"9. Space (not the astronomical-covenant space, but our present writing space) will not allow for more of the hundred stars than this one: Isa. xi. 9, 'For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.' Is not that a glorious star? Is it not a real sun? Remember that these covenant stars are not trembling and tottering with any if, or perhaps, or man's paltry will; but are fixed stars, unconditional and unalterable. Blessed be God for that! It sweetens our sleep at night; and brightens our eye by day.

But this is the mark we are aiming at, that all the hundred covenants and promises, while certain, require money to fulfil them; and at the very least, the tenth part that God fixed for Israel. Stop! don't lay the book down and turn away because of that. Nicer things will come. O how vast the sum of money required for even the Almighty to make a new earth! If you doubt that, tell me how much it would cost to make a new egg out of the materials of a fallen and broken egg! Far more than the cost of a new egg that was never broken, even though it may have fallen.

"But He is making all the money to do all these things. See Him at work amid the vast streams of liquid gold and diamond fires deep down in the central earth. See how He shakes the globe, and opens the chasms, and lifts the wealth near the surface. See how He opens men's eyes and leads them to these stores in California, Australia, and Africa, just in the 'latter days' and 'last days' when His Will says they are to be used. See how we personally have a part of this wealth to use for this very purpose. There lies the key to the Bible, and the opportunity of light entering our souls. . . .

"10. 'The earth is the Lord's.' All the surface is His, so that He can give every isle, and sea, and country, and continent to the seed that He has chosen, and that serves Him best. He is now doing that. See how annexations go on under all sorts of governments. So they will go on. The devil will grumble, and people will call it Jingoism; but tell both parties that God will do as He likes with His own. Have you any land? Remember it is the Lord's.

"11. All within the earth is His. His mines of gold, diamonds and all manner of precious stones contain enough to lay the foundations, and pave the streets, and adorn the gates and walls of the New Jerusalem, as soon as Israel's Federation of all her race has settled the Eastern Question. That morning is dawning. Look up. I see it coming down from heaven even now!

"12. 'The fulness thereof.' The earth is a big barrel; quite full of wonderful possibilities; and only just begun to be tapped. It is like a vast orange with only a few little holes pricked in its rind. There is enough for all; enough for each; and enough for evermore.

"O how the thought of the hidden and undeveloped treasures of earth, and sea, and air, fills my soul with hope, and faith, and certainty; and joy in the Good Time Coming. All that fulness of the earth belongs not to the crown, nor to mine owners, but to the Lord.

"13. 'She did not know that I gave her the corn, &c.' The ignorance of Israel made their guilt less; just as the lack of light in Africa partly excuses the blacks to-day. So to a certain extent it is with us. If we really knew God, and knew Christ, and knew the Bible, we dare not rob God of His own. We would rather die in the ditch to-day. But Israel has not known. The British have not known. The Churches have not known. Even we have not known.

"But we know now, and are henceforth without excuse. We are also responsible for what we have the power and opportunity to know. Then let us follow this subject to the end.

"14. 'Therefore will I take back.' Israel at first were very poor. Even Jacob, the father of them all, was born without a shirt. But God gave them lands, and farms and money, saying, Keep nine parts for yourselves, and give the tenth part to My work. But they robbed God of that tenth part; and He took back, not only the tenth part, but all the ten parts; and left them landless, farmless, moneyless, to wander as common tramps without even a Workhouse, to linger and perish under heaven's black curse. So He will do to the dishonest Israel of to-day.

"We are but tenants-at-will; a lot of poor leaseholders; liable to be turned off the earth at any moment; if we break His terms. If you see that your fathers, of their own free will, gave God one part out of ten, will you fall lower than they were by giving less?"

The present is Part I. of a larger work. Our readers know Mr. Roe's style. His teaching is essential at the present day, when it is only the few who give anything at all; and those who give according to God's demand are, we fear, the very few. We hope this little pamphlet will have an extensive circulation, and do the good it is calculated to effect.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I am glad to be able to give H. Stewart some light upon the subject of the Nicolaitanes, which, as he says, "has been a trouble to many a perplexed spirit." I quote from a booklet well worth perusing:—

"Notes on the first three chapters of Revelation" by General Sir R. Phayre, K.C.B. Price sixpence. 18, Paternoster-row and 64, St. George's-square, S.W.

"Our Lord in Rev. ii. 15, charges Pergamos with allowing those to remain in her communion who hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes which thing I hate."

"An actual sect in the Christian Church is here spoken of whose founder was Dean Nicholas (Acts vi. 5), who, we learn from Church history, became Bishop of Samaria and apostatized from the faith with Simon Magus."

"This is the earliest instance in Christianity of a sect named after its founder. The word Nicholas means 'destroyer of the people,' and is identified with Balaam, whose name is derived from 'Bala, to devour,' and signifies 'destroyer,' or 'glutton.' In 2 Peter ii. 15, as well as in Jude 11 to end, Balaam is spoken of as the forerunner and type of the false teachers referred to as Nicolaitanes. Moreover in Rev. ii. 14 Balaam is mentioned in such a conjunction with the Nicolaitanes by our Lord Himself, as to leave no doubt that his sin and conduct throughout was in principle identical with that of the Nicolaitanes. The meaning of the passage is: 'As Balak hired Balaam for a false teacher, so hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which thing I hate.' See Prov. vi. 16—19." I recommend the pamphlet, which is well worth reading, to your readers.

With best wishes,

Yours truly, ISSACHAR.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR SIR,—I feel quite sure that you will forgive me for again asking you to permit me, through the medium of the "Banner of Israel," to acknowledge the kind gifts which have been sent me towards the translation and publication of the Yiddish Bible. I feel most grateful to your readers, not only for their kind gifts, but also for their earnest prayers and the very encouraging expressions which invariably accompany their kind and generous gifts. Some of the dear friends give neither name or address, so that I cannot acknowledge their kindness in any other way.

The BANNER is very widely read in every part of the world, for I have received gifts from its readers from Africa, America, and Australia, and from all parts of the United Kingdom.

I have frequently been told by those who cannot or will not see that we are Israel that, "those who are believers in the Identity are opposed to and discourage Mission work among the Jews. If I may be allowed, I should like to give here an extract from a letter of a dear friend in Cornwall, a "strong believer," and regular BANNER reader; would to God there were more like her. She says:—"I have made the acquaintance of a few friends who believe as I do, that the Lord Jesus meant just what He said, when He told us, 'If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in heaven.' And we have agreed, though separated by distance, to meet in spirit every Friday evening at 6 p.m., in order to obtain certain things we much need. We have each a list of these requests in order that we may agree about what we ask, and as you know our God is a faithful God, you will not be surprised to hear that we have had already many answers. Amongst the requests there is, of course, one for your work amongst our dear brethren of the House of Judah, and a plea that the money needed may be sent in as you require it. I feel sure the answer has come or is on its way."

This dear friend is not merely praying, but is doing what she can to give herself and cause others to give. Amongst the many cheerful and prayerful givers is a domestic servant, who says that she is a regular BANNER reader. She has for some time past been sending me the tenth of her wages. In one of her letters she says:—"What God has commanded to our fathers in the wilderness through Moses, is even now binding upon us, and if all British-Israelites would obey this command and give their tithes for such a holy work as yours, you would have enough to enable you to print and publish and freely circulate your Yiddish Bible."

The translation of the Old Testament is very nearly completed in stereotype and ready for the press, and £1,000 is needed in order to have a first edition of 10,000 copies printed. But where one penny of it will come from I know not for certain. Up to the present my faith has been in Him who has so graciously permitted me to undertake this work. The Lord has most wonderfully answered the earnest prayers of His dear children, and I have not leant on the arm of flesh, but I look above, to the Giver of all good and perfect gifts, to the God of Israel, the living and ever blessed God, whose is the gold and the silver, and in whose hands are the hearts of His own dear children to incline and dispose them to do that which is well pleasing in His sight, and if I do His will, I feel sure He will not fail me.

If we through these sacred Scriptures, which were so zealously guarded and handed down to us through the Jewish people, and if we have received the message of peace and salvation and have been brought to rest under the shadow of the wings of the God of Israel through our blessed Lord Jesus Christ, the Jew, we ought by our earnest prayers and by all the means in our power help to give back these Holy Scriptures to our poor and ignorant brethren of the House of Judah, who "are destroyed for lack of knowledge."

Trusting that you will forgive me trespassing again on your kindness,

I am, my dear Sir,
Yours faithfully in Jesus, and Hope of Israel,
MARCUS S. BERGMANN.

Upton House, 222, Burdett-road, Bow, May 15, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—The BANNER of Sept. 11th, 1895, has just come to hand, thanks to Miss Rush, and the Fund for the distribution of Anglo-Israel literature, and it is full of interesting articles.

I think the Uganda railway will be a very useful undertaking, and will pay in the long run. Not to speak of the money profits, which, I am quite sure, will come, but in the number of human lives, which formerly used to be lost in the slave trade, and now is lost in the carriage of articles to and from the interior of the country. And the cost £1,865,000 is nothing compared to the Manchester Ship Canal (perhaps one of these days some enterprising Manchester man may construct a ship canal from the Victoria Lake to the Indian Ocean), and the estimated cost of the Bankok-Korat Railway of 105 miles, is £1,300,000.

I was thinking, just before I received the BANNER, of suggesting something like an ordinary newspaper for the Identity cause, with a name that no one would suspect had anything to do with Anglo-Israelism, in which, among general news, news letters, telegrams, correspondence, advertisements, &c., some articles on the Identity could be slipped. And I quite welcome the suggestion of Mr. J. G. Taylor, and am ready to take at least six copies of the paper monthly for the present, and to contribute to it in the shape of news, letters, &c. The BANNER OF ISRAEL and "Covenant People" are the only papers at present that some, who would not read leaflets, pamphlets, or books on the Identity, may be induced to read, and they contain a variety of subjects.

Whitaker in his Almanac for 1876, says, regarding Egypt, "The Suez Canal in which the English Government has invested the sum of £4,000,000, is attracting a large portion of the traffic between this country and the East, and will probably compel England to take an active part in supporting the Khedive." Only six years after Alexandria was bombarded by the British Fleet.

Yours sincerely in the hope of Israel,
FRED H. GRIFFITHS.

QUESTIONS.

A CORRESPONDENT in Swaffham, in Norfolk, wants to know "Who the Ancestors of the French were? as it seems probable that they may play an important part in coming events."

In reply, we may say that there are many conjectures on the subject, none of which seem to be particularly probable. One is that they are the remnant of the Ancient Egyptians, since they are unreasonably anxious for a share in that land, and will not be content, they assure us, till they get it. For ourselves, we find it a hard task to persuade our fellow-countrymen that the British are Israel. In this case we have a hundred proofs which have shown to the satisfaction of ourselves and many others who once were opponents, that the British are "the Remnant" of Israel, but the difficulty is to presuade men that it is true. We do not feel that it will be profitable or easy to undertake a similar controversy in regard to the French.

Our correspondent also views certain passages in the Apocrypha as bearing on our contention regarding Israel, and alludes especially to 2 Esdras xi., xii., xiii., also chap. vi. 7, 8, 9. He would like to read a comment on these verses written by some of our BANNER writers and authorities.

CAPE COLONY has a surplus this year of £1,250,000, due largely to the railway receipts having exceeded the estimates by nearly a million sterling. Cape stock stands higher in the market than any except that of Great Britain.

THE Arctic ship Windward has just left the Thames in the hope of communicating with Mr. Jackson and the other members of the Jackson-Harmsworth expedition who were left a year ago on Franz Josef Land.

THE VIEW FOREIGNERS TAKE OF OUR ALLEGED BRITISH DEFENCELESS CONDITION.

IT is strange how virulent the hatred is which foreign military and naval men entertain for the British Empire and its present prosperous condition. They are quite satisfied that this country is on the verge of a tremendous collapse! We do not realise, it seems, what progress foreign nations have made in the art of war, and how vastly superior they are to ourselves. Even the French show now ten soldiers for every one we can produce, while Germany can muster thirteen! Together France and Germany, if they would only unite to destroy us, their numbers would be twenty to one. But such a condition of things never existed before 1870, and all our exploits before that date count for nothing. We persist in priding ourselves on the achievements of our troops in the old days of Wellington and Napoleon; but war now we should find to be a very different matter with such Powers as these, if we were ourselves to be at war with them. Our opponents tell us that nowadays, in war, our numbers in population, our wealth and commerce, will count for less than nothing. All will depend upon the health, the strength, and training of the soldiers who can be thrown rapidly into motion, and planted on the spot which it is desired to occupy. This, and much more like it, appeared in the Morning Post of May 14th last, in the letters of an "English American" and of a "German American." These rabid productions are answered in the same paper by Mr. Thornton Sydney Scovell, of Earl's-court-square, London, who, however, makes no mention of the chief ground of distinction between Germans and Frenchmen on the one side, and the British on the other. He does not tell us why the British have succeeded in the past, or call to mind the promises of God to Israel, whom the British represent now, as their modern "remnant."

The exceeding rage and rancour of our foreign rivals at the wonderful position of the British nation to-day is shown by the quoted opinions of a couple of "distinguished German officers," who told the "English American" what they thought of our military power, and our right to the position we occupy in the world. The words were these:—

A distinguished German officer remarked a short time since: "England exists as a European Power solely on sufferance. Our object is to acquire the friendship of France. Another struggle with France is too terrible for us Germans to entertain. Our peace conditions with France were a terrible mistake. It is not only the enormous increase of the numbers of the French soldiers that we have to reckon with, but there has been a far greater improvement in the physique of the French race as a people generally since their adoption of compulsory military service than I could have thought possible. The war has benefited France and the French race more than it has Germany. If France had gone on the same road as she did between 1850 and 1870, she would have soon ceased to be a great Power or a great people. The war has converted the French from being monkeys and satyrs into men. England must now be our objective. With France on friendly terms, we can make suitable arrangements to fulfil our destiny. France must have her compensations, and England's monopoly of the world's commerce must be shared between us. Holland and her colonies must join the great German Empire, and England, sunk by her lust and luxury, must go to the level of Spain and Portugal. The English have ceased to be men; they deride our Continental military systems, they hate and fear military service, their soldiers are mere hirelings, the dregs of the people, and they will never be able to face the trained manhood of any white race. The English birthrate is falling with the most gratifying rapidity, though the population increases fast by the preservation of the weak, the diseased, the aged, and the lunatic. English statesmen pander to the people in every way, and the British workmen are the most pampered and extravagant in the world. Their hatred and fear of military service and of war, which would possibly diminish their luxuries, is evidence of their ignorance of and want of true patriotism, and will lead to the finest civil war in Great Britain that has ever taken place in the history of the world. The proceedings of the Commune in 1871 will be mere child's play compared with the wild outbreak there will be in Great Britain after the first defeat of the English. The English rely on the support of the Italian fleet in the Mediterranean, but that fleet will be turned against England when either France or Germany declare war against her; for Italy will share in the benefits to be derived from the destruction of British commerce." This is merely a sample of the mildest talk against England and the English.

Another German officer said. "I have lived in England, and I love the English people; for my mother was English, and I am on my father's side of Polish descent. But it is impossible for me not to see that the people are not keeping their place as a Power in Europe. Nothing can save them from utter destruction when they come into collision with a great European Power. Compulsory military service might save them even yet, if they adopted it at once. But they will never do so—they are too self-conceited. Yet their army is utterly inefficient. Their Volunteers are devoid of all discipline. The personnel of their Navy is deficient in numbers, and their naval officers are as a rule ignorant, frivolous, and inefficient." In short (says the correspondent of the Morning Post) the destruction of the British Empire seems to be the one great thought which occupies the minds of the French, the German, and the Russian people, both military and civilians. French women express their hatred of the English in the most virulent manner.

"England must be our objective" sounds strangely from a German officer's mouth, whose desire seems to be to pacify the French, and, with their aid, to destroy Britain for the sake of half her commerce and wealth. Why does not Germany give up Metz, Alsace, and Lorraine, to France, as the price of French help to destroy Great Britain, which has done no wrong to Germany anywhere? It is admitted we have "the monopoly of the world's commerce." Why do not the Germans and the French combined try to wrest that "commerce of the world" from our weak grasp? They had the chance when the German Emperor sent his imprudent message to the President of the Transvaal not long ago! The Flying Squadron came suddenly into being as the consequence, and the warlike fit of Germany subsided! "Why was that?" may be asked of "the distinguished German officer." The latter need be under no anxiety as to the speedy fulfilment of his desires! The Germans will not surrender to the French their spoils of the war of 1870. The French, till they wrest those provinces from the Germans, will know no abiding peace with them.

Besides this, there is the fact of the Identity, which neither the French nor Germans are aware of. The nations and the earth are the Lord's, and He has given the dominion over them all to His people Israel, whose modern "remnant" the British are. The Lord fights for us His people, and has promised to do so to the end (Deut. xxviii. 1, 13, R.V.). He has given us "the Gates," and these command the ocean highways of the world. Till the Germans can acquire these, against the will of God, they must rest content with their dominion of the Continent, if they can acquire it; but they must not venture to advance across the sea to subdue these Islands till they have, with their comparatively puny fleet, swept ours, sustained by God Himself, from the surface of the ocean. If the opinions we read above are the "mildest talk" against our nation and our people among the Germans, we wonder exceedingly that envy and jealousy at our commercial and military successes should make a people we have always regarded with friendly feelings become suddenly our bitter enemies, absolutely without cause or reason. A people so effete as these German officers consider us could hardly succeed long to keep down the three hundred millions of the Indian and Burmese races, some of whom are born warriors, and have striven hard during the Mutinies, and on more recent occasions, to shake off our rule. In South Africa the Matabeles have had long odds in their favour, and it seemed hoping against hope to believe that the noble garrison of Buluwayo could hold out till the long-delayed succour could reach them. But it has reached them, and the presence of only two thousand armed British and Africander troops is deemed sufficient, with native aid, to put down this most formidable rebellion, at a ridiculously small loss when compared with the cost to us in human life while we wiped out the Sepoy rebellion in India.

Our race is not so effete as our Germans love to think it is. And it has, besides, the protection and blessing of Almighty God, because the British are Israel. This is an argument which probably our German officers hardly understand. But we do; and we know that God is arranging first to give us nationally peace, because He has so ordained it (Isa. xxvi. 12, R.V.), and, as His gift, to confer upon us "the kingdom and dominion and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven," under the sovereignty of the King of Israel, His blessed Almighty Son. These advantages we possess. But the German officers ignore them. They will find, however, to their cost, that these very things will prevent their succeeding in their mad desires against our nation's prosperity, for which result let Israel praise and thank the Lord, their God and Saviour, for evermore!

THE OTHER SIDE.

Why the President's Venezuelan Message was Unwarranted—A Strong Argument Against It.

By C. A. L. Totten.

To the Editor of the "Journal and Courier."

The President's late message upon Venezuelan matters did not unbalance our own judgment, nor disturb our sentiments, which are bent towards Anglo-Saxon affiliation the world around. To our minds the message will have had but one good effect, that, of urging us to instant and more thorough preparation for war, but in other directions than fraternal ones.

The message came out of a clear sky, and was not the echo of any wide-spread public demand, or fully grown sentiment of patriotism, or obvious necessity. The matter at issue as between England and Venezuela is of four generations' standing; it has roots that run away back to 1748. There are two sides to the case between the parties of the first part, Venezuela and Great Britain, and we were at best the mere spectator, as to a controversy over a boundary line, which depends upon rights that actually antedate our own existence as a nation.

Under the circumstances we could but deem its sudden injection into the arena of international diplomacy, caparisoned in such warlike phraseology, as absolutely unwarranted, and so we still regard it: Now—

Because: It is neither self-evident nor attempted to be made out that the Monroe doctrine at all covers the case. Indeed all the weight of argument is upon the other side, though by a strange fatality, not one paper in a thousand has presented both sides to its readers. God forgive us.

Because: Extension of that doctrine as to the necessity of arbitration by virtue of its menace to our peace and safety (which is absurd upon its face), and that no European Power can be allowed to act as arbitrator (although one of the parties is centered in the eastern hemisphere) is so novel as to prejudice at the very start our own chance at even a diplomatic victory in the premises, to say nothing of other situations that may yet arrive.

Because: England herself is as much a party to the Monroe doctrine, properly understood, as we are. The suggestor of it, in fact, and is as fully interested in its integrity.

Because: There seems to be good evidence that the very crisis as between England and Venezuela arose out of the Venezuelan arrest of a Brito-Uruan chief of the police, for actually defending citizens of the United States who had trespassed over the disputed border into so-called Venezuelan domains.

Because: By a serious resolution of Congress, passed in 1825, and in view of just such a contingency, we were expressly and nationally warned against the hasty championship of any South American Republic found in controversy with a foreign power, unless justified at the time by the circumstances, and we do not yet, as a people, understand all the circumstances upon which the English contention is founded.

"Because: According to the conservative definition of all those statesmen who were familiar with the Monroe doctrine in its day of promulgation, we are not yet established in an undoubted right, either morally or politically, to interfere in the mere matter of a boundary rectification.

Because: The boundary in question is in no way contiguous to our own or even remotely related thereto. It is a mere question of fact between the two contestants themselves and one that must ultimately stand or fall upon its own merits, war or no war.

Because: We are not in a position to defend that boundary line upon the spot, but only indirectly to hamper England in its rectification, forgetful of the fact that action and reaction are equal, contrary and simultaneous.

Because: The arbitrary tone of the message is too much of a "sight unseen" guarantee to Venezuela, and is as likely as not to involve us as parties in a de facto war brought about by some further overt and irresponsible act by Venezuela herself. We have put our eggs upon a very dangerous shelf.

Because: Whether the last contingency arises or not, this message places us "on record" in a new light, not contemplated in the original doctrine. Indeed, expressly opposed to it (Benton and Calhoun), and as the champion of every other South American Republic, as against any European Power whatsoever, right or wrong.

Because: The message was calculated, as it has resulted, to deal a most disastrous blow to our already precarious financial credit, both at home and abroad; to cause our wealth to shrink with astonishment; our gold to go abroad, as from an arterial wound reopened; our stocks and commercial paper to come home to roost as birds of ill-omen; our exports to be in danger of losing their best markets; our imports to be cut off, and our best blood to be spilt—all this without any adequate cause, and without any previous and due resolution upon our part as a people to make the sacrifice.

Because: It is a boomerang, and must have been hurled without knowledge of its re-active character, as the event has already shown, and therefore it is a blunder, which we cannot disavow too soon, for the people are not in it.

Because: It is in effect an unpremeditated challenge without consent to all the Powers of Europe to unite with England in the resistance of a doctrine which, while she has supported, they have never fancied, and which in its new development, she may, very naturally, feel herself justified in opposing.

Because: It is distinctively undiplomatic and too vigorously war-like in tone; and the people did not demand or authorize it, and were not parties to it before the fact, nor are they such parties even after the fact, save in quarters where it is taken for granted by them, that the administration has already fully canvassed the whole matter before acting, and could prove its case.

Because: When stripped of all collaterals and threats, based upon remote contingencies possible to arise out of the very investigation called for, it is the mere request for a commission to determine what the state department, itself, should long ago have obtained, or put itself in process of obtaining, through its own agent, or at any rate, should have sought and found, before fulminating such a paper. It is an unheard of thing, that an emergency so grave and looking toward desperate war, should never before have been thoroughly investigated by the state department, and should need thus, at the last moment, the assistance of an outside commission.

Because: Its threats are irrelevant and unfriendly, for they are unwisely introduced previous to any occasion, or else imply a fund of information as to the inadequacy of England's position and her tort in the premises. This the diplomatic notes of the administration plainly show it does not possess.

Because: Whether war-like or not, the tone is at least so distinctly unfriendly that it finally precludes the acceptance of our own good offices, as an arbitrator, and hampers the very investigation its commission is expected to prosecute. For who can suppose a people of the very same stock as ourselves, will submit to us, acting in quasi arbitration, and under durance of a threat, they being quite as powerful and even more prepared for war, the proof they were unwilling to accord to any outsider, they having already deemed it wise to decline arbitration, for reasons whether good and sufficient or not which are of no righteous concern to us. We lately offered our own good offices as arbiters to Japan, and they were declined, but that was the end of it. A message looking towards its infliction upon them was not dreamed of. The present case is not sufficiently different to warrant an offensive interference, for England is quite as much an American power as we are, and her own interests balance ours in these premises, which in no wise touch the definition of the Monroe doctrine (vide Calhoun, Webster, Adams, Clay, Benton, Jefferson, Madison, among the elders, and Von Holst, Woolsey, Hyde, Hewitt and many others as later jurists).

Because: At best the commission must act ex-parte, taking Venezuela into conference without previous request and leaving England out of it in spite of our ignorance of the foundation of her side of the case—the very point at issue.

Because: The initiation of war is admittedly repugnant to American sentiments: it is always un-Christian, and is not only unnecessary here, but has by no means been forced upon us.

Because: We are not justified in straining the Monroe doctrine in order to find ground for violating the far broader and better one, which is a part of it, of non-intervention, be it at home or abroad.

Because: So long as either alien or fraternal powers have material interests in possessions in South America, or anywhere in this western world, they have as much right to manage them without embarrassment as Spain has those in Cuba.

Digitized by Google

Because: By interfering here, and yet so far from home, and that in a matter that, so far as yet made out, appears to be none of our business, upon the disingenuous plea of championship of the weak, or under the weak subterfuge of self-preservation, we are at the same time ignoring an appeal, merely to recognise Cuba, now for a long time and far more near to us, struggling for freedom from all old world interference whatsoever.

Because: We are straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, for with the American interests suffering to death in Turkey and Armenia, we are not even counted among the nations that may be looked to for protecting them vigorously out of the deference to the principle of non-interference, that in such a case does not bind us, while here, with her friendly interests over two American miners said to be the immediate occasion of England's suddenly strained relations to Venezuela, we are actually interfering as against kith in their protection of our own kin, and that with no obvious right in the premises, even if subordinate circumstances are not as represented.

The fact is we have originated an alarm amongst ourselves, which had not yet even quickened the pulse of a single South American Republic as to the danger from encroachment, and which, had the facts of the case borne any resemblance to encroachment outside of the disputed territory, had long ago ignited all in those nearer neighbourhoods in a most decided opposition to England.

The whole message, therefore, was either a blunder or worse, and should be repudiated by the sober minded at once, and that in no uncertain terms, or else speedily whitewashed by the commission, which should bring in a verdict without leaving their seats.

It is one thing to be patriotic and to stand up for a principle; it is quite another to stand by an agent who has made a palpable and unfortunate mistake, and awakened the Lares of the country without an adequate cause. We Anglo-Saxons fight to win, but are not wont to fight without sound reasons, and least of all should we go to war with each other over fictions ill-defined. It is a crime to utter aught that makes a war even remotely possible unless it be in reply to an open menace that is made plain to everyone.

It is a remarkable fact that in all this furor over the Monroe doctrine not a solitary argument has been advanced to show that in any one of its bearings the Venezuelan boundary dispute falls under its definition. The first wave of assenting public excitement followed the message and preceded the reading of its appendices. It was based upon the very natural supposition that the administration had fully established its case. It now turns out that Lord Salisbury's final argument destroyed that of Mr. Olney, with more matter in reserve. The message actually puts the cart before the horse, for had the correspondence of Mr. Olney and Lord Salisbury been submitted in its order, and that of each side a week apart, the message would either never have been written or else have been torn up privately in the White House, and so we ourselves saved from the humiliating dilemma of having either to impeach the judgment of the chief magistrate or to defend it against our own.

There is no encroachment threatened, and no war declared between Ephraim and Manasseh. We do not see how one ought to be allowed, by any possibility to arise in the face of the better and sober second judgment of the real patriots of the two nations concerned. When we get our second breath we will be able to run with this question for another hundred years, if need be, rather than have it run away with us. There is no present need of working up an imaginary case and flaunting an offensive and short-sighted patriotism in the face of a nation, which is a solid friend beneath the surface—blood is thicker than water. The world has no Anglo-Saxon blood to spare. Nor is there occasion for criticising those who do not enthuse to the unnecessary music set up in some careless and thoughtless quarters.

We are not yet discussing what might happen, but what has already happened, and that upon its own merits, and aside from what through a misunderstanding of the case it is assumed had happened. It may or may not be wise under the extraordinary circumstances that we have now invaded the premises and in view of good offices to all true Anglo-Saxons, for Lord Salisbury to offer further memoranda on the case, in advance of any act upon the part of the commission, and so both close his argument and be ready to prosecute its enforcement when the proper time arrives. In the meantime our own rights in the premises have certainly not been created by Mr. Cleveland's message, nor under the definition of the Monroe doctrine can we see how a report of this one-sided commission, even if adverse to Great Britain's pretensions, can breathe into a set of self-assumed rights the breath of life unto the justification of sacrificing untold Anglo-Saxon treasures and still more valuable Anglo-Saxon life-blood and prospects in fraternal strife.

Finally, it is not a question of fear, a thing foreign to our blood upon both sides of the water, that will delay this conflict. It has now been made, and will be kept possible, so long as the uniformed and misinformed multitude is supported in its ill-advised attitude by the press. Nevertheless it has also been made and may be kept possible, and thus at a stand-off, so long as the sober minded among our people insist that the arguments upon the other side be accorded a fair hearing and be defeated only with their own weapons.

But it is a question of cost and of crime and possibly of permanent loss of prestige to our race—for God can still raise up yet other sons of Abraham out of the stones in the wilderness, if we belie our Saxon traditions.

With England we are happily inter-married as much as Abraham's family was with that of Laban. All the resources of our country owe a fair quota of their development to the generous out-put of British capital: they yield mutual advantage to all concerned, and neither one side nor the other can afford to risk their wanton destruction or collapse. It is not a question of who would suffer most materially or gain most eventually, seeing that both would be punished to the full. But it is a question of moral loss which would inevitably fall with stunning weight upon the party that instigated so unjustifiable a conflict without any show of founded right or application to even its own definition of policy.

It has been said that the most England could do would be to blockade our coasts and destroy some of its principal cities, and that the worst we could do would be to take possession of everything on this side of the globe. If each side accomplishes its task it would be an expensive and unwarrantable price to pay for so small a bunch of fire-Caracas which, as it is, may explode in the very magazine itself before even our commissioners begin their task.

Such a war to-day would cry to Heaven for signal vengeance and would reap it in the whirl-wind. The black swirl of its cyclone would fall upon both parties, as the equal responsible representatives of an Israel, that could be so far forgetful of their natural missions for the betterment of man, as to join in fraternal strife over a strip of deadly southern wilderness, while a thousand and one more momen-

Dec. 21, 1895.

The above sensible and argumentative letter by Professor C. A. L. Totten, published on Dec. 24, 1894, in the New Haven Morning Journal, U.S.A., should have appeared before in the BANNER had space allowed. The question discussed has not even yet been settled, and the professor ought to be heard while there is time.

ARE ENGLISHMEN ISRAELITES?

THE following is the termination of a discussion which appeared in the Christian Outlook, a Dunedin, New Zealand, paper, dated Sept. 14th, and Oct. 12th, 1895, between Mr. W. S. Craig, of Port Napier, Hawkes Bay, the opponent, and Mr. T. A. Finlay of Purekiriki, Owaka, on the Israelite side. Previous letters by Mr. Finlay on this subject appeared on pp. 532 to 534 of Vol. xix. of the BANNER of Dec 25, 1895. Mr. Craig opened the proceedings thus:

"ARE ENGLISHMEN ISRAELITES?

"To the Editor of the 'Christian Outlook.'

"Sir,—In your issues of May 11th and 25th, June 22nd, and August 17th, Mr. T. A. Finlay labours hard in his endeavour to establish the Identity of the British people with that of the Ten Tribes of Israel. Mr. Finlay makes some very pertinent remarks on prophecy, and I desire to express my pleasure at the interest he displays in this great and most important subject. It is a subject which has in the past received very little attention from the pulpit, though I note with pleasure that an interest has recently been awakened in the matter, and I hope many will follow those already in the field of investigation.

"As a student of prophecy, I will, with your kind permission, briefly reply to Mr. Finlay, and endeavour to show that 'the promises made to the fathers' have not yet been fulfilled, but will be at the return of Christ to the earth, who came once to 'confirm the promises made unto the fathers' (Rom. xv.. 8), or make their fulfilment possible.

"With regard to interpretation of prophecy, I quite agree with Mr. Finlay that it should be interpreted literally. All will admit, of course, that there are many figurative and symbolic statements in prophecy; but surely these must be interpreted in harmony with the literal. Speaking of interpretation, Jeremy Taylor says, 'In all the interpretations of Scripture, the literal sense is to be presumed and chosen, unless there be evident cause to the contrary.' And Luther says, 'That which I have so often insisted upon elsewhere, I here once more repeat—viz., that the Christian should direct his first efforts toward understanding the literal sense of Scripture, which alone is the substance of faith and Christian theology.' Now, sir, accepting these canons of interpretation, allow me to briefly examine the 'promises made to the fathers,' and to whom they apply.

"When God brought Abram out from among his kinsmen in Chaldea, 'into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, he obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went' (Heb. xi. 8). When he came into the land of promise, God appeared to him, and said, 'Unto thy seed will I give this land' (Gen. xii. 7). In Gen. xiii. 15, the promise is renewed in these words:—'All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever.' Now, sir, here is a literal promise which no method of 'spiritualising' can dispose of, and which history shows has never been fulfilled. No one can dispose of it by merely saying that it is typical of another land 'above the bright blue skies.' The suggestion is quite gratuitous and foreign to the Scriptures. I call the Apostle of the Gentiles to witness. Writing to the Hebrews, Paul, after speaking of certain who pleased God by believing and obeying His promises, says, 'All these died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth' (Heb. xi. 13; see also verses 39 and 40). This is conclusive proof to all who will be led by the Scriptures alone, that the fathers do not now inherit these promises.

With reference to Abraham's seed, I perceive that your Editorial note on May 11th is partially, at all events, required. Paul defines the seed of Abraham, after the faith, very plainly. In Gal. iii. 16, he says—'Now, to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many, but as of one: And to thy seed, which is Christ,' and in 29th verse he says—'And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.' Paul's argument throughout is that, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, 'there is no difference' if we be Christ's.

"From the foregoing remarks, it will be seen that 'the great and precious promises' made to the fathers are to be inherited by Abraham, 'the father of the faithful,' and his children after the faith.

"But, are the natural branches cast off for ever? 'God forbid,' says Paul. 'God hath not cast away His people whom He foreknew.' 'For, if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?' And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, 'There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.' 'For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance' (Rom. xi.). Paul always reasoned out of 'Moses and the prophets,' and he saw that the Jews would be restored to their own land when their Deliverer would again appear on earth. He saw that the kingdom of Israel would be restored (Acts i. 6), and that Christ should then 'reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of His kingdom there should be no end' (Luke i. 33). Of this time the prophet Ezekiel spoke, saying, 'I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall no more be two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all' (xxxvii. 22). This is the time spoken of by Christ when He said, "Ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging (or ruling) the Twelve Tribes of Israel' (Matt. xix. 28). Thus, the Twelve Tribes of Israel will be restored as subjects of the Great King, and the twelve who followed Him.

"The foregoing is what I believe to be the Scripture view of the matter broached by Mr. Finlay. And now, Sir, I do not desire to trespass too far on your space, but you will allow me, perhaps, to deal briefly with one or two of the 'marks of identity' brought forward by Mr. Finlay on behalf of Anglo-Israelism. In reality, Mr. Finlay places Queen Victoria in the place of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is one of the primary mistakes of the Anglo-Israel theory. The Deliverer was to come 'out of Zion,' to 'sit on the throne of His father David' (Luke i. 32); and surely Mr. Finlay will not seek to dispute His claim! Then he affirms that it can be proved from history that the British people are the Ten Tribes of Israel. He would be a clever man indeed who could trace the descent of the heterogenous British people back to about seven hundred and twenty years before Christ, and identify them as the Ten Tribes who were taken captive by the King of Assyria! (2 Kings xvii.) For about that time, the Ten-tribed portion of Israel's sons pass from the page of history; and nothing further is recorded of them in the Scriptures, except in prophecy, where it is declared that they shall yet be united under 'one king' upon the mountains of Israel.

"Again, your correspondent puts forward the words of Gen. xxii. 17, as a 'mark of identity.' The words are: 'Thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies." I must request Mr. Finlay to mark the personal pronoun here very specially. It refers to a particular personage called the 'seed.' I have already drawn attention to Paul's definition of the seed as being Christ (Gal. iii. 16), and all who are members of the body of Christ (Gal iii. 29). Christ comes as a man of war to destroy existing Governments, and 'to set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever' (Dan. ii. 44; Rev. xi. 15). Then shall Christ, the seed of Abraham, 'possess the Gate of his enemies.'

"Again, Mr. Finlay says that 'the term Jew does not mean Israelite, for it only names the members of the tribe of Judah.' It is sufficient, in replying to this statement, to refer your readers to Acts xxi. 39, where Paul affirms that he is a 'Jew,' and to Romans ii. 1, where the apostle says that he is an 'Israelite.'

"There is only one other 'mark of identity' to which I shall refer, meanwhile deeming those dealt with a fair sample of the 'marks' brought forward by Anglo-Israelites. It is that the British people are the only Sabbath-keeping people in the world, apart from the Jews. Mr. Finlay evidently does not know what Sabbath-keeping means. Neither Mr. Finlay nor any other living man has ever kept the Sabbath. Let Mr Finlay consider this reply, Scripturally, and he will be more careful in his selection of 'marks of identity.' Indeed, the whole Anglo-Israelite theory consists only in a mass of verbiage and fantastic speculations founded upon some trivial coincidences audaciously termed 'marks of identity.'

"Sir, this is a subject capable of much enlargement, but consideration for your space prevents me from going more fully into the matter.

"Thanking you in anticipation of insertion.—I am, sir, faithfully yours, "W. S. CRAIG.

"Port Napier, Hawkes Bay, 28th August, 1895."

Mr. Finlay replied as below; and the editor closed the correspondence thus:—

"Mr. Finlay writes us again, on reply to Mr. Craig, on the subject 'Are Englishmen Israelites?' The letter is too long. Our space is much pressed, and we cannot publish long letters on this or other subjects. We shall, however, try to find some room for it—or a part of it—as soon as possible."

"ARE ENGLISHMEN ISRAELITES?

"To the Editor of the 'Christian Outlook.'

"In answer to Mr. Craig, Mr. Finlay thinks he does not know what Identity Truth is, and advises him to read Prov. xviii. 13. He says that it is nonsense to interpret Gal. iii. 18, as doing away with the rich political favours of Israel. He argues that we are taught by it—that Christ is the one seed from whom the blessings were to flow—not the seed to whom they were made. Gal. iii. teaches us that these promises took the form of a will, made by God. The heirs are Israel (the Hebrew nation) Gal. iii. 16; Heb. vi. 13—18. Jesus Christ (being God) is the testator of that will. A will has no force while the testator lives (Heb. ix. 15—17. Jesus died. The will was opened, and the heirs received the promises—no one else could (Gal. iii. 15). What could be plainer? It must be so; else Paul contradicts himself in Acts xxvi. 6, 7, when he tells us that the promises must be fulfilled to the Twelve Tribes.

"In regard to Mr. Craig's view of the kingdom, Mr. Finlay writes:—

"I ask, of what is Christ the King? Of a kingdom certainly. Of what kingdom? When Jesus said, 'My kingdom is not of this world,' what did He mean? Did He not refer to the contrast between the earth-made apostate kingdom described so vividly by Daniel and the God-made, God-chosen kingdom set up in the wilderness—the seed of Abraham in the line of Isaac? In support of this choice, let me quote Exod. xix. 5, 6; Deut. x. 15; Deut. xiv. 2; Deut xxvi. 18, 19; Amos iii. 2; Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20; Jer. xxxi. 2, 3; 1 Peter ii. 9, 10.

"It will be seen from these texts that Israel was a God-chosen nation, and that not for a time, but for ever; 1 Peter ii 9, 10 confirms this. It is of this kingdom that Jesus Christ is the rightful King. The kingdom is not ready for its rightful King (Jesus). He will not come into His kingdom until this nation, this people, even Israel, is in evidence as 'a righteous nation,' prepared for Him, and finally made ready.

"Now for the statement that I place Queen Victoria in a superior position to Jesus Christ. I most emphatically deny it, and appeal to the readers of the Outlook to note the fact. Mr. Craig is the author of that statement himself. Identity truth does not teach it. But as to Queen Victoria's position, I would ask Mr. Craig to turn to 1 Chron. xxix. 23, and note King Solomon's position. The throne mentioned was the throne of the Lord, and Solomon sat on it. My statement is that Queen Victoria occupies the same position to-day. Mr. Craig cannot refute that. If I am guilty of what Mr. Craig charges me with, the writer of the Chronicles must be alike guilty.

"With reference to the 'Gates,' that prophecy (Gen. xxii. 17) must be fulfilled before Christ comes again—Mr. Craig to the contrary. After Christ comes to His throne, Israel will have no enemies existing the Gates of whom she can possess. Besides, when Christ comes, He comes to reign over a kingdom—not to set it up. If Mr. Craig will only follow his quotation from Daniel a little farther (Dan. ii. 44), he will see that that kingdom was to be set up in 'the days of these kings,' and set up for ever. Consequently, that kingdom must be in existence now.

"I would refer Mr. Craig to a repetition of the prophecy regarding the 'Gates' in Gen. xxiv. 60, where he will find no pronoun to trouble him. Mr. Craig seems to think that the question of Jew and Israelite is easily disposed of, and it is just here he displays his lack of knowledge. True, I did say the term Jew does not mean Israelite. I repeat it, and mean it too, but I find I must be more explicit. My position is this: a Jew can be an Israelite since he belongs in common with the other tribes to the nation of Israel; but it does not at all follow that an Israelite need be a Jew, and certainly the members of the Ten-tribed nation never were and are not now. The case of Paul does not teach that the terms are interchangeable. Paul, in speaking of his religious upbringing, and tribal alliance with Judah (see 1 Kings xi. 32, 34), calls himself a Jew (Moadecai did the same, Esther iii. 4, and he was a Benjamite, Esther ii. 5); but when Paul speaks of his nationality he is very particular. It was Paul's great boast that he was 'an Israelite of the tribe of Benjamin,' (Rom. xi. 1), and he fully explains why he was content to be considered a Jew (1 Cor. ix. 20)—placing himself on a level with them if haply he might gain them for Christ; thus in the same spirit we find him calling himself 'a Roman' (Acts xxii. 27), 'the Apostle of the Gentiles' (Rom. xi. 13), 'a Pharisee' (Acts xxiii. 6). He also himself circumcised (Phil. iii. 5; Acts xvi. 3), yet boldly denounced circumcision (Gal v. 2; Acts xxi. 21); he was willing to be all things to all men for Christ's sake (1 Cor. ix. 19, 22). I don't think I need notice Mr. Craig's remarks about the Sabbath. His italics clearly shew his error I am pleased to think that there are very few readers of the Outlook who would listen to a statement such as that. Will Mr. Craig, however, kindly read Exod. xxxi. 16; Ezek. xx. 12. It will be seen there that the Sabbath was to be a sign, a perpetual covenant between Israel and God. Can that perpetual covenant have ceased? Malachi iii. 6 says, 'I am the Lord, I change not.' Therefore the Hebrew nation must be found to-day keeping the Sabbath; that is, the Jews and the Ten Tribes as two distinct peoples must possess the sign of the perpetual covenant. I leave the issue in the hands of honest students of God's Word.

"The Identity Truth declares that the British and American nations are really the only Sabbath-keeping nations upon the earth. We carefully preserve our Sabbath by legislative enactment, it being impossible for any individual to carry on his trade by opening his shop without violating the Sabbath law.

"The 'Identity Truth' also does trace the British people from the land of the Assyrian captivity to their present home, by a chain of evidence as satisfactory as any ever yet placed before men for their consideration.

"Let me close by referring readers to Acts v. 35, 38, 39; Acts xvii. 11.—I am, &c., "T. A. FINLAY.

EGYPTIAN RECORDS OF ISRAEL.

AN IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

"PROFESSOR FLINDERS PETRIE has spent another memorable winter. For a century men have sought up and down the valley of the Nile for written proofs that once there lived a people called the children of Israel. They found this race referred to in monuments all around, on the Moabite stone, on the black obelisk set up at Calah by the younger Shalmaneser to record the victories of his reign, and on many another stone of memory in the Euphratean valley. But in Egypt itself there was dark silence, for even at Defennch—the Tahpanhes of Jeremiah—there is nothing to connect it with the Jewish people save the modern name, El Kasr el Bint el Jahudi—the Castle of the Jew's daughter.

"There lived on a time a great and powerful monarch in Egypt, one Amenhotep the Third, who made the Colossi, and first tried to improve the agriculture of the valley by means of reservoirs. Two centuries after there arose another king who knew not Joseph, and it was he—men called him Merenptah—who, like his predecessor Rameses, despoiled the temples of earlier kings in order to provide himself the more readily with materials for his own. He took from a temple of Amenhotep's a huge black granite slab, bearing an inscription of no little importance, and built the face of it clumsily into the wall of a newer sanctuary designed for his own worship. Upon the smoothened back of this great block of stone he caused a record to be made of his brilliant campaigns in Syria. A few weeks ago the stone was unearthed by the Edwards Professor. And in this inscription, for the first time in Egyptian exploration, there has been found the name of the people of Israel.

"By the courtesy of Dr. Petrie I have been permitted to examine the squeezes of the inscription which he took for purposes of study. The original monument, which thus ranks with the Moabite stone, the great rock-writings of Behistun, and others, in critical value, will be deposited at Ghizeh, and it may be taken for granted that a plaster cast of it will ultimately be procured for the British Museum. The weight of the original is five tons, and the record, which is of considerable length, is fortunately complete. It tells how the mighty Merenptah cleared the Libyans out of Egypt—for even in those days, as in these, there was a constant oscillation of the line between savagery and civilisation—and how he carried his sword into Syria, where he conquered many races in their turn. Amongst the peoples so subdued were the children of 'Is ra il,' and the appearance of this name in the phonetic form of hieroglyphic writing, is for the antiquary the sensation of the year. To what was stated by the discoverer at a lecture in University College last week, it may be added that the people were said to be so completely spoiled that no 'seed' was left to them. Whether this means that the race was in the vanquished area entirely destroyed, or only that the harvests were seized as loot of war, is a point upon which the philologists will doubtless meet in conflict. The story adds that Egypt was filled with 'widows,' and if it be inferred from this that the victor carried all the Hebrew women as captives at his chariot wheel, the incident would but illustrate once more a normal feature of Oriental warfare.

"But this and other sentences, in what may become known as the Israelite stone, cannot properly be discussed until the full text is before us in the Contemporary for May. Suffice it to say that the mere translation of it seems to admit of no dubiety, although the task of allocating the campaign which it describes to a specific place in the history of Israel, as told in its own sacred books, will serve to fascinate Old Testament scholars all through the summer. It is difficult to resist the evidence which attributes the period of Merenptah to the beginning of the twelfth century before this era. The argument for identifying this monarch with the Pharaoh of the Exodus, hitherto incomplete, will obviously be affected by the new discovery. Although, however, the minuter details of Merenptah's colossal archives will but touch the fringe of Biblical study, they are a gage and earnest that the quest amongst the imperishable stones of Egypt for records of Joseph and Moses will one day meet its reward.

THE UNITY OF THE EMPIRE.

THE following appeared in the Otago Daily Times, a New Zealand paper, of Dunedin, on April 6th last, and is satisfactory reading, in these days of provocation and disappointment caused by the late events in the Transvaal and by the crooked policy followed by President Kruger. The article is this :—

"THE UNITY OF THE EMPIRE.

"(Per United Press Association.)

"Wellington, April 5.

"In an interview which a representative of the Post had with Mr. D. Ziman, the latter, having for a time exhausted his West Coast mining topic, turned to the subject of late political excitement in the Old Country and of the warlike enthusiasm evoked, of which he was witness. To the query of the representative as to the manner of the reception of the cables from the colonies of their loyalty and devotion to the Empire, Mr. Ziman answered: The people in England were very pleased at the way New Zealand and the Australian colonies generally showed their loyalty to the Mother Country. Of course, you read Mr. Chamberlain's reply. If I may express an opinion, I should say that the time has arrived when the colonies might show their loyalty in a substantial manner.

"What form is it that you suggest?—Well, you know, it is a fashion among foreigners in Europe to speak of the colonies as only fair-weather friends of England. I have often heard it said that, sooner than put up with the injury to trade and the expense which war involves, the colonies would desert England if she became involved in a great European war. Some colour is lent to this argument by the fact that at present the colonies contribute almost nothing to the defence of their own coasts. There was a good deal of correspondence on this subject in the Times last year, and it was pointed out that at present British subjects in England have to pay taxes to protect the coasts of British subjects in New Zealand, which seems hardly fair. It would be perfectly fair and just that Australasia should contribute more in proportion to their wealth and population to Imperial defences ; but in England people are content that things should go on as they are, and they are so proud of the greatness of the Empire that they are not disposed to bargain with the colonies as to their contributing funds for the Imperial Navy. This brings me to the suggestion I have to make. Let us give the whole world an object lesson in the union of the Empire. Let us offer of our own free will to present a battleship to the Imperial Navy.

"That is indeed a big proposal. Have you thought what such a ship would cost and how the money is to be raised ?—Oh, yes. I think a battleship quite worthy of Australasia could be built for about £500,000, and this sum I should like to see presented for that purpose to the British Admiralty as a free gift from the people and Governments of Australasia.

"And how do you think such a gift would be received in England ?—I think it would arouse an amount of enthusiasm for New Zealand and Australia which one can hardly realise, and it would strengthen the Empire in the eyes of the whole world out of all proportion to the actual cost of the ship. In this way it would, I believe, be a great guarantee of peace, for few indeed would dare to venture on war with an empire that could exhibit to the world such signs of unity and solidity. Australasia herself would gain greatly by such a gift as I suggest, because the English people would feel that New Zealand and Australia were really one with themselves, and always meant to be. But I don't wish to dwell on any selfish aspect of the question. The ship should be given as it would certainly be received in spirit, and as a symbol of Imperial unity.

"Your idea, Mr. Ziman, is a bold and attractive one, but how would you suggest that effect should be given to it ?—Well, I think that I would rather leave that for some of your public men to undertake. I would suggest that voluntary subscriptions should be raised both in New Zealand and Australia, and that the Governments should also contribute—say, £1 for each £1 raised by the public. Any subscription, however small, should be thankfully received, and everyone who contributes half a crown to such purpose would feel that he was doing something to knit closer the ties between the colonies and the mother country.

"FIRST CONTRIBUTION OF £1,000.

"I am sure the movement would receive great sympathy and support in Australia as well as New Zealand, and as far as I am concerned, though I have plenty to do with my money just now, I shall be very pleased on my own account to contribute £1,000 just to make a start with, for, although a foreigner by nationality and religion, I am thoroughly British at heart, and am pleased to take any opportunity of showing my loyalty and affection towards the great British Empire, which gives liberty and protection to all who wish to live under its flag."

"THE BRITISH-ISRAEL DELUSION."

THE April, 1896, number of Things to come contains an article with the above heading, "The British-Israel Delusion." The whole is an earnest appeal from some good man who regards ours as "a dangerous delusion" and warns those he influences against giving heed to the seductive teachings of the dangerous Anglo-Israelites. The writer of the paper is one C. S. He terms ours "a grand diversion," leading away from the hope of the Second Coming of the Lord, and comparable with the "diversion" of the Johannaites, the Millerites, the Mormonites ; all having the same Satanic origin. It is admitted in a sort of way by C. S., that ours is a somewhat harmless movement, but it does mischief, it appears, because it interferes "with the blessed hope of the return of the Lord!" "The Lord Jesus promises men a place in the many mansions He is gone to prepare, and is He wishing us to meet Him in Palestine, as Anglo-Israelites?" Our subject, it seems, draws men away from "the Scriptural, blessed, hope of union with the Lord we love, to the hope of a return to Palestine!" The Israelites, it is admitted, are to return there and are right to entertain those hopes as "bright and glorious ones, for the long millennial times of Messiah." But this, it appears by C. S's article, is not the hope of the Christian! "His calling, his hope, his destiny is heavenly." The Holy Ghost will never deceive him by putting before him the hopes of Israel. "Therefore," adds C. S. in a burst of severe logic, "therefore the present Anglo-Saxon Israelitish movement cannot be of the Spirit of God!" There is much more of the same kind in the paper in question. But the whole is based on the fatal error that the Israelites' hopes as we entertain them are not Christian hopes, but something apart from them. The fact is C. S. is unacquainted with our views and imagines that ours are merely "Earthly hopes and callings of Israel," and that such are necessarily "distinct from the heavenly calling and hopes of the Church of God." There never was a greater mistake, and C. S. ought to know it. Israel of the House of Joseph were blessed by God Himself in Hosea i. 10, R.V., with the Christian character, and C. S. cannot deprive them of it or forbid us claiming it as ours. "In the place where it was said to them, Ye are not My people, there it shall be said to them, Ye are the sons of the living God." The Lo-ammi Israelites are to be known as and proclaimed to be, "the Christian nation," a status which the Divine sonship, now theirs, authorises them to claim. How can C. S. dare to say that a nation so distinguished by God Himself, is not entitled to "the heavenly calling, and hopes of the Church of God?" The Israelites of old in the wilderness were "the Church of God," as Acts vii. 38 declares. When were they deposed from that high privilege and the hopes of the Church of God conferred upon another body? The glory of the Ten Tribes of Israel is described in the Old and New Testaments alike. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, and Heb. viii. 10, 12, describe them in identical words. The Church of Christ cannot have higher gifts than these. The question of personal salvation no doubt is not settled by the adhesion of anyone to the Anglo-Israelite views, any more than they are by adhesion to the Church's dogma apart from the work of the Holy Spirit in the soul. A nominal Christian and a nominal Anglo-Israelite may deceive men; but neither can deceive God, or find salvation otherwise than by the one name under heaven given among men whereby they must be saved (Acts iv. 12), even the name of Jesus. The "British-Israel" views look for the fulfilment of the Old and New Testament prophecies in regard to that race, and find that the British nation are fulfilling them. They look therefore, because God is faithful, to the fulfilment of all that is yet unfulfilled in that race, in the coming times, and rejoice to know that these things point to the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ, their King, to His appearance to reign over them on this earth, which thereby becomes heaven, since where He is must be heaven for them.

In an appendix to the article there is quoted a foolish paper written and published by the late Edward Hine in September, 1883, wherein he deprecated all attempts to convert the Jews to Christ because, as he believed, God had engaged to accept them under Moses in Ezek. xliii. 27. This was no doubt a grievous error on the part of Mr. Hine, and he was much to be blamed. For this very error we ourselves withstood him to the face in our leading article in vol. 1 of the BANNER, No. 6, p. 53, Feb. 7, 1877. The matter was disposed of nineteen years ago and the man now is dead. Our protest was recorded, printed and published. Is C. S. charitable in thus reviving a charge (which was by us publicly denounced), and after so long a time?

C. S. makes a point of 1 Cor. x. 32, maintaining that this text proves the distinction for all time between "the Jews; the Gentiles; and the Church of God." The latter, he says, is gathered out of both Jews and Gentiles and we shall never find, "after the Church of God is taken up into heaven," "a single instance in the prophecies, from Genesis to Revelation, where these three bodies are mentioned as found on earth, again." The fact is the Revised Version gives the correct translation of the Greek words of 1 Cor. x. 32, thus: "Give no occasion of stumbling, either to Jews, or to Greeks, or to the Church of God." In other words, offend neither the people of the House of Judah, nor those of the House of Israel (the Greeks), or "the Church of Christ" the last just then formed by the apostles of the Saviour. The Jews and Israelites of the Dispersion "among the Gentile Greeks" (John vii. 35), were not converted when St. Paul wrote, and therefore the three parties were separately named in the passage in question. Now the Israelites are no longer among the Greeks, but form the majority of "the Church of God" in Israel's "Isles of the West (or sea)" (Isa. xxiv. 15, R.V.), and therefore the three parties cannot properly be named and are not named again, together, in the prophetic Scriptures! The Bible as a whole is a history of God's chosen ones, the children of Israel. They were of old the Church in the wilderness (Acts vii. 38). The House of Israel are to be "The sons of the living God," therefore the Christian nation, and to them is to be given by the Lord the glorious function of the proclamation of the Gospel to all nations, families and kindreds of the earth (Mark xvi. 15). To them is to be granted by God Himself, "the kingdom and dominion and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven," with Christ Himself as the King, ruling over an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him (Dan. vii. 27). We do not in all this forget either the speedy return of the Lord to reign, His rapture of some of His saints, or the glorious kingdom on earth which He will presently rule in this world, by and through Israel His servants; seeking too the teaching of the Holy Spirit, in regard to the subject of our nation's identity with the lost tribes.

HYDE PARK LECTURES.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—On the 7th, 8th, and 9th of July, I shall (D.V.) hold meetings near Marble-arch, at 3 p.m. and 7 p.m., supported by Mr. Rowland Mackworth and others. Will believers kindly send all old BANNERS and other literature to Mr. Rowland Mackworth, 10, Nottingham-street, Marylebone, London, West, as soon as possible, that we may be well supplied with seed? Mr. Mackworth has carried on a grand work of distribution of literature since last year's visit; and he and I went to the Park, on May 7th, at 11 o'clock, and we had a good meeting. My wife was also with us, and it was as much as we could do to give out the literature, so anxious are the people to get some. We anticipate good times this July. May God be with us, and bless our testimony. Eastbourne, Hastings, Seaford, &c., who will help if I pay flying visits? Please don't reply in the winter. Can I speak on Seaford and Hastings Beaches without permission? I know about Eastbourne. As Mr. and Mrs. Reep have left Eastbourne, I want some ratepayer who will ask permission for me. As soon as I hear, I will give dates.

Yours faithfully, H. A. MARCHANT.

DEAR SIR,—The following extract is from the Review of Reviews:—

"'THE REPUBLIC OF BIRMINGHAM,' FROM A FRENCH POINT OF VIEW.

"Provincial England, so little known thirty years ago, is becoming an interesting fact to our neighbours across the channel. The sympathetic description of Birmingham, which is given in the Revue des Deux Mondes, for July, by M. Max Leclerc, under the title of 'A Tour in England,' is indicative of the intelligent appreciation with which some of the best elements of English life are regarded in France. 'A Well-governed Republic,' is the sub-title which M. Leclerc has given to his sketch, and after tracing with many statistics a history of the rise of the great manufacturing centre, its system of municipal government, its education, its health, its public institutions, the solidarity of interests which exists between the various sections of its society, the public spirit by which the whole community is animated, he concludes as follows:—

"'It now seems to me that I have now said enough to justify my title. Birmingham is a veritable Republic in the heart of a Monarchy, and a well-governed Republic. Municipal life circulates there in full tide; liberty has no apparent limits. The commune is all powerful; it affirms its omnipotence, but does not abuse it. It constructs municipal monuments which would be a challenge, if there were anyone to challenge; but in Birmingham, as in all English towns, there are as few as possible of the visible representations of the central power; nowhere is there any trace of tutelage, of mistrust from above, or of a trammel upon these free men; they have been treated like reasonable beings, and they act as such. Is it not strange in a town of 500,000 inhabitants, to meet with no adminstrative offices, no prefecture peopled with scribblers sent down from the capital, no officials, no permanent tribunals? In Birmingham men judge each other; they bring up and instruct their children as they please; they nurse their sick according to their own ideas; they plan and lay out their streets as they want them. I assure you they are excellent Republicans; the name alone is wanting; but they have the thing, and that suffices. They are wise men.'"

When French opinion has fully realised the effects of free institutions upon our towns, it will perhaps become reconciled to our system of colonial government. It is not in England alone, but throughout the British Empire, that the English race proposes to itself to multiply little Republics in all but name on the model of Birmingham and its sister towns.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—It may be of interest to you to read Young's translation of the passage in Amos and in Acts, so I send extracts. Yours truly, W. O.

From translation by Robert Young (literally and idiomatically translated). A. FULLARTON & Co.—

Amos ix. 11, 12.—"In that day I raise the tabernacle of David, which is fallen, and have repaired their breaches: and its ruins I raise up, and have built it up as the days of old: So that they possess the remnant of Edom, and all the nations on whom My name is called, affirmeth the Lord, the doer of this."

Acts xv. 16, 17.—"After these things I will turn back, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, and its ruins I will build again, and will set it upright, that the residue of men may seek after the Lord, and all the nations upon whom My name hath been called, saith the Lord, who is doing all these things."

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Do you note how applicable to us, seem verses 15, 16, 18 and 19, of Psalm lxviii., selected for the morning service for Whit Sunday?

"15. The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; an high hill as the hill of Bashan.

"16. Why leap ye, ye high hills? this is the hill which God desireth to dwell in; yea, the Lord will dwell in it for ever.

"18. Thou hast ascended on high; thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them.

"19. Blessed be the Lord who daily loadeth us with benefits, even the God of our salvation."

I quote from the Annotated Paragraph Bible of 1857.

In the note concerning Bashan, it is stated, "This is the range of Anti-Libanus, which formed the Northern boundary of Bashan. Its Southern peak called 'Hermon,' is often referred to in Scripture, being the loftiest and most majestic mountain in Canaan; and its grandeur as such, is here contrasted with the greater glory of Zion as the 'holy mountain.'"

In referring to ver. 16, "Why leap ye, ye high hills," a note says, "Rather, 'why look ye askance' i.e., with envy, at the honour put on Zion as the earthly residence of God?"

Are we not set on a high hill? For envy, do not other hills look askance at us, and have we not received gifts for men? Power to help other nations in spiritual and temporal in a marked degree? Gifts of opportunity, wealth, and the inspired desire to bring other peoples to a knowledge of the Lord?

Yours faithfully, L. P.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

SIR,—I write to suggest to your contributors that, instead of merely quoting chapter and verse for their references, they should quote the passages (when not too long) in full. The ordinary reader either has not the time, or has not the inclination to make the needed references, and consequently much of the force of the arguments is lost to them.

This remark is applicable to all the writings which I have seen on the "Identification" question, and I hope that my calling attention to what I cannot but regard as a serious drawback to the comprehension of the subject by the ordinary reader, may result in my suggestion being followed. I am aware that the space which would be needed for carrying it out will be held to be a serious obstacle, but this should not be regarded as of much moment when it is admitted that everything should be done to scatter broadcast the seeds of the "Truth." I am, sir, &c., A SUBSCRIBER.

Auckland House, Darjeeling, May 3rd, 1896.

THE HEIRS TO DAVID'S THRONE.

WE have received the following letter from the Hon. Sec., of the British-Israel Association at Brisbane, Queensland, Australia.

"Dear Philo-Israel,—A member of this Association propounded the following question, and, although at the meeting several gentlemen vouchsafed answers, it was deemed advisable to submit it to you with the request that you would kindly give us the benefit of the views of the matter:—

"'If Zedekiah's daughters that left Palestine in company with Jeremiah, were the only heirs to David's throne, of what line did Christ come? for He was of the house and lineage of David, and heir to David's throne.'

"Thanking you in anticipation for your assistance in the matter, I am, &c.,

"HOWARD S. BLISS, Hon. Sec.

"The Treasury, Brisbane, March 24, 1896."

In reply, we say what is obvious from our only source of knowledge, the Bible, that the daughters of Zedekiah, the last male heir to the throne of David, came in the line of David's son Solomon, the son of Bathsheba, Rehoboam, Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, &c., down to Hezekiah, Josiah, Jehoiachin, to Zedekiah. On the other hand, the Lord Jesus Christ came from King David in the line of Nathan, Solomon's brother, by Bathsheba (1 Chron. iii. 5), through Mattatha (Luke iii. 31), to Joseph the supposed father of Jesus Christ. By the other genealogy of Matt. i., the descent was through Solomon to Jeconiah, all but one, kings of Judah only (2 Chron. xxxvi. 8, margin), and then through Salathiel to Matthan, Jacob, and Joseph, the husband of Mary, the mother of the Lord.

The Lord Jesus thus sprang from David the King by his son Nathan (Solomon's brother), and was thus in the direct line of heirs to the Throne from the King of Israel and Judah, Jesse's son.

THE QUEEN has thanked, by her Private Secretary, Mr. W. Jones-Hunt, of Bath, for his Birthday Ode published in the BANNER OF ISRAEL, June 3rd.

"THE MAGIC OF THE BRITISH FLAG."

WE have always felt that God has used the British Flag, being the ostensible symbol of Israel's power, to carry out His purposes of grace, and often those of punishment for sin among the other nations of the earth. It seems to us that the missionary enterprise prospers or fails according as the British Flag protects or abandons it. In India, where the Flag is present everywhere, the missions to the heathen advance. In Afghanistan, when the British military forces were withdrawn, the missions were at once re-called and disappeared. In Madagascar, while British influence was present, the Gospel had free course and prospered. With the French protectorate the British missions are withering and ready to die, for in the event of the success of the French military expedition, Protestant missionary effort cannot be expected to succeed, or do otherwise than languish. Another phase of the same truth that God blesses the British Flag is presented to us in the marvellous history of the progress of the Malayan Peninsula under the fostering care of the British Flag, during the last 20 years. The British protectorate over the native states there was declared in 1874, twenty years ago, and the results to-day are simply wonderful. After that date Perak and the other smaller native states were persuaded to throw in their lot with the British, and henceforth they were governed by British Residents, who effected within a few years a truly wonderful change. Before 1874, these states, with Perak at their head, were simply barbarous. Intrigue, corruption, and violence filled them. They were invaded at that time by a Chinese horde of immigrants, attracted by the rich desposits of tin discovered there. The neighbourhood of Singapore, where the British power had been long established, forced our representatives to decide that these Malayan States must also come under British government. As usual, we did not wish to annex them, but we did the next best thing. After the manner of the protected states in India we decided to appoint British Residents at each of these native states, and proceeded to govern them through their own native rulers, but in the mode approved by the British and Indian Governments.

"In a few years," says the Scotsman, "a wonderful transformation was witnessed."

Sir C. B. H. Mitchell, the governor of the Straits Settlements, was presented by Mr. Frank Swettenham, the Resident, with an able report for the year 1894, of the progress of these outlying native states, with Perak at their head. Their progress has been astonishing, in revenue, trade, and general progress. The estimated revenue of Perak for the current year is taken to be 4¼ millions of dollars, which is equal to that of the British Straits Settlements, including the flourishing port of Singapore! The Scotsman of Oct. 3 last, summarises the figures thus:—

> The rate of progress can best be seen when the figures of several years are taken into account. The increase in revenue since 1890 was expected to reach 75 per cent. at the end of the year. "The production of tin has increased by over 50 per cent.; the export of padi is nearly twenty times what it was in 1890, and that of sugar is more than double. The value of Customs revenue has more than doubled, and of the land has more than trebled. The railway receipts last year were three and this year (1895) will be nearly eight times as large as in 1890. The postal business has increased fourfold, and that of the telegraph offices has more than doubled, while the trade of the State has increased from a value of 17 millions to nearly 27 millions of dollars."

The picture of prosperity presented by the Resident's report is well condensed by the Scotsman, and we cannot do better than repeat the glowing account. It reads thus:—

> This is not all. The Chinese workpeople, and notably the native Malays, have participated in the prosperity of Perak. They are better clothed, housed, and fed; they have "gained exactly in proportion to that power which their chiefs have lost." Their lands, once valueless and in many cases abandoned, are now "cultivated, fenced, cared for. The wealthiest Malays of the Peninsula are the Perak Malays.

It is for them that the richest silks of Trengganu and Batu Bara are woven; it is they who vie with each other in the building of expensive houses and the possession of horses and carriages, while many of them have their own residences in the Sacred City of Mecca." It cannot be said that in developing the wealth of Perak we have at the same time impoverished and degraded the native population. When Mr. Swettenham succeeded five years ago to the Residentship, there was an accumulated surplus at credit of the Government of 1,800,000 dollars. He is "glad to say that nothing now remains" of this idle balance. It has been laid out on railway and road extension, on telegraphs, water works, and everything likely to encourage trade and benefit the country. On the Kinta Valley Railway alone 2½ millions of dollars has been spent by the State. This outlay appears to be a good investment of public funds, and the Perak railway revenue is expected this year to reach nearly 700,000 dollars, "of which probably more than half will be profit, giving a return of about 10 per cent. on capital invested." It might seem hard to beat the experience of Perak. But Selangor, a neighbour and younger Protected State, has succeeded in doing this. The revenue collected last year was close up to that of the older State; the total volume of trade in 1894 was over 25 millions of dollars; and it has a million of dollars of assets invested in loans and securities, and between three and four millions laid out upon a remunerative Government railway. Like Perak, Selangor has a large annual expenditure on public works, and does not neglect the higher resources of civilisation. We read in Mr. Rodger's report that "the liberality of the Chinese community," which in Selangor comprises at least a hundred thousand persons, and includes practically all the tin miners in the State, "has been well exemplified by their voluntary taxation for the establishment of a hospital and asylum for indigent persons who, from old age, chronic disease, or other causes, cannot be adequately treated in the ordinary pauper hospitals; and by their purchase of four ambulance carts for conveying sick coolies from the mines to the hospitals." The native races "have taken readily to various forms of athletic sport, and the sight of men of every race, colour, and creed, assembled together on the cricket or football field affords striking evidence of the good results attending British protection;" while the children, now that the Victoria Institution, a memorial of Her Majesty's Jubilee, has been opened, have "the opportunity of meeting together in the class-rooms and on the playground of a good English school."

There are other smaller States in the Malay Peninsula which are not included in the above account. These have only recently been brought under British protection and management, and are already showing that their progress will be as marked as that of Perak, in no distant period. In regard to the future, Mr. Swettenham, the Resident, makes the following remarks:—

"The best thing we can hope for," says Mr. Swettenham, is a settled agricultural population and "a body of Europeans who will bring their brains, their energy, and their money to convert our jungles into extensive estates of permanent cultivation, a form of enterprise such as no Asiatic has hitherto had the ability, experience, or determination to attempt;" and other Residents echo his words. Whether Perak and its neighbours, having launched on the tide of prosperity with the aid of their tin mines, are to go further and to fare still better on the strength of the suitability of the soil for raising coffee, tobacco, spices, and other tropical staples, remains to be seen. It is enough for the present to know that the magic of the British Flag has within less than a generation converted what, under weak and corrupt native rulers, would have remained in picturesque barbarism into a region that counts for something in summing up the wealth, the trade, and the progress of the world.

The remarks of our Edinburgh friend on the account we have given above of the marvellous progress of these native States in the Malaya Peninsula, deserves a place in our columns. He writes that the above account "shows what this country has been doing in a quiet way for a good many years in a distant part of the world, by advice and superintendance, and resulting in marked social and commercial advances. Little or nothing has been heard of what has been going on in the Malay Peninsular, the country referred to, but now that these reports have been issued, we can see how rapid and how marked the advance has been, and in striking contrast to the fussy and soldiering plans of the French in the countries not far off.

"In contrast to the scrambling for territory of other countries, what strikes me with regard to Britain is that dominion is almost always thrust on it, or acquired in a natural way or of necessity. In the present case we have not even assumed a Protectorate, though that should follow, and would have, no doubt, before this time been an accomplished fact had France or Germany been in our place."

JOSEPH.

By M. J. S.

Our ancestor Joseph was sold into captivity by Judah (Gen. xxxvii.) to the end that, firstly, his possessors, and, secondly, "all countries" (Gen. xli. 50) might be saved from starvation; and British-Israelites believe that so was our race sold by Ahaz, king of Judah (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8) to the end that by its splendid re-discovery in a far land, as foretold, all the world should believe on the God of Israel and live indeed.

As at last the knowledge of our ancestry is beginning to spread in our nation, so may we expect a record to be found in secular Egyptian history of Joseph's life-work, which has hitherto rested on the "unsupported" statements of Scripture; we cannot believe so great a man would be ignored by the tireless scribes of his time and country as has hitherto seemed to be the case.

That marvellous calculator, Professor Totten, has cleared up the mystery. By comparing the record that the children of Israel sojourned in Egypt 430 years with the statement of Heb. vii. 10, "Through Abraham even Levi hath paid tithes, for he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedek met him" (his father and grandfather being still unborn), we see the 430 years is counted from Gen. xii., when Abram entered the land of Egypt, and not from Jacob's era. Further, the family home, all the after lives of Abram, Isaac, and Jacob was in a country garrisoned by Egyptian troops, so that Jacob only moved from one outlying part of Egypt to another. Goshen was Egyptian territory, but not part of Egypt (Ex. ix. 25, 26, "all the land of Egypt contrasted with Goshen," and many other proofs).

Now, see how this new light clears up the whole question, hitherto so dark. Professor Sayce, in his great work, "The Higher Criticism and the Monuments," in the chapter, "Canaanitish and Egyptian Elements in Genesis," after mentioning the record of a great famine, which he identifies wrongly with Joseph's (it was that of Gen. xii. 10), says, "The age of Baba and Joseph (Abram) will have coincided if any credence is to be placed in the Biblical narrative. When Joseph (Abram) entered Egypt it would still have been under Hyksos' rule. . . . If Meneptah, son of Rameses II., was the Pharaoh of the Exodus—and the Egyptian monuments exclude any other reign—the chronology of Ex. xii. 40 would place the arrival of Israel in Egypt long before the expulsion of the Hyksos and the rise of the XVIII. Dynasty. . . . The family of Joseph (Abram) would, therefore, have settled (arrived) in Egypt towards the time when the struggle between the Hyksos kings and the princes of the south first broke out." (The italicised corrections in parentheses are mine.) Compare Gen. xii. 17, "And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai, Abram's wife." Possibly both passages refer to the same event. Sayce goes on to say the Hyksos were "themselves called Aamu, or Asiatics, by their subjects," and that "no prejudice would have been felt against a Hebrew stranger by those who were themselves strangers in the land." Here comes one of the most remarkable features of this romantic story. Sayce himself has since discovered that the Hyksos—kings of Egypt in Abram's time—were of "Kassite," or Cushite (Gen. x. 8) origin. Now Kassite is the proper reading of "Kasdim," translated Chaldees in Gen. xi. 31 and elsewhere in the Pentateuch; so Abram was not a "stranger" to these Hyksos Pharaohs, but a "great prince" (Gen. xxiii. 6), or "a prince of God" (Israel) from their own home in Ur of the Kasdim! No wonder that mighty Pharaoh desired to make alliance with his one-time neighbour by marrying his "sister."

Now to deal with Joseph at his proper time and place. Sayce goes on, "There is only one other period in ancient Egyptian history to which the settlement (of Goshen) could be assigned. This is the period which has recently been revealed to us by the tablets of Tel-el-Amarna. Under 'the heretic king' Khu-n-Aten, Egypt and Canaan were again in close union with one another, and the Canaanite was supreme in the Pharaoh's court and virtually master of the land of Egypt." (Joseph was a Canaanite to foreigners, in the same sense that Danites were later classed with and as Phœnicians.) "We have found the vizier Dudu actually occupying the same position as that of Joseph. But it is impossible to harmonise the date of the Exodus with that of the arrival of Joseph in Egypt if the latter did not happen till the closing years of the XVIII. Dynasty. Khu-n-Aten's reign falls only 150 years earlier than that of the Pharaoh of the Exodus." (Exactly at Joseph's era, by Totten's theory—the true one.) And, further, he says, "Egypt and Canaan are as closely united in the narrative as they were in the days of Khu-n-Aten, when Canaan was an Egyptian province. The famine, which can be caused in Egypt only by a failure of the waters of the Nile, is regarded (!!!) as spreading also to Canaan, where it would be due to a want of rain. Here we may see a trace (!) of the age of Khu-n-Aten, when Canaan was at times dependent on Egypt for its corn—as we know to have been the case from one of the Tel-el-Amarna letters—and when, consequently, a failure of food in the valley of the Nile would have affected also the Asiatic province" (Gen. xli. 56). Having joined the times of Khu-n-Aten, and some of the chief events of his time, to the Scriptural period of Joseph, let us now see some more of what Sayce says as to the great vizier "Dudu," "who occupied the same position as that of Joseph" and at the same time. "There is a curious parallelism between the position of Joseph and that of another native of Canaan, it would seem, in the reign of Khu-n-Aten. Several of the cuneiform letters found at Tel-el-Amarna are addressed by a certain Aziru, or Ezer, a Phœnician officer in the Egyptian service, to his 'lord' and 'father' Dudu. Dudu is the Dodo of the Old Testament, a name which has the same etymological origin as the Hebrew David and the Phœnician Dido" ("Beloved"—the poor captive lad and great ruler remembered his home and father, that "Israel loved Joseph more than all his children" and kept his old pet name in poverty and in riches), "and the language in which Dudu is addressed shows that he was second to the Pharaoh alone." Pharaoh told Joseph, "Only in the throne will I be greater than thou" (Gen. xli. 40). "Like the king, he is called 'the lord,' at whose feet 'his servants' prostrated themselves, and Aziru declares in one passage that he does 'not depart from the commands' of 'his lord,' his 'god,' his 'sun-god, and from the commands of his lord Dudu,' thus coupling together the Pharaoh and his minister. The name Pharaoh gave to Joseph, 'Zaphnath-paaneah,' may be read Zapn-n-ti-pa-ânkh, which is certainly correct save the first syllable (which is doubtful) and would mean 'the man-of-the-north' of 'the living one' (Pharaoh), in other words, 'Pharaoh's Norman,' which name has an exceptional interest to those who believe the Normans of our time to be Joseph's 'great nephews.'" I may mention, to wind up, that Sayce shows that the word the people called before him, "Abrech" (Gen. xli. 43), is Sumerian (the sacred language of Shinar and of Babylon), for "a seer" (abrikku), showing they recognised his Eastern origin and his marvellous prophetic powers; which is a greatly preferable reading to the confessedly incorrect "Bow the knee."

THE BIBLE: ISRAEL AND JUDAH.

A Lecture delivered at the Seamen's Bethel, Pill,

By Geo. Cooper.

PART I.

To-night, I wish with you, to sit with Mary, as it were, at the feet of Jesus. The practice of serving Christ alone does not meet the approval of the Lord Jesus,—as is evinced by the answer given by the Saviour to Martha's complaint respecting Mary. We must listen to the voice of the Lord Jesus daily. Many Christians are troubled too much about the serving part; but let us follow the advice of the Master, and choose that place of blessing—namely, "His feet," that the Lord may pronounce the same benediction upon us as He so lovingly bestowed upon Mary: "Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her."

I am going to speak about a small thing, but, nevertheless, a large subject, and that is, "the Bible." This is multum in parvo, or, much in little. This little Book has stood the test of ages. Rationalising geologists make an effort to remove the Book of Genesis. But it is still, and will stay there. No man can take it away, and, long after the undevout geologists of the future have come, done their work, and their bodies are reposing in the earth, the unalterable saying of David will ring out clear on the air of the future, "The Word of the Lord endureth for ever."

Then the Book of Joshua has sustained a combined attack from the undevout astronomers. They say, "it cannot be true that the sun halted above Gideon, and the moon over the valley of Ajalon. Take that out, and we might believe it;" and they pull and pull away, but what has been the result? Like the sun above Gideon, and like the moon over the valley of Ajalon, it stands still.

Then next step in bands of anatomists and physiologists, and exert all their influence to wrest out of its place the Book of Jonah. "Take out that impossibility respecting Jonah in the belly of the whale for three days and three

"As an offshoot of the ancient Scythians, this race in its early history made a record for piracy and plunder.

"The Sakaisunas required but fourteen hundred years to conquer a part of Asia, march fifteen hundred miles across Europe, establish themselves as a power on land and sea, and give a permanent name to the kingdom of Saxony. Conquered by Charlemagne, they became subordinate on the Continent. But nobles of Saxony have been emperors of Germany, and some of them have done much for civilisation. Luther was from Saxony. And the Reformation was begun in England, where the Anglo-Saxon race, having crossed from the Continent in the fifth century, was then at home.

"The development of the Angles was like that of the Saxons. Both were 'Low German' tribes belonging to the Gothic race. That the Angles gave their name to the island may have been because theirs was the generic name for all the Saxon tribes; but, more probably, it was because they were the first Low Germans in England to accept Christianity, and so to be referred to in the Latin literature of that date. An essential element in the Anglo-Saxon blood was derived from the Vikings; and the law of primogeniture may be traced to these wild men of the sea, whose eldest sons lived in castles, but whose youngest sons were pirates, and lived, died, and were buried in their pirate ships. If the laws of heredity are still in force, it may not be wondered at that the history of Great Britain for the past three hundred years has been a history of aggression and appropriation. The younger branch of the family in America has been too busy in occupying the territory which is wrested from the Indians to look beyond its own broad domains for conquest, but its history abundantly proves it to be a not degenerate stock. But the history of the Anglo-Saxons from the start has been a history of aggrandisement by force. Where it has waged one war for liberty or righteousness, it has waged ten for conquest or subjugation. And so it will to the end of the chapter, unless the grace of God intervenes and eradicates this tendency.

"Two centuries ago the Anglo-Saxons numbered 3,000,000. One century ago they numbered 17,000,000. To-day they number 119,000,000—thirty-eight in Great Britain, nineteen in its Colonies, and sixty-two in the United States. This 119,000,000 rule 36,000,000 in the protectorates and dependencies of the British Empire, besides 300,000,000 in India, making in all more than 400,000,000, or more than one-fourth of the estimated population of the globe.

"The area of the earth's dry land is 50,500,000 square miles; the Anglo-Saxon race controls 14,835,701—nearly one-third.

"The expansion of the race is surprising. In Great Britain alone, for two decades past, it has increased by 3,000,000 each decade. In the United States the population doubles every twenty-five years. At the beginning of this century, says a writer in the Methodist Review, 25,000,000 spoke French, 27,000,000 German, and 15,000,000 English; now 40,000,000 speak French, 57,000,000 German, and over 100,000,000 English. In other words, the number of those who speak French has increased during this century 60 per cent., German 110 per cent., and English more than 600 per cent.

"The assimilating power of the race is marvellous. The race is not materially modified in the United States. There has been a slight change in the physique, that is all. Teuton and Celt still mingle here much as they were mingled in Great Britain. The Teuton still preponderates, as he should to keep the racial features. In 1890 the census returns made the foreign-born population of the United States contain 64 per cent. Teutonic, 22 per cent. Celtic, and 14 per cent. of all others; and the foreign-born was only one-seventh of the whole population. We have room for a vast multitude of people whom our fertile soil will readily support. With 63,000,000 of people on 3,500,000 square miles of territory, we have 18 to the square mile. Germany has 236·7 to the square mile. When our population is as dense, we shall number 828,000,000. We can support more to the square mile than Germany can. Medical science and sanitary regulations are likely to prevent pestilence; increased facilities for communication preclude the possibility of famine; and wars, though not improbable, are not likely to last long, while, with the blessing of God, they may be relegated to the barbarous nations of the earth.

"As to food, the United States and Canada last year raised 487,000,000 bushels of wheat, while all the rest of the world raised 890,000,000. Of this 890,000,000, Great Britain raised 58,000,000, India 238,000,000, Cape Colony 3,000,000, Australia 30,000,000; total 329,000,000. The Anglo-Saxon race last year raised more than two-thirds of the wheat of the entire globe.

"Its shipping is five-eighths of the tonnage of all nations, so that it can carry its own cereal products to any of the family the world over. And if navies are needed to defend them, the combined navies of Great Britain and the United States are even now a match for any foes that could be massed against them.

"The English language, as already indicated, is an important factor. It is easily learned. It is closely allied to the German and Scandinavian. It has a large proportion of Latin elements. It is comparatively free from inflections. The vexed question of genders, so troublesome in German and French, it has solved in a rational way; and if its orthography could be improved, it might readily become a universal, as it is now the most general, language of the world. It is recorded of Professor John A. Weisse that until thirty years of age he was an ardent hater of the English language, and that he undertook the thorough study of it in order to demonstrate its inferiority to German; but his candour compelled him to admit that 'it contains the cream and essence of its predecessors; its grammar is simpler, and its literary records more consecutive and complete.' 'In richness,' says Professor Jacob Grimm, an enthusiastic admirer of his native German, 'in compact adjustment of its parts, and in pure intelligence, none of the living languages can compare with English.' And, according to Mr. O. B. Super (Methodist Review, 1890), Professor Candolle, of Geneva, estimates that in one hundred years English will be spoken by 860,000,000 of people, German by 124,000,000, and French by 96,000,000.

"In this connection it should be noted that, as Professor Marsh says, 'more than one-half of the letters mailed and carried by the postal system of the world are written, mailed, and read by the English-speaking populations of the globe.' These peoples, too, distribute more than two-thirds of the Bibles and Testaments published. It may be justly claimed that the literature of the Anglo-Saxon race is the greatest and the purest. The highest results of scientific research are issued in popular forms, at prices which bring them readily within reach of all. The newspapers of the Anglo-Saxons are unequalled for abundance, cheapness, and excellence, to say nothing of enterprise, in which they are far and away the leaders.

"The federation of the scattered Anglo-Saxons on the globe is not impossible. And if it could be secured, it would prove an immense advantage to every interest of humanity.

"But the Anglo-Saxons need to be sanctified. The racial traits are still conspicuous. If Christianity does not use them in the interests of humanity, and curb and yoke them to the service of the meekness which most exalts the Prince of Peace, the English-speaking nations of the earth will have a temporary splendour, possibly a world-wide supremacy, and then will disappear from earth. If ever there was a sacred duty laid upon the followers of Christ, it is, by every possible influence and through every available opportunity, to seek to bind in one federation of humane and generous service of the weaker nations of the earth the scattered forces of this highly-favoured race, and to make this mighty federation a bulwark for righteousness and justice and honesty and truth in all international relations the world over. Let there be a common citizenship for all English-speaking peoples, so that a man need only to change his residence to change also his citizenship, so long as he abides with Anglo-Saxons. Let extradition laws be reduced to what now obtains among our several States. Let postal unions, and customs unions, and copyright and patent regulations which shall comprehend all English-speaking peoples, break down the barriers which now exist, and prepare the way for the closest possible federation of the Anglo-Saxon race and its dependencies. The time is propitious for such efforts. The opportunities are multiplying. And the present temper of both the English and the American branches of this great family, as they are represented in the most intelligent and thoughtful forces of the two nations, encourages the hope that the mission of the Anglo-Saxon race may be not a selfish but a generous mission for the benefit of the world."

The above is taken from The Christian Age of May 13th, 1896, and is valuable as the expression of the opinion of an American, the Rev. George S. Payson. The writer knows not a word of Our Identity, and yet gives almost all the facts which lie at the foundation of our national Israelitish character, present position, and future destiny, as "the Israel of God." He notices the vast increase of the Anglo-Saxon race, its expansion, its conquests and supremacy among the nations, its hold of one-third of the earth's habitable land, its assimilating power, in America and among the British, its vast food supply, its shipping, its spreading language, its distribution of the Word of God, its immense yet pure literature, its newspapers and correspondence; but alas! also its wickedness and degeneracy, and its need of sanctification, if it is to escape ruin!

The writer draws the exact picture of Israel, but does not recognise his own work. He calls ours "a highly-favoured race," who ought to help "the weaker nations of the earth" —that is, to bless them (Gen. xxii. 18). He wants universal federation among the Anglo-Saxons (making them "a nation, and a company of nations"); and lastly sees that the Anglo-Saxon race has a mission, not a selfish but a generous one, for the benefit of the world! But the writer, because he has missed the clue, sees that we have terrible besetting national sins, and shall be ruined by them. "We need to be sanctified." But he cannot see how. We shall disappear from the earth unless the remedy can be found! He cannot say how. We can, for we have the key to the puzzle. We know the wickedness of the race quite well, as he does, and see its operation everywhere, among the British as well as among our American brethren. But knowing we are Israel, it is our consolation to know also that God, too, has foreseen it, and told us how He means to cure us. If we read Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Heb. viii. 10—12; Joel ii. 28—32, and Ezek xxxvii. 14, 23—28, we shall see that the remedy is Divine, and will certainly effect the cure of the terrible disease the American writer detects, which must be cured or we shall all perish. It is "the Lord's new covenant," applied by and through the precious blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, which is to work the cure. This covenant undertakes to change the very nature of the nation —to pardon its iniquities, to make it the people of the Lord, and Him its God. The outpouring of the Spirit of Christ on the nation and on the people who compose it, will be the ostensible means of the conversion, and it will be radical and lasting.

On the whole, we regard the Rev. G. S. Payson's article as a very wonderful production, and while we see that he wants the knowledge which will comfort him as to the sanctification and permanence of our race, we are glad to welcome him as one of the very best modern "blind witnesses" to Our Identity whom it has been our privilege to introduce to our readers through the medium of the BANNER OF ISRAEL. Let our people praise the Lord for His promises to Israel, and, because being Israel ourselves, they are ours.

COLONISATION IN FRANCE.

THE Birmingham Daily Post of April 10, 1896, published a short statement in regard to the efforts now being made by the French Government to induce its people to emigrate to Madagascar, its new possession. The effort of the rulers appears to be to deter those willing to go by demanding the capital of the would-be emigrants before they start, as a contribution to the State for allowing them to go. Not only is this hindrance in the way of those anxious to try their fortunes abroad, but there is also the fact that France has no surplus population to offer to their outlying possessions, since their home population is not increasing but rather diminishing. The following are the remarks we allude to :—

"The strange mania for colonisation under which the French people have always laboured without success, has once more seized upon the Government, and every effort is being made to induce the people to emigrate to Madagascar. But so totally devoid of all logic is the system by which colonisation is conducted in France that the would-be colonists are requested to pay 5,000f. before they are installed in the new residence they have chosen far away from the mother country, and strangers as they must be for awhile to all the resources the new country has to offer them. The strange system adopted by the French Government of exacting from the colonist capital as well as labour will always prevent any rush of labourers to the new country to which they are invited by proclamation, by placard, or by the labouring lecturers who toil and sweat on behalf of the emigration of families to the different colonial possessions owned by the French. I lately met in London a French family returning from Algeria, having worked and toiled for five long years under the burning sun of Africa. They were hurrying back to their native place near Tours; father, mother, two growing-up boys, two girls, and a baby. They had emigrated by advice of their friends, who beheld with terror this increasing family, so unusual in France. They carried with them the moral of their story in the shape of half-a-dozen hard boiled eggs, on which they were to subsist until they arrived at the grandmother's little farm. What struck me most of all in the sadness of their position was the silent resignation with which they bore the disap nights, and then we might believe it too." But where is now the Book of Jonah? Exactly where it was before; testifying the fact to puny man, that if he attempts to follow Jonah's example in shirking his duty—by escaping even to the Argentine Republic,—God will not only bring about a cyclone of wind, but a cyclone of governmental power, that shall "spue" him back to the country from which he fled to suffer for his wrong-doing, and afterwards make him to fulfil his duty like Jonah.

Then the infidels seek to remove all the miracles. Finally, we have the critic saying that "the Bible is not inspired," and the Christian asserting that the House of Israel,—"God's chosen people," who He says is to Him as "the apple of His eye," and "His firstborn,"—has been entirely swept off the face of the earth, without so much as having the chance to hear the Gospel of Jesus Christ preached to them. They, too, as the geologist, the astronomer, and the infidel, are doing their very best to remove their part (Israel) out of the Bible.

Now, do not be fooled by all this soft talk about the Bible, for these are all futile attempts of puny men to dethrone God, each in their different ways. This is no new thing, for we have the same represented at the crucifixion of our Saviour. We read that the inscription above His head was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Hebrew represents now as then, only in a far greater degree, religious bigotry; Greek, that of the present-day higher criticism, German rationalism, and atheism; and the throwing off of all Christian influence on the part of ruling governmental Powers and adopting methods to suit the present times are equally analogous to the Latin representation.

We, as individuals, can do but little to cope with the first and last, but if we are truly on the side of Christ, we can do an important part to lessen the baneful influence of that which is represented by the Greek.

The question arises, "How can we?" First we must see what God says in His Word. Yet "it takes more than eyes to see this. Try it on a dark night. Worldly wisdom unassisted by Divine illumination can no more discern spiritual truths than eyes alone can see objects on a dark night. Our wisdom is as helpless as ignorance in spiritual affairs, unless God helps us. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned," and, in the spirit, the prophets speak of literal truths. It is, therefore, not the sight of human wisdom alone that we need; it is God's light to refract the object to our dilated but practically blind eyes. "Without Me ye can see nothing;" and that is why it is needful to sit awhile at the feet of Jesus. And now, having faith in this assisted light, we will try to see what God would have us see; and then only comes our time to work, and this work consists in witnessing for God and His faithfulness.

Anything that detracts from the Godhead is dishonouring. Now, the asserted fact that the House of Israel has been destroyed out of God's sight by His own hand, takes away from the Godhead as much as infidelity. Someone may say that "that is a bold and sweeping assertion." Yes; nevertheless it is true. For man says that God has done the very thing which God says He would not do. Can anything be more God-dishonouring than this? We will show how dishonouring it is. It destroys the ground of our belief that God is a God of truth. If He has cast off the House of Israel, what faith can we have in Him to fulfil the promises made to us in Jesus Christ? If He has done so, the doctrine of the unity in Trinity, and the Trinity in unity cannot stand. When such doctrine spreads, and is accepted, we are not far from atheism. Jesus Christ has said, "I and the Father are one." In another place, we learn that Jesus Christ is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Now, if Jesus Christ was the same yesterday, He was then co-equal with the Father, for St. John tells us that "in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." There we have a corroboration of the first text, "I and the Father are one." Therefore, we are forced to the following conclusion, that, when either God the Father, or God the Son (both being co-equal), says a thing, each utterance must of necessity and truth be fulfilled. If any utterance which has been made by the Father fails to be accomplished, disunion between the Godhead must have taken place; and, if the Father has broken His word, what assurance have we that Christ will adhere to His? None whatever. Both must, of a necessity and truth, keep their word, or the impeachment must follow that God is not the God of truth, as represented by the Christian.

Bradlaugh made this very impeachment of our God; and our object to-night is to reply to that charge and prove that God is a God of truth, in that He has not destroyed the "seed of Abraham"—the House of Israel,—and that He is now acting faithfully towards the completion of that promise which avows that "in thee (Abraham) and in thy seed (through Christ) shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Those of you who have read your Bibles carefully are fully acquainted with the name of Israel. But what does the word portend? For years we have read our Bibles, but have we ever prayerfully studied it, so that the light of God's Holy Spirit might reflect upon the retina of our blind eyes, and illumine the dark passages with true light, and shew us the meaning of "Israel and Judah" with their connections?

It is not the gross amount of food which a man consumes which builds up his body with strength, but the nett amount which is digested. So with the Word of God. Many read their Bible without meditating at all on what has been presented to them, and thus no good to the soul ensues. Herein is contained the antidote for such proceeding: "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of Truth."

We shall now try and point out, with God's help, the meaning of the term "Israel," with a view to rightly divide the Word of Truth. The misunderstanding of this term is not confined only to those who have mastered the first and second courses in the rudiments of learning, but also to those who are in the advanced stages. It is most remarkable. But we have given the reason. God's Spirit must guide into all truth alone. Without a basis no superstructure can stand. If we begin in error we shall finally fall into increased error. Superior intellect, as we have pointed out, is not absolutely necessary to the perfect study of the Bible, for they who are learned and search the Scriptures without the key—God's Holy Spirit—are in the predicament described by the Apostle Paul—viz., "ever learning and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth." Nothing is more true. For years our forefathers have taught us that Israel means Judah, and that when we read of Israel we must always understand it to be Judah, or the Jews. Now the difficulties which have been presented to the earnest student in interpreting passages of the Bible, under this direction, in reference to Israel, have been almost insurmountable, rendering the substance of the subject in question an absurdity, so that it was absolutely impossible for the mind to grasp the true meaning, and the consequent result was students without number have put the Book aside as perfectly unintelligible, and as a contradictory one. On the face of this, then, it is essential that we should have a clear understanding of the Scriptural designations of Israel and Judah, whom God Himself divided into two families.

We shall begin to do so by first briefly relating the formation and subsequent history of the House of Israel.

The starting-point of Israel commences, in Sacred History, at the fall of Adam, by the promise of a Restorer of the human race; but it is given so indefinitely that there is not the slightest indication as to whether the promised Seed should be one or many—a single Deliverer or the collective race. As we read on, we are led to see that the Old Testament becomes a fit introduction to the New, because we see the gradual progress of God's handiwork among man, His endeavour, as a God of truth, to carry out His first and most glorious promise. It is not until we reach Genesis ix. 2, 6, that we are accorded the first gleam of light in regard to a more definite idea of God's mighty purpose for man. He here delegates the grand mission to a single race, through Shem, the son of Noah. "And he (Noah) said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant."

Then, secondly, we are given to know that this blessing fell to Abram. (Read Gen. xii.) "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee. And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great: and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee, and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."

This is confirmed again in the 14th verse of the 13th chapter (ib.) in the gift of the land of Palestine. "And the Lord said unto Abram . . . Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall also thy seed be numbered: Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto thee." And again in chapter xv. 18—21 He confirms it and definitely outlines geographically the limits of Palestine. "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates: The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaims: And the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgashites, and the Jebusites."

In due time the inheritor Jacob is born, who receives the blessing of the promise through Isaac. This blessing having come by deceit, Jacob is obliged to fly from Esau, and, having journeyed to the city of Luz, at night he lay down and slept. And in his dream God confirmed unto him the promise He had made unto his forefathers. (Read Gen. xxviii. 12—16). On his return, after twenty years of absence, Jacob is given the name of Israel thus: "And Jacob was left alone, and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day. And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wrestled with him. And he said, Let me go, for the day breaketh. And he said, I will not let thee go until thou bless me. And he said unto him, What is thy name? And he said, Jacob. And he said, Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel, for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed."

And now, from thence, Jacob's name being changed, the children which should follow after would be called by that new name, "Israel,"—"Israelites."

AN AMERICAN VIEW OF THE FUTURE OF THE ANGLO-SAXON RACE.

By the Rev. George S. Payson.

"The Anglo-Saxon race is the most prolific on earth. Its colonisation is unequalled for numbers, for loyalty, and for promise of development. Statistics in the 'Statesman's Year-book' for 1895 show that it owns to-day three-tenths of the earth's surface, rules one-fourth of its entire population, raises more than two-thirds of all the wheat grown by mankind, and has in its shipping not far from two-thirds of the world's tonnage. As to fighting on sea, the combined navies of France, Germany, Russia, and Italy hardly equal in effectiveness that of Great Britain alone, while the United States is taking great strides towards the position of a first-class naval Power. The history of this race, its genius for government, its enterprise, and its devotion to civil and religious liberty, fit it for the noblest destiny.

"But there are perils in the way, the chief of which spring from its own nature. Its aggressive spirit roots, through centuries of development, in savage cruelty and piratical violence. Swagger and selfishness have marred its growth. Its political life to-day incorporates enough of the spirit of the Vikings and of the Heligoland pirates seriously to qualify the religion of Christ. Its methods of aggrandisement rest upon the deification of force. Fighting blood is in its veins. Its future domination or destruction depends upon its surrender to the Cross. The manliness of which the Anglo-Saxon boasts is not the manliness of Christ. The material gains to which he points with pride are not accompanied by a corresponding growth in honesty. The education of Anglo-Saxon youth, particularly in the United States, is secular and not religious; vast portions of American children of school age are permitted to remain in ignorance of religion. In our language to-day may be found more than half a hundred Anglo-Saxon words which mean to give a flogging; which show what a wealth of thought and feeling the Anglo-Saxon race has lavished upon aggressive modes of life. Beastly drunkenness was a fault of its earlier history, more so than of its present. Aggressiveness is still its besetting sin. And unless this is transformed into the meekness of Christ it will ruin the race. First, it will secure its supremacy; then it will ruin it. Innate energy, stubborn courage, indomitable will we inherit from Saxons and Danes; refinement and intellectual culture from Normans; but religious beliefs and Christian character have come to us through the missionaries of the Cross; and unless these last prevail over the taint of blood, the destiny of the Anglo-Saxon race will be like that of all its distinguished predecessors. It will rise only to fall, and will leave merely a name among the world-wide rulers of mankind.

"As an offshoot of the ancient Scythians, this race in its early history made a record for piracy and plunder.

"The Sakaisunas required but fourteen hundred years to conquer a part of Asia, march fifteen hundred miles across Europe, establish themselves as a power on land and sea, and give a permanent name to the kingdom of Saxony. Conquered by Charlemagne, they became subordinate on the Continent. But nobles of Saxony have been emperors of Germany, and some of them have done much for civilisation. Luther was from Saxony. And the Reformation was begun in England, where the Anglo-Saxon race, having crossed from the Continent in the fifth century, was then at home.

"The development of the Angles was like that of the Saxons. Both were 'Low German' tribes belonging to the Gothic race. That the Angles gave their name to the island may have been because theirs was the generic name for all the Saxon tribes; but, more probably, it was because they were the first Low Germans in England to accept Christianity, and so to be referred to in the Latin literature of that date. An essential element in the Anglo-Saxon blood was derived from the Vikings; and the law of primogeniture may be traced to these wild men of the sea, whose eldest sons lived in castles, but whose youngest sons were pirates, and lived, died, and were buried in their pirate ships. If the laws of heredity are still in force, it may not be wondered at that the history of Great Britain for the past three hundred years has been a history of aggression and appropriation. The younger branch of the family in America has been too busy in occupying the territory which is wrested from the Indians to look beyond its own broad domains for conquest, but its history abundantly proves it to be a not degenerate stock. But the history of the Anglo-Saxons from the start has been a history of aggrandisement by force. Where it has waged one war for liberty or righteousness, it has waged ten for conquest or subjugation. And so it will to the end of the chapter, unless the grace of God intervenes and eradicates this tendency.

"Two centuries ago the Anglo-Saxons numbered 3,000,000. One century ago they numbered 17,000,000. To-day they number 119,000,000—thirty-eight in Great Britain, nineteen in its Colonies, and sixty-two in the United States. This 119,000,000 rule 36,000,000 in the protectorates and dependencies of the British Empire, besides 300,000,000 in India, making in all more than 400,000,000, or more than one-fourth of the estimated population of the globe.

"The area of the earth's dry land is 50,500,000 square miles; the Anglo-Saxon race controls 14,835,701—nearly one-third.

"The expansion of the race is surprising. In Great Britain alone, for two decades past, it has increased by 3,000,000 each decade. In the United States the population doubles every twenty-five years. At the beginning of this century, says a writer in the Methodist Review, 25,000,000 spoke French, 27,000,000 German, and 15,000,000 English; now 40,000,000 speak French, 57,000,000 German, and over 100,000,000 English. In other words, the number of those who speak French has increased during this century 60 per cent., German 110 per cent., and English more than 600 per cent.

"The assimilating power of the race is marvellous. The race is not materially modified in the United States. There has been a slight change in the physique, that is all. Teuton and Celt still mingle here much as they were mingled in Great Britain. The Teuton still preponderates, as he should to keep the racial features. In 1890 the census returns made the foreign-born population of the United States contain 64 per cent. Teutonic, 22 per cent. Celtic, and 14 per cent. of all others; and the foreign-born was only one-seventh of the whole population. We have room for a vast multitude of people whom our fertile soil will readily support. With 63,000,000 of people on 3,500,000 square miles of territory, we have 18 to the square mile. Germany has 236·7 to the square mile. When our population is as dense, we shall number 828,000,000. We can support more to the square mile than Germany can. Medical science and sanitary regulations are likely to prevent pestilence; increased facilities for communication preclude the possibility of famine; and wars, though not improbable, are not likely to last long, while, with the blessing of God, they may be relegated to the barbarous nations of the earth.

"As to food, the United States and Canada last year raised 487,000,000 bushels of wheat, while all the rest of the world raised 890,000,000. Of this 890,000,000, Great Britain raised 58,000,000, India 238,000,000, Cape Colony 3,000,000, Australia 30,000,000; total 329,000,000. The Anglo-Saxon race last year raised more than two-thirds of the wheat of the entire globe.

"Its shipping is five-eighths of the tonnage of all nations, so that it can carry its own cereal products to any of the family the world over. And if navies are needed to defend them, the combined navies of Great Britain and the United States are even now a match for any foes that could be massed against them.

"The English language, as already indicated, is an important factor. It is easily learned. It is closely allied to the German and Scandinavian. It has a large proportion of Latin elements. It is comparatively free from inflections. The vexed question of genders, so troublesome in German and French, it has solved in a rational way; and if its orthography could be improved, it might readily become a universal, as it is now the most general, language of the world. It is recorded of Professor John A. Weisse that until thirty years of age he was an ardent hater of the English language, and that he undertook the thorough study of it in order to demonstrate its inferiority to German; but his candour compelled him to admit that 'it contains the cream and essence of its predecessors; its grammar is simpler, and its literary records more consecutive and complete.' 'In richness,' says Professor Jacob Grimm, an enthusiastic admirer of his native German, 'in compact adjustment of its parts, and in pure intelligence, none of the living languages can compare with English.' And, according to Mr. O. B. Super (Methodist Review, 1890), Professor Candolle, of Geneva, estimates that in one hundred years English will be spoken by 860,000,000 of people, German by 124,000,000, and French by 96,000,000.

"In this connection it should be noted that, as Professor Marsh says, 'more than one-half of the letters mailed and carried by the postal system of the world are written, mailed, and read by the English-speaking populations of the globe.' These peoples, too, distribute more than two-thirds of the Bibles and Testaments published. It may be justly claimed that the literature of the Anglo-Saxon race is the greatest and the purest. The highest results of scientific research are issued in popular forms, at prices which bring them readily within reach of all. The newspapers of the Anglo-Saxons are unequalled for abundance, cheapness, and excellence, to say nothing of enterprise, in which they are far and away the leaders.

"The federation of the scattered Anglo-Saxons on the globe is not impossible. And if it could be secured, it would prove an immense advantage to every interest of humanity.

"But the Anglo-Saxons need to be sanctified. The racial traits are still conspicuous. If Christianity does not use them in the interests of humanity, and curb and yoke them to the service of the meekness which most exalts the Prince of Peace, the English-speaking nations of the earth will have a temporary splendour, possibly a world-wide supremacy, and then will disappear from earth. If ever there was a sacred duty laid upon the followers of Christ, it is, by every possible influence and through every available opportunity, to seek to bind in one federation of humane and generous service of the weaker nations of the earth the scattered forces of this highly-favoured race, and to make this mighty federation a bulwark for righteousness and justice and honesty and truth in all international relations the world over. Let there be a common citizenship for all English-speaking peoples, so that a man need only to change his residence to change also his citizenship, so long as he abides with Anglo-Saxons. Let extradition laws be reduced to what now obtains among our several States. Let postal unions, and customs unions, and copyright and patent regulations which shall comprehend all English-speaking peoples, break down the barriers which now exist, and prepare the way for the closest possible federation of the Anglo-Saxon race and its dependencies. The time is propitious for such efforts. The opportunities are multiplying. And the present temper of both the English and the American branches of this great family, as they are represented in the most intelligent and thoughtful forces of the two nations, encourages the hope that the mission of the Anglo-Saxon race may be not a selfish but a generous mission for the benefit of the world."

The above is taken from The Christian Age of May 13th, 1896, and is valuable as the expression of the opinion of an American, the Rev. George S. Payson. The writer knows not a word of Our Identity, and yet gives almost all the facts which lie at the foundation of our national Israelitish character, present position, and future destiny, as "the Israel of God." He notices the vast increase of the Anglo-Saxon race, its expansion, its conquests and supremacy among the nations, its hold of one-third of the earth's habitable land, its assimilating power, in America and among the British, its vast food supply, its shipping, its spreading language, its distribution of the Word of God, its immense yet pure literature, its newspapers and correspondence; but alas! also its wickedness and degeneracy, and its need of sanctification, if it is to escape ruin!

The writer draws the exact picture of Israel, but does not recognise his own work. He calls ours "a highly-favoured race," who ought to help "the weaker nations of the earth" —that is, to bless them (Gen. xxii. 18). He wants universal federation among the Anglo-Saxons (making them "a nation, and a company of nations"); and lastly sees that the Anglo-Saxon race has a mission, not a selfish but a generous one, for the benefit of the world! But the writer, because he has missed the clue, sees that we have terrible besetting national sins, and shall be ruined by them. "We need to be sanctified." But he cannot see how. We shall disappear from the earth unless the remedy can be found! He cannot say how. We can, for we have the key to the puzzle. We know the wickedness of the race quite well, as he does, and see its operation everywhere, among the British as well as among our American brethren. But knowing we are Israel, it is our consolation to know also that God, too, has foreseen it, and told us how He means to cure us. If we read Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Heb. viii. 10—12; Joel ii. 28—32, and Ezek xxxvii. 14, 23—28, we shall see that the remedy is Divine, and will certainly effect the cure of the terrible disease the American writer detects, which must be cured or we shall all perish. It is "the Lord's new covenant," applied by and through the precious blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, which is to work the cure. This covenant undertakes to change the very nature of the nation —to pardon its iniquities, to make it the people of the Lord, and Him its God. The outpouring of the Spirit of Christ on the nation and on the people who compose it, will be the ostensible means of the conversion, and it will be radical and lasting.

On the whole, we regard the Rev. G. S. Payson's article as a very wonderful production, and while we see that he wants the knowledge which will comfort him as to the sanctification and permanence of our race, we are glad to welcome him as one of the very best modern "blind witnesses" to Our Identity whom it has been our privilege to introduce to our readers through the medium of the BANNER OF ISRAEL. Let our people praise the Lord for His promises to Israel, and, because being Israel ourselves, they are ours.

COLONISATION IN FRANCE.

THE Birmingham Daily Post of April 10, 1896, published a short statement in regard to the efforts now being made by the French Government to induce its people to emigrate to Madagascar, its new possession. The effort of the rulers appears to be to deter those willing to go by demanding the capital of the would-be emigrants before they start, as a contribution to the State for allowing them to go. Not only is this hindrance in the way of those anxious to try their fortunes abroad, but there is also the fact that France has no surplus population to offer to their outlying possessions, since their home population is not increasing but rather diminishing. The following are the remarks we allude to :—

"The strange mania for colonisation under which the French people have always laboured without success, has once more seized upon the Government, and every effort is being made to induce the people to emigrate to Madagascar. But so totally devoid of all logic is the system by which colonisation is conducted in France that the would-be colonists are requested to pay 5,000f. before they are installed in the new residence they have chosen far away from the mother country, and strangers as they must be for awhile to all the resources the new country has to offer them. The strange system adopted by the French Government of exacting from the colonist capital as well as labour will always prevent any rush of labourers to the new country to which they are invited by proclamation, by placard, or by the labouring lecturers who toil and sweat on behalf of the emigration of families to the different colonial possessions owned by the French. I lately met in London a French family returning from Algeria, having worked and toiled for five long years under the burning sun of Africa. They were hurrying back to their native place near Tours; father, mother, two growing-up boys, two girls, and a baby. They had emigrated by advice of their friends, who beheld with terror this increasing family, so unusual in France. They carried with them the moral of their story in the shape of half-a-dozen hard boiled eggs, on which they were to subsist until they arrived at the grandmother's little farm. What struck me most of all in the sadness of their position was the silent resignation with which they bore the disap pointment—the shame of defeat and failure—of all the hopes with which they had set out from home a few short years before. It seemed as if they had lost all interest in their own welfare, all consciousness of their own defeat, and were returning resigned and willing to accept the chastisement they felt they had deserved for daring to seek fortune beyond their own little holding. They told me that the hardest trial of all to bear would be the condemnation of the severe, the pity of the benevolent, for the complete destitution in which they had been plunged by the unwillingness of the Government to assist in any way the efforts of emigrants to obtain a footing otherwise than by sacrifice of capital. 'Have you got five thousand francs? If not, stay at home and earn it before you think of emigration. Government is not made to support those who desert the country, but those who remain to support the Government.' That is the argument in use at the Colonial Office."

NORTH OF ENGLAND COUNCIL.

A CONFERENCE in connection with this Union was held at Manchester, on April 6th, the meeting taking place in the Lever-street School, and lasting from 2.30 to 9 p.m. The chair was occupied by Mr. E. B. Woodruff, President of the Manchester and Salford British-Israel and Biblical Evidence Association, who, on rising, welcomed the Council very heartily to Manchester, expressed his warm approval of its objects, and said that nowhere would its work receive more generous co-operation than among Manchester believers. The chairman was supported by Mr. J. G. Taylor (Newcastle), Mr. T. P. Manning (Manchester), and Mr. Jos. Hayden (Halifax), and the others present were:—Mr. Lever, Mr. F. Graham, Mr. Puleston, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Saunderson, Mr. T. Hopkins, Mr. and Mrs. Walshaw, Mr. J. W. Rigby, Mr. J. Scott, Mr. W. Wallis, Mr. F. S. Gandy, Mr. H. Ward, Mrs. Grundy, Mrs. Hemming, Mrs. Crook, Mrs. Cochrane, Mrs. Birch, Mrs. Butterworth, Mrs. Dixon, Mrs. Henderson, and Miss M. Grundy, of Manchester; Mr. D. Parker, Mr. J. Barnes, and Mr. W. Hill, of Sowerby Bridge; Mr. S. Dean and Mr. T. W. Wilkinson, of Bradford; Mr. R. Wilson, Mr. S. J. W. Sherwood, Mr. H. G. Robinson, and Mr. G. Whatling, of Hull; Mr. J. Paylor, of Leeds; Mr. W. S. Cavill, of Sheffield; and Mr. G. Marsden, of Birstall.

The following were elected as new members of the Council:—Rev. H.S. Hamilton, of Leeds; Miss E. Gibson, of Newcastle-on-Tyne; Miss H. Wood, of Bishop Auckland; Mr. E. B. Woodruff, Mr. J. Scott, Mr. W. Wallis, Mr. T. P. Manning, Mr. T. Hopkins, Mr. F. Graham, Mrs. Wallis, Mr. H. Ward, Mr. Puleston, Mr. F. S. Gandy, Mrs. Cochrane, Mrs. Henderson, and Miss M. Grundy, of Manchester.

Several items which had to be deferred at the previous conference were again brought up, one of them being the question of providing a van for the purpose of going from place to place in country districts. Mr. Wilson (Hull) advocated this, pointing out that many religious and political societies now availed themselves of vans and found them most beneficial. The Identity was second to no subject in importance, and we ought to adopt every possible means of spreading it. Mr. Cavill (Sheffield) agreed that we should do everything we could to forward the Identity, but argued that a van would require a capable debater to conduct it, the main strength of the van system lying in the talking powers of the man in charge. He considered that the scheme would be a very expensive one, and suggested that at first the Council should adopt some less costly method of propagating our views. Other gentlemen reasoned in the same way, and the meeting finally decided in favour of colporteurs instead of a van.

The penny sheet almanack, which is to be called "The Britannic-Israel Almanack," will appear early in December. Its features will include texts bearing on the Identity, and short, pithy extracts from a goodly number of Anglo-Israel writers.

Sufficient progress was made with the proposed monthly magazine to justify its being brought out immediately, but as it is felt that summer is not the best time for appealing to the reading public, its issue will be deferred until later on in the year.

It was resolved to hold the next conference at Preston on Bank Holiday, August 3rd.

New associations have been formed at Halifax and Birstall, and lectures have been delivered at Sowerby Bridge by Mr. A. K. Robinson, and at Bishop Auckland by Mr. J. G. Taylor. Mr. A. K. Robinson will shortly (D.V.) give a series of Identity lectures at Birstall.

British-Israelites desirous of being present at the Preston Conference, should communicate with the Hon. Sec., Mr. Jos. Hayden, 2, Grant-street, Commercial-road, Halifax.

"ENGLISH" NURSES.

"MRS. MAKROPOULO, the English nurse who has been in the service of the Hellenic Royal Family ever since the birth of the Duke of Sparta, has just died at Athens. It must be flattering to our womanhood to think that English nurses have been in so much request at most of the Courts of Europe. Alexander II. had an English, or rather a Scotch nurse, Mrs. Mackinnon; while his son Alexander III., when an infant, equally enjoyed the attentions of an Englishwoman, whose funeral he attended shortly before his own death. Prince 'Lulu' also had an English nurse at the Tuileries, and so had the present German Emperor at Potsdam, whilst Englishwomen of the same class abound at the minor German Courts, and are also to be found at the Courts of Copenhagen and Stockholm. The fact is as curious as it is complimentary to us as a nation."—Daily Chronicle.

WHAT TOURISTS ARE DOING FOR THE HOLY LAND.

How much I like your "Nyassaland," and how pleasant "The Sowing of the Seed," in the BANNER of May 13, 1896. I send a little cutting, though it is scarcely worth it, and I daresay, moreover, you saw it! L. P.

"ONE RESULT OF THE BRITISH OCCUPATION OF EGYPT.

"Our Consul at Jerusalem, in a report which has lately been published, states that the British occupation of Egypt has been of great benefit to Palestine. The progress of Egypt during the last 14 years and its attractiveness as a winter resort have drawn to it thousands of visitors annually from Europe and America. A considerable number of these, on quitting Egypt in the spring, make it a point to visit the Holy Land, bringing money and giving employment to a large class of the population. Hotel-keepers, dragomans, guides, shop-keepers, drivers muleteers, &c., all look to the tourist season for their livelihood, and should anything, such as the recent imposition of quarantine on arrivals from Egypt, hinder the usual influx of travellers, it is regarded as little short of a disaster by the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Jaffa. As an instance of the effect which the annual arrival of tourists has had on the progress of the country, Mr. Dickson mentions that 20 years ago there was only one decent hotel in Jerusalem; there are now at least six good hotels, two being first-class, besides several hospices and boarding houses for the accommodation of pilgrims. In Jaffa there are now three first-class hotels, and good hotels have recently been opened on Mount Carmel at Nazareth, and Tiberias. The average annual number of tourists now is from 2,000 to 3,000, not including pilgrims, and the advantages economically to the country of this influx of well-to-do visitors can be readily understood."—Times, May 13.

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"That God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (1 Peter iv. 11).

THE OPERATION OF THE FUND:—To proclaim by special means the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 150 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

M. A. FITZPATRICK, Hon. Treasurer.

Westgate-on-Sea, June 13th, 1896.

We have much pleasure in drawing attention to the energy of our fellow-workers in Denver, Colo., U.S.A., who have decided to bring out a monthly paper to treat of the British-Israel question. This paper may seem too American in style and treatment of the subject for us, as no doubt our journals often appear too British for some readers on the other side of the Atlantic, but it is a step in advance we may cordially welcome, being sure it will increase interest and lead to further study by our brethren of Manasseh of the many valuable works that have been published on this side of the water. We hope the publication will be on sale at our London publishers. The title is THE TRIBES. Price 50 cents. a year. Monthly issue, commencing June 1896.

SOWING THE SEED.

WITH great regret for our own loss, and with much sympathy for those who are left to mourn the absence of a loving relative, we have to record the death of our first missionary Sower.

On April 18th, at his residence, Church Mission House, Cinnamon Gardens, Colombo, the Rev. J. Davies Thomas, C.M.S., eldest son of the late Rev. J. Thomas, C.M.S., of Mengnanapuram, Tinnevelly, aged 55.

Our fellow-worker mentioned in the above notice, was an earnest, ardent, conscious Israelite. A long time ago being as on deputation work for the C.M.S., as he went up and down the country he would put the subject of Our Identity with Israel before the clergy and others in whose houses he stayed, and when home again after an interval of years he found that the ground ploughed up previously had been preparing in many instances for the seed that has to be sown all over our land, he found prejudice against this truth much less evident. In Ceylon Mr. Thomas regularly and gladly received literature from our Fund for distribution. I take the following few words from a letter, showing that his passing away from this life was the calling home of a faithful Christian.

"For him, I cannot but rejoice; he has borne a long and painful illness so patiently and bravely, and now there is the sweet rest. The knowledge of Our Identity was such a comfort to him, it so strengthened his faith; he had such a calm, perfect trust in our heavenly Father's power and faithfulness; he committed himself and us all into His gracious keeping. It was 'all peace, perfect peace,' he said."

From the Western Hemisphere have come a few words from the wife of a Sower, and they shew how we may continually hope for the evil heart of unbelief to give way before God's truth, and how we may expect even then to be tried by doubt to the strengthening of our faith. Our correspondent wrote: "I may say I was greatly opposed to this subject for many years, and did not wish my husband to speak of it, until one day the Handbook was lying on the table, and taking it up I read a few words, and then a strong desire seemed to take hold of me, and I took the book with my Bible and fell down on my knees, and asked God if there were anything in it, to give me His Holy Spirit's guidance that I might see and know for myself that it was indeed truth, and wonderful was the way I was led on step by step until my Bible became a new book to me. One morning I was tempted to think that perhaps after all there was nothing in it. I again asked the Lord to shew me the truth, and He gave me Jer. xxxiii. 3. How could I doubt it after that? I have now two of the Handbooks, which I lend, and I hope and pray that the readers may receive as great a blessing as I did."

Here is another picture of a mind at work, and in this case ready to receive the revelation of Israel. Our correspondent, willing to do a Sower's work, is a minister of the Gospel in one of those wide fields far away given by the Almighty to His people Israel; where the common thing is that great distances have to be travelled, ere services can be held and the flock fed:—

"I am a student. I want that which is sure. That is why I rest so implicitly on the Covenant of God, that in its fulness, or detail, cannot fail. The Bible is to me God's book, it reveals the Father's heart, and tells me His Covenant is unchangeable, yet much of it was so dark to me I could not read it, and indeed the darkness became so painful that the bad habit of not reading the Bible was formed in me. Israel now existing, God's Covenant now filling up in all its details, with the fulness very near at hand, and, as evidently, the fulness of the Covenant to be bestowed upon His people, the Bible is now flooded with light. The light of the Bible illuminates all the details of what the Father is now doing, or suffering to be done in the world. God is glorified in the carrying out of His Covenant, and well may we say, 'Oh how great is His faithfulness!' Though English born, the Scotch caution in me binds me to take the advice of the town clerk of Ephesus, 'Do nothing rashly,' therefore I would like to read an article, a strong book, essay or speech, as strong as possible on the other side of this question. What is against British-Israel. All that I have yet read, or heard, is weak, very weak, so weak as to be silly. Does anything strong against British-Israel exist? If so I would like to read it that I might give it due regard, weigh all, and decide—decide, not hearing only one side of the case."

A Report of the Conference between the British-Israel Association and the Prophecy Investigation Society, has been posted to our correspondent with the hope that the full decision according to the expressed desire of mind or heart, as shewn in the letter, may not be delayed.

The writer continues: "You want me to preach this truth. Well, that may come, it is not here yet; but I can teach. I am free to do that, and do it in the best possible way by exciting curiosity, and stimulating interest. I need something then to supplement, to go on with what has been begun, reading matter. For instance, I was in a distant congregation early in March dispensing the Holy Sacrament of the Supper. I stayed Saturday night with one of the elders, a very intelligent, warm hearted Christian; his family were like him. I brought up the subject of British-Israel, and carefully laid the different points before them; they were deeply interested and very anxious to know more. On the Sabbath, as we drove to the place where the first service was to be held, another elder was with us; again I presented the subject to the two men. The second elder had heard something on the subject before; evidently the ideas put before him had been crude, in some things very wide of the mark. I had to correct the errors and point out the truth. Was this teaching or preaching?"

With confidence we may safely leave our Sower to his work, asking that God may abundantly bless it, and give him strength for all his labours, as a great strain is upon him. And doubtless our readers will realize once more, with those who distribute our Fund, the value, and the need for its work, and the extension of it, ever for the glory of the Lord, and the increase of the knowledge and faith of His people.

During the month 273 BANNERS have been sent out each week, and 116 packets of Literature, including the "Covenant People," have been sent for distribution by our Sowers in the following mentioned places:—

ISRAEL'S SCRIPTURE AND PRAYER UNION.

SINCE last report, we have added five more names to our number. The increase during the past half year has been very encouraging, twenty-six new names have been added, being an increase of eight on the whole of 1895.

The names of any Identity believers who are willing to join us in searching the Bible, and in prayer to God, will be gladly received.

Subject for prayer on last Sunday in July: "Praise and thanksgiving that God is giving His blessing to the spread of Identity truth, and that many are searching their Bibles for themselves to test the truth of the teaching."

The Card of Membership has a list of chapters for the whole of 1896, also suggestions for study, prayers, etc. It is of a size convenient for keeping in the Bible, and will be sent on receipt of six stamps.

The first and second series of Monthly Comments on the whole Bible, by Philo-Israel, may be obtained. Price, in paper covers, 1s. 2d. each; in cloth, 2s. each, post free.

The "Prayers for Daily Use," being a prayer for each day of the week, by Philo-Israel, are 1d. each, or 9d. per doz., postage extra.

Obituary.

BRIGADE-SURGEON LIEUT.-COL. PHILLIP WYATT COCKELL died somewhat suddenly at his residence, 11, Widcombe-crescent, just before midnight last night (June 3). The deceased gentleman had been ailing for some time past, but it was not till four days since his indisposition was thought much of. He passed a very bad night on Sunday, but visited his medical adviser, Mr. Ransford, of Queen-square, on Tuesday. He only took a short walk yesterday, and growing much worse suddenly in the evening passed away peacefully at the time mentioned. Mr. Ransford, who was summoned, did not arrive till life was extinct. It is understood that death was due to heart disease. Dr. Cockell was the son of the Rev. T. Cockell, who also resided at Widcombe, and retired from the position he held of Brigade Surgeon and lieutenant-colonel of the Indian Medical Staff about 10 years ago, and since then had lived in Widcombe, where he had become very well known. He took much interest in the affairs of his parish, and some time since his name was suggested as a candidate for municipal honours, but he never came forward. He was a supporter of many local societies, among others the Selborne Society, the annual meeting of which, at the Institution, only last week he attended and took part in.—(Bath paper).

The deceased was a staunch British-Israelite, always ready to help in any way. He was a man who seemed to have the Bible by heart, and in argument was fluent and able. He seemed full of the Holy Spirit, gentle and kindly to all. His loss will be much felt at Bath by our Israelite friends.

OUR Correspondent, Mr. R. Mackworth, was the first person to send to a London newspaper, The Globe, an account of the island of Molene, off which the ill-fated Drummond Castle was wrecked. Mr. Mackworth was wrecked off this island in the R.M.S. "Boyne," June 1875, the vessel sinking in ten minutes from the time it struck the rocks, but fortunately in this case only two of the crew were lost.

THE Monthly Part of the Banner of Israel for July is now ready, price sixpence. A coloured map of Persia with Afghanistan and Beloochistan is given as a frontispiece. This map will be found very useful in the study of Mr. Reid's paper that appeared in our issue of May 27. Those of our readers who obtain The Banner in weekly numbers from a bookseller may obtain this map for 2d., or the publishers will send the same post free on receipt of two penny stamps.

"THE DISASTROUS EXPLOSION WHICH IS NEAR AT HAND."

THE above is not our own sentiment, expressed in the pages of the BANNER. We quote it from a remarkable article in the London Spectator of January 25, entitled "The restlessness of the nations." The writer ably depicts the condition of the chief nations of Europe, and shows they are all torn with discontent, jealousy, disappointment, anxiety, and anticipation of coming evil. France, it seems, is afraid of coming war, yet hungry for war; longing to fly at someone's throat and achieve some notable victory. She is discontented with everything and everybody.

Germany is no better, rather worse! She is discontented with herself, jealous of our British colonies, wealth and success. Their numbers increase, their industry is always enlarging, but they are no richer. Their Emperor is straining to make a name for himself and to strike some blow at our British greatness like that he attempted in the matter of President Kruger and the Transvaal.

Austria is unhappy but not so restless as the other Powers. The Russians are increasing in population and cannot rest till they can obtain some outlet to the sea in Europe and in the Pacific. They want both, and securing these, desire to rule the world.

Italy, loaded with the weight of the triple alliance, and of debt, looks with affection to Britain as her only real friend, and means to stand by her always.

Turkey is moribund, and is incurring the hatred of Europe by setting herself the task of destroying the Christian portion of her subjects in the East of Armenia to get rid of them, quite regardless of the consequences.

As to the United States, its seventy millions of people are getting tired of peace, and long to try conclusions with some Power as strong as themselves (the British will do in place of another). They use the Monroe Doctrine (in place of a better cause), and try its effect on our unfortunate selves! For ourselves there is unrest and anxiety too—plenty of it just now! We suddenly awake after seventy years of general peace and find we are the best hated people on the face of the earth, having consciously done nothing to deserve this hatred. Men regarding the whole field do not know what to make of it! They cannot understand why the restlessness should exist, nor the cause of it? The fact is, the cause is occult, and men see not the hand which is stiring up the strife. It is the Lord! and He is doing just what He said He would. Men have forgotten that! Just before the end, this is what He declared He would do, in Isa. xlii. 18: "The Lord shall go forth as a Mighty Man; He shall stir up jealousy like a man of war; He shall cry, yea roar; He shall prevail against His enemies."

The Spectator in its article does injustice to our own nation in respect to our conduct towards Turkey and its Armenian atrocities. We ought, in that writer's opinion, to have done something for the sufferers, but it does not say what, or how? We have, he alleges, "imitated the Good Samaritan only in his feelings." We have not acted as he did. But in the face of Turkey's refusal to allow us to act, and the nations' unwillingness that any should interfere, how was the impossible to be effected? The impending crash and catastrophe among the nations may be the result of Turkey's brutality towards her Christian subjects, and very likely the first overt act which will bring down the Turkish Empire will be done by British-Israel. The world indeed has need of peace just now, no doubt; but if God is "come down," as we believe He has, and is stirring up the jealousy between the nations, in order to prevail against His enemies and His people's foes, we may be sure that however much they may long for and need peace, His "determinations" will prevail, and His will will be done, according to the prophecies (Isa. xxvi. 20, 21; Zeph. iii. 8; Luke xxi. 25, 26). With so much unrest everywhere, we must look for vast changes before long. Things cannot last as they are for many years. The terrific scenes and horrible butcheries of Armenia must cease at any cost, and we shall be fortunate if they can be brought to an end without bringing on the long-dreaded Eastern Question wars, and all their consequences. British isolation is already a fact, but with our "company of nations" to keep us in countenance, and perhaps the support of our American brothers to help us, our isolated condition will not turn out for us a very formidable experience, after all, we believe! The Spectator, at any rate, has no trust in the long continuance of peace, but considers a sudden outburst very probable. The writer said:—

A very small match just now would fire the magazine, and we feel no confidence, as we did five years ago, that all the matches are in safe hands. It is useless to say that the extent of the armaments is a guarantee of security, or that the peoples will not permit war, or that war is too wicked for the sensitive consciences of the modern nations. No man in Europe controls a greater army than the German Emperor; there are no people more absolute in their own country, or more averse to war, than the British; no race is more religious, in the orthodox Christian sense, than the American, among whom, moreover, every man has his tincture of education. Yet we all know what the German Emperor has done; we all saw the English people only a fortnight ago rise like one man ready for war; we all read every day the utterances of American Representatives dealing with a fratricidal war as if it were an international contest of yachts or prize-fighters.

It is remarkable indeed that while we British-Israelites on scriptural and Identity grounds look forward to a speedy termination of the unrest of the nations by the occurrence of a terrible and anticipated war-woe amongst them, the public press of this country is conscious that an explosion is close at hand, and that the nations of Europe envy and dislike us because they know that we shall not be entangled in the troubles they have brought on themselves, but shall be safe and free. To the Lord be all the praise for these His mercies to His undeserving people, and let His inheritance and chosen ones say Amen!

AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY'S OPINION AS TO THE BRITISH OCCUPATION OF EGYPT.

THE Free Church of Scotland Monthly for June 1st, 1896, page 138, published the opinion of an American Missionary on the subject of our British occupation of Egypt which is entirely comfirmatory of the views thereon which we have often expressed in these pages. Our government of the land has been a great blessing to the people of it, and fully confirms the predictions of Isa. xix. 20, 21, in regard to the good work of Israel in it. They have delivered the Egyytians from their oppressors and have been "a saviour" to them. Not only is the Gospel preached to the Egyptians, but all sorts of good agencies have been established among them, which go far to prove that the British protectors of Egypt are Israel of the Ten Tribes. It is satisfactory to note that the American Missionary in his enumeration of the blessings our country takes with her to her colonies and possessions beyond sea, are just those God gave to Israel to enable her to bless all nations—namely, beneficent laws, a pure Christianity, a peerless language, and literature, and the highest type of modern Christian civilization (see Deut. iv. 5, 6; Hosea i. 10; Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Gen. xxii. 18).

The following is the extract from the Free Church of Scotland Monthly, to which we have alluded:—

"Whatever may be thought about the war in the Soudan, there can be but one opinion among us as to the value of the British occupation of Egypt. On that point it may interest our readers to hear the opinion of an American missionary, Mr. Crawford. 'The colonizing and grasping policy of England,' he says, 'is constantly criticized; but it should be remembered, and especially by her American cousins, that she carries with her beneficent laws, a pure Christianity, her peerless language and literature, and the highest type of Modern Christian civilization—the proudly-cherished possession of our own people. Nowhere is this more apparent than in Egypt. I speak as an American, and so cannot be misunderstood when I say that from observation and experience here, the English occupation of Egypt is the greatest boon, and promises greater good to her people than any event of her past history. There is hope now that the oppressions of centuries past will be lifted, and that good laws and Christian influence will put brightness and courage into the hearts of the people. This I firmly believe; and it is surely a promising sign when the people themselves say so. I am not led to say this from any special regard for the English people, apart from my esteem for the Christian civilization we have inherited with them, and a disinterested desire for the good of the Egyptian people. The Anglo-Saxon influence in Egypt is seen not only in the evangelizing work proper that is being done, but in hospital and other benevolent agencies. The statement that the hope of Egypt is in England and the American Mission is a statement that no one whom I meet is inclined to contradict.'"

The French out of pure jealousy of our growing ascendency abroad are desirous of causing our stay in Egypt to come to a decided and speedy close, in order that they may themselves assume the reins of government. Not that they care for the Egyptians, or are ready or willing to give them "a pure Christianity" (since they have nationally none such to bestow); or to confer on them "modern Christian civilization" (which they do not possess, and cannot therefore impart), or "a peerless language and literature," for the English have both, literally peerless in character, and there cannot be two languages both "peerless" in kind? The British, in spite of all opposition from France, still remain in Egypt, and will stay there till their work be fully and finally accomplished. This will only be when Egypt shall have accepted Christ for her Heavenly Master, and the Egyptians, no longer needing a guiding hand, will not seek French or other helpers in the place of Israel. We shall wait long enough for that day, since the prophecy of Isa. xix. 23, 25, and other Scriptures respecting the future of Egypt, do not contemplate the independence of that land, or the arrival of a time when, apart from Israel, there can be any blessing for Egypt or Assyria. The words of Isa. xix. 24, 25, R.V., in respect to this, are: "In that day, shall Israel be the third with Egypt, and with Assyria; a blessing in the midst of the earth; for that the Lord of hosts hath blessed them, saying, 'Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance.'" Here, there is implied a perpetual continuance of blessing for Egypt, but only through the instrumentality of Israel in the close vicinity to the land. It follows, therefore, that Israel must always continue in their present position, linked to Egypt for its good, and ministering to it blessings from on high, according to the prophecics.

It is a satisfaction to find the American missionary taking a view in accordance with the Scriptures, and also seeing that the British occupation of Egypt is working out that country's benefit as "the greatest boon" that can be given to it. "It promises," he adds, "greater good to her people than any event of their past history." It is remarkable that while the Egyptians are content with the British occupation of their land, and admit that it has conferred large benefits on them already, the Matabele and Mashonas of Rhodesia, in South Africa, are making a fierce struggle to get rid of us altogether and are murdering and plundering our scattered settlers without mercy. They are probably actuated by fear; and suspect that the cattle disease which has swept off so much of their valuable stock has been the work of the European settlers who they see are busily at work destroying diseased animals, as a precaution, necessary from the European point of view, to prevent further losses from the fatal rinderpest.

The re-conquest of the Soudan in the interests of Egypt, is an important event surrounded with vast difficulties, on account of the extreme heat of the climate, the fierceness of the enemy, and the hitherto craven character of the Egyptian soldiery. But here again God's blessing on Israel is working wonders in their favour. The Egyptian army under British teaching and leading in war, has turned out a splendid weapon to deal with the dreaded dervishes. The European (British) officers seem able to endure the heat and are doing well in the midst of the terrible exposure which the campaign brings with it in the tropical deserts of the Nile, where the operations are taking place. God is guiding His people in Egypt, in the Soudan, and in Matabeleland as well, and will at last give them success by fulfilling to them His promises. To Him shall be all the praise.

ISRAEL: HER PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

Part I.

This paper is issued that those who so kindly gave it a hearing may be induced to still further study along its lines, and also that others into whose hands it may fall may be moved to enquire, "Who are we that God should so wonderfully bless us above all the people that are upon the earth?" and be led to see in our history, past, present and prospective, the wonderful faithfulness of our Covenant-keeping Jehovah.

It were well to notice that it is in connection with the Identity of the Lost House of Israel and their union with that of Judah, that the coming of Him who shall be called, "The Lord our Righteousness" will take place.

Will the present generation witness the Identity, the union, the restoration, the coming of Him who shall rule in righteousness?

We shall see; meantime let us continue to pray, "Thy kingdom come."

Henry R. Baldwin.

Omaha, Nebraska, U.S.A.

It seems on reading this title that the subject is rather comprehensive for treatment in such brief time as this paper must necessarily occupy. Any one of the three divisions might readily exhaust the time allowed, but for reasons afterward to be apparent, it is thought best to retrospect somewhat, to begin with their beginnings, so that we may draw attention to some incidents in their past that do not usually get the attention they deserve, and that very largely affect our understandings of their present and future.

It seems to me that to any, even casual reader of the Old Testament Scriptures, and of the latter day histories, that there is something demanded in the former of the latter that the latter does not supply; in other words, if we regard prophecy as history written beforehand as it assuredly is, then there is a great void in our latter day histories, or prophecy has failed of its fulfilment.

Israel barely receives passing notice by the historians of Egypt, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome, and in modern histories, while Spain, Germany, France and Russia have been recorded that other is a blank, and yet a greater destiny had been plainly mapped out for her by Him who sitteth upon the circle of the heavens, who setteth up one and putteth down another, whose interferences have never been limited to individuals, but have extended to nations, and covered all periods of time from days to æons.

The historian of the future will doubtless supply the lack of the past, for with unveiled eyes he shall behold the divine promises fully kept—the divine pledges redeemed. The divine plan fully revealed, and a long-lost and almost forgotten people shall suddenly shine forth in full enjoyment of all the promises of greatness and glory, so lavishly and positively given her in the persons of her illustrious forefathers. A rehearsal of some of those promises at this time will be quite in place, and will explain my dissatisfaction with the generally accepted opinions regarding the people of Israel, which seems to be, that across the ruined temple of their national life is written in large indelible characters, the legend, Ichabod.

When God selected a man in Ur, of the Chaldees, who should become the progenitor of the race and the person in whom all the families of the earth should be eventually blessed, He gave promise to Abraham in these words: "And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 2, 3). "For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it and to thy seed for ever; and I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered" (Gen. xiii. 15, 16).

"And I will make My covenant between Me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly. As for Me, behold My covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations" (margin, multitude of nations). "Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee. And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee" (Gen. xvii. 2, 6).

And when the Lord was about letting His vengeance fall upon the cities of the plain, He said, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the earth shall be blessed in him?" (Gen. xviii. 17).

Again, when Abraham had passed the supreme trial of his faith on Mount Moriah, the Lord said to him, "By Myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son; that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heavens, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies" (Gen. xxii. 17).

Those blessings were repeated to Isaac, seeing that in Isaac should the seed be called, and were by him transmitted to Jacob, who, on that occasion when he had the vision of the ladder whose top reached to heaven, had these words addressed to him by the Lord: "Thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the West, and to the East, and to the North, and to the South, and in thee, and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Again, at Bethel, the promise was given, "A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee."

This latter promise we find by Jacob transmitted to the sons of Joseph on that memorable occasion, when, though blind, he guided his hands wittingly, and placed his right hand upon Ephraim the younger, and his left upon Manasseh the firstborn, while he said to Joseph, "And now thy two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, which were born to thee in the land of Egypt, before I came unto thee in Egypt, are mine; as Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine; let my name be named upon them, and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth (multiply as the fishes). . . . He (Manasseh) also shall become a people, and he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations" (fulness of Goyim).

It is important that we remember this incident in which Jacob bequeaths the birthright to Joseph's sons, because of, as we elsewhere read, the sin of Reuben the firstborn, in that he defiled his father's couch; thus Joseph disappears from the tribeship to be doubled, as it were, in his sons, thus increasing the tribes to thirteen, and also accounting for the sometime reference to the House of Joseph, and to Ephraim as representative of the Ten Tribes, being possessor of the birthright.

It were well also to notice, that these various promises were to receive their ultimate fulfilment in the latter days, in which—according to a concensus of opinion—we live, and in which consequently we ought reasonably to look for the fulfilment of the promises given us, that they were not fulfilled during the period of their Scripture history is apparent, for that does not describe them as in any fair degree at any time measuring up to the greatness of the promises.

Multitudinousness, where was it? Cooped up within the area of a country a few miles square? No. Greatness, where was it? Manifested in their many wars, in which atrocities were perpetrated, that would be a reflection upon savages? No! Great were their deliverances, wonderful their progress, immense their accumulations, splendid their achievements, no doubt, but infinitely below what a reasonable interpretation of those promises would lead us to expect. But we must not think that God has forgotten His covenant. He never is in a hurry, His designs are realised only when "the time has fully come." When He wanted to qualify an Abraham to become the father of an elect race, He waited a hundred years, and when in need of a Moses to lead that embryonic people from degradation to freedom He waited.

Even so shall He not use many years in the full development of His plans regarding their national greatness and their fitness to accomplish all His designs regarding them.

Four hundred and seventy years after the call of Abram we find his children brought over Jordan into the promised land, their government a Theocracy, but having tribal affinities and counter-affinities, which upon the accession of David to the throne, appear more than ever before marked.

We read of the men of Judah and the men of Israel. The new king succeeded in securing the fealty of both divisions, and by a career of military glory brought the nation to a pinnacle of national greatness, only lacking the embellishments that alone could come of peace under the reign of his son Solomon, but the nation even under him in all his glory did not occupy in undisputed quiet, the territory promised from Euphrates to the river of Egypt.

Solomon, the representative of united Israel's greatest attainments in the past, passes away, and his son assumes control. I need not recount the particulars of the action by which Rehoboam precipitated that grand division of the people that it were well for us never to lose sight of for a moment in all our further research.

The distinctions and differences that David succeeded in smoothing over, broke out afresh, and in response to the memorable cry, "To your tents, O Israel," the Ten Tribes revolted, set up an independent kingdom, and were ever afterwards dealt with in an emphatically distinct manner.

No longer has the term Israel its old and generic significance. The Lord recognises the division, declares it to be of Him, and all through His after dealings the House of Israel and the House of Judah are individually addressed; and for the curses pronounced on one, or the blessing promised to the other, it were foolish to look, save in the after experience of the House addressed.

At the time of the disruption of the Davidic kingdom, we find the sceptre of David remained with Judah, with whom also Benjamin remained by God's arrangement, to be as a light before the Lord in Jerusalem (1 Kings xi. 36). Jeroboam subsequently drove out the Levites who joined the House of Judah (2 Chron. xi. 13, 14).

To enter into detail concerning the two kingdoms as to their national sins, the weakness or glory of their respective monarchs, their rivalries and wars, is not so much the object of this paper as to ascertain from Scripture concerning their then future conditions and destinies.

We are living in the latter days, and as we have before stated, the prediction of Jacob and of Balaam related to latter day conditions, and as numerous other prophecies undoubtedly pointed forward to the same; we occupy the favourable position of those who can see with their eyes the wonderful fulfilment of the prophetic forecast, or be compelled to abandon the field to blatant infidelity and honest doubt.

"We have a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto we do well to take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place," and while criticism of various ranks from the lowest vulgar to the so-called higher, go stumbling and confused among the pages of our Book, let us, with the highest criticism, holding in our hands the lamp of implicit faith in the integrity of the Promiser, and His ability to keep His word, apply ourselves to a gleaning of the field of prophetic foreview so that with this light that shineth in a dark place we may emulate the parabolic woman who swept her house patiently until she found the lost coin.

There is no difficulty whatever, in identifying the House of Judah, for all through the years previous and subsequent to the climax of their criminality in the crucifixion of the Lord of life, there has never been any possibility of doubt as to who they were. Jews they are, and Jews they claim to be, all the while bearing testimony to the fact that the other tribes so long ago deported from their land, remain in obscurity or mysterious hiding.

The House of Israel was taken into captivity 721 years B.C., from which they never have returned, and from which time the prophecies respecting them are among the lights by which we shall be aided in identifying the lost ones.

Judah went into captivity 580 years B.C., 141 years after Israel, but in agreement with the Word of the Lord, were permitted to return, rebuild Jerusalem, and maintain a sort of national existence without a descendant of David upon the throne; albeit, the promise of David guaranteed the perpetuity of his dynasty; thus were they permitted to remain making a wonderful record for zeal for national independence and anxiously looking for the Redeemer promised to Zion, then driven to the winds to be a hissing and a byword among the nations after they had by wicked hands crucified and slain the Lord of glory.

From the destruction of their city, and their consequent dispersion in A.D. 70, the record of their terrible sufferings has become a part of the histories of so-called Christendom; but even in their debasement and dire condition, they proved a blessing to their tormentors. And to-day we recognise them by the show of their countenance, and while in Latin or Roman Christendom they are still persecuted; we of a better Christendom, that is Protestant, extend to them all the privileges of citizenship, and find them making due allowance for their terrible schooling of the middle ages—worthy of all we accord them—many of them working their way to pinnacles of fame in all departments, and commanding the esteem and confidence of communities and governments.

But while there is no difficulty whatever in identifying the remnant of Judah among the nations to any of us, and we frequently appeal to them as a standing miracle and testimony to the truth of their Scriptures and ours, to the justice of their God and ours; we have by a strange infatuation utterly lost sight of the major part of Isaac's sons while keeping in view the miserable minor, and it does seem to me not at all creditable to our faith and our conceptions of the divine One, that we should thus recognise His hand in Judah's punishment, fearful as it has been, and yet fail to look for and to find His glorious promises to the other division—the House of Israel—in equally sure and clear fulfilment.

No wonder that Tom Paine was led into infidelity, because he saw that the Jews could never verify the promises given to Israel. He therefore gave the Bible up as a myth, all because of his failure to recognise the difference between the House of Judah and that of Israel.

THE BIBLE: ISRAEL AND JUDAH.

A Lecture delivered at the Seamen's Bethel, Pill,

BY GEO. COOPER.

WE are told that Jacob had been absent from home twenty years, in which time, from the daughters of his uncle Laban (Leah and Rachel), there were born to him twelve sons. At this period, he leaves his uncle and settles in Beersheba. While here, his son Joseph is sold by his brothers as a slave to certain Midianite merchantmen, who conveyed him to Egypt, in which country he ultimately became Viceroy, i.e., the ruler, or one acting as a substitute for the king. Driven by a grievous famine from Palestine, Jacob and his sons settle in Egypt, where the beginning, in earnest, of this great nation, Israel, commenced; for his descendants rapidly increased in numbers, became a powerful nation, and occupied the land of Goschen.

Then another king arose in Egypt, which knew not Joseph; and observing the rapid strides made by the Israelites, who might, consequently, assume the dominion of Egypt, placed them under tribute; finally reducing them to slavery. But, at the set time, God delivered and led them out of Egypt under the directorship of Moses, and through the Red Sea, whose waters were held apart by a miraculous process until all the Israelites had gained a footing on the Arabian shore. But to their astonishment, these very waters closed upon the pursuing Egyptian army, drowning all Pharaoh's hosts. This is called the Exodus from Egypt.

We have now come to the Mosaic period. In this age, Israel was truly formed as a nation. Under Moses, in the wilderness of Sinai, Israel received from God a code of laws, social, political, and religious, and a complete national constitution, with civil and ecclesiastical officers.

Passing over a portion of Hebrew history, we arrive at the point whence the misunderstanding of the term Israel and Judah commences. No one can mistake that when Israel is mentioned up to this period, 975 B.C., i.e., the time of the revolt of the Ten Tribes (represented by Ephraim, who was heir to the birthright) from the House of David, the whole Twelve Tribes of Israel are indicated. But now these are divided into two divisions, the House of Israel and the House of Judah. The former consisted of ten tribes, while the latter were composed of two. And yet Ezra (i. 5) shews that three tribes were in Babylon—viz., Judah, Levi, and Benjamin. But the latter tribe was lent for the purpose of being lightbearers. And so it is recorded in the 13th ver. of the 12th chap. of 1 Kings, that "Israel revolted against the House of David unto this day." Here we have it clearly stated that "Israel" stands for Ten-tribed Ephraim under Jeroboam, and the House of David stands for Two Tribes (the House of Judah) under Rehoboam, son of Solomon; and grandson of King David.

At the time of Israel's election of Jeroboam as king, they resolved to repudiate or cast aside the temple-worship established in Jerusalem, and to set up in Dan and Bethel their own priesthood and their own gods. Having selected the lowest and most ignorant of the people as their priests, the whole kingdom of the north became so joined to idols, that neither the expostulations of the prophets or the national visitations affected the immorality of the nation. Sin brought its results. Affected by wars, God finally punished them by bringing against them Shalmanezer, king of Assyria, who deported or carried them away captives to the cities of the Medes, close to the borders of the Caspian Sea. (Here should be read 2 Kings xvii. and Josephus for corroboration. See his Book ix. 14, page 237.)

From this captivity we never glean that they returned. God had divorced, or put them aside from Him for awhile.

Leaving now the captive Israelites, we will return back to Judæa and ascertain what happened to the House of Judah, in and near Jerusalem. By following the Biblical record, we find that, during the downward course of the Israelites, the House of Judah notwithstanding this had been even more iniquitous and transgressing. In order to justify this, reference should be made to what Ezekiel says respecting this in chap. xxiii. He here compares the iniquities of the two sister kingdoms under the figure of two bad sisters. Israel, representing the elder sister, had doted on the wickedness of Assyria, i.e., they readily fell into their national wicked practices, especially as to the worship of idols. But Aholibah, representing the House of Judah, had excelled her sister, the House of Israel, in the intensity of her wickednesses, by further indulging in the horrible demon-like worship of Babylon. And for this God says that her punishment shall be additionally more painful and more humiliating than that of her sister Israel (Ezek. xxiii. 31—35): "Thou (Judah) hast walked in the way of thy sister, therefore will I give her cup into thine hand. Thus saith the Lord God, Thou shalt drink of thy sister's cup deep and large; thou shalt be laughed to scorn, and had in derision: it containeth much. Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow, with the cup of astonishment and desolation, with the cup of thy sister Samaria. Thou shalt even drink it, and suck it out, and break the sherds (i.e., fragments into minute pieces) thereof, and pluck off thine own breasts; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God. Therefore, thus saith the Lord God; Because thou hast forgotten Me, and cast Me behind thy back, therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms."

To this depth of sin on the part of Judah, one more iniquity must be added. Jealousy developed itself greatly at the time of Israel's subjugation in the Median cities. It was an open secret that the House of Judah hated the superiority and power which the northern kingdom, the House of Israel, had enjoyed before their captivity, and was always anxious that some foreign power should conquer and take their brethren captive, so that they (the Jews) might come into the possession of the land and usurp her prestige. And now, when Shalmanezer, king of Assyria, took them away into his land, their hope was in prospect of being realised. But men's thoughts are not God's thoughts. Whereupon, He was yet grieved for Israel, notwithstanding their sins (a true attribute of the Divine character), for He directs the prophet Ezekiel (xi. chap.) to prophecy unto the Jews that God was for and not against the House of Israel. "Son of man, saith the Lord God, the inhabitants of Jerusalem have said to the House of Israel, Get you far from the Lord; unto us is this land given. Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God, although I have cast them (Israel) far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary where they shall come." (Does this look like destruction?) "Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God, but as for them whose heart walketh after the heart of their detestable things and their abominations, I will recompense their way upon their own heads." And then we see how God brings this about. Assyria and Egypt are sent by Him alternately against the Jews until He had so reduced them that they easily succumbed to a third party—viz., "the Chaldeans," and this southern kingdom is also carried away, but into Babylon, by the noted Biblical king, Nebuchadnezzar. Thus we see that Judah drank of her sister's cup, and the subsequent history of Judah in the world bears out the prediction of God that she should drain it "deep and large." As predicted, king Cyrus allowed a few of the captive Jews to return to Jerusalem to rebuild that city and its temple, which had been reduced to ruins by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. Probably those who returned were those of whom the Psalmist related, "By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept, when we remembered thee, O Sion. As for our harps, we hanged them up upon the trees that are therein. But they required of us then a song in our heaviness. Sing us one of the songs of Sion. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?"

We have now given a cursory view of the Biblical history of God's chosen people, which has been amply confirmed, but especially by Josephus, whose writings are spoken of in the highest terms by men of the greatest learning and the soundest judgment, from their first publication to the present time. Both divisions of God's people ceased to be kingdoms in their idolatrous conditions. Further, the House of Judah ceased to be a nation. From which we may arrive at the sure deduction that the sin of Judah must have been intensely greater than that of the House of Israel. Part of the Jews remained in Babylon and part returned to Palestine. But the last authentic record we have of the House of Israel is that they remained a body, a nation, but still captives in the cities of the Medes. They had ceased to be a kingdom, but not a nation, nor can they cease while sun, moon, and stars endure (Jer. xxxi. 35—38).

We now, from this point in their history, get no information of these captives, but of the Jews, fully recognised as such, we get plenty. They are clearly recognised to this day. A description of the facial peculiarities of the Jews need not be given, for as the prophet Isaiah says, "The shew of their countenance doth witness against them."

We must ever bear in mind that, although we have no record of the 400 years' interval which existed between the last writings of the Old and the first of the New Testaments, things went on in the same way under the guiding hand of Jehovah.

But we are taught that "the Ten Tribes are never heard of more;" and "that God has wiped them out of existence." But we shall not dilate here on these expressions relative to the final destruction of God's first-born Ephraim, but will call your attention to the following references to them. In chapter xiii. of the Book of Esdras, one of the Books of the Apocrypha, we find that the Ten Tribes escaped over the narrow passages of the River Euphrates:—

"And whereas thou sawest that he gathered another peaceable multitude unto him. Those are the Ten Tribes which were carried away prisoners out of their own land in the time of Osea, the king whom Salmanezer the king of Assyria, led away captive, and he carried them over the waters, and so they came into another land. But they took this counsel among themselves, that they would leave the multitude of the heathen, and go forth into a further country, where never mankind dwelt. That they might there keep their statutes, which they never kept in their own land. And they entered into Euphrates by the narrow passages of the river. For the Most High then shewed signs for them, and held still the flood till they were passed over. For through that country there was a great way to go, namely, of a year and a half, and the same region is called Arsareth" (2 Esdras xiii. 39—45).

Now this Book of Esdras was anciently styled, "The Revelation of Ezra," but is now commonly known as "the 4th Book of Ezra," and is divided into classes:—(1) Historical Introduction; (2) The Revelation of God to Ezra. The second vision has reference to Israel of "the latter days." In it Ezra sees an eagle (representing the kingdom that Daniel saw in his dream) rising from the sea (a Gentile kingdom is always symbolized in this manner); spreads its wings over the earth, undergoes various transformations, is rebuked by a lion (which is Messiah over the fifth monarchy, i.e., Israel or the British Empire), and is burnt up. But this is a destruction analogous to that seen by Daniel. While the third vision portrays a Man (representing Christ's second coming) flying on the clouds, destroying by the blast of His mouth the opposing powers of the world, and gathering the lost tribes of Israel. He gives them the city of Zion.

Bearing in mind the history of the two sister kingdoms, such as has just been presented, we can the more readily understand the New Testament—the sequel to the Old—and its phrases as regard the two Houses. The distinction between the two must ever be present to the mind or a misunderstanding of the Scripture must ensue. If we do this we shall then have no difficulty in realising the Lord's references to the lost sheep of the House of Israel, for whose conversion to the faith of the new covenant He expressly affirms He was sent (Matt. xv. 24), and the confusion of substance which hitherto existed when we read that He commanded His disciples to go not into the way of the Gentiles, but rather to the lost sheep of the House of Israel, entirely vanishes; and our eyes are opened as to whom the Lord indicated by the "lost sheep." Take John x. 16, R.V., "and other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring and they shall hear My voice, and there shall be one flock and one shepherd." Now there are three questions involved in this verse, which must necessarily be replied to in order that an understanding may be arrived at. Firstly, Who were the sheep — the "other sheep?" secondly, What fold enclosed them? and, thirdly, Why did they belong to Him, although they knew Him not? Jesus was then addressing the Jews, who, Ezekiel tells us, God considered His flock, with the House of Israel as "the flock of My pasture, (and ye) are men, and I am your God, saith the Lord God." Therefore, we see who it was that were clearly indicated by "the other sheep," viz., the House of Israel. Then, as to the flock. Christ is here alluding to the Jewish fold, i.e., the circumcision covenant, which held them under the curse of the law, from which Christ hath redeemed us. "Not of this flock," "them also I must bring." Here we are led to see the ultimate reception of the House of Israel and the House of Judah into that fold, which shall become "one flock, one shepherd." Here, again, we see reunion of Judah with Israel as foretold by the prophets. Then the answer to the third question comes unbidden. These "other sheep"—the lost sheep of the House of Israel—were His, because they were the covenant people of God, although divorced for a time from Him, but still beloved by God for their fathers' sake; for God had said fully a hundred years after the captivity of the House of Ephraim-Israel, "I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is My firstborn." Therefore, these sheep were still His, although they had rejected God.

Also the apostles, Peter and James, speak of and to them, specifically, pointing out the locality of the House of Israel in their time. Peter also says, "Unto you (i.e., Israel) first, God having raised up His Son, Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities."

And now, having gained a knowledge of what is meant by the terms of Israel and Judah, we will endeavour to see what the prophets of God in the Old Testament say respecting them. We have left, as it were, the history of the Houses of Israel and Judah behind us, but we must by no means forget it, or the prophetic word again becomes obscured. It must ever be borne in mind or such difficulties will be presented to our clouded intellect that we shall put the Bible down as past understanding, and begin to assist the atheist in his attacks on the Christian's God of truth and equity.

Coupled with these histories of the two kingdoms, in order to aid the Bible student, we must have in our possession a clear and trustworthy key, which is our object to give to-night, wherewith we may unlock the phraseology of the several different prophets when writing of the House of Israel or of the House of Judah.

Much time has been lost by students in the endeavour to understand these Scriptural designations of the tribes, by the method of interpretation taught in our schools and seminaries. All this has resulted in the advance of scepticism as respects the truth of the Divine Word.

To begin with, we find one prophet speaking of the Ten Tribes and another of Israel, when, of course, there is a difficulty at once presented. Israel presents many phases; it may represent the whole body, the Ten Tribes, one or more of the Ten Tribes, and, in some places, the House of Judah. But on one thing you may rely, i.e., the House of Judah never indicates the House of Israel.

We are quite sure when we read in Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy of "Israel," "His people," "all Israel," "the whole House of Israel," and "Thine inheritance," that the Twelve Tribes are spoken to or about. But, after the separation, these terms are, as a rule, applicable to the Ten Tribes who, B.C. 975, inherited the birthright, and thus had a just claim to the title God had given to Jacob.

Before proceeding any further, your attention should be given to the position of time in the Biblical records. The four prophets whose writings are placed first in our Bible, are called "major," and the remaining twelve, "minor" prophets. The reason for the first four books being styled "major" is not because of their importance above the others, but of their respective lengths. Now this, too, is apt to mislead, and care for these positions also should be taken, so that the time of the writing, coupled with the context, may help to give a clue to what the respective prophet is aiming at. Take now, first, the prophet Amos—year 780 to 760 B.C.—195 years after the division of the Twelve Tribes into two parts. So early as this we might here expect to get a direct address to the Ten Tribes as the House of Israel, and to the Two Tribes as the House of Judah. And we are not disappointed. Such it is. But after we pass over the time in which Hosea and Isaiah wrote, the terminology becomes a little mixed, and we must pay particular attention to the time and the context in order to decipher which of the tribes, or, rather, houses, are meant, because we read in Zeph. iii. 14, "Sing, O daughter of Zion; Shout, O Israel." Here Israel is clearly seen to mark out Judah, for the context indicates it. But Jeremiah, writing between B.C. 628 and 588, almost invariably wrote of the Ten Tribes as "Israel," "Jacob," "the House of Israel," and "Ephraim;" and as regards Isaiah, he seems to have adopted the same course, and they as constantly wrote of the Two Tribes as "the House of Judah," "Judah," "Men of Judah," "Jerusalem," and "the Daughter of Zion," or "Jerusalem."

As a rule, we shall not go far wrong if, when Israel is written, we take it to mean the larger House, except in a few instances, such as will be named hereafter—Ezekiel in particular. This prophet addresses the House of Judah as the "House of Israel."

As we have seen, at the time of the Ten Tribes' captivity, the men of Judah had been rejoicing at the captivity of their brethren, of whom they had always been exceedingly jealous, and popular opinion had carried the sway; and they had usurped the designation of the sister House, whose land they anticipated soon to occupy. And thus we find the prophet Ezekiel suiting the occasion to the times. The Ten Tribes had been in captivity many years then, and the Jews were under the impression that they were likely to remain, and so, being a nation of Israel, they dropped the appellation of the House of Judah and took upon them that of the Northern Kingdom, thus handing down to the men of the succeeding generations the tradition, which is prevalent to this day, viz., "That the House of Judah comprises all the seed of Abraham."

And thus Ezekiel, in order to meet the national demands, speaks to them (Jews) as the House of Israel. But when he is addressing the far-off captives in Media, he writes of them as: "All the House of Israel wholly" (xi. 15): "The whole House of Israel" (xxxviii. 16). Hence, we observe that these terms are equal with "all Israel." But we must not seek an allusion to the Ten Tribes when that prophet uses the term, "The House of Israel," or even "Israel." These are the titles which the Jews usurped.

We have now given a little to guide the seeker after truth; and from our Bibles we will call attention to a few cases of perplexity met therein. Take Ezra ii. 70: "And all Israel (dwelt) in their cities." Now this was written of Benjamin, one only of the Twelve Tribes, which tribe was lent to Judah to be lightbearers" (1 Kings xi. 33, 35, 36). Again (ib. viii. 25), "And all Israel there present." And all Israel gave his "portion" (Neh. xii. 47). "They are not all Israel which are of Israel" (Rom. ix. 6). "And so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. ix. 27 and xi. 26). Here a fact is forced upon us. The term "All Israel" is copyright to Ephraim-Israel, or the Ten Tribes. This copyright term should, therefore, also be borne in mind as an assistant to understanding. Here we have it again, in Ezek. xii. 10. "This burden concerneth the Prince in Jerusalem, and all the House of Israel (Benjamin) that are among them" (Jews). It should be noticed that from these passages that the term "All Israel" may even be applied to one of the Ten Tribes, but never to the two. Further, we may also take it for granted that the Ten Tribes are indicated when we meet with the following terms: "Ephraim," "Jacob," "Israel, My servant," "My servants," "Samaria," "the House of Isaac," "the House of Joseph," "The House of Jacob," "the Remnant of Joseph," &c.

Passing to the New Testament, we might peruse a few of the several designations of God's people there.

A NEW ZEALAND COLONIST ON MATTERS IN GENERAL.

A LETTER written by a British-Israelite from Dunedin, New Zealand, on April 1st, has been sent to us that selected extracts may be published in the BANNER. Our friend paid a visit to his native land last year, and returning, arrived at Dunedin on Christmas-day. He seems to have been busy on the voyage out in circulating Our Identity. literature among his fellow-passengers. The BANNER was freely distributed in the saloon and second cabin. Mr. Robinson's "Predestination," Mr. Dimbleby's 'New Era," also went the round, and excited discussion and argument. The letter goes on thus (our correspondent's views on the subject of Bimetallism we pass over. He is very earnest in pressing them. But we are not able to agree with him in his conclusions):—

"I have not observed that any writer among us has taken much notice of the reason why there is such an indestructible love for the mother country felt by her sons and daughters, who have left her shores and become citizens of her colonies under the Union Jack. I think one of the chief factors of the case is that the ocean mail service, for example, the P. & O. and Orient lines, make up a mail, when nearing any ports of call, for passengers writing to their friends in London, on the outward voyage, to be picked up by the homeward-bound mail steamer in a few days. This is a great privilege to all, but the real fact is only to be seen by the observer when the steamer reaches Australia. Albany is the first port of call; but the mail bags of such a new colony are not very numerous. When you arrive at Adelaide then comes the demonstration. Hundreds of sacks of mails are landed for New Zealand, Victoria, South Australia, New South Wales, Tasmania, Queensland, etc., containing correspondence—religious, domestic, social, political, national,—with literature of the daily press, new books, magazines, ad lib. Now, this occurs regularly every fortnight, in addition to which, the French and German lines carry mails intermediately. Also as regards New Zealand, there is the regular monthly Frisco mail, and the bi-monthly direct mail, via Cape Horn, all making the voyage in 30 to 45 days. This is the cement, that quietly and without being observed, is permanently hardening into one concrete mass the whole of the British Colonies; all these have one common interest—progress, liberty, affection, and hope of the future, and will, no doubt, soon result in a national compact of federation. What a contrast in the capacity of nations to colonise is exhibited by the Transvaal and Western Australia, the former the personification in government and liberty (although a Republic) of all that is repressive and tyrannical, taxation without representation—result, an intolerable existence; while in Western Australia, universal liberty, freedom and representation, consequently progress and rapid development. Both colonies are gold colonies, yet the Dutch cannot colonise. But it is reserved alone for British-Israel to occupy the waste and desolate places of the earth, and to make them blossom as the rose. This is an object-lesson for the writers in the BANNER to think of. The arrival of the BANNER Monthly is looked forward to with great pleasure by all Anglo-Israelites in New Zealand that I know of. The January, 1896, number is an especial good one. The signs of the times are increasing the number of converts.

A GATE IN THE MIDST OF A LOFTY LAND.

(Extracts from "In the Heart of a Continent," by Captain Younghusband.)

WRITING of 1889, the author says, in a chapter headed "A Kanguti Stronghold":—

". . . We then retraced our steps to the junction of Shimshal river, and ascended the valley through which it flows. Up this valley, at five miles from its junction with the Oprang, is a Kanguti outpost, called 'Darwaza, or the Gate.' It was from this place that the raiders started on their expedition. . . . Rounding a spur, we saw in the distance a tower erected on the top of a cliff, and approaching nearer, we saw that the whole line of the cliff, where it was at all accessible, was covered by a loophole wall, at the upper of which was a second tower. The cliff formed the bank of a deep ravine, which cut tansversely across the main valley. Looking up the valley on the right was the unfordable Shimshal river; on the left were precipitous mountains, and in front this deep ravine. . . ."

Captain Younghusband and two Indian companions succeeded, however, after climbing half-way up the opposite bank, in persuading the Kangutis, after the wall had been "manned by wild-looking" men, "shouting and waving us back, and pointing their matchlocks" at the climbers, to admit them into their fort; and the author adds afterwards:—

"We stood together for a long time round the fire, a curious group—rough, hard, determined-looking Kangutis, in long woollen robes, round cloth caps, long curls hanging down their ears, matchlocks slung over their backs, and swords bound to their sides; the timid red-faced Kirghiz; the Tartar-featured Ladakis; the patient, longsuffering Baltis; the sturdy, jovial little Gurkhas; the grave Pathan, and a solitary Englishman, met together here, in the very heart of the Himalayas, in the robber's stronghold. It is in thinking over occasions like this that one realises the extraordinary influence of the Europeans in Asia, and marvel at his power of rolling on one race upon another to serve his purpose. An Asiatic and an European fight, the former is beaten, and he immediately joins the European to subdue some other Asiatic. The Gurkas and the Pathans had both in former days fought desperately against the British; they were now ready to fight equally desperately for the British against these raiders around us, and their presence had inspired so much confidence in the nervous Kerghiz that these men had summoned up enough courage to enter a place which before they had never thought of without a shudder."

Writing of 1893, Captain Younghusband says:—

"When I travelled through Hunza, in 1889, the country . . . was ruled by a certain Safder Ali. The Government of India found themselves compelled, in the winter of 1891-2, to make war upon this chief, and as the result of a brilliant and successful campaign, directed by Col. A. G. Durand—a campaign remarkable for the gallantry displayed by individual British officers, and for the military efficiency of the newly-trained Kashmir troops—Safder Ali was forced to flee from the country, and Hunza was brought more directly under the control of the Maharaja of Kashmir and the Government of India. . . .

"It might be imagined that after a war with them, and after the flight of their ruler, the people would be anything but friendly with the British, but eight months later, when I again visited the country to relieve Captain Stewart, the political agent, upon whom had devolved the task of superintending the affairs of the country at the conclusion of the campaign, the people were quiet and peaceful, as if they had been born and bred under British administration; officers were able to travel anywhere through the country without an escort, and were always treated with respect. As I have already intimated, these people had no rooted antipathy to the British Government, and they form a remarkable instance of the good effects which come of following up a successful campaign by assuming a permanent control."

"In Hunza the people are now ruled by a member of the family which has sat on the throne for probably hundreds of years. . . . Not a single custom, unless raiding can be called a custom, has been interferred with. In their internal affairs the people are in much the same condition as when I first passed through the country in 1889. All cases are brought before the chief now, as then, and the British officer who resides in the country is only too glad to be free from the responsibility and trouble of having to deal with them. In only one respect is control exercised by the agent of the Government of India, and that is in regard to the foreign relations of the State. In that one single respect the country must lose its independence, but that is inevitable."

Any remarks of mine on the foregoing extracts would be superfluous, but I would venture to quote a portion of Ezek. xvii. 23: "And it shall . . . be a goodly cedar: and under it shall dwell all fowl of every wing; in the shadow of the branches thereof shall they dwell."

RANDOM SHAFTS.

TITLES are not always a correct index to the contents of a book, and this is undoubtedly true of the Pioneer of Wisdom, organ of a body called the "New and Latter House of Israel." They are often confounded with ourselves by those to whom the confusion is pleasing, but as the "Latter House" professes to have received a fresh revelation from heaven through a "Flying Roll" and "strives to observe every jot and tittle of the Mosaic law, save with regard to sacrifice," this should suffice to mark it off from us. The Pioneer of Wisdom includes nothing which is calculated to interest the public, yet it is vigorously pushed, being hawked about in country districts and vended from door to door in many towns. By these means it would appear that 520 places have been canvassed in two years, and Anglo-Israelites might copy with advantage. Perhaps when we get the cheap monthly, promised by the North of England Council, there may be a change for the better, but so far the friends of error continue to expend more energy over their literature than the friends of truth.

While, however, I can cordially commend this industry of the "Latter House," I would not advise our own supporters to dispose of December numbers in May, as it leaves an impression on the buyer that he has been swindled. The said "Latter House" seem to be of the "perfectionist" persuasion, and I would ask whether the selling of ancient magazines for modern ones is a strictly immaculate transaction? Still, this particular December Pioneer, though somewhat belated, had probably more attractions for such as myself than the current issue, because it administered a solemn rebuke to the BANNER. Philo-Israel was evidently guilty of a grave misdemeanour last year, for in the BANNER of November 6th he published an article on "The Navy and the Empire," and boldly declared that were our navy strengthened by a colonial squadron "we could command peace upon the earth and so prepare it for the millennium and the previous arrival of its King, the Lord Jesus."

The Pioneer of Wisdom warmly dissents from this, saying: "The manufacture of the most deadly weapons that science can invent, the construction and parade of leviathan ironclads are not among the things to promote universal peace. Neither do we read in Holy Writ that the conversion of the world or the subjugation by force of arms of all other nations to Israel, will be a preparation for the millennium." If the author of the foregoing has not magnified his shortcomings it can only be regretfully inferred that his reading of Holy Writ, or his reflections on what he has read, are decidedly imperfect. Prophetic Israel is nothing if she is not an aggressive military power: a battle-axe in the hand of the Almighty, treading down her enemies and breaking the nations into pieces (Jer. li. 20: Mic. v. 8); her destiny being described by Isaiah lx. 12 without the least reserve. These warlike scriptures cannot have their fulfilment during the millennium, nor can their accomplishment be delayed until after it. Consequently we have no choice but to conclude that Israel's conquests are prior to the millennium—that they are preparatory to it, just as the conquests of Rome were preparatory for the Gospel. As to the assertion that "leviathan ironclads" are not likely to promote universal peace, that is a matter on which others who are better qualified to speak have expressed a different opinion.

Our critics are slightly contradictory in their estimates of the Identity. The BANNER for May 27th regaled us with the views of E. Rust, who assured the world, through the Church Family Newspaper, that our subject was a "perfectly harmless delusion." Yet the April part of Things to Come reprints a lengthy extract from "a valuable paper on 'The Lost Tribes of Israel,' by C. S.," designed to prove that Anglo-Israelism is a most pernicious affair. I do not propose to argue that point for the hundredth time—they can fight it out between them, and the blind fighting the blind will form a worthy companion picture to the blind leading the blind. But if this eruption of "C. S." is really "a valuable paper," Things to Come must have forgotten to quote the valuable portions. It certainly is valuable in a sense, as it shows the inconsistency and logical poverty of our opponents.

Of course we are compared to other Satanically-inspired men: the treatise would not be complete if that were lacking. "I remember when a boy," observes C. S., "when the first sounds of the midnight cry were beginning to be heard, Satan raised up a diversion, the Johannaites; it was the very same Israelitish theory I heard once from a noted preacher of theirs as is now propounded by more learned folk." I never fell in with the Johannaites before, and should like to have a few more details about their doctrines, as the statements of these devoted "watchers" are not distinguished for allegiance to veracity. If the "Johannaites" are identical with the "Latter House of Israel" I have already said enough to close the mouth of C. S. Can anyone enlighten me? But to proceed; and here is the essence of this precious effusion.

"What harm? This harm: the Spirit of God is awakening the whole Church of God to the blessed hope of the return of the Lord. Satan can no longer keep men in the error of the wicked, saying, Where is the promise of His coming? He can no longer delude the Church of God by the cry of peace and safety, a good time coming, and the world's conversion by the preaching of the Gospel. . . Now what must Satan do? . . . Now or never he must have a great diversion; men's minds must be diverted from this blessed hope of so soon meeting the Lord in the air; when the deep longing desire of His heart shall be fulfilled: 'Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am.' Oh, wondrous words of untold love! Is it to Palestine, think you, He would have us with Him as Anglo-Israelites? Hear Him, believe Him. 'In My Father's house are many mansions.' . . . Oh, tell me. Do you believe Jesus? Why should we distrust or fear Him? Oh, how He loves! . . . When we see Him we shall be like Him. Oh, blissful hope! And is there no harm in giving up this blessed hope of so soon seeing and being like and with Him we love? Blessed Lord, we would not give it up for the universe. Universe! What is it all to compare with Thee? . . . Our thoughts and hopes must not be diverted to white asses, trains, or steamers to take us to Palestine! No harm!"

C. S. would make a good writer of Gospel leaflets for the young, but when he sat down to discourse on the "Lost Tribes of Israel" he clearly mistook his calling. Many readers of the above medley may feel a little shocked to find Satan introduced in this connection, and it will relieve them to know that he is introduced in all connections. You have but to cross this class of people and you are immediately consigned to Beelzebub. The principle on which they act is simple. Thus: God is the source of truth; Satan is the source of error. They have the truth in its fulness; therefore those who disagree with them are the victims of error, and, necessarily, the agents of Satan. No rule-of-three could be sounder, so that however plausible the (nominal) Christian is, Conventionists can easily detect the "natural man," "the cloven foot," "the tactics of the old serpent," "the enemy," "the aim of Satan," "Satan's counterfeits," &c.

C. S. and his fellows seem to think that we British Israelites are yearning to take our tickets for Jerusalem or ride a white ass, which is a misconception. They also seem to think that this "waiting for the Lord in the air" is something new—a quite original and infallible symptom of sanctification. And this is another misconception, for the watching attitude is nearly 2,000 years of age. The earliest Christians looked for the speedy advent of Christ and made much more practical preparations for the event than the holding of Conferences; but they were deceived. Since then, the Church has seldom ceased to hope for the Saviour's descent, but vainly. Whether the present boastful "watchers" are doomed to similar disappointment or not is a question for the future to decide; but watching consists in walk, not talk, and the coster who wheels a barrow in the slums may be fitter for "the rapture of the saints" than those who harangue by the hour at Keswick, even if, in addition to wheeling, he is so reprobate as to imagine that God has been faithful to Abraham. To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—At the annual meeting of the British-Israel Association, on the 7th ult., Mr. H. H. Pain made use of a very excellent map of "The Promised Land," which he had produced for his own use, in speaking upon the Eastern Question. You have promised the readers of the BANNER that a facsimile of it shall appear for their benefit, but may I be permitted to suggest that a full sized copy would be an important and convincing addition to our literature.

Yours in Israel,

JOHN WILSON.

"THE IMMENSITY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE."

THERE are few who realise the vastness and immensity of the British Empire as it exists to-day. Messrs Whittaker, in their Almanack for 1896, have an article founded on the facts as they bear upon Imperial Federation. They consider "the British Empire as a geographical and commercial unit," and pass in review "its exceeding greatness" and "its actual and potential resources." "The Empire," says the Bradford Daily Argus of Dec. 13, "has an area of nearly 11½ millions of square miles and a population of over 400 millions. The Flag waves in all zones, and within the limits of the Empire are to be found all the necessaries and luxuries needed for its factories and workshops." There is not an item required in civilized life from the coal that warms our bodies and cooks our food, up to the richest and rarest jewels, from the humble fare of the poorest peasant up to the most costly viands, and wines and spices, which could not be obtained from our own fellow-subjects. The British Empire is, or might readily be made, self-contained. In this respect it is unique. "No Empire of the past has occupied the same position; no Empire of to-day approaches it."

With commercial federation the Empire would not only be complete in itself—and stronger by the added strength of the commercial ties which bound its various members with the bonds of common interest—but would be able to command better terms for British goods from foreign countries. Germany, Belgium, Holland, France, and the United States would be brought to the verge of national bankruptcy, were the British markets closed against them, and the mere threat of such closure would be sufficient to secure more favourable terms for the entry of British goods into their markets, than all the preaching and praying of our administrations has been able to achieve in the last half century. Federation, with the impetus it would give to Colonial agriculture, and the revival which it would also occasion at home, would foreshadow such imminent disaster to the whole of the agricultural interests in the United States, that the hostile tariffs built up to please the comparatively small manufacturing section would be swept away by the upheaval of the farming classes, to whom a reorganisation of the fiscal relations between America and the old country would be a matter of life and death. In the same way France, sooner than lose the 44 millions of custom per year which she now obtains in this country would be willing to bring down the duties on British goods to a reasonable level. And so on with all the other nations. There is not one of which commercial federation in the Empire would not give us the whip hand. . . . More than half the steam tonnage of the seas is British; 46 per cent. of the total import trade of the world is British, 48 per cent. of the total export trade of the world is British. These figures show plainly the commercial strength which an Imperial Federation would wield.

The vast extent of the British Empire, while it is a matter for thankfulness to God and national satisfaction, has its drawbacks. It brings us into contact with almost all nations of the earth, small and great, and there are questions arising out of such proximity which are perpetually leading us into national misunderstanding bordering on war. One such has suddenly arisen as we write between ourselves and our brethren of Manasseh on the subject of our old standing boundary dispute between the British territory of British Guiana in South America and the Republic of Venezuela. The President of the United States, standing on the Monroe Doctrine of 1823, demands as a right, what we can never accede, that in such a dispute occurring even in South America, the matter must be brought to arbitration because it is alleged to interfere with their right to occupy the Western Hemisphere free from the interference of European Governments. It is a satisfaction and comfort in all these trials to know that the British are Israel, and that the Lord is guiding, guarding, and preserving us and our interests, and that these dangers, arising even from our own kith and kin in the territories of Manasseh, are all permitted by His providence and entirely under His control. One passage in the despatch from the Government at Washington, to Lord Salisbury, has been well answered by the latter and deserves notice here. The American Despatch declares "that distance and 3,000 miles of intervening ocean make any permanent and political union between a European and an American State unnatural and inexpedient will hardly be denied." To this Lord Salisbury replied that the plain English of these and other words used on the American side were that "the union between Great Britain and Canada; between Great Britain and Jamaica and Trinidad; between Great Britain and British Honduras, or British Guiana, are 'inexpedient and unnatural.' Her Majesty's Government are prepared emphatically to deny the American development of President Monroe's Doctrine. They maintain that the union between Great Britain and her territories in the Western Hemisphere is both natural and expedient." These are some of the trials and difficulties of such an Empire as ours, but through them all the Lord is guiding us, His blind and perplexed people (Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.). The immensity of our Empire is God given and God designed. He means Israel His people of the House of Joseph, to be "His dominion," as stated in Psa. cxiv. 2, and He has provided that "the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be theirs," according to Dan. vii. 27, R.V., as "the people of the saints of the Most High." The Empire, therefore, of His chosen ones is enlarging daily before our eyes, until at last it will be found to be commensurate with the planet. For their Empire is yet to be "the kingdom of the Lord and of His Christ," and will be, as defined in Rev. xi. 15, "the kingdom of the world."

Our untravelled population have no means of realising the extent of Her Majesty's dominions, and maps give but a poor idea of it to uninstructed eyes. But it may give some idea of British Colonial distances to be told that it takes about seven days and nights to get across the Canadian Dominion by rail from East to West, that Canada is three times the size of India, and that the sun never sets on the Empire for a moment. These things are the Lord's gifts to His people to qualify them efficiently to serve Him, and let Israel therefore praise the Lord for His goodness to His heritage!

ISRAEL: HER PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

By H. R. Baldwin.

