalled, and the re-direct examination resumed.

MR. TILTON'S PRAISE OF HIS WIFE'S GOODNESS.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Tilton, when you were before that Committee, did you say anything else in reference to the purity of your wife, in answer to questions put to you at that time? You may look at that and see if it refreshes your recollection. [Handing witness a book.]

Mr. Evarts—Before answering, let us know what it is.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, certainly.

The Witness—Which part do you desire me to look at?

Mr. Fullerton—The part marked in red there—in rubric. A. Well, Sir, the part to which you call my attention, marked in red, is very badly bungled in its expression. Some of it makes very little sense.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Fullerton, I asked you to show it to me before he answered.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I shall not call attention to what it is.

Mr. Evarts—Before any answer is given by the witness let us see it.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly. [To the witness.] Was the substance of that testimony given before the Committee by you? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, before any answer is given I ask to see it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, if he said the substance was not given I should not ask him. [Handing the book to Mr. Evarts.]

Q. On your direct examination, Mr. Tilton, you were asked this question: "Have you not frequently asserted the purity of your wife?" To which you answered: "No; I have always had a strange technical use of words; I have always used words that conveyed that impression; I have taken pains to say that she was a devoted Christian woman; that necessarily carried the other; it was like the statement that I carried to Dr. Storrs; I do not think he caught the idea of the statement; as he took it I do not think that it covered the whole; I have said that Elizabeth was a tender, delicate, kindly, Christian woman, which I think she is." Did you answer in substance that?

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I asked the question whether—[taking the book]—I asked him this—if I can find the cross-examination—I remember asking him whether he had not said in answer to a question, "Have you not frequently asserted the purity of your wife?" "No; I have always had a strange technical use of words; I have always used words that conveyed that impression." That, I think, was the point to which I asked my question, and I understood the witness to answer that he did not. I do not mean that he flatly said that he did not, but that he did not recognize—that he made some comment about the phraseology.

Judge Neilson—Well, that was a verbal criticism.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I would like to find if we can, if your Honor please, my cross-examination, because I don't know exactly what my learned friends propose in that connection. It is at the 700th page, it is said

Mr. Shearman—No; it is February the 8th.

Mr. Evarts [referring to testimony]—This is the matter that I introduced—February 8th. [Reading:]

Q. On this same examination, in answer to this question, "Have you not frequently asserted the purity of your wife?" did you make this answer: "No, I have always had a strange technical use of words; I have always used words that conveyed that impression?" A. I cannot see any sense in that word "strange," Sir; I think there must be some misprint; what I meant was that I had always tried—

Q. Well, I ask whether you made that answer or not? A. Well, I did not make use of any such words as "strange technical use;" it is evidently a misprint; you can see it yourself.

Q. I don't know anything about it. You say you did not make that answer? A. Why, I say, Sir, that of course I did not make any such answer: "A strange technical use of word!" There is some other—it is wrong—bad English—it is not right. I will tell you what I said—

Q. Well, did you say, "I have always used words that conveyed that impression?" A. I did, Sir, and I always used such words on purpose, to convey to everybody the impression that she was a pure and good woman, and if any word of mine will carry the impression about the earth to-day, I should like to utter it from this stand.

Q. Well, then, you did use words that were intended to convey the impression of the purity of your wife? A. I did, Sir. But I did not use it in that form. I did not use the word "purity." I used other words. I think she is a pure woman.

Q. You used words that conveyed that impression? A. Yes Sir.

Q. But used other words to do it, with the intention to convey? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And with the effect of conveying? A. Yes, Sir; with that deliberate design, for I hold, with Mr. Beecher, that she is guiltless.

Q. And with that constant effect? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, that is the cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, my proposition is to prove what else he said at that time, and what words he used.

Judge Neilson—You can do that. Go on.

Mr. Evarts—You mean in answer to that question?

Mr. Fullerton—I mean at first in answer to that question, and by and bye I shall mean differently.

Mr. Evarts—I suppose it is allowable to prove what he has said in answer to that question.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, at the same time of using the language that has been recited in your presence, in answer to the question put to you by Mr. Evarts, did you also say: "I have taken pains to say that she was a devoted Christian woman. That necessarily carried the other. It was like the statement that I carried to Dr. Storrs. I do not think he caught the idea of the statement; as he took it, I do not think that it covered the whole. I have said that Elizabeth was a tender, delicate, kindly, Christian woman, which I think she is." Did you say that also in reply to the question, or that in substance? A. I did not say that about Dr. Storrs, but I said that about Mrs. Tilton. That allusion to Dr. Storrs is very blind and incorrect, bungled; but that allusion to Mrs. Tilton I am inclined to think is correct, because I did say that she is a good woman.

Q. In reply to the question at the same time: "Have you not stated that she was as pure as an angel?"—did you say: "No; Mr. Halliday says I said that; he asked me in Mrs. Bradshaw's presence whether or not I had not said that my wife was as pure as gold." "No," I said, "Mr. Halliday, because the conversation to which you allude was this: I said, 'Go and ask Mr. Beecher himself and he will say that she is as pure as gold;' it is an expression which he used; I have sought to give Elizabeth a good character; I have always wanted to do so; I think she deserves a good character; I think she is better than most of us—better than I am; I do not believe in point of actual moral goodness, barring some drawbacks, that there is in this company so white a soul as Elizabeth Tilton." Did you say that? A. I think I did, Sir; if I did not say it I said something like it.

Q. In answer to the question: "Did you not state that in substance to one or more of the gentlemen with whom you were luncheoning?"—did you answer: "In substance, yes; and I state it now, but I did not use the phrase that she had never violated her chastity." Was that the substance of the testimony? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—There is something more.

Mr. Beach—If there is anything there that they want read, read it.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, well, we don't care.

Mr. Fullerton—There is a great deal more there.

CONVERSATIONS BEFORE BESSIE TURNER OBJECTED TO.

Q. In your cross-examination, Mr. Tilton, this occurred: Speaking of the persons to whom you had communicated the story—the scandal—after naming some of them, you mentioned: "And then perhaps I ought to mention that there was a chance interview in my house, between Mrs. Tilton and myself, at which Bessie Turner heard the whole story." Do you recollect when that took place? A. I cannot fix the precise day, but it was the day on which Mrs. Tilton returned from Marietta.

Mr. Evarts—Where is the passage?

The Witness—Either in November or December, 1870.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—Wait a moment, Mr. Tilton. [Passage shown to Mr. Evarts in book.] Well, I think, if your Honor please, I was asking him in regard to, or commenced with, an inquiry about whether the sum and substance was not that he had stated that Mr. Beecher had made unhandsome proposals, with the exception of three persons. [Reading]:

Q. Now, when you were communicating the whole story, that is another matter; but, with the exception of those three persons (which he had named, I suppose,) the sum and substance of what you communicated yourself to other people was the unhandsome proposals or the impure advances? A. Yes, Sir.

Then the witness went on:

Then, perhaps, I ought to mention that there was a chance interview in my house between Mrs. Tilton and myself, at which Bessie Turner heard the whole story.

Q. I have not asked you that. I ask you, a voluntary communication which you made to outside people? A. I don't remember any other voluntary communications to outside people.

Now, what he said about Bessie Turner was not in answer to any question of mine, nor is it a part of anything drawn out. I objected to it at the time, and I called his attention to what my inquiry was: that it was his own communications. Now, whatever he said there about Bessie Turner should not be made the basis of an inquiry now by reason of my having introduced it in any cross-examination of mine.

Judge Neilson—I see.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will perceive that the learned counsel did not object to that part of the testimony at all.

Judge Neilson—He disclaimed it.

Mr. Fullerton—He disclaimed it only in a measure. The disclaimer was in these words, if it be a disclaimer at all: "I have not asked you that." That is no intimation that he did not take it. It is testimony in this case; it was called out by a question put by the counsel on the other side.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Mr. Fullerton—There was no motion to strike out; and, beside that, Sir, it was a proper answer for the witness to make to the question that was put. Now, I call your Honor's attention to the question and to the answer, and you will perceive that the witness could not discharge his whole duty unless he mentioned that fact, because it was a communication to Bessie Turner. He says that she was present at an interview between himself and his wife when she learned the whole story; she was permitted to be there; it was a communication to her, within the proper signification of the term, and a communication, too, by this witness; and when he was asked to whom he had communicated the story, he was under the strongest possible obligations to mention Bessie Turner with the rest, and he did mention her name as one to whom that story had been revealed. Now, your Honor will bear with me whilst I read this again, and see if I am not correct. After mentioning these names, Mr. Evarts says [reading]:

Q. Well, with those exceptions, was the sum and substance of all that you had ever said to the persons to whom you spoke, that Mr. Beecher had made unhandsome approaches to your wife? A. Yes, Sir; impure proposals; that is the sum and the substance. I did not wish to incriminate Mrs. Tilton.

Q. No matter what you wished; the fact was that that is all that you said? A. That is all I said.

Q. With the exception of these three persons? A. Well, understand me, Mr. Evarts, the three persons to whom I allude are persons to whom I told the story—there were other persons to whom I talked, to whom Mrs. Tilton told the story, and Mrs. Morse told the story.

Mr. Evarts—That you don't know anything about?

The Witness—I do know all about it.

Q. I am talking about persons to whom you communicated information. A. Yes, Sir, but I volunteered the whole story to those three persons, with the addition, perhaps, of Judge Morse.