As we have already seen, the most wonderful promises respecting temporal power, wealth, expansion, world-wide empire, &c., rested in the House of Israel with Joseph's sons, and that their ultimate fulfilment was reserved for these latter days, it becomes us carefully to consider those early promises, and also the prophecies addressed them about, and subsequent to, the time of their captivity; and thus have our minds disabused of the false notions, if indeed we entertain them, that the House of Israel has ceased to exist. The first promises I shall not repeat here except that one addressed to Jacob, and afterwards by him transferred to Ephraim and Manasseh: "A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee." Jacob in transmitting this to Joseph's sons, declares that his name should be named upon them—that is, Israel—and that Manasseh should be the nation, while Ephraim the younger should become the "company or multitude of nations." Moses enlarges upon this in his last memorable blessing to the tribes, and in these words indicates a plenitude of unexampled prosperity besides which all the rest dwindle into insignificance: "And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath, and for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and for the precious things put forth by the moon, and for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the earth, and fulness thereof, and for the goodwill of him that dwelt in the bush let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the top of the head of him that was separated from his brethren. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns; with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth: and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh" (Deut. xxxiii. 13—17).

After the captivity Jeremiah is instructed to "Go and proclaim these words towards the north, and say, Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord, and I will not cause Mine anger to fall upon you; for I am merciful, saith the Lord, only acknowledge thine iniquity; turn, O backsliding children, for I am married to you" (Jer. iii. 14). Again: "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinance of the moon and the stars for a light by night. If these ordinances depart from Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever" (Jer. xxxi. 35, 36). Here is a guarantee for national existence.

Hosea ii. 6, 7 says: "Therefore, behold, I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall that she shall not find her paths. Then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband, for then was it better with me than now."

Ezek. xi. 16 says of her: "Thus saith the Lord God, Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come."

Israel's military glory is declared in these words from Jer. iv. 20, 21: "Thou art My battle-axe and weapons of war, for with thee I will break in pieces the nations, and with thee I will destroy kingdoms."

Micah iv. 7 tells us that God would make her that was cast far off a strong nation, and that the "Remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles in the midst of many people, as a lion among the beasts of the forest. Thine hand shall be lifted up upon thine adversaries, and all thine enemies shall be cut off." "The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might; Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, the mercy to Abraham, which Thou hast sworn to our fathers from the days of old" (Micah v. 8, 9).

And Hosea writes as from the Lord: "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? I will heal their backslidings, I will love them freely: for Mine anger is turned away from him. I will be as the dew unto Israel. Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? Therefore, behold, I will allure and bring her into the wilderness and speak comfortably unto her, and she shall sing there as in the days of her youth, and it shall be at that day, saith the Lord, that thou shalt call Me Ishi (My husband). And they shall no more be remembered by their name. And I will betroth thee unto Me for ever, and I will sow her unto Me in the earth, and will say to them which were not My people, Thou art My people, and they shall say, Thou art My God."

Also God said to David: "I will ordain a place for My people Israel, and will plant them, and they shall dwell in their place, and shall be moved no more."

Thus we glean that the House of Israel were to be called by another name in their "Lo-ammi" condition. They were to be lost, yet watched over and blessed with all the fulness of blessings promised to their fathers while in that state; and we also find some indications of the whereabouts of their new and distant home: in the north (Jer. iii. 18); in the west (Hos. xi. 10); in the isles afar off (Jer. xxxi. 10); in the isles of the sea (Isa. xxiv. 15; xli. 1). They were to be a strong nation (Micah iv. 7); chief of the nations (Jer. xxxi. 7). They were to possess the Gate of his enemies (Gen. xxii. 17). They were to spread abroad to the north, south, east, and west; to inherit the waste places, and make the wilderness and solitary places glad. They were to be immensely wealthy, lending to many nations, but borrowing from none; ruling over many nations, but nowhere ruled over by others (Deut. xv. 6).

With these guides—a few of many—it would seem as though it would not be difficult to find the lost; if, indeed, the time has come for their unveiling. Jesus declared His mission was to the "lost sheep of the House of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24); sent His first messengers, saying, "Go rather to the lost sheep of the House of Israel" (Matt. x. 6).

Where are they? A great deal of time and money has been spent in the search for them, albeit their marks are many and easy of detection. What an insult to the Jehovah of the promises to point us to the Red Indians, the Afghans, a tribe of India or China! What are these doing, or what have they ever done, to bless the peoples of the earth? Perish the thought!

Is there a people now to be found who measure up to the fulness of the promise? Let other than themselves make answer. A Frenchman, M. Prevost Paradol, says: "Two rival Powers, but only one as to race, language, customs, laws (England and the United States) are, with the exception of Europe, dominating the world. However, this actual predominance of the Anglo-Saxon race everywhere out of Europe is but a feeble image of what an approaching future has in store for us. According to the most moderate calculation, the United States will number more than one hundred million of inhabitants at the end of the present century, without speaking of the probable extension of the American Republic to the Isthmus. At all events, the American continent is, in its whole extent, destined to belong to the Anglo-Saxon race. Oceania also belongs to the Anglo-Saxons of Australia and New Zealand. But let us put aside all conjectures; our children are not the less assured to see the Anglo-Saxon race mistress of Oceania as well as America, and all the countries of the farther east that may be dominated, worked, or influenced by the possession of the sea, when affairs shall have reached that climax, and it is not too much to say that two centuries will suffice for it. Will it be possible to deny, from one end of the globe to the other, that the world is Anglo-Saxon? Thus we can foretell through imagination that future situation of the world, and glance at that picture, the main lines of which are, so to say, already sketched by the hands of fate. And if we are inclined seriously to ask ourselves in what time the earth shall have taken that new form, we shall easily perceive that two centuries are scarcely necessary to bring to its apogee the Anglo-Saxon grandeur in the Oceania region as well as on the American continent. That greatness once established, no one shall be able to menace it from without, like Rome, which was surrounded on every side by a barbarous world. There are no more barbarous nations, and the race which will be invested with the guidance of mankind will have to fear neither the competition nor the appearance of a new race."

Victor Hugo, speaking of our mother country, says: "Over that sea, in calm majesty, lies the proud island whose existence consoles me for a thousand continental crimes, and vindicates for me the goodness of Providence. Yes, yes, proud England! thou art justly proud of thy colossal strength, more justly of thy god-like repose. Stretched upon the rock, but not like Prometheus, and with no evil bird to rend thy sides, rests the genius of England. He waits his hour, but counts not the hours between. He knows that it is rolling up through the mystic gloom of ages, and that its chariot is guided by the iron hand of destiny. Dare I murmur that the mists will clear for me, that I shall not hear the rumbling wheels of the chariot of the hour of England? It will come, it is coming, it has come! Henceforth there are no nations, no peoples, but one and indivisible will be the world, and the world will be one England."

Mr. Vernadsky, a Russian, says: "Britain is a menace to the safety of Europe. She is the most aggressive Power of modern times. There is no part of the world where she has not established her garrisons or her colonies. Her fleet dominates every sea. She has torn Gibraltar from Spain, Malta and Canada from France, Heligoland from Denmark, Cape of Good Hope from the Dutch, Gold Coast from the Portuguese, and Hong Kong from China. She has built up a military power in Asia which secures her government over two hundred millions in India. At Aden she holds the Gate of the Red Sea. At Singapore she commands the road to China. From Fiji she dominates the Pacific. Her territory is vaster than Russia, and greater in extent than all Europe without Russia."

Mr. Gladstone says: "There is no parallel in all the records of the world to the case of that prolific British mother who has sent forth her innumerable children all over the earth to be the founders of half-a-dozen empires."

Josiah Strong remarks: "This race is multiplying not only more rapidly than any other European race, but far more rapidly than all the races of Continental Europe." He gives the probable numbers of Anglo-Saxons and all other European nations respectively, in one hundred years more, as: "Anglo-Saxons, 713 millions against 534 millions, these figures representing the largest probable population of Europe and the smallest probable numbers of the Anglo-Saxon race." Continuing, he says: "Does it not look as if God were not only preparing, in our Anglo-Saxon civilization, the dye with which to stamp the peoples of the earth, but as if He were also massing behind that dye the mighty power with which to press it." But enough.

This wonderful enlargement has come about in about two hundred years, and of one race we find a nation, and a company of nations about being federated. We find that this race bids fair to dominate the world, and that for its good; that they have immense wealth, lending but never borrowing; ruling over nations, but not being ruled over; having in possession the coasts of the earth; making the wilderness and the solitary places glad; spread abroad east, west, north and south; having control of the Gates of their enemies, or the strategic points; a seafaring people, in fact—a people ready to take care of poor afflicted Judah when, being driven and crushed by modern Pharaohs, she is being compelled to walk to the House of Israel according to prophecy. Very soon may we see them come in ever-increasing numbers, and events are shaping themselves for the great restoration of wandering Judah with representative Israel, the greatness of which shall so completely overshadow the deliverance from Egypt that it shall be lost sight of.

D'Israeli, when premier of England, grasped the situation, and, when the opportune time came, secured Cyprus and the protectorate of Asia Minor, and England but waits the favourable moment when the nations of ill-consolidated Europe shall be engaged in a life and death struggle, apparently imminent, to take actual possession of the Christian Mecca, Palestine and Jerusalem, and thus secure the restoration of her brethren of that other House of Judah.

Already the eastern sky is aglow with the coming glory, and our eyes may soon see the fulfilment of the word which declared: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise into David a righteous branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely. Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt. But the Lord liveth which brought up and which led the seed of the House of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land." Even so Thy Kingdom come.

NOTE.—The foregoing paper was read before the Omaha and Council Bluffs Methodist Episcopal Preacher's Meeting.

THE "MORNING LEADER" ON THE MEETING AT EXETER HALL, MAY 7TH, 1896.

THE comments of the Morning Leader, of May 8th last, on our Association's Exeter Hall's Annual Meeting were not complimentary, nor in truth were they wise. The writer was evidently quite ignorant of the subject himself, and very palpably exhibited his ignorance in the few lines by way of report which were published by his Editor. His remarks were called "Some Interesting Revelations at Exeter Hall" during the May Meetings.

The subject of the British-Israel meeting was, he stated, the evidence that "we are the chosen people, and that we are predestined to make 'one stick' with our brother Judah." The reporter of the proceedings on the part of the Morning Leader admits that he listened to the Association's Professors' exposition of the "truth" last night, but that "for the life of him, he did not know what they were driving at." "It is true," he adds, "that I heard a great deal about rivers, and mountains, and tribes, and prophecies, and inspirations, but such a cabalistical turned and twisted topsy-turvey, I never heard before." He stated the British-Israel Association's hypothetical case thus: our readers can judge how much the writer carried away with him from the meetings, and what previous knowledge he brought with him to the Hall:—

"You are well aware that there are

CERTAIN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL,

and that in one portion of Holy Writ it is said, 'And the kingdom shall be taken from you and given to a nation.' There are heaps of nations, of course, but the point is, Which nation is it? Well, it is US. For are we not 'bringing forth fruits?' At all events, the British-Israel Association says we are. Only the other day (I am quoting one of the oracles of the B.I.A.) there was not a nation that would have refrained from flying at our throats 'if they dared.' But what happened? Nothing. Why? because we are the seed of Abraham, the true Israel, and 'the sword (vide Scriptural prophecy, as interpreted by British-Israel savants) shall not prevail against us.' Odd, is it not, that the other section of Israel—the United States section, wanted, so at least some of their veracious prints declared, to be twisting the lion's tail only a few hours ago. But there—pshaw! 'We never were conquered (I quote the B.I.A. again), and by God's help we never shall be.' Rather cold comfort this, for Dr. Jameson and his friends at Bow-street? If we may believe the British-Israel Association, however, Mr. Cecil Rhodes is working out for us our destinies as 'God's chosen son, Ephraim.' You can begin to understand the when you grasp the British-Israel Association's discovery that we are the chosen people who are presently to join Judea and become the 'one stick spoken of by Ezekiel.' In short, much as it may grieve the Prophet Baxter, we are the people who are predicted to be the rulers of the world.

"VIGNETTE."

Of course, a good deal of the above is banter, and a good deal is the result of hearing the subject mooted for perhaps the first time. The reporter was probably ignorant that his first quotation was from Matt. xxi. 43, being our Lord's own words addressed to the Jews of His time, telling them that "the kingdom of God should be taken from them and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." The mere statement that our own was the nation the Lord indicated, without reference to current facts respecting our world-wide missionary and philanthropic work, reads of course like an absurdity, which perhaps was the reporter's intention. As bearing upon the matter the writer goes on to state that during our late national troubles, when the world seemed ready to rise up against us and destroy us, nothing really happened to hurt us, because we were Israel; we should be glad if our opponent could give us a better reason for our escape? The Scriptural and prophetical promises are in Israel's favour: and because we have abundantly proved and established our Identity with the lost Tribes, we are really justified in coming to the conclusion that in the late difficulties we escaped unhurt because God promised that we (being Israel) should do so. But, asks the opponent, why did the Americans also "twist the lion's tail" if they are a part of the chosen people, as alleged? We answer because they, too, though a portion of the House of Joseph, are subject to envious feelings, even towards us their blood relations. It is quite natural, that because the Canadian Dominion loyally resolves to remain British, the Americans should be envious and jealous of our prosperity, and cannot but show it sometimes. We do not see how that fact interferes with our views, or proves them to be doubtful? After all, the late troubles vanished as rapidly as they rose up against us; and as to the Americans, good feeling and brotherhood have prevailed, and it is hoped that we shall have no fresh misunderstandings from that quarter.

In regard to the dominion of the world, we suppose Vignette (our opponent's nom de plume) has read Dan. vii. 27; Deut. xxviii. 1—13; Rom. iv. 13, and such like promises to Israel, and will not deny that such dominion over the globe was and is promised to the Hebrew race? On our part we have proved by sufficient evidence that the British are "The Lost Tribes" and as such are "the heirs of the world," the owners of "the Gates," and of the dominion of the sea, "the chief of nations," "the head and not the tail, above only and not beneath," "set high" by God Himself "above all the nations of the earth." Facts are so; and the writer cannot deny it! At any rate let him, or her, attempt it! Failure is certain, as we can assure our opponent.

In reference to Dr. Jameson's foolish raid, and Mr. Cecil Rhodes' conduct, the results show us that God did not authorise the former. But we have no doubt that these apparent failures are working out the purposes of God yet in the future, and that those purposes must embrace the enlargement of our race, its growth in power, and its final universal dominion according to the prophecies. All, however, depends on this. Do the prophecies support our views, and give Israel, God's people, these promises and privileges? If not, then Vignette's task is easy. Let him prove us wrong, by reference to chapter and verse, from the Bible. Do the events of the day and our own national history support our view that the British are "the Remnant of Israel?" If not, then Vignette can, if he likes, prove us to be fundamentally in error, and our work as the Editor of the BANNER will cease and determine, forthwith. Vignette has his task. Let him try and perform it.

THE BIBLE: ISRAEL AND JUDAH.

A Lecture delivered at the Seamen's Bethel, Pill,

BY GEO. COOPER.

CHRISTIANS of different denominations may question, "What good is there in such distinctions, since Christ came to save us all, and placed the Jew and the Gentile on an equal footing." We will see what the Apostle Paul says in answer to this question. In Rom. ix. 4, 5, we have, "Who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the services of God, and the promises, whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for evermore. Amen."

From this, is it nothing to know who are Israelites? Herein is distinction plainly enough marked to stop a child even from putting forward the above question. These promises are made secondary to the Gentile. It was to Israel that Christ was specially sent, for His words import it without a shadow of a doubt, "I am not sent, but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel (Matt. x. 5, 6). "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go rather to the lost sheep of the House of Israel." Again, on the face of this, is it just to reiterate that question? Christ Himself and His apostles have answered it. Hence we see there is a primary importance attached to the Israelites; and it behoves us, as the Bereans of old, to search and find out the truth. Matt. ii. 6, says "He shall rule My people Israel." Who is here signified by "My people?" Someone may remark, "I can see no good in bothering my head," as many have remarked. Now, I ask, Is it of no consequence to know whom Christ is going to rule? Our instructions are that we "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest." It is true we read, but if it is of no consequence, how can we learn and digest the word?

By referring to the key, we see that the captives of the Median cities are pointed out. Here we have it again (Luke i. 6, 8): "He hath visited and redeemed His people." "Hath God cast away His people?" "Come out of her, My people" (Rev. xviii. 4—7).

Turning to Heb. viii. 10, we find, "This shall be the covenant that I will make with the House of Israel." Now, glancing at ver. 8, we observe a clear distinction between the two separated houses. It is given in a decided literal form. God says that "He will make a new covenant with the House of Israel and the House of Judah."

There is not the slighest doubt that confusion must again take place, if the reader is unacquainted with the history of those houses. It would not be requisite for God to speak in this manner to a Gentile people. Why? Because none but God's people had been under a covenant. The context tells us that the "first covenant (i.e., the Mosaic) had not been faultless." If it had "then should no place have been sought for the second." It was with the very people that had not kept the first covenant, that He will contract a second. But mark, in ver. 10 we notice an exclusion of the House of Judah. And then God defines the manner of covenant that He will make with the House of Israel. And saying nothing of the House of Judah, we come to the conclusion, aided by ver. 8, that that house must come under the new covenant through the other house, the House of Israel, by adopting the same methods and the same terms. It seems also to indicate that the new covenant would be accepted by the Jews some considerable time after Ephraim had so done by the non-repetition of the House of Judah in ver. 10.

But we are taught that "this House of Ephraim-Israel is altogether lost—blotted out of existence." Now if this be so, how can the new covenant God says He will make with them be fulfilled? Happily for man, it is not so. The men who propagate such a doctrine are in reality denying the truth of God's holy word, and reducing themselves to the condition of that man of Rev. xxii. 19; his part shall be taken out "of the Book of Life, and out of the holy city, and from the things that are written in this book."

But the Anglo-Israelite must not be angry, but gentle, apt to teach those Christians who repeat this assertion; and ever bear in mind the injunction of James the apostle (iii. 13.) "Shew out of a good conversation . . . words with meekness of wisdom." How can we shew this? When they question the existence of the Ten Tribes, by asking, Where are they? because we cannot point to them in certainty under the Biblical appellation as we can do as regards the descendants of the House of Judah, we must point out what God says respecting them in His word. Probably you may meet with the ejaculation, "But I cannot see. The descendants of the House of Israel cannot be traced upon the pages of the world's history." If God says they shall remain a nation, and we cannot discern them, is that any special reason why these people should not exist? Because we cannot see! We cannot see our brains, but we are convinced that we have them.

Now man's thoughts are not God's thoughts in respect of the people of whom He says they are to Him as the "apple of His eye." Man says this Israel is not upon the face of the earth. But hear what the Lord saith, before whose word scientific fact must shortly succumb (Jer. xxxi. 35, 37). "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night: which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar: the Lord of Hosts is His name. If these ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever. Thus saith the Lord, If heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, I will also cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, saith the Lord."

Now we ask, "Can God," as Moses said, be "the Rock,

Digitized by Google

His work is perfect, for all His ways are judgment, a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is He," if He has cast away this people whose continued existence He vows shall stand side by side with that of the sun, moon, and stars? In the words of Balaam, let us truly answer, "God is not a man that He should lie, neither the Son of man that He should repent: hath He said, and shall He not do it? or hath He spoken, and shall He not make it good?"

The theological explanation as to the non-apparent existence of the Ten-tribed House of Israel is that her sin must have been greater than that of the House of Judah (Jews), but true students of the Bible cannot accept this, for Jeremiah and Ezekiel plainly declare that "backsliding Israel hath justified herself more than treacherous Judah." By a perusal of Jer. iii. 11—18; Ezek. xvi. 46, 47, 51, 55, and xxiii. 4, 5, 11, we see that Judah's sin was greater, and her punishment must be correspondingly severe. And we are informed in the references just named that Judah can only hope to resume her former estate with God, after her sister the House of Israel has first been reinstated.

Jeremiah states that "in those days"—the latter days—when the House of Israel have fully accepted the Gospel covenant of Heb. viii.—"the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the Land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers."

As the House of Judah is still in outward communion with God—the circumcision fold before mentioned, i.e., under the curse of the law—scattered and persecuted throughout all the habitable countries of the globe (see Jer. xxiv. 8, 9), with but one exception—viz., in England and her colonies, the time of the re-occupation of Palestine is still future.

Now the justified sister kingdom of the House of Ephraim-Israel must of a necessity, as we have before seen, be in existence, or how can the House of Judah walk to that House?

As we have said, we are repeatedly told that that House is not to be found on the face of the world. Now, how comes this about? Simply because it is part of the divine plan of salvation to the ends of the earth. It comes of His ruling and guidance so that the modern Israel and the surrounding nations should be ignorant and blinded to the mighty destiny that lies before this House of Israel. Now the Holy Spirit has revealed her to many as modern Britain. But if the continental nations of Europe knew, without any doubt, that Britain would, in the future, acquire supreme dominion over them, what would be the result? She would have all these Powers allied against her, and the consequence would be that she would most likely be subdued, and kept down as a third-rate power in the world. Therefore, God has made British-Israel to lose utterly all trace of their origin; that being one of the principle questions of the present day, Are the British nation of Shemitic or Aryan origin? in order that His will might be carried out as He intends.

Now, what is His intention? It is this. "I have set thee to be a light to lighten the Gentiles." This indication shews that British-Israel must act as the evangelist of the world. And how can she carry the blessed news of salvation to the ends of the world if she has not the position and power so to do? What preserves and befriends the missionary in the foreign fields of Christain labour? Does he carry the sword, fight his way, hold his own against attack, and preach the Gospel? No. the door which has been shut, is now held open by the flag of Britain, which shields him. Her prestige has gone into those lands; and they fear her name. Her power, as evangelist, must be paramount. She must be "the head, and not the tail" of all the nations of the earth (Deut. xxviii. 13). "Therefore the kingdom of heaven shall be taken from you (the Jews) and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. xxi. 24).

The question then arises: To which of the nations can we point as first and foremost, as performing this mighty destiny? We can point to but one only—viz., the British nation. Here we clear away an obscurity which has hitherto existed, when we have read the above from St. Matthew's account of our Lord's teaching.

We may add that those Christians who hold that it is no use to bother their heads about the difference between the House of Judah and the House of Israel, are ruthlessly pushing aside one of the most important aids to an understanding of Holy Writ, without which assistance the Bible is practically a sealed book.

"The credibility of Scripture history has been established by a combination of evidence altogether incontrovertible. This is the more remarkable and satisfactory, as the Bible contains not only the most ancient records, but exclusively makes known to us the origin of all things, and the transactions of those ages, which will in vain be sought for elsewhere, or found involved only in fable. That, however, some difficulties should occur in perusing such venerable documents may easily and reasonably be conceived; but they are not such as affect their authenticity, or even weaken their evidence."

There has existed an obscurity which our teachers have not tried to dispel. This is the distinction between the letters "I" and "J" of our alphabet. If we were in the Scandinavian district, there might be some accounting for it. "I" stands for Israel, and "J" for Judah. But we have been instructed that they are one and the same. Therefore, an obscurity must exist. But I hope that the object of this paper may force the fact upon us that it is not impracticable to solve or remove it. If any difficulty remains after the fruitless efforts of sober criticism, it may fairly be imputed to want of information. A remarkable consistency and harmony characterise the historical parts of the Bible; and these should be carefully followed in this age; but many obscure parts may be made perfectly intelligible to the Bible student. A study of Jewish and Oriental antiquities will give us great light upon the subject. Josephus, among all the Jewish historians, may be cited as one of the most ancient, authentic, and interesting writers of this denomination. The weight of his testimony will be a great help to the student; for it confirms, strengthens, and illustrates the history of our Evangelists, and then opens up to our minds the true drift of the different writers of the New Testament. He also aids us in his account of the state of Judæa; the carrying away of the House of Israel to the cities of the Medes; and of the Jewish or Babylonian captivity. He also shows in a lively manner how the prophecies of our blessed Lord concerning the destruction of Jerusalem were literally fulfilled in their fullest sense.

I may conclude by saying that the study of the Bible needs persistent application. We must not expect to grasp the whole of its "hidden mysteries" in leaps and bounds. Do not be disappointed at first failures. These are always good signs. It is always the self-satisfied man who achieves nothing. Persevere day after day, ask God in full faith for renewed light, and it will not be denied you. To him who can afford to watch, wait, and pray, and is not afraid to work, success will not be denied. Little difficulties presented to us are only stepping-stones to the surmounting of others which were Himalayan in height before the passing over of these lesser difficulties. And thus strength and knowledge is given to us to grapple with others still more difficult. "Line upon line, precept upon precept; here a little, and there a little." And so our knowledge comes.

Our bodies require nourishment; so does the spirit. It is not the amount of Bible-reading that we do that nourishes the spirit for its work. It is the little that we digest. The celebrated American writer Emerson impresses upon our minds strongly that we should not forget the "atoms," and what is made by them. God does not do things by accident. He does not, as a rule, work by miracles nowadays, but performs His will by acting with and upon existing material; and so, if you take the atoms of expression made by God to the prophets regarding the Israel of "the latter days," and watch the finger of God in the progress of the nations, you will observe how gradually He builds up the empire of Israel, which He says "shall eat up the nations," and which is to eclipse in grandeur, might, and magnitude to an unknown extent that of its great predecessor Rome, by filling the whole world, as seen by Daniel; the climax of which nation will only be reached when "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him."

As I finish, a prayer arises: "May our blessing-giving God grant that blind eyes may soon be opened, the deaf ears unstopped, and understanding minds given to all hearers and readers of God's grand and glorious Book, that, as they hear and read, they may be given to know the secret place, and led to the place which He blesses with the blessing which maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow to it."

EXTRACTS FROM DR. H. GRATTON GUINNESS'S NEW WORK—"CREATION CENTRED IN CHRIST," AND SOME REMARKS THEREON.

FORWARDED BY J. S. BARTON.

PART I.

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—Some little time ago, I was reading a work by a lady named Clark, or Clarke, which contained a preface by Mr. Pember. As usual with these writers, it was full of transpositions and misapplications of the terms Israel and the Jews, and now there issues from the Press another volume by Dr. H. G. Guinness—"Creation Centred in Christ," a very important, as well as a very learned work, but alas! as usual marred by the same disfigurements, so that one might well suppose that these writers were afflicted with "Jews on the brain." I append a few examples:—

In the introduction page 35: We have "The Levitical Calendar which has regulated the religious observances of the Jewish nation for 3,500 years, is adjusted to Solar and Lunar revolutions."

This phrase—"the Jewish nation," with its cognates "the Jewish Scriptures," "the Jews" spoken of as comprising the whole of the people of Israel; and "the Jewish dispensation" (meaning the Mosaic or Levitical) in contrast to the Christian dispensation, and the New Testament Scriptures," and "the Jewish history," "the Jewish prophets and kings," meaning thereby the Old Testament history, and kings and prophets belonging to both the Houses of Israel and Judah, occur throughout the book upwards of sixty times. We adduce a few examples:—

Page 8: "The Theistic View—It has been for four thousand years the unwavering confession of the Jewish people," &c.

Page 19: "Jewish and Christian teachers have also borne similar testimony. Moses said of the Antediluvians, 'God saw,' &c. (Gen. vi. 5)," and "Jeremiah wrote twenty-five centuries ago, 'The heart,' &c. (chap. xvii. 9)."

Page 29: "The Civil history of the Jews. Sprung from a common father—a man distinguished by the purity and loftiness of his character—the Jews constitute an ancient brotherhood connected by ties of blood relationship. Early oppressed and enslaved in Egypt, they were delivered by the instrumentality of Moses, and under the leadership of his successor, Joshua, became the conquerors of the land of Canaan."

Page 30: "The religious history of the Jews. From the beginning of their existence the Jews have been monotheists. The Egyptians were polytheists, as were the Canaanites and other nations of antiquity." "While distinguished from other nations by their monotheism, and by the possession of the Mosaic law, the Jews as a nation . . . under Moses, the Judges and the Kings, openly apostatized," &c.

Page 31: "The Jewish Scriptures to which Christ appealed consisted of the Law and the Prophets."

Page 33: "The rejection of the Jews and the call of the Gentiles were both foretold in the Jewish Scriptures. Marvellous fact! that the Jews should foretell their own rejection, and the call of uncircumcised Gentiles into the kingdom of God."

Pages 35 and 36: "The Jewish Scriptures," "the Jewish law."

Page 46: "The Samaritan still lingers at Sychar; the Jew still wanders in every land." Perhaps G. G. will oblige us by telling us where the Ten-tribed Israelite is to be found?

Page 91: The Doctor quotes with high appreciation from Rev. T. D. Bernard's Bampton Lectures for 1864, saying, "Lift up your eyes on this monument of a distant age which you call the New Testament. Behold these remains of the original literature of a busy Jewish sect," &c.

Page 120: "Referring to a series of events in Jewish history, the apostle Paul says, 'all these things,' &c. (1 Cor. x. 6—11)."

Page 122: "We see it [the law of Analogy] in the family of Abraham as embracing the natural seed, or Jewish people, and the spiritual seed, or Christian Church." "The complex ritual of the Jews, the whole of their Tabernacle and Temple worship." "And the whole course of Jewish history was also typical, its Egyptian, Palestinian, Babylonian, or Captivity or Restoration periods."

Page 124: "The story of Joseph touchingly typified 'the sufferings and glories' of Christ in their Jewish and Gentile relations; while the histories of the two greatest kings of Israel, David and Solomon, notably prefigured the militant and triumphant stages in the history of Christ, the true 'King of Israel' and 'Lord of all.'" "The three great offices of Christ, His Prophetic, Priestly, and Kingly offices, were typified by the long lines of divinely appointed Jewish prophets, priests, and kings." We always understood that the priests were of the tribe of Levi, and of the house of Aaron, and should therefore style them the Aaronic Priesthood.

Yet, on the same page (124) we have: "The whole story of the redemption of Israel from Egypt was a figure of Christ's redeeming love," and again on page 129: "It is remarkable that the history of Israel which the apostle Paul tells us, was a type," &c., in both of which passages Dr. G. G. rightly discards the term Jewish, substituting for it the term Israel; and why not always? Is it from oversight or perversity? We do not forget pointing this same thing out to him ten years ago as occurring in his "Approaching End of the Age."

Page 141: We get, "similarly, in Revelation the ante-diluvian and patriarchal age was followed by the Jewish age, and that by the Christian age. The Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian dispensations are associated as stages in a general plan by their relation to the element of a revealed law," and on Page 143: "The whole course of the Jewish history from Abraham to Christ," &c., from which we are led to conclude that Abraham was a Jew! On Page 155 Dr. G. says: "the most striking contrast between Judaism and Christianity, is that between the externalism of the first and the internalism of the second . . . These two widely different methods of control are contrasted in the memorable terms of the new covenant" and then proceeds and blindly quotes Jer. xxxi. 31—34, and does not perceive the difference in vers. 31 and 33 or in its quotation in Heb. viii. 8—10.

Pages 166 and 176: We have the term Judaism used as it frequently is by writers of this stamp, meaning the Levitical economy, in contrast with the Gospel. Thus Dr. G. G. says (page 166): "In Revelation, the Old Testament is adjusted to the New, the law to the Gospel, Judaism to Christianity, so Nature is adjusted to Revelation;" and in page 176, he adduces "the adjustment of the law and prophets, and of the entire preparatory system of Judaism, to the system of Christianity, as an instance of the reign of natural law in the spiritual world." On Page 198: We have the passage which recognizes the British Isles as "a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass," and as a factor in the development of "the moral qualities of the Anglo-Saxon race." We would only remark further that the language of 2 Sam. vii. 10 is very emphatic in the Hebrew, which has been lost sight of both in A.V. and in the R.V.; it is, "And I will appoint a place 'l'ammi l'Israel,' i.e., 'for My people, for Israel,' and will plant them," &c.

Page 218: In vigorously maintaining and insisting upon the essential Deity of Christ, Dr. G. says, "Higher than the Jew, higher than the Greek, higher than the Roman, was Jesus Christ." Then again, on Page 230: We have, "Thus in Jewish history the Israelites of the first numbering fell in the wilderness, while those of the second entered the land of promise." Why Jewish history?

Page 241: We enter upon an entire section shewing "Christ to be the centre of Jewish and Christian history." Hence the declaration that "the twenty-one centuries which extended from the time of Abraham to the Roman destruction of Jerusalem comprised the entire period of the growth, maturity and decline of the Jewish nation," &c., and "since that terminal date" (A.D. 70), "the Jewish people have remained without a temple, without a prophet, without a king, without a land of their own, exiles and wanderers among the nations." Is not this quotation from Hosea just as true as concerning the "House of Israel" (excepting the "escaped of Israel"), nay, more so, seeing that it was Ephraim that was to be "the wanderers among the nations." It is British-Israelites that especially fulfil this description, as the "globe trotters" of the world; whilst out of the 10 or 12 millions of Jews said to exist to-day, at least one half or more are to be found in south-eastern Europe, not so very far away from the Holy Land. But, "the relation which Christ holds to the two streams of Jewish and Christian history," &c., and "the typical bearing of Jewish history on Christian," &c., and "the events of the two thousand years of Jewish history" previous to apostolic times. These short extracts and the following from the "Analogy between Jewish and Christian history," show how impregnated in the author's mind is the idea of the Jews being the only representatives of the Twelve Tribes, whilst those of the Ten Tribes are utterly ignored. "In order to trace the broad resemblance existing between them, we have but to mark the leading divisions of the two histories. Each falls naturally into three principal parts." "Jewish history, as extending from Abraham to Christ is divided into three leading sections by the Exodus and the Captivities. Before the Exodus the Jews were merely a Hebrew family. The Exodus from Egypt and giving of the law inaugurated the national period of their history as the people of Israel, which continued to the captivities. . . . The three names, Hebrews, Israelites, Jews, may be considered as characteristic of the development of the seed of Abraham in these three successive periods." . . . "The thousand years which followed," A.D. 70, "in Christian history, the Mediæval period (like the central thousand years in Jewish history, extending from the Exodus to the Captivities) was characterized by a general and profound apostacy."

We must apologize for this long extract, but we regard it of such an especially choice character, that we are loth to curtail it; it is the choicest in the whole volume of 536 pages. Is not the expression "Jew on the brain" fully justified by it? We wonder after reading the above quotation, how it was that the apostle made such a mistake as to address his epistle "to the Hebrews" instead of "to the Jews," especially as Dr. G. says (page 244), "the Jews suffered under heathen Egypt," and that it was "Jewish history which prepared the way for Christ's redeeming work, whilst Christian history has resulted from His coming." Clearly, these "analogies between the two histories and their contrasts should not be overlooked" (page 245).

Page 248: We are told, "Sacred Jewish and Christian history flow to and from the First Advent, and the Cross of Calvary."

On page 253: In a long quotation from Jonathan Edwards' work, "The History of Redemption," in which "Jewish history" and "the typical Jewish dispensation" occur, we cannot resist the impulse to turn aside and transcribe the following paragraph:—

"The English Revolution, which followed [the Reformation] a century later, was another important step in the progress of Christ's kingdom. The Reformation in the sixteenth century was far from complete. In England, 'the whole power of reforming heresies and errors in doctrine and worship was transferred from the Pope to the King, without any regard to the rights of synods or councils of the clergy, and without a reserve of liberty to such consciences as could not comply with the public standard.' (Neal's 'History of the Puritans,' vol. ii. p. 11). Added to this, the Stuarts were guilty of arbitrary and tyrannical misgovernment, and of endeavouring by false and foul methods to reintroduce papal rule. At this juncture God raised up Cromwell and his Ironsides to deliver the country. The fear of God made them fearless in the presence of the common foe. In those days, Windsor Castle was turned into a place of prayer, and the English Parliament became an assembly of Christian men. 'We have not allowed ourselves' said Cromwell 'the choice of one person in whom we had not this good hope, that there was in him faith in Jesus Christ, and love to all His people and saints.'"

"What a Parliament; unexampled before and since in the world," says Carlyle. Would God we had such an one now!

Page 260: We have "The order of history unfolded in Scripture is that of three principal dispensations, the Patriarchal, the Jewish, and the Christian.

Page 265: "The number 12 is prominently connected both with the Jewish nation and the Christian Church."

Page 267: "The Jews tempted God in the wilderness ten times;" whilst "the Israelites devoted to God, according to the law, the tenth part of their possessions."

THE WEALTH AND PROGRESS OF AUSTRALIA.

SPEAKING at the annual exhibition of the Royal Agricultural Society of New South Wales, Mr. John See, M.L.A., the president of the association, gave a resume of the progress of Australia, which is of special interest. He said:—"Though termed an island, Australia was a continent, with an area of over 3,000,000 square miles, or 2,000,000,000 statute acres. It was 26 times the size of Great Britain and Ireland, and 15 times the size of France. It was 50,000 miles larger than the United States, exclusive of Alaska. Australasia occupies two-fifths of the whole British Dominions, and was only one-fifth smaller than Europe. (Cheers.) The area under cultivation in 1861 was only 1,368,000 acres, in 1893 it was over 7,500,000, and besides this there are permanently under grass 10,000,000 acres. It must be borne in mind that they were yet in their agricultural infancy, only just emerging from the pastoral stage, and they awaited great results from water conservation and irrigation. In 1893 the value of their pastoral property was £253,000,000, the value of products was £40,000,000, and the value of wool exported was £24,000,000. Australia had more flocks and herds than Asia and Africa combined, or than the continent of America, including Canada, United States, Central and South America. Yet she could, under present conditions, depasture 126,000,000 more sheep than she had. The mineral wealth included gold and silver, diamonds and other precious gems, coal, tin, copper, and kerosene shale. In 41 years, ended 1892, the total value of minerals won reached the fabulous figure of £450,000,000, and the gold raised between 1851 and 1893 was valued at £355,000,000. The coal measures area exceeded 24,000 square miles, but in 1847 the output of coal was only 40,000 tons, and in 1891 it was over 4,000,000, valued at £1,750,000. The total trade in 1851 was £52,000,000, or £42 per head of population. Between 1861-92 their trade increased 260 per cent., which showed a larger ratio, compared with population than any other country. Their trade with the United Kingdom was greater than any other British possession except India, while it was more than double that of Canada, and stood fifth after the United States, France, British India, and Germany. The shipping in 1861 amounted to under 3,000,000 tons, but in 1892 it was over 17,000,000 tons. In actual tonnage Melbourne was only exceeded by London, Liverpool, Cardiff, and Newcastle; in value of trade Sydney was only exceeded by London, Liverpool, and Hull. 90 per cent. of this vast trade was in British hands. The railways in 1854 had only 2½ miles constructed, in 1861 there were 242 miles, and in 1893 these had increased to 13,000 miles, costing £120,000,000, and averaging £10,000 per mile. Their railways showed a surplus of revenue over expenditure. The result of all their facilities of communication had been to enormously increase production and accumulation. In 1871 they produced to the value of £56,000,000; in 1891, £117,000,000. From primary industries alone Australasia had more per head than was produced from the combined industries of any other country. The accumulation in 1813 of private wealth was estimated at £1,000,000; in 1863, £155,000,000; in 1890, £1,169,000,000—the last figures showing an increase of £988,000,000 in 27 years. Australasia, in wealth and income per inhabitant, stood far before any other country, the figures being—Australasia, £309 per head; United Kingdom, £246; France, £235; Belgium, £226; United States, £205. In the savings banks in 1871 there were 115,000 depositors with £3,500,000; 1881, 311,000 depositors with £9,500,000; 1891, 741,500 depositors with £19,000,000; 1893, 814,000 depositors with £22,600,000, thus giving 20 depositors per hundred of population, and showing an average of £27 per depositor, or an average of £5 8s. 6d. per head of population. These figures, taken in conjunction with the fact that one out of every four persons in Australia was a holder of property in one form or another, were significant for a country where so much was heard of the 'rich growing richer, and the poor poorer.' It was true they had a large public debt—£210,000,000, or £51 per head of population; but £198,000,000 of this had been spent on reproductive public works, such as railways, telegraphs, water supply and sewerage, harbours and rivers, and other revenue-producing works. As security for debt they had besides the railways the enormous and incalculably valuable area of one billion 205 million 156,000 acres of Crown lands neither alienated nor leased."—From the Launceston Examiner, Tasmania, April 13, 1896.

THE JEWS.

BY H. J. DYER.

WITH what respect ought we, as Christians, to look upon these people, "This peculiar people," "The Almighty's chosen people," "Israel in whom I will be glorified?" These people are only a portion of God's chosen people, now under the curse, yet as such, we owe them a debt of gratitude, because, by their fall, we as Christians are the gainers (Rom. xi. 11).

Is not our very faith, Christianity, formed by "The God-man," our Saviour Himself, a Jew? He was despised and rejected by His own, the Jews of the tribe of Judah. It was ordained by God, that the eyes of Jews were to be blinded (Rom. xi. 8), that they could not perceive it was the Son of God whom they put to death. The Almighty saw this from the beginning, to carry out His great designs. For had the Jews acknowledged the Saviour, how then could Christianity have blessed the world? "God's ways are not our ways, neither are His thoughts our thoughts." The young should have impressed upon them (say at the Sunday-schools) that the poor despised Jew is but fulfilling the work ordained of God, and should never insult one of them, but when tempted to do so, remember who was the first Christian—namely, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, a Jew of the tribe of Judah.

These very despised people, the Jews, what an influence they have had since their final fall at Jerusalem, over kings and kingdoms, yes, and still have. To their brethren Israel it was promised that they should become "a mighty nation," "a company of nations," to be "the chief of the nations," possessing the power to get wealth, also, to enable them to carry the Gospel into all lands. Great Britain and her cousins in America fulfil this command, and send the Gospel everywhere, and preach it, in its purity, as taught by the first Christian, Jesus Christ, and after His death, by His disciples.

The Jews of the tribe of Judah were not to become a nation until the "two sticks" shall have been united. But see the mercy of God towards them. He has given them also "the power to get wealth," so that the Christian has had to bow, and beg of him, as modern history will prove. Are not the Jews of to-day the great financial men in all civilized lands?

Therefore, let us respect this wonderful people. We must remember that they are a portion of God's chosen ones, a people whom the Almighty spoke with "face to face," and to them only. As the heading of that beautiful chapter, Rom. xi., says, "The Gentiles may not insult upon them." "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that cruelly and despitefully use thee." Great Britain has (as a nation) protected the Jews more than any other, admitting them to the highest honours of the land. Are we not justified in looking for this promised blessing?

I trust the day is not far distant when we shall nationally acknowledge that "We are the people the Lord has blessed, even Israel My people."

Look at that beautiful prayer in the prayer-book, composed expressly for the use of this nation, "Oh Lord, save the queen; oh Lord, show Thy mercy upon us; oh Lord, save Thy people, and bless Thine inheritance."

A REMONSTRANCE.

A FRIEND in London, begs us to correct some statements which appeared in Mr. W. Hopton's letter to the Methodist Times, but which the editor of that paper refused. Our friend begs us to make some mention that we are unable to agree with the writer when he says "the fulness of the Gentiles," refers to Turkey! because "that is simply absurd." He also demurs to Mr. Hopton's statement that Turkey must be the apocalyptic "Beast," "because the last head of the beast is in full swing after the Turkish woe is finished, and has to be destroyed by Christ but not by the British."

In reference to the above no doubt Mr. Hopton is in error according to our views, in both the points indicated, and we were aware of the fact when we published his letter. By admitting a letter into the BANNER, however, we do not adopt all our correspondent's statements or views. We know by experience that deep offence is given to our friends who ask our aid to publish their thoughts, if we proceed immediately after so doing to point out their mistakes.

Mr. Hopton's was a bold attempt to set an editor on the opposition side, right; and that effort we fully respect, though we may not agree with the writer in all the arguments he uses. "The fulness of the Gentiles" which, as an expression occurs only in Rom. xi. 25, in the New Testament refers manifestly to Gen xlviii. 19, where alone, in the Old Testament, the prophecy occurs. We do not know why Mr. Hopton holds that the Turks are "the fulness of the Gentiles," or whether the sentence in his letter is a slip which further reflection will probably correct.

Turkey, as our remonstrant says, cannot be the beast, and this Mr. Hopton must allow, we suppose, if he considers the matter.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I have been addressing large audiences in the North during the months of December, January, and February. In Forfar, on Dec. 15, the large parish Church, with accomodation for 2,000, was three-fourths filled; while, in the Congregational Church, at 11 a.m., the usual congregation listened to an address on 2 Sam. vii. 10. The Young Men's Guild at 10 a.m. (numbering about 100), got another phase of our subject, Gen. xlix. 10, "The sceptre shall not depart," &c., and on the Saturday evening I addressed an audience in the Masonic Hall, subject: "Britain at the Invasion of Julius Cæsar and the Introduction of Christianity." On Jan. 19th, I spoke in the E. U. Church in the morning, and in the Parish Church, Coupar Angus, at 6.30 (evening). About 500 or 600 were present in the evening. On Feb. 8th, I was at Peterhead, and addressed an audience of 80 or 100 in one of the halls, while on the following day (Sabbath), I began with the Young Men's Guild, at 9.45 a.m.; then in the United Presbyterian Church at 11 and 2.30, and in the Parish Church at 6 p.m., when about 1,600 to 1,800 were present. I am sure you will be pleased at the good news. If we could get a number of men to go about lecturing in the North of Scotland I would have great hopes of a speedy opening of the blind eyes. Trusting you are in good health,

I am yours, very truly,

DEAR SIR,—The following extract is from the English Mail dated Bombay, July 28th, 1895, just received, and it seems as if the peaceful absorption of the Boers is already going on, in fact, I believe, has been going on for some time. The extract confirms this:—

"FREEDOM UNDER THE BRITISH FLAG.

"The Transvaal Advertiser reports that a trek of eight families recently passed through Pretoria from the district of Wakkerstroom to Buluwayo. One of the party, on being interviewed, said that he was an old 'voortrekker,' and one of his family was a field cornet in the district of Piet Retief. He added he and his friends were in search of freedom, which they hoped to obtain under the British flag again. He also expected to join another trek ahead, of 40 families, and another from the West of the State, of 100 more families. He, moreover, stated in his own patois: 'We shall now leave the land for Oom Paul and his Hollanders. Yes, I've become poor, but Oom Paul, and I, for all that, shall die one day.' The last sentence seems to be the old man's benediction to the mighty autocrat. The trek had quite a patriarchal appearance; bearded men, laden waggons, and the girls and boys on horseback driving the stock."

THE results of Professor Petrie's excavations on the sites of funeral temples in Egypt are now on view at University College, London. Professor Petrie's greatest find was a tablet weighing five tons, dating from about the year 1200 B.C., recording the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt. A copy of the inscription is included in the exhibition.

GERMANY'S IMITATION OF BRITAIN'S COLONIAL POLICY.

WE often hear how Germany's foreign trade is eating out British commerce abroad, and that her colonial system is to be the death of ours, by and bye. It does not appear that the fatal catastrophe is likely to occur soon. The letter of an "American" in the Times of May 29th, seems to show that the Colonies of Germany are a dead failure. They fail in this important particular, that when the German Empire has succeeded in obtaining a portion of the earth which she deems suitable for her colonial purposes, such as the enormous slice of East Central Africa she has acquired, or New Guinea, she cannot prevail on her own emigrating population to go to her own proper "spheres of influence." They invariably avoid these and settle down under the British Flag, which everywhere welcomes all comers whether they be British, Germans, French, or Scandinavians. Apropos of this fact "the American" in the Times says:—"It was a telling stroke when, in the recent colonial debate in the Reichstag, Eugen Richter showed that if the few hundred bona fide German settlers in the Colonies stayed at home, the Empire could well have afforded to pay each of them the salary of the 'Provincial President,' and would have saved money by the operation!" The fact is clearly proved by "American" that the trade of Germany with her colonies is insignificant, and that what she enjoys with such poor countries as Peru, Uraguay, and Bulgaria, is much greater than that with all her colonies. But Germany's trade with "England" and the English Colonies in 1893 was as follows:—

	Imports from	Exports to
England ..	£32,870,000 ..	£33,665,000
English Colonies ..	15,105,000 ..	4,545,000
	£47,975,000	£38,210,000

The trade of Germany with her African Colonies is only 10 per cent. of her trade with all Africa, and this trade is much greater with the British Colonies than with her own. The trade of Germany with her African Colonies was in all only £515,000 that year, whereas with the Cape Colony alone it was £1,065,000. A German paper, the Economist, values the German Colonies thus:—"They are a draft of unknown amount, due upon an unknown day, and drawn upon a Bank of unknown solvency." This is a neat way of saying that the German Colonies are worth little or nothing and will probably fail in the future. The same German authority declares that the British possessions in Africa alone are better customers to Germany than all their own Colonies put together!

The following, quoted by the "American" from the German paper, the Economist, derives its value for us from the fact that it is the utterance of a German writer on the subject of the hostility the Germans exhibit respecting our policy towards the Transvaal. The quotation was this:—

The article then calls attention to the trade with the Transvaal (only £225,000 in 1894) as follows:—

"The diminutive proportions of our trade with the Transvaal are very striking. It amounts to precisely 4 per cent. of our trade with Africa, and is not so much as a tenth of 1 per cent. of our entire foreign trade. It seems very necessary to impress this fact with all earnestness upon the minds of our people and our rulers, since a part of our Press is strongly bent upon drawing us into an ugly conflict with England on account of the Transvaal. As if our trade with the Transvaal were endangered by England's policy! But that is far from being the case, for England does not maintain a protective tariff for her own benefit in a single one of her colonies. Where such tariffs exist they are directed primarily against English industry, and imports from Germany are treated upon just as favourable or unfavourable a basis as those of England; and there is not the slightest reason to believe that this state of things would be changed if England should carry out her will in regard to the Transvaal.

"A grosser over-valuation than that of the Transvaal has indeed seldom been made. The fair acquisition of the country by Germany—quite apart from its desirableness—is absolutely out of the question, for it is a most obvious fact that the Boers want as little of German as of English domination over them. They wish to be and remain free, independent Republicans, as was quite plainly expressed in Kruger's telegram to our Kaiser. Neither would England ever willingly consent to the annexation of the Transvaal by Germany; and how the thought of interfering in South African affairs by means of German Marines could ever have been entertained is to us an insoluble riddle. A war with England about the Transvaal in order to place the Transvaal in a position to refuse to the Outlanders the political rights advocated by England would indeed be absurd. If 'that little bit of Herzegovina (i.e., the Oriental question) was not worth the bones of a Pomeranian musketeer,' this is still more true of the Transvaal. An interference has perhaps never been seriously intended by German diplomacy; it has rather in view nothing more than a diplomatic intervention in favour of the independence of the Boer Republics, with which we can of course sympathize completely. The danger lies in the nagging articles in the Press on both sides. Out of diplomatic and journalistic chatter a situation may arise which permits only one of two courses—either a ridiculous retreat or a foolhardy advance. And to this result the traditional foes of Germany, who rejoice at every one of our embarrassments and would gladly deprive the Triple Alliance of the necessary flank support of the English Fleet in the Mediterranean, are contributing with assiduity."

The article closes with a warning as to the "untenableness of the views of our colonial politicians."

AN AMERICAN.

Berlin, May 15th.

Such is the plain truth regarding the value of German Colonies throughout the world, and especially in respect to Africa and the Transvaal. The Triple Alliance will one day have to meet the assault of France and Russia united. It seems a foolish policy to alienate the good will of the British-Israelites and so lose that necessary "flank support of the British Fleet" which will be needed in that evil day by the German Navy as well as by the Italian. It is a poor policy now to stir up strife between Germany and Britain about African Colonies which Germany cannot manage, even if she could obtain them, and it is perfectly certain that if she wants to dominate in the Transvaal she will have to meet the military strength of the British and the Boers combined. The situation is a peculiar one. The Germans desire to make the Transvaal their own and rule it. The Boers would resist the attempt, and so would the British and the Cape Colonies united. The Boers are equally resolved not to submit to the British. The latter are not the least desirous of seeing the Transvaal under their Flag save in respect to the Foreign Policy of the South African Republic. They mean to direct that, but to leave the country itself alone. They mean to strive to secure the Uitlanders political rights, common to all Britons, not by war but by peaceful means if they can, being sure that the Boers cannot long resist the justice of the claim. Time is on our side, as Mr. Chamberlain has often said, and we mean to trust to time. Meanwhile we may lay aside all fear of German rivalries. We welcome them as fair competitors for the trade of the world and of our own Colonies as well. They are welcome to settle wherever we have settled, in India, Africa, and Australia, on equal terms with our own people, and it will be our own fault if in that friendly rivalry they beat us on our own ground in the peaceful contests of trade and commerce. We have confidence in the energy of our race to recover ground they may lose in some directions by the alleged superior German ways of seeking for customers abroad. In the long run British energy, wealth and perseverance will conquer, because the Lord has given to our race and to ours alone "the power to get wealth," and that in order that He may establish His covenant which He sware to our fathers, as it is this day (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.). To Him be all the praise!

ISRAEL AT THE ENDS OF THE EARTH.

BY E. REEP.

HITHERTO the Egyptian monuments have furnished not a single confirmation of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt. Thus had the Jews, or House of Judah, lost their Hebrew identity as absolutely as the Ten-tribed House of Israel their existence as a people would have been deemed as fictitious as that of the Hyperboreans. It would have been said of them as it has been said of Israel, that they were astronomical myths. Says a certain writer: "Up to the present time it has been the endeavour, in which lives have been vainly spent, to follow the wanderings and settlements of the Israelites solely on the earth's surface. If the pursuers will but turn their attention to Israel in the heavens, the chances of discovery will be much increased, and there is reason to hope that we may yet come upon the missing Ten Tribes in the skies, from whence they have never descended."

Unfortunately for the cavilling sceptic and his celestial Israelites, there has been discovered in Egypt an inscription which speaks of a bonâ fide historical Israel and scatters mere hypothetical conjecture on the subject to the winds. Writing in the May number of the Contemporary Review, Mr. Flinders Petrie tells of his latest and most valuable find amongst Egyptian antiquities. First remarking that until this spring there had been no trace in Egypt to show that any descendants of Jacob ever existed, he says that at last an inscription specifically naming the people of Israel and their defeat by king Merenptah, the son of Rameses the Great, has come to light, giving us the only Egyptian mention of the race, and the earliest certain allusion to any historical connection with them on any monument or record outside of the Old Testament. In dealing with certain passages of the inscription, Mr. Petrie thinks that we are not by any means justified in supposing that there were no descendants of Israel in Palestine between their migration to Egypt and the invasion of Canaan. A people who were so incessantly at feud with one another—the brethren of Joseph and Aaron, of Korah, the slayers of Benjamin, the children of Gideon—are not at all likely, he says, to have held together on all occasions, and never to have had family differences and separations. Such a "stiff-necked and rebellious" people could scarcely hold together for many centuries and migrate to and fro as one body, without some split being likely to occur. Again, in Mr. Petrie's opinion, another probability is that a part of the Israelites in Egypt may have returned to Canaan soon after the famine. That they travelled there readily is shown by the burial of Jacob at Machpelah (Gen. l. 13). In short there is no evidence that they all remained in Egypt until the Exodus.

Seeing that the growth of Israel was to be the blessing of the world, the expansion of the chosen race, even in the earliest times, should neither surprise nor perplex us. In fact the obligation to colonize lay at the very root of Israel's selection as a divine people, it being part of God's purpose to sow her in the earth (Hos. ii. 23). Very curiously, Coleridge, in his "Table Talk," imposes on Britain this very same obligation which was to cause Israel to occupy the desolate heritages (Isa. xlix.) and to spread abroad north, south, east, and west (Gen. xxviii. 14). Thus he says: "Colonization is not only a manifest expedient, but an imperative duty on Great Britain. God seems to hold out his finger to us [British] over the sea." As Coleridge regarded everything in Hebrew history as prospective and preparatory, or typical of something yet to come, the wonder is that he did not recognise in Britain's special function to colonize her Identity with Israel; that God is answering through her the desire of the Christ to have the heathen for an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession (Psa. ii. 8). Notwithstanding, however, his blindness to the Hebrew origin of his British countrymen, he has discerned that the Avesta, the sacred book of the Zoroastrians, has been largely derived from the writings of Moses. Herein, in the Hebrew likeness so perceivable in Zoroastrian theology, we have further proof of the dispersion of Hebrews, more particularly of the Northern Israelites deported to Media and Persia, 720 B.C.

The consciousness possessed by the Hebrews that they were to inherit the earth could but show itself in attempts to colonize; the supremacy of the world meant removing unto the ends of it. And thus the main belief running through the Scriptures is that all the ends of the world are subject to God and shall acknowledge Him (Psa. xxii. 27). It was doubtless the future expansion of the race that moved the kinsfolk of Rebekah to bless her and to say unto her, "Thou art our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the Gate of those which hate them." Abraham, it is certain, held the same exalted conceptions of the distribution of his descendants, since he believed that in the posterity of Isaac all the families of the earth were to be blessed.

In his native city the patriarch must have had every opportunity of learning the names and other particulars of the most distant countries. "Ur of the Chaldees," the port of Babylonia, like most maritime towns, was the home of various nationalities, who naturally imported with their commercial commodities stirring accounts of their journeys, both by land and sea, as well as their religious notions and customs. Hence we can well understand that Ur was a city of idols in which flourished the astrologer, the stargazer, and the moon-worshipper. Many of these coming from India, Arabia, Ethiopia, and Egypt, the civilization and wealth of those countries would be a matter of common knowledge. As a "mighty prince" in Canaan, Abraham had a still more enlarged acquaintance with the government and affairs of foreign nations. It is therefore not improbable that when he sent forth the sons of Keturah and of his concubines eastward, India was one of the countries he desired them to colonize. We seem to have fairly good evidence of such a migration in Indian mythology and in the names of the deified Brahma and his wife Saravadi. In the Hindu code, too, Priestly sees some of the more extraordinary laws and customs of the Hebrews, citing in particular the practice of polygamy, the purchase of the wife and a man taking the widow of his brother. The Hindus have also the record of a Deluge and the story of the Fall, telling of the promised seed of the woman which shall bruise the serpent's heel, whence the incarnation and worship of Krishna. It is because there is so much in Christianity that presents a striking similarity to what is to be found in the religions of India and Persia that M. Burnouf says, the question we have no right to shirk is, "How can this similarity be explained?" Our rites, symbols, which few of us understand, are all to be found set forth in the Veda in almost the same terms as those used by us.*

The question, "How can this similarity be explained?" was quite recently put before a meeting of the Royal Society of Literature, by Prof. Max Müller, the Lord Chancellor presiding. From Lord Halsbury's remarks he appears to have been somewhat shocked at the "coincidences" pointed out by the learned Orientalist. The professor's assertion that nothing remained but to admit a real historical intercourse between the East and the West failed to commend itself to the Lord Chancellor's judgment. He for one declined to place fables dug out of the mysteries of Buddhism against the Gospel narrative, nor would he admit that the latter had been borrowed, as had been hinted.

We have only to notice Lord Halsbury's protest against Prof. Müller's coincidences in as far as it expresses the current idea that Hebrews, Brahmins, and Buddhists arrived at their religious conceptions independently of each other. There is too great a resemblance between Indian and Cabbalistic theosophy to allow of such a supposition. The Hebrews of the far away past were quite as saturated with pantheistic beliefs as any Hindu system; and so long as there is reason to believe that a large maritime trade was carried on between the Accadian—Semitic peoples of Assyria and India, and that the Hebrews of Palestine were fully aware of the importance and wealth of the Indian gold-fields, and thus familiar with the country, it is impossible to suppose that the fundamental doctrines of the great religions of the East were not derived from a Semitic source. Moreover, if it be that the Sacæ or Sakas of India were Israelites of the Dispersion we have a comparatively late Hebrew colonization of India. Prof. Max Müller has deemed it unwise to commit himself to any positive opinion as to the nationality of the Sakas. Many theories, he says, have been started as to their relationship with other races. Owing to a similarity between their Chinese name,† Yueh-chi, and the Gothi, or Goths, it has been conjectured that they were of the same stock as the Getæ (the Danes of English history), and the Goths of Germany. It is also affirmed that there is strong evidence of an early and intimate connection between the Zoroastrians of Media and Persia and the peoples on the banks of the Indus. In brief we may look forward to some such discovery being made in India as Mr. Petrie has made in Egypt. We shall then have better reasons than ever for making ourselves a blessing in our Indian Empire; for performing our duty, and for carrying out that high mission which Bishop Barry declares is certainly given in a very signal degree to the English-speaking race.

When the House of Jacob went out of Egypt, Judah was God's sanctuary and Israel His dominion (Psa. cxiv.). God has not changed the destiny of His people; Israel is still His dominion, and in Judah is His name revered. "Thus saith the Lord, the people which were left of the sword found grace in the wilderness; even Israel when I caused him to rest." "Again will I build thee and thou shalt be built, O virgin of Israel. . . . . Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria: the planters shall plant, and shall eat them as common things" (Jer. xxxi.). The British have seventy-five per cent. of the commerce of the world; they possess all temporal blessings as common things; they allow the stranger to participate in their prosperity: they let the oppressed go free; they endeavour to break every yoke. Ergo they are Israel.

EXTRACTS FROM DR. H. GRATTON GUINNESS'S NEW WORK—"CREATION CENTRED IN CHRIST," AND SOME REMARKS THEREON.

PAGE 268: "The 15th of Nisan might happen on any day of the week, and coincided periodically with the Jewish Sabbath." "While the Jewish people for more than three thousand years kept the seventh day of the week, the Christian Church for nearly two thousand years has observed the first day of the week as the day of sacred rest and worship."

Page 269: "The 24 elders of the Apocalypse (12 + 12) are apparently representative of the Jewish and Christian bodies united in the kingdom of God."

Page 271: "The series of revealed Redemption Times, Patriarchal, Jewish and Christian, is one of Weeks on various scales."

Page 272: "For three thousand five hundred years the Jews as a nation have observed the week of days, resting every Sabbath from secular toils, according to Divine command."

Page 273: "Upon pain of death all leaven was, during this period [the days of unleavened bread] to be put away from Jewish dwellings (Ex. xii.)." "The week, with its concluding Sabbath, is therefore deeply engraven in a variety of ways on the whole Jewish ritual and history. Nor on Jewish history alone."

Page 274: "Thus in every Jewish year there occurred not only a series of weeks of days, each with its concluding Sabbath, but a week of weeks, with its closing Pentecostal celebrations, full of hidden hopes of resurrection experiences." "The sacred portion of the Jewish year, therefore, or its complete calendar, occupied a week of months."

Page 275: "Thus the period marked off for holy convocations from the Jewish year, was septiform in character."

Page 276: "Here was a law perfectly harmonious with the order of sacred seasons observed by the Jews." Yet on the same page, Dr. G. speaks of the Mosaic ritual, and on the next of Levitical times. Why not so throughout?

Page 278: "It was predicted by Jeremiah, that in consequence of their inveterate idolatry, Israel should be carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar." Indeed!! we understood that Israel had been carried captive by Assyria a century before Nebuchadnezzar was born. Again, "A dark and terrible week to Judah were those seven decades; the daughters of Israel (sic) hung their harps upon the willows by the rivers of Babylon, and wept as they remembered Zion." And

Page 279: "Had Israel [Judah is meant] known the day of her visitation, and received her Messiah when He appeared, &c. . . . Its seventh day included His atoning death, His triumphant resurrection, and the descent of the Holy Ghost; the rejection of Israel [Judah is meant] the destruction of their temple, and the first gathering-in of the Gentiles." Why all this inversion of Israel and Judah? Again on same page—"This gigantic week includes the entire 'Times of the Gentiles,' during which supreme power on earth is by God committed to Gentiles instead of Jewish rulers."

Page 281: "The Jew is born in the Abrahamic house; the Gentile has been bought with money; 'Ye are bought with a price.' The typical ordinance of circumcision, that outward token of participation in the Abrahamic covenant of grace, was appointed to be observed on the eighth day, the first day of the second week in the life of the Jewish child [boy]. For four thousand years the Jewish nation has scrupulously kept the letter of this law."

Page 284: "Thus Judaism [the Mosaic economy] with its septenary chronology looked forward in its octave terminal ordinance, to a higher state of things, linked with the advent of Christ, and with the coming and gift of the Holy Ghost."

Page 285: "The periods of Redemption chronology include Patriarchal, Levitical, and Prophetic times (the latter containing both Jewish and Gentile elements) the whole being centred in historic times connected with Messianic or Christian history."

Page 286: "The translation of Enoch in the days of the patriarchs, of Elijah in Jewish times, and the future translation of 'those who are alive and remain to the coming of the Lord' in this Christian age, are analogous events connected with the three great dispensations measuring the course of history." Elijah was a prophet to Israel, and had nothing to do with Judah that we read of; then why this juggling with the terms Israel and Judah? Again on page 287, we meet with other instances of this mixing of terms and peoples, as "With the Exodus of Israel began a new order of times." Good. "The most notable and important fact here is that the institution of the Passover ordinance, and contemporaneous Exodus of Israel from Egypt," &c., and "The times of the three greatest events in the New Testament, the death of Christ, His resurrection, and the advent of the Spirit, were annually prefigured in the types of the Levitical calendar for sixteen centuries before their actual occurrence, and have been unwittingly commemorated by the whole Jewish nation in their annual observances, during the eighteen centuries which have elapsed since the founding of Christianity." Again, on same page, "Levitical calendar" and "Jewish people," meaning Israel.

On page 292, Dr. Guinness proceeds to show the "Scientific Basis of the Chronology of the Four Empires." From this point all is intricate and often abstruse astronomical calculations and deductions, into which it is not our intention to follow him. One great omission, however, is apparent—viz., the recognition of the fifth or stone kingdom of Dan. ii., which was to be "set up in [during] the days of those kings [or dynasties]," which Dr. G. makes so much of in all his writings. This fifth, or stone kingdom, can hardly be the Christian Church, which was not, according to the teaching of persons of Dr. G.'s school of interpretation, begun to be "built" until after the utterance of Matt. xvi. 18 by Christ, and yet this kingdom was to be "set up" during the existence of the Babylonian, Medo-Persian and Greek dominions which had already passed away at the time of Christ's enunciation. Will Dr. Guinness explain this? and tell us where that kingdom was set up, since it is significant that it was begun to be set up, just about, or a little subsequent to the time of the carrying away captive of the "House of Israel" or Khumri, i.e., Omri (Samaria).

On page 303, we read, "Reckoned from B.C. 457, the prophetic '70 weeks' of years coincided with Jewish weeks of years, their dates being gathered from the testimony of Josephus. Sir Isaac Newton says of the '70 weeks' as reckoned from B.C. 457, 'The 70 weeks of years are Jewish weeks, ending with Sabbatical years, which is very remarkable; '" and on page 312, we again have the expression "Jewish prophets," whereas on the next page we read, "Thus closed His [our Lord's] 3½ years' ministry to Israel."

Page 323: We have again "the Jewish calendar" and "the Jews" in connection with "the higher Levitical and prophetic times."

On page 335, we get, "Glancing first at the Jewish dispensation, which extended from the birth of Abraham to the advent of Christ," &c., and "The 400 years which followed, measuring the childhood of the Jewish people, or their history as a family up to their emergence as a nation at the Exodus," &c., and further on, on same page, we have again "the 2,000 years of the Jewish dispensation" although in a few lines previously, we read "The 1,650 years from the Exodus of Israel to the advent of Christ," &c.

Page 336: "The history and chronology of the Jewish and Christian dispensations," &c., and the "The times of Christian history, like those of Jewish," &c; and "The Christian dispensation is the antitype of the Jewish," &c. A little further on Dr. G. says, "The 1,260 years of prophecy are the 37 years central eclipse period in the Babylonian captivity (period of the captivity of Jehoiachin), enlarged thirty-three fold; and the 1,335 years of prophecy are the 40 years Wilderness period enlarged on the same scale." We wonder he does not explain also the 40 years of bearing "the iniquity of the House of Judah," and the 390 years of the bearing "the iniquity of the House of Israel" mentioned by Ezekiel in chapter iv. 3—6.

Page 344: We have "the Jews" and "the Jewish calendar" twice over mentioned.

Page 348: We read that, "the times of the four empires of Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, which conjointly constitute the 'times of the Gentiles,' or the times of Gentile dominion co-temporaneous with Jewish subjection, dispersion and desolation . . . the life period of the great 'Image' of Gentile sovereignty (Dan. xi.), as measured from the Babylonian era of Nabonassar" (moon of Feb. 26, B.C. 747). On Page 359: We read of a "natural and a spiritual Israel," and a very important piece of information—viz., "The 400 years of Israel in Egypt were doubtless measured by Egyptian years; and the primitive or Egyptian year consisted of 365 days." Does this reconcile the seeming discrepancy of the 400 years of Gen. xv. 13, and Acts vii. 6, and the 430 years of Exod. xii. 40? "In 400 equable [Egyptian] years the number of days is 14,600." On Page 362: We have "the Jewish [Mosaic] dispensation," whilst on Page 365: Dr. G. rightly uses the term, "In the history of Israel." Why not always discriminate thus?

On page 378, we read, "From the Nabonassar era 150 solar years measured the period of the two captivities (Israel and Judah) to the Ezekiel date, B.C. 598." We confess we are unable to understand this on comparing it with Ezek. iv. 3—6.

On page 379, Dr. Guinness gives the date of the Exodus as B.C. 1622. Prof. Sayce gives it as occurring under the reign of Maneptah, son of Ramses II., B.C. 1281 to 1262 (see "The Higher Criticism and the Monuments," page 245). This is a wide difference truly.

At page 397, he characterises the "Old Roman Empire" as "the mightiest the world has ever seen." In the face of the British Empire of to-day, we demur to this description.

On pages 438, 439, 442, 443, 446, 494, we have the expressions "Jewish ordinances," "Jewish times," "Jewish, i.e., Old Testament history," "the childhood of the Jewish nation," all of which we have sufficiently noticed already, perhaps too often.

In taking our leave of Dr. Guinness's book, we are bound to acknowledge the (with the exception of the above blemishes) pleasure, and we trust, profit we have received from it, with astonishment at the voluminousness of the calculations made in the tables given. Our author regards the dates A.D. 1897 and 1924 as probably being critical years in the history of the world. Those who live until then will be the best able to judge of the justness of these forecasts. Meanwhile be it ours to be found "looking for and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, being found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless in His sight" (2 Peter iii. 12—14, R.V.). Amen.

"THE SPECTATOR" ON THE RETURN OF THE JEWS.

In the Spectator of Feb. 29th, there appeared an article on Mr. Holman Hunt's proposal for the return or "Restoration of the Jews," which has been going the round of the papers. The admissions and the opinions of the Spectator are equally remarkable. The latter are opposed to the Scriptures, of course, and are of the earth, earthy as they can be. The writer of the article confesses to "a feeling" that the Jews should be restored to Palestine, as so many Christians desire; and thinks that a sufficient reason for the vague wish may be found in the natural desire "to see another chapter opened in what we must all acknowledge, whether we believe or disbelieve, to be a wonderful and most separate history." The idea that the Jews are to return to their own land is described by the writer as if it were the Jews "own idea of their own destiny," ignoring the existence of the Bible and its prophecies on the subject, where the future fact is as clearly revealed to be God's fixed purpose as anything in the Holy Book.

The Spectator makes it quite clear to all its readers that it has no faith at all in such Jewish myths. It does not believe that Palestine is to become "a new and vaster Tadmor," "or treasure house of the world." The writer says "he would not crook a finger to accelerate such a peculiarly earthly consummation" as the Restoration! "He does not care one straw whether there are or are not banks in Jerusalem or quays and stevedores in Joppa." There are enough of these in London and New York! He declares "that God is not the God of one little division of this planet," and that if a Jew has any message to deliver he can deliver it in London or New York, just as well as at Jerusalem. Declaring that he is entirely favourable to any project for the Restoration of the Jews, the writer adds in his scoffing way, that "the world and the Jews will get on, though every such project failed." In all this of course one sees that the Spectator ignores the Scriptural account, which is God's revealed purpose, in regard to the Restoration of the Jews; that it does not care much whether it takes place or not, but that if it does not, it does not much matter if the project fails!

Mr. Holman Hunt, of course, is just as much in error as the Spectator as to the character of the true return and restoration of the Jews. He, like the journalist, believes that the Return is for the Jews only, whereas the testimony of Isa. xviii. 1—7; Jer. iii 18, xxiii. 6—8; Ezek. xxxvii. 1—28; Hosea i. 10, 11; Zech. x. 6—12, and other texts, is to the effect that Israel and Judah together, but not Judah alone, will be the parties to the return of the tribes; that the return will be a vast blessing to the whole world, acting on them as "life from the dead" (Rom. xi. 15), and that the return will be accompanied by such prosperity to the returning tribes that it will be quite unparalleled (Jer. xxxiii. 7—9). How is it that the Spectator turns his back on all these glorious promises and puts his own personal opinions and surmises in the place of plainly revealed determinations of "The God of Israel," which He claims to be for ever?

The united error in all these visionary schemes of Mr. Holman Hunt, the Spectator, and the vast majority of the clergy of the present day, is their stubborn refusal to acknowledge Israel as separate from Judah, or the Jews, and their often repeated mistake that all the Jews are Israelites, and that there are no Israelites now extant apart from the Jews. This is the stumbling block of the Spectator, and in the face of this initial error we cannot wonder that the journalist has fallen head-long into the mistake that the Holy Land will be the portion of the Jews only, whereas in Ezek. xlviii. we find that God Himself will direct the apportionment of the land by lot to the Twelve Tribes by name, a reservation being made in favour of the Levites as the ministerial tribe, who have a one-thirteenth portion granted to them. While we write in this strain respecting Mr. Holman Hunt's and the Spectator's views regarding the restoration of the Jews, we cannot but recognise the fact which we suppose their efforts are intended to facilitate, that there will indeed be a false return of the Jews alone to the land, in which the latter will lay claim to the whole, in the very spirit of their ancestors' conduct towards the House of Josesph, as recorded in Ezek. xi. 15, R.V. To them, the then inhabitants of Jerusalem said in those days, "Get you far from the Lord; unto us is this land given for a possession." What God's reply was to this ambitious and selfish demand appears in verse 16, 17. He promised to be "a sanctuary for a little while (to the Ten Tribes), "in the countries where they are come," and then to gather them from the peoples and assemble them out of the countries where they have been scattered, in order to give them the land of Israel which the Jews desired then, as now, to usurp.

The secular writers of the day insist upon it that Palestine is for the Jews only, and that that will be sure to meet the general approval of the Powers of Europe! But they never reflect that the Jews represent only one of the Twelve Tribes and that the House of Joseph, or the eleven tribes, as the stronger, is appointed to conduct the Jews to their inheritance and with them to enter on exclusive possession when God's time arrives (Jer. iii. 18; Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28). Men's ignorance respecting the existence of Ephraim at the present day, would be astonishing were it not clear that their mistake is answering the purposes of God in hiding His people till the appointed time. He has not forgotten His chosen ones, however, but means publicly to acknowledge them before the world to the glory and praise of His faithfulness and truth. To Him let Israel give all the praise!

No 16 of "Our Race" Series is now issued, and is a thick volume of 400 pages. The title is: "The Fall of Jerusalem, and the Scattering of the Holy People. First Century, A.D." The price is 2s. 6d., as usual. If to be forwarded by post 3d. extra should be sent.

WHY?—A CONJECTURE.

By L. P.

It has been a wonder and an astonishment that comparatively little advance has been made in the last quarter of a century in the joyful acknowledgment of Our Identity with Israel. It is the more remarkable, considering how, in these latter days, great researches have been made, to discover the causes more or less remote of circumstances and events, together with a tendency to dive into mysteries and to dally with the marvellous.

In spite of proofs brought forward to corroborate our belief, indifference, opposition, and a scornful rejection are rife as ever, together with a wilful ignorance of the matter.

Now we would ask, why may we suppose this is allowed to be, when the natural expectation would have been that the glorious truth would have run like wild fire through every class, exciting an exultant joy? May it not be, that we are not yet ripe for the news as a nation? That if it were generally accepted, it might lead to too much assurance of the great part we are to play on the earth, to presumption, to over-bearing insolence instead of grateful humility, to indifference to our national sins, and to other grave consequences. May it not be that our Lord wills to keep the veil unlifted, lest we should be dazzled and led astray by the great light before we have been prepared for its reception by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Isa. xliv. 3; Joel ii. 28, 29; Acts ii. 17, 18).

When that glorious, promised gift is received by our multitudes, when drunkenness no longer abounds, sinking thousands of thousands of miserable beings into unutterable woe, when indecency, licentiousness, and immorality cease to degrade our towns, and blight our country at home, and our Empire everywhere, when idolatrous and atheistical teachings are heard no more, lifting up their voices to the destruction of souls, when blasphemy is exchanged for praise and thanksgivings, by the influence of God's Spirit—then—but possibly not before—may we believe that the darkness that is in part blinding Israel, may be removed. Then shall our trust no longer be in ourselves, but in the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and David, whose faithfulness to His promises has led us through times of trial, darkness and degradation, and set us up on high among the nations.

Let our prayers, fellow-believers in Our Identity, be frequent, urgent, filled with the fire of a living, burning faith, for the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on ever sinful Israel, and then, ah! then what a glorious revelation concerning us may burst upon the nations.

"THE DESERT SHALL REJOICE AND BLOSSOM AS THE ROSE" (Isa. xxxv. 1, R.V.)

An article in the Pall Mall Gazette of June 15, 1896, illustrates the prophecy in Isa. xxxv. 1, R.V, as set out above, in respect to the marshes of Lincolnshire and the swamps of Eastern Britain, reclaimed by the hands of our forefathers, and now "rejoicing and blossoming like the rose." We transfer the article to our own columns, as it gives an interesting account of the "making of the marshes," and shows how God permitted our forefathers to reclaim our land from the sea and make it fit for the habitation of the millions who now occupy a part of it. The following is the paper:—

"THE MAKING OF THE MARSHES.

"Mingling with the hamlet folk who live on the marshland borders, one sometimes wonders how many of them are aware of the vast change that has taken place in the low-lying levels that stretch away from their village rise to a wide, unbroken horizon. Yet these fenny flats, over which the curlew cries and where in earlier days the bittern boomed, have a history as sturdy and stirring as have the scenes of many a stubborn defence and hard-fought battlefield. They, too, have seen the waging of a weary war, the fighting of a fearless foe, the strivings of a ceaseless siege. The fight was an unequal one, and not of man against man, but of men contending against the greatest natural force that could threaten their hearths and homes. For they were pitted against the sea, and often their only bulwark of defence was the frail barrier of drifted sandhills that lies along the shore. In the end the victory was with the weak, and the wide, wild wastes which were given up to the wildfowl and the winds were reclaimed and transformed into flowery meads and pleasant pasture lands, drained by silvery streams and winding rivers. Many successive generations strived to bring about this end, but passed away without witnessing its fulfilment. At times, they seemed within a measurable distance of seeing its accomplishment; but again and again the swelling waves of the North Sea swept away their dams and embankments, and won back the wastes that were almost won. Death and devastation, ruin and desolation, often waited on the flooding tides of a western wind, fear and flood often followed a sudden storm. But the reward came at last, and was well worth the waiting. Men of a later day reaped the fruits of their forefathers' fighting and failure; peace and plenty were the outcome of panic and pain.

"It was the Roman conquerors of the Iceni of East Anglia who first recognised the possibility of transforming the ooze flats and sedgy swamps of Eastern Britain into tracts of land suitable for camps and cultivation. Until the arrival of their invincible legions, the ancient inhabitants of the district had done nothing to save themselves from the inroads of the sea. From the shelter of the bordering woods, they had ventured out in their crazy coracles to fish the silent meres and snare the waterfowl in the beds of reeds. Ancient records relate that at that time England was little broader between the Fens and the Severn than it is to-day between Berwick and the Solway, and that portions of six counties — Lincolnshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, and Northamptonshire—were flooded at every flow of the tide. To meet the difficulties of military purposes and to put a stop to the wasting influence of the waves, the Romans set the captured Britons to work at laying down causeways and building banks between the salt marshes and the sea.

"After the departure of the Romans, and until after the Norman Conquest, little was done to carry on the work so well begun. But during the mediæval period, from 1189 to 1603, large tracts of swamp were reclaimed and great advances made in the direction of draining the lowlands. About the middle of the seventeenth century a great Fenland drainage scheme was projected and completed, but proved inadequate to cope with the vast body of flood water and the daily tidal flow. To help to contend against this difficulty, horse-mills were placed near the river banks 'for the speedier cleansing and scouring of the drains.' At the end of the first quarter of the eighteenth century, these horse-mills were replaced by windmills, many of which, erected about this time, are still to be seen on the marshland. Most of them were constructed with the ordinary undershot wheels, and bear considerable external resemblance to the old-fashioned mills for grinding corn. Others were of simpler structure, consisting of four sails on a kind of skeleton frame, and from their gaunt and fragile appearance were, and are still, called skeleton or butterfly mills. These mills, dotted here and there about the wide expanse of the marshes, give a singularly Dutch aspect to the scene. With their low black towers and shattered sails spread out like spectral arms against the pale background of the dawn or sunset, they have a weird and striking look, and suggest some grim, primeval monsters struck motionless in the midst of the marshes. Except for the red-brown sails of the wherries on the winding waterways, they are often the only outlines which break the level line of the horizon.

"Flat and almost featureless as are these East Anglian marshes, they have a charm and beauty peculiarly their own. Something of

> The silence that is in the starry sky,
> The sleep that is amongst the lonely hills, broods over their sunlit levels and lingers where the bream bubbles rise and the lily pads float on the mirrors of the meres. As Kingsley said of the Fens, 'they have a beauty as of the sea, of boundless expanse and freedom. Much more had they that beauty eight hundred years ago, when they were still, for the most part, as God had made them, or was making them even then. . . . Overhead the arch of heaven spread more ample than elsewhere, as over the sea; and that vastness gave, and still gives, such cloudlands, such sunrises, such sunsets, as can be seen nowhere else within these isles.' When the spring has freed the ice-fettered rivers and the warm winds have thawed the frozen earth, the meadows show a wealth of colour, and summer sees them decked with blossoms of every hue. After the cutting of the rustling reeds that swayed their feathery tops along the river banks to the mournful moaning of the winter winds, the riverside ponds become gardens of flowers, where, amid the rushes and sedges, bloom the frail, pink flowers of the ragged robin and, later on, the yellow corn-flag and the purple water-iris. All along the river courses the air is made musical with the song of the sedge-warbler, which must have learned some of its notes from the bubbling brooks, for its rippling trills are in unison with the gurgling eddies, the sibilant whisper of the reeds and sedges, and the swirling of the streams.

"Even in the depths of winter, when the inlets and river reaches are locked up in manacles of ice, the marshland meads and meres are not left silent in their solitude. Then is the wild life most abundant, and the piping and crying of the wild birds sound around the misty ooze flats of the tidal estuaries, and from the darkness of gloomy, starless nights. The flightshooter treads the river walls, and hides and seeks along the margins of the meres. The otter creeps out from under the rugged roots of the bordering woods, and dives for bream beneath the thin, wind-laid ice. Then, too, the decoy men work the pipes of the larger broads, and carry on their wholesale capture of duck, widgeon, and teal. Often during the winter, wherries are frozen up at some inland staithe, or are kept above the bridges by the rise of the rain floods, and the wherrymen spend their time and money at the hamlet and ferry inns. There, tales are told of the mist wraiths of the meadows and the marsh fires that flicker o'er the sedgy swamps. For the marshland has its own folklore and fairy tales, and the marshlanders of old peopled it with apparitions as weird and wild as the 'Crulande devils' which were seen by the fever-striken fenmen around Croyland.

"Although a 'new earth' has been made of the wild wastes once open to the sea, there are few places within the borders of our land which the irresistible tide of modern life has so failed to alter by its ever-widening flow. Here and there the railway has encroached, and of late years the holiday-seeker has sailed the marshland streams in quest of new scenes and methods of enjoyment. But these have wrought little change in its familiar features; the 'murmur of living, stir of existence' hardly beat upon its borders, and only the absence of a few of the rarer birds have resulted from alien incursions. The wherries still sail slowly between the coast and the inland towns; the eel-catcher's houseboat still lingers in the reedy creek; the fisherman and the wild-fowl-shooter still seek their livelihood where the forefathers fished and shot before them. Much of the far-stretching meadow land is yet practically untrodden soil, and the chance wanderer there may feel that he is breathing an air of primeval purity. Rest and seclusion may be found there in a degree unknown in the wasting woodlands and on the surf-swept shore."

"PASS IT ON."

"THE London Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews" has issued a small leaflet, entitled "Pass It On," intended for "The Children's Beehive For Israel." We reproduce it in the BANNER, not because we can concur with all the views of the writer in regard to the people of the House of Judah to whom he (or she) believes the privilege of publishing the Gospel to all nations was committed, but because he (or she) is unaware that the children of Israel were divided into two nations, but deems that the Jews being Israel, Israel were and are now synonymous and identical with the Jews. In short, that there was no difference between the two peoples. We quote the tractate first, and reserve our remarks till the reader has digested it. It is as follows:—

"'PASS IT ON.'

"I remember coming across an account of an incident in the life of a very earnest worker for God, which interested me deeply; and it is so plain and practical in its teaching that I want our young friends (aye, and old friends too) to read the story for themselves, so that what stirred me so greatly, may perhaps stir them as well. Thus it runs:—

"Once, when I was a schoolboy going home for the holidays, I had a long way to go to reach the town in which I dwelt. I arrived at Bristol, and got on board the steamer with just money enough to pay my fare; and that being settled, I thought in my innocence I had paid for everything I needed in the way of meals. I had what I wanted so long as we were in smooth water; then came the rough channel crossing. I had been lying in my berth for hours, wretchedly ill and past caring for anything, when there came the steward and stood beside me.

"'Your bill, sir,' said he, holding out a piece of paper.

"'I have no money,' I said, in my wretchedness.

"'Then I must trouble you for your name and address.'

"I told him. Instantly he took off the cap he wore, with a gilt band about it, and held out his hand. 'I should like to shake hands with you,' he said.

"I gave him my hand and shook his as well as I could. Then came the explanation—how that, some years before, some little kindness had been shown his mother by my father in the sorrow of her widowhood.

"'I never thought the chance would come for me to repay it,' said he pleasantly, 'but I am glad it has.'

"'So am I,' said I.

"As soon as I got ashore I told my father what had happened.

"'Ah,' said he, 'see how a bit of kindness lives! Now he has passed it on to you. Remember, if you meet anybody that needs a friendly hand, you must pass it on to him.'

"Years had gone by. I had grown up and quite forgotten it all, until one day I had to go to the station of one of our main lines. I was just going to take my ticket when I saw a youngster crying—a thorough gentleman he was—yet trying to keep back the troublesome tears, as he pleaded with the booking clerk.

"'What is the matter, my lad?' I asked.

"'If you please, I haven't enough money to pay my fare. I want but a few pence, and I tell the clerk if he will trust me I will be sure to pay him.'

"Instantly flashed upon me the forgotten story of long ago. Here, then, was my chance to pass it on.

"I gave him the sum needed, and then I told him the story of long ago, and of the steward's kindness to me.

"'Now, to-day,' I said, 'I pass it on to you; and remember, if you meet any one who needs a kindly hand, you must pass it on to him.'

"'I will, sir, I will!' cried the lad, as he took my hand, and as his eyes flashed with eagerness.

"I reached my destination, leaving my young friend. The last sign I had of him was the handkerchief fluttering from the window of the carriage, as if to say, 'It's all right, sir; I will pass it on.'

"As I read the story, my thoughts were carried back to a time many, many centuries ago, when God chose out a certain people, gave them many blessings, committed to them His oracles in the shape of the Holy Scriptures, and sent them forth, charging them to 'Pass them on' to other nations. Nor was that all. He 'saw that the wickedness of man was great upon the earth,' and so, through this same nation, 'in the fulness of time God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that He might redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons;' and He charged them, 'Ye shall be witnesses unto Me in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth.' So this people 'passed on' to other nations the glad tidings that 'God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that all that believe in Him should not perish but have everlasting life.'

"But alas! while other nations gladly receive the blessing thus 'passed on' to them, this people rejected it, and to this day 'when Moses is read in their synagogues, the vail is upon their hearts.' Now can we not, ought we not to 'pass on' to them the blessings which through them have come to us? Oh! dear young Christian friends! You who know St. Paul as the apostle of the Gentiles, as the Israelite who has boldly proclaimed the riches of the Gospel among the nations, and earnestly defended the liberty of 'those who were afar off,' think how he speaks of, deals with, and prays for the Jew, from whom he never separated himself, and whose God-given privileges he energetically maintained. To be imbued with his spirit, to be of the same mind with St. Paul, to wrestle with God for Israel, and to plead with Israel for the King of the Jews—try this earnestly and prayerfully, and obtain the answer in the blessing which God most assuredly will give you. May the determination of each one of us be that of the parting cry from the railway-train, 'It's all right, sir! I will pass it on.'"

The first point which attracts our attention is this: the statement that at the first the Lord chose out a certain people to whom He gave many blessings, committed His oracles, and charged them to pass all "on to all nations," such people being the Jews of modern days. We cannot, of course, agree with the author in this view. God's covenant was with the whole of the children of Israel—the Twelve Tribes, but not merely the two, who are represented to-day by the Jews. It is quite true that the Jews, as the two-tribed House of Judah, having received the lively oracles of God and the "good spell" respecting His Son from heaven, rejected the Divine message, and so placed themselves (only for a time) outside the category of God's promises, covenants, and blessings. "The kingdom of God," which had been theirs, was "taken away from them" (Matt. xxi. 43, R.V.). The "oracles of God" were removed from their trust and keeping. Their good works and fruits were rejected of the Lord, for they were tainted with faithlessness and sin.

But inasmuch as the promises and covenants were made with the Twelve Tribes, and two of them placed themselves out of the line of blessing, by murdering His blessed Son, God's purposes must necessarily have effect upon the Ten Tribes, who were not in Palestine when the Jews rejected the Lord Jesus and His sacrifice for them. The command to "Pass it on" thus still adhered to, and was binding on the original grantees, for God's purposes cannot fail. He made Israel His messengers, and such they must continue till the whole world be converted, as God is true. That race exclusively was to be His blessing "to all the nations," "all the families," and "all the kindreds of the earth." There can be no question that one of the latter, converted by Israel, were in their turn, as the writer of the tractate supposes, to become God's messengers in place of His own nominees, and take the message back to Israel-Judah in lieu of the sole God-appointed evangelists, who were to be always and ever of the seed of Abraham.

No doubt it is our duty, as "the Israel of God," of the House of Ephraim-Joseph, to send the Gospel to the Jews, and that "first," because they, too, with ourselves, are "the children," and "the children must first be filled" (Mark vii. 27). It is right, therefore, and according to the order of things, that when rebellious Judah broke away from their Lord, Israel-obedient should be the proper agents to carry to them, as well as to the rest of the world, the seeds of eternal life, to plead with Judah in short for their King and ours, to wrestle with God for Judah-Israel, being Ephraim-Israel ourselves, their brethren of the stock of Abraham. For "Israel is to blossom and bud, and they must fill the face of the world with fruit." To them is now committed "the kingdom of God," with the custody of the Word, and the power to bring forth the fruits of the kingdom, according to the prophecies and promises. It is ours, as the accredited agents of the great King, "to pass on the Gospel" to the nations, as the humble but honoured subjects of Him, who swore to Abraham that He would ever use his seed to benefit and bless all mankind for ever. To the Lord, therefore, let Israel ascribe all the praise.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

By B. Hailes.

For fifty-nine years has our beloved sovereign sat upon the throne of England, and surely we may add, upon the throne of her people's hearts. All the loyalty and good feeling which were showered upon the girl queen when in her youth and inexperience she was called to stand alone on such a giddy height, have been increased and redoubled during the long reign, which will soon break the record, and make Victoria the sovereign who has reigned longest "over a loyal, affectionate, and prosperous people." What wondrous changes have taken place in these sixty years! How enormously the Empire has grown. It is surely a proud record, that the girl queen of sixty years ago, should now reign over an area of 10 million square miles and a population of 350 millions. Such an Empire the world has never before seen, and well is the significance of it expressed by the small figure of victory on an orb, emblematical of "Government and Universal Dominion," which is held in the left hand of the statue of the Queen, and which was appropriately unveiled on the 59th anniversary of her accession, in the quadrangle of the Royal Exchange.

Well may the question be asked, Who is this who aspires to "Government and Universal Dominion?" We have seen the Empire grow, we know that the English tongue promises to be the lingua Franca of the world, that Britain holds the supremacy of the sea, that her sons are known in every clime, and that the sun never sets upon her vast dominions, but this only makes us the more ready to ask, Who is this wondrous Queen? and Who the people over whom she rules?

If we believe the Bible (and without that belief, we can never hope to arrive at a conclusion to this momentous question), we are told that "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." It behoves us then to try and find out who "the people of the saints of the Most High" are. They must surely be the people of whom God has said, "This people have I formed for Myself; they shall shew forth My praise." And how can they most truly shew forth His praise? By "making His mighty power to be known," by spreading abroad the knowledge of His saving grace. Then we must look for a missionary people. A people who take the Gospel of Salvation to the dark places of the earth, who sow that seed which shall make "the wilderness and the solitary place glad for them, and cause the desert to rejoice and blossom as the rose." This we are told is Israel's rôle: "Israel shall blossom and bud and fill the face of the world with fruit." Yet the Jews who, in the pulpit and out of it, are commonly accepted as the only people who have a right to the name of Israel, certainly do not fulfil this rôle, nor can they in any sense be called a missionary people. Again this people must have a sovereign reigning over them, for how can there be a kingdom without a king? The Jews have no king, they are a scattered people dwelling among, but not of the nations; yet God has said, "David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel." Israel then must be extant, Israel of the Ten Tribes as well as Israel of the two, extant as a missionary people, having a descendant of the House of David ruling over them, and claiming "the greatness of the kingdom and the dominion under the whole heaven." Is it not a strange thing that our Queen's effigy should hold in her hand a figure of victory on an orb, emblematical of "Government and Universal Dominion," and no one lifts a voice against this claim. We are proud to know that she rules over an Empire greater than Rome ever saw, that her dominion is spreading, that we can already speak of a universal language. What does it mean? Can two nations inherit the same promises? Common sense replies, there is not room for two. Can God then have broken His promise, and taken from David and his people the throne and the dominion which He swore, by His covenant with day and night, should be theirs for ever. No, a thousand times no. "God is not a man, that He should lie; neither the son of man that He should repent." Study deeply what Jacob with his dying breath told his sons should befall them in the last days, and compare these prophecies with what has befallen the English Empire in these days. Study God's Word in the light of history, look for the people who enjoy the blessings promised to Israel, who are fulfilling Israel's rôle, of whom it can be said, "the shout of a king is among them." Was not that shout heard in the capital of England, the heart of the world, when on the 20th of June, the statue was unveiled, in the quadrangle of the Royal Exchange?

Let it not be said that pride alone can claim the fulfilment of these promises as being applicable to England. There is a "pride which apes humility," but it cannot be pride to look facts in the face, to believe God's Word, to honour Him in acknowledging that His promises fail not.

Not because Israel was great was God's love set upon them —they "were the fewest of all people; not because they were sinless or perfect—they were "a people laden with iniquity," but "because He would keep the oath which He had sworn to their fathers," because "He loved them." Has that love ceased? has the oath been broken?

If England enjoys the blessings promised to Israel, if she fulfils Israel's rôle; if she be the nation to whom is committed the oracles of God, (let her great Bible Societies witness), can there be pride in saying this nation must be Israel, for "He sheweth His Word unto Jacob, His statues and His judgments unto Israel." Nay! does it not humble the people to think how great their heritage and how sadly they still prove themselves "a stiff-necked people." Let us then earnestly pray that our nation, which is so great, may become "a wise and understanding people," may more than ever "loose the bands of wickedness, undo the heavy burdens, let the oppressed go free, and break every yoke," that they may put away from them Ephraim's sin of "making many altars to sin," and turn to the Lord and "serve Him with one consent." Then shall we see more and more clearly, and acknowledge more gratefully that the blessing of the God of Abraham rests upon this nation, that He has fulfilled all His promises, that while He has graciously given to us "great David's greater Son," to be our Saviour and our King, He has also not forgotten His oath to David, that while day and night continue, "his seed shall be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." Is it not so? "The shout of a king is among us." "God save the Queen."

READINGS FROM "BRITISH-ISRAEL TRUTH."

Our friend Mr. Robert Adcock, of Norwich, has just issued a card to his friends inviting them to attend meetings in the Mission House, at Hildersham, Bracondale, for readings from "British-Israel Truth (with references to the Scriptures)." The following dates were fixed for these gatherings:—July 2nd, 16th, and 30th; August 13th and 27th; September 10th and 24th, at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Adcock tells us that he has taken this step, "stirred up by the Chairman's address at the Annual Meeting." He takes "shame to himself," he adds, "for not beginning earlier!" We publish these facts to encourage others to follow Mr. Adcock's good example.

ENGLISH SERVICES IN A MISSION CHURCH IN JERUSALEM.

The following is from the May number, 1896, of a Monthly Record of the Jerusalem Mission to the Jews, called "Kerem Yisrael," p. 28:—

"It is really surprising how widely the English language is spoken in Jerusalem. Almost every Jewish father is anxious that his children should know, after Hebrew, the English tongue, and even amongst the Arabs and Syrian Greeks, English is gradually finding its way. This stimulated us to arrange a regular service in English, to which people of all nationalities are cordially welcome, and we trust this new unsectarian effort will be much blessed and owned by God."

Correspondence.

BACON ON SEA POWER.

To the Editor of the "Times."

Sir,—Admiral De Horsey, in a letter which appeared this morning in your columns, acknowledges the inestimable service rendered by Captain Mahan to England "by bringing home to every educated reader of his great work the value of sea power to any nation, and its absolute necessity for the bare existence of England as a great Power." But he also asks, fairly and pertinently, whether our rulers needed to be taught this elementary truth, or whether even the most second-rate statesmen had hitherto lived in such crass ignorance?

Whatever our statesmen may have known, there is, I suspect, a widespread popular impression that the discovery, or at least the first publication, of this truth may be attributed to the distinguished American writer upon naval warfare. It may, therefore, be worth while to point out that nearly three centuries ago, at a date long prior to the period when Captain Mahan's historic survey begins, the paramount importance to all nations, especially to England, of sea power was tersely but comprehensively proclaimed by Bacon. I quote from his "Essay on the True Greatness of Kingdoms":—

"To be master of the sea is an abridgment of a monarchy. . . . We see the great effects of battles by sea; the battle of Actium decided the empire of the world; the battle of Lepanto arrested the greatness of the Turk. . . . Surely at this day with us in Europe the vantage of strength at sea (which is one of the principal dowries of Great Britain) is great, both because most of the kingdoms of Europe are not merely inland, but girt with the sea most part of their compass, and because the wealth of both Indies seems in great part but an accessory to the command of the sea."

The final words of this quotation indicate a far foresight of England's future history.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A. C. Lyall.

ONE FLAG, ONE EMPIRE.

THE Congress of "The Chambers of Commerce of the Empire," which commenced its sittings on June 9th, was a national event, aiming at great results for our race, and distinctly pointing to the federation of the British Empire. Mr. Chamberlain, as the Secretary for the Colonies, attended as honorary president, and gave the address. His speech, while it did not and could not settle anything, was useful in commencing a discussion which by-and-bye may result in great changes and a commercial union of the Empire, which will make federation easy. At any rate, it gave Mr. Chamberlain an opportunity of propounding his views respecting the "Customs Union" between the mother country and the colonies and dependencies, showing us what is possible and what impossible on the subject. We have gone some way in this direction already. We have resolved to act in concert with the colonies in securing better communications by land and sea; we are, in union, going to improve postal communications and the telegraphic services, which already unite us to a great extent. We have remedied the defects in our common commercial law.

But what we want, said Mr. Chamberlain, is a commercial union, which, if it could be established, would settle all besides, and lead directly up to federation. This, he declared, was "the next step to take, and it would prove to be the main step, and the decisive step," in the direction of Imperial unity. The speaker said there were three ways of approaching the subject. First, we might try to make the colonies free-traders pure and simple, like ourselves. Mr. Chamberlain dismissed that idea, however, as impracticable, because the colonies for the most part refuse to adopt free-trade. The second plan was that the colonies were to retain their protective principles, but that we were to follow them by giving up our free trade, submitting the while to any duties the colonies might decide to put upon our goods. This one-sided agreement, Mr. Chamberlain said, there was no chance of our nation adopting. The third alternative was "a British Zollverein." This term he explained by saying "it was a Customs Union, which would establish practically at once free trade throughout the Empire, but would leave the several contracting parties free to make their own arrangements with regard to duties on foreign goods: with this proviso, that Great Britain shall consent to replace moderate duties upon certain articles which are of large production in the colonies. All products of British labour throughout the British Empire would be free of duty wherever in circulation."

Such an arrangement as this, Mr. Chamberlain thought, if carried out, "would be the strongest bond of union between the British race throughout the world. The following were the words of Mr. Chamberlain's peroration:—

I only want (he said) to impress on you my personal conviction that if a proposal of this kind came to us from the colonies, backed by any considerable support on their part, it would not be met with a blank refusal by the people of this country (cheers). I say, gentlemen, if it were proposed to us by the colonies, because I do not consider it would be either wise or practicable that a proposal of this kind should come in the first instance from the United Kingdom. We know how strenuously the colonies cling to their own independence, their own initiative. If they desire, as we believe they do, this closer union, if they are willing to make some sacrifice of their present arrangements and convictions in order to secure it, let them say so. Let the offer come voluntarily from them, and I believe it will be considered in this country not in any huckstering spirit, but will be entertained as part of a greater policy that is intended to unite in the closest bonds of affection and of interest all the communities which are under the British flag, and all the subjects of her Majesty throughout the Empire (cheers). I hope you will not consider that I have gone beyond my duty in making these observations to you (hear, hear.) Believe me that I am actuated solely by the strong desire I entertain that your deliberations, which in any case will be most useful, should have some practical result in bringing us nearer to the object which we all have in view, and which I do not hesitate to say is the greatest object which Britons can pursue in what I believe to be a critical stage in Imperial history (loud and prolonged cheers).

It is interesting to see how wonderfully God is working to bring about His promise to Jacob: "A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee" (Gen. xxxv. 11, R.V.). The problem seems insoluble to us at the present moment. But, by such congresses as that Mr. Chamberlain addressed, some steps forward are sure to be taken; and at the proper time in the future we shall see difficulties disappear, and the federation of the Empire will suddenly become an accomplished fact, to the amazement of our foreign enemies, but the satisfaction and comfort of our home and colonial populations. Then we may find, too, that the American Republic will discover that a union of English-speaking nations and peoples will bring to themselves some advantages, and be anxious to take their part in the Customs Union by joining the scheme, which we hope may soon be inaugurated. It is rather a bad omen for Mr. Chamberlain's proposals that, at the discussion which followed his speech, the presidents of the Chamber of Commerce of Liverpool and Manchester offered a decided opposition to Mr. Chamberlain's views regarding a Zollverein, and were also as strongly opposed to the idea of differential duties to be levied on "foreign food stuffs" and "foreign raw material," so as to favour the colonial commodities of like kind. This, of course, would be calculated to make food dearer for our own people, who must be fed from abroad, and there is not much chance of our masses agreeing to any such thing in order to make it pleasant for our colonies.

The subject thus viewed is a tangled skein all but impossible for man to unravel; but with God all things are possible, and He has promised that federation, or what answers to it, shall be the condition of Israel at the last. To Him shall be all the praise when He has by His mighty power brought to pass what to us is the impossible. At the Congress there were represented the Boards of Trade of Sydney, Cape Briton, Canada; Hobart (Tasmania); Toronto, Trinidad, South African Chamber of Commerce; Geelong (Victoria); Dunedin (New Zealand) Toronto, Dublin, Manchester, Liverpool, and Bengal Chambers of Commerce, with many others, giving a thoroughly British representative character to the gathering.

THE COST OF MODERN WAR.

THERE are two sides to every question, and the man or the nation that resolutely faces one and ignores the other is apt (says the St. James's Gazette) to be very disagreeably disillusioned. For the moment our journalists appear to be so convinced that the next war will witness scenes of unexampled slaughter that they have persuaded themselves and most of their readers that no ruler or statesman could be found wicked enough to incur the responsibility hostilities against us would involve. Unfortunately the other side of the question shows very different possibilities, and an accurate knowledge of these may—probably will—lead some of our possible enemies to a very different conclusion.

The following figures, taken from Dr. Engel's statistical work on the compaign of 1870-71, may induce a re-consideration of the matter. It is generally believed that this campaign was one of the bloodiest on record, but actually the figures prove the opposite. Out of close upon one million of combatants that Germany poured over the frontier of France during the seven months the war lasted, scarcely 50,000 lost their lives in battle or died of their wounds or of disease—i.e., barely five per cent. of the total number—and of these only some 28,000 fell to the enemy's fire; whilst of the 22,000 who succumbed to disease 10,000 would have died, according to the tables of life insurance offices, anyhow: leaving the nett loss due to the campaign about four per cent. only. And the Prussian losses in 1866 and the Japanese losses last year were considerably less. Compare these losses with the expenditure of human life that any board of railway or canal directors is prepared to risk with a light heart, or any undertaking only promising five per cent. on the capital entrusted to their charge, and the deduction is obvious that the statesmen who have the lives and happiness, to say nothing of the financial welfare, of the nation they rule to look after, are a great deal more justified in incurring a risk which the care and attention they have devoted to their powers of offence has reduced to a minimum.

The statistics of human life lost in commercial undertakings are not as carefully kept as is desirable, but it is pretty certain that the per centage of deaths above given was largely exceeded in the cases of both the Suez and the Panama Canals, whilst the Severn Tunnel, and half a hundred other undertakings whose names will readily occur to any engineer of experience, were also not completed without a considerably greater proportionate sacrifice of life than it cost Germany to subdue France. And in comparison with the return in both moral and material warfare that this campaign brought to the former, what has any commercial undertaking to show? It is quite impossible to state in figures what the value of the acquired sense of power is to the German race as a whole; but no nation in Europe—not even England—can show within the last 25 years anything like the same development of material prosperity that has taken place along the banks of the Rhine since the fear of invasion was removed.

Now, in this particular case, there was no immediate prospect of great benefit to trade; there were no colonies to excite cupidity, nor was Germany then in a position to carry their trade even if they had been acquired. How different would it not be in the case of a coalition against England now-a-days; and is it reasonable to suppose that this view of the case has been lost on the many enemies who surround us? Would it not be as well if this view of the case were brought prominently before those members of the House who for years have consistently opposed every addition to our armaments? Many of them, at least, as directors of paying concerns, know that they would not hesitate to incur a proportionate sacrifice of life for the benefit of their shareholders. Why, therefore, should the directors of a State, who only do for their country on a large scale what they do on a small one, hesitate to incur an equal risk? . . . . We may rely upon it that if in their opinion the break-up of our Empire offers to the very unscrupulous enemies by whom we are surrounded the chances either of national or individual profit worth the risk, it will not be the question of blood-guiltiness which will for one moment restrain them.—Launceston Examiner, Tasmania, April 13th, 1896.

"A MESSAGE TO THE CHURCH FROM THE NINETEENTH CENTURY."—A third edition of this work, by Bishop Titcomb, is now issued, price 1s. 6d., cloth boards. The Rev. THE CHANGES OF NAMES IN HOLY SCRIPTURE.

By J. S. Barton.

One would suppose it to be impossible for the most cursory reader of the Scriptures not to have been struck with the frequent, and it might by such be thought, the unnecessary change made in the various names so constantly met with. Does it ever occur to such to ask, Is there any reason or meaning in this? We believe there is, and in giving our ideas upon this point, would ask our readers' indulgence whilst we ventilate what may be thought a fad by some, but esteemed by others, not so.

In doing this we would first draw attention to a few of the cases of change, and afterwards endeavour to extract some reasons for the changes. To do this we will put the names side by side in two parallel columns.

Old Test. Original Name	Changed into
Azariah, otherwise written Uzziah = strengthened by Jehovah.	Abednego = the servant of Nego, i.e., of Nebo the god of Babylon.
Abiah, or Abijah = My father is Jehovah.	Abijam = a father of the sea, i.e., a sailor.
Abram = exalted father.	Abraham = a father of a multitude.
Ahaziah = warrior of Jehovah.	Jehoahaz = Jehovah, a warrior.
Bathsheba = daughter of an oath.	Bathshua = daughter of wealth (1 Chron. iii. 5).
Daniel = a judge (appointed) of God, or my judge is God.	Belteshazzar = a prince of Bel or Baal.
Ben-oni = son of my sorrow.	Benjamin = son of my right hand.
Hadassar = a myrtle.	Esther = a star, Lat. aster.
Gideon = a feller, destroyer.	Jerubbaal = a fighter agt. Baal.
Hananiah = the mercy of Jehovah.	Shadrack = royal one.
Jehoahaz = Jehovah is sustainer.	Shallum = retribution (comp. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1—4; Jer. xxxii. 11).
Kirjath-arba = City of Arba.	Hebron = confederation.
Mamre = fatness.
Ish-bosheth = a man of shame.	Eshbaal = fire of Baal (comp. 2 Sam. ii. 8; 2 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39).
Oshea (the son of Nun, Numb. xiii. 8) = salvation.	Jehoshua, or Joshua = Jehovah a Saviour.
Luz = an almond tree, to bend.	Bethel = the house of God.
Meribbaal = contender agt. Baal.	Mephibosheth = glory (turned into) shame (see 2 Sam. iv. 4), or glory of the idol.
Mattaniah = gift of Jehovah.	Zedekiah = Justice of Jehovah.
Pashur = extension (Jer. xx. 3).	Magor-missabib = terror round about.
Sarai = contentious, quarrelsome.	Sarah = princess.
Sela Petra—a rock, or a rocky citadel formerly called Kadesh = the holy city.	Jokteel = a God subdued city (see 2 Kings xiv. 7).
Israel, as a nation.	Jeshurun = the upright, the always prosperous one (Deut. xxxii. 15, xxxiii. 5).
Shesbbazzar = worshipper of fire.	Zerubbabel = born at Babylon.
Solomon = the peaceable one.	Jedidiah = Beloved of Jehovah.
New Test. Original Names	Changed into
Simon, i.e., Simeon = heard.	Peter, Petros, a rolling stone. Kephas, a stone.
James, i.e., Jacob = a supplanter	Boanerges = sons of thunder.
John, i.e., Johanan = Jehovah is gracious.
Judas—(not Iscariot) = praise.	Lebbæus = courageous, having heart. Thaddæus = a consoler, having a breast.
Saul = one asked for.	Paul = the worker, or little one.

In ancient times names meant a great deal more than they do with us, and a change of name meant a change of character or position in surrounding society; this is evidenced in the changes from Abram to Abraham, Sarai to Sarah and many others of those we have given, some to those more honourable, some to dishonour. It is well-known that this was also the case as late as under the Romans. Thus Mutius obtained the surname Scœvola, i.e., left-handed, because he had lost the use of his right hand by boldly burning it without flinching in the presence of the Etrurian king Porsenna, whom he went in to destroy. So our Lord surnamed Simon Kephas or Petros because of his bold confession; but it was well understood that if at any future time the surnamed behaved in any way derogatory of the new name, it was taken from him. Hence in the scene narrated in John xxi. 15—22, Jesus calls Peter by his old name, saying three times over—"Simon, lovest thou Me?" And indeed immediately after he had bestowed his new name of Peter upon him (Matt. xvi. 18—23) He changed it into Satan = an opponent, typical we take it of that system which, boasting of its Petrine succession, by its erroneous doctrines and blasphemous pretensions proclaims itself as Anti-Christ.

But of all the changes of names to which we have so cursorily alluded, none are so significant as the one we have purposely omitted—viz., Jacob to Israel, in order that we may direct our attention especially to it. The name Jacob, i.e., a supplanter or deceiver, was bestowed upon the twin brother of Esau at his birth, on account of his taking hold of his brother's heel at that time (Hos. xii. 3), and in anticipation of his having, in the future, power over or upon the angel and prevailing. Seeing then that these things like so many others happened as types (1 Cor. x. 11) and foreshadowings of future events, surely we are justified in regarding the history of the two sons of Isaac as prophetic of the ultimate issue of political events of the present day.

It was not until Jacob wrestled with the angel and prevailed, weeping and making supplication to Him, that we can look upon Jacob as a renewed man, a regenerated character. Up to this time, he had been true to his name, a supplanter or a deceiver, obtaining all he possessed by chicanery and sheer shrewdness bordering upon fraud, and notwithstanding his gloriously assuring vision at Luz he had not experienced that penetrating, searching look of God, discovering the hidden iniquity of his heart, and making him to fear death from seeing God in His holiness "face to face," so that he named the spot Peniel in remembrance of it. Henceforth he becomes not only changed in name to Israel, but also a changed man, renewed in the spirit of his mind and entering upon a change of character, such as became a "prince of God," and a type of that nation that proceeded from him, which we now claim to be descended from and representative of him in the British folk and nation. It is then in this light—Jacob, the unconverted supplanter and deceiver, and Israel, the renewed and righteous or justified one—that we wish to regard Britain to-day. The name Jacob occurs in the Old Testament 346 times in all, and of these no less than 186 are in Genesis alone, 11 times in Exodus once only in Leviticus, 9 times in Numbers, and 11 in Deuteronomy. There are also 10 occurrences in the historical books, making altogether 228 out of the 346 we have mentioned, leaving 118 in the Old Testament subsequent to 1 Chron. xvi. 17.

Of these the first occurrence is in Psa. xiv. 7: "Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when Jehovah bringeth back the captivity of His people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad." Here, as in many other places where Jacob and Israel seem to be synonymous, we prefer to note a distinction. The occasion anticipated with such longing expectation is the return of the Twelve

Tribes to their own land by their representatives. This we believe will take place, whilst Judah will be still in unbelief and unconverted, i.e., in the Jacob state, yet, doubtless Judah's joy will be very great; whilst Israel as representing those who "have the mind of Christ," as "the Israel of God," will be glad, as commanded by their Lord to be in Luke xxi. 28, and as set before us in 1 Thess. iv. 9, et seq., and other parts of the New Testament. The next occurrence is in Psa. xx. 1: "Jehovah hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee." This expression—"the God of Jacob" and the "the Mighty God of Jacob" occurs, the former 18 times—viz., Exod. iii. 6, 15, 16; iv. 5; 2 Sam. xxiii. 1; Psa. xx. 1; xlvi. 7, 11; lxxv. 9; lxxvi. 6; lxxxi. 1, 4; lxxxiv. 8; xciv. 7; cxiv. 7; cxlvi. 5; Isa. ii. 3; Mich. iv. 2, in the first four of which it is connected with Jacob's ancestors, Abraham and Isaac, as their covenant keeping God and as in the 228 times mentioned before, and in the others, as simply "the God of Jacob" as the overruler of all events in connection with the nation, as distinguished from those who "feared the Lord and spake often one to another . . . and who shall be Mine, saith Jehovah of hosts, in the day that I make up My jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that saveth him." The other expression, "the Mighty God of Jacob" occurs Gen. xlix. 24; Psa. cxxxii. 2, 5; Isa. xlix. 26, lx. 16: and is emphatic of the former name; whilst in the name of "the Holy One of Jacob," which occurs but once (Isa. xxix. 23), we have the character indicated with the intimation that they who now in their unconverted state worship God in a formal manner only, shall at the time spoken of worship Him with holy, filial fear as the God of Israel, i.e., Jehovah—the Redeemer God.

Whether the various terms, "House of Jacob," "seed of Jacob," "children of Jacob," "sons of Jacob," "Remnant of Jacob," "they that come of Jacob," "Jacob His (Jehovah's) chosen," "Jacob My servant," &c., &c., always should be taken as referring to the Ten-tribed House of Israel, we should not like to say, but that it is safe to take them so, except anything in the context militates against such a construction, we do aver. In many cases Jacob is undoubtedly synonymous with Israel, and in some distinguished from Israel.

We have been led to these remarks chiefly by a consideration of that notable passage in Jer. xxx. 7: "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it; it is even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it." This seems to point very directly to the present political troubles of Britain as a nation, and the last clause especially for the comfort of all the British folk; still it points to great trials and perhaps national disasters in the near future, or the assurance of the salvation would be unnecessary. Israel—the true Israel of God—we know "it shall be well with," but there are national crises in which we are made to "return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth Him not, for, behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith Jehovah of hosts, that it shall neither leave them root nor branch" (Mal. iii. 18; iv. 1). But Jehovah "will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried; they shall call on My Name and I will hear* them; I will say: "It is My people," and they shall say, "Jehovah is my God."

* To hear is to answer, comp. R.V. Hos. ii. 21 with A.V.

The question is often debated, "Will the Church have to pass through the great tribulation?" We trust we have contributed something in the above towards the solution of that problem, especially if we read 1 Cor. xv. 52 as it should literally be read—"we shall all be changed," as to individuals, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, during the last trumpet."* Wherefore it behoves us to "comfort one another with these words."

THE WILD GRAFT BOASTS ITSELF.

By the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

The Encyclical Letter of the Italian Bishop, Pope Leo XIII., contains nothing new, but much of that which is very old.

The usual admixture of truth with error may perhaps deceive a few of those who do not discern the true position of the Papacy. The statements concerning the unity and visibility of the body of Christ are true, the means whereby that unity is to be obtained and maintained or restored are false. Fortunately the claims of the Roman Church are old enough to have obtained an Apostolic pronouncement upon them. The Encyclical, of June, 1896, can be summed up in, and rebuked in the words of St. Paul, "Thou bearest not the root, but the root thee," "boast not thyself against the branches," "thou partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree with and amongst them; be not high-minded but fear." Thou art not the original root, but a wild olive graft, given thy place by the goodness of God. Boast not thyself against the branches; they are of the original Abrahamic stock. That root bears thee. True some of these Abrahamic branches were broken off because of unbelief, and thou wert grafted in, but thou standest by faith, and as they, if believing, can be grafted in again, so thou if unbelieving and boastful canst be cut off. It is a remarkable sign of the age that now, at the very close of the times of the Gentiles, this authoritative document should be issued from the head of the same Roman Church, which repeats in unequivocal language the same boast that was rebuked by St. Paul. And to those who recognise more in the apostle's words (ἐπεὶ "since thou also shalt be cut off"), than a simple warning it seems that in the providence of God, this Encyclical has been permitted in order that it may be made manifest to all why the boastful wild branch is to receive its doom.

If the Pope of Rome, who assumes to be the nexus, the only link of union between the Lord Jesus and His Church, and the so-called sacred conclave who appoint him, were to vanish to-morrow as did Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, the continuity of the Catholic Church would not be broken, nor her connexion with her divine Head severed. Branches of the Catholic Church were founded in the West and in the East before St. Peter ever visited Rome. These were in union one with another because of their union with their Head, the Lord Jesus. Their gifts and graces flowed from Him, and from the blessed Spirit, and not from Rome, which was, we repeat, not the root or stem, not even an original branch, but a wild graft.

When did she change her racial character? Never! When did she cease to boast herself against the other branches? The Encyclical answers, Never!

I do not write now of Rome's perversion of, or additions to the faith. These are not directly referred to in the

* Comp. with Dan. ii. 44, "In the days," &c., i.e., "During the days," &c.

Digitized by Google

Encyclical. But I write of her well-defined and central thought, i.e., the sin of arrogance, of proud boasting, of a shaft of pride aimed directly at that original branch which is the Hebrew-British Church. So strong is her historic position, that it is impossible for even Rome to impugn it, except for not being in communion with her Pontiff. The wild graft claiming to bear the root! ! It is indeed a tacit admission that the British Church has all the essentials of Catholicity except union with Rome. The branches with and among whom the wild graft was permitted to partake of the root and fatness, may rest contented and smile with pity at an effort long conceived and carefully planned, which, unable to add anything new, has to fall back upon an empty boast.

It has often happened in the just judgment of God, that sin long continued in has been brought to a climax and pointedly manifested before the end comes. In charity we may hope and pray that it is not to be so now again; and that opportunity may be given to many to hear and obey the warning, "Come out of her, My people, that ye be not partakers of her sins."

SOUTH AFRICA.

By X. Y.

South Africa, during the past six months, has been the subject of discussion in all the journals of Europe, consequent on the remarkable occurrences in which Germany, the Transvaal, Rhodesia, the Cape Colony, and South Africa generally, including Portugal as represented at Delagoa Bay, and Natal, have all prominently figured. In connection with these the German Emperor, Kruger, Leyds, Rhodes, Jameson, Robinson, and Chamberlain have taken a prominent position, and the reformers of Johannesburg have been subjected to fine and imprisonment during the above period.

Being relatively connected with South Africa since the year 1806, the date of the capture of the Cape Colony from the Dutch, and personally connected with South Africa for more than half-a-century, my friends have repeatedly put the questions to me—What do you think of Kruger? What of Rhodes? What of the Boers? What of Jameson? and so forth.

Some leading men have spoken of the Boers as "God-fearing men." So they are, and so was Paul the Apostle before his conversion. He believed that he was doing God service during the Damascus persecution. The majority of the population of the world are in some sense "God-fearing." We as Anglo-Israelites in this discussion have not to sit in judgment upon the Boers, or the Ashantis, or upon Rhodes, Kruger, Leyds, or Jameson. We have to discuss acts, occurrences, and results, in as far as they have been providentially developed by the King of Israel in the administration of His kingdom through these agents or agencies.

Now let us examine some of the results of what has occurred since December, 1895!

The first result that we have to record is the manifestation of Boerdom in the Transvaal. It was necessary that there Boerdom should be unveiled in all its tyranny as regards all outsiders, in its oppression of 680,000 natives, in its love of stagnation, and exclusiveness, in its ignorance, and in its opposition to missionary enterprise generally. It was necessary that this Boerdom, as existent in the Transvaal, represented by a population, including women and children, amounting to only 60,000, should be unmasked with a view either to its reformation or its removal.

The second result we have to record is the manifestation of hatred to the British influence in South Africa on the part of Germany and France, but especially on the part of Germany, and that with a view to supplant that influence and substitute that of the German Empire even to the extent of securing the Cape Colony as a half-way house to India.

The third result that we have to record is the entire destruction of the prestige of Boerdom by the House of Assembly in Cape Colony, when by 60 votes to 11, which is equivalent to 540 to 100 in the British House of Commons, the motion by Merriman that "Her Majesty be requested by respectful address to take into consideration the exercise of Sovereign rights by the British South African Company, as such rights are not consistent with the peace and prosperity of South Africa, and by the revocation or the alteration of the terms of the Charter granted to the said Company, to make such provision for the Government of the territories embraced therein as may to her seem advisable," was rejected.

The following items of the resolution are prominent and have been rejected by six-sevenths of the representatives of the Cape Colony:—

Firstly: The abrogation of "the exercise of sovereign" rights by the Charter was rejected.

Secondly: "The revocation or alteration of the Charter" was rejected.

Thirdly: "That the Charter rights are not consistent with the peace and prosperity of South Africa" was rejected.

Thus the discussion on the same points in the House of Commons here has been simply annihilated by the vote of the Cape Colony Parliament. But not only so, the action of Boerdom in the Transvaal is thus repudiated by Cape Colony, as it has been emphatically by Natal, Bechuanaland and Rhodesia, and by the Uitlanders in the Transvaal itself.

The European population in all South Africa, who repudiate the action of Boerdom,

Amounts to	600,000
Leaving Boerdom in the Transvaal ...	100,000
Majority for the Charter ...	500,000
The number of voters in Cape Colony, all above 21 years of age, is ...	75,000
The number of voters in Transvaal Boerdom, all above 16 years of age is only, 1891	13,000
Or above 21 years of age	10,000 which last is about the number of voters in Natal.

So that, as to voters throughout South Africa, exclusive of the Uitlanders in the Transvaal, we may safely say that Boerdom in the Transvaal stands, condemned by six-sevenths of the voting population.

The fourth result proves that the leading characteristic of Boerdom in the Transvaal is Retrogression.

This is proved by the constitution of Boerdom in the Transvaal.

"According to the provisions of Law No. 7, 1882, 14 years ago, to be a burgher, one had to be born in the State, and to be twenty-one. Persons coming into the State could obtain burgher rights by the payment of £25 and naturalisation, after five years' residence."

Digitized by Google

No "coloured" person can obtain burgher rights, the franchise, or hold landed property. Not only 680,000 natives but all "coloured" persons are excluded. "Coloured persons are considered to be those whose father or mother belong to the native races of Africa or Asia up to and including the fourth generation." "Coolies, Arabs, Malays, and Mohamedans cannot obtain burgher rights or hold landed property. They are only allowed to dig as servants in the employ of white people."

In 1894, the year before last, "the franchise law was further amended, by which burgher rights cannot be conferred upon aliens unless upon a referendum and two-thirds majority of the burghers voted in favour thereof. Even the children of aliens born in the State were excluded. The Uitlander is thus practically excluded."

This retrogression is not only proved by the above, but by the official census. This census in 1891 gave Johannesburg 10,500 Europeans. The Sanitary Board subsequently took a census which gave 44,000 Europeans to Johannesburg, thus, for this one centre, increasing the total European population by 33,500 to a total of 153,500 for the whole State. Of these there were in 1891, 12,500 Boers above 16 years of age, entitled to vote. This will, according to our own Colonial census, give a total Boer population, men, women, and children, amounting to 48,000 in 1891, which deducted from the total gives the following return :—

Total population	153,500
Boer population	48,000
Uitlanders	105,500

This estimate is more fully borne out by the Dutch Church census, which gives the Dutch population at 53,048, the surplus of 5,000 being Dutch Afrikanders from Cape Colony. This leaves 100,000 Uitlanders pure and simple. The population of all South Africa numbers about three millions. Of these two-thirds are under the British flag ; but, as to Europeans, the matter stands thus :—

Farming population Orange Free State	64,000
Boer population, Transvaal	48,000
Two Republics	112,000
Uitlanders, these two States ...	120,000
Europeans under British rule outside these two States	430,000
British total Uitlanders	550,000
Total non-Uitlanders both States ...	112,000
Majority Uitlanders in South Africa...	438,000

In the Standard of the 15th June will be found the following confirmatory of the general South African feeling against Transvaal Boerdom as lately exhibited in South Africa :—

"Pretoria, June 14th.—President Kruger yesterday received a monster demonstration, consisting of the mayors of towns in all parts of South Africa, and representatives of other bodies. The demonstration was organised for the speedy release of the prisoners, and the deputation now thanked the president for his clemency."

This proves that the European majority disapproves of the conduct of Boerdom in its treatment of the reformers by retaining them as prisoners.

The president replied that he had been guided by the Bible. But personally Kruger is not in consideration. What we want to see is that Boerdom in the Transvaal shall be guided by the Bible, which teaches us to love God supremely and to love the 680,000 natives and the 100,000 Uitlanders as well as oneself.

It is to be hoped that free trade, freedom of debate, freedom of representation, freedom of language—according to nationality, and freedom of the press may follow this acknowledgment of the Bible by President Kruger as his guiding star. May it speedily become the guiding star of all South and Central Africa !

The following annual report, as submitted to the Transvaal Volksraad, shows that the larger amount in value of property is held by Uitlanders:—

The farms owned by burghers ...	£3,500,000
Property owned by non-burghers ...	6,000,000
Of this last foreign companies hold ...	3,800,000
Uitlanders' farms	800,000
Non-residents' farms	400,000

So that in population, invested capital, and general enterprise the Uitlander should be fairly represented in the administration with a view to the material and social prosperity of not only the Transvaal, but of South Africa generally.

Now let us lastly consider some other results arising from the late emeute:—

1. The Germans have shown their teeth, but have been rendered powerless to bite.
2. The Transvaal prestige has disappeared.
3. Rhodesia will shortly become an Imperial Province as Uganda, but with a representative Government.
4. Reform in the Transvaal must progress, and tyranny give place to liberty.
5. The loyalty of Cape Colony, Natal and Rhodesia is fully asserted and practically manifested.
6. The advantages of British supremacy in South Africa as a means to consolidate and benefit all the States are made fully apparent.

Postscript.—With respect to the estimate of Boer population in the Transvaal it appears that (1896) there are 5,600 burgher farms. These at $7\frac{1}{2}$ to a farm, which will be $1\frac{1}{2}$ in excess of our colonial average of Europeans, will give 40,000 Boers. The population in towns was, outside of Johannesburg, all told, 20,000 in 1891. Probably 12,000 of these were Uitlanders, thus as before making the entire Boer population in 1891 about 48,000.

Some idea may be formed of the European population of the Transvaal towns from the following return in 1891:—

Johannesburg 3-mile radius	40,000	now 60,000
Pretoria, the capital ...	5,000
Klerksdorp	3,000
Potchefstroom	3,000
Lichtenburg	2,500
Barberton...	2,000
Krugersdorp	1,500
Lydenburg	1,500
Zeerust	800
Middleburg	600
Vryheed	500
Rustenburg	500
Total 12 towns, 1891	60,900

Since 1891 this urban population has been largely increased by immigration, and now is estimated at 100,000. This urban population may be divided into Uitlanders 90,000 and Boers 10,000.

When we consider that the Transvaal has been occupied by the Boers for 46 years, this urban population of only 10,000 Boers is very insignificant, and the influence of the Uitlander population in these 12 centres must necessarily be very great, for they number 90,000. But even now the 11 towns and villages outside of Johannesburg number only 30,000, and, it is evident, that the capital, Pretoria, with its 5,900 inhabitants, must be mainly Uitlander. Deducting the capital's population, the other 10 number but 24,000.

I may here observe that from the United Kingdom, the United States, and from the British Colonies the immigration into South Africa averages 500 weekly at the present time, and this chiefly adult. The Boer adult population, male and female, above 21 years of age, does not amount to this annual immigration.

THE ENGLISH IN EGYPT.

THE following was published in the English Mail of May 13th, 1892, four years ago, but the article is very applicable to the facts of the present day. It is as follows :—

"Jealousy of British influence in Egypt has hitherto prevented the French people, who are so deeply interested in the welfare of the country, from doing justice to the excellence of the work we have accomplished there. The periodical reports of the Bristish Administrator, showing the remarkable improvement we have effected in the social and financial condition of the people, are habitually received by French critics with a smile of incredulity, and so far as the improvement is established in the incontestable form of £ s. d., it is attributed to the operation of natural causes, favourable seasons, and abundant harvests. Egypt is advancing, they maintain, not because, but in spite, of British domination, and all our testimony to the contrary is discredited as that of a witness in his own cause. It is comforting, therefore, to be able to appeal from French prejudice to the impartiality of another great nation, whose testimony even France cannot pretend to undervalue. The people of the United States have no interests of their own to serve in Egypt, and they have no prepossessions in favour of British rule in any part of the globe, but they are fair-minded and truthful, and they cannot shut their eyes to the vast practical benefits which our administration has conferred in so short a time upon the land of the Pharaohs.

"In an article entitled 'The Regeneration of Egypt,' Mr. Edwin H. Woodruff, writing in the New York Nation, pays a generous tribute to the share of England in bringing about that regeneration; and there can be no doubt that in this matter he echoes the sentiments of all impartial American citizens who have studied the question on the spot for themselves. Our work in Egypt, he declares, is an achievement of which every Anglo-Saxon must be proud. There has been little romance about it, but plenty of common sense, honesty, and straightforward hard work, The sole trustee of an insolvent people first sought to re-establish their financial credit. The basis for any such substantial improvement obviously must be intelligent care of the resources of the country. The wealth of Egypt is exclusively agricultural; the productiveness of the soil depends primarily upon irrigation and the regulation of the Nile; therefore, attention was first turned to engineering works for the proper accumulation and distribution of the water supply. It is in a great measure by the irrigation works and the clearing of the canals that the rehabilitation of Egypt has been effected, and Mr. Woodruff exhibits in a few pithy sentences how success has been achieved over obstacles far more formidable, though less material, than desert sand and Nile mud.

"'While the French engineers always stayed in Cairo, each of the present irrigation inspectors travels over his district again and again, often on foot, suffering much hardship, and seeking the shelter of the humblest mud huts, lest, by accepting the entertainment of the wealthy proprietors, he be suspected by the poorer natives of having been bribed. In Ismail's time the canals were first tapped for the estates of the Khedive, then for the pashas and village sheikhs, and last of all for the poorest native; but now all are served alike.' In former days, he tells us, a poor man was completely at the mercy of his rich neighbour and of the corrupt native inspector, who, unless bribed, would not open a sluice at a critical time for the crops. Now the poor no longer have to bribe for water; they have confidence in the English inspectors, and have learned that petitions will be listened to and wrongs redressed. The regeneration of the Egyptian army is in its way quite as noteworthy a feat as the irrigation of the Delta. Mr. Woodruff contrasts the debased and demoralised condition of the fallaheen troops at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir and in the Russo-Turkish campaign, with their present soldierly conduct and bearing, as shown not only on the review ground, but in active service at Tokar and on the Soudan frontier. The abolition of the lash, sufficient food, and better pay, combined with the moral influence of British officers, have been the chief factors in bringing about this desirable reform. Improved sanitation, medical skill, and multiplication of hospitals and dispensaries have led to a remarkable improvement in the health and longevity of the people; but perhaps the greatest of all social reforms is the abolition of the annual corvée, or system of forced labour upon the canals. In 1883 the amount of this unpaid labour was equal to two hundred and two thousand six hundred and fifty men working for one hundred days. Five years later it had been reduced, by British interposition, to fifty-eight thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight men, and, in December 1889, it was totally abolished for the first time in the history of the country, and the yoke of State slavery was finally removed from the Egyptian people, together with all the odious fabric of bribery and corruption by which it was surrounded. The French people may continue to turn a deaf ear to the claims of English administrators, but they can hardly fail to be impressed, willingly or unwillingly, by this independent testimony to the value of our influence in Egypt."

DO THE PROPHETS NOTICE THE CHURCH?

(EZEKIEL XLVII. 1—13).

BY H. E. OLIVE.

PART I.

"And the glory of the Lord came into the house by the way of the Gate whose prospect is towards the East" (Ezek. xliii. 4).

"No one who studies Church history can be surprised that a Church which has often looked so utterly unholy, which had even in the fifth century to be described by Salvian as a 'sink of vices,' should also have grown to look disunited. It would be wonderful if sin had not been as busy to spoil the beauty of the 'Bride of Christ' in one way as in another. The vision of the Church utterly holy, actually Catholic, utterly one, is the vision of heaven, and the hope only of earth."

Digitized by Google

These words seem a fit opening for my subject, which is Ezekiel's vision of a perfectly restored Church, of a sanctified priesthood, of a pure ritual, of a holy people, described from the beginning of the fortieth chapter to the close of his book inclusively. In the eighth chapter of his prophecy, the seer records a very different vision. The angel of the Lord asks him, "Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the House of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chamber of his imagery?" (Ezek. viii. 12). And led by the angel to the temple at Jerusalem, he sees therein every abomination and pollution of pagan worship and ceremonial, crowds of worshippers, ranks of priests, the idolatry of Egypt, Greece, and of Babylon, the officiating priests "seventy men of the ancients of the House of Israel." This vision showed him the depths of iniquity into which the Jewish Church had sunk. In the vision we are about to consider, he is shown the possibilities to which that same Church might rise purified and restored, even as the temple of God. It is well to read these two visions and to dwell on their startling contrasts.

Throughout the prophetical books, and side by side with the history of the people of God, and the land of God, we read the past, present, and future of the Church of God. The Church of God is visible and corporeal, and she is invisible and spiritual. She must be both for the sake of her existence; visible for her growth and continuity on earth, spiritual for her true source of life here and for eternity. The first mention of a visible ritual and worship of God in Scripture is that of the offerings of Cain and Abel, a thanksgiving offering (Gen. iv. 8). That of Cain was unworthy, not being in accordance with God's method of worship, and not being accepted required afterwards a sin offering as an atonement (see ver. 7). That of Abel was worthy, because sacrificial, and in accordance with God's will, and was accepted. In Gen. viii. 20, Noah worshipped God with an offering of thanksgiving. Abraham, who may be looked on as the founder of God's visible Church, maintained always and wherever he went an altar to God. Where he dwelt, there he built an altar: the visible Church among the dwelling-places of his family and household (Gen. xii. 8; xvi. 4—18), and here he sacrificed and served continually, his highest act of service being his willingness to offer up his only son in obedience to God's command.

This early household or patriarchal Church of the families under one head lasted until it expanded into the tabernacle or church in the wilderness, erected under Moses for the assembling of the tribes during their journey from Egypt to Canaan, and for which God ordained a priesthood to serve and a ritual and ceremonies for daily use. This moving Church and service was replaced by the fixed temple at Jerusalem, whither annually the tribes were to go up for the great festival of the Passover, and by the small synagogues built for daily use in each settlement of the people. This temple of Jerusalem, in its vicissitudes, changes and developments, forms the history of the Church in Israel. This was the "old dispensation," the school and preparation for the "Church of Christ," for Christianity in its purest form, when visible sacrifices and "shedding of blood," were terminated by the great Sacrifice Himself on the cross, and the institution of the Apostolic Church, which yet demanded an ordered Church and ministry.

I quote now from a well-known theological writer of the present day:—

"The nation which sprung from Abraham was chosen by God to be His 'peculiar people,' an elect nation. The nation thus chosen consisted of the Hebrew race, commonly known as the children of Israel, or Jews. Shortly after the death of Abraham a great famine spread over the land of Canaan where the family of Abraham dwelt. To avoid this famine the whole of his descendants, numbering seventy persons, journeyed into Egypt, and there greatly multiplied. The king of Egypt, fearing that they might side with his enemies in case of war, reduced them to slavery. From this bondage God rescued His people by the hand of Moses, whom He raised up to be their leader. Under the guidance of Moses the whole nation, now great in number, was led out of Egypt into the wilderness of Sinai, and there organised to form a Church. To this Church the whole of the Jewish nation belonged. Thus organised, the Jewish Church received from God the moral law, the right of approaching Him by sacrifices, the divine blessing, and above all, the promise that from their midst should spring in due time the divine Deliverer, the Incarnate God Himself. Such were the 'elect people,' the Israelites, 'to whom pertaineth the adoption and the glory, and the covenant, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises, whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever' (Rom. ix. 4, 5). It is true God's love and mercy were over all nations, yet it was with the Jewish Church that He thus closely dealt. Outside its pale there was no sure revelation, and no special blessing. The Gentiles, i.e., all nations other than the Jews, are described by St. Paul as 'aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise.' Our blessed Lord Himself declared that 'salvation is of the Jews,' for the Jewish Church was the covenanted sphere of God's favour, and the home of His truth. Though promises to the nations outside the Jewish Church were given, they also depended upon the coming of the Deliverer, the Son of God, made Man. Jesus Christ did not come to destroy the old Church, and to build a new Church on its ruins, but rather He caused it to pass into a higher state of existence. He said, 'Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets, I am not come to destroy but to fulfil' (St. Matt. v. 17). He was born and lived on earth within the bounds of the Jewish Church, with its Scriptures, laws, sacrifices and rites, and in His own Person gave to them a fuller meaning and a new power to save and to heal the souls of men. In His Person and through His grace the old types passed into new and living realities. Thus the Christian Church grew out of the old religion as the leaves and flowers of a plant grow out of the stem. The Christian Church was the offspring of that of the Jews. Our Lord Himself clearly taught this continuity between the two Churches by speaking of the Christian Church as Israel. There is but one Israel or chosen people from the beginning to the end. God's purposed dealings with mankind through Christ were too wonderful to be carried into effect without due warning. There was need of long and careful preparation for the 'Incarnation' and its application to the Christian Church. This preparation was made by God by means of the Jewish Church. Its great work was to prepare the way for Christ, and for God's fullest revelation of truth, and His richest outpourings of grace in Christ. 'The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ.'

"The prophecies, types and figures of the Old Testament find their fulfilment in Christ Himself and the Christian Church.

"The revelation of the Old Testament is complete in that of the New Testament.

"The old sacrifices are fulfilled in the sacrifice of the Lamb of God on Calvary, and its application in the Holy Communion.

Digitized by Google

"The moral law in the Ten Commandments is perfected and raised to a higher meaning by Christ in the Sermon on the Mount, and made binding upon Christian people.

"The Priesthood is summed up, but perfected in Christ, the great High Priest, and continued in the Christian ministry. Holy Baptism takes the place of circumcision, and the Lord's Supper of the Passover. The Jewish Sabbath passes into the Christian Sunday.

"In short the old Church was absorbed into the new, and the Jewish religion filled with new meaning, and endowed with new power through the coming of God in the flesh, and the outpouring of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost, passed into the Christian religion."

Some time ago a very able paper was read at this meeting on the Prayer Book and its affinities with the Hebrew Church, and in reference to the way in which our blessed Lord used the Jewish prayers and liturgies in order to expand and Christianize them, I quote this passage from the History of the Prayer Book, by the Rev. Evan Daniel: "With the exception of the clause 'as we forgive them that trespass against us,' every portion of the Lord's Prayer has been found somewhere in the liturgies of the Jews; 'Our Father, which art in Heaven,' is in their Seder Tephilloth, or Form of Prayer. 'Let Thy name be sanctified and the kingdom reign,' in their form Kaddish. 'Let Thy memory be glorified in Heaven and in the earth beneath,' in the Seder Tephilloth. 'Forgive us our sins,' in the sixth of their eighteen daily prayers. 'Deliver us not into the hand of temptations,' 'and deliver us from the evil figment,' in that and the book Musar. 'For Thine is the kingdom, and the power for ever and ever' is, saith Densius, 'their usual doxology.'" Does not the omission of the clause "as we forgive them that trespass against us" throw some light on the difficulty St. Peter found, and also the other disciples in accepting our Lord's command of complete forgiveness of all injuries?

The vision of Ezekiel is that of a Church of the future as conceived and ardently desired by a Jew. He who had seen the terrible vision of a desecrated temple in the eighth chapter was to see one of a temple filled with the glory of God, whose law of life is thus summed up in chapter xliii. 12.: "Upon the top of the mountain the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy. Behold this is the law of the house." The prophet could not, while ardently looking for the Messiah, conceive the actual details of His coming, nor anticipate the change that must pass over everything after this event; he could not realize the cessation of bloody sacrifices, nay, that their continuation would one day be pronounced a sin and profanation. When he dreams it is of his own majestic and gorgeous ritual, cleansed of hypocrisy and sin, officiated by holy priests, shared in by a repentant people. He saw rising before him the fabric of a splendid temple, which he describes, as to its exterior, minutely, and then entering he beholds the worship therein with marvel and with delight. There are exactly ordered sacrifices, according to God's commandments for the various occasions and festivals. There are ranks of priests all leading the saintly life, the sacrifices are those of animals, willingly and obediently offered by a holy people. This would be his highest conception of a reformed and purified Church: to him even was sealed the full mystic meaning that underlay his own vision. He could not as we can realize the force of his imagery. "There is a river that maketh glad the city of God." Is not this the Church of God in the midst of the city of God? Compare Rev. i. 3 with the opening verses of Ezekiel xlvii., especially verses 8 and 9, "The leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations," and "The tree of life stood by the river, and its roots were watered by it." Compare St. John vii. 39, 40, "He who believeth in Me, as the Scripture hath said, from within him shall flow rivers of living waters."

In the custom of the Brahmins looking on the Ganges as a sacred stream and casting themselves therein for healing and salvation, we can trace the ancient truth and influence of the belief in a flowing river of life.

Whosoever plunges in the fountain that flows from Jesus is saved, but like Naaman, men for ever will have a stream of life, but they must choose it. "There is a fountain filled with blood," but only one. There is a river that maketh glad, but only one. The river of life is God's ordered Church flowing through the ages, no mere geographical stream, benefiting one race only; it is a spiritual flood, stored in invisible buildings, administered by an ordered priesthood on methods ordained of God, yet is always a flood, an increasing stream in depth and width, and the flow of the water is always eastward, from whence we look to see Jesus. Ezekiel xlvii., to the end of the tenth verse, reads like the history of the Apostolic Church to the present day and onward. The first gathering of Christians in the upper room at Jerusalem is the water risen to the ankles, a little spring almost unnoticed of men, only known even locally to a very few. From the day of Pentecost to the reign of Constantine and the building of Constantinople, the history of Christianity, most remarkably so in Dean Milman's history, reminds one vividly of the course of a river. It is an increasing river, a swelling flood, but its flow is impeded, and turned aside and broken by constant rocks, cascades and impediments—namely, the different heresies that tore the Church internally, and the persecutions that destroyed her externally. And yet these very obstacles increased her momentum and velocity until she overflowed the Roman empire, which then represented the civilized world. Thus the waters rose to the knees.

And again through the middle ages, up to the time of the Reformation, the Church is living and growing, guarding doctrine at one time, refuting error at another, until, when through the influences of the fifteenth century and the instrumentality of the printing press and the translation of the Scripture for the use of the people generally, the waters were brought to the loins.

And now in our day, is not the Church a river that cannot be passed over? A sea to swim in. "Blessed are they who sow beside all waters;" "And the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea." This is the missionary promise.

Our Lord commanded His disciples, those first Galilean members of His Church, "Go ye into all the world and proclaim the Gospel to every creature," and the impelling power of that command still rests on their descendants. The Church shall be formed of "multitudes, multitudes." Once in London I listened at an open window in a crowded and busy part to the mere sounds of the city. Abstracting my mind as far as possible from the consciousness of any definite noise, the mingled cries and tramp of mens' and horses' feet, the roll of wheels seemed to me "as the sound of waters," a living flood, flowing, returning, ebbing away, rolling up and roaring in the distance. Some of you may recall a little bit of description by that master hand Charles Dickens, in "A Tale of Two Cities," of a quiet corner in London, Dr. Manett's house on a summer Sunday afternoon, when the listener heard as it were, the distant sounds of crowds coming on, of trampling feet, hurrying people, even the rushing stream of the French Revolution, which was to flow round and draw in that little household. What is the life of our Churches, but that of the crowds who fill them, who gather on the banks of the sacred tide and drink and live. The Church while militant is progressive. The vision of the Church triumphant is that of a great multitude, the sound in the ears is that of a rushing mighty flood, of thronging footsteps. God's promise to Abraham was, that his descendants should be as the sands of the sea shore and as the stars in heaven. The redeemed of the Lord are to be "multitudes that no man can number," not only because they are the descendants of Abraham, Israel according to the promise, but because of those they gather in as well. "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of them who preach the Gospel of peace. Their sound is gone out into all lands, and the nations are gathered in." Israel in the flesh, the Church of Christ, is God's agency for the salvation of the world. This is Dante's conception in his 'Paradise." Those who know it will agree with me in the feeling that one is at times bewildered with the multitude of people he remembers, from the Old Testament saints to his own times. There are circles within circles, in an illimitable perspective, ranks on ranks of angels and celestial beings, swarms and crowds of spirits, that hover round and verge toward the centre, the throne of God Himself. In the midst of this vision as though carried away by the glory of , this passage suddenly breaks in, and the heavenly choir sings :—

"'Glory be to the Father, to the Son,
And Holy Ghost,' all Paradise began ;
So that the melody inebriate made me.
What I beheld seemed unto me a smile
Of the universe for my inebriation ;
Found entrance through the hearing and the sight.
O joy ! O gladness inexpressible !
O perfect life of love and peacefulness !
O riches without hankering, secure !"

This is one of the touches in the great poem that seems to lift one into the atmosphere surrounding the mental vision of the poet as he wrote. His mind dwelt in heaven for the time, as much as that of Fra Angelico, who prayed before he painted his pictures, and knelt as he worked. And so, being done to the glory of God, the poem and the pictures still live, and elevate the mind of their hearers and beholders. In the Revelation the whole of heaven is a temple "and the Lamb is the light thereof." This is the Beatific vision, this the New Jerusalem "whither the tribes go up, even the tribes of the House of Israel.

FACTS ABOUT LONDON.

In London there have been reckoned more Roman Catholics than in Rome, more Jews than in Palestine, more Scotchmen than in Aberdeen, more Welshmen than in Cardiff, more Irishmen than in Belfast. Its streets, placed end to end, would extend to nearly 3,000 miles. Its refreshment is provided for by over 8,000 public houses and 1,700 coffee-houses. It consumes annually over 2,000,000 quarters of wheat, 800,000 oxen, 4,000,000 of sheep, calves, and pigs, 9,000,000 head of poultry and game, and 140,000 tons of fish. Its drinking is upon the same vast scale—180,000,000 quarts of malt liquor, 31,000,000 quarts of wine, 18,000,000 quarts of spirits. Its daily water supply is over 150,000,000 gallons.—Bath Chronicle, June 25th, 1896.

MR. MARCHANT IN HYDE PARK.

To say that we had glorious times in Hyde Park on July 7th, 8th, and 9th, is no exaggeration. The weather was glorious, and an atmosphere of happiness seemed to pervade those stalwarts who came to support our worthy lecturer, above named. The Rev. Marcus Bergmann left his dearly loved task of translating the New Testament into Yiddish for the Jews, and his many other urgent calls, to shew his desire to support our cause. A like enthusiastic spirit brought Mr. Isaac Loveland, Mr. Pym, Mr. May, Mrs. Reep, Miss M. Bell, and many London supporters, not least valuable of whom were some converted to Anglo-Israel truth at the first lecture in 1895. Mr. Marchant was able to see a practical demonstration of the interest the Church Army captains are taking in the cause, and the powerful aid they are giving. Among other such aids was the placing of the manager's room at their hostel at our disposal, to meet for that necessary and refreshing institution, afternoon tea; so that a goodly body of Anglo-Israelites had a quiet two hours over the tea table to discuss individual members and their utility, or otherwise in the cause; (well, the last clause is only a sly hint to do better). Still, how can we accuse members of non-interest when Nottingham-street was invaded by Carter Patterson almost hourly, a week before the lectures, to deliver the bulky parcels of BANNER OF ISRAEL and other gifts of literature for the Hyde Park audiences, who by the way were all that could be desired? Even the so-called tumblers and mountebanks aided us, and gave up their "stands" to us! This solid fact only shows the kindly favour with which the Identity is received. We need not give your readers the subject matter of Mr. Marchant's lectures, because they travelled over a large amount of ground; but I may remark that he cleverly evaded all political or sectarian planks, and he was able after each lecture to devote about half-an-hour to quiet discussion with interested hearers. We cannot forbear asking the thanks of Anglo-Israelites, due to Mrs. Marchant, for the effective way in which she disposed of the twenty-eight "Hand-books." The whole of the immense quantity of free literature was in the hands of the said army of supporters to place in the hands of listeners or others crossing the park. Last, but most important of all, we value the prayerful letters sent with the free literature by those who could not be present. We hope and believe God has answered their prayers.

JOHANNESBURG PRICES.—A cabbage garden at or near Johannesburg ought to pay well, if only that esculent vegetable could be induced to grow there. According to a letter received in Launceston from this South African gold-field single cabbages have realised the modest figure of 7s. 6d! Nor is this the only expense attendant upon indulging in the luxury of a head of this vegetable for dinner, inasmuch as the water to boil them in costs 1s. a gallon. The latter item also bears heavily on the laundrymaid, who, however, recoups herself by charging her customers proportionate rates, 6s. per dozen being considered not at all unreasonable. With bacon at 4s. 6d. a pound, butter in proportion, and many other articles equally dear we must leave readers to make their own calculations as to what is the "living" rate of wages there. The above are the figures quoted in the letter referred to, which also says there is no opening in South Africa for any but skilled artisans.

THE HAND-BOOK OF "BRITISH-ISRAEL TRUTH."—We are glad to announce that a fifth edition of this work has been called for, and is now ready, making 10,000 copies issued. An important addition has been made to this edition, an "Index to Texts" having been compiled, enabling the reader to immediately find a Scripture reference, as every quotation from Genesis to Revelation to which reference is made in the work is tabulated in a convenient form for immediate reference. The prices remain the same: Paper covers, 1s.; limp cloth boards, 1s. 6d; thick paper edition, cloth boards, gilt lettered, 2s.

THE SUDDEN EXPANSION OF RUSSIAN INFLUENCE.

THE attention of some of the British papers, and of many of our people, is being drawn to the sudden and unparalleled extension of Russian influence throughout the world. The Daily Chronicle of February 22nd last published an alarmist article, pointing out how that influence has grown—East and West,—and how important it is that it should be watched and guarded against by our statesmen and politicians. The Russian Empire is already regarded as "the Colossus of the North," and the strides she is just now taking towards universal power are regarded as direct menaces to our own country, and symptoms that the object of Russia, like our own, is the acquisition of supreme power throughout the globe. This revival of Russian ambition began with the exchange of naval visits with France at Cronstadt and Toulon. An alliance was said to have been effected on these occasions, though Russia has not promised France help towards the retrocession of Alsace and Lorraine, or engaged to re-open the Egyptain question, or to help the French to compel our departure from it. The French are doing all they can to help the Russians in their schemes for expansion in the far East. They have provided funds for a large Russian loan to China, and a French company is to build the Manchurian Railway, by which Russia will pour in her troops to hold the Chinese territory she means to acquire, and to secure her own supremacy in the North Pacific.

The late reconciliation of the two enemies, Turkey and Russia, whose quarrel we espoused as regards the Turks in the Crimean war, makes Russia supreme at Constantinople. There, as well as in the Chinese seas, we see her fleets in great strength, and the balance of power passing rapidly into Russian hands; but leaving those of Great Britain, lately paramount in both directions till now. The Turkish Empire, for which we fought and suffered forty years ago, esteeming it "the bulwark of Europe against Russia," has now sold itself to the protection of Russia against Europe. The Daily Chronicle takes a very gloomy view of the outlook for our own country, and summarises all in the following melancholy style:—

This is by no means all that has happened in the Balkan countries. Montenegro is a Russian outpost, armed with Russian rifles. Servia has drawn near to Russia; by Russia's wish she is embracing Montenegro, and King Alexander has conferred the Grand Cross of the White Eagle upon M. de Nelidoff. The reorganisation of the Servian Army has also begun. In Bulgaria Prince Ferdinand has confirmed his son in the faith of Russia, and in return Russia has procured for him the recognition of all the Powers, and is about to place her agents, diplomatic and commercial, in all parts of Bulgaria. With the exception of the narrow stretch of land in Novi Bazar occupied by Austria and the Greek and Roumanian frontiers (and even the former country is closely allied with Russia, for the reason, amongst others, that her Prince saved the life of the present Tsar when a Japanese fanatic attacked him), the Turkish Empire is thus ringed around by Russia's friends.

On the other side of the world Russia has advanced at the same time and in no less a degree. A very few years ago England was the dominant Power there. To-day no one regards her as such. We had supported China, just as we had supported Turkey, as a possible bulwark against Russia. But now China, like Turkey, is under Russian influence first of all. Russia took the leading part in rescuing her from the Japanese territorial victories, and by the great loan she holds her by the throat. Moreover, China has consented to the occupation of an important harbour by the Russian fleet, and Manchuria is dropping slowly but surely into the mouth of the Bear. An ice-free port as terminus of the great Trans-Siberian railway may be a fait accompli at any moment. The King of Korea is at this moment under Russian protection, while the Japanese Diet was hastily prorogued lest the anger of the members should precipitate a quarrel between Russia and Japan. And the Russian forces by land and sea have been brought up to war strength.

Now, what has England done in reply to all this? Absolutely nothing. In diplomacy she has been outclassed at every point. Territorially she is exactly where she was.

Her armed forces have only been partially mobalised because of the German scare; otherwise she is no stronger, and in the Far East her fleet is equalled, if not excelled, by that of Russia. In prestige, she has for the moment suffered an eclipse. These are facts, and they should be faced. What is their significance? In Europe there are other Powers, notably Austria, which will be affected more than ourselves by the Russian advance, but in the Far East we alone, of all Europe, are challenged. Yet we are apparently taking no steps, and apparently we have no policy. Our statesmen seem bent on mere temporary and local arrangements, and have not in any way envisaged the great and alarming facts of the situation. There are two possible ends to this; and we know of no third. We shall either fight Russia, and that soon, or we shall come to an amicable and world-embracing arrangement with her. We have colossal gifts for her in our power, and she has much to give us. As our readers know, the latter is the course we have always advocated. We are profoundly convinced there is no insuperable difficulty in the way; and, indeed, if Lord Rosebery had remained in office such a goal would probably by this time have been in sight. Our purpose for the moment, however, is not to advance any proposal, but to try to convey to the country an idea of the present policy of drift, the alarming situation to which it has led us, and the absolute and most urgent necessity for a national decision.

In all this, of course, we see man's despair, but no recognition of the watchful superintendence over the affairs of His people by "the God of Abraham, and his seed for ever" (Luke i. 55, R.V.). The sudden rise and extension of the power of Russia is not a fact which can have escaped the notice or control of the God of Israel. What if He has foreseen it and allowed it from the beginning? Is not Russia the prophetic "Gog," and is not "Gog's" object to ruin the power of Israel, to defeat God's purposes in regard to the latter's supremacy in the earth, and to obtain the dominion herself in spite of God's providential designs? As we know from Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. (R.V.), that God means to exhibit His own strength as against the utmost that the hosts of His enemy "Gog" can effect against Him, is it not right and proper that He should allow the Empire of Russia to extend on all sides, and to offer menace everywhere against Israel and her ships in the North Pacific, as well as in the waters of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles? If these things were not to occur, and no extension of the influence of her arch-enemy Gog were to take place now at the present day, how could we be certain that the British are Israel, and that the time of her redemption is at hand? It is evident, therefore, that the Russian Empire, being "the Prince of Rosh" spoken of in the prophecy of Ezekiel, above-mentioned (ver. 2), that power must grow just now enormously in might, in order, by and bye, to conceive "the evil device" (see vers. 10, 11, R.V.) to invade Palestine, the then abode of Israel and Judah, and purpose to rob them of God's gift of the inheritance of "the land," and all the other blessings appertaining thereto, which He promised them in Gen. xxii. 17, 18, and in other like Scriptures.

So, far from feeling alarm at the menacing attitude of Russia, we ought, knowing Our Identity with Israel, to rejoice that Israel's redemption is so near at hand, and that God is preparing the last great contest in which Israel is to be engaged with the enemies of her God. Also that He has undertaken, according to the prophecies, to defeat them all on the mountains of Israel, and give His people such a triumph there over all her enemies as the world has never seen before. Humanly speaking the advance of Russia is alarming enough. But "the time of Jacob's trouble," now approaching, is to be excessively alarming to all concerned on our side. Yet it is something to be assured by God Himself, that we shall, as a nation (being Jacob), "be saved out of it" (Jer. xxx. 7, R.V.). God means these things to teach us that we are Israel His people, and He our God; that in our trouble and adversity He would have us rely upon His help to subdue our enemies, the Russian Gog, and give us at last, not only the land of Palestine and its extensions as our home, but "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven;" such kingdom being His, since "all dominions shall serve and obey Him" (Dan. vii. 27, R.V.). To Him be all the praise!

A BRIEF OUTLINE OF RUSSIAN HISTORY.

By E. Reep.

At this present moment the one country that interests us above all others is Russia. The coronation of the young Czar, with all its solemnity and splendour, is an event still fresh in the public mind; not so, however, is it with some other curious events in Russian history. Russia, in one respect, differs from all other countries. The extraordinary varieties of nations or tribes over whom the Czar rules, present an aspect, says the historian, quite unexampled in the history of any other country. Wherever other nations have, by subjugation or gradual admixture, extended their sway, and drawn in distinct families of people under the same rule, it is generally found that the habits, language, and religion of the dominant power influence the rest, and finally absorb all the broad features of external distinction. But in Russia, tribes the most dissimilar are still distinguished by their own peculiar marks, moral and physical. Hence there are numerous nations exhibiting the phenomenon of proximity without sympathy or resemblance. These people, politically united, are yet dissociated in customs, in religion, and in language.

The origin of the many nations that originally peopled Russia is a question upon which history is said to have shed little light. That the Goths inhabited a portion of Russia in the remotest periods of antiquity seems tolerably certain. The Russians are yet called Guthes by the Lithuanians. It also seems beyond doubt that the names and possessions of the ancient tribes were subject to perpetual change, owing to the restlessness of their nature, and the constant inroads from Asia, which occasionally swept away whole settlements, and infused a new character into the provinces they desolated.

About the close of the seventh century the oborigines of Russia were startled by an invasion of Slavi, who as Getæ or Dacians had been defeated on the shores on the Danube and obliged to seek a new country to colonise. With them the invaders brought a language and a mythology having affinity with the language and mythology of Greece and Rome. It is not, however, until the ninth century that the authentic history of Russia begins. Settled on the river Volkhof, the Slavi named their capital Novogorod or Newtown. The commerce of the new city, extending not only to Constantinople and both sides of the Baltic, but to Persia and India, very soon excited the envy of less prosperous communities. These becoming more and more powerful and aggresgive, the Slavi imitated their Anglo-Saxon brethren and called in the aid of their kin, the Verangians, who, as masters of the Baltic, were always ready, it is said, to hire themselves as mercenaries to the highest pay master. Although as hired troops it was expected the Verangians would retire when no longer required for the protection of Novogorod, Rurik, their leader, thought differently; he determined to remain in Russia. After an unsuccessful effort to expel their Verangian brethren, the Slavi quietly yielded to them the government of the country. The people of the soil, composed as they were of different nationalities, were thus brought under the sovereignty of a Norman or Scandinavian dynasty, which, continually strengthened by fresh swarms from Scandinavia, and even England, reigned above seven hundred years.

If we be not in error in identifying lost Israel in the wandering, emigrating tribes of Northmen, the fact that the sons of Rurik were the masters of the province of Moscow gives to the gorgeous spectacle just witnessed at Moscow an interest far surpassing anything that has been recorded by newspaper correspondents. We see in the beautiful Czarina a truly imperial figure. But we see in her something more than a matchless type of loveliness. We see in her the reflection of a real historic past; for we see in her a descendant of the very first founders of the Russian Empire, and once again a crowned Israelite in Russia. Very unlike, however, was the recent coronation ceremony to the ancient rite used by Russia's first rulers. It was on such occasions the custom of the Slavi to assemble in large numbers in some holy place, and there, before crowning the king, to seat on a large stone one of the common people. The function this representative of the democracy had to perform was simple enough. The king stood before him while he administered the oaths of office which bound the king to respect truth and religion and to support the weak and friendless. This part of the coronation ceremony duly carried out, the king mounted the sacred stone. Hereupon the people vowed fidelity to their new sovereign, who, without any kissing of images or pictures straightway received their homage as one divinely anointed to lead and govern them. In some such manner must Saul have taken upon himself the kingly office. The exact order of his consecration was probably chronicled in the book specially written by Samuel at the time of his election for the instruction of the people (1 Sam. x. 25). If so tradition would preserve among the Israelites the commands of the prophet long after the loss of the book or exile in far countries. Hence probably the observance among the Israelite Scandinavians of so many patriarchal and Hebrew customs.

Russia, we are told, occupies an incredible space upon the map. It comprehends, says Lardner,* a vast portion of Europe as well as a third part of all Asia. With this vast territory Russia is not satisfied. A writer in the National Review for June, in some "Gossiping Reflections," assures us that whatever may be the future of Russia, it is evident that the rulers of the vast northern empire are preparing for a grand march forward in fulfilment of what they and their fathers and grandfathers have undoubtedly believed to be its destiny. "The domestic government of Russia," continues the same article, "is said to be extremely bad, and so it seems to be; but as to the management of its relations with the rest of the world there is nothing like it for steadiness, watchfulness, patience, vision for the right moment, courage to seize occasion. Though while the third Alexander lived there was little to show on the surface for the use of these qualities, there was a great deal underground, and a great deal more in the provision of opportunity and the consolidation of forces in waiting for the timely hour. Apparently, the Russian Government now feels that the hour is at hand. Some influential minds in Russia must believe, indeed, that it is rather overpast; for they began to chafe at what was thought a too-complete inaction in Alexander's time. Even before the apparition of Japan as a strong naval power and the fall of China under her attack, the forward impulse was moving strongly in Russia. The victories of Japan, and the tremendous possibilities that then became visible, made the impulse common. Here was a call to action so clear, so imperative, above all so promising, that Russia rose to it at once. The time had come for a general and definite move onward, and the move was begun. But now a halt was called for the coronation of the Czar; and every Russian must think it most fortunate and fitting at such a time that princes and ambassadors should be called from all parts of the earth, but especially out of the East, to witness the splendour, and majesty, and might of Russia's sovereignty. No nation, however great, can remain unimpressed by a spectacle which could be matched nowhere else in the world; and when these Japanese and Chinese, these Turks and Turcomans return home, it will be found that the magnificence of the Czar's coronation was by no means all unprofitable show. It had paying extravagances, and in a thousand years they could hardly be more timely."

We have made the above long extract from the National Review for the express purpose of showing how unconciously men are anticipating the growth and expansion of Russia as prophetically portrayed in Ezek. xxxviii., R.V. To many it must seem strange that so terrible a doom as the prophet predicts in chap. xxxix. should await a prince of Rosh (Russia) and all his people. Seeing that the foundations of the empire were laid by men of the Anglo-Saxon stock, Russia should he a power for good and not for evil. But the mystery of the whole matter is solved by a study of Russian history. The various nationalities of the Russian empire have, like the Canaanites of Palestine, had every opportunity of understanding and obeying the law of righteousness. Christianity was introduced and established in their midst not many years after the death of Rurik, by the wife of his son, now canonised as St. Olga. The result should have been progress, peace and goodwill to men. It has not been so. On the contrary, Russian Christianity is but a withered branch ready for the burning. Though it still masquerades in purple and fine linen it is dead! The fulness of the Gospel, the love of the Spirit, the love of souls, the charity that suffereth long and is kind, have no living place in the Eastern Church. Russian Christianity, therefore, has become purely superficial; so that when it is said that it is the duty of Russia to occupy Constantinople in the interests of humanity, men talk foolishness. Russia has no spiritual interest in humanity whatsoever. She is a political force pure and simple; and as such has rejected Christianity, and thus will fall upon her that Stone which will grind her to powder. At her fall what will follow? Possibly history may repeat itself. In that case chastened Russia will once more stand in need of Anglo-Saxon aid. It will not be refused to her. In Israel shall all the families of the earth be blessed. If Rurik the Norman bound together in peace the rival nationalities of the land in his day, how much greater will be the blessings afforded by his race in the days to come, when God shall have visibly poured out His Spirit upon the House of Israel, from whom He will no more hide His face, nor turn away from sanctifying His name in them. Even Edom is not to be utterly destroyed (Amos ix. 12), but is to find refuge in blessed and sanctified Israel; even so may it be with Russia in the day of her humiliation and the fire of God's wrath against her. "Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent and he shall know them? for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them: but the transgressors shall fall therein."

SOME NOTES ABOUT JOHANNESBURG.

As there are so many persons leaving these shores for South Africa, some particulars of the principal places there may prove interesting. Mr. Leslie Cardun, of the Cardun family of mystifiers, vocalists, musicians, and comedians, recent arrivals from South Africa, who are now touring Tasmania, supplied some interesting notes to an Examiner representative. Mr. Cardun spent two years touring in South Africa with the Thorn Shakespearian Company, and then in his present line of business, and had a very successful trip. Mr. Cardun was a long time in Johannesburg, to which place so many people are now flocking, and he states that it is a very good field for first-class mechanics, but labourers without a special trade or men without a profession are useless, and have to stand their chance. He knew of many of the latter class who came there and had to take up any possible situation at exceedingly low wages, and had to exist on a very miserable allowance in order to raise sufficient funds to get away. Purely labouring work is done by natives, especially at Cape Town, where Malays work for 3s. and 4s. per day. At Johannesburg, when Mr. Cardun left, wages for tradesmen averaged from £5 to £5 10s. per week, whilst board and lodgings cost about 30s. per week at common boarding places—10s. per week for a bed (not a room) and £1 for meals of 1s. each. At hotels, the lowest charge for board and lodgings was 50s. per week. The town is about the size of Launceston, but rapidly increasing in population. The climate is rather warmer than that of Tasmania in summer, but colder in winter, the most disagreeable feature being the storms of dust that pervade the city on a windy day; tons of red sand are taken into the air, and then travelling renders life rather unpleasant. It is a common practice to see tickets on shop windows and doors with the words, "Closed in consequence of the dust" written upon them. The distance from Cape Town is 1,014 miles by rail, and the fare is £8 16s. second class, and £4 15s. 9d. third class, but those riding in the latter are compelled to travel with blacks. Nearly every nationality is represented on the field, the most prominent being Mr. Banato, an ex-Petticoat-lane man, who is also a Thespian, a position which he takes much interest in. He is locally known as the diamond king, in consequence of his being very wealthy. Whilst Mr. Cardun was there M. Banato played as Mathias in "The bells" with the Thorn Company. There are two nicely-fitted theatres there, and a splendid hall at the Wanderers Gardens, and two of these places are always occupied. Mr. Cardun had a lot to say about President Kruger, of the Transvaal, who paid a visit to England recently, and returned to South Africa with some peculiar notions as to manners of the people there. The output of gold at Johannesburg whilst he was there was 40,000 oz. per annum, but now he believed it was nearly 100,000 oz. The business places and several dwelling houses are very modern, and the population now is about 90,000. Buluwayo, or Matabeleland, another place visited, is a six weeks' journey, and when proper communication is effected it should become a flourishing place. The journey at present is done by a wagon, which is meant for a luggage transport, and the fare to ride is £10, or else people must walk. At Kimberley, where the De Beers Consolidated Mining Company, whose cheque for £5,378,000 for the adjoining properties is the largest ever drawn, is situated, business is about played out, and all work is done by natives. Mr. Cardun states that the regulations there to prevent illicit dealing in diamonds are very stringent. The train arrives from Cape Town at 8 p.m., and passengers are rushed with blacks, who offer to sell them diamonds at a low price. People landing there often purchase diamonds worth £5 or £6 for £1, but they are pounced on by detectives on watch, taken to gaol, and heavily sentenced for unlawfully purchasing diamonds, whilst many of the blacks are never captured. Mr. Cardun strongly advises people, other than skilled mechanics, who have no money to spare, against going to South Africa before writing and ascertaining if there is a situation to be had, and the salary attached to it. Now that there are so many rushing to Johannesburg from all parts of the world, if any go from little Tasmania in search of work, Mr. Cardun feels certain that they will have much difficulty in obtaining a livelihood.—From a Tasmanian Paper, April, 1896.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE London Globe of May 27, 1896, has a few words on the subject of the Suez Canal and its uses and benefit to our own nation, which we are glad to transfer to our own columns. When our half-informed friends tell us that we are losing our trade with "the ends of the earth," and that the Germans and French are robbing us of it, we answer them with the statistics of the London Globe, and tell them that as to the bulk of the trade, passing eastwards through the Suez Canal, they are mistaken. Our trade is nearly ten times larger than that of the Germans or the French, taking the number of vessels employed, as the test; and besides that, it is a fact that the British vessels are larger as to their carrying capacity. The quotation is as follows:—

"THE SUEZ CANAL.

"The annual report of the Suez Canal generally makes pleasant reading for English folk, but never more so than on the present occasion. We have a twofold interest in M. de Lessep's grand work; both as investors and as users we share with it good times and bad. Whether it be regarded from the one standpoint or the other, the present return is eminently satisfactory. Owing to a large increase in the transit receipts, the administration is not only in a position to declare a fine dividend, but to fatten the reserve fund and to add a considerable sum to the renovation fund. These payments tend, of course, to secure future financial stability, and may, therefore, be regarded as somewhat in the nature of deferred dividends. But it is when the traffic comes to be closely analysed that England has the most cause for feeling content and even proud. Much has been said of late about the quick growth of Continental trade with Southern Africa, the Far East, and Australasia. That it is increasing admits of no question, but when German and French Chauvinists declaim about the immense commercial interests their respective countries possess in those parts of the world, they must, it is clear, obtain their facts from their imaginations. Last year, 3,434 vessels of different nationalities passed through the Egyptian short cut. Of these, 2,318 were English, all other nationalities, collectively, owning less than half the British total. But we believe that the disproportion would be still more striking if tonnage and not number were taken as a test. Ship for ship, English vessels using the canal are larger than foreign craft, and carry much heavier cargoes. Carrying the analysis a little further, we find that the number of German ships was only 314, and that of French 278, while Russia's share in commerce with the East seems to have been almost nothing at all, as the 39 vessels with which she is credited may be fairly taken as representing her transport service between the Black Sea and Vladivostock."

The owners of India, Burmah, the Strait's Settlements, Australasia, and South and East Africa, are bound to own the largest share of the Suez Canal traffic; but the wonder is that God allowed the French to be at the risk and cost of constructing this splendid work, blinding our eyes to its value and possibility, when He really intended it to be our highway to the East and South-East as well as to the South, thus giving us the right to defend it, and to occupy Egypt, within which it is situated, as a matter of self-defence. The Canal is a veritable "Gate" to the East and South-East, in which "Israel of the Isles" is most interested; and the fact is, that we have been led by a miraculous chain of circumstances to occupy Egypt, while we use the Canal with our shipping which, as is shown above, compares with that of all other nationalities put together, as over two to one! This vast proportion in our own favour is not secured by our hindering other nations trading in our Colonial Empire. Far from it! We invite the competition of foreign merchants in India and the East, as well as in our Colonies, West and South. The Germans, at least, avail themselves of the privilege. But the result is not affected by our liberality. Our ships in the Canal numbered 2,318 last year, while those of all the other nations using that water way was only 1,116! Well may we thank God for this result and take courage. The fact is, of course, no evidence of our worthiness in the sight of God, but only of His faithfulness who promised to "Abraham and his seed for ever" the gift of the Gates, which gives "the power to get wealth," as well as the command of the sea (Gen. xxii. 17; Deut. viii. 18). To Him let Israel return all the praise for His undeserved mercies to us His people and His servants! To our opponents it counts for little or nothing that the Suez Canal ministers to our commercial prosperity, our wealth, and national greatness. It is so, and they are content with knowing the fact. But to link the fact with the purposes of God or to imagine that He has anything whatever to do with it, is what they will never allow. It is vain to tell them that the Canal is a marked "Gate" opening the East to the West, and the West to the East, given to our race because we are Israel. The Jews of old found it just as hard to believe that the carpenter's Son was the Redeemer and King of Israel. They discredited the fact, despised the evidence God gave them to prove it, and as the consequence put Him to a cruel death. To this day they are suffering the consequences of that terrible mistake. "The wrath of God has come upon them to the uttermost" on account of it (1 Thes. ii. 14—16). We do not say that rejection of our nation's claim to be Israel will meet with the same terrific punishment. Far be it from us to say so! The consequence to those who refuse to believe the evidence God gives us, is and will be, the loss of comfort and consolation in the times of trouble which are coming upon the whole earth, but from which we shall, we trust, in great measure be allowed to escape. The promise that the Lord will protect Israel from "the indignation" which the earthly nations shall suffer, and the way that immunity shall be brought about, are clearly stated in such Scriptures as Isa. xxvi. 12—21; Zeph iii. 9; Luke xxi. 25—31. It will be a comfort in the dark days coming to have these Scriptural promises to fall back upon. Those who refuse to believe that the British are Israel in the face of the evidence which the BANNER has furnished to the world for the last 20 years, cannot complain when they see the dangers into which we shall soon, nay, even now seem to be ready to fall. They will find no comfort then in the thought that ours is a non-Israelite, Gentile nation; for there is no promise within the four corners of the Bible to encourage the Gentiles as such to think that apart from Israel they can inherit Israel's blessings. Israel is "the heir of the world," and of all that Christ has to give, here and hereafter. Apart from Israel the world and its nations can inherit nothing.

DO THE PROPHETS NOTICE THE CHURCH?

(EZEKIEL XLVII. 1—13).

By H. E. OLIVE.

PART II.

Now the idea that I want, above all things, to set before you in this paper is, that the Apostolic Church is the continuance under altered conditions of the Jewish Church, and is the true, progressive realization and fulfilment of Ezekiel's vision.

I have noticed before, that as a Jew, Ezekiel could only conceive of a perfectly holy Church after the experience and training of a Jew. He would look forward to a continual succession of bloody sacrifices and ceremonies, joyfully offered and carefully observed, to a priesthood each member of which was holy and upright in life, to a perfect worship of God according to the Mosaic ritual, to a temple so holy that the Lord could enter in and fill it with His glory (see chap. xliii. 1—7). Because the prophets spoke under inspiration, we have no reason to believe that they could themselves realize the full meaning of their words, or that they were possessed of a supernatural knowledge of the future. Such a Church and ritual as Ezekiel describes would be the highest conception of a devout Jew; but this ritual and the sacrifices of animals were to culminate, and be absorbed in, and replaced by the sacrifice of Christ on the cross, and in its altered development the perfect Church was to become the Christian ideal.

The vision of Ezekiel is that of a purified and restored Church, ritual and order of priesthood. Looking on, as he did daily, at the defilements of the temple worship, the evil lives of the priests, the idolatry of the people, the mixture of Paganism and superstitious Judaism that had grown up in Israel, he yearned for, and dreamt of reform and restoration. Under divine inspiration the revelation of this came to him as he was able to bear it, and this same revelation enables us as Christians to embody in his words, our conception of a perfect Church.

I have said that the Apostolic Church is progressive, because, though she is far from being the holy Church of the vision, she is ever pressing towards holiness. Her history is one of ceaseless conflict with error and with evil. She is still rent with controversies and divisions, she is still stained with backsliding and negligence. She is still impeded in her course by the rocks of heresy, the storms of controversy, the countless currents unhealed by the leaves of the tree of life. But, wherever she retains the purity of her faith, the true note of her divine origin and apostolic order, the integrity and holiness of her ministry, her sacrificial character and her missionary spirit, she must flow on as a visible power with an energy and depth that must overflow the earth as the great visible, living testimony of Jesus Christ, which is to influence the whole world.

"And I, if I be lifted up, shall draw all men to Me." As the Jewish Church lifted up the brazen serpent for the salvation of Israel, so has Christianity lifted up Jesus. The whole world is invaded by Him. The forces that still resist His power, Mohammedanism and heathenism, are on the decline. The other great opposing powers, superstition and atheism, have been, alas, engendered by the unfaithfulness of His members. They are manifestations of the anti-Christ which cannot be utterly subdued until the end of all things, and the final conflict between Christ and Satan results in the victory of the former.

The Church increases in vigour and influence, wherever we can discern in her the true notes of the Church of Christ. They are found in 1 Cor. xi. 3, and Eph. iv. 4—7. The sacraments of the Jewish Church are the types of those of the Christian Church. The blessed commandment given by Moses for the proselytising of the stranger, is succeeded by our Lord's parting injunction to His disciples: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature" (St. Mark xvi. 15). See also Ezek. xlvii. 22 to end.

I quote now from a sermon by the Archbishop of York, preached at the Congress at Norwich, 1895 :—

"To the eye of our blessed Lord, however obscure to our imperfect vision, the countless multitudes of those who have been baptized into His name and grafted into Him, are bound together in an union not less real because it is spiritual; they are one body in Christ. There is one Spirit, the Holy Ghost Himself, by whom we are all baptized into the one body, and there is one hope of our calling, the hope of the heavenly home. Whatever may be our differing conceptions as to the nature of the future life, or the conditions under which it shall be attained, throughout the length and breadth of Christendom there is one hope. But St. Paul presents us another group of unities—one Lord, one faith, one baptism.

"One Lord : wherever Christians are found the Christ is worshipped. There may be varied conceptions of His incarnate life, or His atoning death, but everywhere and at all times, He is the Lord, the Lord of the Church, Head over all things to the Church which is His body.

"One Faith: one in its subject, the revealed truth of God; one in its character, the attitude of believing trust in God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost.

"And there is one Baptism. Wherever the Church is found it is by baptism that its members are admitted. There may be different estimates as to its efficiency or its administration, but among all the divisions of Christendom there is one baptism.

"And lastly, the apostle reminds us that all these things are of God. They are not of man's device, they are not of man's operation. They have their source, their strength, and their sufficiency in the one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all. In this triple unity, a Trinity in unity, we find alike the deep foundation and the vital principle of the Catholic Church. St. Cyprian has called it the Sacrament of Unity."

Wherever we see a religious body holding the faith as it is in Jesus Christ, conforming to His sacraments, and manifesting a missionary spirit, there we may recognise the Christian Church, though such a Church may vary in its method of worship or in the order of its ministry.

But as members of the English Church, and of the Anglo-Saxon race, we cannot hide the fact that she, of all religious bodies, appears to bear within herself the notes of that Catholic and Apostolic Church, founded on the old Church of the wilderness, "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the Chief Corner-stone" (Eph. ii. 20).

The Roman Church claims justly to have the same ancient origin, but the whole spirit of her faith and orders has been altered by the acceptance, and also invention of erroneous doctrines. In contrast to the true Church of Christ, the strength of the Roman Church lies in her temporal power, and so in the true sense of the word as a Church and institution she has not a living, eternal power, though this must be possessed by members of her community. The strength and vitality of the true Church is drawn from her Lord; it is a spiritual power. The strength and vitality of the Jewish Church lay in the Shechinah, in the Urim, and Thummim, in the revelation of God in her midst. When these ceased she declined and died away. The temporal power of Rome lay in her earthly aggrandisement, her visible supremacy for the time, but this was her spiritual death. While letting go the true source of life, she has been forced to adopt artificial means of simulating a life that is no longer hers, and so has formulated one false doctrine after another, culminating in the last, that of the infallibility of the papacy. She has been driven doctrinally, as it were, into her last and strongest but, alas, most fatal defence against the truth. Yet we owe much to her in the past and must see how at one time, God made use of her as an instrument.

In the middle ages, before the Reformation, in her earlier and better days, it was the Roman Church that guarded the repositories of truth, and the true doctrines of the Trinity and of the Incarnation, from the destruction of the barbarians. In speaking of the present we must not forget the past nor what we owe to it. Our Church will only continue to be true to the Spirit of Christ, so long as she is faithful to her origin in the apostles and the prophets. It was to the Primitive Church that our Lord committed His history. The apostles transcribed the Gospels, the martyrs won the triumphs of the faith, the controversies with heresies formulated and purified our creeds, and the Roman Church guarded dogma in the darkest period of the middle ages. All the different Christian bodies now in existence owe their Bible and their creeds to the Church of the Apostles.

To return to an old metaphor, that of Ezekiel himself, the stream of faith has flowed on through the ages from those days before the ascension of Jesus, when He gathered and taught His disciples, as we believe, the method of His Church, and of which we have hints in the first epistle to the Corinthians. The river flows unequally, it changes its course and its locality, and we in the end of this century can look back on its course, and trace in its purest stream, the indications of the true Church to culminate finally in the purified temple of Jerusalem, whither the tribes go up. When revealed to mankind this river will be "a sea in which a man may swim."

Perhaps the purest Church to be noticed next in order to that of the first two centuries is the British Church, influenced originally by the early Irish Church. In the British triads there is the notice of "Bran the Blessed, who first brought the Faith in Christ to the Nation of the Cymry from Rome." There are the histories of the Irish, Welsh, and Cornish saints; the traditions of Glastonbury, and so on, until we come to that most important event the meeting of St. Augustine with the British deputation at Aust, A.D. 603. I particularly mention this, as it was the first instance of English opposition to the papal claim, an opposition which has never ceased, and never will cease, while the Anglo-Saxon races exist. The spirit of our nation lies in Dinoth's speech given on that occasion: "Be it known and certified to you, that we all and each are obedient and subject to the Church of God, and the Pope of Rome, and to every pious Christian, to love everyone in his place, with perfect love, and to assist every one of them both in word and deed as being the sons of God. But other obedience than this I do not know should be claimed or demanded as due to him who you call Pope, as father of fathers. That this obedience we are prepared to give and pay to him and to every Christian for ever. Besides we are under the government of the Bishop of Cærleon-upon-Usk, whose business it is to superintend us under God, and to cause us to keep the spiritual way."

There are two facts which are certain—one is, that Rome cannot yield her claims, and the other is, that the Anglo-Saxon race, i.e., the masses of the people, will not submit to them. The spirit of Dinoth lives on in our people. It has shown itself again and again in English history, in the long dispute as to investiture between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the early English kings, in the struggles and martyrdoms of Mary's reign, in our support of the Reformation and our law for the Protestant succession.

NOTE.—"The recitation of the Creed as a liturgical act originated in the Church of Antioch in A.D. 471, and gradually spread westward, but it was not generally adopted in the Roman Church until A.D. 1014, though it had found its way into the Anglo-Saxon office much earlier."

"A creed written in Greek, but in Saxon characters, and preserved at the end of Æthalstan's Psalter, would seem to be a still earlier version of the Apostle's Creed."

"The Creed of St. Athanasius was admitted by the English Church nearly a century earlier than by the Roman Church."—From "The Prayer Book," Rev. Evan Daniel.

BRITISH ISRAELITES AT BRISBANE, QUEENSLAND.

THE annual meeting of the British-Israel Association was held last evening in St. Paul's school-room. Mr. T. R. Dickins presided, and there were about a dozen members present.

After the ordinary business was transacted, the Secretary (Mr. Wickens) read the annual report, as follows:—

"Your committee, in submitting this, the third annual report, have much pleasure in recording a steady but sound progress of your association. The year opened with a visit from Mr. Grimley, the President of the Brisbane Association; that gentleman having accepted an invitation to address a Maryborough audience met with a good house, and doubtless caused many of his hearers to become interested. Your thanks are due to Mr. R. W. Sim, of Bowen, for the gift of a case of literature; also to Mr. Meeks, for the various papers contributed by him during the past year. We are pleased to notice the increased interest that is taken in the discussions at the ordinary meetings, a feature much to be desired, and we would recommend that short articles from some of our literature be read at future meetings with the object of opening discussion thereon. We would also suggest that every member make it a point to bring a friend with him to our meetings to discuss the subject with us, and thereby make the meetings a still greater success. Several new members have joined us during the year, and we have good reason to believe that numbers are becoming interested in the subject, and will doubless become one with us in the near future. The library has been greatly availed of during the year, and several new editions have been added thereto, altogether now forming a splendid library of Identity literature. Appended is a statement of receipts and expenditure, showing a balance to your credit of £1 1s. 3d. —THOS. R. DICKINS."

The report was adopted.

The following officers for the year were elected: President, Mr. E. Melksham; vice-presidents, Messrs. Hubbart and Holcroft; secretary and treasurer, Mr. R. Eadie; librarian, Mr. A. Brown.

Mr. Melksham then took the chair, and returned thanks.

One new member was proposed, and the following motion carried: "That the meetings of the Association be held in future on the Monday on or before full moon."

The Chairman read an original paper on "What good is the British-Israel theory?" in which he stated that the masters and bachelors of art and doctors of divinity must be blind indeed not to be able to see the good that was in the belief, as it showed that the promises made to the lost tribes were being fulfiled, as shown every day in the great movements of England and the world, and were rapidly approaching consummation.

Mr. Eadie also read a paper on events likely to take place in 1896—7, a most nonsensical paper, written by an unbeliever in Israel's destiny, which was severely criticised by the chairman.

The next meeting will be held on the 27th inst.—Wide Bay News, Maryborough, Queensland, April 14th, 1896.

"OTHERWISE."

I THANK Mr. Carlyon for his courteous notice of my paper upon the rendering of ἐπεὶ at Rom. xi. 22.

He does not traverse my statement that in the R.V. the word is given as otherwise but twice, and that there is but this one place in which a peculiar sense is given by the exceptional rendering. It is not exactly correct to say that I repudiate the word "for its solitude." I question the reasons which apparently influenced the translators and revisers, and which same reasons he founds his own opinion upon. I take them in the following order:—

1. That if we read "since," St. Paul "consigns all wild grafts, and therein all Japhetic Churches, to the doom of excision." I think I guarded myself against this misconception. St. Paul is writing to the Roman wild graft only. Nothing that I wrote ought to have been taken as arguing from a particular statement to a universal. Mr. Carlyon has made this mistake.

2. That the British race as a whole, believing themselves to be wild grafts, will be repelled by the statement. But neither will they be drawn to the knowledge of their true position as original branches by the reading as it stands. Neither motive ought to influence the result of an investigation such as this. And as to the charge of "changing the words of Holy Scripture to suit our argument," the rendering of "since" or "otherwise" does not in any way affect the argument for the Identity.

3. That St. Paul's words are hortatory only in this one sentence. But remembering that the Roman wild graft has already been excised by the protesting action of the Israelitish Church, and that because of the very errors that the Apostle wrote of—that the Church of England has not held communion with the Church of Rome for centuries — it seems incontrovertible that, the hortatory element in the words having been neglected, the existence of a prophetic element is manifested by the accomplished fact. In this connection it is well to remember that St. Paul's use of excommunication was not for the destruction of the individual but for correction and salvation, if or when the chastisement is accepted. The same principle may apply to Churches.

4. The bar to the re-union of Christendom. I fear that there is much danger lest a charitable hope may lead to a weak surrender. The original branches do not aim at supremacy, but the Roman wild graft does; and the Church of Israel may be tempted to lower her protest for independence and for doctrinal truth by a vain desire to conciliate Rome. There is hope for Japhetic Christendom, but not until the true relationship of the original branches and the wild grafts is better understood, and union upon a true basis may be possible only after a further use of the pruning knife of God. DENIS HANAN.

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"That God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (1 Peter iv. 11).

THE OPERATION OF THE FUND:—To proclaim by special means the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 150 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

From various places we have good accounts of the regularity with which our Seed packets are delivered, but I would remind our Sowers that I shall be glad to be advised at once when weekly, or monthly packets, being due, are not received. During the next few weeks many lectures will be given east and west of the South of England. Colonel Senior starts in Fowey for a campaign in various parts of Cornwall; for distribution there, we have sent a great amount of small things in literature. We should be delighted to supplement this by some of the larger works, if possible, that will be needed afterwards, we hope, by those who will be stirred up to study the British-Israel Question.

Mr. H. A. Marchant, in addition to his regular season's work on Brighton Beach, hopes to lecture at St. Leonard's, Eastbourne and Worthing, visiting each place several times. It may be remembered that Mr. Marchant also goes inland to other audiences, and therefore he will be glad to have plenty of British-Israel literature also, of all kinds, some of which, according to the measure of our purse, and all our other Sowers needs, we take pleasure in supplying.

For all the good work that the lecturers might do, the funds of the British-Israel Association are not at all adequate. We heartily hope that the great work there is to be done will be realized with increased force by all who have not merely their pennies, but many pounds to spare beyond the daily wants of us all. It is good indeed to give, and to give quickly and freely. We need, all of us, to take to heart the fact that our God knows what we have of His to give for His works.

An account will no doubt be sent to the BANNER of the addresses that were given by Mr. Marchant in Hyde Park this month, so I need only dwell upon the solemn fact of the attention and deep interest of the listening crowds, and refer to the actual sales on the spot, of the Handbook, "British-Israel Truth," and to the welcome accorded to the BANNERS, leaflets, &c., that were given away. We were able to supply a good amount for distribution. Truly the people are ready to receive the good news presented to them.

Again and again we hear and note that comparatively few men attend services, and take part in the public worship of God. May it not be that the time has come for a fuller and wider teaching and appreciation of Bible truths is required than is ordinarily presented? Are the generality of our clergy behind the times, and letting our people slip away from them, while they harp and harp again on the few strings they have familiarised themselves with, but a full sweep they never take, and the perfect harmony they should try to bring out from the Scriptures is totally wanting? Possibly the strange and complex problems that exercise the brains of many in these latter days, demand for their sustenance the full strength of the food which the Word of God supplies. If it be not given, must we not expect to see weakness or depravity, infidelity, and discontent?

There is real truth doubtless in the following words received in a letter from an American clergyman: "I think the time has come when ministers of the Gospel should learn that they are not preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, in its fulness when they fail to recognise the Messiah's special relations with Israel." British-Israelites understand that statment. Who else would do so? But until it is comprehended, the Bible will remain a "sealed book" to many. Shall we not plead earnestly for the Holy Spirit to enlighten the clergy, making them willing to study anew and search for Israel, that they may fitly and faithfully feed the flock which now they know not to be Hebrews of the Ten Tribes?

Here also are the words of a Sower in Scotland that are well adapted to follow the foregoing quotation: "Truly our God doth not break His covenant, nor alter the thing that has gone out of His mouth. And were it not for the light thrown on the Scriptures by those who labour with you in the compilation and spread of Anglo-Israel literature, and otherwise making known the truth of the Identity of the British people with Israel, there are many passages in the Word of God which, to say but little, would be quite unexplained. But our Almighty God knew from all eternity all that should happen in time, and uttered nothing but what is sure to be accomplished."

A fine account of progressive work in New Zealand that has just come to hand must be held back for another occasion for lack of space.

From Canada, Prince of Wales, N. W. Territory, has come the good news of the formation of a new association: "The Anglo-Saxon Israelite, and Literary Association, and a strong request for a good supply of literature is sent, and a promise that, "when we get the Association into shape we will send money towards the Distribution Fund." We hope to send a packet by the next mail, and shall be glad of all the help our friends can give us for this, and all our other Sowers up and down the globe, and again we pray that our God will abundantly bless the distribution of the literature for the honour and glory of His name through all Eternity.

SPREADING THE DOCTRINE.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

Dear Mr. Editor,—I am wishful to elicit the opinion of our fellow-believers in our Israelitish origin, as to whether the time has not come for some "forward movement" in relation to the spread of our views. We can scarcely be satisfied with the progress we are at present making. Would it not be well to put into execution in some more decided way the motto of the old Reformers—"Agitate, agitate, agitate."

The modus operandi by which we are now seeking to increase our numbers is by public meetings, by books and pamphlets, and by the separate efforts of individuals. But are not the total of results disappointing, because the methods are inadequate? Our public meetings are exceedingly few, and usually thinly attended. Books and pamphlets are not to any considerable degree read, because those to whom they are offered very frequently have known something more or less of the earlier literature, and are prejudiced against the subject. The efforts of individuals are confined mostly to the narrow circle of our more zealous friends. We are thus not to-day in touch with the great British public; with the men of astute mind and of social weight, because they lie outside the arena of our propaganda. Yet, to how many of such, a question of such thrilling interest, enforced by arguments so cogent as ours, would speedily commend itself, working in them that conviction of truth which would hasten the day of its national acceptance.

The question then is this—What other means can we take for the spread of our doctrine? Probably the very best would be that of utilising the Press in a way that would secure public attention to the matter. We all remember how, according to the legend, when the mountain refused to come to Mahomet, Mahomet wisely determined to go to the mountain. So, if the public refuses to come to us, we better resolve to go to the public by the via media of the Press. But this must be done on some new line of action. If editors of secular and religious papers would only admit of the discussion of our question in their columns, we might have ample success; but editors too generally are shy of our doctrine, and shut their gates against us. Very well; but is there not yet another plan? Suppose we were to get a whole page of a daily newspaper, and fill it up by suitable letter-press, with a concise and masterly statement of the case, and pay for it as an advertisement; then our doctrine would go simultaneously into the hands of tens of thousands who will not pay attention to it in any other way. Suppose, for example, that a whole page of the Daily Graphic, or some other popular newspaper of its size, were thus paid for, we should thus lay bare the pith of our argument without overburdening the mind of the reader by excess of matter. Would not such a page become a starting-point of investigation to many of the shrewd and strong intellects of the nation, from which they would go further a-field in search of light and knowledge as to the origin and destiny of the British and American peoples? The age is remarkably ripening for such a theme, inasmuch as by the daily development of events, our theory is being justified, and the great prophetic scroll fulfilled before our eyes.

The only objection or difficulty in the plan appears to be in the question of cost. A page of a daily paper is not a cheap thing to buy; while our forces are not over strong in a financial point of view. Yet it may be, that the idea only needs suggesting, and all the necessary expense may be speedily met.

Having had some share in the scheme of "The Handbook of British-Israel Truth," which has been so decided a success, I may, perhaps, all the more confidently venture to place this additional scheme for the consideration of the readers of the BANNER OF ISRAEL.

I am, yours most truly, J. IDRISYN JONES.

Welshpool, July, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—What boundless blessings there are in God's Word! St. Paul gives us good advice when he says, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good" (1 Thess. v. 21). I have had such a beautiful unfolding of the Lord's promises by studying His Word on, "I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth" (Gen. xii. 2, 3, xiii. 16). I was obliged to ask a friend of mine to calculate the following figures for me on the scale given, to see the splendid result of one of the Lord's promises. This is not the proof, but it is very good:—

BRITISH-ISRAEL IDENTITY ASSOCIATION.

The Lord's Covenant { to Abram / Abraham } Gen. xii. 2, 3. „ xiii. 16.
through Isaac

The birth of Isaac is remarkable to us, for it is the same date before Christ as next year we shall be after Christ (Gen. xxi. 2—5.) } 1897.

Isaac was married to Rebekah in 1857; this makes Isaac 40 years old. See also the blessing to Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 57—60).

We will suppose with this blessing upon these two wonderful persons (Isaac and Rebecca), that when Isaac was 50 years old, they had two children: that would be four in all, and we double this every 50 years:

50 years...	4	250 years	64	450 years	1024
100 „ ...	8	300 „	128	500 „	2048
150 „ ...	16	350 „	256	550 „	4096
200 „ ...	32	400 „	512	600 „	8192

and keep doubling it at the same rate for 3,800 years will bring us to the year 1903. What a fulfilment of the Lord's promise when we can comprehend this number—151,118,411,806,388,646,838,272.*

Trillions, Billions, Millions.

Ah, "who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel?" (Num. xxiii. 10).

The writer was forcibly impressed by the Lord's Covenant, while studying the "Lord's "I Will's," in preparing an address to be given to the Liverpool Association, on May 28th, 1896.

P.S.—I am not supposing that this is the Fourth Part of Israel; no, far from it.

You will see the scale at 400 years gives 512; just to show the scale is not overdrawn, see the first chapter of Numbers, which gives the men fit for war over 20 years old. This was 407 years after the birth of Isaac:—

The Tribe of	Reuben	46,500
	Simeon	59,300
	Gad	45,650
	Judah	74,600
	Isaachar	54,400
	Zebulun	57,400
	Joseph—
	Ephraim	40,500
	Manasseh ...	32,200
	Benjamin	35,400
	Dan	64,700
	Asher	41,500
	Naphtali	53,400
		603,550

This list does not include the tribe of Levi, and all the males under 20 years of age. Then, there are all the females of all ages. If we consider them to be twice the number, that would be:

		1,207,100
Fighting men	...	603,550
Total	...	1,810,650

I am well aware this number will be increased very much by strangers who settle with the Israelites. Of course it is impossible for us to give any definite number. All the Lord's promises are far beyond our comprehension! We are lost in wonder, love, and praise! Let all Israel praise the Lord!

JOSEPH DUDLEY.

* By W. Hopton.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—The following extracts are from the English Mail, of Jan. 24th, 1896:—

1. Mr. Walcott (in the U.S. Senate), denounced the action of Mr. Olney and President Cleveland, which he said was provocative of war, and concluded with an eloquent defence of England, which was loudly cheered in the gallery.

2. The Maoris have offered, through the Governor of New Zealand, to provide a regiment for service.

3. An Englishman, Frenchman, and German were dining together during the recent crisis. After dinner, the Frenchman rose and said, "Here's to France, the sun of the world." Then rose the Teuton, and he gave "Germany, the moon of the world." "Here's to England, the Joshua who commanded the sun and moon to stand still!" exclaimed the big Englander neatly capping his friends.

4. The Flag. An American paper tells this story: "In Havana, there was one day a great row in the streets, and a man was killed. Everyone ran away except an Englishman, who did not see why he should run off, but stopped to do what he could for the wounded man. The city was then, as it often was, under martial law, and in a few minutes a party of soldiers came up and walked the Englishman off. He was tried then and there by a sort of drum-head court-martial, and condemned to be shot the next morning at eight o'clock. He managed to get the news conveyed to the English Consul, and at a quarter to eight o'clock next morning the Consul appeared in his coach and four, uniform, cocked hat and sword, all his orders on, &c. The shooting party were drawn out, and the prisoner was there too. The Consul walked up to the officer commanding the party, and demanded the life of his countryman. 'Very sorry,' said the officer, 'but I must carry out my orders.' And he showed the warrant signed by the governor. 'Well,' said the Consul, 'at least you will allow me to shake hands with him before he dies?' 'I can't refuse that,' was the reply. On which the Consul stepped up to the Englishman, put his hand into his breast coat pocket, drew out a Union Jack, unfolded it, threw it over the man, and then said, 'There, now, fire if you dare!' The lieutenant was staggered, the matter was referred to the Governor, and the Englishman was saved."

5. Invasion of England. A certain Captain Baron Lutwitz, a member of the Grand General Staff of the Prussian Army, has written an article on the possibility of invading England. He comes to the conclusion, that such an undertaking would be dangerous, but not impracticable, and hopes that his paper "will have fundamentally shaken the belief in the legend of England's impregnability." Baron Lutwitz might have remembered that a greater strategical authority than even himself used to say that he knew seven ways of getting into England, but could never find one way of getting out.

(Two passages from Holy Writ, if known to the Baron, would convince him of the impracticability, and hopelessness, and worthlessness of all such schemes of invasion as worked out by him, and by other writers, who one and all ignore the God of Israel, the God of battles, and leave Him out of their calculations. They are 2 Sam. vii. 10, and Rom. viii. 31; also Isa. liv. 15, 17.—F. H. G.).

LORD DUFFERIN ON EUROPEAN PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.

IN his farewell speech in Paris, on the occasion of the banquet given in his honour by the British Chamber of Commerce on June 2nd, Lord Dufferin, in a few words, described the condition of the whole of Europe at the present moment, prepared and ready for war, but not knowing when or why it should take place. In the Book of Revelation xvi. 18, we have the fact predicted clearly that about the period in the world's history we have now arrived at "there shall be an earthquake (wars and revolutions) such as there was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake—so great." To produce such a catastrophe among men there must be a time of preparation for a war among the nations such as men have not yet experienced on the earth. Who can doubt that these preparations are now in hand and the outburst not far off? Lord Dufferin spoke as follows :—

But, whatever may be the ups and downs of the diplomatic career, every member of the service, no matter how unpromising the post he occupies, may console himself with the reflection that, if he is industrious, prudent, and, above all, single-minded, the bread he casts upon the waters will not be lost, and that, perhaps when he least expects it, his day will dawn; for, though, like everything else, the outward aspects of diplomacy have changed since the beginning of the century, never have the nations stood in greater need of the thing itself than at the present moment. What do we see around us? The whole of Europe is little better than a standing camp numbering millions of armed men, while a double row of frowning and opposing fortresses bristles along every frontier. Our harbours are stuffed and the seas swarm with ironclad navies, to whose number I am forced to admit England has been obliged, in self-defence, to add her modest quota. Even in the remotest East the passion for military expansion has displayed an unexpected development. In fact, thanks to the telegraph, the globe itself has become a mere bundle of nerves, and the slightest disturbance at any one point of the system sends a portentous tremor through its morbidly-sensitive surface. We are told by the poets of old that when Zeus nodded the golden halls of his Olympus shook to their foundation. To-day it would suffice for any one of half-a-dozen august personages to speak above his breath or unwittingly to raise his little finger, and, like in a heaven overcharged with electricity, the existing condition of unstable equilibrium which sustains the European political system, would be upset, and war, waged in circumstances of greater horror than has been hitherto known to the experience of mankind, might eventually envelope not Europe alone but two, nay all the four continents at once, since in every one of them representatives and offshoots of the contending nations would of necessity be brought into collision. It is to prevent catastrophes of this kind that we meek, civil-spoken, and mild-mannered persons have been invented. Looking at us, you will perhaps say that we are a poor and feeble folk, and that our calling is a sorry preservative against such dangers; but, such as it is, it is the best device that human ingenuity has been able to discover. After all, a very thin wire proves a perfectly effective lightning conductor, and for over 80 years, thanks to this unpretending agency, an unbroken peace has been maintained between your native land and the country with whose prosperity and welfare your own interests are so closely associated.

The war which Lord Dufferin anticipates will, he thinks, "be waged in circumstances of greater horror than has been hitherto known in the experience of mankind." How exactly parallel are the words of the Revelation we have already quoted above with those of Lord Dufferin's utterance! It is strange that unprecedented preparations for war should be taking place among the European nations if an unprecedented war among them were not also imminent! It is true that our own nation is making vast naval preparations to counterbalance those of our neighbours. But anyone can see, as Lord Dufferin tells us, that these additions are not for war, or offensive purposes, but for "self-defence." This is exactly the attitude God intends Israel to assume during the terrific time of conflict which is to occur among the nations. The "determinations" of our God in this respect are manifest from such texts as Isa. xxvi. 20, 21, and Zeph. iii. 8, where the Lord bids His people Israel "to enter into their chambers, and to shut their doors about them, and to hide themselves for a little moment, till the indignation be overpast. For, behold, the Lord Jehovah cometh forth out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquities—the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." The prophet Zephaniah discloses the Lord's purposes even more distinctly. Thus: "Therefore wait ye (Israel) for Me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey: for My determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms, to pour upon them My indignation, even all My fierce anger, for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of My jealousy. For then will I turn to the peoples a pure language (lip), that they may all call upon the name of the Lord to serve Him with one consent."

What Lord Dufferin describes is evidently the preparation for those chastisements about to fall upon the nations outside Israel, which God will bring upon them by wars one with the other—wars, which for horror and atrocity, will be unparalleled in "the experience of mankind." The facts being as they are, we have here another valuable proof that we are the lost House of Israel, for while the world is preparing for its own punishment, our own nation is living carelessly and confidently, as Israel was to do, without thought of national danger, but trusting on the contrary that in some way or other they will certainly escape. Just at the time when the continental nations are in anxious anticipation of coming evil, "men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth," our own people are feeling the influence of a call to send the Gospel to all nations, to benefit and bless all those who know not Christ. The cause of missions is making progress throughout the land as it never has before, and sacrifices are being made for Christ, and on account of His demands upon His servants, which certainly are without a parallel in the days that are past. We are comforted, therefore, by these things when we think of the troubles to come, and remember our Lord's commands in Luke xxi. 28, "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." We are not to suppose that in the midst of wars and revolutions, earthquakes and national disasters we British shall nationally deserve to escape. Far from that! Our deservings are nothing in His sight whose hand is to direct the chastisements coming on the earth. He will spare our nation because He has redeemed us, and because the Lord of glory, the King of Israel, has died for His people. His righteousness, which is infinitely precious in the sight of God, covers us, and is ours by imputation and substitution. So states the Word of God in Isa. liv. 17, R.V.: "This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord Jehovah, and their righteousness which is of Me, saith the Lord"—words which the context shows were spoken to Israel by their God, who is their Maker, Husband, and Redeemer (ver. 5, and Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21; comp. 2 Cor. v. 21). Our subject, in short, brings comfort not only to the believing Christian, but to the nation, God's people Israel, who, being "the sons of the living God," we know, by reference to Hos. i. 10, R.V., to be none other than the lost House of Ephraim-Israel, God's Lo-ammi multitude. To Him let us ascribe all the praise!

DO THE PROPHETS NOTICE THE CHURCH?

(EZEKIEL XLVII. 1—13).

By H. E. Olive.

PART III.

The description of the temple, priests, ceremonies, and offerings in Ezekiel's vision includes chapters xl. to xlvi. Chapter xlvii. is the vision of the waters flowing eastward, that wonderful, beautiful vision and prophecy revealing God's purpose, that the redemption of man, commencing in the East on Calvary has flowed westward, and then gathering force and momentum through the lapse of ages, flows eastward again to embrace the whole earth. His Church is Christ's instrument to save the world. And this vision also teaches us the eastward attitude of His servants to be always as those who look for the return of their King.

"The primitive custom of turning to the East during the repetition of the Creed probably originated in an old custom observed at baptism. The catechuman turned his face towards the West in renouncing the devil and all his works, and to the East in making profession of his faith. The early Christians were accustomed to turn to the East in their devotions just as the Jews turned their faces towards Jerusalem when they prayed" (see 2 Chron. vi. and book of Daniel). "Are your windows open towards Jerusalem?" —From "The Prayer Book," Rev. Evan Daniel.

In the latter half of Ezek. xlvii. and the whole of chap. xlviii., there is an account of the division of the land, and lastly of the Gates of the city and its name, "The Lord is there." With Ezek. xlviii. 30—35 we should compare Rev. xxi. 10 to end, "The Lord is there," "and they shall see His face." The natural law of the progress of Christianity is also the natural law of the chosen race who are eventually to possess the world, and to restore it to the dominion of Christ.

In the course of this history we trace, first, the uncivilized and savage state of man, such as he was after the expulsion from the garden of Eden, then the patriarchal or family life, as that led under Abraham and Jacob. This developes into family life under tribal government with a head or leader such as Moses was, a necessary arrangement during the sojourn in the wilderness. In Canaan the life of communities and cities begins and extends over the world by the forces of conquest, circumstance and civilization. The highest development of man is that of citizenship, i.e., as a member of a polity, or community, "that is the measure of the force of his influence on others for good or evil." St. Paul boasts of his heavenly citizenship (Phil. iii. 20), and the love of a city, Jerusalem, was a passionate instinct of the Jew. Plato's highest ideal of a Utopia, was that of a city governed with perfect laws, a republic, a community of men, the joy of each man being his membership thereof. St. Augustine's "City of God is at once the funeral of the ancient society and the gratulatory panegyric on the birth of the new; it was written to silence the last murmurs of expiring paganism. It acknowledged, it triumphed in the irrevocable fall of the Babylon of the West, the shrine of idolatry; it hailed at the same time the universal dominion which awaited the new theocratic policy. The earthly city had undergone its predestined fate; it had passed away with all its vices and superstitions, with all its virtues and its glories, with its false gods and its heathen sacrifices. Its doom was sealed for ever, but in its place had arisen the city of God, the Church of Christ. A new social system had emerged from the ashes of the old; that system was founded by God, was ruled by divine laws, and had the divine promise of perpetuity." I quote this passage from Milman's "History of Christianity."

St. Augustine in his conception thinks only of the substitution of Christianity for paganism in the Roman empire, then the civilised world; he does not recognise the continuity of the Church under another development from "the Church in the wilderness." He looks only at one aspect, one stage in the course of the kingdom of God, like Ezekiel, the only possible hope and ideal to him, but the same beautiful idea of a perfect city rises before his mind. And this is Christendom, the visible Christendom. I am in no way speaking of the Church within the Church, of God's dealing with individual souls, but of God's visible rule of the earth, and of those servants to whom He has willed to entrust this rule. The promises of earthly possession, and of being instrumental in God's purposes for mankind are given to all Israel; of his individual, eternal salvation, each man alone knoweth.

The broad facts of the subject are these. This earth is to be redeemed to the Lord, and the great instrument in this, the chief factor and agent in this purpose is the Church in Israel. She is God's outward, visible means of proclaiming the Gospel to mankind. In these latter days, we are witnesses to the fact that for many obvious reasons the greater capacity, inclination, indeed destiny towards this lie in the Anglo-Saxon or English-speaking races.

In conclusion, I ask leave to read the stirring words on this subject spoken at the Church Congress at Norwich, last year, by the Bishop of Norwich :—

"To be a chief instrument, if she will rise to her opportunities, of ministering the Gospel of salvation to the world-spreading Anglo-Saxon race in this wonderful age, and the wonderful ages yet to come, times of change, of controversy, of material progress, of discovery in the world of thought and science, of bold inquiry and eager speculation ever going on; while holding fast to the prime revealed truths of the Gospel, which, because revealed, may never be changed nor forgotten, yet to adapt herself to the wants of the age, and change if need be her methods to meet the requirements of the times; against the ever-varying assaults made by the proud and restless intellect to defend and elucidate the Christian dogma—and, oh! how thankful, my friends, we ought to be for the pre-eminent part which the Church of England in our own generation has taken by her noble literature in this indispensable work—to uplift the cross of Christ in every corner of the world where Christian zeal and English energy can penetrate; and by ministering the good things of God to the immortal soul, to be ever adding to the number of the redeemed, and thus preparing for the coming of the Lord—this is the glorious work to which our Church has been called by her Lord. She is in many ways calculated to be the organ of the religious feeling of a free people. If in times past she has leaned too much upon external props, upon a privileged position—at one time upon the favour of arbitrary kings, at another time upon the assistance of the Legislature—she has for some time past been learning the lesson of self-help, and finds that the lesson is a good one, though by no means learned as yet. She has never declared war against the spirit of the age, nor done aught which would prevent her from meeting the wants of the present or succeeding ages. Loyal to constituted authority she must ever be. It is one of her principles. But courageously worked, she is adapted to be a popular institution; and, indeed, in our great towns is being more and more worked upon a popular basis. It is evident, indeed, that in her merely human aspect, as an earthly institution, she is dependent upon the goodwill of the people to whom she has been called to minister. As a God-inspired society, in the exercise of her divine commission, she depends only and solely upon the loving will of her divine Head. Let us see, each and all of us, what we can do to aid her in her mission. Is not this the best and truest work to which we can set ourselves? After all, do we not realise the fact, and shall we not realise it yet more in the hour of death and in the future world, that the only thing worth living for is to know and do the perfect will of God; to listen all one's life long for the divine voice speaking to the soul, and give the response of faith and obedience; to turn ever to the Light, as the sunflower turns towards the sun, and, by divine grace, to draw ever nearer to that Light which shall 'shine more and more unto the perfect day.' You and I are only permitted to live in order that we may work the works of Him that created and redeemed us while it is day. And to those who fulfil their calling by doing what little may be in their power to extend His empire over the souls of men it shall be granted to hail with glad welcome Him for whose Advent the Church is ever praying, 'Lord, Thy kingdom come.'"

PART II.

EVENING PRAYERS.

IN the Magnificat the Virgin Mary says, "He remembering His mercy hath holpen His servant Israel, as He promised to our forefathers, Abraham and his seed for ever." This only applies to those descended from Abraham.

In the next Cantate, "He hath remembered His mercy and truth toward the House of Israel, and (or therefore) all the ends of the world have seen the salvation of our God," evidently through Christian Israel, but not through the Jews, who have been the open enemies of Christ all along. This Psalm of David, "a new song," is only a further development of the Song of Moses in Exod. xv. "He hath done marvellous things, His right hand and His holy arm hath gotten us the victory," which will again be developed into the Song of Moses and the Lamb, which none can sing, but the 144,000 who are redeemed out of the Twelve Tribes of Israel (Rev. iv., xiv.), shewing the beautiful continuity of God's works and ways.

Then the Song of Simeon, "a just and devout man, waiting for the consolation of Israel." The Holy Ghost was upon him, and he blessed God and said, Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation, which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people, to be a light to lighten the Gentiles (or for the unvailing of the nations) and the glory of Thy people Israel."

It is followed by Psalm lxvii., which shows the position of the chosen race as the means of bringing the world to God, every alternate verse applying to Israel and the nations, is as if we said, Deal so graciously with Thy people that thereby the Gentiles may join themselves to them and embrace their religion. "He has said and shall He not do it?" Through Abraham shall the world be blessed, and how but by bringing it to Christ.

Next the Litany, which is so applicable to all times. "Remember not our offences, nor the offences of our forefathers." Who do we think of here? "Spare Thy people whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy most precious blood, and be not angry with us for ever; spare us, good Lord." Is that not Israel brought back, Israel in whom I will be glorified, who is ever to seek Thy honour and glory?

"From all blindness of heart, good Lord, deliver us." "May it please Thee to bless and keep all Thy people. That it may please Thee to give to all nations unity, peace and concord." A distinction here seems to be made between us and all other nations. "Preserve to us the kindly fruits of the earth." It may not be generally known that in the Isle of Man they add, "restore and continue to us the blessings of the sea," intending Great Britain and Ireland as well. "We have heard with our ears and our fathers have declared unto us, the noble works that Thou didst in their days and in the old time before them. Lord, arise, help us and deliver us, for Thine honour." What, if we are Gentiles, has God's honour to do with it, for the promises were made to Israel and not to them. "Oh, Son of David, have mercy upon us." Here we claim our Saviour through His peculiar relation to Israel. Son of David is one of the many emphatic titles pointing out the favoured position which Israel occupies in relation to the Saviour of the world. He is called in Scripture, Jesus, the King of Israel, the Ruler of My people Israel, the Governor, and the Saviour and the glory of My people Israel.

In Prayers and Thanksgivings: "O merciful Father, who didst suddenly in Samaria turn great scarcity and dearth into plenty (so now) Have mercy upon us," &c. "Almighty God, who didst send a plague upon Thine own people in the wilderness; and also in the time of King David didst command the destroying angel to cease from punishing, so may it now please Thee to withdraw from us this plague," &c.

And for rain: "We give Thee humble thanks that it has pleased Thee to send us at last a joyful rain upon Thine inheritance." For deliverance: "We humbly acknowledge that all the punishments which are threatened in Thy law might justly have fallen upon us," for the law was given to Israel and is binding upon them.

In the Collects we pray: "Mercifully receive the prayers and supplications of Thy people," and "Thy humble servants," "This Thy family," "Thy faithful people," &c. "Lighten our darkness, we beseech Thee." And on Good Friday we pray for Jews, Turks, Infidels and Hereticks," for all the world, except ourselves, "that they may be saved among the remnant of the true Israelites." Who then are they, unless they are ourselves? True Israelites may be spiritual, but the remnant cannot be thus explained away. Observe the Collect and Epistle for the 13th Sunday after Trinity, and the Collect and Epistle for the 25th Sunday after Trinity (Gal. iii. 16—22; Jer. xxiii. 5—8), the last being a portion of the service that seems to force upon the nation the consideration of Israel's restoration to Palestine, and is enjoined to be read on the Sunday before Advent.

The Communion: "Your fathers did eat manna and are dead" (John vi. 58); "He that eateth this bread shall live for ever."

The Commandments were given exclusively to Israel as a sign (Deut. vi. 1—4, 7, 8), and if we are not Israel the sign has failed, which God forbid. Our Saviour (Mark xii. 29) commences the Commandments, "Hear, oh Israel," as in Deut. v. This we leave out and also in the first Commandment, after "I am the Lord thy God: thou shalt have none other gods but Me," we leave out "who brought thee out of the land of Egypt and out of the house of bondage," perhaps lest the British should learn their origin before the time intended. Second Commandment: we have not any graven images, nor had we even in the time of the Druids. Fourth Commandment: the observance of the Sabbath is a sign of His chosen people. This commandment we have been careful to keep, so that even to this day it is a sign (Exod. xxxi. 13—17; Ezek. xx. 12). Fifth, "Honour thy father and thy mother," and the reason is noticeable, "that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." The people's answer to each makes it the prayer of and for the nation. In answer to which we have God's promise, "I will put My laws in their minds, and write them in their hearts." Of all nations, we, the Jews, the Colonies and the Americans, observe, obey and teach these Commandments to our children (Psa. lxviii. 5—7).

Baptism. "As Thou didst safely lead Thy people through the Red Sea, figuring thereby Thy holy baptism, receive this child into the congregation of the flock of Christ, receive him for Thine own child by adoption, and make him a lively member of the Church, to continue Christ's faithful servant and soldier unto the end of his life, and see he is taught the Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments."

Matrimony. Early in the service the example of Isaac and Rebecca, who lived faithfully together, is given, and then, "as Thou didst send Thy blessing on Abraham and Sarah, to their great comfort, so vouchsafe to send it on these Thy servants, that they, obeying Thy will and under Thy protection, may abide in Thy love unto their life's end." And further on, "Abraham, whose daughters ye are," surely suggesting that under God, we should look unto the Rock whence we were hewn, unto Abraham our father, and unto Sarah that bare us.

Visitation of the sick. "Thou hast taught me from my youth up until now, therefore will I tell of Thy wondrous works." Yes, and He has also said, "Even to your old age I am He; even to hoar hairs will I carry you." (Apply this to the nation of Israel as Scripture does.)

In the Burial Service occurs, "I am a sojourner, as all my fathers were." "Thou hast been our refuge from one generation unto another." "Come, ye blessed children of My father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world."

Churching Service. "I will pay my vows now in the presence of all His people, in the courts of the Lord's house, even in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. Praise the Lord."

The Commination Service is all a bit of Israel, a Jewish service. "Make ye new hearts and a new spirit, wherefore will ye die, O House of Israel, turn ye then and ye shall live. build the walls of Jerusalem. Spare Thy people, good Lord, and let not Thine heritage be brought to confusion," and the blessing given to Aaron. "On this wise shall ye bless the children of Israel, The Lord bless us and keep us and lift up the light of His countenance upon us and give us peace, now and for evermore" (Num. vi. 23).

In Forms of Prayer at Sea, the first is noticeable as showing how our safety under God depends on the dominion of the sea. Prayer before battle: "Makes it appear that Thou art our Saviour and Mighty Deliverer through Jesus Christ our Lord. O save us, that we may praise Thee. O Lord of Hosts, fight for us, that we may glorify Thee" (and how often has He done so). Thanksgiving after a storm: "How wonderful art Thou in Thy works. He turned the sea into dry land. O praise our God, ye people; make the voice of His praise to be heard, who suffered not our feet to slip." Then Psa. cvii., which describes Israel in exile from the time of the captivity. It was sung at the feast of the Passover, and is called a "Hallelujah Psalm." It is addressed to the Lord God of the covenant race, whom the Lord hath redeemed, and gathered them out of all lands into a united nation. Read from the beginning. Ver. 7: "He led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation." He brought them here (2 Sam. vii. 10). Vers. 10—14: "Out of darkness and the shadow of death"—slavery and superstition. Ver. 16 speaks of reformation, and ver. 17 of martyrdom: "They drew near to the gates of death." Ver. 20: "He sent His Word and healed them"—the Bible and invention of printing. Ver. 23: "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters," refers to their mercantile and maritime power. Vers. 35—37: The outpouring of God's Spirit, our cultivating the waste places and the colonies, and going forth in poverty to sow. Ver. 38: The same overruling Providence through all, and finally our eventual blessing to all nations. The whole Psalm speaks of God's loving care for Israel. There are two refrains throughout: "O that men would praise the Lord for His wonderful works to the children of men;" "They cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and He saved them out of their distresses." And the last verse is: "Whoso is wise will ponder these things, and they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord." After victory: "We gat not this thing by our own sword, neither was it our arm that saved us; but Thy right hand and Thine arm, and the light of Thy countenance, because Thou hadst a favour unto us." "We beseech Thee, give us grace to improve this mercy to Thy glory, the advancement of the Gospel, the honour of our Sovereign, and the good of all mankind." In the ordering of priests: "Ye are called to be messengers, stewards, and watchmen of the Lord, to teach, feed, and provide for the Lord's family, to seek for Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and for His children who are in the midst of this naughty world, that they may be saved through Christ for ever. The church and congregation, whom you must serve, is His Spouse and Body; wherefore consider with yourselves the end of your ministry towards the children of God. Frame yourselves and families according to the doctrine of Christ, to be wholesome examples and patterns to the flock of Christ." And to the bishops: "Will you be merciful for Christ's sake to the poor and needy, and to all strangers destitute of help?"

Then follow three forms of prayer which were in use up to the twenty-second year of her Majesty's reign, when, at the desire of Parliament, she ordered them to be discontinued. The first is for the happy deliverance of King James and the three estates of England from the Gunpowder Plot, and also for the happy arrival of His Majesty King William for the deliverance of our Church and nation. The third sentence is: "Many a time have they fought against me, from my youth up: may Israel now say, Let Thy hand be upon the man of Thy right hand, and upon the son of man whom Thou madest so strong for Thine own self, so will not we go back from Thee. O let us live, and we shall call upon Thy name. Not our merit, but Thy mercy; not our foresight, but Thy providence, delivered us. Therefore to Thy Name be ascribed all honour and glory in all the churches of the saints from generation to generation, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Continue Thy favour, with the light of Thy Gospel to us and to our posterity, for evermore. Lord, Thou art become gracious to Thy land, Thou hast turned away the captivity of Jacob. Our enemies are brought down and fallen, but we are risen and stand upright. The Lord shall bless us, even He shall bless the House of Israel; He shall bless the house of Aaron."

In the commemoration of the martyrdom of Charles I. the following passages occur: "The adversary and the enemy entered into the gates of Jerusalem, they shed the blood of the just in the midst of Jerusalem. Be favourable and gracious unto Zion; be merciful, O Lord, unto Thy people."

The service for June 20th, being the day on which her Majesty began her happy reign. The lessons are Josh. i. 1—9 and Rom. xiii., in which occurs: "Knowing the time, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand. Look upon the face of Thine anointed"—a term applied to our Saviour; all the kings and priests of Israel were anointed, and sometimes the name is given to the people. "He suffered no man to do them wrong, but reproved kings for their sakes, saying, Touch not Mine anointed, and do My prophets no harm." The collect is: "Most gracious God, who hast set Thy servant Victoria our Queen upon the throne of her ancestors, let Thy wisdom guide her, send her help from Thy holy place, and evermore mightily defend her. Keep her in safety under the shadow of Thy wing and supported by Thy power [Have not all these petitions had joyful answers?]; and that these blessings may be continued to after ages, let there never be one wanting in her house to succeed her in the government of this united kingdom, that our posterity may see her children's children, and peace upon Israel," &c.

The Epistle which follows is beautifully suited to come after such a prayer. It begins: "Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, having your conversation honest among the Gentiles, that they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation."

Surely a guiding hand directed our reformers when they taught England in her national church to pray. If prayers mean anything, they must be taken in a literal sense, and in a literal sense the witness of our Church is that we are Israel.

GREATER BRITAIN IN THE MILLENNIUM, THE HEAD OF A FEDERATED WORLD KINGDOM.

THE following historical lecture was delivered at Exeter Hall, on 24th June, by Rev. Robert Douglas, Vicar of Bredgar by Sittingbourne :—

He commenced his lecture with an allusion to the day, St. John the Baptist's day, and the two-fold influence of the Baptist; the stern denunciation of the degenerate age, "O generation of vipers," and the insistance upon the great truth of God's determination to perfect His promises to the seed of Abraham.

We must not be carried away by the idea (that so many people have) that Satan is the ruler of this world. It is not so. God is the Ruler, and He governs for good now. Our Redeemer is Head now. It is true that Satan's power is still enormous, but Christ's atonement and ascension abolished the reign of Satan. Exalted to God's right hand, all power is given unto Him. In spite of all the notorious and deplorable evil that has marred Christianity, yet Christian history bears witness through all the ages to the marvellous victories of the Cross. The fight is still raging, but "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." Satan will have power to punish evil-doers, but all power is in the hands of our Lord to give us repentance.

The baptism of fire spoken of by St. Peter is not for annihilation, but to destroy evil and to purify, "We look for a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." On this earth the glory of Christ shall be revealed. "The righteous shall inherit the earth and dwell therein." The Israel of God is to be an everlasting nation (Gen. xvii. 19). Apart from this express promise it is reasonable that it should be so. The marvellous dealings of God with Israel for 1,200 years from Abraham to the dispersion, cannot be supposed to have utterly and abruptly ceased then. It would contradict the character of Jehovah; it would contradict the history of humanity. The peculiar interposition of God on Israel's behalf implies that He will still continue their guide. Yet the evil must be purged, and Isa. vi. 12 is a picture of the captivity. "Until the Lord have removed men far away and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land." But the next verse says they shall learn their lesson, "And it shall return . . . so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof."

St. Paul, commenting upon the casting off of Israel, says the pruning of the tree did not kill the tree. "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?"

Isa. xl: "Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel, My way is hid from the Lord . . . ? Hast thou not known . . . that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? . . . They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength. . . ." "Keep silence before Me, O islands, and let the people renew their strength." Isaiah is very explicit as to the ultimate recovery of Israel: "Israel shall be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation; ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end." Wickedness must be put away, but the end is not a curse, but a blessing that is to be poured out upon us and through us to all nations.

Referring to the stone . . . hurled at the idol and destroying it and then becoming a great mountain filling the whole earth, the lecturer considered the "stone" to be the Anglo-Saxons destroying the papacy. (In view of the great increase of Romanism in England to-day it is difficult to follow this reasoning). Yet the fact remains that Christian Britain as the head of the Protestant nations is influenced by the grace of God, enshrining the oracles of God in our laws, our Bible, our Prayer-book, and nationally resisting the errors of Popery. In Daniel's image the clay represents those backsliding Israel that have joined with the papacy and allied to idolatry.

Popery is a counterfeit of Christian apostasy from the Old Testament truth. The Romanists borrowed their ritual and laws from the Etruscans, who seem to have been descended from a mixture of Israel and the heathen. Buddhism also had its origin in Old Testament history. The source of all the religions is Israel. Apostate Israel (clay in the toes of the image, popery) is not the everlasting Israel. "Come out of her, My people," "receive not of her plagues." In the new covenant the redeemed is a mighty army for God and truth. There are stages of evolution of Israel in history; lines of demarcation between the present Christian Government and that of the Millennium. Before the age of glory there must be the time of great trouble and deep tribulation, but God's people shall be delivered. During the last 1,800 years, by His Holy Spirit, by His election of grace, God has been taking to Himself His Israel for the blessing of the world. The first drops of the early rain fell at Pentecost; the abundance of the latter rain will be at the Millennium. "I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh." "Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob and have mercy upon the whole House of Israel and will be jealous for My holy name." "The Redeemer shall come to Zion and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob."

The crucial test of Israel-Ephraim is "blindness" until the fulness of the Gentiles. "His (Ephraim's) seed shall become a multitude of nations." (Gen. xlviii. 19).

We long for the manifestation of Israel. In Isa. lxvi. there is the connexion of life and being with grace. The people are saved by goodness. "Before she travailed she brought forth." Ephraim has a policy of insurance guaranteed by God for endurance: a nation represented by election of grace. His stone kingdom for overthrow of idolatry. Over and over again there are infallible proofs that what was promised has been fulfilled to Britain and kindred nations. Scattered by the Caspian Sea, in different epochs, and gathered by God in different tribes, to come to these Isles of the West, and become a composite nation, ruled by special providence, as surely as Israel of old. Christ ordered the Church to carry the message of redemption. Apostles founded the Church in these realms. In the third century we had bishops; three British bishops attended the Council of Arles in A.D. 314, when there was no Bishop of Rome there! Through all the ages a constant succession of Church life in the nation. What is that Church which is doing God's work in the world? With Missions, Bibles, Prayer-books, a Catholic race diffusing Protestantism? There are 120 millions of English-speaking people; 15 millions are Roman Catholics. The mark of Israel-Ephraim, the Church of the living God. "How shall I give thee up Ephraim?" The nation is not wholly converted, but it contains a remnant spreading salvation. We deplore our sins, but we must not forget what God has wrought through us.

"How shall I put thee among the children and give thee a pleasant land, a goodly heritage of the hosts of nations? And I said, Thou shalt call Me, My Father, and shall not turn away from Me."

Not what we have done, but what God in spite of our unworthiness has done through us. There is still a large portion of the Anglo-Saxon race connected with the Papacy. Israel, according to the flesh joined to Antichrist. Tacitus relates the struggle between Arminius, our Teutonic ancestor, and the Romans in A.D. 9, when the Romans under Varus were utterly annihilated. But in many battles the Alemanni or Saxons saved the Roman army as allies. Political alliances with Rome could not save her. God's blessings on Britain are permanent. Her power is not moribund. Her missions are not diminished. Her language is spreading over the face of the globe. The blessing of Joseph is upon her. Truth and righteousness are the basis of her laws. A God-made nation, enshrined in His holy Church, as in no other nation on the wide earth. History shows her curtailing the tyranny and error of the Pope.

The stone kingdom hurled by Christ against five centuries of Idolatry. Wickliff, Reformation, Open Bible, revival of Church life. If the dark times of trouble are soon approaching, we look beyond to the coming of our dear Lord, the Head and King of Israel. We need the gracious outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Are we not all praying for this? Christians of all denominations, are there not Pentecostal Leagues amongst us? When God answers our prayer, and He will, then the Lord our Redeemer will come and set up His glorious rule. Holy Scripture declares that Israel glorified is the same Israel redeemed by the Saviour. The brightest jewel in the diadem of Emmanuel. A nation bringing forth the fruits of righteousness, blessing and blest. Our work to be a witness for truth, for philanthropy, a preparation of the kingdom of glory, a pledge and seed of it with promise of abundant harvest. "He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root. Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit."

[Note by the Editor.—We are not responsible, of course, for all the above contains. But we, generally, go with the speaker, though we notice one doubtful sentence.]

HONOURED BY AMERICANS.

UNBOUNDED EULOGY OF THE REIGNING SOVEREIGN OF THE GREATEST KINGDOM THE WORLD HAS SEEN.

"THAT the American people are characteristically large-hearted and ever ready to give 'honour to whom honour is due,' is known the world around. That there is something more, something deeper and stronger than friendship existing between us and our 'Cousins' across the water, has again been beautifully and emphatically manifested in the grand tributes of praise expressive of our honour and esteem for England's Queen.

"In illustration of this we quote one instance, from the sermon by Rev. Dr. W. B. Leach, Chicago, Sunday, May 24th, as reported by the Chicago Tribune. While heartily endorsing every word quoted, we think that some of our people—including not a few politicians—need to grasp the sentiment contained in the sentence, 'No words of eulogy can we bestow on England and her greatness, that do not redound to us also'—and all of that paragraph.

"Dr. Leach said: 'It is not unseemly to-day to turn our attention to one who in all the seventy-six years of her life has appeared to the world as the purest and truest type of womanhood as well as one of the greatest and most benignant of rulers. Not one jot or tittle does it detract from the glory of our own flag and country to turn and look at our motherland, from whence has come our glory.

"'Americans now, from Britain once, need not be ashamed to show the world whence they sprung. In honouring to-day England's Queen, we honour America. No words of eulogy can we bestow on England and her greatness that do not redound also to us. Hand in hand these two great nations, one in language and purpose, are going on to the subjugation of all the world. Soon will it be said that the Anglo-American tongue is the language of science and commerce the world over.

"'England's Queen is before the world to-day with a record unblemished, untarnished, inspiring, helpful to all. As a Christian woman she has been an example for years to the women of her land. The greatness of her royalty did not exclude the exalted, simple duties of wife and mother. She never forgot the sweet, modest, domestic traits of character that makes the true wife and mother.

"'It is then not out of place to-day for America, as a republic, and Chicago, the brightest jewel in that republic, to present a laurel of praise to England's Queen. We do thank God for the example set by the woman greatest in power of all women, of a humble, God fearing, homelike life, and pray we may be followers of it.'"

The above appeared in our American Identity paper, The Tribes in its June issue. It is highly satisfactory in respect to our gracious Queen's hold upon the reverence and affection of our Republican brethren. We are glad the sentiments have appeared in the first issue of the American Israelite journal.

"THE TRIBES."

OUR American friends have started a monthly paper of their own, the subscription to which is to be 50 cents a year. It is to be sold by Messrs. R. Banks, and it is hoped there will be a demand for the journal, that we may see the view our brethren across the water take of "Our Identity" and of their own, with the Lost Ten Tribes. The paper will be issued under a committee in Denver, Colorado; No. 1, Vol. 1. being before us. We hope The Tribes will attract to itself a large number of American readers. Already we see that secretaries of American Anglo-Israel Associations in esse or posse are sending letters of greeting to the new journal; Washington, Chicago, Omaha, appear representatively in that capacity. The leaders in the movement look to Britain, and the British as their brethren, partners in the blessing, both in enjoyment already, and yet to come.

We quote some of the papers in the first number that our readers may judge, regarding the kind of matter the editor, or editors, have put before the public as specimens of what is to follow.

In one respect we hardly agree with Mr. William A. Redding, who wrote the introductory article. He states that the "Anglo-Saxon, English-speaking Americans," should look upon themselves as the long-lost Ten Tribes of Israel, who left Palestine 721 years before Christ was born." This is a startling claim for the one tribe Manasseh to make! If that be the object of The Tribes, we do not think it can prosper. The one tribe Manasseh, whose history dates from Gen. xlviii. 19, cannot safely claim to fulfil the destiny of the Ten Tribes, located in the British Isles! Truth must go first before our Denver friends can hope to succeed. We re-publish Mr. Redding's paper first, and then the editorial. If the object be to show that the Ten Tribes have left the home God provided for them in the United Kingdom and in her Colonies, and are now settled in the United States, we should like to see the proof of that astonishing fact.

The following are the two papers we have commented on.

"INTRODUCTORY.

"Its proprietors have requested me to write the introductory for this, the first issue of their paper called The Tribes. Therefore, I am here to introduce to the people of the United States this publication, which is the first of its kind in America, and which is to throw back the bolts and swing open the great iron door and bring out from their darkened cell these Anglo-Saxon, English-speaking Americans, and let them look upon themselves as the long-lost Ten Tribes of Israel, who left Palestine 721 years before Jesus Christ was born. They dropped out of notice so completely that the best historians forgot them and they became as 'dry bones' of the dead past (see Ezek. xxxvii.), and we have abundant proof to show that it was the decree of the Most High that this should be so (for a purpose) until the proper time would arrive for them to come forth as the brilliant nation of the earth and lead the world. "When I have brought them again from the people and gathered them and am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations, then shall they know that I am the Lord, which caused them to be led into captivity (hiding). Neither will I hide My face any more from them' (Ezek. xxxix. 27—29).

"The Lord is now uncovering them in a wonderful way. 'I will bring the blind by a way they know not' (Isa. xlii. 16).

"The dealings of God with these ancient people, and their crooked but covered path are just now peeping to light, showing the marvellous wisdom and hidden manner with which Jehovah has handled the nations and stationed them on the earth to fit in the cogwheel of time as it comes around for them to step in and perform their part; and things are rapidly taking form for these long-lost people to come to the front, and it is causing upheavels and commotion everywhere. O, marvellous works of God! 'If it be marvellous in the eyes of these people, in those days, should it also be marvellous in Mine eyes? saith the Lord' (Zech. viii. 6).

"If you would learn about these people and the part they are to play in the world in the near future you should read every issue of this paper, as a host of the closest students of history and of prophecy in the world will write for its columns, so that each issue will feed your mind with the wisdom of the ages, and you cannot afford to lose this rare opportunity of learning the marvellous works of the Most High, who moves the nations with the precision of clockwork. The next twenty years will witness the greatest turn among the governments that has ever occurred, and you should be on your guard, by learning the general chain of the subject; and the Ten Tribes question is the key to the whole situation. EDITORIAL.

"This paper will advocate the view that God has kept His promises to the Ten Tribes of Israel. The current opinion of Christendom is that He has not. Nine-tenths of all the trouble theologians have with the Bible arises from this source. All concede that the threatenings have been kept but not the promises. The curses they accept in an historical sense but not the blessings, which they say are metaphorical. As a lawyer in North Carolina puts it: 'Israel is made to feel keenly the truth of prophecy when he is to be kicked, but when the pie is handed round he must be satisfied to wait for the sweet bye and bye.' We hold to the hypothesis that the promises are as real as the curses and as sure, and that the Anglo-Saxons as a race are in the enjoyment of them.

"On the other side of the sea valuable papers publishing these views are abundant. They have much to say of British-Israel. We expect in this little paper to say something on this side of the sea for Saxon-Israel. The people of the United States are somebody, and we propose to let them know it. The centre of Anglo-Saxon population has already shifted from Great Britain to America, and is now found in the United States. That centre is constantly moving westward. We shall be up to date in the recognition of this fact.

"There are thousands in America as well as in England, who believe that the Saxons are the sons of the Ten Tribes of Israel. Many of these already have local organizations for the study of this question and for the distribution of literature concerning the subject. It is the purpose of this paper to be a medium of communication between these organizations, and give them all the encouragement in our power. Communications from them will always be welcomed by the editors. Let us know each other, who we are, and where. Fellowship in the service of truth is precious. It will be the purpose of this paper to promote it in every way possible. It will increase in size and numbers with the increase of subscribers and means for its publication. 'Men of Israel, help.'"

The article of Mr. M. L. Streator, A.M., published in the American journal is a remarkable paper, claiming for the American people the position of Israel "cast far off" described in Micah iv. 6, 7. The "small one" (the Puritans) of Isa. lx. 21, 22, is become, according to this writer, "a strong nation," in other words, "the great American Republic." The result seems to be that the American Israelites are not content with the position which Jacob assigned to Manasseh, the elder of his two grandsons—but will not be satisfied till they have achieved the position and greatness of Ephraim and his "company of nations," the owner of the three Empires. We shall watch the development of these transatlantic views. At the first blush we hardly see how they can be made to agree with ours, which we believe are founded on the Scriptures of the living God.

KOBE.

KOBE! What is Kobe? Where is Kobe? Kobe is in Japan, at the head of the beautiful "Inland Sea of Japan," and is a flourishing Japanese town where there is an English "Settlement" of British folks, a bit of "dear old England" "transplanted in the Land of the Rising Sun." At Kobe there is no English Church; and the British there want to have one. The cost will be £1,500, of which the British Kobeites engage to raise £500. They want their friends here to give them the £1,000. To effect this object, they have published and are circulating in England one of the prettiest little Japanese circulars imaginable. It is a pamphlet printed on white cloth, profusely illustrated with Japanese figures and scenes, in colours, and can be obtained by anyone who wishes to possess a copy, from Mrs. Swann, Catthorpe Rectory, Rugby.

We republish the text of the pamphlet, (we wish we could copy the illustrations also), because some points are touched upon which are "household words" in the BANNER. Our Kobe friends know nothing of the BANNER or of Our Identity, no doubt; but their pamphlet helps us to realise the extent of the British Empire and that even in a foreign land like Japan they desire, being widely scattered everywhere, to possess a Church where they can worship God—the God of Israel—according to the teachings, and doctrines, of the Church of England. The appeal is headed "Kobe Church," and is to the following effect:—

"Of all the fascinating trips that this world affords, a run down the famous Inland Sea of Japan, in one of the fine 'Empress' line of subsidized armed cruisers, is perhaps as near to a flit through dreamland as it is possible to approach.

"And at last when, having run the whole length of those beautiful waters, the fine boat drops her anchor in the lovely bay of Kobe, with its azure blue waves lapping the pearly sand, that by its very softness has withstood the fierce onslaughts of the wildest typhoons, the traveller comes to the conclusion that he has not gone half round the world in vain.

"For there before him is spread out a scene of perfect beauty. In the background tower up peak after peak of mountain ranges, some wooded from base to summit, others varying the scene with their red bare loamy tops, though now possibly, all tipped with the first fall of dazzling white snow, glowing pink in the radiant sunrise. At their feet there nestles the Japanese town of Hiogo with its 180,000 inhabitants. Its quaint crescent shaped roofs forming a background to the forest of masts of the flotilla of native junks, with their lofty sterns and single big square sails, lying idly upon the water, waiting for the day's work to begin.

"Away on the right you will notice the 'Settlement' of Kobe, as it is called. Just a bit of dear old England transplanted to the land of the rising sun. In those verandahed, cool-looking houses, built specially strong to resist the periodic earthquake shocks, you will find hundreds of our fellow-countrymen. They have gone forth from our overcrowded little island, and are helping by their hardiness and enterprise to build up that worldwide Empire of which we are so proud.

"Looking back to the early days of Kobe's history you might have been present on an occasion of that stern legalized suicide known as 'Harakiri' the only honourable way for a condemned samurai to die. And you might have seen the Japanese officer, who ordered his men to fire upon the settlement, in expiation of his offence, calmly and deliberately take his own life with the special short sword that was ever carried for that purpose.

"But those days are no longer, Japan is far on the road to civilization, and Kobe, with its ship-building yards, railway construction sheds, its steamers connecting with every port in the East; and its lines of railway spreading out their arms east and west to gather in the trade of central Japan, is now the second port of this rising empire.

"So far Kobe's importance! On the other hand, as we have called at port after port, on the way from England to Japan, Gibralta, Malta, Aden, Colombo, Penang, Singapore, Hong Kong, Shanghai, Nagasaki, Kobe, and Yokohama, we have become accustomed to expect a Church in every port; and have by degrees become proud of the fact that our old Church of England has proved to have life enough in her, even in this nineteenth century, to plant a place of worship for her sons and daughters in those far off lands, where her children are called upon to sojourn, and are in such special need of her services.

"But in this long list of ports, half circling the world, the only place where Englishmen have not the privilege of worship in a building belonging to their own Church of England is this port of Kobe.

"And it is to ask you to lend a helping hand towards supplying this want that this appeal comes to you from the land of the sunrise. For it seems fitting that we who first see the light of each new day dawn upon the earth, should start that hymn of praise which Sabbath by Sabbath girdles the world in one great circle of joyous thanksgiving till it dies away again on the shores of the great Pacific in the far West.

"'The sun that bids us rest is waking
Our brethren 'neath the western sky,
And hour by hour fresh lips are making
Thy wondrous doings heard on high.'

"Again year by year, as Kobe rapidly grows, the stream of visitors from England and America who come to examine the curious customs and life of this interesting nation, becomes increasingly important. Making Kobe their base of operations, they go on excursions, either to busy manfacturing Osaka (the Birmingham of Japan) to historic Kyoto, or to the inland sea. And it becomes imperative to make full provision for their spiritual needs. For nowhere are the services of our Church of England more appreciated than in a foreign land.

"Again only those who have lived for a length of time among the heathen, can at all realize the terrible tendency which the lines between right and wrong, morality and immorality, have, to become blurred and obliterated. Shut off from the healthy moral atmosphere of England, one's ear gets accustomed to hear a lie told by the Japanese as casually and with as unblushing a face as the truth is at home; while the sad example set by the natives in the matter of morality, and the facilities afforded here for sin, are the ruin of scores of our fellow-countrymen, who, had their lot been cast at home, would probably at least have lived a moral life. The only light that can pierce this darkness is 'The True Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.' Again, Christian England, be it said to her credit, is, in obedience to her Lord's commands yearly pouring thousands of pounds into this far off land: Her object is to tell the heathen there (hundreds of thousands of whom are still bowing down to the fox, the badger, the sun and other objects) of Him who died to 'save His people from their sins.'

"But of what use is it all, unless the lives of the European community, lived before the Japanese, confirm the tidings that the messenger of the cross proclaims? And what use if the lives of those who are called Christians compare ill with the Buddhists?

"This makes it of the very greatest importance that all should be done that can be done to help our brethren here to live for God. Especially is this so now that Japan has by this war taken a front place among the nations. It is all the more important that the civilization she boasts and would offer to conquered kingdoms should not be a mere veneer on the surface, but should spring naturally from within, built, as all true civilzation must be, upon Jesus Christ the only true foundation.

"At present the Church services here are held in a building that is lent for the joint use of all sects, and has to be given up on alternate Sundays to other bodies, Methodist, Baptist, or Congregational who have all to worship in this the only available building.

"This of course makes our services very irregular, and is obviously a far from satisfactory arrangement. And so we appeal to you to help us to build a church that shall remind our brethren abroad in Japan of the churches of old England and the God our fathers worshipped.

"In this country of cheap labour a suitable church and site will cost about £1,500.

"Of this amount we can raise £500 here in Kobe, in the course of the next year; and we can only hope to do this owing to the offer of our chaplain to set aside the stipend accruing to him in furtherance of this object. This leaves a balance of £1,000 to be raised elsewhere. Can you kindly help us in this our need.

"Cheques made payable to the 'Kobe Church Building Fund,' at the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, Lombard-street, London, E.C., will be acknowledged by the Rev. S. Swann, M.A. (chaplain), Kobe, Japan. Or they may be sent c/o Miss H. Bardsley, Rose Castle, Carlisle, N.B., who will acknowledge and forward them to Japan; or Mrs. Swann, Catthorpe Rectory, Rugby.

"N.B.—This appeal has been privately subscribed for, and is not printed out of the funds. But it has cost 25 cents a copy, postage included. So if you are interested and yet unable to help us further, even that amount will be gratefully received."

RANDOM SHAFTS.

It is no new thing for people to apply the words of Scripture to British affairs, nor is it, from our point of view, a very marvellous thing, since we may be sure that inspired writers would use language suited to the case. But it really is amazing that men should seize upon lengthy passages descriptive of Israel, inform us they are beautifully true of the Anglo-Saxons, and yet ridicule or ignore the suggestion of an historical identity between the two races. Those who deny that we are fulfilling the prophetic destiny of Israel may reasonably oppugn us. But those who boast that the foretold future of Israel agrees precisely with the experience of our own nation, must have remarkably distorted faculties of perception if they cannot see that Great Britain and Israel are necessarily the same, or that the Bible is an unreliable book. Perhaps most of them do, but deem it prudent not to say so—at present.

If this is how the matter stands, I should certainly think that the Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., is among the majority. Last May the reverend gentleman preached the annual sermon on behalf of the Baptist Missionary Society, in which he said, "There is nothing more wonderful in the story of empires and nations, and nothing more unaccountable by ordinary causes, than the growth in power, wealth and influence of our own people and of the people who share our language and religion." Who would have believed it possible, he asked, that the "land whose praises Shakespeare sang would strengthen its stakes and enlarge the place of its tents until its sons ruled over one-third of the human race?" As far as it goes this is extremely satisfactory, because Isaiah liv. has in the past been devoted sacredly to the Church, and none except "carnal" or "ignorant" persons had presumed to give the prophecy a literal construction. Now the Baptist divine is, I submit, beyond suspicion; and he not merely literalizes it but Anglicizes it, like our depraved selves.

However, Mr. Greenhough is only beginning. "Imagine," he observes, "some prophet writing in those days when this little island was overshadowed by France, dreading conquest by Spain, soon to be outstripped in commercial power by Holland. Imagine him borrowing the words of Scripture and saying, 'Thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left, and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate places to be inhabited. The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee, and the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and kings shall minister unto thee.' What laughter would have attended his foolish arrogance and insolent misappropriation of divine words!" Of that there can be no doubt, because even to-day our application of the prophecy to England draws laughter from some and abuse from others. But we need care for neither. Our proper concern is to know whether the interpretations put forward by us are genuine or spurious, and Mr. Greenhough, at any rate, considers them genuine.

Take a few more extracts:—"Who would have believed that in this short time the words would come true—that the feeble sea-girt people would become the mother of empires? . . . Think of our enormous wealth—the bankers and capitalists of the world, lending to all and borrowing from none, with an annual income at least a thousand times as much as our whole expenditure on foreign missions; think how the purity of Evangelical truth has been preserved through all manner of revolutions and upheavals; how the Bible, which in other even nominally Christian lands is a closed or neglected book, is among us the book loved best, the well-nigh universal household treasure. . . . Think of it all. It is the one great modern miracle." And is there no hint in the Scriptures of this miracle? Prophecy extends to the latest ages, including the nineteenth century, and are we to suppose that it is silent on "the one great modern miracle?"

A peculiarly offensive matter to opponents of the Identity is our "presumption" in claiming to be "chosen" or "elect," and they are shocked that we should virtually accuse God of "favouritism." But Mr. Greenhough recognizes that the British have been "favoured," and tells us why: "Surely we have not been endowed by God in this way, that we might grow fat and luxurious. . . . Was it not especially with this intent, that we should set up a standard of righteousness, and that we should be more than all others God's messengers of light and truth to the nations that sit in darkness? In all this God's voice has been calling us. God's consecrating hands have been laid upon our head. Thus saith the Lord: 'In the shadow of My hand have I hid thee, and made thee a polished shaft, and in the day of salvation have I helped thee, that thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Show yourselves!' We are elect by all signs and proofs to be the great missionary nation."

After this, I do not see how the Baptist denomination can look on Mr. Greenhough as a good Christian, and am prepared to hear its organs summoning him wildly to recant or resign. But instead of excitement in the camp, one editor states that the occasion of this address was a "time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord," and is "thankful the preacher was led of God to speak words of such true eloquence and of such animating power." It is strange. What does it mean? It seems to mean that literal renderings of prophecy are not so abominable to the clerical mind as we had thought. It seems to mean, further, that the "stealing of Israel's promises" is not always theft, and that their dedication to our country is not always heresy. Allow men to harbour the ingrained fictions of Gentilism and Japhetism; do not ask them to cremate the compositions or retract the assertions of a life, and much will be forgiven.

Still, "refreshing" though it may be, and innocent though it may appear, Mr. Greenhough's method of employing Scripture is not without attendant evils. The mass of his listeners would of course feel gratified at his quotations and their consummate harmony with British history. But the audience would embrace many reflective people of two kinds—the sceptical, touched with the rationalism of the hour, and the perplexed faithful. The sceptical, with their scruples about the doctrine of Inspiration, would have their mistrust abundantly confirmed, for what Isaiah had predicted of Israel was being accomplished by a totally different stock; while as for the faithful, their faith would receive another rude blow. If Mr. Greenhough had avowed that the British were lost Israel, the result would have been just the reverse: doubts would have been dispelled, and the depressed faith of numbers built up. But half the truth, like a little learning, is a dangerous thing; and to handle the Scriptures in this unnatural style is simply to proclaim their failure. It is quite the fashion—and temptingly easy—for divines to cull their illustrations of British exploits from prophecy; but they should beware of the fact that in so doing they are either sounding its triumph or telling its knell.

THE BRITISH NAVY AND THE ARM OF FLESH.

THE late increase of the British Navy in accordance with the proposals of Mr. Goschen and the Government at his back have called forth comment from The English Churchman and St. James's Chronicle, which in some respects are admirable, but in others are erroneous, since they declare that our commerce, wealth, and foreign possessions are traceable to this nation's constitutional profession of Bible Protestantism, and will all disappear if we fail to be faithful to the fundamental principles of that Protestantism. That is to say, that as long as we maintain this national Protestantism according to the Bible standards, we shall continue as we are, expanding, wealthy, successful in commerce, and generally prosperous. But if we cease to be Protestant, we shall be punished by poverty, commercial ruin, contraction of Empire, and general collapse.

In the one case, our national excellence will earn God's favour; in the other, we shall lose it, because we fail to perform our part of the implied covenant! We do not so read our Bibles. We there find that the blessings we enjoy, enumerated above, are those bestowed by God upon His people Israel, not for their past, present, or future excellencies, but because God promised them "to Abraham and his seed for ever," as the reward of his obedience. The promise was to him. His obedience at Mount Moriah in the matter of the sacrifice of his only son Isaac, was the occasion, as some regard it, of the ratification of the promise previously made in Gen. xvii., "Because thou hast obeyed my voice."

These blessings, then, are ours not for our Protestantism, but because we are the seed of Abraham, and, therefore, heirs of the promises. Our national Protestantism, such as it is, is God's gift to His people, who are also "His witnesses," as stated in Isa. xliii. 10 and xliv. 8. The English Churchman admits "our enormous national wealth," our vast Colonial Empire, our "cosmopolitan trade," and our Protestantism, but never seems to reflect that these national marks point to our Israelitish origin, since these things, with many others like them, were to be Israel's features, while in fact no one can deny that they are ours to-day. The words we allude to in The English Churchman were these:—

These facts suggest various reflections. When we compare the vast extent of our Colonial Empire and our present cosmopolitan commercial trade with what they were immediately prior to the Reformation, or the British Navy in the days of Elizabeth with that of to-day, the contrast is pregnant with instruction. It was long since pointed out by the late Dr. Wylie, in his "History of Protestantism," that the total tonnage of the Navy in the reign of Queen Elizabeth was merely such as in our time is represented by one of the great Atlantic-going steamers. England's foreign possessions, her vast commerce, and her national wealth are distinctly traceable to her constitutional profession of Bible Protestantism, while her power to retain these unparalleled blessings depends entirely upon her fidelity to the fundamental principles of that Protestantism. Our "first line of defence" is God Himself, rather than the mightiest navy we can produce.

The truth rather is, that Bible Protestantism is one of the chief of God's good gifts to Israel. But as the British are Israel it is His gift to them. That this is the case is shown by such texts as these:—

"He showeth His Word unto Jacob, His statutes and judgments unto Israel; He hath not dealt so with any nation; and as for His judgments they have not known them" (Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20, R.V.). "Remember ye the law of Moses, My servant, which I commanded him in Horeb for all Israel, even statutes and judgments" (Mal. iv. 4, R.V.). "I have written for him" (Ephraim) "the thousand things of My law, but they are counted as a strange thing" (Hosea viii. 12, R.V.). "First of all, they" (the Jews) "were entrusted with the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 2, R.V.).

Being gifted with these, they are not, therefore, on that account rewarded also with the other blessings enumerated.

Digitized by Google

Rather these benefits, including the Word, and the national Protestantism it produces, are first and last God's promised gifts to Israel, and we, therefore, possess them to-day because we are Israel. They confer no righteousness upon us, but we have them because of our descent from Abraham as "the heirs of the world."

In regard to the boastful spirit of some among all classes, and their claim to be superior to all other nations, this must, of course, be rebuked. It is an anti-Christian and anti-Israelitish spirit; and is not conformed to Christ's. Israel's function is "to bless all nations," according to the Scriptures, but not to boast themselves as superior to other races in "wealth or strength." God bestows these gifts, however, on His people to make them higher than all their rivals, that they may compel obedience, and so procure a hearing for the Gospel among all nations. Hence, He has given them India, Australasia, Canada, and the many regions in Africa, where they are supreme. Here and there, as at present in Matabeleland, there is a great uprising of the natives to shake off their yoke, but in the end it is and will be seen, as in India after the mutinies, that their supremacy by sea and by land is better assured by the rough experience they go through, and that in the end they bless the nations, even when they have first had to subdue them by naval and military force. India is an instance in point. Even after we had obtained possession we have had again and again to stamp out the spirit of rebellion, till the desire to get rid of our presence in the Peninsula culminated in the terrible mutinies, which cost us much British blood and vast treasures before we could convince the natives of North India that God had given us their land to bring them under Christ, and finally to bless them with all the blessings which lie at His right hand. To Him be all the praise.

THE RETURN TO PALESTINE.

THE following was published by The Jewish World newspaper, on July 10th, 1896, being a letter from our friend Mr. H. H. Pain, of the Stock Exchange, London. The editor does not appear to have made any remarks on the contents!

To the Editor of "The Jewish World."

"Sir,—I read in last night's Globe an extract from the Jewish World relating to the practicability or otherwise, of establishing a Jewish State in Palestine.

"No one doubts—and least of all a Stock Exchange man—that if it was simply a question of money that the Holy Land could be run as a financial success by the chosen people, as represented by the Jews. But after all has been said and written on this interesting topic, from a commercial, financial, or political aspect, no one can get over the fact that the re-settlement of Palestine by the chosen people can be only profitably discussed, by viewing this question from a Scriptural standpoint as laid down by the Old Testament prophets.

"Now, whether we are Jews or Christians, we can all meet for discussion, on the common ground of a general acceptance of the Old Testament writings, which speak in no uncertain voice as to the conditions of the future return to, and possession of, Israel's promised inheritance.

"The boundaries of the land, promised to Abraham and his seed—as represented by the Twelve Tribes of Israel—is from the Nile to the Euphrates. Almost the whole of the territory therein included, belongs to the nominal dominions of the Sultan of Turkey.

"The prophet Ezekiel (in the 36th chapter) predicts, with special reference to the future restoration of the chosen people to their inheritance and the turning out of its then holders, that the Almighty 'in the fire of His jealousy has spoken against all Edom who have appointed My land unto themselves for a possession.' Clearly the people who at the present time, and for centuries past have held the promised land in their possession, are the Ottoman Turks. Obadiah, who prophesied after the Lost House of Israel had been carried captive into the land of Assyria, predicts in terms which have no uncertain application in the light of present day events, that (Turkish) Edom would be 'driven out even to the borders' by the various people forming her 'confederacy.'

"This has notably been fulfilled so far as the Turkish possessions in Europe are concerned, for it is a matter of common knowledge that such States as Roumania, Servia, Bulgaria, etc., have one after another declared their independence, until at the present time there is hardly anything left of Turkey in Europe.

"The prophet further declares that the house of Esau (or Edom), shall be destroyed by the House of Joseph.

"As one who believes in the Israelitish origin of the British people, may I draw your attention, if it has not already been done by previous writers, to the belief that I share with many more of my countrymen, that the blessing of patriarch Jacob to his grandsons, the sons of Joseph—Ephraim and Manasseh—that they should respectively become 'a nation and a company of nations,' 'a great nation,' has its fulfilment in Great Britain and her colonies, and America.

"Grant, for the sake of argument, that this contention is correct, then it is obvious that Great Britain and America are prophetically spoken of by Obadiah, under the collective term of their father's name, as the House of Joseph. Balaam predicted that Israel was to take possession of Edom in 'the latter days,' and 'destroy the remnant from the city,' i.e., Constantinople. Again, in the 60th Psalm we are told that they are to do this alone and unaided, after appealing in vain for help—the 'isolation' of British-Israel.

"Let me draw attention to the rest of the Turkish possessions in Asia and elsewhere, and their position with reference to this country at the present time. It is remarkable that all the remaining territory of the Ottoman Empire is included within the boundaries of the Nile and the Euphrates. At the present time Great Britain, by her occupation of Egypt, is virtually in possession of the country. The re-conquest of Soudan is also in course of progress. Further South, Uganda is ours, while this country claims by its possession of Egypt the control of the Upper Waters of the Nile. Finally, the British East Africa territory rounds off our possessions to the Indian Ocean. Thus, one quarter of the Promised Land is already in the possession of British-Israel, and acquired without purchase. Truly, in the words of the prophet Isaiah, 'My people (Israel) are at hand to come.'

"Our troops ('your valiant men shall be clothed in scarlet') are already quartered in Aden, Suakin, Cairo, etc.

"Only quite recently the Sheik ul Islam offered up a prayer, in the Most Holy Place of Mecca, that Arabia might be delivered from the scourge of the Turks, even if in doing so, Mecca and Medina should be taken under the guardianship of England!

"A few months ago it was within the bounds of possibility, judging from the representations of the British and American Ambassadors at Constantinople, that interference would have taken place in Armenia, in response to the popular outburst of indignation in both countries at the horrible atrocities perpetrated by order of the Sultan in that much misgoverned province of Turkey. Should circumstances at present unforeseen eventually compel our interference in Armenia, we shall thereby gain control of the Upper Waters of the Euphrates in the same manner as we now control the Upper Waters of the Nile.

"From the Soudan, Armenia, and Palestine, the one universal cry amongst its most unfortunate inhabitants is, 'When are the English coming to deliver us from the scourge of the hated Turks.' It is only, therefore, when the downfall of Turkey has been brought about by England, in accordance with the predictions I have mentioned, that the Promised Land will become a British Colonial possession, and it is then the Jews, in company with, but not to the exclusion of, their brethren of the lost (British) House of Israel, will regain possession of their promised inheritance. People may dispute the theory of British-Israelism as much as they like, but they cannot get over the fact that we as a nation, are at the present time in possession of, and actually fulfilling the predictions appertaining to the chosen people, apart from the Jews, so far as they have been to the present fulfilled.

"In conclusion, may I ask, Where is the throne and seed of David, and the nation of Israel which was to exist as long as the sun, and the moon and the stars endured? These promises are not fulfilled in the House of Judah, but they are, if my contention is admitted, fulfilled in the House of Israel. It is a singular fact that our Royal Family claim descent from David, and that our Royal Arms consist of the Lion of Judah and the Unicorn of Ephraim, and the crowned Lion of David ruling over both. We also 'lend money to many nations, and never borrow of them,' and in many other respects fulfil the promises made to our forefathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

"I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

EARLY BRITISH ROAD-MAKING.

"Land Marks of History."—The Rev. G. Oliver, D.D., in "History of Masonry."

IT is a well-accepted doctrine, founded on absolute facts, that the best evidence of the state of civilisation in any country is supplied by the extent, structure, and perfect condition, or otherwise, of its roads. If it is without roads, the people are to all intents savages and barbarians, for without them all extended intercourse and commerce are impossible. But trade may exist without intellectual power, it may be replied. True. But roads cannot, and in fact very little of trade. But to originate the idea of roads, and the use of them, requires all the intellectual and reflective, as well as perceptive powers of man, to be in the highest development and activity. To the savage, a road seems the greatest curse, as it gives his brother savage an easier means to approach to rob and murder him, and enslave his wives and children. To the barbarian who is in a certain stage of productive life, the first idea is to build a wall round his town or his fields to keep his neighbour off them, from the same fears as the wild hunter has, not to make smooth paved paths for him to advance over to reach them and with the object of destroying the works of their hands. This was the stage old Greece reached and stood still in; therefore, Greece, with each of her villages, or walled States, in a chronic state of petty tribal war with each other, never made a road or invented a bridge. To advance beyond this state requires a mighty effort, which the Greek people never attained, nor have they even to our day, in spite of the engineering lessons placed before them by the Hebrews, Persians, and Romans.

In short, for a people to become road-makers requires such a sacrifice of selfishness, and the sacrificing of narrow local benefits, for the benefit of the whole nation, looked at as an individual existence, that few races of the world has ever been able to exhibit. The first road-builders were the Semitic nations, and it would seem, as far as records show, that the Hebrew family of that race were the originators of the idea, and the first to carry it out on an extensive scale. This is quite clear from the care with which Moses ordered highways to be constructed from every part of Palestine to the three Cities of Refuge, for criminals to flee to for trial, and to extend similar assize circuits, as we should now call them, in proportion to the extension of their empire by conquest, and these three main roads were to be connected with every village in the Hebrew dominions.* That this order was carried out carefully, we can trace by the constant reference to roads and byeways throughout the Bible, a thing forming a striking contrast to the allusions to the pathless state of their countries by the Greek and early Roman historians.† The Romans seem to have learnt the art of road-making from the Carthagenians, a Semitic nation as far as regards its masses.‡

But this is simply introductory to our main purpose, to show how fully the Hebrew race, when it flowed over to Britain 1,200 years B.C. by the Mediterranean, carried with it the deep impression of roads, on an organised plan, being the first essential of a civilised people, and the basis of efficient government, so far as its physical actions are concerned. Consequently, when the island had become settled Dywnwal Moelmud, the earliest codifier of British law, designed and partly carried into execution, a thorough system of main and cross roads, as recorded by our most ancient writers.§ These main roads have from then, about 800 to 900 years B.C., to our own day, formed the backbones of all our systems of roads and railways, and are no mean testimony to the engineering genius and civilised foresight of our remote ancestors. Even the Roman Empire on the Continent has not left behind itself so perfect a system of intercommunication as those old Britons, whom modern dunces assert to have been "savages who went naked." By its name, the first great road, following pretty well the route adopted by our modern North Western Railway, ran from Dover to Pembroke on the South-west, and Holyhead on the North-west, by two branches. It was named Sarn Gwyddellin, or the Irish Road, now corrupted in "Watling Street." Then branches from it at London, ran the great north road, called Sarn Iken (the Ikens Road), the name of the district now called the Eastern Counties. This road is now called by surveyors Ikenild Street. This road went through Lincoln, being carried over the Fens upon high banks, like we do railways now, and so on through Sheffield to York, and on to Glasgow and Edinburgh. Next came the Sarn Icha, or the High Street, which ran from the mouth of the Tyne at Newcastle along the hills of England's backbone through Yorkshire, Derby, Worcester, and the rest to St. David's in Pembrokeshire, then the port of Menef. Then fourth, came the Sarn Ermyn, now called Ermin Street, by topographers, running from the southern port of Pevensey, right up the east coast to Edinburgh. This was followed by an offshoot at London, which took pretty well the route now followed by the Great Western Railway through the South Midlands to Menef (St. David's). The sixth great high road was from the Salt Mines of Cheshire to Longborth (Porthmouth), where that great article was exported to all the Continent. Another branch of the Saltway ran to the Humber ports and those of the East Coast to serve the trade in salt, from thence to what is now Germany and North Europe. After this we reach the second Sarn Ermyn, which opened the country from Torbay to Dumbarton, on the Clyde, and probably it was used for the transit of iron, and other metals, in which that district is so rich, although after the destruction of the ancient British commercial civilisation by the Roman tyranny and the Saxon savagery, they for centuries laid unworked. The ninth great road was one for the general protection of the nation from invasion, and ran round the whole circuit of the island up to the Forth and Clyde. It was named in the language of our ancestors Y Sar ar y Mor, or "The Road by the Sea." It was in fact a chain of fortifications connected by one of the most stupendous pieces of road engineering the world has ever seen. As it followed all the sinuosities of the coasts and great rivers, it could not have been much less than 2,000 miles long! The engineering genius, resources, and wealth of a nation who could make such an organised system of roads at that time, in the whole not less than close upon 6,000 miles, startles even us, accustomed as we are to engineering feats. And further, these were not mere track ways, but properly made and metalled roads, with cuttings through hills, the raising of hundreds of miles of embankments to carry them over marshes and fens, as proved by the remains of them still in existence after 2,600 years, and which are constantly being found in the execution of works for our own similar uses. It is useless for those ignorant of the state of our forefathers to deny this, and declare there is no evidence. We possess the same evidence of their existence as we do of the existence of the Greek, Egyptian, and Assyrian temples and cities,—their ruins yet with us, and the fact that considerable parts are in use to our day. For pedants we have their own class of evidence —Cæsar's Commentaries. This great Roman leader not only expresses admiration at the main roads, but says the whole country as far as he fought his way, about 50 miles, was intersected in all directions by cross roads, over which wheeled waggons of supplies, and large masses of war chariots, could and did advance on all his flanks, so that whilst Caswallan, the British general, held him in check on his advance up the main road, his flanks were harassed by the charioteers and cavalry from the cross roads, and if attacked or pressed they rejoined their main body, to gain advance by new routes. He records in despair that, owing to the atonishing means of easy and rapid locomotion these roads formed, his own troops never were able to hold more land than they stood upon, for if they charged out or strayed they were cut off, and if a skirmish took place the British always were able to call up supports or to retire to again advance.*

This would seem to imply that our ancestors not only were highly skilled engineers and road-makers, but understood the art of making maps of them,—an art that neither the Romans nor Greeks possessed. At least these latter have left no traces of mapping to us. None have even been dug up at Pompeii, where whole Latin and Greek libraries of the age of the Cæsars, A.D. 56, have been unearthed, but no maps. But we are getting too long, so must return to these engineering monuments again. What we have already said will show our forefathers were no barbarians, but brought a perfect civilisation and an organised society with them from the East, being true Hebrews, or "colonisers," then as now, for that is the translation of the surname of Abraham, and we are his descendants.—Anonymous Leaflet.

SOME SPEECHES, AT THE CONGRESS OF THE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF THE EMPIRE.

We think the following speeches, delivered on the 10th June last, at the Grocer's Hall, E.C., on the occasion of the above Congress will be useful and acceptable to our friends, and we quote them accordingly, The first is Mr. Chamberlain's at the banquet at the Holborn Restaurant. He spoke as follows:—

"Mr. Chamberlain, again rising, said—I have now to propose to you the toast of the evening, 'Commerce and the Empire,' and, gentlemen, although this is a toast of infinite scope which appeals to our imagination as well as to our material instinct, I hope to observe in my remarks upon it the brevity with which the compounder of the toast list has set me an example. He has found it possible to put before you a toast of this magnitude in what practically amounts to two words. Succinct as he has been, he might have been still briefer, for I believe that the toast of the Empire would have carried with it all that is meant by commerce and the Empire, because, gentlemen, the Empire, to parody a celebrated expression, is commerce. It was created by commerce, it is founded on commerce, and it could not exist a day without commerce. (Cheers.) But this fact does not derogate in the slightest degree from the high ideal which we have formed of that world wide dominion, which covers so large a portion of the earth's surface, and which to so many hundreds of millions of persons has brought civilization and security and peace. (Cheers.) It is true that the great Napoleon called us a nation of shopkeepers; but we may bear in mind that it was his ambition to open shop himself (cheers and laughter), and I think the taunt was born rather of jealousy than of contempt. (Cheers.) The fact is history teaches that no nation has ever achieved real greatness without the aid of commerce, and the greatness of no nation has survived the decay of its trade. Well, then, gentlemen, we have reason to be proud of our commerce and to guard it. (Cheers.) If I were to ask myself the oft-repeated question, whether this Empire is destined to follow the empires of antiquity and to perish and the memory of it to be forgotten, or whether we are to sink like some of our rivals into a condition of mediocrity or obscurity, I confess my answer would depend not so much upon what may be done or said by the population of these small islands, but rather upon the eventual determination of that greater Britain which forms, in space at any rate, the larger portion of the Empire (cheers), and upon the arrangements which they may make to bind us together in closer union. (Cheers.)

"THE ADVANTAGES OF UNION.

"Gentlemen, the advantages of such a union are now universally appreciated. They are becoming the commonplaces of after-dinner oratory. No one now has to argue for the principle. We in this country are, I think, now pretty well convinced of the assured future of our colonies and our dependencies. (Cheers.) There may have been times, but it is long ago, when these great countries with their enormous potentialities were not appreciated in the United Kingdom. That was not long the case. We know now their capabilities for the production of every article of general necessity or general use. We know of their enormous mineral and natural resources. We know they must inevitably grow in wealth and in power and in intellectual strength. We know that day by day they are attracting to themselves a vigorous and intelligent population. (Cheers.) But knowing all that, is it wonderful that we desire that the ties of blood and of language, of laws and of religion, which now bind us so closely together should never be loosened by selfish competition, by unworthy jealousy, which nevertheless insensibly spring up even between kindred nations unless their institutions are linked together by something more material than sympathy. (Cheers.) More and more our sons leave our shores and go to distant lands, and we desire that the lands to which they go should be Britain like the land that they leave. (Cheers.) We desire that if they leave us they should leave something of themselves behind and should continue to cherish our aspirations for the greatness of our common race. (Cheers.) That is our position, but am I wrong in thinking that the colonies share our feelings and share them to the full—that they have no idea of cutting themselves adrift from the great history of the mother land, from the glorious traditions in which we find the germs and origins of the ordered liberty which they enjoy, from the history of the struggles in which their ancestors took no mean part, and from all the common pride in the glories of art and literature which, perhaps, more even than our victories in arms, have made the name of Britain illustrious? (Cheers.) No, gentlemen, I believe that our colonies recognize the fact that the life of a great nation is fuller than the life of a small one, and the life of an old nation more instructive than the life of a new one, and in order to secure and maintain this connexion I am quite convinced that none of our colonies will be ready to abandon its part in the heritage which belongs to all of them. (Cheers.)

Digitized by Google

"THE GROWTH AT HOME.

"We ask you from the colonies to attach yourselves closer to us. The benefit is not all on our side. It is not to a decrepit ruin that you are asked to cling. (Cheers.) You have come here, and I think you will agree with me in saying that there are no signs here of waning life or decaying greatness. (Cheers.) The continued growth of this country is almost as remarkable as the growth of those sister nations that we call our colonies. I could name large cities in our midst the annual addition to whose population could furnish many townships even in most vigorous communities. (Cheers.) Well, then, surely it is better to remain a valued associate in such an Empire as this than to sink isolated and separate into a fifth-rate Power. (Cheers.) It is better for your commerce and for our commerce that we all alike should share in the free interchange of commodities between 300 millions of people than that we should be engaged in setting up barriers one against the other and in exciting a competition from which all will be sufferers. The unity of the Empire is recommended to us by sentiment, and sentiment is one of the greatest forces in human affairs, but it is recommended to us no less by our material interests; and it is, in my opinion, the duty of every statesman, whether in this country or in the colonies, to make permanent and secure this union by basing it upon material interests; and, although I am ready enough to admit that there is much that still remains to be done—we are sowing the seed of which, it may be, we shall not reap, the harvest—yet I am optimist enough to think that the forces of cohesion are greater than the forces that tend to disruption. (Cheers.) I rejoice in everything which tends to identify the commercial life of the colonies with the United Kingdom, and therefore I welcome such a congress as this which is met in our metropolis to-day, and I cannot doubt that its deliberations, with the opportunity which it affords for personal intercourse and communion, will be fruitful of future good. I appeal to the representatives of the commerce of the United Kingdom to facilitate our task, to make sacrifices, if need be, to secure this great object and ideal, and I appeal to the delegates from the colonies to recognize and to reciprocate the spirit in which we bid them welcome and to recognize the pleasure with which we see them once more 'at home' (loud cheers), and I ask them to carry back to all the quarters of the globe where the Union Jack floats over a British community the assurance of the affection, the pride, and the confidence with which the mother country regards her distant children. (Loud cheers.)"

Sir Albert Rollit, M.P., spoke as follows in winding up the debate on the subject of the proposed Commercial Zollverein:—

"The President (Sir Albert Rollit, M.P.) said that the office of a chairman was at times to focus the feeling of a meeting and to give it expression. Blood was thicker than water, and the colonial delegates might take home with them the assurance of British sympathy with their Imperial aspirations and with their commercial interests. (Cheers.) But while they were sympathetic they must also be practical; and it would be matter for deep regret if they failed to formulate, with general assent, some record of their opinions, or to take a step onward towards the solution of the problem they had so well and exhaustively debated for two days. (Hear, hear.) The subject was both difficult and delicate; whether they were free traders or not they must feel the evil of fiscal changes and of the uncertainty which often followed them and disorganized trade; the consequences of their resolution would also be very great, if it were acted upon by the Government, and the result might jeopardize the favoured-nation treatment they had enjoyed from all nations and those maritime earnings which were represented by 70 millions sterling per annum in the shape of what had been called invisible exports. (Hear, hear.) But the example of free trade had not been followed by other nations who had tariff-bound coasts, who preferred isolation and exclusive dealing, and who thus injured, not only our trade, but their own; and it was very well for M. Méline to say that, while France was rightly protectionist, England was equally rightly for free trade, a state of affairs which could hardly be a permanent economic basis, for, whatever their friendship for France, this was a one-sided system, and made them lament for her the more the loss of her eminent economist, M. Jules Simon. (Hear, hear.) On the other side was a great and wide sentiment, a high ideal, a dream, as it had been called, but rather the realization and interpretation of the poetic dream, which pictured England thus:—'She stands with all her daughter-lands about her, mistress of the seas, and heiress of the land beyond the seas.' (Cheers.) Someone had quoted 'Perish the colonies' as if it had been said by a Briton, but it had not; it was a Frenchman who cried, 'Périssent les colonies plutôt qu'un principe' (hear, hear); and if free trade was a principle, and one to which he heartily subscribed, so colonial federation was a principle and commercial union, if it were only practicable and prudent. (Hear, hear.) What changes had come over public feeling as to the colonies! First they were plantations for Imperial profit, then even statesmen counted their cost, but now Imperial and colonial unity was both a political and mercantile objective, and must carry with it some real advantages, such as commercial dealings with people using the same flag, the same language, and the same commercial customs, the identity of which the congress was seeking to increase. So, too, they sought greater political unity and strength, and, remembering that the basis of British trade was the exchange of her manufactures for her food, they sought to cultivate and develop the resources of the colonies, which were so vast and various, and might be made the best means of insuring supplies under all conditions of peace or war. (Cheers.) An American boasted that his country was bounded by the pathless ocean on the East, by the equinoxes on the South, by the aurora borealis on the North, and by the Day of Judgment on the West. (Laughter.) But a federated British Empire would have no boundaries at all; it would be the world over. (Cheers.) Still, there were other considerations. Whether Britain surrendered some of its free-trade principles or the colonies some of their protection, each would involve some sacrifice, and some differential treatment, which he believed to be inherently necessary in any scheme of commercial union, must mean mutual concessions, while a restricted market meant, even if after some economic friction, an addition to prices, and upon this point the people would have to determine. But the real problem was, whether it might not be wise to make an economic sacrifice for greater political, social, and commercial ends, and the Zollverein, which had been so much quoted as an example, was in truth based on a common tariff by mutual concessions for political and commercial purposes. (Hear, hear.) They might also be met by retaliation and tariff wars if they denounced existing treaties, and the case might be even worse if Hamburg or Antwerp were declared free ports. (Hear, hear.) So that there was very much to be said on each side of this most complex and difficult economic problem, and they must be content to demand that it should be promptly and fully considered by their statesmen, which Mr. Chamberlain had promised if the colonies moved in the matter. Let them, then, take the first step towards its impartial examination, and let them do so in the determined spirit of Hannibal—'Aut viam inveniam aut faciam'—'I will find a way or make one.' (Cheers.) With this object—the consideration of the question—he had framed the following resolution, and, if it were generally acceptable to the meeting, he would formally move it as the expression of the views of its members. (Loud cheers.):—

"'That this Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the Empire is of opinion that the establishment of closer commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the colonies and dependencies is an object which deserves, and demands, prompt and careful consideration. The congress, therefore, respectfully represents to her Majesty's Government that, if that suggestion should be made on behalf of the colonies, or some of them, it would be right and expedient to promote such consideration, and the formulation of some practical plan, by summoning an Imperial conference fully representative of the interests involved, or by such other means as her Majesty may be advised to adopt. That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the president to the Prime Minister, the First Lord of the Treasury, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the leaders of the Opposition in both Houses, the High Commissioner for Canada, and the Agents-General of the other colonies.'"

The resolution and amendment were then withdrawn, and Sir A. Rollit moved and Mr. Osler (Toronto) seconded the above resolution, which was supported by Mr. W. H. Willans, chairman of the council of the London Chamber of Commerce, and carried unanimously amid loud cheers.

The following resolution was moved and seconded by the representatives of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce:—

"(1) That, as a first step towards Imperial federation, it is desirable that a Consultative Imperial Council should be formed, whose members, for the time being, should be resident in the United Kingdom. That the council should be called together in cases where the general interests of the colonies represented were affected in matters of trade, finance, or Imperial defence. (2) That this council should consist of members elected by every self-governing colony in some adequate and relative proportion to its electorate, and that its functions should be purely consultative. (3) That the Crown colonies should also be represented on this council."

After some discussion this resolution was carried unanimously, and the congress then adjourned.

EXTRACTS FROM "MADAM HOW AND LADY WHY."*

"Of course there is a great deal more to be said about all this; but I have no time to tell you now. You will read it, I hope, for yourselves when you grow up, in the writings of far wiser men than I. Or perhaps you may feel for yourselves in foreign lands the actual shock of a great earthquake, or see its work fresh done around you.

"And if ever that happens, and you be preserved during the danger, you will learn for yourself, I trust, more about earthquakes than I can teach you, if you will only bear in mind the simple general rules for understanding the 'how' of them which I have given you here.

"But you do not seem satisfied yet? What is it that you want to know?

"Oh! There was an earthquake here in England the other night, while you were asleep; and that seems to you too near to be pleasant. Will there ever be earthquakes in England, which will throw houses down and bury people in the ruins?

"My dear child, I think you may set your heart at rest upon that point. As far as the history of England goes back, and that is more than a thousand years, there is no account of any earthquake which has done any serious damage, or killed, I believe, a single human being. The little earthquakes which are sometimes felt in England run generally up one line of country, from Devonshire through Wales, and up the Severn Valley into Cheshire and Lancashire, and the south-west of Scotland; and they are felt more smartly there, I believe, because the rocks are harder there than here, and more tossed about by earthquakes which happened ages and ages ago, long before man lived on the earth.

"I will show you the work of these earthquakes some day, in the tilting and twisting of the layers of rock, and in the cracks (faults as they are called) which run through them in different directions. I showed you some once, if you recollect, in the chalk cliff at Ramsgate, two sets of cracks, sloping opposite ways, which I told you, were made by two separate sets of earthquakes, long, long ago, perhaps while the chalk was still at the bottom of a deep sea. But even in the rocky parts of England the earthquake force seems to have all but died out. Perhaps the crust of the earth has become too thick and solid there to be much shaken by the gases and steam below. In this eastern part of England, meanwhile, there is but little chance that an earthquake will ever do much harm, because the ground here, for thousands of feet down, is not hard and rocky, but soft, sands, clays, chalk, and sands again; clays, soft limestones, and clays again, which all act as buffers to deaden the earthquake shocks, and deaden too the earthquake noise.

"And how?

"Put your ear to one end of a soft bolster, and let some one hit the other end. You will hardly hear any noise, and will not feel the blow at all. Put your ear to one end of a hard piece of wood, and let some one hit the other. You will hear a smart tap; and perhaps feel a smart tap, too. When you are older, and learn the laws of sound, and of motion among the particles of bodies you will know why. Meanwhile you may comfort yourself with the thought that Madam How has (doubtless by command of Lady Why) prepared a soft bed for this good people of Britain—not that they may lie and sleep on it, but work and till, plant and build and manufacture, and thrive in peace and comfort, we will trust and pray for many a hundred years to come. All that the steam inside the earth is likely to do to us, is to raise parts of this island (as Hartford Bridge Flats were raised, ages ago, out of the old icy sea) so slowly, probably, that no man can tell whether they are rising or not. Or again, the steam-power may be even now dying out under our island, and letting parts of it sink slowly into the sea, as some wise friends of mine think that the fens in Norfolk and Cambridgeshire are sinking now." . . .

"Page 85. Why, you ask, are there such terrible things as volcanoes? Of what use can they be?

"They are of use enough, my child; and of many more uses, doubt not, than we know as yet, or ever shall know. But of one of their uses I can tell you. They make or help to make divers and sundry curious things, from gunpowder to your body and mine.

"What? I can understand their helping to make gunpowder, because the sulphur in it is often found round volcanoes; . . . but how can volcanoes help to make me? Am I made of lava? Or is there lava in me?

"My child, I did not say that volcanoes helped to make you. I said that they helped to make your body; which is a very different matter, as I beg you to remember, now and always. . . . At least so I believe; and so, I am happy to say, nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine people out of every million have always believed, because they have used their human instincts and their common sense, and have obeyed (without knowing it) the warning of a great and good philosopher called Herder, that "The organ is in no case the power which works by it;" which is as much as to say, that the engine is not the engine-driver, nor the spade the gardener.

"There have always been, and always will be, a few people who cannot see that. They think that a man's soul is part of his body, and that he himself is not one thing, but a great number of things. They think that his mind and character are only made up of all the thoughts, and feelings, and recollections which have passed through his brain; and that as his brain changes, he himself must change, and become another person, and then another person again, continually.

"But do you not agree with them; but keep in mind wise Herder's warning that you are not to 'confound the organ with the power' or the engine with the driver, or your body with yourself: and then we will go on and consider how a volcano, and the lava which flows from it, helps to make your body.

"Now I know that the Scotch have a saying, 'That you cannot make broth out of whinstones' (which is their name for lava). But though they are very clever people they are wrong there. I never saw any broth in Scotland, as far as I know, but what whinstones had gone to the making of it; nor a Scotch boy who had not eaten many a bit of whinstone, and been all the better for it.

"Of course, if you simply put the whinstones into a kettle and boiled them, you would not get much out of them by such rough cookery as that. But Madam How is the best and most delicate of all cooks; and she knows how to pound and soak, and stew whinstones so delicately, that she can make them sauce and seasoning for meat, vegetables, puddings, and almost everything you eat; and can put into your veins things which were spouted up red-hot by volcanoes, ages and ages since, perhaps at the bottom of ancient seas which are now firm dry land.

"This is very strange—as all Madam How's doings are. And you would think it stranger still if you had ever seen the flowing of a lava stream."

. . . . . .

"And now you will ask me, with more astonishment than ever, what possible use can there be in these destroying streams of fire? And certainly, if you had ever seen a lava stream, even when cool, and looked down, as I have done, at the great river of rough black blocks streaming away far and wide over the land, you would think it the most hideous and the most useless thing you ever saw. And yet, my dear child, there is One who told men to judge not according to the appearance, but to judge righteous judgment. He said that about matters spiritual and human; but it is quite as true about matters natural, which also are His work, and all obey His will.

"Now, if you had seen, as I have seen, close round the edges of these lava streams, and sometimes actually upon them, or upon the great bed of dust and ashes which have been hurled far and wide out of ancient volcanoes, happy homesteads, rich crops, hemp and flax, and wheat, tobacco, lucerne, roots, and vineyards laden with white and purple grapes, you would have begun to suspect that the lava streams were not, after all, such very bad neighbours. And when I tell you that volcanic soils (as they are called), that is soil which has at first been lava or ashes, are generally the richest soils in the world—that, for instance (as some one told me the other day) there is soil in the beautiful island of Madeira so thin that you cannot dig more than two or three inches down without coming to the solid rock of lava, or what is harder even, obsidian (which is the black glass which volcanoes sometimes make, and which the old Mexicans used to chip into swords and arrows, because they had no steel)—and that this soil, thin as it is, is yet so fertile, that in it used to be grown the grapes of which the famous Madeira wine was made—when you remember this, and when you remember, too, the Lothians of Scotland (about which I shall have to say a little to you just now) then you will perhaps agree with me, that Lady Why has not been so very wrong in setting Madam How to pour out lava and ashes upon the surface of the earth.

"For see, down below, under the roots of the mountains, Madam How works continually like a chemist in his laboratory, melting together all the rocks, which are the bones and leavings of the old worlds. If they stayed down below there, they would be of no use; while they will be of use up here in the open air. For year by year—by the washing of rain and rivers, and also, I am sorry to say, by the ignorant and foolish waste of mankind—thousands and millions of tons of good stuff are running into the sea every year which would if it could be kept on land, make food for men and animals, plants and trees. So in order to supply the continual waste of this upper world, Madam How is continually melting up the under world, and pouring it out of the volcanos like manure, to renew the face of the earth. In these lava rocks and ashes which she sends up there are certain substances, without which men cannot live—without which a stalk of corn or grass cannot grow.

"Without potash, without magnesia, both of which are in your veins and mine—without silicates (as they are called) which give flint to the stems of corn and of grass, and so make them stiff and hard, and able to stand upright—and very probably without the carbonic acid gas, which comes out of the volcanoes, and is taken up by the leaves of plants, and is turned by Madam How's cookery into solid wood—without all these things, and I suspect without a great many more things which come out of volcanoes, I do not see how this beautiful green world could get on at all.

"Of course, when the lava first cools on the surface of the ground it is hard enough, and therefore barren enough. But Madam How sets to work upon it at once, with that delicate little water-spade of hers, which we call rain, and with that alone, century after century, and age after age, she digs the lava stream down, atom by atom, and silts it over the country round in rich manure. So that if Madam How has been a rough and hasty work-woman in pumping her treasures up out of her mine with her great steam-pumps, she shows herself delicate and tender and kindly enough in giving them away afterwards.

"Nay, even the fine dust which is sometimes blown out of volcanoes is useful to countries far away. So light it is, that it rises into the sky and is wafted by the wind across the seas. So in the year 1783, ashes from the Skaptar Jokull, in Iceland, were carried over the North of Scotland, and even into Holland, hundreds of miles to the South."

. . . . . .

"Ah! my dear child, that I could go on talking to you of this for hours and days! But I have time now only to teach you the alphabet of these matters—and indeed, I know little more than the alphabet myself; but if the very letters of Madam How's book, and the mere A, B, C of it, which I am trying to teach you, are so wonderful and so beautiful, what must its sentences be and its chapters? And what must the whole book be like? But that last none can read, save He who wrote it before the worlds were made.

"But now I see you want to ask a question. Let us have it out. I would sooner answer one question of yours than tell you ten things without your asking.

"Is there potash and magnesia and silicates in the soil here? And if there is, where did they come from? For there are no volcanoes in England.

"Yes. There are such things in the soil; and little enough of them, as the farmers here know too well. For we here in Windsor Forest, are on the very poorest and almost the newest soil in England; and when Madam How had used up all her good materials in making the rest of the island, she carted away her dry rubbish and shot it down here for us to make the best of; and I do not think that we and our forefathers have done so very ill with it. But where the rich part, or staple, of our soils came from first, it would be very difficult to say, so often has Madam How made, and unmade and remade England, and sifted her materials afresh every time. But if you go to the Lowlands of Scotland, you may see where the staple of the soil came from there, and that I was right in saying that there were atoms of lava in every Scotch boy's broth. Not that there were ever (as far as I know) volcanoes in Scotland or in England. Madam How has more than one string to her bow, or two strings either; so when she pours out her lavas, she does not always pour them out in the open air. Sometimes she pours them out at the bottom of the sea, as she did in the North of Ireland, and the South-west of Scotland, when she made the Giant's Causeway, and Fingal's Cave in Staffa too, at the bottom of the old chalk ocean, ages and ages since. Sometimes she squirts them out between the layers of rock, or into cracks which the earthquakes have made, in what are called trap dykes, of which there are plenty to be seen in Scotland and in Wales likewise. And then she lifts the earth up from the bottom of the sea, and sets the rain to wash away all the soft rocks, till the hard lava stands out in great hills upon the surface of the ground. Then the rain begins eating away those lava-hills likewise, and manuring the earth with them; and wherever those lava-hills stand up, whether great or small, there is pretty sure to be rich land around them. If you look at the Geological Map of England and Ireland, and the red spots upon it, which will show you where those old lavas are, you will see how much of them there is in England, at the Lizard Point in Cornwall, and how much more in Scotland and the North of Ireland. In South Devon, in Shropshire—with its beautiful Wrekin, and Caradoc, and Lawley,—in Wales, round Snowdon (where some of the soil is very rich), and, above all in the Lowlands of Scotland. you see these red marks, showing the old lavas, which are always fertile, except the poor old granite, which is of little use save to cut into building stone, because it is too full of quartz—that is, flint.

"Think of this the next time you go through Scotland in the railway, especially when you get near Edinburgh. As you run through the Lothians, with their noble crops of corn, and roots, and grasses, and their great homesteads, each with its engine chimney, which makes steam do the work of men, you will see rising out of the plain, hills of dark rock, sometimes in single knobs, like Berwick lava or Stirling crag: sometimes in noble ranges, like Arthur's Seat, or the Lidlaws or the Ochils. Think what these black bare lumps of whinstone are, and what they do. Remember they are mines—not gold mines, but something richer still—food mines, which Madam How thrust into the inside of the earth, ages and ages since, as molten lava rock, and then cooled them and lifted them up, and pared them away with her ice-plough and her rain-spade, and spread the stuff of them over the wide carses round, to make in that bleak Northern climate, which once carried nothing but fir-trees and heather, a soil fit to feed a great people; to cultivate in them industry, and science, and valiant self-dependence, and self-help; and to gather round the heart of Mid-Lothian and the Castle Rock of Edinburgh the stoutest and the ablest little nation which Lady Why has made since she made the Greeks who fought at Salamis.

"Of those Greeks you have read, or ought to read, in Mr. Cox's 'Tales of the Persian War.' Some day you will read of them in their own books, written in their grand old tongue. Remember that Lady Why made them, as she has made the Scotch, by first preparing a country for them, which would call out all their courage and their skill; and then by giving them the courage and the skill to make use of the land where she had put them."

[The friend who sent us the above for the BANNER, says, with justice, that the thoughts seem to point to 2 Sam. vii. 10, R.V.: "And I will appoint a place for My people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in their own place, and be moved no more: neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, as at the first, and as from the day that I commanded judges to be over My people Israel; and I will cause thee to rest from all thine enemies."—ED.].

THE IDENTITY AT PERTH, WEST AUSTRALIA.

IN the West Australian a paper published at Perth (West Australia), on May 20th, we have a few lines noticing the effort of Mr Horatio Robson, of that city, to make known by lectures the facts of our case.

FREMANTLE DEBATING AND MUSICAL SOCIETY.

There was a large attendance of members and visitors at the Congregational Hall on Monday evening, when Mr. Horatio Robson delivered a lecture on the "Identification of the Lost Tribes with the Anglo-Saxon Race." The president (Mr. W. A. Windas) occupied the chair. The lecturer ingeniously traced the course of the Israelites through their varied wanderings, and endeavoured to establish the speculative theory of their identity with the British race. At the close of the address a great amount of discussion ensued, and an interesting evening terminated with the usual vote of thanks to the lecturer and chairman.

It is clear that the writer of the above was not favourable to our views and probably knew but little about them. Hence the remark that Mr. H. Robson "endeavoured to establish the speculative theory of the Identity of the Lost Tribes with the British race!" No evidence of any value it is clear, can be adduced for this "speculative theory," in the journalist's view. Yet the opposite to that is the very fact which has induced those who have adopted our views here, to rely upon and embrace them. We believe that strong and valid evidence is forth coming in support of Mr. H. Robson's and our views—evidence which the Western Australian journalist could never demolish or rebut.

For nearly twenty years we have week by week been engaged in promulgating in the BANNER, the evidence on which we and others have based our belief in the Scriptural predictions we see fulfilled around us, and fulfilling. At present our labours are great and our efforts truly "up-hill work." The attitude of the clergy is, of course, the great impediment to advance. For they lead the people in such matters; and while their indifference or opposition lasts, the people will take no interest in the fact that the British race are Israel, and as Israel, enjoying the blessings promised to that race according to the prophecies. Under these circumstances our duty seems to be, like those who preach the Gospel of Christ in places where He is totally unknown, to go on repeating the good news, that "Lost Israel is found," with the reasons for our belief added, till some are impressed with the message, accept it, and become in turn its zealous and successful preachers. For, the facts are true; and it is not in the power of man to show that the Ten Tribes, hitherto "lost," are to be lost for ever; or that the British who answer accurately to the Biblical description of the lost nation, are not they. Let anyone who doubts our assertions, sit down earnestly to study all that the Bible tells us respecting the House of Israel or Ephraim. It will be found as the result of that investigation that Ephraim-Israel exists to-day as "a great and mighty nation," Christian in character and profession, supremely blessed by the Lord, being the holder of "the Gates" of the world, being the mistress of the seas, enormously wealthy, reigning over many nations, submitting to none, lending to many nations, borrowing from none, the evangelists to all the nations of the earth, being also the people of the Book—the Word of God. These Islanders living in the West, yet already "spread abroad to the West, and to the East, to the North, and to the South," are blessed with rapid "population increase," and are going forth continually, sending out their swarming colonists, to found "daughter nations" loyal to their old mother in the West; thus fulfilling many prophecies given by the Lord and by His servants the prophets, in favour exclusively of His People Israel, "His firstborn." The followiug texts will prove the truth of our statements on these points, in the order named above Gen. xii. 2, 3; xviii. 18; Hosea i. 10; Gen. xxii. 17, 18; Deut. viii. 18; xxviii. 1—13; xv. 6; Hosea xi. 10; Gen. xxxv. 11; Jer. xxxi. 9, R.V.

Our nation fulfils these prophecies accurately, and does so exclusively among the nations. These facts from the nature of the case prove the truth of the Scriptures, and at the same time the Israelitish origin of the British nation. God has been pleased to declare that He depends upon His chosen people Israel to prove to the nations of the world "that He is God." This remarkable statement will be found in Isa. xliii. 10, 12; xliv. 8, R.V. "Ye are my witnesses saith the Lord, and My servant whom I have chosen, that ye may know and believe Me, and understand that I am He. Before Me there was no God formed—neither shall there be after Me. . . . Therefore ye are My witnesses, saith the Lord, and I am God."

The House of Judah stand to-day witnesses that God exists armed with power to punish disobedience and to destroy. But the testimony is not perfect because His attributes of mercy, grace, and salvation must be proved by the other House of Israel who proclaim as "His witnesses" that He exists to save and restore Israel His people by blessing, sanctifying, and energizing them to serve Him faithfully, and to glorify Him by their proclamation of His Gospel grace, among the nations, according to His appointment of commission to them as stated in His word written. In conclusion we republish the following from, we believe, a Liverpool paper of recent date, showing what our Colonial Empire is like; giving statistics, which point in several details to our nation's Identity with "Lost Israel."

"OUR COLONIAL EMPIRE.

"At the present time when everything in the relations of Great Britain with her colonies points to the early accomplisnment of Imperial Federation for both commercial and defensive purposes, it is important that everyone should be able to appreciate the advantages to be derived from such a scheme, and that can only be attained through a knowledge of the extent and wealth of the Empire as a whole—an extent and wealth but only feebly recognised by the generality of people. Thus never before was the annual 'Colonial-office List' of such value and interest as it is this year, in which it reaches its thirty-fifth annual edition. Compiled by Mr. John Anderson, of the Colonial-office, from official records, the accuracy and completeness of the vast amount of historical and statistical information regarding all colonies and dependencies—except, of course, India, to which a separate 'list' is devoted—goes without saying; it is something more than a mere reference work, it is a book to study. Including India, the British Empire now extends over 11 millions of square miles, or 91 times the area of the mother country, but the area of the Colonial Empire alone is 77 times that of the United Kingdom. It has a population, if we exclude that of the vast territory of the Niger and Oil Rivers, of only 20½ millions, as compared with the 38 millions at home. During the last decade, however, the population has increased from 15½ millions to 20 millions, excluding possessions annexed since last census, or from which there were no returns. The bulk of this increase is in the Australian and South African colonies. Of the total colonial area of 11,320,995 square miles, the eleven self-governing colonies cover about seven millions square miles, inhabited by a population of 11 millions, so that the area still more or less under the direct authority of the Home Government amounts to three and a third millions square miles, with a populution of about 10 millions. All but 360,461 square miles of this is in Africa. The products of the colonies consist mainly of raw materials. In the matter of trade, great strides have been made since 1875, with the exception of one solitary backward movement in 1892, the increase has been continuous, but in 1894 the movement was forward again, and colonial trade amounting to £288,205,102, and the United Kingdom trade to £682,130,677. During 1892, 1893, and 1894 the excess of the value of our imports from the colonies over the value of our exports to them was 20, 17, and 19 millions respectively. The largest item in the colonial exports is wool, sugar and molasses coming next. The total gold product of the Empire reaches ten millions sterling annually, or nearly one-third of the world's production, contributed mainly by Australia, New Zealand, and India. At the end of 1894 there were 32,928 miles of railway, and 107,195 miles of telegraph, while the tonnage of colonial shipping was 1,511,804. These are only a few of the main facts of our Colonial Empire; their significance requires no emphasis. The 'List' also contains the usual accounts of the services of the officers in the colonial service, colonial regulations, transcript, list of officials, &c., together with a number of excellent maps, Messrs. Harrison and Sons, booksellers to her Majesty and the Prince of Wales, are the publishers."

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

SIR,—With your kind permission, I should just like to pen a few ideas for the benefit of your readers on the advantages likely to accrue to Liverpool and the nation at large on the opening of the above canal.

I find that the United States have come to the rescue of the company making this water way; and are going to advance 70,000,000 dollars, and leave thirty million dollars for the people to take up. The canal will be 170 miles long (but 121 miles is river and lake), so that the remainder which is to be cut, lies on the Atlantic and Pacific ends of the undertaking. Now what does this canal mean to Europe and England in particular?

It means lessening the Pacific Ocean, and especially that part which at present is farther away from us by bringing it six thousand miles nearer; or some ten days. I find one of the White Star ships did the passage London to Sidney in thirty-seven days, so that it means we shall be able to travel to New Zealand and Australia, Japan and China, under a month, according to place and distance. Liverpool should be on the alert and consider what advantages in passenger and goods traffic this will bring her. As the West Indian islands will be on the line of this route, it ought also to benefit them, thus causing them to export and import more from us.

It also ought to benefit the cotton industry and help the merchant to compete on more equal terms with the developing trade that Japan and India is now creating.

It would appear that the time is dawning for the far East to wake up from its slumber, and that the work done by many men in a variety of branches in the wake of civilisation was now going to bear fruit. This should be good news to our overcrowded islands, and be the means of opening up such an island as Borneo, with its four hundred thousand square miles, in fact all these islands, Java, Celebes, the Manillas, are all under peopled by the Anglo-Saxon race. Singapore should rise into first importance as a centre of trade. Queensland and Western Australia, with New Guinea, ought to advance rapidly in population from these islands. Then again there is that large group of islands under various names, where our missionaries have worked for the last fifty years, with more or less success. Let us trust that all these islands will see brighter and happier days in the future, as our steamships become more and more numerous.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—With reference to Mr. John Wilson's request for a "full-sized copy" of my Map of the Promised Land, I am afraid it is practically impossible, as it is nearly six feet square.

I am, however, shortly going to publish my articles, "Englishmen Israelites" and "Politics and Prophecy," in pamphlet form, when I propose to include in it a printed and reduced copy of the said Map, which I hope will be found useful.

I enclose a copy of my letter to the Jewish World, anent the "Return to Palestine," which you may find of interest to readers of the BANNER.

I take this opportunity of placing my services at the disposal of anyone, who would like me to lecture on the Eastern Question on the lines of my address at the Annual Meeting at Exeter Hall last May, when I used the Map above referred to. With kind regards, believe me,

Yours truly,

H. H. PAIN.

THE LOST TEN TRIBES.—It is not generally known that Mr. Marchant, of Brighton, has been giving two interesting lectures on the beach at St. Leonards on the subject of the British people being the "Lost Ten Tribes of the House of Israel." Mr. Marchant is a fluent and most interesting lecturer. He is a working-man—but he comes from Brighton and lectures, asking for no reward. He comes simply to make the subject known at St. Leonards. There is no collection of any kind, and he distributes, free of payment, a quantity of literature on the subject amongst his listeners. Mr. Marchant has promised to give two more lectures, the first of which was delivered on Friday, August 7th.—Hastings and St. Leonards News, Friday, July 28th, 1896.

THE BOER AND UITLANDER QUESTION.

BEHIND the Matabele and Mashonaland Questions there still remain unsettled the Uitlander and Boer Questions. The grievances of the former remain as they were, and the latter are still suspicious and provoking in regard to the preparations of the British to put down the Matabele rebellion, imagining that they are intended in the end for the conquest of the South African Republic. A correspondent in The Glasgow Weekly Herald, of June 20 last, declares plainly that the Boers are convinced that once the Matabele campaign is over "the forces in Charterland will pass into their country." The consequence is they are doing all they can to prepare for the coming war. This war is as confidently anticipated, it appears, on the British side of the Boer frontier, as in the Transvaal.

The report among the Charterland levies is, that sooner or later, there must be war with the Transvaal, and a disposition is shown that it may happen soon. A march to Pretoria will be popular. A suggestion of the correspondent, however, contained in the paper in question is new and welcome, as intimation from one on the spot that after all the Boer difficulty may be settled without any appeal to arms but in a natural way, satisfactory at any rate to ourselves. What he says is this: "Apart from Pretoria and Johannesburg, the Boers depend entirely on their lands, cattle, and their transporting trade. Their land and transports cannot be managed without oxen. The Rinderpest is across the border, and in the course of things will mow down the cattle. Their lands and transports must be abandoned. Want is already among the country Boers. Its extension means that they will have to appeal, or beg for aid, from Britain and from the Uitlanders, who have little or no connection with the lands and transports of the country Boers. Then the Uitlander Question will be settled, their claims will be conceded."

The correspondent adds, that on his line of march from Sekwani to Palla, continuous lines of dead oxen lined the road on both sides, and dotted the veldt for miles inwards. In one mile he counted no less than 600 carcases, and at one place, within a radius of 200 yards, there were counted 80 trecking oxen, lying almost on the top of each other, having died within a few days. It appears that 40,000 oxen had died during the six weeks prior to the writer's march, and the dread disease has shown itself in almost every herd of cattle. In Palla there were nearly 400 waggons abandoned, because the oxen had died, and every waggon had in it merchandise of every kind, and of enormous value, in the aggregate. He considered, therefore, that the outlook for the South African Republic was hopeless.

The Daily Telegraph's Pretoria correspondent on June 22, corroborated the above serious statement of facts, by declaring that "Rinderpest was raging with unabated violence," though we do not gather that it has yet seriously invaded the Transvaal. Whether the anticipation of the correspondent of The Glasgow Weekly Herald is well founded or not, we believe that by some means short of war, the opposition of the Boers to the simple justice which the Uitlanders demand must be conceded. War will be a horrible remedy, which will probably cost more than the object proposed will be worth. In two ways, it seems to us, the end will be attained without it. The massing of large bodies of British troops and volunteers on the West and North-west of the Transvaal will show the Boers that their case is really a hopeless one, and if to that cause there be added the loss of their cattle, and the ruin of their lands and transport operations, it seems to us that cut off from outer, German, or other help, they must surrender at discretion, and agree to treat their best friends, their British, European, and American fellow-countrymen, with ordinary justice and equality. The Uitlanders do not require much; but they demand to have a voice in their own Government as subjects of the Republic. While they pay enormous taxes, they claim to have a vote as to how the State shall spend the money. They raise out of the mines nine-tenths of the Revenue which the Boers have, to carry on their Government, and they feel that it is only fair that in return for the benefits the State derives from their occupation as miners, they should enjoy the franchise and have a voice in the political condition of the Republic, in proportion to their stake in the country.

By what means this may be brought about, may be doubtful; but it is clear to us that God is working out His plans to give His people the ascendancy in South Africa, and that without a war between the European races there, whom He means to weld into one. The rebellion of the native tribes appears to be the means by which His purposes are to be effected; and to that agency He seems to be adding the Rinderpest to fight for us and so carry out His will. "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God. How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past tracing out. . . . For of Him, and through Him and unto Him are all things. To Him be the glory for ever. Amen" (Rom. xi. 36, R.V.).

There are many, no doubt, who would repudiate these views as abhorrent to the Christian profession of our nation and unworthy of ourselves as the followers of Christ. No one, however, wishes for the annexation of the Transvaal, or for the suppression of the Boers as a powerful factor in the country. It is to be desired, on the contrary, that the South African Republic should continue to flourish under its own Boer and British Government with the understanding that it exists in union with the Empire, its people being a united body at peace among themselves, and favourable to the paramount Power in South Africa, which defends and protects them all. That this may be the outcome of the present turmoil in the vast South African Dominion now forming, we fervently desire.

THE NEXT COMING.

Article by Dr. Talmage, in April, 1896.

"The world started with a theocracy, the personal reign of God on earth. Why not close with a theocracy, the personal reign of Christ on earth? There is not a form of government that satisfies the people. Multitudes are tired of monarchies, and tired of limited monarchies, and tired of despotisms, and tired of republics. It may be that the dissatisfactions will increase, and after man's failure at government, the eternal God, in the presence of Christ, may step down to catch up the reins of authority that human hands have not been strong enough to manage. I see it would be a glorious thing if Christ would come and set up a universal throne, and all sin and oppression and war would cease, and the world would take a happiness such as it has never dreamed of. Just think what a place this world would be if complete justice and righteousness reigned in all cities and in all lands! I do not know what your habit is, but my habit is getting more and more to see in all secular events a divine significance, and I find nearly all worldly events pointing in one direction—a glorious consummation when this world shall be the Lord's, either by the presence of Jesus Christ taking government and ruling and reigning on earth, or by the power of the Holy Ghost achieving the same result.

"The only reliable prophecy for a long while ahead is that which is founded on Scriptural data. Hurricane and euroclydon are to be laid away in watery graves, and a time of balmy atmosphere is to come in which there shall be Paradise regained. The intense heats will be lifted from the tropics, and the intense cold lifted from the Arctic, and the uncertainty lifted from the temperate. All this is foretold, sometimes under one phraseology, and sometimes under another. Twelve manner of fruits, and every month a production. Gardens swathing the earth with deep colour of full-blown rose. That settled weather of unbroken loveliness is coming as surely as the Bible is veracious, and God who makes the seasons can control them. About that weather (in contrast to modern meteorological predictions) it is safe a hundred or a thousands years before to make announcement.

"If Christ ever does come to reign on earth personally, He would find on the American continent people from all nations. What a place to set up His kingdom! midway between the Alleghany and the Rocky; and Asia would send to Him its contribution from the one side, and Europe would send to Him its contribution from the other side—a universal kingdom. Mr. Orton, a little while before his death, presented to me a telegraphic chart which surprised me amazingly. But much has gone on since that time to make the map a still more wonderful exhibition, shewing that the time is hastening on when someone will be able to put his finger upon the knob of one telegraphic instrument and thrill all nations with the one touch. But, however Christ may come, and whenever He may come, and wherever He may come, let us all be ready.—From the Christian Herald, May 14, 1896."

A FRENCHMAN'S IDEAS ON THE FUTURE OF BRITISH COMMERCE.

The following article we quote from the Leicester Daily Mercury of July 25 last, is remarkable as being the translation of a paper regarding the commerce of the nations of Europe, referring especially to that of Great Britain, France and Germany compared. The object, of course, is to show that great as we have been in this respect, and "being still the first commercial state in the universe" and "the conqueror of the empire of the seas," we are in respect of coal and iron, losing our command and allowing our primacy to slip away from us. Germany is rapidly coming to the front and beating us generally; and the end is likely to be that we shall have to fight Germany as in Pitt's days we fought France, to retain our position in the world, as first in commerce all round. It is well to be forewarned, as we shall thus endeavour to be forearmed.

Our French writer we imagine, would be glad to see us deposed from our acknowledged position of "Queen of the seas" "the sovereign of the cotton industries," and hitherto first in the coal and iron trades. But we hardly think he relishes the idea that Germany is likely to step into our place and obtain the primacy in the two articles, iron and coal, on which our greatness and wealth have hitherto been built. It will be a bad day for France when that takes place, for then the war of revenge for the recovery of the lost provinces will add one ingredient of difficulty to the already heavy task which lies before France and Russia together, in the coming deadly struggle for existence, that confronts the nations of Europe. Being free from that terrible anticiptation, we shall, we suppose, see then our opportunity for the recovery of our commercial supremacy which Germany if stricken to the ground, will hardly value any more, seeing that her national existence will be at stake between two such giants in war, as Russia and France combined are sure to prove.

Digitized by Google

Our recent article on the Suez Canal (p. 328, August 5th, 1896) gave a comparative statement of the commerce of Britain, Germany, and France, with the east, and we found that of the 3,434 vessels of all nations which passed through the Canal during 1895, 2,318 were British, the German only 314, and the French worse still, namely only 278; Russia boasted of only 39 vessels! When the Germans and French can show a better proportion than 7 to 1 against them, it will be time to talk of their beating us in the general commerce of the world, especially in iron and coal. It is more than probable however, that our repeated strikes in past years have transferred some of our trade to such keen rivals as the Germans and French no doubt are. But we trust the promises of God to His people Israel that in these and all other respects they shall ever be "the head but not the tail, above only but not beneath" their continental and other rivals (Deut. xxviii. 1—13, R.V.). The article was as follows:—

FRENCH IDEAS ON THE FUTURE OF BRITISH COMMERCE.

"The foggy island which the ancients placed at the extremity of the world, has become, by the force of circumstances as much as by the labour and the initiative spirit of its inhabitants, the first commercial state of the universe. At the end of the last century, smaller than the great States already formed, less favoured by nature from an agricultural point of view, she had already conquered the Empire of the seas. Her manufactures and her commerce were already powerful. In the seven years war she had beaten the maritime and colonial power of France, but our rivalry was still very redoubtable to her. Our war marine, reformed under the reign of Louis XVI., held her in check during the war of the American independence. Our commercial marine was a dangerous competitor, and our foreign commerce was, perhaps, more important than that of the British islands. The desperate animosity of Pitt against the revolution, in spite of the identity of purpose in France in 1789 and in England in 1648 and 1688, cannot be otherwise explained. War, and war a l'outrance, was necessary to assure the maritime and commercial preponderance of the United Kingdom. In obliging France to turn towards the care of her national defence, the forces and energies which could assure her commercial triumphs, England disembarassed herself of a too redoubtable competitor. The emigration of the capable officers of the war marine decided the issue of the struggle. Our marine, which fought with equal arms, was driven into the ports. From that time forward England had only to pay expenses of war. Her industry and her commerce, free from all competition, could support them without too much difficulty, and reimburse her for them after the peace. After the wars of the Empire, England had attained her purpose. From a maritime and commercial point of view the British islands had acquired against France such a preponderance that we had no longer the chance of regaining the advantage, and, as our country was the only one which could then rival the United Kingdom, Great Britain was the mistress of the markets of the world. On the other hand, the transformation of its industries increased still more the power of the United Kingdom. The great industry was already born in England. Freely developed during the wars of the revolution and Empire, she improved the methods of production. The invention of the steam engine ensured her universal triumph. Thenceforward the manufacturing preponderance was acquired to the country, which produced and disposed of iron and coal—iron for constructing steam engines, and coal to animate them. We certainly had in France both of these precious products, but we had a great deal less and their extraction was a great deal more costly. With the raw material (iron) and the tools (engines and coal) cheap, an abundant supply of skilled labour, certain and already open markets, abundant capital, the English industry had only, so to speak, to go forward. It was quite sufficient to go and seek beyond the seas the other raw materials which her machines and her workpeople, driven from the country districts by the transformation of arable land into grass land, could manufacture. The cost of transport itself was but small. In exporting the surplus production of coal and metals, England had an outward freight for her commercial marine, and therefore the return freight could not be costly. When steam was applied to navigation, and iron to naval construction, the British marine acquired even a new element of preponderance. She constructed steamers in wood or in iron, not only for her maritime commerce, but for the shipowners of other nations. Thus the commercial marine of the British islands was certainly the first in the world. But this was only a relative superiority. In 1860, at the most, it was only equal to that of two States of the first class. The maritime superiority of Great Britain was almost absolute. The number of its vessels were about equal to that of all other marines of the world united. But from a commercial point of view the monster was less redoubtable, and the remedy has even come from the excess of the evil.

"England is marvellously fitted up for production in mass and for mechanical and naval construction. She has blindly thrown herself into it. The manufacture of cotton is a product in general use. Its raw material is of an exotic origin. The English industry has made tissues of cotton to excess. During the wars of the Empire she created herself markets everywhere by hindering other countries going to buy raw cotton. In this branch alone British preponderance has remained evident.

"But the English builders of steam engines and weaving looms have exported them everywhere; the proprietors of coal mines have sent out coals; the British shipowners have transported the coals and machines at low prices into all parts of the universe. The markets for cotton and principal exotic raw materials were at London or at Liverpool. Thanks to competition, they were able to acquire the elements of British manufacturing prosperity, at the same price as English manufacturers, with the exception of the cost of re-exportation which, nevertheless, was reduced by the competition amongst British shipowners. With the national coals—the coals of which the cost of transport determines the cost, or with the import duties, to compensate the cost of re-exporting of British machines—the continent was in a position to enter into the struggle with British manufacturers.

"Belgium had coal in abundance. English engineers and capitalists came to found different establishments there. By her great port, Antwerp, through her rivers and canals, she had cheap transport. Like England, she exported coal, iron, machines. She manufactured glass, spun and wove the flax of Flanders and the wool of her flocks.

"In France a great industry was formed near to the coal mines of the north, and prospered under the shelter of import duties. We had merino wools, skins, and silks. The English markets and the British ships completed our assortment of raw materials. Even for the tissues of cotton the taste of our designers and the preference of our manufacturers for finished articles of a harmonious and seductive form gave to our products an element of superiority over the British tissues. The entrance duties, sometimes rather too high, assured to the French industry a preponderance in the home market. In the foreign market they competed by quality only. With the silks and skins relatively neglected by the British capitalists, with the wines and spirits, woollen tissues, and articles of luxury, we developed our commerce by the sale of the British commerce, and sometimes by the aid of her customers.

"For analogous reasons, the United States and Germany have little by little reduced the distance which separated he volume of their industry and commerce from the imposing mass of production and exchanges of the United Kingdom. The British preponderance has thus insensibly diminished. The moment is approaching when the United Kingdom will have to abandon it to another power.

"The following table, which shows the amount of general commerce of four Powers, will already permit the reader to guess who will be the heir to Great Britain:—

In millions sterling.

	1860	1872	1880	1890
British Islands	336	669	688	748
France	232	370	429	412
United States	136	146	313	345
Germany	—	391	437	529

"Who will succeed Great Britain as the maritime commercial power of the civilised world? According to the above table, France might have pretended to that role in 1860.

"She had constructed her first railway; her geographical situation ensured her a monopoly of rapid transport between Spain, Portugal, and Europe on the one hand, and between England and the continent on the other hand. From Brest she extended her hand towards the United States, Algiers, and Northern Africa. The mails for India and the extreme East traversed her territory from Calais to Marseilles. The piercing of Mont Cenis assured her the transit to Italy with Belgium, Holland, and England. She was the only Power rich enough to subsidise regular postal lines of navigation with the countries beyond the seas. Spanish America turned her eyes towards Paris. Silks, wool, wine, sugar, skins and prepared leathers, even fine printed cottons of French mark, furnished splendid elements of exportation. But she had already a very heavy debt, which she increased instead of diminishing. She manufactured at fairly high prices. Her emigration to Algiers and the United States slackened from 1860. Her marine was wanting in a heavy outward freight. She was short of coal and iron. Further, her population increased very slowly. Her capital was too prudently absorbed by investments in State funds instead of being put at the disposal of commerce, industry, and agriculture. The present was agreeable, and the future less brilliant.

"Germany only existed. From the date of the war of 1866 only she began to organise herself from an industrial and commercial point of view, but she sent out her emigrants by hundreds of thousands to the United States. She was short of capital. Our milliards furnished it for her. Thanks to the annexation of Alsace, she received an augmentation to her foreign commerce of about 300,000,000 francs (12 millions sterling). Victory, above all, stimulated the spirit of enterprise. There was a prodigious development in the production of coals and metals. The German coal mines yielded in 1873 36,000,000 tons, and in 1883 56,000,000 tons. The iron mines yielded six million tons during the year of the Grunders (founders of companies) nine millions in 1884. In mineralogical products of all sorts the production doubled in 18 years.

AN AMERICAN LADY'S ADDRESS ON OUR IDENTITY.

THE subject I have chosen for our Bible study this afternoon, is concerning the Hebrew nation, in the historical and prophetical Scriptures. It is a line of study in which I became interested a few years ago, and from which I have derived so much pleasure and profit, that I gladly accepted the invitation of your committee to prepare a paper on the subject, hoping I might be able to interest some of the earnest Christian workers and Bible lovers in the subject. I can claim very little originality in my paper, except in arrangement of facts selected from a very miscellaneous amount of literature. In Gen. xii. we have an account of the call of Abraham, more than 2,000 years before Christ, with the promise that God would make of him a great nation, that his seed should be as the sand on the sea shore, and should possess the land of Canaan, which a few years later God defined as all the land from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates, which according to a late writer would make about 800,000 square miles, or nearly three times the size of Great Britain and Ireland. And in 2 Kings xii., we have an account of the division of the seed of Abraham more than a thousand years later, which God declared was of His special planning. One part was known as the House of Judah and consisted of the two tribes, Judah and Levi, and known in history as the Jews; the other, called the House of Israel, consisting of Ten Tribes, and for 2,500 years spoken of as the lost Ten Tribes. The assertion, that the Anglo-Saxon race are the descendants of these lost Ten Tribes, was made more than half a century ago, and every year has added to the list of scholarly writers in support of it from all denominations of Christian people, until the amount of literature on the subject should of itself arrest the attention of all lovers of the Bible. Acceptance of its truth has no manner of concern with the weightier matters of salvation, which rest, as they must always do, on the sacrifice of our Saviour. But a study of the theory drives us to the Bible to see "whether these things be so or not;" thus to many, who have taken it up the Bible has become a new book, especially the Old Testament. While I presume there are none here who deny the truth of the Bible, there are many who will say with St. Peter "that there are many things hard to be understood."

The historical books we most of us are familiar with, and delight to obey the command to teach our children of "the wonderful things God wrought for our forefathers." But when we come to the books of prophecy, we read or listen to the appointed lessons with a feeling that the time has not yet come for us to understand in any way the full meaning intended, and if we should have our interest aroused enough to devote time to study and thought on the subject, we seek the aid of some commentary and most of us feel obliged to accept the explanation; only, if we consult more than one a great confusion arises, for their words do not agree, and in these diverse interpretations sceptics and infidels find most nourishing food for their criticisms. A writer has said, "that when confusion marks a philosophical system, it invariably springs from a wrong conception of the central object or fundamental principle in that system. While the sun was supposed to wait on the earth, our ideas of solar laws were crude and eccentric, but when the sun was given its rightful station in the heavens order ensued." So there must be one central object running through the Bible, connecting the Old and New Testaments, its historical, prophetical and Gospel parts in one harmonious whole. There can be no doubt among Christians, "that God's purpose is to bring back the whole rebellious world to its true allegiance, and to make righteousness cover the earth as the waters cover the sea." In order to do this He chooses to adopt the method of blessing the many by means of the few. Accordingly, we find Him choosing one man, Abraham, the Syrian, separating him from country and kindred, and declaring that of him He would make a great nation, and in Him all the families of the earth should be blessed. From Gen. xii. the history of God's dealings with this man's seed is the central object and theme of the Old Testament. They are "His people," "His servants," "His elect," "His witnesses to the end of the world." In His dealings with them, He seems to ignore all the other nations of the earth, and so the prophet Amos represents Him as saying (iii. 2), "You only have I known of all the families of the earth." The Rev. G. A. Smith, in his exposition of Isa. xli., xlii., and xliii., says, "In these chapters the uniqueness of Israel is as much urged upon us as the unity of God. Is He the one God in heaven? they are His only people on earth, His elect, His own. His guidance of them is matched with His guidance of the stars, as if, like the stars shining against the night, their tribes alone moved to His hand through an otherwise dark and empty space. His revelation to humanity is given in their language; the restoration of Jerusalem, their capital, is exhibited as the end of His processes, which sweep down through history and affect the surface of the whole inhabited earth." In tracing the dealings of God with mankind as revealed to us in His Word, we find that an election or choosing of certain nations or individuals to work out His plans is evident. He chose Seth of Adam's sons as the progenitor of His faithful people, and only among his descendants are the names of those found "of whom the world was not worthy," but whom for love of the world God preserved from the flood. And of Noah's sons, Shem was chosen, of Shem's descendants Eber was chosen, from whence came the Hebrew family of nations. Amongst the Hebrews Abraham was called to be the "father of the faithful." Of Abraham's sons Isaac was chosen; of Isaac's two sons, Jacob, who was afterwards called Israel, and became the father of the twelve patriarchs, and among these, two were set apart for special dignity. Judah was given the sovereignty, with the promise "that the sceptre should not depart from Judah nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come." And to Joseph the multitudinous increase and instinct of expansion. And in Joseph's line a distinction was made, the younger son, Ephraim, was set before the elder son Manasseh, and from the day that Israel blessed his own sons, and adopted and blessed the sons of Joseph, a marked difference is easily traced in the history of the two tribes, and their fellows, until their final separation under Rehoboam, son of Solomon.

The reign of Solomon is conceded by all to be the most splendid epoch of Hebrew history, but, as a result of its extravagance, a bitter feeling of resentment against the House of Judah had grown to such proportions that Ten Tribes refused their allegiance to his son Rehoboam unless he would reduce their taxes. This Rehoboam not only refused to do, but threatened to make the grievious yoke of his father many times heavier; then the cry, "To your tents, O Israel, now see to thine own house David," rang through the hosts, and Israel departed to their tents. When Rehoboam with his army of 180,000 chosen warriors started to compel their return, the word of God came to him, saying, "Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel; return every man to his house, for this thing is from Me." This was about 975 before Christ, and Jeroboam of the tribe of Ephraim, was made king over the Ten Tribes, called, after the division, the House of Israel or northern kingdom; Samaria was its capital. The political disruption of the kingdom was complete; but its religious unity was as yet unimpaired. Jeroboam feared that the yearly pilgrimages to Jerusalem would undo all he had effected, and he took the bold step of rending it asunder, by setting up two golden calves, one at the southern and one at the northern extremity of his kingdom, saying to the people, "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem; behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt," thus laying the foundation of the complete apostacy of the northern kingdom. During the 254 years of its existence, many dire calamities witnessed to the truth of God's word, that if they should forsake Him and worship other gods, His curse should rest upon them. Four times their kingdom was invaded, much spoil and many captives taken, until in 721 before Christ, the king of Assyria, after three years' siege, captured Samaria, and marching through the land, carried away the remnant that remained of the tribes, and filled their country with foreigners. From that day to this, they have been designated the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel; lost to themselves and to the world, but we must believe guided and cared for by their covenant keeping God.

Hosea, a prophet of the northern kingdom, foretold to his countrymen sixty years before the seige of Samaria, that the kingdom of the House of Israel should cease to exist, that God would no more have mercy on the House of Israel, and that He would utterly take them away, and would finally say, "Ye are not My people and I will not be your God;" but immediately adds, "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered," that is, the birthright blessing of multitudinousness was yet to be theirs, for they would yet be called, "sons of the living God." And we learn of God's loving watchfulness over them from the prophet Jeremiah, who was inspired to write 115 years after the siege of Samaria, "I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is My firstborn." According to the same prophet, in the 31st and 33rd chapters, Israel was always to be a nation, ruled over by a representative of the House of David, for, "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon, and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar, the Lord of Hosts is His name; if these ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever."

And closely connected with the promise of a national existence, is the promise to the House of David (Jer. xxxiii. 25, 26): "Thus saith the Lord, if My covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I cast away the seed of Jacob and David My servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." As these ordinances are with us still, that nation and that throne must be identified among the nations and thrones of the present era. St. Paul says (Rom. xi. 29): "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." And the same apostle tells us, in Rom. xv. 8: "Now, I say, that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers."

Now, the promises to Abraham are summed up in Gen. xxii. 16—18: "By Myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed My voice." The blessing was two-fold, temporal and spiritual. The temporal blessing was the multitudinous seed, the land, military strength, able to take and to hold the Gates of their enemies, the power to get great wealth, and to use it in such a manner as shall prove a blessing to all the world; and the spiritual blessing was the one seed, Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of His people Israel and the Saviour of the world, the glad tidings of which could not be carried to all nations without the temporal blessings of great wealth and military strength.

This covenant with Abraham was confirmed to Isaac and Jacob. A short time before the death of Jacob he adopted the two sons of Joseph, saying, "Let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers, Abraham and Isaac; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth." Jacob put his right hand on the head of Ephraim, the younger son, which displeased Joseph, and when he would have changed it to the head of Manasseh the elder, Jacob refused, and said, "I know it, my son, I know it; he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great, but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations." In 1 Chron. v. i., we find that the birthright was taken from Reuben, the firstborn of Jacob's sons, and given to the sons of Joseph; and in Gen. xlix., we have the time given us when we may look for the beginning of the fulfilment of the ancient covenant. "And Jacob called unto his sons, and said, Gather yourselves together, that I may tell you what shall befall you in the last days." That the phrase, "the last days," or "latter days," refers to the present Christian era, is one of the most settled points of Scripture interpretation. In Hebrews, the writer tells us, "God hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son." St. Peter tells us, "Christ was manifested in these last times for you." And St. John says, in his 1st Epistle, "Little children, it is the last time."

The unique position of the Anglo-Saxon race among the nations of the earth first led scholars to search for the origin of the race, and in tracing the history of the Jutes, the Angles, the Danes, the Saxons and the Normans, we find, according to Sharon Turner, the historian, that they were all kindred nations of the same people, and came from Media and Northern Armenia, but that country was evidently not their original home, but that was the country to which the Ten Tribes were taken by their Assyrian captors; so that to those who trace in the history of the Anglo-Saxons a fulfilment of what God's Word tells us Israel should become in the latter times, "the grave of Israel became the cradle of the Saxons."

Since the independence of the United States was declared, there have been two great political divisions of the Anglo-Saxon race, Great Britain fulfilling the rôle of Ephraim, being "a nation, and a company of nations;" and our own Republic, that of Manasseh, a great people. They call us "Brother Jonathan," we speak of them as "our English cousins."

It will be interesting to note some of the marks that are recorded in the Bible by which the House of Israel may be recognised in these latter days. It was to be "a great and mighty nation;" "the chief of the nations, a nation and a company of nations, spread abroad to the west, the east, the north and south." There can be no doubt as to which one of the nations of the earth answers to this description. Great Britain, with her Dominion of Canada, the six States of Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, the South and West African States, the Fiji Islands, are a few of the 77 colonies belonging to England.

"RUSSIA, PERSIA, AND ENGLAND"—A REVIEW.

By E. Reep.

The above title heads an article in the July number of the Nineteenth Century. It is, of course, one that brings to mind the thirty-eighth chapter of Ezekiel, "the account of a thought," as the late Rev. E. Hoare describes it in his "Palestine and Russia," a treatise now just upon twenty years old. The flight of twenty years has not suggested the smallest change in the interpretation of Ezekiel's prophecy. Referring to a mighty prince of Russia (prince of Rosh, R.V.), who will in the latter days come into conflict with the House of Israel and the House of Judah, the prophecy declares that into his mind shall come an evil thought. And he shall say, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages (see Zech. ii. 4, 5) to take a spoil and to take a prey. Identifying the British as the House of Israel and as the people under whose protection the House of Judah, or the Jews, will return to Palestine, where the evil thought is to take effect, we are bound to watch for every political sign that points to the fulfilment of Ezekiel's prediction and Russia's aspirations to rival Israel.

The author of the Nineteenth Century article says: "The month of May has witnessed, in the assassination of the Shah of Persia and the coronation of the Czar of Russia, two events of deep and enduring interest to the world. . . . What more dramatic than the contrast between the swift and bloody death of the [Shah] successor of the monarchs whose kingdom had already grown old when Cæsar's galleys first touched the shores of Britain, and the triumphant inauguration of the reign of the ruler of the youngest of European powers, with princes, ambassadors, and nobles bowing before the throne, an armed host around him and a dazzled and bewildered nation shouting in their madness: 'It is the voice of a God, and not of a man.' In still more vivid dramatic contrast stands the shining figure of the young Czar in the central pavilion on the Khodinsky plain, surrounded by obsequious courtiers, while the bands play Glinka's 'Life for the Czar,' and within sight and hearing rolls towards Moscow the long line of waggons laden with the corpses of three thousand of his subjects, poor dumb animals, slain by the carelessness, cowardice, and imbecility of his officials. . . . The duty of moralising may be left to the clergy and special correspondents, for all that is intended here is to suggest considerations which, though familiar to all political thinkers, the majority of Englishmen are too careless or too occupied to work out for themselves. The coming century, which will be full of scientific marvels radically changing the conditions of modern life, will also see the awakening of old world nations whom many have believed to have sunk into hopeless decrepitude; while the savage peoples who have through long ages lived in fear and darkness, will, at last, turn to the light and, with glad hearts, prepare to take their rightful places at the feast which civilisation and freedom have provided impartially for all mankind. Everywhere the valley of dry bones begins to stir with new life. The miraculous advance of Japan is no subject for jealousy or fear, but is the happiest omen for all. India, educated and free, will quadruple her wealth; the desert plains of Persia may again blossom as the rose, and the valley of the Nile repeat the glories of the Pharaohs. The crowded ant-hills of Chinese cities will be transformed by the railway and the telegraph; while the spirit of change, like the faint breeze that precedes the dawn, is beginning to wake the dwellers on the slopes of the Atlas, by the far waters of Nyanza, and among the Turkoman's camel-hair tents. The earth is in travail with the new birth that is to be, and the future is of hope and not of despair."

When British-Israelites venture to take this optimistic view of the immediate future, and point out the blessings that are in store for mankind through the redemption, growth, and expansion of Israel in Britain, they are usually regarded as rhapsodists indulging in the fine frenzy of a perverted imagination. Therefore the following question is not devoid of interest. We are asked: "Who, then, and of what spirit are they who shall dominate the twentieth century and lead the expectant nations in the path of progress? For Asia and for Persia there can be no shadow of doubt as to the answer. England and Russia are the two powers between whom the empire of Asia will be divided, and there is no other to complicate their rivalry. The Monroe doctrine is a chain which binds Americans to their own continent; Germany has no colonising aptitude, and all the commercial advantages she may desire are secured to her under the British flag. . . . England and Russia stand face to face as the sole pretenders to Asiatic sovereignty; the struggle between them for supremacy will be the dominant note of the twentieth century."

That the twentieth century will see Russia more and more bent on increasing her power in Asia few can doubt. Lord Rosebery most decidedly anticipates her development. There are two great empires, he says, which have their source in Europe, the expansion of which must furnish a most interesting study for any political observer. One is the empire of Russia, and the other is our own. These two great empires, Lord Rosebery points out, are the antithesis of one another. Russia is collected, we are scattered all over the world; whereas Russia is autocratic, we rest in the main on a series of democratic parliaments; we comprehend all churches and all races, and have commercial predominance. Furthermore, our empire represents a commonwealth of nations; a commonwealth of nations that is spread all over the world, comprehending within its magic circle not merely new nations, such as those that inhabit Australia, but that great mass of Oriental nations which we denominate India. Hence the development of our empire under circumstances so different from those of Russia, and yet, says Lord Rosebery, so enormously interesting and so absolutely unprecedented, must be a study of the greatest interest to mankind.

That one of our leading statesmen should so well understand the diametrically opposite characteristics of the two empires destined, as any one may see, to come some day into conflict, and not perceive the analogy between the great Israelite empire predicted in Holy Writ to come into existence in the Christian dispensation and the British empire is, to say the least of it, incomprehensible. For what can be more evident, if the Bible be a prophetic book, than that there should, in the latter days, grow up a commonwealth of nations such as the British Empire is acknowledged to be? If the House of Joseph, as described in Gen. xlviii. 19, was not to develop into what Lord Rosebery calls a crowned commonwealth of nations, and the House of Manasseh into a great people as represented in the United States of America to-day, it is the duty of our theologians to explain to us what Jacob's prophecy with regard to Ephraim and Manasseh really did mean. Apparently it had but one meaning; an Israelite commonwealth of nations in the Christian dispensation. We say in the Christian dispensation because in the early Christian Church it was understood that Jacob, by the Spirit, foresaw the figure of the people that was to come. Therefore, says the epistle of Barnabas, Jacob crossed his hands in blessing Joseph's two sons, for he knew to whom God had appointed the honour of being the first people and heirs of the covenant, i.e., the New Covenant. The prophet Isaiah also foresaw the figure of the people that was to come. In Isaiah's day the Ten-tribed House of Joseph had been carried away captive as a punishment for their sins and idolatry. Hence the prophet predicts that the Christ is to be sent to preach good tidings to a humbled, broken, persecuted people, whom He would set at liberty in the acceptable year of the Lord. That this prophecy had especial reference to the dispersed, wandering House of Joseph is shown by what we read in Matt. x. 5, 6 and xv. 24: "I (the Christ) am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel." And so made the heirs of the new covenant, the redeemed latter-day descendants of the House of Joseph, or Israel, fulfil in the British race Jacob's prophecy of an Israelite commonwealth of nations in the Christian dispensation. Keeping this fact clearly in view we cannot fail to feel the force of Lord Rosebery's remark that the development of Russia (Israel's great rival and enemy of the latter days) is a study of profound interest to Englishmen.

And now to return to our article, "Russia, Persia, and England." The author would have us understand that there is no room for a single shadow of ill-will or hostility to either Czar or people on the part of Englishmen. He and they are alike slaves of a traditional system of government which is an anachronism in this age and a constant danger to the peace and freedom of the world. What, we are asked, can be more pathetic than the figure of the Czar as he takes his predestined seat on the throne whose pretentions are an insult to heaven and an outrage to man? For answer to this question we can only echo the Word of the Lord: Set thy face against Gog, prince of Rosh (Russia), Meshech (Moscow), and Tubal (Tobolsk), and prophesy against him. Not against any particular Czar, but against a system represented by every Czar, which assumes to itself the absolute power belonging only to the Most High. In a word it makes itself God; it is Satanic; and it is for this that God is educating British-Israel in a diametrically opposite principle, the principle of breaking every yoke and letting the oppressed go free. So deadly oppressive is the Russian administrative machine that even the Czar himself cannot escape from it. The chief object of the Russian bureaucracy, it is declared, is to exclude the light; to hold the people in a blind, superstitious obedience; to punish, imprison and banish those who would teach the miserable moujik that he is a man and not a vodka-filled beast, that the peasant has his rights as well as the Czar and an equal claim to happiness and freedom.

For Russia, then, to be emancipated from Satanic darkness she must come under the rule of Israel. Out of evil will come good; for on the day when the evil thought shall come into the mind of Gog, the freedom of the Russian people will be at hand. In all this can be seen the wisdom of God. He has trained, educated, and formed for Himself a people to show forth His praise (Isa. xliii. 21), and that is why the author of "Russia, Persia, and England," is able to say of the British race that they claim no privileges that they do not share with the rest of the world. On the practice of such doctrine rests the law and the prophets. To set the example of serving God and the neighbour is Israel's mission and blessing.

THE RETURN TO PALESTINE.

THE following appeared in the Jewish World, dated Aug. 7th, 1896, and should be read in connection with Mr. H. H. Pain's letter, published in last weeks No. of the BANNER OF ISRAEL:—

"To the Editor of the 'Jewish World.'

"Sir,—May I take exception to the statement in your issue of July 31st, under the heading of 'The Anglo-Israelites,' that 'their latest pamphlets, etc., teem with observations on the near approach, eighteen months hence, of the establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine."

"As a founder and member of the British-Israel Association, I should like to be allowed to state, that what we believe is: that when Turkey ceases to hold Palestine, it will become a British colonial possession, by virtue of our Hebrew descent as members of the House of Israel—not Judah. No one will dispute that under such condition the Holy Land will become a prosperous country. Business and religious sentiment will combine to bring about such a happy result. Politically and geographically England is in a position to maintain her rule over the country when once it comes into her possession.

"The Jews all over the world, I believe I am right in saying, look to this country for help when they are in trouble, and nowhere do they enjoy such civil and religious freedom as in England and her Colonies. The Prophets declare that the Jews are to walk to their brethren of the House of Israel living in the Isles of the Sea North-west from Palestine, when driven out of other countries by persecution, previous to the return of the two nations or houses as one people. One king is to be king of them all.

"David's throne and seed and the nation of Israel were to last for ever. This will not apply to the Jews, but it does to the House of Israel, if we the British people are identical with them, as I contend on Scriptural grounds we are. The manner of the transfer of the seed of David from the House of Judah to the House of Israel, is detailed in Ezek. xvii. 22—24. One thing is certain, that if we be Israel, that Her Majesty the Queen, by virtue of her position, must be descended from King David, as indeed she claims to be. The Royal Standard which floats over the Keep of Windsor Castle, bears the Royal Lion of Judah. The Royal Arms consist likewise of the crowned Lion representing the Royal Family: the supporters are the Lion of Judah and the Unicorn of Ephraim, the head of the House of Israel, whilst on the Shield is the Harp of David. How do you account for these remarkable coincidences, except on the supposition that we, the British people, are of Israelitish descent?

"All honour to Dr. Herzl for his well-meant efforts on behalf of his oppressed brethren in foreign countries, but with the greatest deference I submit that his well-meant scheme will not meet with any practical success, as neither on prophetical or political grounds is there any warrant for such hope. I am perfectly well aware that there are numbers of the English clergy and people who pooh-pooh the Anglo-Israel theory, and small wonder if the Jews do so too, but no amount of objection or ridicule will get over the fact that we, as a nation, are doing the work and fulfilling the destiny of the children of Israel as foretold by the prophets.

"That we shall occupy Palestine in ignorance of our origin as the chosen people there are Scriptural reasons for believing. Even at the present time we are in occupation of Egypt, the Soudan, Uganda, and British East Africa, which are all within the boundaries of the Promised Land—the Nile to the Euphrates—in blind pursuit of our destiny. Another proof of our Israelitish origin. The wonder to me is, that people fail to see the connection between prophecy and its fulfilment, when such facts are literally staring them in the face.

"Mr. Shaffer will, in my opinion, very soon 'see the flag of Judah once more raised over the ancient capital,' but will he recognise it under the altered conditions? I hope most sincerely that not only he but many others of my Jewish brethren will do so; but according to the prophet Zechariah that is too much to expect at that early stage of the re-occupation of the Holy Land.

"I cannot agree with Mr. Monk's view that 'it is by means of the Jews, Christians, and Mahometans (the progeny of Abraham) that all the nations of the earth be blessed," for that honour is distinctly conveyed to Abraham's elect seed in the line of Isaac and Jacob, or Israel, by whom it was given to the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh. The Abrahamic blessing was so divided that the Sceptre or Chief Ruler came of Judah, but the birthright was Joseph's. It is not to my purpose to show, as I could do, that this birthright blessing is enjoyed by Ephraim, in company with all his brethren of the House of Israel—not Judah—as the head of his father Joseph's house. I merely mention the fact to correct the statement of Mr. Holman Hunt. It is by this elect seed of Abraham that all the nations of the world were to be blessed. It is an admitted fact that wherever the rule of this Empire extends, there prosperity in a commercial, political and religious sense is the rule and not the exception. Of us it may with all humility be said, in the words of the prophet Isaiah, 'All that see them shall acknowledge that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed.'

"Mr. Monk's idea too, of 'compensating Turkey by paying the full commercial value of the land of Israel,' whilst no doubt prompted by the best of motives, is distinctly at variance with the teaching of Holy Writ, wherein it is promised that it will be given to, and not bought by, the seed of Abraham. It will become ours in the same way we obtained possession of Egypt, &c., the outcome of a political necessity. Anglo-Israelite students of the Bible will see in the accomplishment of this prediction the hand of God, leading His people by a way that they knew not.

"Finally, the best answer to the assertion of 'L. T.,' 'that the modern Jews are descendants of all the Twelve Tribes,' is the fact that the Jews offer up prayer in their synagogues every week for the recovery and return of their brethren of the House of Israel. Zechariah, who prophesied B.C. 518, over 18 years after the Babylonish captivity, speaks of the Ten-tribed House of Joseph, as being distinct from that of Judah, which statement and date alone effectually disposes of the quotations brought forward to prove the contrary. It would, however, be easy on other grounds to disprove the inferences sought to be drawn from the several quotations given by 'L. T.' Thanking you in anticipation for the insertion of this somewhat lengthy letter,

"Believe me, sir, your brother Israelite,

AN IMPORTANT PROPHETIC KEY.

BY H. A. MARCHANT.

IN Deut. xxxiii. 7 we have these remarkable words, spoken by Moses in the midst of his parting blessing to the tribes of Israel: "Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah; and bring him unto his people. Let his hand be sufficient for him, and be thou a help to him from his enemies." What could Moses have had in his mind, or what did God foreshow to him by the spirit of prophecy, to cause him to make such a plaintive prayer for the tribe from which our Saviour was to spring? In that parting blessing he seems to shower, by Divine inspiration, every blessing upon the head of Joseph; whilst Benjamin, the tribe which remained with Judah after the revolt in the days of Jeroboam, is spoken of as "the beloved of the Lord, who shall dwell in safety by Him." Might not some pious Jew when reading this passage ask himself the question, "Why should Moses pray for Judah to be brought to his people?" It was not Judah that revolted from the Ten Tribes, but the Ten Tribes broke away from Judah; and yet Judah seems to be in special need when the others are in a state of blessing. How can these things be? or how can it be reconciled with the subsequent history of the two Houses of Israel and Judah? In searching for a clue to this mystery, let us particularly observe what Zechariah says in the 11th chap., that after the breaking asunder of the staff Beauty, which symbolised the annulling of the Mosaic covenant which God made with all the people, in contradistinction to the covenant which He made with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, there followed the breaking asunder of the staff Bands, "that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel." This, from the context, would evidently be after the crucifixion. The well known Biblical critic, Dr. S. Davidson, has said Zechariah could not have written this prophecy because the brotherhood between Judah and Israel had been broken in the days of Jeroboam. Let us go back to the period of the revolt, when we shall see that the brotherhood was not altogether broken when God separated the Ten Tribes from the two, saying, "This thing is from Me." Ahijah, the Shilonite, after rending the garment of Jeroboam, said: "Take thee ten pieces; for thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Behold I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give Ten Tribes to thee (1 Kings xi. 31), but he shall have one tribe, for My servant David's sake," evidently one tribe of the kingdom. Ten and one do not make twelve, and after the revolt had taken place, we find that the House of Judah was made up of Judah and Benjamin; and afterwards Levi. Which then was the one tribe, if it was not Benjamin, which was a part of the House of Joseph, as we have proved from 2 Sam. xix. 20, where Shemèi, of Benjamin, speaks of himself as of Joseph's House. Whilst Benjamin remained with Judah, the brotherhood was not entirely broken; and can anyone reconcile what Moses said of Judah and Benjamin, if Benjamin has been numbered among those of whom it was said, "How oft would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing; but ye would not?" Yet of Benjamin Moses said: "The Lord shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between His shoulders." The people of Benjamin are specially exhorted by Jeremiah (chap. vi. 1) to "flee out of Jerusalem." Christ told His followers to flee out of Jerusalem (Luke xxi. 20, 21), and Christ's followers spoke of those who sought to kill Him as Jews, as much as to say, that they themselves were not Jews in reality. This is perfectly clear if Judah and Benjamin took opposite sides. Paul said, "I also am an Israelite, of the tribe of Benjamin.' The prophet Micah (v. 3) says: "Then the remnant of His (Christ's) brethren shall return unto the children of Israel." Paul says the unbelieving branches, when they turn to the Lord, will be graffed into their own olive tree. Jeremiah says (iii. 11): "Backsliding Israel hath justified herself more than treacherous Judah." And, "In those days the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers" (ver. 18). It says in 1 Chron. v. 2, "Judah prevailed above his brethren, and of him came the chief ruler; but the birthright was Joseph's." This will explain why God says, "Ephraim is My firstborn" (Jer. xxxi. 6). Ephraim (or the Ten Tribes), who in ancient times was joined to idols, was to repent of idolatry, become a great spreading tree, and they (probably Judah) shall dwell under the shadow of it and return (Hosea xiv. 7). Having been given a bill of divorce and made Lo-Ammi, Israel was to become numerous as the sand of the sea, before the children of Judah and the children of Israel were gathered together (Hosea i). The dry bones of Ezek. (chap. xxxvii.), resurrected by the word of the Lord, are the so-called lost Ten Tribes, "an exceeding great army," which the context shows are one stick, whilst Judah is the other stick. The dry bones had been excommunicated by Judah: "Get you far from the Lord; unto us is this land given in possession" (Ezek. xi. 15). But God said that He "would be a little sanctuary to them in the countries where they should come" (ver. 16). This will show why: "More are the children of the desolate (divorced wife) than the children of the married wife" (Judah) (Isa. liv. 1), and ought to explain why Moses, having blessed Joseph with every blessing of heaven and earth, beseeches Almighty God for Judah, saying: "Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah; and bring him to his people."

Are we taking note of these things when studying the prophetic Scriptures?

"BRITISH-ISRAEL TRUTH"—ITS FIFTH EDITION.

WE are glad to welcome the Fifth Edition of our Handbook, issued in July 1896, with a short preface by the two well-known editors, the Rev. D. Hanan, D.D., and Dr. H. Aldersmith, author of "The Fulness of the Nations." The fact that 8,000 copies of this work have been disposed of within a few years, is an indication that the volume is answering the purpose for which it was written, and that it is decidedly making its way as a popular vade mecum in respect to our subject. The Fifth Edition contains an improvement, in the form of an Index to the texts quoted or alluded to in the volume. This cannot fail to be useful to those who are resolved to study the wonderful subject of our nation's Identity with Israel, by comparing the facts of the day with Scripture, and Scripture with Scripture. May the Lord give His blessing yet more and more to the volume, which now goes forth again for the fifth time to testify that He is faithful and true (Isa. xliii. 8—12).

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—Lest in my interest for The Tribes, I should seem to forget the BANNER OF ISRAEL, I send you a short article for its columns. The cause is one, as the destiny of our race is one. Believing that variety adds interest to our papers, I am only too glad to contribute my share. I have already received letters from New Zealand and other distant parts of the earth, thanking me for some of the articles which my pen has contributed to the BANNER. Is it not on this account a good thing for writers to sign their real names and addresses? It makes us acquainted with each other, and sometimes brings us into correspondence. There is power in numbers. The more we "lift up the voice together," the better for our cause!

Yours for the work,

T. ROSLING HOWLETT.

"MANIFEST DESTINY.

"That the Anglo-Saxons are filling the rôle assigned in prophecy to Israel is manifest, and none can deny it. No one attempts to. The opposers of the Anglo-Israel theory concede that 'spiritually' the English-speaking race now occupy that position. The highest authorities affirm that 'Israel existed that the world might be taught the nature and attributes of the one true God.' They also say, 'Morally, at least, it seems certain that the place in the scheme of things once taken by Israel, is now occupied by the United States. We front the new as they the old civilization. We are not only geographically and morally in Israel's place, but in our mission we are set to keep alive among the nations the knowledge of the true God.'

"This distinction certainly does not belong to the United States exclusively. Is it not shared by the entire English-speaking race? It is the mission not of a country, but of a people. Britons and Americans are one in civilization and service, as well as in language. England and America together are putting the knowledge of the Gospel on all mankind. D'Aubiné, the historian of the Reformation, in his visit to the British Isles was so impressed with the resemblance between that people and ancient Israel that he wrote: 'I have been struck with admiration at beholding the people of those Islands encompassing the globe, bearing everywhere civilization and Christianity, commanding the most distant seas, and filling the earth with the power of the Word of God. At the sight I said, "Ascribe ye strength unto God. His excellency is over Israel. The God of Israel is He that giveth strength and power unto His people."'

"This is not the language of a professed Anglo-Israelite, but of a witness, who supposed that he saw another race of men filling the destiny assigned in the Holy Scriptures to Israel, God's own chosen people. Apart from this religious aspect, current literature recognizes the Anglo-Saxons as filling politically the destiny assigned in prophecy to the Hebrews. Their supremacy over all other races is acknowledged. It was among the fixed decrees of prophecy that that race should rule the world; that the nations which would not serve them should perish (Isa. lx. 12).

"This is the very complaint that is made against the Anglo-Saxons by other nations. A Russian writes: 'It is only too clear that the aggressive Empire, unless speedily checked, will establish a universal dominion over all the peoples of the earth.'

"The New York World, in its New Year's issue for 1896, had a cartoon, in flaming colours, covering an entire page, called 'The British Lion's Insatiable Appetite,' in which a ferocious lion, with wide open mouth stands on a platform, with Lord Salisbury by his side, 'introducing him to all weak and defenceless nations.' These are represented by a Turk, with tears in his eyes; and a Venezuelian boy, with his hair standing on end from fright, and the king of the Ashantees, sitting on a bench before him, to whom he says, 'Let me make you acquainted with this amiable and kind animal. In case he should happen to swallow you, it will be a comfort to know that you have become a part of the boundless and glorious British Empire. Step up, please!'

"Thus, whether in joy or in fear, whether in dread or derision, foreign and home writers alike recognize the manifest destiny of the great Anglo-Saxon race. This destiny is history confirming the predictions of the wonderful prophets of Israel concerning the future of their nation. It is no mystery to those who believe that God says what He means, and does as He says. It is to them the realization of ideals, created by Moses and other prophets, lifted by inspiration above the limitations of time, to see and declare things to come, which things we now behold with our own eyes. It is those who stagger at the promises of God through unbelief who are in cloudland. Those who believe are basking in sunlight.

A REPLY TO OUR ANXIOUS BROTHER THE POPE FOR ENGLAND'S REUNION.

SURELY union is blessed and sweet,
And much to be wished for by all;
A holy one England would greet,
But not wine that is mixed with gall.

We've a Saviour we trust and adore,
And need not His mother to plead,
And saints, though addressed by the score,
Cannot grant us one blessing we need.

How England could clasp hands with Rome
Is a mystery not to be solv'd,
God grant that the day may ne'er come
When this nation should be so involv'd.

Are we not the true Israel of God,
To whom were the promises made?
And would He not send us the rod
If to idols this nation had stray'd?

We are God's favour'd people, not Rome's,
To us were the promises given,
And all blessèd unity comes
To Israel, the favoured of Heaven.

His book, which is seal'd by the Priest,
Is one full of promise to those Who revel in Israel's feast,
As the people of old that He chose.

His covenants still we can claim;
What nation so favor'd as we?
We hold fast to our Protestant name,
And with Rome we can never agree.

What union can light have with dark,
Or Israel with counting of beads?
We care not to have the beast's mark,
And therefore won't follow his deeds.

We would never confess to the Pope,
A mortal who sins every day,
For we have a glorious hope
In our Saviour, the Truth, and the Way.

He only our sins can forgive,
And only His help we implore,
And we trust with Him ever to live,
When perishing Popes are no more.

INDIA AND AFRICA.

IN our article on "British Dominion in Africa," published on May 20th last, we commented on the fact which is receiving attention from many quarters, that equatorial Africa can only be held by our nation, by military force, but that while climatic considerations prevent us using our European soldiery for this purpose, India has an unlimited supply of native soldiers ready and willing to act under British officers, and to hold the country for us. "The Indian races thus constitute a force at the disposal of the British which not one of her rivals can command!"

The same subject has lately been discussed at the Westminster Town Hall, on June 23rd, in a lecture delivered for Captain Frank Younghusband, C.I.E., on "India and Africa." As the lecturer had been sent on special business to South Africa, the address he had prepared was read for him by Mr. L. Probyn. The lecture was thus reported in the Times of June 24th:—

Captain Younghusband in his paper dealt with the relation between India and Africa and the use to which the one might be turned for the advantage of the other. Having pointed out that Great Britain had now well nigh accomplished the task left her in Asia by the last century, he said the coming century would find a similar task for Great Britain in Africa. He proceeded to argue in favour of employing for that work the same general principle upon which we had so successfully worked in India, and asserted that for the mutual benefit of both continents we must make use of India for the development of Africa. Ten years hence there would be 30,000,000 more people in India than there were now, and in another quarter of a century 80,000,000 more, and the time must obviously come when India would no longer be capable of supporting the overwhelming numbers. If she could afford to send traders, settlers, and petty officials to Africa now, she could continue to do so, and in increasing numbers, in the future. She might or might not be able to afford the despatch of soldiers, or to view with equanimity an emigration from India of her warlike races. But there seemed to be no reason to anticipate that the present flow of ordinary settlers towards Africa would not continue, and year by year increase of employment for them in Africa was forthcoming. In Africa there was land needing population, and in India there would be every year a larger population needing land. One of the most obvious ways in which India could help in the development of Africa was by the loan of troops and by encouraging the emigration of the warlike races to Africa to serve in wars of conquest or defence. But this, though the most obvious, was probably the most objectionable mode by which India could help Africa, and, it was to be hoped, not a necessary one. There was no need to directly encourage natives of India to emigrate to those parts of the continent of Africa which were suitable for settlement by whites. But in tropical Africa there was evidently a wide field of employment for natives of India, and as they settled there we might expect to see the improvement which the Arabs, with all their faults, had undoubtedly effected upon the natives of Africa carried on. Tropical Africa could scarcely be a field for settlement for a large white population, and if it were dependent for its development upon whites alone the development would be very slow and tedious. But by making use of India for the purpose progress ought to be assured and the development rapid.

Sir Lepel Griffin, in opening a discussion upon the paper, said the emigration of Indians to Africa was a subject of very great complexity. It had engaged the attention of the Government of India and the Secretary of State, and was at the present time before him in one shape or another. With a good many of Captain Younghusband's statements he was entirely in agreement. There was no doubt that great advantages would accrue to both India and Africa if some such system of interdependence could be arranged by which the superfluous population of the one country might assist in the development of the other. But, having had a great deal to do with Indian administration, he thought there were many difficulties which those who considered the question should fairly face. It was, of course, very doubtful whether the aboriginal races of Africa would ever rise to any high level of civilization. Africa, then, would depend for development upon forces outside itself, and as the country was obviously unfit for colonization by Europeans it would in time fall more or less into the hands of other races—possibly Indians, probably Chinese. The Indian was very highly placed in the intellectual rank of races, and he possessed a great many virtues which the Chinese did not, and probably never would possess. The Indians with ourselves might claim to be civilizers. They did not make good settlers for many reasons connected with race and religion and various other points. But if, under conditions which the Government would have carefully to frame, the Indian could be persuaded to settle in some of the best parts of Africa with his family, then, he thought, as an experiment, the suggestion of Captain Younghusband might be welcomed. On the one question which was now before the English and Indian world—namely, the payment by India or by England of the troops employed in the Soudan—he thought no person who was a true friend of India and who wished well to the British Government at home could possibly be silent. If the honour of England and the English people were to be considered the question could only be decided in one way. So long as Indian troops were employed in Africa on work which was entirely outside those duties which were laid down in the India Act for the legitimate employment of Indian troops out of Indian revenues they should be paid the whole of their ordinary pay and the whole of the extraordinary expenses, and not one rupee should be charged to the revenues of India. The matter was one of very great importance, and the honour of England was distinctly involved.

We see thus, that while God has given us India from end to end of that vast country, He has also placed in our hands the command of the ocean in the East, by conferring upon us the chief Gates of the African continent on its Eastern coasts, such as Suakin, Mombasa, Zanzibar, and Pemba, besides Aden, and Socotra, placed over against those coasts, as well as the Peninsula of India, the Island of Ceylon, the Fortress Island of the Mauritius, and the Gates at Perim, and Singapore closing the Indian ocean, and it priceless treasures, against intruders from Europe, or from China to the West, and to the East, as well. With an inexhaustible supply of the native fighting agency in India, inured to a climate like that of equatorial Africa, God has given us the means to secure our possessions there, and to give the continent under our charge the blessings of the Pax Britannica, which India at last enjoys under our Flag.

The unsatisfactory condition of the Provinces of Mashonaland, and Matabeleland, in South Central Africa, where the rebellious natives outnumber the settlers, renders the outlook very alarming just now. But it is satisfactory to know that if needful, India could supply a few regiments of Sikhs or Beluchis to reinforce our sadly beset countrymen, and countrywomen, who are doing wonders in their dangerous position so far removed from help in Rhodesia. One regiment ("the Beluchistan"), is reported from Simla, in the Times of June 25th, as about to return to India from Mombasa, and as the "correspondent" says, "might well be sent to Beira, taken by rail inland, and marched to Salisbury. This movement would be quite feasible, as the troopship Clive will reach Mombasa, a few days hence, with orders to convey the regiment back to India. The Baluchis have been disappointed of their fighting so far, and would therefore be keen to take part in a Mashona campaign. They are of fine physique, well officered and fully equipped on a fighting scale."

It is high time that something effectual were done to put a stop to the anarchy which reigns in Mashonaland and Matabeleland. Every day's delay brings more of the native fighting population into line, to swell the ranks of the rebels and to make life unsafe in our new possessions. Murders of peaceful British settlers throughout the disturbed districts are taking place continually; three hundred having already been killed and mutilated by the murderous savages with whom we are at war. It seems time that our Government at home should take the matter into their own hands, without reference to President Kruger's feelings, and put down the disturbance by employing the forces of the Empire, which in the Cape Colonies and India are amply sufficient, we suppose, to quell the opposition of a brave but cruel race, to make way for Christainity and civilization, with peace, liberty, and freedom for those to whom God has long since given South Africa, to bring its native races to Christ, their King.

Israel is the heir of South Africa, and must reign there in Christ's name, where now His authority is disputed by armed savages. Such regions as Rhodesia are not intended for naked barbarians whose right to, and occupation of, the land were brought about by fire and sword, and can produce no fruit for the good of the nations, or for the glory of God! As in America and New Zealand the savage races were put down under Israel's feet, and as in India the Hindu and Mohammedan nations, being enemies of Christ, have, after a century of conflict been reduced to submission, and are now content to be blessed with the blest people of the Lord, so in Matabeleland and Rhodesia everywhere, Israel will at last be proclaimed conquerors through Christ, to whom the victors must, and will ascribe for ever, all the glory and all the praise!

ANGLO-ISRAEL'S ORDINATION TITLE-DEEDS.

By a Mother in Israel.

"He shall reign over the House of Jacob for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end."

In reading a Roman Catholic book, "The Faith of our Fathers" (?), by Cardinal Gibbons, I find the above quotation in proof that the Church of Rome is that kingdom. Assertion, no matter how bold, is no proof. There is, however, one thing certain—that, wherever that House of Jacob is to-day, there is our Lord reigning, and will reign for ever. Again, also, another quotation: "There shall be one fold and one Shepherd," in proof (vide Cardinal Gibbons) of the unity of Rome and the Pope, as the shepherd of our faith. We, as Anglo-Saxons, or sons of Isaac, own no shepherd but our Lord, as Head of our Church. Also, we deny the assertion that the Roman pontiff is "the Vine." Christ has declared Himself that Vine, and His holy apostles, twelve in number (not one), are the branches; and yet, in face of this, Rome asserts that only through its own particular church is salvation possible. Our Lord has said, "He that believeth in Me shall be saved."