Q. About him you do not remember? A. I don't remember the exact extent of that conversation with him.

Q. Now, when you were communicating the whole story, that is another matter—but with the exception of those three persons, the sum and substance of what you communicated yourself to other people, was the unhandsome proposals, or the impure advances? A. Yes, Sir; and then perhaps I ought to mention that there was a chance interview in my house between Mrs. Tilton and myself, at which Bessie Turner heard the whole story.

Judge Neilson—Now, you ask—

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I ask him when that took place.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think he can state when, merely the date, Sir; that is all. The date of an event refers—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I do not propose to limit myself to the date.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is the question now.

Mr. Everts—Well, that I suppose. I started this inquiry with this. [Reading]:

Q. Now, Sir, did you not say on that occasion (that is, before the Committee), in answer to this question: "I ask what evidence you stated against Mr. Beecher to Mr. Bowen"—in answer to that question, did you not make this answer: "I must answer your questions in my own way. I came to tell you the whole truth, and not fragments of the truth. Mr. Bowen wanted me to speak more in the paper of Plymouth Church." Mr. Johnson said: "Perhaps Mr. Tilton has a reason for not going to Plymouth Church," and thereupon Mr. Bowen was curious to know the reason. I, in a solitary phrase, said that there was a personal, domestic reason why I could not go there consistently with my self-respect; that Mr. Beecher had been unhandsome in his approaches to my wife. That is the sum and substance of all I have ever said on this subject, to the very few people to whom I have spoken of it?"

Now, that was my question; that is, taking a question and an answer from his examination before the Church Committee I, in the ordinary form, asked him: "In answer to that question did you not make this answer?" The witness then says, when I have propounded to him that question [reading]:

A. What is your question?

Q. Did't you in answer to the question read to you, make that answer? A. I didn't make the last part of that answer, Sir, and I repudiated in a public card that report of my interview. I distinctly, before the Committee, charged Mr. Beecher with adultery, and they did not put it in the report.

Q. Well, now, I am not asking you about that. It has nothing to do with it. I have asked you a simple question, whether in answer to the question I read to you, you did not make the answer that I read to you? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Very well; what you did afterwards I have nothing to do with.

The Witness—I did not, Sir; in other words, that Committee were informed by me—

Mr. Everts—No matter.

The Witness—It is the last clause.

Mr. Everts—I have not asked you anything about it.

Mr. Beach—Well, he has a right to answer that he made a part of that reply and part he did not. That is just what he was saying when you interrupted him.

Mr. Everts—No, he was not.

Mr. Beach—Well, I say that he—

"has," I suppose it should be: it is "was" here, and I again say that he has not, and Mr. Beach says "the minutes will show."

Mr. Everts—He was talking about the repudiation of the report.

Mr. Beach—He was not, Sir, when the counsel last interrupted him.

Mr. Everts—Well, I say he was.

The Witness—That was the substance of what I said to Mr. Bowen.

The witness goes on:

I didn't tell him the whole story, but I had told others the whole story, but very few.

Mr. Everts—Now, I have not asked you. You say that you did not make that last part of the answer? A. No, Sir; I say that the answer is imperfect; part of it is omitted; that is the answer that I generally made. There were a few exceptions to that answer, namely, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Moulton and Mrs. Bradshaw.

Now, I have gone on with the inquiry:

Q. Well, with those exceptions, was the sum and substance of all that you had ever said to the persons to whom you spoke that Mr. Beecher had made unhandsome approaches to your wife? A. Yes, Sir; impure proposals; that is the sum and the substance.

And then my learned friend has read on from that, and it ends in this question:

Q. Now, when you were communicating the whole story, that is another matter (that is, I excluded all talk when he was communicating the whole story); but, with the exception of those three persons, the sum and substance of what you communicated yourself to other people was the unhandsome proposals or the impure advances? A. Yes, Sir.

Then the witness volunteers—

Then perhaps I ought to mention that there was a chance interview in my house between Mrs. Tilton and myself, at which Bessie Turner heard the whole story.

I certainly had not introduced or inquired about any interview with Mrs. Tilton, or a part. I say then: "I have not asked you that. I ask you, a voluntary communication which you made to outside people"—meaning, outside of his wife.

Judge Neilson—Well, you remarked to the witness—

Mr. Everts [reading]:

A. I don't remember any other voluntary communication to outside people.

Then I ask him about what he had said to Mr. Moulton, which is on this very subject. Now, my learned friend says that I have made no motion to strike out. Well, if your Honor please, I don't understand that when I repudiate the answer as not being to the question, when it is not to the question, that it is in my introduction for the omission of a motion to strike out.

Judge Neilson—Well, it would not have been in but for your interrogatory, and being in, you would be at liberty to use it in your address to the jury.

Mr. Everts—Well, but I repudiate it; I don't want it; it is the very thing that I was not inquiring for.

Judge Neilson—You have made an intimation to the witness which would be a suggestion to be acted upon hereafter, to confine himself to the question. But still his answer, that part of it, stands as well as the other part.

Mr. Everts—Well, Sir, I now move to strike it out, as not called out by any cross-examination of mine. I certainly had no idea that it was in the testimony.

Judge Neilson—Well, were you not aware that it was a part of the testimony, and that you could use it.

Mr. Everts—I have never read this testimony since.

Mr. Beach—Will you allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he heard it delivered.

Mr. Everts—I heard it when it was delivered, but I immediately objected to it.

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Mr. Everts—Well, I say that I did.

Mr. Beach—Will you allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—In the first place Mr. Everts called for the persons to whom this witness had communicated the whole story, or put questions properly to lead to the naming of the three persons to whom the whole story had been told by this witness. He then goes on to inquire whether, with the exception of these three persons, he had not uniformly told those with whom he conversed that the extent of the offense was impure proposals on the part of Mr. Beecher. In the course of that inquiry it occurs to the witness that in the first branch of the inquiry he had omitted Bessie Turner. He then says to Mr. Evarts, "Now, I ought to say, Mr. Evarts (the sense is 'for the purpose of correcting my previous answer naming only three persons') that there was another person to whom I had communicated the whole story, making four instead of three." Now, isn't that perfectly proper, and isn't it evidence to be taken as a part of the answers to the first branch of the inquiry as to the persons to whom he had communicated the whole story? Mr. Evarts says, "Now, that is not my inquiry now." But yet it was a proper answer to the interrogatory which Mr. Evarts had previously put, and must stand as testimony. How would the witness stand under this examination if the motion is now made to strike out that answer?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir, I think it stands as part of the testimony. Mr. Fullerton, put your question; I think you can put that question and get an answer

GENERAL DISCUSSION.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, let us understand. When a witness volunteers a statement not in answer to a question, and counsel then rejects it, is it to be understood if counsel on the other side does not insist upon it that it remains in.

Judge Neilson—I think it does; I think you are at liberty to use it.

Mr. Evarts—It is not anything I had asked. I had drawn a line of examination as distinct as possible about this statement that he had made before the Committee.

Judge Neilson—He named three exceptions.

Mr. Evarts—He made then certain exceptions which he had a right to name.

Judge Neilson—Now, he named the fourth exception.

Mr. Evarts—But I did not inquire what he had said to other people at all. As he gave me exceptions, I set them all aside.

Mr. Fullerton—You inquired of the persons to whom he had communicated the whole story, and that is what he said.

Mr. Evarts—I set them all aside, and now say: "With those exceptions that you have made—"

Judge Neilson—I understand that.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I have not inquired at all what he said to other people.

Judge Neilson—That is very plain; I understand that.

Mr. Evarts—This Bessie Turner matter they say comes in now as a part of what he said to other people. Now, I haven't asked a word of what he said to other people including Bessie Turner.

Mr. Beach—You asked for the names of the persons to whom he communicated the whole story; that is calling for what he said, I take it.

Mr. Evarts—I asked whether the sum and substance of what he said to other people, was not this point that it was only unhandsome proposals, and he said: "With the exception of three persons to whom I told (what he calls the whole story) that was the sum and substance." Now, I don't ask a word of what he said to anybody except the persons to whom he told what was the sum and substance, and now, they say that Bessie Turner comes in as a fourth person, but I understand her to be rejected as not a person to whom voluntary communications were made, because I asked him—I say: "I have nothing to do with that; I am asking you as to persons to whom you made any voluntary communications."

Judge Neilson—I understand perfectly. You did not interrogate him as to what he said to Bessie Turner or to those other three persons, although it is quite apparent upon the face of the examination that he stated the matter to those persons differently from the statement to the persons about whom you particularly inquired.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I have not made an inquiry concerning any statement that he made to any person so as to give them a right to bring that out. But this matter of Bessie Turner stands upon the testimony; it must stand (I supposed it was excluded entirely), not in the position of a voluntary communication by him to her; he speaks of it as a chance interview between himself and his wife, in which we may assume there was a conversation, and Bessie Turner thereby, as he says—

Judge Neilson—It is implied that she became possessed of it in some form. This inquiry is as to the date of that occasion. When was it?

Mr. Evarts—Of the whole story. Now, on the face of that, it is a confidential communication overheard by somebody, which is not permitted to be given in evidence by a party to the communication. Bessie Turner is under no such obligation as would preclude her from stating what she overheard, if she did overhear it.

Judge Neilson—I think, if it is to be excluded, it is to be excluded on the ground that you did not inquire into the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—That is my point, and I think it is a very clear one.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not inquiring into the conversation to have the witness say that he told the whole story to the party?

Mr. Evarts—I did not ask that.

Mr. Beach—That you took as evidence, or allowed as evidence, in this case.