Rome, again, points in scorn to the many sects that exist in the Protesting churches. To me these very differences carry out the allegory of the Vine. Are not all the branches of a different form and size, and from them spring the twigs as well as the fruit and leaves? Cannot we agree to differ, as long as each branch or smallest twig draws its life from Christ the root? No two members of one family are alike; all brain power differs; we cannot think alike on any one subject. Did not our blessed Lord know this when He appointed twelve (not one) apostles or branches in his lifetime, to form His Church? And His last instruction was, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, but to the lost sheep of the House of Israel." Not to the Jews, who were never lost, but to the Ten Tribes that were in our Lord's time "wanderers" from their own native land. Is it likely that this last order was disobeyed, and that the Gentile Church of Rome is the only true church? Emulation is as necessary a spur in religion as in secular affairs; when a country is governed by an autocrat it fails—absolute power is always abused; and the divers opinions in a parliament is a safety-valve for the good government of the whole.

Certainly unity should be desired, but it can never be as long as the Roman Church puts itself in the place of its God, and claims infallibility, and that all churches should bow down to it. The only test to know if a church is a true and profitable branch is to watch its growth and working in the country where it is planted, and to see if God has given it His blessing. We look to Rome, and see that it has failed. At one time it all but ruled the world, and now only two of all the nations submit—Spain and Ireland; and, as to those, no remark need be made.

We Anglo-Saxons, since we threw over the errors of Rome, not changing our faith, the faith of our fathers, have spread and are spreading over the face of the world, bringing in our train peace and righteousness; all this is due to the countless blessings of our God. And surely we have no need to hanker after the so-called infallibility of Rome. We know wherever the Anglo-Saxon race exists there is truth and justice. Can the same be said of others? We rejoice in our freedom, though we are noble enough to respect and honour those who differ from us. All we ask is to be left alone. We want no union with Rome, till Rome does as we did, and casts off its errors. Then, and only then, will we give her the hand of Christ-like fellowship. We were a Christian Church hundreds of years before we joined ourselves to Rome. We left that church owing to the gross errors that polluted it; not, as asserted by Rome, because the Pope refused his sanction to the marriage of King Henry VIII. That was the last straw that turned the scale. Since then every blessing has been ours, and we, who know that we Anglo-Saxons are those lost tribes, are quite content with the credentials of our ordination orders, as from Christ our Lord, who has stated that He will dwell in the tents of Shem, and that He will reign over the House of Israel for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end. All praise and glory be to Him!

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH ON NATIONAL CHARACTER.

THE Bishop of Peterborough chose for the subject of this year's Romanes lecture, which was delivered yesterday in the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, "The English National Character." . . .

The great product of England is not so much its institutions, its Empire, its commerce, or its literature, as it is the individual Englishman who is moulded by all these influences and is the ultimate test of their value.

THE ENGLISH THE FIRST TO FORM A NATIONAL CHARACTER.

The most important point about English history is that the English were the first people who formed for themselves a national character at all. In very early times England showed a tendency to withdraw cautiously from the general system of Europe and to go its own way. It had a notion that England's interests were not the same as those of the Continent, and were not covered by any general system which there prevailed. It was not that its chief object was consolidation within its natural boundaries, because for a long time its military energies were directed to the Continent, and the desire to expand within the limits of the island itself was never of supreme importance to the popular mind. The conception of natural boundaries was the chief cause of the formation of nations on the Continent. It was not so with England, which slowly absorbed Wales, waited for Scotland, and neglected Ireland. Its dominant motive seems simply to have been a stubborn desire to manage its own affairs in its own way without any interference from outside. This accounts in some degree for the failure of other nations readily to understand us. We have not at any time been swayed by the general ideas which have prevailed on the Continent. We have declined to raise abstract questions, or to commit ourselves to ideal schemes. Englishmen stood in the same attitude towards the great ideas of the 11th and 12th centuries as they observed towards those of the French Revolution. At the same time the English have occasionally displayed great capacity for borrowing and expanding abstract theories when it was necessary, an example of which may be found in the doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings. But when that doctrine had served its purpose and was carried too far it was rapidly dropped and exchanged for another which was more practically useful. Indeed, English politics show that the idealism of the practical mind is thorough-going for a brief space, but its very thoroughness prevents it from leaving any abiding trace. Thus the development of English institutions did not come from the expansive power of general ideas, but was largely the result of cautious adjustment to the facts of national life.

THE POWER OF TRADITION.

The abiding result of this temper is that in England no existing institution can be explained without going back a long way. Foreign nations have to come to us to find the traces still remaining of their own historic past, which has been submerged by volcanic eruptions. A witty foreigner once said that if three Englishmen were shipwrecked on a desert island, their first proceeding would be that one would propose, and another second, that the third do take the chair. (Laughter.) The Englishman is content to live under complex and venerable institutions because they have come to fit him, and he resents being pared down to fit them. There is, however, another question of the antiquity of our institutions for which we undeservedly suffer in foreign estimation. The methods of Parliamentary government have been freely copied, but they owe their value in England not so much to the excellence of the finished article as to the long process of forging which it has undergone. Those who have borrowed from us feel a little sore that things do not work so well as they expected. Party government is an excellent thing, but the number of parties must be limited, and it is difficult to limit them artificially. It must, however, be confessed that we have something of the hardness which goes with a long period of steady success. It requires an effort to see how exceptionally favourable has been the process of England's development when compared with that of other countries. It does not bear the marks of centuries of oppression from barbarous aggressors, of long struggles to realize national unity, of eager waiting for some man with a strong arm and an iron will, who might carry out the inarticulate wishes of a suffering people, of passionate outbreaks of national despair, of chimæras of universal happiness madly pursued, of dreams of universal empire ending in exhaustion. As we look around we can see on all sides the abiding traces of these things on the characters of other peoples, traces of something fantastic, unreasonable, fanatical. But we should remember that suffering gives an insight into regions where thought cannot penetrate, and the man who has not suffered is wise if he learns some lessons from those who have. We should not be so uniformly and aggressively reasonable in the advice which we tender them so freely.

OUTSPOKENNESS AND INDIVIDUALITY.

Englishmen have always been more concerned with saying what they would than in being or doing what they could. There is more outspokenness and expression of purely individual opinions and judgments in the medieval chronicles of England than in those of other countries. Hugh of Lincoln took Henry II. by the shoulder and gave him a good shaking when he petulently refused to listen to him. Grossteste hunted Henry III. from place to place, as the king fled before the scolding which he knew was in store for him. With this outspokenness went a tolerance of opinions which again distinguishes England from other countries. It was not until the end of the 14th century that England troubled itself to discover heresy, and then the motive was to arrest outbreaks of social disturbance. It has been pointed out that the sufferers under Queen Mary were not more numerous than those under Henry VIII. or Elizabeth; but Englishmen regarded their punishment with horror, because they suffered solely for their opinions as such and not for the maintenance of social order or political security. The truth is that every Englishman likes to express his opinion if he takes the trouble to form one. What becomes of his opinion is a matter of secondary importance. He gives it to his fellows for what it is worth, and he knows that they will not attach undue importance to it. But foreigners who have a different view about the responsibility attaching to opinions and are not accustomed to hold public meetings about the affairs of other countries, are apt to take the separate utterances of individuals as an authoritative expression of national policy. The fact is that all the fire and smoke with us comes from a bonfire; with them it would mean a conflagration. This air of condescension towards foreigners is certainly of long standing. The pages of Matthew Paris are full of this English sentiment, which was directed equally against Italian ecclesiastics and the relatives of a Provencal Queen. And at Osney Abbey the students shot the cook of the Legate Otho, who lost his temper at their free and easy ways. The earliest account of England from outside is that of a Venetian Ambassador in 1497, who says:—"The English are great lovers of themselves and of everything belonging to them. They think that there are no men like themselves and no other world but England; and whenever they see a handsome foreigner they say he looks like an Englishman, and that it is a great pity he should not be an Englishman; and when they set any delicacy before a foreigner they ask him if such a thing is made in his country." Early in the reign of Henry VIII., Sir Robert Wingfield argues in a magnificently English manner:—"As the English nation has always surpassed the French in valour and good faith (I do not wish to speak invidiously), so it cannot be judged inferior to it either in antiquity and dignity or in the size of its territory, or in its learning and capacity." England remained unmoved by the Renaissance so long as it was a foreign importation, and only received it from her own scholars when it assumed the practical form of serious criticism. The national form given to the new learning enabled England to withstand the influence of the Reformation on the Continent and work out its own ecclesiastical change on its own lines. Not till this was accomplished did the literary and artistic impulse of the new learning find an expression in the reign of Elizabeth, modernized and inspired by the vigorous awakening of a new consciousness of national greatness in an altered world. The slow and deliberate way in which England has weighed and valued the productions of Continental thought, literature, and art, and has selected from them just what she needed, stands in striking contrast to the rapidity with which other nations have received impulses from England and have at times been dominated by them. On whatever side we approach English history we find Englishmen always animated by a stubborn determination to manage their own affairs in their own way according to their own needs. The 16th century saw this long-cherished independence of England seriously threatened, and the menace made Englishmen realize as they had never been called upon to realize before, all that their country meant for them. The modern Englishman came into definite existence—not different from his ancestors, but the same endowed only with greater self-consciousness because compelled to adapt himself to larger problems. He takes with him wherever he goes a notion of liberty which is associated with duty and justice, and this is the secret of his success as a civilizing agent. In 1820, Hegel wrote:—"The material existence of England is based on commerce and industry, and the English have undertaken the weighty responsibility of being the missionaries of civilization to the world; for their commercial spirit urges them to traverse every sea and land, to form connexions with barbarous peoples, to create wants and stimulate industry, and first and foremost to establish among them the conditions necessary to commerce—viz., the relinquishment of a life of lawless violence, respect for property, and civility to strangers." Nothing has occurred to diminish the force of these words, which show how England has been fitted for that high destiny and for a due sense of the responsibilities which are inseparable from it.—Times, June 18, 1896.

BIBLICAL TREASURES IN ABYSSINIA.

KING MENELIK, of Abyssinia, has, says Science Siftings, promised that as soon as peace is restored within his dominions, he will permit a commission of European scientists to make an exhaustive examination of the vaults of the cathedral church at Axum, where the monarchs of Ethiopia have been crowned from time immemorial. A widespread tradition of the Moslem world asserts that it is within the ancient vaults of this structure that the Ark of the Covenant is preserved, along with the tables of stone containing the Ten Commandments, and which Moses brought down from Mount Sinai. The seven-branched candlestick of gold, which figured in the Holy of Holies of the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem, is said to be immured in these vaults, which are also known to contain a mass of ancient papyri and other manuscripts that are in an excellent state of preservation, but have never been translated or annotated. It is no mere vague tradition handed down from father to son which has transmitted to generations of Abyssinians the story of how these priceless treasures came to repose in the Cathedral of Axum. The story of their procurement by the rulers of the country and of their being deposited within these sacred vaults is specific, particular, and detailed. It is told how they were brought from Jerusalem to Abyssina by the founder of the present reigning dynasty, the first of the Emperors, Menelik, who was the son of King Solomon of Israel and of the biblical Queen of Sheba. This original Menelik is frequently referred to in the Song of Solomon. Although, as authentic history teaches, born after the return of his mother to her own dominion, he was brought up at the court of his father at Jerusalem. He remained there until the first destruction and sacking of Jerusalem, and the pillage of the Temple of Solomon by Shishak, King of Egypt. Immediately before the destruction of the Temple Menelik fled back to Abyssinia. He carried with him for safe keeping the treasures of that structure, which were threatened with seizure and defilement. It is positively asserted by Abyssinian tradition that he carried back with him the tables of stone, the Ark of the Covenant, and the seven-branched candlestick. These he deposited in the interior of that huge granite pile which constitutes the pedestal of the ancient Abyssinian temple of Axum, long antedating the Christian era, and where the rulers of Ethiopia have been crowned from the earliest times. The present Cathedral of Axum is built on the summit of a species of granite pyramid, the remnant of a heathen temple that formerly occupied this site. It is within the interior of this pyramid that the vaults are situated which King Menelik has now promised to throw open. The Cathedral of Axum is but one of the repositories of biblical treasures which Menelik offers to open up to the modern scientific world for investigation. It is believed that he will open up for the first time the priceless treasures that have for thousands of years been jealously preserved on the Holy Island of Debra Sinan, located near the centre of the great inland sea or Lake of Zuoi, in the southern portion of the Kingdom of Shoah. This island is reputed sacred not only among the Abyssinians themselves, but also throughout the Moslem world, and it is to this probably that must be attributed the fact that, notwithstanding the innumerable wars that have raged in Abyssinia for at least 1,800 years past, the sanctity of the island should never have been violated by either Christian or infidel. This island of Debra Sinan, the Aybssinian rendering of Mount Sinai, is inhabited and guarded entirely by monks, as ignorant and fanatic as are all the Abyssinian clergy, but who, when once they take up their residence on the island, are never permitted to leave it again. In fact, the soil of the island had never been trodden by the foot of any layman until two years ago, when Emperor Menelik himself, attended by a few of his principal ras or generals, and escorted by a strongly armed bodyguard, crossed the waters of the lake and landed on its shores, the bodyguard remaining in the boats ready for emergency. According to the dusky monarch's own account the vaults of the monastry, which is of enormous size and built upon rock, are filled with papyri and parchments and books of every description. The books are believed to have been sent thither at the time of the Mohammedan invasion of Abyssinia, in the sixteenth century, but the parchments are declared to hail from the world-famed library of Alexandria, which was dispersed in the seventh century by the Mohammedan caliph Omar. The papyri evidently date from a much earlier era, and probably relate to that period when the Emperors of Ethiopia ruled not only over Abyssinia, but also over Egypt, their domination of the latter country being pictured by many a sculpture and painting on the pyramids and temples in the land of the Nile.

ASTONOMERS are about to celebrate the discovery of Neptune.

ISRAEL—BRITAIN.

Some Notes from a Lecture delivered by G. VICARS BROWN, in Peckham Public Hall, November, 1895.)

THE lecture was prefaced by a few remarks relative to seeking after the truth along many paths, each of which leading thereto being sacred—e.g., in astronomy and geology we are forestalled in the Word of God, while respecting sociology, whether relating to individuals or nations, it was a Biblical science from beginning to end, particularly in the latter aspect of the study. In this connection our own great race claimed our attention, and the object of the lecture would be to demonstrate that the Anglo-Saxon people were Israel, the witness of God.

After briefly reviewing the points of prophecy upon which the identifications were based (and which had been the substance of a previous lecture for the same Association), figures were given contrasting ourselves with other nations. The following may serve as examples:—

About 1883 the area of the British Empire was something over $8\frac{3}{5}$ millions square miles, while to-day it is over $10\frac{4}{5}$ millions square miles. The population of the British Empire (390 millions) and the United States of America (65 millions) unitedly, at the same date is 455 millions, containing an Anglo-British element over 100 millions strong, sprung within a century from but $20\frac{1}{2}$ millions. The land area and the population of the globe being given respectively at 48,620,000 square miles, and about 1,500 millions of human beings, comparison with single nations under these headings is superfluous.

In commerce that of the United Kingdom and Colonies in 1800 A.D., amounted to £69,000,000, that of the most prosperous of the Continental Powers—Germany—to £36,000,000. In 1889, that of the United Kingdom alone was £740,000,000, against Germany's £367,000,000. The year 1820 saw the carrying power of the British Empire, compared (in tonnage) with the rest of the world, excluding the United States of America, thus:—British Empire, 2,650,000; Alien, 1,904,000 (United States of America, 1,340,000). These figures became 1888: British Empire, 22,895,000; Alien, 16,285,000 (United States of America, 9,620,000). The actual shipping shows the British Empire with slightly over 25 per cent., the United States of America with rather under 25 per cent., Alien percentage being over 50 per cent., the foreign shipping being largely composed of sailing vessels. Be it noted, however, that "over 80 per cent. of the world's shipping is built here" (Mulhall).

Our literature boasts of its high antiquity, and also of its continuity. In this lies much of the force of its testimony to British-Israel truth. Taine, in his "History of English Literature," Vol. I., p. 45, says: "More than any other race in Europe, they (the Anglo-Saxons) approach, by the simplicity and energy of their conceptions, the old Hebraic spirit." Again, on p. 49, he says, after giving an extract from Cædmon: "In this manner will Milton hereafter speak, the descendant of the Hebrew seers, last of the Scandinavian seers, . . . he will add nothing to the primitive sentiment. Religious instinct is not acquired; it belongs to the blood, and is inherited with it." Testimony so direct, and from so high an authority, such as is contained in the above quotations, cannot be lightly set aside.

Closely allied to the spirit which has for centuries animated our literature is that spirit of freedom which has ever asserted itself pre-eminently in our nation, notably in 1215 A.D., when at the granting of the Magna Charta, was laid, under God, the foundation of the freest Constitution of the world. The British Government has identified itself with this national liberty-loving spirit, alike in its abolition of slavery and its principles of reform. So, indeed, was it foreseen of old by the prophets (Isa. xlix. 9, 24, 25; Jer. xxx. 21).

Reference was made to our military and naval power, enhanced by the possession of the "Gates," which were afterwards enumerated. Attention was called to the great function of the British Navy, foretold in Isa. xviii., etc., of restoring Judah to the Holy Land.

Evidences were given of the priority of the Anglo-Saxon people as a Christian race, as, for example, the extent of foreign missions, the growth of such movements as the Salvation Army, Y.M.C.A., Young People's Society of Christain Endeavour, each of which have had their origin either in England or America. The sign of the Sabbath was emphasized; while it was likewise pointed out that the 365 divisions, or sects, of Protestants, so far from being a reproach, was in truth a very powerful evidence of how widely and deeply doctrinal Christianity was being considered throughout this country, and those of our brethren across the seas.

Prominence was given to the identification of the British Isles with the land of Israel's exile and salvation, foretold by the prophets. In addition to the well-known passages (e.g., Isa. xxiv. 13—15), and arguments in this connection, the lecturer made use of the following points, among others: that learning from the Pu'ra'nas that Israel and Canaan were known to the Hindoo races as Brahmins and Canána, it is not unreasonable to infer that much of the Vedic legends of an earthly paradise may be based upon the scraps of prophecy carried by the children of 'Brahma (Abraham—Totten) the wandering 'Saca. The Vedas (showing the literal and definite view of the prophecies taken by the Israelites themselves) speak of a Sveta-dwipa—i.e., a White Island in the West; while both Confucius and Buddha taught a Western Paradise. Borne by the tide of the earlier migrations westward, the myth reached the Greeks who, either from this cause, or from Danite convictions, believed in a happy, bright, and White Island beyond the pillars of Hercules. With the "Isles of the West" of Isaiah, and the well-nigh universal tradition in the East of a white island in the western seas, standing thus prominently in the mind's eye, it is noteworthy, not to say startling, to find that upon these Isles have been lavished, beyond all others, those terms which could best express the fulfilment as it were of this expectation and traditional creed of the eastern tribes. The name Albion, whether derived from Greek, Phœnician, or Hebrew, signifies the White Island, or Mount; that given by the Kymry, "Y Ynys Wen," bears the meaning of "the White Island;" and among a dozen others of similar import, it must not be forgotten to mention Y Vel Ynys (the Honey Isle), which would seem to betray a lingering, though faint remembrance, of "a land flowing with milk and honey."

Several objections were anticipated by the lecturer, who gave a somewhat lengthy reply to that concerning ethnic difficulties. As it contained a few quotations from sources which, though authoritative, are not often read, it may be as well to give a reproduction, in miniature, of the argument.

After touching upon the questions of physiognomy, language, and customs, the lecturer proceeded connectedly to trace the migration of the variously-named peoples of these isles back to their home in Palestine, by a series of quotations (of which only a few can be given here) from high authorities.

In a review (vide Arch. Camb., 2nd Series, Vol. III., p. 238) of a "Guide to Northern Archæology," brought out for the Royal Society of Northern Antiquities, Copenhagen and edited by the Earl of Ellesmere, is given a passage from the work, from which is taken the following:—

"'Dan and Angul,' says the venerable historian, Saxo Grammaticus, 'were brothers,' . . . the Danish and English people are originally descended from the same ancestry (i.e., according to tradition.—G.V. B.) . . . The accounts thus transmitted by the old writers are confirmed by the testimony of other literary remains and monuments of ancient times."

Here, in a nutshell, we have the opinion of the above learned body, that the Jute, Saxon, Angle, Dane, and Norman are of one and the same race. Turning to Paul B. du Chaillu's "Viking Age," a work deservedly held in the highest estimation by all, we learn concerning these northern tribes that "The mythological literature of the North bears evidence of a belief prevalent among the people, that their ancestors migrated at a remote period from the shores of the Black Sea, through South-western Russia, to the shores of the Baltic. This belief seems to be supported by a variety of evidence. . . . When we appeal to archæology, we find in the neighbourhood of the Black Sea, near to the old Greek settlement, graves similar to those of the North, containing ornaments and other relics also remarkably like those found in the ancient graves of Scandinavia. The Runes of the North remind us strikingly of the characters of Archaic Greek; . . . the reader will be struck by the similarity of the customs of the Norsemen with those of the ancient Greeks, as recorded by Homer and Herodotus" (pp. 25, 26, Vol. I.).

Here, not only are the Anglo-Scandian tribes traced to the region from the Danube to the Crimea, but a relation is also indicated as being probable between them and the ancient Greeks of Mœsia, known to be Danoi or Danites (vide Latham's "Ethnology of Europe;" Gawler's "Dan, the Pioneer," etc.). Concerning the tombs mentioned above, we have the following from Nebauer:—"The old gravestones in the Crimea, which are now recognised as genuine by all men of learning, attest that there were Jewish (Hebrew) communities in the Crimea as early as A.D. 6, and that they held themselves to be descended from the Ten Tribes" (vide p. 125 Adam's "Great Britain Rank," etc.). In the same locality, and at the same epoch, Herodotus places the Cimmerioi, whom Arnold, Nebauer, and Rawlinson have identified with the Kimbri of the Romans, and the Kymry of Wales; while the two following excerpts from inscriptions demonstrate the origin of both the Kimmerioi and the Sacae (the progenitors of the Anglo-Saxon tribes—S. Turner) to be Hebrew:—(1) Inscription on second column of the Rock of Behistun: "Queen Esther (who) demonstrated and made evident the cruelty of Haman . . . and the calamity (threatening) the inoffensive Kimiroi-Kibiroi (K'hEB'R)." (2) Cuniform inscription: "Nineveh Ashur. All sojourners—Cimiru (K'hEB'R) the heroic—in the land of Taurica (Crimea?) the great Sennacherib conducted to Chabor (Habor); Israel and the Levi prophets famous above all others. The beautiful Sacæ were placed in a valley" (J. Rankin, BANNER, Vol. XVII., pp. 234, 379). In the latter the Cimiru and Sacæ are coupled together, as they are also in the translation of the record of Stonehenge:

Digitized by Google

"The Saca leaned upon and assisted the Cimarim" (Rankin, BANNER, Vol. XVIII., p. 296).

Relative to the ethnic distinction of the British tribes from the Continental races, it is gratifying to find that our contention for their non-affinity is supported by many anthropologists, as the following quotation from Taylor's "Origin of the Aryans" shows. He says: ". . . In two very ingenious papers, whose arguments have convinced many of the French anthropologists, Broca has maintained that there never have been any Celts in Great Britain or Ireland, that no British people ever called themselves Celts, or were so called by ancient writers, and that they do not possess the physical characters of the Celts of history. The real Celts are the people of central France, who are the descendants of the Celts of Cæsar, . . . the true Celts of history and ethnology, as distinguished from the so-called Celts of philology and popular archæology."

And since the late Professor Huxley from a like scientific standpoint classed the Teutons and Celts together as being one and the same race, it is useless to argue and object that Anglo-Israelites are unscientific in claiming the Anglo-British race as being ethnically "a stone cut out of a mountain without hands." Even in ethnology "we dwell alone, and are not reckoned among the nations."

Thus, step by step, has the ancestry of the Anglo-British tribes been retraced, and proved to be that of the Ten-tribed House of Israel. Using the Identity as a logical basis (1 Pet. iii. 15), the lecturer concluded with a Gospel appeal to sceptics and doubters present.

JOHN BULL AS A PARTNER.

MR. P. H. BURTON, who is a well-known representative of the dry goods trade of Toronto, has written to the Canadian Dry Goods Review on the subject, "Is John Bull a better partner than Jonathan?" "We naturally think," he says, "that biggest which looms up most to our vision, and we are so near to 'Statia,' and see so much of her people, that we easily follow her lead more than those who are far removed from us. Braggadocio has one advantage; it sets people talking, and, though we may know it is brag, yet some of it is sure to stick. Jonathan teaches his children from the time they leave the cradle, right on to their graves, that theirs is the biggest country on earth—the biggest rivers, the biggest lakes, the biggest mountains, the biggest everything, and the tarnation smartest people in the world—in fact, that smartness would atone for everything, and enable you to get along without honesty and humanity, when these were not convenient. Now, we may admire a smart fellow, and one sometimes admires a smart girl. But to take one as a partner is another matter. There is always the fear that in a short time your partner may have your money, and you will have the experience. One would naturally prefer a partner who was willing to let you have some of the money as well as the experience—to live and let live.

"It was not very long since people across the line thought they would soon transfer the money centre of the world from London to New York. But they forgot they were living largely on borrowed money. Britain is the creditor nation of the world. The published trade returns of countries give usually only the exports and imports. Home consumption is lost sight of, and the movements of money also. It is estimated that Britain receives annually from abroad 400,000,000 dols. in interests alone, not to speak of those investments which pay nothing. Britain does nearly half of the carrying trade of the world, and it is estimated that this in freight and passengers brings her in about 600,000,000 dols. a year. So she gets about 1,000,000,000 dols. a year which does not appear in the usual trade returns, and thus can afford to import a few hundred millions a year more than she exports and still have a nice pile to the good. Now, just here note the difference between her position and our own. We are a debtor nation. Our debt is owned abroad and not at home. Like all young countries we had to borrow money to build our canals, railways, and other public works, and also to carry on many of our other concerns. Therefore we must be careful that the value of our exports exceeds the value of our imports at least enough to pay the interest we owe abroad, and, therefore, every dollar's worth of goods that we can manufacture here instead of importing helps to reduce our foreign indebtedness and hasten the time when we can own our own debt. So it is impossible and impracticable to have free trade as they have in England, and necessary for us to protect our own industries, whether of the field, the farm, the forest, or the factory.

"Jonathan also is a debtor. It is estimated that 'Statia' has to send to Europe 120,000,000 dols. a year for interest, as much more for the carrying trade, nearly all done on foreign ships, and as much more for her folks who go abroad, and live abroad and spend abroad, or say 350,000,000 to 400,000,000 dollars. For, while no one would question the intense conviction dwelling in the breast of every American that one man is as good as another and better—still they really do like a handle to their name and the attention which servants who don't live in the land of freedom are in the habit of giving. And as they have lots of professors, colonels, generals, &c., at home, no wonder they go abroad for other titles. Thus it comes that all their surplus products and their gold are swallowed up by the needs of their outside indebtedness.

"Now, while we should avoid their follies, we can learn from their mistakes. A drop in their tariff on woollens of one-half, stagnated that business for 1894, improved it in 1895 (when they plunged heavily), and 1896 has brought the reaction. Thus, 1894, starvation; 1895, gorging; 1896, digestion. Now, it is better to have a moderate feed all the time, and the best thing for business all round is steady, regular diet, neither disturbed by tariff changes nor speculation. Clearly, then, our best partner for money is Britain.

"Now, then, for commercial character as a nation. Britain's boast is that her word is as good as her bond. The best people in 'Statia' are of the same sort, but politically and nationally they are not so considered in Europe. There is a strong mistrust and not without cause that they will always consider themselves first and their creditors afterwards, if convenient. This is why their securities fell so sharply when Cleveland gave his Venezuelan message. Their buying is often purely speculative, every-one trying to squeeze the other fellow. They will put down enormous orders and crowd other people out if they think the market will advance, and then, if things don't turn out as expected, cancel without compunction. This is, of course, having its effect in this way; that they will not always get the first chance, and manufacturers will not put themselves out of the way to cater for their market. All the same, they make it very awkward for other people, and unsettle markets and hurt legitimate trade. So there is no getting over the fact that if we want a partner who has money, who is willing to lend it to decent people on decent terms, who can be trusted to do the fair thing and not squeeze you out of all you have, John Bull is the man every time."

The above is taken from a paper called the Drapery World, dated June 20, 1896. The quotation is from the Dry Goods Canadian Review, republished, we suppose, in London. The article is valuable to us as showing the reason why the Canadian daughter of Israel will always prefer to depend on her old mother in the West for trade and its profits, rather than look to the American States as her partner. Some facts appear in the above in respect to British wealth and the way and "power to get it," which God has given us, but not to the States or Canada in the same way. Ours is "the creditor nation" of the world, to whom all pay interest and send it here as "imports." We also "carry half the trade of the world," receiving on these accounts no less than 1,000,000,000 dols. a year, or about £200,000,000 sterling, which does not appear in the usual trade returns! Verily the Lord has given us "the power to get wealth," according to Deut. viii. 18, because we are Israel. To Him be all the praise!

AN AMERICAN LADY'S ADDRESS ON OUR IDENTITY.

DANIEL WEBSTER once said of Britain: "Her morning drum beat, keeping time with the hours, encircles the earth with one unbroken strain of the martial airs of England."

And Israel was to "possess the Gate of his enemies." For five hundred years Britain has been the Gate-holder in the lands of those who hate her; she controls all the important ports or Gates of the world except Constantinople, and recent events would lead us to expect that would eventually be hers; but her own Gates are open continually: "They shall not be shut day nor night;" no passport is required to enter her Gates or cities.

Israel was to be the great missionary agency in the world: "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." It is literally Britain and America that are engaged in blessing all the families of the earth; they maintain more than twice as many foreign missions as all the Gentile nations put together. They must be a Sabbath-keeping people. In Exod. xxxi.: "The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily, My Sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations." It is well known that the Jews and the Saxons are the only people that enact laws for Sabbath observance. France, Spain, Italy, have no Sabbaths. At the French Exposition, a few years ago, the grounds were open to the public every day of the week, but the English and American exhibits were covered with canvas on Sunday. God also commands Israel to be kind to the stranger, saying, "Love ye therefore the strangers, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." It is well known that England and America are asylums for all political refugees, as well as the distressed of all nations, and especially in our own country is "the stranger as one born among us." Israel must also be found under a monarchy. While Israel was journeying through the wilderness, and had pitched in the plains of Moab, the king of the Moabites sent for Balaam to curse the people, but he could not curse whom God had blessed, and said to Balak, "The Lord his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them" (Num. xxiii. 21). During the reign of King David God sent the prophet Nathan to him, saying, "Thy house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee, thy throne shall be established for ever." And in 2 Chron. xiii. 5: "Ought ye not to know that the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and his sons by a covenant of salt;" and 2 Chron. xxi. 7: "Howbeit the Lord would not destroy the house of David, because of the covenant that He made with David, and as He promised to give a light to him and to his sons for ever."

The possible descent of Queen Victoria from King David was first entered upon by F. A. Glover, in 1861; since then the whole subject of her Majesty's Jewish ancestry has been further examined by various students and writers on our Israelitish origin, until, as a result of their research, Dr. Poole is able to give us in his book (quoting the Rev. A. Grimaldi) the genealogy of Queen Victoria, through the line of the kings of Scotland and Ireland, to Queen Tephi, whom ancient legends of Ireland claim was a beautiful Eastern princess, and, Identity writers claim, was the daughter of Zedekiah, the last king of the house of David to reign over Jerusalem, and whom Scripture tells us was carried by the prophet Jeremiah into Egypt after the destruction of the city by the king of Babylon, and the beginning of the seventy years' captivity of the House of Judah.

These are only a few points of Identity; they could be multiplied many times, as the carefully preserved genealogies of the British, and the laws giving the eldest son the titles of his father and the largest portion of the estate; and the lion on the flag of England, which was the ensign of the tribe of Judah; Joseph's coat of many colours, found beyond the recollection of history in the Scottish plaid of the Highlands, and still preserved as a tribal distinction; the stumbling of Ephraim's tongue over the letter H (Judges xii. 1—6)—so that shibboleth would test a modern Londoner, who still stumbles over his H's. And many of the sins of ancient Israel are reproduced in the Anglo-Saxons of to-day, also proving points of Identity—addicted, as regards very many of her people, to all sorts of wickedness and abominations, hateful to God (Ezek. xxxii. 23). Nationally addicted to the vice of drunkenness, so much so that time and again it becomes a question of national politics. Ten times more money is spent for rum than for religion. We must feel that sometimes we almost hear the denunciation of Isaiah, as he cries, "Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower, which are on the head of the fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine." These are spots and blemishes showing the trail of the serpent from Eden to our own day, which, in the faith of our father Abraham, and by the strength and guidance of our great Captain, we shall blot out in His good time. And in the interval, whether we believe we are the literal seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, or not, we are as a race doing the work that God gave His servants, His elect, His people, to do, and let us strive to do that work in such a way that the Master, when He cometh, may say, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"That God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (1 Peter iv. 11).

THE OPERATION OF THE FUND:—To proclaim by special means the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 150 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

SOWING THE SEED.

WITH great pleasure and thankfulness we are able to report the continual dispatch of 274 copies of the BANNER OF ISRAEL each week; and during the month 111 packets of literature were sent out, including, as usual, 200 of the "Covenant People." The places mentioned below have shared the amount distributed.

The letter from a New Zealand Sower referred to last month, I quote from now. It will be welcomed by many, who will rejoice to know that this Sower, Mr. T. A. Finlay, of Purekiriki, is becoming prominent as a teacher of the truths upon which the British-Israel question sheds so much light as we have in like manner, Mr. H. A. Marchant at home. We are thankful to know that both these men are full of energy, and deeply imbued with the gravity and grandeur of their work. They proclaim the fact that we are Israel not merely to interest others in the newly discovered truth. If we rest upon interest only being aroused, the results for good we may expect to be but few. Their earnest purpose, and deep desire in telling the people who they are, is to lead them to reverence the Almighty, to value His Word, to accept thankfully the Gospel of our Lord, and recognise the duty specially devolving upon us, as Israel, to proclaim that Gospel fully to all the world.

As the years have passed we have become familiar with the good efforts of Mr. Marchant. In New Zealand, Mr. Finlay has been pushing his way for some years, and next season he hopes to start lecturing more effectively with a good lantern, and views of the God-given Gates held by the British. In time we hope all our Colonies, Dependencies, and the United States, will possess their own lecturers similarly equipped, and endowed with knowledge and power of utterance.

Mr. Finlay points to a local need, in the opening of his letter, which is also a general need, no doubt. He says, "What we want here, besides public lectures, is a band of visitors who would go from house to house in districts, talk with the people, and leave literature to be studied. These visitors would require to be spiritually minded themselves, possessed with a strong, deep love for the Lord Jesus, and who would in a winning way shew the faithfulness of our Jehovah God, by bringing the people to see that He is fulfilling to-day, before our very eyes, every jot and every tittle of the promises made to our fathers. The people would thus come to look on the Bible as a true book, with an intelligent story in it, and become interested in it in consequence. People in general are not so to-day. It is appalling to see the apathy and indifference that prevails around us, and in a time too, when God's 'people' (Ammi) should be 'looking up' for their 'redemption draweth nigh.' The cause is not far to seek. The air is cram full of spiritualizing dust, which is working sad havoc among a people who ought to be the most spiritual minded in the whole earth. Of course we are, but oh! how low is our spiritual life! This spiritualizing is obscuring the minds of our people, so much so that only a few see anything interesting in the Book at all. Oh, for a trumpet voice to tell out Identity Truth throughout our land! The people would listen—they would 'rejoice and be glad!'"

How true this statement is, has been amply proved at home by Mr. Marchant, and those who have witnessed the listening, thankful attitude of the crowds before him in Hyde Park.

Mr. Finlay continues, "The New Year's BANNERS (an extra supply sent for) arrived safely. I am glad to be able to report acceptance of the truth through the reading of them already. I have been corresponding with a man 170 miles from here whom I discovered somewhat accidentally trying to find out something of Anglo-Israel Truth. The correspondence has extended over six months, and has been the means of opening up another district. I have been trying to supply them with literature as I can spare it. I begin to feel like a head depôt; I have so many districts to keep going. The BANNERS continue to arrive regularly, and are much appreciated. I am much indebted to you for writing to Colonel Senior about the lantern slides of the Gates, and am much pleased too at his reply, and think his offer a very satisfactory one indeed; it is certainly better to get copies made from his and sent out.

"I am noting with deep interest everything that is transpiring around us to-day in the world. I wonder men's minds do not fasten on the events more than they do, and read in them the fulfilment of the prophecies uttered in the grand old book, but the time is coming; it is very near. Till then let us work, and tell out the truth as it is revealed to us, and thank and praise the God of Israel." Yes, the time may be short to the close of this Dispensation, but there seems yet much to be accomplished, and one trouble after another has cropped up for British-Israel.

A happy thought comes out in a letter from another correspondent in N.Z., known to BANNER readers, Captain Hugh Stewart, another steady, faithful worker. He says, "Writing to me on Feb. 20th, you mention the great difficulties our Government has to face. Is it not wonderful how we glide past them? Just as a person in a train looking ahead sees another train approaching as if to smash up both, if he did not know of the rails, there would be every reason for alarm. We cannot see the rails we are running on, but we know they are there, and in good order, and need not fear." Well may we be comforted through all our distresses, and trust, for "underneath are the everlasting arms." Thank God for His love and mercy to His people.

It is a New Zealand budget we give this month, for here is yet another word from a Sower in that colony who generously supports our Fund, and has sent also £1 to be forwarded to the Rev. Marcus Bergmann for his Bible translation work. It may help to cheer and encourage those who may, from the same cause feel faint-hearted. "You will be wondering if I have received the 'Covenant People'—they have arrived safely, and are being handed round; one I give to my sister, who passes it on to her circle of friends. I am afraid I cannot report much progress lately. I had begun to feel disheartened, when I suddenly had presented to my mind this verse, "Cast they bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days," and I remembered, "In the Lord's own time."

We sow the seed, and "in the Lord's own time," the harvest will be granted, and then He will be glorified. For that let us labour, and delight in it continually.

REV. DR. MOORE ON 1898.

REV. DR. MOORE, writing about the students of Eschatology, or "The Science of Last Things," says: "Mr. Dimbleby is undoubtedly a very able chronologist. His latest book, 'The Appointed Time,' is being widely read. It is more lucidly written than works of this character usually are. He has great truths to tell us, from both Scripture and science. He handles with great skill the problem of Daniel's Seventy Weeks. What is of most interest is his calculation of the 'Times of the Gentiles.' This is a period emphatically held up for exhibition by Christ Himself as the term of Jerusalem's oppression by Gentile Powers. When the oppression began is known for certain—viz., when Pompey seized Jerusalem, B.C. 32. Singularly, the Roman occupation lasted for 666 years. This is the fatal number of the Therion, or Beast. Why should it be considered fanatical to see in this historic fact a correspondence with Divine prediction? It is a simple process, devoid of extravagant conjecture, to reckon on from the cessation of Roman tenure of Jerusalem, and the commencement of the Moslem dominion, in A.D. 638, according to Gibbon, down to the end of 'the time, times, and a-half'—a Biblical period of 1,260 years. This brings us down to 1898. If this be the true view of a great prophetic subject, then we are near to great events, which will mark the end of the Turkish woe. Why is Lord Salisbury confused, baffled, impotent, before Turkey? He seems not to know; but any observer of the 'signs of the times' could tell him. The tiger who has torn the Armenian nationality into bleeding tatters has yet a short time to gloat over the despair of the whole of Christendom at his infernal programme. Then for the Sultan will come the fearful and fiery retribution which no human power has been able to inflict."—From The Christian Herald, May 14, 1896.

Correspondence.

A REMONSTRANCE.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—In this week's BANNER, July 15th, you are requested (I see) to correct two statements in my letter to the Methodist Times, simply because they are absurd—viz., "The fulness of the Gentiles" (Rom. xi. 25), and the "Beast" (Rev. xiii. 5).

There was put into my hands this week, Mr. J. B. Dimbleby's "New Era at Hand," 9th edition. It can be had from the Author, 1, Gordon-road, Wanstead, E. Price threepence.

Mr. Dimbleby shows the two disputed points, which I had no knowledge of when I wrote the letter—viz., that the "fulness of the Gentiles" in Romans, and the "beast" in Revelation, refer to Turkey's reign. It appears to me, therefore, that these are questions of opinion, and may not be absurd notions. However, I can well afford to give up the two disputed points because other Scriptural points I name in my letter clearly prove my contention—viz., that the time of Turkey's reign is fixed and settled by the God of heaven; and if so fixed by Jehovah, it is folly, I consider, to charge Lord Salisbury and the British Government with propping up Turkey, and with the 60,000 Armenian martyrs.

We all deplore the state of things in Armenia. But suppose the wish of Mr. Hughes had been granted, and our Government "received the courage of a mouse," and had taken "the blood-stained Sultan by the throat," and sent his Empire out of existence. What would follow? A great scramble among the nations for Turkey would take place. Sixteen millions of men in arms would commence at once to blow each other's heads, legs, arms, and bodies into fragments; millions of fatherless children and widows would be left to suffering, caused thereby.

Thank God, we have at the head of the nation clear-headed, calm, and thoughtful men, with steady, cool heads, who will not rush the nation into such without consideration and thought. If Turkey must fall and die, and I believe it will shortly, let it be at God's appointed time; for He knows better than man what and when to do the thing. I think Mr. Hughes will agree it is better to leave the thing in His hands. Certainly I do.

THE DOMINION OF THE WORLD, AND TO WHOM IS IT TO BELONG?

IT is remarkable that the dominion of the whole world is the object which is set before two of the existing nations of the world, exclusively. The Russians on the one hand, and the British on the other, have this national object of ambition before them. We do not believe that our own nation entertains the idea at the present moment, or has done so at any other past period of its history. But those who watch her progress, plainly see that she is rapidly taking up a position over the whole earth, which must end, in the absence of national disaster, or colonial rebellion, in universal dominion.

These small and contemptible islands of the North-west of Europe are placed in a strategic position, giving them the maximum of protection with the minimum of danger in regard to invasion. The coaling stations, or Gates of the world, are theirs, conferring the supremacy of the sea. These united, bring vast commerce, and "the power to get wealth." Besides that, there are the British colonies, most of them "nations" already, protecting the Western flank of the seaway from the island home of the race, Southwards, in the case of the "dominion" of Canada. Australasia, in the far South and South-east, is carrying the influence of the nation to the Antipodes, and far beyond. The colonies at the Cape, Natal, and the protectorates towards the Zambesi, promise by-and-bye to develope into a mighty South African Dominion, as large as Canada, giving the nation a promise of an African Empire larger than all the colonies individually. Besides all this there is the military possession of British-India, and Burmah, immense in size, immensely populated, and with capabilities of trade and wealth, quite beyond calculation now. This Empire is constantly growing. Without the consent or wish of the Parent State in "the little Islands of the North," the tendency is for ever to increase. For the Empire is founded on justice and good government, and men who once have experienced what that government is, have no desire to shake it off or escape from it. The cry of those who have not yet benefitted by its good government is ever, "When are the British coming to govern us?" The tendency of affairs is to make the Queen's dominions larger and larger as time goes on, and at last, if things go on as they are doing now, the Empire will surely be co-terminous with a large part of the habitable globe.

The leading article of the Melbourne Age newspaper, published on May 25, 1896, the date kept as Her Majesty's birthday, is remarkable, since it dwells on the extent of her dominions and speaks of them thus:—

> Somebody has calculated that Queen Victoria is a sovereign over a continent, over 100 peninsulas, 500 promontories, 1,000 lakes, 2,000 rivers and 10,000 islands. She waves her hand and 900,000 warriors march to battle in "thin red lines," as stubborn as those in the historic past. She bends her head in acquiescence, and 1,000 ships of war and 100,000 sailors do her bidding on the ocean. She walks upon the earth, and 400,000,000 human beings feel the pressure of her foot. The Assyrian Empire was not half as populous as hers; the Persian Empire not nearly so powerful; the Carthagenian Empire less dreaded; the Spanish Empire not a quarter so wide; while the Roman Empire was weak in comparison, and Greece but as a village. A throne at the best is a dizzy eminence. Surely, then, it is no light thing to have sat on such a throne for almost three score years and to be scatheless of even a scandal.

Such is the growing Power which bids fair to become the dominant empire of the earth, which, without striving to effect the object, is continually getting nearer to its accomplishment. But is Great Britain without a rival in her career of aggrandisement? Nay, she has a mighty competitor for world-wide dominion, a Power which has no conscience in the pursuit of its objects of ambition, and has set before it the task of subduing the earth and bringing it all to submission to the sceptre of the Tzar.

In the Daily Graphic of July 4 last, we have a short notice on the subject of "Russia's Ideas," which, dealing with "The Apotheosis of Russia," tells us in a few sentences what Russia desires and means to have in the end. The article is as follows:—

RUSSIA'S IDEAS.

More important, though, is a paper on "The Apotheosis of Russia," with especial reference to the manner in which this threatens Great Britain. Russia is advancing in position, and 'twere well, thinks the writer, that Britons should seriously consider the outlook:—

"In the Eastern hemisphere Great Britain and Russia are the only two expansive Powers in any real sense. There are others, such as France and Germany, which resist absorption, and even seek out barren spheres for the expansion that never comes. But the fact that such Powers resist absorption is only the more reason for certainty that the time will come when there will be no room left for the simultaneous enlargement of both. The moment may come in the twentieth century or in the twenty-first, but come it must and will. And however the advocates of an Anglo-Russian understanding may delude themselves or others in London, there is no delusion in St. Petersburg. 'Hostility to England is the alphabet of Russian policy,' says the forward school; 'An understanding if you will,' say even the most moderate, 'but it must be an understanding, not of common interest, but of rivalry.'"

All along the line Russia has been triumphing. Little triumphs they may have been, but significant enough if rightly read. She managed the poor and pitiful Prince Ferdinand until he only wanted permission to abase himself; she schemed with the Porte until Europe witnessed the amazing spectacle of Abdul Hamid throwing himself into the arms of his ancient enemy and combining with Russia against her old ally England; she has plotted and planned in the far East to the end that that stately envoy Li Hung Chang brought sincere and humble congratulations to the new Emperor.

"The truth is that Great Britain and Russia are too big ever to agree for any time. We believe that to our race will fall the ultimate supremacy of the world; Russia believes exactly the same of herself. Sooner or later the two ambitions must collide, and we had better be making ready for that great day at once. To allow Russia to absorb all possible strength before the conflict is to put a premium on defeat and ruin."

As soon as Africa is settled we might begin to think about Russia.

That "great day" when these two mighty Powers will collide and seek by war to settle which of them shall remain "the Mistress of the World" must come at last. But it will happen according to the will of God, and just as He has told us it will happen. The well-known chapters xxxviii. and xxxix. of Ezekiel, which in fact are the Commander in Chief's despatches to his Israelitish war office of that day, tell us all about it; who the parties to the conflict are, where it is to take place, the very spot where the decisive battle will occur, and its terrible result. It represents the last final assault upon the Twelve-tribed nation on the mountains of Israel, and the defeat and destruction of the enemies of the Lord, called "Gog," but known and described in these chapters as the Russian Empire of to-day. From these scriptures it is plain that the last great contest of the world will be the fight of Russia versus Israel—and the modern secular writers of the day recognise, as we have seen, that the contest for the dominion of the world now looming in the future, perhaps not the remote future, will be between the Tzar of all the Russias, aided by part of Europe and a large portion of Asia, and the nation and company of nations appertaining to Israel, helped, guided and prospered by the Lord God Almighty, the God of Israel. To Him let us ascribe all the praise and all the glory and all the thanks.

ALMOST LIKE TWIN-BROTHERS.

By Bookworm, of Australia.

The resemblance between the Hebrew and English languages in their structure and usages, though it has been observed by translators and others, has not hitherto, so far as I am aware, been considered critically, with regard to its causes and consequences. Yet the subject should be one of great interest, not only to philologists, but to believers in our Israelitish origin.

John Wilson wrote over fifty years ago, in his "Lectures on Ancient Israel and the Fulness of the Gentiles," p. 143: "One great line of argument has been omitted in tracing the identification. It is that of language." This neglected field of research still awaits cultivation, that it may become fruitful. It might well engage the attention of some of our advocates who are qualified to set in order and draw conclusions from the results to be obtained by comparative examination, a work whereby additional evidence might be supplied to prove that the Bible is indeed our national heirloom, and an armoury be opened to furnish the people of the Book with new and effective weapons against the forces of prejudice and ignorance. Pending the production of such a work, the testimonies of some witnesses, concerning the like characteristics of Hebrew and English, as exemplified in the translation of the Bible, and examples of correspondence and analogy taken from our common speech and literature, may serve to awaken interest, and stimulate inquiry.

The testimony of Tyndale, our earliest translator of the Scriptures from the original tongues, has been repeatedly referred to; but is not, I think, well known, as it occurs in his "Obedience of a Christian Man" (pref.) pub. 1528. Works vi., pp. 148—9, Parker Society's Ed., thus:—

"St. Jerome also translated the Bible into his mother tongue: why may not we also? They will say it cannot be translated into our tongue, it is so rude. It is not so rude as they are false liars. For the Greek tongue* agreeth more with the English than with the Latin. And the properties of the Hebrew tongue agreeth a thousand times more with the English than with the Latin. The manner of "speaking is both one, so that in a thousand places thou needest not, but to translate it into the English word for word; when thou must seek a compass in the Latin, and yet shall have much work to translate it well-favourably, so that it have the same grace and sweetness, sense and pure understanding with it in the Latin as it hath in the Hebrew. A thousand parts better may it be translated into the English than into the Latin."

Of like purport are the words of Hy. Craik in a work on the Hebrew language (Bagster, 1860):—

"It ought to be observed that there is a far closer correspondence between the Hebrew and English languages than between the Hebrew and the Latin. This gave our translators a great advantage over Jerome."

About a century ago Rev. Alex. Geddes, LL.D., published a new translation of part of the Old Testament, with critical notes. In the prospectus, 1786, note on p. 128 he observes:—

"Our language easily moulds itself into the Hebrew form; and it rarely happens that we are under any necessity of having recourse to paraphrase or circumlocution to express the full meaning of the text. Even when the syntactical arrangement is different, there is a striking equipollence of simplicity, conciseness, and energy to be attained; which perhaps no other modern language can boast of and which is not found in ours, with regard to any other language but the Hebrew."

And in a letter to B. P. Lowth, 1787, p. 36 :—

"Luckily for an English translator of the Bible, he will not be often under any great necessity of departing much from the arrangement of the Hebrew, especially in the poetical parts of Scripture, where the two idioms are so congenial, as to appear almost like twin-brothers." (The italics are mine in these two quotations).

The style and structure of our Authorised Version of the Scriptures affords confirmation of the foregoing opinions. Geddes remarks :—

"Every sentence, every word, every syllable, every letter and point, seem to have been weighed with the nicest exactitude, and expressed either in the text or margin. Pagninus* himself is hardly more literal, and it was well remarked by Robertson above 100 years ago (1786) that it may serve for a Lexicon of the Hebrew language, as well as for a translation."

In the words of Selden, "the Bible is rather translated into English words, than into English phrase. The Hebraisms are kept, and the phrase of that language is kept."

And Dr. Adam Clarke in the preface to his commentary observes :—

"Those who have compared most of the European translations with the original have not scrupled to say that the English translation of the Bible made under the direction of King James I. is the most accurate and faithful of the whole. Nor is this its only praise; the translators have seized the very spirit and soul of the original, and expressed this almost everywhere with pathos and energy."

Some of these observations apply to the New Testament, which, it should be remembered, was written in what has been called Hellenistic or Hebraizing Greek.

To return to the language of the Old Testament, we have evidence of agreement of the English translation with the original in word, phraseology and spirit. Is not this a clearer mark of linguistic relationship than that afforded by the likeness of a multitude of isolated words, occurring in English and the languages usually classed with it? Philologists are generally keen to trace the parentage, history and distribution of words, but the phenomenon of the reproduction of the features of an ancient dead language in those of a modern living one in harmonious combination appears to have no attraction for the exercise of their critical skill.

King James' Bible, commonly known as the A.V., was, however, rather a revision than a new translation, and may be traced through successive revisions up to the first complete English Bible, rendered, for the greater part, from the original tongues, that of 1537, which bore the name of Matthew (probably a fictitious one), but was really Tyndale and Coverdale's version.† Geddes says of it: "It is astonishing how little obsolete the language of it is, even at this day; and in point of perspicuity and noble simplicity, propriety of idiom, and purity of style, no English version had yet surpassed it," and Rev. E. Budge, observes, "I think if that translation were now printed and put into circulation with the alteration of a very few words, five persons out of six would scarcely know that they were returned to the old original of Henry VIII's days." To introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the Authorised Version* consistently with faithfulness was one of the principles adopted by our last revisers. The A.V. and R.V. therefore bear witness both to Tyndale's faithful and skilful work, and to the soundness of his judgment concerning the properties of the original tongues in relation to the English.†

High honour and gratitude are due to the many pious, learned, and patriotic men, from Tyndale onwards, who have contributed to the formation and correction of our copy of the Holy Scriptures; but we are especially bound to give glory to the God of the Bible, not only for raising up such men, but for preparing our language in a wonderful manner to become a fit medium for the revelation of His oracles to the English-speaking people.

Anderson in "Annals of the English Bible," 1845, thus comments on our national position with regard to the Bible. After mentioning that our version of the Bible is the only one in existence on which the sun never sets, he proceeds: "What in ancient times was the pre-eminence of the Jews? Did it not consist in this, that to them were entrusted the oracles of God? But were these ever committed to them as they have been to us? Jehovah had not so dealt with any nation; but had He dealt with even that nation, as He hath done with this? If Divine revelation be regarded in its proper light as the voice of God, to what people in existence has He ever spoken so long, so uninterruptedly, and now above all others so extensively? It was said of old that the mighty God, even Jehovah, hath spoken and called the earth from the rising of the sun to his going down, and is it nothing that in our language by way of eminence, this should have been first so singularly and literally verified? Such, at all events, is the present high and momentous position of Britain and her sons."

I conclude with a few words about Geddes, a scholar of some note in his time. He was a Scottish Roman Catholic Priest, said to be the first of that faith to receive the degree of LL.D. from the University of Aberdeen. The Protestant version of the Scriptures had been familiar to him from his infancy, for he tells us: "Although my parents were Roman Catholics, they were not bigots, and the Bible was the principal book in their scanty library. They taught me to read it with reverence and attention, and before I had reached my eleventh year I knew all its history by heart."

In the comments which accompany his translation he displays rationalistic views. Aikin's biography records of him: "Of Dr. Geddes' profound and various learning, acute and penetrating genius, and indefatigable application, his numerous production, and particularly his grand work and the pieces which bear relation to it, afford a very ample testimony."

BOOKWORM.

* Author of a verbal translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Latin, of which Charles Butler says, "That it is an accurate and faithful translation, all acknowledge; that the Latinity is barbarous cannot be denied," an illustration of Tyndale's remarks before quoted.

† The work of Tyndale comprised the Old Testament from Genesis to 2 Chronicles, and the whole of the New Testament. The rest of the Old Testament was almost the same as Coverdale's version of 1535. The book was edited by John Rogers (the first martyr in Queen Mary's reign), who was officially identified with Matthew (see Eadie and Moulton's works on the English Bible).

* Of course it has faults, but they are not worthy to be compared with its excellence as a whole.

† His remarks on the translation of Greek and Hebrew into English will command the assent of all who are acquainted with the properties of the languages in question. (Professor Moulton).

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We beg to draw our readers' particular attention to the above excellent paper which comes to us from distant Victoria, Australia, from a man of letters, who has been our correspondent for many years. His subject is one on which far too little has been written, namely, "The marvellous capability of the English language to express the meaning of the original tongues of the Scriptures." No doubt the evidence to be derived from the comparison of the Hebrew with the English would become a powerful weapon of attack and defence on our side. We would that some of our scholarly champions would take it up and use it.

Our Victorian Correspondent is no mean authority, and we are glad to know that we may soon expect from him a paper on "The Analogies with Hebrew Occurring in our Secular Literature and Speech."

The full quotation of Tyndale's words regarding the close affinity between the Hebrew and English tongues, which appears in Bookworm's article above, is very valuable and conclusive as regards our Identity with "The lost Ten Tribes."

THE PARABLES OF BALAAM.

A FRIEND to our cause, a reader of The English Church and St. James' Chronicle, of July 2, last, is much tried by the article on the above subject in the issue in question. He is unable to answer the writer himself, and begs us to take up the cudgels in the interests of truth, and expose the fallacy of the article in The English Churchman. The author apparently does not see that the prophet was dealing with the two Houses of Israel and Judah, and was painting the future history of the former rather than of the latter. We have accordingly read the article alluded to, and find it an exposition of the two chapters in Numbers founded on the spiritualizing view of God's dealings with Israel; meaning by the term "the Jews," or "House of Judah." The writer understands, that while the Jews are Israel, there are no Israelites except the Jews. Of course, with that error at the foundation of his remarks the exposition of the passage is bound to be unsatisfactory, and confusing. Quoting the 9th verse of Numbers xxiii., where Balaam said that "the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations," the comment runs thus, "Through many vicissitudes they have remained a separate people," meaning the Jews who have remained "a separate people."

The writer had no thought that the Ten-tribed House of Joseph, or Ephraim, had also to be reckoned with, and that Balaam did not forget them. But besides this avenue to error, the writer of the article had another, which runs through the whole of his paper. He took Balaam's prophecy, quoted it, and instantly gave it a spiritual application which it certainly was never intended to bear; and so evaporated its historical teaching. Thus, in reference to verse 9 we have just quoted, the author remarked, "Similarly, Christians are to be separate from the world; God's enemies are there, and if the love of the Father be in His professed children, they will not be found there." The Lord Jesus knew the world, and said of His disciples, "the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world." St. Paul took up the strain, saying, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world," and so on with much more to the same effect.

The writer's words are no doubt very true, and very Scriptural. But the question is, was Balaam's object to teach this sort of lesson? or was it not rather, to point out to Balak and to all future students of the Word, that the Lord foresaw the future destiny of His people, and mapped it all out historically, so that men might see that He had foreseen and arranged it from the first, and guided them throughout their course, while step by step they fulfilled His will according to His prophetic Word.

The view which we have taken of the four prophecies of Balaam was published in the BANNER OF ISRAEL so far back as Aug. 4 and 11, 1880, on pp. 307 and 318 of Vol. IV. We looked on the four visions as four consecutive eras in the history of Israel. On the first occasion the prophet saw the Twelve Tribes drawn up before him in their camp. He stood on the top of the rocks and beheld a people "dwelling alone" in the wilderness then, and destined "to dwell alone" ever afterwards, by reason of the presence of their God with them always, separating them from the other nations of the earth. During that first epoch of the first vision, no mention is made of Israel's earthly king. They had none such then. God was their King. The first vision covered the story of Israel from B.C. 1452, to the time of Saul, B.C. 1095. These were the Twelve Tribes, a united, multitudinous, conquering, peculiar race, destined to be a holy people.

The second prophecy carried on the historical narrative. It began with the era of Israel's earthly monarchs, with Saul as the first. It covered the interval between B.C. 1056 to B.C. 975, including the victories of David, and the peaceful reign of Solomon. Reference to Num. xxiii. 19—24, will illustrate this. Then we find in Israel "the shout of a king" (ver. 21). The people being those "brought out of Egypt," with David's rampant lion, and the lion and the unicorn of Ephraim, to indicate that the whole of the original nation is before us. To this nation God repeated the assurances He gave them in their wilderness sojournings, "God is not a man that He should lie." "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel. The Lord his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them." This was but a repetition of the blessing announced by Balaam in the first vision when Israel was described as "the righteous" by the Lord (ver. 10), and proclaimed to be not His cursed, but (therefore) His blessed people (vers. 7 to 10).

The third vision of Balaam had reference probably to our present Christian dispensation, and to British-Israel as seen to-day. Balaam viewed the British Empire before him 3,300 years ago. And he perceived in the prophetic "wilderness" of the "Isles of the West," a happy, prosperous, populous, Israelitish nation, highly blessed of God, and wealthy to a degree; "spread abroad" throughout the world, "to the West and to the East, to the North, and to the South," according to the prophecies in Israel's favour. He saw this "people" still under a monarchy. "His king," said the prophet, "shall be higher than Agag" (whom we take to be Russian Gog), "and his kingdom" being Israel's, "shall be exalted," as ours verily is (Num. xxiv. 4—9; Dan. vii. 27).

To prevent our spiritualizers spoiling this glorious prophecy (the record dictated by God Himself), Balaam again marked the continuity and identity of the race by describing them, in ver. 8, as those God brought out of Egypt, and as still possessing the lion and the unicorn as their national emblems. Then, too, was repeated regarding them, the blessing originally pronounced by Almighty God on Abram, in Gen. xii. 2, first fulfilled during this third epoch of the people's national life, "Blessed is he that blesseth thee (Israel), and cursed is he that curseth thee."

Digitized by Google

That blessing, we see, is the lot of the British nation to-day. Shortly we hope it will also be shared by their brethren of the House of Judah. This third vision covers, we believe, the period since A.D. 1550, the epoch of the glorious reformation, and exhibits our nation as it really is, "a nation" responding to the Seer's description in every possible imaginable way.

The fourth and last phase of national life described by Balaam is yet future as to its fulfilment. It is a prediction of "the latter days" (Num. xxiv. 14), a chronological hint that the four prophecies relate to four distinct eras of time in the history of Israel. The whole was the story of what "this people" Israel were to do, and at the last what would happen to Balak's people at the end of the dispensation at the hands of Israel. Both were to survive as nations, till then; and it is ours to search for, and find the two peoples, now.

Further references to this part of the prophecy may be found on page 319 of Vol. IV. of the BANNER OF ISRAEL; but enough has been said and quoted from the two articles to show that there is more in Balaam's four prophecies than our friend in The English Churchman is probably willing to admit. Those prophecies are our nation's consolation, and we praise the Lord for them.

EGYPT.

WE have received the following "cutting" from an American paper of June 21 last, from Mr. J. Cassel, of Kansas, regarding the sayings of an Irish Roman Catholic priest, who has been long employed as a missionary in Egypt. His testimony as to the benefit and blessing of British rule and administration to the people of the country is very satisfactory and remarkable. The report is as follows :—

"FROM DESERT LANDS.

"A visitor from the land of the lotus and the pyramid, Rev. Father D. J. Sullivan, is a guest at the residence of Father Thomas F. Cashman, on Jackson boulevard, near Ogden-avenue. Father Sullivan is a sturdy Irishman of splendid physique. His education was received principally in France, where he joined the African Missionary Society of Lyons some six years ago. Within a year he was assigned to take charge of the society's work at Tantah, a city with a population of almost 100,000, and one of the chief industrial centres of British Egypt.

"But, while nominally attached to the post at Tantah, Father Sullivan has been a missionary throughout much of the Delta country, finding it necessary frequently to extend the sphere of his labours right into the heart of the late Madhi's dominions in the trackless deserts of the Soudan.

"CHARACTER OF THE SOUDANESE.

"Of the Soudanese fanatics, latterly known as Mahdists, the good priest talked interestingly and at length when seen last night by a reporter for The Inter Ocean. He said :—

"'They are a very peculiar people, the most fanatically anti-Christian of any I have ever known. While they succeeded in killing General Gordon a number of years ago an almost irreparable blow was dealt to the cause of civilization in Africa. For the Soudanese must be reckoned with by the many European civilizing influences at work in Africa to-day, before any great headway can be made for Christianity and humanity in the great central and eastern districts of the country. The Mahdist sect is the chief bulwark of Mohammedanism in the dark continent. Egypt, it is true, has in the past suffered much from the Ottoman incubus. But all that is now being rapidly changed, and within a very few years the historically fertile country of the Pharaohs will undoubtedly have regained something of its pristine fame as pre-eminently the land of milk and honey.'

"'To what influences is this advance to be ascribed ?' was asked.

"'Exclusively to the fiscal and governmental reforms inaugurated by England,' was the unhesitating answer.

"ADMINISTRATION IS SUCCESSFUL.

"The priest seemed to have half forgotten his Irish descent as he spoke. So he quickly caught his breath as he added, with a smile: 'That indorsement of English methods of government must seem strange as coming from an Irishman and Catholic. But, while I do not wish to in the least condone the governmental misdeeds of the English in Ireland, yet truth and candor compels me to say that the English administration of Egypt has been strikingly successful and eminently beneficent. When England took hold there, the country was bankrupt and everything and everybody seemed thoroughly demoralized. Now, the country's long-standing obligations have all been liquidated, the finances of the government have been placed on a sound basis, and the masses of the people are comparatively prosperous.'

"'Then you are not an advocate of the withdrawal of the English from Egypt ?'

"No, sir. I certainly am not. But on the contrary, I hope to see the present English expedition up the Nile a success in every way. The Soudan must be reclaimed from Osman Digna and his fanatical myrmidons, Khartoum must be retaken, and the evil influences of the Mahdist regime eradicated root and branch. For we in Egypt cannot readily forget the ruthless destruction of Christian lives and property wrought by the Soudanese after the fall of Khartoum and that gallant, chivalric hero, General Gordon, with whose untimely death came the reaction that again plunged the great Lower Nile country into a state of hideous barbarism.'

"SHIFTLESS AND UNPROGRESSIVE.

"The Soudanese are described by Father Sullivan as a shiftless and unprogressive people, who are chiefly remarkable for the readiness with which they yield up their lives for the Mohammedan faith. But the priest is not without hope that they may ultimately be won over to Christianity and civilization. Egypt, he says, is already well nigh Christianized and civilized to a great extent.

"The missionary society to which Father Sullivan belongs, has branches in Dahomey, Ashantee, and Matabeleland, and, indeed, among almost every race and tribe on the continent. The average time in which a missionary withstands the pestilential climate of the tropical coast country is only two and one-half years. 'Then all our priests and nuns die with yellow fever, malaria, or some other epidemic,' said Father Sullivan.

"The visiting priest is 38 years old, but looks much younger. He wears a full beard, but in all other respects resembles closely the conventional clergyman. The Egyptian climate is, he says, very pleasant, and not unhealthy.

"To-day Father Sullivan will preach at ten o'clock mass, in St. Jarlath's Church. Within a week he will deliver a lecture upon Egypt in aid of the mission work he is engaged in in Africa. Most Rev. Archbishop Feehan has kindly given his approval to Father Sullivan's plans for a series of such lectures in Chicago and throughout the archdiocese."

The testimony of a Roman Catholic Irish priest on such a subject as British good government in Egypt, ought to rank as excellent evidence of its real success in the land. God certainly has blessed our efforts to give peace and prosperity to what was once a down-trodden, unhappy race, but is now prospering as the priest from "Desert Lands" describes. This prosperity attends all our efforts to govern eastern lands. It would attend us in Charterland and Matabeleland also, but for the ignorance and fanaticism of the tribes who in Rhodesia are striving to drive our countrymen out of their neighbourhood. Hitherto the efforts of the emigrants have been but partially successful in consequence of the extent of the insurrection, and the difficulty experienced on the British side, in maintaining an adequate number of fighting men in a country where there is no food, and where oxen and cattle have been cut off extensively by a terrible rinderpest, which has destroyed vast numbers of the flocks and herds of the people, and even of wild animals, which are suddenly disappearing, stricken by the same visitation. We have confidence, however, that the blessing of God, which has followed us in Egypt, will yet enable us to subdue our brave, but savage and cruel foes in the South, who are fighting for the restoration of their bloodthirsty dominion which has depended, hitherto, on the slave trade, and on the awful massacres of the native races subdued by their arms.

LECTURE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

"Mr. A. Tracey Middleton delivered a very interesting lecture on Thursday night, in the Russell-road School-room, Port Elizabeth, Cape Colony, the Rev. Mr. Wynne, presiding. The subject, briefly, was that of 'Anglo-Israelism.' It may not be generally known that there is in existence a Society called the British-Israel Association, which numbers in its directorate no fewer than twenty-one beneficed clergymen. The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse is one of its vice-presidents. Mr. Middleton's object in his very able lecture was to stimulate thought on this important subject. Hence he spake solely with the view of creating a renewed interest in study of the Scriptures. If, he said, Anglo-Israelism is regarded by some persons as a craze, it was a craze that could do no harm, but might possibly do much good by inducing a desire to 'search the Scriptures.' We have no hesitation in saying that the lecture must have cost Mr. Middleton very many hours of study, research and investigation. In regard to the Scriptural promises which of necessity formed the very base or groundwork of the theme so elaborately dwelt upon, the lecturer divided his subject into two heads—1. The promises of which we have a recorded fulfilment, and 2, The promises of which there is no recorded fulfilment. The task undertaken by the lecturer was an arduous one, but, to the gratification of the audience, he was perfectly equal to its fulfilment. His Biblical quotations were numerous, apt, and calculated to inspire inquiry. The lecture must have involved an immense amount of study, and we only regret that the demand upon our space will not admit of the publication which it deserves. In many points an important light is thrown on passages of Holy Writ that are on first reading somewhat obscure. Mr. Middleton clears the way from doubt and difficulty, reconciles apparent inconsistencies, proves that what are sometimes termed contradictions are practically confirmations, and, in fact, his lecture opens up an entirely new field of thought and area of study. As a treatise on Biblical history, and leaving speculation and theorising quite out of the question, the lecture is valuable, and in many respects convincing and conclusive. The amount of research and thought involved in its preparation is simply appalling. Never was a vote of thanks more honestly deserved than that which was unanimously passed to Mr. Middleton at the close of his elaborate lecture."

As far as it goes, the above is very satisfactory and encouraging. We only wish we could glean from the Port Elizabeth Paper the evidence (in outline) relied upon by the lecturer to prove that the British are Israel of the House of Joseph. The second section of the lecture regarding "the promises of which there is no recorded fulfilment," would be the one in which we should be most interested. We should expect the lecturer to tell us that the promises and sworn covenants of the Lord Jehovah to His friend Abraham, and "his seed for ever," as detailed in Gen. xxii. 17, 18, xxviii. 14, and xxxv. 11, belonged to the class having no recorded fulfilment in the Scriptures. They awaited the sacrifice of God the Son, and in His hands they were to become vital and be fulfilled.

The "spreading abroad" of Israel West, East, North, and South, was to take place in the Christian dispensation, and the federation of its "nation and company of nations" is an event which yet awaits complete fulfilment.

The time when "Israel was to take root, blossom, and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6, R.V.), dates later still, when the nation of Israel shall have long been settled as a Christian nation in their Isles of the West. The clusters of promises having reference to the multitudinousness of the chosen race could hardly be looked for before the present century, because in connection with it, as Hosea i. 10 teaches us, the nation is to be known as "the sons of the living God," during their "Lo-Ammi" period of existence, and that in the place where they were to be reckoned to be non-Israelite Gentiles. The discovery of the lost Ten Tribes, after a prolonged period of hiding and of disappearance from the knowledge of history, is of course another of the promises of which there is no recorded fulfilment, for, to this very hour, men with the Bible in their hands refuse to believe that Israel is in existence, but maintain that she is utterly lost.

The lecturer, no doubt, made much of all these points and showed that though the House of Israel was "lost," she was yet destined to be "found" as one of the modern nations of the world, domiciled in the Isles of the West, yet "spread abroad" as "nations," in the four quarters of the earth, being the mistress of the seas, because the holder of the Gates (Gen. xxii. 17), Christian in character, entrusted with the oracles of God and sending them with the Gospel, to all nations, families, and kindreds of the earth, blessing them in spiritual things thereby. Proving these things, the lecturer must have found it an easy task to show that the British alone among the nations answer to all the points of likeness God Himself has set down for us, whereby to be able to detect Israel, when the time for the discovery should have come. What men find so difficult to allow at the present day is the idea that any nation or people of ancient times could be perpetuated without their own knowledge, if once mingled and lost among the nations. They disregard the fact that God has said that He will positively effect this very miracle and bring it to pass. Also, that there is not one of the nations of Europe now existing which can trace its national descent with accuracy, or prove who their ancestors were 1,000 years, much less 2,500 years ago.

But it was predicted of Israel that she "should not find her paths," because God purposed to hedge up her way with thorns and make a wall that she might lose them. The Cape paper was right in saying that the lecturer's subject "opens up an entirely new field of thought and area of study." It seems, in fact, to present us with a new Bible in some respects, though in the matter of salvation it does not touch that subject, but confirms the fact that "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved" than the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, who has "formed, made, created, and redeemed Israel" His people, to bring Him glory, and "to show forth His praise" (Acts iv. 12; Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.). Experience has shown that the subject of Our Identity, reverently and Scripturally treated, leads men to Christ in penitence, converts, and sanctifies. If men err and are lost, who embrace these truths, it is in spite of them and in direct opposition to their tendency and teaching. We trust that the lecturer in Port Elizabeth made all this very plain, and secured with God's blessing many believers in Our Identity.

THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

It is one of the questions of the day, "What is to become of the Jews?" and "What had best be done about them?" The last suggestion is one which appeared in the Illustrated News, "discussing the proposal of Dr. Theodor Herzl, to establish a Jewish State in Palestine." It is admitted this would mean the establishment of a new State, which would have a fair prospect of success seeing that other nations have been started, especially in Australia, by what were originally penal colonies. It is very singular that when men are discussing the future of the Jews, and admitting that there is a necessity that they should somehow be provided for with a locality and a fixed home, no one thinks of going to the Bible to see what is said there respecting the subject. Were that very obvious plan adopted it would be found at once that God Himself has settled the whole difficulty, and has told all who wish to know what the end is to be. In the first place, the Jews are not to go back finally alone. We say "finally" because it appears very probable, from the facts of the day and from certain passages in the prophecies, that there will be a false return, not sanctioned by the Lord, of the Jews alone. Such a return the Illustrated News and half Christendom recommends, and would carry out to-morrow if the Jews were willing to go, and if the nations of Europe would be answerable for the expense. When this experiment fails, which it must, and will do, then there will be the final God-honoured one, which will include the Twelve Tribes, not excluding the thirteenth, Manasseh. The proceedings will include the union of the Jews and of the Ten Tribes, called "the House of Israel" in Jer. iii. 18, R.V. The operation is described thus in the passage in question: "In those days the House of Judah shall walk with (to, margin) the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north, to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers." The prophets Isaiah, Hosea, Ezekiel, and Zechariah describe various details connected with the return of the united Houses, and nothing can be clearer than the fact that if it be desired that the Jews should be settled in Palestine, they can only be so disposed of when the Ten Tribes are found in their present home and in God's fixed time the Jews are united with their brethren of the House of Joseph and with them proceed to occupy the land of their inheritance "together." It is vain to make plans for the Jews which are directly opposed to those God has already revealed as His final purpose in the matter. The effort, such as that described in the Illustrated News, is sure to fail, while at present, as may be freely admitted, there seems no probability, humanly speaking, that such an idea as that prophetically announced can possibly be carried into effect as things are now.

The article in question is as follows:—

"THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

"It is not difficult to understand that recent events should have given a practical interest to the mystical dream of a resuscitation of the Jewish State in Palestine. Not many weeks ago Lord Salisbury spoke of the territories of the Sultan as being likely, at no distant period, to "come into the market," and when that event occurs the fate of the Holy Land will have to be decided. The whole of Christendom would view with sympathy the re-establishment in that country of, at least, a section of the people with whom it is historically identified, not only because it would fulfil a prophecy dear to all the Semitic religions, but because it would assure the neutralisation of a land which, for the commerce of the world and the conflicting ambitions of the Powers, has a considerable strategical importance. Events, too, would seem to be meeting the idea from another direction. Dr. Theodor Herzl, the Austrian publicist, who is responsible for the latest agitation on the subject, bases his proposals on the persistence of anti-Semitism, which is rendering it daily a more difficult task for the Gentile nations to assimilate a certain proportion of the Jewish people. He suggests the revival of the Jewish State as the most practical way of meeting this difficulty—the setting apart of a certain territory whither all persecuted Jews could bend their steps without fear of being met by immigration restrictions or anti-Jewish agitations. This, of course, would mean that the foundations of the State would have to be laid with very unpromising material. But nations have before now grown out of penal colonies—conditions infinitely worse than those which Dr. Herzl contemplates. The Jewish community in London has done well to appoint a committee to study the project."

The "study" of the project will end with a great disappointment to all concerned if it is conducted apart from the prophecies of the God of Israel as revealed in the Book He has caused to be written for the information of His chosen ones. If that source of knowledge be consulted, then it will be seen (as we have already shown) that the Jews will return in triumph to their land as soon as "Ephraim" is found and the two Houses are ready to return "together to the land which the Lord hath given for an inheritance unto their fathers" (Jer. iii. 18). But their joint departure thither must be from "the land of the north," and the Jews must, as the condition precedent, gather together there before they depart with their brethren of the House of Israel (or Joseph), to the Promised Land. As this will be the final settlement of the people, and the arrangement (one sanctioned by the Lord) is to last for ever, and the nations of the earth to whom the Land of Palestine is even now an object greatly coveted, will hardly acquiesce, we can see that the settle ment of Israel and Judah will lead to wars and invasions of that country exactly as the prophets have declared. To Russia the matter will be a serious disappointment, and will lead, as Ezekiel declares in chapters xxxviii. and xxxix., to a terrific convulsion and an invasion of the land by a confederation of European and Asiatic peoples, which must be successful, humanly speaking, if the power of the God of hosts on Israel's side be omitted from the calculation. Thank God, He will then fight for His people and defend their interests. For that will be the last great conflict this sin-torn earth is to see, before the return of the King, the Lord Jesus Christ, "to reign over His ancients gloriously," and over His world-wide kingdom which He will administer by the hands of His chosen ones, the children of Israel, Judah, and Manasseh. To Him, then, must be all the praise and all the glory. But we must now and for ever abandon the hopeless task of bringing about the restoration of the tribes after a fashion not sanctioned by the Lord or by the Scriptures of His truth.

THE CORONATION STONE.

THE following appeared in the Montreal Star of June 27th last, under the head of "Notes, Queries, and Answers." A friend in Richmond, province of Quebec, Canada, sent the paper to us, signing himself (or herself), "A Sharer in your Belief, and a Constant Reader of your BANNER." Our nameless correspondent is one of a very large number scattered all over the earth, whom we shall never see in the flesh, but who, one and all, feel friendly towards us and our belief, being also constant readers of this journal. We are thankful for the kindly expressions of sympathy we constantly receive from friends beyond sea, and are glad to know that our labours in the BANNER are so widely appreciated. To the Lord be all the praise!

The Montreal Star contained the following:—

"LEGEND OF SCONE.

"To the Editor of 'Notes and Queries.'

"Sir,—The coronation of Queen Victoria took place on June 28, 1838, and reminds us of the stone which is under the coronation chair in Westminster Abbey. The following legend is taken from Marshall's 'Historic Scenes in Perthshire,' in which county Scone (pronounced Scoon) is situated.

"The outline of the legend concerning the Stone of Destiny is, that it is the stone which was the patriarch's pillow at Luz (Gen. xxviii.); that it was brought from Syria to Egypt by Gathelus, son of Cecrops, King of Athens, a person who entered into the service of Pharaoh, and married his daughter Scota; that, to escape the impending plagues, Gathelus, by the advice of Moses, sailed from the Nile, with his wife and the stone, and landed in Spain; that Gathelus sent the stone with his son when he invaded Ireland; that the kings of Ireland were crowned on it for many ages on the hill of Tara; that Fergus, the son of Erc, who led the Dalriadic Scots to the shores of Argyleshire, brought it with him for his coronation to Dunstaffnage, where it remained till 834; and that Kenneth McAlpine conveyed it thence to Scone, where the Scottish kings were crowned on it, till Edward I. of England carried it in 1296 (Aug. 8th) to Westminster Abbey, where it is still preserved, and supports the coronation chair of the British sovereigns.

"In the treaty between King Robert Bruce and Edward III. it was stipulated that this stone should be restored to the Scots. But the Londoners had taken a fancy for it; [and] when Edward would have fulfilled the stipulation, a mob rose and prevented him from doing so; and Bruce had not much difficulty in persuading his people to waive the performance of this part of the treaty.

"This stone is called the Stone of Destiny, because of its influence on the destinies of Britain, as commemorated in these lines:—

"'Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunque locatum Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem,' which have been Englished thus:—

"'Unless the fates are faithless grown,
And prophet's voice be vain,
Where'er this fatal stone is found,
The Scottish race shall reign.'

"This stone is [now] in Westminster Abbey, and there, as well as here [in Perthshire] the Scottish race have been reigning ever since the accession [of James VI.] to the English crown. "GILLEMARUS."

RANDOM SHAFTS.

THOSE nihilists of theology, called by courtesy, "higher critics," contend that the books of the Bible were written much later than they profess to be, and Conder has a few words to say thereon which are not only valuable in themselves, but are of interest to us. The modern theory is that the Book of Joshua belongs to the era of Persian domination over Palestine, but Conder assigns its final compilation to the Davidic age, and remarks: "It is difficult to believe that a Jewish writer of later times would willingly have admitted that the first centre of worship for Israel was at Shechem, and this applies to the author of Deuteronomy, as well as to the writer of the Book of Joshua. In Deuteronomy Joseph and Judah are equally blessed, as also in the song of Jacob. . . . The language of the Hebrew prophets regarding Ephraim is very different to that of the earlier books, and Gilgal, which in the Book of Joshua is a sacred centre, was to them an idolatrous shrine. In Samuel's time it was still a sacred place, where justice was administered; and only in the eighth century B.C. is it first noticed with disfavour" ("The Bible and the East," p. 109).

On the principle that half a loaf is in certain eventualities worth taking, it is satisfactory to have Col. Conder's admission that Joseph and Judah were equally blessed. This is not the opinion of the clergy, for they seem to think that Joseph had no promises at all, although Canon Girdlestone, in a fit of generosity I presume, has conceded that the Ten Tribes possess a promise of "re-union with the other two." It is also satisfactory to know that the equality between Joseph and Judah in the matter of blessings is of service to orthodox religion, Col. Conder's reasoning on this point being quite sound. But a socratic sermon could be preached on his statements, and might be divided, as is usual, into three sections, thus:

Firstly—Is the language of the prophets regarding Ephraim very different to that of the earlier books? No doubt Ephraim is denounced and threatened with punishment, but so is Judah; yet Judah's blessings were not thereby cancelled, and neither are Joseph's. The predictions of Hosea and Zedekiah concerning Joseph's house are not surpassed by anything foretold of it in the Pentateuch, nor are the prophets a whit less liberal with Joseph than with Judah. Secondly—Are Joseph and Judah equally blessed in Deuteronomy, or even in Jacob's song? The answer is, No. In the latter, the Abrahamic blessings are laid on "the head of Joseph;" and in Deut. xxxiii. 7, Moses merely prays that Judah may be helped of God, whereas Joseph is the object of magnificent promises. Thirdly—If Joseph's equality with Judah tends to authenticate the Old Testament Scriptures, what would Joseph's superiority do?

There is no question as to this superiority—"the birthright was Joseph's." And while it is unlikely that Jewish authors of a late date would have put Joseph on a par with Judah, it is utterly absurd to suppose that they would have set him above Judah. True prophets would, of course, declare what they were inspired to declare irrespective of their personal prejudice or wishes, but the rationalist does not give "Jewish patriots" much credit for inspiration, and we must meet him on his own ground. Fortunately this is easy, as Conder demonstrates; but he would strengthen his argument immensely if he went a step further and taught what is actually the case—namely, that the primitive Scriptures bestow the premier position on Joseph, apportioning the throne to Judah and national greatness to Joseph.

It is a common retort of our opponents that in claiming a worldly empire for Israel and identifying it with the British Power we "repeat the sin of the Jews, who looked for an earthly dominion instead of a spiritual one." But where do they gather from Scripture that this expectancy of political rule was "the" sin of Judah or a sin at all? Christ did not spare the Jews. He exposed their shortcomings in the plainest and strongest terms; but I cannot remember a single occasion on which He censured them for the "sin" referred to. He denounced the Pharisees for their hypocrisy, their self-righteousness, their formality, and their blindness; but He never once rebuked them for hankering after an "earthly dominion." This "sin of the Jews" was apparently a sin of the disciples as well, for they asked the Saviour when the kingdom would be restored to Israel, and His reply does not convey the impression that their hopes were displeasing in His sight. On the other hand, the Jews distinctly repudiated "earthly dominion" when they cried, "We have no king but Cæsar." Our learned friends are probably confusing the Scriptures with the Commentaries?

To bring forward proof that the Ten Tribes did not return with Judah from exile is, perhaps, a little out of date. The affair is settled; and those who are not convinced upon the evidence already offered will be convinced by nothing. But as an indication of the completeness with which Biblical facts support our view we may allude to the topography of Nehemiah. He states that the "residue" dwelt "in all the cities of Judah, every one in his inheritance" (Neh. xi. 20); but proceeds to relate that some of the children of Judah inhabited Moladah, Hazar-shual, Beersheba, Ziklag, and Enrimmon, while Benjaminites took up their abode at Hadid, Neballat, Lod, and Ono. Now, if Josh. xix. is consulted, it will be seen that these five cities colonised by Judah were in the territory of Simeon; besides which, the places annexed by Benjamin have been identified and belonged, it is known, to Dan. If, however, Dan and Simeon had come back from Assyria, they would have re-occupied their old homes, and it is obvious that Judah and Benjamin crossed the border for the simple reason that Dan and Simeon were absent.

That the British should be descended from Israel and have forgotten so many of their Israelitish customs is a circumstance "past believing," in the opinion of some. But 2 Kings xxii. records a piece of bad memory on the part of Judah, which may assist them to see the possibility of a people forgetting a very great deal in the space of a thousand years, although it is only one out of several similar incidents in the history of the chosen race. The chronicler informs us that Hilkiah found the book of the law, so that it had been lost and during the interval—which would not be long—the whole community, including good king Josiah, lapsed into ignorance of the covenant, or of its nature (2 Kings xxii. 13, xxiii. 2). For when Shaphan had read the scroll Josiah rent his clothes, and exhibited other signs of dismay—weeping, summoning a public convention, and sending an embassy to "enquire" of God through Huldah.

The prophetess pronounced Judah's fate, and if we measure their guilt by their punishment the Jews must have forgotten more than circumcision; indeed, from the account of Josiah's crusade against prevailing evil it is clear that they were not far removed from the heathen they had dispossessed. In this instance they lacked "the book of the law," but they had a priesthood, a temple, and the traditions which are inseparable from a stationary population. Can so much be said of Israel? Contrast the advantages of Judah with the disadvantages of the Ten Tribes, and then let any candid judge decide whether the condition of the Saxons was more surprising than that of Judah in the days of Josiah.

JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF INDIAN TROOPS IN EGYPT.

THE subject of the above has been discussed in Parliament, and hotly disputed in the press. It has been settled, as we all know, by a sort of compromise which carries the point of the Government of the day by a fraction of its proper majority; and the matter has been for the future arranged in such wise that after a few months of the loan of Indian troops to the British Government for work in Egypt or elsewhere out of India proper, the cost will fall on the British Government, but not upon the Indian. One who signs himself "An Interested One," well known on the British-Israel side of our controversy, sends us a cutting from the Birmingham Daily Post of June 26, in which the subject is sensibly discussed.

The verdict of this country is, we believe, against the Government who seemed to be striving to drive a hard bargain with India and forcing her to pay for the restoration of the Soudan to the Government of Egypt, the fact being that the then Government of Britain, with Mr. Gladstone at its head, found it inconvenient at the moment to retain the Soudan and compelled the Khedive to let it lapse from his authority. We are glad to know that the question will never arise again, but that if the British require the help of Indian troops, as may be the case in South Africa, others will pay the bill, and leave India to supply the bone and sinew of the expedition, but not the money. The Daily Post published the following:—

"THE EMPLOYMENT OF INDIAN TROOPS IN EGYPT.

"Among the Parliamentary papers issued yesterday was a return of 'opinions' and 'reasons' with regard to the expenses of troops despatched from India to Africa in aid of the Egyptian operations, such opinions being entered in the minutes of the Secretary of State in Council on May 16. The opinions of Sir James Peile, K.C.S.I., and Field-Marshal Sir Donald Stewart, Bart., G.C.B., are quoted. They state, 'We do not find that India has a direct and substantial interest in the recovery of the Soudan by Egypt. The Egyptian Government and the canal were not in any danger. The case simply is that as the power of the Mahdi and the Dervishes appears to be breaking up the moment was thought opportune for striking a vigorous blow. There was no question when the operations were commenced whether India was so directly and specially interested in them that she ought to be a partner with England (or is it not with Egypt?) in the cost. India has come into the matter accidentally. It was found that the forces of Egypt did not suffice both to take the field and to hold Suakim. If Suakim had been blessed with a good climate, no doubt English regiments would have been sent there, and if they had it cannot be contended that India would have been required to contribute, but its climate is more favourable to Orientals than to Europeans, and therefore the Government of India was asked to send troops, and it cheerfully complied by selecting some of the best.' As to the payment, they say, 'Surely there is a great difference between paying your own men for doing your own work in your own country and paying the same men for doing other people's work in a foreign country.' Sir A. Arbuthnot holds that India has a very direct and substantial interest in the safety and tranquillity of Egypt, and in safeguarding that country from attack. 'The position of Egypt, lying as it does on the direct route from England to India, being as it is the highway by which our British troops have to travel to and from, renders it as essential to the interests of India as it is to British interests, that Egypt should be protected from her foes, and that her present peaceful and prosperous condition should be maintained, and if it be, as I believe, it is requisite to this end that the supremacy of Egypt in the Soudan, or in a portion of it, should be re-established, then I submit that the success of any operations which have to be undertaken with this object is a matter which has a direct and substantial interest for India. The truth is that if it were not for her Indian Empire, England would have no practical interests in Egypt. All that India is asked to do is to bear for a limited period the ordinary expenses of the Indian troops which are to be sent, all the additional charges which will be incurred being met from the British or the Egyptian Treasury.'"

The writer remarks in the above that "India has come into the matter accidentally." But in affairs that concern God's providence and the concerns of Israel, there can be no "accidents!" For that race and for the nations entrusted to her charge, God has made full provision, and these He carries out according to His own will. India is a vast repository of military strength to help His "battle-axe" and "weapons of war" to strike the blows He purposes to inflict upon their enemies, and His. Hence the importance of India to Israel and the need that the latter should treat the former with strict justice, and yet with grateful favour and generosity.

It does not look well to see the conquering Power demanding its strict money rights as determined by itself, when the conquered are, in respect to a doubtful point, loudly complaining that it has been wronged by the paramount nation. All this, however, is a part of the difficulty of our position which we may trust the Lord to make clear for us, knowing that "He careth for us."

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—By the merest chance, through the kindness of a Hull friend of mine, I received a parcel of BANNERS yesterday. In an old number (Aug. 14, 1895) I see an interesting account of Hebrew relics dug up in the United States, but unfortunately their whereabouts is lost. It will be strange indeed that I—in Egypt, and after this great length of time—should be the means of discovering even a slight clue to the locality wished! I can scarcely think it possible. Anyway, allow me to state that, during the winter of 1890, I was journeying from Western Canada to New York (on my way to Europe), when, on the railroad between St. Paul (Minn.) and Chicago (Ill.), I chanced to meet a gigantic Western cattle-man, also going partly in my way. He, being like myself, travelling alone, and also kind, big-hearted, good-humoured, and, above all, very intelligent and highly educated, it was no wonder we were friendly till we reached Chicago, and dined and parted, I going east and he going south. In those days I took no interest in the Lost Ten Tribes (it is different now), but I well remember this Western gentleman speaking in a most interesting manner of American antiquities, and peculiar and unaccountable "finds." Amongst these "finds" he related what I thought an absurd "story" about some stones with Arabic inscriptions discovered—I can't say where exactly—about fifteen years previously, and then in possession of a Denver (Col.) gentleman of property, a chum of the narrator. Now the fifteen years were approximate, I would say, and the Arabic, if studied by a student of languages, might turn out to be Hebrew. In short, this story, which I laughed at then, may be quite correct in outline, and very possibly the inscribed stones described as required in the BANNER.

I am more than regretful that I can give so very little real information in so important a matter; but perhaps what I have stated as to whereabouts may lead to a surprising result. The editor of a leading Denver (Colorado) paper may be able to give some reliable information. I hope so. Kindly excuse my rough writing materials, but I am packed up, waiting to go up the Nile at short notice; and excuse also the errors.

Yours very sincerely and fraternally,

C. W. ANDERSON NEURY.

THE BATTLE OF FERKEH.

THE special correspondent of the Times, (June 15th), writing of the battle of Ferkeh, says:—

"Even nature came to our assistance, for on the day of our advance a dense sandstorm obscured the air, veiling the unusual bustle of our camp from the keen eye of any Dervish scout who might be posted on the hills. Curiously enough it was on this very day that the chief Emir of the Danagla contingent at Ferkeh, Osman Azrak, ventured to reconnoitre near Akasheh, saw nothing of our movements through the dust, and unwittingly forwarded our design by lulling the Dervishes into a false security, for on his return he told Hammuda that he had looked into the camp at Akasheh, and that all the troops were asleep; there was nothing to fear."

So we say, "the Lord fought for Israel" at the battle of Ferkeh.

THE EDUCATION OF THE CHILDREN IN ISRAEL.

AT a time when the subject of education in general, and religious education in particular, is exercising men's thoughts it is satisfactory to know God's mind on the point. He desires the religious education of every child. He prescribes that it shall be publicly given, and that its object shall be to teach them "to learn and fear the Lord our God," from generation to generation. This instruction is given by Moses in Deut. xxxi. 11—13, R.V., in the hearing of the congregation of Israel: "When all Israel is come to appear before the Lord thy God, in the place which He shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing. Assemble the people, the men and the women, and the little ones, and thy stranger that is within thy Gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the Lord your God, and observe to do all the words of this law; and that their children which have not known" (which have not known anything, A.V.) "may hear, and learn to fear the Lord your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it." God thus cares for the children of Israel and desires them to be brought under the teaching of His Holy Word; that they may hear it, and learn by regular, constant instruction, to fear the Lord (our God and theirs) perpetually. Surely no other nation on the face of the earth regards this subject of the education of the young with such reverence and earnest desire to see them brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord as our own? Our day and Sunday-schools, our public schools and Universities, the facilities our nation affords by law to the young of all ages and of both sexes to hear and learn to fear the Lord our God, are very remarkable and unique among the nations!

A preacher at the Parish Church at Clifton, on a recent occasion, commenting on the texts we have quoted above, made the remark quite apart from our Identity, that "without boasting we may say that our nation makes better provision for the religious education of our little ones and young people than any other nation on the earth." The remark was just and true, but only just and true because the British are Israel, and God has prescribed to them a line of conduct regarding education which we are bound to, and do to some extent, follow, because we are Israel His people. He has also promised to our race exclusively such blessings as these, which we find in Isa. liv. 13, R.V., "And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord (disciples, marg.), and great shall be the peace of thy children." The Lord loves His people, and takes care for the children of His chosen ones, that He may instruct them in the fear of the Lord. For He has said in Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20, R.V., "He showeth His word unto Jacob, His statutes and His judgments unto Israel; He hath not dealt so with any nation; and as for His judgments they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord."

In seeing that His people are instructed in the law of the Lord, He has made provision that the children of His flock shall also benefit by the command that they too shall be present when His laws are read and explained in the great congregation, that by degrees, after most patient teaching, they too may learn to fear the Lord, and become the lambs of His flock, to be fed and taught by His servants.

Our Voluntary Schools, with their splendid opportunities for healthy religious influence over the young, must be permanently retained by our people to carry out the will of God in regard to the education of the little ones of Israel, who according to that will must be assembled to listen to the laws and judgments of the Lord that they may hear, and learn to fear Him. As education in all the schools is now free and the parents have nothing to pay for their children's teaching, it behoves the former to contribute their due share towards the maintenance of the schools that supply the teaching the Lord prescribes as pleasing to Him and beneficial to the young.

Digitized by Google

The instruction in the Board Schools may or may not include teaching from the Word of God, and can scarcely be said to carry out the will of Him who loves and cares for the little ones of Israel His people. This arises from our unhappy sects and divisions, which are, ere the restoration of Israel to their land, or concurrently with that event, to cease to exist. When the Lord brings again Zion, then shall the watchmen of Israel see eye to eye (Isa. lii. 8). The restoration of the tribes to their land, is the time when the Lord shall give them "one heart, and one way, that they may fear Him for ever" (Jer. xxxii. 39). The knowledge of the Lord shall then be universal in Israel, and neighbour shall have no need to teach his fellow-neighbour to know the Lord (Jer. xxxi. 34). When the nations have suffered the indignation of the Lord, even all His fierce anger, then shall Israel His people serve Him with one consent, without sectarian divisions (Zeph. iii. 8, 9). One heart and one spirit will be God's gift to them, when He recalls them to the land of Israel with favour (Ezek. xi. 17—19). With sectarianism departed, then will education be founded on the Word of God as universally accepted by the nation, and "the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9; Hab. ii. 14). To Him then shall be all the praise!

OPEN EYES.

By B. Hailes.

The echo of the joy bells, announcing that we have given back to "the sea-king over the sea," not his daughter whom we proudly call "Our Princess," but her daughter, the granddaughter of our Queen, have hardly died away, and the pageant which called forth such loyalty from the good humoured, orderly crowds who gathered to see their Queen and her royal descendants and guests has only passed to pave the way for talk about a greater pageant next year, when our Queen shall have sat upon the throne for sixty years. Already, says the Madras Times, "the announcement that it is proposed to celebrate next year, with unusual pomp and ceremony, the sixtieth anniversary of her Majesty the Queen-Empress's accession to the British Throne, and that the leading princes of India are to be invited to visit England and attend the anniversary function, has delighted the native community of India, or at least the more highly educated portion of it, immensely." There is a strong desire on their part that the pageant in England should not be "inferior to the Coronation fête at Moscow." The Hindoo mind has not yet grasped the fact that the stability and grandeur of the British Throne rests not upon barbaric state, nor yet upon the loyalty of the nation; and though it would be grand and bring home to the British people some idea of the vastness of the Empire over which their Sovereign reigns, to see her "surrounded by her feudatory chiefs of Asia," yet we should wish both the British and the Indian people to know why the stability of the throne is assured, and why when some kingdoms have tottered and fallen, and others have changed their dynasties, England's Queen has sat secure, in her island home, girt by the silver streak, ruling over an Empire which extends through all zones. An interesting diagram of this mighty Empire is to be found in Whittaker's Almanac, 1896, where, by "causing the countries embraced within it to close up from right and left, from east and west, and to concentrate upon the meridian of Greenwich as a central line," we see how, with the United States intervening, the Empire extends from north to south through every zone. We should like to know why Whittaker divides his diagram into "the countries of the Gentiles" and "the Anglo-British World." This very division gives to us the reason of the stability of the throne. "Thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel." If, as we believe, the Anglo-Saxon race are the House of Israel, over whom the throne of Judah reigns, having been, according to our Lord's words, taken from the Jew "and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof," then according to God's promise we expect to see the seed of David His servant rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, so long as His covenant of the day and of the night endures, and we understand why again according to Whittaker this should be "the greatest and probably (we should leave out that word) the most enduring and beneficent Empire the world has ever seen." We trust that it may please God to spare our beloved Queen to fulfil the wishes of her Indian subjects, and to celebrate among her faithful and loyal people the completion of the sixtieth year of her reign, surrounded by her heirs down to little Prince David of the fourth generation.

How few there be that have found the glorious key to God's promises to the House of Israel, and how earnestly must we continue to offer Elisha's prayer, "Lord, we pray Thee, open their eyes, that they may see." It is a wonderful thing that whenever anyone comes forward with a theory, or so-called science, or learning to prove that any portion of the Scriptures is not authentic or true, immediately he finds many followers, and even those who cling to the Word of God examine the theory or science and take infinite pains to refute or expose the same, but when a truth so grand and glorious, so according, as we believe, to the mind of God, so pregnant with His glory, shewing forth the absolute truth of His promises, as that the ten lost Tribes of Israel are found in the Anglo-Saxon race, how few believe or care; it is cast aside with a contemptuous smile or sneer, each following his own theological theory, and forgetting God's promise, God's oath, to His servant Abraham. Why is it? we are fain to ask.

"Lord, open their eyes, that they may see." We have seen how already "the Anglo-British world" fills a great portion of the earth. And yet it goes on increasing. If we turn to the Book of Daniel we find that thus it is to be with the stone kingdom which is to become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. Is it far fetched to think that this mountain and Israel, who is to be as the sand upon the sea shore, who is to possess the Gate of his enemies, who is to become a multitude of nations, whose branches are to run over the wall, whose blessings are to be unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills, are one and the same? If so, then, when we find Britain thus blossoming and budding and filling the face of the world with fruit, who, we ask, is she?

No doubt we shall be met with the objection that there is much to be deplored in the state of the Empire, that there is not that unity which we ought to expect if this were the "nation with whom God has dealt as He has not with any other nation." But wait, the end is not yet. There is trouble in South Africa, but out of all this trouble we believe God will make the way plain, and we shall dwell there not, as it is now said, for the love of money grabbling, but that we may even there teach and practice that "righteousness" which "exalteth a nation; nor can we look with complacency upon the way in which we have been brow-beaten in Armenia and Crete. July 16, well puts it, "Time was when England would have pursued her charitable purposes, despite the protests of the Universe; but under modern statesmanship we are controlled by every foreign whim." Yet we know, though by what means we know not, that God has said, "I will lay My vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel." There is much even in our own little islands to cause grief, rampant atheism and socialism, cruelty and ignorance and vice, many among our millions of whom it may be said, "God is not in all their thoughts," yet hopefully and prayerfully we look for better days. God has blessed the nation, and for His oath's sake He will do so still, till that glorious time when "judgment shall run down as waters and righteousness as a mighty stream." When they shall no more teach every man his neighbour, saying, "Know the Lord, for they shall all know Me from the least of them unto the greatest of them."

Ours be it then while we wait, to proclaim the glorious truth that Israel is found, to teach our neighbour and our brother that God has neither broken nor forgotten His promise. "He has multiplied the nation." The days will surely come when it shall be said, "The Lord liveth which brought up and which led the seed of the House of Israel out of the north country, and from all the countries whither He had driven them." When "Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely" under the shadow of "Jehovah-tsidkenu."

"Lord, open their eyes, that they may see."

THE "FOURTH OF JULY" IN DOYLESTOWN, BUCKS COUNTY, PA., U.S.A.

In the Doylestone Daily Intelligencer, of July 6 last, we find an interesting and patriotic speech of the Hon. Dwight M. Lowrey on the subject of the day, namely, the declaration of American Independence. We republish the oration, because the speaker had much to say respecting the British nation which, from an American, was remarkable and satisfactory. The speech was sent us by our friend the Rev. T. Rosling Howlett, of Philadelphia, who was present and heard it. He says that "he had the privilege of joining with many patriotic citizens in rapturous and prolonged applause over the sentiments of cordial relations with Great Britain." Mr. Rosling Howlett does not think that "the best element of America is unfriendly to the mother country," in which sentiment we cordially agree. We only fear that there is rather a large majority of the American Republic which has no great liking for their British brethren here, and that they have no idea of concealing their sentiments. However that may be, we gladly give our American orator full space in the Banner for the speech which gave such satisfaction to his hearers. The report was as follows:—

"After music by the band, chairman DuBois introduced the orator, Dwight M. Lowrey, Esq., of Philadelphia, whose address in substance was as follows:

"One hundred and twenty years have 'hid in mist their many coloured sides' since the scroll was signed and the bell was rung which ushered this fairest and greatest of Republics into the family of nations. And during all those years, on each succeeding anniversary of their natal day, the American people have laid aside private cares and every personal endeavour, and have gathered themselves together in their local places of meeting, in the grove or in the hall, to testify their reverence for the memory of the men who brought them into being and their devotion to the principles of civil and religious liberty, it is the mission of their nation to illustrate, develop and maintain.

"On Independence Day, wherever the Stars and Stripes are waving, the reaper stands idle in the field, the hammer lies silent on the anvil, the doors of the counting house are closed, the ships in the harbour rock gently on the tide; yet the pulse of life is beating fast throughout the Republic's wide domain, and amid the booming of cannon and the clangour of bells rises strong and firm the triumphant voice of a great nation, exultant in its freedom, proud of its past, and confident of its future.

"This is the sacred day of American patriotism, and where is the generous mind that does not feel the inspiration of that word?

"There is a base and spurious sentiment which coarser souls mistake for patriotism. It feeds upon vain-glorious self-adulation; it parades an ignorant contempt for the judgment, character and wishes of foreign peoples; it commends as alone consistent with the national advantage and honour those measures of foreign and domestic policy which involve an injury to the interests or feelings of some foreign Power; it condemns as pusillanimous and treasonable the courteous conduct of diplomatic relations; and it foams with rage when a fellow-citizen admits the worth and dignity of a distant community or concedes that our own people may not yet have attained in all respects to the final perfection of human nature.

"Far different is the elevated spirit of a true and intelligent patriotism. It is not blind to the national shortcomings, but it endureth all things, it hopeth all things, it looks at those traits of the national character which are truly admirable and at those features of the national institutions which promote great human ends, and these it cherishes with a more than filial devotion; it considers international relations not as a struggle to overcome an enemy or supplant a rival, but as a field in which each nation may make a distinct but serviceable contribution to human progress; it feels a glow of generous sympathy with everything in the character and custom of a foreign people which exalts the dignity of human nature, and it would open the widest avenues of approach to every foreign influence which would make life at home more gentle, more noble and more humane.

"In such a spirit of enlightened patriotism let us consider to-day what was the real motive of our Revolutionary stuggle; what has been our principle contribution to the cause of human progress; and what is the relation in which we now stand to Great Britain and to the different members of the English speaking race.

"I shall not stop to go over again the story of our struggle with King George, to recount the exploits of the brave, to mark the difficulties and successes of our statesmanship and our diplomacy. You are familiar with that story from Lexington to Yorktown. It is a narrative of great privation and of heroic endurance, of obstacles seemingly insurmountable overcome by an unfaltering resolution, of reverses seemingly destructive turned into victories by a fortitude which never wavered, and a courage which cast out fear. In the book of man's progression there is no more inspiring page than that on which is recorded the rise of the American nation. Thirteen colonies differing in habit, and in temper, in ideal and in tradition, in social organization and in religion, bnt united by a common danger and dimly conscious of a common destiny, came together and upon a basis of mutual concession erected the august structure of our nationality.

Follow the development of the national idea from the congress which met in 1775 to take measures for the common defence to the convention which in 1787 promulgated the Constitution of the United States, and you must conclude that the history of the world affords elsewhere no such striking instance of the dispassionate application of pure reason to political affairs.

"There are three great influences which brought about American Independence.

"1st.—Oppressive commercial restrictions laid by the mother country on the rising industries of the colonies.

"2nd.—Unwise and tyrannical exercise of political power by the Crown and Parliament.

"3rd.—The natural self-assertion of an established and growing community, conscious of its power, impatient of tutelage and eager for distinction.

"There can be no question that the commercial restrictions imposed upon us by the British Government operated powerfully to inspire the colonists with the notion of the diversity of interests between themselves and the parent community. But these restrictions were not even mentioned in the Declaration as a grievance. Owing to the imperfect state of economic knowledge, the colonists seem rather to have contemplated such enormities as part of the natural order, as long as they should remain subject to the Crown.

"But the unintelligent meddling of their distant rulers with their domestic affairs and with their local constitutional forms was instantly resented by the colonists, for it wounded their pride, destroyed their comfort and diminished their importance. The arraignment of royal policy expressed in the declaration is confined almost exclusively to this head.

"There is not in the whole Declaration the slightest allusion to any real popular distress, except the suffering which naturally followed King George's effort to put down the existing insurrection. Mr. Jefferson included in his original draft a mention of the one real misery of the African slave trade, but the Congress struck it out. They were not prepared to made a stand for human liberty; their battle was for colonial liberty.

"Independence was the real motive and issue of the Revolutionary struggle. The people never gave the movement an unreserved support until independence was declared. Time, distance and circumstance, had made the Colonies a new community, differing from the mother country much more that we do now, in thought, interest, tradition and association. Had the provocation been less severe, it is probable that they would still have risen; had the French not intervened it is certain that having risen they would still have been victorious, for the fulness of time had come. The hour had struck for them to assume the control of their own destinies and possibilities, to exercise that privilege of self-determination to which by the laws of nature and the circumstances of their position they were justly entitled.

"It cannot be doubted that we lost something when we severed our connection with the land from which we came. No people can violently break with its past without a certain moral and intellectual impoverishment, and the somewhat dull and heavy monotone of American life is partly traceable to the barrier which independence set up against the continuous inflow of the vivifying stream of ancient English culture.

"On the other hand, with the independence came the resolution and the enthusiasm, the pride, the confidence and the expectancy which have made the American people the most self-reliant, the most sanguine, the most optimistic community on the globe. If we concede, as in truth we must, that our marvellous development has been somewhat one-sided and has been pre-eminently concerned with the exploitation of material resources and the providing of creature comforts, nevertheless, in 1861, we proved to the world that our money-getting, money-loving nation was capable of supreme devotion and of boundless sacrifice to preserve the union which gave us dignity and strength, and to wipe from our flag the stain which exposed us to derision. For we never were truly a nation, and we never were truly a Republic until Abraham Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation, and Lee laid down his arms at Appomattox and the sovereign people wrote the 14th and 15th Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

"And yet with all our shortcomings, with all our long and ignominious compromise with the wrong and curse of slavery, the American Republic from the hour of its birth has been the hope of the world and a bright example to every people which is struggling to be free. We have gained the applause and enlisted the sympathy of mankind, not because we overcame King George, not because we transformed ourselves from the Colonies into an independent State, but because we took our stand upon a new far-reaching principle, the doctrine of popular sovereignty, the principle of democracy. The illustration and enforcement of this principle is our chief contribution to advancement. When we rose in arms, we proclaimed it to an expectant and eager world; when we rested in victory, we made it the corner-stone of our Constitution. The influence of our example has affected every civilized country and quickened the progress of that general democratic movement which has made itself felt on every modern government outside of Russia, and has changed the face of modern civilization. Even the mother country has not remained exempt. The government of the British Isles to-day is a kernel of pure democracy held in a bursting shell of monarchical and aristocratic institutions.

"Indeed there are some points in which English policy to-day is more justly and genuinely democratic than our own.

"And if you ask the British people to-day what has wrought in them this mighty change, they will answer by the voice of their best qualified historians and of their most enlightened statesmen, that the most potent factor has been the lesson of 1776 and the influence and example of the United States.

"Time brings changes and triumph to the right. We are wonderfully near England to-day in time; we can pass from Broadway to Piccadilly in a week; we can send a message from New York to London in an hour; but we are more wonderfully near her still in the strength and constancy of a common democratic purpose.

"The American people will never surrender one jot or one title of the independence which they so hardly won and which they have so nobly justified.

"But the movement of their advance in civilization and in true mental and moral culture may not improperly be measured by the progressive decay that sentiment of distrust and dislike of our transatlantic kinsmen, which even at this late day is a pervading though diminishing characteristic of our people, and a most pestilent, beclouding and dangerous factor in our political life. Americans will never be intellectually free, until they have emancipated themselves from this prejudice; until that happy day shall come when it shall be no longer possible in this country for an ignorant demagogue to conceal a domestic issue and befog an argument by violent diatribes against British policy and British power, when no American will feel himself reconciled to vicious and unnecessary taxation, because he knows it tends to embarrass the free and easy interchange of commodities between this country and the British Isles, nor look with suspicion upon an honest dollar because he knows it to be coined from the metal in which the notes of the bank of England are expressed to be paid, nor shout unreflecting applause to the so-called vigorous foreign policy of excitable and ebullient statesmen, because he forsees that it may bring us into conflict with that kindred power which of all the nations of the earth has the greatest interest and desire to abide in relations of peace and amity with us; a conflict too by the way which, should it come in our day to the clash of arms, would entail its blighting and benumbing burden on our children's children and turn back the wheels of civilization in this country and in the world at large for full one hundred years.

"If those vain babblers who love to blow upon the dying embers of international hate were capable of reflection they would perceive that our interest in cordial relations with Great Britain is quite as positive as hers; nay, if anything ours is the greatest interest. She is our best customer for what we have to sell and our best purveyor for what we want to buy. We ship to England; but England ships to all mankind; we cannot hope to rival her commerce until we are ready to adopt the liberal maxims which define her policy and explain her superiority. England is a lending nation; we are a borrowing nation; we build our railroads with her capital and move our products with her exchange. We have been pre-eminently an industrial people, and we are just beginning to put forth our energies in other directions. Our artists still go to Paris and Rome for sympathy and light, our men of science and philosophy still seek guidance and instruction in the universities of Germany and of the British Isles; our men of letters still find in the old world their inspiration, and in very many instances their most congenial surroundings. England on the other hand has a manifold and a diversified civilization, and she spreads the treasures of her intellect before us with lavish hand. Her literature is our consolation and our fountain of life. In truth her literature is our literature and ours is hers.

The accomplished scholar who occupies the chair of Belles Lettres in the University of Pennsylvania, Mr. Felix M. Schelling, instructs his students that they have to study not American literature, but English literature in America. With fine critical insight he has laid hold upon, and in that phrase he has indicated, the continuity and the substantial unity of our forms of thought. England's common law is our rule of action. The safeguards of our constitution are the fruits of her experience. Her religion is our form of conduct here and our promise of life hereafter. When we meet in the house of worship, the Bible which is opened is King James' version; if prayers be read, they are English prayers; the hymns we sing are English hymns; the psalms we chant are English adaptations. With English rites and formulas we baptize our infants, we marry our brides and bury our dead.

"To an American who is intelligent as well as patriotic, England may well be a distinct, she can never be an alien nation.

"Our independence is assured—it can never be taken from us. There is not power enough in any modern nation, nor in any possible combination of modern nations, to subjugate the millions who in the hour of danger will rally to the defence of the Stars and Stripes.

"But independence is purely a political condition. It secures to us a proper control of our domestic affairs; but it does not remove, on the contrary it rather increases our responsibility toward those other communities which are of our blood and language, and toward those larger human interests which depend for their advancement on the intelligent and kindly co-operation and interaction of all races and of all States.

"On this day, therefore, it is proper for us to join with our rightful self-congratulation some considerations upon our necessary relations to the different communities of our English speaking race.

"Think for a moment where that race is planted. We have 70,000,000 of people in the United States. There are doubtless boys in this audience who will live to see the number rise to one hundred millions; and there is room and sustenance within our borders for millions upon millions more. We are not all of one race it is true; we are not even all of one colour, but it is more than probable that for a period far beyond the point to which the imagination can carry us in prophecy, the Anglo-Saxon will be the dominant, absorbing and determining type. And we are but a part of the Anglo-Saxon settlement in North America; that masterful race has already secured to itself and to its uses this entire continent, from the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande to the regions of eternal ice and snow.

"Australia is a continent in itself, with a territory about equal to our own. It, too, has become the home and heritage of another branch of our race. To it must be added New Zealand and Tasmania, with an aggregate territory equal to that of Great Britain and Ireland, and afterwards the myriad isles of the Polynesian archipelago. To this dominion will eventually be joined New Guinea, the largest island on the globe.

"Then in Southern Africa there is steadily but surely rising a mighty empire, which in time, I firmly believe, will extend from the desert of Sahara to the Cape of Good Hope and from ocean to ocean, with an open line of communication all the way from Cape Town to the Isthmus of Suez. And this new empire will rival, if it shall not exceed, in resources, in dignity and in power, its kindred community on this western hemisphere.

"And finally, the mother-land herself, pregnant hive of nations, gathering within the circle of her influence countless isles of the sea, dotting every ocean and illuminating every clime. England, the home of constitutional liberty, the ancient champion of religious freedom, the modern apostle of unrestricted commercial intercourse, the reservoir of the world's wealth, because she has made her martial ardour subservient to the arts of peace. For of all that stream of wealth which is steadily pouring into her coffers not one penny of it comes as tribute, but all as the reward for the services she has rendered to mankind. Firm upon her white chalk cliffs Britannia stands; her locks are grey with the changes of a thousand years; but in her eye is flashing the light of an eternal youth, for she is young again in her children.

"I do not mention the places of merely strategic importance, like Gibraltar, which this race holds in its grasp, nor the instances of conquest and military occupation like the Indian Empire of the Queen; but I ask you to consider only the vast territories which this race is colonizing and reclaiming from the wilderness, territories approximately as great in extent as the whole of the Western Hemisphere of North and South America, yet distributed so as to touch and dominate every division of the earth's surface.

"Think of the influence on human destiny and on human thought which this race is ordained to exercise from its position of vantage in these rich and ample domains. No empire that has ever been set up among the children of men has equalled it as it is to-day in its beginning; no empire that the imagination of man has ever pictured has equalled in dreams what it will be in its fruition. Think of the boundless acres which will yield their increase to its sowing, think of the mines which will give up their treasures under its hand, think of the machinery which its ingenuity will perfect, think of the products which its industry will bring forth to minister to human comfort and satisfy human need, think of the ships that will carry its associated flags, think of what its men of thought will do to unveil the secrets of nature, to systematize the results of investigation and reflection, think of what its statesmen will do to perfect government by the people and to lift the burden from the oppressed, think of the songs its poets will sing by Northern fountain and under Southern palm, think of the myriad presses from which will issue the common thoughts of men who live on different sides of the globe, think of the schools and universities which will rise on the plains where the cannibal once held his fiendish revels, think of the churches which will nestle in the valleys through which the slave driver once led his infamous caravan.

"Think of these things and remember that the countless millions which will inhabit these vast regions will speak one language, will cherish one tradition, will cultivate one ideal, will practice one custom and will enforce one law. Remember, too, that whether the flag of our Yankee nation shall continue halted at the Great Lakes or be ultimately carried forward by voluntary consolidation to the Arctic circle, we of the United States will ever remain but a single member of this vast confederacy, which no mere political division can hold asunder in its great effort to speed the march of human progress and to ameliorate the sum of human condition. It is written in the book of fate that the race to which we belong shall occupy a wider empire, shall develop a nobler civilization, shall exercise a more profound and enduring influence on the destinies of mankind than any race which has moved on the face of the earth since the morning stars sang together over the advent of man.

"It is not an upstart race; it has had a place in history for full 1 000 years. It is a religious race, living in the fear of God and in devout subjection to the power which makes for righteousness. It is a moral race; neither the Roman nor the Jew have surpassed it in the force and constancy of its sense of conduct. It is a pacific race; terrible indeed in battle, but cultivating and preferring the arts of peace. It is a reflective race; poetry, science and philosophy embellish its leisure and prepare its mind for action. It is a political race; instinct with the love of liberty and with respect for law. It has shown to the world by long experiment that governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed are man's best protection against the miseries of anarchy and the ignominy of despotic rule.

"Thinking of these things, remembering these things, having in view the past, the present and the future of our race, its struggle, its achievement and its mission, tell me from your hearts if I speak not true when I say that there is a principle in which as Americans we have a peculiar interest of greater importance to humanity than the independence of these States, an interest more precious than the memory of the signers of our great declaration, and that is the peaceful, harmonious and friendly co-operation of the scattered members of the Anglo-Saxon race.

"Union is more precious than separation; helpfulness is more noble than independence. This is the great truth which gave dignity and sanction to our mighty struggle of 1861. In this direction are moving all the forces of modern civilization. In this direction lies the promise of the most liberal culture, the most enduring prosperity, the highest prestige. The Stars and Stripes, always the standard of a noble and puissant nation, shall be advanced to yet more transcendant glory if they be carried in the van of this humane and fraternal movement. America must be foremost in the common effort, holding her military prowess and political autonomy in conscious and deliberate subjection to her office as a leader in the encouragement of liberal sympathies and in the advancement of civilization.

"Short-sighted men are telling us of the United States that a primacy of the Western Hemisphere is the proper end of our ambition. But this is a mere political supremacy of doubtful possibility and of still more doubtful value.

"Others more short-sighted still are urging us to industrial and intellectual isolation; but these are self-imposed bonds which the rising tide of our national life will eventually burst with volcanic force.

"As we increase in wealth, in population and in culture, our points of contact with the outside world will increase in number, and then we shall need and seek the moral support of the men of like fashion and feeling with ourselves.

"We shall begin with a treaty for a permanent tribunal of arbitration, we shall end with a moral, intellectual and industrial partnership of all thoughts, of all goods and of all service, in the interest of a higher and more magnanimous civilization than any which man has yet known.

"There is the true destiny and the future position of the United States. May heaven send us wisdom to hasten the coming in of that time, for in that greater union shall we and all the nations of the earth be blessed.

"Loud and continued applause greeted the speech at its close.

"Rev. W. Hayes Moore, of the Presbyterian church, offered the closing prayer, and after a selection by the band Mr. Grim led the audience in singing 'America.'"

"YOUR BROTHER ISRAELITE."

THE following correspondence appeared in the Jewish World of August 21st, in reply to a letter by L. T., the answer being from the pen of our friend Mr. H. H. Pain, of the Stock Exchange:—

"YOUR BROTHER ISRAELITE."

"To the Editor of the 'Jewish World.'

"Sir,—Allow me to intrude again on the space of your valuable paper, with the object of telling Mr. H. H. Pain that the Jews do not pray for the return of their brethren of the House of Israel. What they do pray for is for the return of the House of Israel, under which name they mean themselves and nobody else. In their prayers the Jews style themselves Israel.

"Though Zechariah prophesied about eighteen years after the return from the Babylonian captivity, nevertheless, those prophecies which Mr. Pain has probably in mind refer to a time when Assyria and Egypt strove for the mastery of the ancient world; at which time the northern tribes had a separate government. But in those prophecies which refer to a time subsequent to the fall of Samaria, the prophet, in speaking of the people ruled from Jerusalem, uses indiscriminately the name of Israel and Judah, as can be seen from chap. xii.

"Yours obediently,
"L. T."

"YOUR BROTHER ISRAELITE."

"To the Editor of 'The Jewish World.'

"Sir,—Whilst I fully appreciate the kindly spirit in which 'L. T.' has noticed my letter to you on the 'Return to Palestine,' I cannot accept either his correction, or his interpretation of the subjects referred to in his letter of last week.

"I am informed by a friend who is a Jew, that the following prayer is offered up in the synagogue every morning: 'O Rock of Israel, rise up to the assistance of Israel; and ransom (as Thou hast said) Judah and Israel. Our Redeemer, the Lord of Hosts is His name, the Holy One of Israel. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who hast redeemed Israel.' Here the two Houses of Judah and Israel are unmistakably mentioned.

"Then, again, as to Zechariah. In his days the Ten-tribed House of Israel had been carried captive to Assyria some two hundred years previously, and become 'wanderers among the nations,' and had not, as 'L. T.' contends, 'a separate government.' They had in fact become, as Hosea predicted they would, 'Lo-Ammi,' 'Not My people, and I will not be your God.' They were divorced or cut off from the Mosaic covenant, and thereby became—like the nations among whom their lot was cast—Gentiles. For the distinction in those days between the chosen people and the Gentiles was, that one was under the Mosaic Covenant and the other was not.

"I may briefly observe, in connection with this point, that Jeremiah (xxxi. 31—37) foretells that the Lord 'will make a new covenant with the House of Israel and with the House of Judah;' but it is of great importance to notice that in ver. 33, where the promise is repeated, no mention is made of the House of Judah, but only of the House of Israel, the inference being that Israel of the Ten Tribes was to first come under the new covenant. If the British people be identical with the House of Israel, as I believe, then this is undoubtedly a correct interpretation.

"Chap. liv. of Isaiah shows that the 'cast-off wife' (as contrasted with her sister of Judah, who still remains under the Mosaic covenant) was to be the mother of more children than that of the married wife, whilst colonial expansion is foreshadowed in the second and third verses, and freedom from their enemies in the concluding portion of the chapter.

"To return to 'L. T.'s' contention about Zechariah. Chap. xii. has not been fulfilled, but awaits its accomplishment in the future. It is certain that, in the Roman siege of Jerusalem, the Lord did not 'save the tents of Judah first;' on the contrary, they were utterly destroyed.

"If space permitted, I could show that the 'inhabitants of Jerusalem,' upon whom the Jews will, on the future occasion, put their trust, are their brethren of the British House of Israel, but that is beside my present purpose. Zechariah does most certainly draw a marked distinction between the two Houses of Israel—e.g., 'I will strengthen the House of Judah, and I will save the House of Joseph.' Again, in chap. xi.: 'That I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel,' a prediction which had its fulfilment at the time of the raising of the Roman siege, when certain Jews who had accepted Christianity made good their escape. These, we 'Anglo-Israelites' believe, were Benjaminite 'Jews' of the House of Israel, but who were in political union with the House of Judah for the time being, 'that David My servant may alway have light before Me in Jerusalem.' They belonged, strictly speaking, to the House of Israel, not Judah. These (Benjaminite) Jews, according to Eusebius, escaped to Della in obedience to the warning contained in Jer. vi. 1. By accepting Christianity they were naturally excommunicated by their Jewish brethren, and excluded from the temple worship, &c.

"'And I took My staff Beauty and cut it asunder, that I might break My covenant (the Mosaic) which I had made with all the peoples.' 'Then I cut asunder Mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel.'

"The ultimate result being (chap. xiii. 8, 9) that 'two parts (Judah and Levi) shall be cut off and die . . . and I will bring the third part (Benjamin) through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and I will try them as gold is tried; they shall call on My name, and I will hear them; I will say, It is My people, and they shall say, The Lord is My God.' These Benjaminites arrived in England as the Normans.

"If any of your readers care to read the arguments on which I lay claim to the distinction of being 'your brother Israelite,' may I refer them to our official text-book, 'British-Israel Truth,' 1s. (R. Banks & Son).

"In conclusion, may I express to you, Mr. Editor, my heartfelt appreciation of your kindness in permitting me—a 'Gentile-Hebrew'—to enter into a correspondence in your columns on 'The Return to Palestine,' a subject in which I take a keen interest, as I am justly entitled to do, by virtue of my claim to subscribe myself,

"Your brother Israelite,

"THOSE SILKEN BONDS."

AUSTRALIA AND THE EMPIRE.—SEPARATION SPEECH BY A PRIEST.

"THE annual dinner in connection with the Warragul branch of the A.N.A. (Australian Natives' Association) was held on Tuesday night in the Masonic Hall, and was the scene of an enthusiastic demonstration in support of the union of the Empire (says the Warragul correspondent of the Melbourne Argus). The incident was quite unexpected, and arose in consequence of an impassioned separation speech delivered by the Rev. Father Hallinan, to which Mr. Kirton, M.L.A., replied in a spirited and patriotic manner, at times raising the company to a pitch of great enthusiasm.

"In prosposing the toast, 'Prosperity to the A.N.A.,' the Rev. Father Hallinan, referring to the national feature of the association, alluded to the statement recently made at Ballarat by Mr. Purves, that he looked forward to the time when this country would be erected into a nation independent of Britain, and said that the greatest critic of his words could not say anything harder of him than that he was premature, for the time would come, and must come of necessity, when Australia would be a nation as proud and as glorious as England was in all her might to-day. They would then need no 'silken bonds,' no ties of affection even, to bind them to England. He did not wish to deny that the present state of Australia was such as should induce them to look kindly and with affection and love on the old country. But the moment they in Australia became a nuisance and a bother to England, much as she loved them, she would leave them in the lurch, and let them stop there. ('No,' and dissent.) She did it to America, and it was only the growing strength of the democracy in England that prevented the same autocratic notions and tyrannical laws ruling them in Australia that were sought to be imposed by England on the patriotic people of America. They had serpents here worse than the cobra in the form of landlordism, and if that landlordism was permitted to grow Australia would meet the fate of Ireland. They didn't want to be bound by silken bonds. The Australian wanted no bonds but the bonds that bound him to his native land—the truest bond of all, patiotism. Let that thought inspire them, and then they would assuredly develop a robust national spirit, and insure the abiding prosperity of the land that gave them birth. (Cheers.)

"Mr. Kirton, M.L.A., replying on behalf of the board of directors, said he felt justified in saying that their society had ripened the federal sentiment in the colony, and trusted that at no distant date the union of the colonies would be consummated. Federation meant strength, federation meant fraternity, and he rejoiced to think that their contemplated federation would be a union under the Crown. (Cheers.) Father Hallinan had dwelt on the severance of the silken bonds which bound us to the mother country, and, whilst crediting him with being sincere, he ventured to suggest that his judgment was very much at fault when he referred to the relationship which at present existed between these colonies and the mother land. He alluded to a speech delivered by Mr. Purves, in which he did not deliberately advocate separation, but in which he said that the time would come when separation would be inevitable. He (Mr. Kirton) was present at the meeting at which the speech was delivered, and he ventured to ask then, and he repeated the question now, 'Why should we sever this silken bond?' (Loud cheers.) Why should they cut this tie which bound them to the mother country. (Renewed cheers.) If he gloried in anything at the present time, he gloried, primarily, in the fact of being an Australian, and rejoiced at the work done by his father and their fathers in the past. (Cheers.) They were the old pioneers who had so honourably and so worthily acquitted themselves in a critical time in their country's history, when good men were necessary to shape the national life and found the institutions of Australia. (Cheers.) The Australian natives were thoroughly loyal. (Loud cheers.) They revered the work done by their fathers, and were proud of the traditions of the old country. And as a member of the board of directors of the A.N.A., and one who spoke as an officer, he desired to say that night that the Australian Natives' Association would lend no countenance at all to the demand for separation from Great Britain. (Great cheering.) He trusted that the people of this colony would always be found working hand in hand in the interests of Australia, working as members of the British Empire, and hastening that time when they shall have a union of all the scattered sections of the Anglo-Saxon race. (Loud cheers.)

"At the close of the proceedings the National Anthem was sung with great vigour."

The above appeared in the Evening Observer of May 18th last, published in Brisbane, Queensland. It is highly satisfactory as showing that in Queensland there is a strong patriotic feeling in favour of the Unity of the Empire, but against "separation" in any shape. This appears to be the feeling everywhere, and save in Rhodesia and Charterland there is no sign of discontent in any direction. The uprising there, of course, was caused by the desire of a brave but savage race to get rid of the restraints of civilization and Christianity and to recover the power to domineer and destroy the native tribes around them, in order to acquire possession of their lands and property, including their wives and children. The defeat of Dr. Jameson's foolish attempt to overpower the Boers by a raid which never could have succeeded, gave hope to the Matabeles and has been the cause of all the murders and losses our race has since sustained in that now wretched country. The necessities of the case will force us to recover the control in the land, of course, but at what cost in human life and national treasure, who can tell? The remarkable thing about the condition of feeling in Australia is that while there is a section of the people who expect to see the colonies separated from the mother country for reasons stated by the Rev. Father Hallinan, an Irishman, the majority are loyal to the mother country. In spite of that discordant note it was plain that the tone of the meeting was against any separation at all, but rather for the maintenance of the British Empire wherever it exists, with a federation of the scattered units which constitute it now, and are united by ties which seem too feeble to hold it long together. As British-Israelites we may lay aside all anxiety on the subject. The Lord has promised "to Abraham and his seed for ever," that the great and mighty nation which was to develop from his posterity, was to become "a nation and a company of nations," "a mother and her daughters," united and yet separated, the one within, and the others running over, the wall of the well, which continues always to sustain them all as a perennial fountain springing from the throne of God Himself, who blesses them (Gen. xlix. 22 to 24, R.V.). The God of Jacob, by His own hands strengthens the hands of His people, and blesses them with the blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breast and of the womb, blessings of every imaginable kind; all poured out without stint and without condition, on the head of God's favoured "firstborn," Joseph and Ephraim, now developed into the Anglo-Saxon race (Jer. xxxi. 9). It is a great consolation to us who are living in troublous times to know that vast and unmanageable as our Empire appears to human vision, it nevertheless has been built up to its present condition by the Almighty God of Jacob, and that now at the present hour, as well as for the future, we can confidently look to Him to sustain His own work and promises, never leaving us or forsaking us, but bringing us to our appointed end. In Isa. xlii. 16, R.V., we have His express promise to that effect in the following comforting words: "I will bring the blind by a way that they know not; in paths that they know not will I lead them; I will make darkness light before them and crooked places straight. These things will I do, and I will not forsake them." The future of Israel as depicted in the Scriptures, is not to become disintegrated and dispersed. On the contrary, they are to be "a fulness of nations" (Gen. xlviii. 19; Rom. xi. 25), and in union, the world will be theirs, as the heirs thereof (Rom. iv. 13, R.V.). God's gift to them will be according to His promise in Dan. vii. 27, "the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven." There is no hint here of separation or contraction in the existing Empire of the British-Israelites, but on the contrary, a full promise of their enlargement and world-wide expansion, sustained by the power of God.

To Him be all the praise.

THE GOD OF SHEM, OR JAPHETH?

A letter to the Editor of the "King's Own" (the Rev. John Urquhart), re article "King's Own" for May.

By H. A. Marchant.

Dear Sir,—For some time past, I have read "The King's Own" of which you are the Editor, and am very pleased with the majority of articles which appear in what I may truly call an excellent and useful magazine, devoted to the service of the King of kings; exposing infidelity and unbelief in whatever quarter it may shew itself.

When we attack infidelity, is it wise that we ourselves should become the preachers and teachers of that which we seek to destroy? I am one of those who have made a special study of the promises which God made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, and am astonished to find that those who profess in the "King's Own" to defend Holy Writ against the assaults of the enemy, seem in a great measure ignorant of the blessings which God promised in this line of descent.

Was what God promised to this people, who were of Shem, previously promised to Japheth? And is God mindful of His promise to Japheth and forgetful of His promise of Joseph's birthright? (Gen. xlviii. 15—21; 1 Chron. v. 1; Jer. xxxi. 9, last two clauses).

How is it that the defenders of Holy Writ are in such a fog that they can say, as you say, "Japheth has dispossessed Shem," and that the Japhetic race has spread north, south, east and west, when God promised to Shemitic Jacob that his seed should be as the dust of the earth and should spread west, east, north and south? Did He forget that He had previously promised all this to Japheth? In my Bible I read (Gen. xlviii.) that "Ephraim and Manasseh should become a great people and a multitude of nations." This looks very like colonising. Where are they? You say, "The kingdom of heaven has been taken from the Jew and given to the Gentile." Where do we learn that doctrine either in the Old or New Testament? The "nation bringing forth the fruits of the kingdom" (Matt. xxi. 43), must be Ephraim, whose name means "fruitful." "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit." When did the Gentiles get their wonderful fruit-bearing capacity? Of Israel we read: "I will be as the dew unto Israel, his branches shall spread as Lebanon." Can you shew us a few texts in which God has said the same things about Japheth, to corroborate the idea which you have put forth, that God would cast away His people? "God forbid," said Paul 1,800 and more years ago. Eighteen hundred years after Paul, defenders (?) of Holy Writ say that God's people have been dispossessed! We must have grown wiser than Paul, or else Paul was wiser than the moderns. If Paul was wiser, where is the good olive tree with its Gentile grafts which were not to boast that they had dispossessed the roots and branches? "Thou bearest not the root, but the root thee;" and is that tree still standing, or has it withered away? For Paul said the unbelieving Hebrew branches were to be graffed into their own olive tree again; and Moses prayed (Deut. xxxiii. 7): "Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah, and bring him to his people." "In those days the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers" (Jer. iii. 18).

Micah tells us (chap. v. 3): "Then the remnant of His (Christ's) brethren (Judah) shall return unto (or with) the children of Israel." One would almost imagine that Peter made a mistake if the modern theory is correct about Japheth dispossessing Shem; for Peter said the elect strangers of the dispersion (God's Ten-tribed Israel) were an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession, nothing whatever about Japheth's dispossession of them, instead of which it is Lo-ruhamah and Lo-ammi, or the Ten-tribed House called back again during the Gospel age (Hosea i.), according to the new covenant which God made with the House of Israel in Christ's blood (1 Peter ii. 9, 10; 1 Cor. xi. 25). Isaiah knew nothing about the "treasures of Divine grace" being taken from Shem and given to Japheth, for in his 59th chapter and 21st verse we read: "As for Me, this is My covenant with them, saith the Lord; My Spirit which is upon thee, and My words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever." When God committed the "treasures of Divine grace" to the Hebrew race, where are the predictions to be found which lead Bible students to believe and to teach that Japheth was to supersede that race? Was the law Japheth's schoolmaster to bring Japheth to Christ? and according to your mode of interpreting the Japhetic prophecy, may I ask if you can explain how it was that God overlooked that Japheth should dwell in the tents of Ham? For if we British people are Japhetic, we not only dwell in Shem's tents, but we dwell in Ham's also, and that to a very considerable extent. You will find a large number of texts where God says He "will dwell with the children of Israel and be their God." You will find that even Samuel said, "The Lord will not forsake His people, for His great name's sake; because it hath pleased the Lord to make you (Israel) His people." Ezekiel explains who the Lord's people are (chap. xxxiv. 30): "And they shall know that I the Lord their God am with them, and that they, the House of Israel, are My people, saith the Lord God." Can you point us to a few similar texts concerning Japheth? If God intended such good things for so many generations, He would not have left us in the dark as to the glories He intended to bestow upon the Japhetic race. I read something in my Bible about Gog and Magog which does not foreshadow those wonderful blessings of which you speak as being bestowed on Japheth's descendants (see Ezek. chaps. xxxviii. and xxxix). If God devoted whole chapters to describe the destruction of a Japhetic race, are there not a few verses somewhere informing us of the transfer of Israel's blessings to Japheth? Of course not, for God had chosen Israel to be unto Himself "a peculiar treasure" (Deut. xxvi. 18, 19), and never did any prophet or apostle dream for a single moment that God's purpose concerning His chosen race had altered in any way. "Thou, Israel, art My servant, Jacob whom I have chosen, the seed of Abraham My friend." "I have chosen thee, and not cast thee away" (Isa. xli. 8, 9). We can find you many like precious words. Why do the propounders of the Japhetic theory find themselves shut up to a solitary text and their own imagination? And how is it that none of these people who believe so much about Japheth, in their efforts to convince sceptics of the truth of God's Word, never, no never attempt to shew that the birthright was Joseph's, that Ephraim is God's firstborn, and that Joseph's House was to "multiply as fish do" (marg. of Gen. xlviii. 16) and become a great people and a multitude of nations? Statements such as I read in the "King's Own" for May are and can only be prolific in making Atheists, for they flatly contradict God's unconditional covenant with the Hebrew fathers as contained in the Word of God.

Bradlaugh thus put the case: "God a God of truth! why He promised to Abraham in the most solemn words; He repeated His promise; nay, this Book which reveals the attributes of Almighty God, tells us that God condesce to swear to a weak, puny man, that He would establi kingdom for ever, and that his seed should be a as the sand upon the sea shore. That promise and sworn by God, and I ask where Where? Don't tell me it was fi not literal. God swore that it lished it, and now it is a thin the God of the Bible always in Church: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for He hath visited and redeemed His people." "Yea, let God be true and every man a liar." It has come to this to-day!

I trust you will re-consider the Japhetic theory, which brings gross dishonour upon the oath which God swore unto "our fathers."

IMPRESSIONS OF SOUTH AFRICA.

By J. Brice, M.P.

The following statement, from the Centenary Magazine for July last, contains only a portion of "the impressions":—

"It is the magnitude of the prize that makes the present contest exciting, and draws the eyes of Europe to these few square miles of barren upland, of which no one had heard fifteen years ago. Whatever be the political outcome of the contest, whether the 'strangers' obtain votes or not, and whether or not the present form of Government is maintained, there cannot be much doubt as to the ultimate result.

"The Transvaal, therefore, and all South Africa, with the Transvaal, seems destined in the future to belong to the English type of civilization, and to speak the English tongue.

"But the Dutch tongue also will hold its ground for many years, and Boer traits will, no doubt, powerfully affect the South African character, as it acquires, after a generation or two, a settled and distinctive quality.

"The wish and hope of everyone who knows the country must be that the fusion which will (almost certainly) come at last, may come peacefully, and come not by a victory of the one element which could leave resentment in the breasts of the other, but by a process of gradual assimilation, similar to that which turned English and Scotchmen from enemies into friends, and is welding Flemming and Walloons into one Belgian people."—From a correspondent at Preston.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

Dear Sir,—May I ask the members of the Prayer Union, and all who are interested in the spread of British-Israel truth, to take into prayerful consideration the contents of the accompanying letter? I am ready, if the Lord will and the door is open, and the way made clear, to respond to the summons, and to start in March next on a tour to the colonies of the British Empire, taking advantage en route of my correspondent's kind offer to help me as far as he can in Western Australia. I have no doubt that when such a tour is widely made known through the Banner, and other British-Israel journals, I will receive similar invitations from various localities, which I would avail myself of as far as circumstances and funds would admit of.

Yours truly, H. Senior.

To Col. Senior, Osborne-road, Clifton, Bristol.

Permit me to approach you in regard to the ing out here to lecture upon the literal Israel in the present day. out-and-out believer in, and ritish-Israel truth, and at the elieves that he is, a humble Lord and Redeemer from , whose coming again he d expects.

lead; a godless, devil-serving place in all phases of human life. There are now said to be 30,000 souls here, and at —— 20,000 more.

"A few exceptions to the general mass, from amongst the Wesleyans and Brethren, show an aggressive Christianity in holding the banner of the Cross up before the people; but I have not yet, after a year's residence from N. S. Wales, found a Christian brother with whom I can read, and pray, and work, using our Master's key, the distinction now between the two Houses of Israel, by which to unlock the meaning of our God's letter to us men and women. The moment I speak of a literal, not a spiritual Israel, we clash directly; hence, you can imagine my loneliness spiritually, and how I miss the sweet, helpful companionship of a brother —— in Sydney, with whom I met every week to study these matters.

". . . Now, sir, will you come over and help us? My daily prayer is that God would prepare me for what He is preparing for me, and show me in what special way I can serve Him; and it has been much borne upon my mind, that your coming would be the means of setting me to work, and that you may be instrumental also in turning my wife's mind, as I am sorry to have to say that she is as yet indifferent and antagonistic to this grand truth. Were you to come, it would be my pleasure and endeavour to assist you as assiduously as I could, and beg that you will make our house your home as long as it is convenient for you to stay, where you will be an honoured guest, welcomed, I feel sure, by my wife as well as by myself, for she is a hospitable, genial woman . . . Should you visit N. S. Wales before returning to England I can, I feel sure, speak of the pleasure it would be to —— to have you in his house to stay, and a few other earnest souls you would there find.

"Now, my dear sir, I trust you will make it a matter of prayer, and consider the matter well before you say "No" to this my call for help. I can understand the matter of want of funds for the trip may be an obstacle, but I trust not insurmountable. I regret, however, that my salary and means make it impossible on my part to assist pecuniarily as I would, if able, love to do.

"I am, dear sir, yours, &c.,

WIDOW PAYNE FUND.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

Dear Sir,—I desire to return my heartiest thanks to you, and the kind friends who have so generously contributed to the fund on behalf of myself and children, through the medium of your paper. When I think of the strangers from all parts of the country thus assisting, I can see the gracious hand of One, who is "the Husband of the widow, and the Father of the fatherless."

I have also great cause for thankfulness to the firm of Messrs. Booth & Co., in whose service my husband had only been four days when the sad event took place, for their kindness in extending to me half-payment for three months after the occurrence, which has proved a great blessing to myself and children; also their kind remembrance at Christmas-time.

To the North Liverpool British-Israel Identity Association, and the friends in Bootle, Birkenhead, and Southport, I also tender my warmest thanks, which I would extend to Mr. C. R. Colquhoun and Mr. Theodore S. Hill, for their labours in connection with the fund.

Yours faithfully,

Widow Payne.

Liverpool, August, 1896.

In British South Africa, though we cannot yet record the final and complete pacification of Matabeleland and Mashonaland, hostilities appear to have ceased with the chiefs and tribes who made their stronghold in the Matoppo hill district.

THE SUPREMACY OF ENGLAND IN THE MATTER OF COMMERCE.

THE Penrith Observer, of July 14th last, quoting the Paris Soleil, notices the hostility of the French Press to the admitted supremacy of Great Britain in commerce. Our nation, it is declared, is at the height of her commercial prosperity. "The value of her maritime trade surpasses that of all other nations of the world together!" Finally, "all the other nations are tributary to England for international telegraphic communications."

The Soleil, we suppose, despairs of remedying this unfortunate state of things (for them), and, therefore, recommends a very trenchant remedy. Great Britain must be destroyed somehow. What better way than by watching for the time when she is at war with France, and then hurling against her ocean trade a host of privateers, which will avoid all contests with our men of war, but only prey upon our commercial fleets. The French privateers would be fast ships and cruisers regularly commissioned. If this were done, and due notice given at once to our nation that the French would no longer regard the Declaration of 1856, by which they promised and engaged to abolish that mode of warfare, then the Soliel observes the British would have more consideration for the French, and would be ready to grant them concessions if we knew they were equipped with privateers to destroy our floating commerce on the outbreak of war.

This is, of course, all very easy and satisfactory for the French, from their point of view. But from ours, there are other considerations which will certainly influence the result. In the first place, we are Israel, God's people, whom He has promised to guide, guard, and protect, but never to forsake (Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.). In the next place, in the coming time of wars and revolutions, which all seem to expect and dread, there will be no war to give our opponents now the opportunity of destroying our commerce by their privateers, since the Lord has said, "He will ordain peace for Israel," because He has wrought all their works for them and in them (Isa. xxvi. 12, R.V.). He has told us the attitude we (being Israel) must assume in the midst of the European turmoil which is going to surround us. "Come My people," He commands us in Isa. xxvi. 20, 21, R.V., "enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For behold, the Lord cometh forth out of His place, to punish the inhabitants of the earth, for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood and shall no more cover their slain." The terrible passage in Zeph. iii. 8, R.V., also is full of trouble to the nations, non-Israelite in origin; but of peace and comfort for Israel, who are "the daughter of the Lord's dispersed." Then shall the Lord "take away the judgments" of Israel, and "cast out our enemy," "for the King of Israel, even the Lord, will be in the midst of His people, and we shall fear evil no more!" (ver. 15, R.V.). There being no war in which we can possibly be entangled, according to the above, and the wars that are to be being entirely between our would-be adversaries of to-day, we do not see that we have need to fear these continental commotions, which will be their punishment from the Lord, but not ours! Besides, even if it could be imagined that we should be at war once more with France, we may be sure the contingency has not been left unprovided for by our rulers and naval experts. Our position at sea gives us the command as to numbers, and we cannot imagine that our mercantile cruisers will be idle or that our mercantile fleets will be permitted to pass to and fro, save under proper protection and convoy. Our commerce is far too valuable to be left to chance, and in those days of steam privateering revived, there would certainly be found, with our great preponderance at sea, some efficient means of neutralizing the efforts of the French in their suggested plan of restoring a barbarous and cruel mode of attack. In estimating the power of the French to do us material injury at sea in the manner suggested, it is well to recollect that their population is dwindling, while ours is fairly retaining its wonderful power of increase. The French population now "is not much greater than it was in 1815, and for ten years past it has been virtually stationary. In 1800 the French were double in number to the British of the United Kingdom. To-day our population is larger than that of France! Ninety-six years have made the difference! They console themselves with the hope that as our British birthrate is apparently falling, comparing 1864 with 1894, so our turn will come next and that theirs is no abnormal decrease to lead them to despair.

One of their own writers, however, Abbé Fortin, tells his country that with their small birthrate and few children, their manhood, fit for war, will become the country of old or mature men. This will affect the navy as well as the army, and in this respect we believe the French are too sanguine when they imagine that with the help even of privateers, they will be able to do our commerce material harm. Those who indulge this hope are again reckoning without the God of Israel, who has promised to His people that they should remember the "Lord their God, for it is He that giveth thee power to get wealth, that He may establish His covenant which He swear unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.). Israel's commerce is the basis of their wealth, and if the power to acquire wealth is destroyed by the French privateers, is it conceivable that God would stand by and allow it when He assured His people by Moses, that by their wealth He would establish His covenant which He swore to fulfil as it is this day? The answer to the inquiry, of course, is that it is not possible or even conceivable! For in that case the Lord's sworn promise would be found a lie, and no further trust could be reposed in His faithfulness, truth, or oath, which God forbid! Let the British people praise the Lord then because of their Israelitish origin; and because of His goodness and mercy and truth towards their undeserving race.

MOSES AND THE PROPHETS—THEIR UNCORRUPTED PRESERVATION PROVED BY BRITISH-ISRAELISM.

By H. A. Marchant.

Most readers of the Banner of Israel are doubtless aware that many "Higher Critics" and Sceptics in general maintain that the Pentateuch is a compilation or forgery of certain Jews after the Babylonian captivity. It is also generally argued by such writers that the prophecies and Old Testament Scriptures have been corrupted and altered to suit the thoughts and prejudices of later writers. A work has recently been published which claims to be the "People's Bible History," "prepared in the light of reason and investigation," edited by the Rev. G. C. Lorimer, LL.D. with an introduction by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, published in twelve 6s. parts, or two 2 guinea vols., by Sampson Low, Marston and Co., of London. A review of the work appeared in the Review of Reviews, of June, showing that it was the work of many minds and a great many opinions; some opposing others are expressed in its pages. Amongst the writers we find Professor Sayce, who complains very much of some things which are said by the "Higher Critics" against the Bible; and as he has broken somewhat with the "Higher Critics," I am astounded to find that he or any other careful Bible student could be the writer of the following quotation:—

"The words of a prophecy might be modified and changed so as to adapt them to the circumstances of the day. Passages might be admitted or added, and alterations made in the proper names. A prophet might revise his own prophecies in this way as well as the prophecies of others." I never read a more astounding or baseless statement of the case than the above, which any man who knows the distinction between "Israel" and "Judah" and the separate destinies of the two houses can prove, not only to his own satisfaction, but to the dumbfounding of Infidel objectors as I have done when I have heard them attack the Pentateuch and declare that it was written or altered by the Jews after the Babylonian captivity. I will now, God helping me, show to the readers of the Banner the kind of argument which I adopt when dealing with the above objections and have always found to be unanswerable.

I ask these objectors if they can tell me who the Jews are? those who they say forged or altered the Old Testament Scriptures; and, as British-Israelites are well aware, I am sure to find there is a great lack of knowledge, not only on the part of orthodox Christians; but of "Higher Critics" and Infidels as to who "Jews" were and are! I generally find they think the Jews of 500 years B.C. represented the Twelve Tribes of Israel! I then force them from this position and make them acknowledge that there was a distinction between Jews and the Ten-tribed House of Joseph, and that consequently the Ten Tribes with Joseph at their head had no part whatever in either altering or forging or preserving in a corrupted or uncorrupted manner the Scriptures of the Old Testament. Hence, if they say the Jews forged it or altered it, we must see in favour of whom they forged or altered it, themselves or their enemies. I have a pamphlet before me at the present moment entitled: "The Ten Tribes, Where Are They? By one who has been among them;" supposed to have been written by a Jew, and emanating from the Operative Jewish Converts' Institution, against British-Israelism; the writer's object evidently being to prove, against all Scriptural and historical evidence, that Israel and Judah amalgamated and became one people. But, like most of our opponents, he presently hangs his own argument with his own rope by quoting a passage from the Talmud in the Hebrew, which he says "denies to the Ten Tribes political restoration as a body, and eternal life to every individual of them," abundantly confirming what we read in Ezekiel xi., that the Jews excommunicated the Ten-tribed House, saying: "Get you far from the Lord; to us is this land given in possession." They not only preserved the record of their own uncharitableness without alteration, showing that they would not tamper with the words once written by the prophets of God, but also allowed to stand God's reversal of this excommunication and His promise to be a sanctuary to the Ten-tribed House, and that He would give them the land of Israel.

This does not look like an alteration of prophecy to bring it up to date as to the expectations and prejudices of those who were then living. But this same prophet Ezekiel, speaking to Judah, says: "Thy sister, Samaria, hath not committed half thy sins." Neither does this look like an alteration to suit popular prejudices or ideas.

And what can we say concerning the prophet Jeremiah? The people so hated by Judah are spoken of as being more just than treacherous Judah; and that the day would come in which Judah would have to go to these very hated people, and as the "Speaker's Commentary" says, "take the lower place." And in chap. xxxi. 9, did the Jews forge or alter the Scripture so as to make it read: "Ephraim is my first-born?" To Judah's lasting credit let it ever be known that though passage after passage in the prophets opposes what they would have liked to be the truth, they never wilfully altered a single word, however much it exposed their own wickedness or spoke in favour of their enemies (Jer. iii.).

But what shall we say when we go back to the Pentateuch, when we find in the Book of Genesis the description of the characters of two men: one Judah, the father of the bona fide Jews; the other Joseph? Had the Jews forged this book would they not more likely have made it Joseph and Tamar, and Judah and Potiphera? Do people generally give their enemies' ancestors a glorious character and forge scandalous stories about their own parentage? Much as some people may be shocked and horrified at these narratives appearing in the Scriptures at all, they are positive witness to its antiquity and uncorrupted preservation! or here at least is one of the places where we should have found, as Professor Sayce teaches, alteration made in the proper names. Not only so, but did the Jews forge the story how Judah said: "What profit is it that we slay our brother and conceal his blood?" "Come, and let us sell him;" and then after they had made a little profit out of the transaction, go on to forge the character of the one to whom they should bow down, and show that in spite of all the prejudices and hatred they had towards this people, that after all, God had given Joseph's sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, the birthright (Jer. xlviii.; 1 Chron. v.).

And did they forge, in Deut. xxxiii., the text which says: "Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah, and bring him unto his people," whilst they showered on the head of Joseph, their enemy, the blessings of heaven and earth unto the "utmost bounds of the everlasting hills?" Does it look as though there were any alteration in proper names when we come to exercise a little common sense? Does it not rather show that the Jews of the House of Judah, with Benjamin and Levi, carefully preserved what had been written from the days of old, not allowing one single text of the Word of God to be wilfully marred? I may also ask the "Higher Critics," from the standpoint of the difference between the House of Joseph and the House of Judah, whether the story of Benjamin at Gibeah (Judges xix.) has had alteration in proper names? If proper names might be altered, why did not Judah, Benjamin and Levi, obliterate from these books (which were taught to the people as ancient and national records) the record of their own sins, shame, and ignominy? and how was it that they so faithfully recorded the virtues of those whom they hated? Is it according to human nature to take the curses to yourselves and give the blessings to your enemies? Therefore we can justly conclude that whatever sins Judah, Benjamin and Levi's prejudices against their brethren of the Ten Tribes may have led them to commit, there was one sin at which they never did or would connive, namely, tampering with the oracles of God which had been committed to their care. They carefully preserved them and handed them on to the Christian Church; and even now they cannot understand why the judgments written have been executed against themselves. Consider this, ye "Higher Critics" and Sceptics, and find out what the Scripture says concerning Joseph, the stick of Ephraim (Exek. xxxvii.) before you charge the Jews with dishonest acts of which they never were guilty. Cease ye, yourselves, from fouling the waters and treading down the pastures and then charging it on others who were not guilty. This article does not ignore the fact that the Ten Tribes had many sins against God and their brethren of Judah. May God hasten the day of their re-union! Let us love as brethren those who had the oracles of God to preserve for us,—all lost sheep of the House of Israel now found by our good Shepherd Jesus.

A KNOTTY POINT.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR SIR,—Once more may I solicit your permission to intrude upon your space? You have been very kind to me on more than one occasion, particularly in giving my long letter of Nov. 13th, 1893, a space in the dear old BANNER. For that, and all other favours pray accept my sincere thanks. And now, in an hour of perplexity, I apply to you for aid. Presuming then, that I have your permission, I venture to enclose herein (for your perusal), three letters, written to me by a young lady friend I have known for many years, and one I much esteem and respect; one who often sat by the bedside of my dear wife in her dying hours. I merely mention this, that you may know what a dear and beloved friend we have always had in Miss W——. Now, what I want to ask you, sir, is this: Had the enclosed epistles been addressed to you by my young friend Miss W—— (or any other young lady), what reply would you have returned to the fair correspondent? But permit me to acquaint you with the circumstances that influenced my friend to pen those lines. They originated thus:—On Sunday, 17th ult., at St. John's Church, Launceston, the Rev. Canon Kelly, M.A., gave us, as usual, a very long sermon, the subject of which was, "The Church and kingdom of Christ upon earth." From the commencement, to the conclusion of his discourse, he most strenuously impressed on the minds of his congregation that the said "Church and kingdom of Christ on earth," was made up of "no one particular people, or nation, but of all nationalities," to wit: French, Germans, Spaniards, Portuguese, Dutch, Turks, and all the rest of our continental friends.

Now, sir, this is a theory I most emphatically deny. I maintain, that "Christ's Church," and "Christ's kingdom," are synonymous, that at its first organisation it consisted of no other people on the face of this earth, but those whom the Lord Jesus Himself chose, and ordained to form His Church." I have written a brief essay on this momentous subject, in which I have carefully followed the Church from the day that Noah built an altar unto the Lord, until I came to Abraham; on, right on, have I kept with it! From "the friend of God;" down into Egypt with Jacob, back into Palestine, through the wilderness with Moses; on, on I say, have I travelled with it until like the star of Bethlehem it led me safe to Christ. But did I stop there? Nay! my journey did not end at Jerusalem. No! I must march on still, forward with the brave Galilean Benjaminites, onward from Jerusalem in Palestine, to Britain. No rest! no rest! till the flag of Christ is planted firmly on British soil. And well those gallant soldiers did their work, well they obeyed their Captain's commands in conveying His message of salvation to their brethren, the "lost sheep of the House of Israel." Yes, ye Anglo-Saxon men, women, and children, ye seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; ye people whom the Lord hath blest! Ye British race! Ye "chosen generation!" Behold your Church! The glorious Church of England! A pure Church founded by Christ and His apostles alone. The bride He came to seek, and find. Oh! "blessed be the Lord God of Israel: for He hath visited and redeemed His people," and,

"When peace shall descend like the dew on thy shore,
And a halo of beauty shall circle thee round;
The trumpet of Israel shall sound as of yore,
And proclaim to the world that the lost heir is found."

The Jews were never lost, neither were the Gentiles; so it could not be either of those people that our Lord came to seek. In fact we have His own word for it, "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the House of Israel." Again, St. Paul tells us, "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, to redeem them that were under the law." Now the Gentiles never were under the law, and as the Jews would not receive Him, why He went to His other sheep—viz., the House of Israel. "Go to the lost sheep of the House of Israel," said our Lord to His disciples. Now I think this is all pretty plain English, and all the spiritualising in the world will not alter it one iota.

Although the Bible was originally written in Hebrew, it has been so beautifully translated into our language, that any school boy or girl may both read and understand it (that is, if they will only read the dear old book as it is written). If they do not, but will still listen to the spiritual interpretation of the present day teachers, why then the Bible will be to them what a man in this town the other day told me it was—viz., "The greatest puzzle that ever was written." I know there are passages difficult to comprehend; they have been so to me in years past; but now (thanks to the writers of Anglo-Israel literature); thanks to you, sir, to dear Miss Lawrence, Miss E. M. Rush, and to those who are asleep in Jesus! and I must not forget one who will ever be dear in the memory of all who knew him—viz., our late beloved and respected pastor, the Rev. Canon M. B. Brownrigg. 'Twas from his lips I first heard the glorious news of my birthright, and although that voice is silent now, and we shall never hear its tones again, or see that dear face until we meet at the "midnight cry," yet, the torch that he kindled in this good city of Launceston, shall never be extinguished, while Edward Lovell Dwyer lives to keep it burning. Once more I thank the living, and the dead, for all they have taught me. The Bible is a new book to me. I know now the true meaning of God's Word, uttered by the mouth of His holy prophets and apostles, and if I only read the dear old book as God has written it, taking nothing from it, or adding anything to it, it will be no puzzle or enigma to me. Once more I emphatically repeat, the Church of England is the Church of Christ, the Church of Israel, founded by Israelites alone. Israelites were the first clergymen in Britain, they built the first Christian Church. Aristobulus was the first Lord Bishop, ordained by St. Paul himself. The Church has one foundation: Christ and His apostles, and they were Israel. This is the faith I shall live and die in, and all the spiritualising ministers may preach to the contrary will make as much impression on me as a puff of wind, or a spray of the sea on the rock of Gibraltar.

When I wrote to my friend Miss W., in reference to Canon Kelly's sermon on the "Kingdom of Christ," I made no comment on the reverend gentleman's version of that subject, then, but merely referred her to several passages in Scripture of which I enclosed a copy for her perusal, asking her whether she thought the homily she had heard on the Sunday was at all in harmony with those passages, to which she replied in letter number one. I then posted a second missive to my fair opponent, something after the style of what I have herein written; thereupon, I received letter number two. Epistle number three came in answer to my third address to my adversary. You will see, sir, the battle has been a resolute one, and I must compliment my antagonist for being a brave and valiant warrior.

The quotations I sent for her to study were Deut. xiv. 2, vii. 6; Amos iii. 2; Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20; 1 Peter ii. 9; Isa. xlix. 3, and many more. But I need not recite them to you, who know them all well. You will note her answer in letter No. 1, page 2. And now, dear sir, you know the sentiments of my heart, and all the world may know them too. The hero of Acre's nephew is not afraid to say what he means, and what he believes to be the truth. However, to you, and to all those clergymen whose names I have before me, in the BANNER and Covenant People, I submit myself. If I am wrong, tell me, and I will sheathe my sword, and yield to your decision. I am well aware you are not prophets, but I firmly believe that God has revealed a great deal to you. Judge, therefore, between me and my fair and energetic opponent, Miss W.

But ere I conclude, I will just briefly comment upon two remarks of my friend, in reference to Englishmen. Being one of that chosen race myself, I cannot let her assertion pass unanswered. She writes thus:—"Englishmen are very exclusive, and they would like to be so in heaven." To the first affirmation, I reply in the affirmative, taking my authority from Num. xxiii. 9, "Lo! the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." To the second observation, I answer: Well, I think my friend forgets that in "heaven all are to be as the angels." However, I must leave that query for some wiser head than mine to decide.

Nevertheless, there is one thing I beg to add, and it is this: When the "Holy City," new Jerusalem, comes down from God out of heaven, the wall of the city will have twelve foundations, and in them will be the names of the twelve apostles. It will also have twelve Gates, and "the names written thereon, will be the names of the Twelve Tribes of Israel." From this it seems to me, that even in the "new heaven, and the new earth," the name of Israel will not be blotted out. And now, let me sign my name in full, to all I have written; and that God will bless you all in the battle. Believe me ever faithfully yours in Christ and Israel,

EDWARD LOVELL DWYER, Hon. Local Sec.

LETTER I.

DEAR MR. DWYER,—I must apologise for not writing to you before. First, the Rev. Canon Kelly's sermon. I saw nothing wrong with it, except perhaps the politics. I think they ought to be kept for week-days. Politics and religion may go hand in hand, but one may relax one's hold on them on Sundays.

Now about the other. I have carefully read those verses, and I will give you my idea of them. Jesus Christ was a direct descendant of Abraham; and when the Lord said, "In thee shall all the kingdoms of the earth be blessed," and other verses which you have quoted, they were meant spiritually: that through Jesus Christ the seed of Abraham should be blessed. Jesus was a descendant of Israel; and through Him, who was about to die for His people, they (the whole world, not one particular portion of it) should be blessed. I am sorry to disagree with you, but that is the meaning those words have for me; and I prefer to think I owe my salvation to the Lord Jesus Himself, and that, if I am a penitent sinner, He who said, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out," will not first ask me if I am an Anglo-Israelite or a Gentile. I prefer, I say again, to think that, than to think that the merciful Father would make any difference between one of His children and another, for we are all His children. I cannot think that those promises point to anything else but to Jesus, the "Saviour of mankind." I think, too, that ought to be enough for us! The fact, in short, suffices that we have a great High Priest, who is ever making intercession for us. I know you won't agree with me. I am sorry, but I cannot help it! I hope you will still believe me to be, &c.

LETTER II.

DEAR MR. DWYER,—I think there is a little misunderstanding somewhere between us about the Anglo-Israel theory. We will put the spiritual idea on one side, and accept the worldly. I grant you that we are Israel; where are we then? What is the difference? are we any better than our neighbours, who, by the accident of birth, are Spaniards, Germans, Portuguese, Dutch, or any other foreigners? Remember Luther was a German, and we owe him a great deal for the work he did at the time of the Reformation. And there are Frenchmen as good as any English. Englishmen are very exclusive, and they would like to be so even in heaven. When the Lord said, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel," He said it to try the faith of the woman; for you must remember that Jesus Himself was a descendant of the Gentiles as well as of Israel. Ruth the Moabitess was a Gentile; so was Rahab. Israel and Gentiles are thus connected, or should be, in one holy bond of fellowship. The Lord Jesus taught His narrow-minded disciples a love and faith that was wide as the world, of a God who was the Father of all, irrespective of racial prejudice: "one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of us all." And why should we set so much store by the thought that we are the children of Abraham, and therefore entitled to all these blessings? "Seek ye first the kingdom of God." Christ Himself is the only Son. We are they (Israel and Gentiles) who have received the Spirit of adoption. As there is one only Son, so all the rest of the world are the adopted children of the one Father. Why should the doom you spoke of come upon Germans, Spaniards, and other foreigners? There are in Germany some of the cleverest, deep-thinking, scientific men of the day. Not only that, but some of the most God-fearing. I myself personally know several German gentlemen, for whom I have as much respect as I have for any other of my friends.

And now about the ministers. Nobody, without an exception, has ever biassed me in any way as regards the Anglo-Israel theory. I suppose it is true. But it is not that. What appeals to me is this: that they seem to think that, because they are Israel, they are in a much better position, here and hereafter, than those who, by "the accident of birth," are not Israelites. Now that is the part I don't like. You say there is no Gentile Church now. I think that is wrong. As I said before, Christ is a lineal descendant of both Israel and Gentiles; and I should not like to say that, because a nation happened to be a Gentile nation, the doom you have mentioned was theirs. Remember the "Inasmuch as ye have judged these." Launch Anglo-Israel literature in such a country as Germany (one of the nations spoken of), and see what effect it would have. Why, our own Royal family is more than half German.

You also spoke of the ministers receiving purses of sovereigns. They have earned it. St. Paul says: "Even so hath the Lord also ordained that they who preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel." And if I had time and money, which I have not, I would rather spend it on showing to those who do not know it that they, whether Jew or Gentile, are children of God, and joint heirs with Christ, than by trying to prove that we are Israelites, and entitled to earthly glories. "For what shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Hoping you will excuse all mistakes,

Yours very faithfully,

D. M. W.

LETTER III.

DEAR MR. DWYER,—I think it is a pity that we should quarrel, so I will just send you a few words, and then we will bury our religious differences. I think you might have done yourself the justice to think that if you, a personal friend, could not convince me, no man, even though he be an "Oxonian," could do so. No, I have often told you that. I think that if we are Christians—and that should be our first thought—then, "Cui bono?" If we are Christ's, what can anything else matter? And we are His, bought at such a price! He came to "redeem the world," not a portion of it; and He wasted no time proclaiming His own identity! No! "He went about doing good," giving "full and free salvation" to all who would accept it. And that is "the Master" I worship. If I am His, I am content to try and do His will, to "do to all men as I would they should do unto me." And you may make use of my name to anything I have written. Hoping I have not offended you,

Yours very faithfully,

D. M. W.

P.S.—By-the-bye, I do not consider my ideas confused.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR ON THE ABOVE.

The correspondence to which the above refers, opens up a subject with which we are all familiar, namely,—the favour which God declares that He bears towards His people Israel, and that that favour remains now as it did before.

Our friend, Mr. Dwyer, we see, rather confounds "the Church of England" as it now exists with Christ's Church, the Church of Israel, chosen in Abraham and his seed, and the Israelite Church in the wilderness. There are many senses in which the Scriptures use the word "Church," and one of the chief is the national. Israel was the chosen, selected, separated nation, and in that sense, God's "Church," or "Ecclesia." The Church of England at present hardly represents the nation, save in a forensic sense, though in the blessed future we believe it will. Just now, there are many other religious bodies besides the Church of England among the British, and these refuse to submit to the latter or obey her form of worship. The nation, in fact, is divided, and "the Church" has not in her fold the nation. But in regard to "the kingdom of God," our Lord's words in Matt. xxi. 43 should settle the question, as between Canon Kelly and Mr. Dwyer. "The kingdom of God" (that is of Christ) was, He declared when on earth, about to be taken from the Jews (a portion of the children of Israel), and given to "a nation"—"the fruit-bearing nation." The idea of several, or all nations, believing of course in Christ, being this "kingdom," must be given up. Wherever this "kingdom" now is, we must find it represented by a single modern, Christian nation, and one that brings forth "the fruits of that kingdom." The evidence is conclusive that the modern nation in question answering to the description given, is the British, Anglo-Saxon nation, or race, which has been clearly shown, and not denied by Miss W., to be the House of Israel. That people, nationally regarded, must also be "the Church," or chosen ones of the Lord; the nation He has "selected" out of all the nations of the world, to show forth His praise and glorify Him in spiritual things. Miss W. prefers to take all the promises given to Abraham and his seed, in a spiritual sense, but not in a literal, because she "would rather not think that the merciful Father would make any difference between one of His children and another, for we are all His children." We may grant that He is merciful and that all believers are His children. But it does not therefore follow that He will not, being a Sovereign, use the fittest agents among His children to do His work in the world! Men act thus in the affairs of this life, and no one accuses them of partiality. India is governed by Great Britain. But only a selected and trained few out of Britain's sons are sent there to do the nation's work! Does God show partiality in selecting among His national children the one He deems best fitted for the purpose, in educating and training them, and then sending them forth to evangelize and bless the world? Surely not. He does not leave us in doubt about His plans. In Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 12, 21, R.V., He declares that He has made, formed, and created Israel, and constituted them "His witnesses," "that they might show forth His praise." They are "to blossom and bud," and they are "to fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6, R.V.). The Bible is full of God's electing grace, whereby He appointed this favoured race to be His messengers of mercy to the world; and woe be to us if we refuse to recognise either His right to do as He will with His own, or fly in the face of His providential arrangements by which He declares He will dispense His mercy to the nations. Miss W. seems to have fallen into an error respecting our teaching with regard to Israel's functions. Our Israelite origin cannot save a single soul any more than it saved Ahab, Judas Iscariot, and the many Israelites and Jews who have died in their sins, unsaved! The chief "good" we recognise as the result of the choice of the House of Joseph to be God's ministers, is that it has educated and sent forth a people, chosen by the Lord as the fittest agents to proclaim the Gospel, and invite the adhesion to it of all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth. This invitation opens to all Gentiles the whole of the spiritual blessings which God gave to Abraham and to his seed, for themselves first, and to communicate them to, and thus bless all the nations in Christ, in spiritual things only. As to temporal blessings, those were in the nature of things reserved for "Abraham and his seed for ever," and could not be communicated to the nations, except that such individuals, or families of those nations, who joined or may join the House of Israel, and so become naturalised among them, and share with them in such temporal gifts, become themselves "Israelites by adoption." These temporal gifts were: 1st, the land; 2nd, a great and mighty nationality; 3rd, a great and constant population-increase attached to it, conferring "Empire;" 4th, the Gates of their enemies, as their own possession; 5th, abnormal wealth; 6th, a colonial empire; 7th, a heathen empire great beyond comparison; and 8th, the privilege of Gospel evangelization among all the nations, which is the end and object of all the rest, being specially needed to qualify them for their glorious ministerial functions. Miss W. would apparently be satisfied with her own personal salvation, but dreams not that God needs something beyond that. He needs her help, and that of all her race to take the Gospel to all the world besides. As a fact, she must see that God uses the British and American nations, nationally, but not the other non-Israelite nations, nationally, to execute this glorious function. What other nation is fitted, quâ nation, for the work? None in Asia, none in Africa, being mostly savages and Mahomedans; none in Mahomedan or in Roman Catholic lands; since the latter teach rank idolatry. Not the German race, who refuse obedience as to the Lord's Sabbath, and to His commands as to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. We are reduced thus to the Protestants of the Anglo-Saxon, British race, and these are just those we detect to be Israelites because they have all the gifts in possession which God promised to His people to enable them to go out and evangelize all nations in all lands. Miss W. has some idea that because we make these claims for the British as Israelites they must or ought to be holier and better than their neighbours. Alas! Israel is no better now than they were when God selected them in the times of Moses and the patriarchs before him. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were far from perfect characters. Israel was always a stubborn, evil generation, as Deut. ix. 7, 13—29, and 2 Kings xvii. testify. David's character was very faulty, and on one occasion his crimes were heinous. Yet the Lord chose the nation and the man, and loved both to the end.

A few words on another objection raised by Miss W. and we conclude. She demurs to our esteeming our nation to be in an exalted position because we are Israel. We do not say so. God declares that "Israel obedient" shall inherit all those earthly blessings enumerated in Deut. xxviii. 1—14, xv. 6; Jer. xxxiii. 9, xxxi. 9, 31—34. We have proved the British to be "the remnant of Israel," and Miss. W. does not deny the fact. Can she venture in the face of Scripture to refuse to the Lord's people the position of superiority on earth, which He who cannot err has assigned to them? Earthly supremacy is requisite for those God deigns to employ as His world-wide missionaries, to enable them to preach the Gospel to the heathen. Without the protection of the British flag the Gospel could not be preached to the natives at all. The flag having ceased to avail in Matabele and Mashona lands in South Africa, the Christian missionary's power is in abeyance. The Gospel as a rule, like trade, follows the British flag.

Christ certainly came to redeem the world, not Israel only. But He has decided to do it in His own way. "Go ye," He said to His Israelite followers, "and preach the Gospel to every creature." "Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." "Israel shall blossom and bud, and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6; Mark xvi. 15; Matt. xxviii. 20, R.V.).

THE NEW REVELATION.

By T. Reay, Gosforth.

It is so rare to meet a man who knows aught of Israel except the Jews, that the old ground must be gone over again and again. It cannot be too often repeated that in Scripture the term Israel refers, for the most part, to the Ten Tribes, and the term Judah to the two.

Solomon was king of all Israel. At his death his son Rehoboam was to be crowned king, but the Ten Tribes revolted, and set up a separate kingdom, with Jeroboam as their king. God Himself then owned Solomon's son as no more than king of Judah. Judah fought unsuccessfully with Israel to win her back, and in proof that Ten-tribed Israel was not the insignificant people we are sometimes told, it may be noted that in this war with Judah, because God was against her, Israel lost 500,000 men, the greatest slaughter in any one battle either before or since (2 Chron. xiii. 13—18, R.V.). 217 years after the separation, after Judah had passed through the reigns of 10 kings, the word "Jews" first appears and refers to Judah only—never once was it used with reference to Israel, who all this time was also existing as a separate nation. After outliving altogether 19 kings, Israel was driven by the Assyrians to beyond the Euphrates.

Judah continued a kingdom for 133 years after Israel disappeared; 467 years from the accession of David, and 387 years from the revolt of Israel. She was then driven captive to Babylon, but returned and inhabited the holy land in our Saviour's day, but Ten-tribed Israel never joined her, for she never returned.

About 120 years after Israel had ceased to occupy a place in history, Jeremiah said, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the House of Israel, and with the House of Judah." St. Paul explains, in Heb. viii., that our New Testament is precisely that new covenant. Jeremiah further says, "The House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance to your fathers."

The return of the Jews to Palestine is freely discussed to-day. Israel is still missing, but anybody can easily identify the one nation of the world that is to restore the House of Judah to the inheritance of their fathers, and that is the nation which to-day possesses the heritage, and is doing the work of Ten-tribed Israel.

The Jews were Judah, and Judah was of Israel, just as a Welshman or a Scotchman is British; but nobody can point to the Welsh or the Scotch as "the British nation," so it is equally absurd to point to the Jews as "the Israelites." The Scriptures make no such blunder! With regard to the term Jew, a born Welshman or Scotchman will ever be Welsh or Scotch and proud of his origin, being always at the same time British. A descendant of the tribe of Judah will likewise always be an Israelite. The foregoing is the A B C of Scripture, or what the notes are to the musician. They are the first steps to the new revelation, and the Scripture is unintelligible without them.

In 1843, the Rev. Maximilian Geneste, M.A., incumbent of West Cowes, Isle of Wight, published in two elaborate, and, doubtless then, very costly volumes, dedicated to the Lord Bishop of Winchester, what he describes as the gordian knot of sacred chronology, the intricacy of which all the chronologers have complained of, but none have been able to unravel. He entitles them the Parallel Histories of Israel and Judah. The work was subscribed for by Her Majesty and other royal personages, the leading clergy, H.M. judges, &c., &c., some 900 copies being subscribed for, previous to publication. The volumes in question must be lying snugly in the libraries of many and many an English home, and yet, after more than half a century, how refreshing it is to meet a man, pastor, teacher, or Bible student though he may have been for a lifetime, to whom the sound of Israel conveys any idea beyond that of the Jews. Men will not trouble to grasp the A B C of their Scriptures, without which an intelligent understanding of them is impossible, nor learn the notes by which the music of restored Israel is shortly to glorify God.

"Surely to God we are boastful enough, as a nation, without getting this idea into our heads," said our leading Church paper, some years ago. Is it not boastful, then, to attribute the marvellous position of this nation to our own natural strength, to anything and to everything in fact, rather than to God? but it is not boastful, in the face of the assertion of sceptical writers that God made certain specific promises to the Jews and never kept them, to say, that on the contrary, God is, and has been faithful, and has kept all His promises.

What good will it do? is constantly asked. Much every way, as St. Paul would reply. It will prove that God really exists, and is very near to us this moment. It will transform the half-hearted "I believe" of our Apostles' Creed, a phrase ordinarily used otherwise to express doubt, into something more nearly approaching the original "credo," and thoroughly vitalize our already Israelitish worship. This new revelation is to the theologian what the electric light is to the scientist. Secularists and publications that pander to them often speak of the Scriptures as the Jewish writings, the Jewish histories, &c.; this is their polite way of insinuating that apart from the historical portion the rest is a cunningly devised fable. Now, the new revelation reveals the fact that if a fable the Jews are not the authors, because the Scriptures contain nothing that is in any way creditable to the Jews, and certainly no such promises as we hear so much about. There are promises in and through Christ, but we have only to consider the attitude of the Jews towards Christ to perceive that they are not the inventors of the fable.

The Roman Catholics, then, as the accredited custodians of the Scriptures, Are they the inventors of the fable? The new revelation again says, Certainly not; for they would not have told us, as St. Paul tells them, that they only owe their position in the Christian world to the enforced salutary, but temporary absence of others. Israel's vacation ended, she must resume her duty; she can neither divide honours with or become absorbed by Rome. She must stand first—the first and not the last.

The British are the only people to-day who could, with any show of reason, be charged with inventing the fable, but their sublime indifference to their heritage dispels the idea, and forces the stamp of eternal truth upon the Holy Scriptures.

To those who are familiar with Scripture, the new revelation lets in a flood of light on our doings in Egypt and South Africa at this moment. We cannot understand —and it is not blasphemy, but pure candour to admit that we nationally, do not agree with very many of God's ways; but we cannot, like some people, say, "If that is your God, we will have none of Him." Our childhood's life was not lived in vain, and we cannot forget its lesson. We well know now that what was the very best for us was just what ran counter to our highest judgment, and was what we most condemned in our earthly father. We cannot get beyond childhood in our relation to God, and to seriously criticise His doings, if it were nothing else, is to repeat the error of our childhood.

Israel has never been forgotten in her captivity; her own God-sent messages of love and promises of restoration are reiterated throughout the pages of Scripture, all clearly addressed to her, but by the translators and commentators divided between Judah and the Church. Although the missives have missed her, Britain stands to-day arrayed and bedecked in all the finery of Israel's presents, and in the full enjoyment of Israel's promises, shaking her head in response to God's overtures of reconciliation. "Truly, the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, My people doth not consider."

WHY THE NATION-CHURCH EXISTS AND WHAT IS ITS OBJECT.

WE are often asked in what "The Church" consists and how our nation, being Israel, is interested in the blessings which the Scripture attaches to the Church of Christ, that is His body. Of the various senses attached to the word "Church" in the Scriptures, there is one which clearly applies to the nation selected by the Lord. Thus Stephen, just before his martyrdom (Acts vii. 38), spoke of Israel as "the Church in the wilderness." To the nation of Christ's choice (and, therefore of God's), "the kingdom of God," taken from the Jews, was destined to be given.

That nation must needs be the House of Israel, God's selected people, therefore His sanctified ones, or "Church," set apart to show forth His praise (Isa. xliii. 21, R.V.). For Israel was "to blossom and bud, and to fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6, R.V.). That Nation-Church, blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ, and early set apart to become a blessing to all the nations outside the circumference of Israel's nationality, as well as to all those within its bounds (Gen. xxii. 18, R.V.), has a work to do which is entirely unselfish. It has to deal with all the inhabitants of the earth, and in and through Christ, to bring them blessing.

The Moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, in his address at its sitting in June last, reported in The Scotsman of the 3rd of that month, speaking of the Church in a sense differing from ours, gave expression, nevertheless, to views on the subject we have mentioned which exactly express our idea. He said—

"THE COVENANTS.

"In external form the covenants have passed away; but it is only as the water has passed away when it is seen no longer separately on the ground, yet is nourishing the more effectively because unseen the daisied grass and ripened corn with which the earth is clothed. (Applause.) So far have the words of the Covenant's first martyr been fulfilled. He saw the storm that was bursting on his Church and country, but he saw the clear shining after rain which would also come, and he died with this prediction about Scotland on his lips:—

> "They may scatter their dust on the winds of Heaven,
> To the bounds of the utmost sea;
> But her Covenants—burned, reviled and riven—
> Shall yet her reviving be."

(Applause.) But that reviving needs to go further than it has gone as yet. Let us have clearly before us the ideal for which our fathers strove. Let us understand that the Church exists not in any sense for its own sake, and not even for the benefit of the individuals that make it up, but as the chosen means of carrying out the divine purpose for mankind. Let us understand that a foremost part of that purpose is to make the people of each land aware that they, as truly as Israel of old, have special things to do for the God of all the earth, special aspects of the truth to develop, special kinds of good to embody in tangible and effective forms in order that they may thereby work out spiritual benefit for all mankind.

"HONOUR AND SUCCESS OF A NATIONAL CHURCH.

"Let us understand that the honour and success of a national Church lies not in securing advantage of any description to itself, but in making the nation aware what its particular duties as God's servants are, and in sending them forth both determined and well equipped to do them. (Applause.) Let us understand that such ends cannot be gained by might or power, not by sudden strokes of any kind, only by patient walking along that lowly path of service and self-effacement which our Head deliberately chose when He refused to have the kingdoms of the world and all their glory put into His power at once. Let us understand such things as these, and will not all common duties be in large measure transformed for each of us in whom spiritual life exists at all? Will not each of those common duties be felt to be a part, and a means of awakening and moulding a thousand other parts, of a collective national life which will draw communities and nations to submit to a heavenly guidance which has shown its transforming power in actual experience? So there may come to be spread wide and far among us that intensity of personal piety which is the root of everything good and hopeful, and side by side with it the constant sense that the common details of common life are holy because inseparably inwoven in the plan according to which God is effecting His loving purpose for the nation and for all mankind. So may the ancient vision be fulfilled in more glorious fashion than could be understood either by those who first shaped it into words or by our Covenanting fathers whom the rude sketch of it that came before them so greatly uplifted and inspired—the vision with which, as it stands in the writings of Micah and Isaiah, the proceedings of this Assembly may, I trust, not unfittingly be closed:—'In the latter days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills, and peoples shall flow into it. And many nations shall go and say, 'Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob, and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths; for out of Zion shall go forth instruction, and the word of Jehovah from Jerusalem.'

"(Throughout its delivery the address was frequently applauded.)"

We are glad to see that the Moderator spoke of the Church as a "national" body, which it represents as "God's servants," and sending forth the nation, determined and well equipped to do their duty towards the world. The nation, too, is herein represented as drawing communities and nations (let us mark that!) to submit to a heavenly guidance which "has shown its transforming power in actual experience."

The difficulty in most minds in regard to this subject is the doubt that a nation can ever be so completely changed and converted to Christ as to constitute a body perfect in Him, and answering to the popular idea of "a true Church."

Digitized by Google

Those who so speak and think, do not literally understand the splendid prophecy repeated in the Old and New Testaments alike, in precisely similar words, in Hebrew and Greek (see Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, and Heb. viii. 10—12). A nation answering to this description, right through and through, is what men cannot allow to be possible, when "all shall know the Lord;" "from the least of them to the greatest of them;" when they will be in fact the "Lord's people and He their God." He will "forgive their iniquity and remember their sin no more." Who can doubt that a nation so blessed, must be the very "Church of God"—the Church redeemed by the Lord Jesus Christ, whose function is described in Isa. xxvii. 6, R.V.—namely, "to blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit."

The guarantee that the Lord intends to keep this His erring people from backsliding, and abandoning His service and faith, is found in the words of promise in the same passage of Scripture. He proposed to make a covenant with the House of Israel, whereby He would put His law in their inward parts, and would write it in their hearts. A nation so blessed, in whose inward parts, and in whose hearts God Himself intended to put His law, must verily be the Lord's selected, chosen nation, therefore among the nations, His Church. No other nation is to be so blessed, or by grace so distinguished. Proof of this is found further in Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20, R.V.), where it is distinctly stated concerning Israel: "He showeth His words unto Jacob, His statutes and judgments unto Israel. He hath not so dealt with any nation, and as for His judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord."

"OTHERWISE" AND "REUNION."

ONE further interchange of thoughts will now, I hope, set Dr. Hanan and myself at one on the meaning of Rom. xi. 22, as we are absolutely at one on the subject of British-Israelism. I also hope that it may lead to the harmonising of our "Handbook" both with our English Bible and with itself.

We agree that "all prophetic churches" are not "destined" to be "cut off." We agree that the rendering of ἐπει, one way or another, does "not affect the argument for the Identity." These are two important points. But Dr Hanan claims that "St. Paul is writing to the Roman wild graft only;" and thereupon charges me with "the mistake" of "arguing from a particular statement to a universal;" but if St. Paul as "Apostle of Gentiles," wrote (as he says and I read) "to the Gentiles" (τοῖς ἔθνεσιν) the "limited liability" disappears and no mistake is made! Besides I took the two instances of the word "destined" together as one equivalent and universal statement, and argued accordingly. I have since then noticed that in Mr. Aston's chapter in the "Handbook" the rendering "otherwise" is retained (p. 130). Inasmuch, then, as the translation does not affect the argument, and Dr. Aldersmith uses the word "destined" in reference to the Church of England, and Mr. Aston's article retains "otherwise" which is the rendering of our A.V. confirmed by our revisers, I may well beg the editors of our "Handbook" either to harmonize it with the English N. T. and with itself, or to expunge the argument as needless!

Finally, in self-vindication, I feel it due to myself to add an explanation in reference to my own hope of the "Reunion of Christendom," and Dr. Hanan's hope of "Union upon a true basis." Herein again I am thankful to cherish the conviction that we are absolutely at one, for in my view the two phrases have but one meaning. Dr. Hanan fears "a weak surrender to conciliate Rome;" and, if he thought of Lord Halifax, under the misleading title of "Reunion of Christendom," advocating "union with Rome," I heartily share his fears.

But no true British-Israelite can fall into that trap. Reunion of Christendom means unity of the Church! Union with Rome means schism, if not apostasy! Reunion will co-operate with British-Israelism to secure our Saviour's prayer that all may be one, that the world may see and believe that the Father had sent Him! Rome has perpetuated division by adding twelve or fourteen fresh dogmas to the two Catholic Creeds, and decreeing infallibility; and as long as she is Trentine neither Greek nor Anglican can treat with her. But *only one clause, the "filioque" (for which we have Rome to thank), divides the Greek and Anglican Churches; and if both can adopt the basis of union, as virtually they have laid it down in the Bonn Conferences, and in God's Providence can return to the pure faith of the undivided Church, their united strength may so bear upon Rome as to bring her also back into the "one fold." No other basis can be found than "the faith once for all delivered to the saints," and no other embodiment of it than the Apostles' and Nicene, or, more strictly, Constantinopolitan Creed. All Churches must alike return to that Creed, without addition and without surrender—to the faith of the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church—and then Israel and the Church will become one again as they once were, and they will be witnesses and fellow-workers for one aim and object: "The glory of God in the highest, on earth peace and goodwill amongst men," the Epiphany of Christ!

PHILIP CARLYON.

The Rev. Mr. Carlyon desires to add to the above the following "note from Dr. Vaughan's Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans" (written in the first instance, for the benefit of his Sixth Form at Harrow), in which he explains the force of ἐπει in these words:—"For this use of ἐπει (since, if so) in Rom. iii. carrying with it the suppressed clause, 'if so,' or 'if otherwise,' according to the context of chap. xi. 6—22; 1 Cor. v. 10, vii. 14; Heb. ix. 26, x. 2."

JEWELLERS' GOLD, AND ISRAEL'S WEALTH.

"IN England alone £33,000 worth of gold a week is used by the jewellers; and this nearly all new gold, which, being required in certain forms and quantities, is mostly supplied from London. A curious chapter might be written on the preparation of jewellers' gold. There is watch-gold, for instance, which is of 18-carat; while for the more decorative smaller articles there is grain-gold, which is fine gold above the Mint standard. Although the metal is prepared in London, by far the larger portion of articles of jewellery are manufactured at Birmingham and Sheffield. Birmingham takes half the gold and silver used in British jewellery, the silver alone used in the capital of the Midlands averaging over £350,000 a year. England's £1,720,000 a year is said to be a third of the world's goldsmith's work, although, of course, all gold statistics are for many and obvious reasons but approximate and none too favourable estimates."—London Paper.

"Sir John Puleston handed the casket to Princess Maud. The wedding ring, which is of gold from the Trawsfynydd Mines, was enclosed in a silver casket, which is formed of panels supported by beautiful carved Corinthian pillars. The back panel has engraved upon it the following inscription:—'Presented by the Gorsedd and National Eisteddfod Association to her Royal Highness the Princess Maud of Wales, on her marriage with his Royal Highness Prince Charles of Denmark, July 22, 1896.' The front panel, which is of solid gold, has a similar inscription in Welsh. One of the end panels is ornamented with the Arms of Wales, surmounted by the Dragon, and underneath the Eisteddfodic motto, 'Galon with Galon' ('Heart to heart'): the other bears the Union Jack crossed with the Danish Flag. The lid is formed of an oval crystal centre, bearing in the central portion the appropriate Eisteddfodic and Druidic emblems with the motto, 'Dan Nàwdd a'i Dangnef' ('In God's protection and His peace'). On either side are the monograms of the bride and bridegroom, surmounted by the crowns of the Royal Houses of England and Denmark. The corners are decorated with the Red Dragon of Wales in enamel and wreaths of oak leaves and acorns entwined with mistletoe.

"The Prince of Wales graciously acknowledged the present on behalf of his daughter, and expressed the greatest gratification with the continued kindness and loyalty of the people of Wales and the pleasure they had in visiting the Principality. Sir George Osborne Morgan, the Hon. Hanbury Tracey, Mr. Milbank, M.P., the Arch Druid, and other members of the deputation were then formally presented. The little Prince was a great attraction, and his grandfather, the Prince of Wales, informed the party that he was always called David."

PROGRESS OF THE CAUSE.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I am making time to report to the readers of the BANNER something of the work which it has pleased God to enable us to do during the year 1896 up to the present date. Not that my year's work is done, as the autumn is often an important time. During the first quarter of the year I gave six addresses in the country chapels and two in local mission halls. During the second quarter I gave six addresses in country chapels, three in Carlton Hill Mission Hall, one at Worthing, one in Hyde-park, and thirteen on Brighton beach, distributing an enormous quantity of literature in all these places, and causing a considerable amount of interest to be stirred up. During July I worked in the country, in Hyde-park, St. Leonard's, and Brighton, having given no less than sixteen addresses during the month.

Among other pleasures with which August has opened, I received an invitation to lecture at Mrs. Seaman's boarding-house, 117, Marine Parade. This Christian lady has become very interested in the subject, and it was a great pleasure to me to go and lecture and sell seven "Handbooks." May it please God to abundantly bless Mrs. Seaman, and may many receive the "light" in her house.

Mr. Mackworth has reported concerning the Hyde-park meetings, but he omitted to state what a splendid banner he had made and fixed on a pole, which stood well over the head of the speaker, and how he himself left no stone unturned to make the meetings as successful as possible. The first afternoon we had three decided Christian opponents, but after their first warming they stood aloof. Of course, their opposition was limited to the usual stock-in-trade text (Gal. iii. 26) and logic, which is all well-exposed in Mr. J. G. Taylor's "New Testament Truth on the Anglo-Israel Controversy," a pamphlet which all aspirants to open-air advocacy would do well to commit to memory. Several Jews listened with great attention; one stood at my elbow a whole afternoon, as though he would not lose a word, and was the first to buy a "Handbook." I beg to thank all the friends who kindly sent literature for our London meetings. Mr. Mackworth has doubtless written to them all, but my time is so fully occupied, they will excuse me from writing to thank them personally; besides which, I do not know whom the different parcels came from; but we had a good supply with what Miss Rush sent, and what I sent up from Brighton.

Several friends have asked me what I would charge to go and lecture in their localities, and they speak as though the cost keeps them back from doing something for this cause. I think it is time that friends in other towns and villages knew that I charge nothing; and if they will only communicate with me, and help to get up the meetings, either indoors or out, I will see that they suffer no personal loss. The British-Israel Association and other friends will back me up if we can only find the doors open for meetings. The first thing is to find the room, as winter will soon be upon us—church, chapel, or mission hall, wherever they are willing to accept of our services. This only applies to the south of England, as I can only pay flying visits. I may mention that, when I have been absent from Brighton, my place has sometimes been taken by my friend Mrs. Richardson, who is an indefatigable "sower," and speaks fluently upon this subject.

So we can truly report progress, and praise the God of Israel. Yours faithfully, H. A. MARCHANT.

60, Upper Lewes-road, Brighton, Aug. 10, 1896.

P.S.—My report will be sent with list of subscriptions to be printed in January, 1897. I am just about to order another supply of literature for my autumn and winter work. "Handbooks" sell freely wherever I go.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—You will, no doubt, be pleased to hear that a few Anglo-Israelites residing in the Camberwell District, S.E., have met together for friendly intercourse, the outcome of the same being the unanimous desire for the following:—

1. That a Local Association should be established as soon as possible, for the purpose of providing periodical meetings, mutual intercourse, lectures, prayer, and study of the Identity question, and the promulgation of this grand and momentous truth.

2. To invite all British-Israelites resident in (or near to) Camberwell, Peckham, Dulwich, &c., to become members of this Association.

3. To intimate that it is proposed (D.V.), to hold a drawing-room meeting about Sept. 15, next, at which it is hoped that our good and esteemed friend, the Rev. Marcus Bergmann, will preside and give an address.

Several names have already been obtained, and any other Identity believers residing in the districts referred to are cordially requested to co-operate, and the undersigned will be pleased to receive and reply to communications on the subject.

Thanking you in anticipation, and with best wishes,

Believe me, dear Philo-Israel, yours faithfully,

HENRY G. LOCKE, Hon. Sec., pro. tem.

115, Choumert-road, Peckham, S.E., Aug. 22, 1896.

HERMANN WARSZAWIAK, during his preaching tour in America, publicly stated, "The two great nations of the world are the United States and England. These will be the victorious countries in the coming of Christ, because they have been kind to the Jews. I believe that the Anglo-Saxons are the Lost Tribes of Israel. It is positive to me, the Jews, two millions of the eight millions in the world, have come to you, and in the coming day they will say, 'Our brethren, we have come to you; we have found you; let us worship our God together.' I plead for your sympathy and prayers for our people." Addressing, by invitation, the ministers of Lincoln City, Nebraska, he urged the importance of the study of Hebrew, claiming that the time was coming when ministers would need a good knowledge of it. H. W. is a converted Polish Jew, who is head of the New York Mission to the Jews, and is collecting the necessary funds to build a synagogue for them. 73, Bible House, New York.

"BRITAIN'S POSITION, PRESENT AND FUTURE."

THE above is the general description of a lecture delivered in Adelaide, Australia, and published in the Adelaide Observer of April 26, 1896. The Australian friend who sent us the notice cut out of the paper, declares that the lecture cannot be termed even "Blind Evidence;" but we regard it as very remarkable evidence of our nation's Identity with the lost Ten Tribes, when it is known that the lecturer was no other than the late Edward Hine's opponent at the Exeter Hall discussion, some years ago, named Mr. Robert Roberts. The speaker boasted that in the three nights discussion he had proved the falsity of the Anglo-Israel "theory," since it was, in his opinion, an artificial and unscriptural invention. While he declared that the idea was untenable in character, he allowed that "England" was possessed of almost all the blessings we assign to her, as believers in Our Identity! We had these gifts, according to Mr. Robert Roberts, not because we were Israel, for we did not belong to that race, but because "we were the most Bible-honouring, and enlightened of the Gentile nations!" Where Mr. Roberts finds that statement in the four corners of the Word of God he has never stopped to explain. It is a pure invention of his own! It is not only not in the Book, but it is in direct contradiction to the Word and promises of God Himself! He, the Lord, allotted them all to Israel, His chosen people; but those who tell us that He gave them on any ground at all to one of the Gentile, non-Israelite nations, and that because they were the most enlightened and Bible-honouring of the Gentile races, has the burden of proving that idea from Scripture, and of showing us how such an assertion does not dishonour God, and make Him a liar (which God forbid)! In His Word we find that a nation such as that answering to the description of the British given by Mr. Roberts was distinctly indicated to be Israel. Before we proceed further, it is fair that the reader should see what Mr. Roberts himself said. It was this:—

BRITAIN'S POSITION, PRESENT AND FUTURE.

The series of free lectures by Mr. Robert Roberts are drawing to a close, the fifth having been delivered in the Trades Hall on Friday night, on "The greatness and maritime strength of the British Empire considered as an element in the political combination characterizing the end of the present dispensation." It was a significant fact that a cluster of small islands should exercise dominion over half the globe, and be "monarch of the deep." British ships everywhere outnumbered other nations ten to one. His contention in previous lectures was that "the present condition of the world had neared the events given by prophecy, and that a divine revolution was close upon the world." The question was whether such a state of affairs corresponded to the prophetical indications as regarding the situation of the "latter days." This was borne out by Scriptural quotations, which required that a maritime power of wide dominions situated in islands would figure in the restoration of Israel's nationality, as ancient Tyre figured in the establishment of the kingdom of Israel under David and Solomon. "Tarshish" was the name bequeathed to that power, and he traced it in its primitive applications, showing that every part of the surface of the globe to which it could be applied was under British rule. Britain was undoubtedly the tin islands of Greeks and Phœnecians, from which Tyre obtained her tin supply mentioned in Ezekiel xxvii. 12. Other passages were submitted to prove that after Britain had been humbled Britain would become the ally of the new kingdom of David, assisting in the restoration of the Jews (Isaiah lx. 9). The Anglo-Israel theory was false, being an artificial and unscriptural invention, and had been fully exposed in a debate between himself and the inventor in the Exeter Hall, London, for three nights. Such an idea was untenable in its character. England had been assigned a place in the latter-day prophecy, not as a part of Israel's race, to which she did not belong, but because she was the most Bible-honouring and enlightened of the Gentile nations. After being humbled she would submit to a new Constitution and new rulers at Christ's hand, and give up the dominion of the sea, but first the war of the great day of God Almighty would break all human governments of the world. Such facts as he had stated might appear to some fanatical, but if examined they would be judged to be found true, and he commended them as worthy of consideration by all, seeing that we were now in the time of the end and nearing the time of trouble such as never was.

Mr. Roberts here describes the British people as occupying the islands, as "dominating half the globe," and as being "monarch of the deep." Now in regard to the latter fact, no nation can be "monarch of the deep," in these last days (the period Mr. Roberts especially refers to in his lectures as a prophetic period about to witness a divine revolution), without being in the possession of "the Gate of their enemies." These are the many Gates of their many enemies (Gen. xxii. 17, R.V.). The Gates are the ports of their enemies; their stategic positions, giving dominion over their neighbouring land and seas (Psa. ix. 14; comp. Prayer Book Version). Our nation is the only one in possession of the Gates, and, therefore, is the mistress of the sea. But the Scriptures give these very things to Israel—namely, the dominion over half the globe, "the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven," the heirship of the world, and the supremacy of the sea (Gen. xxviii. 14; Dan. vii. 27; Rom. iv. 13; Gen. xxii. 17). All these, it will be seen from the Scriptures quoted, were gifts from on high to God's chosen people Israel.

Since the Scriptures require, according to Mr. Roberts, that a maritime people, like the British, should carry out the purposes of God, such people being situated in islands, we reply to him that the Scriptures distinctly indicate Israel to be the people God set apart, as islanders, with wide dominions to carry out His purposes of restoration of the children of Israel generally to the land of their promised inheritance. This appears from Isaiah xli. 1, et seq., and xlii. 4, where the contexts show that the Lord was describing Israel of the Isles as His servant, His chosen, the chief of nations, whom God helps and defends. In regard to the wideness of the dominions promised to Israel and to that people exclusively, in the Scriptures, we need only to refer to such a passage (beside those already noted) as Isa. liv. 2, 3, R.V., which clearly points to Israel: "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations; spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes. For thou shalt spread abroad on thy right hand, and on thy left, and thy seed shall possess the nations, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited."

Mr. Roberts maintains that the British Empire is the Tarshish of Scripture, and is the Gentile power destined to assist in the restoration of the Jews to their land! The lecturer was strangely ignorant of the Scriptural fact that the Jews are not to be restored alone, but that they will be restored and accompanied in their return by their own brethren of the House of Israel, called "Joseph," or "Ephraim," in the Scriptures. Many Scriptures assert the fact, and nothing whatever can be made of them but that—Jer. iii. 18, R.V., is one such. See also Hosea i. 11; Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28, &c.

When Jerusalem shall be called the throne of the Lord, and all nations shall be gathered to it to the name of the Lord to Jerusalem, "In those days the House of Judah, shall walk to (margin) the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers." Here is the return of only two peoples described. Israel and Judah together return, but no interference of a Gentile people like the British according to Mr. Roberts, is admissible. It would be a destruction of the promise and of the prophecy if it happened. The fact as stated by Mr. Roberts, however, is true enough. The British will indeed restore the Jews, and return, themselves with them to the land; but it will only be so because they are Israel, their stronger brethren. As the British are proved by hundreds of lines of proof to be the lost Ten Tribes, or the House of Israel, it is quite correct to say, as Mr. Roberts declares, that they will help the Jews to return. But he is wrong when he tells us that they will do so as a Gentile, Bible-honouring, and enlightened nation. Were it so the Bible could be proved to be false, and the prophecies unreliable. Mr. Roberts adopts apparently all our views respecting the British nation, and its future Scriptural destiny, in respect to the Jews, but endeavours to show that she will act Israel's part because she honours the Bible and is "enlightened." But where he finds in Scripture that Israel is ever to be superseded, or a Gentile nation is to take her place, he does not tell us. The report of his lecture is deficient in this respect. But were it otherwise, we are confident that he could not prove his case, or that our nation is such as it is, responding exactly to the prophecies, for any other reason than the rational one—namely, that she is Israel, and therefore, responds to all the promises and predictions of God concerning the House of Israel and the Jews. Let the British, therefore, being Israel, praise the Lord.

A.D. 1897, IN ITS RELATION TO PROPHECY.

By A. A. Bridgman
(Vicar of Lezayre, Isle of Man).

PART I.

"Prophecy! Hm! And do you mean to tell us at the end of this nineteenth century, that you are going to speak about that worn-out fable, prophecy?" Such a question as this is one that would probably be put by nine hundred and ninety-nine persons out of every thousand, and they would suppose they were saying something very smart and unanswerable. Well! notwithstanding the self-complaisant superciliousness, the contemptuous sneer, the scorn, or vexation with which the question might be put, my answer would be, Yes; because, when one considers the unbounded, the absolute ignorance of men on the subject of prophecy, who are well, and even thoroughly informed, on many and great subjects, there is no reason that can be assigned why one should not speak with positiveness about prophecy, seeing that it is not a matter of mere opinion, but one of demonstration; of demonstration as complete as that of a proposition of Euclid. Before speaking of A.D. 1897 in its relation to prophecy, I propose to say a word or two to shew that the above is not an empty boast, but a matter of fact.

In the first place, let me put a question to be answered quietly, and by every one to himself. If one of the weather prophets of the present day, who profess to foretell the general character of each month of the coming year, should, year after year, give a generally correct description of each month, would you not say, that he knew what he was talking about; that he had some solid ground to go upon; and that he was not merely making guesses, which now and then happened to be correct? You could not with truth say otherwise, and you would have no wish to say otherwise. Now, if a man 1,800 years ago, others more than 2,000 years, and one 2,500 years ago, foretold what would take place in these very days in which we are living, as well as trace out, very briefly, but quite correctly, the course of events which were to take place in a then far distant future; and if these events took place in the way that had been predicted, then let me ask another question. Why is a different rule to be adopted in regard to the acceptance of these predictions, from that given to the weather prophets, simply because they are given in the Bible? Why is their being found in the Bible at once assumed to be a proof of their absurdity, and a reason for their rejection? Yet this very absurd way of proceeding is almost universally adopted now with regard to the prophecies in the Bible. No doubt, men have a kind of pretext for rejecting the Bible prophecies, because rash interpreters have meddled over and over again with them, and brought them into disrepute by reckless assertions founded upon nothing but their own crude, unsupported opinion. If science had been tested only by the failures of scientific inquirers in their search for truth, science would not now be held in very high estimation of mankind at large. So it is with prophecy which has been tested only by the innumerable failures, and rash assertions of searches for the key, with which to open the symbolical language in which prophecy has been written; and because of these failures, prophecy has been foolishly derided; but when others have successfully interpreted prophecy, and have shewn the truth of their interpretations by its fulfilment in the way they had interpreted it, these proofs have been wilfully set aside, and men have attributed them to happy guesses, and fortuitous coincidences, forgetting that if they were happy guesses and fortuitous coincidences they would be infinitely more improbable, as could be easily shewn by applying to them what is known to mathematicians as the "Theory of Chances," than that men could predict more than 2,000 years ago what should happen, or that others could unlock their dark sayings couched in symbolical language as unintelligible to all others, as were the Egyptian hieroglyphics, until modern research had supplied a key, which has enabled hard-working enquirers to read them with facility. What has just been said can be easily proved to be true. Suppose, for instance, the case of the youngest child of a family of twelve. Then consider how few women are the mothers of so many children. Then ask how many such women are there out of ten thousand? What then was the chance, when the mother of those twelve children was born, that she should live to have twelve children? First, the chance has to be calculated of her living to the age; then, the chance of her having any children at all; and then again, that she should have twelve. Combine all these chances as the "Theory of Chances" teaches, and it will be seen that the chances against any newly-born female child's having twelve children are something stupendous. But these chances are absolutely as nothing to the chances against a man's predicting 2,000 years ago what has happened in my lifetime; nevertheless this has been done. In 1701, Robert Fleming, an English clergyman, published a book, in which he gave as an interpretation of Daniel's prophecies, that the papacy, or temporal power of the Pope, should be destroyed in 1848. Fleming wrote thus in 1701 in his "Rise and Fall of the Papacy:" "If we may suppose that Antichrist began his reign in the year 606, the additional one thousand two hundred and sixty years of his duration, were they Julian or ordinary years, would lead down to 1866 as the last period of the seven-headed monster. But seeing they are prophetical years only (of 360 days) we must cast away 18 years to bring them to the exact measure of time that the Spirit of God designs in this book. And thus the final period of the Papal usurpations (supposing that he did indeed rise in the year 606) must conclude with the year 1848." Barnes, the American commentator on Daniel, asks if this is to be "considered as merely a happy conjecture, the one successful one among thousands that have failed, or as the result of a proper calculation respecting the future. No one in comparing it with the events of the year 1848, when the Pope was driven from Rome, and when a popular government was established in the very seat of the Papal power, can fail to see that it is remarkable, considered as having been uttered a century and a half ago. Whether it is the correct calculation, and that temporary downfall of the Papal power is to be regarded as the first in a series of events, that will ultimately end in its destruction, time must determine." Time has determined. It was the first in a series of events ending in the destruction of the Papal power. The next event in order was the driving out of the Austrians from Lombardy, followed immediately by the overthrow of the duchies of Tuscany, Parma and Modena; as also by that of the Papal power in all its provinces except the small territory of the Patrimony of St. Peter secured for a time for the Pope by the bayonets of French troops. Then came Garibaldi's conquest of Sicily, and of the continental provinces of the King of Naples, all culminating in the unification of the kingdom of Italy, with the exception of Venetia, and of the territory held for the Pope by the French. After all this, the war between Austria and Prussia gave Venetia to the kingdom of Italy; and when at length Louis Napoleon challenged Germany to stake her territories on the left bank of the Rhine against Alsace-Lorraine, God declared against him, and his fall enabled the Italians to take possession of Rome, to depose the Pope, to place on His throne Victor Emmanuel as king of all Italy, and so to fulfil to the letter, and to the time, the prediction uttered by Daniel 2,500 years ago, as interpreted by Fleming more than 150 years before its fulfilment. And all this is a happy conjecture! Men say so, but may we not justly say, they talk bosh; still they say so. I have been told so several times, and always by very intelligent, highly educated men; but, who spake without reflection. Nay, one said, "If we may make ducks and drakes of dates in this way, we might so manipulate them, as to prove anything we pleased." Yes! if we were speaking after the predicted events had taken place. The objection would in such a case be a fair one, and would need to be shewn to be inapplicable in the given instance. But when the prophecy has been made more than 2,000 years, and the interpretation has been given nearly 150 years before the predicted event takes place, the objection can only be designated as silly, for what man ever lived, who, uninspired of God, could tell what was to happen more than 2,000 years afterwards; or what man could interpret any but a divinely inspired document, so as to say it meant that a certain event would happen 150 years afterwards; and both prophet and interpreter should be correct as to the event and to the time at which it should take place? Let anyone try his skill by foretelling some most improbable event shall happen in exactly a month, or a week, from to-day; it would need a very fortuitous coincidence to make his words come true; but 2,000 years, or 150 years, bah! it is only talking drivel to speak of fortuitous coincidence after such lapses of time.

In this first part I have confined myself to shewing there is no à priori reason why prophecy should not be true, and the interpretation of it correct. In next week's continuation I shall endeavour to shew the connection between 1897 and prophecy.

THE NATIONAL RIGHTEOUSNESS OF ISRAEL.

By the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

This is admittedly a difficult subject, and one upon which much indefinite thought exists even amongst those who recognise its existence. In Isa. liv. 17 it was foretold that recovenanted Israel, the once barren and desolate, the firstfruits of the travail of Messiah, should receive from the Lord of hosts, the Redeemer and Holy One of Israel, a "righteousness which is of Me," saith the Lord. Because of this, "My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee." This is a position promised to one nation, a national righteousness granted to Israel. We ask, What does it mean?

There are extreme statements made in reply. On the one hand it is supposed that national righteousness is the resultant of the collective right doing or justice of each member of the body politic; on the other, that it is the endowment of a favoured people, apart from right doing. Our object now is to endeavour to ascertain wherein the truth that may be found in each statement can be separated from error, and, as far as possible, to learn what may be the revealed will of God.

Under the Old Testament dispensation God dealt with the nation which He formed to be the exemplar of His rule in such a way that great principles were defined. There were periods when the nation was righteous in the sight of God, and when national prosperity and peace was given. This national righteousness was not the resultant from the absolute individual right doing of every member of the community; and yet the continued wrong doing of the community often culminated in producing a state of national unrighteousness which brought sore distress. Where is the boundary-line which, when crossed, caused the nation, as a whole, to be unrighteous and subject to punishment? To answer this, we must ascertain what was required of the nation in order that it should be reckoned righteous; and then, when and under what circumstances the sin of individuals was reckoned to be the sin of the nation.

The first requirement was the legal recognition of national covenant with God. This was acknowledged and maintained by the practice of the initiatory rite of circumcision, which by the admission of each unit brought the whole body into the Abrahamic covenant.

The next was, that the governing power, whether patriarch, judge, or king, should worship the Lord God of Israel and Him only; obey His holy law; and by example, as well as enactment, maintain truth and justice between man and man.

The third requirement was the national obedience to the ordinances of sacrificial worship. (There were certain ordinances which were expressly national in their character, as, for instance, the ceremonies of the great day of atonement.) Individual wrong doing caused the nation to become inimical to punishment, only when it was sanctioned by the sin-produced inability of the State to suppress it, and by the general connivance which fostered it. Then it was when the prophets prophesied falsely, and the priests bare rule by their means, and the people loved to have it so, the sinful acts of the ruling powers, of the religious teachers, and of the people, produced the position of national unrighteousness and the national punishments that followed.

As the wrong doing of individuals did not in itself produce national unrighteousness, so also the right doing or justice of individuals did not avert calamity when the nation became unrighteous. The seven thousand whom God foretold would not bow the knee to Baal, shared the miseries of the Assyrian deportation. Then, as now, national mercies and national judgments, come like the rain upon the just and the unjust. And hereby is evidenced the fact that in the government of God there is such a thing as national righteousness and national unrighteousness, as apart from the acts of the units which make up the nation.

There are many instances where the act of the king is regarded as the act of the nation—e.g., when David sinned, and a national judgment fell, he said, "These sheep, what have they done? let Thy hand be on me, and on my father's house." Then, also, the king's act procured pardon for the people by the sacrifice offered upon the threshing-floor of Ornan; and the energies of the State being directed towards the preparation for the temple, we find that during the later years of David's reign and the earlier years of King Solomon, the nation was righteous in the sight of God, and the peace and prosperity which blessed the whole community evidenced as well as resulted from the national position.

There are instances in which the ruling house was judged, while the people were not involved. And again, when the people or the priests suffered, while the king was personally unaffected. But, nevertheless, the broad outline of God's will, as revealed in the earlier history of Israel and Judah, manifests the recognition of the positions of national righteousness, and of national unrighteousness.

Under the Christian dispensation we must expect to see the same judgment applied, the requirements for national righteousness being the same:—

1st—The State and legal recognition of national covenant with God, by the acknowledgment of the Christian faith, the practice of the initiatory rite, and the legal observance of the ten laws.

2nd—The public and national acknowledgment of fealty to God by rulers and people.

3rd—The effort to maintain truth and justice by purity in the administration of just law, both civil and international.

But the new covenant gives to Israel, when Christian, and to Judah, when brought under it, a gift of national righteousness which is of God. This does not clash with the requirements just stated, but is the cause of their existence. It is based upon the principle under which the nation was looked upon in their king. Israel is nationally re-covenanted in Christ Jesus the Lord, and this re-covenanting is through the redemption wrought by Him, and is the efficient cause of her Christianity and national acceptance. We repeat that British-Israel's Christianity is not the cause of her re-covenanting, but that her re-covenanting is the cause that brought the grace of faith to her. Her righteousness is of God, because she is accepted in Him, who "visited and redeemed His people." But this primary cause does not make unnecessary the requirements beforementioned, rather they become imperative because of it, and their observance obtains the sanction, which is of the new and not of the old. The nation is to follow after right doing, because she is re-covenanted and righteous in the sight of God, and accepted in her King, and not in order to obtain or retain that position. The laws of what I may call the kingdom of God's grace in the world, as existing in the universal Church, apply to His grace to His firstborn nation, Ephraim-Israel; and if any would deny the gift of national righteousness in the Messiah, they must also deny the possibility of the reckoning of a righteous position to any in Christ.

It may be objected, What about the status of other Christian nations? Is there this national righteousness for them? It is plainly revealed that all of every race who are in Christ are righteous and accepted in Him, and not for their own works or deservings; but we cannot be wise above what is written, and in reply, I ask for any statement, or promise, or prophecy, which gives to any but Israel this national grant: "Their righteousness is of Me, saith the Lord;" for "this is the heritage of the servants of the Lord," even the once barren and desolate, but now redeemed and re-betrothed, according to that glorious 54th chapter of Isaiah.

A practical conclusion follows. That the efficient means whereby national right doing is to be maintained is by a knowledge of our national position. That the effort to maintain what is right in the State will be prompted by the right motive, and therefore be effectual, when each member of the body knows his or her true position as a member of "the covenant people." That a true worship will be maintained in the Church when we know that we are Israel, and not Gentile; a natural branch, and not a graft.

The knowledge of the national re-covenanted position in Christ, the King of Israel, will be the means whereby, as never hitherto, national and personal right doing and service will be produced, and at the same time, necessarily, the efficient cause from which we learn that we continue to be accepted, not because of our own worthiness, but only because of the grace which has been given to us through the righteousness of the Righteous One, in whom nationally, as well as individually, we stand. Thus, the knowledge of the Identity of our race with Israel must tend to the glory of the Redeemer, and the national right doing of the State.

NOTE.—Although I have referred to but one passage, perhaps it may be well to state that it is not unsupported. The new covenant mentioned in xxxi. Jer. 34, and Heb. viii. 10, &c., is, firstly, the cause of the national standing in Christ, and secondly, the means whereby it will be brought about that every individual in that nation will know God, from the least to the greatest.

A TESTIMONY FROM BOSCOMBE.

OUR friend, Mr. J. J. Snow, when leaving Boscombe recently, became possessed of a copy of "Trew's Guide" to the place, and was very much surprised, and yet gratified, to read the following on pp. 25 and 26. Whether the writer was a "British-Israelite" by conviction we cannot say, but it seems probable, since he distinctly states his conviction that "the Ten Tribes of Israel came to this country," and landed at or by Aggleston, near Boscombe, before migrating to Stonehenge:—

"From here we will make our way across the downs or common to Aggleston, or the traditional Devil's Night-cap; a curiosity which should not be missed. It is an inverted pyramid, cut out of a solid block of iron-stone, on the top of a barrow or mound, about 80 feet in circumference and 70 feet above the level of the ground. There are many absurd theories as to its origin; one thing we may be assured of is, that it was a work of great magnitude, and therefore of significant importance to its designers. The most general belief is that it was a 'Druidical Altar,' and that its name is derived from the Saxon 'Haelig,' holy, and 'Stan,' a stone, or 'Hyleg,' giver of life, or the Greek 'Helios,' entering into the light of the sun. Each and all these derivations may be right when we consider that the Druids were learned both in astronomy and astrology: they were the priests of the ancient Britons, the pioneers of the Ten Tribes of Israel who came to this country; this was their first landing-place; from here they migrated to Stonehenge, therefore it is just as reasonable to suppose that this inverted pyramid was used for astronomical purposes and to commemorate their landing, as that it was used as an altar of sacrifice. This monument of antiquity must at least be about 3,600 years old.

"The scene from this spot at sunrise is magnificent. As the sun pours his rays across the sea it flashes upon this altar of stone, and everything in and around is enshrouded in a sea of glory."

Of course the guide must be a good deal out in its dates to suppose that the Druids, as the pioneers of the Ten Tribes, were the builders of this "inverted pyramid" 1800 B.C., or 3,600 years ago. However that may be, the writer in the guide boldly asserts that the Ten Tribes of Israel "came to this country," and this is the point which strikes one as remarkable, for it is true!

SCRAPS.

FORWARDED BY L. P.

THE following paragraph is from the St. James's Gazette of a few days ago:—

"Last week there was sold at Christie's (says the Builder) the reputed lock and key (of brass and steel) of the Star Chamber, Westminster Palace, being the King's judicial court, which was abolished by Statute 17, Charles I. The chamber stood at the north-east end of the hall, and was built temp. Elizabeth. Over the doorway were carved 'E. R.,' an open rose on a star, and '1602.' The original decoration of the oak ceiling is by some supposed to have given the court its distinctive name. By another account, 'Star' is a corruption of the Hebrew 'Shtaroth'—the contracts or agreements, for the greater part of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, entered into between Jews and Christians, which the parties were required to deposit in the then Court of Exchequer. The deeds were executed in triplicate, so that the third copy might be kept there; the King taking a silver 'besant' (about two shillings) for each pound of every sum that passed under the deeds. Similar repositories were established in provincial towns; but we understand that the only Shtaroth that have been preserved are some of those originally deposited at Westminster. The Star Chamber and Exchequer buildings were finally pulled down in 1836."

In an article signed "H. T. M." in the August number of the Sunday at Home, he says: "Before the year 1840 I was employed in a shipbroker's office in an old seaport on the east coast of England. . . . One item in Lloyds' List used to interest and puzzle me at first; it read something like this: 'Sailed on the 4th inst., H.M.S. Meanaer, with supplies for the Homeward Bound.' I asked my grandfather the meaning of these words; and he told me that, when easterly winds prevailed, dull sailing ships felt it hard to get hold of the land in the chops of the Channel, and the Government kindly sent supplies of bread, water, roots, &c., to supply any who were in need. These were the days of sailing ships. . . . These merciful trips of British men-of-war are, we believe, unrivalled in the history of the navies of the world."

I remember, some—I might almost say many—years ago, it was suggested by an Identity writer that Nahum ii. 3 referred, in its chariots and shaken fir-trees, to our railroads and trains. I see, by an article signed "H. H. Pain," in the last number of the Covenant People, that he takes the same view of the prophetic passage. May I now suggest that the proposed motor carriages for town and country are referred to in ver. 4? I note the following advertisement in the Times of the 3rd inst.:—

"Last day but eleven of the International Exhibition of Motors, 'Horseless' Carriages, &c. Gas and Oil Driving Engines in Action. Display of Motor 'Horseless' Carriages and Cycles in Operation."

If the horseless vehicles increase with anything like the rapidity of cycles during the last year or two, we may well believe "the chariots shall rage in the streets, and shall justle one against another in the broad ways."

It appears to me that some writers in the newspapers are trembling with alarm as they announce their belief that Great Britain is being "isolated." They do not imagine how this very probable circumstance is calculated to cause joy, not fear, to the believers in Our Identity; for Israel, it was prophesied in Num. xxiii. 9, was to "dwell alone." Therefore, shall it not be well if other nations are led to force this our destiny upon us?

These timid writers doubtless feel, if we are isolated, then every Western nation envying and hating us, uniting together, will rise up and crush us into helplessness and obscurity. Do these fearful ones believe what someone said, that, if all the world was against him, but God was on his side, he had a majority of one? And if this be true of an individual, it is assuredly true of a nation.

ANGLO-ISRAELISM.

Some Reasons Against the Assumption that the British Nation Represents the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel.

Being a Reply to Certain Writings of Those Putting Forth that Claim, Addressed to a Christian who had Lent the Author Some of their Books.

"1. The raising of the question appears to be a snare of Satan to bring about confusion in the Church of God.

"2. It places a wrong object before the soul.

"3. It places a wrong hope before the Church.

"4. It is an attempt to claim in this dispensation blessings from God by another way (see John x.)—the way of the fleshly seed of Abraham—earthly blessings, too, in earthly places; instead of blessings through faith in Christ—heavenly blessings in heavenly places (see 1 Pet. i. and 1 Ephes. i., and contrast Deut. xxviii.

"5. It is an attempt to substitute the British nation for the Church of God!

"6. It is a substitution of the British nation for Christ! Thus, for the Seed possessing the Gate of His enemies (Gen. xxii. 17), which is Christ (see Gal. iii. 16, where the apostle distinctly calls attention to the fact that it is 'Seed,' not 'Seeds'), this new error says it is 'Seeds,' and alters the word 'Gate' to 'Gates,' thus putting England blasphemously in the place of Christ.

"7. It is to confuse the present dispensation of grace, which is a calling out of Jew and out of Gentile a people for His name—the assembly of God, the body of Christ, the heavenly Bride, with the House of Israel as Israel, which is restoration to their land and earthly kingdom (see e.g. Acts i. 6—8), both of which will be fulfilled after the Lord Jesus Christ has taken His Church to the heavens. He will then come to the earth with His saints and establish His earthly kingdom, and then will Israel be the head and the nations will be the tail. It is thus a deliberate attempt to cheat the Lord and to cheat His people out of the enjoyment of their heavenly blessings in Him.

"8. It is an attempt to prove that, apart from the atonement of Christ, earthly blessings can be inherited by fleshly Israel, which is a lie of Satan (that this is so, see e.g. Isa. liii. and Zech. xii., xiii.).

"9. It is a blasphemy to seek to apply to the British nation the Scriptures which can only be applied to Christ. So likewise with those Scriptures which alone appertain to the believer in Him: to apply them to the British nation is blasphemy. To call the British nation 'the elect,' 'chosen of God,' 'peculiar people,' 'royal priesthood,' whereas these words are only applied to the saved souls now in this dispensation, is indeed a lie of Satan. It is on a par indeed with the sin of Korah when he said all the congregation were holy and aspired to the priesthood.

"10. The utmost which would result were all the statements proved (which they are not)—namely, that the ancient settlers in Britain were of Israelitish origin—would only amount to this, that in England, as in other places, there are those having Jewish blood in their veins.

"11. If this even were so, how comes it that circumcision is unknown amongst them? And the Passover? And how comes it that the Feast of Purim is likewise unknown?—a feast which was to last for all the Jews' generations?

"12. The word 'Saxon' comes not from 'Isaac,' I believe, but from the Latin word Saxum, a rock—perhaps because they were originally a people from the mountains, or because it described their hard and fierce nature.

"13. Finally, to listen to such teachings as these is to turn away one's ears from the TRUTH, and to have them turned unto FABLES.

"Read John xiv. 2, 3; there it is THE FATHER'S HOUSE, not the land of Palestine, our eyes are directed to, and the Lord Himself, not earthly blessings, we are to have before us.

"P.S.—It may be added that it is a presentation of the wrong ground of acceptance with God (see Rom. iii. 9, 19; note, too, Matt. xii. 48—50). Even when Israel after the flesh are restored to their land, it will be only on the ground of the atonement of Christ, the true Joseph, the true Lion of the tribe of Judah, too (see Rev. v.). It is only through redemption, and that of blood. We find from Luke xxiv. 21 and other Scriptures that the root error of the Jews (Israel) was that the Messiah would redeem Israel apart from death and resurrection by His incarnation. The Lord calls all such who thus are mistaken 'Fools, and slow of heart' to believe all that the prophets have spoken. Death and resurrection were necessary before Israel could be redeemed. Note the use, too, of the word 'Israel' in this verse: 'We trusted that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel.' This, too, is pretty well a universal error in Christendom of to-day—redemption without blood.

The foregoing is a little list of objections to our BANNER views which comes to us all the way from New Zealand, with the request on the part of the sender (a British-Israelite believer) that the objections might be answered. The writer of the leaflet is said to be one of the Plymouth Brethren, whose objections to the Identity we have often had to encounter, and who, fighting as they do on an entirely different plain from ourselves, are hard to persuade, because they misunderstand our subject and refuse to see the scriptural distinction existing to-day between Israel and Judah, the two Houses by which prophecy describes the children of Israel in these our last days.

In regard to Notes 1, 2, and 3, we are, of course, quite unable to meet our opponent, because he does not definitely state his objections, but deals in generalities. Our subject, he says, "appears to be a snare of Satan" to bring confusion into the Church of God, that "it presents a wrong object before the soul," and "a wrong hope before the Church."

Now, we present no object before the soul or before the Church in respect to salvation, because our subject does not touch the one or the other, the former or the latter. We hold that salvation is wrought out for every saved individual by the precious blood of the crucified Son of God, who is God the Son, and without that blood and the atonement founded on it, there could be no salvation and no blessing either for Israel, Judah, or Manasseh. We point out that God promised to the fleshly seed of Abraham certain earthly and spiritual blessings which were to come to them through the one "Seed" ("Christ"), and that in the hand of Christ as the fruit of the atonement, and of the shedding of His blood, those blessings have been given to the British people, whom therefore we recognise to be the House of Israel, once "lost," now "found." These blessings come to us by promise and grace, and through faith in Christ, earthly blessings in earthly places and heavenly blessings in heavenly places, in order that we may dispense the latter to all nations, according to Gen. xxii. 18 and Isa. xxvii. 6.

In regard to Notes Nos. 4 and 5, no one can justly accuse us "of attempting to substitute the British nation for the Church of God," or "the British nation for Christ." The latter statement is particularly monstrous. It has not a shred of proof to support it, and the opponent (G.W.C.) wisely produces none.

In regard to the promise of "the Gate of his enemies" in Gen. xxii. 17, it is true that St. Paul in Gal. iii. 16 teaches us that "to Abraham were the promises made, and to his seed. He saith not 'and to seeds,' as of many, but as of one, 'and to thy seed,' which is Christ."

No doubt all the promises of God to Abraham were given into the hand of the Mediator, and till He appeared, and bled and died, the promises could not become vital. Therefore they were dormant, as far as the great mass of them were concerned, till Christ came and gave them out of His own and of His Father's fulness. So St. Paul, too, teaches us in Rom. xv. 8 (R.V.): "Christ hath been made a Minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, that He might confirm the promises given unto the fathers, and that the nations (Gentiles) might glorify God for His mercy." But when the Seed came He gave forth the promised blessings, and those were meant not only for Abraham, but for "his seed after him," who were to be not like Christ—one—but like the stars of heaven, the dust of the earth, and like the sand which is upon the sea shore, for multitude. Hence the promise was Abraham's development into "a nation," "a great and mighty nation," which the Seed (Christ) was not; also a seed "possessing the Gate of their enemies." The enemies were many, and the Hebrew idiom allows—nay, demands—the meaning that as each enemy had "a Gate," and there were many of these enemies, their several Gate or Gates should be in possession of that national, multitudinous seed. The Gates in this sense the Lord Jesus had not, and has not; but the British hold them because Christ confirmed this promise too, according to Rom. xv. 8 (R.V.), as a promise to Abraham.

Note No. 7 brings to our notice the objector's peculiar views. This, he says, is the time of "calling" out of Jews and calling out of Gentiles, a people for God's name, which is to be the body of Christ. By-and-bye the House of Israel as Israel will be restored to their land and earthly kingdom, &c., &c. The Lord is to have an earthly kingdom, and then Israel (meaning, we suppose, the Jews?) will be the head and the other nations the tail. All this seems to be an invention of the opponent's imagination, but we fail to see whence he derives it—certainly not from the Scriptures.

In what we hold regarding the present dominion of Ephraim-Israel, we see no attempt to "cheat the Lord," or to "cheat His people of the enjoyment of their heavenly blessings." Nay, we admit that Israel, now possessing some of the temporal promises, may, as regards the majority of her people, be without enjoyment of heavenly blessings. We cannot see, therefore, how our teaching is an attempt to "cheat the Lord" and "His people," as stated.

In regard to Note 8, we find our opponent, as usual, is quite unaware of the character of our belief. So far from alleging that earthly blessings can be inherited by fleshly Israel "apart from the atonement of Christ," it is in consequence of the atonement and sacrifice of our Lord, we believe Israel has become the heir of the promises and entitled to the earthly and spiritual blessings, both by grace and both by faith.

In reply to Note 9, we affirm that no one on our side "seeks to apply to the British nation the Scriptures which alone appertain to Christ" or "to the believer in Him." If we be held so to offend when we speak of the British (being Israel) as God's elect or "chosen ones," "His peculiar people," "the royal priesthood"—then we say that in Isa. xlv. 4 "Israel" is described as "God's elect," and, as He never changes, they must be His "elect" to-day (see also Isa. lxv. 9, 22).

Israel, the seed of Abraham, God's friend, were God's servant, and His chosen. These so described are not Christ, but the chief men of the earth, and, as God changes not, they are His chosen still. It is no sin to describe them as God does (see Isa. xli. 8, 9). So, in regard to the terms, "peculiar people" and "royal priesthood." These are Israel's God-given names, and they are so applied in 1 Pet. i. 9. Our objector has no right to object to our use of the terms applied to Israel, for God changes not.

No. 10 shows that our opponent has not yet learnt to distinguish Israel from Judah, since he speaks of British-Israelites, "the ancient settlers" in this land, as proofs that such "had Jewish blood in their veins."

In regard to Note 11, G. W. C. wants to know why circumcision has disappeared among us, if we be Israel? We reply that when Ephraim was cast out of the land for sin, and disinherited, they became God's "Lo-Ammi," no longer under the Mosaic covenant, cut off from circumcision and reduced to the condition of the Gentiles or nations. Under the circumstances, we would ask G. W. C. why he expects the rite to appear among those whom God had removed from the Mosaic covenant and reduced to the condition of outcasts? The Passover has gone, but it is revived under Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. As to the Feast of Purim, it had nothing at all to do with Ephraim of the House of Joseph, who had gone into captivity 212 years prior to the institution of the feast among the House of Judah (or the Jews exclusively). Our opponent's views are quite distorted by his ignorance of the scriptural distinction between Israel and the Jews.

With the post scripta of G. W. C. we have nothing to do. We quite agree that acceptance with God of Israel, Judah, or the non-Israelites, is wholly through the blood of the atonement; and that, as for G. W. C., he knows really nothing of our views, but is beating the air. Redemption without blood is what we abhor. We as Israelites are saved only by blood, and that of Jesus Christ, our divine Lord, as we said before and now solemnly repeat.

Reviews.

What is Great Britain doing for God's glory, and why is she called to this work, more than other nations? No. 1 of a series of six tracts, by J. Wesly Rigby. Price 1d. each. 3, Plymouth Avenue, Longsight, Manchester.

THIS is the first of a series of six tractates by Mr. J. Wesly Rigby. The following numbers are to be on the subjects stated—namely,

No. 2. "Abraham and His Call."
No. 3. "Britain and Her Bible."
No. 4. "Britain and Her Foundation."
No. 5. "Britain and Prophecy."
No. 6. "The Times and the Seasons."

The author has an ambitious programme, and, no doubt, he is on the right path. But we wish he had given a little more care and time to the composition of his work, and been a little more exact regarding the conclusions he draws from his premises. The pages abound with "therefores," but the reasoning, being insufficiently set out, the mind is left in confusion when invited to come to the conclusions stated. We quote a couple of instances by way of example. On p. 11, after referring to 2 Sam. vii. 10, our author remarks, "The place where God plants His empire is not Palestine, therefore the place God has ordained for His people is these Islands of Great Britain. Therefore His people Israel are called the British people; a new name as well as a new place." Another kind of mistake appears on p. 13, where it is stated that "the term Jew was given to Judah when in captivity, being only the abbreviated term for Judah." We do not find from 1 Kings xvi. 6 that the Jews were in captivity when the Scriptures first describe them by that name (B.C. 742). Despite these blemishes there is good matter in the tractate in question, and the following quotations will, we think, justify our statement.

"We are Israel, whether we know it or not. No people can inherit the fulfilments of those promises, but Israel. Therefore, whether we like it or not, this heritage we now hold substantiates the fact that the British are the people of Israel, whose great and grand blessings are destined to reach all conditions of fallen humanity, which must be accomplished by the ministration of His people Israel. It is God's own appointed purpose to accomplish His own appointed good will to all men, by His own appointed people of Israel. This is the great secret why Great Britain devotes so much of her vast, unbounded resources of power, and wealth, and knowledge, with which God hath endowed her, to promote her great, high, and responsible calling, for the good of the world and God's glory. Britain will never share the sad fate of great and mighty empires who have risen up in every age on this earth, but who have successively fallen, and crumbled to atoms from their high pinnacle of grandeur and glory to which they aspired, living only to-day in paltry historic records. It is the glorious work for God to which Great Britain is divinely appointed and called to undertake, along with the fact of her Israelitish origin, which gives stability and integrity to our Empire, constituting the unalterable, immoveable firmness no other empire ever enjoyed; because our foundation is Israel, and our rock is Christ. Though wretched, poor, sinful, and lost, God found us, His lost Israel, and in redeeming love picked us up out of the miry clay, and established our goings on the foundation of a universal empire. If students of prophecy who study prophecy on the dark side, only opened their eyes, they would see the truth that we are from Israel, and then they would see the bright side of prophecy. Why should we be pestered with blind seers in this bright gospel day, and day of Israel's exaltation to a mighty empire, who never cease to teach pending judgments, hanging over our heads, to fall upon us, fixing date after date when terrible events will take place? Their dark prophecying never comes to pass, but undismayed in their dark hope, they refix dates again and again as if they were determined to make God's thoughts and ways to be like their thoughts and ways.

"God reveals Himself to men in prophecy that they may fashion themselves to His prophetic word, and not expect that God should fashion His word to men's dark ideas. Balaam could not curse Israel, because 'God had not seen iniquity in Jacob, nor perverseness in Israel' (Numb. xxiii. 21). But Balaam's dark ideas had, and so he presumed to make God believe they were a bad and wicked people. But God had not seen those things in Israel Balaam charged Israel with, therefore He could not curse Israel. Balaam lost the bribes promised to him; he went back defeated, cast down, and disappointed. Nevertheless, God made Balaam to bless Israel, and he exclaims, when the Spirit of God came upon him, 'How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel.' 'His seed shall be in many waters, and his King shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted.' 'He shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows.' 'Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee.' 'Out of Jacob shall come He that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city' (Numb. xxiv. 1, 5, 7, 8, 9, 19.) God sent His Spirit into Balaam, and made Balaam to bless Israel, and speak of what Israel would become in the latter days, of which the above are a few extracts.

"May God give His Spirit to British Balaamites, and make them prophecy the truth. It was money and gifts that made Balaam to err; it is the same that makes our teachers err; but, notwithstanding all these things, it hath pleased the Lord to bless us, and the time will be shortly when we shall all be righteous (Isa. lx. 21). The grand righteous future will be the grandest age of all ages. Respecting the grandeur of the coming righeous period, it will not be unbecoming to liken the mass of people of these days (who will not form in their minds the slightest conception of what a righteous period would be like) to a man going out before the dawn of day. Looking up, he sees the darkness of night; he moans in despair, 'Oh, dear! light will never come here," though he now sees dawning, deep down in the Eastern horizon, gleams of light; but he still complains, 'It's all down yonder, far away; it will never come here.' But to his surprise, he beholds its brightening approach until the whole firmament over his head becomes lit up with glorious daylight; he now stands ashamed of his stupid unbelief. So will it be with the people of these days when the righteous period sets in, for which the tribes of Israel are raised up, as God's servants, to work in the earth for His glory (Isa. xlix. 6—10). The glory of Him who said, 'As I live, the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord' (Numb. xiv. 21). Therefore, it is in Israel, and Israel only, that the door of mercy and salvation is wide open for the whole world to enter and be saved by Jesus Christ, who is an Israelite and in Israel, for ever to be a light to all races of peoples sitting in darkness. The light of Israel must be for ever in a real Israel, and never in a sham or surrogate Israel—people who are not the posterity of Abraham. That being so, it is in Israel the door of mercy is ever open, and the shining light for ever shines for sin-stricken humanity. It is in Israel the fire of Divine love is continually burning with unextinguishable flame; it is God's glory to save sinners and to raise the fallen; for this purpose God hath exalted Israel into a mighty empire, and it is for this purpose God and Israel are united to each other by an everlasting bond and contract of covenant to work, as God's people, to bring about the salvation of the world, and the time when God shall establish righteousness by abolishing the curse and the removal of evil; and when Satan shall be conquered, taken captive, and sealed up in his prison, and then universal righteousness will be set up. It was to this end that God made Abraham 'heir of the world' (Rom. iv. 13), and 'to him and his seed were the promises made' (Gal. iii. 16—18.) We are the children of Abraham, God's servant, and God is the Lord our God."

"The Squire's Manuscript: A Tale With a Purpose." By Agnes Evans-Lloyd, Chester; Phillipson and Golder, Eastgate Row, 1896.

THIS little volume is distinctly an Identity work, intended to teach the great truths we have at heart, under the guise of a story and a dialogue between a Christian gentleman and a native of India, who is not only a Brahmin pursuing his medical studies in Scotland, but owning the rather unbrahminical name of Meer Mahmoud Yung! The tale opens with a conversation between the young Brahmin student and his friend, Sir Dan Calvert, which, taking a religious turn, the Indian stated a difficulty in regard to the Christian religion and its divine book, which we are well acquainted with in the BANNER. "The Bible," said the Brahmin, "leads to unbelief in God!" "I have read in your Old Testament," he said, "of earthly blessings and promises of an earthly throne, but not one of these promises have I been able to trace as having been fulfilled. In fact the result of my Bible study has been to convince me that Christians are the most credulous set of people! Your God gives you one book full of earthly promises, of which you have not seen one fulfilled, and yet you receive from Him a second book which you say you believe in. If God had not fulfilled the earthly promises given in His first book, how can you believe He will fulfil the heavenly promises given in His second book? This, believe me, is the reason why there are so few following in Christ's steps." The Brahmin evinces through the story, a good knowledge of our Scriptures, and was quite prepared for the Identity lore which Sir Dan Calvert's uncle, Squire Forrester, poured out for his benefit, from a mind well stored with Israelite and British-Israelite knowledge.

In the conversation between Sir Dan, his uncle and the young Brahmin, the scriptural distinction between Israel and Judah was brought out very clearly.

Squire Forrester regarded the two houses as God's two witnesses. Seven tribes of the House of Israel, he thought, were addressed as the Seven Churches of the early chapters of the Revelation of St. John, Dan being then in Ireland, Simeon in England, and Benjamin a loan from God to Judah to act as a light in Jerusalem. If, according to Professor Totten, 215 years of Egyptian bondage were required besides 40 years of wanderings in the wilderness to fit Israel to rule a small territory like Palestine, "What limit, and what term of years shall one assign to fit the second witness Israel, God's instruments, to rule over the whole earth, her ultimate inheritance?"

In subsequent conversations, the question of the Israelitish promise of the Gate of their enemies came up for discussion, and Squire Forrester, in reply to the Brahmin, gave the following clear explanation of the matter (p. 27). Being asked how "the English nation" fulfil the Gate promise, the Squire said: "Well, this is one of the outlines that best encloses Great Britain. Spain does not belong to her, and yet she possesses Gibraltar, which is one of the Gates of Spain. Malta, one of the Gates of the Mediterranean; Aden, the Gate of the Persian Gulf; Cyprus, the Gate of Palestine; Hong Kong, one of the Gates of China; Quetta, the Gate of Afghanistan; Canada, which formerly belonged to France; Colombo, Burmah, Singapore, Fiji Islands, Falkland Islands, St. Helena, the West Indies, Bermuda, Mauritius, the Channel Islands, the Cape of Good Hope, one of the Gates of Africa, and endless Islands which serve her as coal stations, and Gates, in seas which do not belong to her." Well might the Brahmin exclaim "That is startling!" We have indicated sufficiently the character of the work Mrs. Evans-Lloyd has given us, and we think our readers will procure and read it without further recommendation from us. We were pleased to see a reference to the BANNER OF ISRAEL on p. 10, which we transfer to our pages as in duty bound. The Squire said to his nephew Sir Dan, "You have often seen me read the BANNER OF ISRAEL, but as you never asked me any questions about it, I thought it best to be silent."

"Oh! the BANNER OF ISRAEL, the periodical you receive every week, uncle Jack, I know! The articles in it about our Colonial Empire are most interesting. It was reading some of its pages that first stirred within me the wish to travel, but I am afraid I never read the religious articles. . . ." We are not sure that the Squire's policy of silence in regard to the Identity is of any avail? It left Sir Dan in ignorance, and if we follow his example there will, humanly speaking, be very little hope of the subject making its way in our nation! "Ye are my witnesses saith the Lord," and a witness to be of any use must needs speak and draw attention to the Master's message entrusted to him. Not by becoming a bore, whom men shun; but by leading up to the subject and judiciously introducing it to interested hearers, to spread the light and truth thereby.

There is, of course, a plot and a love story in the work we are dealing with. Sir Dan falls in love with and marries Sybil, one of Squire Forrester's wards, and in the evening of the marriage the Squire, whose manuscript on the Identity is the subject of the book, passes away in peace. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." The book on the whole, is well worth reading, and though we may not be able to accept all the author's statements in regard to Our Identity, we believe the teaching to be sound. With the following quotation from pp. 89 and 90 we conclude, wishing the authoress much success, and a wide sale. The words which follow are these, addressed by Sir Dan to his uncle. "Truly, uncle, the subject is full of possibilities, and shows forth the work of God's dealings with men in a marvellous manner. I have been much struck with what you have said just now about the Bible beginning and ending with the sons of Jacob. One cannot but feel that a nationality, about which the whole of such a book has been written, must in God's purpose, be intended to play a most important part in the destines of earth. I also understand that the fact of having this idea well fixed in your mind, would help you to trace more clearly the plan running through the Bible." Just so! The identity is the great testimony that God is faithful and true; also that Jesus Christ our Lord was the Minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made to the fathers of the Hebrew race (Rom. xv. 8, R.V.).

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I am very pleased to see the suggestion of the Rev. Idrisyn Jones, that it is time to make a forward move.

Ever since I thoroughly grasped British-Israelism my conscience seemed to tell me that it always was time for a forward move, unless we think it best to go forward like a crab, sideways. I wonder how the apostles would have got on if there had been a division of opinion among them as to whether it was time to move forward in proclaiming the glorious truth that Jesus Christ had risen from the dead!

Digitized by Google

Upwards of sixteen years ago, the Anglo-Israel Association sent three lecturers to Brighton, and I, at that time, thought they would not have come unless they had been convinced at that date that it was time for a forward move. If it was time sixteen years ago, surely it must be time now? But I found, even in those days, some who knew all about British-Israelism themselves, thought the time had not come to proclaim it publicly and make it known on the right hand and on the left. Their theory was that it had got to make its way quietly. There are a good many places where the "quietly" method has been tried, and stagnation is the result; and if you call attention to British-Israelism people say "What is that?" Previous to sixteen years ago, I had known of the subject for four or five years and believed it, but in a dazed kind of manner, never having met another believer in this glorious truth who knew or understood anything about it. At the first of the meetings in Brighton, sixteen years ago, I found myself seated beside an old friend with whom I was in constant communication. He said to me: "Do you believe in this subject?" "Yes, do you?" "Yes." "Well," said he, "why did'nt you tell me you did?" I said to him: "Why did'nt you tell me?" It is evident we had both believed strenuously in the "quietly" method. Are there not many who are doing exactly the same, and are hiding their light under a bushel rather than let it shine before men?

The newspaper idea is capital; only I think half a column at a time would be more likely to be well read and thought over than a full column. There is ample material in the daily account of current events from whence to draw strong points of Identity in their fulfilment of prophecy. I should say that one single text quoted in full would be of more value than fifty Scriptural references. This should never be omitted. To print the text in the column of a newspaper which contained the promises made unto the fathers, and ask the readers what nation is in possession, would, in my estimation, do a large amount of good; for I find by experience that large numbers of even Bible readers are oblivious of the fact that God ever made such promises!

Yours faithfully,
H. A. MARCHANT.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I send you a copy of our American paper, published in Denver, Colo., of which I, though living nearly two thousand miles away, have the honour of being the Honorary Associate Editor. The members of the "Society of the Ten Tribes" in Denver do the clerical and routine work, all of which is done solely for the sake of letting the light shine.

It is our only organ in America, and we hope it may do much good. After the 1st of September it will be an eight instead of a four page paper.

The cause is surely, if it may seem slowly, advancing in America. Our people over here like the terms "Anglo" and "Saxon-Israel," better than "British-Israel." These American Anglo-Israelites consider that Great Britain is no more "all Israel," than the Jewish nation or race were "all Israel." America, at least the United States, if not the "Lion's share," is certainly the Eagle's share. I speak of this because I wish to avoid all terms that would unnecessarily produce prejudice against our cause. The Hebrew problem is greater than Britain and America combined. It embraces "The Twelve Tribes that are scattered abroad," and therefore, of course, includes the Jews.

When I was a school boy, our vast regions of the West, Kansas, &c., were put down on the maps as the "Great American Desert that never could be inhabited." But the Anglo-Saxons have got there, and have made the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose, as the wonderful prophets of old foretold Israel should. For my part, I wish the same race of men might have, not only the disputed part of Venezuela, but all South America, that they might turn that portion of the Western Hemisphere into a garden also. We are doing it for New Zealand, Australia and Africa, and will eventually do it for the whole world.

The promise of the Old Testament and the New alike is, that the "meek shall inherit the earth." Abraham is "the heir of the world." We will get there as sure as the promises of God are true, and that is as sure as God is God.

I have gotten out the 5th Edition of my "Anglo-Israel," revised, enlarged, and, as I think, greatly improved. It has been my purpose and ambition to perfect this one book rather than to write many, feeling that one good book on the subject is worth a ship load of indifferent ones. I will send you a complimentary copy, as also a copy of the first issue of The Tribes, which we should feel honoured to have you notice.

Yours for the work,
T. ROSLING HOWLETT.

"YOUR BROTHER ISRAELITE."

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

SIR,—In my letter of the 31st ult., I brought forward several arguments in support of my statement that the modern Jews represent all the Twelve Tribes. Mr. H. H. Pain ignores them all, except those which I base on prophetic utterances. I do not concern myself in the present case with the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of prophecy, but with those historical data which it contains.

The historical standpoint of Zechariah ix. 11, and the allusions they contain, clearly point to a time when the Northern Kingdom still existed, that is, to a time antecedent to that of Zechariah by some 200 years. Assyria and Egypt are spoken of as mighty powers, and there is no allusion to Babylon. Tyre and Sidon are still at the height of their prosperity. Gaza has a king of her own. In the time of Zechariah all this had been changed. As regards the prayer Mr. Pain quotes, I do not see how it could prove that the Jews pray for some brethren of theirs. It is clear from the tenor of the prayer that the worshippers mean themselves, under the names of Israel, or Judah and Israel.—Yours obediently,

L. T.

Mr. H. H. Pain's reply:—

"YOUR BROTHER ISRAELITE."

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—May I trepass upon your space once more to reply to "L. T." The Northern Kingdom of the House of Israel, did not exist in the time of Zechariah, B.C. 520; for the simple reason that the people had been carried captive to Assyria by B.C. 721, and "were not a people" by 668 B.C., in accordance with the prophecy of Isaiah (chapter vii. 8).

Until "L. T." recognises the fundamental distinction, "that all Jews are Israelites, but not all Israelites are Jews"—in the same way that "all Kentish men are Englishmen, but not all Englishmen are Kentish men"—it will be as difficult for him to appreciate the distinction that exists in prophetical passages that apply to the House of Israel, and those that refer to the House of Judah, as it is for me to enter into an argument with him that the Jews do not represent all the Twelve Tribes of Israel. However, I am sorry to add that this confusion of thought exists in the mind of my own Clergy and people quite as much, apparently, as it does in that of "L. T." and some of the Jews.—Your brother Israelite,

H. H. PAIN.

THE RISING IN RHODESIA AND THE SLOW PROGRESS OF THE BRITISH.

FOR months the British public has been waiting for decisive news from Charterland, and daily scanning the papers to see if any impression had been made upon the rebellion in Matabeleland or in Mashonaland. Hitherto there has appeared to be nothing hopeful to record; though we have been thankful to find that in the perpetual conflict that has occurred success in each fight has been on the British side, but the enemy's loss has been also slight, and he has only made a rapid retreat to come on again at the first favourable opportunity. The rebels appear to be always ready to believe the most absurd reports as to British defeats, and in one recent case, reported in the papers of August 17th, to have credited the false statement that the British invaders had been utterly destroyed with exception of the native commissioners, Messrs. Taylor and Thomas. The incident was thus reported by a Reuter's cable on August 17:—

The Inyami Endhlovo regiment had also been threatening Mr. Thomas's fort for some time. They sent a woman in to the fort, and on hearing her story that her people wished to surrender Mr. Thomas gave her a pass to bring them in. She never returned, and prisoners who were afterwards captured stated that she was sent in to obtain information. The report she brought back to the Inyami Endhlovo regiment, said the prisoners, confirmed the four Guay impis in their belief that native Commissioners Taylor and Thomas were the only two whites left alive in Matabeleland.

Matters are not quite so bad as that! Many Europeans have been savagely murdered by the native rebels, who have proved to be quite a desperate enemy, not easily, crushed or discouraged. Many Europeans have been killed in the large number of skirmishes we have been engaged in with them; but the waste of European life has been well filled up by fresh Imperial troops from the Cape garrisons, from the Cape colonists who have volunteered for the service, and by the native Cape "Boys," who have fought bravely and well, in defence of British interests, life, and property. The success which God has hitherto granted us in our contests with our savage foes, has been discouraging for them, but cannot be so for us, even though success has not been decisive, because we have behind us the Abrahamic blessing of numbers innumerable, which, could the Matabele have realised, they would never have risen in rebellion, or calculated that their warfare had left but two white men alive to dispute the ground with them! So far back as the 18th August, the Times reported by "Reuter's special service," that "the situation was much clearer; that the majority of the natives were tired of fighting, but were still undecided about surrendering;" "that negotiations are proceeding in the Matoppo Hills between Mr. Cecil Rhodes and Inyanda;" that "the rebels in the Enkeldoorn district were tilling the ground, and returning stolen property, which they had looted a month ago," and that "the mining companies at Panhelanga, near Umtali, were resuming work." The plan of the British in the disturbed district seems to have been to give the enemy no rest; but wherever he was heard of to attack, cause him loss, and put him to flight. This may go on, of course, for some time; but when the natives realise that their white enemies are always increasing in numbers and their own side always losing, it is not in human nature to keep up the futile contest, which was hopeless for the savage from the first. We have had, of course, a lesson to learn from the late protracted rebellion in Charterland; but it is one which we suppose will not have to be taught us twice. No doubt we were over confident, and have not realised that it was God's purpose to give us the land, and that it was our duty so to govern it that He should be praised. We have had probably to learn to trust Him more than we have done, and to live in Chartered land cleaner lives than, from some accounts, some of our people have done. Or, as in the case of the Indian Mutinies, it may have been God's purpose, by means of that tremendous trouble, to teach our nation that the time was come to extend over the whole of India the direct government of His people Israel, and to cease to rule by Chartered Companies. It may be that in the present case also, the Lord would have us understand that Charterland must be administered by the direct authority of His people Israel, under the ruling of the Crown. However that may be, we have the promises of the Word to guide us, and these declare beyond doubt, that "Behold they shall surely gather together, but not by Me; whosoever shall gather together against thee, shall fall for thy sake" (Isa. liv. 15). Also in Isa. lx. 12, we have such a promise as this: "For the nation and kingdom which will not serve thee, shall perish, yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted." The Matabele refuse to serve us and they have gathered together against us to murder, to rob, to kill and to destroy, but they have not the Lord on their side, and therefore, they are destined "to fall for our sake," because the Lord is with us, and will yet cause this rebellion to be finally suppressed and bring back peace to the distracted land.

At the present moment the trouble which was once acute in the Transvaal against our race, by reason of Dr. Jameson's foolish raid, is still causing some anxiety. Because the Boers are building two strong forts to protect Pretoria, are importing Maxims, Krupp, and other guns of the quick-firing description; manifestly to use against the British, within and beyond the frontiers of the Transvaal. This may or may not mean serious effort to get rid of the British suzereignty; but the balance of opinion seems to be that President Kruger is a wise man, and will not proceed to extremities, but will remain at peace with his best friends, the House of Israel.

While we have our troubles in Rhodesia, and are suspicious how matters will yet go with us in the Transvaal, the French too are anxious about their own colonial empire, which is very large in extent, but yet does not seem to succeed. Their trouble, as we know, is connected with their shrinking population, or as some French writers are now trying to show, that it is because there is no law of primogeniture now in France, and there is no stress of want upon the younger members of their families to drive them to the colonies in order to build up their fortunes by settling there. The subject was mentioned in the Daily News of Aug. 14th last, thus:—

The theory of M. Jaurés is worth considering for a moment from another point of view. Why, while England succeeds, does France fail in colonisation—fail, that is, in the sense that she is unable to make full use of her colonies? The answer, of course, is—as we indicated the other day in dealing with the latest French census—because the French population is too stationary to necessitate any overflow. M. Mézières, the Academician, contributes to the "Temps" some interesting remarks on the subject. He finds the root of the evil in the French law of bequest:—

"We had once the genius of colonisation," he says. "Our younger sons created in the 17th and 18th centuries the finest colonies in the world—St. Domingo, Canada, and India, where the English have only trodden in our footsteps. The law of primogeniture no longer exists in France. We no longer have younger sons condemned to poverty, and thereby to the spirit of adventure. Each of our children has a right to an equal portion of his parent's fortune."

And as this distinguished writer finds the evil in equality of distribution, so he bases his hopes for the future on other causes which will counteract it and make the struggle for existence more severe:—

"This portion, which formerly sufficed for subsistence, is threatened by many reductions. In many families the lowering of the rate of interest and the greater cost of living render it insufficient. We catch glimpses of the moment when in our democratic society only those will be assured of the necessaries of life who win them by hard work. For the activities of the future, for so large a number of people who henceforth are sure to find living in France extremely difficult, what fresh ground is there save in the colonies? This question is now one of life or death. The immense colonial empire which we have won in several years would become for us a cause of ruin if we did not know how to use it. If individual initiative does not come to the rescue of this great effort of the mother country, we shall have shed the blood of our soldiers and spent our millions, not for ourselves, but for our rivals. Even in the domain which belongs to us, as may already be seen in certain parts of Indo-China, it is they who are being enriched at our expense."

These are interesting speculations, worthy of attention from all political thinkers. In France itself, it seems, objections are beginning to be felt to that law of bequest which Matthew Arnold used to extol as the one form of equality really worth having.

The Lord has our case and those of the French and all other nations in His own hand, and will guide us according to His promises, to His own glory. To Him be all the praise!

IF WE ARE WRONG, ARE THEY RIGHT?—A WORD TO OUR OPPONENTS.

By H. A. Marchant.

Many of us may have seen a cartoon in a comic paper: a man, finding his enemy had got up a tree, procured a saw and was determined to cut off the branch on which he was seated. But, foolishly, he sat with his back to the foe, not liking to look him in the face, with the result that when the branch gave way they both fell together.

Some of the opponents to our views imagine that we are "up a tree." I wonder whether they take into consideration that if such is the case, they are cutting us down after the above fashion; and if we fall, we both fall together. So it will be wise for them to consider what they are about before they attempt to do as a Brighton clergyman said he had done some time ago, "demolished British-Israelism by giving it a death-blow!" A short time ago I heard an Irishman in a railway carriage singing a song about Tommy Doolan's cat. Whatever they did to try and kill this wonderful cat, the chorus stated: "but he is still alive and fighting." And our opponents, including this clergyman of the South Coast, are realising day by day that British-Israelism is, after all, one of those questions which will not easily receive its quietus.

Our opponents fail to see that when we attack their interpretations of prophecy, we in reality establish the truth of God, and in no way destroy the foundations of our most holy faith. But, when they attack British-Israelism, suppose they succeed in proving that we are not Israel by history, ethnology, language, or any other learned and scientific method which they may choose to use against us, how do they stand after their success? We bring them to the Bible and say: "Let us take this book for the time being in the same way as we would take a scientific text-book, say on chemistry, and if in the teaching of chemistry, a so-called teacher would persist in maintaining that oxygen and hydrogen were one and the same, would it not be right to ask him where he found it so stated in the text-book? and would he not be called upon by those whom he professed to teach from that book, to teach what the book itself taught rather than his own fanciful notions? If we British-Israelites have made a mistake, and the British people should be proved to be not Israel, our opponents are, after all, wrong in calling the Ten Tribes Jews, and in telling us, as one famous Bible scholar tells the students of one of our leading colleges in his text-book ("Maclear's Old Testament History"), that the birthright was Judah's, and the privileges of the first-born were bestowed upon that tribe; whereas the Bible distinctly declares that the birthright was Joseph's. Ephraim, Joseph's son, is God's first-born (Jer. xxxi. 9). Independent altogether of the question whether Britain is or is not Israel, the Bible teaching should be given and not that of the learned professor. I am inclined to think that those who do not like British-Israelism can sometimes see that this is the only conclusion they can draw from sundry passages of holy writ, for upon one occasion when taking the chair at a Gospel Temperance meeting, I read for the opening chapter, Genesis xxii. I merely emphasized the fact that God had sworn with an oath that because Abraham had obeyed His voice and done that which was well pleasing to God by the obedience of his faith, He, the living God, would bless and multiply his descendants and give them the Gate of their enemies. Not a word did I say about England or any other nation in the world; and yet a missionary, who also occupied the platform, told a friend that I had preached British-Israelism! I told my friend to thank him for his testimony, for it proved to me that, much as he disliked it, he could see clearly that it was the only inference to be drawn from those very plain and simple passages of the Word of God. This same missionary was dreadfully shocked upon one occasion because a brother missionary had lent a Christian policeman, who was an ex-navy man, and had seen something of this world's Gates, a book called the "Geography of the Gates." "What had a policeman's soul," said he, "to do with geography?"

How strange, that the same man should see that the 22nd of Genesis was British-Israel! I verily believe our opponents are, many of them, persuaded that after all we are right, only they don't like to acknowledge themselves to have been wrong for so many years; but we British-Israelites have all had to come to that. We, one after another, have acknowledged that in the past we knew not the distinction between Israel and Judah, and that God had made Israel Lo-ammi, "not My people;" and that this same Lo-ammi people were to become as numerous as the sand of the sea-shore, having been brought back to God by the Gospel, and called "sons of the living God" (Hosea i.). One faithful missionary known to me, when he saw the truth, went to his people and said: "I have been teaching you wrong; we are not Gentiles in the ordinary acceptation of the term, but the Gentilised House of Israel; and now I must begin to learn and teach you better." It is not every man that can humble himself to this extent! and perhaps that is why the opposition has been so long continued. But if they will continue to oppose our views, let us ask them to consider whether they have ever taught the people in any of their sermons, books, or commentaries, what God has taught in His holy Word, of which they are told by God Himself that they are to "diminish not a word." Here, then, is God's story: "Abraham's seed should become a great and mighty nation, blessed and multiplied, and possessing the Gate of his enemies, because thou hast obeyed My voice."

The Lord appears to Isaac, Abraham's son, and says: "I will perform the oath which I sware to Abraham thy father, and I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven; and will give unto thy seed all these lands; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because that Abraham obeyed My voice, and kept My charge, My commandments, My statutes and My laws." On Jacob, God bestowed the birthright after Isaac; his mother's sons would bow down to him, as well as other nations and peoples, and a curse would come upon all who sought to curse Jacob, but a blessing upon those who blessed him. His seed would be as the dust of the earth and would spread abroad to the west, to the east, to the north, and to the south, and that multitudinous seed, joined to the one seed, Christ, would be the means of blessing all the families of the earth. And that wonderful spreading people were to be fruitful and multiply until they became a nation and "a company of nations" (Gen. xxxv. 11). We will not stop here, but enlarge upon the bestowal of the birthright upon the son who dreamt of the stars and of the sheaves, whose two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, were to "multiply in the midst of the earth as fishes do increase" (see margin); and Manasseh would become a great people, but his younger brother, Ephraim, whose name means fruitful, would become a multitude of nations, or the fulness of the Gentiles, whichever you like to translate it. There is an immense amount of Scripture to the above effect.

We ask our opponents, Is the above true, independent of British-Israelism? Do they teach those Scriptures to the people? If so, will they kindly refer us to the works wherein we may find the valuable information taught and not explained away? And, seeing that the above and much more to confirm it is the Word of God, what will they do with it if they demolish the idea that Britain is Israel? Can they not see that by dragging us down they fall with us? Whereas, if we prove that they have overlooked some of God's prophetic truth and thus misrepresented some parts of what God has said in His holy Word, we do but establish and confirm men in the holy faith of Christ. "But," some will say, "the new covenant superseded the old covenant." That is true, if they mean the Mosaic law; but the new covenant in no way abrogated the promises made unto the fathers. "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8). And have they never read that the promised mercy was none other than the oath which God sware unto our father Abraham? Therefore, the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ was none other than God's attesting seal to make these promises sure to those who are called "the seed of promise." And as we find both Old and New Testament agreeing that the law was not against the promises of God, we earnestly beseech those who oppose our views, based upon sacred Scripture, to consider what they say and do; for, if they succeeded—which we know it is impossible for them to do—they would themselves be landed in a dilemma from which there can be no escape. May the Lord Jesus open their eyes, for many of them know not what they do, but others kick against the goad and find it hard, but they are determined to keep on kicking whatever they suffer by so doing. May God have mercy on such, and show them a better way to serve Him who loved us so that He sent His beloved Son to seek and save that which was lost, even His lost sheep of the House of Israel. Bless God, all over our empire and America we are going forward. My wife has a dear Scotch friend in New Zealand. I quote from her last letter: "I told you the old Sutherlandshire wifie died. We had the husband, John, staying here. Tell Henry I was pleased to hear them say they were British-Israelites. Mr. S——, the minister, used to laugh at them, but old John said, 'Well, tell me where they are, or what other nation but Britain has inherited the promises.' Old John was here when the last BANNERS came out, and how he enjoyed them." Would that the minister who laughed had enjoyed them as this aged saint did; but laugh as they will, we laugh last and best, for on God's side we win. Praise and bless His holy name, He has remembered His holy covenant for ever.

THE PROTESTANT REFORMATION SOCIETY, LONDON.

WE are requested by the Rev. L. G. A. Roberts, Secretary of the above Society, to say that the sum of £1, as one of the results of a sermon he preached at St. Mary's, Stamford Brook, Shepherd's Bush, W., on Sunday, August 30th, has been duly received by him. The anonymous donor forwarded his contribution with the following remarks:—

"Forwarded by a believer in the Identity of the British people with the lost tribes of Ephraim-Israel, and of the Protestant Church founded here in apostolic times; who also believes that a knowledge of these facts is the best antidote both to Romanism, and Infidelity, as proving that God's promises to His people, being kept in this case, will be kept in all others." The preacher requests us to say that the Society he represents are thankful to the donor for his kind contribution.

We are glad to know that the Rev. Mr. Roberts is still interested in the subject of "The Hope of Israel," and sees the BANNER monthly. He has not as much time as he used to have when residing at Clifton, to devote to the study of the matter. He knows, however, as well as we do, that "the Protestant Reformation" is the very heart and soul of Our Identity, a fruit of it, and the divine consequence of our birthright; since He who is "the Father of Israel," His "firstborn," tells us that "He showeth His words unto Jacob, His statutes and His judgments unto Israel," that "He hath not so dealt with any nation, and as for His judgments they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord" (Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20, R.V.). The Protestant Reformation in this favoured land was a national change of attitude towards God and against Rome; and it is the only Land which abides in vigour and national strength in loyalty towards the Lord, and in antagonism, for His glory, to the false systems of the Church of Rome, now striving hard to regain the ground it lost 300 years ago. The Protestant Reformation Society is an embodiment of the witnessing functions of the British-Israelite nation, and we are glad to know that he who once was the treasurer and able supporter of the British and Clifton British-Israel Identity Association is now the secretary of so excellent an institution as the Protestant Reformation Society in London. Mr. Robert's official address is 62, Berner's-street, Oxford-street, London, W., that being the head quarters of "The Protestant Reformation Society."

THE enormous size of London is brought out by the fact stated by Lord James of Hereford, in introducing the Water Works Bill for the metropolis and surrounding districts. He states that the existing water works extend over 620 square miles; while the total rate of value of property within the area was forty-one and three-quarter millions, and that it was estimated that in thirty-five years' time the population would exceed eleven million.—Christian Million, March 26, 1896, p. 310.

A.D. 1897, IN ITS RELATION TO PROPHECY.

BY A. A. BRIDGMAN

(Vicar of Lezayre, Isle of Man).

I ENDEAVOURED in my first paper on this subject to shew, that there is no à priori reason why prophecy should not be true, or interpretation correct, since the former may have been inspired by God, and the key of its interpretation may also have been given; which proposition can only be denied by the assumption of imaginary infallibility on the part of him who denies it. I now propose to shew, in the first place, on what ground any year can be selected as one marked out by prophecy; and then how A.D. 1897 has been selected as a year so marked out.

Many interpreters have for some years past come to the conviction, that as time is and has been measured by two different, but natural standards—viz., the lunar year, and the solar year, and also arbitrarily by the calendar year of twelve months of thirty days each, it was a matter of importance to determine the standard, whether lunar, calendar, or solar, by which the years declared by prophecy were to be measured. We have seen that Fleming, by the rejection of solar years, and the substitution of what he called lunar years, but which were really calendar years of 360 days, calculated correctly the year of the first event of a series which led in 1870 to the predicted overthrow of the Pope's temporal sovereignty; while taking solar years as his standard he obtained as a result 1866, a critical year in the series which terminated four years later. Hence has arisen a theory which supposes that as the 2,520 years of the "times of the Gentiles" had a protracted beginning—that is, that the captivity of the people of Israel, Jews and Israelites, did not begin and end in one year, but was protracted through many years, so the termination of that period will be protracted through as many years as the period of the beginning was; and that if we take eventful years in the first period, each as a beginning, then by calculating in each case the predicted 2,520 years by the three standards of lunar, calendar, and solar years, we shall be led to nine years, three in each standard, in the period of the completion of the "times of the Gentiles," which will answer as distinct endings to the critical year of the beginning, from which we have started; and that these three years of the end will witness critical events in the decay and final destruction of the Roman Empire symbolised in Daniel's prophecy by the legs of the image of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which were made "of iron, and its feet part of iron and part of clay."

This decay and destruction affect the Papal power, and that of Turkey, into which two the old Roman Empire was divided, when the Pope obtained universal autocratic spiritual authority throughout its Western division; and the Turk obtained similar authority throughout the Eastern division, when the Mahommadan religion had risen to power in the East, after the Hegira; and, as it has been well said by the Rev. Dr. Hanan, "The steps in the rise and establishment mark the time for the steps in the decline and overthrow. . . . All of these steps are curious; some are of but little apparent value, but all point to the foreknowledge of the Lord God of Israel, and to His direct rule over the affairs of men;" that is, they all point to the truth of prophecy as contained in the Holy Scriptures, and therefore to the truth of these themselves; the doubts and sneers, the mockery and ridicule of men, learned or unlearned, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Why then has 1897 been selected as one of these critical years? Dr. Hanan might have added to the words I have just quoted, some are more than curious; they are most important, startling by their importance; and should the year A.D. 1897 prove to be a critical year, as it is pointed out to be by the facts, that—

"From the capture of Jerusalem by Omar, A.D. 637, 1,260 calendar years have brought us to the recent overthrow of Turkey by Russia; the Treaty of Berlin; the Anglo-Turkish convention as to Cyprus; and the English protectorate of Asia Minor; unquestionably a fresh stage in the downfall of the Mahommadan power, whose present head is Constantinople. We have not yet reached 1,260 solar years from the same date; they will run out in 1897;" then we shall have another overwhelming testimony to the correctness of the theory respecting the dates at which prophecy will be fulfilled; and thus an ever accumulating testimony to the truth of Holy Scripture will be afforded by prophecy in these "last days," the days so often spoken of in Scripture. But, supposing A.D. 1897 should prove to be the critical year it is expected to be, it by no means follows that it will usher in the termination of this age, the coming of our Lord in glory, or the resurrection of the dead. Assumptions respecting these future events have been frequently made, and have been as frequently shewn to be false by reason of their non-fulfilment, for it is the fulfilment of prophecy, which can alone prove the prophecy to have been inspired of God. Supposing, however, A.D. 1897 should not prove to be the critical year expected, what then? Just this. The theory, which has been sustained by so many fulfilments, will cease to be the unfailing guide in the fixing of prophetical dates, as it has hitherto been; and fresh investigation will be required to find the key that shall give us certainty in ascertaining what those dates shall be; but this is a question which time will now soon determine, for 1897, or the beginning of 1898, as the case may be, is close at hand. What, however, according to the theory, are we to expect when the time is come? Will it be some more final fall of Turkish power; or as some speculative writers suppose, the end of the age; or as those, who believe the Anglo-Saxon race to be the descendants of the lost Tribes of the House of Israel, that it points only to the end of the "times of the Gentiles"—that is, of the Gentile supremacy, which has reigned with scarcely a break in the Holy Land since the Jews were carried captive to Babylon, and also to the restoration of that land to its rightful owners, the representatives of the kingdom of Judah, and those of the kingdom of Israel; or to the first step to that event, so distinctly predicted by the prophets, especially by Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Hosea, as also by St. Paul, and by our Lord Himself?

The mention of the Anglo-Israel theory will raise a nearly universal smile of contempt and doubt. That goes without saying; but contempt determines no disputed question, and a theory that is spreading wherever the English language is spoken, in England, in America, in Australia, in South Africa, is something which contempt alone cannot hope to conquer, for unsupported opinion born of ignorance of the grounds on which a theory is built, cannot cope for ever with it, supported as it is by an ever-increasing amount of ascertained fact, and resting on strong probabilities, not on opinion; for opinion, which is only opinion, is of no greater value than an ounce of moonshine. It would, of course, be presumptuous to dogmatise, and say that this or that will happen as the result of what prophecy tells us will soon take place; that must be left to time to determine. This, however, is certain, that as Paley shews us in the first chapter of "The Evidences of Christianity," by reference to Suetonius and Tacitus, the Jews were persuaded that at the time our Lord came "some signal and greatly advantageous change was to be effected in the condition of their country by the agency of a long-promised messenger from heaven," so now for many years the expectation has been widely spread abroad that great changes predicted in the Scripture are about to take place, and which has been more and more pointed as time rolled on to 1897—8 as the time when the change would take place. And this expectation, based on prophecy, which has been growing stronger every year among those who have made prophecy their study, is now being shared by those to whom prophecy is a dead letter, as also by those who laugh it to scorn. The millions of armed men ready to be let loose at any moment; the vast naval preparations going on in all the so-called Christian lands; the social unrest everywhere; the political instability throughout Europe; an instability now shewing itself even in the hitherto immovable East, where Turks, panting for freedom are conspiring against the Sultan, which the Sheikvul Islam at Mecca preaches revolt among the Mahommadan pilgrims collected from all parts of the Mahommadan world, and bids them put themselves under the protection of England; all this, and more than this, shews that the world is ripe for the fulfilment of the prophecy which points to 1897—8 as the time when the Bible will once more in the life-time of millions of men, not yet thirty years of age, vindicate itself by proving itself to be the inspired Word of Him who rules and guides men by His will to work out the works which shall accomplish His pre-ordained and long predicted purpose in the redemption of mankind through Christ Jesus our Lord.

IMPATIENCE.

By the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

It is most natural and almost unavoidable that those who are convinced of the fact of the Identity, and who estimate the far-reaching consequences to our Church and nation which it involves, should manifest impatience when they realize the absolute indifference that possesses the millions of God-fearing people, as to the existence of Ephraim-Israel, and their blindness to evidence, which can only be traced to that indifference.

It seems to many (does it not?) that it would be for the glory of God and the welfare of our race, if the leaders in Church and State knew and acknowledged that we are the Israel of God, re-covenanted in Christ, the inheritors of the promises given to Abraham and his seed, and amongst other things the rightful owners of the land given to him by God. It seems that the knowledge of this would give guidance and direction to our statesmen at this anxious time, and revive and strengthen the wavering faith of many. But the fact that we are not nationally or ecclesiastically awake ought not to cause impatience. The more we know of the providential care that has guided us hitherto, the more must we be assured that the hand of God causes our blindness now. For it is manifest that through the centuries it has been the purpose of God to lead and guard and develope Ephraim and the tribes his fellows, while they were unconscious of their race and destiny. This must be admitted even by those who deny any identification, if only they admit that Ephraim exists and has a future; for the denial manifests unconsciousness. It is evident that the time has not yet come for a change in the patient purpose. The way in which the dual control in Egypt vanished in order that our power should be established there, is a modern instance of the method in which the blind have been led by paths they know not for two thousand five hundred years; and similarly the whole of the promised land from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates may be given to a blind people.

Why is this? Is it permitted to us to ask the reason for this most mysterious purpose? In the first place, the covenant-keeping faithfulness of God is kept distinct from any idea of national faith or worthiness. It stands forth in massive grandeur, a monument to last for ever in the records of the universe of faithfulness to promise, unclouded by either assumed merit or acknowledged demerit, an act of grace, a marvel of providential care, but above all absolute TRUTH.

Again, God's purpose has not been marred by the intentional opposition, either of the covenant people, or of their adversaries, and it has not been helped by the puny efforts of either; it is a purpose of the ages, wrought only by God. Even as the many mansions of the Father's house are being prepared unknown to us for those who are here being unconsciously fitted for them, so the kingdoms of this world have been and are being prepared for the rule of Christian Israel, the Lord's executive, and Israel is being unconsciously fitted for her glorious work. The coming events which we may expect when, the times of the Gentiles being fulfilled, Jerusalem and the land will cease to be trodden down, will (as far as we can see) proceed as in the past. The duty of restoring Judah and of redressing the oppressions of ages in the East, may be our only loadstar, and we may find ourselves reinstated before we are conscious of the reason, and the central purpose, hitherto hidden, may not be revealed, or recognised until the great consummation has been reached. Indeed, why should it not be so?

Of what use, in that case, is our effort to witness to our Identity with Israel? or is our attempt to do so a feeble interference with the purpose of God? It cannot be. A truth is never made known in order that it should be kept from others, and apart from the personal joy caused, and the strengthening of faith in those who, reading of God's purposes in His Word, perceive its accomplishment, it is the duty of those who know to proclaim. There must be a preparation for the denoument. We do not desire to hasten it, or to aid in bringing it about, but when God acts, the minds of many will be ready to take it in. The fact of a comparatively few having been able to read of the purpose of God will be evidence that no obscurity of statement hindered men from knowing, but only the strange incapacity of indifference. It is as necessary for the glory of God that men in the future should know of His purpose, as that they should know of His work. Accomplishment presupposes purpose. The purpose has been foretold; it will one day be publicly acknowledged, and our work and witness are necessary means towards this end.

So complicated are the labyrinths through which statesmen have to tread their way, that even if they knew of Our Identity, they or we would not know how to help at present. Better leave it to God. But we have hold of a great truth, the most wonderful historical fact, and our work and effort are necessary to make ready for that gradual advance in knowledge which will bring glory to God, as soon as He has performed that which He is pledged to do.

ARE GERMANY AND THE GERMANS OF ISRAEL?

A SUPPORTER of the Rev. Robt. Douglas has contributed a paper in The Rock, of July 3rd last, on the general teaching of the Rev. lecturer, in Exeter Hall, in which he deals a passing blow at "the defective notions of the BANNER OF ISRAEL and of Anglo-Israel publications generally, as well as at the Metropolitan British-Israel Association;" because we all deny that "Britain is Ephraim distinctively," and because "we exclude Germany as a nation from Israel altogether." Mr. R. Douglas's view is that it is an immutable axiom "that what is truly Christian nationally, is ipso facto Israelite; and therefore, that the whole of our Christian history is a providential fulfilment of Bible prophecy." "Those who have the blessings are those to whom God swore to give them."

We may agree to the definition thus given us by Mr. Douglas of what constitutes a modern Israelite nation, and ask the question in return whether the inhabitants of Germany or even the "ruling tribe" of it, "have the blessings," not one or two of them, but all the blessings God swore to give to "the great and mighty nation" to come of Abraham, "His friend?" They have, as to some sections of them, considered apart from the rest, some resemblance to a portion of these blessings, but not all the cluster of blessings given to us, on God's oath, as Israel His people in Gen. xxii. 17, 18! "The ruling tribe," the Prussian part, is not "a great and mighty nation," though the diverse races united just now in one, and called the German Empire, is. Not even Mr. Douglas, we suppose, however, would rank all these, including the Roman Catholic portions of the Empire, among Israel? The nation as a whole cannot be said to be under God's blessing, since they nationally dishonour Him in the matter of the Sabbath-day of 24 hours, and in their lack of veneration for the Word and laws of God. They possess not "the Gate of their enemies," and therefore cannot pretend to the supremacy of the seas. Their population-increase is great, but not so great as ours, nor does their surplus population seek to found fresh German colonies beyond sea, like Joseph's daughters, "running over the wall;" but when they emigrate they go to swell the emigration of what Mr. Douglas admits to be Ephraim's overflow of people. Their wealth is nothing excessive; while ours is abnormal and bewildering in its volume. Finally, they are not the evangelists "of all the nations, families, and the kindreds of the earth." For these and many other reasons we have often given in these columns, we hold Mr. R. Douglas to be in error, and are glad he knows it.

We add two paragraphs of the Rock article to show our readers what he really teaches, and why:—

"This restoration will, it is emphatically declared by God, be under Ephraim and Judah, as two allied and powerful military nations, at the close of this age. (a) Both are to be Christian (Jer. xxxi. 31—40; Heb. viii. 8—13). 'The New Covenant,' as is self-evident, is Christianity, and it came into operation and has been working itself out, under our Almighty Christ, since 1,850 years ago. (b) The distinctive mark of revived Ephraim is the 'M'lo ha Goyim' (Gen. xlviii. 19), or world-wide colonial empire; and of revived Judah the 'Sceptre,' or the giving kings or rulers to all the 'many nations' or 'company of nations' lineally sprung from Jacob (Gen.

Digitized by Google

xxxv. 11, xlix. 10; and Jer. xxxiii. 26). Isaiah (xi. 12—16) plainly asserts this alliance of Ephraim and Judah, as two independent and mighty military nations, in the future return and re-conquest of Palestine. Jeremiah (iii. 18) declares the same. So does Hosea (i. 11). Ezekiel is equally explicit in the prophecy of the 'two sticks' (xxxvii. 15—28). Zechariah affirms the military might of Ephraim and Judah, in this fighting age, and before the peaceful Millennium, in unmistakable terms. He is God's goodly horse in the battle, treading down his enemies as the mire of the streets in the battle (x. 3—12), and so, along with Ephraim, marching back in triumph at the head of all Israel to their fathers' land!

"Now, as 'God is true, but every man a liar,' Ephraim and Judah are such at this hour, when their return is imminent. They have their undoubted providential counterparts in Britain as Ephraim, and the ruling tribe in Germany as Judah, at the head of Protestant Teutonic Europe, portending and insuring a vast and resistless Anglo-Saxon world union, including the United States, the child of both—such union being the only hope, under God, of the Christian Churches, and nations, and the whole world in the future.

"These are the teachings of the 'Christian Israel Association,' alike in contrast with the 'dreams' of Evangelical interpreters of prophecy, and the defective notions of the BANNER OF ISRAEL and Anglo-Israel publications generally, as well as with the Metropolitan British-Israel Association, which denies that Britain is Ephraim distinctively, and excludes Germany as a nation from Israel altogether! We rest on the immutable axiom that what is truly Christian nationally is ipso facto Israelite, and therefore that the whole of our Christian history is a providential fulfilment of Bible prophecy. As God is unchangeable, those who have the blessings are those to whom He swore to give them. Those who allege as an objection the apparent origin of the British races from different nations ignorantly advance a proof of Our Identity, since the gradual disintegration and dispersion of Israel during many centuries necessarily produced this phenomenon."

We prefer to let Oxonian, the Editor of the Covenant People, answer Mr. Douglas, and therefore propose to request him to speak on this subject in the BANNER, as he has most interestingly done in the leading article of the August No., 26, of Vol. iii., of his own paper.

The article is headed :—

"GERMANY AND THE GERMANS.

(A Holiday Letter from the Editor.)

"Waymarks of Israel, scattered across the Continent, lead us inevitably to a consideration of what has become, for British-Israelites, the great Teutonic question. Not alone, however, for them—the already convinced—is this question a matter of moment. If that which is to them British-Israel truth is ever to become more than a mere craze in the eyes of those at least of the general public, who can boast some education, the precise degree of connection or contrast subsisting between the Anglo-Saxon and the German must be definitely established. It has come to be almost regarded as an axiom that the two are merely twin branches of a formerly united 'Teutonic' race. Is this hypothesis correct, or not?

"Where doctors differ, it is generally held presumptuous for an outsider to decide—still more so, if the doctors agree, for the outsider to assert the contrary. Nevertheless, an Englishman's inalienable right is that of private judgment. Neither in religion, nor naturally, in any other department of knowledge, will he be content to believe without individual acquaintance with the facts. If the present writer were a famous Oxford Professor, instead of being an humble Oxford Graduate, he would still trust that whatever he might have to say would be weighed before being accepted. All that he asks is—that you will not allow any authority, however eminent, to prevent you judging for yourselves.

"Germany is in many ways a remarkable, and, in some parts, a very beautiful, country. While many of its landscapes rest the eye, there is much about the speech and characteristics of the people that gives food for reflection. Personal observation, supplemented by study of works upon the subject, has led the writer to the conclusion, which he feels confident will be accepted after perusing the following analysis of Germany and the Germans.

"The very first point that strikes the attention of the intelligent student of recent German history, or the observant traveller in Germany, is that 'Germany' is a geographical rather than a racial unit. The Prussians are the dominant race, even yet disliked by the Bavarians. North German speech is markedly different from that of the South. The types of character are also widely different. These variations within Germany itself might be enlarged upon, were it not that it is beside the purpose of the present article. It does, however, indicate this much: that if any one section of the 'Germans' should turn out to be closely related to ourselves, such connection would by no means involve a racial unity between Britain and 'Germany.'

"We next note that, side by side with sectional peculiarities, there are certain characteristics common, in the main, to the inhabitants of Germany. The question naturally at once arises, Are they, in these particulars, in harmony or antagonism with ourselves?

"On the answer to this will largely depend the solution of the question of Identity.

"These national traits, in all their varying aspects, are very fully brought out in those very readable two volumes published by Mr. W. H. Dawson, in 1894, on 'Germany and the Germans.'

"In the forefront he places the conscription—introduced in 1813 by Prussia, which has been, as the writer remarks, the pioneer alike in arts of peace and war. Legalised by Prussia in 1850, as a permanent part of the constitution then granted, it passed, on the establishment of the Empire, into the Imperial Constitution of 1871. Forced military service, indeed, is no new regime, being inherited from the military monarchies of the past. The Anglo-Saxon races have through the ages retained the voluntary principle, thus proving themselves the heirs of an old-world regime of liberty.

"Deut. xx. 5—8.—From the mention of conscription, Mr. Dawson naturally leads up to another point of contrast between Germany and Anglo-Saxondom. 'Our youth,' he reminds us, 'make up for the absence of military training by manly outdoor exercises unknown on the continent. Save butterfly hunting and botanizing, the German schoolboy has, literally, no out-door pastime, and his gymnastic exercise is a poor substitute for vigorous games in the open air. The cricket and football fields, to which hundreds and thousands of English lads and young men flock all the year round when work is done, are for them what the drill ground and manœuvre camp are for the youth of France, Germany, and Russia.'

"The chapter on 'Patriarchal Government' supplies

another, still more apt, illustration of the gulf between them and us. Several sentences and phrases are italicized, and we trust that any who still allow themselves to suspect racial affinity between Teuton and Saxon will weigh them carefully.

"There is a large school of politicians in Germany whose principles and measures are taken from countries of Free Popular Government. Give us, runs the cry of this school, Give us English laws and institutions! . . . These politicians' aims are premature. The Germans are a ruled and not a self-ruling nation. . . . The capacity of self-government must be developed before the free institutions common to democratic countries will be either practicable or appreciated, and for centuries the people of Germany have been taught, not independence, but its opposite.'

"Such a fundamental difference naturally manifests itself at every turn. Needless to say, public spirit is at a low ebb; there is no vigorous political or civil life. Men are indifferent towards all national or local interests. Honorary public offices are not the object of that warm rivalry which is one characteristic of the citizens of a free community. Rarely do individuals offer handsome contributions for needed public or philanthropic purposes. Hospitals, orphanages, universities, libraries, churches—mainly maintained by the State or some State-directed authority, rather than by private munificence!

"To speak of civil administration alone, our author tells us—

"'There are thousands of paid officials in Germany performing duties which in England are done as well by the people themselves through elected bodies, or by private citizens whose only reward is the honour attaching to faithful and voluntary public service. The two systems have little in common, and are not less different in results than in spirit.'

"The argument grows in intensity as we read further into this interesting book. Du Chaillu's 'Viking Age' once for all dissipated the idea that the ancestors of the English were untutored savages. Dawson's 'Germany and the Germans' leaves it impossible for any educated mind to retain the delusion that the Anglo-Saxons are an offshoot from the continental 'Teutons.'

"The power enjoyed by the police in Germany clinches the argument. (See Chapter V., and read carefully pp. 69, 70, 77.) We cannot refrain from quoting the following striking passages.

"'No characteristic distinguishes the German in his civil relationships from the Englishman more completely than this deference to the police authority. Where the latter appeals to the law, the former appeals to the police.'

Popular control of the police is undreamt of.

"'It need hardly be said that most of the police functions which have been alluded to would not be tolerated in England. . . . The Englishman's peculiar constitution makes him indisposed to do anything which he has not somehow had a hand in determining. He does not like compulsion of any kind, least of all compulsion which owes none of (1 Kings xii. 16—19) its authority to himself. . . . Inconveniences—anomalies—abuses—he will tolerate these, rather than forego his birthright.'

"His birthright! How august a birthright his is, the author of 'Germany and the Germans' suspects not, while himself so strongly substantiating.

"Britons reverence their Sovereign, who is beloved even by the still more democratic Americans. We admire wise leadership, and gladly give honour where it is due. In Germany, we are told an unreasoning adulation is the rule. 'The occupants of a throne are spoken of in elaborate terms almost suggestive of Oriental effusiveness. Even the dead body of a sovereign is spoken of as the high corpse or the most high corpse! The departed monarch is not merely blessed, but highly blessed, or most blessed! What is this but the Babylonish and Roman apotheosis of their kings?

"As regards religion, we learn that it exists in name, rather than in reality. Individual exceptions there are, undoubtedly, but Germany, as a whole, is honeycombed with 'rationalism, scepticism, and atheism.' The masses are, at the best, indifferent.

"'In Berlin there is surplus wealth enough amongst the Protestant community to supply the city with the churches of which it has for a generation stood in deep need. Yet there is to-day but one Protestant church to every 20,000 of the population, and it is as difficult to draw money from private pockets as it is to draw water from flint.'

"Not much evidence here of any mission to bless the world. And the Sabbath—surely, were the Germans, nationally, Israel, they would, nationally, reverence the Sabbath. Amongst ourselves there may be different modes of hallowing the day of rest, but, nationally, it is one of our most precious possessions. 'In Germany,' on the contrary,

"'A tendency prevails to act up to the letter rather than the spirit of the injunction that the Sabbath was made for man. There what is known as the Continental Sunday had for a long time been naturalized. Until William II. came to the throne, Sunday almost ranked as an ordinary business day. . . . In the towns, warehouses and offices were well conducted if they did not keep open later than dinner-time, while shops rarely closed at all. The consequence was, that thousands of people were compelled to work seven long days a week.'

"Many spots in Germany are dear to the present writer, to whom some German-speaking highland valleys are almost a second home. He would gladly wander through the length and breadth of the German lands to discover isolated traces of Israelitish origin, so that, when the time comes, all such rifts and remnants might be readily recoverable. At the same time, he has seen too much to permit him ever to believe that Germany is Israel.

THE METRIC SYSTEM

By JOHN S. ANDERSON.

FROM time to time we notice in the public prints strong recommendations in favour of our adopting the French method of calculations, and Mr. Ritchie has prepared a bill for legalising the same in this country.

The Standard of the 7th instant, in a leader on the report of a Committee appointed by a conference in the spring, at Birmingham, to consider the state of the law and to make recommendations in the way of improvement, says:—

"The Committee have, in fact, anticipated the Government proposals in declaring that the use of metric weights and measures for trade purposes 'should be made, at least, permissible.' They are also in favour of the metric system on account of its apparent simplicity. But this, again, is only hazarded as 'an opinion,' and does not appear as a distinct recommendation. A good deal of practical testimony on this subject, including a letter which we publish this morning, goes to show that while the metric system looks very well on paper, it does not so readily adapt itself to the ordinary purposes of life. A century of the system in France has failed to effect its general adoption among the working population and the lower middle class."

The letter in question is dated from Paris and signed by J. A. S. It is in the first place written to warn tourists with regard to restrictions on the circulation of certain French coins. The writer then proceeds to discuss the metric system and concludes as follows :—

"The truth is that the metric system, in its effect on currency, has made the giving and taking of money on the Continent a matter of perpetual worry to all concerned. If my countrymen wish to bar the entrance into the United Kingdom of such an exasperating annoyance, they will assuredly never sanction the application of the metric system to their coinage.

"It may, perhaps, surprise a great many to learn that the metric system, apart from book-keeping, by no means generally prevails among the French people. After a hundred years of this system, the working and the lower middle classes still, all of them, continue to buy their meat, bread, and groceries by the pound, their coal and coke by the bushel, their wine by the chopine and demi-setier, while up to five-francs they all of them count, not by francs and centimes, but by sous, or half-pence. In the country they mentally judge of land by the arpent, and not by the hectare, and distance is still reckoned by the old league. This list could be added to. Those who would explain away these facts are either chicanists or faddists.

"If my fellow-subjects are wise, they will stick to their own way of counting money. It may not be pretty, but it works well. What they suffer from the want of the metric system is nothing to what the French suffer from its adoption. Long years of residence in France enable me to speak with certainty in the matter. The French decimalists conceal the truth, and their English partisans do not know it."

From this we must hope that common sense will prevail, and that our British coinage and weights and measures, so often mentioned in the BANNER OF ISRAEL as of Israelitish origin, will never be altered, but will still remain to us—"British-Israel."

THE LENGTH OF THE QUEEN'S REIGN.

PROPOSED NATIONAL HOLIDAY.

IT has been left to a peer to undertake a duty which one is surprised no enterprising member of the House of Commons has thought of fulfilling, for Lord Braye has asked ministers in the House of Lords whether, inasmuch as on the Wednesday, September 23rd, the Queen will have reigned more days than any other sovereign of this realm, they, in honour of such an auspicious and extraordinary event, will introduce a measure to constitute, for this year only, Sept. 23rd, a Bank Holiday, as was done, it may be recalled, on the occasion of the Jubilee in 1887. The estimate of fifty-nine years and ninety-seven days needed to cause the Queen to reign as long as her grandfather is (writes a London correspondent) affected by various considerations, which have not had their full weight. I have before explained that the most satisfactory way of making the computation is by taking the actual number of days and making allowance for the leap-years in their respective periods. As far as Geo. III. is concerned, neither 1760 nor 1820 can be counted as a leap-year, as that monarch succeeded towards the end of the former year, and died at the beginning of the latter, before the leap-year principle of the extra day operated; while there is the further fact that 1800, in accordance with the provision made at the revision of the calendar, was not treated as a leap-year. The nett number of leap-years in George III.'s term accordingly was thirteen, while the Queen has seen fifteen, which means that in covering the same calendar period as her grandfather, her Majesty has had to reign two days longer. Allowing, therefore, for these two days, it will be found that the Queen will equal the record of George III. on September 22nd, and pass it on September 23rd, and Lord Braye has selected the exact date for the proposed celebration. It may be, of course, that the Government will desire to reserve any formal recognition of the event until next June, when a complete sixty years' reign will have been accomplished; but it is certain that a number of the Queen's loyal subjects will take steps to show their appreciation of the striking historic fact connected with September 23rd.—From the Christian Million.

BRITISH JUSTICE IN RESPECT TO THE SENTENCES ON DR. JAMES JAMESON AND HIS COMPANIONS.

A FRENCHMAN named M. Guibert said, in regard to this subject, what was published in the Times of July 31, 1896, and quoted again below. He remarked :—

"If anything could increase our legitimate admiration for English justice, it would be the impartiality displayed by it in the Jameson trial. Brought first before the Bow-street Court and accompanied to the Court-room by the cream of English society, who, sharing in his hopes, went so far as to claim a share of complicity in his acts, the agent of Mr. Cecil Rhodes saw his undertaking characterized more severely perhaps by the magistrate than it had been by the entire independent Press of Europe and America. Sent before a jury, where he might hope to find a more indulgent reception, he is now, after remarkable pleadings, sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment—that is to say, considering British law and customs, to an extremely severe penalty. The jurors heeded neither the voice of public opinion, which hoped for an acquittal, nor the suggestions of the counsel for the defence, which made an indirect appeal to their patriotism. As for the judges, they took their stand on pure law, and it was thus that they made the jury understand that they had to settle a question, not of sentiment, but of international security and reciprocity. It is permissible to explain this firmness of the English magistrates in the presence of popular infatuation by the independence insured by the high stipends which they receive. In London even the Bow-street magistrate, although only a police magistrate, is a personage of importance. But the judges, such as those who have just decided the fate of Dr. Jameson, are morally and materially the peers of the most considerable men in the State. The English are well aware that the source of the independence of justice is in the very large sacrifice which the Budget allows to insure it. We seem to obey a contrary conviction, and this has not hitherto produced very good results."—Our Own Correspondent.

Westgate-on-Sea, September 19th, 1896.

I would ask Nurse G. to be kind enough to accept an apology, on account of her note having been accidentally destroyed before the initials mentioned were taken down. I should be pleased to be favoured with her address.

Our correspondents who have desired to obtain suitable lantern slides to illustrate a lecture upon the Empire of British-Israel, may be glad to know that Colonel Senior has kindly had a set of slides made, 22 in all, at the cost of £1 2s. The box and postage to New Zealand has been 4/6 in addition. I give these exact details as they may assist any one who is planning to give lectures on the British-Israel question and wishes to illustrate them in like manner.

Again we are able to give 274 as the number of the copies of the BANNER OF ISRAEL we have sent out weekly during the past month, and 126 packets of literature, including also 200 of the "Covenant People," to the following places:—

ENGLAND:—Aldershot, Alvaston, Andover, Annfield Plain, Attercliffe, Basingstoke, Barrow-in-Furness, Berwick-on-Tweed, Bexley, Birkenhead, Bishopstrow, Bow, E., Bournemouth Brighton, Canterbury, Carlisle, Catford, Chatham, Cheetham, Chelmsford, Chester, Chippenham, Cowes, Crewe, Derby, Devonport, Dover, Eastbourne, East Chorlton, East Grinstead, East Twickenham, Exmouth, Goodhurst, Harlesden, Hampton Hill, Harpurhey, Heaton Chapel, Highgate, Hull, Leicester, Lewisham, Leytonstone, London, Lowestoft, Ludlow, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Norwood, Perranarworthal, Plympton, Portsmouth, Poole, Quernerford, Richmond, St. Just, Sandgate, Shepherd's Bush, Shrewsbury, South Benfleet, Southsea, Tottenham, Teddington, Tulse Hill, S.W., Tunbridge Wells, Twickenham, Uxbridge, Wadingham, Wandsworth, Wellingborough, Wilsden, Wolverhampton, Worthing, Woolwich, York. ISRAEL'S SCRIPTURE AND PRAYER UNION.

OUR Prayer Union still grows. Two more have been added since last month, making the total 1,591.

The names of any Identity believers who are willing to join us in searching the Bible, and in prayer to God, will be gladly received.—Ezek. xxxvi. 37.

Subject for special prayer on last Sunday in October: "That God will guide our statesmen at this critical period in regard to the Eastern Question.

The Card of Membership has a list of chapters for the whole of 1896, also suggestions for study, prayers, etc. It is of a size convenient for keeping in the Bible, and will be sent on receipt of six stamps.

The first and second series of Monthly Comments on the whole Bible, by Philo-Israel, may be obtained. Price, in paper covers, 1s. 2d. each; in cloth, 2s. each, post free.

The "Prayers for Daily Use," being a prayer for each day of the week, by Philo-Israel, are 1d. each, or 9d. per doz., postage extra.

Address, Mrs. Woolcott, 74, Saltram-crescent, St. Peter's-park, London, W.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—A few weeks ago you were so kind as to publish in the BANNER OF ISRAEL a most interesting appeal for funds for the church at Kobe, Japan, which my son, the Rev. Sidney Swann, is struggling very hard to build. That appeal has resulted in sums amounting to £6 10s. having been sent to me, and, on behalf of my son, I wish to express my deep gratitude for the help you have given to this work of God in a far-off land; and, if not encroaching on your space, would like you to express in the BANNER how deeply I feel the kindness of all those Christian friends who responded to your appeal.

Would you oblige by sending me another copy of the BANNER OF ISRAEL in which you inserted the Kobe appeal?

Faithfully yours,

E. S. SWANN.

Catthorpe Rectory, Rugby, September 15th.

EARLY RISERS.—Most sovereigns of Europe are early risers. The German Emperor is generally at breakfast by 6 a.m., and often in summer has by that time enjoyed a ride with the Empress and his sons. The Empress of Austria rises in summer at 4.30 a.m., and after breakfast starts on one of her long walks. The Queen Regent of Spain breakfasts at 7 a.m., the Queen of Italy at 6 a.m., and the King of Spain also at 6 o'clock. One of the latest royal risers is the Prince of Wales.—Christian Million, May 7th, 1896, p. 448.

LI HUNG CHANG is nearing China, and on his arrival he is to be restored to all his former positions, including that of Viceroy of Chih-li, the Emperor having discovered that he is the best man for the post after all.

ARTICLES, Correspondence, &c., should be sent to the Editor, PHILO-ISRAEL, Woodcot Villa, Tyndall's Park, Clifton, Bristol.

THE TURKO-ARMENIAN HORROR.

THE terrible massacres of Armenians in Constantinople, on Wednesday, August 26 last, must surely call for the interference of Europe. In the commencement the Armenian revolutionists were entirely in the wrong. They committed an act which the Times correspondent described as one of "recklessness, folly, and criminality, which cannot be too strongly condemned." The invasion and capture of the Ottoman Bank, in broad daylight, by a band of insurgents armed with revolvers and bombs, was an outrage disgraceful to the Armenian cause on whose behalf they admitted to have acted, and disgraceful also to the Turkish Government which parleyed with the rebels, and gave them their lives and liberty afterwards as the price of submission. But the real disgrace to the Sultan's Government followed, when as the result of the Armenian outrage, the Turkish police and soldiery permitted the Turkish mob to rise and commence a massacre of the Armenian population of the capital, which is admitted by the Government officials to have reached to 5,000 individuals.

The description of it in the letter of the Times correspondent, of September 4, but dated August 31 from Constantinople, is terrible. He wrote:—

The only place where the gourdineurs encountered resistance was at Psamatia, where most of the committee men have their abode, and the committee held its meetings. In this suburb the Armenians fought till they came to their last cartridge, and then several of them blew out their own brains. It is reported that one young woman fought desperately in defence of her aged father, and died covered with wounds. In all the other places—Galata, Pera, Taxim, Papaskeupru, Hasskein—the Armenians seemed stupefied, and were simply knocked on the head like rabbits by a gamekeeper; some ran for their lives, but were quickly hunted down, excepting in a few cases in Pera, where asylum was found in one or other of the Embassies. While the banded assassins slew every Armenian they could find, the police and gendarmes arrested all they could lay hands upon. These poor wretches were pinioned and marched off, being cruelly beaten as they went, to one or other of the police depots, which many entered only to be brought out to the dead-cart on the other side.

Readers should remember that this is no hearsay story; of many of these horrors I have been an eye-witness; so also has the Hon. M. Herbert, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires; Signor Pansa, the Italian Ambassador; and Messrs. Chabert and Baroni, dragomans of that Embassy; M. Maximoff, first dragoman of the Russian Embassy; besides many other gentlemen of unquestionable veracity with whom I have compared notes. The whole business is an instructive illustration of the true Hamidian spirit; it was stopped by the timely threat of the Ambassadors, without which the assassins would have pursued their work of extermination.

A large number of people are leaving Constantinople to-day by train or steamer, the events of the week having produced a strong impression as painful as it is general. It has been seen that the resources of the Hamidian system include wholesale assassination, and what may seem good for Armenians to-day may appear equally fit for Greeks or any other Christians to-morrow.

The episode is one full of horrors, and is a proof hardly needed now that the hour of the fall of the Turkish Empire is near at hand, and cannot be long delayed. A power so effete as the Sultan's, and so reckless of the lives of Christians who are subjects of his Government, is deprived of European sympathy, and would be wiped out at once were it not for the fact that there is no ostensible successor for the Turkish dominions; but they must be the prize of the strongest. This means that after the Sultan, will intervene the deluge —"a great earthquake," in short, "such as was not since there were men upon the earth, so great an earthquake so mighty" (Rev. xvi. 18, R.V.).

The rulers of the European Christian world are unwilling to precipitate the frightful catastrophe, for which, however, all are rapidly preparing. In the providence of God, it must come, and such signs as the late events in Armenia and Constantinople, in Crete also, all combine to prove that preparations are on foot for the fall of the house of Esau, according to Jer. xlix. 17, et seq., R.V., "Edom shall become an astonishment; every one that passeth by it shall be astonished and shall hiss at the plagues thereof; as in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah and the neighbour cities thereof, saith the Lord, no man shall dwell there, neither shall any son of man sojourn therein. . . . The earth trembleth at the noise of their fall; there is a cry, the noise whereof is heard in the Red Sea. Behold He shall come up and fly as the eagle and spread out His wings against Bozrah; and the heart of the mighty men of Edom at that day shall be as the heart of a woman in her pangs."

The reference to the Red Sea, as the locality whence the "cry" attending the fall of Edom shall resound and create alarm in striking. It will be a fall that will make the earth itself "to tremble," so tremendous will be the catastrophe. A prophetic fact attending the fall of Turkish Edom, is that to which Ezek. xxv. 12—14, R.V., draws attention, thus:—"Because that Edom hath dealt against the House of Judah, by taking vengeance, and hath greatly offended, and revenged herself upon them, therefore, thus saith the Lord God, I will stretch out Mine hand upon Edom, and will cut off man and beast from it, and I will make it desolate from Teman, even unto Dedan shall they fall by the sword. And I will lay My vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel; and they shall do in Edom according to Mine anger, and according to My fury; and they shall know My vengeance, saith the Lord God." It is startling to find from this, that by the hand of the British people (being Israel) God intends to lay His vengeance upon Turkish-Edom.

At present, of course, there seems to be no chance whatever of our Government ever venturing to lift a finger against the Turkish Power, or becoming the instruments in God's hands of vengeance for their sins against Him. But the words just quoted, being apparently applicable to the case, show that the chief agent to carry out His decrees, in regard to Edom, will be our own race. Knowing that God has this matter in hand, and that in His own time He will bring it to pass, we may await the issue with composure and leave the results with Him. What we may be sure of is this, that a high-spirited nation like our own cannot long endure to see Christian men and women butchered by thousands in the broad light of day, and before the eyes of the Moslem multitudes in Constantinople, there being, it appears, a moral certainty that the Turkish Government and troops, if not the Sultan himself, have all united in bringing about the late massacres, from hatred of the Christians, and that the Armenians have in the late butcheries in that city, been goaded by oppression and wholesale murder, to take the law into their own hands, and compel their rulers, even by an unlawful act like that perpetrated at the Ottoman Bank, to do them bare justice and allow them the rights which they have been promised.

SITTING IN THE SHADOW OF A GREAT LIGHT.

In the Christian of Sept. 17th, in a paper headed "The Sword Over England," "F. C. Spurr," writes:—

"With but little alteration, the opening words of the book of Isaiah might with justice be applied to the English nation, for if ever a nation has been nourished and guarded by God, this nation has. The miracle of England's greatness is second only to that of the Jewish nation. Less than two millenniums ago our ancestors were living in the woods and caves of this island, a barbarous and an almost unknown people. Rome was then supreme, and there seemed no reason to believe that her supremacy would ever fade. To-day Rome is less than a memory, and the barbarous nation has become the chief empire of the world. And by whose power? He must be an extraordinarily blind man who replies that our Navy, or the accident of our home being an island protected by the sea, is sufficient to account for it. A combination of nations against us would make short work of our natural and artificial protections. But hitherto this combination has not been effected, and all attempts at it have been frustrated. It will be sufficient to recall the destruction of the 'Invincible' Armada and the utter breakdown of Napoleon's conspiracy against us.

"No human arm has placed England in her present position. This 'vine in a very fruitful hill' is surely the planting of the Lord. And can it be doubted what was the purpose of God in procuring for this country above all others the blessings which have crowned her? Those who first were made partakers of His gifts to her had little doubt. The printing press is English, and the first use made of it was to print the Holy Word. The earliest steamers took out missionaries to the far-off countries, in many cases free of charge. The first message flashed along the telegraph cable was a message from Scripture. England has been raised to eminence without special merit of her own, in order to accomplish a great purpose of God. To her has been committed a grand and awful trust.

"She was commissioned to give the Word of God not only to her own people, but to all the world. From her the first missionaries went forth a century ago leading the way in the new Divine enterprise of Missions. While Continental nations have been engulphed in rationalism or superstition, it has been left for the English-speaking people alone to witness, without wavering, to the truths which our Lord and His apostles preached, which were obscured for sixteen centuries, and which were restored to us at the Reformation. These things, of course, were accomplished under God, by His people, and not by the nation as a political body; nevertheless, the nation, as a nation, has been regarded as the repository of these things, and, in any case, the nation, as a nation, has been prospered of God because of those in her who have accomplished His will. Formerly, at least, if there was no spiritual co-operation on the part of the nation, yet the nation did not only not oppose what was done, but it recognised, through its heads, in many ways, its unique position."

I subjoin a leading paragraph from the same Christian.—

"We are told that a number of prospective Nonconformist ministers, on being asked by their examiners what part of the Bible they read most, replied, the four Gospels. And on further inquiry as to which of the Gospels, they read most, the reply, without exception, was the Gospel of John. This was thought to be highly satisfactory. And so it was, so far as it went. But the question arises, are these young men, who seek to become evangelists, pastors, and teachers, giving adequate attention to the Scriptures as a whole? or are they following the lead of some of their seniors, in drawing a contrast between the Gospels and the Epistles, or rather between the Holy Spirit speaking by the Lord, and writing through His apostles?" I would add, and inspiring His prophets. L. P.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR ON THE ABOVE.

The article in the Christian to which L. P. draws attention is indeed a remarkable one. We should expect that F.

C. Spurr, drawing as he does the portrait of the British nation in the colours the Word of God employs to depict the people of Israel, is almost a British-Israelite, open to conviction. We are, he admits, blessed above all other people. God has Himself selected the British for these blessings. Their object was that being divinely commissioned they might give the Word of God to her own people first, and to all the world besides! The witness to God that the Lord and His apostles preached the truths which we recovered at the Reformation, our nation alone has been giving forth. Our nation is reckoned to be the agent of the Lord in dispensing these benefits, though only a section of the race actually does and did His will in the matter. Admitting all this, the writer declares things are changing rapidly now. We are producing, not the choice grapes the Lord looks for from His vine, but sour grapes. We support and uphold the Agnostic and the Atheist. We used once to regard with respect the Lord's-day, but now vast numbers despise it, and five-sixths of the population of London never attend any place of worship! Sixty-five per cent. of the men of this country are utterly outside all religious agencies!

Christian morals, he adds, alluding to the "sex novels" and monthly magazines, are entirely disregarded in these publications. Our drink bill increases; our masses are indifferent to God, and irreligion, and lust, and greed are becoming dominant amongst our people. The writer believes these things betoken national inner-decay which, if not arrested, will mean utter ruin. "England is untrue to her trust." "She has waxed fat against God and now kicks." We are a proud people, and all nations note the fact. We are proud of our navy and call it "invincible." Of our commerce we boast, and believe ourselves secure.

But, adds Mr. Spurr, God can bring us down as He brought down and blotted out Rome and Carthage. If God wills it, He can punish us, and ruin our nation by bringing all those who hate us to combine their forces and overwhelm us. Having given vent to these warnings and threats, the writer, F. C. Spurr, describes the remedy for our degeneracy and godlessness. It is the true one. "Let the prophets of God awake and point out to men the inevitable issue of the present godlessness. But above all, if it would please God to grant the revival for which so many have prayed, and for so long a time, then would the desert blossom as the rose. God is ready surely. What is needed is a Church humbled to bitterness because of her perverse powerlessness, and then filled with the Holy Ghost, to be the agent of that revival which alone can save England from ruin.

"Lowisham, S.E." "F. C. SPURR.

We go with a great deal that Mr. Spurr advances. But he lacks one thing—namely, the knowledge that the British are Israel. Israel was never anything but a headstrong, proud, backsliding, wayward people; always ready to relapse into idolatry, Sabbath-breaking, drunkenness, unclean living and ungodliness. She is no better now than she was in Moses', Isaiah's and Jeremiah's days! She needs indeed the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, spiritual revival, and the new covenant described in Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, and Heb. viii. 10—12. Give the nation that grand cluster of blessings promised exclusively to Israel, and then Mr. Spurr's anticipation will be justified and Britain, being Israel, will be like "the desert blossoming as the rose," and as Israel redeemed, filling the face of the world with Gospel fruit.

The recognition of the fact that the British Anglo-Saxon race are Israel of the House of Joseph, will lead Mr. Spurr to see that Rome and Carthage are not on the same platform in respect to God's purposes of grace with the British-Israelites. God is under covenant and promise based on oath to bless, guard, but never forsake them. Rome and Carthage had no such guarantees of mercy and life, and therefore perished. Our recreant, ungrateful nation has been long punished, and yet is not reclaimed by such punishments. There is one remedy left which God has promised to use, and that will certainly succeed. We have already alluded to it as the new covenant. For this we have been nationally praying for 300 years in the words of our Communion Service in relation to the Ten Commandments. At the end of the tenth, the people are instructed to pray thus, "Lord, have mercy upon us, and write all these Thy laws in our hearts, we beseech Thee." We know God has heard this prayer and will answer it literally, as requested, according to the promise in Jer. xxxi. 33, and Heb. viii. 10. To Him let Israel give all the praise!

SOME ANGLO-ISRAELITE TEACHING.

By J. THOMSON.

THE knowledge of Our Identity with the long lost Ten-tribed House of Israel has now been published a good many years in this country, in the colonies and in various parts of the world. From all that we have learnt, as to the results of such publication, though not coming up to our first anticipations, they seem to be fairly encouraging, considering the opposition which, at first, had to be overcome in various quarters. We very seldom have any violent opposition to meet now-a-days. If there is any, our opponents generally sheer off when they find themselves losing ground in argument, and often turn away from the subject and its further consideration, with a complacent smile of pity for those who are still the subjects of such harmless delusions.

But the most amusing part of this controversy is when some writer of note in one of the semi-religious popular journals of our time has the courage to examine the teaching involved in the knowledge of Our Identity, and he takes notice of the matter so far as to air a few notions upon the subject in the journal of which he is editor, or an "esteemed correspondent." For this condescending notice a thorough going advocate of Our Identity is always thankful, as there is a better prospect then of the question being examined than when it is cast aside as not deserving the slightest notice except by a few fanatics qualifying for Bedlam.

In the Sunday Companion for Sept. 14th, 1896, on p. 147, is a "Sunday School Lesson," which is founded upon the history of Jacob's Pillar; which might have been written by any Anglo-Israelite, in that its teaching, as a whole, is that which could only consistently be taught by a genuine Anglo-Israelite. There are also three notable illustrations—"Bethel,"—Jacob asleep with his vision of the angels—the coronation chair in Westminster Abbey,—and the Stone of Scone. The writer dates the period at about B.C. 1760. Jacob has just secured his father's blessing by a cruel and mean trick, and is hurriedly escaping alone and on foot to Padan-Aram from his brother Esau.

"Soon after leaving Beersheba, Jacob appears to have entered the great road which, at the time, ran northward along the central mountain ridge of Canaan. On the second or third evening he came to the western slope of the hill, where stood the hamlet of Luz. It is now, and doubtless was then, a dreary region, singularly bleak, and even forbidding, in aspect. Neither beauty nor grandeur distinguishes the site, nor is there fertility in the surrounding country. The patriarch could have had no trouble in finding a stone for his 'pillow;' the difficulty would be to perceive anything else. Grey, jagged rocks crop up everywhere over the scanty soil; and the view around presents only bare, rounded heights. Yet the name 'Bethel' means 'place' or 'house of God.'

"There Jacob lay down to sleep. The stone upon which he rested his head would seem too hard and solid if a European put it to such a use; but the Oriental habits of wearing a turban, and also of wrapping the head in an outer garment, would make it more of a cushion.

"We must not omit reference here to the curious legend that the famous 'coronation stone,' now in Westminster Abbey, was the patriarch's pillow upon this occasion. How it was subsequently conveyed to Ireland is not historically clear; but there it appears as the Lia Fail, and was set up on the hill of Tara, being used at royal coronations. Fergus, son of Eric, removed it to the shores of Argyllshire and from thence King Kenneth, in the ninth century, took it to Scone, on the Tay, near Perth, where it was enclosed in a wooden chair. Next the monarchs of Scotland were crowned upon it; until Edward I. of England transferred it to Westminster.

"As it is reputed to wield the magic property of securing royalty to the nation possessing it, we may hope it will remain there; but certainly Jacob never suspected the wonderful destiny of his rocky pillow, nor must readers treat these statements as more than an epitome of certain singular traditions. The 'coronation chair and stone,' however, are preserved in the Abbey."

This, so far, is not bad even for an Anglo-Israelite, and inasmuch as that is doubtful we may be satisfied with so much, while he hopes the "stone will remain there," which speaks well for his patriotism. He goes on,—

"When Jacob awoke, the desolate spot where, sad and weary, he had lain down to sleep appeared to him no longer the same. He had learned that it was really near to the invisible world, and under the protection of Jehovah. Therefore, to mark the reassuring fact in a suitable manner, he erects the stone on which his head had rested as a permanent memorial of the circumstances; and, by pouring upon it some of the oil carried with him in Eastern fashion for medicine or food (see Luke x. 34), he gave it a sacred character.

"Thenceforth the locality became a kind of sanctuary. Abraham already had built an altar there (Gen. xii. 8); but from Jacob's time it was more generally treated as a 'holy' place by all the tribes of the land. Canaanite and Hebrew actually fought for its possession (Josh. xii. 16; Jud. i. 22). Jacob himself visited it again afterwards to set up a second and more enduring pillar (Gen. xxxv. 14). Four centuries later a great national council was held there under the rule of the Judges. But in the reign of the wily Jeroboam it was desecrated by the worship of a golden calf: and subsequently, by the prophets Hosea and Amos, its name was changed to Bethaven (house of idols) and the curse pronounced, which to this day is fulfilled in its shapeless ruins and rifled tombs.

"Nevertheless, Dean Stanley's words respecting 'the pillar, or cairn, or cromlech of Bethel' should be thoughtfully considered by students of 'comparative religion.'

'It should be looked upon, he affirms, 'as the precursor of every House of God that has since risen in the Jewish and Christian world—the temple, the cathedral, the church, the chapel; nay, more of those secret places of worship that are marked by no natural beauty and seen by no human eye—the closet, the catacomb, the thoroughfare of the true worshipper.' It is the practice still among Orientals to set up a stone in token of gratitude or reverence. Mr. Morris relates that, when ascending the rock of Istakhar, in Persia, his old guide 'every here and there placed a stone on a conspicuous bit of rock, or two stones one upon the other,' at the same time uttering a prayer for a safe journey and a sure return home.

"Within Great Britain still exist noteworthy groups of stones which probably had a religious origin. At Stennis, in Orkney, and at Stonehenge and Axbury, in Wiltshire, are extremely interesting relics and evidences of an ancient and long vanished faith. They consisted of large blocks, disposed in a circular form, and surrounded by a trench and mound, but are now more or less disarranged. The popular idea is that each of these groups was once a Druidical temple; yet it is not impossible that they have been used for the successive rites of different races. At any rate, they can claim a real, although distant, relation with Jacob's sacred pillar."

Our readers will agree with us that if not an Anglo-Israelite, the editor of the Sunday Companion writes very like one, and we can allow him to teach that "it cannot be doubted that at various times God has providentially revealed His will to man by means of nightly visions." We have no doubt that our readers as well as ourselves will be glad to hear from him again upon the same, or similar, lines touching the truth of Our Identity with the lost Ten-tribed House of Israel, and its agreement with the prophecies of Holy Scripture.

BUDDHISM IN BRITAIN.

By E. Reep.

PART I.

Two interesting notices of Dr. Moore's "Ancient Pillar Stones of Scotland" have already appeared in the Banner of Israel (vols. xvii. 235, xviii. 325); it may therefore seem unnecessary to call further attention to Dr. Moore's valuable treatise. Notwithstanding, the present writer may be excused for again touching upon Dr. Moore's amazing assertion that a Hebrew-speaking community of Buddhists found their way to Scotland and there settled amongst a people also Hebrew-speaking, and who in writing employed the Ogham characters. As evidence of this astonishing fact we have in the north-east of Scotland, more especially in Aberdeenshire, numerous stones, as well as the so-called Newton Stone, inscribed with Buddhistic symbols, such as were used in the sacred rock-records of the first Buddhists in Western India. Until we lay aside our mythical stories of ancient Britain it will be difficult to believe that the supposed savage Britons had any sort of intercourse with India; that contact between East and West was as possible two thousand five hundred years ago as now. Yet Dr. Moore affirms that the connection between East and West was, 500 B.C., as easily maintained through Persia, Armenia, Cappadocia, Thrace and Germany, as at any period known to history. Then the merchant was sacred; then men lingered in their traffic without the need of passports, for the great monarchies were united in protecting and preserving free commercial communication between Europe and all Asia; therefore trade and travel were direct and constant.

This must have been so. Great armies, such as Alexander led into Asia, apparently marched with ease through countries that would tax the strength and endurance of a modern army to the very utmost. Letters, too, and information of every kind, seem to have been conveyed rapidly and regularly from one country to another. Thus we read of Alexander, in Asia, receiving news from home of such matters as the publication of some books by Aristotle, and of his written reply discussing the philosopher's arguments. So far therefore as travelling was concerned there was no serious obstacle in the way of Buddhist missionaries extending their faith to all parts of the world, even to so remote a country as Britain. At the same time it remains a curious question why Buddhist teachers should have sought converts at the uttermost bounds of the West. Their reasons for so doing can only be conjectured by looking into the origin of Buddhism.

It is pretty generally acknowledged by classical scholars that about the 5th century B.C., an intellectual movement swept over India and the Greek world. In India the movement had its rise among the Sacæ or Sakyas, colonists from Media and Persia. A people migrating from either of these countries would be certain to bring in their train a goodly number of the Magi (so-called), whose religion and philosophy so profoundly fascinated the mind of Plato that he conceived the idea of living amongst them. Among a people then settled in India, acquainted with the sacred system of the Magian priesthood, which, be it remembered, originated in the very regions to which had been deported the captive House of Israel, it is nothing extraordinary that there should have sprung up in their midst a religious reformer anxious to found a kingdom of righteousness. Wherefore the duty of proclaiming to all men the whole of the most excellent law became a cardinal doctrine in Buddhism. If it be that the Sakyas were repentant Median-Israelites, this conception of a mission to the whole world doubtless emanated from the determination, formed soon after their exile from Palestine, to put away all Baal-worship, to reject all representation of the Eternal in human form, and to devote themselves to the interpretation of the teaching of Moses as they had never thought of doing in their own land. In carrying out such a resolution the words of Moses could not fail to reveal to them the certainty that their seed was to be in many waters and that out of Israel was to rise a Sceptre that should have dominion over the whole earth. For the first time, too, it perhaps dawned upon them that as a chosen nation of priests it was for all Israelites to offer up prayers for the whole of mankind; that from them knowledge and virtue were to emanate through the universal race of man.*

That the first founders of Buddhism felt they had a mission to mankind is indicated by their symbolism. The wheel of the Buddhist, says Rhys David, is no ordinary wheel; it is the sign of dominion; the symbol of a universal empire of truth and righteousness. Buddhism, however, like Roman Christianity, has not adhered to the principles laid down by its first teachers. What is called Asoka Buddhism is supposed to represent much of its purest doctrine; and in all probablity they were Asoka Buddhists who inscribed their symbols on the pillar-stones of Scotland. The reason for this inference requires some explanation. With Alexander, as we all know, Greek influence spread across the world. All the world too, says Prof. Mahaffy, made up their minds that the rise of Alexander was a great turning point, when an older volume of history was finished and a new one begun. It is from the records of the new volume that we glean several important facts. A notable one is that the Semitic communities of Mesopotamia readily submitted themselves to Alexander's conquest. When Alexander, then, made up his mind to invade India we may conjecture that there went over the Hindu Kush with him shoals of Israelites who had been subjects of Darius, many of whom with their Greek comrades settled in the Indus provinces and throughout the Punjab. In the province of Bactria, between the western part of the Hindu Kush and the river Oxus, were also Medes, Persians, and Greeks living under kings with Greek names who established a Greek coinage, which has recently been discovered. The scanty remains of their architecture still show, we are told,* that the kings of this far remote Asiatic realm bordering upon the Tartars were Hellenistic in culture. Under this Hellenistic influence Buddhism grew into a popular creed; but not till the great King Asoka came into power (about 220 B.C.) did it attempt world-wide proselytism. This powerful king's conversion to Buddhism is described as an event as great as the adoption of Christianity by Constantine. His extensive authority gave free scope to the strong missionary spirit of the Buddhist priests, who made his name revered from the Volga to Japan, from Ceylon and Siam to the borders of Mongolia and Siberia. Professor Mahaffy thinks it probable that Buddhist missionaries also preached in Syria two centuries before the teaching of Christ was heard in Northern Palestine. Certainly the Essenes and the Therapeutæ put in practice the Buddhist creed of self-conquest, and at the same time conceived it to be their duty to spread their views in all countries. Buddhism may therefore have reached Britain from almost any part of the world, and through a Hebrew-speaking people. Why Buddhist Hebrew-speaking missionaries should be attracted to Britain with the laudable desire of imparting to its inhabitants a knowledge of the virtues of the most excellent law is sufficiently obvious in the fact that it was northern Israel's place of safety after her fall and dispersion. As it is written, "Keep silence before Me, O islands, and let the people (Israel) renew their strength: let them come near; then let them speak: let us come near together to judgment" (Isa. xli).

For Buddhism to become the religion of the world (numerically) it must have originated from some knowledge of Divine truth. That it had a Hebrew basis is hardly to be disputed if it can be demonstrated that the northern Israelites, carried captive to Media, were the founders of Zoroastrianism or the religion of Cyrus and the Magi; for Indian philosophy has been recognised as a positive offspring of the Magian faith. A writer in the Royal Asiatic Association's Journal (vol. 22, 1890) seems to take this view, inasmuch as he asserts that a religious community came into India from Persia. That there was a connection between these immigrants and the Aryans of Iran (Persia) is shown, he thinks, in the legend that the son of Vishnu or Krishna brought the priests of the Magi into India from Sakadwipa. The evidence likewise seems to show, he says, that it was the Iranian priests accompanying the Sakyas and Aryans who first brought the sacred metrical system into India. Thus the sacrifice of praise, thanksgiving, and prayer was introduced by the teaching of Aryan and Semitic immigrants.

Touching the period of Asoka Buddhism, Professor Max Müller says:* "There are no inscriptions to be found anywhere in India before the middle of the third century B.C. These inscriptions are Buddhist, put up during the reign of Asoka. . . . They are written in two alphabets—one written from right to left and clearly derived from an Aramean, that is Semitic alphabet;† the other written from left to right, and likewise an adaptation of a Semitic alphabet to the requirements of an Indian language. That second alphabet became the source of all Indian alphabets, and of many alphabets carried chiefly by Buddhist teachers far beyond the limits of India."

Although Sanscrit, in Professor Max Müller's opinion, had ceased to be spoken in India by the people at large when Buddhism arose, Schlegel sees in its structure and grammar a resemblance to Greek and a near affinity to Persian and Germanic roots. Hence we may infer that Sanscrit itself affords evidence of contact with a people acquainted with Media and Persia, if not a confirmation of the statement that the same peoples who introduced civilised and stable government into India performed the same task in the countries of Western Asia, in Greece, Egypt and Italy.

Without further discussing whether Persian traditions were derived from India or not, or vice versâ, let us now see if there be any line of Hebrew thought which at all agrees with the ideas that ultimately developed into Buddhism.

THE TRIBES.

INQUIRY COLUMN.

No. 4. September, 1896.

QUESTION 1. "What difference does it make?"

Answer. This is the stock question of those who have no other answer to the claims of Israel's continuity and Identity in the Saxon. We may say in general, that it makes all the difference in the world whether the promises of God are true or not. If the Israelites have come to nought, the promises relating to them must have come to nought also. They stand or fall together. They share each others fate. This is manifest and no one can deny it. The Scriptures teach that the promises pertain to the Israelites. "The promise is unto you and your children." "The promise made unto the fathers, unto which promise our Twelve Tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come." Such expressions are of constant occurrence. Is it not important that these promises be confirmed by fulfilment? Men are staggering at them through unbelief. Is it any wonder when so much of exposition of Scripture, in current theology, consists of explanations of why they were not kept? If the promises have not been kept it must be because the Maker of them could not keep them, or would not. If the first, He is less that All-mighty; if the last, His veracity is impeached. Either of these conclusions is inadmissible? It is monstrous then, for men to ask, "What difference does it make?" The difference between "fallible expectations" and the sure word of prophecy is the difference between death and life!

This "What difference" objection is answered clearly and briefly, but conclusively, in the closing paragraph of "The Bible a Sealed Book, Why?" which reads thus: "Suppose the Saxons are of Hebrew origin, what advantage is there in knowing it? Of what practical benefit is the subject to us? Much every way. The knowledge of our racial connection with Israel is the corrective for the ignorance and misunderstanding of much of the Old Testament; it elucidates not only the prophetic books, but also the Gospel; it strengthens the race bond, and promotes the most exalted patriotism; it gives a new and increased interest to the development and extension of the Anglo-Saxon race and power; it affords an enlarged hope in the prophecies and promises of the Holy Scriptures, which have been unsatisfactorily forced into a purely spiritual meaning, or left as unsolvable mysteries. In a word, it makes the Bible an open and an unsealed book. The Scriptures are at once seen to be, of all writings, the most explicit in speech, and the most accurate in thought. Their claim to a Divine origin is established beyond all question or cavil. It becomes as certain and manifest as in the days of Joshua, that, "There failed not aught of all the good things which the Lord hath spoken unto the House of Israel; it all came to pass" (Josh. xxi. 43, Leeser Version.)

"Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it; shout ye lowest depths of the earth; break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein; for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and in Israel will He glorify Himself" (Isa. xliv. 23, Leeser's V.)

Are not these advantages of priceless value?

Question 2. "Explain the issue between the advocates and the opponents of the Anglo-Israel Identity?"

Answer, The real issue between the Anglo-Israelites and their opponents relates to the promises of God. Paul teaches that the promises, as well as the adoption, the covenants, and the giving of the law, pertain to the Israelites. This, even if he had not said it, is manifest. They, according to these promises, were to possess the Gates of their enemies, extend their dominions to the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills, push the peoples together to the ends of the earth, rule over many nations, be set on high above all nations in honour, praise and power, of them all nations were to be afraid, while in them all the families of the earth were to be blessed. Have these promises been kept? All Anglo-Israelites say, Yes; while their opponents say, No. Of the latter there are two classes of schools. The Higher critical school call these predictions and the hopes inspired by them, "fallible expectations." The Apologetic school admit that they have not been fulfilled in the nation of Israel, but claim that in a figurative, or metaphorical sense, they have been fulfilled in Gentile Christianity. This they call the spiritual sense, in which they claim these promises must be accepted. Anglo-Israelites, on the other hand, claim that since the words written were inspired by the Holy Spirit, the real, or historic sense, is the spiritual sense. That other is a phantomizing sense, which men have invented and misnamed "spiritual."

We—Identity believers—hold to the idea that the God of the Bible is an honest and plain spoken God, who says what He means and does as He says. We accept the view of Daniel Webster, who said that he believed that the Scriptures were to be understood in the obvious meaning of their words, since he could not persuade himself that a book, given for the instruction and conversion of the world, was written in language which only philosophers and scholars could understand. This clearly states the situation. The Higher Critics and the Apologists fight each other, but neither of them answer our arguments. One would suppose that they would either combat these arguments or cordially accept them, as indifference would seem out of the question, since it makes all the difference in the world whether the promises of God are true or false. Their only answer, however, is a sly twinkle of the eye, a good-natured laugh, or "a big word peremptorily spoken." These are not arguments. Let them fight like men, or throw up the sponge! Let them answer our arguments or yield the palm. It is no answer to say: "Have any of the rulers of the Pharisees believed?" We surely have got beyond that.

"Humanity sweeps onward, where to-day the traitor stands,
To-morrow crouches Judas with the silver in his hands;
And the hooting mob of yesterday, in silent awe return,
To gather up the ashes, for history's golden urn."

RANDOM SHAFTS.

THE Morning Star is another organ of those who look for the speedy advent of Messiah; but it differs materially from Things to Come, both in tone and substance. It takes a lively interest in the Hebrew, which perhaps is natural, as prophetic developments are obviously rushing to a head, and all religious papers have at present "their faces Zionward." But, what is less common—or, I might say, what is most uncommon—the Morning Star does not confine its attention to the Jews, or speak as if Judah were the only tribe worth a glance. On the contrary, it distinctly recognizes the Ten Tribes as an important factor in the restoration, and discusses their whereabouts with a very unusual measure of sympathy. The views expressed on that point do not by any means agree with our own; but, outside the literature of Anglo-Israelism, no journal seems to have so clear a perception of the duties attaching to "watchmen" in these pregnant times.

That its contributors are fairly well read in those Scriptures which more especially concern the Ten Tribes is evident from such remarks as the following, in an article by E. C. Bradley: "From Micah iv. 7 we learn that in the latter day, while Judah is only described as a remnant, Israel will be a strong nation." "Thenceforward in the Word of God they are treated as outcasts and lost among the nations, until, at a time still future, we find them in Ezek. xx. 35 suddenly brought into the wilderness of the people, where the Lord will plead with them face to face, . . . and will cause them to pass under the rod, and bring them into the bond of the covenant." "While the man of sin will be in Jerusalem, persecuting the Jews, the Ten Tribes will be in the wilderness, and not only not under his control, but in a position to resist him. They, as a nation, were not in the land when our Lord said, 'If another come in his own name, him ye will receive.'" Even the widely-bruited presence of Anna in the Temple does not trouble him; as he cites 1 Kings xii. 17, and thinks this will account for it.

Apparently Mr. Bradley has no definite opinion respecting the location of lost Israel, and he makes no attempt to discover it, but merely tries to identify the wilderness, which place has not the same meaning with him as with us. Since Hosea ii. 14, 15 mentions it in connection with the Valley of Achor, he argues that this wilderness includes the Dead Sea region; while, from other texts (Isa. xi. 14; Dan. xi. 41), he maintains that it comprehends Philistia, Ammon, Edom, and Moab, which Israel must yet inhabit, and there be pleaded with. But Hosea and Isaiah here simply indicate that southern Palestine will be subdued by Israel on her return—that is, when leaving the wilderness; they do not teach that southern Palestine is itself the wilderness. Further, we are not told by Hosea ii. 15 that the Valley of Achor is in the wilderness, but that Israel shall receive it, along with her vineyards, from the wilderness.

After reading the various passages bearing on this wilderness, there can be no doubt whatever that it is not simply a district in which God pleads with Israel for a brief season, but is the land where she passes her term of exile. According to Ezek. xx. 34, 35, God would gather Israel out of the countries through which they were scattered in that prophet's days, lead them to a "sanctuary" (Ezek. xi. 16), and bring them into the bond of the covenant. They are not in ancient Media now, either as worshippers of "wood and stone," or as a "strong nation." Consequently, they must have been moved into the wilderness; but they are certainly not to be found in Edom or Philistia. Although the direction in which they went is not given, Scripture reveals to us the direction from which they return, and that is much the same thing. Jer. iii. 18 and Hosea xi. 10 are sufficient for our purpose. Jeremiah declares that at the restoration Judah walks to Israel, when they "come together out of the land of the north," and, as Mr. Bradley's plan would bring them from the south, its fallacy is patent.

Succeeding Mr. Bradley's article, there is one by the Rev. Henry Brass, M.A., F.G.S., who also contends for a literal restoration of the whole Twelve Tribes, and deals seriously with the Ten. Of the latter he observes: "Some have identified them with the Nestorians, others with the Beni-Israel amongst the Afghans, &c.; possibly there may be partial truth in all these, but, from all I have read on this subject, I have come to this conclusion. If you draw a line north and south through the Holy Land, generally speaking, all Jews to the west of the line belong to the Two Tribes, all to the east to the Ten. And this is not an arbitrary division. The whole nation was carried captive to Babylon and Assyria in the East: the Ten Tribes remained there, and would naturally expand eastward; the Two returned, and were carried captive by the Romans westward. . . . One thing seems clear—the Ten Tribes will be restored as well as the Two, and become 'one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel.'"

This geographical distribution of the Twelve Tribes is quite unsound, in two ways. First, because the Jews who returned were but a fragment of the Two (or rather three) Tribes. The great majority stayed in Babylon; so that it is impossible to "draw a line north and south in the Holy Land" which shall have Jews on the west and Israelites on the east. Again, it might be natural for the Ten Tribes to expand eastwards; but it was just as natural for them to expand northwards, and far more scriptural. As already shown, the restoration is peculiarly associated with the north and west; so that, if the Ten Tribes return from the east, Jer. iii. 18, xxiii. 8, xxxi. 8, and Hosea xi. 10 will have no fulfilment. But, if searchers for lost Israel cast their eyes towards the British Islands, they will discern a people who comply with this and every additional requirement of the prophets. JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

Reviews.

Coming Events in the East and the Return of the Jews to Palestine. A paper read before some students of prophecy, May, 1896. By H. Aldersmith, M.D., F.R.C.S. Reprinted from "The Covenant People." James Nisbet and Co., 21, Berners-street, Oxford-street, 1896. 2d.

WE are glad to find that Dr. Aldersmith has republished his valuable paper, above described, in a pamphlet form, after it appeared in "The Covenant People." The author writes in an interesting way, and evinces throughout his little work research and originality which make anything from his pen valuable to British-Israelites, and indeed to all students of prophecy. He commences by pointing out that the three woes of the book of Revelation are poured out upon the Gentile non-Israelite nations, while "the great tribulation" is for Judah and Israel to try them (Jer. xxx. 4). He concurs with other interpreters in holding that the second woe represents the Ottoman Power, which has not yet passed away. With the Armenian massacres before us, no one could venture to say that we are free yet from that woe. Dr. Aldersmith believes that "Gog" and "the king of the north" represent the same (Russian) Power, with its allies, which is destined to come up against Israel and Judah united on the mountains of Israel, at the time of the end. This Power he connects with "the Assyrian" who is to meet his doom in the last days, according to Isa. xiv. 25, xxxi. 4, 8; Micah v. 5; and Jer. xxx. 1—8, and with the Beast who arises during the second woe (Rev. xi. 7). The third woe he believes to be still future, being God's punishment of this final Power—Gog and his hosts with Babylon and the False Prophet. He follows Professor T. R. Birks in his last work on "Sacred Prophecy" in these views.

The interesting part of Dr. Aldersmith's pamphlet is that wherein he refers to the "king of the South." This Power he holds with Birks to be Great Britain, which already grasps the vast Southern Empire of India," and, as Birks surmised, may also have possession of Egypt in the time of crisis, and thence push against the Northern adversary. The passage from Birks' "Two Later Visions of Daniel," quoted by Dr. Aldersmith on p. 10, reads thus:—

"Egypt alone seems too feeble to undertake any serious resistance to a confederacy so vast and mighty. . . . That the same Power which holds the vast southern empire of India may then also have possession of Egypt, and from thence push against the inroads of its Northern adversary, it would be rash to expect with confidence, but the conjecture is not unreasonable. The course of events and the necessities of commerce appear more and more to be grouping together India, Egypt and Britain. . . . When, therefore, all the continent shall be gathered under one head, as King of the North, it seems not improbable that the maritime Empire of Britain may be the rival Power, and that its acquisition of Egypt will give to it the prophetic character of the King of the South.' . . . 'The great leader of the North will overflow and pass on to the South, to crush the Power which has assailed him. The description answers exactly to the words of Ezekiel, where he predicts the march of Gog against the land of Israel.'

"This has indeed come to pass (Dr. Aldersmith adds), and with our fresh advance into the Soudan it is not very likely that Great Britain will get out of Egypt before the Eastern crisis becomes acute. Besides, as 'Gog' is the same Power as 'the King of the North,' it is very evident that Great Britain must be the 'King of the South,' for hardly any student of prophecy doubts against whom Gog or Russia comes up over the final settlement of the Eastern Question."

The following piece of close reasoning which brings the pamphlet to near its close shows us how strong is the ground on which the writer rests when he states his belief that "the King of the South" is Great Britain, which, after the great tribulation is nearly finished, will push against the Russian confederacy as King of the North, till finally God delivers our race, as well as the Jews, out of the trouble. Our author writes thus:—

"But what about 'the King of the South?' It seems simply marvellous to me that so few realize that the time of the overwhelming of the King of the South is actually 'the great tribulation,' when Michael stands up for his people Israel as well as Judah, and that they are to be saved out of it. But where is the larger division of Daniel's people in the last days—viz., the lost 'House of Israel,' unless they are the people called 'the King of the South?' for both the House of Israel and the House of Judah are to be in Jacob's trouble (Jer. xxx. 4).

"In Daniel, speaking of this time of the end, we read: 'When they have made an end of breaking in pieces the power of the holy people [viz., the Israelites], all these things shall be finished' (xii. 7).

"And it is quite clear that the very people who are to suffer so terribly under the invasion of the King of the North during the great tribulation are the Southern people holding Egypt in those days.* Therefore, I maintain, it clearly follows that this people must be Israelites, for the scattering of their power is actually spoken of as the breaking in pieces the power of 'the holy people,' and none here will deny that 'the man clothed in linen,' in foretelling this great event at the end, undoubtedly referred to God's chosen race—Israel and Judah. Hence, if Great Britain be the King of the South, as so many of us believe, she must also be part of 'the holy people,' or Israel.

"Again, those who are to suffer under Gog's invasion are undoubtedly God's chosen people, 'even My people Israel'—Israel and Judah. So, logically, it clearly follows that if Gog and the King of the North be the same Power, even Russia and her combined hosts—which most of you will admit—then the 'King of the South, and 'My people Israel,' against whom this Northern Power comes up, must also be identical. No one doubts that it is Israel that Gog comes up against, and yet I am laughed at when I say 'the King of the South' must also be part of God's people Israel. I maintain that you cannot logically get out of this difficulty, except by owning that the King of the South is part of God's chosen race. But it cannot be Judah, or the Jews, for at that time they are to be 'few in number,' and would be unable, without any army or navy, to push at the Northern adversary, as the King of the South is foretold to do. Besides the House of Judah is then at Jerusalem, as Zechariah informs us (xii.); while in chap. x. we are told that Joseph's house, before that time, is to be increased in number, and to 'remember God in far countries' (x. 7—10).

"Hence, this division of God's people—the House of Israel—is the power that pushes against the King of the North. But if Great Britain be the Power called 'the King of the South' in these last days, it logically follows that Great Britain is the House of Israel, in spite of the unjust and frivolous objections that are raised by some against this view.

"Jeremiah actually says, concerning this time—Jacob's trouble—that both the House of Judah and the House of Israel shall be saved out of it, and also that 'it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord of Hosts, that I will break his yoke from off thy neck,' which can only refer to the Assyrian's yoke, the final head of the Beast, or Gog, on Israel and Judah, in the last days. And all this proves,

* "The land of Egypt shall not escape" (Dan. xi. 42).

Digitized by Google

I consider, that the King of the South, or, as I believe, Great Britain, is indeed part of God's chosen race, for the people called 'the King of the South' are to suffer terribly under the great tribulation, which is a tribulation on Israel, as well as the Jews, before the final deliverance of God's chosen race."

We have said enough deeply to interest our readers in Dr. Aldersmith's work and lead them to procure, read, and keep it. There is no doubt that the main features of his scheme of interpretation are correct, since the prophecies of Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. fully corroborate Dan. xi. and xii., and show that Jacob's trouble is the result of Russia's last effort to destroy her enemies, "the holy people" (Dan. xii. 7, R.V.), the Israelites, and the end will be Russian Gog's overthrow by the hand of God. To the Lord be all the praise.

The Great Pyramid. By John Chapman, F. R. Met. Soc. Author of "The Great Pyramid and Freemasonry," &c., &c. London: J. S. Virtue and Co., and of the Author, The Lawn, Torquay. 2/6.

A HANDSOME volume as above comes to us from a writer well-known to many of our readers, which, while containing little that is absolutely new about the Great Pyramid; having been in fact, as the title-page states, reprinted from the Devon County Standard, the Freemasons' Chronicle, the Hastings and St. Leonard's News, and the Isle of Wight Advertiser, yet is well worthy of being added to the library of Pyramid Students, or better still, will form an admirable present to any friend to whom the subject is not already familiar, since the author's facts are almost exclusively derived from the writings of the greatest pyramid authority, Dr. C. Piazzi Smyth, to whom this work is dedicated.

The contents are very well arranged, and after describing the construction of this wonderful pile of masonry the writer takes us carefully through the scientific lessons, the historic testimony and the prophetic pointing of the building in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired except an immediate study of the larger standard works referred to, and which we make no doubt is the author's intention towards his readers, as indicated in the preface.

We are usefully reminded by Mr. Chapman that the ordinary reader must "try and forget a great deal that he has met with concerning the Great Pyramid in order to be able to grapple with the details as now appear, since the historian, the artist, and the philosopher, have each alike contributed to the mystification of the subject and have established prejudices that militate against the formation of a true estimate of this marvellous building." We note that Mr. Chapman, like Mr. Brangwin, both of them masonic writers upon this subject, seems a little more struck than ordinary folk by the wonderful and mysterious skill of the subterranean works leading to the quasi-sepulchre, an unfinished though exquisitely commenced apartment and a place that could never have been appropriated to its suggested purpose, and we get a piece of information on page 20 that we do not remember to have met with before, viz., that Dr. J. A. S. Grant, of Cairo, has discovered in the grotto beneath the well leading from the grand gallery almost vertically downwards, there is firmly embedded in the wall a granite block, which Mr. Chapman very appropriately suggests may prove to be the entrance to another passage and also to a chamber that will form the solution of the thirty-sixth course of masonry as a basement storey.

Readers of "Life and Work" will be glad to learn that our old friend Alece Dobree, Piazzi Symth's Arab assistant at the Great Pyramid, is still in existence with his little museum of casing stone fragments "with the angle perfect," although we are told by a recently returned Egyptian tourist that he complains grievously of the lack of appreciation of this angle evinced by to-day's travellers.

Mr. Chapman, as all know, is a staunch Anglo-Israelite, and does not omit to inform his readers, page 48, that he considers as do we, that "the identification of the lost Ten Tribes of Israel with the British nation has proved a magic key with which to unlock the dark truths that shroud some of the prophecies . . . giving to the inspired volume a richness and a fulness of meaning that it did not previously possess." He regards our rapid acquisition of territory throughout the globe during the past few years as a happy fulfilment of the Divine promise to Israel—viz., "that the uttermost parts of the earth shall be her possession" (p. 61).

We quite accept Mr. Chapman's conclusions to the main argument—viz., "If therefore the triple testimony, viz., the Scientific, the Historic, and the Prophetic, has brought forth the Great Pyramid, and commended it for our acceptance as a divinely erected monument intended to be a witness to the Lord of Hosts in these latter days—then let us with gratitude accept it as such, and watch with confidence for the great events of the immediate future."

Correspondence.

THE NORTH OF ENGLAND ANGLO-ISRAEL COUNCIL.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—We had a real time of blessing at the Liverpool meeting of the above Council, which was most refreshing to very many. There seemed an atmosphere of earnestness and reality about it which appears somehow wanting in most religious meetings, and for which I believe all true Christians are longing and hungering—i.e., the fellowship or "communion of the saints," a phrase, I fear, more often repeated than realised.

With such an "electric light" upon the Word of God as a knowledge of our national identity as Israel affords, this reality can be easily understood. We take God at His Word, and wholly believe the Bible, which is proved absolutely true by means of this great truth.

But my chief object in troubling you with this letter is to say what I omitted to do at the meeting, in the midst of so much important business—viz., would it not be possible at each of these conferences to have an evening lecture in some large hall, so as to make the most of the opportunities presented by this "forward movement" to spread a knowledge of the truth we all value and love? The two meetings held on Saturday last were stated to be "for believers only," and it seems to me that we want to use every possible means to get the ear of the public.

To illustrate my meaning, when Mr. Earnest P. Dix (now of London) was the hon. sec. of the Liverpool Association, we had a splendid lecture, before at least seven hundred people, in Hope Hall, from the Rev. Robert Douglas, M.A., on "The Position of England in Prophecy" (if I remember rightly). If this could be done then, might we not hope that, with the terrible events now occurring in Turkey, and the murder of so many thousands of our Armenian fellow-Israelites, even greater interest would be taken in a lecture on this subject? I am glad to notice that lectures are a prominent feature in the scheme of the Council.

Yours faithfully,

THEODORE S. HILL.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR SIR,—I feel that I am imposing on your kindness, and trespassing on the space of your valuable columns of the BANNER OF ISRAEL; but the request of several anonymous donors to acknowledge their kind gifts in the BANNER must be my plea. And, in doing so, I would again ask you kindly to permit me to give a few extracts from some of the friends' letters, which greatly cheer and encourage me in the blessed work, far more than even their gifts. For these blessed messages make the gift doubly blest.

One friend writes: "Ever since I first heard of the glorious work in which you are engaged, I have prayed daily to our heavenly Father to grant you health and strength, as well as a great measure of His Holy Spirit, to enable you to accomplish this blessed work. May His chosen people, then, no longer be 'destroyed for lack of knowledge.'" Another friend, who was present at a meeting at which I spoke, writes: "How thankful I felt when I heard you tell that already some of the Bible had been translated into a language that could be understood by the poorer class of Jews, and that these portions were even now in the hands of many. I had only been waiting to know that the work of translation was really begun by you to show my sympathy in the work that so plainly commends itself to all who love the Lord Jesus and His Israel. I did not think of giving more than one pound towards it, as I am not rich, and there are so many calls for help in God's work in these days; but I felt I must, constrained by the love of Christ, do a little more than I thought, even if it may call for some self-denial; it is a privilege even to do so little to aid in giving God's precious Word —so dear to us—back to those who gave it to us in the beginning. I enclose a thank-offering of £10, and I hope and pray that the sum of £1,000 you need may speedily be sent in to you by the Master's rich servants."

Another friend sent me the following lines:—

"Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days."—Eccles. xi. 1.

"The bread of life can ne'er be lost,
Though scattered far and wide;
And thou shalt surely find again
Each crumb thou hast supplied.

It may be after many days,
But trust thy faithful Lord;
The souls which thou hast fed with Christ
Shall be thy great reward."

I am now translating the last book, viz., Chronicles, which forms the last in order according to the Hebrew Bible, which is now being set up and stereotyped as fast as I can supply the MS. It may perhaps be advisable, for the information of friends, to give the books according to the Hebrew order. They are as follows:—

I. The Pentateuch, called the Torah, meaning the Law.
II. The Prophets, which consist of:—
(a) The former Prophets—Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings.
(b) The latter Prophets—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets.

III. The (other) Writings (or, as called by the Greeks, Hagiographa, or Sacred Writings), which are: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1 and 2 Chronicles.

All the above, with the exception of part of Chronicles, is not only set up in type, but also stereotyped ready for press. The first edition of the Pentateuch and Psalms is already exhausted. I am constantly receiving requests from Jews, and missionaries working among them, from all parts of the world, to send these Scriptures. How forcibly I am reminded of the fulfilment of the prophecy in Amos viii. 11, 12, when these requests come for the Word of God, and I am not able to supply them.

My heart often rejoices when I see the great pleasure and gratitude with which those portions already out are received by the Jews, and especially by Jewesses. Only on Tuesday, Sept. 8th, that being the solemn Rosh Hashanah (New Year's day), I have received a request from a Russian Jewess for a copy of the Pentateuch. I took it myself. The poor woman, when I presented her with it, first kissed the book most reverently, and then, stooping down, kissed my feet. It touched me very much to see such gratitude.

A Jew, writing from Paris, says: "I have seen a notice of your translation in The Truth, and therefore beg of you, dear Jewish brother, to send me a copy of the Bible, and I promise you that I will diligently read it. The Hebrew Bible is for me too difficult to understand. It is now many years since I had a longing desire to read God's Word in my own mother tongue; but, alas! I could not find such. But, when I had seen the above notice, I praised God that He had heard my prayer, and I now rejoice in the hope of soon to possess this inestimable treasure in my house."

Surely every one who has so kindly and generously helped in giving the bread of life to the many hungry ones in Judah, must rejoice with me in these blessed results.

I have just brought out, at the suggestion of a friend, the Epistle to the Hebrews, with illustrations of the priestly offices in the Temple on the Day of Atonement. This blessed portion is being paid for by friends apart from the Old Testament funds. A copy of which I herewith enclose. I trust ere long to commence the whole of the New Testament, and feel sure that the Lord will most graciously supply the means for that also.

Thanking you most heartily for your great kindness in permitting me to make known the need for this work,

I am, my dear sir,
Yours faithfully in Jesus and the hope of Israel,
MARCUS S. BERGMANN.

I may here say that I have still about 70 copies of the beautiful anthem, "The Lord shall comfort Zion," and shall be glad to supply any friend with a copy at 2s. 1d., post free.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—As the writer of the short article on "Hebrew Inscriptions on Stones Discovered in the United States" (see the BANNER OF ISRAEL, No. 972), and in answer to your correspondent, Mr. Neury, in last week's BANNER (see No. 1,028), I regret to say that I have not been successful in obtaining any information besides that then given. If Mr. Neury, or any other person, can throw any further light thereon, it will be most interesting, and valued highly by every Anglo-Israelite as a bit of secondary evidence not to be despised.

I remain, yours faithfully,
JOSEPH THOMSON.

AFFAIRS IN GENERAL.

WRITING, as we do, in the beginning of October, 1896, there are one or two matters of which notice must be taken in our BANNER record of the march of events. There seems at last some hope that the Rhodesian rising is drawing to its expected end. It has been a long and harassing guerrilla war, wherein the brave but cruel native Matabele tribes have shown that they are ready to adopt our British tactics, and fight us, not only in their usual fashion, with the assegai and shield, but with British rifles, which they have readily learnt to use. They have learnt, besides, to fight under cover, behind rocks and stones, and under the protection of natural fortresses and caves, with which their country seems literally to abound. British pluck, mounted infantry, and the plan of never giving a native impi rest, but attacking it at once, as soon as its presence was reported anywhere, has been, under God, too much for a gallant people, who expected to exterminate their enemies, but never expected to come out with defeats from first to last. They are said now to "be tired of fighting, and are surrendering and treating for peace." It will be long, no doubt, before the rebellion has been completely wiped out, since our foes are really savages, and we cannot expect them to act reasonably like European combatants, and know when they are really beaten.

God's hand is plainly manifested all through these operations in our favour, giving our small and motley forces the bravery and gallantry needed to make them superior to their native foes, who, being always in the majority, often surrounded our handsful of Europeans, half-breeds, and friendly natives, led by our own countrymen, but in the end were invariably repulsed, with more or less loss of life to themselves. Matabeleland and Mashonaland being rich in the precious metals, and being a land fit for the settlement of some millions of our countrymen, we could not afford to lose, and consequently we have seen the struggle continued by our settlers, assisted by "Cape Boys" and some few hundreds of her Majesty's troops, armed as mounted infantry.

While success has attended our arms in regard to the native rebellion, not much is being said regarding the Boer and Uitlander question. At present it seems to be dormant, though it has to be noted that President Kruger is raising defensive works round Pretoria after the fashion of Paris, and that large quantities of guns and ammunition have been imported for some time back, to prepare for what is likely to come, provided the Boers continue to treat the British and other European settlers in the country as they are doing now, with severity, suspicion, and injustice.

From the Soudan there is nothing but success to report. Dongola, with the province of that name, has been taken, and occupied by Major-General Sir H. Kitchener, whose first act, after victory, was to send back his British infantry regiment to Cairo, impelled thereto, we suppose, by economical considerations, since the expedition has been starved by the jealousy of France, who has forbidden Egypt to spend her own savings on the war! The road to Khartoum is now open; but it is supposed that no effort to seize it will be made this year, but during the next, if matters are then propitious.

A short but instructive paper in the Covenant People, by "Oxonian," on "The Lifting of the Burdens of Egypt," will well repay perusal. Among the burdens of Egypt which our nation has just lifted, is the destruction by defeat in war of the Dervish bugbear. It has withered and disappeared with the advance of the British and Egyptian army southwards; and now, from Alexandria to Dongola, British influence is paramount, and the inhabitants of the Soudan are everywhere hailing the Sirdar, Sir H. Kitchener, as the saviour, or rather as the representative of the earthly power which has saved Egypt from miseries untold. The extract which "Oxonian" publishes from The Dawn of India (January, 1895) is a glorious testimony to the benefit Christian Britain has conferred on heathen India. The sentence which closely follows it is what concerns us to-day: "Such is India under British rule; and what India is, Egypt is rapidly becoming." "Surely a nation introducing justice and equity is," says Oxonian, "not misnamed 'a righteous nation, keeping truth.'"

Among the "affairs in general," we cannot ignore the designs of Russia, and the Armenian atrocities. Whither are these matters tending now? and what do the signs of the times portend? There is a feeling that the present crisis will pass over. But it must recur again soon, and the smallest mistake on the part of the Powers will, we suppose, precipitate the great explosion! The whole trouble hinges, we believe, on the possession of the great Gate Constantinople, and the strategic waterways that run beside it, and connect the Black Sea with the Mediterranean. Russia means to have it all, and desires, we believe, to let the Armenians be ground down and massacred by Turkish murderers, till, at a convenient moment, the whole territory may be incorporated with her own empire, and so open the way from the north-west into Syria and Palestine. She may not make an effort to seize the Gate just now, as any movement in that direction would be followed by war with Austria, Hungary, and Germany to back it, since Austria has set her heart upon possessing the Gate, and will never agree to its lapsing to the Russian Bear. These Powers (Austria and Germany) must defend our own Israelite claims upon this strategic spot; but we can afford to stand by and look on till we note the issue of the contest between Russia and the Teutons for possession of the "peerless port" and of the water highways belonging to it.

But why does Russia desire to annex the land of Israel's inheritance, given by the Lord to the chosen race? Because Russia knows nothing of the prophecies, but believes that her own object will be best served if she can prevent British trade passing by the Suez Canal from the British Islands to the Indian Empire, Australia, and the Cape, and vice versâ, from the East to the British West. With Palestine and Egypt in possession, she thinks to sever British interests east and west of the Canal, and so acquire for herself the commerce and wealth of the world, at our expense. In vain! Prophecy reserves nothing but ruin at last for Russian Gog; though, before that event occurs called "Jacob's trouble," our nation, being Israel, must pass through terrible vicissitudes, but "be saved out of it" at last. To the Lord our King let Israel give all the praise for this, our mighty consolation (Jer. xxx. 7, R.V.).

THE QUEEN'S REIGN.

"On Wednesday last the Queen's reign surpassed, in length, that of any of her predecessors. All the praises of the 'Golden Alphabet' might well and worthily be written in praise of Her Majesty, to whom the King of kings has given the blessing promised to those who revere God and obey His commands. Appreciation of length of days is characteristically Jewish, and on none will the Jews of this Empire invoke a more earnest blessing than upon her whom it has been vouchsafed to wield, for so long and glorious a time, the sceptre of these realms. It is unnecessary to refer to the change in the position of Jews in England during these sixty years. It is considerably less than half a century since the disabilities from which our people had for so many ages suffered, even in this great and free country, were fully removed and those of our faith and kindred admitted to full rights of citizenship. Her Majesty is known to have taken an active personal interest in the accomplishment of our emancipation, a circumstance for which our gratitude goes out to her in special degree. Our people have fully justified the tolerant and enlightened statesmanship which opened to them the doors of distinction common to the rest of their fellow subjects, and have contributed more than their proportionate share of valuable and valued service to Victoria's mighty empire. Of all the acts which have made the Queen a universally beloved sovereign, none have struck so deeply as that one in which she displayed her sympathy with the oppressed Jews who suffered in the Damascus incident. As Graetz said, by the knighthood she conferred on Sir Moses Montefiore, and the letter in which she recorded her pleasure in the deed, Her Majesty wrote a page in Jewish history—and that one of the brightest. We but humbly express the feelings of the Jewish community in wishing Her Majesty a happy and long continuance of her nobly spent life."—The Jewish World, London, Sept. 25, 1896.

We are glad to republish in the Banner the glowing words of Jewish loyal appreciation, which appear above, in regard to the length of days the God of Israel has given to our beloved Queen, in excess of those of any previous sovereign who has reigned in Israel's "appointed place" (2 Sam. vii. 10). We heartily concur in our Jewish brethren's kind and loyal sentiments towards our Queen, and earnestly wish for her with them "a happy and long-continued reign." She rules over the House of Israel, as a nation which has "spread abroad to the West and to the East, to the North and to the South;" and has occupied "the desolate heritages of the earth," and there has built up a company of daughter nations who refuse to separate from their "old mother in the North," but resolve to throw in their lot with hers, and so proclaim to the world the fulfilment of the prophecy which declared (see Gen. xlviii. 19, R.V.), that the afterseed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, should become at last "a fulness," or "multitude, of nations;"—a fact already come to pass in these our days.

The Lord has given to the Queen's dominions splendid wealth, many rich mines of gold and silver, diamonds, and rubies, iron, copper, and asbestos, a resultant commerce of unbounded magnitude, bringing in wealth abnormal, with which nothing, God has declared, shall interfere, since He has announced that with that wealth He purposes to establish His covenant which He sware unto Israel's fathers, as it is this day (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.). To the Queen herself, as belonging to the House of David, He has promised that her royal race, descended from that of David, shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel while sun, and moon, and stars, winds and waves endure to testify that He made them (Jer. xxxiii. 25, 26, R.V.; 1 Kings viii. 25, R.V.).

We have special grounds, therefore, to offer also, our humble congratulations to her Majesty on attaining the longest reign of any of her predecessors on the throne of the House of Israel. We trust she will be spared to receive next summer, on June 20, 1897, the outburst of loyal felicitations (sure to arise), when her reign will have extended to 60 years. This is sure to be offered her by her loving, admiring, and grateful people, in return for the great benefits her long and peaceful reign has secured to them for sixty years. To the Lord be all the praise for the blessings thus granted to His people.

BUDDHISM IN BRITAIN.

By E. Reep.

PART II.

If we ignore the fabulous stories of Gantama Buddha and regard only his ethics and philosophy, and claim to be a teacher of the law, there is observable in the second book of Esdras a cast of thought singularly analogous to the spirit of primitive Buddhism. Esdras, as we read in the first chapter, receives a divine command to go and shew his exiled countrymen their sinful deeds, that their wickedness might serve as a warning to their children's children. In the second chapter it is to Israel (ver. 33) that he is to deliver his message; but set at nought by them he appeals unto the heathen to flee the shadow of this world and to prepare for a kingdom of everlasting rest. This is precisely the teaching of Gantama. Everything in this life is evanescent; in man there is no abiding principle whatever. To flee then the shadow of this world, to turn from the restless turmoil of this life, and to seek the path which will lead to the rest of the Nirvana of wisdom and goodness and peace is one of the lessons of Buddhism. Yet in the struggle to root up every evil desire, and to attain a mental culture productive of goodwill and spiritual love for others, it is not desirable that the mind should be absorbed in an assiduous effort to solve the mystery of the primary origin of things.