Judge Neilson—Is it not enough that he told the whole story differing as to those three or four persons, from what he said to the others?

Mr. Beach—In what respect did it differ? What was the whole story?

Judge Neilson—It differed in this, that it was the whole story.

Mr. Beach—But we do not understand what the whole story is, and they are at liberty to argue that that was not a charge of adultery—at perfect liberty to argue from that. If a witness is asked whether he told the whole story upon a given subject to a party, certainly, upon re-examination, it is admissible to ask what he told.

Mr. Evarts—I did not ask that question.

Mr. Beach—You got it out, Sir; you got it in the evidence, and you have a right to use it, as the Court decides, and if it be upon the records as evidence, then we have a right to know what it was that he said, constituting, as he says, the whole story.

Mr. Fullerton—I call your Honor's attention again to the question which called out this answer, and I repeat what I have already observed, that the witness was bound under his oath to say what he did in regard to Bessie Turner: "The sum and substance of what you communicated yourself to other people, was the unhandsome proposals, or the impure advances? A. Yes, Sir." Now, if he had stopped there would it have been true? Was he not bound to say, "I communicated something else to Bessie Turner, beyond impure proposals or solicitations?" The counsel upon the other side undertook to limit these communications, to every person, to impure advances or unhandsome proposals; and the witness having stated in the presence of Bessie Turner the whole story, was bound to say: "Sir, I did more than that; I communicated the whole story to Bessie Turner." Now, the gentleman says he did not call it out; I say that he did call it out.

Judge Neilson—You say that, in substance and effect, it is there.

Mr. Fullerton—It is there, and it is because the learned counsel called it out by his question. He put it there; he is bound by it. A lawyer is very apt to take a good thing whether he asks for it or not, if he can get it, and sometimes he has to take something that he don't like because he can't help himself, and this is just one of those instances. And when he undertook to limit the communications of this witness to all persons, to impure proposals, he said: "No; I went beyond that on one occasion; I communicated the whole story to Bessie Turner." I say it is a proper reply, it is a legitimate reply. It was a reply that he was bound to make, and it stands here as evidence in this case. And when the learned counsel comes to sum up this cause to the jury, he has a right to use that as an instrument against us, that that communication was made to Bessie Turner. And, in one view of this case, the learned counsel desired to show, and he will claim that he succeeded in showing, that this witness communicated this scandal to various persons, to attain some object, and among the rest, he will claim that Bessie Turner is to be enumerated. It is certainly very clear, Sir, that this is evidence in this cause, and that we have a right to follow it up on this re-direct, not only to ascertain when it was said, but what was said.

Mr. Evarts—Well, now, my learned friend puts it distinctly upon the proposition that when I am inquiring of this witness, in the line of cross-examination, whether or no the sum and substance of what he said to persons was not—whether he had not stated that the sum and substance of what he had said to other persons concerning this matter, was unhandsome advances, or impure proposals, and the witness answers, "No; to certain persons I had said something else;" then I say, "excepting those persons, wasn't it all that you said," and he says, "Yes," and then he says, "Perhaps I ought to say," [having named the three persons,]—"Perhaps I ought to say that in a chance interview, in my house, between Mrs. Tilton and myself, Bessie Turner heard the whole story;" I say, "I don't refer to anything but voluntary communications that you made to outside persons," (treating this as a matter between himself and his wife, as it certainly was); then he says, "I don't remember any other voluntary communications to outside people"—now it is claimed that, because I, not asking anything concerning any interview at which he has said anything, but the sum of the interview being that it was impure proposals, that, therefore, because he said there were some other people to whom he made other statements, that they have a right to inquire what those statements were. Now that is what it comes to, and Bessie Turner cannot stand any better than the rest. I suppose she will stand very differently, whenever the matter is approached and disclosed in regard to the circumstances of its being a statement to her. But that does not alter the proposition that I am not responsible for its introduction, whether in course of this inquiry in which I have not asked one word about any interview with anybody with whom he said that he didn't limit his interview to the impure proposals. That was my whole inquiry. I wanted only an answer to whether he had said so before the Church Committee. It ended in a discrimination as to what he had said, and what he had not said, which was all well enough; and then came in these inquiries in which I did nothing but exclude all conversations, with anybody and everybody, which had had for their subject anything but the impure proposals, and, having set them aside, I abstained entirely from any inquiry as to what passed between them and those persons. And now my learned friend says they have a right to introduce it.

THE FACT OF THE BESSIE TURNER CONVERSATION ADMITTED.

Judge Neilson—I understand that. [To Mr. Fullerton.] Is this statement of the Bessie Turner matter very material?

Mr. Fullerton—Very material.

Judge Neilson—Let us have it.

Mr. Fullerton—When was the conversation that Bessie Turner was present at?

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note my exception to any inquiry, as not based upon any cross-examination of mine, and not lawful in itself to them.

The Witness—I remember, Sir, very distinctly that it was on the day of Mrs. Tilton's return from Marietta, Ohio. I had gone in the morning in a carriage to meet her at the depot; this conversation took place in the afternoon of the same day, but I don't remember the exact day; I can't give the day of the month; it was either toward the close of November or in the beginning of December, 1870; that is as closely as I can state it.

THE CONVERSATION RULED OUT.

Q. Well, you say Bessie Turner heard the whole story; what was the whole story that she heard?

Mr. Evarts—Now, I object to that.

Judge Neilson—Well, I must rule that out, and it is quite apparent now that as to Bessie Turner and three other persons he made a statement of this matter quite different and quite beyond the statement which he had made to the other persons—the statements about which Mr. Evarts inquired. I do not think he has opened the door to bring in the conversation, either with Bessie Turner or with the other three persons, and I have no doubt that the jury understand the attitude of the witness on that subject. Certainly I do.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, I haven't any doubt that they understand it, but I think they would understand it a good deal better if they knew what the Bessie Turner story was. Your Honor will perceive—

Judge Neilson—This is clear, very clear, from the whole testimony that some of these persons, about whom the learned counsel inquired particularly, heard the statement limited to impure advances; equally as clear that as to three or four persons they heard much more—a very different charge. That is very clear upon the testimony as it stands, but I do not think he has inquired as to the conversation with those other persons sufficiently to justify us in receiving it.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, your Honor will perceive at a glance the object which the other side had in view in giving this evidence to show that in the various conversations between the witness and third persons that he limited the charge against Mr. Beecher to impure advances.

Judge Neilson—Now, I understand the motive of the witness: it has been revealed to us clearly and distinctly—the purpose and motive of the witness and also the exception as to those four persons.

Mr. Fullerton—That is very true, Sir; but I say again, their object was to limit these charges made by the plaintiff in this suit against Henry Ward Beecher, to impure proposals. We know just exactly what communications were made to these other persons named, communications that were impure proposals, and nothing beyond that.

Judge Neilson—Now, as he was an eye-witness, his versions of it to them, whatever his motive might have been—we understand his motive don't touch the principal fact at all.

Mr. Fullerton—But, Sir, they have laid the whole foundation for the argument that no adultery was committed, because the plaintiff in this case did not charge adultery in these conversations.

Judge Neilson—If that act was committed it would equally exist whether the plaintiff charged it or did not. He might gloss it over, qualify it, seek to get rid of it, try to protect his wife, be as sentimental as he pleased about it, but still the fact would remain.

Mr. Fullerton—The fact would remain undoubtedly, but if he glossed it over in nine cases, may we not show that in the tenth case he stripped everything from it and showed it in all its hideous deformity?

Judge Neilson—You might if he had inquired into the conversation; I think he did not.

Mr. Fullerton—They did inquire whether he had not limited himself to the charges of impure advances, and whether he had made any other charges to any other person, and he says, "I made the whole story known to Bessie Turner in the conversation between me and my wife when she was present." Now, we ought to know what that whole story was; we ought to be able to meet the other side by saying that although he limited that charge to impure advances in several instances, yet in one instance he told the whole truth. We are entitled to that; we are entitled to it in consequence of the course pursued by the other side. Shall they prove that a communication was made to Bessie Turner, and we not be able to prove what that communication was? I am aware that the counsel upon the other side do not wish it, and I am equally aware that his inquiry called it out. The answer was the legitimate result of that inquiry, and when we learn now that in several instances he qualified this charge and subdued it, may we not show that in another instance he told it just exactly as it was?

Judge Neilson—You could if it was a conversation they inquired into. I think it don't come within that rule.

Mr. Fullerton—Suppose, Sir, they put Bessie Turner upon the stand, to prove Mr. Tilton did not communicate the whole story to her.

Judge Neilson—Then you could recall him to meet that; that is plain enough.

Mr. Fullerton—I think it is equally plain that we might meet it now.

Mr. Evarts—Then I should have gone into the conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—You might go into it a little more fully.

Mr. Evarts—I have not gone into it at all.

Judge Neilson—That is my present view of it.

WHO SUGGESTED MR. BEECHER'S CALL ON MRS TILTON.

Mr. Fullerton—We must adopt it, then. [To the witness.] Mr. Tilton, I call your attention to what occurred between you and Mr. Beecher at the time of the interview on the night of the 30th of January, 1870? A. That date must be wrong.

Q. The 30th of December I should have said; I was wrong by one or two days. Who suggested that Mr. Beecher should go and see Elizabeth? A. Mr. Beecher asked permission to go.

Q. And you have already given us, I believe, your reply? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I understand you in your cross-examination to say, also, that you told Mr. Beecher to go and ask your wife whether she had not written you the letter? A. No, Sir; I did not. My wife asked me if I said such and such a thing.