To come back to Esdras we find that Esdras himself is rebuked by an angel for being curious to discover what is unknowable. Desiring to comprehend the mystery of the apparent triumph of evil in the world, he is informed that "they that dwell upon the earth may understand nothing but that which is upon the earth: and he that dwelleth upon the heavens may only understand the things that are above the heights of the heavens."

Not to weary the reader with a comparative study of Hebrewism and Buddhism, which he can make for himself, it will suffice to say that apart from the moral teaching of Gantama there are incidents in his life which are also incidents in the life of Esdras. Just as Gantama shaved his head and gave himself up to long fasts, vigils and meditations; just as he was enlightened under the sacred Bo-Tree while endeavouring to solve the mystery of sorrow and suffering; just as he took five disciples to impart unto them the inner meaning of the law, so we read of Esdras. Esdras, while pondering under an oak tree, is enlightened like Gantama under the Bo-tree; he is bidden to set his house in order, to renounce corruption, and to let go mortal thoughts, to cast away the burdens of man, to put off the weak nature, and lastly, to preach of a kingdom of righteousness (chap. xiv.). On receiving wisdom and understanding he dictates for forty days to his five disciples the wonderful visions of the night, of what may be called the night of his enlightenment. In the forty days were written two hundred and four books (according to the margin nine hundred and four): "And it came to pass, when the forty days were fulfilled, that the Highest spake, saying, "The first that thou hast written, publish openly, that the worthy and the unworthy may read it: But keep the seventy last, that thou mayest deliver them only to such as be wise among the people:* for in them is the spring of understanding, the fountain of wisdom, and the light of knowledge."

Much has been said about the pessimistic tenets of Buddhism. The impermanency of all things is said to be its fundamental creed; thus the living are few, the dead many; i.e., the saved are few, the many are lost. In Esdras, the same pessimistic spirit is most conspicuous. This world is full of sorrow and travail, full of perils and very painful. This world has been made for many, the world to come for few. There be many created, but few shall be saved. But in Esdras, as in Buddhism, there is a path leading to perfect goodness, wisdom and rest: misery shall pass away and suffering shall be no more. Notwithstanding, as a man sows so shall he reap; and so in Buddhism his deeds must result in either a pleasant or a bitter end. Sorrow and suffering will only be overcome, was the teaching of Gantama, when the lusts of this life are destroyed.

When Gantama first began his mission of expounding the real truths of the excellent law, he was received with incredulity. Esdras is warned that his mission will be received in a like manner, but he was neither to fear men's imaginations nor to trouble about their words against him. By despising the law when as yet place of repentance was open to them, they would have to bear after death the pain of their ignorance. Gantama declared the road to Nirvana (which has been said to mean the peace of God which passeth all understanding) was open to all, to the lowest as to the highest; there is, therefore, salvation for all. The message Esdras had for the heathen conveyed a like hope for the whole earth: "And therefore, I say unto you, O heathen, that hear and understand, Look for your Shepherd, He shall give you everlasting rest; for He is nigh at hand and shall come in the end of the world." Who is to say that the Buddhist in looking for the new Buddha that is to come (the Buddha of love) is not looking for that very Shepherd of whose advent Esdras was to tell the heathen? If this was the message the Buddhist missionaries had to deliver to the whole of mankind, Dr. Moore is probably right in saying that they prepared the way for Christianity in Britain. And if they came to a Hebrew-speaking people, as Dr. Moore affirms, the excellent law, the law revealed by the Omniscient One, with its ten commandments, its Sabbaths, and its moon festivals,* probably revived a study or an affection for the old Mosaic faith, which like modern Buddhism had lost its moral standard in the lapse of centuries, if it was not altogether forgotten. Be this as it may, early Buddhism awakened, according to Neander, feelings of gentleness and self-sacrificing benevolence, and to many peoples became the means of a transition from the wildest barbarism to semi-civilisation. That a divine element was recognised in it is testified by the attempts made in the first centuries of our era to blend it with Christianity (see Neander on the Manicheans). The very fact that it was possible to fuse Zoroastrian, Buddhistic, and Christian doctrine, shows a commmon basis of belief. This common foundation, in view of the wide dispersion of ten-twelfths of the chosen people, it is only reasonable to suppose was an Israelite one. And just as Gnosticism in Buddhism was derived from Persian Christianity, so may we suppose that primitive Buddhism was derived from the earlier Persian faith of Magianism, which, if not carried to India by the Esdras of the Apocrypha, was certainly preached among the Sacæ or Sakyas of the Indus and Ganges and by them to the heathen. But whatever the channel through which Israelite Magianism found its way to Northern India and there became Buddhism, we may be pretty sure that its first pioneers were Hebrews.

* Hence perhaps esoteric Buddhism.

* See David's "Buddhism."

Having assumed a Hebrew origin for Buddhism, we may now find an enhanced interest in the inscription on the Newton Stone. According to Dr. Moore, the inscription, though Hebrew, is inscribed in Arian letters (ancient Sanscrit). The Arian alphabet, he says, is proved to be Semitic, and it was used by the ancient inhabitants of Palestine, who were offshoots of the Pali, a people who employed the Arian alphabet in Northern India. It is, therefore, in the natural order of things that Hebrews should have used Arian characters, for the Phœnicians and the Philistines (orginally Arians) spoke the same language as the Hebrews. Palestine really takes its name, asserts Dr. Moore, from being the country of the Pali (Pali-stan). The word stan means country, and was used by the Jutlanders with that signification.

As regards the most ancient Hebrew characters, we have no means of knowing their original form, the oldest memorials of Hebrew writing reaching no farther back than the middle of the second century B.C., and these are found on coins of the Maccabean period. If it be safe to trust tradition, Ezra wrote out the Old Testament scriptures in the Chaldee characters; and it has been supposed that the Jews, after their return from Babylon, spoke that language, or something akin to it. It has been observed that the name Hebrew is not anywhere applied to the language of the Israelites in the Old Testament. Isaiah terms it the language of Canaan (xix. 18). The later appellation, the Jewish language, properly means the dialect of the kingdom of Judah; but subsequently it was employed in a more extended signification, to designate the entire people. The language was first called Hebrew after the return from the captivity, when the use of the Greek language became prevalent among a certain class of Jews.*

Although Israelites and Jews may have continued to use Hebrew or Phœnician characters in writing long after their dispersion, it does not follow that they were able to speak Hebrew. In the time of Ahasuerus, son of Darius of Media, who reigned from India to Ethiopia, the nationality of the Hebrews was not recognised either by their physiognomy or their language. That Haman was able to inform the king that there were Hebrews scattered abroad, living among the people in all the provinces of Persia, who were observing laws peculiar to themselves, is to be accounted for by the Talmud statement that he (Haman) was a direct descendant of Esau, even if Mordecai had not himself divulged his nationality by telling the king's servants that he was a Jew. But to say that he was a Jew was scarcely correct. The Talmud, however, apologises for this rather important error by explaining it, and distinguishing a Jew from an Israelite. We read: "Why was Mordecai called a Jew? He was not of the tribe of Judah, but a descendant of Benjamin. He was called a Jew because he feared the Lord, as all Jews should do." Evidently in ancient times it was not the regular custom to confuse Judah with Israel—a fact our theologians would do well to make a note of.

Another fact may perhaps also be noted. Herodotus calls the Medes Arians; and Dr. Moore thinks that the Sacæ might adopt or be known by the same name, since the earliest positive record we have of this people connects them with the hill country of Media, and also in a direct manner with the deported tribes of Israel, who were placed by Tiglath-Pileser in the mountain district of Great Media, a region expressly called Ara or Hara in 1 Chron. v. 26, but "cities of the Medes" in 2 Kings xvii. 6. Hence the Sacæ would be known as Arians, as coming from the country of the Arii. These, in their dispersion east and west, have, as Saxons, "recast"—to use the words of Mallet the historian*—"in a Teutonic mould the ancient systems of Hindostanic and Hellenic philosophy, which have become so intimately interwoven with our whole social existence that without them modern civilization would be doomed to inevitable decay." But, what is still more singular is, that the Saxon should now rule in that very Eastern land to which his ancestors, somewhere about two thousand five hundred years ago, carried the first germs of Buddhism. To the heathen was then shown that "the way of righteousness is life; and in the pathway thereof there is no death." Whatever Buddhism may be to-day, we may say, with Bishop Bigandet, that in the Buddhist scriptures exist most of the moral truths prescribed in the Gospel. It is, therefore, an interesting question as to how Buddhism, if it be a fact that it came to our shores, was wafted to the isle of Britain. That it found stone records of a Hebrew people is almost unquestionably certain. As affording some proof of this, we will venture to conclude this paper with the following extract from Brown's "Sacred Architecture": "The analogy between the stones set up by the patriarchs, and by Moses and Joshua, as sacred memorial objects, to ratify vows and to announce the laws of the Decalogue, and the altar for devotional sacrifices used by those early people, with the approximation to the cromlechs of the ancient Celtic nations, is too clear not to be observed in our researches. It is remarkable that all the ancient altars found in Ireland, and now distinguished by the name of cromlechs, were originally called Bothel, or House of God, and they seem to be of the same species as those mentioned in the Book of Genesis, called by the Hebrews Bethel, which has the same signification as the Irish Bothel." Clearly Britain's past history has yet to be written.

A SERMON BY THE REV. T. ROSLING HOWLETT, OF PHILADELPHIA, U.S.A.

THE following appeared in The Doylestown Daily Intelligencer, on August 25th last, of Philadelphia, U.S.A. The subject was "Salvation, Its Source and Course." It was headed,

"THE GLORY OF THE PEOPLE.

"The Rev. T. Rosling Howlett, of Philadelphia, preached in the Reformed Church, Doyleston, Sunday morning. Mr. Howlett's theme was 'Salvation—Its Source and Its Course;' and he announced as his texts, 'Salvation is of the Jews' (John iv. 22), and 'The glory of Thy people Israel' (Luke ii. 32).

"One of these texts was spoken by Christ and the other was affirmed of Christ. The first informs us of the source of salvation and the second indicates its course. It originated among the Jews; it has had its course among the Israelites. It is generally assumed that these are one and the same party, but this is an error. From its general acceptance it may be called 'a fiction agreed upon.' The stream of Hebrew population, from the death of Solomon, was divided into two branches, 'Judah' and 'Israel.' The two combined composed the kingdom of David, called in Scripture, 'the tabernacle of David, which has been broken down.' Its restoration is among the fixed decrees of prophecy, and is to be brought about by the re-union of Judah and Israel. The Jews derived their existence and name from the tribe of Judah, which was named after the fourth son of Leah. The first Jew was this noble son, the worst Jew was Judas, who betrayed Christ, and the best Jew was Jesus—through whom salvation came. The nation of the Jews, after the revolt of the Ten Tribes which composed the kingdom of Israel, was loyal to Moses and the Abrahamic covenant—circumcision. The House of Israel abandoned both.

"For this reason the latter were uncovenanted and sent into exile, where they were scattered among uncircumcised nations and called, in common with them, 'Gentiles.' The whole world was divided into 'the circumcised' and 'the uncircumcised;' that is, into Jews and Gentiles. Among the latter were the Israelites of the dispersion, designated in the terminology of the New Testament, 'The lost sheep of the House of Israel.' To these Christ referred when He said to the Jews, 'Other sheep I have which are not of this fold.' Them He declared He came to seek and to save.

"The re-union of these two branches of Semitic stock will be the restoration of the Israelitish nation. 'Israel' is now found under the Saxon name. This is in compliance with the promise of God to Abraham: 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called.' The name 'Isaac,' as spelled in the Hebrew Scriptures, is Yitzchak, and the Saxons, in their earliest past-Biblical history, were called the Yitzchakska—that is, the Isaacites. With such marvellous exactness has this promise to Abraham been fulfilled. With equal certainty will the re-union of Judah and Israel—in the present case Jews and Saxons, be brought about.

"Conquer your prejudices while we say a few kind words for the Jews. That there is throughout Christendom, and the whole world, a tremendous prejudice against them is well-known. That there should be is strange, when we remember that two-thirds of Christendom adore a Jewess as almost, if not wholly, divine, while all worship a Jew as the Redeemer and Saviour of men. We get the ten commandments, and the law and the Gospel from the Jews, and then turn round and sneer at them. Men talk about converting them to Christianity. They had better get converted to true Christianity themselves first. It is not true Christianity to despise and hate Jews. This did not the Man of Nazareth. 'He was not ashamed to call them brethren.'

"Since they are destined to be our neighbours and fellow-citizens it concerns us to know what kind of citizens they make. That they are an ancient people is indisputable. They walked the banks of the Nile and the Jordan when the world was young, and served as priests in the temple of the living God long ages before the rise of Greece and Rome. Great empires have arisen and passed away like a cloud, but the Jews remain the same peculiar and unchanged people. They are a piece of ancient society planted in the bosom of the modern world. In numbers they are from 7,000,000 to 9,000,000—about the same as when Christ was on earth.

"That they are a healthy and long-lived race is well-known. They attribute their longevity to their observance of the sanitary laws of Moses. They are a peaceable and law-abiding race. They are not found among the criminal classes, but are the most orderly and pacific element of our American civilisation. Their sons do not run the saloons of our cities, and their daughters are not among the fallen women. As a race they are phenominally chaste. They are also an industrious race. The truth of President Harrison's statements in his message to Congress is beyond question, 'The Hebrew is never a beggar; he has always kept the law—life by toil—often under severe and oppressive restrictions.' They are the friends and patrons of education. The Talmud teaches that 'learning is better than law,' and that 'every man should have a trade, and every workman should be a scholar.' History records that while the Saxon was hovering between the dark of barbarism's night and the dawn of civilisation's day, the Jews were basking in sunlight. That they have a facility for rising in the world, when equal advantage is given them with other races, is well known. Indeed, this is the sum of all complaints against them in lands where hatred towards them is highest. Not long since the leader of the Liberal party in Germany, the leader of the Republican party in France, and the Prime Minister of England, were all Jews.

"Well, these are the people whom a hand mighter than man's is bringing to our shores. The number of them now in the United States is more than 1,000,000, and the tide of emigration is rising. In 1892, 372,000 settled in the United States, while thousands also found homes in Canada. This is the people of whom Paul in answering the question, 'What advantage hath the Jew?' said, 'Much every way, chiefly because that unto them were committed the oracles of God.' Christ rises infinitely above Paul and declares 'Salvation is of the Jews.'

"But there is our other text, 'The glory of Thy people Israel.' This is fulfilled not in the Jews, but in the Israelites—now under the Saxon name. Go where you may, wherever they dwell, and you will hear them singing, 'In the Cross of Christ I glory,' and their minister thundering out the words, 'There is none other name given under heaven among men whereby we must be saved.' This is the great missionary race of the world—the very race of whom God said, 'This people have I formed for Myself; they shall show forth My praise; they shall declare My glory among the nations.'

"But the greatest thing in the whole count is salvation. All else goes for nothing compared with this. Salvation! It is but a single word but contains millions upon millions of ideas. It reveals a thought so vast that only the mind of the Lord God Eternal can measure it. Its height, its depth, its length, its breadth we shall never know, until,

> "'We reach the green fields on the banks of the river,
> And sing of salvation for ever and ever.'"

WHENCE SHALL ISRAEL'S HELP COME?

THE Psalm cxxi. is one of a cluster of fifteen in number, described "songs of ascents" or "steps." It is not known for certain what "the ascents" or "steps" mean, or who wrote each of these songs. In each of them there is evidence to show that the composers of these songs had Israel in their minds, and implored or predicted for her peace from the Lord, help, and redemption. Psalm cxxi. commences with a question propounded by Israel or someone in the name of Israel: "Whence shall my help come?" (Revised Version). The answer comes at once: "My help cometh from the Lord Jehovah, which made heaven and earth." Israel receives help and blessings in abundance, and they come to her anonymously. They are like the presents which are brought us at Christmas-tide—some with the names of the donors inscribed upon them, others with nothing to indicate whence they come save the handwriting of the sender. We investigate the matter and find, though no name is given, that we know the giver, because we know the character of his handwriting. So Israel, not knowing by name the author and giver of her blessings, yet can conclude whence they come because the Lord Jehovah, their covenant God, centuries ago promised to send those very gifts now to hand, and the comparison of the gifts with the prophecy of the gracious Giver settles the question finally and for ever: "My help cometh from Jehovah, which made heaven and earth."

What are the gifts promised which have been already received and enjoyed by the tribes? The psalm tells us; "He will not suffer Israel's foot to be moved." He keeps Israel perpetually, for "He neither slumbers nor sleeps." "Jehovah, the Lord, is Israel's Keeper." "He is Israel's Shade upon their right hand." "The sun shall not smite them by day, nor the moon by night. The Lord shall keep thee from all evil: He shall keep their soul. The Lord Jehovah shall keep their going out and their coming in, from this time forth" (David's era), "and for evermore." Were these blessings so promised worth having? or worth recording as prophecy for Israel's generations for ever, and therefore for to-day? or were they not? There will not be one dissentient voice. Every one will declare with decision that these were choice blessings, which any nation might be proud and happy to possess and know to be theirs for ever. If so, why is the matter one for merriment and disdain when we tell men that this our nation is Israel, and is, with the American Republic, the heirs of just these promises, which the psalmist was so thankful to enumerate and rejoice over? The Creator of the universe, we assert, is our nation's Friend, because we are His people Israel. Is that an absurd statement? It cannot be if we are in fact Israel. He will never let us fall, or so neglect us by slumbering over His charge, that He will even for a moment fail to keep us. Is that a trifle or absurd? It cannot be either, if the British are in fact the House of Ephraim, His chosen. The Creator of the world is our Shade on the right hand to guide, guard, sustain, and light us, so that the sun shall not smite us by day, or the moon by night. He will ward off all evil from the nation. Is that a matter we can trifle with and despise? Nay, it is true; and we contemn it at our peril. It is true because we are Israel. But there is greater comfort yet. He will keep our nation's soul in going out and in coming in in the past, in the present, and during all time to come—for evermore. Surely this is the climax, and should move the most indifferent to earnest inquiry and decision. It involves our national prosperity and safety in spiritual and temporal matters, from this time forth and for evermore. The only doubt is, are these blessings ours? They must be so if we are Israel: and that we are Israel has been proved in every possible imaginable way; for we are in possession of the whole of the mercies and blessings named in the psalm, and we could only be so if we are Israel, but never otherwise.

If we be not Israel, but a Gentile nation of an alien race, then has God forgotten His promises to Israel, and given to another what He pledged Himself on oath to give only to the afterseed of Abraham, His Friend. God forbid! He has performed to our nation exclusively all He promised them. He has kept us safely through the ages. He has not suffered our foot to be moved. He has been our Shade on our right hand, and kept us from all evil. He has kept our soul. In going out and coming in He has kept us, and He will be our Keeper for ever, because He is omnipotent, the Ruler of the heaven and of the earth which He made, and He has been our Ruler, and is even now our King. What are the blessings promised to Israel requiring His guidance, guardianship, and care? He promised that the seed of Abraham should become a great and mighty nation, blessed of Him (Gen. xii. 2, xviii. 18, and xxii. 17). He declared that they should as a nation possess the Gate of their enemies, therefore should dominate the ocean highways of the world (Gen. xxii. 17). He promised them wealth "to lend," with "the power to get it" (Deut. xv. 6, viii. 18), also the spiritual blessings which would constitute them the benefactors and blessing of the world, sending and ministering to them the Gospel, the Word, the Sabbaths, and the laws of God. He promised to make them a nation and a company of nations, to give them a heathen empire unparalleled in the earth, and finally the dominion of the whole world (Gen. xxii. 18; Isa. xxvii. 6; Gen. xxxv. 11; Psa. cxi. 6; Dan. vii. 27, R.V.).

To bestow all these good gifts, the Giver must needs be the Lord Jehovah, the covenant God of Israel, whose Almighty power is needed to help His chosen ones to arrive at the greatness, power, and strength to which He destined them. The road by which He meant to guide His people is described in Isa. xlii. 16 (R.V.), thus: "I will bring the blind by a way they know not; in paths that they know not will I lead them: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked places straight. These things will I do, and I will not forsake them."

The spiritual explanation of Psa. cxxi., which has no reference to the Israel of the psalmist, is, we maintain, included in our own view. The true believer in Christ is either an Israelite by birth, or he is an adopted son of Abraham, by reason of his faith—in either case an Israelite.

THE MANCHESTER AND SALFORD BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION.

REPORT, 1895—6.

[We have received the following from the Secretary of the Association, and have much pleasure in re-publishing it in the BANNER.—ED.]

THE Council, in presenting their 16th Annual Report, desire to record their thankfulness to Almighty God for past and present blessings on the labours of the Association.

Such labours have not been great during the past year but they have been well-directed, and the knowledge of the truth of the Anglo-Saxon race being identical with the Ten-tribed House of Israel has been brought before a number of people, which has resulted in their reading the Word of God with more intelligence, and in a purer and clearer light than hitherto.

Your Council believe that the light of the Identity and the many and ample proofs of the fulfilment of prophecy, banishes to the four winds of Heaven the puny intellect of man, with his so-called "higher criticism," and accepts the Word of God in its entirety, and in its glorious sublimity.

Your Council deplore the loss, by death, of one of the founders of the Association, whose life amongst them was blameless, whose geniality and wise counsel they sorely miss, whose services were always at the command of the Association—they refer to Mr. Edward Tudor, their first Chairman in the year of its establishment in 1880, and afterwards President in 1889-90. "God buries His workmen, but the work goes on." During the past Session there have been two lantern lectures, and thanks are due to Mr. J. W. S. Jones for his kindness in lending and officiating at the lantern—such services being gratuitous.

There have also been 13 very interesting papers given during the Session on most important subjects touching on the Identity, and the self-sacrificing labours of all these members have been very commendable and praiseworthy. The Identity has been shown in many ways—by many and varied side lights, each lecturer exhibiting the same in a clear understandable method, all their own, so to speak, and giving the Association the benefit of his and her experience in such a forcible manner as to convince the simplest Biblical student amongst them of the truths of Holy Scripture, of the distinction between Israel and Judah—of God's faithfulness to Israel and His covenant promises—and the recognition beyond all controversy of the fact, not theory, that Israel of the Ten Tribes and the Anglo-Saxon race are one and the same people, as the latter are found to be fulfilling to the letter all the ancient promises made to Israel—as witness more particularly the position of her gigantic colonies and their readiness to assist and confederate with the mother-country, so soon as the signal is given them for the necessity of their doing so, thereby fulfilling Gen. xxxv. 11.

Our active interference in Egyptian matters has again, not alone, taken the world by surprise, but our own "blind" countrymen who fail to see what right this nation has to interfere with Egypt at all, and are in great perplexity as to the nation's object—they utterly fail to see that the prophecies are receiving a very rapid fulfilment in Egypt, Turkey (Edom) and Israel our own nation, and that in all probability events of a startling character are at hand—it may be that the oppressor of the Armenian Race (Edom) is about to receive the vengeance of Israel (God's battleaxe) viz., England—for all her cruel atrocities—and the rivers of blood shed by that diabolical and Euphratean power—now fast drying up (Rev. xvi. 12), for is it not written, "I will lay my vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel" (Ezek. xxv. 14).

Your Council feel that the knowledge of the Identity is the golden key by which the prophecies are unlocked, the curtain of futurity drawn aside, and the bright penetrating Rontgen rays admitted, whereby the skeletons only of the present formidable powers, Rosh or Russia, and her numerous allies—Israel's present and future enemies—Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix.—are observed, their outline marked out and made clear to the trained vision.

Your Council were pleased to receive on Bank Holiday, Monday, April 6th, the members of the North of England Council, who were holding a Conference in this city, and placed a large room at their disposal. The President, Mr. E. B. Woodruff, occupied the chair. The proceedings commenced at 2.20 p.m. At 5 o'clock the Conference adjourned for tea, and it was astonishing to note how soon the British-Israelites fraternised with each other. The cup of tea had a most exhilarating effect upon all the members. The discussion was resumed at 6 o'clock and continued until 9.15, when the meeting was brought to a close in the usual way. The Conference was a most enjoyable and successful one.

Your Council, feeling the need of a substantial increase in the funds of the Society—not alone to meet current expenditure, but to enable the Association to be more aggressive in its propaganda of the Identity subject, resolved at the last Council Meeting, "That two members should be appointed for each large circuit or district, to call or wait upon those who would be likely to subscribe; to visit old subscribers, and also wait upon those who had not paid in their subscriptions." This the Council feel would tend to increase largely the membership of the Association.

In conclusion, your Council seek the aid, sympathy and prayers of all who take an interest in this deeply important subject, and in much thankfulness for the success of their labours in the past they look earnestly forward to the spread of that truth which is to do so much for the British nation.

Our belief hinges on three questions:—

1.—Can God change?

2.—Is He faithful to His promises?

3.—Does He make promises to Israel and fulfil them to a Gentile (non-Hebrew) people?

The late Bishop Titcomb, in his last work, "A Message to the Church from the Nineteenth Century," said:—All I ask of my brethren, and especially of the Bishops and Clergy, is that they will not relegate this great subject of consideration to the region of fanciful speculation, which is beneath their dignity to investigate or to notice.

All Bible Students, Sunday-school Teachers, &c., should give this subject their earnest consideration, because it supplies the strongest evidence to the truth of God's Word.

I have found Anglo-Israelism a power in the pulpit; a power in social life; a source of inexpressible comfort and strength in the history of my own soul. It has made me fearless in the presence of every kind of infidelity, particularly of the subtle, poisonous scepticism of some whose profound knowledge of material nature closes their eyes to all other truth. It has taken from me all anxiety as to the results of the so-called "higher criticism," though it is difficult to preserve one's equanimity and patience when the "Son of Man" is "betrayed with a kiss," and the Church wounded in "the house of her friends." In short, Anglo-Israelism has enlarged my mind, teaching me many things in the Bible and history I should not otherwise have known. It has given me a keen but restful interest in all that is taking place in every part of the world. Best of all, it has deepened my reverence for Jehovah, the "Holy One of Israel;" it has increased my love towards the Lord Jesus—Israel's Redeemer and the world's Saviour; it has established my faith in the Scriptures, and given me unbounded confidence in the Providential dealings of the universal Father. Is it any wonder that I wish others to share these grand blessings, and that I am sometimes enthusiastic in telling the good news that the "prodigal" has come home—that the "lost" and "wandering" one is "found?"

Rev. C. F. Cooper, Nova Scotia, Canada.

The Prophets foretold that the House of Israel in the "latter days" shall be found:—

1.—"A great and mighty nation." Gen. xii. 2, and xviii. 18.

2.—"Possessing the Gate of his enemies." Gen. xxii. 17 and xxiv. 60.

3.—"A nation and a company of nations." Gen. xxxv. 11 and xlviii. 4.

4.—"Under the new covenant, and therefore Christians." Hosea i. 10, ii. 23; Isa. xlii. 4, 6—8, 16—19; xliv. 21, 22; Jer. xxxi. 31, 34; Heb. viii. 8; Ezek. xi. 16; Zech. x. 9.

5.—"The chief of the nations." Ephraim-Israel. Jer. xxxi. 7. Deut. xxvi. 19 (R.V.).

6.—Manasseh-Israel to be "a great people," but Ephraim-Israel to be "greater than he," and is to become "a fulness of nations." Gen. xlviii. 19; Rom. xi.

7.—Both of these immensely populous, as "the stars of heaven" for multitude; as "the sands upon the sea-shore," as "the dust of the earth," and "increasing as fishes do increase." Gen. xxii. 17; xxvi. 4; xiii. 16; xlviii. 16; Isa. x. 22; liv. 1—3; Hosea i. 10.

8.—The people of the House of Israel were to be planted in a place of their own and move no more, and to be no more afflicted by "the children of wickedness" their enemies (2 Sam. vii. 10), and there to dwell alone; having been wanderers among the nations (Hosea ix. 17), from whence they have been sifted out (Amos ix. 9), and gathered out from among those nations (Ezek. xx. 35 and 41; Hosea ii. 14; Jer. xxxi. 2).

9.—In "the islands of the sea" (Isa. xi. 11; xxiv. 15); "the isles afar off" (Jer. xxxi. 10; Isa. lxvi. 19); in the "north country" (Jer. iii. 18; xxxi. 7, 8); also in the "west" (Hosea xi. 10); which is "the appointed place." This place is to become too limited in area for their immensely increasing numbers: "The place is too strait for me," &c. (Isa. xlix. 20).

10.—Pushing the people together to the ends of the earth. Deut. xxxiii. 17.

11.—A great maritime people, whose "seed shall be in many waters," and the chief navigators of the world. Num. xxiv. 7; Psa. lxxxix. 25.

12.—Ephraim-Israel was to be unconquerable as a military power, their national emblems being the lion and unicorn.—Micah v. 8; Num. xxiii. 24; xxiv. 9; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Gen. xlix. 9; Isa. liv. 15—17.

13.—A means of blessing to all other nations (Micah v. 7; Gen. xii. 3). Blossoming and budding and filling the face of the world with fruit. Isa. xxvii. 6; xliii. 7, 21; Matt. xxi. 43.

14.—God's witnesses to the world, and His messengers of salvation to the heathen. Isa. xliii. 1, 10, 12, 21; xliv. 1, 2, 8, &c.

15.—Possessing a great heathen or non-Christian empire. Psa. cxi. 6.

16.—Possessed of enormous wealth, and thereby enabled to lend to all nations, but to borrow of none; and is also to rule over many nations, but never to be ruled over by them. Deut. viii. 18; xv. 6.

17.—Observing the Sabbath; thus showing that they possess the "sign of the Sabbath" given only to Israel as a sign between the Lord and the children of Israel for ever, for a perpetual covenant. Exod. xxxi. 13, 16, 17; Ezek. xx. 12, 20.

18.—So highly blessed above all people, that they are to be known "as the seed whom the Lord hath blessed." Isa. lxi. 9.

NOTICE.

Our belief being founded upon a careful comparison of prophecy and history, the Identity teaching shows how the various prophecies relating to the Hebrew people find the LITERAL fulfilment of one set in the Jews, and of the other set in the British nation.

History clearly shows that Media was the neighbourhood whence the ancestors of the British people came, and that the Welsh Kymri (or Cumri), the Celts, Picts, and Scots, Scythian Angles, Gothic Saxons, Frisians, Danes and Normans (or Northmen), were all brethren, portions of the Ten Tribes converging to these Islands from the various dispersions "among the Gentiles" as "wanderers," thus exactly fulfilling Hosea ix. 17, Ezek. xi. 16, 17, xxxvii. 1—14; Amos ix. 9; also notice 2 Kings xvii. 5—23; 2 Kings xviii. 9—12; Deut. xxxii. 26. WARS, AND RUMOURS OF WARS.

BY JOHN S ANDERSON.

GENERAL conversation and the perusal of the newspapers of the present day bring forcibly to one's mind the conversation of the disciples with our Saviour, upon the Mount of Olives, when they asked Him (St. Matt. xxiv. 3.) . . . "What shall be the sign of Thy coming and of the end of the world?" and His reply (v. 6), "Ye shall hear of wars, and rumours of wars" (in St. Luke xxi. 9 it is rendered "wars and commotions").

Let us take up any daily paper, say the Standard of this day, and see the extraordinary numbers of "wars and commotions" referred to in the following order :—

1. The crisis at Zanzibar, where we have interfered and by force of arms with our ubiquitous fleet turned out the usurper and placed a Sultan of our own selection on the throne.

2. The Italians and Brazil, between whom existing difficulties are hoped to be arranged amicably, but the Italian Government is quite ready to take energetic measures if necessary.

3. The Cretan outbreak, which brings in our remonstrances with

4. Turkey on the state of things in that island.

5. The Cuban rebellion.

6. Outrages in Morocco, where yesterday two Moorish Governors, accompanied by a force of troops, have burned and looted some French and Italian properties.

7. Reported riots in China, anti-Christian, at Shanting, where it is stated that a thousand members of a secret society have destroyed thirty Catholic (query Roman) missions and that 4,000 troops have been despatched to suppress the disturbances.

8. The Armenian riot. Panic at Constantinople. Landing of Marines. Appeal to the Sultan. Here, of course, our interference became necessary, and besides appealing directly to his Majesty, as chief of the State, to put a stop to the horrors of which in some cases members of the Embassy were eye-witnesses, in which we were joined by the Ambassadors of the other Powers, Mr. Herbert at once sent for a number of sailors armed with rifles with fixed bayonets from her Majesty's ship "Imogene," who were posted as sentinels round the garden of the Embassy. Another nail in the coffin of the sick man. Surely the present state of things in this wretched kingdom cannot last much longer.

9. The Soudan Campaign. The expeditionary force, after being for some time almost compact, is once again spread over a line about a hundred miles in length. The Dervishes at Dongola having moved their camp from the river two miles west of the town to an eminence, which has been strongly fortified, makes it probable that a strong resistance will be offered to the Egyptian expeditionary force.

10. Fighting on the Niger. The stronghold of the brigand slave Katchella, on the Middle Binue River, has been destroyed after desperate fighting. Many slaves were rescued. Lieutenant Feshing, of the Royal Irish Rifles, led the Niger Company's forces. Lieutenant Parker, of the Welsh Borderers, who was the first over the Stockade, was twice wounded. Katchella was shot while fighting on the wall of his stronghold.

11. The native rising in Rhodesia. Peace negociations, an exciting interview between Mr. Rhodes and others and native chiefs. The rebels were warned that if fighting continued, they would be hemmed in by forts, and in the end must all perish.

12. The Philippine Islands. In consequence of the recent arrests of three hundred persons implicated in the conspiracies, an outbreak has taken place at Novaliches. One thousand armed natives made hostile demonstrations, but they were dispersed by the Spanish forces. . . .

It must be borne in mind that these twelve instances are taken from one newspaper, and for one day only, not chosen on account of the number of cases reported, but simply as it might be "by chance" from this particular paper, for we have for some time past thought of noticing the question in this manner, and the number is certainly remarkable.

We do not allude to any other of the vital points foreshadowing the approaching end of the age as foretold by our Saviour, considering they can be viewed separately. "But," as He said in the 36th verse of St. Matthew xxiv., "of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only."

MANIFEST DESTINY.

ALREADY the large activities of the English people are beginning to run according to the lines of a real social organism. From the old Universities are going out efforts which unmistakably suggest the nation organized for culture. The House of Commons and the City governments express more closely every year the public interests of all the people. Out of the toiling majority there comes a great impulsive rising which shows that the period of confusion and chaos in the industry of the nation is almost at an end. In any case, whatever other characteristics this coming democracy may have, it is certain to be a social democracy. It will not disappoint its people by removing one kind of democracy merely that another may arise. It will not be swept and garnished of ancestral privilege in order that the privilege of commercial craft may more fully enter in. Rather it will be as a fertile field, levelled of the remnants of a former season, where all that nourishes the better nature may freely grow. In the approach towards such a national life, towards a republic of industry, of letters, of art, of pure religion and undefiled, England, of all countries in the world, holds for the next following generations, the manifest destiny.—R. A. WOODS ("English Social Problems").

THE SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST.

To the Editor of the "Review of Reviews."

DEAR SIR,—Having read the Review of Reviews for some years, I have often admired the way in which you have shown your faith in "the manifest destiny of the British race." During the last twenty years I, as a Briton, have taken a deep interest in all that concerns not only the mother country and her colonies, but also the United States of America.

A study of these great peoples ought surely to convince any thinking man that there is indeed a manifest destiny for the Anglo-Saxon race, so manifest that they must be blind who cannot see the modern miracle which is being performed before the face of all nations.

I remember reading some time ago in something you wrote upon "How to Become a Journalist," that "the true journalist would treat no subject as beneath his consideration." This reminded me of Paley's words, that "contempt prior to examination would be sure to keep a man in everlasting ignorance."

When I procured the Review of Reviews for February last I said: "Surely Mr. Stead must have been examining the British-Israel subject," from the way in which you quoted those beautiful passages from the prophets in your article on the "Progress of the World." And other British-Israelites, who are amongst your most earnest readers, feel as though God alone had opened your eyes to see the truth and to know the reason of this manifest destiny. I cannot say how many people have read my copy, but it has been on tour for four months, and has come back well-thumbed and almost worn out.

In your article on Mr. Cecil Rhodes you again write exactly as though you had studied the writings of the British-Israelites for the last quarter of a century, and we (British-Israelites) are astonished if you have come so near the truth without seeing it. You speak of Mr. Rhodes as believing in the "survival of the fittest," and that he regards the Anglo-Saxon race as the "standard-bearers of the Almighty and the fittest to survive," but you say Darwin is probably more to his liking than Isaiah or Habakkuk. But why should this be so? If one will take the Bible and read it carefully, and let it tell its own story apart from pre-conceived notions and ideas, he will see clearly that those prophets proclaimed in the clearest possible manner that the fittest would survive, and the fittest were those who had been specially trained by God, in order that they might possess the secret of the salvation of the world, which you say is possessed by England above all nations.

No one will doubt that the Jews are one of the surviving races; but, inasmuch as Ten Tribes of their brethren have disappeared, and the Jews and Christians also find it a problem as to their whereabouts, is it logical or according to common sense in any way to suppose that five-sixths of the Hebrew race have become like "dumb-driven cattle?" Is it not more reasonable to suppose that they have become heroes in the field of strife, seeing that they descended from men like Joseph, who, when he was sold for a slave, became head of his master's house; when put into prison was put over all the other prisoners; when brought out of prison had a gold chain put upon his neck, and was made next to Pharaoh, and Joshua, their great military leader, not to mention many other Biblical heroes?

Is it according to science to suppose that such people who were of the Ten Tribes and brethren of the Jews, who have proved themselves to be gifted with no small share of those great qualities which enable a race to survive and to come to the front in the battle of life; is it according to all the laws physical and moral which we know that such a people should beget a nation of fools? And did not the prophets distinctly declare that Israel would survive even though God made an end of all the nations whither He had scattered them? (see Jer. xxx. 11).

Take the promises which God made to these Hebrew people that they should become a great and mighty nation (Gen. xviii. 18), blessed and multiplied and possessing the Gate of their enemies (Gen. xxii. 16, 18). A people that were to to "spread west, east, north, south, and become as the dust of the earth" (Gen. xxviii. 14), and were to become "a nation and a company of nations" (Gen. xxxv. 11), "to grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth," becoming "a great people and a multitude of nations" (Gen. xlviii. 16, 19); and although called the Lost Ten Tribes, were to fulfil the following prophecy (Isa. liv.): "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations; spare not, lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes, for thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left, and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited." Do not these promises point to something like the British Empire? And has not Cecil Rhodes helped to do this? Surely this looks like the survival of the fittest, and the fittest were those whom God had chosen and trained for the great work which He meant them to accomplish. And if you and others who believe in the survival of the fittest and this manifest destiny of the British race will but investigate the despised question of British-Israelism, you will see whether we are justly dealt with by those who misrepresent our views.

I send a copy of "British-Israel Truth: a Handbook for Enquirers," which contains a vast amount of Biblical and historical information, and shows the reason why the British are the only successful colonizers and rulers of alien people which the world possesses. You will then see "why this race represents that which is best worth preserving for the good of mankind," and also understand why Spaniards and Portuguese, Dutchmen and Frenchmen, although they had the start in the race, have one by one been distanced by the Anglo-Saxon, and you will see that Milton was not at all wrong when he wrote of "God's Englishmen."

If Mr. Rhodes will study Isaiah and Habakkuk, side by side with Darwin, he will find such texts as the following: "Israel shall blossom and bud and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6); "For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Hab. ii. 14). And did not Hosea say of Israel that "He should grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon. His branches shall spread and his beauty be as the olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon" (chap. xiv. 5, 6).

In conclusion, I would again say, Search and see whether these things are so, and whether it is fitting to treat those who believe that there is ethnic affinity between the House of Isaac and the Anglo-Saxon with the contempt which is usually meted out to them.

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT AND THE HIGHER CRITICS.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—The practical suggestion some time ago of the Rev. Idrisyn Jones for a forward movement does not seem to have elicited any notice till that of Mr. Marchant's letter of last week, perhaps because he did not make it sufficiently practical by trying to start a fund for it. But the admirable article by Mr. Marchant in the previous week's BANNER on "Moses and the Prophets," dealing with the higher critics, seems to me to be just the kind of article that should be one of the first to appear in such a newspaper propaganda as that proposed as likely to attract notice, and, further, start this counter-criticism.

There are always two lines of forward movement in any cause that meets with opposition—viz., that of continuing to carry on the work on the old lines, more or less ignoring the opposition, and that of meeting the opposition direct.

Now, I believe the higher criticism is come to stay in some respects. I need not say now what I think is their particular work; we all get more or less different views of things; we can only agree mainly upon the essentials. Much the same conditions hold with us in our cause that do with those in others. There are British-Israelites and British-Israelites, some who would take passages of Scripture that require interpreting, and require us to accept their interpretations, as well as the obvious meaning of passages that only require simply reading, even if they require to be taken with the context. Till we all mainly agree upon the national identity, and the details will work out all right in time in spite of us all, often perhaps by the aid of the third disinterested party, as well as by the opponents, if we can use them, and the higher criticism too, like all other things, will find its proper level.

But if it is a fact, as it seems, that it is being largely carried on regardless of the historical as well as the prophetical distinction between the two Houses of Judah and Israel, then it seems to me that it is specially ours to have something to do with bringing it to that proper level. And such treatment as that that Mr. Marchant has given it is just what I had long been looking for, and wondered that it had not appeared before from some pen, and which I think, if it could be carried out in a small work as a criticism of the higher critics (without too strong a flavour of British-Israelism, perhaps), or published as suggested, it would excite considerable popular interest.

It is the only lines upon which they can be met, and would perhaps do more for our cause than anything else just now, as opposition to all literal prophetic interpretation and needless wholesale spiritualizing of the text was never more active than it is now.

Hoping that others will have something to say,

I am, yours truly,
R. E. C.

SIR,—In the Review of Reviews for July, pages 74 to 84, and also same magazine for August, pages 169 to 172, there is reviewed a book entitled, "Made in Germany." The writer, a Mr. E. E. Williams, produces an enormous array of figures and statistics to prove that the British are quietly and surely losing their commercial supremacy. He states that the value of British exports has decreased 30 millions of pounds during the last 30 years. He shows by comparative tables, that the trade we are doing with foreign countries, and even our own Colonies, is gradually diminishing, while that of Germany, Belguim, and other European countries, is increasing by leaps and bounds. It is a lamentable fact, if the case be as this writer asserts and endeavours to demonstrate. He states that our exports to our possessions (excluding India) is four millions less now than it was in 1874. It is evident that the colonies are transferring their trade from the mother country elsewhere. He endeavours to show what the causes are for this decline in our national and commercial prestige. He asserts our technical education is at fault, and also the system under which labour is controlled is so diverse to that of Germany. I trust there is some fallacy in the conclusions which the writer arrives at, as the tenour of your valuable paper points to the permanence of England's commercial supremacy.

Perhaps, sir, you would give us the benefit in an article on this remarkable book—"Made in Germany."

I am, dear sir, yours,
W. T. W.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Would you kindly review the statement made in Bible Light for June, folio 55, where, in answer to the question, "What further prophetic mark of Revived House of Judah shews that it cannot possibly be the community or sect of modern Jews?" it is stated, that as Judah was to possess the "sceptre" perpetually, and become a sovereign military nation, "the Jews cannot, by any conceivable possibilities, become this."

Does not Mr. Douglas know that the sceptre of Judah is now the head of the House of Israel, "whose hand is on the neck of his enemies," as he quotes?

It is further stated that a section of the German nation "God has raised up corresponding to Judah." What about that, and what about Mr. Douglas' constant assertion in his writings, that Germany is Manasseh?

Faithfully yours, H. M. S.

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—A few friends are desirous of hearing from others who will be willing to join with them to study British-Israel truth. If there are any believers within our midst, I shall be glad if they will communicate with me at the undermentioned address, so that a class can be arranged.

I am, dear sir, yours truly,

A BRITISH BISHOP.—This year, "Aristobulus, one of the seventy disciples, was chosen by St. Paul to be the Missionary Bishop to the land of Britain" (Martyrology of Greek Church). "It is perfectly certain that before St. Paul had come to Rome," writes Alford, "Aristobulus was absent in Britain." The circumstances surrounding the founding of the British Church are clearly providential, and we opine that Paul's natural concern for the Church in the strong northwest corner of God's acres, and of which we are presuming he was himself a chief sower, led him to send Aristobulus thither pending some convenient time when he himself could return to those now familiar fields!—Totten.

AROUND THE WORLD IN THIRTY DAYS.—When the Trans-Siberian railway is completed in 1900, it will be possible for a globe trotter to encircle the globe in thirty days. Over the new route he will be able to reach St. Petersburg from London in forty-five hours, and arrive at Port Arthur in 2[illegible] hours.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE, ACCORDING TO LORD ROSEBERY.

THE speech of Lord Rosebery at Edinburgh, on Oct. 9, in justification of his retirement from the Leadership of the Opposition has been looked for with great interest. It was an eloquent and able vindication of his position and his action. It convinces the readers of it that his Lordship is a patriot first and a partizan afterwards, and that as respects the Empire he is one with Lord Salisbury, and one with those who believe as we of the BANNER believe. He hates and detests as we all do the Armenian atrocities, but only differs from Mr. Gladstone and his party as to how we should deal with them to put an end to them. He sees we cannot do it nationally by independent action. We must unite with the chief European Powers or drift into a general European war. The withdrawal of the Cyprus tribute would not affect the Sultan or alter his atrocious and cruel policy. He would not give back Cyprus to the Turk, or Armenia to any other Power,—to Russia least of all, since no one knows if Russia would give the country good government. The withdrawal of our ambassador would, Lord Rosebery considered, be a useless and mischievous measure. Our sole hope of influencing and guiding the Sultan would be gone if we withdrew our ambassador. That policy would surely end in our drifting into a general war. Lord Rosebery's protest against isolated British action in opposition to the settled views of the great continental Powers was most earnest. He believed that if adopted it would surely lead us into the great and dreadful conflict we all foresee would be the result. He declared that war would shatter the British Empire itself. Rather he would wait till the Powers could agree to act in concert, and of that there seemed better hope now since the Tsar has paid his visits to the Powers and left France for Russia. Lord Rosebery has vindicated himself and shown us that his support to the foreign policy of Lord Salisbury will not in the future be wanting.

The powerful remarks of Lord Rosebery in respect to the British Empire are what concern our readers most, and we propose to quote them as worthy of record in these pages. In arguing in regard to what a European war means in these modern days, he said it would involve the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of people, the ruin and devastation of the regions that it invests, danger to many countries, and perhaps worse to our own, almost our national existence. He described the destructive war so caused as "this European conflagration." He then came to the question of our own Empire and asked how the war, if we engaged in it, would affect our Colonial Empire. On this point he spoke thus:—

"There is one point, too, about any war in which you might engage in the East. The United Kingdom is the heart of the Empire, but the greatest part of the Empire lies outside the United Kingdom. You have those vast colonies which are your pride. I believe that the colonies of Great Britain in support of Great Britain in a just and necessary war would rise, and without hesitation would stand by the mother country, but I confess I do not feel the conviction of the enthusiasm or that readiness in regard to a war waged on behalf of the Armenian interests in the East. My impression is this. That the colonies would rather take the attitude of a nation not less Anglo-Saxon, not less Christian, and much more populous than yours—a nation whose interests and whose subjects have been more directly affected by these outrages than your own—I mean the United States—and, while willing to join in diplomatic action, would deprecate invoking the arbitrament of the sword on a question which does not directly concern their vital interests.

"THE CHARACTER OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

"There is one vital consideration connected with all our foreign policy which I have not seen noticed, and to which I must call your attention in a sentence; that is the character of the British Empire itself, and it is a consideration not applicable to this question alone, but to the whole course of your foreign and your colonial policy. The British Empire is, in truth—as Napoleon III. said quite falsely of his empire—the British Empire is peace. It means peace and it needs peace. For the last 20 years, still more during the last 12, you have been laying your hands, with almost frantic eagerness, on every tract of territory adjacent to your own, or desirable from any point of view, which you thought it desirable to take. (Laughter.) That has had two results. I daresay it has been quite right. (Laughter.) But it has had two results. The first result is this—that you have excited to an almost intolerable degree the envy of other colonizing nations, and that, in the case of many countries, or several countries rather, which were formerly friendly to you, you can reckon, in consequence of your colonial policy, whether right or wrong—and I myself am supposed to be rather a sinner in that respect (laughter)—you can reckon not on their active benevolence, but on their active malevolence. And, secondly, you have acquired so enormous a mass of territory that it will be years before you can settle it or control it, or make it capable of defence or make it amenable to the arts of your administration. Have you any notion what it is that you have added to the Empire in the last few years? I have taken the trouble to make a computation which I believe to be correct. In 12 years you have added to the Empire, whether in the shape of actual annexation or of dominion, or what is called a sphere of influence, 2,600,000 square miles of territory. I observe you sigh. (Laughter.) Whether it is with a sense of repletion or relief at hearing you have so much undigested Empire about you I will not stop to inquire, but just compare these figures. It will show you more clearly what you have done. While the area of the United Kingdom—England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, the Channel Islands, and so forth—has 120,000 square miles, therefore to the 120,000 square miles of the United Kingdom, which is a part of your Empire, you have added during the past 12 years 22 areas as large as that United Kingdom itself. (Cheers.) I say this, that that marks out for many years a policy from which you cannot depart if you would. You may be compelled to draw the sword—I hope you may not be—but the foreign policy of Great Britain, until its territory is consolidated, filled up, settled, civilized, must inevitably be a policy of peace. (Hear, hear.) You may fairly ask me, Having discussed all those other remedies with disapprobation, to what do you look yourself for dealing with this question? No gentleman has a right in the medical profession to condemn the pills of his opponents without offering some medicaments of his own. My view—I am afraid it is not a very fresh one, but it is equally certain it is the only sound one—my only panacea for dealing with the Eastern question is the concerted action of the Powers.

Lord Rosebery, of course, speaks like a statesman, and regards affairs from their purely human and national standpoint. He does not give a thought to the fact that the hand of God has had something to do with our nation and its enormous increase of empire during the last 12 or 20 years. He does not stop to inquire who the British are or whether their singular condition, with foreign enemies everywhere, has anything to do with their prophetic destiny, which, since they are Israel, gives them a wonderfully increasing population, a diminutive island home, and as a consequence, a boundless Colonial Empire in all zones and quarters of the earth. These have for the most part fallen to their possession without the active opposition of the European Powers; but still, in the most favourable parts of the habitable globe. Though his Lordship seems to think this is a very dangerous condition of things, he admits that he himself, when in power, contributed somewhat to the enlargement of the Empire, which is now costing us "the active malevolence" of our European neighbours. Lord Rosebery rightly says, our policy under the circumstances is peace, and we cannot afford to go to war with this vast mass of "undigested empire about us." So the Lord God of Israel also has decided respecting His people; for it is written in Isa. xxvi. 12, R.V.: "Lord, Thou wilt ordain peace for us, for Thou hast wrought all our works for us." He has wrought all for us, so that our British vast expansion has been ours as His gift; and to consolidate His work, He has "ordained peace for us," and will do so in the future. We are as a blind people in His hands, and Lord Rosebery evidently thinks that is our condition too! But God, knowing we are blind, has undertaken to be our Guide, and has told us for our consolation in Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.: "I will bring the blind by a way they know not; in paths that they know not will I lead them. I will make darkness light before them, and crooked places straight. These things will I do, and I will not forsake them." Such being the case, Lord Rosebery ought to be consoled. Our nation's expansion is "to the West, to the East, to the North, and to the South." So was Israel's to be (Gen. xxviii. 14, R.V.), and God Himself has so arranged it. The nation blindly takes up these positions, under Divine guidance, as shown above, and our expansion is His doing (Isa. xxvi. 15, R.V., margin). To the Lord be all the praise!

A LITTLE ABOUT SEVERAL THINGS.

By Joseph Thomson.

From time to time in the modern history of our country there has passed through the population a common feeling termed "panic," or a fear of invasion from some foreign country—generally the French—and which fear has generally had more or less the basis of fact for its foundation. The most recent phenomena of this kind is still within the memory of all who have taken any interest in foreign affairs and our relation as a nation thereto.

It is also interesting to watch the way in which John Bull meets such threats as seriously affect himself and his "little island." He makes no demur, but insists upon plenty of money being spent to put the nation in a position of sufficient defence, and then awaits the onstroke of the enemy.

In his very interesting "Retrospect of a Long Life,"* Mr. S. C. Hall has touched upon several of our national characteristics, and noticed particularly the fighting disposition of the modern British. In vol. I., p. 79, he has a paragraph headed, "Hatred of the French," and says that "sixty years ago, England and France were considered natural enemies. The threatened invasion by the first Napoleon, and the enthusiasm with which more than 200,000 volunteers sprang to arms," within two years, were matters of "fresh recollection" to all in his youthful days, Very apropos to this, Mr. Hall tells a good anecdote. Some twenty-five years or so ago "France was growling a similar threat, and Napoleon III. was pressed by his marshalls to do what no one knew better than he would have been madness"—viz., attempt a landing on our coasts. At that time Mr. H. was in Paris, and had the honour of conversing with one of the Emperor's most distinguished generals. This valiant man explained to Mr. Hall the manner in which the plan could be carried out successfully, finishing a long harangue by saying, "You know we have plenty of transports." "Yes," replied Mr. Hall, "and you will want them; but one will suffice to bring you back." Mr. Hall adds, "I think I see the old soldier now, with his look of indignation, as he suddenly rose and left the room." Yes, the threat of invasion has often been thrown out against this country by one or other of the Continental Powers. But we do not fear them. The fate of the "Invincible" Spanish Armada will be a warning to them for all time; and unless they would court almost certain similar destruction, they would do well to think, not once, or twice only, but many times before venturing upon such an achievement. We do not, however, depend merely upon human arms of flesh; but to quote the advice popularly ascribed to Cromwell as given to his "Ironsides,"—we "trust in God, and keep our powder dry." To quote one of our patriotic poets:—

"O Britain, praise thy mighty God,
And make His honours known abroad;
He bids the ocean round thee flow;
Not bars of brass could guard thee so.
. . . . . .
To all the isle His laws are shown,
His Gospel through the nation known;
He hath not thus reveal'd His Word
To every land; praise ye the Lord." *

Mr. Hall goes on, and says further, "I can well remember the earliest lesson I received of my father (an officer of the good old school of pigtails and powder). The lesson was this; he would put me on his knee, pat me on the head, and say, 'Be a good boy, love your mother, and hate the French.' Such counsel" (however much it may jar with some people's opinions) "would be almost invariably followed up by this:—'Now, my boy, if you meet six Frenchmen, run away; if there are three, lick them!' Such was the invariable teaching received by boys of all ages, early in this century. Three Frenchmen were thought but a fair match for one Englishman; and I believe nine out of ten of the soldiers of the Peninsula considered three to one made even forces. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the belief, prejudice—call it what you please—thus inculcated as it were from the cradle, was the source to which England owes many of her victories both by land and sea."†

These may be, under Providence, some of the secondary causes of our natural pre-eminence in arms. But viewed in the light of Our Identity, i.e., on the supposition that the modern British race is the ancient and hitherto long lost Ten-tribed House of Israel—furnishes us with the true reason, and we see that in the light of prophecy this should be characteristic of modern Israel, and not of any other. Thus we read and (applied in our nation) with understanding, "The remnant of Jacob shall be among the nations, in the midst of many peoples, as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep: who, if he goeth through, both treadeth down and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver" (Micah v. 8, R.V.) "The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might: they shall lay their hand upon their mouth; their ears shall be deaf. They shall lick the dust like a serpent, they shall move out of their holes like worms of the earth; they shall be afraid of Jehovah our God, and shall fear because of thee" (Micah vii. 16, 17). Where in all the past history shall we find a nation answering to this delineation of a warlike character, if we reject that of the modern British race? And as time goes on it will be seen that the answer of history to prophecy is so clear that none can gainsay or question whom it points out.

Again, in illustration of his remarks, Mr. Hall continues, "I cannot say how it is now, but about thirty years ago, when I visited the 'Invalides,' the great hall was hung with the banners of every military power, except the English. Of English flags there was not one! A venerable custodian who had shared in a hundred fights, took me round, and with the pride of the soldier and Frenchman (either would have been ample), named to me, one after another, the battles of which they were the prizes. When he had made an end of that long and splendid battle-roll, I startled him by the simple and natural question—'And where are the English?' He made me no answer, but turned away with a changed and gloomy look. There was not one."*

Here we have again a most characteristic anecdote. While our "ancient enemies," whom we had met on many battle-fields could boast of trophies gained from many nations, they could not show one from England! While many victories over our foes have been granted us by our great Captain Jehovah, who is a "man of war" (Exod. xv. 3), "strong and mighty, mighty in battle" (Psa. xxiv, 8), few have been the occasions when our enemies have triumphed over us; so few, indeed that their fewness only more clearly proves the rule. These latter apparently untoward events, have often proved "blessings in disguise," permitted by the same divine Providence as chastisements for national sins and lead us to repentance; which end attained, more abundant national blessings have followed to qualify us for the work apportioned to us as a nation to do. These facts in our history are so well known that it is unnecessary to do more now than simply refer to them.

At the time of the Napoleonic wars, there were "many thousands" of French prisoners of war in the prisons of this country. No doubt they had little comfort in them, and limited supplies of food; for all English prisons at that time were a disgrace to the nation, though perhaps no worse (if not better) in these respects, than the experience met with in Continental prisons. This is not what we now desire to call attention to, but the fact as attested by Mr. Hall that "English prisoners in France were as one to ten in comparison with the number detained on British soil;" another proof of the superiority of British over French powers.†

These characteristics of the modern British have not always secured for them unmingled respect, or "fear," from our neighbours; but every now and again violent threats (which they have been careful not to allow to grow) have been indulged in by feeble, but envious potentates, of which we have recently had several examples. One of these, apparently a "feeler," is referred to by Mr. Gadsby, who, writing some forty odd years ago, quotes the following passage from a pamphlet then recently published at Naples, and supposed to be by the permission, if not sanction, of the then Neapolitan Government:—"The world will never have peace until all the sovereigns united shall be able to destroy this plundering people" (i.e., the British), "and wipe them away from the nations of the earth—until the English people are dispersed like the Hebrews—until London, like Jerusalem, shall be in ruins and ashes; then Europe will be safe. Let us console ourselves in God. France will do it; the time approaches."‡ Most of this will be considered as so much "stuff;" but the wish is here father to the thought, and more than one civilized "Power" would glory in the "sack" of London, for the "loot" it would furnish to a successful invader. Mr. Gadsby's book was published in 1855, and since then Europe has seen many changes; but among them we have not seen London in ashes; but we have seen the capital of France—the Power that was to do this—in the hands of the invader, and the French nation has been made to "lick the dust," and we have had no hand in all this!

Indeed, in the light of Our Identity the ardent hope of this Neapolitan writer seems now further off than ever among human probabilities. May we not again confidently quote from our British-Israelite poet ?

"This northern isle, our native land,
Lies safe in God th' Almighty's hand ;
Our foes, of victory dream in vain,
And wear the captivating chain."
. . . . . .
"Almighty grace defend our land
From their malicious power:
Let Britain with united songs
Almighty grace adore.
. . . . . .
Let tyrants make no more pretence
To vex our happy land ;
Jehovah's name is our defence,
Our buckler is His hand."
. . . . . .
"He builds and guards the British throne,
And makes it gracious like His own ;
Makes our successive princes kind,
And gives our dangers to the wind."*

The Israelitish ring in these stanzas is remarkable; especially if we must estimate them as "blind" testimony only. But note particularly the absoluteness of what Dr. Watts' asserts concerning England. Our northern isle "lies safe in the Almighty's hand." There is no doubt implied here ; and it does not depend upon our worthiness. Our foes dream of victory in vain; and so far from being conquerors, are captives, and "wear the captives' chain." The next two stanzas are a prayer for divine grace to defend us from the malicious power of our enemies, nor can they "vex" us in anywise, seeing that in Jehovah is our defence, and His hand is our "buckler." The last stanza, like the first, makes further declaration of our faith; Jehovah "builds and guards the British throne." Why? The Identity teaches us that it is so because it is David's throne, promised to him and his descendants for ever! Like His own, Jehovah makes the British throne "gracious" and "our successive princes kind," i.e., they are virtuous, and set a good example to the rest of the body politic; while He so protects the whole nation that their dangers are scattered "to the winds." Thus we see that the poet asserts positively that God builds and guards the British throne. But, turning to Holy Scripture, we there learn that this was promised of David's throne only, and that not in a parabolic string of words which may have little or no meaning; but in language that could not be mistaken by the most careless of Bible students. "Once have I sworn by My holiness (because He could sware by no greater, He sware by Himself, Heb. vi. 13, 14), that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven. Also I will make him My firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth" (Psa. lxxxix. 1—37; 2 Sam. vii.). "David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel. . . . If ye can break My covenant of the day, and My covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season; then may also My covenant be broken with David My servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne. . . . As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured: so will I multiply the seed of David My servant, and the Levites that minister unto Me" (Jer. xxxiii. 17—26). From all these, and many other passages of Scripture, we gather that the throne of David is established for ever; and if the British poet is right in what he announces as descriptive of the British nation, the British throne must be that of the House of Israel, and ever occupied by a descendant of the House of David. Must we consider that our British poet has only been indulging in a bit of poetic license merely, or asserting sober facts? If the former, what does he mean? He cannot so travesty Scripture? If he sings only of sober facts, where are they? Who possesses them ? Only the light of Our Identity can explain such a maze, and give satisfactory reasons for this pre-eminence among the nations of the earth ascribed to the British. "He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for His judgments they have not known them" (Psa. cxlvii. 20).

THE THANKSGIVING SERVICE IN BATH ABBEY ON SEPTEMBER 23, 1896.

THE following account of Canon Quirk's sermon preached in Bath Abbey on the occasion of the thanksgiving service held there on Sept. 23, was published in the Bath Herald on that date. The sermon was reported thus:—

"ADDRESS BY CANON QUIRK.

"A thanksgiving service to commemorate the Queen's reign was held this morning at the Abbey. The service commenced with 'God save the Queen' played by the organist, the large congregation upstanding. The Litany was read by Rev. J. Scovell, after which Canon Quirk read part of the special thanksgiving service prescribed for use on the anniversary of the Queen's accession, special reference being made in the prayers to the Queen's long reign and to the Turkish atrocities. Two hymns were sung by a full choir—'O God our help in ages past' and 'Praise to our God, whose bounteous hand,' the latter of which is specially prescribed for thanksgiving and for national blessings.

"Canon Quirk said the subject upon which he proposed to address them was entitled, 'The Longest Reign of English History,' and he would take for his text 1 Kings i. 39, 40: 'And Zadock the priest took an horn of oil out of the tabernacle, and anointed Solomon, and they blew the trumpet, and all the people said, God save King Solomon. And all the people came up after him, and the people piped with pipes, and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them.' He said the text had an interesting association, not only with the auspicious event of the day, but with that ancient and stately church in which they were worshipping. On May 11th, 973, historians told them a remarkable and most splendid ceremony took place within Bath Abbey Church, and it was nothing less than the coronation of King Edgar—the first coronation on record of a king of all England, and in which both Archbishops took part. Having read a description of the scene, he said, turning to the present day, they were commemorating the latest and greatest reign of English history. Since Edgar was crowned in Bath Abbey no fewer than 44 kings and queens had come to the throne and passed away, and not one of the 56 kings and queens of England since Egbert, the first king of all England, in 827, had had the length of days in sovereignty that God, in His goodness, had given to Queen Victoria. That length of days, 59 years and 97 days, they commemorated that morning. They gave thanks to God for it, and shouted over again in that church the shout of Edgar's coronation 900 years ago, 'God save the Queen, let the Queen live for ever.' In olden days it was the custom to describe each monarch by a quasi-title or surname, as for instance, Edgar, who was called the peaceful. He supposed he was right in saying that peaceful would describe our Queen's reign, for the Anglo-British Empire now extended over nearly one-fourth of the supposed surface of the land in the world, and more than one-fourth of the estimated population of the world, or in other words the Empire of Great Britain contained over 11,000,000 square miles and over 400,000,000 of people. We speak of the glories of ancient Rome, but let us realise our Queen reigns over an area six times as great as that of ancient Rome and over a population probably double, while in character her dominion is the greatest and most magnificent the world has ever seen. It was said of Edgar that 'God him granted that he dwelt in peace.' May God still grant it of our great country, to dwell in peace. To-day we have in our land the Emperor of all the Russians. It was said that in the draft of a treaty between England and Madagascar there was written in the margin, 'Queen Victoria asks as a personal favour to herself that the Queen of Madagascar will allow no persecution of the Christians.' In the treaty when it was returned there occurred this answer, 'In accordance with the wish of Queen Victoria, the Queen of Madagascar engages that there shall be no persecution of the Christians in Madagascar.' What a happy omen for the meeting of the Empress of India and the Emperor of Russia! Where force of arms or force of arguments failed friendship often prevailed, and they might hope and pray that the private meeting as friends of the Queen and the Czar would bring about an agreement that in accordance with the wish of Queen Victoria the Emperor of Russia engaged that there should be no persecution of the Christians in Turkey. But peaceful though her reign had been it had been more than peaceful. There was a such a thing as peace with dishonour, and Edgar the peaceful died when only in the 32nd year of his age, possibly in no small measure a victim of the vices of the time and of his youth. What then was the leading characteristic of her great reign—the greatest reign of English history? He thought if he must answer it in one word he should say it had been not peacefulness only, but faithfulness; fidelity had been its leading characteristic. Faithful as a daughter, faithful as a wife, faithful as a mother, faithful as a friend, faithful as a councillor, faithful to the English consitution, she had been faithful as a Queen, and Victoria the Faithful was the grandest title of her glorious reign. Let them who professed to be her faithful and loyal subjects, not only honour her name, obey her laws, but follow her pure and faithful example. Faithful in a very little, we too could become rulers over much; faithful unto death, we can obtain the crown of life. Thus and thus only should we be found worthy of the blessings we enjoyed, the blessings of living in the greatest Empire that the world has ever seen, in the longest reign of English history, and under the monarch of whom the poet Tennyson has well said:—

"'And leave us rulers of your blood
As noble till the latest day!
May children of our children say,
She wrought her people lasting good;
Her Court was pure; her life serene,
God gave her peace; her land reposed:
A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife and Queen.'"

"THE BOOK OF THE MONTH."

By W. L. Blore.

The above is the title of an article in Review of Reviews for July 15, in which the writer considers the observations of Mr. Williams upon the present condition of British industrial supremacy in a work entitled, "Made in Germany." The Daily News and other leading papers have also taken up the subject, and have invoked the assistance of Custom House and other experts upon this knotty question.

As an Anglo-Israelite one is heartily glad that, not only Germany, but all the continental nations are striving with all their might to compete with Anglo-Israel in industrial development. Would that they somewhat modified their military ardour, and confined themselves to this more healthy competition, which has been truly described as the "soul of trade."

Unfortunately years, periods, and localities have been selected by Mr. Williams as the sole data for comparison, whereas the subject has innumerable collateral springs and issues; and British commerce is ubiquitous, and, like the barometer which indicates the pressure of our atmosphere in the physical world, it indicates from year to year the condition of the trade of the whole world and of certain portions thereof in its constant fluctuations. Anyone who has travelled knows right well that British exports, that is exports produced by British capital, emanate from every country in the world, including, not only Germany and continental Europe, but Asia, America, and even Africa, from its innermost recesses of Lake Nyassa and Lake Victoria.

The years selected by Mr. Williams are 1884 and 1894. Let us then look at our trade during these two years in all its bearings.

Mr. Williams dwells largely upon our exports, and considers them piecemeal. Let us consider them in the aggregate. He considers certain items of export to certain localities. We shall take the whole world.

When a commercial man finds that pig-iron, or some other article exported to a certain locality does not pay, he, as a wise man, applies his capital to the production of some other article, which he exports to some other locality which does pay. We see an instance of this every day in the dealings of the British and United States Stock Exchanges. So that into the consideration of this export question enters the question of profit real and proportionate.

Now the field that the British exporter is able to act upon is the whole world, for there is not an accessible port anywhere where the British sovereign is not coveted, and where British currency does not stand at a higher value than that of any other country.

Now let us take the total exports of Germany for 1884 and 1894, and compare them, and then take the same dates and consider British commerce with its collateral issues and springs.

Whitaker, 1884, German Empire exports ...	£166,743,829
,, 1894, ,, ,, ,, ...	148 880,000
Retrogression	£17,863,829
United Kingdom, 1884, exclusive of Bullion, Precious Stones and other Collaterals, 1884	£295,967,583
,, ,, ,, ,, 1894	273,785,867
Apparent retrogression	£22,181,716

The ordinary investigator would stop here. Not so the true statistician.

We see here that the British deficiency has been mainly affected by the crisis in Australia, and by the severe protective duties of the United States and Continental Europe, which have been directed against British commerce, but which have failed to shake its stability, for it finds relief in other ways.

For instance, take the tonnage of Germany and the United Kingdom for 1884. "Whitaker," 1887.

Sailing Vessels Tonnage, United Kingdom, 1884—5 ...	3,248,807
,, ,, ,, Colonies, 1884—5	1,276,662
Tonnage ...	4.625,469
German, 1884—5 ,, ...	806,197
British excess Tonnage ...	3,819,272

Now let us take "Whitaker's" last return (1896):

Sailing Vessels, United Kingdom, 1895... ...	2,421,981
,, ,, Colonies, 1895	582,657
Tonnage	3,004,638
German ,, ...	543,455
British excess Tonnage ...	2,461,183

Here we find that the Germans have decreased by 33 per cent. and Britain by 35 per cent. in sailing tonnage.

Now let us turn to steam.

United Kingdom, 1884—5. Tonnage	6,162.117
Colonies, 1884—5, Tonnage	377,506
Total ...	6,539,623
Germany	603,917
British excess Tonnage	5,935,706
United Kingdom, 1894—5...	9,695,976
Colonies	542,025
Tonnage ...	10.238,001
Germany	1,343,357
British excess	8 894,644

The freight and passage money earned by the British shipping in excess of that of Germany, is about £26,000,000 annually, and the increase between 1884 and 1894 is fairly represented, after deducting that of Germany, by £10,000,000. This amount is equivalent to an export.

But the exports of Germany represent the exports of the German Empire, which includes certain acquired territories of great value which have been added during the last half century. So that in comparing values as to exports we should take the exports of the entire British Empire, for they are the product of British capital, British enterprise, and British industry quite as much as are the exports of Alsace, Lorraine, Hanover, and Schelswig-Holstein, the product of the German Empire.

Now, in referring back, it will be seen that the United Kingdom retrogression was apparently for 1884 to 1885, £22,181,716. But the increase of exports in Australia, India, South Africa, and Canada, during that period amounts to £55,000,000, and in the freight account to another £10,000,000, thus turning the retrogression into an advance of £43,000,000. Adding Germany's increase in her African trade to her European exports she still shows a retrogression as to exports of £16,000,000. So that the distance between the British and German Empires is in favour of the former £59,000,000 more in 1894 than it was in 1884.

As to imports we may here observe that wheat was ("Whitaker"), mean value, in 1884—37s. 10d. per quarter, and in 1894, 21s. 11d. per quarter, so that a diminution in value is not a diminution in quantity, and so with wool. Wool was 11d. per lb. in 1884, and only 8d. in 1894. So that we saved money without a diminution of quantities in this interval under these two heads alone.

In considering commerce as affecting the two Empires let us take the entire commercial value of the two for 1884 to 1894.

The British Empire in 1894	£1,173,250,000
,, ,, ,, 1884	1,076,020,000
Increase ...	£97,230,000
Add increase of Bullion, Precious Stones, &c....	10,000,000
Increase of Freight and Passenger account ...	10,000,000
Total increase in volume of trade	£117,230,000
Increased interest on Capital invested in Foreign Securities in 10 years	20,000,000
Total advance	£137,230,000
German Empire, 1884	£331,000,000
,, ,, 1894	371,000,000
Increase	40,000,000
Increase Colonial	1,000,000
Total	£41,000,000

RESULT.

Commercial progress, British Empire	£137,000,000
,, ,, German ,, ...	41,000,000
British excess in 10 years...	£96,000,000

So that the progress of British commerce has been nearly three and a half times that of the German Empire during 1884—1894.

But further, many of the commercial industries in continental Europe, especially in France and Germany, are represented by British capital, and on many a shop we find inscribed the words, "Old England." Even Redfern, of Cowes, is represented in one of the principal boulevards in Paris, and German South-Western Africa is begging for English capital to develop that barren land.

Postscript:—In the discussion of this subject it appears that in the British Empire, the Russian Empire, and in the United States, all which have large areas and diversified climates, there are compensations for the irregularities of commercial development which do not exist in Germany.

For example take the following returns.

	Population.	Volume of Trade.
United States, 1981 ...	50,000,000	£309,000,000
,, ,, 1895 ...	70,000,000	£308,000,000
,, ,, 1895, Steamers 626; Tonnage, 1,000,000
	Population.	Volume of Trade.
Russia, 1881	100,000,000	£246,000,000
,, 1892	124,000,000	£132,000,000
,, 1892, Steamers, 260; Tonnage, 240,000
	Population.	Volume of Trade.
British Empire, 1881 ...	274,000,000	£917,000,000
,, ,, 1894 ...	300,000,000	£1,173,000,000
,, ,, 1895, Steamers, 7,320, Tonnage, 10,000,000
Germany, 1895, Steamers, 953; Tonnage, 1,343,000

So that, taking everything into consideration, the British Empire commands the sea-going commerce of the world.

THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" REGARDING THE TEN TRIBES.

ON October 12th, the Daily Chronicle made fun of a French author, M. Louis Marthin-Chagny, who has been writing some remarkable things respecting the British people. The Frenchman has not much good to say of us. No one abroad has, apparently, at the present moment! He admits we have "conquered the world," and he hates us for it. He thinks our name, John Bull, means nothing, and is nothing. Our real name is "John Snake," the serpent; and he believes that name fits us. An English clergyman is his abomination. He believes the English clergy were at the bottom of the bloodshed in Tonquin, Madagascar and Dahomey. He deems that we have conquered the world by means of two agencies, namely, the insidious help of Freemasonry, and secondly because we are the Ten Tribes of Israel! Freemasonry had its origin, says the Frenchman, in 1717. Before that year England, he says, was "nothing; no population, no fleet, no colonies. What is England now? Everything, she has an enormous population, a huge fleet, innumerable colonies." The conclusion, says the London editor, is obvious. "Freemasonry has made England what she is!" In regard to the second point, we must quote the editorial statement, thus :—

"As to the second thesis—that the English are the Ten Tribes—the thing is as plain as a pikestaff. Indeed, the idea is no novelty, it is an accepted commonplace; unless we are mistaken, several English newspapers, each with a large circulation, exist for the sole purpose of keeping our attention directed to it. So that M. Marthin-Chagny in adducing further arguments is only killing the slain. We should have been sorry, all the same, if he had not adduced them, for after all it is just as well to make assurance doubly sure. And they have the beautiful simplicity which is the mark of all great truths. We are Saxons, and the name 'Saxon' is only a corruption of 'Isaacson.' Extracts from Strabo, Herodotus, and others prove that the Saxons came from the country where Isaac disappeared; they were originally called Scythians, then Sacassani, then Sakai, and finally Saxons. Note, too, that we call the other Saxon branch 'Uncle Sam' and 'Cousin Jonathan,' in subtle reference to our common Hebraic origin. Contemplate the British flag; you see its pattern is composed of squares; that is a discreet allusion to the rebuilding of Solomon's Temple. Again, observe that English clothes are essentially oriental in cut and colour; our overcoats, macintoshes, and ulsters have no waists and enormous sleeves, and our ladies invariably wear bright, primary hues. And yet, in the face of these facts, some people have the hardihood to declare that the Ten Tribes do not inhabit England, but have retired to the heart of Africa. As M. Marthin-Chagny remarks, with biting irony, 'it seems difficult to admit that the Israelites, formerly a white race, have suddenly become niggers.'"

The Frenchman winds up his nonsensical tirade in these words :—

"'It will be necessary to crush this race, and a pitiless brutality will probably be the sole means of assuring in the end the tranquillity of the Continental peoples.' There is a crumb of comfort, however, in the 'probably.'"

Without paying much attention or attaching any weight, either to the Frenchman's words, or to the jokes and jibes of the London daily at "Our Identity," it is remarkable that the facts of our case are known to a French writer and gravely published as a reason why we should be hated and destroyed. We suppose some of the Canaanitish nations who watched the progress of Joshua and the armed tribes under him felt much in the same way towards the chosen people then! They feared and hated them and wanted to "crush them" as a race. But God protected His own, and crushed their godless enemies instead. For the Continental races there can be no peace or rest, but only a "great earthquake," ever approaching nearer and nearer, "such as there was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, so great." "Men's hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming upon the earth" (Rev. xvi. 18; Luke xxi. 26). The trivial things connected with English clothes and the like are mentioned as our grounds for connecting the British with "Lost Israel," but the grand points which furnish infallible proof of Our Identity are passed over without comment, while those matters that no one thinks of appealing to as evidence, are paraded as our proofs.

The Asiatic, Medo-Persian origin of our race, our settlement in islands of the West, the wondrous fact that the seemingly diverse races which were gathered here in the course of centuries, were after all one and the same people under different names; our remarkable growth after settlement in our Island Home, our Nation Colonies, our Heathen, Colonial and Ocean Empires, founded on our Israelitish gift of the "Gates," our vast wealth, enabling us to lend to many nations borrowing from none, to reign over many nations, submitting to none; our reverence for the Sabbath, for the Hebrew Decalogue, the Hebrew Scriptures, and for the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ our King, the King of Israel; all these and other facts which none may deny or discredit, are the foundations of our belief in respect to our nation's Hebrew origin, since they are all predicted and promised by our God in His Holy Word as His gifts to Israel, His chosen, whereby they may be recognised and detected when in their Lo-ammi or Gentile concealment. The details which we have given above, of course, do not include all the lines of evidence at our disposal. The "desolate heritages" given to Israel in Isa. xlix. 8 for a covenant to the people, "to cause to inherit" these desolations must be an infallible proof of our origin, since we alone have succeeded to their possession, and no other nation has them in enjoyment, or can fulfil the prophecy regarding them in future. Our race in North America, Australia, Tasmania and New Zealand, besides South Africa, have "raised up" these once desolate countries and made them now Israel's habitations, rejoicing and blossoming like the rose, according to the prophecy in Isa. xxxv. 1, 2. To no other nation than ours is it given to reign over many nations, but to succumb to none. No other foreign capital in Europe has been secure from the foot of the invading foe but ours, and to no other race is it given to care for the souls of all men, and take the Gospel to "all nations," "all families," and "all kindreds of the earth" (2 Sam. vii. 10; Gen. xxii. 18). Our race does this, and does it exclusively. But according to the Scriptures the privilege and the duty are Israel's, and that exclusively. Putting these things together, we arrive at the Frenchman's conclusion, "The British are the Ten Tribes," and we praise God for it. But we see no ground from the premises to come to the conclusion that to promote European tranquillity, it will be needful "to crush our race!" Our God will have something to say against that proposition, since He is our Guardian and our Guide. Let Israel thank the Lord for that!

GOD'S COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM—HOW VERIFIED TO HIS SEED.

By the Rev. Marcus S. Bergmann.

The mighty influence which the history of this people has exercised, and still exercises, on the nations around them, is not sufficiently recognized in Christendom. It is admitted that, for two thousand years prior to the advent of the Messiah, Israel was the only people under heaven worshipping the true God; it cannot but be conceded that for these twenty centuries "the children of Israel had light in their dwellings," whilst the world around them was shrouded in total darkness. It is allowed that they occupied a prominent place in the history of redemption; but the nature and extent of Israel's vocation and mission among the nations of the earth has for ages escaped observation in Christendom. No nation that has still a national existence can trace back its history, with any clearness and certainty, to so remote a period as Israel. At the time when Moses led forth the people from Egypt, Rome was not yet founded, Troy was not yet besieged, and the tribes of Greece were in a half-barbarous condition. Egypt, Assyria, Phœnicia, and other nations, which had already attained some degree of greatness at that period, have long ceased to exist in their national character. But the history of Israel begins with the call of Abraham, and from thence proceeds downwards in a clear and continuous narrative.

The great design of the Triune Jehovah, to glorify Himself in the recovery of a fallen world, by means of Abraham and his seed, has been but partially acknowledged in the Christian Church. It has been the habit in the Christian Church to regard the people of Israel to have had their day in a dispensation now no more. Men have spoken and written of Christianity as if it were some new thing—altogether foreign to the religion of Moses and David. They speak of the present dispensation as if it were not "the blessing of Abraham that had come down upon the Gentiles!" An unscriptural separation has been hereby introduced between Israel and the Church; as if whatever be of Israel must necessarily be thrown back upon the former dispensation, as if Israel and the Church were antagonistic; and this violent separation has been brought to bear, not only against the dispensation of Israel, but against Israel itself as a nation.

A moment's thoughtful reflection will at once prove the source whence the Christian Church had its rise. In obedience to their Lord's command, His chosen apostles went forth first "to the lost sheep of the House of Israel," and He whom "God had exalted with His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins," abundantly blessed their labours, and many thousands in Israel were added to the Church.

The Church of the first century consisted principally of the descendants of Abraham, the Gentiles forming almost everywhere the minority. The spread of the knowledge of God in early days, the rise of the Christian Church, the progress of religion among the nations of the earth, are more intimately linked with the covenant of Abraham and his posterity than is generally imagined. In all ages, the history of Israel has been under the controlling influence of the covenant promise made to their fathers:—

1. "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing, and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 2, 3).

2. "Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all nations of the earth shall be blessed in him" (Gen. xviii. 18).

3. "Thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south;* and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxviii. 14).

The great sin of Israel did indeed materially affect the temporary position and state of Israel as a nation. Yea, such was the shock experienced through the entire body of Israel, and so terrible the disaster, that they threatened apparently to nullify the covenant of God with Abraham! And, later on, the apostacy of Judah in rejecting the Messiah did indeed interrupt, but did not frustrate, the intention of Jehovah towards Abraham's seed. They, obstinately refusing to recognize the Lord Jesus as the Messiah, and persecuting unto death the Son of God, the kingdom of heaven was taken from them, and given to another people. Thus Judah was severed from the olive tree. Unwilling to understand the time of their visitation, the things belonging to their peace were hidden from them. A moral darkness overspread the people. "Blindness in part hath happened unto that part of Israel" (Judah).

"Is Israel, then, still in a state of covenant?" If this question has reference to that mutual agreement come to between Jehovah and the children of Israel at Sinai, our answer is—decidedly not! Few indeed were the days when Israel was really in this happy condition. Their national consent to the terms of the Mosaic covenant, in the words, "All that the Lord hath said we will do, and be obedient," was of very short duration. Already, at the foot of Sinai, that covenant was broken. From that day to this, it cannot strictly be said that that people ever were in a state of covenant. "They have turned aside quickly out of the way which I commanded them," is the solemn charge against them by God Himself from Mount Sinai. Their quick and awful fall is pointed out concisely and emphatically by David: "They made a calf at Horeb. For their heart was not right with Him, neither were they steadfast in His covenant. They kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in His law" (Psa. lxxviii. 10). Their whole history, from Sinai even to the advent of Christ, is marked by rebellion, ingratitude, and unbelief; and yet, how stood matters during the whole of that period, with regard to the covenant of God with Abraham? It is plain that all these centuries of disobedience and backsliding, left that covenant just where it was. No act of man could injure it. Even the blackest day of Israel's transgression—yea, and Judah's too—when their sins had been multiplied to an extent that they reached even unto heaven, and when the terrific curse of a broken law hung frowning over their devoted heads, the God of Abraham, in remembrance of His promise and His oath, interposes to prevent and favour them; and, as if to repel any inference which other nations might draw, supposing from the desolate state of "His vineyard" that He had utterly given up His people Israel, He asks, "Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement, whom I have put away? or which of My creditors is it to whom I have sold you?" (Isa. l. 1). It is true Israel has departed from the Lord, she has broken her marriage vow; but has the Lord changed His mind? Is His love diminished? Has He turned away from Israel for ever? No! Here we have His own declaration through Isaiah (liv. 6—8): "For the Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth when thou wast refused, saith thy God." Far be it from the Lord to retain His anger for ever. "For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid My face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." Thus, though they had most grievously trespassed against His most holy law, the God of Abraham still addresses them, through Jeremiah, as not utterly disowned. "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you" (Jer. iii. 14).

Whatever alterations were effected by that tremendous revolution, it altered not in the least the purpose of God, as touching the covenant with the fathers. In respect of that solemn deed, it is expressly said, "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." In reference to that purpose, then, whatever was Israel's condition in the reign of the kings, just such is the condition of Judah now.

They have grievously multiplied their sins, fearfully aggravated their former impenitence and unbelief; and tremendous is the curse which hath overtaken them. The frightful effects of a broken law, and the terrible consequences of the guilt enacted at Jerusalem, have pursued them to the utmost parts of the earth. But, on the part of Jehovah, as the great apostle declares, "they are still beloved for the fathers' sakes!" The unfaithfulness of man can never nullify the unconditional promise of God. For "God gave it to Abraham by promise." This is the apostle's own emphasis. The frailty of man cannot change the immutability of God. "Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee!" Thus reasoned St. Paul, and thus prophesied Isaiah, and thus the Holy Spirit, in perfect harmony with the view given, testifies in David: "If his children forsake My law, and walk not in My judgments; if they break My statutes, and keep not My commandments; then will I visit their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes; nevertheless My lovingkindness will I not utterly take from them, nor suffer My faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of My lips" (Psa. lxxxix. 30—34).

The following solemn declaration of God through Jeremiah proves still the validity of Israel's title-deeds as a seal to the whole argument: "Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying, The two families which the Lord hath chosen, He hath even cast them off? thus they have despised My people, that they should be no more a nation before them. Thus saith the Lord, If My covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David My servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them" (Jer. xxxiii. 24—26).

This proves that God's covenant with Abraham and his seed was not merely for a time, but for all ages. His plan for the redemption of man took into calculation His future covenant engagements with Israel; for, "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel." The whole history of Israel is intimately bound up with the interests of the Church of God in the world. The interests of mankind require their continuance as a nation; so that Israel's nationality should be preserved. The grand plan, the basis of all, alters not. Whether Israel be in Egypt or in the wilderness, in the land of promise or among strangers, under the Mosaic or Christian dispensation, Israel ever had his peculiar vocation, was ever fulfilling his peculiar mission, and carrying out by an irresistible law the terms of his national covenant. Israel is by no means a cipher among the nations. Seen or unseen, he acts his allotted part. Whether as kings and priests, as prophets and apostles, or as hewers of wood and drawers of water, Israel has ever been made instrumental in the building of the great spiritual temple.

The whole history of Israel, from the day God called Abram out of Hur to these our own days, supplies successive illustrations of the great Hebrew covenant, i.e., that Abraham and his seed were to be the "seed sown in the earth" (Hos. ii. 23), through whom salvation should be extended to all the ends of the earth! The concurrent testimony of all the prophets elucidates very significantly the tenor of the Abrahamic covenant. "Ye are My witnesses." "This people have I formed for Myself; they shall show forth My praise" (Isa. xliii. 10, 21). "He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root; Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6). The God of Israel hath declared, and He will not alter the word which proceedeth out of His mouth: "Thou art My servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified!" (Isa. xlix. 3).

Remote ages sufficiently testify how richly the world hath benefited by a people "to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenant, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises: whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came" (Rom. ix. 4, 5). Israel hath exercised his peculiar calling in the world in more recent years; and to this very day Israel is fulfilling his high vocation as Jehovah's special witness among the nations of the earth!

The everliving Jew hath likewise testified to the love as well as justice, to the goodness as well as to the severity of God. But, whatever testimony the past and the present supply, as illustrative of God's purpose with Abraham and his seed, it is certain that when "that day" shall have come, when that people shall return to "seek the Lord their God and David their king" (Hos. iii. 5); when "they shall look upon Him whom they have pierced, and mourn" (Zech. xii. 10); when in Jehovah Jesus "all the seed of Israel shall be justified, and shall glory" (Isa. xlv. 25); then will Jerusalem "arise and shine," for her light will have come, and the glory of the Lord will have risen upon her, and the nations shall come to her light, and kings to the brightness of her rising (Isa. lx. 1—3). Then shall also the Church of Christ fully comprehend the glorious import of Zechariah's prophetic hymn: "To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember His holy covenant, the oath which He sware to our father Abraham."

This has special reference to the Church of Christ in this land. Much of what passes by the name of Christianity, especially on the Continent, is lamentably different from the primitive type of that Christianity founded by the Lord Jesus Christ and His Israelitish apostles. A pious Jew, entering such a Continental Christian Church, would have just cause of offence in seeing worshippers on their knees before graven images. Millions of these nominal Christians are in reality infidels of various shades. But, in the island which we inhabit, we see in every one of its towns and villages places of worship in which the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is adored. In these the Old Testament Scriptures are publicly read in the hearing of the people, and are treated as the Word of God. Preachers take their texts from Moses and the prophets, as being of divine authority. The ten commandments are read aloud, week by week, in the national Churches of the land, and are taught to the children in the Sunday-schools, as a summary of duty towards God and towards man. The command to keep holy the seventh day is observed, with a difference which does not affect the essential nature of the precept. Commentaries have been written on the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which, for learning and labour, are not perhaps surpassed (if equalled) by any that have come from Jewish pens. The same Scriptures are translated and circulated in all parts of the known world, by subscriptions raised in this country at the cost of many thousands of pounds annually. And in the lands where paganism still reigns we see English missionaries, supported by the English Christians, calling upon the heathen to cast away their idols and believe in the God of Israel; whilst that portion of Israel (Judah) herself makes no effort of the kind.

But there is still another and most important question, which is—How many true worshippers has the God of Israel among the people of this country? To give an exact answer to such a question is, of course, impossible. "The Lord knoweth them that are His." But doubtless there are hundreds of thousands in this island alone who, through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, can sincerely say with the Psalmist of old, "The law of Thy mouth is dearer to me than thousands of gold and silver." "Happy art thou, O Israel! who is like unto thee, a people saved by the Lord? the shield of thy help, and that is the sword of thy excellency! and thine enemies shall submit themselves unto thee, and thou shalt tread upon their high places."

GARDENS IN THE DESERT.

A Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy.

Centuries ago the prophet Isaiah wrote, "The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." The heading to the thirty-fifth chapter of the book says, "The joyful flourishing of Christ's kingdom." But, whatever may be the spiritual significance of this prophecy (if any), the literal and material truth is now being demonstrated.

Business in Cairo last year caused me to stay a few days in Suez on my way from London. There are singularly few "sights" in Suez; one of the few is the progress which is being made in reclaiming the desert. The desert does not consist entirely of sand, but of soil slightly mixed with sand and heavily impregnated with salt. In walking across the desert, the surface salt-flakes crack beneath one's feet like thin ice. If the salt be removed from the earth, the fertility of the soil is simply amazing.

The first and chief requisite in reclaiming land is water. An abundant supply is now at hand, in the fresh-water canal which is brought from the Nile to Damietta, on to Ismailia, and then to Suez. For miles along the canal the fellaheen are working, and little farms are to be seen, each having a creek cut from the canal to the cultivated ground. A large hole terminates the creek at the farm end, and in this a water-wheel is placed. As a rule, such wheels are of the roughest description, and are worked by ponies, mules, cows, or donkeys. Every animal, while working the wheel, has its eyes thoroughly covered, otherwise blindness would result.

The method of reclaiming land is to take a small section and roughly level it. A narrow creek is then cut from the canal, and the water is allowed to flow into the plot. Where the water finds its own way the natives leave well alone; but in parts where it does not they bank up for paths as much as possible. Each holding thus consists of several irregular-shaped sections, connected by main and subsidiary trenches. These are controlled by the primitive means of clods of earth, so that any part can be inundated as the cultivator desires. When the levels have been arranged, the creek to the canal is enlarged, and the land swamped. The soil is loosened by the water, and the sun's action brings the salt to the surface. This is scraped off, and the process repeated until there is a fair depth of reasonably clean surface soil. In addition to the inherent productive power of the earth, the Nile water is rich in fertilising agents.

Clover is generally first planted, as the seed is inexpensive, and the crop a close-growing one. Green clover is also a very useful crop, as it possesses medicinal properties of much value to animals. Viewed widely, fresh fodder is very rare in Suez, and animals get but little "green meat." But when the clover season arrives they have a good time, and go into the fields and nibble away to their heart's (or stomach's) content. Diarrhœa invariably ensues; but, this over, the animals return to the clover, and at last get into splendid condition.

After clover the peasants follow their own fancy in the matter of crops. The town of Suez affords a capital market for vegetables, fruit, and flowers, so in the gardens along the fresh-water canal these things are mostly grown.

I went into one of the little farms, intending just to have a look round; but I was so surprised at what I saw growing, that I took out my book and jotted down something of what I saw. The farm was only a few acres in extent, and I did not go over the whole of it. I was, moreover, ignorant of the names of many things which were growing. But I recognized roses, orange and lime trees bearing fruit, almond trees showing immature nuts, peach trees just finished fruiting, capsicums (the largest I have ever seen, some of them the size of Duchesse pears), stocks, wall-flowers, French marigolds, turnips, mustard in blossom, long overhead stretches of grape vines bearing green fruit, beetroots, herbs of several kinds, lettuces, geraniums, potatoes, strawberries, rubber plants, agaves, convolvu-li (I suppose I ought to say), peas, beans, tomatoes, acacia shrubs (in blossom and emitting a very sweet scent), oats, cauliflower, clover (in new sections), palms, cabbages, mint, plantains, and castor-oil plants (and also flies and black ants in myriads). And all this from desert land!

Is it legitimate, or logical, or biblical, for our Christian ministers to generously bestow all the curses upon the Jews, and to appropriate to the Church all the blessings promised to the Jews and to their brethren of the House of Israel? If so, and if Isa. xxvii. 6, "He shall cause them that come of Jacob, to take root: Israel shall blossom and bud and fill the face of the earth with fruit"—can be spiritualized into meaning the Church; to whom then (unless the Church and Israel are synonymous) belong the words of Isa. xli. 14—15, "Fear not, thou worm Jacob, ye men of Israel: I will help thee saith the Lord. Behold, I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument having teeth; thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small and shalt make the hills as chaff."—The Tribes.

A NEW REASON WHY EUROPE HATES US!

THERE is no doubt that we are hated. We have alluded to the fact before in these columns. Our leading articles, dated June 24th, July 8th and 22nd of this year, have the fact for their subject. Our foes predict for us, as we shewed, a tremendous collapse, because they are in all ways so much our superiors in the art of war. We exist, they believe, on sufferance; on the good will, in short, of France, who could destroy our power at any moment convenient to themselves. The Germans, too, see that our fate is sealed, because we have not got compulsory military service. With that, we might hold our own, but with Germany and France united we should surely "go under."

Even the Americans are, it is said, becoming tired of peace, and would be glad to come to blows with some first-class Power, and "the British would do in the place of another." We have shown, too, how greatly the Germans envy us our incomparable Colonial Empire, and how in their foreign trade that with their so-called colonies is trifling, while the British Colonies are their best customers. Such a state of things cannot but excite the jealousy, envy, and hatred of the German nation, and cause them to dislike our world-wide success compared with their own failures. But, as we have said, there is yet a new and very extraordinary reason (unreasonable of its kind too), which is said by some to be growing and having its effect, to cause the continental nations to hate us. They hate the Jews because they are Semitic in origin, and the Germans and Austrians are beginning to dislike the Semitic element in Christians. The French are becoming persuaded that the English also are Semitic, because they must be and are Jews.

This has appeared in The Nineteenth Century for September, as the following quotation from it shows:—

> And if all the Jews of Germany and Austria suddenly left Europe altogether, the anti-Semites, far from ceasing their agitations, would continue to exist as heretofore. They would fight the Semitic element in Christians generally, or in Turks, Russians or Englishmen. This is no mere assumption. . . . The large portion of Frenchmen who cordially hate the English have, in an elaborate book written by one Louis Martin, given utterance to their firm belief that the English are Jews.

The Daily Chronicle of Sept. 7th, under the head of "Reviews," alludes to the same French idea in regard to the Israelitish origin of the British people, assigning it as a cause why the Germans and Austrians would hate us, as do the French also. The article contains the following:—

> Still, Dr. Reich attributes anti-Semitism, in the main, to the "poorly developed political instincts of most of the Continental nations." The democracy of Germany and Austria, in its present stage, must hate somebody, and if all the Jews were to disappear, this hatred would probably be directed against Englishmen. An egregious anti-Semite in France has written a book to prove that the "English are Jews," no doubt our old friends the Lost Tribes. Parliamentary parties in Germany have so little aptitude for politics that anti-Semitism, Dr. Reich suggests, is their apprenticeship to public business. When they mature they will take more rational views.

Whatever the cause, we fear large sections of the French, and nearly the whole of the German people, detest our race for various reasons. We have been, on the whole, too successful. Our commerce and resultant riches are too great. Their own failure to make their colonies pay, is a sore subject with them, and they naturally resent our more successful ways, being conscious that in a military point of view their own power is vastly superior to ours. Could they only get rid of the sea and find a bridge by which they could walk over and assail us, we fear the days of our immunity from invasion would soon be over. But the promises of God are our defence, and He has arranged for the safety of "our appointed place," where "the children of wickedness shall afflict us no more," by giving us not only our safe, inviolate island-home, but the security of the supremacy of the sea, which the gift of the Gates secures (2 Sam. vii. 10, R.V.; Gen. xxii. 17, R.V.).

Our own Gates or Ports, too, are the subject of prophecy, for Isa. lx. 11, R.V., tells us respecting Israel's home ports, "Thy Gates shall be open continually, they shall not be shut day nor night; that men may bring unto thee the wealth of the nations, and their kings led" (with them).

The home and foreign Gates being secure in our own, and also in our enemies' lands, makes ours an unique nation, one for whose security and safety God offers His own oath and faithfulness as the guarantee. This enables us to regard the rage and the envy of the nations with much indifference and even with complaisance, knowing that if He is on our side we have nought to fear, but may live "carelessly and confidently" in our isles, the envy of the nations of the world, but the beloved and protected of the Lord, "because of the anointing" (Isa. x. 27, R.V.). We are aware that these views are repulsive to our foreign neighbours, who will not allow them a moment's consideration. Their rage has an independent origin, and serves, in the purposes of God, to place ours in a position of isolation in respect to the nations, and so in a sense to "dwell alone" in regard to them (Num. xxiii. 9, R.V.).

By many among ourselves, good and godly men and women too, these views are repudiated with much warmth, on the grounds that God cannot have His favourites among the nations, and that if we are hated by them, we deserve it, and shall be punished in the end for our arrogance and self-exaltation. We reply that God chose Israel out from among all the nations, that with them, as His human agents, "He might establish His covenant which He sware unto their fathers as it is this day" (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.). He has repeatedly declared that He formed, created, and made Israel that they might show forth His praise (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.); that "He chose them," and "them only has He known of all the families of the earth" (Amos iii. 2).

The British being Israel, they have become the heirs of all that God gave to Israel by promise, and therefore it is not presumption or arrogance humbly and gratefully to acknowledge all that God has done for this nation, both in spiritual and temporal matters. In the former it is shown by Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20, already quoted above, that the Lord shews His words, His statutes, and His judgments unto Jacob and Israel alone; but as for the nations, they have not known His judgments at all, and He hath not so dealt with them as He hath with Israel. In respect to temporal gifts, the Lord gave them all by oath to Israel "His firstborn" and "His dominion," but to "the nations" nothing in perpetuity, but only what should serve and benefit Israel His people. To the Lord let Israel give all the praise!

DR. H. ALDERSMITH'S LECTURE at the College Hall, Sion College, Victoria Embankment, E.C.—We are glad to announce that our friend Dr. H. Aldersmith, M.B., F.R.C.S., will deliver a lecture at the above address on Wednesday, Nov. 11, next; his subject being, "The Great Distinction between the House of Judah (the Jews), and the House of Israel, in these latter days." The Rev. W. Martin, the President, will, we understand, preside. The meeting will not be open to the public; but the President and Court of Governors can invite their friends. The lecture will be delivered at 3 p.m., and we are glad to know that it will finally be published. Such lectures as these, delivered in various localities, and before influential hearers, must tend to make known our glorious truth. All honour then and blessings from on high, be to Dr. Aldersmith for his constant labours.

THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS TO PALESTINE, ACCORDING TO THE "MELBOURNE ARGUS."

AN article appeared in the Melbourne Argus on the subject of the much debated re-settlement of the Jews in Palestine. The article proceeds from beginning to the end without the smallest reference to the Bible, or to the sacred character of the Jews as a people, to God's purposes in regard to the restoration of Israel and Judah to their land, and how He intends to prosper and bless them in that operation to the praise of the glory of His own faithfulness and truth. Everything connected with this aspect of the subject is totally put on one side, and the matter treated as if there were no God, no people of God, no divine purposes revealed in reference to the restoration of the tribes, and no promises in which they had any concern as regards the land of their inheritance, Palestine. The article, which is an able one regarded as the outcome of a secular mind, will be found interesting by our readers, and we quote it before we make further comment on it:—

"Usually the project of returning the Jews to Palestine is attributable to some Christian doctrinaire like Holman Hunt; but if the Jewish Chronicle is representative of the English Jews in any other than a religio-sentimental sense, the 'chosen people' themselves are desirous of having an independent political organisation. The Chronicle says that prominent Hebrews are considering a scheme for undertaking the administration of Palestine with a view to future autonomy. The practical difficulties in the way of such a scheme are not insurmountable. Palestine is not of much value to the Sultan, who has, moreover, an always open ear for propositions which have the flavour of cash. Palestine in its widest signification is about of the same extent as this colony, and has now a population of about 650,000, 100,000 of whom are Jews, and the great bulk of the remainder are Mahometan Semites. The religious difficulty ought not to be so great as in Europe, where nevertheless the Jew and Christian manage to live together in a somewhat modified harmony. Whether the proposed Asiatic home would be attractive to the European Jew is another question. Although it has its fertile patches, Palestine is on the whole a poor country, and vital economists would be puzzled to know how the 8,000,000 or so of professing Jews in Europe and Asia are to be put in a prosperous condition in such a territory. Probably the poverty-stricken and oppressed Jews of Russia and Poland would be delighted with the prospect of making terraces for vine-growing purposes on the hill sides of Judea; but would the Jews in England, France, Holland and the United States care to cast in their lot with an Asiatic colony in which trade on a large scale would be conspicuous by its absence? The Jew has thriven wonderfully in Europe; but the basis of his success was a highly industrious population of an alien race less alive to the potentialities of finance than the Jew himself. If a great migration of the Jews to their ancestral home were within the limits of practical affairs, there would probably be a general European desire to forward the scheme. The Czar, although he is displaying unwonted liberality in admitting foreign Jews temporarily without inquiring too narrowly into their calling, would notoriously see a general exodus of his Jewish subjects without a pang. Nor is the race particularly loved in any part of Eastern Europe, where they abound. There would presumably therefore be no lack of colonists if they were called for. But how many of them could be provided for in Palestine, even under the administration of an enlightened Government? Supposing they were drawn in proportionate numbers from the various countries of the world, it is by no means certain that they would agree. It is all very well to hold a religio-racial sentiment; but what community of thought outside that would there be between the French and the English Jews, whose ancestors have been in the west of Europe for many generations, and the squalid hordes of Eastern Europe? It must be remembered that it is in England, France, Germany and Holland that the Jew has made his mark and pushed his way to the financial front, and this is just the particular kind of Jew who would decline to cast in his lot with an agricultural and pastoral settlement in Asia Minor.

"The probability is that if all the Jews in Christendom were collected in Palestine to-day they would be scattered over the civilised world again to-morrow. A good many people suppose that the spread of the Jews over Europe was due to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; but, as a matter of fact, they abounded in every part of the Roman Empire before that. Nor is their case a singular one. There are many countries productive of able and vigorous races, which yet from their natural poverty are unable to maintain the increase, which has consequently to spread abroad and take root elsewhere. The Scotchmen, and descendants of Scotchmen, out of Scotland would probably outnumber the Jews, and yet no one thinks of collecting them and resetting them on the banks of the Forth and Clyde or among the heather-clad hills. The Swiss, for a like reason, have contributed their quota to the population of almost every land, and we hear nothing of sending them back to their native mountains. If a peculiar isolation of race and religion is to be deemed a reason for gathering a people in the home of their fathers, it applies to the Parsees of India with quite as much force as to the Jews of Europe. Why should not the Parsees be collected and re-established in Persia? That is a country which has decayed as much under Mahometan rule as Palestine has, and is obviously in need of a spirited population and a progressive Government. But how many Parsees would care to take part in forming a Persian colony? Like the Jews, they thrive amongst industrious races of alien blood and faith, and would probably prefer the flesh-pots that they know of to the deserts of their ancestral home. If we once start on the superhuman task of reversing the migration of races we shall have a very difficult goal in view. If all the descendants of Jews are to be crammed into Palestine, why should not all Anglo-Saxons be sent back to the British Isles, or even all the branches of the Aryan race be returned to that Central Asiatic plateau from which they are supposed to have originally emerged? If the Jews have had a somewhat hostile reception in Europe, it was largely because they were a comparatively fresh overflow from Asia. The Gipsies represented a still later wave of Asiatic immigration, and Europe has held them in abhorrence to this day. There is just a little unkindness in the sometimes expressed desire to send the Jews back to Asia, "bag and baggage," as Mr. Gladstone wanted to do with the Turks. The British Jews are just as much Britons as the rest of us, and a good many of them will be disposed to tell those who bid them return to Jerusalem to go to Jericho. We venture to say that if Mr. Zox found himself in an independent Judea he would leave no stone unturned to get himself appointed consul in Melbourne. Even if there were anything in the proposal to found a Jewish State in Palestine, difficulties might be raised by other Powers than Turkey. Mediæval Europe, which hated the Jews, went mad over the dream of occupying the Holy Land, and within the last half century we have had a great European war nominally arising out of a squabble about the sacred places at Jerusalem. What Government at Jerusalem would like to start on its career with such a question of foreign policy on its hands?

"The question of the migration of races is one of very wide interest. A continual ebb and flow of population is always going on, and although it does not now take the form which it once did, industrial invasion is capable of assuming dangerous dimensions. These colonies were quick to take the alarm at the swarm of Chinese which appeared on their coasts, and adopted trenchant methods of checking the invasion. Queensland is now alarmed at a prospective Japanese inroad, and all the colonies are agreed that steps should be taken to prevent their being swamped by a rush from India. It is always possible that new countries will require to protect themselves in the same way against an excessive emigration from Europe, and the late Dr. Pearson maintained that the time would come when each European nation would be called upon to erect barriers against inroads by its neighbours. It seems as if this prediction were to be speedily realised. The United States, which has been a dumping-ground for the surplus population of Europe for a long period, is disposed to call "enough," and has adopted legislation for excluding pauper and illiterate emigrants from Europe. These terms are elastic, since they depend on the standards adopted by the States from time to time, and could obviously be employed to shut out altogether the class of emigration which has hitherto flowed westward. New Zealand has initiated legislation animated by the same spirit and which has the same object in view. Owing to the more or less arbitrary powers conferred upon the Continental Governments, the necessity for fresh legislation has not been so urgent; but we have the remarkable fact that in Great Britain, the country whose boast it was that free entry was offered to all men untainted of crime, the Government has announced as part of its policy a Bill for the exclusion of pauper immigrants. What is to happen when the policy of mutual exclusion is complete and the population of the European countries increases beyond the available means of sustenance? It is, perhaps, a recognition of this difficulty which has turned so many eyes on Africa. England and Germany are struggling for dominance there, each with an eye to an outlet for its surplus population, as well as to the conservation of a market for its goods. There is no doubt that the more temperate regions of Africa are capable of furnishing homes for millions of the human race, and this outlet, together with the sparsely peopled regions of America and Australia, will suffice to prevent a deadlock during the coming century at least. What the proposal of the Jews to acquire Palestine should draw attention to is the capacity of some parts of the Turkish Empire in Asia to absorb European population. Regions which once maintained millions of human beings are now abandoned to a handful of Arab nomads. Good government and the application of science and capital to the cultivation of the land might make many an Asiatic desert blossom as the rose, so that the distribution of the assets of the 'sick man' ought to acquire a new interest in every overcrowded country in Europe."

In reading the above one wonders if the editors of the Age ever read the Bible to learn therefrom what interest Israel and Judah (or the Jews) have in the Promised Land? If they have, they should know that Palestine is a land the Lord claims peculiarly as "His own" (see Gen. xii. 7, xiii.

15, xvii. 8, xxviii. 13, xxxv. 12; Lev. xxv. 23; Deut. xi. 10—12; Josh. i. 11; Jer. iii. 18, besides other texts too many to name). And He has given it to His people the Twelve Tribes of Israel as their own inheritance for ever (Ezek. xxxvii. 16—28, xlviii.). They have been removed from the land at present, for sin. But the time is fast approaching when they will unite in their return, and then Israel and Judah will be settled "after their old estates" by the hand of God Himself (Ezek. xxxvi. 11). Of one fact there is no doubt; namely, that the restoration of the Jews apart from their brethren of the House of Israel, or the Ten Tribes, will not have the divine sanction. The return will be "together" (Jer. iii. 18), and although in the parable in Ezek. xxxvi.,xxxvii.16—19,they are represented as two sticks, Israel or Ephraim and Judah, "the return" will be as one stick, united in the hand of the Lord, so that they will be one people, and one nation again; and that "for ever and for evermore" (Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28). To Him be all the praise for ever.

THE MOSQUE OF OMAR.

By the Rev. E. Sidney Savage, M.A.
(Vicar of St. Mark's. Barrow-in-Furness).

In no other capital of the world has religion secured so prominent a position, and so firm a hold, as in Jerusalem. To many, the first association of Constantinople is St. Sophia; of Rome, St. Peter's; of Florence, Santa Croce; of London, the Gilded Cross of St. Paul's; of St. Petersburg, the Golden Dome! Jerusalem, however, is still unique as a capital, for not only is it the Mosque of Omar, which is the building, par excellence, of the holy city, as it towers, on the chiefest hill, above all else, save sky and sunlight, the alike first and last object seen of Jerusalem! There is also this significant fact that the Haram es Sherif, or Noble Sanctuary enclosure, occupies, as did the temple of old, with precincts and pavements, one-sixth of the total area of the city, and is in comparison as St. James' Park is to Hyde Park. Jerusalem, alone of capitals, has this striking feature, and it is in itself a characteristic sign of the government of ancient Israel, which was a "peculiar people," God governed and God guided.

This great quadrangle is a silent witness to the chief tenet and one article of Mohammedanism, "There is no God but God." It is this temple quadrangle that gives the present dignity to a city, composed formerly of walls, later of palaces, and now of ruins. At the first sight of the city, and remarkably so from the east entry, the mosques of Omar and El Aksa alone stand out with any degree of prominence; the great church of the Holy Sepulchre is almost buried in bazaars and thronged tenements; the south facade, alone conspicuous, gives but a meagre conception of the splendid interior.

Omar's Mosque monopolises the highest ground of five-hilled Jerusalem, and raises itself aloft in the noble quadrangle, with an impressive grandeur, as a thing of majesty. It is encircled by green gardens, bright flowers, and springing fountains, which give life to cypress, olive, palm, and plane. It was this vast enclosure, then, crowded with the courts and temple of Herod, and thronged with eager worshippers gathered for the great feast that arrested the Saviour's triumphal march on that memorable Palm Sunday entry at the southern brow of the Mount of Olives, that first met His gaze as it rested on its rocky height, sheer above the valley of Jehoshaphat.

This quadrangle, now the throne of Mohammedanism, encloses the site of Mount Moriah, and that of the thrice-built Jewish temple. Many and varied as are differences among the Churches, there is unity here. Bible, Talmud, Koran, Jew, Gentile, and Moslem agree in this identity. No Jew now treads that hallowed area; the dread of polluting the Holy of Holies, the bitter monopoly of the Turk, and the bright daggers of fanatical dervishes at the gates, effectually bar the entrance to the Jew thus ostracised from the sacred acres, where, formerly, all but Jews were excluded. The great quadrangle is now closed to all but Moslems, except the few visitors who are willing to pay heavy backsheesh and pass through under the permit and protection of kavass and soldier. Moslem pilgrims and priests, veiled women and Turkish officials, alone possess the key of those oaken gates.

The Mosque of Omar, or the Great Dome of the Rock, occupies the venerable site ever fresh with the memories of the Jehovah Jireh of Abraham, the threshing floor of Ornan, the conquest of David, and the temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod.

This magnificent octagon, with its unsurpassed mural masonry, 528 feet round, encloses a bare limestone rock which rises 5 feet above the temple floor, the building itself being 2,440 feet above sea level; the massive dome, sheeted with lead, towers aloft in sombre contrast to the perpetual sapphire of the eastern sky and the vernal tints of grasses, blossoms, and flowers, watered by kiosks and fountains.

The Semitic worshipper cares not for either art, sculpture, or painting, for his is > "A God that, shrouded in His lonely light,

> Rests utterly apart
> From all the vast creations of His might,
> From Nature, Man, and Art."

In fact, the arts of statuary and painting were denounced by the early Moslems as incentives to idolatry, and even yet a few of their doctors forbid the delineation of anything that has life under pain of being cast into hell. This being so, we cannot be other than most agreeably surprised at the harmony of detail and beauty of design of this spacious and splendid shrine, built by Byzantine architects who were employed by uncultured and unappreciative Saracens.

The Kubbet es Sakhrah, or Dome of the Rock, is accounted second only to the Kaaba at Mecca in sacredness, and inferior only to the mosque at Cordova in beauty. The magnificent dome was adopted as part of their armorial bearings by the chivalrous knights' templers, while the spacious octagon was the prototype of the temple-shaped churches of London, Cambridge, Metz, and Laon.

This temple is the home of prayer to pious Moslems. At sunrise the call to prayer will be heard from the neighbouring muezzin tower, "Prayer is better than sleep;" and throughout the day the faithful will be called from the four quarters in the shrill and familiar notes, "Allahu akbar!" On the marble pavement adjacent the great mosque, devout worshippers will prostrate themselves, utterly regardless of inconvenience and observation. In marked contrast to the dazzling whiteness of the marble blocks in the glare of sunlight, is the dim religious light of the interior, let in through the double tier of glass windows, which, with richest purple, have obscured the outer light for four hundred years. Gigantic columns of rarest marble, many of them dating from the temple of Jupiter, erected on this spot by Hadrian, support the resting dome, pillars and walls being relieved by the richest mosaics on a background of gold, mellowed by eight or nine hundred years. The visitor cannot fail to be impressed and enchanted by the stateliness and magnificence of the circular aisles which surround the bare limestone rock, almost obscured from view by a lofty iron screen. This rock, called the Sakhrah and the Foundation Stone of the World, gives name and dignity to the Mosque of Omar, and has been crowned with halo and sanctity from the age of Abraham. "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner (stone), a sure foundation" (Isa. xxviii.). Temples have been erected and destroyed; empires, once possessors of this site, have been forgotten in a long oblivion, but the rock remains, and the site of Mount Moriah retains identity and sacredness. What remains of the glories of former temples is the most sacred spot, the limestone rock marking the Holy of Holies! On the temple walls are inscribed, in ancient Cufic letters verses from the Koran, each verse being accounted by Mohammed as a miracle. Descending eleven steps we enter a dark cave, whose bare rock rings with a hollow sound, and probably covers a well which supplied water for the temple offerings. Here our cicerone warns us are the gates of hell, and here, according to Mohammed, one prayer is better than a thousand.

That statesman or prince will confer a blessing on humankind who will open this great enclosure and the temple on Mount Moriah to worshippers of every clime and every creed.—From the Church Monthly.

"YE ARE MY WITNESSES, SAITH THE LORD."

By Philo-Israel.

The following appeared in the September number (4) of The Tribes, published in Denver, Colorado, U.S.A. (50 cents a year), being a Monthly Journal devoted to the elucidation of our subject, and styled "An American Identity Journal."

"There can be no national honour greater than that which the Lord Jehovah describes in Isa. xliii. 10, 12, and xliv. 8, as belonging to the nation of His choice. They are, He declares, the witnesses He designs to use to prove to the unbelieving world 'that He is God!' They witness to His providential care, His foresight, His power, and His grace toward them, and through them to the world at large which He loves so well. They testify to Him, and He uses them in His service. 'Ye are My servant, whom I have chosen.' He is their Saviour, and none other stands in that relation to those chosen ones. There being 'none other name under heaven given among men whereby they must be saved" but the name of the God-Man Jesus Christ; 'therefore ye are My witnesses, saith the Lord Jehovah, that I am God.' As the Creator, the Former, the Redeemer, the Guide, and the Saviour of this wondrously blessed people, He calls on them for service, and by that history and that service He presents to the world a body of evidence which He, God Himself, declares suffices to prove that 'He is God.' The history, past and current, of this people then, silences the infidel, comforts the believer, furnishes national hope and consolation to the nation addressed and confers on them divine honour, and distinction, such as no other race can or will ever possess. They were to be 'the sons of the living God,' as Hosea i. 10 (R.V.) proclaims, 'above only and not beneath' all the nations of the earth, and by the Lord Himself 'set on high above them' all (Deut. xxviii. i. 13, R.V.)

"The nation so honoured in the Scriptures of the living od, was Israel—not Israel of the Ten Tribes only; nor dah-Israel of the Two Tribes only—nor Manasseh-Israel of the separated tribe of the House of Joseph only. All these were Israel—members of the family of that name, and all were to be partakers of the blessing promised, sooner or later. But God's plans were to be developed, and instead of one united nation, He early showed that His so-honoured people, were to be divided eventually, into three portions, having for a time, different histories, destinies and blessings.

"The Two Tribes, or Judah-Israel, crucified the Lord of glory, and for that terrible crime they were by the hands of the Roman Titus, cut off from the blessing, for a time, and left to suffer 'the wrath of God to the uttermost' as it is to this day (1 Thess. ii. 14—16, R.V.).

"The separate career of Ten-tribed Israel began also by reason of sin, and under the wrath of God, when as shown in 1 Kings xii. and xiii., they were driven away from Judah-Israel and finally carried into their Assyrian captivity (B.C. 720), soon to be pardoned and blessed of God and constituted 'a great and mighty nation,' in their 'Isles of the West.' They were, in course of time, to send out from among themselves, a handful of their race, under stress of religious persecution, to found in a new home, a state, destined to become, according to the prophecies, 'a great people,' a Hebrew, Israelite race, competing with their brethren left behind them, in their island possession. They were to be inferior to them; but only in the one respect, that whereas their own greatness was to be connected with a mighty (American) continent, that of their Ephraim-Israelite comrades, left behind, would prove to be even greater; because to them was to be allotted 'a company of nations,' a fulness of Goyim' (i.e., 'nations') which should be the foundation of a world-wide Empire, to be won for Christ their King.

"Such were the promises of the Lord to Israel; such their application to the people of His choice, the Ten-tribed House of Joseph. How does history support this remarkable development of a race which being one originally in their Western Island Home, was after that, to split voluntarily into two, by the departure of one of its tribal constituents to become an independent nation? Our American readers know how God brought about the division in the House of Joseph in A.D. 1620, when the 'Mayflower' set sail from Britain with its handful of dissatisfied Anglo-Saxons, who settled in the great American Continent and became the founders of the splendid Republic, now one of the greatest nations of the earth. By accretion, and natural increase, the daughter is, in her own home, greater in population than her old mother, and competes with her also in wealth, and in 'the power to get it' (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.). She has a glorious future before her as a Christian, yet Israelite, people; under God's blessing and providential care destined once more in friendly co-operation with Ephraim-Israel, her British cousins, to rule the world, to evangelize it for Christ their King, and in peaceful union to occupy their allotted portion (one-thirteenth) of the Holy Land and its surrounding territories, which the hand of God will assign to them one day according to Ezekiel xlviii. 4.

"There can be no national honour and glory so great as that which the Lord assigns prophetically to the House of Joseph. It consists, as we have seen, of the representative tribe of Ephraim, which stands for the Ten-tribed 'kingdom,' and of American Manasseh. Their greatness is distinct, yet marked. There can be no encroachment by one on the privileges and greatness assigned by God Himself to the other. They are two independent, yet linked, nations, which have yet to unite and glorify the Lord together, by working for Him in carrying the Gospel to the nations. Their function is not to quarrel with each other and to impede the Lord's commission entrusted to their hands, but in brotherly union and yet independently, to benefit and bless the inhabitants of the world, whom the Lord God of Israel, their father, so loved, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life (John iii. 16, R.V.).

"We have, then, in the British Empire on the one hand, and the United States on the other, the two great Israelite nations, united already by ties of religion, language, manners, customs, and past history. To them God appeals as 'His servants' and 'His chosen witnesses' to prove to the world that He is God, and that as God, He has foretold their respective destinies, and brought out His fulfilments of them according to the predictions of His prophets, true to the jot and to the tittle, literatim et verbatim.

"While these two nations, constituting the House of Joseph, are witnesses to the God of love, pity, and tenderness, also to His truthfulness to His promises to 'Israel obedient,' the testimony would be incomplete without proof offered to God's character for justice in the punishment of sin. Judah-Israel stands forth the sad monument of the effects of God's wrath, even to the uttermost, because they slew the Lord of glory, crying out, 'His blood be upon us, and on our children!' The proof is thus complete. Judah, Israel, and Manasseh, the three Scriptural nations, answering to the Jews, the British, and the Americans of to-day, offer the valid testimony of the two or three witnesses the Hebrew law demanded, and prove beyond doubt that God exists, that He is 'the Father of Israel,' while 'Ephraim is His firstborn' (Jer. xxxi. 9, R.V.).

"Theirs, like ours, is a God-honoured, God-protected, nation. With the British, they are set apart in the end to rule the world, as the heirs thereof. Their destiny, like ours, is to evangelize and Christianize the world, to prepare it for its King, our Master—the Lord Jesus Christ. Brethren, let us therefore love one another and serve the Lord with gladness as His appointed Israelite Gospel Messengers to the inhabitants of the earth, to bring them all to Christ!

"[In the above paper we have taken it for granted that the British are Israel of the House of Joseph. The fact has been abundantly proved by the writers on the British side, and now by such men as the Rev. T. Rosling Howlett, Professor Totten and others of the States. We have not noticed the difficulty respecting the tribe of Manasseh as belonging to the House of Joseph, even after its departure from the main body or the Ten Tribes. The fact is, Manasseh was the eleventh tribe of Joseph's House, by reason of the return of Benjamin to his brethren. The Ten Tribes were then complete, when Manasseh left them in Britain. They departed to America to fulfil their destiny as described in Gen. xlviii. 19, being 'lost' for a time to Israel in Britain (Isa. xlix. 20, A.V.) but destined, nevertheless, to remain an important portion of the House of Joseph, or Israel, under a new form of Government, foreign to the throne of David, 'till the reunion under Christ, the Lord, shall take place. May He hasten that glorious day.]

THE REV. DENIS HANAN, D.D., AS CHANCELLOR IN CASHEL CATHEDRAL.

We have great pleasure in drawing attention to an announcement in the Dublin Daily Express of Oct. 13, 1896, in respect to a well merited honour done to the Rev. D. Hanan, D.D., our able friend and fellow-helper in matters connected with our nation's Identity with the lost House of Joseph. We heartily congratulate the Rev. Doctor on his promotion to the vacant stall in Cashel Cathedral. We know it is well earned; and we are glad to hear that the appointment is a "most popular one." Dr. Hanan never loses an opportunity of pushing the subject we have at heart wherever he can do so with due respect to the courtesies of life; and we have reason to believe that his advocacy of the views is successful. The notice we allude to, is in the following terms:—

"The Bishop of Cashel has conferred the vacant stall of the Chancellorship in Cashel Cathedral on the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D., Rector of Tipperary. The new Chancellor has been working in the diocese for more than a quarter of a century, and for more than thirty-one years in the united diocese. The appointment is a most popular one, and it is generally felt that Dr. Hanan has well earned the dignity now conferred on him by his Diocesan."

SIDE LIGHTS.

By L. P.

Mr. Leckey says, in his "Democracy and Liberty," referring to the war between the Northern and Southern States of America: "The judgment of the North was justified by the event, and this great struggle added one more to the many conspicuous instances of the fallibility of political predictions. The overwhelming majority of the most sagacious politicians in Europe believed, either that the North would never attempt to restrain by force the Southern States if they desired to secede; or that an armed revolt of many entire States, guided by their legislatures, could not possibly be suppressed; or that, if it were suppressed, it would only be through a general rising of the enslaved negroes, which they anticipated as one of the most certain consequences of the prolongation of the war. Each one of these predictions was signally and absolutely falsified. The speedy and complete acquiescence of the defeated South in the result of the war was no less surprising to European statesmen."

I quote the above passage, because it seems to me strongly to emphasize the prophecy of the patriarch Jacob that Manasseh should be "a people" and "great." Had the Northern and Southern States been torn asunder and settled down into two distinct nations, surely the heaven-inspired prophecy would have been falsified. Yet experts seem to have anticipated such a result, but their expectations were unfulfilled, and are now, by the world in general, remembered no more.

In the Christian of Oct. 8th, I read:—

"Dr. Pentecost's published sermon for Sept. 27, entitled 'England and America,' was a powerful plea for a closer union between the two great nations. This desire, growing deeper year by year among our own people, the preacher's closing words will find an echo in every true British heart :—

Digitized by Google

"'I plead for a more generous study of America, American people, and American institutions by Englishmen ; a more brotherly feeling ; a kindlier consideration ; and, above all, a profounder consideration of the paramount duty of coming to a better international understanding with us, and a speedy and ultimate alliance of the two nations for the sake of peace, the civilisation and the Christianisation of the world, which is especially the providential mission of the Anglo-Saxon race. Let England show herself friendly and cordial toward her own kith and kin across the sea, and she will not need to abide in "splendid" or other kind of isolation among the nations of the earth; and if the time ever comes (which God forbid) when Europe shall combine against her, her own American offspring will not stand by and see her burned, and her kingdom dismembered, for the lack of active sympathy and national help. It is time that the old family feuds should be forgotten, and a blood alliance should be established, which shall last while the world stands.'"

The above seems to shew how broken links are being soldered together ; preparatory doubtless to a reunion between Ephraim and Manasseh, of what kind or in what form or manner we cannot guess, but which must, I imagine, precede Israel's regaining possession of the land bestowed on Abraham and his "chosen" descendants for a lasting inheritance, and their return thither at least representatively.

MR. H. H. PAIN AT NORWICH, ON NOVEMBER 10th, 1896.

We are requested to notify that our friend, Mr. H. H. Pain will lecture at Victoria Hall, Norwich, on Tuesday, November 10th next, on "The Turkish Problem, Considered in the Light of British-Israel Truth." A coloured map will illustrate the lecture. Mr. Robert Adcock will preside. The proceedings will commence at 8 p.m., and admission will be free. There will be a collection for expenses.

The syllabus of the lecture will be :—

1. The Identity of Great Britain with the tens of thousands of Ephraim ; and of America (U.S.A.) with the thousands of Manasseh ; also of
2. The Ottoman Turk with the Edomites of Scripture.
3. The Doom of Turkey and the part to be taken in it by God's servants, of the House of Israel. We trust that all who can, will make a point of attending.

ARE COVENANTS AND PROMISES SUSPENDED?

(A letter to a well-known London preacher and prophetic writer.)

By H. A. Marchant.

Dear Sir,—A friend, on whose word I can thoroughly rely, has told me that you stated in . . . Tabernacle, when preaching on July 12th, that "it was now no question of covenants and promises."

As these and similar statements are made by those who hold, as you do, that this is a Gentile parenthetical dispensation, I feel, as a believer in every word of Holy Writ and in the faithfulness of the God who inspired it, that I should like to ask you how you can substantiate this statement ? it being diametrically opposed to the whole tenor of both Old and New Testaments. I can quite see how when a man has persuaded himself that this is a Gentile parenthesis, he is shut up into believing that covenants and promises have nothing whatever to do with us at the present time ; therefore, to such believers it does not matter how clearly the Scriptures may tell us that it is a question of "covenants" and "promises," they will not allow their "Gentile parenthetical" idea to be marred in any way, even if one half of the Scriptures should be shewn by this modern dogma to be false, and "of none effect."

If you will turn to 1 Cor. xi. 25, you will find that Christ said, "This cup is the new covenant of My blood." I should like to lay special emphasis on the word the; not a new covenant, but the new covenant, that which God had promised to make with the "House of Israel, and with the House of Judah" (Jer. xxxi. 31), and which the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews affirms was made by our Lord Jesus Christ, and made with the Hebrew people, even though the Jews of the "House of Judah" may have rejected it, which rejection in no way hindered its accomplishment and reception by the "House of Israel." "Not as though the Word of God had taken none effect, for they are not all Israel which are of Israel" (Rom. ix. 7). The Jews were "of Israel," but they were not the people of whom the prophets continually spoke as distinct from Judah, saying in passage after passage of Holy Writ, "all Israel and Judah." Therefore, we ought to conclude that the inspired words spoken by Mary and Zachariah, "He hath holpen His servant Israel, in remembrance of His mercy (as He spake to our fathers), to Abraham and his seed for ever, . . . to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember His holy covenant, the oath which He sware to our father Abraham;" also St. Paul's words, "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers"—all go to shew that there was no such thing in God's plan as a "Gentile parenthesis" because of Judah's unbelief, as it has been left to modern generations to invent, to account for the supposed failure of God's promises, or in order that the inventors might relegate everything to the Millennium, and make believe that "He who keepeth Israel," had, as far as Israel was concerned, both slumbered and slept, and although He had positively declared He would be the God of all the families of Israel in their generations, and that He had chosen them and not cast them away, that He had cast them away for nearly 2,000 years ! Have you ever thought of the force of St. Paul's words, "God forbid?" There is no "God forbid" now! What Paul said was utterly impossible, modern interpreters of prophecy tell their constituencies, is accomplished—namely, that Israel is cast on one side, and that the Gentiles are brought to the front, in spite of the apostle declaring, that "the law was Israel's schoolmaster, to bring them to Christ." Where do you find a similar text for the Gentiles? And is it not a reflection upon the "everlasting Father's" wisdom, that after He had trained a "people to shew forth His praise," they, according to modern theories, failed at the very time when the "God of Israel" declared that His Son Jesus Christ should be "their glory?"

I would commend to your consideration Zech. xi., where you will learn by the symbolism of Beauty and Bands that the cutting asunder of the staff Beauty symbollised the annulling of the Mosaic covenant made with all the people, in contradistinction to the covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, under which covenant God would continue to bless them for ever (Psa. cv. 8, 9, 10). Then the cutting asunder of the staff Bands, we are told, symbolises the "breaking of the brotherhood between Judah and Israel." Can the "Gentile parenthesis" believer shew us any reason why the brotherhood was broken in connection with the death of the Crucified One? And if the brotherhood was broken, and the two sticks of Ezek. xxxvii. are not yet made one, as the prophet says they shall be, can the "parenthetical" believers prove that the preaching of God's Word concerning the resurrection of His Son Jesus Christ has not been instrumental in blessing the dry-boned House of Ten-tribed Israel, who said: "Our bones are dried up, our hope is lost, we are clean cut off;"

but of whom Peter wrote and said: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who, according to His abundant mercy" (the mercy promised to the House of Israel), "hath begotten us again unto a living hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." There can be no doubt to whom Peter wrote, for they were the "elect strangers of the dispersion," who had not seen Jesus Christ and yet had loved Him (1 Pet. i. 8, R.V.), and who were then declared to be an "elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation" (not Church), "a peculiar people, who were to shew forth the praises of Him who had called them out of darkness into His marvellous light" (the tense was in the past, even 1800 and more years ago!); the Ten-tribed house of whom Hosea prophesied, saying (chap. i.), in his time, they should not obtain mercy, and should fall so low as to become Lo-ammi, not God's people, but yet were to become as the sand as the sea-shore for number, and be called the sons of the living God, before Judah was joined to them. And as Peter says to the elect strangers, "which in times past were not a people (Lo-ammi), but now are the people of God; which had not obtained mercy (Lo-ruhamah), but now have obtained mercy" (ver. 10).

The "Gentile Parenthesis" teachers could not have this at any price, because it would revolutionise the conclusion to which they have jumped from the misinterpretation of a solitary text in Daniel (ix. 26, 27), which interpretation is not to be doubted even if nine-tenths of the promises of God in the Old Testament, and all the expectations of the apostles in the New Testament, should be seen to be false! If this were a "Gentile Parenthetical Dispensation," why did not the Lord Jesus Christ choose His apostles from the Gentiles? And did Paul (who was not a Gentile) dream for a single moment that his "good olive-tree," with its broken off, unbelieving branches and Gentile grafts from the "wild olive-tree" would ever be so grossly misinterpreted and misunderstood that the day would come in which Christian teachers would put forth ideas which would turn Paul's tree into a wild olive, root and branch, with a few Jews attached here and there, like toys on a Christmas-tree?

"Look on this picture and on that," and see which is most consonant with Scripture truth. Give me Paul's conception, which harmonises with all God's promises from one end of the Bible to the other, rather than the idea which represents the "Holy One of Israel" as an oath-breaker, and an inventor of a plan, which those who advocate it say, "had not been revealed in the Old Testament prophets"—a kind of afterthought—because there was no Israel but Judah, in the estimation of these inventors, who knew not of Ephraim, God's firstborn (Jer. xxxi. 9), the chief of the nations; nor did they believe that he would "bemoan himself and return unto God," and that God calls him His "dear son, a pleasant child" (Jer. xxxi. 18, 20). In their teaching there is, consequently, none but Jews or Gentiles; and when they are asked in which of these two classes they classify the House of Joseph, the best answer I can ever get from any of them is: "They are all Jews" (!) or, "I cannot say."

If we wish to cure Atheism and the various forms of infidelity which surround us, it will not be by Christians being diametrically opposed to God having had mercy upon Ephraim and backsliding Israel, unto whom He had declared He would shew mercy, and cause them to hear His voice in the north country and the isles afar off (Jer. iii. and xxxi.). My heart's desire is, that God will speedily answer the prayer which so many of His people are continually offering: "Lord, open Thou mine eyes," acknowledging that "blindness in part hath happened unto Israel, until the fulness of the nations be come in" (Gen. xlviii. 19; Rom. xi. 25).

H. A. MARCHANT.

60, Upper Lewes-road, Brighton, August 23rd, 1896.

39, Linden-gardens, W., August 31st, 1896.

Dear Sir,—Not until this evening have I had leisure to read your letter of the 23th. As I read it I could not but be sensible of your kindness in writing to me, a stranger, at such length. But when I reached the last sentence I discovered that your letter was prepared for publication, and not for my benefit at all.

In these circumstances I could not enter on the Anglo-Israel question, even if my time permitted it; and I will only say that my words, which you have made the basis of your manifesto, have not the remotest reference to that controversy. They were uttered in the course of an address upon Titus ii. 11: "The grace of God has appeared"—a subject of infinitely more importance than anything dealt with by the propagandists of Anglo-Israelism—a subject, moreover, which, so far as I can judge from their writings, has no place in their system of doctrine. Grace is the great characteristic truth of Christianity, and grace is as inconsistent with covenant as it is with merit, nor could it be revealed till the "crisis" of the world had come in the rejection of the Son of God, till Jew and Gentile alike stood guilty and condemned, and the word went forth, "There is no difference, for all have sinned."

I repeat, then, without qualification or reserve, that it is no question now of covenants or promises. If any child of Adam is to be saved or blest, it must be only and altogether by GRACE.

If, as your letter implies, Anglo-Israelism is inconsistent with this great cardinal truth, it only serves to accentuate the falseness of that system.

You are perfectly at liberty to publish this letter.

I am, yours faithfully,

R. ANDERSON.

To Robert Anderson, Esq., C.B., author of "The Coming Prince."

Dear Sir,—Although at the end of my letter of August 23th I informed you that it would be sent to the Press, I did not feel justified in printing your name, as you might be able to explain your words in another sense. Your letter of the 31st shews that you used them in the sense we understood. It is curious that those who work against the Anglo-Israel question always fly away from our main arguments and spend their time in such baseless accusations as "God's grace having no place in our system." Whereas it is the grace of God, and His grace only, upon which the whole superstructure of British-Israel truth is built up.

I am sorry, indeed, to have to print your letter, but I must do so, lest you should conclude that I feared it seeing the light of day. I leave it to speak for itself to the great British-Israel public. But oh! sir, I am grieved that any Bible student can so dishonour God as to say, that "Grace is inconsistent with covenant and promise." I do not feel it necessary to do more than ask you to re-read your Bible, and long before you have come to the end you will confess to God that it was a great mistake to think that He would only keep His covenants and promises when men merited it. But "Grace is inconsistent with covenant;" and yet the cup of blessing which we partake of is the new covenant in Christ's blood. My first letter will shew to any fair-minded reader why the Gentile parenthesis believers must, to be consistent, believe this dogma which you have so plainly stated.

With regard to your words having no reference to the Anglo-Israel controversy, they were uttered in the tabernacle of an old, but very unfair opponent; and not only did they oppose Anglo-Israelism, but struck at the foundation of all that is precious to a Bible-loving soul, and, therefore, it would be wrong to leave them unrebuked. I enclose one of the British-Israel Association pamphlets, entitled, "Grace and Faith," and pray that God's blessing will rest upon you in your efforts to bring men to Christ, the Redeemer of Israel and Saviour of the world; and also pray that you will not try to misunderstand our British-Israel work, for we also seek to glorify God by shewing His faithfulness to our fellow-men that they may seek Jesus.

I remain, yours faithfully,

H. A. MARCHANT.

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"That God in all things may be glorified through Je us Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (1 Peter iv. 11).

THE OPERATION OF THE FUND:—To proclaim by special means the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 150 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

SOWING THE SEED.

WHAT a pleasure it is to know that the work one is engaged in prospers! And when it is believed by many that the work is needful, and real good results from it, how thankful should we be that this blessing has been granted by Him from whom all good things flow! Progress is what we are again allowed to report. That this may continue is the earnest desire of the Distributors of the Anglo-Israel Distribution Fund.

A comparatively few years ago who would have dreamed that our little paper, the BANNER OF ISRAEL, would now have welcoming eyes and hands waiting for it week by week in the far off N.W. Territory of Canada? A tiny map of the Dominion of Canada, with the Diocese of Saskatchewan prominently marked, lies before me. It was sent from that region, where now are Sowers of British-Israel literature living and working to procliam the truth of the Word of God, and His faithfulness to His chosen people, Israel. And in that teaching, let us remember, must ever be shewn the ample proof of the loving kindness of the Almighty to the whole world, and the Gospel of salvation and of the kingdom is set forth afresh. Still farther to the North-west I am longing for our work to penetrate; and to many of the quiet and lonely settlements of Athabasca I would that our books and papers could be passed to bring light and knowledge to the emigrants who have gone from our shores to occupy those broad lands far away. So broad the districts, so distant the settlers from one another that one wonders how life is lived in that loneliness. Earnestly, we hope, and pray, that the distance may be bridged as often as may be, and our papers, &c., distributed there to draw the minds and hearts of the people to their Bibles, and more truly to the Redeemer of Israel, that faith in Him may be increased and unbelievers won to His service.

I am pleased to quote a few words from the letter that accompanied the little map, showing that the good news spreads. "Many thanks for the reading matter you have sent me; I can assure you we need it badly. Our Association here has had three meetings, and we have seven members and promises of many more, but as the settlements here are very much scattered we shall have to do most of our work by distributing reading matter." Here it is evident that literature is the great thing required in addition to the devotion of the little assemblage of workers.

In other places, as referred to previously, there is a great desire for lectures, and here I would draw attention to the plea that has reached Colonel Senior from New Zealand, that he would undertake a lecturing tour. Who could doubt the great benefit that would result? The advertisements to draw people together would alone cause some publicity of the British-Israel Question as the lecturer passed from place to place; then there are many whose attention can best be gained by the human voice; and the power shown of an earnest Christian life, added to the lectures that Colonel Senior would give, not for money, nor reward, would be a cheer and help to every circle of conscious Israelites who could receive him. But the actual cost of the necessary expenses would have to be met. Who can and will provide it? A treasurer, R. H. Whytlaw Esq., Windsor Quadrant, Glasgow, would receive subscriptions and hold the money for the purpose intended. Here and there may be British-Israelites whom God has blessed with means, who perhaps could not possibly undertake the work themselves, and yet would recognise it as an honour and delight to set this much hoped for tourist fairly on foot. How lovely it would be! And I would rejoice if our friends would also then generously help us to send out from our Fund adequate supplies of literature for every lecture in the various Colonies. Meanwhile we wish to steadily continue that already wide distribution we have in hand, and for which we are glad of aid daily.

From the United States, a valued correspondent, a clergyman, has given us the following happy little account of what is going on. "I have continued to receive the literature you so kindly send me, and have thus far made a good use of it among my friends and some parishioners. I am now in correspondence with a professor in a Theological Seminary of the Church, in a Western State. He is reading, and expresses himself as greatly interested. As a rule, it is difficult to enlist the interest of professors and scholars, but this gentleman is deeply in earnest, and though not yet fully convinced is approaching conviction. Our Association meets regularly with unabated interest, though it does not grow very rapidly in numbers, but we are cheered to find that in other parts of the country many are shewing a lively interest in the great subject. We had our first anniversary a few months ago; and succeeded in getting quite a large attendance of 'Gentiles,' two of whom afterwards joined our Association. As events take place in the affairs of men at large we find constant corroboration of 'the Identity.' It is really astonishing how much 'blind' testimony is constantly furnished by the newspapers, as well as by writers who treat of current events without an idea of the true significance of the subjects they handle."

One incident I would like to refer to, and then quote from a letter received from a missionary who is now on his way to rejoin the Universities Mission, Likoma Island, Central Africa. Some time back, I was able to send some British-Israel literature to the Mission, and later on wrote to ascertain if it had fallen on good ground, and much regretted that the answer was in the negative. As to whether our present correspondent was at Likoma at that time I know not, but I rejoice now to make known to our friends, that our correspondent, while in England on leave, had the British-Israel Question brought before him, and by the blessing of God his eyes were completely opened; he is now an active worker, and was supplied with a good packet of literature for the voyage out, and for future use. Concerning the gifts the letter runs as follows:—"Very many thanks for the parcel received this morning. I hope to make 'Bible Lessons' particularly useful in classes, &c. At present no less than four clergymen have your and my books in their possession. They have given me a hearing and promised to study; I hope at least to mention it to three or four more of my clerical friends before leaving England. At the same time I have been able to do something among the laity, and hope to tackle our Sunday-school teachers upon the subject. Next time I shall write from Zanzibar, or Lake Nyassa, at the Universities' Mission to Central Africa."

Will not our readers give thanks with us for this news and pray that this new Missionary Sower may be brought safely to his destination, and there be able to speak with power to those who at the first rejected those truths which had been put before them? So we hope it may be, and that consequently the scriptures may speak with new force to the hearts and minds of all in that Mission Station, and in the clearer light obtained, we trust each member of that Mission may be preserved from sowing seeds of error in accordance with the prevailing ignorance concerning Israel and the plans of God which He has revealed in and for that nation; for hereafter those errors must bear evil fruit and again cause confusion in men's minds, and detract from the glory which should be given to the Father; the glory which even now we are slow to remember was the aim and end of our Lord's work on earth.

Our distribution of literature, &c., has been continued as usual. 274 BANNERS per week, and 155 packets of literature, which included 200 copies of the "Covenant People." The following is the list of places sent to:—

ANGLO-ISRAELITES IN LONDON.

ON Friday, Nov. 13, a social gathering is arranged at the Church Army Coffee Tavern, 136, Seymour-place, W. The spot is within easy walking distance of either Edgware-road or Baker-street Metropolitan Stations, as it abuts on to Marylebone-road. Members are asked to assemble at 8 p.m., when tea and coffee, &c., will be served from the private kitchen of the manager. At 9 p.m. some selections of vocal, choral, and instrumental music will be given, and then time for conversation will be allowed. It is hoped that this, one of a series of such gatherings, may result in more active propaganda, and in the securing of membership to the Society. As outsiders selected from the different sects and churches in the neighbourhood will be invited, no collections or any expenses save their own railway or 'bus fares will be required of the guests; but it is absolutely necessary that a card of admittance be obtained by request, in writing, from Mr. R. Mackworth, 10, Nottingham-street, London, N.

AN ODE TO ISRAEL.

*Dedicated to Brother John, Brother Jonathan, and Brother Judah.

BY C. A. L. TOTTEN.

GOD save the Saxon Queen,
Ruler of Ephraim,
Britannia:
God o'er Manasseh's Land,
Let Freedom's Chieftain stand;
Defend by Thy right hand,
America.

Still twain, conjoin them one,
By them Thy will be done,
Great God our King:
To them Thy kingdom come,
By them the world be won;
So may Thy praise be sung,
Till Earth shall ring.

Let Judah swell the song,
And back to Zion throng,
Jerusalem.
Then let Messiah reign,
Death unto death and pain,
Restore fair Rachel's slain,
To Bethlehem.

Then let the morning stars
Resume their loud huzzas
As at the dawn;
For with the Earth renewed,
And by new heavens reviewed,
All shall be God-indued,
Eternal morn.

MILLIONS of dollars are being spent by the Republicans and Democrats in flooding the United States with political literature in view of the approaching Presidential election. Scores of tons of pamphlets and posters are being sent out by the Republicans, who keep eight of the largest printing establishments in the country continually busy. The postage bill of one of the great parties for one day only was over 2,000 dollars (£400).

MR. CURZON ON BRITISH FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

THE masterly speech of Mr. Curzon, delivered on October 14th, at St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, requires notice in the BANNER, because it relates to Israel's Empire and to the affairs of our race in foreign parts. We can never be indifferent to foreign affairs in general, because our possessions abroad are in all zones and all quarters. Mr. Curzon spoke of the Egyptian Campaign, of the Armenian Question, of Lord Rosebery's recent speech, of the Cyprus Convention, of the Eastern Question, and the Continental Powers' action in respect thereto; besides, as to the Cretan Question, and what Lord Salisbury has done in respect to our affairs in general. In defending our own country from the charge of land hunger and the desire to pilfer territory from other nations, Mr. Curzon said that Lord Salisbury's actual deeds would be his best defence. And he described what these were thus:—

"Let me tell you what has been the measure of the acquisitiveness of Lord Salisbury's Government. He has come to terms with France as to Siam, and, so far from taking any territory in virtue of the agreement, he surrendered a portion of the British territory to the French and signed a self-denying ordinance at no time to embark on denied encroachment on the guaranteed portions of the kingdom of Siam. We are at the present moment arranging disputed question with France about the river Niger in an amicable fashion at Paris. The late Government, ignorant of the early history of the case, took possession of the little island of Trinidad lying 600 miles off the coast of Brazil in the Atlantic Ocean. We discovered that Brazil had valid titles to the possession of the island. Accordingly we have surrendered it to them. In the case of Zanzibar the other day, when the rebellion broke out, there were many people who said, 'This is an opportunity you ought to seize in order to annex it,' and although there were neighbouring and parallel precedents for such action, so anxious were the Government scrupulously to observe their obligations in the matter that they refrained from taking any such step; and, lastly, if we take the topic which recently caused a good deal of interest—I mean the occurrence in connexion with the boundaries of Venezuela—Lord Salisbury has from the start been anxious to see the creation of a competent tribunal to examine and to settle this question, and not merely that but to form a general arbitration treaty that should meet all similar cases of dispute with the United States in the future. (Cheers.) The only instance so far as I know that can be got of an opposite spirit, of an opposite temper, is the fact that when we came into power we maintained instead of relinquishing the British protectorate over Chitral, greatly to the advantage of its people and to the satisfaction of the tribes, and to the security of the Indian position. And also in the case of Egypt we have enabled her to win back a portion of that old province of which our mistaken decision had deprived her. Are these the evidences of an aggressive nature? It is not an easy thing to conduct a policy of a great country with dignity and yet not be offensive to the pride of others and to be conciliatory without being weak. (Cheers.) One of the principal reasons which have sustained the composure of the country during the crisis through which we have been passing has been the confidence in the present Government and in the Administration of Lord Salisbury. (Cheers.) I have detained you a long time, and I have taken you over a wide field of survey, but if my survey has been wide I think I may say that the spectacle which I have endeavoured to put before you is one of which no Scotsman or Englishman has any cause to feel ashamed. (Cheers.) We see this country wealthy, prosperous, but it is yet not so sunk in sloth or so absorbed in the pursuit of gain as to be deaf to the call of suffering or indifferent to the spectacle of continued misrule. She may be sneered at by some and mistrusted by others, but her voice is listened to by all (cheers), and international policies and programmes break down when she desists. Peace is the foremost and the steadfast aim of the people of this country, but nevertheless if her sons are called upon to fight we see them conducting themselves with equal gallantry amid the snows of the Himalayas or under the burning sun of the Soudan. (Cheers.) If we look at our colonies and foreign possessions we see her children still exhibiting the old familiar virtues of energy and intrepidity which have made the fortunes of the race. If they open new markets these markets are free to all. If they conquer new territories these territories are administered in the interests of the country. (Cheers.) No doubt we commit faults, no doubt we are guilty of great errors, but I think we may say with truth that the ideal we set before ourselves is not an ignoble ideal, and that to its attainment we make some approximation. As the scroll of history unfolds before our eyes, the page on which we are inscribing the characters of British influence grows wider and wider until it seems to embrace almost the destinies of mankind. Truly this is a great, an august, an Imperial work that lies before us. I pray God that we may be equal to the task." (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

Mr. Curzon sees clearly that our nation's influence is becoming wider continually, and that already it seems "to embrace almost the destinies of mankind." Being Israel, this follows as a matter of course! For by the prophetic destiny marked out for that race in Gen. xxii. 18, xxviii. 14, and other Scriptures, Israel has to bless "all nations" and "families" of the earth, and therefore, must have commercial and other dealings with the whole of the nations, to enable them to offer these benefits to the world. By Mr. Curzon's true statement we are in that position now, the destinies of mankind being entrusted to our charge! How this can be, unless the British are Israel, he does not stop to consider; but his prayer at the end of his speech is hopeful, because he beseeches God that "we may be equal to the task" committed to us. Mr. Curzon considers that our position as an insular Power, compares favourably with the Continental Empires, because they have to keep up colossal armies—we, the smallest in Europe and of any great Power in the world. To keep up their armies the nations of Europe must resort to conscription. Ours is a volunteer army from first to last. The Continental Powers keep up the balance of strength by national alliances; the two of Russia and France being opposed by the three of the triple alliance, Germany, Austria, and Italy. We refuse all alliances and are good friends with many nations. Our naval and imperial position gives us a voice in the affairs of the world second probably to none. Mr. Curzon thinks the influence thus acquired is greater than that of all other nations. Our naval strength in case of a continental war among the nations there, would be of the utmost value to the parties to the struggle, and "would be like the sword of Brennus thrown into the scale!" As we refuse to be entangled with such alliances the nations hate and envy us now—but will court and flatter us if only they could get our navy on their own side! In refraining from these entanglements we only follow the guidance of the Lord, who, in Isa. xxvi. 12, "has ordained peace for us," and told us in verses 20, 21 how we are to obtain it. He prescribes "non-intervention" for us, and says, "Come, My people, enter thou into thy chambers and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself for a little moment until the indignation be overpast, for behold, the Lord cometh forth out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity. . . ." No one can deny that this is our national and imperial policy at present, and it seems the only one likely to keep our people out of the terrible earthquake "war-woe" which is likely to break out shortly among them.

Mr. Curzon made a very handsome acknowledgment of the value of Lord Rosebery's late speech in Edinburgh. He said in reference to it the following:—

"It was a speech of one who has been Foreign Minister of this country, and who may be so again. It might be studied by Conservatives and posted in every club—I very much doubt whether it will be in every Liberal and Radical club—in the country, and whether Lord Rosebery again becomes Prime Minister of Great Britain or not that speech will stand to his credit. I congratulate the party that retained such a member in its ranks; I commiserate the men who have lost such a leader. (Cheers.) Well, in that speech Lord Rosebery conclusively answered all his recent colleagues. He answered Mr. Gladstone; he answered Sir William Harcourt; he answered Mr. Asquith; he answered Mr. Bryce, and I almost feel angry with him that he has scarcely left anything for us to answer." (Laughter.)

The world-wide wanderings of Englishmen and Scots were noticed by Mr. Curzon in a few well chosen words, which we do well to repeat. They point not doubtfully to our Israelite origin, since they tell of our wanderings to the ends of the earth and of our commerce which is derived from every sea and every ocean:—

"It is no doubt well that the labour of Parliament and the efforts of your political organizations and the speeches of your public men should in the main be devoted to domestic problems and the alleviation of the lot of our own people and of the conditions under which they labour. It is not a bad thing—I think it is a good thing—that from time to time we should be reminded of our Imperial responsibilities (cheers); of the place we occupy in the European system, and of the influence that we are capable of exercising for good and for evil upon the destinies of mankind. (Cheers.) Such a reminder acts as a tonic on our material system. It places us for the time being in a wider environment; it enables us to appeal to our fellow citizens, and we are appealing still more to the great brotherhood of mankind. (Cheers.) There is another aspect in which a foreign crisis is by no means without its service. It holds up the mirror to the people of this country in which we can see ourselves as others see us. To you, Scotsmen, the view that is entertained of us abroad may not be flattering to our complacency or agreeable to our self-esteem, but at any rate it is a corrective of national vanity and self-righteousness, and it should be—it ought to be—a potent stimulus to common sense. (Cheers.) Least of all can you in Glasgow be insensible to these considerations. Your sons go out into all lands and come back to you from the uttermost parts of the world. The keels that are laid in your docks cleave the waves of every ocean and of every sea (cheers); every day on the bosom of your broad river may be seen the accumulated evidence of the foreign connexions of this country (cheers), and also those connexions in the aspect which you here view them may be associated, in the main, with the pursuit of trade and of the arts of peace. Yet so inextricably are commerce and politics interwoven in the texture of our Imperial interests that not merely, as the chairman told us to-night, is it a common adage that 'Trade follows the flag,' not merely if a war should break out, might your mercantile interest be the first to suffer, but modern wars are more likely to arise, and have already more frequently arisen, from the jealousies of commerce and from the race for markets than they have done, as in olden times, from the personal ambitions of sovereigns and statesmen, from religious quarrels, or from dynastic feuds. (Cheers.) For these reasons I hope that the people of this country will not be—and I am sure that the citizens of a great manufacturing and maritime city like Glasgow can never be—indifferent to foreign affairs, which, after all, are only the affairs of our own country in foreign parts." (Cheers.)

In the prophecy of Balaam (Numbers xxiv. 7, R.V.), which is under fulfilment at the present hour, we have recorded regarding Israel, in our present epoch, that

"Water shall flow from his buckets,
And his seed shall be in many waters,
And his king shall be higher than Agag,
And his kingdom shall be exalted."

With the enlargement of our commerce, the vigilance of our God in protecting us as a nation from harm and from war in consequence will increase, and we need dread no evil.

As the British flag advances, trade advances too, and the protecting care of the God of Israel may be relied upon to ward off all the accompanying dangers of our position, as it is this day. We praise the Lord for His tender care of His blind ones hitherto, and rely on Him also in the future, to accompany us with His blessing, both spiritual and temporal.

THE 92ND ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

THE following is part of the leader of the Daily Chronicle. of October 17th last, regarding the funeral of the late Primate, so suddenly called to his account in Hawarden, but interred in Canterbury Cathedral with vast ceremonial on the 16th. It was right that due love, affection, and reverence should be shown to the temporal head of the English Church, who on the whole had during his career done well for the Church and for the sheep of the flock of whom he was the chief earthly shepherd. However much we may differ from the late Archbishop, no one can deny that he was a hard-working, able, and single-minded Prelate, whose loss as a man of peace will be long felt by the Church at large. The following is the Daily Chronicle's article, in part:—

"With great reverence, and much ceremony, the body of the ninety-second Archbishop of Canterbury has been laid to rest in the cathedral from which he took his title. The last of the Archbishops to find sepulture in that glorious fane was Cardinal Pole, after his three years' troublous tenure of the office. And what a difference marks the years 1556 and 1896, the middle of the brief reign of Mary I. and, in the course of nature, the closing era of Victoria I. Three hundred and forty years, most of them jewelled or defaced by great events, have gone since Reginald Pole died, and now Edward White Benson joins him under that fretted roof which covers what some absurdly call 'the first Christian Church in England.' Of course Canterbury is not this. British Christianity flourished long before Augustine's Roman mission in simpler forms and without much royal or State recognition. That honour belongs to Glastonbury, the 'vetusta ecclesia'—the wicker Church. Glastonbury was founded by St. Patrick, the apostle of Ireland, more than a century before a Christian wife persuaded a King of Kent to listen to the message of the monk sent to those whom Pope Gregory declared to be 'non Angli sed angeli.' There had been even fifteen Archbishops of London before then; and—to say nothing about Ireland, and the Isle of Man and Galloway—there were three sees, with cathedrals, in the province of Cærleon, or Wales, before Augustine saw the white cliffs of Albion. But, for all that, Canterbury has been, for thirteen hundred years save one, the seat of the Primacy of England. It has never been long without a head, save during the fifteen years that succeeded the execution of Laud, whom Dr. Benson so much honoured. It stands for all men of the English race as to all intents and purposes the head and front of our historical Christianity, and it can never be a matter of indifference to thoughtful Englishmen what manner of man he is who sits 'in the chair of St. Augustine.'"

By W. L. BLORE.

THE Editor of Bible Light, under the title of, "Family Quarrels, between Germany and England," suggests "a very simple remedy," as he terms it, "an amicable co-operation in the colonial field." We all well know that this is simply impossible. The constitution of Germany is a military despotism, that of England is liberal and representative. Before there can be the least approach to "amicable co-operation in the colonial field" Germany must change her skin. At present, she cannot be called a brother in politics, in religious observance, in missionary enterprise, or in the pursuit of the arts of peace. She, Russia, France, Austria, and Italy have not, one of them, the characteristics of that brotherhood which is essential to an "amicable co-operation in the colonial field." He refers to Genesis xlviii. 19. Ellicott in his commentary states on this passage: "It was the division of Manasseh into two divisions which made it politically insignificant." "Ephraim commanded a superior position in consequence. It held naturally the rank of foremost tribe in the days of Joshua, and claimed it always afterwards." "Joshua as an Ephraimite held a position similar to that of General Washington in the United States, and all Israel would regard Joshua as their ruler and chief. The influence of Ephraim would be strengthened by the ark being placed in one of its towns." The context says that after this: "Jacob set Ephraim before Manasseh." We deny that Germany is here represented by Manasseh, which the editor of Bible Light affirms. Now mark the word "before" in verse 20. In the Septuagint it is translated—"In front of." Now the editor, in his article, places Germany in front of Ephraim. See his note on the same page which states—"This partnership in our home commerce, and the advantages of it to both, especially Germany, is seen in the following returns:—

Imports from Germany and Holland for 5 years ...	£269,855,701
Exports to Germany and Holland for 5 years ...	£139,251,875
Balance in favour of Germany and Holland ...	£130,603,826
Which will give an average per annum of ...	£26,120,765

From this it will be seen that the industries of Germany and Holland gain nearly £2 from us, while our industries only gain £1 from them."

A schoolboy from the lowest form might put the learned editor right on this score. If A sends B £1 of merchandise and B in exchange returns to A £2 of merchandise, who is the gainer? Answer: Not B but A. The £2 returned represents profit, interest on investments in Germany, and freightage on goods shipped in British ships to different parts of the world. Then in this matter of commerce are we brethren? Decidedly not. Protection and utter rejection in the colonial field are the characteristics of German dealing with Britain in this matter. Whereas, in our colonies all the European nations and all the nations of the world are welcomed as partners in commerce, in political status, and in representation.

Germany is no more our brother than is France in this matter of commerce. At any rate, Manasseh must come behind Ephraim, and not appear in a line with him in the sense of equality but as a follower, which Germany is not in constitution, in the observance of the Sabbath, in the home, or in missionary enterprise, or in language. The last is most important. The United States is the nearest to us in consanguinity, language, the observance of the Sabbath, political and constitutional characteristics, and in missionary enterprise. Our periodical literature is interchangeable, which cannot be said of that of any other. We must therefore decline to accept Germany as standing in a line with us even as a second in the fight of the progress of the kingdom of Israel. The United States stand second.

There is an excellent article in Good Words for September, entitled, "Life in Berlin." The following extracts may be interesting to those who have studied this subject:—

"If a woman's position is inferior in Germany to what it is in England, that of servants is especially bad. There service seems almost a species of serfdom. A German lady would need be a good manager, for with high rents and food dear it is not easy to live now-a-days. Sugar is 4d. per lb., tea very expensive, pot of marmalade 1/6, soap very dear, bread too is often dear. When flour rises in price, instead of raising the price of the loaf it becomes smaller. Hence the lamentation, 'How small the loaf is becoming.'

"Germany is poorer to-day than before the last war. Great success brings its cares with it. Fathers have to support their sons till they are twenty-five at least, for what with two years' service and not leaving school till they are nineteen, they are very late in beginning their professional studies. They are often thirty before they become self-supporting, and it is a heavy tax on parents with small means.

"Incongruous as it may appear, along with the German's high opinion of their own prowess and success, there is a widespread feeling of insecurity as to the stability of things. They think the French will never rest till they have avenged themselves for 1870 and 1871. Their Eastern neighbour is also a source of uneasiness to them, so it is little wonder if the idea of a war with additional taxation strikes dismay into the hearts of an already overtaxed people; and contradictory as it appears, they are for the same reason, as well as for more patriotic ones, willing to pay any taxes for the support of their enormous army.

"A few months' sojourn in Berlin makes one appreciate the freedom enjoyed by all in England.

"We do not describe how they spend their Sundays in Berlin, seeing that there is a movement all over Germany to get back the day of rest. 'This is no easy task.' The Emperor and Empress are doing their best in this direction.

So that, taking everything into consideration, we may safely say that Germany has neither the voice nor the hands of Ephraim or Manasseh; neither is its mess of pottage palatable to Israel; neither is the Emperor of Germany as wise as our father Jacob or as prudent as our great general Joshua. As to relationship by marriage descent, we see that we are represented at other courts besides that of Germany. The Czar of Russia seemed to be quite as much at home at Balmoral as the Emperor of Germany was at Osborne. Both are representatives of military despotism, not of representative government in its most liberal sense.

But let us refer back to the question of imports and exports as quoted by the editor of Bible Light. It is as well, once for all, to clear away the mist that conceals the truth from the uninitiated on this matter. For that purpose I quote McCulloch on the Balance of Trade:—

"A very large proportion of the restraints imposed on the freedom of commerce during the last two centuries arose of this notion, that if the imports exceeded the exports the balance would have to be paid by specie.

"The truth is, however, that the balance of trade is erroneous, from radically mistaken notions as to the nature of commerce. The mode in which the balance is usually estimated is indeed completely fallacious."

Then he enters into details. But further on, he says:—"The value of an exported article is estimated at the moment of its being sent abroad, and before its value is increased by transport. Whereas, the value of the imported commodity in its stead is estimated after it has arrived at its destination, after its value has been enhanced by the cost of freight, insurance, importer's profits, &c. Mr. Pekin, in 'The Commerce of the United States,' 2nd ed., p. 280, says: 'Although our practical politicians have been in the habit of considering the excess of imports as a certain proof of disadvantageous commerce, it is nevertheless true that the real gain of the United States has been nearly in proportion as their imports have exceeded their exports."

Then the writer enters more fully into detail and discussion of the subject, and closes thus:—

"Not only, therefore, is the common theory with respect to the balance of trade erroneous, but the very reverse of that theory is true. It is difficult to estimate the mischief which the absurd notions relative to the balance of trade have occasioned in almost every commercial country; here they have been particularly injurious. It is principally to the prevalence of prejudices to which they have given rise, that the restrictions on the trade between this country and France are to be ascribed." (McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary Edition, 1840, 1,250 pages.) The above quotations will be found on page 57.

Some idea may be formed of the advantage gained by the United Kingdom for the year 1894 from the following return from Whitaker.

We exported in 1894 merchandise valued at £273,785,867, and imported in return £408,344,810, to which add Bullion, specie, and precious stones—estimated at, say, £22,000,000—which gives us a commercial gain in one year of £156,558,943—which gain in one year exceeds the gross exports of Germany for the same year according to Whitaker. The rate of exchange alone is a proof that the balance of trade is in our favour.

Postscript.—What co-operation can there be in the colonial field; when Germany, after ten years colonial effort, has only 700 colonists, including all officials, and shows a volume of trade, including government stores, of about half a million; whilst Anglo-Israel numbers 300,000,000 in population, and has a volume of trade amounting to, including bullion, specie, and precious stones, two hundred millions in her colonies and possessions? The proportion is four to two thousand. The proposal is impracticable.

"COME OUT OF HER, MY PEOPLE."

By H. R. Shaw.

In the days of Uzziah, king of Judah, and of Jeroboam, son of Joash, king of Israel, the herdman-prophet Amos was commissioned to declare unto these two evil-dealing nations, among other sayings of the Word of the Lord (chap. ix. 9): "For, lo, I will command and I will sift the House of Israel among all nations" (margin, cause to move), "like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth." This Scripture, referring, as it evidently does refer, to the entire Twelve Tribes of Israel, would, even if it stood alone, give us confidence in the power and will of the Lord to preserve and duly reproduce His Ten Lost Tribes of the northern kingdom which owned Jeroboam II. for its king in the days of Amos. The people have indeed been swallowed up by the great Gentile Powers of the earth, but only after the manner in which Jonah was swallowed up by the great fish—the meal has never been digested, and must be disgorged unharmed after the third day, and we think as Anglo-Israelites that we shall not be far wrong in declaring that the great disgorgement of Israel is now in very active progress indeed. So far back as A.D. 96, John heard a voice from heaven saying, a propos of Babylon the Great, "Come out of her, My people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." He is informed that this Babylon the Great "is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth," which, of course, in that day was Rome pagan, notwithstanding that the commentators who have supplied the marginal references to the A.V. do, by referring back, among other passages, to Isa. xlviii. 20, seem to favour a literal Babylon and a very literal redemption of the Lord's servant Jacob therefrom. No doubt, however, they are sufficiently near the fact if we recollect that the great world power had seven heads, of whom Rome and Babylon were two.

These observations have been suggested by the perusal of a remarkable leading article appearing in the Daily Telegraph, of London, Oct. 16th, 1896, wherein the writer seems clearly to recognise the sifting process in full operation—not, of course, of Israel's grains of corn from among Gentile chaff, but of the better sort of continental, and especially German continental, emigrants from thence to the free and hospitable colonies of Great Britain; which, of course, is the same thing, although our intelligent journalist knows it not. The article in full is as follows:—

"Criticism, 'made in Germany,' of British policy, British character, and British motives is as cheap, and we may safely add as nasty, as the commodities which have turned that phrase into a byword. The torrent pours on unchecked, but, even if we were disposed to mind it, familiarity has bred its habitual contempt. Yesterday German criticism was directed to unmasking some deep self-seeking scheme in the disinterested efforts of Lord Salisbury to secure decent government for the subjects of the Sultan. That having failed to produce any appreciable effect either here or on the Continent, an attack is now being made on the colonising policy of Great Britain. A chance remark by Lord Rosebery, in his great speech at Edinburgh, that within the last dozen years two million six hundred square miles had been added to the possessions of the English people, has furnished a peg for the indictment. We are land-grabbers and thieves, and we know not what else. We certainly do not stand alone in this condemnation, for Germany herself, who has not shown much aptitude for successful colonisation, has absorbed in the same period nearly half as much as rapacious Albion. The German eye, however, recks little of motes and beams when it is inflamed with anger against Great Britain. The Kölnische Zeitung, ever to the fore when this country is the object of attack, preaches us a sermon on 'English territorial greed and English envy of colonial extension on the part of the European Powers, especially of Germany.' The Kreuz Zeitung is good enough to tender us advice. 'England will not find time,' it says, 'to realise her colonial ideal, and while she is trying to assure and to retain her newer possessions she is losing precisely those dominions upon which her universal influence is founded. The political developments in East and Central Asia already point to such a future for England, and if the errors of English policy are made, as they seemed to be made, a question of national vanity, the present generation may experience the truth of our words. Africa will drive England from Asia, that is the prospect of the future.' A dismal prospect truly, but still we can do something, the Kreuz Zeitung generously says, to save ourselves. We can clear out of Zanzibar, abandon Rhodesia, and confine ourselves to Cape Colony, and then, perhaps, 'the Fatherland, the happy Fatherland,' will stint the volume of vitriolic abuse daily turned on us by the German Press. It is hard to say whether the silliness or the baselessness of this kind of invective is the more remarkable. One would almost be tempted to imagine that Germany had only just discovered that the Anglo-Saxons are a colonising race, that they have spread and planted themselves and increased and multiplied in every quarter of the habitable globe. Anglo-Saxon colonisation differs from the system adopted by most continental nations in that it is not exclusive. We do the work of pioneers, and we debar no one from entering into the fruits of our pioneering. It is a notorious fact that Germans prefer to settle in colonies already established by British enterprise to founding colonies of their own under the German flag. The reason is not far to seek. The German colonist, as a rule, is a man who endeavours to escape the stringent, if necessary, despotism of the continental military system. In a British colony he is a free man; in a German colony he is still under the shadow of the yoke.

"Nor is this all. Wisely or unwisely, we have conceded to all British dependencies the right to impose or to refrain from imposing duties upon imported goods, without reserving to our own merchants and manufacturers any special privileges. So that in the markets of India, of Australia, of South Africa, the German competes with the subjects of the paramount Power on terms of absolute equality. Hence it follows that the expansion and development of British colonies are as much to the advantage of the German as of the English producer. We make colonies, and the Germans trade with them. Nothing, therefore, could be more ungrateful than this persistent carping at the colonial system of Great Britain. If any one had a right to complain it is the Briton, and not the German; for we keep up an immense fleet and impose taxation upon ourselves to maintain a great Empire, which opens its markets as freely to the alien as to the home-born subject of the Queen. One incidental result of the persistent nagging of the German Press is the retirement of Dr. Kayser, the chief of the Colonial Department in Berlin. He has been hounded out of office, in spite of the fact that he is known to enjoy the personal favour of the German Emperor, mainly because he recognises the limitations of German Colonial policy. His successor is certainly not to be envied. These attacks on Great Britain are, however, by no means isolated. If the Colonies furnish the text to-day, it was Turkey yesterday, and it may be China or Japan to-morrow. We confess to complete indifference to them, while we are unable to conceive their ulterior object, if they have any. Great Britain has no quarrel with Germany; we are kinsmen, and we have never been arrayed against one another in arms. Our commercial interests conflict, no doubt, as they must conflict with those of all other industrial races; but, as has been pointed out, we accord to Germany advantages that she strenuously denies to us. We do this, it is true, not as a matter of favour, but as the outcome of the commercial policy to which we are committed. No Power outside the Triple Alliance manifested a more sincere sympathy with the object of the League of Peace than Great Britain. If we declined to join that combination it was because the conditions and circumstances of the allies and our own rendered anything like a formal adhesion quite impossible. Germany has not the slightest justification for the unfriendliness displayed by so large a section of the German Press towards this country, but it may not be amiss to remind these scribes that the friendship repudiated in Germany may be appreciated elsewhere. It was not inconvenient for Germany, to state the case mildly, that there should be friction between Great Britain and the two Powers which are the real rivals of the Triple Alliance. It is possible to understand, though we need not admire, a policy that should tend to aggravate the differences that kept Great Britain and Russia apart; but what is utterly incomprehensible is a policy which, if it had any result at all, could only end in driving Great Britain into the arms of Germany's most formidable rivals. We do not say that this will be the result of the continuance of these petty attacks upon England, for nobody attaches any great importance to them; but it is as well to point out that this could be the only imaginable outcome of them. If such be the policy of the German Press, it can hardly be that of far-sighted German statesmen."

Comment is scarcely necessary; we are land-grabbers, like Israel, according to our German critics; so are the Germans, according to the Daily Telegraph, but with this difference, Britons know what to do with the lands when they have got them, having, in fact, the Israelite need for the lands and the Israelite blessing attending their acquisition, while to Germans and others the possession of the waste lands seems as valueless as was Esau's birthright to that profane person. Britain, in short, like Jacob of old, knows a good thing when she gets it, and sets about making the most of it, and more important still, is, according again to the Daily Telegraph, not exclusive. All may come in and sit down with the children of the pioneer-host. And herein may be perceived, we think, the solution of some of the mystery of Britain's or Israel's successful colonial policy and of the failure of other nations' colonial enterprises. This abstinence of continental folk from their own native colonies and this flocking of aliens to the British Colonies and Dependencies is but the reponse to the voice which is urgently calling to the scattered corns, the rifts and remnants of the flesh and blood Israel to "Come out of her, My people," that ye be not partakers of the judgments impending upon the seven-headed and ten-horned great earth power. And surely a thought such as this should inspire all true Christian Anglo-Israelites with patience and charity towards the melancholy procession of destitute aliens, as we call them, who are constantly arriving upon the shores of our country and its dependencies, to compete with our native operatives, or even it may be as half assimilated Boers in South Africa giving us a great deal of trouble to beat in war, for if we read the times aright, these are verily the gathering together of the dry bones of Israel bone to bone, only awaiting the invigorating touch of the Spirit of God to become revealed as the mighty Israelite army of the Lord, a people indeed prepared for Him.

The Mother of Nations.—There is no parallel in all the records of the world to the case of that prolific British mother who has sent forth her innumerable children over all the earth to be the founders of half-a-dozen empires. But among these children there is one whose place in the world's eye and history is superlative: it is the American Republic. She has, taking the capacity of her land in view, as well as its mere measurement, a natural base for the greatest continuous empire ever established by man.—Gladstone.

"ISRAEL, THE GUILTY." THE NATION'S SINS. WRATH OR MERCY—WHICH?

By H. A. Marchant.

Many Christians, and even some of our British-Israelites, find it difficult to believe that God will continue to show favour and lovingkindness to our nation, it being in their estimation guilty of so many sins and iniquities. Those who are opposed to British-Israelism are continually flaunting the nation's sins before our faces and telling us to look at their sins, and they ask the question, How can we be the favoured nation of God; must He not execute the fierceness of His wrath upon such a nation as this? To prophecy evil against Britain is no new thing; and yet in spite of all these prophecies of coming judgment, God continues to shower His blessings upon us day by day.

The question I should like to ask of those who are so given to looking at our sins is: do they look at this nation and its relation to Almighty God from the proper standpoint? If we British-Israelites venture to quote the text: "In righteousness shalt thou be established," we are accused of applying it to an unrighteous nation, and are told we are subverting God's truth; whereas, we say with the Psalmist, "I will make mention of Thy righteousness, even of Thine only." Surely, this is the only righteousness in which Israel is to be established; for God says, "Their righteousness is of Me, saith the Lord;" and Hosea says, "From Me is thy fruit found."

I have met many Christians who have taken a delight in taking their stand with the "accuser of the brethren," who, by the way, we are told "shall be cast down;" and they have over and over again enumerated our country's sins, and piled them up as though they would make a tower, the top of which should reach unto heaven. And then they seem to take delight in asking the question: "And shall not God's soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" "How can we be Israel with all these sins?" They fail to see the folly of their logic, for, if they are right, Israel cannot exist unless she is a sinless nation; and if such a perfect people exists outside of the British, why are they not a candle set upon a candlestick, or a city set upon a hill that cannot be hid, letting their light shine before men? and why has God forsaken such a good people as Israel must be, according to the above method of reasoning, and chosen, as a great many of these opponents say, a Gentile people, and instituted a Gentile dispensation? No one can doubt that our sins merit the wrath of God, but "He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities; for as the heaven is higher than the earth, so great is His mercy towards them that fear Him;" and in this land I fully believe there are millions that fear the name of the God of Israel and trust in His Son and His finished work. But when people take a pessimistic view of our country's sins, are they looking at the matter fairly and justly? It has been said of autobiography, "that there we can read of all the good things that the writer ever thought, whilst all the bad things which he did are left out." And when people judge of our country's guilt by the newspaper, may we not ask them whether they have ever thought of the fact that it pays the newspaper best to chronicle evil rather than good? There are tens and tens of thousands of people whose bad deeds have been chronicled in the newspapers who have performed tens of thousands of good deeds not one of which has been recorded in print. It is the evil which men do that is blazed abroad, and some people judge that nearly all are evil, and children of the devil because of this. In a village Bible-class someone remarked "what a drunken place that village was." Another said: "Well, let us test it and see whether we have a right to call it a drunken place or a sober place. With pencil and paper I will take down the names of all the drunkards you can think of." After ransacking their brains they got several names of men and women who made a great noise under the influence of drink. "Now," said the class-leader, "let us put down the names of all the sober and respectable people we can think of." The list was very soon swollen out of all proportion to the drunken list. "Now," said he. "why should we brand our village as a drunken village, when you have got such an overwhelming majority of sober, respectable people?" It is not the sobriety and respectability and the godly devotion that is chronicled in the daily paper, but the drunkenness of the drunken, and the vice of the vicious. In fact, the doings of the sons of Belial; and then some would say "What a wicked nation we are!" Let us never forget to look at the other side of the shield, lest we be like the knights who called each other liar and fool because they saw one the silver side and the other the golden.

When speaking of our country's sins, we do well to remember, "If Thou, Lord, should'st mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand?" (Psa. cxxx.). One thing that ought to be a comfort to us British-Israelites is, that God knows more about our sins than we do, and therefore, we may be sure He never forgot them or overlooked them when He caused His precious promises to be written. Seeing that He knew all about them, what did He say He would do with them under the new covenant? Would He execute the fierceness of His wrath because of them, or do as He promised by Micah, "Who is a God like unto Thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of His heritage? He retaineth not His anger for ever, because He delighteth in mercy. He will turn again and have compassion upon us; He will tread our iniquities under foot: and Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea. Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, the mercy to Abraham, which Thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old" (chap. vii. 18—20).

There are some British-Israelites even who think that the time of "Jacob's trouble" is a period when God, being wrath with Israel, will judge her because of her sins. I do not so read my Bible; for when I compare scripture with scripture I find that the promises of mercy under the new covenant are so numerous, that I am amazed that any should suppose our covenant-keeping God will fail to keep these promises with all His others. In Luke i. 54, 55, we read, "In remembrance of His mercy" . . . "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers;" and St. Peter says, "the longsuffering of our Lord is salvation" (2 Peter iii. 15). And now I want my British-Israelite brethren to turn with me to Isa. liv. What does the prophet say of the Ten-tribed House of Israel, who were to do what Britain only has done? "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes; for thou shalt spread abroad on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall possess the nations, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited. Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed: neither shalt thou be confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame: for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more. For thy Maker is thine husband; the Lord of hosts is His name; and the Holy One of Israel is thy Redeemer; the God of the whole earth shall He be called" (read the whole chapter).

Here we have what is truly, when rightly examined, a chronological and geographical proof that the Husband of Israel will never again leave her nor forsake her; for we have been enlarging the place of our tent, and stretching forth the curtains of our habitations for the last 300 years. And she is to "fear not;" she shall not be put to shame; she shall even forget the shame of her youth. In overflowing wrath, God hid His face from Israel when they broke the law and were to be deported from Palestine. But when in Gospel days she began her world-wide mission, "with everlasting kindness will I have mercy upon thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer"—for, just as God kept the covenant with Noah's family and the animals, and the waters have no more overflowed the earth, "so," said God, "have I sworn that I would not be wrath with thee nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." "Mercy," my friends, mark that; put a line under it in your Bibles, for a good many who profess to believe these sacred scriptures read "wrath" against Israel, instead of "mercy;" they threaten her with the great and strong wind, and earthquake, and fire, but overlook the fact that it shall be the "still, small voice." "Therefore, behold I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak to her heart" (Hosea ii., see margin). Not by burning the dry bones under the chaldron, but by speaking to them and saying: "O ye dry bones, hear the Word of the Lord."

In the dispensation of the grace of God, we do indeed stand amazed that so many of our Christian brethren should accuse us of going back to the law, which they appear to have gone back to very much themselves, to find these awful judgments which they have been threatening for so many years past, but which do not come upon Ephraim, whom God calls His "dear son." The cause of much confusion existing in men's minds is that they can only see Jews and Gentiles, unto whom they apply all the promises and threatenings. But if backsliding Israel had the promise that God would heal her backsliding and would have mercy upon her, it will be well for Bible students to find out something as to where these people are; for, if poor, persecuted Judah is to come to the House of Israel, it would be poor comfort for them to be brought to Israel before Israel herself had been brought to God by our Redeemer, Jesus! There are fierce judgments and wrath in God's sacred scriptures, but no careful student would apply such prophecies to that branch of God's people to whom He had said, "I will not be wrath with thee nor rebuke thee. Return, thou backsliding Israel, said the Lord, and I will not cause Mine anger to fall upon thee, for I am merciful, saith the Lord; and I will not keep anger for ever . . . I will love them freely, for Mine anger is turned away from him" (Ephraim) (Hos. xiv.). Who turned God's anger away from Israel? Must it not have been He who stood in the sinner's place, who "bore the sins of many, and made intercession for the transgressors?"

"O Christ! what burdens bowed Thy head,
Our load was laid on Thee."