Mr. Evarts—The record will show what I asked him.

Mr. Fullerton—But I want him to explain it.

Mr. Evarts—You are not entitled to ask him to explain it.

Judge Neilson—He may let him say what it was.

Mr. Evarts—I think, if your Honor please, that my cross-examination of the witness does not give them the right to explain that.

Judge Neilson—Suppose there was an inadvertence, a blunder.

Mr. Evarts—Then I agree that that be brought out in the proper form.

Judge Neilson—Let him explain that.

Mr. Fullerton—I shall not bring it out in any other form than I have now got it in, because I am correct about it.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor understands, and I think you intend to apply the rule to protect the rights of both parties in regard to this matter, and we mean that the adherence shall be maintained to that rule throughout. Now, the direct examination was this—

Judge Neilson—I recollect it, including a very solemn injunction which he gave the defendant on the occasion of his going.

Mr. Evarts—I did not interpose any new matter in cross-examining him about it.

Judge Neilson—You examined him in regard to it?

Mr. Evarts—I cross-examined him.

Judge Neilson—Now, if you got a new answer or a statement that differs from the other, he can call his attention to that.

Mr. Fullerton—The question put on cross-examination was: "I then said to him, 'It is but a few squares to my house; go and ask Mrs. Tilton for yourself whether or not she wrote the letter.'" A. Ah! that was my suggestion, not his.

Q. I ask whether you did not say that to him? And you answered, "I do not remember any such expression as that. Do you take it from my cross-examination before the Committee?" etc.

Mr. Evarts—Well,

Mr. Fullerton—And then afterwards—

The Witness—That was one of the softening passages from the True Story, as it is called.

Mr. Evarts—Well, no matter. I ask to have that answer of the witness stricken out if it is taken.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—No matter; I ask to have that stricken out, if it is taken.

Mr. Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Here he was asked:

I am not asking about that; I am trying to get the facts. Did you say it is but a few squares to my house, go and ask Mrs. Tilton for yourself, whether or not she wrote the letter? A. Well, I may, perhaps, have used some such expression; I do not remember; but it was not in reference to any doubt.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what next?

Mr. Fullerton—"No matter, you used the expression? A. That was only as to his surprise," &c.

Mr. Evarts—That is all I introduced.

Mr. Fullerton—My question now is whether the suggestion originated with you or Mr. Beecher, that Mr. Beecher should go and see Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—He can answer that. What is it?

The Witness—The suggestion originated with Mr. Beecher.

AN INCONSISTENCY EXPLAINED.

Mr. Beach—There is, Sir, an apparent inconsistency between these two answers, and I ask that the witness may be permitted to explain what he means by the answer he gave on the cross-examination, that he told Mr. Beecher to go and see his wife, to see whether she wrote the letter, whereas now he answers differently on the direct examination—that the visit came as a suggestion from Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—My recollection of it is that Mr. Beecher, having spoken of going, himself introduced the idea, and the witness consented; that is the way that it looks to me.

Mr. Beach—Very well. I want it so to appear on the record. Your Honor's ingenuity would, of course, see the correct explanation, but it should stand on the record.

Mr. Evarts—We are not commenting upon evidence, but the question is upon getting it, and getting it legally. This witness, who is also the party, had a very free utterance of this interview, without interruption, and in his own way. I cross-examined him as to a particular point and in that cross-examination he has given the answers that have been read to your Honor, which come to this, that Mr. Beecher indicating surprise that his wife should have said any such thing, he (the witness) said, "It is but a few squares to my house, go and inquire for yourself;" or something of that kind.

Judge Neilson—I don't remember any inconsistency myself. But if there be any, or any inadvertence or mistake, it should be explained; because it is our duty to take care of this witness as well as any other witness.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; if your Honor please, and of the truth also.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly, and that is the very object. We do not take care of the truth by getting an answer in an improper form and then holding the witness to it.

Mr. Evarts—And we do not take care of the truth by allowing a witness to modify his answer as many times as he pleases. The object, no doubt, is to get the truth, and the laws of evidence are so framed as to secure the best means of obtaining it, and they do not look to the protection of the witness, except so far as to protect the truth as it comes from him.

Judge Neilson—No doubt.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt that is your Honor's intention, that he should have an opportunity to state the matter truly. He has had that opportunity in his narrative, as given by him, without interruption. I take up a single proposition, to prove by him that on the indication of surprise from Mr. Beecher at the contents of what he had communicated to somebody as from his wife, he says: "It is but a few squares to my house," etc. Now, if that is a contradiction of his first statement, there it stands; and I think the learned counsel has been allowed to go as far as is permissible when he has asked a certain question which has been asked and answered, whether it originated with him or Mr. Beecher, and he has answered that it originated with Mr. Beecher. Now, that does not give them the right to reproduce the original examination at all.

Judge Neilson—It gives them the right to correct any apparent discrepancy if there be any.

Mr. Fullerton—I will put this question. [To the witness.] Whatever you may have said to Mr. Beecher in regard to going to your house to see Mrs. Tilton, was it before or after he asked permission to go? A. It was after he asked permission to go; and the phrase about a "few steps" is part of the narrative called "The True Story"—the softening—

Mr. Evarts—Stop! I object to that.

Mr. Beach—Confine yourself to the question.

Mr. Evarts—I wish to have that struck out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, this last remark. It is sufficiently distinct. Now, proceed, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Evarts—That was not an answer to any inquiry.

MRS. MORSE'S KNOWLEDGE OF PRIVATE INTER-VIEWS.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Tilton, in your cross-examination, in speaking of Mrs. Morse, the question was put, "But how did she find out what had passed confidentially or privately between Mr. Moulton, Mr. Beecher and yourself?" and I understood you to answer, "Because I told her and she told all the world." Did you mean to be so understood? A. No, Sir; that was an inadvertence. I never talked with Mrs. Morse later than October or November, 1870; that was before Mr. Moulton came into the case. I have had no conversation with Mrs. Morse for four or five years.

Q. What you told Mrs. Morse was prior to Mr. Moulton's having anything to do with the matter? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That the witness was about to correct next morning on his cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—I want him to correct it a little more fully.

The Witness—All the conversation I had with Mrs. Morse was with reference to facts that had been previously communicated by Mrs. Tilton, and not first by me.

Q. Now, did you suppose that Mrs. Morse was going to communicate what you told her to any one?

Mr. Evarts—I object to that question.

Judge Neilson—That is immaterial.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, Mr. Evarts made a significant remark after getting out the answer—"You did this, knowing of her infirmity."

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Beach—Now, may we not, in reply to that, get from the witness whether he told it expecting that she would repeat it?

Judge Neilson—Thus reminded, I think the question is proper.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will please to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes. The witness may answer that question.

Mr. Fullerton—Whatever you communicated to Mrs. Morse, did you suppose that she would repeat it to any person? A. No, Sir; I never told anything to her; she was nearly wild when she heard the story from Elizabeth, and I tried to keep life in her body for a while.

Mr. Evarts—I object to the answer. He was asked only in reference to what he communicated to Mrs. Morse, whether, or no, he believed that she would communicate it, and now he tells us something that his wife told her.

Judge Neilson—He explains; I think the explanation may stand.

Mr. Evarts—Not an explanation of what he said.

Judge Neilson—Yes; the whole thing may stand.

Mr. Evarts—Are we not at the mercy of the witness?

Judge Neilson—Parties are always at the mercy of witnesses; I think the answer may stand.

Mr. Evarts—The answer to a question which is limited, "Did you suppose that Mrs. Morse would communicate what you told her to any one else," would be yes or no. His entire answer, if your Honor please, would be, "I never communicated anything to her"—if that is a part of it; but is he then to be allowed to go on and say what his wife communicated to her?

Judge Neilson—I think it is a proper answer taken as it stands altogether.

Mr. Evarts—He certainly would not be allowed to interpose as an answer to the question what his wife communicated to Mrs. Morse. Certainly the inquiry did not embrace anything that his wife communicated to Mrs. Morse, and did not have the least reference to anything except what he himself communicated to Mrs. Morse; and yet under the line of cross-examination and of direct examination the witness made a voluntary statement concerning what his wife told Mrs. Morse, and that he had some opinion or other.

Judge Neilson—The question assumed that he had communicated something to Mrs. Morse. He had a right to qualify the statement and he has done so.

Mr. Evarts—He has a right to say that he did not communicate anything to Mrs. Morse; he has not a right to say that his wife did communicate it.

Judge Neilson—He has a right to indicate the fact somehow. It would not do to say that he did not communicate it, and let it stay there. I think the answer must stand.

Mr. Evarts—I move to strike out all parts beyond the answer to whether he supposed that she would repeat it—all in regard to what he said, and all that has reference to his wife.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—And I except to your Honor's ruling admitting it, of course.

MR. BOWEN'S FORFEIT JUST.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Tilton, the next question. Did you regard these $7,000, which you claimed from Mr. Bowen as your due under the contracts—as your just due? A. Yes, Sir; every cent of it.

Q. You supposed you were entitled to that sum by the terms of your contracts, the contracts having been ended? A. I knew that I was; no question about it.

Judge Neilson—You had no question in your mind? A. Nor in Judge Reynolds's mind.

Judge Neilson—Well, the arbitrators settled that; it was due to you, no doubt.

Mr. Evarts—I ask that what he said about Judge Reynolds's mind be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Yes; strike that out.

MRS. WOODHULL'S BUSINESS.