In Ezek. xxxvi. God is remonstrating with poor sinful Israel, and promises them cleansing, a new heart and a new spirit—not for your sakes—be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O House of Israel. But as He says in verse 22, "For Mine holy name's sake." Let us all study what that means, and we shall find God's oath speaking to us, and it will explain why poor sinners as we are, we may yet look up into His face and say, "Lord, Thou wilt ordain peace for us, for Thou also hast wrought all our works in us" (or for us) (Isa. xxvi. 12). What works? Read the 15th verse and see some of it. Joseph means increase, and Young's Concordance shows that it says, "Thou hast Josephed the nation, O Lord; Thou hast Josephed the nation; Thou art glorified," &c. Praise His glorious name, we will never say Him nay. Amen.

WARS AND RUMOURS OF WARS.—TURKEY AND THE APPROACHING END OF THE AGE.

By John S Anderson.

PART II.

Commenting on these momentous questions, the state of Turkey naturally occupies a very prominent position. In Heycock's "Kings of the East," second edition, published in the year 1849, the very first chapter treats of the "Drying up of the mystical Euphrates," as in Rev. xvi. 12: "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates, and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." As he says, all recent commentators upon this passage are agreed that we are now living during the outpouring of this vial of wrath. This will be evident by attending to those facts which from the year 1820 afford an illustration of the words of the prophet. The river Euphrates, which rises in the mountains of Armenia, and flows nearly 1,800 miles through the heart of Asiatic Turkey, is set by the prophet figuratively for the Turks through whose land it flows. Not the river, but the Turks, therefore, are to be dried up. He traces from the year 1820, when the "Annual Register" records that the Ottoman empire, by a large and unwonted good fortune, found itself, at the commencement of the era (1820), freed at once from foreign war and domestic rebellion, up to the date of the publication of his book, the various misfortunes which have overtaken the Turk.

We imagine no one would deny this, or that these untoward events have continued up to the present day.

In the Standard of August 20, writing about the Cretan insurrection, and the helpless condition of the Sultan with regard to the despatch of men and arms from the Hellenic kingdom to the insurgents in Crete, which he said "might strain the relations between Turkey and Greece." . . . "The facts which Tewfik Pacha had to lay before the Ambassadors bear another and a more significant moral. In themselves they are convincing evidence that the Porte no longer exercises an effective government in Crete, and that the Greek sympathisers with the Christian insurgents are determined, even at the risk of embroiling their country in war with a more powerful neighbour, to do all that lies in the power of valorous and adventurous men to bring the intolerable tyranny and ineptitude of the Turkish domination in the Island to an end. The Embassies can have no other views on the subject of Tewfik Pacha's complaint than are here expressed. They can but tell the Sultan that, however wrong it is for Greek filibusters to act while Diplomatists talk, he is but reaping what he has sown. The detestation with which his wrong-doing has inspired the liberty-loving peoples of Europe was certain to find active expression. The Sultan should surely be the last person in the world to be surprised that enthusiastic partisans in Greece have passed from expressions of sympathy with the rebels to an appeal to the arbitrament of force.

"It is not in Crete alone that anarchy prevails. From Macedonia comes the news of a massacre by Turkish troops which reads exactly like a repetition of Armenian horrors. The soldiery attacked two villages in the province of Logani, killed all who could not escape to the mountains, and burned down the houses. In Syria also there is incipient, if not active, rebellion, and there appears to have been fighting of some kind on the Bulgarian frontier. Whether the frontier incident be alarming or not, it is just one of those matters that they may yet develope into a serious quarrel. Look where one will in the dominions of the Sultan, there are deep-rooted troubles and disturbances such as precede the downfall of an Empire; while in Europe there is a growing storm of angry disapproval at the cruelty and incapacity of the Turkish Government.

"By its persistent neglect of reiterated warnings to put its house in order—and the first step to that end should be the concession of autonomy to Crete—it courts the punishment that must in the end overtake an Empire which disregards its duty to its subjects. There was a time when this country, as it showed by its deeds, was willing to make any sacrifice in order to preserve the integrity of Turkey. We should still be unwilling to hasten its division, but the persistent misgovernment of the Sultan has made it impossible for an English Minister to suggest the idea of going to war in defence of so rotten a system."

Having arrived at this point, we are brought to the consideration of the mere hair by which the sword hangs suspended over the head of the doomed Sultan, showing the extreme acuteness of the situation, and then to the prophecy of our Saviour in St. Matthew xxiv. 28, "For wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together."

Is not this being fulfilled before our own eyes at this very moment? for the war-ships of the various eagles are even now gathered together near the Turkish capital, Constantinople, the Gate of gates. They are represented by the French eagle, the German eagle, the Austrian eagle, the Russian eagle, the Italian or Roman eagle, and the American eagle is about to put in an appearance, the President of the United States having ordered the warship Bancraft to Turkey as well as the cruiser Cincinnati and other cruisers to follow.

The state of the "dying man" may be summed up in the words of the telegram from Constantinople as reported in the Standard of Sept. 2.

"August 31st.—To-day the Representatives of the Powers met again to deliberate on the wording of the Collective Note which is to be sent to the Porte on the subject of the recent massacres. With regard to the written communication which the Dragomans were instructed to deliver at Yildiz Kiosk on the occasion of the anniversary of the Sultan's accession, it expresses profound regret at the painful events which have characterised the twentieth anniversary of his Majesty's reign. This communication and the telegram addressed to the Sultan on Friday, pointing out the danger to his Empire which would arise from the continuance of anarchy in his capital, are documents the direct language of which is rare in the representations of an Ambassador to a foreign Sovereign.

"It is a noteworthy fact that the Representatives of all the Powers have been acting in perfect accord in regard to the various steps taken."

Digitized by Google

How long this accord will continue it is of course impossible for us to conjecture, the interests of the six "eagles" not being identical, and those of more than one are certainly not in ultimate accord with our own, but from the information received it would seem that we are taking the lead in these representations to the Porte, and moreover have a powerful fleet close at hand to back our demands if necessary.

Referring to the prophecy quoted at the commencement of this paper it remains to be shewn for whom the way is being prepared by the imminent collapse of Turkey. Who are therefore the "Kings of the East" must form the subject of another article.

RANDOM SHAFTS.

It is well known that the height and shape of a big mountain is best seen at a distance, and perhaps this principle accounts for the fact that foreigners understand the greatness of the British Empire better than we ourselves do. Frenchmen, especially, are keenly conscious of its magnitude; and fertile in their suggestions for reducing its importance. Our latest Gallic critic is M. Marthin-Chagny, who has written a book dealing with the never-ending Angleterre, and in which he ruminates thus: "It will be necessary to crush this race, and a pitiless brutality will probably be the sole means of assuring the tranquillity of the Continental peoples." By pitiless brutality, our "highly civilized" neighbour cannot surely imply massacres of the Turkish stamp. But he has, no doubt, a terrible plot in his eye, and we ought to quake at the prospect, only I fancy that something of the kind has been tried before. We have had Europe on our track in the past—much to the disadvantage of Europe,—and although Europe is more powerful than she was then, so is Britannia. This is to look at the matter merely from a human standpoint: our "first line of defence" is unknown to M. Marthin-Chagny.

Unknown? It would seem so; yet M. Marthin-Chagny actually believes in Our Identity with the lost Ten Tribes, and has evidently picked up a few scraps of our argument. He holds that Saxon is a corruption of Isaacson, that the Saxons are descended from the Sacassini, and that, according to ancient historians, such as Herodotus, they came from the district where Israel disappeared. Besides, he asks us to note that the British flag consists of squares, which arrangement is an occult reference to the re-building of Solomon's temple, and he even maintains that our clothes are Oriental in cut and colour. Seeing that he has fallen in somewhere with our literature, and attributes the political position of Great Britain in a large measure to our descent from the Ten Tribes, he should be aware that no weapon formed against us shall prosper. At least that is the promise, and the God whose mighty arm has triumphantly carried out His promises so far may be trusted to fulfil the remainder. The French are not generally logical when treating of the British Empire, and this lack of logic will eventually draw them to their ruin.

The London Chronicle devotes an article to this peculiar work, and of course it sneers at M. Marthin-Chagny's profession of the Identity. His extravagant notions, however, lay him open to ridicule, so that we cannot justly complain of the editorial satire, but the leader contains a sentence which is rather striking. Speaking of the subject we advocate, it says: "The idea is no novelty, it is an accepted commonplace; unless we are mistaken, several English newspapers, each with a large circulation, exist for the sole purpose of keeping our attention directed to it." Much depends on what the Chronicle means by a newspaper, but I, for one, am not acquainted with any of those newspapers which exist for the sole purpose of keeping our attention directed to the "commonplace," and am prepared to receive further enlightenment.

Foreign attacks on England show no signs of abatement; contrariwise, they increase in number and intensity. Most people will agree with Mr. Chamberlain that this state of affairs is partly our own fault: that self-accusation and self-depreciation are a good deal to blame for it. If French and German and Russian writers stigmatize our national policy as rapacious, unprincipled, thievish, immoral, and disgraceful; if they have begun to assume that we are a weak, defenceless, drunken, gambling, uneducated set, is it surprising? Certainly not; they are only repeating what they have heard. A section of the British press—the discontented, snarling section—make it a business, and find it a pleasure to cast slurs on their countrymen. The religious papers join in, under the impression, no doubt, that wrath is an indication of righteousness; but righteousness forbids us to bear false witness, and slander has been quite a "commonplace" of late in prints styled "religious."

A feature of the present "Gentile rage" worth noticing is that none of the Powers concerned are disposed to tackle us singly. They call on each other to form a coalition, and express the conviction that this alone will be sufficient to thwart our nefarious designs. This is exactly what the Identity teaches us to expect. In prophecy Israel is opposed to and opposed by—not this or that nation, but—the nations. "He shall gore the peoples, all of them." "He shall eat up the nations, his adversaries, and break their bones in pieces." "The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might." "With thee will I break in pieces the nations." "It shall break in pieces and consume all those kingdoms." Gog, again, Israel's arch-enemy, is but the head of a confederation—a confederation which, to the discerning mind, is already visible in the germ.

The ordinary exposition of Gog's invasion is that the Jews (or a remnant) having returned to Palestine and settled in their "unwalled villages," Gog raises a huge, cosmopolitan horde to subdue them. But would it be necessary to assemble half the world for that purpose, or would the object, even if it were gained, be worthy of such colossal military operations? Gog might covet Jerusalem and the Syrian coast, but that is no reason why Gomer, for instance, should embark on a war to assist him in obtaining it. Obviously it would require a mutual and wide-spread grievance to bind together the conglomerate forces described in Ezek. xxxviii., and neither the occupation of Palestine by Jews, nor their growth into a strong nation, would supply that incentive. But take the Ten Tribes into account; admit that they are the Anglo-Saxons—threatening to grasp the universe,—and it is easy to comprehend a league like that led by Gog. The motive would exist, so would the reward; foreign scribes being the judges.

* * *

In the English Historical Review for July there is a paper by Mr. Edward Jenks on "The Problem of the Hundreds," which is an enquiry into the nature of what he calls the "Teutonic" system of Hundreds. Mr. Jenks contends that the Hundred was an "area of tribal settlements," and he strenuously combats the view of a M. Fustel that it was a "governmental unit like our modern County Court district." The latter gentleman appears to have a better conception of the truth than Mr. Jenks, but I do not presume to instruct either of them. I would simply suggest that the circumstances attending the origin of an institution are calculated to shed light on its character; and if those who differ over this "problem" consult the first chapter of Deuteronomy they will discover the source, not only of the hundred, but of the tithing and the trithing.

JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

NOTES BY S. A. M.

FOR upwards of 2,000 years B.C., the national shout of God's people was "God save the king," and such it has remained for us nearly 2,000 years since the birth of Christ.

Moses, the law-giver, said, "Thou shalt set him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose" (Deut. xvii. 15).

And Samuel said to all the people when he anointed their first king, Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin, "See ye whom the Lord hath chosen," and all the people shouted and said: "God save the king!" (1 Sam. x. 24).

So also, "all the people" said "God save King Solomon," when he was anointed as the successor of his father, "David the king," of the tribe of Judah (1 Kings i. 39).

And Solomon in his wisdom enjoined the people to "fear the Lord and the king" (Prov. xxiv. 21).

Ezra also, that "ready scribe in the law of Moses, who prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments" (read chap. vii. 6—10), told the people to "pray for the life of the king" (Ezra vi. 10).

And still onward came towards us the shout, "God save the king!" when Joash, the young heir of the kingdom, was anointed (2 Kings xi. 12), "for the shout of a king was among them" (Num. xxiii. 21).

"God save Queen Victoria!" Amen.

AMEN.

This pure Hebrew word has survived among us for upwards of 3,500 years as prescribed for "all the people" (Deut. xxvii. 15—26; 1 Chron. xvi. 36; Psa. cvi. 48).

We find the clear meaning of this ancient word in Jer. xxviii. 6, where we are told that "Even the prophet Jeremiah said, Amen: the Lord do so: the Lord perform thy words." And our Lord's prayer solemnly concludes with the words, "For ever. Amen" (Matt. vi. 13).

Its three sacred letters, A. M. N., proclaim the true Christian Trinity, the triune Jehovah: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, thus:—

A el, the mighty God, the Father;
M elech, the King Jehovah Christ, the Son of God;
N eshamah, breath, spirit.

WILLESDEN BRITISH-ISRAEL SOCIETY.

THERE is a considerable number of members of various English Churches who believe that the people of Great Britain are a section of the ten lost Hebrew Tribes, and their defence of their position is an ingenious one. A society has been formed with Mr. J. S. Barton as Secretary, and possessing an address at 29, Blenheim-gardens, Willesden-green, having this view as a cardinal point in the members' faith, and styling itself the Willesden British-Israel Prophecy Investigation Society. Some thirty-five members met on Oct. 15 at Willesden-green to hear an address by Mr. H. H. Pain, on the Eastern question, in which the speaker first contended that the British nation was identical with the lost House of Israel, who after Jeroboam's reign were carried captive to Assyria, then (according to the Book of Esdras) proceeded to Arsareth (a town on the Sereth, a Danube tributary). From Herodotus the speaker traced a connection between the Scythians and the Israelites, and alleged that the Danes, Saxons, and Normans were of the same race. Certain prophecies were quoted to bear out the speaker's contention, and he then went on to identify Turkey with Edom, and to interpret prophecies to the effect that England and America would interfere on the Armenian behalf, with the result that Constantinople would be a British possession. He expressed a belief that Turkey would lose the holy places in the spring of 1898, and that the two peoples, Judah and Israel, would be united under one king in 1928.—The Willesden Chronicle, Friday, Oct. 30, 1896.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—In last week's BANNER I read how we might spread the doctrine of the Identity. I can say of myself that for the past nine or ten years I have not been a silent witness among my own class, miners, and not a few of them have heard the good news. Now they read for themselves, and believe too. Thank God I have, through the BANNER and other literature of the Identity, been the means of bringing numbers who once were in darkness to the light that is revealed through God's Word. One is a manager of a colliery; another is an engineer, and a host of colliers. Poor, despised, we may be. Thank God, He is our Father, our salvation, and our Friend. I know in whom I have believed, though I can work with a pick in the mine better than use a pen to write what I know. I thank God for the light that fills my soul. I love the BANNER and its aims. I was born again, a Salvationist, and among our people I have not been idle. No! no! it does not matter who they are or where they are. I have captains and staff officers, and soldiers in our army, that have been brought to the light. A few weeks ago, our captain, after reading an old almanac and some old BANNERS, testified to me how she saw as she had never done before. She said, "I always thought we English were something more than any other nation."

Dear Editor, I cannot help you in your fund for distribution of literature, but I will use my BANNERS by lending them while they will hold together. I have bought many books on the Identity, but I have lost all by lending them. Still the word or seed has gone forth, and I am looking for God's blessing on it. There is one thing I should like to come to pass, my brother. I have often wished we could get Mr. Marchant to lecture here; I think a lecture from him in our town would do a deal of good. I am very sorry we are unable to do this; having work so bad, since the coal strike, but by God's help we will keep plodding on, doing our little best. God bless you. Amen and amen. Yours most truly,

WILLIAM HARDING.

THE NATIONS, AND THEIR "LAND GRABBING" OPERATIONS DURING THE PAST 12 YEARS.

THE Times, on the 20th October last, published a statement showing how much of the land of the outside world, the chief of the European nations had succeeded in appropriating during the last 12 years when the race for seizing territory began in earnest. At the conclusion of the article, the following sentence occurred, pointing back to Isa. liv. 2, R.V., and so unwittingly introducing the idea that the whole matter related to "Our Israelitish origin," which in point of fact it really does. The words were these: "In proportion to the extent and responsibilities of the British Empire and the demands which compel us to be constantly 'lengthening our cords and strengthening our stakes,' we have sinned greatly less than any other Power." The writer of the article in his apologetic argument never dreamt that, this nation being Ephraim-Israel, no apology or explanations were really needed on their behalf. Their proceedings have all been undertaken in accordance with the Scriptural destiny prescribed for Israel; and were carried out under the guidance and direction of the Lord God of Israel, who, in Gen. xxviii. 14, Isa. liv. 2, and other passages, told them they should, with God's blessing accompanying, "spread abroad to the West, to the East, to the North, and to the South;" and that in so doing they should obey the further command, "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thy habitations: spare not; lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes. For thou shalt spread abroad on the right hand and on the left, and thy seed shall possess the nations and make the desolate cities to be inhabited." The two prophecies relate to the same people and to the same circumstances, and the means by which the command is to be obeyed is by doing the very thing the Times' writer declares we are compelled to do by "constantly" expanding in all directions. The means by which God has forced us as a nation to carry out His will, is the almost insane rush for colonies made by Germany 12 years ago. That rush forced us to carry out a policy, well described by the German papers of the present day as a reproach to ourselves, but which apply best to the German people themselves, if we read for "Germany" and "German," the words, "Britain" and "the British." "It is evident that Britain cannot silently give way when British interests are directly or indirectly endangered by German plans, and that in such cases Britain should appeal to the same rights as those claimed by Germany. This is the opinion of the vast majority of the British people. . . ."

It is remarkable that at the present moment the German Press, never too friendly towards us, is violently hostile to our nation, and has caught at a sentence in Lord Rosebery's speech in Glasgow which we have already noticed. His lordship said that, "during the last 12 years we had added something like 2,600,000 square miles to our Empire," already vast enough then. The object of the Times is to show that while Lord Rosebery was quite correct in his statistics, he failed to show that if we had been "land grabbers" (according to divine prescription, be it said), the Germans and French had been great offenders too, and that in spite of reason or just necessity. Certainly, the Germans and French, being non-Israelite nations, had no divine mandate to acquire more land. The Germans, however, having had in 1884, no colonial territory whatever, in 1896 have acquired in Africa 920,920 square miles, and in the Pacific 120,150 square miles, or a total of 1,023,070 square miles in all. This sudden access of outland Empire was accomplished in one year only, while our Empire beyond sea was commenced 500 years ago, and our sudden enlargement during the last 12 years was the result of Germany's furious demand for territory, which made it necessary for us to secure as much as we could to prevent her barring our South African enlargement northwards from the Cape towards the Zambezi. In the beginning of 1884, our possessions beyond sea were:—

In Europe	120	square miles
Asia	1,414,130	,,
Africa	300,000	,,
America	3,610,000	,,
Australasia	3,085,540	,,
A total of ...	8,409,790	,,

At this juncture what was the conduct of Germany? She acquired Damaraland and Namaqualand—and wished "to insert a band of German territory between the Cape Colony and the Zambezi. We could not allow this, and therefore made friendly arrangements with Germany and secured our present territories towards the Zambezi from the Cape, and beyond, into Central Africa." Including such additions necessarily made to keep out Germany from stifling us, we acquired in Africa about 2,000,000 square miles. There were extensions in Asia; Burmah to wit, which the French coveted and we had to secure to defend India.

A valuable comparative statement is given by the Times of the acquisitions of each Power, thus:—

COMPARISON.

Let us compare in the following table the accessions to the territories of the various Powers principally concerned. We take the total area of the territories belonging to each Power, including that of the mother country, and compare it as it was in 1884 with what it is now in 1896, showing the actual increase in square miles and the proportionate increase as compared with the area 12 years ago:—

—	1884.	1896.	Actual Addition.	Area 1896 compared with 1884.
	Square Miles.	Square Miles.	Square Miles.
France ...	869,000	3,391,000	2,522,000	3 4-5 times
Gt. Britain	8,530,770	11,129,860	2,599,090	1 1-3 ,,
Germany...	208,670	1,231,740	1,023,070	6 ,,
Belgium ...	11,370	1,011,370	1,000,000	89 ,,
Italy ...	110,620	610,620	500,000	5 ,,

In regard to France, which has added 3⅘th times the territory she had in 1884, up to the present date, we note that in 1884 she had about 600,000 square miles in Africa, 56,000 square miles in Asia, and 9,000 square miles in Oceania, or 665,000 square miles in all, whereas now she possesses 3,391,000 square miles, of which 3,100,000 are in Africa, and 282,000 in Asia, and 9,000 in Oceania, being an addition in 12 years of 2,726,000 square miles! The French additions in recent years, however, include the Sahara Desert, 1,500,000 square miles, Madagascar with the northern portion of Siam in Asia. These are hardly likely to be paying territories in a national sense. The point, however, on which we insist is, that our additions of territory were made in obedience to divine command, and under the Lord's guidance, leading eventually, we believe, to further national enlargement, in order that Christ's kingdom in the earth might thus be prepared and established. Whereas, the growth of Germany, France, Belgium, and Italy, has all been the result of national ambition wholly irrespective of Christ, His work, His Gospel, and His kingdom, and therefore, independent of His blessing.

However much then the nations may denounce and abuse us, through the newspaper press, we believe that the Lord is with us, and is blessing us according to the prophecies, and we therefore, as His people Israel, bless and praise His holy name, for these His undeserved blessings.

We are glad to announce that the Rev. E. J. Kennedy (for many years secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association) has been presented with the living of St. James's, Hatcham. He is a Vice-President of the British-Israel Association.

ODDS AND ENDS.

By W. L. Blore.

There has been a great amount of discussion lately about British foreign trade in nearly all the leading journals, and it is comforting to be assured by the Daily Telegraph of Oct. 22nd, in a leading article, that the Board of Trade are about to issue a publication on the subject, whose "scope will not only include the actual amount of the British export trade, but also the amount of the German and United States foreign trade—our two great competitors," &c. "The result, it is understood, is not quite what Lord Rosebery predicted—'Enough to make all your hair stand on end.'" "The report will be ready for publication before the end of the year, and there is excellent authority for the statement that it will then be made quite clear that, taking the relative increases of population in Great Britain, Germany, and the United States into account, our own trade has increased in a greater ratio in proportion to our increase of population than the trade of either of the two countries named." So that individually we are richer than they. "Taking the increase of population into consideration, the position of Great Britain leaves nothing at which to be alarmed." This is most encouraging.

The writer, however, makes one mistake, and that is, that the population of Germany is increasing more rapidly than our own.

German increase in twenty years ...	25 per cent.
United Kingdom increase	33 ,,

So that Germany, as to numbers, shows a deficiency of 8 per cent., or 3,300,000 on this percentage. It is well known that Prussia is the leading State in the German Empire, and it may be interesting to ascertain how its population, excluding emigration, has increased in comparison with that of Great Britain, our leading influence here.

Population of Prussia in 1880	27,251,067
,, ,, 1891	29,955,281
Increase in eleven years	2,704,214
Population of Great Britain in 1881 ...	29,710,012
,, ,, ,, 1891 ...	33,028,172
Increase in ten years	3,318,160

In eleven years Prussia increased nearly 10 per cent.; but Great Britain in ten years increased 11 per cent. As it is, the leading division of the United Kingdom, with an area of 90,000 square miles, supports in greater comfort three millions in population more than Prussia does upon 135,000 square miles. In our area we support 366 per square mile, whilst Prussia supports only 222 per square mile—thus, taking area into consideration, showing a deficiency in population of nearly twenty millions as compared with Great Britain.

But the remarkable thing is, that the actual aggregate of increase is so much larger with the United Kingdom than with Germany. As to those who have been left at home, the increase in both cases is 20 per cent. nearly. Whitaker tells us (page 545) that "it has been computed that there are 7,000,000 Germans resident in the United States," in which the gross population increased in the twenty years 1870—1890 by 24,000,000, or 60 per cent.; whilst in Australasia the population has increased by 50 per cent. in the same period. Thus we see that, both at home and abroad, our population is fast outstripping that of Germany. Taking all our colonies, inclusive of the United States, into account, we have in 1896 about 120 million English-speaking people under our rule; and we see that the rate of increase varies from 33 per cent. in the mother country to 60 per cent. in the United States, during twenty years.

Now let us take the lowest rate—that of the mother country—as the rate of increase for each twenty years during the next century, and we shall arrive at nearly 500 millions. This may give one some idea of the future position of Australasia and North America, the two continents peculiarly adapted for the homes of this large population. But, should the increase in the United States alone be sustained at the present rate, and no increase allotted to any other member of our family, the result will be nearly 750 millions in 1996.

Another subject that has attracted my attention is the profit arising out of the commerce of the United Kingdom. Taking the difference between our exports and imports, we find that our customers sent us back £130,000,000 more than we sent them, to which we have to add £22,000,000 for bullion, specie, and precious stones, giving the United Kingdom a balance of £152,000,000 for 1894. This balance represents also a portion of the interest on all colonial and foreign investments, and the freightage and passenger account of twelve million tons of shipping.

Our interest account with foreign countries and our dependencies is enormous; but, making allowance for the last two items, we may take the profit on our purely commercial trade at £80,000,000 per annum, independent of manufacturing profit. The following extract, containing an account of the movement of navigation for nine years, may be interesting to some of your readers:—

"The information contained in the statistics recently published by the Chamber of Commerce of Paris is calculated to make Frenchmen reflect, and especially those interested in the ocean-carrying trade. The movement of navigation between the various countries of the world from 1883 to 1892 shows that, while for the mercantile navy of England there was an increase of 7,790,000 tons, for Germany 7,309,000 tons, for the United States 5,674,000 tons, and for Italy 5,510,000 tons, the movement of navigation for France was almost completely stationary, the increase being only 250,000 tons. In addition to these eloquent figures, the annual statistics published by the Bureau Veritas disclosed the fact that during the last eight years, from 1887 to 1895, the increase in the steam commercial navy of France was 142,346 tons, against an increase for Germany of 678,475 tons, and for England and her colonies of 3,391,784 tons. Moreover, during 1895, the total movement in the French ports was 19,000,000 tons, 7,000,000 of which were carried by French vessels, and 12,000,000 by foreign ships. As for the traffic through the Suez Canal, the last statistics published, those of 1894, are eloquent. Two thousand and fifty vessels, with a total tonnage of 5,023,477 tons, were English, 200 ships, with a tonnage of 401,877 tons, were German; 84 ships, with a tonnage of 137,044 tons, were Dutch; and only 55 vessels, of a total tonnage of 122,538 tons, were French. In 1894, the general trade of the French colonies, Algeria and Tunis being excepted, amounted to 476,000,000f. In that total, foreign countries figured for 259,000,000f., leaving France 217,000,000f., or 21,000,000f., less than half. In that year the French colonies bought 219,000,000f. worth of goods, of which 124,000,000f. came from foreign countries, and 95,000,000f. only from France. They exported, that is to say sold, goods during the same year to the amount of 252,000,000f., of which 134,000,000f. went to foreign countries and 118,000,000f. to France."

The movement of navigation must not be confounded with the increase of shipping.

WARS AND RUMOURS OF WARS.—TURKEY AND THE KINGS OF THE EAST.

By John S. Anderson.

PART III.

In a former paper, page 472, we showed the manner in which the Turkish Empire is being dried up in accordance with the prophecy in Rev. xvi. 12. "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared."

The object of the present paper is, as promised, to show the locality of the dominions of the kings of the East, and who they are for whom the Empire of Turkey is being dried up.

Referring again to Heycocks "Kings of the East," we find that before we can show who they are we must first ascertain what part of the world is meant in Scripture by the East.

"Commentators having very generally concluded that the title of 'Kings of the East' is meant to be applied to the Jews, must have also concluded the promised land to be the East. A little reflection will convince every reader of Scripture, that this is contrary to the often-repeated language of both the Old and New Testaments. By comparing 'Scripture with Scripture,' we shall be able to clear up this matter, and show where the east is to be looked for. In Isa. xliii. 5, 6, it is written, 'Fear not, for I am with thee; I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back; bring My sons from far, and My daughters from the ends of the earth.' In this passage the east is as distinct from Judea, the place to which the Jews are to be brought, as are the west, north or south.

"In Matt. ii. 1, it is said, 'Now, when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem.' . . . Again in Dan. viii. 9, the prophet writes: 'And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land.'

"Here also the pleasant land, or Judea, is placed as distinctly separate from the east, as it is from the south. And no reasoning can make Judea and the east mean the same country. By attending to this prediction of Daniel's, and examining how it has been fulfilled, it will lead us to discover where the east really is. Toward it the little horn or Mahommedan power was to wax exceeding great."

He then traces the rise and progress of this Power from the year 863 through their eastern conquests, a Moslem Dominion being for the first time established in the heart of India in one of its greatest cities, Delhi, in 1174, to the mission of Captain W. Hawkins, in 1607, who along with Captain Keeling, endeavoured to open a commercial intercourse with India, but "the Mogal Emperor declined writing to the king of England, because it was unsuitable to the dignity of the Great Mogal to write to so petty a prince." Let us pause for a moment to consider the change in the relative position of the two Powers since that period; and where can there be found a more perfect illustration of the passage, 'He hath put down the mighty from their seat, and exalted them of low degree?' The humbled descendant of the once Great Mogal is now a submissive subject and pensioner of that merchant company which in vain sought to obtain a letter to their own prince, whilst the merchant company has itself become a sovereign Power, and as kings reign over 80,000,000 of subjects, and in his presence wield over the dominions of his ancestors the sceptre wrenched from his hands. How great and wonderful is the contrast, and while seeking how it has been effected, may the important answer given by the Almighty to the question, 'Who hath wrought and done it?' in the 4th verse (Isa. xli.) be constantly kept in view, lest the great first cause be lost sight of amidst the secondary causes, the instruments of His power. "I the LORD. . . . I am He."

"Less than 250 years have elapsed (Heycock wrote in 1849) since a body of merchants petitioned Queen Elizabeth to grant them exclusive privileges of trade to India; their charter having been granted them on the 31st December, 1600, which formed the petitioning merchants into an incorporated company, under the title of 'Governors and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East Indies,' commonly known under the name of the 'East India Company.' The form of government adopted by this mercantile company is such as enables them to bear the title of 'kings of the East' given them in the Revelation.

"The governing power is not vested in the Queen of England, or in any particular person. . . . This government, in its rise and constitution, is without a parallel, and by its form makes the East India proprietors, as they have been frequently called, merchant kings. . . . It is further stated (see Isa. xli. 2, 3), that the nations were given before them. Though put in the form of a question, it is evident the words are prophetic, 'Who gave the nations before him?' Throughout the Scriptures it is very common to speak of a power, and apply to it the same personal pronouns which are used to a king or person.

"In the 18th chap. of Isaiah, it is written, 'Woe to the land shadowing with wings,' &c. and in the 3rd verse the personal pronoun 'he' is applied to this land represented as shadowing with wings. In the same manner, in the words under examination at present, the power raised up in the east is spoken of as a person, and it is only by comparing the history of the East India Company with the description given by the prophet, that it becomes evident that they are the party intended."

Since this was written (1849) the dominions under the East India Company, as is well known, were (on the 5th Nov., 1858) taken over by Her Majesty the Queen, who in 1877 formally assumed the title of Empress of India.

With these facts before us, we can arrive at no other conclusion, but that the British nation is that to which the prophet refers as "The kings of the East." It is very remarkable that Heycock also proves that we, the British nation, are the people chosen of God to restore the Jews to Palestine, quoting Isa. lxvi. as containing a commission from God to "the isles afar off" to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the desolations of Israel (meaning the Jews).

Thank God we are now able to see, what was not vouchsafed to Mr. Heycock, that "we" are none other but the long-"lost" Israel.

NUTS FOR SCEPTICS TO CRACK.

By GEORGE E. INGLIS.

A FEW questions for ministers and Bible students to peruse and digest will be in order, answers to which will doubtless bring forth a wide variety of opinion. However, there is but one answer which is strictly scriptural.

1. If the Ten Tribes of Israel were never lost, but returned to Palestine with the Jews under Cyrus, how can you account for the failure of Amos ix. 15, "I will plant them upon their land, and they will no more be pulled up out of their land?"

2. Zechariah, writing 427 B.C., and after the return of the Jews, speaks of the return of the House of Joseph as yet future, still predicting their dispersion in far countries and their ultimate restoration, as a multitude, and as a powerful and God-fearing people.

3. At what time in the forgotten history of the race has the House of Joseph enjoyed the birthright blessings of Gen. xlviii. 19, "He shall become a people, and he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, for he shall become a multitude of nations?" What nation to-day is a multitude of nations? Deut. xxxiii. 13, "And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, for the deep that enricheth beneath, and for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and for the precious things put forth by the moon, and for the chief things put forth by the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills, and for the precious things of the earth and the fulness thereof, and for the good will of Him that dwelt in the bush; let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the top of the head of him that was separated from his brethren. His glory is like the firstlings of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of the unicorn; with them he shall push the people to the ends of the earth, and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim (England) and the thousands of Manasseh (United States)."

4. Is it a legitimate exposition of Exek. xxxvii. to say that the "dry bones" represent the "Gentile nations" when ver. 12 says, "Son of man, these bones are the whole House of Israel," the context promising a union of the whole House of Judah and Ephraim, &c.?

5. Must not Israel exist as a nation before the fulfilment of Jer. iii. 18, "In those days the House of Judah shall walk with (to) the House of Israel," &c.?

6. Why do our exegetes take two-thirds of Dan. ii. referring to the gold, silver, and brass, and iron, and clay kingdoms as being literal, and the remaining portion referring to the stone kingdom as being spiritual? And upon whose authority?

7. Has the event of Ezekiel xxxvii. 21 yet taken place? "I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, and I will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land; and I will make them (Judah and Israel) one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all."

8. Where is the historical union of all the tribes?

9. What has become of David's throne which God says is to last for ever, &c.?

10. The promise of Isa. lxvi. 19 says, "I will send those that escape of them to Tarshish and Javan, the isles afar off." When was that promise fulfilled, or is it still future?

11. Another promise, Isa. xxxvii. 31, 32, "And the remnant that is escaped of the House of Judah shall again take root downward, and bear fruit upward. For out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and they that escape out of mount Zion: the zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this."

12. Does Ezek. xvii. throw any light upon when this promise of Isa. xxxvii. 31 was possibly fulfilled? And is it possible, as we are told that the tribe of Benjamin escaped from Jerusalem before Titus destroyed it, that they might also be a portion of that remnant who found their way to the "isles afar off," and went to those who had already been carried there with that tender twig of Ezek. xvii.?

13. Is it legitimate, or logical, or biblical, for our Christian ministers to generously bestow all the curses upon the Jews, and to appropriate to the Church all the blessings promised to the Jews and to their brethren of the House of Israel? If so, and if Isa. xxvii. 6, "He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root: Israel shall blossom and bud and fill the face of the earth with fruit," can be spiritualized into meaning the Church, to whom then (unless the Church and Israel are synonymous) belong the words of Isa. xli. 14, 15, "Fear not; thou worm Jacob, ye men of Israel: I will help thee, saith the Lord. Behold, I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument having teeth; thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff."

14. Does not Isa. xli. 14, 15 refer to the same people as Isa. xxvii. 6?

15. Can the Gentiles, the "wild olive tree" grafted into the good olive tree, have usurped the fatness and the mission of the good olive tree simply because some of the natural branches were broken off?

16. Was not Christ's command (Matt. x. 5, 6), "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go ye rather to the lost sheep of the House of Israel," a recognition by our Saviour of the existence of the dispersed among the Gentiles?

17. Did not Peter in his epistle fulfil the command of Matt. x. 5, 6?

18. Does the declaration, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation (ethnos) bringing forth the fruits thereof," mean what it says, or, as we are taught to believe, the conglomeration of nations receiving the Gospel, and called the Gentile Church?

19. If all the blessings of the prophecies are for the Jews (two tribes) without their brethren of the House of Israel, what was the meaning of the words of Simeon in Luke ii. 30—32, "For mine eyes have seen Thy salvation, which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people, a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel?"

As we, the Anglo-Saxons, have been a light to lighten the Gentiles, being "His witnesses," "a peculiar people to show forth His praise," "made high above all nations," "lending unto many and borrowing from none (Ephraim), ruling over many and being ruled by none," also possessing "the Gates of their enemies," fulfilling the mission stated for Israel in Isaiah, Jeremiah, and throughout the prophecies, being to-day the servants of God; do you not think it probable that in us—the Anglo-Saxons—is fulfilled Isa. lxii. 2, "And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory; and thou shalt be called by a new name which the mouth of the Lord shall name (Saac-sin—Saxons)? And are we not also fulfilling Isa. lxvi. 19, "I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, Tubal and Java, to the isles afar off, that have not heard My fame, neither have seen My glory; and they shall declare My glory among the Gentiles?" Can this mean that the Gentiles have usurped this glorious mission (declared as Israel's) and are to-day preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles? Hardly. Then would it not be "life from the dead" to find that our forefathers veritably were those "lost sheep of the House of Israel?" and that God Almighty has been sanctified in them in the midst of many people, and that we do "remember" Isa. xliv. 21, 22, "Remember these, O Jacob and Israel; for thou art My servant; I have formed thee; thou art My servant: O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of Me. I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy trangressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins: return unto Me, for I have redeemed thee." And Isa. xlviii. 11, "For Mine own sake, even for Mine own sake, will I do it; for how should My name be polluted? And I will not give My glory unto another." Are there any conditions attached to these promises? None. "In a little wrath I hid My face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." Isa. liv. 8, "For the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto Himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth" (Deut. xiv. 2).

If we, the Anglo-Saxons, have had, and are having, fulfilled in us all these many blessings, and yet we are not Israel, we shall have to surrender them to the rightful owners; or, if we be not His people, and have this glory which He sware to give to none other, how much will there be left for the heirs?

THE TEN TRIBES IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

By M. L. Streator, A.M.

The following is from the October No. of The Tribes, our Denver, Colorado, contemporary:—

"THE ELECT RACE.

"The Apostle Peter in writing to the sojourners of the dispersion, says to them, 'Ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession' (1 Peter ii. 9). Peter was not writing to Gentiles, but to Israelites scattered abroad. It is not true of the Gentiles that they are an elect race, and a people for God's own possession. The great Apostle Paul in treating of the restoration of Israel, says, 'The gifts and calling of God are with-examining how it has been fulfilled, it will lead us to discover where the east really is. Toward it the little horn or Mahommedan power was to wax exceeding great."

17. Did not Peter in his epistle fulfil the command of Matt. x. 5, 6?

18. Does the declaration, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation (ethnos) bringing forth the fruits thereof," mean what it says, or, as we are taught to believe, the conglomeration of nations receiving the Gospel, and called the Gentile Church?

19. If all the blessings of the prophecies are for the Jews (two tribes) without their brethren of the House of Israel, what was the meaning of the words of Simeon in Luke ii. 30—32, "For mine eyes have seen Thy salvation, which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people, a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel?"

As we, the Anglo-Saxons, have been a light to lighten the Gentiles, being "His witnesses," "a peculiar people to show forth His praise," "made high above all nations," "lending unto many and borrowing from none (Ephraim), ruling over many and being ruled by none," also possessing "the Gates of their enemies," fulfilling the mission stated for Israel in Isaiah, Jeremiah, and throughout the prophecies, being to-day the servants of God; do you not think it probable that in us—the Anglo-Saxons—is fulfilled Isa. lxii. 2, "And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory; and thou shalt be called by a new name which the mouth of the Lord shall name (Saac-sin—Saxons)? And are we not also fulfilling Isa. lxvi. 19, "I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, Tubal and Java, to the isles afar off, that have not heard My fame, neither have seen My glory; and they shall declare My glory among the Gentiles?" Can this mean that the Gentiles have usurped this glorious mission (declared as Israel's) and are to-day preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles? Hardly. Then would it not be "life from the dead" to find that our forefathers veritably were those "lost sheep of the House of Israel?" and that God Almighty has been sanctified in them in the midst of many people, and that we do "remember" Isa. xliv. 21, 22, "Remember these, O Jacob and Israel; for thou art My servant; I have formed thee; thou art My servant: O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of Me. I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy trangressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins: return unto Me, for I have redeemed thee." And Isa. xlviii. 11, "For Mine own sake, even for Mine own sake, will I do it; for how should My name be polluted? And I will not give My glory unto another." Are there any conditions attached to these promises? None. "In a little wrath I hid My face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." Isa. liv. 8, "For the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto Himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth" (Deut. xiv. 2).

If we, the Anglo-Saxons, have had, and are having, fulfilled in us all these many blessings, and yet we are not Israel, we shall have to surrender them to the rightful owners; or, if we be not His people, and have this glory which He sware to give to none other, how much will there be left for the heirs?

THE TEN TRIBES IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

By M. L. Streator, A.M.

The following is from the October No. of The Tribes, our Denver, Colorado, contemporary:—

"THE ELECT RACE.

"The Apostle Peter in writing to the sojourners of the dispersion, says to them, 'Ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession' (1 Peter ii. 9). Peter was not writing to Gentiles, but to Israelites scattered abroad. It is not true of the Gentiles that they are an elect race, and a people for God's own possession. The great Apostle Paul in treating of the restoration of Israel, says, 'The gifts and calling of God are without repentance' (Rom. xi. 29), that is, they are without change of purpose on the part of God, or, as it reads in the margin of the Revised Version, they are not repented of. God adheres to His original purpose in the selection of Israel, whom He calls 'My people, My chosen' (Isa. xliii. 20). While under the Gospel of Christ the conditions of salvation are the same to all people of all races, the gifts and calling of God are not the same to all persons, nor to all races, for none are so well fitted to accomplish the divine work throughout the world as the race which God hath chosen. According to God's own purpose and promise Israel becomes at the appointed time the colonizing and the missionary race of the world.

"When the patriarch Jacob was blessing Joseph just before his approaching death he said concerning the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, 'Let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers, Abraham and Isaac' (Gen. xlviii. 16). Hence the posterity of Joseph are called 'the children of Israel' (Hosea i. 10, 11), 'the House of Isaac' (Amos vii. 9, 16), 'the seed of Abraham' (Isa. xli. 8).

"We need to firmly fix in our minds the radical and all-important distinction between Judah and Joseph, and between their descendants the Jews and the Israelites. Now I entreat you that none of you will go hence reporting that I believe and teach that we are Jews, for I have no such conception whatever. Judah was only one son among twelve sons. The Jews were only one tribe among twelve tribes. I admit that the tribes of Benjamin and Levi were incorporated for awhile with the tribe of Judah. These constituted the Jewish nation. All of them were called Jews. But there were Ten Tribes under the leadership of Ephraim that rebelled against the House of David and the tribe of Judah, and set up for themselves another kingdom in northern Palestine. Over and over and over again these Ten Tribes are called the House of Israel and the children of Israel, and they are contrasted with the House of Judah. While all Jews are Israelites in the broader sense of the term, all Israelites are not Jews. While the priesthood was given to the tribe of Levi, and the kingship to the House of Judah, the promise of the multitudinous race, the company of nations, the assembly of peoples and the fulness of the nations was given to Joseph and Ephraim. If we lose sight of these manifest distinctions, we will fail to understand one-third of the Bible. Rehoboam, the king of Judah, gathered his army, and was about to attempt the coercion of the northern tribes. But God forbade him to do it. He spake to the king of Judah, and the House of Judah and Benjamin, saying, 'Ye shall not go up nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel: return every man to his house: for this thing is of Me' (1 Kings xii. 24). As said in the Scriptures, 'It was a thing brought about of the Lord' (1 Kings xii. 15). From that time onward the promises and prophecies concerning Israel and Judah follow divergent lines of development. We must distinguish between Israel and Judah in order at all to understand God's sure word of prophecy.

"The divergent lines of destiny and history concerning Joseph and Judah are to meet together a little beyond our own times, for the crisis of the ages is approaching, when Ephraim and Judah will become one in the hand of the Lord. Here we have the two witnesses spoken of both in the Old Testament and the New Testament. The two witnesses are the House of Joseph and the House of Judah. God foretells the contrasted destiny of each with minute precision; and the history of four thousand years confirms the truthfulness and accuracy of His prophetic word. He Himself appeals to this accomplishment in history of His purpose and promise as declared in prophecy as the supreme evidence at the crisis of the ages of His own Godhead. 'Ye are My witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God' (Isa. xliii. 8—12; xliv. 8.)

"The promise that Abraham should become 'the father of a multitude of nations' (Gen. xvii. 4), embraced Sarah his wife, for of her it was said, 'She shall be a mother of nations' (Gen. xvii. 16). Hence the promised and the elect race of many nations, does not include the descendants of Abraham and Hagar, as the Ishmaelites and Saracens, famous in history; nor the descendants of Abraham and Keturah, as the Midianites of ancient times, and the Brahmins, still numerous in the East. While these persons were children of Abraham, they were not the children of promise. 'For not all who are of Israel, the same are Israel; nor yet because they are a seed of Abraham are they all children; but, 'In Isaac shall there be called to thee a seed.' That is: not the children of the flesh—the same are children of God; but the children of the promise are reckoned as a seed. For this word is one of promise: 'According to this season will I come, and there shall be to Sarah a son' (Rom. ix. 6—9, Rotherham's Translation). Abraham's offspring by Hagar and Keturah were not children of promise. But Abraham's son by Sarah was the child of the promise.

"Isaac, the child of the promise, was to become the father of the many nations of the promise. The elect race is the race of Isaac. The word of promise is this:—'In Isaac shall thy seed be called.' The chosen race descends from Abraham through Isaac, and bears the name of Isaac. Hence Jacob, the patriarchal prophet, said, 'Let the name of Isaac be named on them' (see Gen. xlviii. 16). Consequently they are called Isaac's sons. The root of the word Isaac is Saac, or Saka. The yod is the smallest letter of the Hebrew alphabet. In the rapid pronunciation of the compound word it would be readily eliminated. Thus Isaac's sons becomes Sac's sons, which combines into our modern word Saxons. The Saxons are literally and etymologically the sons of Sac or Saka, who was Isaac. The word appears in history in many different forms, as Sakasuni, Sacae, Saki, Saxones, etc., all of which are patronymics, meaning sons of Sac or Saka. Just before the Israelites of the Ten Tribes went forth from their native land into exile, they began, according to the word of promise and the prediction of Jacob, to appropriate to themselves the name of Isaac. They said to the prophet Amos:

"'Prophecy not against Israel,
And drop not thy word against the house of Isaac' (Amos vii. 16).

"He also said to them,

"'The high places of Isaac shall be desolate,
And the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste.' (Amos vii. 9).

"The Hebrew parallelism in these two couplets shows that the House of Isaac is Israel. The Hebrew form of Isaac is YITZCHAK. The original form of Saxon is YITZCHAKSKA. This ethnical name in some of its various forms they have carried with them from Palestine and the days of Amos in their wanderings over the world down to our own times. In Christ we are Christians; in Isaac we are Saxons. The elect race, chosen of God for the accomplishment of His great and gracious purposes throughout the world, is the Saxon race. This grand and mighty race is Israel, the ethnical servant of Jehovah, chosen of God to carry onward the work of the Messiah, the personal servant of Jehovah,

"'In Isaac shall thy seed be called.'

"God's decree is fulfilled in our ethnical name of Saxons. The history of our own times is exhibiting the fulfilment of God's declaration concerning them.

"'This people have I formed for Myself;
They shall show forth My praise' (Isa xliii. 21).

"In vindicating the divine choice in the selection of the elect race, the Apostle Paul shows that God of His own sovereign will chose of the only two sons of Isaac, children of the same father and mother, children that were twins, one in preference to the other. In infinite wisdom He chose the people that were the fittest for accomplishing His purpose. It was not a personal, but a national and racial election which God had in view. Instead of considering them as merely two persons, He regards them as the heads and the representatives of 'two nations' and 'two peoples,' and looking forward into their national development in the future He speaks of the different nations springing from them, when He says,

"'The one people shall be stronger than the other people;
And the elder shall serve the younger' (Gen. xxv. 23).

"The Apostle Paul, in confirmation of the wisdom of the divine choice recorded in the first book of the Old Testament, quotes from the prophecy of Malachi, the last book of the Old Testament, 'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated' (Rom. ix. 13). The divine election between the two peoples preceded the birth of the two children who became their progenitors. The principle of the divine choice was the fitness of the one people and the unfitness of the other people for accomplishing the divine work. God chose for His own people the race best adapted to do His work. He had the right to do this. It was best for all the world that the Judge of all the earth should make such an election. But the declaration that He hated Esau was made long after the people of Esau had manifested their savage and blood-thirsty character. He says to Esau, 'Sith thou hast not hated blood, therefore blood shall pursue thee' (Ezek. xxxv. 6).

"The context of the Scripture which Paul quotes from Malachi, is very significant, but has been sadly overlooked. The passage reads thus: 'But Esau I hated, and made his mountains a desolation, and gave his heritage to the jackals of the wilderness. Whereas Edom saith, We are beaten down, but we will return and build the desolate places' (Mal. i. 3, 4). This return of Esau from his exile after the desolation of his mountains and heritage has been overlooked by nearly all expositors. Yet its fulfilment constitutes one of the great facts of history. From Ezekiel we learn who these people are. It was Edom who said of Israel and Judah, 'These two nations and these two countries shall be mine, and we will possess it' (Ezek. xxxv. 10). Edom executed his purpose to return. The children of Esau exclaimed, 'The ancient high places are ours in possession' (Ezek. xxxvi. 2). 'Therefore, thus saith the Lord God: Surely in the fire of My jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the nations, and against all Edom, which have appointed My land unto themselves for a possession with the joy of all their heart, with despite of soul, to cast it out for a prey' (Ezek. xxxvi. 5). What people took possession of the Lord's land? The Ottomans, who are 'thy mighty men, O Teman' (Obad. 9), who was a grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11). Who led the conquering army? Omar. This was the name of another grandson of Esau. The general was named for his ancestor. What building occupies the chief of the high places, the site of Solomon's temple? The mosque of Omar! What people conquered the two countries of the two peoples, Israel and Judah, and possess it today? The unspeakable Turks, relentless in cruelty and revelling in human gore. Yet they are descendants of Abraham, Isaac and Esau. Can you not now perceive something of the wisdom of omniscience in choosing the race of Jacob rather than the race of Esau for the accomplishment of his purpose in the world. The race of Esau are vessels of wrath which have become fit for destruction. Hence the Lord of Hosts says, 'They shall build but I will throw down; and they shall call them the border of wickedness, and the people against whom the Lord hath indignation for ever" (Mal. i. 4). The Bible foretells the fall of Turkey and Mohammedism in the direful doom of Edom. Read what it says about the wrath that is coming upon them to the uttermost.

"We will the better appreciate the privileges and blessing of Saxon-Israel, the elect race, through whom the Lord according to His purpose and choice is saving and elevating the world, when we contrast it with the debasing character and appalling doom of Esau, the unspeakable Turk.

"'Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord;
The people whom He hath chosen for His own inheritance' (Psa. xxxiii. 12)."

THE CHURCH AND THE NATION OF ISRAEL.

How is it that the Church in this land—meaning by "The Church" the national, established "Church of England,"—seems to have lost its hold of the nation, and that vast masses of the people refuse to obey or belong to her, but hold aloof from her as an evil thing and will have none of her? This thing is true, however we may dislike to recognise the fact. If we were to look more deeply into the matter, we should probably find that "This thing is from the Lord," even as Ephraim's departure from Judah and Benjamin, in 1 Kings xii. 24, was also declared by the Lord to be according to His will and purpose. "Thus saith the Lord, ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren, the children of Israel; for this thing is from Me." The separation between the nation in part and the Church has been brought about in great measure by the refusal of the Church to recognise the nation with the lay people thereof as part of the Church, and neglecting to consult the laity in that capacity, with regard to the changes contemplated in the ritual and mode of public worship by the clergy. There is a significant paragraph in The Christian for September, which looks like a good beginning towards a better understanding between the laity and clergy, if only the proposals could be carried out. The Contemporary, from which The Christian quotes, makes the source of the information respectable. If the proposal were only carried into effect, we should soon witness a great change for the better in the relations between the laity and clergy. Misunderstandings and alienation would cease, and peace would probably reign between these two sections of the Church, who in truth constitute the national establishment. The Christian wrote as follows:—

"Rev. Chancellor Lias, in The Contemporary, pleads for the treatment of the laity as an integral portion of the Church of God, as the first step towards placing the Church of England in touch with the nation. He argues that their assent should be obtained to all appointments; that they should be consulted in all parish affairs, including the mode of conducting services; that no church work or legislation should be initiated without their approval; and that if this were done, many obstacles which now exist to a cordial understanding between the clergy and the people would disappear at once. It is at least certain that if this work were done, it would demonstrate the fact that the High Church movement is a movement of the clergy and not of the laity, and the extravagancies of ritual in many of the Churches would be summarily put a stop to."—The Christian, September, 1896.

"The extravagancies of Ritual" are at present repulsive to large bodies of the laity, who now, in consequence, are driven to join the Non-Conforming Churches around them against their will. Were the laity to have a voice in regard to such ritual, they would be attracted once more to the simplicity of the Protestant services of our protesting Church, and union instead of discord would reign throughout our land. To this we have to come as a nation according to the prophecies, and the sooner the better! See Isa. lii. 8, lx. 5; Jer. xxxii. 39, xxxi. 34; Zeph. iii. 9; Ezek. xi. 17—20.

HOW THE IDENTITY MAY BE PUBLISHED.

WE have lately had many suggestions how best to make known the facts of Our Identity, and symptoms of that "impatience" respecting which the Rev. Dr. Hanan wrote so well in the BANNER of October 7th last, have shown themselves in several quarters.

The British-Israel Identity Association, by its Secretary, has sent us a scheme for a "Forward Movement," whereby it is hoped that the Identity will be carried into the opposing camps of our opponents from the fort we have held successfully for a good many years past. They suggest that handbills, leaflets, pamphlets, and booklets, powerfully written and attractively got up, should be distributed at Church and chapel doors as the congregations are coming out; that a large system of distribution be organized for the streets, trains, 'busses, boats, &c. &c., the reading so distributed being of an attractive nature, to arrest attention, and "induce readers to ponder and ask questions, and expect answers from their clergy and ministers, lay preachers, Bible-class leaders, Sunday-school teachers," &c. The Association wants these papers to exhibit "samples of present day preaching, compared with what it ought to be, according to the Book of God!" As such literature can hardly be got without a great effort, it is suggested that the Editors of the "Covenant People" and of the BANNER OF ISRAEL meet, consult with the Council of the London British-Israel Association, and then call on believers all round the world to produce able essays, such as those described above, to be afterwards examined, and finally issued, to produce the desired result. The question of cost is also considered, but as the proposal includes the idea that "some one" should pay for a quantity of the printed matter so produced, and the Council in London are to decide questions of stereotyping and the cost price of the literature, we indicate, we think this is the weak part of the scheme. The Distribution Fund, we observe, is to have placed on it the onus of sending this literature to all parts of the world! On the whole, the above does not commend itself to our judgment.

For twenty-four years or so, Identity literature has been poured out from believers in the United Kingdom, and it is probably as good here as the writers available can make it. The literature has had a fair share of success, and is making its way well. Why are we now to attempt to create an entirely new supply, which the machinery proposed can scarcely produce under some years, the cost being also unprovided for, and likely to remain so? An effort of another character commends itself to our judgment. The idea is to seek the co-operation of some local editor and get him to republish some striking artic'e on the subject of the Identity, prefacing it with a few lines from the sender, drawing attention to the matter. A case in point is before us. A resident of Cambuslang, N.B., wrote a letter to the Cambuslang Pilot, enclosing a copy of the BANNER leader of September 9th, 1896, and asked for the insertion of both. The good Editor not only reproduced the letter and our BANNER leader, but got both inserted in a neighbouring paper, The Herald of Hamilton, of September 25th, 1896. The effort resulted in the publication of our friend's letter and of our own leader, in two Scottish newspapers, with probably a large number of readers. Let our readers attempt to carry out the same plan as Mr. George Lowther, and if it be done with judgment, we believe the results will be satisfactory. We reproduce Mr. Lowther's letter to his local Editor, but our own leading article we omit, as it may be found in our BANNER, No. 1,028, p. 375. The letter was as follows:—

"BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION.

"Sir,—With a view to assist and help on the formation of the above Society, I have taken the liberty to send you (i.e., if you will allow it to be published in your valuable paper) an extract from the BANNER OF ISRAEL, a small weekly paper which is published entirely in the interest of the above Association, to propagate and spread through all the land the great and glorious truths of the Identity of the British race with the lost Ten Tribes. I shall be much obliged, therefore, if you can grant me space occasionally to insert articles on the above subject. In London, Liverpool, Bristol, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Stirling, and other large centres of Britain, British-Israel Associations have been established for years, and I should very much like to see one established in Cambuslang. In this connection I may say that arrangements are almost completed to bring out Mr. Reid, the Secretary of the Glasgow branch B.I.A., to give us a course of eight lectures, commencing probably in November next, in the U.P. Church, and which will result, I trust, in the formation of a local branch. A wide-spread knowledge of the truths of our Identity will tend to let us know as an Anglo-Saxon race our true position in the world, and will also prove God's faithfulness to His 'chosen people' from generation to generation; it will also unfold before us our true mission and position in the world as a race to blossom and bud and fill the whole earth with fruit. We look around us and see how the Anglo-British world fills a great portion of the earth, and yet it goes on increasing. If we turn to the Book of Daniel we find that thus it is to be with the Stone Kingdom, which is to become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. Is it far fetched to think that this mountain and Israel, who is to be as the sand upon the sea-shore, who is to possess the Gate of his enemies, whose branches are to run over the wall, whose blessings are to be unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills, are one and the same? If so, then, when we find Britain thus blossoming and budding, and filling the face of the world with fruit, who, I ask, is she? These, and many more questions, will, I trust, be fully answered when the course of lectures are given in November next. Meanwhile, I conclude by enclosing the extract above referred to, which is entitled, 'The Dominion of the World, and to whom is it to belong?'

"I am, Sir, yours truly, GEORGE LOWTHER."

THE WITNESSES OF GOD, AND TO GOD.

In a Court of Justice when a trial is in progress and the point for determination is the guilt or innocence of the accused person, who is the chief, and important factor in the proceedings? Not the judge! He cannot determine the issues without extraneous help. He can apply the law, but he cannot supply the facts. Neither can the counsel, however learned he may be, or however eloquent in speech. The prisoner's mouth is shut and he cannot do anything towards the decision of the case. The public who assemble there to witness the trial are forbidden to speak. They cannot assist the prisoner or the public prosecutor. Everything depends upon the witnesses. From their lips proceeds the evidence, which, if found to be credible and admissible, will exonerate the prisoner or send him to punishment condign. The witnesses are the most important parties in the case. The highest regard and best attention is given to the statements of the true and faithful witnesses whose credit cannot be shaken and whose evidence is manifestly true. The Lord's redeemed ones, those for whom He gave Egypt as a ransom, and Ethiopia and Seba for them, whom He loves, whom He has made, formed, and created, for His own glory, describing them as "the blind people that have eyes, and the deaf who have ears," these, and these only, are His witnesses, who show forth His designs and purposes, and prove that He, the Lord, is God (Isa. xliii. 9—12, R.V.). The witnessing of Israel, those above described, relates to facts and persons outside themselves. They point to Him who made them and chose them. They have fulfilled their destined career, and they point back to Him who foretold that career, and lo! all has come to pass jot for jot, tittle for tittle, with no shadow of error between the prophetic predictions, or the actual corresponding history.

The people thus described in Isa. xliii. 1 to 13, R.V., are no doubt the Ten-tribed Christian House of Ephraim-Israel, since ver. 14, et seq., states that He is their "Holy One, their Creator, their King." He formed them, that they might set forth His praise (ver. 21). These are His redeemed ones (ver. 1), therefore a Christian people; who, though unworthy (vers. 24 to 28), and made "a curse and a reviling" by God Himself, are yet pardoned (ver. 25), and for Christ's sake have pardon, and cleansing, and justification (ver. 25, R.V.). To them the Lord gives the water of His Holy Spirit (Isa. xliv. 3, R.V.) and His blessing on their offspring, in spite of all their wickedness, and recognises them as "the sons of the living God" (Hosea i. 10, R.V.), another expression for "the Christian nation." In Isa. xliv. 7, 8, R.V., the whole matter is plainly declared, and neither the Jews nor the Gentiles can answer to the description but British-Israel only as a nation existing now to God's glory. He declared, "And who as I shall call and shall declare it, and set it in order for Me, since I appointed the ancient people? And the things that are coming and that shall come to pass let them declare. Fear ye not, neither be afraid; have I not declared unto thee of old and shewed it? And ye are My witnesses. Is there a God beside Me? Yea, there is no Rock; I know not any." Is it no honour to be a part of God's ancient people selected to be witnesses of His Godhead, the Christian servants, who testify to Jews and Gentiles alike, that God exists, that He has made and formed themselves, to make known to the nations God's character and the Lord Jesus Christ's glorious salvation, acknowledging the while their own utter unworthiness for their high destiny, save and except as they are made worthy by the precious blood of Christ shed upon them as His nation?

THE CONTROVERSY BETWEEN MR. H. A. MARCHANT AND MR. R. ANDERSON ON "GRACE," AND OUR IDENTITY.

(See pages 461, 462).

We publish below two more letters on this subject, wherein Mr. Anderson shortly leads the way, and Mr. Marchant answers him. "Grace," says Mr. Anderson, "blesses without cause." If there be a prior promise, or covenant, or claim founded thereon, there can be no "grace" or scope for it, on the part of the Promiser.

In all this, Mr. Anderson appears to forget that before God made oath to Abraham and gave him the covenants and promises on which we rely in our contention regarding Ephraim-Israel and the British nation, He had already exercised "grace" towards His "friend" and his seed after him, and without the slightest merit in Abraham to earn any reward, had conferred on him all the blessings which are now our nation's portion. The gifts which were the subject of the promises, were conferred on Abraham and his seed for ever, in the hands of the one Seed—Christ the Mediator, and as soon as He had come and made the Atonement for Israel which constituted their fitness to enjoy the blessings which "grace" had previously provided, these covenants were conferred on them, again by grace, and through faith.

The promises, oaths, and covenants, regarding which Mr. Anderson stumbles, were added to the gifts by grace, because God, "willing more abundantly to show to the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel, interposed Himself by an oath that by two immutable things in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong encouragement who have fled for refuge to take hold of the hope set before us."

The covenants and promises were added again by grace to give the guilty heirs a strong assurance. It was thus grace from first to last, and the covenants being unconditional were in reality a part of the grace and consistent with it.

39, Linden Gardens, W., Sept. 8th, 1896.

Dear Sir,—In saying that grace is inconsistent with covenant and promise, I was giving expression not to an opinion but to a very elementary truth. Grace blesses "without cause" (., Rom. iii. 24; see John xv. 25), and therefore grace has no scope when there is an obligation or a claim. To fulfil my obligations and keep my promises is not grace. Therefore it was that, until the rejection of Christ had shut the whole world up to judgment, grace could not be revealed. But now the grace of God has appeared (Titus ii. 11).

If you will lay aside your prejudices against me, and read the chapter on grace in my "Gospel and Its Ministry," you will see my meaning.

It is you who have decided that Anglo-Israelism is inconsistent with this—the great cardinal truth of Christianity.

Yours faithfully,

R. Anderson.

60, Upper Lewes-road, Brighton, Sept. 10th, 1896.

To Robert Anderson, Esq., C.B.

Dear Sir,—You say, "to fulfil my obligations and to keep my promises is not grace." In Psalm 50, God says, "Thou thoughtest I was altogether such an one as thyself." Evangelicals are apt to look too much at self, and when you compare your obligations with God's gracious promises, and performance of the same, you miss the mark. God was not under obligation to Adam, but of His own free grace promised "the seed of the woman;" but to separate this promise from the fulfilment as you do, would be to say, God only sent Christ because He was obliged to do so, and that the Saviour did not come by the grace of God. What about the Saviour coming by promise through a certain line, all elected by God's free grace, alone, Seth, Noah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, David? What of the oaths to Abraham and Isaac, and another to David (Acts ii. 30)? Were these oaths, promises, covenants, and elections, devoid of grace, and only manifestations of God and man being under obligation to each other? To fulfil all these, did "God so love the world" (John iii. 16)? or, should it read "God by His promises was so under obligation, that He sent His only begotten Son?" for obligation is not "grace," so you say. But it depends on the wisdom and love of the One who of His own free grace took the obligation upon Himself, and performed it.

We may bind ourselves through lack of wisdom; God never! Yet we may bind ourselves by grace. A man meets another in distress, and says, "You wait here, and I will fetch my purse and give you a sovereign!" The man in distress says, "Very well, thank you." There is at once a promise and an agreement or covenant. The man returns with the coin, and gives it to the other as a free gift. Some one may say, "Was not that an act of grace?" "No," says the man, "he gave it to me because he had promised it, and I waited, according to agreement, whilst he went to fetch it, and grace is inconsistent with covenant and promise. If he meant it to be of 'grace' he should have fetched it without a promise, and given it to me as a surprise. He only kept his promise and his obligation." Would not this show the man's vile ingratitude? Why do Christians talk so much about "God's faithfulness and His precious promises?" What is He faithful to —His covenants and promises, or what? According to you grace is inconsistent with the promises of God, and therefore grace must end some day, in order that the new covenant and the promises may be fulfilled.

The "Parenthesis Theory" lands men into some strange dilemmas! If the new covenant is not yet made, where are we? You say "in a hiatus of grace;" but if the new covenant is made, then it is "the new covenant in Christ's blood," and made with the House of Israel, as the Epistle to the Hebrews will prove to you; as do all the other epistles, if read in the light of the Old Testament prophecies. The new covenant is all of God's grace; that is, of His unmerited love and mercy. I am not prejudiced against you, as some who know you well are well aware; but I object to your attack on God's covenants and promises. I remain, yours faithfully,

H. A. MARCHANT.

THRONES OF THE HOUSE OF DAVID.

(Psa. cxxii. 5.)

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

SIR,—In the July 18th number of Black and White there is a likeness of our beloved Queen Victoria, and she is called "the mother of kings." In a leading article of the Western Morning News of Tuesday, Sept. 22nd, the editor remarks that the Queen will be able to boast that she has reigned more days than any other sovereign in English history. She has been safely reigning while revolution after revolution has happened in France. Germany has had five sovereigns since she began to reign.

She will in future be recognised as the ancestress of one of the most powerful rulers; for her grandson wears the iron crown of Germany. Her granddaughter is Empress of Russia. Another granddaughter is Crown Princess of Roumania. Her second son rules over the principality of Saxe-Cobourg. The hereditary princess of Saxe-Meningen is her granddaughter. The heir to the throne of Greece is her descendant. The Grand Duke of Hesse is her grandson. She has no fewer than sixty-one descendants, who, one day, between them, promise to be at the head of more than half of Europe.

Are not these the thrones of David's house spoken of in Psa. cxxii. 5? As there was only one throne of David in Palestine, those thrones must be somewhere. Where is there another throne, connected with so many thrones, as is the British throne? Isa. ix. 7: "And of peace there shall be no end; upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom" (which is Christ's throne and kingdom). "Thou shalt call His name Jesus." "The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David; and He shall reign over the House of Jacob for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end" (Jer. xxxi. 36). "If those ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever" (Jer. xxxiii. 20—21).

AN AMERICAN SUPPORTER IN LONDON.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—We have an offer of the free use of the International Christian Mission Hall for lectures on Anglo-Israelism on each Monday (weekly), commencing Nov. 23rd. This kind offer comes from the Rev. Richard Copp, an independent Anglo-American who has opened the hall for the welfare, spiritual and temporal, of the poor in South London. The hall is in North-street, Kennington, S.E., three hundred yards or so on the south side of Westminster-bridge. Mr. Copp, who has been giving me valuable support in Hyde-park lately, has had thirty-five years' experience in the West Indies, Canada, the United States, and South America. I hope we shall have an enthusiastic meeting of Anglo-Israelites at eight o'clock on the 23rd inst. There will be no collections. By-the-bye, Mr. Copp will see that a nice fresh show-bill of the BANNER OF ISRAEL is placed on a board outside his hall each week. Please imitate this, other workers—I mean the show-bill move.

Yours very truly,

R. MACKWORTH.

FORMATION OF AN ASSOCIATION FOR CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM.

A MEETING of Identity believers and friends, resident in the Camberwell district, S.E., was held, by the kindness of Mr. D. F. Bell, at Modena House, Peckham Rye, on Thursday evening, Nov, 5, 1896. After a very able address by Mr. G. Vicars Brown, it was unanimously resolved to form a local branch, to be termed the Camberwell, Peckham, and Dulwich British-Israel Association. Mr. H. H. Pain, of the Stock Exchange, was appointed president, and Mr. Henry G. Locke as the hon. secretary. The following gentlemen were elected on the committee:—Messrs. D. F. Bell, F. J. Lepingwell, G. Vicars Brown, T. P. Couzens, and J. A. Collier.

The annual subscription being purely a nominal one, any friends, residing in or near the district named, who would be willing to join this Association, are most cordially requested to communicate with the hon. secretary, 115, Choumert-road, Peckham. It is proposed to have a large local meeting in December next, at which Mr. H. H. Pain has promised to give a lecture on the Eastern Question, and no doubt other speakers will be present.

LORD SALISBURY'S SPEECH AT THE GUILDHALL.—The Bourse Gazette speaks decisively. "We think the speech shows that Lord Salisbury is satisfactorily strengthening England's position without the sacrifice of her dignity, or doing any injury to her real interests." The Dongola Expedition it considers to have practically settled the Egyptian question; because, as the Powers interested did not interfere when the Expedition was commenced, they will not do so now. Moreover, the Bourse Gazette says, England is certain of the support of the Triple Alliance, for it is distinctly to the interest of Germany that England should remain in Egypt.

"WHO GIVETH THEE POWER TO GET WEALTH."

THE Giver of the power to get wealth designed for a special and divine purpose is the Lord Jehovah. The nation to whom He gives, and always will give it, is Israel, His chosen. The object why He gives it to Israel, His people, is that He may Himself establish His covenant which He sware unto our fathers, as it is this day. The words of the promise, as we find it in the Revised Version, is as follows:—"But thou (addressing Israel) shalt remember the Lord thy God; for it is He that giveth thee power to get wealth; that He may establish His covenant which He sware unto thy fathers as it is this day" (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.).

Facts have lately been announced in The Times, of August 10th, 1896, which show that God has just given us a new means to get wealth, and at the same time has by our actions bestowed upon the world a blessing for which men have been vainly searching for thirty or forty years but have not till now succeeded in the object they have had in view. Rhea fibre has long been known in India as a commodity of the greatest value, and with a capacity for the largest production and easiest growth, if only men could rediscover the mode by which the fibre can be separated without injury from the bark in which the delicate fibre is embedded, steeped in tenacious gums which have hitherto defied the skill of the manufacturer to dissolve.

For thirty years our scientific men have been striving to earn a reward of £5,000, or Rs.50,000, which the Government of India offered in 1869 and renewed in 1877, for the discovery of the process by which the valuable fibre could be cheaply separated from the bark without damage to the fibre, and at a cost which must be remunerative. The difficulty has at last been overcome; and a British subject born in India, named Gomess, has been the instrument, in the hand of God, to give the fibre to His people; there being abundance of land where this plant of the nettle family may most plentifully be grown. The Indian Government is greatly delighted at a discovery which has originated with a British scientist, who has given to his nation "a new industry which promises to rival jute cultivation," and produce a demand for the fibre of the Rhea bark "likely to be enormous." A company has been started in London with branches throughout India, Europe, and America, for the sale of the article, to grow which the Indian Government is prepared to do its utmost. The Times article on the subject is as follows:—

INDIAN AFFAIRS.—A NEW INDUSTRY.

The remarkable development of the Rhea fibre throws for the moment all tariff differences between Bombay and Manchester into the shade. The Indian Government has long been aware that in this widely-spread variety of the nettle family its provinces possess a source of unused wealth. In 1869 it offered a reward of £5,000 for the invention of a machine or process which should separate the delicate fibre from the bark at a cost consistent with the requirements of commerce. An offer of Rs.50,000 was renewed in 1877. Various machines were submitted under these inducements, but they failed in regard to the essential element of cheapness, and after many trials the offers were withdrawn. They effectually attracted, however, the attention of experts in Great Britain, Europe, and America. Rhea became recognized as one of the most valuable fibres known to the ancient or modern world. Its use in Egypt, India, and China dates from before the dawn of history. Rhea cloth is unrolled from the mummies of the Nile and unearthed in the burial mounds of Assam. The nets and lines spun from it had, for strength, fineness, and durability, no rivals among the fishermen of Bengal and the Malay Archipelago. As "China grass" it won its way about the beginning of this century into European commerce.

The difficulty is to separate the strong silky fibres of the bark from the outer cuticle and the tenacious gums in which they lie embedded. In the past, when labour was of little account, the wives or daughters of the husbandmen and fishing communities scraped and washed small quantities of the bark till, by the persistent toil of many days, each family produced a few handfuls of the much-prized fibre. But the cost of this manual process proved an insuperable difficulty in the adoption of Rhea for modern textile manufactures. Dr.

Royle, as industrial adviser to the India Office, showed that the Rhea fibres "are exceeded by none in fineness, excel all others in strength, and may be fitly compared to the trunk of an elephant which can pick up a needle or root up a tree." He declared that, if the difficulty of separating the fibre can be overcome, "the benefits to India and the world will be incalculable." It is this problem that the chemists and machinists of Europe and America have during the past thirty years been endeavouring to solve. France and Germany at once entered the field with factories for the extraction of the fibre. They worked it up into many forms, from ropes and sail canvas to plushes and dress-pieces resembling silk goods in appearance. They failed, however, to produce a filasse, or clean fibre, which should be at once cheap and serviceable. No machine or merely mechanical operation eliminated the resins with a perfection which yielded fine yarns, except at a cost prohibitive of their general use.

The chemists seemed for a time to be more successful. They produced by means of various re-agents a filasse which was at once cheap and apparently sound. Beautiful fabrics were woven on the Continent, and the inventors laid out a large capital, in the belief that they had solved the problem. But by the time the fabrics came into the hands of the consumers, indeed often before they passed from the shops of the retail dealers, it was found that the chemicals had injured the fibre, and the goods were often returned to the makers. Process after process and machine after machine failed to extract a Rhea fibre which should be both durable and cheap.

The honour of solving the problem has fallen to an English chemist, born, we believe, in India. Mr. Gomess, after many experiments, elaborated a process which the Indian Government is at length able to pronounce a complete success. "The difficulties which previously existed," says the official memorandum lately issued by its Inspector-General of Forests, "in regard to the extraction of the valuable textile fibre from the bark of the Rhea plants have been entirely overcome by what is known as the Gomess process, and a large demand has sprung up for ribbons of dried bark with every probability of its increasing to enormous proportions." After referring to the operations of the Rhea Fibre Treatment Company in London and its dependent associations now being established throughout India, Europe, and America, the official memorandum proceeds to indicate how the production of the fibre may be increased in practically unlimited quantities to meet the demand. "These facts seem to point to the conclusion that we are on the dawn of an industry which even promises to rival jute cultivation." The Inspector-General then draws out a scheme for aiding the cultivators by official information as to the areas most suitable for the growth of the plant and the varieties best adapted to each locality, and by Government experiments as to the best modes of stripping, drying, and baling the bark. The subject, he insists, "becomes all the more important and urgent as reports reach us from the French colonies of considerable activity in the Rhea fibre trade, and as it would not be convenient to be outstripped by them."

The Gomess process adopts zincate of soda for the elimination of the resins, and effects it without the slightest injury to the fibre. After the "ribbons" or strips of bark have been freed from dirt they are placed in weak acid baths for a night. Next morning they are passed through a mild alkaline bath, and then boiled in weak solutions of caustic soda to which zinc has been added. When washed and dried by the usual mechanical means the fibres emerge as a long, silky filasse, entirely free from the cuticle and resinous gums in which they were embedded; clean, white, and ready for the comb of the spinner. They take the most beautiful dyes and can be worked into every variety of fabric from gorgeous velvets to cheap drills and delicate laces. The combined lightness and toughness of the fibre render it peculiarly suitable for tents and ship canvas. Three-fifths more cloth of equal strength can be made from Rhea than from the same weight of linen. That is to say, 1,000 yards of the Rhea canvas weigh only as much as 600 yards of linen. Its durability and resisting power to strain are also much greater. The Government of India is taking effectual steps for the rapid extension of the cultivation. If its forecast be correct, we may congratulate ourselves that what promises to become a great new industry has been rendered possible by the science of an English chemist and has been practically inaugurated by an English company.

Whatever other blessing we may lack we certainly have the God bestowed power to get wealth. But lest men may imagine that this is sent them to puff them up and teach them to despise the nations who are poorer than themselves, the gift is linked to an announcement which is simply astonishing. It is that this power is granted to Israel that God's glory may be satisfied, and also that apart from them He will not recognise any agency, to carry out His covenant which He made with their fathers. This unqualified statement carries with it the continued existence of Israel of the two Houses as the ministers of the Lord, doing His will; receiving the wealth He gives them to use, and in that action enabling Him (wondrous thought!) to establish His sworn covenant to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. These included the birth from that Israelitish source, of "a great and mighty nation," one "blessed" of God, "numberless as the stars," as "the dust of the earth," and as "the sand of the sea-shore," holding "the Gates of their enemies," and therefore supreme on all the oceans of the world; but more precious than all, a Christian nation, ready and willing "to bless all the nations," and "all the families of the earth," by taking Christ to them as the world's Saviour; and His holy Book as the one great gift of God to man, testifying of the work of the Lord Jesus Christ and of His willingness to receive and save them, if only they will believe His grace, and live.

None can dare to say that these gifts are unimportant and worthless? They were the best that God, the Lord Jehovah, had to give, and He bestowed them all unconditionally, like a Sovereign, on His chosen people. Let us, as that people, praise the Lord for His goodness and mercy towards us; and be especially thankful that in the matter of the Rhea fibre He has thought of us again as He has done in respect to the gold, and silver, and diamonds, and rubies, and coal, and iron and asbestos, which He has also so abundantly and exclusively given to us to discover, and also to enjoy.

THE CHURCH AND THE KINGDOM.

By J. W.

I BELIEVE that the confusion made by many writers between "The Church" and the "Kingdom," is a very great hindrance to many minds in receiving the great and blessed truth that the English nation is indeed the Lost Tribes of the House of Israel, or at all events, "the fulness of the nations promised to the sons of Joseph" (Gen. xlviii. 16—20). For the Church of Jesus Christ, which is His body, "the bride, the Lamb's wife," is a revelation quite distinct from that of the Messianic Kingdom upon earth, over which Christ and His Church will one day reign.

In the Old Testament the great hope is the coming of this kingdom, as is proved by the general expectation that Christ came to restore the kingdom to Israel; in the attempt to "take Him by force to make Him a king," in the acknowledgment of faith "Thou art the Son of God, thou are the King of Israel," and in the final accusation brought against Him before Pilate, "Whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar," and the mocking title written on the cross in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, "Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews," and even after the resurrection His own disciples expected, and rightly, that He would "restore the kingdom to Israel," though He would not satisfy them as to "the times and seasons" concerning it.

Now, if we turn to the Book of Daniel, we find a revelation given in two forms, to Nebuchadnezzar first, and afterwards to the prophet Daniel, of five great kingdoms, and only five, from that period lasting on to the end of this dispensation. To the king this revelation took the form of "a great image, whose brightness was excellent and the form thereof terrible," the head of fine gold, the breast and arms of silver, his belly and thighs of brass, and his legs of iron, and then a stone cut out without hands smites the image, and itself becomes a "great mountain and fills the whole earth." The interpretation that follows tells how Babylon is succeeded by Medo-Persia, by Greece and Rome. All these world powers have passed from prophecy into history, and are now being followed by this great British Empire, the colonizing, conquering, protecting, Christianizing power, which we believe is being prepared for re-union with the House of Judah, restoration to the promised land, and the coming of the great Messiah Himself to take the kingdom and to reign for evermore.

A second vision of this prophetic history is given in the 7th chapter of Daniel, where another aspect of the four kingdoms is presented to the prophet himself, and here the four Gentile kingdoms appear as "four beasts rising out of the sea," and are followed by the everlasting kingdom given to the saints of the Most High. Now, in all this prophecy, we do not read anything of the Church of Christ. As I have said before, the hope of the Old Testament is "the kingdom," and only in types and shadows do we see the vision of "the Queen in gold of Ophir, whose beauty the king greatly desires," the blessed company gathered out of all nations to be united to Christ, as His body, and destined to reign with Him over this coming kingdom of Israel. This seems to me the mystery kept secret since the world began, and in a special manner given to St. Paul to shew to us in his epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians, and in the 12th chapter of his 1st epistle to the Corinthians. That the foundations of that Church are laid in Israel we all know. Her Lord came out of Judah, and lived and died as a Jew; all His apostles are Israelites, and so are all the early converts to the faith. And indeed the great work of our Lord in heaven now is, "to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins," so that it seems absolutely certain that it is only through repentant Israelites that the Gospel can be carried to all the nations of the earth. At the same time we have the clearest revelation that in Christ, there is neither Jew nor Greek, circumcision or uncircumcision, bond or free, and also that He gathers them out of every nation, and tongue, and people, a truth against which even the apostles ranged themselves at first, and St. Peter needed a special revelation before he could believe that "common and unclean" Gentiles could be invited to share in this wondrous union with the Lord.

It is sometimes said that this dispensation is a "Gentile interval," but when God reveals more generally the wondrous fact that He has been building up the kingdom of Israel ever since "the days of those kings" (Dan. ii. 44), and that the history of the English nation is the fulfilment of God's promises to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, as far as they can be fulfilled till He comes to make Judah and Ephraim "one stick in His hand" (Ezek. xxxvii. 19), then we shall see how, out of the kingdom, and through the instrumentality of the kingdom, God has been gathering out for His own peculiar treasure, a people united to Himself by the Holy Ghost, the bride, the Lamb's wife, and how Christ is "given to be Head over all things to the Church, which is His body, the fulness of Him who filleth all in all."

It is this outgathering from all nations that seems the special work of God in this dispensation, that all the time the kingdom is going on, and when the Church is completed and has made herself ready and the marriage supper has taken place, then the alleluias of heaven will soon be followed by the Lord's return, and all His saints with Him to take the kingdom and to reign for evermore (Rev. xix.).

THE PROMISES TO ABRAHAM AND HIS SEED, WERE THEY CONDITIONAL, OR UNCONDITIONAL?

To us who have looked into the subject there is no difficulty in answering the above question. We reply that the whole of the promises in early times given by the Lord on oath to the patriarchs were without condition. The covenant under which they were secured to Abraham and his seed after him was not hampered by any condition whatsoever! Our opponents are, however, of another opinion; and an article in Trusting and Toiling (edited by Mr. Samuel Wilkinson), from the pen of Dr. J. E. Cumming, of Glasgow, promulgates the following in respect to our belief in the Identity of the British Anglo-Saxon races with Ephraim-Israel. He wrote thus:—

"One word as to Anglo-Israelites. The promises of blessing given in early times were all conditional, and set side by side with curses, if the conditions were not fulfilled, as we have seen already. This then seems utterly to destroy the claim made to these blessings on the part of those who have not kept the conditions, and who have disclaimed their descent. Are the nations of England and America to be dealt with as Israel, or as portions of the Church of Christ? If the former, then they have cut themselves apart from the national covenants. If the latter, the Israelite blessings cannot be theirs."

We take exception to the above, which, without reservation, declares that "the promises of blessing given in early times were all conditional." We affirm on the contrary that they were nearly all perfectly unconditional. We take some in the earliest times of Abraham, "the friend of God," and ask where in these the conditions come in? We begin with Gen. xii. 1, 2, just when Abram was called by God to leave his native land and go into Palestine, or Canaan. In verses 2 and 3, are seven distinct promises of blessing made by God Himself, the Covenant Jehovah of His people, and no condition appears at all in any one of them! These promises were:—

1. The promise of "the great nation" to come of Abram.
2. God's blessing.
3. His declaration that He would make Abram's name great.
4. Abram was to be a blessing to others.
5. God would bless those who blessed Abram.
6. He would curse those that cursed the people of Abram.

Digitized by Google

7. In Abram all the families of the earth were to be blessed.

Not a word is added to impose a condition under which, if failure on Abram's part occurred, the promises would be null and void! In verse 7 of the same chapter the following is recorded. (1st) God appeared to Abram and He said to him, (2nd) "Unto thy seed will I give this land." What condition was imposed in this case? In chap. xiii. 14—17, we have God's gift of the land to Abram and also to his seed thus expressed, again without any condition to hamper the gift: "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward and westward. For all the land that thou seest, to thee will I give it and to thy seed for ever." Then followed the promise of population increase. It was compared to the dust of the earth, innumerable. "Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee" (ver. 17) unconditionally!

In chapter xv. we have another cluster of blessings all unconditionally granted by God Himself to Abram. In ver. 4 his heir was promised to be his own son. In verse 5 his "afterseed" was described. It was to be numerous as the stars. No condition was attached to this promise, and because Abram believed God, He counted His servant's faith to him for righteousness—the righteousness of faith. There was no condition expressed here! There was the free promise, and Abram's faith accepted it. The rest of Gen. xv. 9—21, is a historical sketch of Israel's career in the form of prophecy, and shows that so far from conditions in God's promised blessings, He gave the land by boundaries to Israel quite without conditions and stipulations.

In chapter xvii. we have Abram's name changed; he was made the father of many nations, an exceedingly numerous progeny was promised him, the covenant with him was made everlasting, the land was settled on his son, and his heirs for an everlasting possession, and the Lord would be their God (vers. 1—8). In ver. 15, 16, Sarah was blessed with several unconditional blessings. She was to have God's blessing. A son was to be born of her to Abraham. She was to become "a mother of nations" and kings of peoples were to be of her. The son promised was literally born, and there was no condition in respect to that matter. The other parts of the promise have also been made good. Where then does the condition come in? In ver. 19, we have the blessings handed on by God to Isaac "by an everlasting covenant" with him and his seed after him. No stipulations are expressed to limit the freedom of that grant!

In chapter xviii. 18, we have God's statement to Abraham in respect to "the great and mighty nation," which was "surely" to arise from him. No stipulation or condition will be found there to throw doubt on the promise, or to limit it in any way.

In Gen. xxii. 15—17, we have a set of promises which, being unconditional and supported by the oath of God Himself, must be deemed conclusive of the subject. Abraham obeyed God's voice in the matter of the sacrifice of his only son Isaac as a burnt offering before the Lord. Because he obeyed the word of God, the Lord gave him His special blessing—He multiplied his descendants, as the stars of heaven, and as the sand upon the sea shore, He gave his seed, so multiplied, the Gate of his enemies, and declared that in his seed all nations of the earth should be blessed. No condition exists here, save the fulfilled one on Abraham's part, "in obeying His voice." This instance governs all the rest and establishes the fact that the writer in Trusting and Toiling labours under a great mistake; for "the promises in early times were all" unconditional, but not "conditional," as he believes.

Being Israel the British and Americans have indeed become God's Lo-Ammi, His "not a people." They were cast out of the Mosaic covenant, it is true; because that was conditional; but as Hosea i. 1—11 shows the promises of God to Abraham revived in their favour, because they were unconditional. Verses 9 and 10 show that this was so, since after declaring that God reduced Israel to the condition of the Gentiles as His "Lo-Ammi" ones, He continues in verse 10 thus, "Yet the number of the children of Israel" (the Ten Tribes) "shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass that in the place where it was said to them, 'Ye are not My people' it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God," His Christian nation! To Him be all the praise!

"YOUR BROTHER ISRAELITE."

[The following letter appeared in the issue of the Jewish World (a Jewish paper) of October 16th, 1896, the writer being our friend Mr. H. H. Pain, of the Stock Exchange, London.—ED.]

"To the Editor of the 'Jewish World.'

"SIR,—Since I had the privilege of being permitted to write letters to your influential paper, I have taken to reading it regularly, and very much pleasure and profit have I derived therefrom.

"I am now induced to seek the favour of admission to your columns once more from reading the sermon delivered by Dr. Gaster, on the occasion of the opening of the Maida Hill Synagogue. In the course of his remarks the following passage occurs:—

"'At the same time show your gratitude to God, for His mercy in that He has caused you to see this day, to open the gates of yet another house of God in this land; whose gates have been opened wide to receive us, and over whose seas we have crossed like unto the Israelites of old, from persecution to liberty and peace.'

"From my former correspondence your readers are doubtless aware that I claim that the British nation is identical with the Lost House of Israel. For the sake of argument, grant that the claim is correct. Now turn to the 33rd chapter of Deuteronomy, 7th verse, containing the invocation, not blessing, of Moses:—

"'Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah,
And bring him in unto his people;
Let his hands be sufficient for him,
And Thou shalt be an help against his adversaries.'

"The quotation supplies its own commentary in the light of my claim, does it not?

"Dr. Gaster then refers in terms of gratitude to the reign of Her Majesty the Queen:

"'Unite with the inhabitants of this great Empire to thank Him for the signal grace He has shown to the aged and beloved ruler of this realm, Her Majesty the Queen, whose life He has protected and whose rule He has prolonged beyond that of many a king or ruler. Under her benign sway liberty and freedom has been ours, and it has been granted to us to share effectively in the duties and privileges incumbent upon the citizens of this land, and to show our loyalty and devotion to our Queen and country. On this day of our rejoicing we think, therefore, of our beloved Queen, and pray to God to lengthen her days in happiness and bliss. May He send His blessing to her and to the whole Royal Family. May He bless the men who stand at the head of the Government.'

"Will my Israelitish brethren of Judah, call to mind the blessing of our forefather Jacob:

"'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah,
Nor the ruler's staff from between his feet,
Until Shiloh come.
And unto Him shall the gathering of the people be.'

"As also the prediction of Jeremiah, 'For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel.'

"The ruler of this mighty Empire upon which the sun never sets, is literally, if my contention is admitted, quite as much the Queen of the Jews as of the British people. Her Majesty claims descent from King David. Look at the Royal Arms, and can your readers doubt the evidence of their own eyes? What do these heraldic emblems contain? The crowned Lion of Judah—the supporters are the Lion of the House of Judah—and the Unicorn represents the House of Israel, whilst the Shield contains the Harp of David. Again I ask: have these no meaning?

"The articles and correspondence of your widely circulated paper, witness to a widespread desire amongst the Jews to regain possession of Palestine, the home of their forefathers.

"Political events, as I have explained in my previous letters, point conclusively to the breaking up of its present possessor—the Ottoman Empire—by the hand of British-Israel.

"This will facilitate the accomplishment of the aspirations of the Jewish people, if, as I am fully persuaded will be the case on the disappearance of the Turk from the scene, England takes the Promised Land under her protection. But may not the very fact that the Holy Places will thereby pass under the control of the Gentile (?) English, give rise to a feeling of bitter disappointment to many Jews, and call forth the reproach administered to their forefathers as of old: 'Son of man, thy (Ezekiel's) brethren, even thy brethren, even the men of thy kindred, and all the House of Israel, all of them—i.e., the Ten Tribes—are they, unto whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem—the Jews—have said, Get ye far from the Lord: unto us is this land given for a possession.'

"Would that I could persuade, not only the Jews, but also my own people, that we are all of one race, by virtue of a common descent from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, then would come to pass the prediction of Isaiah: 'Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim.'

"Again, would that sentiment which I notice invariably runs throughout all the speeches and writings of the Jews exist, namely, that they are an alien people, and only dwell among us by sufferance, as it were? But they are not aliens, if my claim is correct, as I am prepared to prove it is.

"Do not then, ye men of Judah, reject the right hand of brotherhood and fellowship when it is held out by an Englishman. Think what my contention means—blood relationship with a free people, who, by the frank admission of Dr. Gaster, admit all Jews 'to share effectively in the duties and privileges incumbent upon the citizens of this land.' Witness Lord Beaconsfield, and the Lord Mayor-elect of London: may he have a successful year of office. Whatever difficulties your readers may entertain in admitting my claim, that the British people are, indeed, none other than the lost Ten Tribes of Israel, surely the fact that we, as a nation, are in possession of all the literal blessings promised to our forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, ought to carry some weight in giving me, in their opinion, the right to subscribe myself, as an Englishman,

"Your brother Israelite,
"H. H. PAIN.

LET BAALIM BE NO MORE REMEMBERED IN ISRAEL.

By E. REEP.

THE Pope has refused to recognise the validity of Anglican Orders. To the Papal mind the Anglican Church is of the synagogue of Satan, wherein is neither knowledge nor salvation, nor light nor blessing. For this let the Protestant British Church be thankful; thankful that she has failed to cast in her lot with them whose feet are shod, not with the preparation of the Gospel, but, indeed, with death and destruction. It is to be hoped that we have now heard the last of the infatuated notion, which has so possessed a large body of the Anglican clergy, that the Roman Pontiff is the true, central, visible, spiritual Head of Christendom.

The English Church now stands, according to Cardinal Vaughan, alone and shivering in her isolation, her faith and hopes the agency of the evil one. Time was when Anglicans paid this sort of compliment to the Papacy. We have learned, however, whether wisely or not, to forego, to forget, and to forgive the past, otherwise we might remember for our edification that "Popery has been ever looked on as that which we ought to apprehend and fear the most, and guard chiefly against, it being our most restless and most formidable enemy." This is one of the utterances of a Parliament in the reign of Queen Anne; it is one to lay stress on in the reign of Victoria. In a manner it was set forth at the recent Church Congress by the Archbishop of York, who declared that "against the will of the people of England the country had been parcelled out into dioceses, and set under Roman Catholic clergy. By the sole authority of an Italian prelate, who recently occupied the See of Rome, vast buildings had been erected, magnificent services inaugurated, while priests had been multiplied beyond all proportion to the number of adherents." Furthermore, the Bishop of Peterborough protested that the Roman Church had always been the enemy of national development. How much so is, of course, impressed on the larger half of English history, the voice of which still cries: "Beware of them which say they are apostles and are not." That we should at this present moment bear this caution in mind is manifest when it is remembered that among the coming events of 1897 will be the celebration of the 13th centenary of the landing of Augustine on English soil. The Church of England has already signified her intention of commemorating the occasion with solemnity and thanksgiving; hence the necessity of having at our fingers' ends a few unvarnished facts of British history.

Far too much veneration has been felt for Bede's "Ecclesiastical History of the Anglo-Saxons." On the supposition that it is to be regarded as accurate history, has been based the utterly false presumption that the Saxons, at the coming of the Roman monk, Augustine, were ignorant of Christianity. Before we can believe in such ignorance, we must entirely forget that the Angles and Saxons sifted through countries which had been largely Christianized as early as the second and third centuries. So widespread was Christianity in the third century, that Tertullian speaks not only of the Sarmatians, Dacians, Germans, and Scythians as having received the faith, but of it being established also in Spain, Gaul, and Britain. In the fourth century a British Christian made himself famous throughout the world by publishing certain doctrinal views that were opposed to the prevailing conceptions of Christianity. Rome, Sicily, Africa, and Palestine, were in turn visited by this schismatic Briton, in company with a brother monk from Ireland. In the East he was well received, more particularly by the Bishop of Jerusalem, under whose protection he is said to have formed a considerable number of disciples. The fact of his being trained and educated in Britain is deemed by Neander, the Christian historian, to have had an important influence on the development of his religious views. Pelagius, he says, was a diligent student of the Oriental Church-Teachers; and, as the British Church was derived originally from the Oriental, it is probable that in various ways the connection between them was maintained. Pelagius,* in one respect, showed himself to be a typical Briton. He insisted that the Bible was the only source from which it is possible to learn perfectly the will of God, and he set his face sternly against allegorizing expedients. As a result of the Pelagian controversy, the British Church must have been renowned in every region where flourished a Christian community; and judging by the anathemas pronounced against Pelagius by the Romish Church, and against all who adopted his belief in a literal observance of Christ's precepts, the Church, of which he was such a prominent member, no doubt suffered the same ostracism and censure. Thus, when Augustine the monk was commissioned by Pope Gregory to preach the Gospel to the "barbarous" English nation, it was not because they were ignorant of Christianity, but because the British Church was regarded, just as she is regarded now by the present Vicar of Rome, as heretical and of the evil one.

On the arrival of Augustine in Britain at the end of the sixth century, the Angles and Saxons had been settled in the country a hundred and fifty years. During this century and a half the West-Saxons had struggled for supremacy by fighting incessantly against the Angles, the Welsh, the Picts and the Scots. Other causes, however, than tribal ambition, kept these tribes constantly at feud with each other: the law that made every family responsible for the crimes of its members was one that frequently led, as it did with the ancient Israelites, to bitter dissensions and an appeal to arms. But all legends and stories recording tales of victorious Saxons vanquishing barbarous Britons, Kemble ("The Saxons in England") would have us put aside, and look into history beyond the times of fanciful stories.† However this may be, Gildas, our oldest British historian, who is supposed to have lived in the sixth century, tells us that Britain was famous for twenty-eight fortified cities, all securely strengthened by walls, towers, and barred gates. The island itself, he says, has the appearance of a lovely picture. Decked like a man's chosen bride, with divers jewels, with limpid fountains and abundant brooks; with transparent rivers and cool lakes, which pour forth torrents of refreshing water; pleasantly situated, with mountain, hill, and plain, it is perfectly adapted for pasturage and the work of the husbandman. Unfortunately, Gildas was dependent on foreign historians for his historical material, the records of his own country having disappeared into distant lands with exiled Britons, or been destroyed by the fires of the enemy. History thus compiled is hardly reliable history; but we may safely gather from Gildas that in his day every sort of religious corruption had crept into Britain, and had subverted the people. Men dumb, he says, in the apostolical decrees, were intruding themselves into the preferments of the Church, buying the same at a high rate; men were attaining to the episcopal dignity who were only usurping the name of priesthood to further their own ends and ambition.

From Bede's account of England, it is clear that Augustine and his party of monks found, on their arrival, plenty of churches in the country. Ethelbert, King of Kent, seems to have shown the characteristic kindness peculiar to kings of Israel (1 Kings xx. 31), and to have received the Roman mission with great courtesy. Probably it did not occur to Ethelbert to trouble himself as to what was really the object of Augustine's visit, though it was nothing less than to establish the authority of the Roman See in Britain. That Gregory's envoy achieved his purpose so easily is to be attributed to the circumstance of Bertha, the king's wife, being a Christian. Since she was of the royal family of the Franks, her sympathy was doubtless with the Roman rather than the British Church; hence Ethelbert, through the Frankish interpreters Augustine had brought with him—for neither he nor his foreign forty monks could speak the British tongue,—consented to hold an open assembly that he might hear the new doctrine Augustine wished to put before him. Augustine, with all the idolatrous paraphernalia belonging to the Roman Church, was not slow to appear in the presence of the king. And again the English king seems to have exhibited that Israelite sense of fairness which was, from what we read in Scripture (2 Chron. xxviii. 7—15), so distinctive a feature of the Israelites of the House of Israel. After attentively listening to Augustine's interpreted dissertation on Roman dogma, he politely begged for time to consider such teaching, remarking: "Your words and promises are very fair, but as they are new to us, and of uncertain import, I cannot approve of them so far as to forsake that which I have so long followed with the whole English nation. But because you are come from far into my kingdom, and, as I conceive, are desirous to impart to us those things which you believe to be true, we will not molest you, but give you favourable entertainment; nor do we forbid you to preach and gain as many as you can to your religious views." Accordingly the king permitted the accredited agents of the Pope of Rome to take up their abode in the city of Canterbury. In that capital they took possession of an ancient British Church, in which they met to sing, to pray, and to say mass, until such time as other churches were built or repaired in other places. The king, persuaded, eventually, like the Anglo-Catholic party in the National Church to-day, that the unity of Christendom was vested in the hands of the Pope of Rome, embraced the Roman heresies; and thenceforth, for more than eight centuries, England lived in daily dread of Papal interdicts and religious tyranny. During such interdicts no church dare ring a bell, sing a psalm, or celebrate mass, or any other rite save a service of penance. From the throne to the hovel, every one was the slave of the Pope; at his mandate even the king could be dethroned, and all persons, high or low, who ventured to defend their sovereign, shared his excommunication. In these days of full liberty it is hard to realise that it was once possible for a Roman Pope to licence the Archbishop of Canterbury to place the king and realm under such a ban, much less can we imagine an order for no one to presume to crown his heirs. But more astonishing still is the Papal letter that thanks an English king "for the satisfaction and submission he has made by granting his kingdom to the Roman Church." No wonder that the Church of the Inquisition was grateful to John that he was "mindful that his kingdom was the patrimony of St. Peter." To gain England even in John's time was a prize big enough to bewitch the Papal See into personifying itself as a Power to which had been given the kingdom and dominion of the whole earth (Dan. vii, 27). Howbeit the kingdom of the saints of the Most High is not seated in Papal Rome, but in the nation whose thousands are the ten thousands of Britain, whose name is Israel.

Review.

Englishmen Israelites; Turks Edomites: Politics and Prophecy, with Coloured Map. By H. Herbert Pain. London: Robert Banks, Racquet-court, Fleet-street. Price 1s.

We are glad to welcome Mr. Pain's work in its published form, having already seen some advanced proofs, by his courteous forethought. Mr. Pain, who has given the spare moments of a business man's life for two years to the careful preparation of this book, has been, we suppose, under the impression, till lately, that he was not gifted with the power of lecturing, and could not write a book on the subject, which, we know, has engrossed his attention for a score of years. Yet he has now come out of his shell and proved that he can speak and lecture well; and the book before us shows, besides, that he can carefully digest the innumerable facts and arguments of our case, and present them to the public in a very creditable, readable manner. He has in this volume gone over the whole ground of Our Identity, and in a short, terse argumentative fashion, told us the whole story, from the beginning to the end, of the origin, progress, and future of the British Empire. Mr. Pain illustrates his case by a Map, reduced from a costly one of large size he caused Messrs. Sandford to prepare for him, to help him to address our friends at Exeter Hall at the last Annual Meeting. Mr. Pain has, in his book, quoted all his Scriptural references in full, in view to the fact, which we fear is one of some importance, that readers of our literature have not the patience to look up our texts, but take them for granted, much to their own loss and ours. Our author goes over the usual preliminaries of the subject in a careful but abbreviated way, which sometimes may, we fear, take too much for granted in respect to the readers' intelligence and knowledge. He traces the History of the House of Israel from Assyria to the British Islands, chiefly following Oxonian's "Israel's Wanderings;" describes the wanderings of Dan, and points out the position of Benjamin as a tribe, during the wanderings of the Israelites, touching also, by the way, on the subject of Language, Religion, the Mosaic and the Abrahamic covenants. There are many thoughts worth remembering interspersed in these pages which could advantageously be quoted. One is this (p. 38): "It is obvious that if the old covenant was not made with Gentiles of Japhetic and Hamitic origin, neither could the new covenant be made with them." Again: "A Frenchman, Hindoo, or Hottentot, may accept Christianity, and thus become the seed of Abraham by faith, but that does not confer racial descent from Abraham, which we Englishmen claim." Inter alia, Mr. Pain regrets "that our clergy and congregations of our National Church do not realise the literal meaning of the words put into their mouths by the Book of Common Prayer, and so join in the services with a heartfelt devotion and pleasure unknown to all except those who realise their literal Israelitish descent" (p. 39, 40). In enumerating the Birthright Blessings, our author notices "The Mighty Empire and Company of Nations," the Multitudinous Race, "the Gates," "the Appointed Place," the Free Country, the Dominion of the Sea, the Divine Protection, the Missionary People, India, Africa, the invincible Army and Navy, Foreign Loans, Slavery, the Blessing to other nations to come from Israel, the Sabbath, and many other points of more or less importance, which Mr. Pain enumerates and comments upon. Further on our author, noticing the good olive tree and wild olive branches, grafted in amongst the others, observes:—

"What became of the natural branches that were never broken off? They are not represented by the Jews; they could not possibly be by the Gentiles; therefore they must be Israel—Israel of 'the lost sheep of the House of Israel.'" The question of "the Church," which is often discussed in our columns, is put in a nutshell by Mr. Pain, thus:—

"In the Wilderness, the whole Congregation was the Church of God, ergo, the Nation was the Church. In England (the term is used in its widest sense), before Nonconformity was allowed, the National Church included the whole people; therefore, if the British people be literal Israel, the Nation was the Church, and the Church, as an Ecclesiastical Organization, was the Church of God in Great Britain, whilst Great Britain, as the Missionary Nation, is the Church of God in the world."

The cui bono objection has been answered by Mr. Pain, on pp. 86—88, in a series of fourteen arguments very shortly stated, which are cogent, and pretty nearly embrace the whole case as we are accustomed to state and answer it ourselves. Mr. Pain's merit is, that he focusses the whole into a page or two, and in this, as in other branches of the subject, brings the arguments into a condensed form which, if it does not settle the matter, at any rate leads to thought, discussion, and further research and investigation. Of course, in a treatise like this, so tersely and admirably condensed, every point cannot be embraced, much less enlarged upon. Thus, in the matter of the Gates, some further elucidation might have been advantageous; showing how the Gates command also the ocean highways of the globe, and that in these days of steam used in driving the warships of the whole of the Powers of the world exclusively, the possession of the Gates confers on the happy owner of them the supremacy of the sea, exclusively.

The work under review, no doubt, is a very valuable one, and should be of great service to all of us engaged in the propaganda of our glorious truth. Armed with the "Handbook," and such volumes as the present, we may expect our truth to permeate many new strata of our population where the knowledge of Our Identity has made no lodgment as yet, or, worse still, has never been heard of at all.

The second portion of Mr. Pain's book will probably have the greatest interest for many of our readers; but as it deals with futurity and with political events yet to take place in response to unfulfilled prophecy, it behoves one to be cautious, since the details of great national crises depend on facts not yet revealed. These may be totally different to what we anticipate, though the final event may be the same. The views of Mr. Pain hinge upon the fact, which, we think, the evidence justifies us in holding, namely, that Turkey is Edom or Esau of the prophecies. Granted that, the fate of Turkey must be such as Mr. Pain anticipates, and we also believe. The grounds of that belief have been stated before, but they may be profitably repeated in Mr. Pain's words.

Digitized by Google

He states that "Esau is Edom" (p. 106, &c.) and his country "Mount Seir" (Gen. xxxvi. 8, 9, R.V.). Bosra, the metropolis of Edom, is Bossorah, near Bagdad, and identical with Broussa in Asia Minor. Esau's grandchildren were Teman and Omar, identical—the former with Othman; Ottoman, Osmanli,—the latter with the name of the Caliph Omar, who built the famous Mosque at Jerusalem. Edom was prophetically destined in Scripture, Old and New Testament alike, to possess Israel's land for centuries prior to Israel's restoration. The Turks are now in possession, and Israel's restoration is drawing near, as all men allow. "Therefore the Turks are Edom." Mr. Pain amplifies the proofs on pp. 107, et sequitur, establishing a strong case. Balaam prophesies, and the Vision of the Prophet Obadiah strongly corroborates, the conclusion, and makes the case almost impregnable. This point ceded, the rest is plain. Turkish Edom will be overthrown, and the nations will divide the Turkish Empire.

The questions of Egypt, the Soudan, the sources of the Nile, and British East Africa, all follow, and Mr. Pain has something to say about them all. We cannot go with him further, but his views take him to the Millennium and the events which seem to usher it in, regarding which we must pause before we follow him.

In conclusion, we desire to recommend our friends to secure a copy of Mr. Pain's little volume, whose shape even is original, and, having perused it, help in its wide distribution. It embraces every subject we all have at heart in connection with Our Identity, and it will be found useful and profitable as a means towards the end, namely, the wide publication of the important subject with which the author and we all are dealing.

We thank Mr. Pain for the kindly words of his Postscript, and are thankful that he has found our poor labours in some measure useful. To the God of Israel be all the praise! Non nobis!

Correspondence.

SOWING THE SEED AT SEAFORD.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Seaford is a quiet little town of 2,000 inhabitants, being about 17 miles by rail from Brighton, but much less as the crow flies. It is much patronised by quiet visitors, and if British-Israelism is known there, the visitors will be sure to hear of it, as the place is compact. I felt that if we could only wake it up, folks would meet and talk over the matter. So first we went to spy out the land. On August Bank Holiday, my wife and I took with us a bag of literature and a parcel of 300 BANNERS, but as the day was hot, the people were sitting about near the water, and there was hardly any promenading; so, as we were forced to return by an evening train, or change at Lewes later on, and get crushed in a Bank Holiday rush for carriages, I did not lecture that day, but enquired as to the best time, and talked with people and gave them literature, and told them to watch for me. In the afternoon I got the help of two lads, and we put BANNERS and leaflets in nearly every house, and left it with prayers for a blessing on our efforts.

On August 14th, my friend, Mr. R. Mackworth, arrived in Brighton for 16 days to join with me in the work. So on Monday, 17th, we went to Seaford. We had a good and attentive audience, gave away a lot of literature, and we sold three Handbooks. On the 20th, Mr. Mackworth went over to spend the day distributing and conversing with the people. He saw that Monday's work had taken root. He found out two of the local clergy, and called to tell them what we were doing, and gave them Handbooks. He made the journey on his bicycle, and I am sorry to say on his return he took the lower old road instead of the new road into Brighton at Blackrock, and not seeing a small post in the dark, ere he could pull up, he smashed into it, and although, thank God, he was not hurt, his valuable bicycle was seriously injured. Before he left Seaford he stood up on the front and announced our next visit for the 24th.

When we arrived on that date a storm was brewing, and it was not possible to lecture; so we went about among the people, speaking and giving literature. A Christadelphian and I had a discussion which drew others to listen. One young man said he wished I would give him some literature to take to his village, a distance away, which I did, to his great delight. We then went all over Seaford distributing BANNERS and leaflets. Mr. Mackworth invaded public-houses, talked to the men, and told them to look out for us. He also went to the Constitutional Club, and the secretary kindly permitted him to leave BANNERS for the members to read. We distributed in the train on our return, and felt sure we must be waking the place.

On Saturday, 29th, we again went, and spoke to the people on the front; but as a cool breeze made them shifty, we distributed literature, and sold three more Handbooks. Mr. Mackworth left Brighton on the 31st, and as I told the people to look for me on the 2nd of September, I would not delay, even though my wife could not go with me, but Mrs. Farnes kindly came. I felt sure the seed must be taking root, so I took 12 Handbooks, and plenty of BANNERS and other literature; but when we got to Lewes it was raining. However, it cleared up, and when we got to Seaford, it looked black but was dry, and when we got to the beach there was hardly anyone about, and I thought it would be a failure. However, I hung up my Union Jack, Stars and Stripes, and British-Israel lecture banner, and wherever the people came from—I was astonished. We had a good audience, and Mrs. Farnes distributed a lot of literature, and sold 10 out of the 12 Handbooks. One young gentleman came to the station with us to learn all he could by the way. At the first meeting a young American gentleman was much impressed at the sight of a man displaying his country's flag at such a lecture. He bought a Handbook. Another gentleman on the same night complimented me on my abilities; but, before all the people, he said I was only wasting time by not preaching Jesus, "rather than a lot of old prophecies that had no meaning for anyone now. What had we got to do with old prophecies? They were no good now to anyone!" Yet he demanded that I should preach the Christ who, by the way, was revealed in such an old and useless book as he deemed the Old Testament to be! Our previous experience teaches us how to deal with such objectors; and I think he was sorry he spoke ere long, although I dealt gently with him, as my object is to win.

Mr. Mackworth helped me in Brighton Sundays and week-nights; and every day he went to the front for conversations and distributions, and did much to press forward the truth during his 16 days in Brighton. I have finished at Seaford for this year, unless I hear from someone asking for a meeting indoors during the winter.—Yours faithfully,

H A. MARCHANT.

60, Upper Lewes-road, Brighton.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I feel I must write and let you know the blessing your paper has been to a friend of mine and myself. A few weeks ago I lent a copy to my friend and kept on doing so with each successive copy every week, and now he has been instrumental in starting "a mutual lending society" of six members, by which means your paper goes round to each of us in turn, among other papers and periodicals; and so the glorious truth of Our Identity is brought to the knowledge of four more, and hence many more, as each one is sure to speak of the subject, in a friendly way or otherwise, to his friends, and so propagate the truth, and set others thinking if not acting.

Besides this, my friend tells me, that he never read his Bible since he left school, because those who taught him used to ridicule it, and so he got in the way of doing the same; and also when I first lent him the BANNER he used only to read the article on "The Signs of the Hour," and glance at the rest; whereas now, he reads it and looks out for it, and propagates the truth to his friends with a certain measure of success. And not only does he read the BANNER, but also his Bible, and even has gone so far as to send me a paper marked in the margin with a verse out of the Bible, shewing how it proves God's Word, though the article was never intended to do so.

I feel that this testimony is one which we have to glorify God for, and it will stimulate you in your work, and not only you but all your readers, and encourage them to lend, knowing that small though the results for good may seem at first God is using you and your paper, and those who lend the same, to further the one truth that predominates His Word, and sheds just the light that is now wanted among our race to cope with infidelity and impatience at seeming delay in justice being wrought to those who oppose this truth and persecute God's people.

I can only say, that this truth has changed the aspect of everything in my daily life, made me a more loyal subject, and a desire to be a good citizen in the true sense of the word; and has also shewn me that the past of my life and surroundings I looked on formerly as secular are sacred in the eyes of God. He is truly in everything, and party spirit is eradicated by this truth, as it shews us all and every party are necessary, and under the ruling hand of our Almighty God. May He go on to bless the BANNER and Anglo-Israel work in every land, is the earnest prayer of,

Yours truly,

JAMES L. P. STEEL.

W. L. BLORE.

Hill House, Sandown, I.W., Oct. 26th, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I am an Anglo-Israelite of many years standing, a student of the Bible and of prophecy from my early childhood, and have taken in the BANNER OF ISRAEL for some years. With reference to the correspondence between E. L. Dwyer and D. M. W., may I be permitted to say a few words. In letter 2, D. M. W. says: "Remember Luther was a German, and we owe him a great deal for the work he did at the time of the Reformation." Also, "Why, our own Royal family is more than half German." I also have thought much of this, especially on reading two years ago the history of the Reformation, in which most of the reformers (or missioners) were so-called Germans. The same objection has been thrown up at England that she has no good old musicians; that all the best masters, composers, and singers were either Germans or Italians. How comes it then, if, as is so often demonstrated in the BANNER, England is the head and not the tail in all things?

I think the objection can best be met thus: the conclusion I have come to is this, that both reformers and musicians, such as Handel, Mendelssohn, &c., though belonging nominally to the German or Italian nationality, were in reality of Israelitish extract or origin.

Christ's apostles (or missioners) were Israelites, and to the Israelite nation was deputed the work of preaching the Gospel, to them was the light given; besides, it is well known that the tribes of Israel, when migrating westward from their captivity, travelled through Europe, and settled in different countries, especially North Germany and that neighbourhood; so it is quite reasonable to suppose that the chief reformers and musicians may be of them. Who but an Israelite could preach God's Word so effectually? Who but an Israelite could compose such glorious masterpieces as the "Messiah," "Elijah," "Creation," "St. Paul," &c., which so stirs the hearts of us Anglo-Israelites, or, I should say, the whole British nation?

The intermarriages of the British and German Royal families may be accounted for thus: George I. of England was a "German" (?) or Hanoverian. Would a real German rule over England? No.

I am of opinion that all the great masters, musicians, poets, painters, &c., were of Israelitish origin; for "a people chosen," trained and divinely instructed by God Himself (Isa. xliii. 21) to show forth His praise and do His work, ought to be the best of all workmen; and that they were only called by the name of the country through which they passed, and settled for a time: thus was Israel "lost." (See Exod. xxxv. 25, 26, 30—35, xxxvi. 1, xxxviii. 23, xxxix.; 1 Chron. viii. 5; 2 Chron. ii. 13, 14, iv. 11. Huram of Benjamin.)

With reference to D. M. W.'s remark about the "doom of foreigners," and of French or German individuals being "as good as any English," I would answer, if I may, the judgment or doom is not pronounced against individuals (Isa. liv. 15—17), but against those nations who, in being anti-Israel, are also Antichrist! Gen. xii.: "And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee." (See also Exod. xvii. 14—16). So, in the coming "European war," God's judgment will fall on those nations who oppose and fight against Israel, whether they be German, French, or any other nationality; because, in fighting against Israel, they fight against Christ, the "King of Israel!" (Isa. xliii. 14, 15), and so prove themselves to be, at least in part, Antichrist (or against Christ).

I fear I have made this more lengthy than I intended; and, if there be any errors, kindly excuse, as I am at present ill, and hardly able to write. Yours in Israel,

K. B. CARTER.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I do not mean to trouble you with a letter, but merely to ask a favour of you. Some months ago I read a letter from a brother Israelite in New Zealand, asking information about the progress of the faith in that belief in this country, and for other information, looking, as I understood him then, to some new movement to promote its growth. Being a man of business, I was forced to write my reply with interruptions, and before I had completed it, having his letter in my pocket, I met a friend to whom I spoke of it, and he expressing a wish to read it, I lent it to him, and through some unfortunate accident he has mislaid it and been unable, so far, to find it. I am very anxious that my correspondent should know the circumstances which have prevented my reply. I found on looking at my letter that I had not put his address at head of my reply, and being of three or four names, all of which were new to me and peculiar, I am unable to recall them. I have no doubt he is a reader of the BANNER and hope that he would see this, if you would kindly insert it in your next issue, and will send me his address, so that I may supply the information asked for to the best of my ability. Thanking you in advance for your kind compliance, and wishing you God speed in all your undertakings, I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

THE COMING CONFLICT.

WE take the following from the Sussex Daily News, of November 5th and 10th, 1896:—

"Last night, at the Carlton-hill Mission Hall, Brighton, Mr. H. A. Marchant gave the first of a series of weekly lectures on 'Great Britain and the Eastern Question, or the Coming Conflict for the Dominion of the World.' The lecturer, who was introduced by Mr. J. J. Jones, said that those who read their Bibles carefully would find that events of the last few hundred years with regard to the Turkish Empire had gone on Bible lines. Holman Hunt had suggested that Palestine should be purchased from the Sultan, and the Jews restored, but this was not foreshadowed in the Bible at all. God's plan was that the people of Israel and Judah united were to take possession of it, and the lecturer, according to his well-known Anglo-Israel views, found these tribes in the British Empire. Biblical students, he continued, found in prophecy a coming conflict between Israel and a great northern confederacy, in which Russia was distinctly indicated as forming part. Turkey, he held, would be broken up, and the seat of government of the British Empire shifted to Palestine, according to prophecy. The 'times of the Gentiles' were nearly expired, and the Powers were awaiting as it were for God's moment to arrive for the extinction of Turkish rule in Palestine, and the return of Israel and the Jews. Mr. Marchant quoted many passages from the prophets with regard to the future of Israel, which, he said, could only be applicable to the British Empire. They alone, he said, were a nation, and a company of nations, holding the Gates of their enemies. Returning to the Confederacy which is to attack Israel, he said that God was then to work a miracle which would convince all mankind once for all that He is God, and Israel His people."

"THE EASTERN QUESTION.—SOME NEW VIEWS AT BRIGHTON.

"Mr. H. A. Marchant continued his series of lectures on 'Great Britain and the Eastern Question' at the Carlton-hill Mission Hall, Brighton, on Wednesday evening. He spoke of the hatred of the other nations of Europe towards England, and of their jealousy of her unique position in the world, and went on to quote from an article by M. de Lanessan an acknowledgment that the British had become the Gateholders of the world by the possession of Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, the Suez Canal, the Island of Perim, the Aden Peninsula, Singapore, and Hong Kong. He added that according to the Nineteenth Century the large proportion of Frenchmen who cordially hated the English had, in an elaborate book written by one Louis Martin, given utterance to their firm belief that the English were Jews. All this, Mr. Marchant maintained, was in fulfilment of the prophecy that Israel should possess the Gate of her enemies. He drew attention to a map of the Promised Land, showing that the land promised to Abraham was from the Nile to the Euphrates, and that the march to Dongola, and ultimately to Khartoum, would only mean the occupation of the territory which Israel was to occupy. He fully believed that on the breaking up of the Turkish Empire, Britain would be found in possession of Palestine, if not of Constantinople, and that ultimately the Sublime Porte would become a British possession. He enumerated numerous Scriptural prophecies, and contended that they applied to the British race and not to the Christian Church, as usually interpreted. Mr. J. J. Jones presided, and there was a numerous attendance. The lectures will be continued for the next three weeks on Wednesday evenings."

THE GODLESS FLORIN.

BY H. K. WOOD.

"VICTORIA Dei Gratia Britanniarum Regina," that is, "Victoria, by the Grace of God, Queen of Britain." Thus runs the legend or inscription, more or less fully expressed, on the coins of the British realm. Once, indeed, some two-shilling pieces were issued from Her Majesty's mint without the initials, "D. G.," or the full words, "Dei Gratia,"—"By the Grace of God." They were designated the godless florins, and were at once recalled. It well becomes us as a Christian nation, under a Christian Sovereign, thus to acknowledge the Almighty, and never to forget that without His support and blessing prosperity cannot be ours. From Him come the power and the victory, and He it is that putteth down one, and setteth up another. Everywhere in the Bible we are taught to trace the hand of God in history, and to give the glory to Him to whom alone it is due. Gloria Deo—Glory to God.—Good News.

WAILING FOR THE DEAD.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

SIR,—In your issue of the 11th September, your correspondent "Dublinensis," when endeavouring to reply to a query of "J. D." relative to the Irish custom of Keening, or wailing for the dead, gives a very confused statement of the traditions which connect us with the East. The one material fact which acts as a historic foundation for those traditions is the Lia Fail, or stone of destiny. But this was never said to be "the original Table of the Law;" it was known as Jacob's pillow. There is no ancient tradition as to the Tables of the Law, but there is a strange tradition that "the Jews' Ark" is hidden on the hill of Tara, and modern Bible students have said that if it is there the Tables of the Law are in it. In this connection the change of the name of the hill to Tara—almost the same as Torah—at the time that the Lia Fail was brought there, is not to be overlooked. The Tuatha de Danaan who settled in Ireland long before the name of the hill was changed, bear the name of the most venturesome and unsettled Hebrew tribe. The Fenians were the Phœnicians, and settled in the south. These were the ancient inhabitants of Canaan, and it is highly probable that the custom of wailing for the dead was common to both peoples.

Keening is practised among the peasantry to-day; it is usually done by relatives, and is a strange, sad, weird, and mournful dirge. It is handed on from generation to generation, and is a natural expression on the part of those who give voice to their grief. The custom of "making this ado and weeping" was practised in Palestine A.D. 31, and it would seem that a "tumultuous" and loud expression of grief is of Eastern origin, and has idolatrous associations.

The antiquarian question as to whether the Torah is hidden at Tara, could be disposed of by a little effort and the expenditure of a small sum of money. It is strange that no attempt to explore the Mergeh or receptacle there has ever been made.—I am, Sir, &c.,

D. HANAN.

M. DE LAUESSAN, A FRENCH STATESMAN, ON THE BRITISH OCCUPATION OF EGYPT.

A FRIEND who has seen the London Morning Post of Nov. 6th, 1896, and the copy of M. de Lauessan's views therein, in regard to the continued occupation by the British of Egypt and the Soudan, has sent the paper to us, as the French statesman's ideas offer so remarkable a testimony to the facts of our case, especially in regard to British "possession of the Gates of their enemies" (Gen. xxii. 17, R.V.). "I should think," wrote our correspondent, "that he had been reading a copy of your work on 'The Gates.'"

M. de Lauessan, of course, does not approve of our prolonged stay in Egypt. He would have us quit the country at once according to the rash promise of the then Premier, Mr. Gladstone, more rashly repeated to the French by British Prime Ministers since! In giving his opinion pretty freely on this point, M. de Lauessan describes the British Gates which lie thickly on the road to India and the East, and admires "the sagacity, foresight, and activity our nation has displayed in the pursuit of the object she set before herself last century;" namely, we suppose, to build up a British Empire in India, and beyond, again, in the East. Here, however, M. de Lauessan goes beyond the facts and evidence; for, if one thing is clear, it is that in seizing on Gibraltar, Malta, the three great Indian Gates, Singapore, and some others, our nation had no idea of an Eastern Empire at all. Greatness was thrust on her by the Lord; and in most of these cases the places were taken almost accidentally, but without intending thereby to fortify the Overland Route, or to secure our road to India and the East. The Suez Canal was not built by us at all, but by the French; but we have secured the monopoly of its profits by the vast Eastern trade God has given us, and by reason of the fact that He has forced upon us the whole of India, given us South-East of India, as a Colonial field, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, the Fijis, besides mercantile possessions in North Borneo and China, with the Cape territories rich in treasures of gold, diamonds, asbestos, iron, coals, and other precious things of the earth and its mountains. What we have secured has been by the gift of God to a people often stupidly blind to its blessings; a people which quite recently has, by Mr. Gladstone's wilful sacrifice of its interests, thrown away what God gave it, and that not once or twice. The Transvaal was such an instance, and the land of Egypt is, in intention, another. M. de Lauessan, however, confirms our views respecting "the Gates" and their extreme value, writing thereon in the manner described in the following.

After discussing the necessity which rests on England to abandon her position in Egypt with reference to her promise in 1882, and since often repeated, to clear out of the country as soon as Egypt could go alone, M. de Lauessan writes thus:—

"England has had at all periods of her history a marvellous intuition of future European expansion in the world. She has always been considerably ahead of the other nations in all the countries where civilization was to penetrate, and along all the great maritime routes. By the occupation of Gibraltar, England assured to herself the key of the Mediterranean; by those of Malta and Cyprus, she established in that sea refuges and bases of maritime operations which make her a Mediterranean Power, almost as much as France, Italy, Turkey, or Greece. By taking possession of the Island of Perim and the Aden Peninsula, she secured a preponderating situation in the south of the Red Sea. The important works done at Colombo give her not only a port of call perfectly safe at all periods of the year, but also the command of the most central point of all—the Indian Ocean. Through Singapore England is absolutely mistress of the Malacca Straits, the nearest way to Java, Borneo, the Northern Australia, on one side, and to Indo-China, China, the Philippines, Japan, and all the Pacific Ocean on the other. Of the Island of Hong Kong, she has created in less than forty years an admirable commercial and political centre, commanding the entrance to the southern rivers of China, and the sea communications of Canton, the most industrious town in the Chinese Empire.

"Only one point of this fine route to the Far East remained, up till this end of the century, outside British domination, and this point acquired, by the making of the Suez Canal, a political and commercial importance of the first class, since the Canal is the entrance to the shortest route to Great Britain's Indian Empire, and towards the 500,000.000 consumers—Hindus, Siamese, Chinese, Javanese, or Japanese—of the far Eastern Seas. By landing at Alexandria, and subsequently occupying Egypt, England became mistress of this capital point, and the mistress to such a degree that she can, in a few hours, close the route to the Far East against all Europe.

"It is impossible for any man who reflects not to admire the sagacity, the foresight, and the activity which Great Britain has shown in the pursuit of the object which she proposed to herself last century, and of which she completed the last step in 1882, when, taking advantage of the troubles in Alexandria, she landed her sailors and her soldiers on Egyptian soil. But all the admiration which one may have for England's political skill, cannot prevent Europe being aroused at the thought that a single nation has become, through the momentary indifference and tolerance of the others, mistress of the most important maritime route in the world. . . .

"I do not think that there can be in all Great Britain a single statesman worthy of the name who is not rendered anxious by the isolation of his country, and by the marks of undoubted hostility of which it is the object from all Europe. Certainly Europe will not go so far as a threat of armed intervention to cause the British troops to leave Egypt. France herself is too wise and too peaceful to make the evacuation a casus belli; but it is no less true, that the moral authority of England in the world is considerably weakened by her attitude on the banks of the Nile and the Suez Canal. Her enemies are glad of it, and her friends are distressed. Her statesmen must understand that such a situation cannot be indefinitely prolonged."

In reference to M. de Lauessan's statements, we have Lord Selborne's speech in Edinburgh, on Nov. 6 last, on the subject of our surrender of Egypt according to our promises. He would have us stay till we can go, and then "clear out" according to our pledges.

His Lordship said: "The other critics who had been free with their advice had dealt with the question of Egypt. We had had advice from Mr. Courtney to scuttle, and from Lord Charles Beresford to repudiate our engagements. He did not know which of those two advices was the worse. We had no possible excuse either for shirking the work that lay before us or for repudiating our ultimate engagements. (Hear, hear.) He shared entirely with his hearers a great regret, he was sure they all felt, that, at the time after the battle of Tel el Kebir in 188?, when we had a perfectly free hand and a clean sheet, we should have saddled ourselves with a perfectly gratuitous promise to leave Egypt at a certain indefinite date; but there was no good crying over spilt milk; we did make those promises to Europe, and to Europe we should have to keep them, but it was not only we who had to recognise facts, but Europe, and France especially, must recognise facts too. It would be equally impossible and absurd for France to pretend that all those fourteen years of work in Egypt had made no difference as for us to pretend that we had never made the engagements we had made. Who had spent millions on Egypt? The British Empire. (Hear, hear.) Whose blood was it that had been shed there freely? Why, the blood of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen. Who was it that had given that country new life, absolutely rescued her from a dead past, performed a work of national regeneration of which there was no other example in history? (Cheers.) Why, Irishmen, Scotchmen, and Englishmen; and, when the time came that our work was done and we were able to leave the country, was a Frenchman going to pretend that the French were to be in the same position for the future towards Egypt as the country whose sons had done the work, shedding their blood and spending their money? That was a perfectly preposterous position, and while we were bound to fulfil our obligations, according to his individual and private opinion, Europe and France were absolutely bound on that occasion to recognise that we had a superior interest, and that with that interest, which we had fairly earned and won, no other nation could possibly compete. (Cheers.) He had just mentioned—he had rather prophesied—what he hoped would shortly be one of the great diplomatic triumphs of Lord Salisbury and this Government. (Cheers.) But they had before them one of the neatest little bits of work that had ever been done by a body of our fellow-countrymen—he meant the occupation of the province of Dongola by an Egyptian army. Let them remember what the critics of the Government had said. Some of them said, 'You are rushing on an army of Dervishes who have all the fury of fanatics; your little army will undoubtedly perish, and a very large and costly expedition will have to be sent from home in order to undo the wreck.' Where were those prophets now? Was ever an expedition carried out with more ease or more wonderful success? There was another class of critic, who said, 'You will not tell us what you are going to do;' and they laughed at Mr. Chamberlain when he said, on behalf of the Government, that we meant to go just as far as we could prudently at the moment, and then we meant to stop. There never was a more sensible policy. Our object in reconquering a country was not to spend as much bloodshed as we could, but to do the thing at the least cost of blood and money which was compatible with success. (Cheers.) Therefore, there never was a more common-sense attitude, or a more common-sense performance, than to go to the province of Dongola, to occupy it, to make it a fresh base of operations, to let the disintegrating force among the Dervishes go on, and then, when the time was ripe and all was ready, to make a final advance upon Khartum. (Cheers.) The policy of the country towards Egypt would neither be that of scuttle nor of repudiation, but the very common and simple policy of the performance of our duty and of common good faith." (Cheers.)

The speech of Lord Charles Beresford on "The British Occupation of Egypt," delivered on Oct. 29th, at the Constitution Club, London, was alluded to above by Lord Selborne, but hardly deserved the adverse opinion expressed regarding it by the speaker. Our space forbids our quoting it now, but we hope to publish it in our columns next week.

OUR NATION'S FUTURE PROSPERITY.

WHILE there is so much suspicion abroad, that in spite of our Israelitish origin, we are likely to lose our power to get wealth before long, and that the German people are likely to take our place as the great commercial and wealthy race of the world, it will be some comfort, no doubt, to many to notice what the Times announced on October 5th last, in regard to the "remarkable advance" of our countrymen in "The British Steel Industry." The increase of output during the last half-year, has been something abnormal, and is said "to be unique in the history of British industry." What is wanted, however, to complete our success and entitle our people to congratulation, is, that they must, in the steel manufacture, give up the resort to trade strikes, which have hitherto only landed the working men in hopeless losses, and not without injury to the nation itself. The following was the Times report :—

THE BRITISH STEEL INDUSTRY—REMARKABLE ADVANCE.

During the last week the British Iron Trade Association has collected and published the statistics of the production of steel in the United Kingdom for the first half of the present year. The figures show an almost unprecedented increase of output, which is a specially interesting fact in view of the discussion that has been going on for the last year or more as to the alleged superiority of German methods and the success of Continental competition. It appears that the total production of steel for the first six months of the current year was as much as 1,969,320 tons, or at the rate of 3,938,640 tons a year, which is by far the largest output of steel hitherto arrived at in a single year by any European country. The figures have, however, in several years been exceeded by the steel output of the United States. The largest increase of output appears to have taken place in the open-hearth steel industry, which, although not much over 25 years old, and scarcely worked on a commercial scale 20 years ago, now yields over 2,100,000 tons of material per annum. This is an advance which is without parallel in the history of any other branch of British iron-making, and is perhaps unique in the history of British industry. The north of England, where only a few hundred tons of open-hearth steel were produced 15 years ago, is now producing that material at the rate of over 800,000 tons a year. Scotland is not making quite the same amount of progress, but even there the advance has been marvellous, seeing that 292,782 tons were produced in the first half of the current year, where only a few thousand tons were produced at the only works of the kind established in Scotland 20 years ago. The Sheffield district has not made such striking progress as Cleveland and Scotland, but still the advance has been material, and the same remark applies to Wales, Lanchasire, Staffordshire, and other districts.

As far as the Bessemer steel industry is concerned, it appears that there has been an augmentation of 103,662 tons during the first half of the current year on the output of the corresponding half of 1895. The principal advance appears in Lancashire, where the output was 45,535 tons in excess of the output for the corresponding half of 1895. But the most striking feature of this branch of the steel industry is that it has fallen behind the open-hearth manufacture, instead of having a large lead as it had up to a few years ago. Indeed, to go no further back than 1887, the output of Bessemer steel was then at least twice as much as the make of Siemens or open-hearth steel, whereas it has now fallen more than 300,000 tons a years behind it. This fact is not alone due to a growing preference for open-hearth steel. It is also a function of the diminished demand for steel for railway purposes, to which Bessemer metal has hitherto been chiefly applied, and the increased demand for steel for shipbuilding, and kindred purposes, to which open-hearth steel is more particularly suited. It is the great demand for new shipping, both in Great Britain and in other countries, that has chiefly stimulated the demand for this latter description, while the large increase in the output of Bessemer metal is mainly due to the increased requirements of railway companies at home and abroad.

There is every probability and expectation that the demand for steel will continue on a large scale. It is no secret that some descriptions of that metal, and notably blooms and billets, have lately been even scarce, and that there is at the present time difficulty in having orders filled for current delivery. Not only so, but there is a continuous substitution of steel for wrought iron for structural and other purposes, and it is probable, although by no means certain, that the great advance in the output of steel will be coincident with a decreased production of malleable iron, which has been on the wane for a number of years—so much so, indeed, that we do not now produce one-half the quantity that we turned out little more than ten years ago. The growth of the steel trade in all branches has been so rapid that the plant now in operation in this country is generally of the most modern kind, and if our manufacturers can only keep free from strikes and get fair terms from railway and shipping companies they may take heart of grace for the immediate future.

The above is a reassuring statement as to the continuance of the prosperity of British-Israel, and an instance of the unforeseen way whereby our God often proves the truth of His promises to His people, and shows that in the matter of their national wealth, He has not forsaken or forgotten them. Whatever may be the state of our commerce, and however close the German nation may seem to be in overtaking us in our commercial progress, it is needful for our own comfort that we should not forget the promises of the Word. God assures us there, that He will "never leave us, nor forsake us," and that "He it is who giveth us power to get wealth, that He may establish His covenant which He sware unto our (Israelite) fathers as it is this day" (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.). He has besides engaged that as the House of Joseph, He will bless us (being the Almighty) "with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that coucheth beneath, blessings of the breast and of the womb," also with "the chief things of the ancient mountains, the precious things of the everlasting hills, the precious things of the earth, and the fulness thereof" (Gen. xlix. 25, 26, R.V.; Deut. xxxiii. 15, 16, R.V.). Endowed with these good things direct from the hand of God, why should we be faithless and unbelieving? Why should we distrust and suspect Him? There are, no doubt, fluctuations in the vast volume of our world-wide commerce, such being sent to us to warn us of our rivals' efforts and of the dangers attending our trade disputes at home; salutary checks, in fact, on sloth and on senseless conflicts here, between capital and labour. But the final successful result is assured, because God the Promiser, hath sworn it, "that blessing, He will bless us," that He will multiply and enlarge us and give us the Gate of our enemies, which includes not only the command of the sea, but the safety of the commerce which floats upon it, on its road to our Home Ports, as well as that from our own lands, to the Gates of our enemies, established, fortified, and held by us beyond sea in the lands of our now foreign allies, of colonial children, and of our heathen subjects, in India and elsewhere.

It is remarkable how, in late years, God has opened to us vast expanses of thickly populated semi-civilized countries, which He has thrust upon us to bring to Christ, to civilize and furnish with all that a race feeling their way upwards require to possess. Thus in Uganda we have a British Protectorate established over vast regions where Christianity seems rapidly to be embracing many thousands of its people, who are ready to change their habits of life and to import British goods, implements, furniture, clothing, books, and even carriages and horses, for their personal use, and will do so to an immensely greater extent as soon as the railway to the coast at Mombasa, now under construction, has been finished. The Fiji Islands furnish us with another instance of the same fact. In India, there are located under British supervision and control, "about 286,000,000 of people, who are in excess of the population of the whole of Africa and South America combined; more than all Europe, exclusive of Russia, ten times the population of England, and one-fifth of the human race!" Think what a customer such a company of nations as that must furnish us with! and how vast must be the requirements of such a prodigious portion of the human race whom God has given to us to provide for and teach His ways! In these and many other directions, God has opened to us, mostly during Queen Victoria's happy and prosperous reign, markets in the four quarters of the earth, the best being those of our own kith and kin in the United States and among the nigh 300 millions of Hindus and Mohammedans of Hindustan. To Him be all the praise by Israel assigned!

"HOW SHALL WE ESCAPE IF WE NEGLECT SO GREAT SALVATION?"

By H. A. Marchant.

It is a highly important matter that we should "rightly divide the Word of truth," and compare scripture with scripture, in order that we may ascertain its true meaning. It is a very dangerous thing to conclude that a certain obscure passage of Scripture has a meaning which forces us to twist and turn other passages in order that they may agree with what we think it means. A rule which the writer of this article has adopted for a considerable time is to see if he cannot make a difficult passage agree with easier passages, rather than force the plainer and simpler text into teaching some view which might be adopted of a difficult passage. The writer is fully convinced in his own mind that many of our British-Israel advocates would be better able to combat opponents to our views if they would reconsider one single text which is continually quoted, both by British-Israelites and their opponents—namely, Zech. xii. 10.

In reading the Gospels, we find some remarkable expressions of our Lord and Master, such as, "If ye believe not that I am He, ye shall die in your sins;" "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." And yet a large number of believers in the truth of our Saviour's words have got an idea that the Jews (and those who oppose British-Israelism mean all the Twelve Tribes when they speak or write of Jews) will remain in unbelief until One who rose from the dead comes with the clouds of heaven to make them believe by seeing, because they would not believe Moses and the prophets! Our Lord said: "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate: ye shall not see Me henceforth until ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." This is generally explained backwards now-a-days, as though it read, "Ye shall see Me and then say, Blessed," &c. Is this the right way to treat our Lord's words? If we turn to the R.V. of Acts iii., we find St. Peter exhorting the Jews to "repent and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and that He may send the Christ who hath been appointed for you, even Jesus." If we examine modern expositions of prophecy, we shall find that Peter's words are reversed in the nineteenth century, and, instead of the second coming of Christ depending on the repentance and turning again and the blotting out of their sins, people are taught that the Jews will not believe in Christ until He is seen with their natural eyes. Who was it that stirred up opposition to the apostles at Thessalonica? The Jews who believed not. According to St. Paul's second epistle, when speaking of Jesus Christ coming to be "glorified in His saints, and admired in all them that believe," he predicted "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord," as the fate of those who "troubled the believers and obeyed not the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. i. 6—11). Would this order of events be altered by the lapse of time? For my own part, I fail to see that it would be so.

To turn again to Acts iii., we find the apostle Peter claimed that "Moses indeed said, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you from among your brethren like unto me; to Him shall ye hearken in all things whatsoever He shall speak unto you; and it shall be that every soul that will not hearken to that prophet shall be utterly destroyed from among the people." How, then, comes it that nineteen centuries after such prophecies were reiterated, men have concluded that the final generation of those that say, "We will be as our fathers, and will not hear that prophet, and will not obey the Gospel of the One whom you call Christ, and will persist in continuing to neglect the great salvation," shall escape en bloc after the Lord has been "revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ"—and all because they are circumcised descendants of Abraham? How shall we escape? The answer might be, "By the fact of our being circumcised," if the modern views are correct.

But some will say, "You are overlooking Zech. xii. 10: 'They shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and shall mourn for Him.'" Let us pay careful attention to what Zechariah says, taking notice of the fact that he is speaking about a people who are called "the inhabitants of Jerusalem," as a people distinct from Judah. This is perfectly clear if we read the chapter carefully; for, without trying to expound the whole chapter, it says in ver. 7: "The Lord also shall save the tents of Judah first (beforehand), that the glory of the House of David and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem be not magnified above Judah."

Let us attend to a little A B C. A (God) promised to save B (Judah) first, because He will not allow C (the House of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem) to be magnified above B (Judah). Throughout this chapter, I maintain, B never becomes C, and C never becomes B; and therefore, when it says that God will "pour upon the House of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplication, and they shall look unto (R.V.) Me whom they have pierced," those who receive the spirit of grace and of supplications are C, and not Judah, whom we have called B. This may be a Scripture puzzle, but it is worth learning, as it will save us from blundering as our opponents do. The late John Wilson wrote a splendid article on this very subject in the Watchman of Ephraim, vol. i., p. 391, entitled "The Burden of the Word of the Lord for Israel;" and I gathered my first thoughts on this subject from that article, and considered it for several years, and at last came to the conclusion that, if Moses truly said the impenitent ones who refused to hearken to the Christ should be utterly destroyed from among the people, Zech. xii. 10 must harmonize with Moses' and Christ's declarations in the Gospels, that, to the unbelieving and impenitent, one should not be sent from the dead; but they were to "hear Moses and the prophets," or "perish in their unbelief." In that remarkable prophecy of Zechariah, expositors, as a rule, can only see Christ (A) and Jews (B). They have entirely ignored the House of Joseph; and, inasmuch as Zechariah is prophesying of a day in which the enemies of God's people who are against them in that land will be devoured by God's people as though that people are a torch of fire among sheaves; yet He will not give them the power to do this until believing B (Judah) and believing C (Israel) are united and restored to God's favour.

There is no House of David reigning over the people called Judah; but there is, we believe, the throne of David with the House of Joseph; and Obadiah tells us very plainly who these burning, fiery people are, for in ver. 18 he says: "And the House of Jacob shall be a fire, and the House of Joseph a flame, and the House of Esau for stubble, and they shall burn among them and devour them: and there shall not be any remaining to the House of Esau: for the Lord hath spoken it." Therefore it is very clear to the careful student that those whom Zechariah distinguishes from Judah under the title of "House of David and inhabitants of Jerusalem" are none other than the so-called "lost Ten Tribes of Israel," or Ten-tribed House of Joseph, with David's family still reigning over them. So that, instead of there being only two parties present in Zech. xii., there are three; and, to make myself clear, we will recapitulate. (A) God or Christ; (B) Judah; (C) the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. So, when A says, "They shall look unto Me and mourn for Him," may it not be C that will do the looking, and B—i.e., Judah—that will be mourned for, instead of, as it is generally understood, Christ? Some learned Bible scholars have actually jumped to the conclusion that this remarkable text is corrupted, because the speaker seems to refer to himself as "me" and "him." Once recognise the three parties present, and this difficulty vanishes. John Wilson clearly showed this, as will be found in the Watchman of Ephraim, and also in his work, "The Title Deeds of the Holy Land." This will thoroughly harmonize with what our Lord said, with what Moses said, and also with all the Epistles—that, when the great crisis comes, those who remain finally impenitent and rebellious will be purged out from among the people, and they will not be made the inheritors of the Millennial blessings because of their circumcision; and that Israel and Judah will both, in the main, submit to Christ before He is revealed from heaven, is my firm conviction, from the study of Heb. x. 12, 13: "But this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting (waiting, tarrying, looking for—see Gall & Inglis' Greek concordance) till His enemies be made His footstool." It is Christ who is waiting or tarrying till His enemies are made His footstool. If that means until they become thoroughly wicked, they have been that from His ascension until now. But if it means that they, with all their heart and soul, bow themselves before Him, and offer themselves as His willing subjects, united Israel and Judah have not yet done so from the heart; so there is a reason why the Lord is still sitting at the right hand of God, and He will never come from heaven to prove that His word has returned to Him void, and not accomplished that whereunto He sent it. "He is exalted a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and remission of sins." Most of those theories which oppose God's simple truth are built up by men who cannot discern what applies to Israel and Judah, and what applies to the world at large. Hence they teach something like this: that when the King returns, instead of saying, "These Mine enemies, that would not that I should reign over them, bring them hither and slay them before My eyes," He will make them the progenitors of the Millennial generations. But I have heard the preachers say, "Yea, there will be no escape if we neglect so great salvation;" consequently, it is revealed both in the Old and New Testaments that Israel must return unto the Lord, and Judah cease her enmity, before Jerusalem shall again see that risen and exalted Saviour.

Although these topics are such that they do not enter into my public open-air advocacy of British-Israelism, on account of their abstruse nature, I should like to see what some of our leading writers have to say upon what I may call the A B C of Zechariah's prophecy. We are amazed at others not seeing the difference between Israel and Judah; we should be the first to see and acknowledge it in Zech. xii. And will it not strengthen the hands of the missionaries to Judah to know that Israel will mourn and supplicate for Judah, and that God will save them for His Son's sake—that day must be very near at hand? But let us tremble ere we teach them that they shall escape at the end, even though the word spoken is steadfast, and the question asked, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" Evangelicals sometimes sing the truth, even when they do not preach it; see Sankey's Hymns, No. 363:—

"Let all who look for, hasten that coming joyful day,
By earnest consecration to walk the narrow way;
By gathering in the lost ones, for whom our Lord did die,
For the crowning day is coming by and by."

Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

THE LECTURE AT SION COLLEGE, LONDON.

On November 11th, Dr. Aldersmith read his paper before the Court of Governors and members, at Sion College, Victoria Embankment, London, and was warmly welcomed by the President, the Rev. W. Martin.

There was a large attendance of members and some ladies; and some well-known faces were present, including the Rev. F. Aston, the Hon. Col. Edward Legge, Douglas A. Onslow, H. H. Pain, and the new member of the Council of the British-Israel Association, Captain Lowe.

Dr. Aldersmith dwelt on "THE GREAT DISTINCTION BETWEEN THE HOUSE OF JUDAH (THE JEWS) AND THE HOUSE OF ISRAEL, IN THESE LATTER DAYS," and showed how the House of Joseph, or Israel, must now be in the enjoyment of certain temporal blessings, and under the new covenant. He told his hearers that the atheist pointed to the fact, as he thought, that God's covenant had been broken, as he only saw the Jews as the representatives of God's promises to Israel. The lecturer said it was God's honour and faithfulness to His once and for ever chosen race that was the subject before them, and asked them why the promises given to Israel should be thought to be spiritual only, while those concerning Judah and the cities were literal, as well as the prophecies concerning our Lord's first advent. Dr. Aldersmith then described the Abrahamic covenant, that it was an everlasting covenant, and had not been put on one side, but actually confirmed by the death of Christ. He showed how the covenant was entailed on to Isaac and Jacob and the House of Joseph, &c. Reference was made to the early history of the Twelve Tribes, the disruption under Jeroboam, the Assyrian captivity of Israel, and the Babylonian captivity of Judah. Then the meaning of the term "Jew" was explained, and much concerning the mixing up of the terms "Jew" and "Israel" quoted from the Handbook, showing the word Jew was not found in the Bible till after the Babylonian captivity. He reminded his hearers that it was never applied to the Northern kingdom, or to the Twelve Tribes, and that though all Jews were Israelites, it by no means followed that all Israelites were Jews.

He then fully proved that the children of Israel did not return with the Jews, devoting much time to this, as he knew this was the one point he would meet with most opposition about. Zechariah was quoted, also Josephus, Esdras, 1 Kings, and Chronicles, showing the Ten Tribes were in the land of their captivity after the return of the Jews. Then many of the well-known passages from the "Speakers' Commentary" were given, showing that the writers fully recognise the distinction between the two Houses, and that the re-union and the return has not yet taken place. Ezekiel xxxvii. was explained, with the vision of the two sticks; and, the lecturer said, "To dispute this is to deny the Scriptures, and to make the Word of God of none effect." It was then shown by numerous quotations that the modern Jews do not believe they also represent the House of Israel, and the two distinct prayers used by them for the two Houses were read, and a reference made to our friend, the Rev. M. Bergmann.

Proofs were then given that the birthright blessings could not have been fulfilled before Christ came, that "He might confirm the promises given unto the fathers," and hence they must be fulfilled either during this Christian dispensation, or after the re-union and the return.

Luke i. 68 was quoted, showing that the Abrahamic covenant must be fulfilled in this dispensation, and that it was in the nature of a will, and required the death of the testator (Christ) before the promises could come into operation. He showed how false was the theory that this is a pure Gentile parenthesis, and that it was absurd to think God's promises, covenant, and people were put on one side till the millennium.

The doctor then fully described the death-bed scene of Jacob, and showed how his lineal seed were to become the fulness of the Gentiles, and that the birthright was Joseph's. The usual proofs were given that the birthright blessings could not have been fulfilled before the Assyrian captivity, or while the House of Israel were "Lo-ammi." The meaning of the word Goyim, or Gentiles, was then considered, and it was shown that the missing House of Joseph must be a company of so-called Gentiles in these latter days. Luke i. 68 was read, and the confirmation of the Abrahamic covenant explained. The lecturer then denounced the false view that God's promises and covenant were in abeyance till the Second Advent, and showed the difference between the Abrahamic and the Mosaic covenants, quoting Galatians iii. Having shown the blessings must be fulfilled either during this dispensation, or during the millennium, Dr. Aldersmith gave his usual proofs that the birthright blessings are pre-millennial, which are to be found in the second chapter of our Handbook, bringing in "the latter days," Micah's description as a lion amongst sheep, Jeremiah's prediction, "the chief of the nations," that the company of nations must come to pass before the one nation is formed in Palestine by the union of the two Houses, and the "fulness of the Gentiles" in Rom. xi. Special attention was called to the fact that Zechariah, Isaiah, and Hosea say the House of Joseph is to be redeemed before the return. Then the divorce of Israel, and the re-marriage in Isaiah liv. was discussed, and St. Peter's testimony, writing to the sojourners of the Israelite dispersion, that they who had been Lo-ammi, were then again the people of God.

The doctor then showed some of the chief marks of the missing House, and said it was as easy to discover in these days as the Jews, and finished in these words:—

"When the sick man falls the Eastern Question must come up for settlement, and with the remarkable events now going on we ought to be able to see that the Ottoman Power is falling fast. When this desolating Power ceases to tread down Jerusalem, surely the times of the Gentiles, referred to by our Lord, will be fulfilling, and then the rightful owners will again get possession of Palestine. You know what a trumpet blast the return of the Jews will be, announcing that the close of this dispensation is drawing near: but, remember, the Jews have to walk to the House of Israel, hence that House has to restore the Jews." Reference was made to Gog, and Dr. Aldersmith said, "I maintain that the Jews cannot be the chief power that Gog comes up against to try and overwhelm, but it must be a much more powerful 'company of nations,' even the lost House of Israel," and he finished, "I beg of you not to allow a large portion of the Bible to remain a sealed book to you, as it must be, if you think the chief actors in the last drama in Palestine are only the Jews, and forget the larger division of God's chosen race, the lost House of Israel. God's plans change not, therefore ye, O sons of Jacob, are not consumed. Finally, do understand that I have been speaking chiefly of the temporal blessings, and that I do not forget that all Gentile converts, through union with Christ, may be called the spiritual children of Abraham. Nevertheless, in these latter days, there must also be a company or fulness of nations, springing lineally out of Ephraim-Israel, the individual members of which, though only saved by the same spiritual union with Christ, yet, in these days, are a standing testimony to the fulfilment of the Abrahamic covenant, and are working out the destined purposes of God to His once, and for ever, chosen race for the ultimate regeneration of mankind."

The paper lasted fifty minutes, and at its close there was a long discussion, and our friend had to stand a severe criticism, mostly the old foolish arguments. The first speaker said that there were no two Houses now, that the re-union of the two sticks was past, and that both Houses returned with Ezra. It was amusing to find that another speaker, also an opponent, said the first speaker was no student of prophecy, as of course the re-union had not taken place, but he could not see that Britain was the House of Israel. Another followed, saying, of course, it was all "Anglo-Israelism," and that no nation on earth but Great Britain was developing and pushing the peoples, and so it was very evident what the opener was driving at, a remarkable piece of evidence, for not one word was said by the doctor that Great Britain was the lost House of Israel; but the facts were so plain, if what he stated was true, that the picture flashed on the meeting as by instinct.

Again and again, assaults were made that there were not two Houses and that all the prophecies were not to be literally fulfilled, &c. Dr. Aldersmith was supported in his argument by the Rev. F. Aston, Mr. Douglas A. Onslow, and Captain Lowe, and had not a very difficult task before him when he got up to reply, and showed by quotations from the Jewish Chronicle, and Dr. Neubauer, that the Jew who had spoken was wrong in thinking the Jewish people believed that there is not a lost House of Israel somewhere. He also gave other passages, showing that what he was contending for was correct, and that Joseph's House must not only be distinct, but a great nation, "a strong nation," as Micah tells us, and the very "fulness of the Gentiles."

The President of Sion College has given permission for the lecture to be published. It will be by Messrs. Nisbet and Co., by the beginning of December, and will, we trust, be a very useful pamphlet for distribution, especially amongst the clergy, as it was read before a number of London clergy at Sion College.

SALISBURY v. BISMARCK.

By P. Carlyon, M.A.

The conclusion that Great Britain inherits "the birthright" of Ephraim, is built on the fulfilment and literal interpretation of about fifty distinct and independent prophecies in the Bible, and on the assurance that the Bible is the Word of God. Several other prophetic notices occur of Israel's destiny which are not yet revealed by actual fulfilment, of which some are already giving out their tokens as "signs" for which our Lord forewarned His disciples to look! These are all historic warnings evolved out of the past and running into the future. It is therefore the Christian's absolute duty to "watch!" The firmness of the conclusion already established, rests on our fifty witnesses being unanimous, and every testimony on the other side being refuted. If coming events harmonize with the fifty past fulfilments, who can resist our argument? This short article takes only an illustration from one great event now discussed in every print and uttered in every tongue—the Conference of the six chief European Powers for the solution of the Eastern Question. We read the solution in the 38th and 39th chapters of Ezekiel. If the concurrent testimony of commentators that the R.V. rendering of "chief prince" should be "prince of Rosh," and, in any case, that Gog means Russia, be a truth, it is Russia's destiny to have her power broken on the mountains of Israel. If so, Russia's permanent and necessary antagonist is Israel. Thereupon we fall back upon the conclusion founded on fifty fulfilments that Israel and Great Britain are one—one people, one race, one nation, one Empire; and we cannot alienate, nor transfer to any other, the gifts and appointments of God which are "without repentance." From our conclusion Great Britain and Russia are necessary antagonists until the arbitration of the sword, or, rather, of the Lord's "battle-axe" (Jer. li. 20) shall decide the supremacy, and swords shall be beaten into ploughshares; after which war shall be no more, and the British "lion" shall lie down with the "bear" as well as with the kid. This article is headed "Salisbury v. Bismarck," which two quotations from Lord Salisbury's pacific speech at the Lord Mayor's Banquet, Nov. 9, 1896, will explain. Lord Salisbury said: 1. "Extraordinary statements have recently appeared in Germany on the voucher apparently of the greatest statesman that the latter part of this century has produced. I demur absolutely to the assumption on which he appears to go—that there is a permanent and necessary antagonism between Russia and Great Britain. I know of no cause that could give rise to it. I know of no such antagonism. It is, I think, the superstition of an antiquated diplomacy. And 2. It is through the channel of the Sultanate, and through that alone, that we can hope to convey to the Christians and Mussulmans of the Turkish Empire some slight portion of that good government which has been the privilege of the West so long."

Now, both these great statesmen, unhappily, ignore the light of prophecy; and we must assign the palm of political foresight to the German rather than the Briton; and with regard to the second opinion, we must hold him to be less far-seeing than the greatest of English statesmen who has advocated his famous "bag and baggage" expulsion of the Turk! But for this blindness to both Russia's and Turkey's (alias Edom's) destiny, nothing could be more admirable than Lord Salisbury's speech and policy. We wish we could move him, as well as all of our nation, to read Russia's doom in Ezekiel, and Turkey's in Obadiah. They would then at once perceive how marvellously public opinion is veering round to the Biblical interpretation of the great crisis of the age. Ordinary observers can see that, from China and Japan, all through Central Asia to Jerusalem, and Constantinople and Egypt, Russia and Great Britain are rivals. Russia's traditional policy, from Peter I. and Catherine II., is not to rest short of acquiring Constantinople and Jerusalem. Great Britain can never relinquish Egypt or Syria. Why? Because it is promised land, given in perpetuity by God to His own people Israel. They are, therefore, and must of necessity remain, antagonists until Israel is restored as "one nation" to her own land which God gave to their fathers, and Ezekiel xxxvii. be fulfilled. These things we tell the world before they come to pass, that when they do come to pass, the world may believe. We say to all, Watch! Watch coming events already seen above the horizon, and if our readers fail to find sufficient proof hitherto to carry conviction, we will venture to predict that the solution and outcome of the Eastern Question now in progress will become a turning witness as well as a comfort and a blessing, like "light shining in a dark place."

This mere sketch should suffice to settle the question whether antagonism between Great Britain and Russia is necessary or not; but if any one desires to enter more widely and more deeply into the subject he cannot do better than study "Oxonian's excellent book, "Russia Japhet."

THE TURKISH PROBLEM.

A lecture on the Turkish Problem considered in the light of British-Israel Truth was given last evening in Victoria Hall, Norwich, by Mr. H. H. Pain, member of the Council of the British-Israel Association, in which he sought to demonstrate the Identity of Great Britain with the "tens of thousands of Ephraim," of America with "the thousands of Manasseh," and of the Ottoman Turks with the Edomites of Scripture. Mr. R. Adcock presided, the proceedings being opened with the singing of a verse of the National Anthem, followed by prayer.

The lecturer said he intended first to prove the connection between the English and the House of Israel (not with the Jews or the House of Judah) and the connection between the Turks and the Edomites. The Jews were carried away to Babylon, and the Ten Tribes were afterwards taken captive into Assyria. From Assyria the Ten Tribes of the House of Israel went a long journey to Arsereth on the Danube, and from thence into these islands, under the name of Saxons, Danes, and Normans. Jeremiah, turning to the north, bid backsliding Israel return, as contrasted with her treacherous sister Judah. From many passages in the Bible the lecturer showed the likeness between the Israel of prophecy and the British people, that "another name" by which, according to the Scriptures, the House of Israel were to be called. Even in the word "British" he found two root words signifying "covenanted man." British-Israel is under the New Covenant, while the Jews are under the Old Covenant, for when the Ten Tribes were cut off from the Twelve they became Gentiles under the New Covenant. In Joseph, the head of the House of Israel, was the blessing which descended on Manasseh and Ephraim, through whose seed had come Americans and Englishmen. The seed of Ephraim, it was prophesied, should hold the Gates of the enemy, and England held strategical points all over the world. In the prophecy that Ephraim should lend money and never borrow, we saw foretold the great money-lending power of England. Since the time of Christ the Jews had no king of their own, but as the throne of David must, according to the Scriptures, exist, he contended that her Majesty could trace her ancestry through the Scotch and Irish kings to David. The stone which caused Nebuchadnezzar's image to collapse and became a kingdom was to be found in Jacob's stone in Westminster Abbey, that is of our great and widespreading kingdom. Being of the House of Israel the Church of England was the true Church, and not that of Rome, which had denied the validity of English orders. Next the lecturer proceeded to identify Turkey with Esau or Edom, who was prophesied to be in possession of the Holy Land and the Holy places. As the Turks were in possession of the Holy Land and the Holy places they were Edom. Balaam's prophecy as to what Israel should do to Edom and Moab in the latter days foretold their continuance in the Christian dispensation. Quoting from other prophets he contended for the application to Turkey of various passages in them referring to Edom, and pointed out correspondences between what was predicted and the present political situation. In the prophecy, "I will inflict vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel," he argued that this meant the punishment of Turkey by England and America. If England was Israel then it had given to it the sword of the Almighty, notwithstanding what Mr. Gladstone had said on that subject. In Isaiah Edom was coupled with those under a curse to be destroyed. Incidentally the lecturer referred to the fact that the Royal Arms of England bore as symbols the Lion of Judah, the Unicorn to represent the House of Israel, and the Harp of David. It was prophesied, therefore, that the "Unicorn shall go down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls," which he explained meant the Colonies of England with England. [The Chairman—"John Bull."] One of the signs of the time of the end prophesied by the Saviour was that "where the carcase is there shall the eagles be gathered together." That carcase, he said, was Turkey, and the eagles were to be seen in the heraldic emblems of the foreign Powers now in a state of preparedness for the scramble for the "Sick man's" inheritance. He believed that on the division of Turkey among the Powers Constantinople would be destroyed by an earthquake. From the map he showed how British power, or the power of the House of Israel was closing in upon and around the Promised Lands of the Bible and how, according to the prophecy, the power of the Turk or Edom was receding. The Armenians, he went on to say, were a remnant of the House of Israel, left behind when the main body went westward to the British Isles. When the nations of Europe shall slaughter the Turks the English (as the House of Israel) would have to step in to occupy Palestine. That the "time of the end" had come he showed by the ingenious interpretation of many passages of prophecy, finding remarkable correspondences between the pictorial language there used and the great changes going on in Palestine. The lecture, which was very full of quotations and geographical references, was listened to with evident interest by a large audience, who frequently expressed approval by applause.—From the Eastern Daily Press, Nov. 11th, 1896.

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"That God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (1. Peter iv. 11).

THE OPERATION OF THE FUND:— To proclaim by special means the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 150 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

SOWING THE SEED.

On approaching the last month of the year we remember the special expenses we desire to provide for at this season, for our Sowers are glad to have the Anglo-Israel Almanack for themselves, and for others, as it always contains special articles of value. And soon follows the desire for a large supply of the New Year's No. of the BANNER, which we are glad to send far and wide, by which, in the fulness and variety of its treatment of the British-Israel Question, we hope for our Sowers to be instructed, and with which we try to attract the attention and interest of many people, ignorant, as yet, of their origin and destiny, and the great responsibilities in consequence resting upon them. So our friends, appreciating these publications themselves, will know how we shall welcome particular donations for their distribution. We are thankful the money gifts, received this month, have kept our Fund in continual motion for its regular output, and we are glad to acknowledge a gift of fifty copies of "The Bible a Sealed Book, Why?" from the Rev. T. R. Howlett (U.S.A.). It is a little pamphlet, putting fresh views before the British-Israel public highly to be commended. And Mr. H. H. Pain has kindly sent us one hundred copies of his book, reprinted from the "Covenant People," entitled "Englishmen Israelites," &c., which doubtless will be very acceptable to our Sowers, and we hope will also prove a benefit to many others.

For all the money help, and the literature referred to, we desire to offer best thanks to our many friends. Every effort made to convince our brethren of Judah that the Redeemer of Israel has indeed appeared in the flesh, and was sacrificed for the sins of the whole World must commend itself to all conscious Israelites, and for those who are trying to evangelise the Jews it seems that some special reasoning concerning Our Identity with Israel is likely to be a valuable aid. On this account the above-mentioned little argument, "The Bible a Sealed Book, Why?" is good to offer to Jews, as well as to those of us who call themselves Gentiles, and ere long we may have for similar use a reprint, for it is promised, of the article entitled, "God's Covenant with Abraham—How Verified in His seed," lately contributed to the BANNER by the Rev. Marcus Bergmann. Here may fitly be quoted a letter from one of our SOWERS, a Missionary to the Jews. Warm thanks, as usual, come first, "for your continued supply of British-Israel literature. You will be pleased to know that two men employed in the West India Docks to whom I was made useful in the Gospel, when engaged there as a Missionary, are eagerly reading up the subject of British-Israel Truth. They appear to be deeply interested. I have also been able to give copies of the Handbook to other friends engaged in Christian work, and I hope they too will become interested in this most important question. If Mr. Bergmann's paper is reprinted from the BANNER, Oct. 28th, I would be glad to have some copies, as I regard it as a very important contribution to British-Israel literature; I am quite sure all who had the pleasure of hearing it read, and the discussion that followed, would be pleased to have it in print." God grant that the time may be hastened now for the Gospel of His kingdom, and of free salvation to repentant sinners to be fully preached! Meanwhile, how must our Father in Heaven, and His Son our Redeemer, sorrow for the indifference manifested by so many of "the chosen people!" Indifference to all that is revealed in the Word of God. And so people care not who they are, and too often seem to care not what will become of the country that has given them birth, and patriotism counts for little with such in our present times of peace.

Yet there is a desire to "go forward." Education, even "higher education," for the lowest is the cry. Too often secular education only is the great desire; but with that what will result? If it does not lead up to real love of country, and if the knowledge and love of God be left out of that course of apparent enlightenment which is afforded for the minds of the youth of this generation, what sort of preparation will Israel be making for her to rightly ride upon the high places of the earth, to witness truly for the King of kings, and watch for the coming of her Saviour? How should British-Israelites strive to win all around them, and those far away, to consider the truths about Israel that have been committed to them! The humblest reader of the BANNER OF ISRAEL and other kindred publications learns much that is left out in the teachings of the schools. Here is proof, to point to what has been referred to, in a letter from a Sower, one of those in humble life, but who receives, and reads in joy and thankfulness the good things our Fund supplies; thankfulness being well proved by the gifts sent in return to support the Fund. The letter runs, "I do thank you very much for sending the papers. I do value them next to my Bible, and they seem doubly interesting when one cannot help seeing the Scriptures fulfilled, or rather fulfilling in the troublous events that are happening around us. I do thank God for the light thrown on the prophetic Scriptures by the teaching of the BANNER OF ISRAEL, the "Covenant People," and the many other publications that are written in these days." The above expresses much that comes to us from many quarters, clearly showing the light that is being kindled in lowly places and the love of the Word of God that is being intensified by, we doubt not, the operation of the Holy Spirit in those hearts and minds that open willingly to receive the blessed influence and teaching from the Scriptures. ISRAEL'S SCRIPTURE AND PRAYER UNION.

THE membership numbers 1,594.

The names of any Identity believers who are willing to join us in searching the Bible, and in prayer to God, will be gladly received.

The Secretary hopes that old members will try and induce fellow-believers to join with the New Year, and that they also will renew their membership.

If any believers are willing to become local secretaries and they will send their name and address I should be pleased to send Cards for 1897.

Subject for special prayer on last Sunday in December: "Praise and thanksgiving to our Covenant-keeping God for all His mercies and blessings during the past year, both nationally and individually."

The Card of Membership for 1897 has a list of chapters for the whole year, and contains suggestions for study, prayers, etc. It will be sent on receipt of six stamps.

NORTH OF ENGLAND COUNCIL.

THE North of England Council held a Conference in the Common Hall, Liverpool, on September 12th, when, in addition to those from a distance, a goodly number of local believers met together to discuss Identity matters, the very unfavourable weather notwithstanding. Mr. J. Barnes, of Halifax, occupied the chair, and the others present were: Mr. J. Catterall, Miss H. Robson, Mrs. Kent, Miss Bacon, Mrs. Cadman, Mr. S. Broadley, Miss W. Broadley, Mr. H. Down, Mr. F. H. Lane, Mr. J. Heys, Mr. H. Belwood and Mr. E. Lyon, of Liverpool; Mr. T. S. Hill, of Birkenhead; Mr. T. Hopkins, Mrs. Dunn, Mr. J. F. Sanderson, Mr. T. Leigh, Miss M. Grundy, and Mr. J. Scott, of Manchester; Mrs. Hastings, of Everton; Mr. J. Paylor, of Leeds; Mr. W. Hill, of Todmorden, Mr. J. Dudley, of St. Helens; Mr. J. A. Millward, and Mr. S. Dean, of Bradford; Mr. D. Parker, of Sowerby Bridge; Mr. R. Wilson, and Mr. H. G. Robinson, of Hull; Mr. D. Stuart, and Mrs. Greenwood, of Seacombe; Mr. P. E. Wardell, of Crewe; Mr. J. Fielding, Mr. J. Hayden, and Mr. G. Clifford, of Halifax.

The Council are preparing an Identity Sheet Almanack, which they believe will be useful and acceptable, and of which due notice of publication will be given.

It was decided to hold the next Conference at Birstal, near Leeds, on Saturday, January 30th, 1897.

The following were elected new members of the Council:—Mr. J. Dudley, of St. Helens; Mrs. Kent, Mrs. McCraith, Mrs. Poole, Mrs. Gwynne, Mr. J. Catterall, Mr. P. Laycock, Mr. Smith, Mr. Growcott, Miss Bacon, Mr. S. Burkinshaw, Miss H. Robson, Mr. H. Belwood, Mr. E. Lyon, Mr. Colin, Mr. J. Heys, and Mrs. Irvine, of Liverpool; Mr. Theodore S. Hill, of Birkenhead; Mr. T. Leigh, Mr. J. Sanderson, and Mr. G. Bainbridge, of Manchester; and Mr. J. Fielding, and Mr. G. Clifford, of Halifax.

THE SOUTH YARRA BRANCH, BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION.

Report of proceedings during the past fifteen months.

THE work has been of an aggressive and progressive character, inasmuch that our workers have had opportunities of putting our principles before such public bodies that they could not get in touch with before. The Association has received new members, and finds that a large number spread throughout the Colony of Victoria, are fully convinced of the truth which we advocate. Since our last report, dated in June 1895, we have held our own. We have during that time met all liabilities, and have a balance of £11 0s. 5d. under the head of "free assets." At the time when the balance sheet was presented and officers elected, the Association was startled by the President resigning his position. Those present regretted this circumstance, and warmly urged him to withdraw his resignation, but without effect. Mr. Stephens stated that his objection was to become a permanent president, and therefore believed a change of regime would be an advantage in the future. In passing a vote of thanks to Mr. Stephens, it was stated that he had done good work, and had promised to give help to the good cause in the future to the best of his ability. The officers elected were as under:—President, Surgeon Captain Crossby, Medical Officer, H.M.S.I.; Secretary, Mr. R Robertson; Treasurer, Mrs. Stock; Librarian, Mr. J. Stock; Committee, Messrs. Ayers, Hawkins, Stephens, Stock, Thompson, Mrs. Oatley and Mrs. Fleming. President, Secretary and Treasurer, ex-officio members during the above period. The following lectures have been delivered:—

Surgeon Crossby, two lectures at Temperance Hall, Napier-street, South Melbourne, and one at School-room attached to the Scotch Church, Abbotsford. The minister occupied the chair and stated he was convinced of the truths connected with the subject, and urged the study of the Word of God in reference thereto.

Surgeon Crossby, two lectures at the Protestant Hall, Cecil-place, Prahran; Chairmen, Ex-Mayor Councillor Davis and Mr. Stephens.

Mr. Stephens—Lectures, Congregational Church, Prahran, and two before the Literary Society in connection with his church (the Presbyterian) at Prahran; Lectures at the Protestant Hall, Prahran, Chairman, F. C. Gray, M.L.A.; at Church of England School-room, South Melbourne; and one at Temperance Hall, South Melbourne. Mr. Easy—Lectures, Church of England School-room, South Melbourne; and at Protestant Alliance Hall, Prahran. Mr. Stephens, Lecture, Hope Baptist Church, Prahran. Mr. Carter, of Trentham, as a local preacher has done much good work.

We have observed with much regret that in the Age newspaper was reported the death of Mr. John Leechman, the distinguished author of "Jehovah Triumphant." Certainly he performed a great work. His book will be studied for long.

PROGRESS IN LIVERPOOL.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—A Men's Bible Class on Identity lines, presided over by the Vicar, the Rev. F. J. Parkinson, B.A., is held every Sunday afternoon, at 3, in the Committee-room of St. Athanasian Church, Fountain-road, off Stanley-road (enter by Fonthill-road).

We have gone through the historical evidence, and are just going to begin the prophetical evidence, commencing with the Book of Jonah; a grand opportunity for spreading the truth and the literature of our Identity. We want earnest support from all believers to strengthen the hands of the Vicar, who is thoroughly in earnest. Through him, in time, the grand truth will permeate the whole of the well-filled Church.

Yours in the hope of Israel,
C. R. COLQUHOUN,
Hon. Sec. and Treasurer,
North Liverpool British-Israel Identity Association.

48, St. Johns-road, Bootle, Nov. 2nd, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR SIR,—Mr. H. H. Pain's lecture in the Victoria Hall in this city last evening was a conspicuous success; his audience numbered 700 to 800, and were widely representative. My friends would have me preside, and I must say it was a most enthusiastic and sympathetic company.

Mr. Pain's manner and matter are alike excellent; he is master of his subject, and speaks on it from the heart. In a post or two a copy of a local newspaper report should reach you. It is the most widely read paper we have, and I think you will admit it is a fairly good report.

And now, having held aloof from your honourable association for so long, more from want of thought than anything else, I think I ought to join your membership, if you will have me. I have written Mr. Aston, asking particulars and conditions; and it shall not be my fault if my fellow-citizens do not in the future hear more of British-Israel truth than heretofore. With best wishes, &c.

Yours, &c., ROBT. ADCOCK.

TRAFALGAR DAY AND BRITISH POSSESSION OF THE SEA POWER.

MEN are beginning generally to recognize the fact that our nation's existence depends, under God, entirely upon our possession of the supremacy of the sea. If we retain that we shall nationally live. If we lose it, which God forbid, we shall nationally be ruined. It is this truth which makes our position at this time so critical; but with the promises of God to Israel to support us, it is in fact one vastly comforting to us nationally and very exhilarating. The Times of Oct. 21 (Trafalgar day), published an article on the subject (apart of course from all reference to the Identity), which puts the subject before us ably and powerfully. The text is a saying of Napoleon I., respecting the condition of the French people after Trafalgar. The Times applied the sentiment to our own nation, and solemnly warned it to maintain its ascendancy at sea for our nation's very life. The words were these:—

"To live without commerce, without shipping, without colonies, subjected to the unjust will of our enemies, is to live as Frenchmen should not." As applied to France, the history of that country after Trafalgar demonstrates the exaggeration of these words of Napoleon. It was not lack of commerce, shipping, and colonies, nor even the will of enemies not more unjust than nations fighting for life are apt to be towards their foes, that wrought the temporary downfall of France, but the insatiable ambition of Napoleon himself and his disastrous attempts to do by military aggression and commercial repression what maritime supremacy alone can accomplish. But as applied to England, and still more to the British Empire in these days, the words are fraught with an awful significance. To live without commerce, without shipping, without colonies, to say nothing of subjection to the unjust will of our enemies, is not merely to live as Englishmen should not, but to live as Englishmen could not. Maritime supremacy inaugurated by the fortitude and foresight of Drake and his comrades, fortified and increased by the deeds of the noblest succession of heroic seamen ever vouchsafed to a nation, consummated by the genius of Nelson, is now the be-all and the end-all not merely of our Imperial security, but even of our national existence. That is the heritage we have received from our forefathers, that is the possession and the tradition which we must hand on unimpaired to our posterity. Subjection to the will of our enemies, just or unjust, can never overtake us so long as we are supreme at sea. It most assuredly will overtake us, sooner or later, if ever we are false to the traditions which ninety-one years ago Nelson wrote with his life-blood on one of the most memorable pages of our history. "Splendid isolation" is perhaps the inevitable lot of a Power which in time of war can brook no rival on the sea; but if we neglect our sea power or shrink from the efforts and sacrifices it entails, the splendour of our isolation will some day vanish in a twinkling and squalid subjection will take its place. If the revived celebration of Trafalgar is to be anything more than a frothy and somewhat exotic expression of a sentiment without substance, it should mean that the nation is now once for all resolved to shrink from no sacrifice which may be necessary to place our supremacy at sea beyond the reach even of challenge. The Government and the Admiralty have so far given proof that their naval policy is not unworthy of such a resolve. But Governments and Admiralties are apt to grow weary in well doing. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that the next year's vote for shipbuilding will probably show a decrease, and the remark was cheered by the First Lord of the Admiralty. If they remember Trafalgar and its teachings, and if they reflect that the country is now taking that lesson to heart in view of the division of Europe into two heavily-armed alliances, Ministers must surely think twice or thrice before acting upon this disquieting prediction. It is no mere stake of pride, power, or prestige that depends on the indisputable supremacy of our Navy. It is the very existence of the kingdom and the Empire. "To live without commerce without shipping, without colonies, subjected to the unjust will of our enemies" must have been humiliating to France. It would mean annihilation for England.

The four points Napoleon mentioned as conditions under which no Frenchman should live, are declared by the Times to be such, that if the British were called on to suffer them, it would mean annihilation for our race. They were,

1. No Commerce.
2. No Shipping.
3. No Colonies.
4. Subjection to the unjust will of their enemies.

These points touch, each of them, our Israelitish privileges as a nation, and have all been foreseen and provided for by the Lord Jehovah, the God of Israel, and therefore our God. He has, in a word, given us "the Gates," by His sworn promise made to Abraham our forefather and to his seed for ever, in Gen. xxii. 17, "Thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies." The Gate being ours, the naval and military command of the ocean highways of the world is ours also. Those highways carry our commerce, and also the shipping which floats it into our own ever-open Home-Gates according to Isa. lx. 17, R.V., "Thy Gates (i.e., Israel's), shall be open continually, they shall not be shut day nor night: that men may bring unto thee the wealth of the nations, and their kings led (with them)."

In reference to the Colonies of the Empire, their perpetuity and continuance as British possessions, depend, as India's does too, on the British grasp of the sea power, and they are guaranteed by the Lord to us, besides, by the promise of "a nation and a company of nations" (the young lions of the merchants of Tarshish) "shall be of thee" (Jacob) (Gen. xxxv. 11, R.V.). The appearance of "the young lions" in the crisis of the Russian Invasion of Palestine, is a pledge to us also that the Colonies will be attached to the Empire up to the very end (Ezek. xxxviii. 13, R.V.).

The Commerce of our nation pours day and night without cessation through the open Gates of our father-land, which is our Western Island home, as we have already seen; and no time can therefore come, when for us there shall be (as British-Israel) no commerce, no shipping to carry it, and no Colonies to send the former and the latter to our shores. In regard to the last of the four points, "subjection to the unjust will of our enemies," God has given us complete assurance as to that. "Thou shalt rule over many nations," He said in Deut. xv. 6, R.V., "but they shall not rule over thee." "The Lord thy God will set thee high above all the nations of the earth." . . . "The Lord shall make thee the head and not the tail, and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath, if thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and do (them)" (Deut. xxviii. 1 and 13, R.V.). The final condition of our Israelite race is plainly described in Dan. vii. 27, R.V., where it is said that "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High; His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him."

Israel's is a position of supremacy and continuance in supremacy, and therefore there can be no question of their "subjection to the unjust will of their enemies." Besides which in 2 Sam. vii. 10, R.V., we have a promise of the appointment by God Himself of a place for His people Israel, and of His planting them so that they might dwell in their own place and be moved no more, neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more as at the first, and as from the day that I commanded judges to be over My people Israel."

Here is a promise of complete immunity from "subjection to the unjust will of their enemies." The British as Israel are now in this place of safety, and true to His promise the Lord has kept them safe in their Island Home for a thousand years, and will so preserve them to the end. None of the afflictions which the Times anticipated can therefore possibly happen to the British, because being Israel they are God's chosen people, His blessed ones, heirs of His promises, and in present enjoyment of most of the same. They have the sea power of the world, and all that appertains thereto, and are not, therefore, likely to lose the gifts of God specially granted to them as belonging to the same by the oath of the Promiser, to Whom be all the praise.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD ON EGYPT.

THE subject of the speech was "The British occupation of Egypt," delivered on October 29th, at the Constitution Club. Sir J. Fergusson, M.P., presided.