Mr. Fullerton—One word now with regard to Mrs. Woodhull. Was she a broker in Broad-st.; did she keep an office there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A public office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Like other brokers? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Advertised herself as a broker? A. Yes, Sir.

HOW THE CATHERINE GAUNT STORY CAME OUT.

Q. I understood you to answer with reference to the Catherine Gaunt letter that anything which any one knew from that letter must have come from you, because that letter was written to you. Do you know that your wife did not communicate to some one the contents of the Catherine Gaunt letter? A. She very frequently spoke about Catherine Gaunt.

Mr. Everts—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—Let the stenographer repeat the question.

[Question read by TAYLOR stenographer.]

Mr. Fullerton—Did you, or not, know that she had not communicated the contents of the Catherine Gaunt letter to any one?

Mr. Everts—I object to any answer beyond yes or no.

Judge Neilson—And he can say yes or no; that is the way to answer.

Mr. Everts—I object.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I will alter it.

The Witness—Either yes or no would not be a conscientious answer.

Judge Neilson—Did you know that she did not communicate it to any one? A. I don't know, Sir.

Mr. Beach—You do know.

Mr. Fullerton—He does know.

Judge Neilson—Or the other way.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you know the fact that your wife communicated the contents—

Mr. Everts—Wait; I object.

Mr. Fullerton—I am putting another question. Do you know that the contents of the Catherine Gaunt letter were communicated by any person other than yourself? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—I ask that that answer be stricken out. It was known that I was to object to the question; I rose to object, and Mr. Fullerton said to wait until the question was put.

Mr. Fullerton—It may be considered as unanswered, for the

Mr. Everts—Very well; then it is out. Now, I object to that, so far as any answer embraces anything said or done by his wife.

Judge Neilson—He can answer without referring to her.

Mr. Fullerton—He did answer the question without referring to her. He did not embrace Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Let the stenographer read the answer. [Answer read.] That may stand.

Mr. Everts—Understand me as objecting and excepting to its admission.

THE CELEBRATION OF ROSSEL'S DEATH.

Mr. Fullerton—I come now to the subject of the Commune.

The Witness—What subject?

Q. The Commune of France. What do you understand by the Commune of France? A. May I explain, Sir?

Q. Briefly. A. After the fall of the Empire, France was agitated with the question, what should be the new government? Those of our citizens who love America and American liberty said, "Let us have a government such as they have in the United States, a government of representation;" and the Communists, so-called, are those people in France who believe in governing Paris by precisely the same system of government under which we live in Brooklyn. For instance, what would be thought if the Mayor of this city should insist upon appointing all the Aldermen of all the wards, and denying to the people of the wards the right to elect their Aldermen? It would be a revolutionary proceeding. We hold to the opposite view. Every ward in this city elects its Aldermen; and the Mayor has no right to interfere. Now, the Communists in Paris insisted that, in the formation of the new government, every ward of the city—in other words, every Commune—should elect its representative, and that the Mayor should not appoint its representatives. In other words, "Communism" in Paris is local self-government as we practice it in every American city. On the other hand, that which is called "Republicanism" in France is that which, if it were brought into this country, would be denominated despotism, and would not be permitted for an hour. That is Communism. Every democratic citizen of Brooklyn, if he lived in Paris, would, by virtue of his American antecedents, and the principles of Thomas Jefferson, be a Communist, and nothing else.

Q. Whilst you approved, then, of the general principles of Communism, you did not approve of the excesses to which they went? A. No, Sir; neither did the leading Communists; neither Rossel.

Q. Now, I come to Rossel. What did you understand Rossel was put to death for? A. For a purely military offense.

Q. Did you understand that he was the murderer of the Archbishop of Paris and the Chief Justice? A. No, Sir; there was no man who protested more eagerly against it; there was no man who had a greater respect for religion than Rossel, either Catholic or Protestant, and the very last hours of his life he spent with pen and ink, writing a brief, beautiful and pathetic address to his fellow Communists of France, and the substance of which was: "My Brethren, if you ever rise to power in this country, never commit any atrocity: it will be unworthy of Liberty and of us who are dead."

Q. Did you understand that he was arrested by the Communists? A. Yes, Sir; and the head of the Commune, or the head of the party that was associated with the Communists, has written violently against Rossel—denounced him. Rossel was a Christian man, the son of a Scotch woman, brought up in the old Calvinistic faith, and he died like a hero and a martyr.

Mr. Everts [Interrupting]—If your Honor please, we don't want the history of Rossel.

Mr. Beach—I don't know; they have attempted to stigmatize us because we took part in a procession in his honor.

Mr. Everts—I object to it.

Judge Neilson—Let it stand as it is; I think the explanation proper in view of what was called out.

Q. Now, what was this procession in New-York which you joined? A. I will tell you exactly what it was. It was not a procession in which the great mass of men joined in, because it was for or against the Communists, for there were Communists in it and anti-Communists in it; a man who walked near me during part of the procession, an old man, was a Roman Catholic. The object of that procession was this: Rossel had been put to death, as I described it the other day, by a judicial murder; there was a procession to celebrate his death by a public funeral in New-York. A certain officer of the police (I have forgotten his name; perhaps the Superintendent) issued an edict saying that such a celebration should not be held. That edict immediately elicited on the part of the press such an outbreak, and on the part of all good citizens who love Liberty and Free Speech in every country, such indignation that many thousands joined in the procession for the purpose of testifying their regard for American Liberty. And, if it had been a procession for any other purpose, if it had been to any other end, the simple fact that the right of procession was denied would have brought me in it, and so would it thousands of other men who were there; it was not a procession of Communists more than of good citizens.

THE WINSTED SCANDAL.

Q. That brings me to the Winsted story. Who suggested that you should take this little sick girl to Winsted?
A. My wife suggested it; after I got ready to go on the journey she begged me to take this little girl with me.

Q. Where was this school girl staying? A. At my house.

Q. State why it was that she wanted to hear your lecture and why it was Mrs. Tilton's wish that you should take her? A. She was a friend of ours and a protegé of my wife's, and a member of a family all of whose members had interchanged visits at my house; she was a school girl at Connecticut and had had a severe illness, and had come to our house to be nursed; and when I was going to Winsted to lecture, as on a previous year I had gone with Mrs. Tilton, and we had such pleasant hospitality shown to us by a certain family there, I asked Mrs. Tilton if she would not come again. She said no, but asked me to take—(I won't name the name;) so, after I had got ready to start, and my bag was packed, I waited to take her; expecting when we got to Winsted to be entertained at the house where I was previously entertained; but the family were away, and we had to go to a hotel. There never was a better girl in the world than she; and it is an outrage to introduce her name with any reference to the case.

Q. What was the young girl's age? A. I don't know. This was when she was a school-girl. I never asked her age.

Mr. Beach—Well, about, from her appearance? A. I should think sixteen or seventeen; I don't know.

DIRECTION OF MR. TILTON'S SPENDTHRIFT TENDENCIES.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, in one of your letters you have spoken of your spendthrift tendencies, and asked your wife to check you. What had you reference to—what was the character of the expenditure referred to?
A. Well, Sir; I was always buying costly things to beautify my house—pictures, books, furniture, and the other luxurious frivolities which many rich men can indulge in and which men who are not very rich cannot. That is all. I don't exactly understand the character of the question.

Q. That is a sufficient answer. I didn't know but what it might have been in riotous living. I wanted to show it was not in riotous living, that you expended your money. A. No, Sir; I never indulged in riotous living.

Mr. Fullerton—I supposed not.

Mr. Evarts—There is no inquiry of that kind. I ask that that be struck out.

Mr. Fullerton—The riotous living?

Mr. Evarts—Yes; the riotous living.

Mr. Beach—Well, it is very proper.

Mr. Evarts—It is in answer to no question.

MR. SCHULTZ'S ADVICE ABOUT THE GOLDEN AGE.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you recollect the conversation with Jackson S. Schultz in regard to your matters? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State what you said to him?

Mr. Evarts—You mean the conversation I inquired about?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, of course.

The Witness—I went with Mr. Franklin Woodruff, in the month of either January or February, 1871, shortly before the founding of The Golden Age—I went with Franklin Woodruff to see Jackson S. Schultz. We went over to his store. We were told by his partner that Mr. Schultz was home. We went to Mr. Schultz's house. He was then sick with the gout, and gave us some good advice about what you call riotous living, and Mr. Woodruff laid before Mr. Schultz the project for establishing The Golden Age, and asked Mr. Schultz to contribute to the capital and become one of the stockholders. Quite a long conversation ensued between Mr. W. Woodruff and Mr. Schultz, I taking a very subordinate part. Toward the end of that conversation Mr. Schultz said that the enterprise is one of a character which ought to have the endorsement, he thought, of Mr. Beecher. He said that if Mr. Beecher would take part in the paper, or would approve of it, that it would be likely to succeed. Mr. Schultz asked me if Mr. Beecher was interested in it. I told him that Mr. Beecher had expressed a willingness to be interested in it—to do something for it, and then followed some conversation between Mr. Schultz and myself. I cannot report the phraseology of it, but the pith of it was this, that I could not put myself under any obligation to Mr. Beecher, but I did not tell Mr. Schultz the reason why.

Q. That was the substance of the conversation? A. That was the substance of the conversation; Mr. Woodruff was present throughout the conversation.

THE PERSON MEANT BY "MR. B."

Q. In many of these letters which have been introduced in evidence, written by your wife she speaks of "Mr. B.," but who was the Mr. B. of whom she spoke? A. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. And was Bessie Turner known by any other name in the family; was she mentioned in any other way than as Bessie, or Bessie Turner in the family, or in the letters which Mrs. Tilton wrote? A. She was sometimes called Libby.

Q. And whenever Libby occurs in the correspondence in evidence reference is made to Bessie Turner? A. Yes, Sir.

NO CONNECTION BETWEEN MR. BOWEN'S PAYMENT AND THE COVENANT.

Q. Was there any connection between the payment of the $7,000 by Mr. Bowen, and the execution of the tripartite agreement which has been put in evidence? A. Not the slightest, Sir.

Q. I understand you to say the $7,000 was paid in advance of the execution of that paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was not the condition precedent that the paper should be executed before the money was paid? A. No, Sir.

Q. No connection between the two things as I understand it? A. Not a shadow of connection.

MR. TILTON'S STORY TO MRS. BRADSHAW.

Q. You have been asked whether you didn't tell the story to Mr. Johnson and some others, and Mr. Richards, I believe, and Mrs. Bradshaw. What did you tell Mrs. Bradshaw?

Mr. Evarts—I have not asked that.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, you did.

Mr. Evarts—Not in the least. There is something in the direct examination about that. I have not asked any question concerning anything he told Mrs. Bradshaw; I have not asked any question concerning it.

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman forgets.

Judge Neilson—There were so many questions that I cannot assume to remember it.

Mr. Fullerton—It seemed the learned counsel has put so many that he has forgotten some of them himself. He asked the question, whether he told this story and to whom, and mentioned Mr. Johnson, Mr. Richards, Mrs. Richards and Mrs. Bradshaw.

Mr. Evarts—This is the same subject we have been just over, and which your Honor excluded.

Mr. Fullerton—No; not the same subject.

Judge Neilson—That is one of the persons classed.

Mr. Evarts—No, Sir; she is one of the three persons. I have not asked anything more.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; it is at another time and on another inquiry, and as to another subject altogether. The other inquiry was as to showing "The True Story," which was to Mr. De Witt, Mr. Dunklee, Mr. Clarke, and so on.

Judge Neilson [To Mr. Beach]: Can you find that, if you please.

Mr. Beach—I will try, Sir.

Judge Neilson [To Mr. Beach]: Are you looking for a needle in a hay stack?

Mr. Beach—I am hunting for a diamond on the sea shore.

Mr. Fullerton—It is there; if you look you will find it. That is certain. [To Judge Neilson]: Whilst Mr. Beach is looking for it, I will go on with something else, if it meets your Honor's approval.

Judge Neilson—Well.

MRS. WOODHULL'S DEemeanor BEFORE MR. TILTON.

Q. You have spoken of several visits which you made to Mrs. Woodhull at her residence in the City of New-York. I wish to ask you whether at the time these visits were respectively made her husband was at home? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In every instance? A. I think he was; in every one. I don't think I was ever at the house when he was not there.

Q. You have spoken of going to the house and into every room of the house. At whose request was that? A. Mrs. Woodhull's request.

Q. And what object did she expect to accomplish by taking you through the house, as she said at the time? A. She asked me if I heard her house was a house of ill repute. I told her I had heard it. She asked if I would do her the favor to see what answer she could make to it. I said I would listen. Said she, "I don't want you to listen; I want to show you something; I want to show you the house." She took me through the house, and it was, as I stated, perfectly empty, like a new house.

Q. What was Mrs. Woodhull's demeanor, in your presence, whilst you were at her house? A. She always acted like a perfect lady.

Q. In her conduct and conversation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see anything amiss in her whilst you were at her house? A. No, Sir; and her husband always acted like a perfect gentleman.

Q. Did they, by word or deed, try to impress upon you that their life—that their words and conversation were correct. A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That I object to, what they by word or deed attempted to do.

Judge Neilson—I think the other answer covers the whole ground.

Mr. Fullerton—I have been over the whole ground, and an imputation is cast upon the witness because he went to this place. I would like to show what the place was when he got there, and what the demeanor of the persons was when he got there.

Judge Neilson—That you have a right to ask.

Mr. Evarts—That he has asked. That I didn't object to.

Judge Neilson—Well.

A LETTER OF MR. BEECHER'S TO MRS. TILTON.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Tilton, a letter has been introduced in evidence written by Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton subsequent to the publication of the Woodhull slander, and it has no date. Do you remember when that letter was written? A. Yes, Sir; it was written a long while after the slander.

Q. How long? A. Well, I was going to say six months; perhaps that is an over statement. Certainly four or five months.

Q. Do you remember how it happened that it was written so long after the slander? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State.

Mr. Evarts—If he knows about it being written from what occurred between him and Mr. Beecher, that is evidence, and nothing short of that.

Judge Neilson—What is that, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—I say if the witness knows from what occurred between him and Mr. Beecher, then that is an interview which, if not already included in the gentleman's inquiry, can be gone into. There is no other mode of knowledge that affects us.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Fullerton]—It took place some months afterwards. Don't that cover it?

Mr. Fullerton—Not at all. There was a reason for writing to her; I want to know that reason.

Judge Neilson—Let the witness answer that question in the most general form, what the reason was, without specifying the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—He must be confined to what passed between him and Mr. Beecher. Nothing else binds us.

Judge Neilson—On such a point as that there might be a reason stated, although not in the presence of Mr. Beecher. I will allow the question.

Mr. Evarts—I object to the question, and to any answer short of what passed between Mr. Beecher and the witness.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Answer it very shortly.

The Witness—During the first four or five months after the Woodhull scandal a great many people asked Elizabeth what Mr. Beecher had done about it.

Mr. Evarts—I object to that.

Mr. Fullerton—That is a fact I have a right to show.

Mr. Evarts—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—I will let that stand. It is by way of getting at his reason for his theory.

Mr. Evarts—I think it is objectionable.

Judge Neilson—I will let it stand.

Mr. Evarts—Because the reason can be given, it does not allow under that the introduction of hearsay evidence.

Judge Neilson—He will undertake to relate the reasons, and the first may be the suggestions of other people.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; and that might relate, on this examination, to something that occurred in conversation between himself and his wife.

Judge Neilson—They don't propose to take that.

Mr. Fullerton—It is a part of the res gestæ.

Mr. Evarts—I don't understand that it is. He says a great many people spoke to Elizabeth. That I propose to strike out.

The Witness—He wanted to know how Mr. Beecher wrote this to her, whether he had ever made any expression of sympathy.

Judge Neilson—[To Witness.] That is one reason; don't give her answer.

Mr. Evarts—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—No; I will let that stand.

Mr. Evarts—I except.

Q. How long after those inquiries was this letter of Mr. Beecher's written to her? A. This letter was written to her when those inquiries were being made, and the letter was written for the purpose—

Mr. Evarts—I object to that.

The Witness—of putting into her hands something that she could show to her friends, and that is what Mr. Beecher said.

Mr. Evarts—I object to what the letter was written for, unless it proceeds from Mr. Beecher, as a reason why it was written, and I wish the witness would stop when I object.

Judge Neilson—Bring it within that rule.

Mr. Evarts—I think that's struck out?

Judge Neilson—I understand that has been referred to as a statement of Mr. Beecher's.

Mr. Evarts—He has not said. I move that it be struck out.

Judge Neilson [To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Read the last answer of the witness.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the answer.

Q. When did he say that? A. He didn't say it to me; he said it to Mr. Moulton. I had nothing to do with that letter.

Mr. Evarts [To THE TRIBUNE stenographer]—When was this last part of the answer given? It must have been after my objection.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer—It was.

Mr. Evarts—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—I deny the motion.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you carry the letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From Mr. Moulton's house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton give it to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. There was one question I omitted to ask you in reference to the tripartite agreement. Were you willing to sign the tripartite agreement after you read and became acquainted with the article which referred particularly to you—the original tripartite agreement you had prepared? A. No, Sir, the original draft of the tripartite covenant I refused to sign.

MRS. TILTON'S TRIP TO MONTICELLO.

Q. Do you recollect when your wife was at Monticello? A. She was there in the Summer of 1869. I think she was there more Summers than one.

Q. How is that? A. I was just thinking that she was there more Summers than one. I was there with her one Summer; I think she was there two or three years in succession; I know she was there in the Summer of 1869.

Q. Do you recollect what time she was there in 1869? A. She went shortly after the baby was born.

Q. Do you recollect her return, what time it was? A. Yes, Sir; I recollect her return, because I went after her, and she came away, and we crossed each other on the road.

Q. You did start to go for her? A. Yes, Sir; I started to go and make a surprise visit to her, and when I got there I found she had gone.

Q. Did you see this Catherine Carey that was on the stand yesterday? A. I was here yesterday.

Q. And you saw the witness? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you recognize her as a family servant of yourself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As a servant that went to Monticello with your wife? A. I have not said that; I don't remember enough about the servants, but I remember that she was a nurse.

Q. In the family? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, in one of your letters that has been put in evidence—I call your attention to "Exhibit D, 93," dated Brooklyn, August 28, 1869:

MY DEAR WIFE—I find myself alone, but hardly lonesome; weary, but not sleepy; restless, but not without peace of soul to-night, and so I turn my thoughts to you and the children in your mountain nest.

Where was the mountain nest? I suppose it to be Monticello, and that is why I ask the question. A. Yes, Sir; this was a letter which I wrote from home in Brooklyn to Mrs. Tilton at Monticello. The phrase "mountain nest" refers to the mountainous character of the country. Monticello is a village up among the mountains in Sullivan County in this State.

Q. On a very large eminence, is it not? A. Yes, Sir, and very pure air.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] Look at the paper I now show you and say whose handwriting it is? A. Henry Ward Beecher's.

Q. Say if there is any handwriting upon it in the hand of any other person—you need not state in whose handwriting it is if there is such handwriting? A. Yes, Sir; there is another person's handwriting; the description on the back.

Q. That is on the out side of the last leaf in lead pencil, is it not—page three? A. The words written on the back of page three are not in Mr. Beecher's handwriting.

Q. The words written in lead pencil on the back of page three are not in Mr. Beecher's handwriting? A. Yes, Sir; are not in Mr. Beecher's handwriting.

[Marked for identification. "Exhibit No. 103."]

SOME OF MRS. TILTON'S LATER LETTERS PROPOSED.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] In whose handwriting is the paper I now show you? A. Mrs. Tilton's.

[Marked for identification, "Exhibit No. 104."]

Q. [Handing paper to witness]. Again, in whose handwriting is the paper I show you? A. Mrs. Tilton's all except the lead pencil mark at the back.

[Marked for identification, "Exhibit No. 105."]

Mr. Fullerton—If the Court please, I owe an apology or an explanation to the other side in offering these two letters; I promised to do it before the close of the cross-examination, but the cross-examination was so long that I forgot it.

Mr. Evarts—These last two?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; and when we find them, there are some other letters from Monticello which I desire to introduce, to fix more distinctly the time when Mrs. Tilton was there in 1869.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Beach.] Mr. Beach, to what date does your book come down to?

Mr. Beach—It comes down to the commencement of the re-direct examination.

Judge Neilson—I cannot help you, then; my book only comes down to 1875; that is as far as my book goes.

Mr. Evarts—Mine goes down to the end of the cross-examination, and the commencement of the re-direct.

Mr. Fullerton—It is in the 19th century yet!

Mr. Beach—I think that satire of The Herald is very likely to become a fulfilled prophecy from the present appearance of things.

Mr. Fullerton—[Handing paper to witness.] Look at the paper I now show you and say whether it enables you to state how late in August your wife was at Monticello in 1869? A. This letter is dated, "Monticello, August 31st."

Q. I didn't ask you the date of it, I asked you if it enables you to state how late in August she was there? A. She must have been there the very last day?

Mr. Evarts—We have asked for that letter of 1874.

Mr. Morris—I cannot find it.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Beach, it seems to me that occurred quite late in the cross-examination, whatever it is.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I will look.

A HARD TECHNICAL QUESTION DISCUSSED.

Mr. Evarts—These letters that are now proposed to us, being letters from Mrs. Tilton to her husband, are not letters referring to any letters that have been introduced upon our part, and they are not letters that have been communicated to Mr. Beecher, or in regard to which he has any relation. That is not proposed. And they are of date, one in July, 1871, and the other may be assumed late in 1872, though there is only a memorandum of that date. I suppose that it is considered to be correct. And they are after the alleged cause of complaint on the part of this husband against Mr. Beecher, made the subject of this action, and are not admissible under any rules of evidence, being entirely passages between himself and his wife, and not admissible in the light in which the other passages have been introduced, to wit, of the condition of their family relations before the occurrence.

Judge Neilson—The rule, as I understand, is that in an action of this kind, to show the relation of a family, the domestic happiness or unhappiness, the plaintiff may put in evidence correspondence prior to the alleged event.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Or to the knowledge of it.

Mr. Evarts—Or to the knowledge of it.

Judge Neilson—And the other side may put in letters also that would combat the suggestion of a peaceful household. I think the limit is there, as stated in the books—prior to the knowledge of the offense.

Mr. Evarts—It is very well settled, I believe.

Judge Neilson—Isn't it, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—I think not, Sir; that is subject to some exceptions. They have introduced some letters, I believe, since the event.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, not objected to. That is another matter.

Mr. Fullerton—That forecloses the other side.

Mr. Beach—They did not object to the same character of evidence.

Judge Neilson—You have had subsequent correspondence?

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly. They have introduced a part of it.

Mr. Evarts—That don't foreclose, in the least, our objecting to letters, if they don't object to letters. There never was any rule of evidence of that kind. They may find an advantage by having them in.

Mr. Beach—Certainly.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, this rule, as your Honor has stated it, you will perceive does not apply to the question now before the Court, because the defense in this case have introduced a part of the correspondence since the alleged cause of complaint. They have done that, and they have exposed themselves to the balance of the correspondence between the parties during that period. It is very plain, Sir, that we are entitled to this correspondence.

Judge Neilson—In view of that, I am inclined to receive the letters, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Why, your Honor, they cannot give the letters in evidence any way. We can give in evidence anything that affects this plaintiff; they cannot. Their right to introduce in evidence letters between husband and wife grows out of their right to show relations between them before the invasion or knowledge of the invasion of the domestic purity. That is the only way. On the face of the matter they have no right to give in evidence letters from one to the other, but on the face of the matter we have a right to give in evidence anything that affects this opposite party to us. That is the difficulty. They overlook that fact. General rules of evidence allow us to affect him with letters, as the general rules of evidence allow them to affect Mr. Beecher; but the special rule, on special motive, permits the interchange, between husband and wife, of observed demeanor, or of letters, to be brought in as a part of the domestic, conjugal relation, which may be thus proved. Now, these letters are not within that rule; that seems to be conceded. Then how are they brought in under any general proposition of the law of evidence that enables them to put in evidence letters between their party and a third person? Now, there is nothing in the proposition that because we have given some letters between the year 1870 and 1874, or whenever we have given them. [To Mr. Shearman.] What have we given?

Mr. Shearman—One in 1871.

Mr. Fullerton—Several.

Mr. Morris—1869.

Mr. Evarts—1869 is prior.

Mr. Pryor—The law is not as to knowledge; it is as to the event. There is no authority for it in any book anywhere.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, yes.

Mr. Pryor—Give me an authority.

Judge Neilson—My impression has been that way.

Mr. Pryor—No, Sir, it is not. It is the date of the event.

Mr. Fullerton—Subsequent to the event.

Judge Neilson—The event as it becomes known to the party.

Mr. Pryor—No, Sir.

REMARKS OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—Now, let us see if we cannot find an authority. Lord Kenyon says: [Reading from Edwards vs. Crock, 4 Esp. 39]:

"In an action of crim. con., letters between the plaintiff and his wife, passing while they were necessarily separated, in the pursuit of their vocations as servants, and written before there was any suspicion of adultery, are admissible to show mutual affection and happiness."

That is the point. The point is how they are going on in their domestic life before the interruption, per quod consortium amittit. It is the losing of the companionship that is the action.

Judge Neilson—It is on the question of damages.

Mr. Evarts—That is as it may be.

Judge Neilson—It professes to be as to the principal fact.

Mr. Evarts—I agree, it don't prove the fact. It is the state of their domestic happiness until the discovery of the fact, producing a new situation.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That is the rationale of it.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Fullerton, let us see why it is admissible.

Mr. Evarts—I was going to say, with certain qualifications. If we had put in a letter to which either of these was an answer, why, that of course would bring it within another rule of evidence, and if my learned friend points that out we will consider it.

ARGUMENT OF MR. FULLERTON.

Mr. Fullerton—The rule, as your Honor has stated it, is no doubt correct, that we would have no right then to introduce a correspondence between the husband and the wife, which occurred subsequent to the alleged offense; but the other side had a right to do it, and they have availed themselves of that right, and have given in evidence in this case several letters which passed between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, subsequently to December, 1870, when this alleged offense was made known to Mr. Beecher, letters of Mrs. Tilton to her husband. Now, what was the object of introducing those letters? Let us look for a moment. It was not to show that husband and wife lived together harmoniously; that was not their object, that was one of the objects which we had in view in introducing the correspondence. They had another, and a further and a deeper object. They wanted to show letters written subsequently to December, 1870, when this offense was made known to Mr. Beecher by Mr. Tilton, for the purpose of convincing this Jury that no woman who had submitted herself to the embraces of a paramour would ever have written such a letter to her husband. That is their object, and when my learned friend on the other side comes to sum up this case to the jury, if this case stands as it does now, he will flout those letters in our faces and say, "There is the evidence that this charge is false, because those are the letters of an innocent woman." Now, Sir, they have tried the experiment and they must reap the fruit of it. Whenever they go into correspondence subsequent to December, 1870, they open the door, and they cannot shut it at their will. We can read correspondence between the parties during that same period for the purpose of combating the position which they intend to take, predicated of the evidence as it stands on their part. Now, Sir, that is the doctrine of this case. Any letter, now, written by Mrs. Tilton to her husband subsequent to December, 1870, we can introduce in evidence in this case, for the purpose of doing away with any inference which they seek to draw from the correspondence given by them which occurred during the same period.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is the point, the very point involved, whether, they having put in some letter which might possibly admit of a certain interpretation, you have a right to put in other letters to qualify that interpretation.

Mr. Fullerton—They have entered upon a line of investigation here. We can pursue that line of investigation. We can give evidence of the same character and of the same purport, to explain away and get rid of the testimony which they have given of that character. Nothing can be clearer than that. And whenever they try the experiment of coming down since December, 1870, for the purpose of introducing letters between husband and wife, they have opened the door for the whole correspondence between those parties at that time. That is our position.

ARGUMENT OF MR BEACH.

Mr. Beach—May I refer you to an authority, Sir, upon that subject, which falls under my eye in Court. If opportunity were given, I have no idea, Sir, but cumulative decisions to the same effect could be given with great readiness. I understand the rule to be that where a party enters upon a line of immaterial or irrelevant evidence, or incompetent evidence, that the opposite party has a right to follow the lead thus given, and to enter upon the same class of evidence. I am not sufficiently familiar, at this moment, with the rule to say whether it is an absolute right upon the part of the opposite party to give that proof—answering proof. Your Honor will perceive that it might lead, under certain circumstances, to a great waste of time if the Court should allow irrelevant evidence to be produced by one party because the other had been permitted to present it, and we may, therefore, qualify the rule to this extent, I think, with propriety, that it is a subject which depends upon the discretion of the Court, to be exercised reasonably and justly, with reference to the subject-matter, and the particular circumstances which are upon the occasion brought to the attention of the Court, and that seems to be the result, Sir, of the expression to be found in Phillips on Evidence, where it is said :

The cases do not agree upon the question whether irrelevant testimony, being given on one side for the assumed purpose of proving a fact, will warrant other testimony in reply to that so given, either to repel it directly or touching the fact upon which it professes to bear. The result would seem to be that it is discretionary with the Court to hear or reject the evidence in reply. In many cases, and indeed all, the expense of time must be useless, and may, by consent of parties, be made endless, if the Court have no power to interfere.

Judge Nellson—Is that from the text, or a note ?

Mr. Beach—It is from the note.

Judge Nellson—Is it Edwards's notes, or Cowan's ?

Mr. Beach—It is Cowan's, Sir—Cowan and Hill's. I think it is Edwards's edition. Yes, Sir, it is the additional notes of Mr. Edwards. Now, your Honor will perceive that in the evidence which we offer, which consists only of a letter or two—two or three letters which were inadvertently omitted upon our direct examination—there can be no great waste of the time of the Court. The examination is not likely to proceed to an extent which will be tedious or unfortunate. If this is a question—which is the concession I am disposed to make—dependent upon the discretion of your Honor, it seems to me that the appeal which we make to that discretion must be invincible.

My associate has stated the object of the evidence which they introduced. We, in the freedom of inquiry which we chose to permit upon the other side in regard to the relations existing between this husband and wife, made no objection to this evidence which they offered, assuming it to be irrelevant. We permitted them to give letters from Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Tilton, and the reverse, without objection, the object being that which has been expressed so forcibly by my associate to your Honor. Now, in the exercise of a just discretion, Sir, they having availed themselves of that character of proof, for the purpose, either avowed or obvious, it seems to me it would be harsh and unjust to deny the introduction of the letters from Mrs. Tilton, to a very limited extent, bearing directly upon that question, possessing none of the uncertainties of parol evidence, leading to no injurious waste of the time of this Court, and necessary, Sir, for a proper explanation of the relations between the parties, that being the subject to which their evidence referred. And we appeal to your Honor's discretion, anxious to do justice between these parties, solicitous to ascertain the real truth in regard to these relations, to exercise it in a spirit, Sir, and with an authority which will lead to those results; and I—without enlarging, Sir, pressing motives upon your Honor—I submit that it would be a harsh and extremely unjust exercise of that discretion to permit the gentlemen upon the other side to avail themselves of this character of evidence, and permit us to a very brief extent to answer it by the evidence which we propose.

Mr. Evarts—The question has nothing to do with discretion or irrelevancy. Those topics are as remote from any consideration here, which is the legal right, and the perfectly well established rules of evidence. Now, my learned friends have so often pleased themselves with stating what I am going to say in my summing up, that I am afraid when I come to sum up I shall be anticipated in every point. The question here is whether the evidence now proposed is legal or not. I object to it. It is said that we have put in evidence a letter subsequent in date to the point of discovery alleged by the complaining husband. The Catherine Gaunt letter, as it is called, is the only letter of that kind and of that date that we have put in evidence.

Mr. Beach—You are mistaken, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Show us some others. We have endeavored to find all of them. It is not from want of pains on our part to find out whether there was any other that I make the statement. If you can point us to anything else, correct it. Well, I will assume the Catherine Gaunt letter is the only one.

Mr. Morris—Well, that is a mistake.

Mr. Evarts—What ?

Mr. Morris—I am quite certain that is a mistake.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will get it after recess. It is ten minutes past one, if your Honor please.

Mr. Beach—You mean the only letter subsequent to the discovery ?

Mr. Evarts—Subsequent to the discovery. We shall lose our whole recess if we go on in this way.

Judge Neilson—Get ready to retire, gentlemen. The officers will please pass around there and keep the audience quiet.

Mr. Beach—Give us until a quarter after two, please.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir. Gentlemen you will return at a quarter past two o'clock.

The Court here took a recess until 2:15.

PRINCIPAL ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

The Court met, pursuant to adjournment, at 2:15 p. m.

Mr. Beach—May I be permitted, Sir, to introduce an authority or two upon the question under discussion, before adjournment. It was contended, on the part of the defendant, that evidence of the correspondence between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, as relating to their domestic intercourse, its character was admissible only after the discovery of the offense charged.

Mr. Pryor—Before.

Mr. Beach—Before the discovery of the offense.

Judge Neilson—Only up to the discovery.

Mr. Beach—Only before the discovery of the offense charged; that is, that the discovery, or, as they say, well-grounded suspicion of the offense, is the point at which the limit of inquiry is fixed. My associate, Mr. Pryor, upon the authority of Mr. Greenleaf, took the position that the evidence was limited to the time of the act of commission, and there are, I think, many reasons to support that proposition. He hands me, Sir, the second of Greenleaf, Section 57 of Part 4. [Reading:]

"The letters of the wife, in order to be admitted in favor of the husband, must have been written before any attempt at adulterous intercourse had been made by the defendant." [Referring, Sir, to the case of Wilton vs. Webster, in the 7th of Carrington and Paine, at page 198.] "And whenever her letters are introduced as expressive of her feelings they must have been of a period anterior to the existence of any facts tending to raise a suspicion of her misconduct, and when there existed no ground to impute collusion"—

Antecedent, Sir, to the existence of facts not of suspicions, but of facts tending to raise any suspicion of the adulterous intercourse; and your Honor will perceive how fugitive and uncertain would be the limit which should be founded upon the question of the existence of suspicions of adultery, because those suspicions would be varied according to the character of the different persons who might be placed in that situation. Therefore the limit is the fact of adulterous intercourse, or such congenital facts as would lead, tend, to a suspicion of its existence. I think, therefore, it is clear that the proposition of my learned associate is correct. But I do not consider it, Sir, as particularly important upon the question of the admissibility of the proof we now offer, for the reason that they have given evidence on the other side, subsequent to their own established limit, and the precise question before your Honor is whether, as a matter of right, or a matter of discretion, they having given that evidence without objection on our part, which, under the rule which they established, would be inadmissible as irrelevant and incompetent, they can properly object to the introduction of similar evidence, upon our part, in answer to the proof which they have given. Now, Sir, I refer to the 5th Barbour, at page 516, the case of Moss vs. Stone. The syllabus is: "After evidence has been given by the plaintiff in regard to a mortgage without objection" (it is parol evidence, Sir) "and several inquiries in regard to its contents have been made by the defendant, both parties will be considered as having acquiesced in receiving parol evidence of the mortgage, and the defendant cannot then object to the plaintiff's proving at what time the mortgage fell through."

The Court says: "I think the learned justice before whom this cause was tried, at the Circuit, decided correctly in receiving parol evidence to show when the mortgage held by the plaintiff on Dutcher's house became due. The defendant's counsel had previously given some evidence in regard to that mortgage, and this objection was not made until the plaintiff's counsel had also made several inquiries in regard to its contents. The defendant's counsel could not then object to proving the single fact when the mortgage fell due, without also objecting to all the previous evidence of its contents. I think that it must be held that both parties had acquiesced in receiving parol evidence of the mortgage."

Now, that would have been consistent, Sir, under the exception which was taken, only upon the ground that the production of this answer in evidence was either a matter of legal right, or was properly the subject of the exercise of judicial discretion, and in either sense the Court held that it was a proper exercise of power upon the part of the trying Court to admit the proof. And again, Sir, in Phillips's Evidence, speaking of this question of answering irrelevant testimony:

"In assumpsit against several partners, one of them introduced a letter of his copartner to the plaintiff which, it was insisted, made against him. In consequence of this the plaintiff offered to show that the same copartner, in answer to certain interrogatories, had contradicted what he said in his letter"—a parallel case in principle. "This was objected to by the defendant who produced the letter, and it was received. Held, no error, as the defendant himself had laid the foundation of it."

Now, see, Sir, this was a case where the one party had asked the other in regard to a declaration made. The Court then received declarations, not at the same time, but upon other occasions, which contradicted the declaration which had been improperly received in evidence without objection. And that is precisely, Sir, the attitude of this question. They have given in evidence a letter, subsequent to December, 1870, for some purpose. The manifest object of the introduction of the letter is to show certain expressions of sympathy and regard upon the part of this witness towards her husband. The letter was offered to show certain relations after the event, and after the revelation of the event, inconsistent entirely with the truth of the alleged event. We are not anticipating the argument of the counsel, Sir; we suppose it will be founded upon the evidence, and that no question which can be raised upon that proof, in favor of his client, will escape the ingenuity and the ability of our learned friend. It would be very difficult, Sir, for any of us upon the part of the plaintiff, or all of us, combined, to anticipate all that the counsel might be able to say upon that subject. We do not pretend to that ability, but we reason, Sir, that from the nature of the evidence, its legitimate and real import is to prove that after the fact of this