Lord Chas. Beresford, who was received with loud applause, said that there was no question which commanded more attention in Great Britain at the present moment, and there was no subject which would command more interest in this country and throughout Europe in the near future than the British occupation of Egypt. It was well to recollect that our connection with Egypt historically and our troubles about Egypt politically dated a great deal further back than 1882. After reviewing the events which led to and the results which had followed the British occupation, he said we carried out reforms and improvements which had never been equalled in history, and which, although apparently parallel to our work in India, could not really be compared, as in India we had a free hand, whereas in Egypt we had met with the most determined obstruction and resistance. Lord Cromer was not a Pharaoh (laughter), but he had done more for the country and the people than did Rameses the Great, and his work would last longer. If we left Egypt, to whom were we to leave it? To the Turks? They were the Suzerain Power, but at the moment when the country was almost unanimous in denouncing Turkish rule in Europe surely we were not going to restore Turkish rule in Africa! (applause). There were three cardinal points in this question of our continued occupation of Egypt. The first was the sentimental one, with which he had dealt. The second was the military position; and the third was the commercial position. As to the second of these points, the circumstances had changed with regard to a great number of matters which affected our military position in the Mediterranean. There were military circumstances connected with Africa that should change our Egyptian policy. He referred to the extended frontiers, not yet properly defined, of other European nations in the centre of Africa, which frontiers were extending rapidly to the north, and in the direction of what was once Egyptian property. To conquer and hold the Soudan required to be done quickly to be effective, and the Egyptian forces necessary could not be raised in time. Then, too, the paramount Power in any country could not exist solely by the sword and physical force. It could only exist by upholding right and justice, and reforms similar to those carried out in Egypt by the employment of civil government would be necessary in the Soudan. But civil administration took time to effect, and did not agree with early evacuation (hear, hear). It was in consequence of circumstances having become so altered that we should declare a change of policy with regard to Egypt and the Soudan. The time had come for a strong, clear, but courteous declaration that the circumstances of the case had altered our policy, and that we intended to remain (loud applause). We had for many years been blustering on the one hand and dipping our ensign, as a token of humiliation, on the other. We should end our disagreeables as far as England was concerned, and gain the respect of Europe, if we abandoned both the policy of clearing for action and dipping our ensign. There was no war or semblance of war when France and Russia found that circumstances made it necessary for them to change their policy with regard to the fortifications of Bizerta and Batoum. He did not believe that there would be a war or the semblance of war if Great Britain found that, under the altered circumstances, it was necessary to change our policy with regard to Egypt and the Soudan. The danger that he saw ahead was that one might drift on till things came to such a pass that, in consequence of demands made upon us at an inconvenient moment, our choice would lie between war or humiliating departure from Egypt (applause). A frank declaration on our part now would save both. It was always dangerous to put other Powers in a position of being able to take the initiative on a question affecting the country's honour (applause). He might be wrong, but from military expediency he did not think it would be wise to proceed to Khartoum and to reconquer the Soudan without British or Indian troops, which must be paid for by British money (hear, hear). Once at Khartoum it would be easy to make the long-proposed railway from Suakim to Berber, and then, if necessary, Indian troops could be poured into the Soudan without the innumerable difficulties attending the long line of communications from Cairo. To commercial men he need not point out the probability of opening new and extensive markets to this country, and Europe generally, as the head emporium would be Khartoum, to which would go all the immense undeveloped trade of Central Africa. From Khartoum to Berber merchandise would be water borne, and then by rail to Suakim, the natural and quickest outlet. The distance was roughly four hundred miles to the coast, and Khartoum would be brought within a month or five weeks of London. Another great advantage of this proposal was that it would probably bring the frontiers of our spheres of interest next to the frontiers of other European nations, an advantage which could not be over estimated. The policy of smiling under abuse, and of dipping our ensign, had made us no friends, but had made those, who by their language appeared to be our enemies, more bitter than ever. Do let us change this policy, and, recognising that circumstances altered cases, declare boldly, clearly, and in the most courteous way what we intended to do, and why and how we intended to do it. He could not sit down without congratulating his old comrade the Sirdar, his officers, and the men of the Egyptian Army on the masterly manner in which they had achieved the reconquest of Dongola under tremendous and unforeseen difficulties (loud applause). For the reasons that he had given, and in the interests of peace, which was England's greatest interest, he believed that the time had come for a careful reconsideration of our position on matters which not only affected our interests, but the interests of Europe and civilisation. Do let us know our own mind. If we were going to leave Egypt, let us leave now. If we intended to remain, let us, without rudeness, without bluster, point out that changed circumstances had altered our position, as changed circumstances had frequently altered the policy of other countries and revoked treaties without comment or explanation. He hoped that he had adduced several clear and pointed reasons why it had become impossible for us to leave Egypt—reasons which many might consider as affecting those British interests which sometimes seemed in danger of being forgotten (loud applause).

A discussion followed, one speaker expressing the hope that Lord Charles Beresford would repeat his address to a mass meeting of the citizens of London.

Sir J. Fergusson, in reviewing the discussion, said that we must possess our souls in patience, go forward in the performance of our duty, and leave our diplomacy in the present skilful hands that wielded it to choose the time and opportunity for making such a stand as might be necessary. That we should go back from the position that we had taken up in the Nile Valley no man would believe. We had given such pledges to the inhabitants that the disastrous surrenders of 1885 could not be repeated.

A cordial vote of thanks was passed to Lord Charles for his address.

THE LILY AMONGST THE THORNS.

By Rev. L. G. A. Roberts.
Secretary of Protesant Reformation Society.

We have been hearing this morning, practically, about "The Lily amongst the Thorns," and this is my subject—The Lily. How beautifully it is brought out in the Song of Solomon. The Bridegroom says, "I am the Rose of Sharon," and then, stooping down, "I am the Lily of the Valley" and "My beloved is a Lily amongst thorns." That same Bridegroom, when He was upon earth, said to His disciples. "Consider the lilies, how they grow!" We have first the tokens of life, springing up out of the ground, we may say, "first the blade, then the ear." And what is the life? It is God-given. It is not like that inorganic nature, which is around; but it is organic, God-given and springing up, it bursts itself, it comes out, in all the perfection of glory, like unto her Master. A lily, pure, white, spotless! Looking up into the face of that glorious sunshine, that "Sun of Righteousness" that "Brighter sun," from whom she receives all her beauty and all her glory. But how does she partake of this? "They toil not, they spin not, and yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

We have heard of toiling ones, anxious ones, careful ones, but our Master would have us without anxiety, without that toil, that weary burden bearing us down to the earth. He would bid us to look up, and take all our life from Him. "Consider the lilies, how they grow." Without care! Your Heavenly Father careth for them. But now let us carry out that expression of our Lord. "Consider the lilies." We have it revealed to us in the Song of Solomon. We have it also revealed to us in the 45th Psalm. If you look at the keynote of the 45th Psalm, you will get that which I speak to you about. It is a psalm of love, a song of love, and the type of the key is "Shushan," "a lily." Ah, there is the Lily, the Lily in the valley, the Lily amongst thorns, the King all glorious, the Queen in her vesture of gold; and then if you follow up the subject, you look at the other Psalms. We have the 60th Psalm, the 69th Psalm, and the 80th Psalm. Just look at the 69th Psalm for a minute. The same keynote, "Shushan." It tells you of the love of the Bridegroom, how He died upon the cross for you, "Reproach hath broken My heart." Yes, He suffered all that He went through, simply for the love that He bore toward the Bride. Then look again at the 60th. "That Thy beloved may be delivered." There is another Psalm about the Lily, all about the Lily. And then we come to the 80th Psalm, "Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock, Thou that sittest between the Cherubims, before Ephraim, and Benjamin, and Manasseh, stir up Thy strength, and come and save us." It is a prayer of God's people, that He may come and deliver His people Israel, the dear Bride of the Old Testament, whom we believe is the Bride of Christ. But, brethren, look again and see what is the character of the Lily. We hear concerning the Church, that immediately the harvest is ripe, He putteth in the sickle. Oh! when the Church is perfect! Quite so! He putteth in the sickle. But in the 14th chapter of Hosea, and I wish you to refer to it, what is it we are told there? The 14th of Hosea gives us the character of the Lily, and what is it? It begins with, "O Israel, return unto the Lord, for thou hast fallen by thy iniquity. Take with you words, and turn to the Lord; say unto Him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously." Behold the gracious One, and God's loving answer! "I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely." Yes, they are the same words, taken so often and applied to the Church only, and we love to have it so. "O Israel, I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." Words spoken to Israel and shall not be taken away from them. And after that, what does He say about them? "I will be as the dew unto Israel, he shall grow as a lily." Is then the sickle put in? Is his work done? Is he cut off? No! He strikes his roots into the earth, he spreads them abroad, his branches spring out, and then gathers the nations to himself; and the reflecting power and influence of the perfection of the glorious Lily is such, that "They that dwell under the shadow shall return, they shall (every one of them, as we are told) revive as the corn, and grow as the vine and spread as the cedars of Lebanon." Brethren, one more word, the effect of this work. When this work is undertaken by the dear people of God, in love to Christ, in self-denial in the sacrifice of themselves to God, what is the result? The root will be purified by the very fact of their being drawn to the Lord, and by their working for Him. Why, the very thing we want this nation to say to-day, as she is amongst thorns. "What have I to do any more with idols?" O, would to God we could say that to-day. Would to God we could thus so make an earnest resolution, that we would do everything to put away the idolatry in our midst, and the sacerdotalism and the other mediators and every other change that dishonours our glorious Lord and Master. God will then say, "I have heard thee, I have observed thee," and the people that repented will say, "Lord, we have not wrought any deliverance in the earth," and we have, just like the fruitless tree, nothing but leaves. That confession will bring down showers of blessing, and God will say, "Look up! In Me is thy fruit found." And so there will be a "lily amongst thorns," looking up only to that glorious "Lily of the Valley," the "Rose of Sharon," and thus taking upon her all power, all might, and all efficacy, and in His might going forth to the work of the Lord, as the true Bride of our Lord Jesus Christ. "The Bride hath made herself ready" (Rev. xix. 7).

OUR SOUTH LONDON readers will notice that there are two lectures next week in this neighbourhood. We hope that Mr. Pain and Mr. Marchant will be encouraged with good attendances; also Mr. Stubbs at Kennington.

DR. JAMESON has been released from goal. Sir William Broadbent, the eminent physician having reported to the Home Secretary that further imprisonment would retard his recovery. The operation was performed on the Doctor for an old standing complaint which had been aggravated by confinement. He had been in prison four months.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE ON OUR EMPIRE.

THE annual meeting of the Bristol Conservative Working Men's Association was held on Oct. 27th, at the Hannah More-hall, Park-street, and was well attended. The chair was taken by Mr. R. Dugdale. Those present included Colonel Sir Edward S. Hill, K.C.B., M.P., Sir Richard Temple, Bart., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., Mr. Lewis Fry, M.P., &c.

Sir Richard Temple, Bart., who was very heartily received, said he rejoiced to stand upon the platform with his respected friend, Colonel Sir Edward Hill. He should like to say that, having been with their popular member on a hundred critical and arduous occasions, he had reason to know his merit as

and as a worthy representative of the city of Bristol (cheers). It was well that this, one of the most ancient ports of the empire, should be represented by one who was engaged in the shipping industry, the development of which within the living generation had been the most wondrous fact in the industrial history of England (cheers). At this moment, of the many millions of tons of ocean-going shipping about 60 per cent. was under the British flag, and the remainder under the various flags of many nations. With such a representative as Sir Edward they might be satisfied, and if within the ensuing half or three-quarters of an hour he succeeded in pleasing them, the reward he should ask at their hands was that they should continue to believe in him as much as he did (cheers). He had to address them on the supremely important subject of the empire abroad and the working men at home. With regard to the working men at home, he hoped, as everybody hoped, that they would have all the pleasant and domestic legislation, that they would have excellent religious instruction for their children, that they would have well-built dwellings, scientific instruction, institutions for thrift, and everything that could elevate the soul and enlarge the mind (applause); but, behind and beyond and above all, there was one cardinal advantage, without which all other advantages would be for the most part in vain, and that was good wages and constant and regular employment (applause). He would endeavour to recall to their memory that the prime and supreme consideration necessary to achieve this was the

in all parts of the world, and, secondly, upon that trade depended the maintenance of their empire beyond the seas, which he dared say they knew, but he should have to bring it home to their minds in a very distinct and conclusive manner. Other nations sought empire for various reasons—France notoriously for glory; Germany spent a great deal of money for a small result, though it was an increasing result, in her African possessions. England did it for subsistence (hear, hear). It was not a question of glory; it was a question of bread and butter (hear, hear). England must live by her empire, and that empire depended upon an enormous foreign commerce, protected by an overwhelming navy. This was a proposition well known to them, but as it was sometimes doubted and disputed, he would trouble them with a few considerations which would prove it conclusively. In the first place, there was within the four corners of the British Isles sufficient for the teeming population that dwelt therein. We had to import more than 400 millions' worth of produce for use from foreign nations. We must have this, partly for the work we carried on, and more than half for food. This was the most tremendous bill to pay that had ever devolved upon any nation in the history of mankind. How was it paid? Well, of course, it was paid partly by freight. We were not only the great shipbuilders of the world, but we were the ocean carriers of the world. Secondly, we were the great money lenders of the world, and by our accumulated capital carried on industries not only in our own empire—which was large enough—but in almost all empires of the world. Thereby we drew a mighty tribute from the nations of the world in the shape of interest. That paid 40 to 45 per cent. of the tremendous bill. The rest was paid by exporting British produce to every corner of the globe. This exportation, which now amounted to (say) 225 millions per annum, was greatly hindered by hostile tariffs (hear, hear). These hostile tariffs were, of course, a virtual admission of British superiority (hear, hear). He did not think that his countrymen ever claimed sufficient credit for themselves on that account. Was there any nation in the world that could enter into competition with us in a fair field and without favour? Not one. Could we have a more universal admission of all mankind that the British were, after all, the best workmen in the world? The workmen of no other nation could turn out so good an article for the money as the British could. That was the opinion of all mankind, as shown by the universality of the hostile tariffs (hear, hear). Lord Rosebery had referred to the competition of Germany, and to the need of technical education—which education he quite agreed with—but would the Germans kindly enter the field against us without the help of tariffs? Of course they would do nothing of the kind. They funked to fight us without the panoply of the tariff (hear, hear). The extent to which these hostile tariffs operated was, he feared, not always known to his fellow-countrymen. Might he give them one instance from which they might take a tolerably exact measure of the

Digitized by Google

TREMENDOUS EFFECT OF THESE TARIFFS.

The British trade with the little country of Holland was nine millions, while the population of that country was 4½ millions—just about the size of London. Our trade with Germany was only 17 millions, though that country had a population of 52 millions at the last census; and the case was just the same in France, where the trade with us was 13 millions in produce, while the population was 40 millions. The United States only took from us 19 millions, while her population at the last census was 62 millions. He must not push the comparison too far, because the three countries he had mentioned were manufacturing countries, more so than Holland; but, if the latter took from us nine millions, if there were no hostile tariffs, how much more would Germany, France, and the United States be taking? All three together now did not take up 50 millions; but were it not for hostile tariffs it would be at least 200 millions. Therefore, inasmuch as all those great markets were closed to us to that alarming extent, and would continue to be so, our only chance must be in the neutral markets of the world. The phrase "neutral markets" was well known, but what he wanted them to consider was what were the extent and possible extension of these

NEUTRAL MARKETS.

Where were they, and what were they, and what was the value of our export trade with them? We exported, as he had already reminded them, not less than 225 millions annually. Out of that 75 millions went to the British colonies and possessions, but, as they were well aware, all these were not neutral markets. Still, although Canada and Australia were almost closed to us because of hostile tariffs, there remained at least 40 out of 75 millions going to neutral markets, and he was proud that foremost in the neutral markets of the British possessions stood India. She took 30 millions, and that was a fact which ought to make them determined to defend her against her rivals and enemies (applause). And he bid them mark that the 30 millions of to-day were the 20 millions of yesterday, and would be the 40 or 50 millions of to-morrow. Deducting the 75 millions from our 225 millions of exports, that left 150 millions, and after deducting the 60 millions sent to tariff countries that left 90 millions, which, with the 40 millions which he had shown came from British possessions, made 130 millions as representing the value of the neutral markets. These markets were scattered all over the world, but they were nowhere where the British flag did not wave. So that depended upon their maintaining the British Empire. In this century India had increased by many millions, and why not Africa, and every man, woman, and child would take articles made in this country. These were neutral markets worth having, especially as the old countries were going to be closed. The only chance for the working men of Great Britain was new markets, but they could not have new markets unless they maintained their empire (applause). The absolute manner in which these markets depended upon the flag was illustrated by one or two pregnant instances. Take the case of Turkey—he was not going to discuss the politics, the internal politics of Turkey, but he was going to mention the value of the products that country took from Great Britain. Our trade with Turkey—exports and imports, both equally important—was 12 millions annually; but there was an extraordinary fact with regard to Turkish trade, and that was that a great part went through Malta for distribution. The trade returns of Malta would astonish them, amounting to something like 26 millions, which, added to the 12 millions done direct with the home country, amounted to 38 millions, which represented the value of

BRITISH TRADE WITH TURKEY.

Many thought—and he shared the opinion—that the knell had sounded, and that the breaking up of Turkey was only a question of time. When that question came to be settled by the electors of England, they would have to consider the value of their trade. If Russia got into Constantinople, there was an end of British trade with Turkey, for that country would no longer be a neutral market. How did he know? He knew what Russia had done in Central Asia. Britain used to have trade there, but directly Russia became paramount in those regions that was stopped, for the purpose of fostering her own manufactures. Russia tried to do the same in Northern Persia, but failed. She would also try in Turkey, and possibly in China waters. Let them think for the moment what British trade was with China, Hong Kong settlement, and the Straits. It amounted to 20 millions, and he was not exaggerating in the least when he said that if we lost control over Chinese waters, by not being able to keep up an overwhelming squadron, and if our naval force was broken there by a combination of Russian and French fleets, away would go our trade, the privileges of the treaty ports, and on the loss of our strategic position in the Straits there would follow the loss of our trade,

APPROPRIATED BY RUSSIA,

or France, or possibly by China herself. Did they suppose that the Chinese Government were willing for us to trade? The poor Chinese were glad, but the privilege to trade had been forced from the Chinese Government by arms. We had won the right to trade by the sword, and by the sword it would have to be kept. Coming nearer home, he might point to useful comparisons. Take Egypt as against Algiers. Our trade with Egypt, which had a population of seven millions, was worth 11 millions; but Algiers, which was under French jurisdiction, with a population of five millions, did only one million trade with Great Britain. The reason of this was obvious. And take, again, the case of Madagascar. At one time we had a trade with that island of one and a half millions, but it had now fallen to the beggarly sum of a quarter of a million, and the cause of this was that Madagascar had been or, in other words, the trade was gone. There was another very remarkable case connected with Holland. He had just now been praising Holland at the expense of Germany and France; but he must give them a case on the other side with regard to Holland. The great island of Java, which was in the Dutch Empire, did trade with Britain to the extent of two millions only, with its population of 30 millions. But take Ceylon, which in many ways was on all fours with Java, only the latter was much larger, and they found that Ceylon, with a population of three millions, did trade equal to five millions, more than double the amount done with Java, although the latter had six times the population. What was the cause of this astounding difference? Of course, it was not far to seek. Java was once a British possession, which was in the Napoleonic war. He supposed that that was one of the few mistakes made by our Imperial Government; and could anyone doubt that if Java had remained in our possession that the trade would now have been more like 30 millions (hear, hear). Take the case of Africa. Our trade there was worth 13 millions already, but, excluding Algiers, our trade with foreign Africa—meaning German and French Africa—amounted to the beggarly sum of half a million. The reason was obvious. Those parts under the British flag traded with us, and the others did not. And that was so all over the world (hear, hear). We admitted everybody's goods freely, but nobody would return the compliment because they had the silly fear that we should injure their people. The truth remained that, unless we could maintain our empire with our flag waving over it, we could not have neutral markets, and unless we had neutral markets the working men in England could not live (applause). It was really for them, and of course the protection of such an Empire as this scattered all over the world needed an overwhelming navy (hear, hear). He had not time to dilate upon that important subject more than to point out the happy fact that, under a Unionist Government, at this moment the Channel Squadron was more than equal to what the French could put on the seas, to say nothing of our immense reserve at Portsmouth (applause). The British fleet in the Mediterranean was more than equal to any force that the French had there, even in alliance with the Russians (applause). He need not say that, if we made comparisons in the waters of China, or in any other part of the world, we should find that 60 or 70 per cent. of the gun-bearing ships were British ships, and the rest were the squadrons divided among other nations (applause). If we came to the coaling stations became of great importance. Such coaling stations were hardly possessed by any other Power save England. They might thank God for that (hear, hear). On the other hand, our line of coaling stations formed a perfect girdle round the habitable globe, each being able to hold its own against any foreign force that might reasonably be expected to be brought against it. The effect of the separation of our colonies from us, which some talked of so lightly, would be tremendous. Supposing that Australia and Canada separated from us, and remained neutral while we were at war with

A MATTER OF LIFE AND DEATH

A MARITIME WARFARE,

A COMBINATION OF EUROPEAN POWERS.

Those Powers would be able to enter Sydney, Melbourne, or Vancouver for shelter and coal; and that would be a fearfully serious thing for us (hear, hear). Of course, in the wisdom of Providence, such a separation might come; but it would be a tremendous blow at British supremacy on the ocean (hear, hear). They would all admit that there had been no tinge of party feeling in what he had said (applause). The facts he had set forth affected Liberals as well as Conservatives (hear, hear). He did not doubt the good will of their political opponents in such a matter as this. But of course, with both parties emulating each other in well-doing, there would be degrees of efficiency in such well-doing (hear, hear). It was for them to elect which party would subserve these interests in the best manner. Which of the two parties, according to their traditions, their circumstances, and their capacity, was most likely to serve them well in these matters? It was an extraordinary fact that almost all the

MEN OF IMPERIAL EXPERIENCE,

the men of clear heads, strong right arms and world-wide experience, belonged to the Unionist party (applause). And therefore he said that the Unionist party had overwhelmingly the mental, physical, and moral capacity for dealing with these things (applause). He would ask them to think with gratitude of the men, particularly in the East, who had served them so well in securing these neutral markets; men who had to serve, but thought only of what would be good for British trade, British manufactures, and British exports. He had spoken of the Empire as a matter of pounds shillings and pence and of bread and butter. But it was also a matter of sentiment. Neither the Cæsars with their legions from Great Britain to India, not Alexander the Great with his phalanx from Greece to the Sutlej river in Northern India, not even Philip of Spain with proudly-boasted dominions on which the sun never set, not the Russian Czar with his immense dominions from the Arctic Ocean to the Pacific—not one of these ever possessed an Empire so splendid, so world-embracing as that which had been founded for us by the blood, the sweat, the tears, the anxieties, and the labours of our countrymen abroad (loud applause).

Col. Sir Edward Hill, K.C.B., M.P., moved a vote of thanks to Sir Richard Temple for his admirable and instructive address. He felt they were all proud of their great Empire, and after the speech of Sir Richard Temple they must feel still prouder. He had put it to them, not only as a matter of sentiment, that we had the greatest Empire the world had ever known, but he had shown that it was to the working men of this country a matter of bread and butter. In thinking of how well their coaling stations were fortified, they should not forget that they owed much in this respect to the late Lord Beaconsfield. Still they should not lose sight of the fact that they needed to protect their coalfields at home (hear, hear). He had long worked to obtain a harbour of refuge at Lundy Island, but he had not been able to persuade the Admiralty to grant one. At the present time there was nothing more easy than for a hostile cruiser to run up the Bristol Channel, and to destroy the whole of our coalfields without any great danger to itself, but at a very great disadvantage to us. He ventured to hope that that condition of things would soon be altered. While agreeing with what Sir Richard Temple had said as to the superiority of the British workmen, they could only hope to maintain that if the working man was not bound down by restrictions.

Mr. Goodenough Taylor seconded the vote of thanks, which was unanimously carried.

Sir Richard Temple, in returning thanks, said what he asked them to do was to resolve patriotically to maintain for ever that Empire whose claims he had advocated that night.

The meeting concluded with the singing of a verse of the National Anthem.

The above appeared in the Bristol Times and Mirror of October 28. We publish the account, which is very interesting, because Sir Richard Temple gave his hearers a vast mass of valuable statistical information and spoke hopefully of our trade prospects, besides giving a clue why the nations of the world and even our own larger colonies, will not meet our working men on equal terms, but hamper them with "hostile tariffs" to shut out the British imports. Sir Richard makes much of the British "Gates" and well he may; for we alone of all the nations possess the majority of them, according to the Divine promises to Israel, and "these form," he adds, "a perfect girdle round the habitable world;" each able to hold its own against our nation's enemies. Without meaning it, Sir Richard Temple gave testimony to Our Identity, and we claim him as a witness (unwitting of course) that we are Israel. In saying that our Gates or "coaling stations form a perfect girdle round the habitable globe," Sir Richard assigned a very solid reason why our power was supreme on the ocean, and we were (like Israel) "set high above all the nations of the earth," and that by the hand of God himself. Sir Richard thanked God for this—and we all heartily join him in ascribing the praise to the Holy One of Israel our King!

It is comforting to know that in the English Channel our squadrons are now more than equal to any the French could bring against us; and that in the Mediterranean we are more than a match for France and Russia united. Sixty or seventy per cent. of the gunbearing ships everywhere carry the British Flag, and the remainder (40 or 30 per cent.) are the squadrons of other nations regarded as one. Sir Edward Hill laments over the defenceless condition of the Bristol Channel and the absence of a harbour of refuge at Lundy Island. This defect ought to be remedied; but if it be neglected by our Government we have a promise in Isa. liv. 17 (R.V.) which covers the danger. It is this: "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper, and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn;" also (ver. 15): "Behold they may gather together but not by Me. Whoever shall gather together against thee, shall fall because of thee." French success in the Bristol Channel therefore is impossible: though very possibly the attempt may be made, and cause us a terrible fright, for our supine neglect of duty. We hope our readers will keep a copy of Sir Richard Temple's speech by them as a ready source of consolation when they are inclined to be low-spirited and dejected. But above all to praise the Lord for the comfort the speaker's facts and arguments convey.

HU, DEFROBANI, PRYDIAN.

By James Rankin, F.R.A.S.

According to the Welsh Triads, Hu. the Mighty conducted the first inhabitants of Britain from Defrobani, a country in Asia, in the region where Constantinople now stands. After taking possession of the island, they gave it the name of Prydian, or Britain.

The three names Hu, Defrobani, and Prydian are obviously compound names in the Chaldee tongue, the meaning of which it is now attempted to unravel.

According to the Hebrew lexicons, Jehovah is often addressed by the name of Hu.; it is consequently supposed that Jehovah is here alluded to in the Welsh Triads.

In examining the next name, Defrobani, it is obvious that the first letter of this compound, namely, D, is the Chaldee article the, and it supplies the key to the meaning of the sentence, thus:

D—efro—bani,
The—Ephraim—children; } that is, the children of Ephraim.

Dividing the other compound in the same way:

Pri—dian,
Ephraim—Dan } gives Ephraim and Dan.

And again, on the title-page of the Syro-Chaldee New Testament is seen the Syrian way of spelling London, namely, LNDN. (לנדן), literally meaning the abode of Dan.

The placing of efro, or ephro, under the same head as Pri or phre is only following the Hebrew lexicons, where it is stated that phri. (פרי or פרה) is the root from which אפרים Ephraim is derived.

It is evident, therefore, from the meaning of Defrobani, that the Cumri, the first inhabitants of these islands, were the children of Ephraim and Dan. The history wrapped up in those three compound words, when opened out throws a flood of light on that remote period, wh successive historians have peopled with Celts, Gaels. Druids.

There is, happily, but one opinion among those w written the chronicles subsequent to the arriva Romans—that the Angles, Saxons, and Danes we the same people; but, strange as it may seem, of these names are looked into, it is found t Angles (An-gle) mean the same thing—that for Gael (gadael) in Welsh means to emigra in Gaelic is merely noble Gael—that is, A emigrants. It is not very clear why the c Saxons (in Keating's History of Ireland t Sagsan), unless they are the Hebrew Saca

It follows from what has been stated that the emigrant Gaels and Angles were so designated by those who had arrived before them. The historian of the battle of Clontarf calls the Danes Danmerkians, either from Denmark, or more likely from the Icelandic word mark, or marg, a confederate; from which it is conclusive that there was a union of the Hebrew tribes, under the name of Dan, or Danes; and, judging from the Syrian spelling, they founded and gave the name Lan-dan (the abode of Dan) to London. They were known in Irish history as the Tuatha De Danaans—that is, the Tribes of Dan. In Ezekiel xxxviii. 13 mention is made of a people designated Dedan, who are to be the opponents of Mosch and Tubal in the latter days; in Ddn, as Dedan is written in the Hebrew, the initial D appears to be the Chaldee article—that is, meaning the Danes. It is difficult to sift from Keating's History of Ireland the dates when the first tribes arrived. The first part of what is called Irish history evidently took place in Asia, in the part called Iberia, situated between the Caspian and the Black Sea. They journeyed, under a leader named Neimhidh, possibly the same as Nehemiah, from the Black Sea to the Northern Ocean, keeping Europe on the left hand, and the north-west side of Asia on the right hand. It is stated by the traveller Clarke, who followed that route across Russia in the early part of this century, that nearly the whole distance is marked with tumuli, or burial mounds, extending in some places as far as the eye can reach. Many of them are more like dwellings than tombs, generally containing two arched apartments.

Judging by the names of places in England ending in ester, such as Chester and others, there is reason to infer that those places were named in memory of Queen Esther, whose edict to the Jews to defend themselves was sent to all the provinces of King Ahasuerus, when, evidently, a general migration of Hebrews from the two provinces of Albania and Iberia then took place; and it may be inferred that it is from those places that Britain and Ireland received the names of Albion and Iberia, for it is the custom of colonists to name the new places in which they settle after the country they came from.

The Hebrews were known to Herodotus under the name of the Kimmerians. He states that their country was invaded by the Sythians, on which the Kimmerians held a council among themselves. The Plebeians gave their advice that it were better to leave the country than attempt to defend it against the Sythians, but the royal party argued that it was nobler to die in a mutual slaughter of each other than to remain and be killed by the enemy or to go they knew not where. This resolve they actually carried out, for all the royal party died by a mutual massacre of each other, and were buried by the Plebeians, who then abandoned the country, and that their graves were to be seen (at the time he wrote). It is possible that the events narrated by Herodotus, who was contemporary with Nehemiah and Queen Esther (B.C. 457-445) were instigated by Haman, the Jews' enemy. Nehemiah disappears after he had rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem. Whether he returned to the Persian Court, and then became the leader of the Plebeians in their flight from the Sythians, there is no means of knowing. But the Irish annals supply the only connecting link between the departure of the Kimmerians from the Black Sea and their re-appearance at Jutland. The annals describe a succession of lake-eruptions during a period of ten years after the arrival of Neimhidh or Nehemiah. The description accords sufficiently close with the inundations of the sea that happened on the coast of Jutland during the second and third centuries before the Christian era that drove the Cimbri from their settlements, and when they first became known to the Romans. But the only authentic dates of their arrival in these islands are fixed by the astronomical and magnetic observations taken at Stonehenge and Lough Gur, namely, B C. 139 and B.C. 147.

A FOREIGNER ON THE "GATES."

A Letter to the Editor of the "Banner."

MY DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—Permit me to congratulate you, in the name of the many to whom your argument has been of inestimable service, on the striking confirmation afforded recently by the words of a prominent French politician to your identification of us as the people who were to "possess the Gates." You have insisted, for a number of years now, upon this correspondence between the forecast given to Abraham and its realization in our own world-wide Empire, and to many of us it has, in the light of your demonstration, seemed a quite obvious mark of identity. Your argument, being now so signally supported by "one of the leading French authorities," should be pressed home with a renewed assurance of its convincing the yet unconvinced.

For the benefit of those who may not have seen this important pronouncement, it is to be found, under the heading "M. de Lanessan on Egypt," in the Morning Post of Nov. 6th. France has, of recent years, been trying to carry through an ambitious colonial policy, without the colonial instinct, and M. de Lanessan has been one of her principal colonial governors, presiding for a period over her possessions on the Southern borders of China. He is stated to be "one of the leading French authorities on colonial matters."

It is the question of Egypt that has elicited his opinion on England's dominant position in the world, by virtue, as you rightly put it, of her "possessing the Gates." And this is how he opens:—

"England has created for herself in Egypt a privileged situation." "Thy seed shall possess the Gate." The Gate was the seat of judgment, and the channel through which reforms might be introduced. They who possess a hold upon a country, by virtue of which they can benefit it, they who have won a privileged situation therein, despite the jealousy of their neighbours, these "possess the Gate." But the occupation of Egypt has been only the latest of a series of instances of the fulfilment in our own imperial realm of that old world prophecy of the future of Abraham's seed. And our French ex-Governor saw this. "England," he says, "has had at all periods of her history a marvellous intuition of future European expansion in the world." Now, "intuitions" are inspirations, and the inspiration, in this case, was to "possess the Gate." For, as M. de Lanessan points out, "by the occupation of Gibraltar, England assured to herself the key of the Mediterranean, by those of Malta and Cyprus she established in that sea refuges and bases of maritime operations which make her a Mediterranean Power almost as much (!) as France, Italy, Turkey, or Greece." And so on, in the same strain. Perim and Aden gave England "a preponderating situation" in the Red Sea. Colombo strengthened assured her "the command" of the Indian Ocean. Through Singapore she is "absolute mistress" of the routes to Australia, on the one hand; on the other, to China, Japan, and the Pacific. Hong Kong has become in less than forty years "an admirable commercial and political centre, commanding the entrance to the southern rivers of China and the sea communications of Canton, the most industrious town in the Chinese Empire."

Digitized by Google

The crowning example of this "marvellous intuition" has been, in M. de Lanessan's estimation, the occupation of Egypt.

At the time of writing, I have not seen your own notice of this important declaration by the late Governor General of Indo-China. But I am assured we shall not be wrong in holding that, in asserting that in one case England holds the key; that in another she has established a serviceable base of operations; that in a third instance she has acquired a preponderating situation; in a fourth has assured herself of the command of an ocean; in a fifth has become absolute mistress of a great highway of the nations; in a sixth controls the entrance of a great commercial inlet, and, most recently, has made for herself (nay, Providence has made for her) a privileged situation at a point where "she can, in a few hours, close the route to the Far East against all Europe." This French politician, all ignorant, as he is, of the natural conclusion to which his evidence can be pressed, has abundantly substantiated the truth of your contention that, being in very truth the people who do "possess the Gate" of their enemies (actual and potential), or, as it is otherwise expressed, of those that hate us (note, the isolation of England), and whose instincts, national and religious, are so alien from our own, we must of necessity be that people for whom such a position was foretold.

All of us are glad that the argument of "the Gates" should have received so signal a corroboration.

Believe me, to be, dear Philo-Israel,

Yours fraternally,

MR. MARCHANT'S DEBATE WITH A CHRISTADELPHIAN IN HYDE PARK.

ONE chilly evening, in the past October, as a London worker in our cause strolled into Hyde Park, to see how far the mist and cold had broken up the congregation of "Truth-seekers," who concentrate there day after day, journeying from distant parts of London for spiritual and mental food; to our friend's surprise, a goodly company formed round him, and an American pastor of the district of Kennington, put his platform at the disposal of the Anglo-Israel speaker. A friendly challenge was the sequel of the speech. The opponent agreed that on the morrow at 3 p.m. he would dispute the truth of Anglo-Israelism. He professed himself to be a Christadelphian, and to have lectured for twenty years in Hyde Park, and that as Mr. Robert Roberts had crushed Mr. Hine eighteen years ago, so he would crush the Identity, which was again raising its head. Ten minutes after the challenge the Brighton telegraph wires carried the message, "To Marchant—important debate in Hyde Park to-morrow, 3 p.m.; large crowd expected, your presence urgently needed." By 8 p.m., the reply came back to London, "I shall try. Marchant." At 3 p.m. on the morrow a large crowd gathered around our Brighton friend, who, it must be said, had left his business at considerable inconvenience to respond to the call. The debate lasted till nightfall, and there is no need to say more than that the Christadelphian had no grip of the subject and that his defeat was complete; the usual blindness to the difference between the Jew and the Israelite was as thorough as though he were a novice instead of being an avowed student of Anglo-Israelism. He emphatically affirmed that Abraham was a Jew. Immense interest was evidenced by the listeners, and whilst the subject was warm in their minds Mr. Marchant thought it would be politic to ask Mrs. Richardson to give a lecture on the "Coronation Stone" to the same people a few days after his debate. This was carried out successfully, and Mrs. Richardson had the pleasure of returning to Brighton with a statement that the people had warmly pressed her to give a second lecture on the same subject, which request she contemplated acceding to.

RANDOM SHAFTS.

THE strong attachment of the Church to spiritualities, and its supreme contempt for merely carnal benefits, is well known; and I was afraid that this exalted state of feeling would prove a permanent obstacle to the progress of the Identity. But there is hope. An American religious paper, the Central Presbyterian, has given its readers an account of various "Good Things Gathered at the Synod," which good things are recipes for English Plum Pudding (with its befitting sauce), Metropolitan Cake, Lemon Pudding, &c. The Synod had evidently fared sumptuously on such dainties, and it would also seem that the recipes were being distributed in the pews of Presbyterian places of worship for home purposes. That the Church should have formally recognized the value of these delicacies is a favourable sign, but, of course I only look on Plum Pudding as a means to an end. Growth in grace is a gradual process, and when the Church has risen above Plum Pudding, as it naturally will do, we may fairly expect that it will see some worth in the national boons provided by the Abrahamic covenant.

A very fine work could be written entitled "A Commentary on Commentaries," and although the Christian public might not be edified by it they would certainly be entertained. Commentaries are often helpful, often amusing, and often quite mystifying. A sentence by Dr. John Campbell merits an honourable place in the third category—perhaps I should say the second and third. He is "expounding" Hosea ii 14, "Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her;" on which he remarks: "The state of the Jewish captivity is likened to a residence in the wilderness, which possibly means the dispersion of the Ten Tribes." Yes, but what does this mean? Hosea himself is plain enough, but the doctor's deliverance, which was intended for a light, more resembles an extinguisher. Surely "A Commentary on Commentaries" is an absolute necessity?

Notwithstanding the almost universal notion that no person can be a genuine Hebrew unless his or her nose is of a specified shape and size, we are all probably acquainted with Jews who do not differ from their neighbours. That at least is my experience. In one case a whole family consists of Esthers and Mordecais, as their countenance is no witness against them whatever, and they might pass for "Aryans" with the greatest of ease. In another case—as if to shew what diversity may subsist between the closest of blood relations—while sundry of them are typical Jews, the remainder are typical Saxons. A third illustration within my own knowledge is a lady of a somewhat public character, and she ought therefore to be an advertisement for us. And her words are not less emphatic than her mien.

When lecturing on "The Jew in Portrait and Caricature," this lady observed: "The pre-conceived idea of a Jew is remarkably comical. He is cunning, deep, unscrupulous, talks broken English; his hair is black, so are his eyes; his skin is dark and his nose long." She ridiculed this burlesque, and continued: "I remember once talking to an old lady, and she asked me what Church I went to. 'I am a Jewess,' I replied. Thereupon she looked at me with blank consternation. 'Were you born one?' she ejaculated. I answered in the affirmative. 'Are your parents Jews?' she queried. I nodded my head. 'How strange,' she at length murmured, 'for you really speak English remarkably well' . . . As regards the typical long nose, I do not think that large nasal organs are confined exclusively to the Semitic people. . . . We are an Eastern people, and black hair, and black eyes, and dark skins are seen in the hot Eastern climes as characteristic of Jew, Christian, or Mahommedan, neither being a whit more favoured than the other. But the English-born Jew very frequently possesses no outward sign of the race to which he belongs. A fair-haired, blue-eyed, light-skinned Jew or Jewess is nearly as often to be seen as the dark portrait which it is the custom to draw of us."

Most of the imminent Second Advent periodicals deem it a primary duty to smite the Identity, so it is fortunate for the Identity that their blows are rather infantile. It is not difficult to perceive why our subject is an offence unto them. They have the ordinary prejudices of the present generation, but in addition to that there are two pleasures on which they have fixed their vision and planted in the immediate future. One is, to be caught up in the air; the other is, to gaze complacently down upon a globe enveloped in carnage. But Anglo-Israelism snatches the British Empire from the fire, and as that Empire comprises an enormous share of the earth, the theatre of woe becomes very much narrowed. The opponents in question are not content with this. Nothing but a world-wide conflagration will satisfy them, and they feel disappointed at the prospect of a partial one, as boys do when their squib is slightly a failure. Besides, is not England a terribly wicked nation considering her advantages? Why then should she be spared? Like Jonah with Nineveh, they are more ready to weep and frown at God's mercy than to rejoice over it.

But it is only occasionally that these sentiments are allowed to put their heads out of the bag. A better way is to argue that we have not the Hebrew physiognomy, that we ought to be circumcised, that we are unspiritual, and so on. The latest to enter this field is The Warning Cry and Second Advent Messenger, "a Monthly Advocate of the Special Divine Message, and Witness of the Lord's Presence in Judgment." Its November issue has notes on the Turkish crisis, in which it is said: "From the Jewish appearance of many Armenians there would appear to be a close connection between them and the Jews, and they are more likely to prove to be the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel than the Anglo-Saxons. Also, according to Scripture (Rev. xvi. 12), these tribes must come from the East, not, as Britons would do, from the West, were they journeying to Palestine."

Passing by the reference to features—an objection which has been answered sufficiently—is it not curious that those who want information about the return of Israel should go to the Revelation for it? And is it not equally curious that our critic should have to fall back on a text which never mentions Israel, Ten Tribes or twelve? I am not prepared either to deny or assert that "the kings of the East" are Israel. I would simply point out that if this writer believes Rev. xvi. 12 alludes to the Ten Tribes there are multitudes who do not, and we cannot draw a sound conclusion from an unsound premise. Granting that the verse bears on Israel, it does not conflict with our view, for the British are an eastern and a kingly power; whereas the Armenians are among the feeblest of Asiatics. But the prophets Jeremiah and Hosea tell us explicitly—not enigmatically—from whence the Tribes of Israel are restored. Jer. iii. 18, xvi. 15, xxiii. 8, xxxi. 8, all lay stress on the North, while Hosea xi. 10 particularises the West; consequently the "must" of the Warning Cry needs modification. These texts are studiously ignored; but they exist, and no doubt they are ignored for some reason.

JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

MR. GEORGE LOWTHER, OF CAMBUSLANG, GLASGOW, CARRIES ON THE WAR.

WE are glad to see that the Cambuslang Pilot of Oct. 17th, has again published one of Mr. Lowther's letters, with the lecture appended of Mr. W. Hopton's (a two-part paper on "Lost Israel found in the British nation,") which appeared in the BANNER of January 29th and February 5th last (Nos. 996 and 997). The letter appears below. This effort by a humble believer near Glasgow, who doubtless once thought that he could do little or nothing to advance the good news we have to tell our nation, turns out to be a powerful weapon, since his words admitted into the Pilot, no doubt have reached thousands in and round Glasgow, and have given fresh wings to Mr. W. Hopton's excellent paper, which we published early in the year. We hope many others will follow this example, for where Mr. Lowther succeeded, others may also prosper, and so the good tidings may enter into new circles of readers, and some energetic ones be there secured to carry on the tidings yet further afield.

His letter was to the following effect:—

BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—I thank you very much for publishing my letter and extract in the Pilot of 27th September last, and hope you will pardon me for thus troubling you again. The arrangements mentioned in the issue of above date are now completed, and the first lecture will be given by Mr. Reid in the U.P. Church, on the first Wednesday of November, and be continued each Thursday until the series of lectures are completed. Further details will be given later on in the Pilot. Meantime, for the benefit of those who may not have heard about Our Identity, or for those who have heard about it, but scarcely understand what it means, I enclose another extract from the BANNER OF ISRAEL, which will help to explain matters more clearly. If we turn to the Bible and look at the 35th chapter of Genesis, verse 11, we find these words:—"And God said unto him (Jacob), I am God Almighty; be fruitful and multiply; a nation and a company of nations shall be of thee." Now, sir, I hold that in the history of the Jewish nation, from Jacob until to-day, the above prophecy has never been fulfilled. The House of Judah, or the Jews, as commonly spoken about, have never been a "company of nations," and to-day they are scattered abroad over the world, a bye-word and a reproach, known of all men, thus fulfilling her destiny as prophesied by the prophets. Are we then to suppose that the above verse is wrong, or that it refers to a time still in the future? I do not think so. Somewhere in the world to-day there should be the other "House of Israel" in existence. The House of Judah, or the Jews, were composed of two tribes only. There should be ten more somewhere amongst the nations of the earth, and if we can find such a nation, who are also a company of nations, then I think we shall find the Ten Lost Tribes. The above prophecy was given to the seed of Abraham exclusively and literally, not spiritually, as very many assert; but I will close this letter, and leave the extract to do the explaining. It is entitled:—"Lost Israel Found in the British nation."

Mr. Hopton's paper will be found on pages 62 and 68, of this year's BANNER OF ISRAEL.

THE DESTINY OF THE ANGLO-SAXON BRITISH RACE.

THE following appeared in Pearson's Weekly for August 1st, 1896, being the last chapter of a story called "The Final War," by L. Tracey. It is very much to the point and will be interesting to the readers of the BANNER :—

THE DESTINY OF THE RACE.

So Peace ruled: not that sullen silence which harbours in its breast poisonous passions, but a peace such as the world had never known, deep, eternal and serene.

In this last mad eruption the evil genius of war had exhausted itself and humanity had cast it forth as a noisesome thing to be tolerated no more. The Saxon race for a moment held the world in fee. But it was only to give to the nations abiding rest, to soothe ambition, to repair injustice, to mete out to all freedom before the law of justice.

Such a vision of a new world and of a new age had Tennyson. Was this the consummation of the poet's dream? Had mankind progressed—

"Till the war-drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle flags were [furl'd,
In the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World?"

There was no room for scepticism in that noble mind. For in the same breath he wrote :—

"Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

Did not Shelley also sing in tones of triumphant prophecy :—

"The world's great age begins anew,
The golden years return."

This surely was the "newer Hellas" that he saw, the Hellas of a world completely free. And yet not from countries of romance, lands where warm blood keeps fresh the passion of poetry, did the miracle come. It was from the race dedicated to commerce; the sturdy, unimaginative, practical people whose home, first set in the little Island of Great Britain, spread forth to a new continent in the West, and then broadened out till it covered the earth and sea.

Such is the destiny of race. Three Empires has the world known. Transient tyrannies have swept across it, and in the dark background of time there loom gigantic shadows of strange dynasties covering the earth with their power. Of them history has no word to say. But since man's life became clear and intelligible there have been but three preponderating races, each representing a cosmic force and taking its place in the due development of the destiny of humanity.

First came the Greek, the strong, sensuous being who gave order to chaos, who wrested from its bondage the perfect life of man. His was the rule of Art, that great force which gives each thing its place and finds for each a use, which cuts off the civilised from the barbarous, which carves the rich doorway to the Temple of the Ideal. Greece gave to mankind its implements—its faith, its yearnings, its strength: and in doing so exhausted herself.

There was the Roman, the man of action, not the dreamer of Hellas, not wrapped in the sensuous charms of art, but the strenuous builder of Empire. It was the destiny of Rome to found the great doctrines of jurisdiction, to give law to the nations. Hers was a civil, not an æsthetic strength. As her great poet has in noble verses propounded :—

"Others, I know it well,
The breathing bronze will chase,
And from the death-white marble
Upcall the living face,
Will plead with eloquence not thine,
Will mete and map the skies,
And with the voice of science tell
When stars will set and rise.
'Tis thine, O Rome, to rule:
This mission ne'er forego,—
To spare in war the vanquished
And bring the haughty low."

She ruled by virtue of impartial Law, by the just prinicples which brought all peoples willingly to her feet. And yet even Law was not enough to bring a lasting Empire. Others arose who also knew her Law, and from her nerveless grasp snatched the sceptre of her dominion. And in a day the Empire of Rome melted away before the vigorous Northmen.

Now has taken up the tale the third overwhelming dynasty that the world has known. The new Empire is that of the Saxon race. Art and Law had had their day; there followed the dominance of science.

Digitized by Google

The nations had learnt the lessons of beauty, and knew how to disfigure them; had caught the message of Law, and knew how to abuse it. But nature has her revenges, and as the earth opened out before the pioneer, and discovery narrowed the great continent of Europe, and brought its peoples into active rivalry, it became clear that the new Empire was not one of orb and sceptre—not the annexation of countries, and the absorption of alien races. It was to be an Empire of another, a subtler, a more enduring, a more resistless kind.

For the message which science gave the world was that that race alone would conquer in the struggle for existence which showed greatest adaptability, which could easiest accommodate itself to the countless variations of earth's wayward moods. It was the cruel law of the survival of the fittest. There was need of some versatile people who feared no change of climate or contradiction of condition, for whom heat and cold, desert and fertile land, sea and plain, peace and war, luxury and indigence, struggle and ease were alike—whose temperament had infinite degrees passing from sanguine heat to phlegmatic torpor. For such a race the earth lay open, offering its dominion.

Here lay the tragedy of less fortunate peoples—more blessed, perhaps, in rich qualities of heart—more developed, it might be, in gentle graces and warm emotions—but forced, after all, to pay the penalty of their very virtues.

Life is eternal action and re-action, and from the being who rejoices in a nervous temperament which leads him to the pleasant paths of art, she sucks the virile vigour which should nourish and sustain. It is the fate of the Celt. He exhausts himself in the passion of life and scatters his years from him in each gust of self-abandonment. He is the invalid amongst men, the sick person, incapable of continued effort, needing all that luxury can give and yielding himself to dreams and visions and things impalpable.

Nor is the more vigorous people of romance, that northern people, fitted for the struggle. For romance plays too great a part in its life. Its character is weakened by sensuousness, and its vision dulled by speculation. It may be led to victory, it cannot take itself to the goal. For in this new Empire it needs that each and every man shall himself be leader. It must be a nation of pioneers.

This, then, is the mission of the Saxon race—slowly but surely to pour itself over the earth, to absorb the nations, to bring to pass that wonderful dream of a world united in a single family and speaking a common speech.

How rich the blood, how noble the inheritance of Britain! She has the stern indomitable defiance of the Saxon, the strenuousness of the Celt, the romantic genius of the Teuton. She is both actor and dreamer. Her poets have dwelt beside the founders of her Empire. Reckless of danger, amorous of what is new, versatile in action, ready in resource, fertile beyond the ingenuity of chance, adaptable to all changes of climate and modes of life, at home in icebound regions and beneath the equatorial sun, carrying with her the capacity of Empire, the power to rule, and obstinate in the attainment of her desire, she is bound by no limit of race, no dimension of geography.

And thus she early found her power. She has led the world in all its noblest struggles. Whilst other nations groaned in kingly servitude, she was already free. Her battle of liberty was fought before the hope of freedom dawned in Europe. Her conscience refused that allegiance to sacerdotalism which drenched the Continent with blood; and her reformation, long premeditated, came, if not without the agony of struggle, still gently and without excess. Her Parliament at almost the dawn of her history gave equal laws, disputed with kings, and drove out tyrants. Her press was free, her speech unrestrained. And as she battled ever for freedom, so she gave herself to the passionate pursuit of knowledge, to the mysteries of philosophy, to the sublime teaching of science. Thus, armed with all that discovery could yield her and owing allegiance only to herself, she poured her sons over the earth and upon the seas, and in remote regions founded another Empire. America arose—that second England—new home of the Saxon race, and heir to her aspirations and her destiny—America which developed a new type of being, more versatile still, and still more strenuous. And the impulse went on, giving life to Canada, peopling the vast continent of Australia, carrying civilised arts to mysterious Africa, to venerable India, and on every continent, in every sea, stamping itself in eternal characters.

And how could such a race be resisted? For, wherever it penetrated it did not languish under conditions unfavourable to its growth. With miraculous ease the Saxon remodelled himself to obey every variation of climate, every manner of sky, every form of life, till it became clear that he was no fixed, irrevocable type, but of plastic mould, responsive to the slightest touch, and reproducing himself in a hundred different shapes. The Saxon is content wherever he is; the instinct of his blood tells him that the earth is his home, and that his spirit must inform the nations and regenerate decaying peoples.

Commerce bent itself to Britain, and all peoples entrusted to her their possessions. The Saxon tongue has become the speech of the world, the Saxon ensign—whether British or American—is the flag of the seas.

Thus, as life becomes more complex and harder grows the struggle, there is no escape for peoples not fitted to bear its strain, and the Saxon race will absorb all and embrace all, reanimating old civilisations and giving new vigour to exhausted nations. England and America—their destiny is to order and rule the world, to give it peace and freedom, to bestow upon it prosperity and happiness, to fulfil the responsibilities of an all-devouring people: wisely to discern and generously to bestow.

This vision—far-off may-be—already dawns: and in the glory of its celestial light is the peace of nations.

The race described in the above must infallibly be Israel and no other. It has all the signs and marks which God assigned to His people by which they were to be known in the latter day. Israel, according to the Scriptures, was to be "the head and not the tail." "Above only and not beneath, set high by God Himself above all the nations" (Deut. xxviii. 1—13). Such, says the writer, were the British. "She has led the world," he declares. "She was free, when other nations groaned." She fought and conquered freedom when Europe had nothing even of the hope of it. God said Israel was in the time to come, after Jacob's days, "to spread abroad to the West, to the East, to the North, and to the South" (Gen. xxviii. 14), and Balaam in figurative language announced in Numb. xxiv. 7, that his seed (Israel's) "should be in many waters." The writer we are quoting, using almost the very figure of Balaam, declared that our British Anglo-Saxon race "have been poured out over the earth, and upon the seas, and that in remote regions they have founded another Empire" (in America).

The Scriptures tell us that Israel of the latter days were to be found in every sea, developing into "a nation and a company of nations" "a federation and fulness of nations" (see Gen. xxxv. 11, R.V., xlviii. 19, R.V.). The facts of modern times show us that our nation has done this very thing, but no other has. We are "a nation and a company of nations," Australia, India, Canada, Africa, representing many nations in union and federation, many speaking the same (English) tongue. The Scriptures give the world to Israel to rule and govern for Christ, saying that He will give to them "the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven" (Dan. vii. 27, R.V.). The fact is in accordance with the prophecy. The Empire has extended miraculously in late years, and in addition to India there is an Empire forming in the South of Africa which most men see is to be British Anglo-Saxon; the struggle to decide the point being now in progress in Rhodesia and Charterland and with the Transvaal also, to settle the question whether Israel-Britain is to be the head or the tail, above or beneath and set high or set low in comparison with the Boers. The writer in Pearson's Weekly foresees for our race, that with the United States we shall together "rule and order the world, to give it peace and freedom, prosperity and happiness," to fulfil the responsibilities of an all-devouring people" (whatever they may be). But these are the good things that God created, made and formed Israel to possess, and afterwards to communicate to the nations of the world. We have given to the nations entrusted to us by the Lord, the pax Britannica, commerce, civilization, the Gospel, the Bible and the Sabbaths of the Lord. Such a race cannot be resisted; for it is "the overcoming one," even "Israel, the prince of God" (Gen. xxxii. 28, R.V.). It is strange that the writer of this passage was totally unaware that in drawing the portrait of the British people, he was unconsciously depicting the picture of Israel-obedient, God's chosen and favoured people, whose future is to give glory to the Lord and to show forth His praise (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21).

Digitized by Google

LORD DUFFERIN EXPLAINS THE REASONS WHY THE CONTINENTAL NATIONS HATE US.

LORD DUFFERIN spoke at Belfast as the guest of the mayor on Oct. 28th, at the Ulster Hall. His speech was, as usual, clever, racy, and deeply interesting. It had a national ring about it which we greatly admire, and we propose to quote some of its salient portions to show how, speaking of the Empire he has so long served, he described God's people Israel and their work, as set out in the Scriptures, which work they are destined to carry out in these our "latter days." Alluding to the fact that the Press of most of the Continental Powers exhibited signs of extreme hostility to us, Lord Dufferin explained some of the causes of this untoward state of things. First and foremost is the terrible war-cloud hanging over all the European nations save our own, which makes them miserable, but madly envious and jealous that we should be exempt from this terror; but yet were willing to bring the curse upon Europe by our lately proposed interference in Armenian affairs, without the consent and aid of "the European Concert." Lord Dufferin's words were these:—

"THE WAR CLOUD.

"Mr. Curzon, however, in his recent brilliant and admirable speech, has undoubtedly hit the right nail on the head, and given, at all events to a great extent, the correct explanation of a temper so out of harmony with our own friendly instincts. We Englishmen, safe within the circuit of our tutelary seas, can form no conception of the haunting anxieties which embitter the existence of the nations of Central Europe, upon whose every frontier hangs, black and motionless, a threatening cloud of war, and whose citizens, even within the recesses of their innermost chambers, mingling with the prattle of their children and the tender converse of the hearth, can hear the ominous tramp of alien armies, the rattling of their artillery, the thunder of their squadrons as they periodically gather, march, and manœuvre within, so to speak, a stone's throw of their unprotected fields and villages and open towns. With such a sword of Damocles hanging over each country's head, you can understand how angry all become at the thought of what they consider the inconsiderate action of an outsider like ourselves precipitating the risk of a universal disaster. The very circumstance of our being out of the path of the storm is an additional subject of offence and irritation, and this feeling is still further enhanced by Europe being divided—at all events for the moment, I do not say permanently, for all alliances are kaleidoscopic—into two independent interests, the one represented by what for all practical purposes we may call the Dual, and the other by the Triple Alliance. (Hear, hear.) Each confederacy is alive to the effect which our co-operation on either side might have upon the result in the case of an ulterior conflict, and all are united in abusing what they call our selfish isolation and our indifference to the vital interests that preoccupy themselves. A person who sits upon the fence is always an obnoxious individual, and statesmen who are so absorbed in the crucial cares I have referred to cannot make allowances for the motives of our traditional detachment from their own political system, and fail entirely to comprehend that England's face is turned seawards rather than towards the European continent, and that we are more concerned with our own commercial and colonial interests across the ocean than with the inter-tribal rivalries of our immediate neighbours." (Cheers.)

His lordship puts our case vividly before us when he says our nation is "out of the path of the storm" which is about to visit "yonder ill-consolidated Europe"! The Dual and the Triple Alliance remind one of the five in one house divided, the three against two and the two against three, of Luke xii. 52, R.V. Europe is thus divided now, on the very verge of the great earthquake "war-woe;" but, in regard to the British-Israelite nation, the States of Europe regard us as the party sitting on the fence, aloof and safe from the turmoil on either side. Our face, however, is turned seawards, looking after our Gates, our coaling stations, and our ocean fortresses, which guard our seaborne commerce, with no time to give to the Continental alarms, and its territorial disputes. But another reason, according to Lord Dufferin, why we are so unpopular abroad, is that our colonial expansion has been successful, while theirs has been the reverse, and human nature resents that, and is discontented and angry at the result. Lord Dufferin expressed himself thus:—

"COLONIAL EXPANSION.

"Again, another source of our unpopularity arises out of the recent impulse towards colonial expansion which has had so sudden and curious a development within the last few years. We, as an island people with a happily teeming population, were driven by the force of nature centuries ago to overflow in every direction, and to occupy the desert places of a great portion of the globe. It is true a corresponding excess of population set on foot, though much later, a great Teutonic emigration, for some years as great as that from Ireland itself; but Germany, for many a long day, was content to see its wandering millions pass to the American continent, where they have proved such a valuable addition to the intelligence and the resources of the United States. (Hear, hear.) But when the fad for African acquisition became fashionable, Germany very naturally was anxious that the children who left her shores should remain within the jurisdiction of the Fatherland; and there is no doubt that she, as well as France, has been provoked to find that the belated birth of their colonial policy has restricted the field of their operations. (Hear, hear.) As a result, it occasionally happens that this or that German or French emigrant, in pursuit of some fancy territorial titbit in Africa or elsewhere, suddenly finds himself confronted by an Englishman already standing sentry over the path. The Briton may be gaunt, emaciated, and broken down with fever and unremunerative toil, but he looms in the eyes of the new-comer like an obese dragon warding the garden of the Hesperides, and the barren tracts beyond him appear to blossom with self-grown fruits and flowers that encircle gleaming hills of solid gold. Highly-coloured accounts of these experiences, on being transmitted to Europe by the indignant explorer, are naturally amplified and misrepresented by the Press, and are bitterly commented upon by what is known at Berlin and at Paris as the colonial party, until the English really come to be regarded by a large body of honest German and French opinion as unjust depredators and intruders within the sacred precincts of what Providence intended to be their own private kitchen gardens, the fact of Germany herself having within the last dozen years or so laid hold of more than a million square miles of territory to which she had no special right being entirely ignored; while France's acquisitions in various parts of Africa—in Algeria, Tunis, Senegal—her claim to the reversion of the Congo State, and her recent annexation of Madagascar, are equally passed over in silence. (Hear, hear.) But it is a vain thing to expect nations to be just or reasonable when their material interests are at stake, and it would be both unwise and useless upon our part to recriminate or to exhibit resentment at the unfair diatribes to which I have referred. (Hear, hear.) Hard words break no bones, and the authors of these very artificial complaints are perfectly conscious that of land-grabbing in Africa they and their countrymen are as guilty both in fact and in intention as the rest of us. Nor must we take too seriously the ill-natured outbursts of the Press in any country. The Paris Press, for instance, does not always represent Parisian, still less French, opinion; but each paper, of course with some exceptions, is merely the advocate of this or that nominal political or commercial group, or of some not very influential politician, and in every European country the Press is much more responsive to governmental and other inspiration than our own. In any event, in spite of this prevailing tone of angry and disingenuous deprecation, we may console ourselves with the comfortable assurance that Europe, however little she may like us, cannot help respecting us as a steadfast, truth-loving, humane, and indomitable people (hear, hear); and when our detractors affect to descant upon our loss of prestige, nobody knows better than themselves that they are talking arrant nonsense." (Cheers.)

In the above our island home, teeming population, the British occupation of the "desolate places" or heritages of the earth, and the blessing that gave us the colonies, where we could live with our children and thence return (Zech. x. 9, R.V.), are all mentioned regarding our own nation, but quite unconsciously that these are some of the rich blessings God promised Israel in His holy Word. The whole is a clever, good-humoured explanation of problems which have puzzled many of us at home, and Lord Dufferin, in a few eloquent words, gives us the clue to the difficulty.

Lord Dufferin said some wise words on the necessity of preparation to defend our vast possessions throughout the world. He bids us recollect "that not only France, but Denmark, Italy, Turkey, Poland, Bulgaria, Austria, have each in turn been desecrated by the red ruin of many a bloody battle-field." Nor have India, America, China, or Japan, escaped these awful visitations. "While we, in these happy islands," have for many generations lived "our untroubled lives in blissful ignorance of what invasion means" (see 2 Sam. vii. 10), and "so can hardly believe in the ruthless ravages of war, in disaster and defeat raging through the land, with its accompaniments of disbanded armies, violated women, and burning and plundered towns." The speech was indeed a remarkable one; and yet, through it all, one sees how his lordship enjoyed his liberty, as one of the people, to lay aside his official dignities, and give his thoughts (within limits) to his fellow-townsmen. So joyous was his mood that he said, at the beginning of his address, that he felt "like a young colt turned out to grass, and was ready to kick up his heels at all authority!" Lord Dufferin has served his country well. As Governor-General of the Dominion of Canada, as Viceroy of India, as ambassador to France, to Russia, and Turkey, and in countless other positions, he has been a true patriot and a faithful public servant. All honour to this gifted son of Israel, whose Irish tongue is eloquent still, and whose wisdom is phenomenal. He tells us of the greatness and the grandeur of our country, and, knowing who this people are, we call upon our readers to praise the Lord as Israel, and to give all the glory to His name.

WHEN IS ISRAEL TO ENJOY THEIR BIRTHRIGHT BLESSINGS?

A CORRESPONDENT who is studying our subject, and has done his best to bring some of his clerical friends to take a favourable view of our case is somewhat puzzled himself in regard to one aspect of the matter. He asks for clear Scriptural guidance (one or more texts will suffice if they distinctly indicate the facts) to prove to him "that Israel's blessings" (now enjoyed as we maintain, by Great Britain), such as:—

(a) The Gates;
(b) "The place of their own;"
(c) The evangelizing function;
(d) The multitudinousness;
(e) The occupancy of "the waste places;"
(f) The lending and not borrowing;
(g) The supremacy at sea, &c., &c., were each and all to be the condition precedent to the event of—

I. Judah walking to Israel, and returning to Palestine together; and of

II. Judah's conversion to Christianity.

The difficulty resolves itself, in short, into the inquiry whether Israel of the Ten Tribes are to enjoy their birthright blessings before they are united once more with Judah, and before Judah is converted to Christ, or will it be after these two events take place?

It is clearly declared in Ezek. xxxvii. 22, that once "the Two Sticks" of that prophecy—Israel and Judah—are united by God Himself and the return takes place, then, the Lord "will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one King shall be King to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all: . . ." That being the case, the restoration of the two Houses once effected, according to Jer. iii. 18 and Hosea i. 11, will bar any further separate enjoyment of the birthright blessings either by Israel or Judah, since they will be from the hour of reunion sharers in common of all previous benefits separately enjoyed by Israel up to that date. It is clear then from this consideration that Israel's enjoyment of her peculiar blessings, called "the birthright," must be prior to Judah's union with Israel, and prior to Judah's conversion to Christ, which takes place after Judah's return to the land, as may be proved from Ezek. xxxvi. 24, 25, and Zech. x. 5, 6, R.V.

But what are Israel's birthright blessings? Just those described by our correspondent—the Gates, the multitudes, the desolate heritages, the wealth which lends but does not borrow, the empire on land and the supremacy at sea, the evangelizing functions and many other things appertaining to the Hebrew birthright, which blesses by ruling the family and rules by blessing it. These are mostly described as Joseph's heritage in Jacob's testamentary document (Gen. xlix. 22—26) and in Moses' list of blessings to fall to the tribes as recorded in Deut. xxxiii. 13—17. Jacob declared in Gen. xlix. 1, that the predictions he was inspired to make would take effect, and become vital, "in" these "latter days," but not before. All Joseph's or Ephraim's seed then must now, at the end of these latter days, known in the New Testament as "the Christian dispensation," be in enjoyment of the promised blessings which turn out to be the birthright of the Hebrew family of Jacob. Reuben was the rightful heir to take them as the "firstborn," but he sinned, and the father deposed him and conferred the birthright upon Joseph and his two sons for ever (Gen. xlviii. 19, R.V.; 1 Chron. v. 1, 2, R.V.). It comes then, to this, that the blessings belonging to the holder of the birthright must in these "latter days" be found in the grasp of the sons of Joseph as "the remnant of Israel" (Jer. xxxi. 7, R.V.).

As a matter of fact, we find that the British and American people have them all in possession. As the Scriptures cannot be broken and as God is true, the British must be therefore the House of Israel. They are enjoying the promises at the right time and in the right place, in the isles of the West, before the union with Judah, and before the restoration to the land of the two Houses together.

Stating the argument concisely, we have, as a fact, which all must admit, that prior to the disruption of the two Houses, Israel never enjoyed even for five minutes the special blessings included, as we have seen, in "the Hebrew birthright;" and, after the reunion it is obvious for reasons we have assigned that Israel cannot ever thereafter separately enjoy them, as they will be the common property then of Israel and Judah united. It follows thus, as a clear demonstration, that as Israel is bound to have a special and independent enjoyment of these birthright blessings, some time or other, it must be in the Christian dispensation—that is, now. But the sceptical inquirer may ask, Where is the proof that Joseph and Ephraim were destined to inherit the Gates, the empire, the wealth and expansion, already mentioned as part of and appertaining to, the birthright? We reply, that these things are assigned to the House of Joseph or Israel (alias Ephraim) in many parts of the Word. The mighty nation, the multitudes, the Gates, and the general blessing were conferred in general terms by God's oath in Gen. xxii. 17, 18, on the entire Twelve Tribes. In Gen. xlix, the gifts so given, were apportioned to the tribes separately, but to Joseph (and his heirs) there was allotted fruitfulness, expansion, help from God, blessings from Him, connected with the land and sea, multitudinousness, mineral wealth, superlative blessings above that of his progenitors "unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills," with military supremacy, and the "pushing" power, as well as the goring strength described by Moses in Deut. xxxiii. 13—17. The same with much detail appears in Deut. xv. 6, xxviii. 1—13; in Hosea i. 10; Isa. xviii. 1, 7; Zech. x. 6—9, and [illegible]e: plainly showing that to them was also given the power to reign over many nations, but to succumb to none. The above should satisfy the doubter and confirm the believer in our Israelitish origin. For verily, our Anglo-Saxon race does, and that exclusively, answer to the picture drawn by the prophets as to Israel's condition in "the latter days," and our race alone, without one exception, enjoys all the blessings which prior to the restoration to the land were to be ours. To the Lord let Israel give all the praise!

THE ANGLO-ISRAELITES.

THE following controversy took place in the Jewish World (London) of October 23rd and 30th, 1896:—

THE ATTACK.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—Your correspondent in your last week's issue on the above subject, like many others of the same school, for want of better knowledge of Scripture, claims that the British nation is identical with the lost House of Israel; but if he would study more of Moses and less of Hine, he would see the fallacy of that idea. How does your correspondent square his ideas with the declaration of the Eternal concerning the Ten Tribes of Israel, as recorded in Deut. xxxii. 26: "I said, I would drive them into one corner: (and consequently) I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men." This hath really been the case of the Ten Tribes, whom the King of Assyria carried captive to Halah and Habor, by the River Gozan; and of whom we have not to the present day any certain or authentic account as to their real place of abode.

Your correspondent calls our attention to that oft mistranslated passage in the 49th chapter of Genesis, which has no connection with the British nation, or those people claiming to be Christian Israelites, the word anglicised, is Shiloh, and appears thirty-one times in the Hebrew Scriptures, but always as the name of a place, and not once that of an individual; and what can the prediction of Jeremiah, "For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of Israel," have to do with Queen Victoria? She does not sit upon the throne of David, and she is no more the Queen of the Jews than any other sovereign under whose rule it is the privilege for Jews to reside. As for Her Majesty claiming descent from King David, I am aware that Edward Hine has claimed it for her, but he has claimed far too much. Our attention has been called to the Royal Arms, and we are asked if we doubted the evidence of our own eyes? There is nothing in these emblems, though some people may read many things into them that they or any other Arms were never meant to convey. And with regard to the Ottoman Empire, we know that many Christians would like to see it broken up, but the religion of Mahommad grows stronger year by year, and has a greater claim upon Abraham than Christianity, which becomes weaker as education advances. Your correspondent says: "Would that I could persuade, not only the Jews, but also my own people, that we are all of one race, by virtue of a common descent from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." Does he not know that Abraham was only one amongst the millions then existing? If he had claimed relationship with the Philistines, he would have been much nearer the mark; if he was laying claim to a piece of property with no better title deed in his possession than he has to put forth for his descent from Abraham, he would never get it. The lost Ten Tribes had the covenant deed sealed in their flesh, which is an everlasting covenant, a title deed not possessed by the above claimants; but even if their ancestors had had that covenant seal in their flesh, their offspring have lost it, and hence all claim to the promised blessing of Israel. Yours obediently,

D. FRAZER.

THE REPLIES AND DEFENCE.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—I am much obliged to Mr. D. Frazer for noticing my letter, which you kindly permitted to appear in your issue of last week.

In reply thereto, may I tell Mr. Frazer that I have little or no acquaintance with the writings of the late Mr. Hine. I am primarily indebted to the writings of Philo-Israel, Mr. E. W. Bird, an ex-Indian judge and the leader of our movement, for my knowledge of the theory of Anglo-Israelism. I am, however, well versed in the writings of Moses and the prophets, and from the instruction which I have derived from a frequent study of them, I venture to reply to the criticisms of your correspondent.

I admit that the passage contained in Deut. xxxii. 26, "I said I would scatter them afar; I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men," is applicable to my people of the lost House of Israel, and also that they were "carried captive to Halah and Habor, by the River Gozan," but I cannot acquiesce in the statement of Mr. Frazer that, "we have not to the present day any certain or authentic account as to their real place of abode." 2 Esdras xiii. 40—46, gives an account of the Ten Tribes crossing the narrow passages of the Euphrates, and after a long journey of a year and a half arriving at a region called Arsareth, which place we believe to be identical with the city of Arsareth, on the River Sereth, a tributary of the Danube, which flows into the Black Sea. In proof of this statement, I may mention that tombstones have been discovered in the Crimea, which are at present placed in the Museum at St. Petersburg, and which bear the following inscription: "This is the tombstone of Buki, the son of Iszhak the Priest. May his rest be in Eden at the time of the salvation of Israel. In the year 702 of the years of our exile" (A.D. 6). This could not possibly refer to the House of Judah or the Jews, as they were at that time in Palestine; it must therefore refer to the House of Israel of the Ten Tribes. Further, it is evident that, in order to have crossed over "the narrow passages of the Euphrates," they must have taken a north-westerly direction.

From Arsereth they passed into the British Isles under the various names of Danes, Saxons, Normans, &c., and are now known as the British people. The prophets declare that they were to be found in the "isles of the sea," "north-west" from Palestine, "a multitudinous people," "lending money to many nations," &c. (vide Jer. iii. 12; Isaiah xlix. 12, 24, 15; Hosea i. 10; Deut. xv. 6).

Mr. Frazer alludes to the mis-translation of Gen xlix. 10, which, he says, "has no connection with the British nation, or those people claiming to be Christian Israelites; the (Hebrew) word, anglicised Shiloh, always applies to a place, and not once to that of an individual." My answer to this objection is, that I never applied the passage to the British nation, but to the Royal Family, who must, by virtue of their position, wherever they reign over Israel, be descended from Judah. Whether Shiloh refers to a place or to the Messiah, as some people think, does not affect my argument, as this blessing in any case refers to Judah and his descendants, who were to possess the sceptre, and no one else.

Mr. Frazer asks, "What can the prediction of Jeremiah, 'For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel,' have to do with Queen Victoria? She does not sit upon the throne of David, and she is no more the Queen of the Jews than any other sovereign under whose rule it is the privilege for Jews to reside." It is here that I again join issue with your correspondent. Mr. Frazer indulges in objections without giving reasons; I, on the other hand, ask for a reasonable answer to a reasonable question. Where is the everlasting throne of David? It is as certain as the Bible is true, that the Royal Family, in accordance with the promise declared by Nathan (2 Samuel vii. 10—17), and repeated again by Jeremiah (chap. xxxiii.) on the very eve of the apparent extinction of the Royal Family in the person of Zedekiah, that some representative of the seed of David must be reigning over the House of Israel, which House, too, must also exist as a nation at the present time, in common with the ordinances of heaven, to which a comparison was made, and which are likewise in existence at the present day. Again I ask, where is the throne and seed of David? It is very certain it does not exist over the House of Judah or the Jews, but if my argument is correct—that the British nation is identical with the lost House of Israel—then the prophecy is fulfilled by the fact that Her Majesty the Queen, who, by virtue of her Davidic descent—to which she lays claim—is at present reigning over the House of Israel, and the promise is made good. As an Englishman, I am conceited enough to declare that I should have thought Mr. Frazer would have been delighted to welcome such a suggestion, instead of repudiating it.

I may add that I drew attention to the Arms of our Royal Family as a curious confirmation of the fact of her claim to be descended from King David, and by virtue of which I again assert that Her Majesty is as much the Queen of the Jews as of the British people.

As a Christian and a humanitarian, I shall most certainly be delighted to see the Ottoman Empire broken up, and the sooner the better; though I cannot accept Mr. Frazer's truly surprising assertion, "that the religion of Mohammed gets stronger year by year, and has a greater claim upon Abraham than Christianity, which becomes weaker as education advances": but as that is merely a matter of opinion, which every man has a right to express, I need not discuss it; moreover, it does not affect the subject matter under discussion.

What Mr. Frazer intends to convey by his remark, "that Abraham was only one amongst the millions then existing," I am at a loss to understand; but when he makes the startling assertion that, "if I am laying claim to a piece of property with no better title in my possession than I have put forth for my descent from Abraham, I would never get it," I am fairly struck dumb with amazement! On what other ground, I should like to ask, can any part of the chosen people, whether they belong to the House of Judah or the House of Israel, lay claim to and expect ultimately to come into possession of, either the Holy Land or the Promised Land, except on the promise made to our forefather Abraham and his seed, in the elect line of Isaac, Jacob, and the children of Israel? Surely, if anyone needs to study Moses and the prophets, it is Mr. Frazer, and not I.

Finally, your correspondent states that, "the lost Ten Tribes had the covenant deed sealed in their flesh, which is an everlasting covenant, a title deed not possessed by the above claimants; but even if their ancestors had had that covenant sealed in their flesh, their offspring have lost it, and hence all claim to the promised blessing of Israel." I thank him for the admission, whilst denying his conclusion, as it is a strong argument in support of my case. We are told by Hosea (chap. i.) that the House of Israel was to be divorced from the Mosaic covenant and become "Lo-ammi," "not My people," whilst the Jews were to have "mercy" shown them, which they experienced by a return from the Babylonian captivity; the latter were never divorced, but remain under the Mosaic covenant to the present day. The House of Israel, on the other hand, we are further informed by Hosea, were to be as "Jezreel"—i.e., "I will scatter"—and then to become like the people amongst whom they were cast—"Gentiles"—a distinction which implied that they were not under the Mosaic covenant like the Jews; and they also lost the rite of circumcision. The prophets Isaiah (chap. liv.) and Hosea (chap. ii.) declare that the House of Israel was to be "allured into the wilderness," "spoken comfortably to," "re-betrothed in righteousness," "to call her Maker 'Ishi'"—i.e., husband; and that in this new condition, previous to the return of the people (Jezreel), accompanied with their brethren of Judah, they were to become "as the sand of the sea," and a spreading, colonising people. Jeremiah also predicts: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the House of Israel after those days; I will write My law in their inward parts, and in their heart will I write it: . . . . for I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin will I remember no more" (chapter xxxi. 31—34). From the fact that the House of Israel, in the repetition of this promise, is mentioned alone and not in conjunction with the House of Judah, as in the preceding 32nd verse, it is a fair inference that the House of Israel would come under the new covenant before the House of Judah. This accounts for the British nation of Israel being Christians, whilst the Jews remain under the Mosaic covenant; the latter bear the rite of circumcision in their flesh, whilst we British Christian Israelites bear it in our hearts.

I trust that my explanation will constitute a further claim, not only upon Mr. Frazer, but also upon the vast number of your Jewish readers, in securing the admission from them that I have the right, as an Englishman, to again subscribe myself, your brother Israelite.

Yours obediently,

H. H. PAIN.

The Stock Exchange, 26th October, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—In replying to a correspondent, who believes in the British nation being identical with the lost House of Israel, Mr. D. Frazer, in last week's issue, says that the word Shiloh, mentioned in the 49th of Genesis, is the name of a place and not that of an individual, is, to my mind and reading, perfectly correct. Much has been said and written on the subject of "Until Shiloh come," and many of your readers will recollect the interesting discussion we had in your valued journal 14 years ago on the topic. Unfortunately, the correspondence ceased rather abruptly at that time, or otherwise I would have developed the argument, and probably have brought to light a beautiful and cogent truth. Later on I may have the privilege and pleasure to expound this interesting subject to your readers.

Meanwhile, I will content myself by touching upon one other point in Mr. Frazer's letter, wherein he says, "For want of better knowledge of Scripture, the aforesaid correspondent, like many others of the same school, claims that the British nation is identical with the lost House of Israel; but if he would study more of Moses and less of Hine, he would see the fallacy of that idea." Well, if a conversion is ever to take place, it will never come through Mr. Frazer's feeble attempt at Scripture exposition. To tell us that the Eternal would make the remembrance of them (ten-tribed Israel) cease from among men, and that "this hath really been the case of the Ten Tribes," is to exhibit a superficial acquaintance with Moses. If Mr. Frazer will carefully read the whole of Moses' song in that 32nd chapter of Deuteronomy, he will see therein an effusion of curses and blessings peculiarly intermingled. For while the Eternal says, "I would drive them into corners," not "into one corner," as Mr. Frazer has it, and "make the remembrance of them to cease from among men," He further on says, "He will be merciful unto His land and to His people" (ver. 43). National curses and punishments pronounced against Israel and Judah are limited in their duration, and cease with national obedience and repentance.

Does Mr. Frazer look forward with hope to the "promised blessing of Israel" that he speaks of? Does he really expect a new and blessed era to dawn upon the Jews at the long looked for Scripturally-promised restoration? If so, then permit me to tell him that that event will never nationally take place until Judah discovers and acknowledges Ten-Tribed Israel. A partial return of Jews to their own land will assuredly take place, but the blessing will only accompany the national restoration. Innumerable Scripture passages can be quoted to prove this.

If Mr. Frazer wishes to grasp the truth, let him study Moses in conjunction with the prophets, and then, and not until then, will the scales fall off his eyes, and light from the Eternal gleam into his mind, which can produce a faith and hope that will be unassailable.

Yours obediently,

October 27th, 1896. ALEXANDER MACPHAIL.

In the above our readers can see that a Jew and a couple of Anglo-Israelites are at last fairly at issue. The Jew has brought his arguments, such as they are, to the front, and our friends have, with effect, opened their batteries upon him. It is clear that our Jewish opponent, Mr. Frazer, is badly furnished with, and short of, arguments. He makes round assertions, but the grounds for his conclusions are not forthcoming. It is satisfactory to see from the reference to Deut. xxxii. 26, that Mr. Frazer admits that the Ten Tribes have been, and are still, "lost." But, as a well-read Jew, he ought to allow that the Ten Tribes are to be found, and, with the House of Judah, are to return to "The Land." Hosea i. 11; Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28; Isa. xviii. 1—7; Jer. iii. 18; Zech. x. 6—10; Zeph. iii. 9, 10; all these, and other passages from the Hebrew prophets besides, declare to us that the last, final, and blessed return to the land of the inheritance will be by the Houses of Israel and Judah united, to form, of two nations and kingdoms, one nation and one kingdom, in the Land of Israel, for ever. That the British people and empire are the people and empire of lost Israel is a matter of evidence. The prophecies of Moses and his successors describe what the destiny of the House of Israel was to be, and history past and current enable Mr. Frazer and ourselves to judge whether we have the lost people before us or not. We affirm, and give our reasons for it, that it is even so. Mr. Frazer denies the fact, but fails to tell us where our weak points are. Assertion is not argument; nor is unsupported affirmation capable of proving anything at all. Granted that the Ten Lost Tribes discarded circumcision. What then? They incurred the penalty prescribed in Gen. xvii. 14, for their act, and were "cut off" from God's people, and became as "Gentiles." They were reduced to the position of God's "Lo-ammi" (not a people) of Hosea i. 10. But they did not thereby forfeit their birthright or their blessing secured to them by God's oath to "Abraham and his seed for ever," sworn perfectly unconditionally to them, in Gen. xxii. 15--18, and by 1 Chron. v. 1, 2. Under that title they succeed as heirs-at-law with the House of Judah; and verily their claim can never be set aside! The British people answer to the description given by the Hebrew prophets of the "lost," but soon to be acknowledged, House of Israel. They are now discovered in their island home—in "the isles of the west," as described in Isa. xxiv. 15—a powerful, wealthy, commercial, conquering people; already "a nation with a company" or "fulness of" (daughter) "nations" ranged beside them; "lending to many nations, borrowing from none;" "reigning over many nations, subject to none;" and blessed in all possible imaginable ways, as recorded in Deut. xv. 6, xxviii. 1—14, and Zech. x. 6—9; holding the empire of the sea, by reason of their possession of "the Gate of their enemies" (Gen. xxii. 17).

We follow not Hine in this matter, or Philo-Israel either, for the matter of that, but only the Word of the living God, of which the Jews were once the God-honoured custodians, but now in possession and in the keeping of the British-Israelites, for the use, thank God, of Mr. Frazer and his people "first," and then for that of all the nations of the world, to whom the God of the Hebrews is sending us as His honoured messengers. To Him be all the praise.

BRITISH PRE-EMINENCE AND COLONIZATION.

By John S. Anderson.

We cannot resist, even at the risk of being thought tedious with so many repetitions, calling the attention of the readers of the Banner of Israel to a splendid "blind evidence" article in the Standard of this day.

It is written on the telegraphic announcement that Mr. Cecil Rhodes purposes leaving Fort Salisbury in the course of next week on his way to this country.

After expressing great admiration and sympathy with his successful efforts in assisting to subdue the rebellion in Rhodesia, the back of which is now assuredly broken, the writer proceeds thus:—

"What his services have been to this country and to the British Empire, is a matter of universal notoriety, and they amply account for the vindictive enmity with which he is assailed by those who envy and those who deprecate the greatness of the English name. The problem he had before him at the Cape was one of the most difficult that ever confronted an active and responsible statesman; and, up to the fatal moment when its beneficent action was interrupted, his policy seemed to promise the accomplishment of the one end which has been pursued by every one who takes an intelligent view of South African politics. . . .

"It is not possible to dissociate altogether the madcap incursion into the Transvaal from the insurrection which quickly followed in Rhodesia. But the native rebellion was met with splendid promptitude; and, perhaps, the 'vital spirit of man, that predominant factor in the regulation of the world's affairs, was never more strikingly displayed than in confronting and suppressing a mutiny covering hundreds of thousands of square miles with a handful of improvised combatants. But these were Englishmen; and if they had required encouraging to intrepid deeds, they would have found the necessary stimulus in the language, the attitude, and the action of Mr. Rhodes. As he himself said at the time, his first duty was to confront the native rebellion. When it was crushed, then, but not till then, would he 'face the music.' The rising is practically at an end, and Mr. Rhodes is preparing to keep his word. He will be in England at about the anniversary of the singular and ill-judged exploit which compels him to visit us again.

"There is much in the history of South Africa to exasperate the spirit of Englishmen. A Jove principium. The mischief began with Mr. Gladstone; and the pusillanimity that followed Majuba Hill has been the parent of a thousand misfortunes. Every attempt to retrieve them, being either undertaken at the wrong moment or in the wrong manner, has only made the situation worse. But when all necessary allowance has been made for the vexation inflicted on a proud race by incompetent Statesmen and shortsighted buccaneers, South Africa, like other portions of the globe, testifies, in an eloquent and unmistakeable manner, to the colonising capacity of the English people. It has frequently been asked of late why we are, to put the matter mildly, so little loved by certain aspiring communities. The answer is much more simple than most people seem to be aware of. The lack of affection arises from the circumstance that these aspirants find that they labour in vain, more especially in the direction whither they are guided by their ambition. There is a ludicrous disproportion between the Colonial possessions of England and those of any other State, or, indeed, of all other States. Other peoples do not possess the secret of colonising and conquering, because it is an instinct, an impulse, not an arbitrary or artificial determination. Englishmen are colonising and conquering Africa because they cannot help it. Germans and Frenchmen are not doing so, because, though they try very hard, they do not grasp the right method. The English Colonial Empire is alive, and thrives and grows of its own inherent vitality. French or German colonising is, at best, an ingenious and spirited piece of mechanism. It is not organic; it is only mechanical. Hence it is always costly, and generally abortive. To state this fact is, doubtless, not to give pleasure to certain of our less friendly critics. But it is a fact as plain as the sun in the heavens, or that this country is an island, and that France and Germany are not. Algeria is a standing proof of what France can do with a large colony after fifty years of effort. It has officials, soldiers, barracks, theatres, cafés; but it is not appropriated and absorbed as numerous portions of the earth's surface have been, and still are, by Englishmen. We have an immense tradition for colonising behind us, and we turn it energetically to account. Mr. Rhodes is not a popular personage either in Paris or Berlin, but there is not a German or a French advocate of a forward colonial policy who does not wish in his heart that he was a Frenchman or a German. Non ex quovis ligno fit Mercurius; and true colonisers spring only from free communities."

What less can be said about this than that it is a marvellous "British-Israel" apology; only it lacks the essence of the whole, of the Source whence springs this wonderful aptitude for colonising, as well as supremacy possessed by the British nation, fulfilling amongst numerous other prophecies that from Micah v. 8 at the head of the BANNER OF ISRAEL, "and the remnant of Jacob, . . . both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver!" Israel, praise ye the Lord!

A LONDON VICAR ENCOURAGES ANGLO-ISRAEL DISCUSSIONS.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—Of all the late series of encouragements I have received, none to my mind has the value of the following:—The vicar of St. John's Kilburn, the Rev. J. S. Moore, a large hearted Irishman, out-and-out for Christ, going into the bye-ways and slums to seek his flock, said in reply to my question when Captain Stephens of the Church Army introduced me as an "Anglo-Israelite," "Oh, indeed, I do know what an Anglo-Israelite means; I have many dear and respected friends who hold those views, and though as yet I don't thoroughly accept the view, I have found those who hold them are true, loyal Churchmen, earnest Bible students, and in every way desirable members of the Church, and moreover, I will put my parish room at your disposal for a lecture whenever you like, for I want the subject thoroughly ventilated." Now "tip-top," as the foregoing expressions are, the value is in the character from whom they came. This case means the force of ten men combined. Here we get an influential man, with all the machinery at his command, and his sympathetic introduction to his parishoners; he proved his boldness of action by allowing me, then and there, before 150 of his parishoners and his curates to get on the platform in the hall where the introduction took place, and give a brief outline of Anglo-Israel Truth. Now are there any of our people within convenient distance? if so, will they give such a splendid man a taste of the support we justly plume ourselves in sustaining through years of contempt we have suffered from some of our clericals. I wish I were near enough to throw myself into his general work, if he would accept me! But distance and the fact that the Church Army are treating me with kindness, confidence, beyond all I could have expected, the fact that I am attacking tooth and nail, all their officers, and undoubtedly gaining them over fast; this, I say, ties me to my present work; but do let me beg those who live near St. John's, Kilburn, to seek the honour of an interview with Mr. Moore, and they will find him no "wishy washy" time-server! London has been waiting for such a man and opportunity.

I have to-night returned from a lecture I gave, as announced, at Kennington and was delighted to find our much respected Vice-President Dr. Heywood Smith, was among the supporters. Now, dear brother Anglo-Israelites, take off your coats, roll your sleeves up; no more skulking! do a little fighting! This, my dear Philo-Israel, is the rather lengthy letter I respectfully ask you to publish, if approved of by you. Yours very sincerely,

R. MACKWORTH.

A TRANSCRIPT ERROR IN BIBLE.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—In the second Book of Chronicles, xxi. 2, xxviii. 19, two kings of Judah, Jehoshaphat and Ahaz, are designated kings of Israel. As this mistake is somewhat curious, I have looked up several commentators for an explanation of the matter; and as their comments are of some interest to BANNER readers, I will, with your kind permission, append them to this letter.

Cook's Commentary refers to 2 Chron. xxi. 4, thus:—"And divers also of the princes of Israel should read Judah. The author of Chronicles often uses the generic term, where the specific one would have been more appropriate. See xii. 6, xx. 34, and xxi. 2, where Jehoshaphat is called king of Israel. 2 Chron. xxviii. 19, we read, 'Ahaz king of Israel.' This is a remarkable instance of that lax use of the word Israel by our author [of Chronicles] which has already been frequently noticed." Again, 2 Chron. xxviii. 23: "But they were the ruin of him and all Israel, i.e., JUDAH; verse 27: "but they brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings of Israel, that is, Judah."

2 Chron. xxi. 2, in the Annotated Paragraph Bible, is noticed as follows: "Jehoshaphat king of Israel: an error in transcribing for king of Judah. And also Ahaz, 2 Chron. xxviii. 19. Verse 27: Here, as in xxi. 2, Israel is put for Judah." An Old Testament Commentary says: "2 Chron. xxi. 2 we have king of Israel (so xx. 34) where we should have expected Judah. See, too, end of verse 4." Matthew Henry's Commentary points out that the princes of Judah mentioned in 2 Chron. xvii. 7 are, in xix. 8 and in xxi. 2, called princes of Israel instead of Judah because they were men of integrity, Israelites indeed.

Looking into the different versions of the Bible, Jehoshaphat and Ahaz are correctly described (2 Chron. xxi. 2, and xxviii. 19) as kings of Judah in the Septuagint, the Vulgate, Wycliffe's Bible, and a Bible published in Dublin, 1816, which is described as being translated from the Latin Vulgate and compared with the Hebrew, Greek, and other editions in divers languages. Possibly some of your readers may know of other editions wherein Jehoshaphat and Ahaz are properly called kings of Judah in the verses referred to. Not to intrude further on your space,

Believe me, dear Sir, Yours very truly,

E. REEP.

"AHAZ KING OF ISRAEL."

IN 2 Chron. xxi. 2, Jehoshaphat king of Judah is styled "king of Israel," and in chap. xxviii. 19, Ahaz is mentioned as "king of Israel." The princes of Judah, also, are called "princes of Israel." Both these kings ruled over Judah and had no jurisdiction over the northern kingdom. Because of this, the Alexandrian translators made the correction "king of Judah," which is historically right, but textually wrong. It is an evidence of the correctness of the Massoretic text, from which our versions were translated, that the unhistoric error is retained in it, as it is reproduced in our Bibles.

Why did the compilers of the books of Chronicles give a title to the kings of Judah which was not given in the earlier books of the Kings, and which is contradicted by the context where Judah is alone under consideration?

The Chronicles were compiled after the return from Babylon, and the spirit of exclusiveness which was rebuked by Ezekiel when the Jews were in Babylon, and which caused them to say to the House of Israel, "Get you far from the Lord: to us is the land given in possession" (or occupancy), was intensified when the second temple was built. Israel had been cast out, Judah alone was restored; and the ambition to exercise a suzerainty over the whole of the Land of Promise was most natural.

It is quite possible, and even probable, that the jealousy of the Samaritans and their opposition to the rebuilding of Jerusalem, may have had a political as well as a religious origin, such as would be caused by any assumption of right to their territory.

The chroniclers, animated by this spirit, would fix upon any claim that had been put forward before the Captivity; and when recording the names of kings of Judah who reigned after the overthrow of the northern kingdom, they would give them a title to which they aspired, although it was unreal. Similarly, the kings of England were styled "of France" for centuries after that title was no more than a name,

The House of David never recovered its right to rule all Israel. Circumstances were too strong for it, and it had to yield to the inevitable. But the desire to re-unite "the kingdom" to Judah was always present. When Jehoshaphat king of Judah made alliance with Ahab king of Israel, and cemented that alliance by the marriage of his son Jehoram with Ahab's daughter Athaliah, it was evident that the desire to re-unite the two monarchies was the object aimed at. Jehoshaphat considered himself king of Israel de jure, Ahab was king de facto. If all went well, the grandson of both kings might rule the whole land.

Thus, also, in the reign of Ahaz, when anarchy existed in the northern kingdom, came a fitting opportunity for one who was descended from Ahab and Jehoshaphat, to claim the title, and the record at chap. xxviii. shows that he did so. In the reign of his son Hezekiah we find a further attempt to bring all Israel to Jerusalem to keep the Passover (chap. xxx. 1); nor can it be doubted that a political as well as a religious motive influenced the effort.

But these projects having failed, and Ephraim-Israel having been deported to the Caspian, the two tribes, upon their return, would say, "To us is the land given in possession;" and their writers would revive any claim that the ruling House of Judah had ever made, and mention the kings who made it as "kings of Israel."

Similarly, the great men of Judah would call themselves princes of Israel; being Jews they were of Israel, but then, as now, desiring to step into Ephraim's birthright.

The petty politics of men cannot defeat the great purpose of the Lord God of Israel, which decreed the total severance of the houses, and yet promised the perpetuity of the Davidic line, until the House of Judah walks to the House of Israel in order that together and under one head they may re-possess the land, all envy having ceased.

THE VALUE OF A TRADE MAY DECREASE BUT NOT THE QUANTITY.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO,—I enclose an extract from the Cape Argus, just to hand, which gives full particulars as to our present position as to trade. It wisely takes both imports and exports.

Yours truly,

W. L. BLORE.

Sandown, 7th Nov., 1896.

"THE DECADENCE BOGEY.

"If proof were wanted of the splendid stability of British trade in the face of foreign competition it is to be found in the Board of Trade returns. The Gardeners' Chronicle points out that the decadence notion, that 'England is going to the dogs' and that we shall soon have to close up shop and hand our goodwill over to Germany and France, has been a trifle obtrusive of late, but to-day the 'Bogey' is rapidly beating a retreat in face of the tremendous mass of figures contained in the Board of Trade returns. If we take the imports solely for home consumption and exports of goods manufactured at home, we find that between 1875 and 1879 British imports and exports amounted to £15 10s. 4d. per annum per head of population; from 1880 to 1884 the figure was £16 8s. 6d., from 1885 to 1889 it was £14 17s. 10d.; and from 1890 to 1894, £15 10s. 2d. per head. The average gross annual total from 1890 to 1894, which was £715,000,000, is the highest ever attained. With some fluctuations the table records continuous progress and prosperity. Now for a few facts concerning Germany. From 1875 to 1879 the amount of German imports and exports was £7 9s. 1d. per head, as against our £15 10s. 4d., and after falling to something below £7, it rose again in 1890-94 to £7 4s. 11d.—less than in 1870—against England's £15 10s. 2d. The foreign trade of the German Empire is less than half that of Great Britain.

"The Gardener's Chronicle further points out how delusive it is to suppose that lower price totals shows a necessary decrease of trade. The value of a trade may decrease, but not the quantity. Germany may take greater risks and offer cheaper goods on purpose to get trade, but in the long run it will be found that risky trade is bad trade, and that cheapness too often means rubbish. However, the Board of Trade statistics prove conclusively that there is no decadence in either value or the volume of British trade."—Cape Argus, 14th Oct., 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—Since I wrote you last from this distant field, I am happy to say that the good cause is enlarging its influence to a considerable extent. We have organised a Society here, which, though comparatively a small beginning, bids fair to do some good. This Society is called "the Prince Albert Anglo-Israelite and Literary Society," and meets regularly on the second and fourth Wednesdays of each month. The officers for the current year are as follows:—President, James Stewart; Vice-President, Miss A. Keyworth; Recording Secretary, H. G. Dawson; Corresponding Secretary and Librarian, Fred Keyworth. We hope that if this reaches you in time that you will insert this Society in the Anglo-Israel Almanack. We have already considerable Anglo-Israelite literature, thanks to the Anglo-Israel Distribution Society, and I am happy to state that reading matter relating to our identification with the lost House of Israel is eagerly sought after here. This gives us great hopes that our Society will increase in membership and be the means of doing much good.

Most thinking people here, as well as in other parts of the world, are anxiously awaiting developments in what is called, "The Eastern Question," and eagerly discuss every item of news from that quarter. To us who are distant spectators of events happening in Turkey at present, we have strong grounds for believing that "the times of the Gentiles" are about ended, and that "through much tribulation," it may be, the Almighty is about to "set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people." That there is something extraordinary about to take place shortly, seems to be a universal belief among thinking men; but, strangely enough, a great many are loathe to believe that the hand of God is directing every event that is taking place! It seems that our clergy, who ought to be the first to study the signs of the times (as a dear friend, who wrote to me lately, puts it), "our clergy are busy weeping over the grave of lost Israel, when they ought to be shouting anthems of praise to God for His marvellous lovingkindness to His people in these latter days." Still we thank God there are many noble exceptions among the clergy both in England and America. You have many earnest workers among you in Great Britain, who are doing a great work in awakening the people to see that He has not forgotten His people; while in America there are many earnest workers, among the chief of them being the Rev. Thomas Rosling Howlett, whose works have done good service in awakening many to see our glorious inheritance as the children of promise. Upon the whole let us hope that before long, both our rulers and people will be led to see that God has not been slack concerning His promises made to our forefathers.

I remain, sir, yours respectfully,

JAMES STEWART.

NATIONAL PESSIMISM AND SELF-DEPRECIATION AMONGST THE BRITISH-ISRAELITES.

IT is notorious that among a noisy class among us, and at certain times of crisis, we have many indulging in a spirit of pessimism nationally, and raising wild cries that we are "losing ground in commerce, and likely ere long to give place to Germany, in wealth, in commercial success, and colonial power." On the other hand, there is another able and noisy class, who tell us that we are too prosperous, wealthy, and successful as "land grabbers," and that our proper policy to right ourselves with the world around us, is to give up Cyprus, come away from Egypt, and abandon all attempts to hold beyond sea possessions which foreign nations do not wish us to occupy; but would ever after regard us with love and affection if we would only consent to do the right thing, and give them up at once.

Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P. for Bodmin, in his letter to the Times of Oct. 19, leads the way in making these self-depreciating propositions. Our hold of Cyprus, and above all, our continued stay in Egypt, our occupation during the last 20 years in "snatching continents, pegging out claims," interfering as missionaries of order and peace, and then settling down in permanent possession, acquiring 2,600,000 square smiles of territory, which Lord Rosebery described as "undigested Empire." These things, in Mr. Courtney's view, reduce us to absolute impotence as a nation, since they give us a character among the nations which proves us to be untrustworthy at Cairo, and therefore, not to be trusted at Constantinople. All this absurd argumentation published by a Member of Parliament, is fashionable among some of our national pessimists, but he forgets how and why we got into Egypt in 1882, what we have done there since in the interests of Europe and Egypt, and that our retirement from Egypt now, to please the French, would be the ruin of that land, put in jeopardy our Indian and Colonial Empires to the East and South-East of Aden, besides working grievous injury to the creditors of Egypt in Europe. The argument applied to our own nation, in respect to Cyprus and Egypt, should, in justice, be used first by Mr. Courtney in regard to France, Germany, Austria, and Russia. The Times stated the matter well, on Oct. 19th, in these words:—

If renunciation is to be a preliminary condition of trust, why should this country be the only one called upon, in this sanctimonious style, to buy confidence by surrenders? The position of France in Tunis has a considerable similarity to that of England in Egypt. Moreover, if Mr. Courtney is right, the Austrians must be called upon to give up Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Germans Alsace and Lorraine, the French Savoy and Nice, the Russians all that they have obtained in Europe and Asia during the past twenty years, and to make them over, "as a guarantee of good faith," to some ostensible form of independent government. The demand for "princes," if this policy were to prevail, would become exceedingly keen, and the supply of "civil lists" on the generous system contemplated by Mr. Courtney would tax the resources of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and of the Finance Ministers of other States. But these considerations will hardly trouble Mr. Courtney, who looks upon England as "humiliated" because her statesmen admit that she is incapable of facing all the Powers of Europe in war.

In regard to the gratitude and friendship of the nations as a return for our proposed self-sacrifice respecting Cyprus and Egypt, we have but to recollect what we realised from Germany after our surrender to her of Heligoland, which was, we were told, to cement friendship with her for ever! We have, it seems, the undying hatred of Germany to-day, because we mean to defend our rights in the Transvaal! We gave over Madagascar to the tender mercies of the French to propitiate her in regard to Zanzibar and our Protectorate there. We have had nothing but insults and hostility from France ever since! We gave back the Ionian Islands to Greece; but "Prince Bismarck saw in the act a sign of approaching decay in the British power." We have allowed other nations besides France to have even now a voice in the disposal of Egyptian finances. Yet these very Powers refuse to let us use the revenues of Egypt which we have secured for her by our splendid administration of her revenues; and to thwart our nation's efforts to restore to Egypt the territories of the Soudan which our Government allowed to lapse from her authority in recent times, they refuse us power to pay for the late military operations out of the accumulated income of the Egyptian State. The policy of France and her helpers is, however, very short-sighted! We shall nationally have to pay these charges ourselves, and so have another reason for continuing in the country; not only because we have bled for Egypt, and given it prosperity instead of the red ruin and bankruptcy she was suffering before we interfered; but because we shall have now spent our money to help her. Our security will be Egypt's revenues, and "some day, we can send in our bill to Egypt, and get it paid at our leisure." Mr. Chamberlain, in his short address, during Mr. Goschen's inaugural speech at Birmingham, on "International Prejudice," reported in the London papers on October 23rd, made some judicious observations on our national condition. "He believed," he said, "in national education, but much more in our national character. As long as the English people maintain the qualities of the Anglo-Saxon race, so long shall I as one not sympathise with those who are constantly predicting evil." Unfortunately, neither Mr. Goschen nor Mr. Chamberlain thought for a moment of the part that the God of Israel is playing in reference to His people Israel, or realised that the British Anglo-Saxon race were and are they. In the light of the promises of God to Israel, pessimism has no place at all in the conditions, prospects, and destiny of our nation, being Israel. God has promised her blessings innumerable, without the smallest condition attached. Being Israel obedient, which the blood of Christ, their Daysman and Redeemer has made them, they are a nation whom God has engaged to bless, to multiply, to strengthen by the gift of the Gates, so that three Empires shall be their's, namely, that of the sea, of the colonies, and of the heathen world. He has given them wealth and supremacy over the nations (Deut. xv. 6, R.V.). Spiritual gifts, too, valuable beyond conception, namely, the Word or oracles of God in custody, the Sabbaths, the laws, and the Gospel of Christ, to publish and teach among all nations and all the families of the earth. These gifts suffice, and leave all ideas of pessimism aside, making ours "the head and not the tail, above only but not beneath," "set high above all the nations," and that by the hand of God Almighty Himself (Deut. xxviii. 1, 13, R.V.). To indulge in pessimism in regard to blessings God Himself has given us as His free gift, and to depreciate ourselves in matters wherein God has set us as a nation high above all the rest, is neither wise nor grateful towards our glorious King and Redeemer, the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the Leader and Guide of His really blind people; and the comfort is, that He who cannot lie has promised that He will guide us to the end, but never, no, never leave us, nor forsake us. To Him let Israel give all the praise (Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.).

OUR NEW YEAR'S DOUBLE NUMBER will be published January 6th. The Supplement will be a sheet illustrating the Emblems of the Twelve Tribes. We believe this will be found a valuable illustrated sheet, not only for students of Our Identity with Lost Israel, but to all interested in the Study of the Scriptures. With this Number we enclose a programme of our New Year's Number, and our publishers will gladly send a packet post free to any person able to usefully distribute the same.

"PERPLEXITY."

IN a letter just to hand from our well known friend L.P. the following remarks were made:—"Was there ever an historical record of a time when the word 'perplexity' was as applicable as it is now? There has been distress of nations and a call to defend themselves, and so forth, during the progress of wars in Europe. But now the peoples themselves are fairly puzzled and cry out, 'What shall we do? What can we do? Not this, or we shall surely bring on a European war! not that, or England will annex Constantinople,' and so on. There is extreme 'perplexity' on all sides, and the times respond wonderfully to our Lord's words in Luke xxi. 25, &c., R.V., "There shall be signs in sun, and moon, and stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, in perplexity for the roaring of the sea and the billows; men fainting for fear and for expectation of the things which are coming on the world, for the powers of the heavens shall be shaken."

The Times newspaper of September 17 last, also testified inadvertently to the condition of perplexity to which public writers were being reduced in consequence of the doubtful character of the alternatives which public affairs present to their view. The Times of September 17th, presents to us the opinions of Lord Hugh Cecil, M.P. (the son of Lord Salisbury), whose political views concur with those of his father, and the proposals of an out and out opponent of the present Government, Sir Charles Dilke, M.P. In both will be noticed "perplexity" and uncertainty as to what course it would be proper and right for this country to pursue in regard to the Armenian Massacres, and the frightful atrocities of the Sultan, whom Mr. Gladstone always designates "the Assassin," and his "unspeakable Turks."

"THE ARMENIAN MASSACRES.

"It is understood that Lord Hugh Cecil, M.P., who was invited to attend the forthcoming indignation meeting at St. James's-hall, and who has been staying at Walmer Castle with the Prime Minister, has sent the following letter to the secretary of the Byron Society:—

"'Walmer Castle, Kent, Sept. 14, 1896.

"'Dear Sir,—I am much obliged to you for the kind invitation which you have sent me, and I much regret that pressure of other engagements prevents my accepting it. Every Englishman must share in the generous indignation that has been aroused by the atrocities perpetrated under the infamous government of the Sultan. It is most earnestly to be wished that that indignation may now cease to be confined to our own country. Unhappily it would seem that we should be dangerously misleading the Armenians if we made them believe that England alone can save them. Lamentable as it is, it appears to be the fact that there is strictly no hope for them till feeling abroad at least approximates to the excitement here. Trusting this may soon happen, I am yours faithfully,

"'HUGH CECIL.'

"Sir Charles Dilke, M.P., has forwarded the following letter to a correspondent who wrote to him for an expression of opinion as to the action which the Goverment should take in view of the recent massacres of Armenians in Constantinople:—

"'Docket Eddy, Shepperton, Sept. 15, 1896.

"Dear Sir,—I have kept back your letter for a few days, because it needed a more detailed reply than the majority of the great number of letters on all kinds of political subjects which an active member of Parliament receives.

"'In reply to you I have to say that I hope to be able to support the Government of my country in a firm and well-considered policy, though their conduct in respect of the weakness of that very Fleet on which we must rely does not encourage me to form too favourable a view of the probability of its adoption. In addition to the weakness of the Fleet, having regard to the present position and unpopularity of our country, one of the chief difficulties in the way of the Government must be the remembrance of the fickleness of public opinion. Twenty years ago—in a few months—public opinion was fiercely Bulgarian and fiercely anti-Russian, to the verge in each case of war; war, that is, in the first instance against Turkey, and in the other for it. In 1882, when the servants of the Government on the spot reported that the de facto Government of Egypt had armed the mob of Alexandria for the riots in which the allied admirals were hunted through the streets, bluejackets and stokers killed, and great numbers of Levantine Christians injured, public opinion was in favour of strong action. The Government negotiated and asked for reparation, but when new fortifications were erected and fresh guns brought to bear upon the British Fleet, and the British admiral bombarded the forts of Alexandria, a large section of public opinion condemned what was called a 'massacre.' It is therefore difficult for any Government not to consider carefully in advance exactly that which it intends to do, and the extent to which it may rely upon restrained but steady national opinion at its back. There is another consideration which must weigh, which is that if we go to war, in however righteous a cause, we plunge into that war not only ourselves, as representatives in Parliament, but hundreds of millions of people in all parts of the world—India, Canada, Australia, and the rest—possibly without their consent, a consent which we must not assume.

"As for our reprobation of cruelty, it is, I hope, unanimous; but that does not suffice. We most of us denounced the horrible cruelty perpetrated towards the Jews in Russia during the last reign, and happily now almost at an end. Those of us who know the facts denounce the cruelty which is going on in Africa in the name of civilization, but we are unable to interfere in these cases. Whether we can interfere in Turkey, as well as denounce, depends upon an accurate ascertainment of the facts. What we are asked to do is, in the first place, to act through the European concert. As to this there can be no difference of opinion. It is the next step which is more doubtful—viz., that, failing decisive action by the Powers, Great Britain should intervene by force. Intervention at Constantinople by force would mean forcing the passage of the Dardanelles, an operation which can be successfully carried through by her Majesty's Mediterranean fleet, but probably not without heavy loss, and possibly not without tremendous loss. The loss of a first-class British ironclad is equivalent, as regards our position in the world, to the absolute destruction of a French or German corps with all its guns. A forcible passage of the Dardanelles might also conceivably bring about a general war, for which we are wholly unprepared, and in which our very existence as a Power would be at stake. Forcible action, elsewhere than at Constantinople, by the seizure of material guarantees, so far from sufficing to prevent massacre at Constantinople, might possibly aggravate it. It would be likely, whether exerted in the Archipelago, or in Arabia, or at Smyrna, to bring about that partition of the Ottoman Empire between the Great Powers by which we have much to lose and nothing to gain except a most dangerous inheritance impossible to defend. Our worthless acquisition of Cyprus, and our, in my opinion, embarrassing virtual protectorate of Egypt have destroyed in the minds of the Powers our credit for clean hands in relation to the Ottoman Empire, and our power for usefulness in the Mahomedan East. They have made it difficult for us to lead the European concert. They have made it in the highest degree dangerous to act without it, and it is perhaps a question if all those who call for forcible action by ourselves alone realize either our comparative weakness—only, I hope, temporary, until the nation arouses itself to look into its defences—or the depth of our unpopularity.

"'One small element of pleasure I find in the present gloomy circumstances—that they form, indeed, the deathblow of the mischievous agitation for the exclusion of destitute aliens from this country when, in the present state of public opinion, we are able to offer a home to the exiles of the unhappy Armenian race.

"'I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

"'CHARLES W. DILKE."

These two letters clearly show to those who can reflect that alone our nation cannot help the Armenian victims, and the aid of foreign nations will be absolutely denied us to enforce the better treatment by the Sultan of his subjects, because at present Russia is all powerful in the East, and Turkey has thrown herself into the arms of Russia. The Continental Powers find themselves overawed by the might of Russia, and thus on this question British-Israel is completely isolated and forced to obey the commandment of the Lord, "Come, My people, enter thou into thy chambers and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For behold the Lord Jehovah cometh forth out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." As "the Lord will ordain peace for us," His people Israel, according to His declaration in Isa. xxvi. 12, R.V., we can see that it is by forcing us to assume a position of isolation and non-intervention in continental quarrels, He means to keep us safe from the terrible turmoil of the conflicts raised by His indignation, and as the punishment of the nations (outside Israel) for their iniquity.

In the speeches which have been delivered throughout the country at the various "indignation meetings" held to protest against the horrible massacres in Constantinople which have lately disgraced our nineteenth century, we detect the same "perplexity" which we have seen in the letters of Sir Charles Dilke and Lord Hugh Cecil in reference to the subject. In Bristol, while the clerical speakers were often for the most violent measures at any and every cost, the resolution of three ministers of religion to this effect was not allowed to be put to the meeting, which contented itself with loudly protesting against the Sultan's barbarity but would not counsel any provocation of war to enforce their protests. This left the matter at large to be dealt with as the Prime Minister saw expedient and fit. This result of our national "perplexity," of course, will have no effect on the Sultan; but will leave the matter still in the hands of the Continental Powers headed by Russia; the result being scant mercy to the suffering Armenians and possibly to Christians in general. How the matter will terminate we must wait and see. It does not appear that we shall have to wait long. Meanwhile, being Israel, we can afford to wait the Lord's time, seeing that He is our Guide and Protector, who will never leave us nor forsake us. To Him be all the praise! (Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.)

WHO IS THE "ANCIENT OF DAYS?"

By F. Thompson.

The description given in Daniel vii. 9, is the same exactly as that given of "One like unto the Son of Man" in Revelation i. 14, and He was Jesus Christ. If you will throw aside preconceived notions and follow out this train of thought, you will see how this thought elucidates a difficulty, and you will also see that what follows is the description of Christ's reign. He it is who is the Judge, and as He, who was at the beginning with God, is the Alpha and Omega, it is no stretch of imagination to call Him the Ancient of Days. Compare the time given in verse 22 with Revelation xx. 3, 4. This period in Daniel also seems to refer to the time before the kingdom was to be "delivered to God, even the Father" (1 Cor. xv. 24).

The only difficulty in accepting this interpretation is in the 13th verse (Dan. vii.), but it was suggested lately at a meeting for the study of prophecy, where the above view was brought forward by a clergyman present (a blind witness), that it was perhaps a mistake to print in our version the "Son of Man" with a capital S, and that as four kingdoms had been represented in Daniel by four beasts, "was it not possible that the kingdom of the saints of the Most High might be represented by a 'Man,' a higher type of creation, the fifth kingdom of Dan. ii. 44?" In his vision, Daniel saw this kingdom under the symbol of one like unto "a Son of Man" (R.V.), being presented to the Ancient of Days, who was the Lord Jesus Christ. He was to reign over them, and the dominion having been taken from the four beasts (verse 12) it was given to this symbolical "Man" representing Israel.

This seems a new idea and an important one, being another link in the chain of evidence as to the connection between literal Israel with the everlasting kingdom. Though the clergyman who made this suggestion did not seem to know anything of our Israelite origin, he answered another clergyman present, who asked, "Do you mean this 'Son of Man' represents the Church?" by saying "No, I think He represents a literal nation, Israel."

This is a very bare outline of a very interesting discussion, and it seems worthy of consideration by Anglo-Israelites.

THE ANGLO-ISRAELITES.

The following correspondence, between Mr. D. Frazer (of the House of Judah) and Mr. H. H. Pain, appeared in the Jewish World of Nov. 27th and December 4th, 1896, respectively. Mr. D. Frazer attacked, and Mr. Pain, our champion, replied.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—I am not surprised to hear that I am the most illogical reasoner that Mr. Pain has had to contend with. He is not satisfied with my rendering of Deut. xxxii. 26, although I gave as authorities for it such erudite scholars and authors as David Levi and Manesseh Ben Israel. I will add to them another of no mean standing. J. Jahn, D.D., a Christian divine, speaking of the return from the Babylonian captivity, says: "As the invitation of Cyrus to build the temple at Jerusalem was directed to all the people of Jehovah, and proclaimed throughout the Persian empire, undoubtedly not a few of the Ten Tribes returned to Palestine. . . . However this may be, it is highly probable that most of the Israelites returned early, when they heard of the prosperity of their brethren in Palestine. But whether their return was early or late, it is certain that they did actually return, for the history of later periods mentions Israelites as settled in Galilee and Perea, long before the time of Christ (Macc. ix. 24); but, connecting themselves with the tribe of Judah, they finally lost the name of Israelites, and all Hebrews were called Jews."

"But since many of the tribe of Judah chose to remain in the land of exile, it is reasonable to suppose that still greater numbers of the Israelites who had lived in those countries two hundred years longer would have little inclination to exchange the happiness they there enjoyed for the prospect of an uncertain good in Palestine. But as the jealousy between Judah and Israel had now ceased, according to the predictions of the prophets, those Israelites, also, who remained in exile joined themselves to the tribe of Judah, which was in possession of the temple, and consequently they too received the denomination of Jews. All questions, therefore, and investigations for the purpose of ascertaining what has become of the Ten Tribes, and whether it is likely they will ever be discovered, are superfluous and idle" (Hebrew Commonwealth, pp. 65—6). Though such profound Hebrew scholars, their authority is called in question; the Anglo-Israelites are the only reliable authorities, if even they do not know the אב.

It is quite evident from good authority that the Twelve Tribes are so mingled by intermarriage that it may be truly said, that the remembrance of them has ceased from among men, that, with few exceptions, none can tell to what tribe he belongs; as is further demonstrated by Manesseh Ben Israel. R. Judah Ben Levi says his father was of the tribe of Judah and his mother of Benjamin, as the tribes were accustomed to intermarry; for we find David, who was of the tribe of Judah, married Michal, the daughter of Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin; Ahimaaz, of the tribe of Naphthali, married the daughter of King Solomon (1 Kings ix. 15); Jehoiadah, the high priest, a descendant of Levi, married Jehosheba, daughter of Joram, King of Judah (2 Chron. xxii. 11); the remainder of the tribe of Benjamin intermarried with the others. That such marriages were always lawful, Holy Scripture proves, as it plainly says, "And the priest's daughter, when married to a strange man" (Lev. xxii. 12); that is, of another tribe" (Conciliator, vol. ii., p. 235).

The Abrahamic covenant, or title deeds to the promised blessings. We cannot separate the Mosaic covenant from the Abrahamic covenant, and in this the Scriptures are the surest guide:—(1) On the passover it says, "It shall be an ordinance to your generations for ever" (Exodus xii. 17). (2) Circumcision: God told Abraham that it was to be an everlasting covenant, "Thou shalt keep My covenant therefore, thou and thy seed after thee in their generations" (Genesis xvii. 9). (3) The Sabbath: "Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, &c., throughout their generations for a perpetual covenant" (Exodus xxxi. 16). (4) One God: "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me" (Exodus xx. 3). And Manasseh Ben Israel says, "And so it is given in the decalogue, which is eternal and established for everlasting posterity, clearly demonstrating that the observance of these particular precepts will never be discontinued." The above are the title deeds, for it is the observance of these that entitles Israel to the promised blessings. Does or ever did the Anglo-Israelites observe them? If not, on what do they base their claim?

If Israel had to be divorced from the Mosaic covenant, will Mr. Pain be kind enough to tell us when this took place, and under what covenant the Ten Tribes are now, and what religion they profess?

Mr. Pain asked, Where is the everlasting kingdom of David? But, as he professes to know, he will, perhaps, tell us where it was during the second temple; for during the second temple there was no king of the tribe of Judah or the House of David. Manesseh Ben Israel says, "The kingdom of David is everlasting, for it has been given to no other, and will return to his house at the time of the (true) Messiah." There is a similar example with Phineas, to whom the Lord promised the everlasting priesthood (Num. xxv. 13): "And it shall be to him, and to his seed after him, a covenant of everlasting priesthood."

Yet it ceased for a time, as we find Eli, Abimelech, and Abiathar, who were descendants of Aaron's second son, Ithamar, officiated as high priests; but in Solomon's reign it was restored to the descendants of Phineas, as it says (1 Kings ii. 27), "And the king put Zadok in the place of Abiathar (verse 36), because Zadok was a descendant of Phineas;" and although it has now ceased for a while, at the time of the (true) Messiah it will again return, as it says, "But the priests, the Levites, the sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of My sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from Me, they shall come near to Me to minister unto Me, and they shall stand before Me to offer unto Me the fat and the blood, saith the Lord God" (Ezekiel xliv. 15). So that, notwithstanding the supreme pontificate of the house of Phineas has temporarily ceased, it is termed everlasting. The same is the case with the throne of David, which, although at present vacant, is nevertheless perpetual: "And My servant David shall be their prince for ever" (Ezekiel xxxvii. 25).

"And the word לְמַרְבֵּחַ—'to the increase' (Isaiah ix. 6)—has not accidently a final and closed ם in the middle of the word, contrary to general rule; for, as our sages rightly argued, there it is signified, that for a while—that is, during the captivity—this government and empire of the house of David should be closed and hidden, but when the walls of Jerusalem, which are now open, shall be enclosed, it then shall discover itself, which remarkable coincidence the ancients observed in Nehemiah ii. 13, where a מ is also found, contrary to rule—that is, open at the end of a word פְּרוּצִים חֻמַּ—'they (the walls) open.' From these two מ's, the only exception contrary to the regular construction of letters found in the whole Bible, they form this admirable conjecture, that when the walls of Jerusalem, which are now open and exposed to the enemy, shall be rebuilt and closed, then the kingdom of David will discover and shew itself, as those two events will happen at the same period" (Conciliator, vol. ii., pp. 141—2).

We have not got the proof I asked for, viz., "that Queen Victoria claims to be a lineal descendant from David," but we are told, by virtue of her position, must be descended from David. Vague assertions are no proof. If the Danes overthrew the Saxons in England in the sixth century, in a long and bloody war, and oppressed them for a long time till the days of Alfred, how can the Saxons be the people against whom no weapon formed was to prosper, for the Danes are still a nation?

I wish to ask Mr. Pain the following plain questions:—

(1) You connect the Danes, Saxons, and Normans with "the lost Ten Tribes of Israel," and say they are not to profess Judaism. What are they to profess? You say, "They are found in the isles of the sea" (Isaiah xlix. 12); but who is the speaker in verse 1, and who is spoken to?

(2) "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king and without a prince, and without a sacrifice. . . . Afterwards shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and His goodness in the latter days." Will Mr. Pain tell us when are the latter days to commence?

(3) Turning now to the New Testament, Christ said, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24). Does this mean that He was sent to Saxons, Danes, and Normans?

(4) Christ said to His disciples, "Go rather to the lost sheep of the House of Israel" (Matt. x. 6). To whom did they go?

(5) "The Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith. But Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness" (Romans ix. 30, 31). Are these the Anglo-Israelites?

(6) "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in" (Romans xi. 25). But where does the fulness come in?

(7) Jesus said to the woman of Samaria, "Salvation is of the Jews" (John iv. 22); and Paul, who made no difference—called all the Jews Israelites—said, "For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises" (Romans ix. 3, 4). Paul does not claim relationship with the Saxons, Danes, or Normans.

History proves that the Saxons were never in the least connected with the Ten Tribes of Israel by descent; and it has never been said they were, except by distorters of Scripture.

I expect we shall not hear much more about the overthrow of the Ottoman Empire after these able articles of the Rev. Harris Cohen on "The Jews in Turkey," who has proved, beyond a doubt, the good treatment that the Jews have hitherto received in that empire.

Yours obediently, D. FRAZER.

Nov. 24th, 1896.

THE REPLY, BY MR. H. H. PAIN.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—Mr. Frazer, instead of giving direct answers to the questions and arguments contained in my last letter, has quoted long extracts from commentators, both Jewish and Christian, to sustain his objections to the Anglo-Israel theory. As I have already given my explanations in previous letters on points raised during our correspondence, and again repeated by Mr. Frazer in his letter of last week, I cannot undertake to go over them again.

Whilst regarding the opinions of the learned scholars, that your correspondent has quoted, with the respect that is so deservedly due to them, I submit, with all deference, that it is not a question of "It is highly probable that most of the Israelites (i.e., the Ten Tribes) returned," or "That it is reasonable to suppose that still greater numbers of those Israelites, also, who remained in exile joined themselves to the tribe of Judah"; but, simply, what saith the Scriptures? They, and they alone, are the sure guide in an argument of this kind; and I challenge Mr. Frazer, or anyone else, to give me a single passage, either in the old or New Testament, that will bear out the unwarrantable assertion that the union of the House of Judah and of the House of Israel, since their division under Rehoboam, has ever taken place. I have given Scriptural references for this statement in my previous letters to your influential paper, and I now ask Mr. Frazer to give his, instead of deluging me with quotations from commentators.

Your correspondent, as proof "that the Twelve Tribes are so mingled by intermarriage," quotes several texts dating before the captivities. But what on earth has that to do with the total disappearance of the Ten Tribes which subsequently took place? That many of the children of Benjamin should intermarry with those of Judah and Levi is only natural, seeing that these tribes were politically united up to the time of the Roman dispersion, when Benjamin's connection with the House of Judah was severed, in accordance with the prophecy of Jeremiah vi. 1, and Zech. xiii. 6—9, and xi. 7—14.

I have endeavoured, Mr. Editor, and I hope it will be admitted successfully, to confine my arguments to the Old Testament, as it is a common ground of belief for both Jews and Christians; but Mr. Frazer, in submitting seven questions for my consideration and reply, has attacked me in the Christian stronghold—the New Testament. I willingly accept the challenge, and I do so with particular pleasure, as Mr. Frazer has chosen quotations which answer and defeat his own objections. I think I shall not be far wrong in hazarding a conjecture, that in the prompting of these interrogations, that the hand is the hand of Judah, but the voice is the voice of Israel. All the same, I feel confident of my ability to answer the enquiries to the satisfaction of impartial judges.

(1) "You connect the Danes, Saxons, and Normans with 'the lost Ten Tribes of Israel,' and say they are not to profess Judaism. What are they to profess?" The new covenant, or the Christian faith, as I endeavoured to explain in my previous letter. "You say 'they are found in the isles of the sea' (Isaiah xlix. 12); but who is the speaker in verse 1, and who is spoken to?" To the Ten-tribed House of Israel.

(2) "Will Mr. Pain tell us when are the latter days to commence?" With the commencement of the Christian dispensation (Hebrews i. 2; 1 Peter i. 5, 20).

(3) "Turning now to the New Testament, Christ said, 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel' (Matt. xv. 24). Does this mean that He was sent to Saxons, Danes, or Normans?" Christ never left Palestine, but, by the instrumentality of the apostles, notably of St. Paul, His message was carried to the Ten Tribes of the dispersion, who, centuries later, appeared in these isles in the manner described in previous letters, where they subsequently became known by the names above mentioned.

(4) "Christ said to His disciples, 'Go rather to the lost sheep of the House of Israel' (Matt. x. 6). To whom did they go?" To the lost Ten Tribes, of course; for, obviously, the Jews were not lost at that time; on the contrary, they were very much in evidence.

(5) "'The Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith; but Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness' (Romans ix. 30, 31). Are these the Anglo-Israelites?" I explained in my previous letters that the Ten Tribes were divorced from the Mosaic covenant B.C. 720 and 680, and became like the heathen, amongst whom they were lost—Gentiles. St. Paul, in this chapter, is there showing that these "Lo-Ammi" (Gentiles of the House of Israel) had attained to the righteousness of faith, which the Jews, by adhering to that of the Mosaic law, had failed to attain. "Wherefore!" asks St. Paul:

"Because they sought it not by faith, but, as it were, by works.
They stumbled at the stone of stumbling: even as it is written,
Behold I lay in Zion a stone of offence,
And he that believeth on Him shall not be ashamed."

The apostle goes on to declare of the Jews of that day:

"For I bear them witness that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge.
For, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and seeking to establish their own, they did not subject themselves to the righteousness of God.
For Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness, to everyone that believeth."

If Mr. Frazer will read for himself the context in Romans ix., that he has quoted, he will see that St. Paul refers to a passage from Hosea i., which applies only to the "Lo-Ammi" (House of Israel), which, as I have said before, was divorced from the Mosaic covenant, and re-married under the new covenant (Isaiah l. 1 and 54, and Jeremiah xxxi. 31—37; also Hebrews viii. 8—13). The apostle also cites Jeremiah xviii. and xix., wherein the happy lot of the House of Israel is compared with the sad destiny of their brethren of the House of Judah; but a brighter future is quickly drawing near for them, as the experience of the English Jews, as a body, amply testifies.

(6) "'Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in' (Romans ix. 25). But where does the fulness come in?" The "blindness in part," that has happened to Israel, here refers to the Jews, as they refuse to see that the Messiah has come; and, judging from passages in Zechariah and elsewhere, there seems no reason to expect that, although a few Jews may be converted to Christianity by the missionary efforts of their brethren of the House of Israel, still they will not as a body believe in the Messiah until His second coming, which takes place at the end of this age, when "the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel (i.e., the Twelve Tribes) shall be saved." The expression, "the fulness of the Gentiles," is only once used in the Old Testament (Genesis xlviii. 19), where the same phrase is rendered in the Hebrew, "fulness," or "a multitude of nations." This blessing was promised to the seed of Ephraim, the head of the House of Israel or Joseph—i.e., the Ten Tribes. This "multitude of nations" is in course of accomplishment by England and her colonies, according to the views of the despised Anglo-Israelites; and although the Hebrew origin of the English nation is obscured, and we are "not reckoned up among the nations" as Israel, either in the estimation of Jews, or the foreign nations, or even in the opinion of many of our own people, who in many instances are deaf to all explanations on the subject, still I believe, and I have Scriptural warrant to bear out my expectation, that this great truth and discovery of the latter days will be recognised by the nations at large, ere long, as well as by those whom I thereby claim as my brethren, the Jews. I sincerely hope that this somewhat lengthy correspondence may be the means of bringing about this—to me and my fellow Anglo-Israelites—much desired recognition of our national relationship.

(7) "Jesus said to the woman of Samaria, 'Salvation is of the Jews'" (John iv. 22). From the fact that Christ came of Judah, this is undoubtedly correct, but if Mr.

Digitized by Google

Frazer intends to imply by this passage that we are in any other sense indebted for Christianity to the Jews, I would ask him by what process of reasoning he arrives at the conclusion, that the Jews could ever impart what they never accepted?

"And Paul, who made no difference, called all the Jews Israelites." Yes; but he did not call all Israelites Jews! which is a distinction with a very great difference, as I endeavoured to make clear in my previous letter.

"For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption and the glory and the covenants, and the giving of the Law, and the service of God, and the promises" (Rom. ix. 3, 4). The context of the quotation shows that St. Paul was speaking to the Romans, of the Jews. We know for a fact that the oracles of God were committed to the chosen people, the Twelve Tribes, "For He showeth His Word unto Jacob, His statutes and ordinances unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation, neither have the heathen knowledge of His laws." St. Matt. xxi. 43, records that Christ said, "The Kingdom of Heaven shall be taken from you (Jews) and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." That nation, not Church, as our Commentators erroneously teach, is the nation of Israel, of the Ten Tribes, mentioned by Isaiah. "In days to come, Israel shall blossom and bud, and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit," i.e., Ephraim, the "fruitful" one, "My first-born," who, as a nation, represents "the Church of the first-born" (Heb. xii. 23)—the so-called Gentile Church of Christian Theologians and Commentators. The whole teaching of the Bible is this, that a knowledge of God is only to be obtained through the medium of the chosen people; for one may search the Bible from Genesis to Revelation, and to no one else will it be found that the Word of God is committed. In short, the propagation of the Gospel and Scriptures generally is committed to Israel, whilst the reception of it is open to the whole world. This explains the purpose of the Almighty in bringing about a division of the Twelve-tribed nation under Rehoboam, for foreseeing, in His infinite wisdom, that both Houses would prove untrue to their allegiance, He retained the House of Judah (or the Jews) to witness for Him in the Old Dispensation, as we do for Him in the New. This accounts for the fact that we are the missionary people of the world, and although our efforts may not be successful in convincing our brethren of the House of Judah that the first Advent has taken place, still we are in duty bound, in accordance with the Divine command, to proclaim the Gospel "to the Jew first and also to the Gentile." Doubtless some of my countrymen may exhibit want of tact in carrying out what they sincerely believe it is their duty to do, but I hope that this explanation may be the means of explaining their attitude towards the Jews, and the motive which inspires them to fulfil what they sincerely believe to be their duty.

Paul, of course, "did not claim relationship with the Saxons, Danes, or Normans" as such, because the Lost Ten Tribes were not known by those names at the time.

Mr. Frazer states, "History proves that the Saxons were never in the least connected with the Ten Tribes of Israel by descent." I never said that it did, but what I do maintain is that Sharon Turner, the historian of the Anglo-Saxons, traces them back to the very place where the House of Israel was lost. Space forbids me to enter into the historical argument by which we connect these Saxons with the Sakai mentioned by Pliny who settled in Armenia, and who were known as Saccassani, or with the Scythians of Herodotus, who states that "the Persians called all the Scythians Sakai." But for this argument I must refer your correspondent to my lately published book, entitled "Englishmen, Israelites, Turks, Edomites, Politics and Prophecy," particulars of which he will find in your advertisement columns.

In conclusion, I will briefly observe that Mr. Frazer will find himself very much out in his expectation, that "We shall not hear much more about the overthrow of the Ottoman Empire after these able articles of the Rev. Harris Cohen on "The Jews in Turkey," for I believe, and my book above mentioned contains the expression of that belief, that the Turks are the descendants of Esau, or the House of Edom, whilst, granting that the theory is correct, that England and America are identical with the House of Joseph or Israel, we shall very shortly see the fulfilment of the prediction of the prophet Ezekiel, "I will lay vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel." (See also Abod. xviii.; Num. xxiv. 15—19; Psa. lx. 9—12; Isa. xxxiv. 1—8). Grant the theory, it does not require very much intelligence in studying the political European news, as contained in our daily papers, to see that everything tends towards the fulfilment of our prophetic destiny; in blind pursuit of which we have already acquired one-fourth of the Promised Land, by virtue of our occupation of Egypt, the Soudan, as well as our possessions of Uganda and British East Africa. Truly the words of the prophet Isaiah are now being literally realised, "But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches and yield your fruit for My people Israel, for they are at hand to come."

TRADE DEVELOPMENTS WHICH WILL FOLLOW A SETTLEMENT OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.

By T. H. B.

[DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I enclose you an article written by a friend of mine who has travelled in Egypt, Palestine, &c., and who is competent to form a sound judgment on the future of these and the adjoining countries. As he does not believe in Anglo-Israel truth or our Scriptural views, his opinions are a valuable testimony to the certainty of our hopes being fulfilled and our views correct, even from the low standard of "a commercial aspect," which appeals to many minds with a stronger force than the promises of God and the so-called Scriptural speculations.—With kind regards and best wishes, yours truly, A. K. ROBINSON, 9, Vernon-road, Leeds, Oct. 29, 1896.]

THE settlement of the Eastern question will be followed by a period of great trade activity all over the world. The ever-present fear of war, resulting from any attempt to deal with the question, has kept back enterprise in the countries immediately concerned. When this fear is past, capital will flow in, and some of the fairest regions of the earth, now little better than a wilderness, will blossom forth into wonderful fertility. The great plains north and west of Constantinople are capable of producing magnificent crops, the soil being so extraordinarily fertile. Large portions of Asia Minor which formerly supported huge numbers of people are lying waste. Much as has been done in Egypt since our occupation, it is not a tithe of what that country is capable of. By the construction of reservoirs for controlling the flow of the Nile vast areas, now desert, will be brought under cultivation. The land of Goshen will be as rich as in the days of the patriarchs. Railway building will receive a great impetus. The line from Cairo up the Nile will be pushed steadily on till it joins that from the Cape. The effect of this will be not only to connect our colonies, but to open out much of the Dark Continent, the products of which will be exchanged for our goods.

Another great work will be the Euphrates Valley line, which will ultimately be extended to India. It is reasonably to be supposed that, before many years are past, it will be possible to run trains through, from London to Calcutta. The construction of these great works will cause the greatest activity in all the ironworks both here and on the Continent. The iron trade being so good, every other trade will be favourably affected. The purchasing power of the artisan class will bring prosperity to the farming interest in a marked degree. The prospect is that there will be a long continuance of trade activity such as the world has never yet seen.

The employment of vast numbers of natives on the construction of these great lines of railway would cause such a demand for silver that the equilibrium between that metal and gold would be re-established and the advocates of bimetallism would find their occupation gone.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

"In some recent remarks on the Eastern question, we spoke with approval of the proposal for England to relinquish Cyprus. An esteemed correspondent writes to point out that such a course would be against Britain's destiny as outlined in the prophetic Word. For ourselves, we cannot subordinate the cause of righteousness to what is at best only an interpretation of prophecy. Moreover, we are more impressed than ever with the conviction that the Word of prophecy was not given in order that those who study it should themselves become prophets. God's purpose with the nations will go forward without anxiety on our part. All the same, it is our bounden duty to do justice in national as well as personal affairs."—The Christian, October 29th.

What a silly remark! As if by interpreting prophecy by past and present events you claimed to be a prophet. If we may not interpret prophecy (in all prayerful humility), what is the use of it? I wonder if Identity is making the Editor sour and sharp? (John xxiv. 25.) L. P.

Review.

The Anglo-Israel Almanack and Diary, for 1897. London: Robert Banks and Son, Racquet-court, Fleet-street. Price 3d. Cloth 1s.

We are glad to be favoured with an early copy of our New Almanack for 1897, and to find it an improvement even on those that have gone before. We are sure that this will be a popular number, and that the sale will equal, and probably exceed that of its predecessors. To begin with, the Frontispiece is a speaking likeness of our friend Dr. H. Aldersmith, author of "The Fulness of the Nations." The portrait is quite a recent one, very well executed, and will be greatly welcomed by our readers generally. We have a new departure in the present issue, eight other portraits being included in the work, three being those of our chief lady workers in the Identity field, and four the secretaries or other officials of the Northern British, Hull, Manchester, and North Liverpool Associations respectively. We only regret that the portrait of Miss J. Lawrence was not also added to the list as the lady to whom we really owe the very origin of the Free Distribution Fund, and who worked with it up to only two years ago.

The Articles, which are generally of a high order of excellence, are by the Rev. Canon Hanan, D.D., Douglas A. Onslow, Philo-Israel, J. S. Anderson, the Rev. T. Rosling Howlett, B.A., U.S.A., the Rev. J. Idrisyn Jones, H. R. Shaw, and Chas. Stubbs, B.A. A useful cluster of papers giving hints how British-Israel Associations should best be formed, and (more difficult still) how they should be kept alive, is included in the work. Mr. R. Mackworth has an original, half-humourous sketch, to tell us how best to distribute our literature.

It cannot be denied that Messrs. Banks and Son have provided us, for the coming year, with a valuable collection of Identity teaching, which we hope will cause the little volume rapidly to disappear from the publishers' shelves.

"The Glorious Record," the story of the Queen's reign, by Mr. H. R. Shaw, is a clever résumé of a splendid epoch. The picture of Balmoral Castle which illustrates the subject on p. 57, will be welcome to many distant readers who know not the locality, but have heard of it only by the hearing of the ear. The writer has some wise observations regarding our "possession of the Gate of our enemies," by reason of our hold of vast stores of iron and coal, given us by our God, with a view to our command of the seas. Other nations not only cannot hold Ocean Gates because they are ill-supplied with these two gifts of God, but also for the sufficient cause that all the chief strategic, tactical positions have been already secured long ago by the British, everywhere, through the gift of God; and therefore could not fall to the nations outside our limits, even did they wish it ever so much. The portrait of the Queen is very good.

The various articles which appear in the Almanack are very much to the point and useful. Canon Hanan's question regarding "The Own Olive Tree," of Rom. xi. 24 will do good and teach people to think. Mr. Onslow in his own argumentative style shows us that "the travail of the daughter of Zion," of Micah iv. 10, is none other than that of the House of Ten-tribed Israel, the British nation. Philo-Israel's paper on "The Multitude of Nations," called also "The Fulness of Nations," comes next, showing by a great and unique sign now present before us, that the Ten-tribed House of Israel is extant to-day, and that the British Empire is its modern "remnant." Mr. Anderson, on Colonization, follows on nearly the same lines. Our American friend, the Rev. T. Rosling Howlett, shows from the standpoint of Manasseh, that the British are verily Israel. The Rev. J. Idrisyn Jones' paper on "I don't want to be a Jew!" is a characteristic one reflecting the writer's genius. His paper is instructive, and deserves to be studied by those who despise the Jew, converted and unconverted, and who know not the difference between Israel of the Ten Tribes and Judah of the two. Mr. Shaw's short essay on "The Queen," we have mentioned before. Mr. Stubbs on "The Great Pyramid," brings that subject once more before us with its vast array of figures and corroborations, which plainly indicate the divine character of the Builder and of His measurements in the structure.

We are glad to see that the Home Associations are two in excess of last year's list, being 35 in number, and that the Colonial and American has increased by three. The increase is not large, but satisfactory as far as it goes.

We congratulate the publishers on their successful work. As an Almanack the new one contains all that such a work should. It will, we are sure, be appreciated by the public, and sell. We hope our friends will buy it largely, and give it freely to our clergy and ministers, friendly and the reverse.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

Dear Philo-Israel,—Allow me to say how much instruction, cheer and comfort I derive from perusing the Banner of Israel from week to week. I have been a constant reader of the Banner for over twelve years, and have all that time been doing what lay in my power to diffuse the glorious truth that the Anglo-Saxon (English speaking) race are indeed, not Gentiles, as we in our blindness have always considered ourselves to be, but God's own elect people Israel—seed of Abraham—of the Semitic and not of the Japhetic race. This is one of the greatest discoveries of the age, This is now so well established by so many incontestable truths, that no candid or reasonable man who will take the trouble to study them, can fail to be convinced of this truth.

We, in this age, "are living in a grand and awful time, when to be living is sublime," not merely in the close of the nineteenth century, but in the closing years of the present Gospel dispensation. The proofs of this are many, and increasing constantly.

To the thoughtful and observing mind, and even many worldly men, feel impressed that a great crisis is soon coming upon the world. We can hardly avoid the conclusion that we are in "the time of the end" foretold by God's prophet Daniel, over two thousand years ago, for "knowledge has been wonderfully increased," and from the extraordinary facilities of travel now afforded us, "many are running to and fro" all over the earth.

The present condition of the nations of Europe, with millions of men all armed and prepared for war, shows that we have arrived very near the time spoken of in the Apocalypse —that "There shall be an earthquake (of war and anarchy) such as there was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, so great" (Rev. xvi. 18). There have been wars and great troubles all through the history of the world, but there never has been such a condition of things as there is in the world to-day. Not only all Europe will be involved, but other nations will be drawn into the great impending conflict. We have now arrived at the time spoken of by our Lord when He foretold that upon the earth would be "distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and waves roaring" (upheavel and unrest among the masses, riots, strikes, etc), "men's hearts failing them for looking after those things coming upon the earth" (Luke xxi. 25, 26), the actual condition of things among the nations and their rulers to-day. All darkness and confusion to them, but to us who are guided by the sure word of prophecy, over all the turmoil and confusion, we can hear the cheering words of our blessed Lord: "And when these things come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh" (ver. 28), that is, His own personal coming to take His people up and out of these troubles coming upon the world.

But what is the attitude of Israel at this present time? Twenty-six hundred years ago, in prophetic view of these very troubles impending, the prophet Isaiah thus wrote— "Come, My people, enter thou into thy chamber and shut thy doors about thee, hide thyself, as it were, for a little moment, until the indignation shall be overpassed. For behold the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity, and the earth shall disclose her blood and shall no more cover her slain" (Isa. xxvi. 20, 21).

Great Britain (Ephraim-Israel) is fortifying her home ports and the outlying Gates of her colonies and dependencies; is building a vast navy to protect her island home and her highways of the seas. The United States (Manasseh-Israel) is also fortifying her coasts, building a navy and preparing artillery and munitions of war, for purposes of defence. So we see that this people, blindly and unconsciously though it be, are obeying the command and fulfilling the prophecy uttered twenty-six centuries ago.

Israel, as predicted, was to be "Chief among the nations," and who will now deny the pre-eminence of Great Britain and the United States among the nations of the earth. Also as predicted by our father Jacob as to our standing in "the last days." One a "nation and company of nations," "a multitude of nations" (Gen. lxviii). (In Great Britain's heathen Empire of India alone, there are sixteen different nations.)

Israel was "to dwell alone," and "not to be reckoned among the (Gentile) nations." It is even so to-day. Great Britain is isolated, and not in alliance with any nation. The United States will not enter into any "entangling alliance," and the cardinal principle with her is—"Non-intervention."

In the not-far-distant future, events will occur that will disclose to the world that we, of the Anglo-Saxon race, are "The seed whom the Lord hath blessed," and convince, even the clergy, that we are the Israel of God, and not Gentiles, as we have always been taught to believe.

The days of Israel's ignorance of her origin and blindness which was to be, in the purposes of God, for a time, are fast passing away. God speed the day.

Yours in the hope of Israel,

THOS. SANFORD.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Is it not inexpedient to refer to supposed hidden "Rifts and Remnants" till more light is given to show where such, if they exist, are to be found?

Do you not consider, as I own I do, that those who dropped away from the wandering tribes, and have become absorbed in other peoples who are real and not nominal Gentiles, have lost their claim to be considered as of Israel? Now they may be French, Spanish, Germans, and what not else. It is diferent, I think, with those who have at times fled to England for conscience sake. They may well be believed to be the fragments of the tribes which dropped behind, and which the Lord has caused to be brought in, through persecution or otherwise, and rejoined them to Ephraim.

Those who have become entirely as one with Gentile countries can scarcely be recognised as being of Israel. What proofs can be brought forth of their right to such a claim? They are not under the rule of the House of David. They are not mistresses of the sea or possessors of the Gates, and the weapons formed against them are certainly not rendered unprosperous.

We do not know what future revelations may be vouchsafed concerning any who may have fallen away from us in our wanderings, but at present they lack all the signs that have revealed to us who we are.

Yours truly, L. P.

London.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I cannot help feeling how misunderstood we are by Mr. Anderson's letter, published in the BANNER of the 4th inst. just to hand, so I send herewith a copy of a letter written by me a week ago to one of my relations, which refutes the charge; and I think, as it was written before I knew of such a charge, it is doubly strong, and I pray God it may help to alter the views of our mistaken brother and others who may think with him. If Our Identity does not teach "Free Grace" I don't know what does.

In his letter our brother repeats without qualification, "that it is no question now of covenant and promise." Brother Marchant has quoted Paul, and rightly so, and there are two verses that came to me very strongly last evening, and they are these: "And now I stand judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers; unto which promises our Twelve Tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews" (Acts xxvi. 6, 7).

The Jews of Paul's time, called by our Lord "blind leaders of the blind," and the blind teachers of our day, believing themselves to be right, seem very much alike, and ought to make us doubly careful to carry out our Lord's command— "Judge not." Scripture, like history, repeats itself.

Peter also tells us, among other things, "Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days. Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, 'and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed'" (Acts iii. 24, 25).

Again, Paul in Romans iv. 13—24, especially ver. 16, "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be of grace; to the end that the promise might be sure to all the seed, not to that only which is of the law (Jews), but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all" (Israelites, the Twelve Tribes to whom Paul belonged, not the Gentiles). "Among whom the remnant of Jacob were" (Micah v. 8).

Then in verse 23 he goes on to say, "Now this was not written for his sake only, that it was imputed to him (Abraham), but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord, from the dead." (Who came not to destroy but to fulfil the law and the prophets, Matt. v. 17).

Again, Rom. ix. 1—8, especially vers. 3, 4, ". . . My kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants . . . and the promises."

Again, Gal. iv. 12—22 shows us we are made nigh by the blood of Christ (which is the blood of the everlasting covenant, Heb. xiii. 20), and are no longer strangers, as we were when cast off, to the covenants and promises.

Heb. viii. 23 talks of "a new covenant having made the first old," the whole chapter being full of teaching of the covenant, about which if there was no question now, inspired writers would not have taught us there was. Luke i. 72, 73, gives us as two of the many reasons why Christ was to be born, "to perform the mercy promised to our father Abraham, and to remember His holy covenant, the oath which He sware to our father Abraham."

Again, Heb. xii. 22—25, "Thus ye are come unto Mount Zion and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly of the Church of the firstborn" ("Ephraim is My firstborn," Jer. xxxi. 9), "which are written in heaven, and to God, the Judge of all, and the spirits of just men made perfect, and to the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel. See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh." Ver. 28: "Wherefore we receive a kingdom."

Anyone wanting further light gets it very clearly and concisely in the Inquiry Column of The Tribes, Vol I., No. 4, for Sept., 1896.

We might quote chapter on chapter, not only verses, in the New Testament on this subject, but I pray God these few will be used of Him to raise the veil from the eyes of our false accusers, and convince them of the truth of Our Identity teaching. I do thank God for this charge, as it has led me, and I am sure it will others, to search the Scriptures more carefully regarding this matter of covenants and promises.

Opposition is one of the best things to spread the truth, as it has always been used of God to do so. It helps us to do the crushing and grinding allotted to the stone kingdom by Daniel and Christ Himself (Dan. ii. 44, 45; Matt. xxi. 42—45).

Oh, Lord, give us patience and forbearance with all, remembering Thy patience with us, is the earnest prayer of

Your brother in Israel,

JAMES E. P. STEEL.

29, Foster-hill-road, Bedford, Nov. 6th, 1896.

MY DEAR A. B.— . . . I am reading up a subject which has brought me much light on God's Word, and this is, that we, the Anglo-Saxon Race, are the Lost Tribes of Israel. By this I mean England and her colonies and America, are fulfilling the promise made by God to Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 11, xxviii. 14), "That a nation and a company of nations should be of him;" afterwards repeated by Jacob to Joseph when blessing his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 19), "That Manasseh should be great but Ephraim should be greater, and his seed a multitude of nations." England and her colonies are fulfilling the promise to Ephraim; and America that made to Manasseh; and not only these promises, but all the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and their seed for ever.

The Jews, we have been taught, are Israel; whereas they are the Tribe of Judah, one only out of the Twelve Tribes of Israel and are now under the curse called on their own heads when they crucified our blessed Lord (Matt. xxvii. 25). But in God's time, most likely very soon, Judah and Israel, the latter one of a house, two of a city (Jer. iii. 14), will all return to the promised land (Jer. xvi. 14, 15, xxiii. 7, 8).

This truth opens out not only the Bible but everything that is going on around us at the present time, which are the last times spoken of in Gen. xlix. 1, and 1 John ii. 18, and many other places in God's Word.

It has cleared my mind from many difficulties in my daily life, and has given me a desire more than ever to be a faithful servant of my God, my Queen, and my country. . . .

It makes me see more clearly than ever, God's ruling hand in everything in our world as well as in the next, and removes all party spirit and animosity, because God is ordering and guiding all parties for the good of our nation; and not our nation only, but the good of the world, through us His witnesses, the children of Israel (Ezek. xxv. 14, and other places).

It also shows why our empire is expanding so fast; as He is fulfilling His promise to Abraham to make him "the heir of the world" (Rom. iv. 13, Gen. xvii. 4).

The law herein mentioned is the Mosaic law, which required obedience, to which we are now dead; but the promises made to Abraham (Gen. xxii. 16—18), and afterwards repeated to Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph, were without condition. They came of free grace; a free and a full salvation in things earthly and spiritual, in this life and in the life hereafter.

I am sending you a book ("Israel: a Thesis") on this subject, which I trust God will bless to you. . . .

I am, &c.,

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I am writing to thank you for the help the BANNER has been to me. A lady in Plymouth kindly loaned me two BANNERS which contained articles on Gog and Magog (Ezek. xxxviii. 39), which convinced me that we were Israel. Since then the Old Testament has indeed been a new book to me, and the prophecies so long spiritualized by our preachers and so long a mystery to myself, and as such very little read, are now quite clear, and a real delight and profit to me.

The coming of our Lord for His Church I now see much clearer through your help. I am engaged as a colporteur in South Devon, and preach every Sunday at a mission chapel, and so have many opportunities of bringing this truth before the people, and find it generally received. I gave a Bible-reading on Our Identity (my first) last week, which was much enjoyed, and a desire is expressed that I should give a lecture on the subject.

I remain, yours faithfully,

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I cannot but think that in the article under the above heading, E. Reep has given the erroneous impression that Augustine brought to the Saxons the Roman religion as we understand it now. He did not do this; for most of the errors of Rome sprang up later than Augustine, but I have been meaning to write an article on "The Growth of Romish Errors," and shall hope to do so when you have space for it.

Yours faithfully, F. C. P.

BRITISH-ISRAELITES AT WILLESDEN.—An able and interesting lecture was delivered at the Assembly Rooms, Willesden-green, on the 19th inst., by Mr. H. H. Pain. The lecturer's topic was "The Eastern Question as Affecting Great Britain's Interests." He contended that Great Britain had a paramount claim upon the Asiatic portion of the present dominions of the Turks in consequence of the British people being the successors of the Ten Tribes which formed the House of Israel up to 720 B.C. Votes of thanks to the lecturer and Mr. Onslow, J.P., who presided, concluded the meeting, which was very fairly attended.—Willesden Chronicle, November 27th, 1896.

THE YEAR OF TROUBLE ENDED.

THE past has been a year of sore trouble to our nation. To-day sees the termination of our anxieties, and behold a great calm! When we began it we were plunged into the trial which burst upon us from the United States, when President Cleveland sent us the message of fire and sword in regard to the South American boundary dispute of long standing in Venezuela. The matter is not yet closed, but the effort to twist the lion's tail on the part of brother Jonathan did its intended work, and after the expenditure of a vast mass of oratory and correspondence, we are presently to have a decision of the dispute which shall, we are told, be satisfactory and honourable to all. So may it be.

The American menace was quickly followed by the German Emperor's truculent message to President Kruger on the subject of Dr. Jameson's miserable invasion of a State at peace with his own Queen, and by an outburst of German hate and envy of our country, as expressed by their Press, which was treated by our Government as a defiance. It instantly called forth the special flying squadron of powerful ironclads to reinforce our already mighty power at sea. That measure had the expected effect. The angry tones of the German and American peoples died away; and the "young lions" who form our "company of nations," sent home their congratulations and assurances to their old mother in the West that they were true as steel, and would stand by her to the last.

The five Governments of Australia, and that of Tasmania, followed by New Zealand, "viewed with satisfaction the prompt and fearless measures adopted by Her Majesty's Government in defence of the integrity of the Empire," and conveyed to us their united assurances of loyal support. Foreign interference in matters of British and Colonial concern "they were determined to help us to resent." A lesson was thus conveyed to the whole world that the Island mother and her daughter nations were united as one people, and would not allow their enemies to threaten them.

The next trouble which disturbed us, and disturbs us still, is the Armenian horror. The nation has been moved to the heart's core by the awful character of the events which have taken place there, and at Constantinople, with the connivance of the Turkish Government, and of "the Arch Assassin" himself apparently. We are still in the throes of this deep distress, but are confronted by the fact that the nations of Europe representatively assembled at "The Great Gate" would look on our independent action as a menace to themselves, justifying a declaration of war against us. The geographical position of Armenia is against our acting alone, and a general war provoked by our separate action, would only lead to the further extermination of the Armenians, besides the horrible consequences of a war between the European nations, all armed to the teeth. We remain quiescent, therefore, in spite of the wave of indignation which has spread over our land, and true to the prophecies, Israel is found to be abiding in her chambers shutting her Gates about her and hiding herself for a little moment, because "the Lord has ordained peace for her," and will not permit her to take this matter into her own hands, "since this thing" too is from Him (1 Kings xii. 24, R.V.).

The year has witnessed the disastrous defeat of the Italians at Adowa, at the hands of the king of the Abyssinians. That great event brought on another, namely, our British advance from Egypt towards Dongola and Khartoum in order partly to assist the Italians after their overthrow, and partly though chiefly to win back the Province of Dongola from the Dervishes, and to prepare for the further advance of British and Egyptian troops to Khartoum to restore that city and its surrounding territory to the Khedive, to whom it belongs, and from whom we caused it to be separated soon after the Battle of Tel-el-Kebir. In our Leader of April 22 last, we asked men to note how this matter of the expedition to Dongola would end. We ventured to anticipate that God would give us success in regard to Dongola, which He denied to the Italians at Adowa. The event has just occurred; and we see the British, led by the Lord, ruling over the whole Province of Dongola, with Khartoum itself likely ere long to fall into our power. Noting this who can doubt that the British are Israel, and that the Lord is fighting for us?

During the spring and summer of this year, we have had the sore trouble to encounter of the rebellion in Matabeleland and Mashonaland. It broke out soon after Dr. Jameson's fatal and foolish raid, and has raged ever since. Only quite lately has the power of our savage enemies waned, and some hopes of a permanent peace begun to be entertained. It has been a bloody, cruel war, waged by our young emigrants, aided by Cape "boys" and friendly natives, backed up by a few of the Imperial troops acting as mounted infantry and artillerymen. Against fearful odds our volunteers have nobly sustained the national character for bravery and bull-dog courage; till at last we may conclude that peace will ere long reign where murder, violence, and the treachery of our savage enemies struggled hard for the mastery, but never once obtained it because the Lord fought for His people, and gave them the final victory.

The condition of the Turkish Empire, and the rapid approach of the critical period when it must break up and disappear has occupied much thought this year, and led to continual speculation as to how the event will be brought about. The subject is full of difficulty. How the prophecy of Ezek. xxv. 14 is to be accomplished we must leave to the event to show us. One point only is clear. There can be no peace till Turkey is out of the way. But the moment of her collapse will be the commencement of the terrible earthquake "war-woe" which is to devastate "yonder ill consolidated Europe," while British-Israel, sheltered in her "Chambers," and hidden in her "Gates," is to be protected and preserved by the Lord Himself, till "the indignation" be overpast (Isa. xxvi. 20, 21, R.V.).

During the past year, we have had many kind helpers in the work of the BANNER. Our readers have been discovered in the utmost parts of the earth. Everywhere there have been men and women who love the truth, ready to testify that the Scriptures bear witness with the facts of the day, that the British are Israel. We thank God for these, also for all those in the United Kingdom who have upheld our hands during the twelvemonth expiring to-morrow. To the friend who prepares our Indexes we tender our readers' thanks and our own, for good work well done.

It only remains for us before we throw down our editorial pen, at the end of the last day but one of the dying year, to thank God for His help so graciously given to us and to our work; for the admirable way in which the mechanical labours connected with our paper are conducted, and for the success which has been granted to our own feeble efforts in the cause of Israel. To Him alone be all the praise.

MAY IT NOT BE SO!

By L. P.

IN Jer. xlix., when writing of the future fall of Edom, which is now generally believed to be nigh at hand, the prophet (ver. 8) says, "Flee ye, turn back, dwell deep, O inhabitants of Dedan, for I will bring the calamity of Esau upon him, the time that I will visit him." And after saying of Edom (ver. 10), "he" (Edom) "is not," the prophet adds, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in Me;" after which the utter desolation of Edom is described. Now, I would ask whether judging by late events, we may not suppose the "inhabitants of Dedan" to be the present suffering, persecuted Amenians?

In a note to ver. 8 in the Paragraph Bible it is explained that "dwell deep" would mean "hide yourselves from the enemy, either by retiring into caverns, or by fleeing into the depths of the desert whither they cannot pursue you."

This would seem markedly to refer to the poor fugitive Armenians of the late terrible time.

As to the origin of Dedan, there are two statements in Eadie's Bible Cylcopœdia of 1877 :—

"Dedan, 1.—A district of Arabia, Petrea, south of Idumea, or Edom, settled by the descendants of Dedan, son of Jokshan, son of Abraham and Keturah. . . .

"2.—A country of Arabia, or the Persian Gulf, which traded with Tyre in ivory and ebony, and drapery for chariots. It was inhabited by the posterity of Dedan, son of Raamah, son of Cush; and long after the ruin of Tyre there was a city Dedan in this region which carried on an extensive trade, part of which was in those articles mentioned by Ezekiel (xxvii. 20). The location of these places is uncertain."

If paragraph 1 be correct, by their origin the Dedanites were related to Israel, being descendants of Abraham, though not of Isaac, and therefore, not of the "chosen people." Probably, therefore, there would be friendly intercourse between these blood-relations which may account for the Armenians holding "many customs and traditions" [vide Pain's "Englishmen Israelities," page 131] of Israelitish origin, as also for "the sympathetic feeling between this country and Armenia." Is this feeling stronger than that we should feel for any other people under the like circumstances? I am inclined to doubt it.

YOUR BROTHER ISRAELITE.

THE following appeared in the Jewish World of November 6th, 1896, and November 20th, respectively.

THE ANGLO-ISRAELITES.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. Pain, said in your last week's issue that he has little or no acquaintance with the writings of Edward Hine, but is indebted to the writings of Philo-Israel, Mr. E. W. Bird, an ex-Indian Judge. But was Mr. Hine not the first promulgator of the theory of the identity of the British people with the "Lost House of Israel?" We have heard very little of that gentleman since his "three nights' debate with Mr. Roberts, of Birmingham," on the above subject. Both your correspondents, Mr. Pain and Mr. Macphail, object to my statement with regard to Deut. xxxii. 26: "I said I would drive them into one corner (and consequently), I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men," &c. I find I have the support of such great scholars as David Levi in his "Lingua Sacra and Dissertations on the Prophecies of the Old Testament," and Manasseh Ben Israel, in his "Conciliator," who says, "From the captivity of the Ten Tribes to the present time, the Hebrews are indiscriminately called יהודים, Jews, as if all were of the tribe of Judah." It is worthy of notice that the Ten Tribes were carried to Lahlach and Habor by Shalmanesser, in order that they might occupy one portion of the country, each tribe still governing itself; which is confirmed by Benjamin of Tudela and others, who state that the distinction of the tribes was kept up, but in this Roman and Agavene captivity of the two tribes, with some of the Priests and Levites, except a few of the nobles who are known to be descendants of the House of David, as the Jahias, Abarbanels, and others, the common people are so intermixed that no one can positively say to which tribe he belongs. Hence it may truly be said that their remembrance has ceased from among men.

Mr. Pain says the Ten Tribes passed into the British Isles under the various names of Danes, Saxons, Normans, &c., but he gave us no proof to substantiate his assertion. What was the religion of these, and have they changed at all since, and who is it that is lending money to the various nations? Your correspondents may tell us that they are members of the "lost House of Israel." Yes, but professing Judaism?

Mr. Pain says I indulge in objections without giving reasons. I said that Queen Victoria does not sit upon the throne of David, and she is no more the Queen of the Jews than any other Sovereign under whose rule it is the privilege for Jews to reside; against this he asks, "Where is the everlasting throne of David?" My answer is, It is not in England. "And the Twelve Tribes were scattered over the face of the earth as the messengers of God, carrying forth His holy law to the people." But when did Her Majesty the Queen of England lay claim to her descent from King David, and where is the proof?

Mr. Pain says he would be delighted to see the Ottoman Empire broken up, but there is very little humanity in that. The Jews need not share that opinion, for they have been as well treated there as in any other kingdom of the Gentiles, and he will, perhaps, be more surprised when I give him my authority for the advance of the religion of Mohammed, which he calls in question. The late Emanuel Deutsch, Assistant Librarian of the British Museum, in an article on Islam, in the Quarterly Review for October, 1869, says, "Few religions have been founded in plain day like Islam, which now counts its believers by more than a hundred millions, and which enlarges its domains from day to day, unaided. Most clearly and sharply does Mohammed stand out against the horizon of history." "And according to an estimate made by Hassel there were—Christians of all denominations 120 millions, Mohammedans 250 millions" ("National Encyclopædia," 1886). So you see that the statement I made is fully made out. And if Christianity was placed on the same footing as Mohammedanism it would die a natural death, as it takes thousands of pounds to keep it alive.

Mr. Pain says that he was struck dumb with amazement at my telling him that if he was laying claim to a piece of property with no better title-deed in his possession than what he has put forth for his descent from Abraham, he would never get it. Yet he has not made good his claim; he must remember that Abraham was the only acknowledged servant of God amongst the millions of human beings then existing. It is evident that Mr. Pain & Co. are the descendants of the idolators contemporary with Abraham; and to prove that as such they have no claim upon the promises of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, it is said in Gen. xvii. 9—14, "And God said unto Abraham, Thou shalt keep My covenant, therefore thou, and thy seed after thee, throughout their generations. This is My covenant, which ye shall keep between Me and you, and thy seed after thee; every male of you shall be circumcised. And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be for a sign of the covenant between me and you. And at the age of eight days shall every male of you be circumcised throughout your generations, he that is born in the house or bought with thy money must needs be circumcised. And My covenant shall be in your flesh for a covenant for ever. And the uncircumcised male who doth not circumcise the flesh of his foreskin, that soul shall be cut off from his people." The above is the title-deed to the promised blessings; and Mr. O. J. Simon, in an article on "The Mission of Judaism," in the Fortnightly Review for October, says, "The man whose grandfather was a Jew, but whose parents were detatched from the Jewish religion, is only called a Jew by violent anti-Semites. He has no more title to the name than the grandson of a Quaker has to that name, when neither his parents nor himself are members of the Society of Friends. . . . And as the religion of the whole House of Israel was one and the same from Abraham till after their dispersion, when the tribes became so intermixed by marriage, up to the present."

Where does Mr. Pain get his information from, that Israel was to be divorced from the Mosaic covenant; it is not in Hosea i. He only shows us that Israel had lapsed into idolatry, of which they were forewarned (Lev. xxvi.). But Hosea tells us that Israel shall return and seek the Lord their God and David their King, and shall fear the Lord and His goodness in the latter days (chap. iii. 4, 5). That is, those Israelites who have apostatised, will return to their former religion; but they never lost the rite of circumcision, for the decree had gone forth from God that it was an everlasting covenant, and no ex-judge can revoke it. And in proof that the twelve tribes have been intermixed since the close of the Babylon Captivity or shortly after, though scattered amongst the different nations, see Ezek. xxxvii. 21, 22: "Thus saith the eternal God, Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one King shall be King to them all. And they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." At that time God will write His law in their hearts, not on tables of stone as in the days of Moses. But how could that be if the Ten Tribes were Christians and the other two Jews? Where is the circumcision of the heart commanded? And if the Israelites came into the British Isles under the various names of Danes, Saxons, Normans, &c., is the following promise applicable to them: "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper?" (Isa. liv. 17). Yours obediently,

D. FRAZER.

3rd November, 1896.

Mr. H. H. Pain replied on November 20th, thus:—

THE ANGLO-ISRAELITES.

To the Editor of the "Jewish World."

Sir,—Indisposition and absence from home has prevented my replying before to Mr. Frazer's letter of the 3rd November.

Your correspondent is the most illogical reasoner I ever came across. What the fact of my being primarily indebted to Philo-Israel—E. W. Bird, Esq.—the leader of the Anglo-Israel movement, for my knowledge of this theory, has to do with Mr. Hine being "the first promulgator of the theory of the identity of the British people with the Lost House of Israel," I am at a loss to conceive.

Deut. xxxii. 26 does not say, "I said I would drive them into a corner," the rendering as in my Bible, the Revised Version, reads thus, "I said I will scatter them afar, I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men." Will Mr. Frazer have the hardihood to say that this passsge applies to the Jews, whom everyone knows in whatever land they dwell? Does it not rather aptly describe the fate of the Ten Tribes, as is evident from the fact that their whereabouts is, and has been, for centuries past, a matter of speculation; not only to the Jews but to Christians as well?

Digitized by Google

Your correspondent quotes learned Jewish scholars in support of his contention that "From the captivity of the Ten Tribes to the present time the Hebrews are indiscriminately called Jews, as if all were of the tribe of Judah." I will go further and tell him that most of the great scholars of the Christian Church do the same thing. It is precisely this want of discrimination that we Anglo-Israelites so much object to. It is the cause to which we attribute all the difficulties of Scriptural interpretation of our opponents. Until the fundamental distinction is recognised that "all Jews are Israelites, but not all Israelites are Jews," it is hopeless either for Mr. Frazer or anyone else to expect to understand the Old Testament prophecies.

It would occupy more of your space than I have a right to expect to enumerate the various proofs which go to connect "the Danes, Saxons, and Normans with the lost Ten Tribes of Israel." Suffice it to say, that both Isaiah and Jeremiah declare that they are to be found in the Isles of the Sea, north-west from Palestine, as the following references will prove. (Jer. iii. 12, Isa. xlix. 12 and xxiv. 15.) They are not to "profess Judaism," but are to be found under the new covenant, as I will explain later on.

With reference to the article on Islam, in the Quarterly Review for October, 1869, I do not dispute the facts therein stated as quoted by Mr. Frazer, but only his inference therefrom.

Your correspondent's assertion that I "must remember that Abraham was the only acknowledged servant of God amongst the millions of human beings then existing; it is evident that Mr. Pain & Co. are the descendants of the idolators contemporary with Abraham," is very amusing, but I failed to understand either the drift of the remark, or how he arrives at such a curious and uncomplimentary conclusion.

The Abrahamic covenant "is the title-deed to the promised blessings," but I ask Mr. Frazer to give me a plain answer to a plain question: "Have the Jews at the present, or at any time past, ever enjoyed one of them? If so, will he kindly state them in detail."

It would be unfair for me to assume that the article of Mr. O. J. Simon on the "Mission of Judaism"—unless I had an opportunity of reading the context—that that gentleman intends to convey what I presume Mr. Frazer implies by his insertion of an extract therefrom, that anyone, be he Jew or Gentile, who changes his faith thereby changes his race or nationality. The proposition is too absurd to need discussion.

Your correspondent asks, "Where does Mr. Pain get his information from that Israel was to be divorced from the Mosaic covenant? It is not in Hosea i." Mr. Frazer must be a very superficial reader of the chapter in question to arrive at such an erroneous conclusion. The House of Israel of the Ten Tribes is therein figuratively dealt with under the type of an unfaithful wife. In verse 4 she is called "Jezreel;" "for I will cause the kingdom of the House of Israel to cease." A prediction which had its fulfilment in B.C. 680, according to Isaiah vii. 8, 9.

Verse 9, "Lo-Ammi," i.e., "not My people," "and I will not be your God." That is, they became like the people amongst whom they were cast—Gentiles. A distinction which implied that they did not remain under the Mosaic covenant from which they had been divorced, and in contrast to their brethren of the House of Judah, upon whom the Almighty showed His "mercy" (verse 7), by allowing them to return from the Babylonian captivity. It is stated in verse 11, that after the Ten Tribes became Lo-Ammi, not My people, but before the return of the two Houses to the land of their inheritance takes place, that "the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sands of the sea," a prediction as obviously inapplicable to the Jews, who are few in number, as it is applicable to the innumerable population of the British Empire. Hosea, in the 2nd chapter, speaks of this divorcement, and reconciliation of the House of Israel as distinguished from the House of Judah in the following passages:—Verse 2, "Plead with your mother, plead, for she is not my wife, neither am I her husband." The succeeding verses show that on repentance (7), "then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband." (16) "And it shall be at that day, saith the Lord, that thou shalt call Me Ishi—i.e., my husband." (19) "And I will betroth thee unto Me for ever." (22) "And I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy: and I will say to them which were not My people, Thou art My people; and they shall say, Thou art my God."

Parenthetically I may observe that chapter iii. refers to the House of Judah.

Isaiah, in chapter l., asks, "Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement?" And in chapter liv. the prophet declares, "For thy Maker is thine husband." "For the Lord hath called thee as a wife forsaken . . . even a wife of youth, when she is cast off, saith thy God." "For a small moment have I forsaken thee, but with great mercies will I gather thee." The reconciliation having taken place, the prophet then goes on to declare, "Sing, oh barren, thou that didst not bear . . . for more are the children of the desolate" (an indirect allusion to Rachel, the mother of Joseph, the head of the House of British-Israel) "than the children of the married wife" (Judah).

"For thou shalt spread abroad on the right hand and on the left, and thy seed shall possess the nations—i.e., colonial expansion—and make the desolate cities—of Palestine in the near future—to be inhabited." It is logically certain that the numerous, populous nation of the House of Israel, whether identified with the British nation, as I am firmly convinced is the case, or with any other nation that Mr. Frazer in his choice may think fit to select, must have come under the new covenant, from the fact that the Jews are the only people in the world who, outside of the Ten-tribed House of Israel, in the past, or the Gentiles in the present, have been, or remain under the Mosaic covenant.

The Prophet Jeremiah confirms this statement, for it is recorded in chapter xxxiii.:

"Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the House of Judah and with the House of Israel; not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt, which My covenant they break, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord."

"But this is the covenant which I will make with the House of Israel [no mention here be it noted of the House of Judah, inferentially proving that the former was to come under it first]: I will put My law in their inward parts, and in their hearts will I write it."

Finally, the prophet declares, "If these ordinances [of the sun, moon, and stars], saith the Lord, depart from before Me, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever." That nation, therefore—as the Bible is true—must be in existence at the present time. The Jews are not a nation, they have no land, and no king descended from David reigning over them. I maintain—and I have given Scripture quotations in support of my contention—that the British nation are in possession of the Abrahamic blessings, and are fulfilling the destiny predicted of the lost House of Israel; therefore, they must be the nation of Israel spoken of by the Old Testament prophets. Further, Her Majesty the Queen, by virtue of her position, must be descended from David, and the Royal Arms are a silent testimony to that fact. Mr. Frazer meets my statement by a blank assertion that "the everlasting throne of David is not in England." Will he be kind enough to tell me where it is, for I do not presume he will dispute the promise given to David, by the mouth of the Prophet Nathan, and reiterated by Jeremiah, on the eve of the apparent extinction of the Royal Family, remains unfulfilled? The quotation of Ezek. xxxvii. 21, 22 is misapplied to this question, for I do not dispute that at the time of the second and final re-union of the House of Judah and of the House of Israel, and their return to the land, i.e., Palestine, that there "one King shall be King to them all," but what I do ask is—What, in the meantime, has become of the seed and throne of David since Zedekiah's death in B.C. 588?

Finally, Mr. Frazer asks, "If the Israelites came into the British Isles under the various names of Danes, Saxons, Normans, &c., is the following promise applicable to them: 'No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper?'" (Isa. liv. 17). My answer is, Yes—emphatically, Yes—for under these names we have the tribes of Israel coming to their destined home in the Isles of the West, as prophetically foretold by Ezekiel, in his "vision of the valley of dry bones," which the prophet expressly declares "are the whole House of Israel"—not Judah—coming together, "bone to his bone," previous to the union of the two Houses, under the similitude of "two sticks," when they will become "one nation under one king." It must be obvious to anyone who has the most superficial acquaintance with the history of the British Empire, that to us, as a nation, the words of the Prophet Isaiah are literally true, "no weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper."

I must apologise for the length of this letter, but I would ask you, Mr. Editor, your readers, and also Mr. Frazer, to kindly remember that I am fighting for the honour of my Abrahamic birthright, and the consequent privilege to subscribe myself, Your brother Israelite, H. H. PAIN.

THE MOTOR CARS ON NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

OUR friend L. P. writes in regard to the Times article of Nov. 16th, in reporting the Motor Cars' journey from London to Brighton, that the scene might, as described, be a commentary on Nahum ii. 4, R.V., which reads thus: "The chariots rage in the streets, they justle as one against another in the broad ways, the appearance of them is like torches, they run like the lightnings." Our opponents would indeed find it difficult to explain away or spiritualize this literal fulfilment of a prophecy which is about 2,600 years old and is taking place before the eyes of the modern House of Israel.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD ON THE BRITISH OCCUPATION OF EGYPT.

THE opinions of Lord Charles Beresford, one of our most popular public characters, are always sure to command attention. His political address at the Constitutional Club in London, on October 28, which we published on Dec 9, No. 1041 was quite up to the speaker's mark and was full of original ideas. He thought that in 1882 we nationally made a great mistake "either from excessive modesty, or for fear of unpleasant consequences if we took decided action." He thought this was not unlikely "because of the rotten state of our fleet at that time!" We adopted a policy of "shilly shally," and instead of annexing Egypt, or proclaiming a protectorate, as France did in Tunis and Madagascar respectively, we declared our expenditure of blood and money was quite disinterested, and we intended to clear out as soon as we could! Lord Charles' views are best seen from his own words, and we quoted them because we saw that what he recommends will have finally, sooner or later, to be adopted. Our sacrifices in the past have been too great, and those yet expected of us too vast to justify us in throwing up the charge of the Nile Valley, which is prospering as it has done with God's blessing under our excellent administration and management.

British interests are Israel's interests, and these have a Guardian (the God of Israel) little suspected by Sir Charles Beresford. Without Him nothing has happened in Egypt since 1882 which has taken place. Sir Charles does not know why we have refrained from declaring a protectorate in Egypt, but God knows, and to Him it has seemed best that we should abstain from seizing the land which in 1882 He made over to our guidance. Ever since that date He has been directing our steps and forcing us, against our statesmen's will but quite in accordance with our nation's secret desires, to remain in Egypt, and never to relinquish our hold upon it as the chief Gate of our road to India, China, and the British "nation-colonies" to the South and South-East of Suez. We have no doubt ourselves that God means us to remain in Egypt and that there we shall stay. Everything points in that direction. The conquest of Dongola and the money we must spend (because of French opposition) to pay for the military expedition just ended; these events have rivetted our hold on Egypt and made it impossible for us to leave it. The French outcry comes with bad grace from those who, to injure us in the future, have just annexed Madagascar, and to strengthen their position in the Mediterranean have proclaimed a protectorate over Tunis, and have fortified Bizerta in the teeth of a treaty forbidding them to do so. We are in Egypt now, and it is clear we intend to stay there. It is now meet and right that we should proclaim our intention very respectfully to the nations concerned and take all measures necessary to convince the objecting Powers, that if they disapproved of our proceedings we were sorry, but left it to them to turn us out. There would be no attempt to do so; as all the nations, hate us as they may, are aware that in the event of the coming war of nations taking place, our navy would be an acquisition indeed on their own side, and no one could afford to fasten a quarrel to end in war upon the true mistress of the seas, who also commands the wealth of the world. The wars of the king of the North and of the king of the South are to succeed "the great earthquake war-woe" now at the doors; and as the king of the South must be the possessor of Palestine, Egypt, and India, while the king of the North is Gog and Russian Magog, accompanied by the surviving nations of Europe, it follows that our own Empire representing the king of the South is tied to Egypt in the providence of God and has been led by Him to bear rule there till His designs in respect to the occupation of Palestine by the thirteen tribes of Israel have been fulfilled, and Egypt His people, Assyria the work of His hands, and Israel His inheritance, have been settled in their own inheritance, after their own former estates (Isa. xix. 25; Ezek. xxxvi. 11, R.V.). To the Lord be all the praise!

PART II.

In the first part I omitted to add "since the Reformation" after "the first Roman Catholic" in the statement respecting the conferring of Geddes' degree, and to mention that the quotation from Anderson's work on the Bible was contained in the preface, that from Selden in "Table Talk."

Another testimony concerning the assimilation of our translation of the Scriptures to the originals is given by Dr. Eadie:—

"The spirit of all the sacred writers lives in the English translation. The immediate and fervid utterances of the Semitic temperament, filled with the divine life, clothe themselves as with a native fitness in our English tongue, and have for all time ennobled and sanctified it."*

The principle to be observed in the classification of languages is thus stated by Benjamin W. Dwight†:—

"Grammatical identity is the basis of all linguistic analysis. According to their grammar, which is in fact their inward osseous structure, all languages are readily classified into distinct, determinate families." And he adds as a counter illustration: "The English is very largely Latin in its vocabulary, but not at all in its grammar."

Is not translation a practical proof of this similarity or family likeness, if the translated version closely follow the original, and yet retain the purity and harmony of a native classic? Such has been the result in rendering the Hebrew Scriptures into English. Surely devout readers of God's Word should seek to understand the significance of this intimate relation of speech to speech, and scholars might find herein a study more profitable and more worthy of their abilities than the so-called higher criticism.

Dr. Tullidge claims "that this agreement in the internal structure of the two languages proves a similarity of mental constitution between the Hebrew and Anglo-Saxon. And since, on the part of the Hebrew people, this was so wonderfully unique, the agreement can be adequately explained only on the supposition that the Anglo-Saxons are lineal descendants of the ancient Hebrews."‡

A characteristic of Anglo-Saxon mind, according to a writer in Harper's Magazine, September, 1860, is "a profound sense of the invisible, the infinite, claiming a secret and earnest affiliation with Hebrew mind as revealed in the Old Testament." If this relationship be admitted, why should it any longer be held secretly, or thought to be due to some occult cause, and not in accordance with our Creator's law of hereditary transmission of mental, as well as bodily qualities, by natural descent?

In the following examples of correspondence and analogy with Hebrew, from English speech and literature, the references to the Bible are contained in the A.V., unless otherwise noted. Some words in quotations are printed in italics for the sake of distinction. The edition of Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, referred to as Dav. Ges., is that of Rödiger, translated by Dr. Benjamin Davies.

The simple form and construction of the English language is noted by Bp. Lowth, who also observes: "Of all the antient languages extant, that is the most simple which is undoubtedly the most antient; but even that language itself does not equal the English in simplicity. The words of the English language are perhaps subject to fewer variations from their original form than those of any other."*

In the absence of case-endings to nouns (and adjectives), and the use of prepositions when required to express the relations of case, the Hebrew resembles the English.

"The English have omitted the needless variation of cases in the Saxon, and reverted to the prior simplicity of the Hebrew, the Saxon variable terminations giving way to the English prepositions."—Bosworth.†

A solitary case-ending remains in English; the genitive 's derived from one of the Saxon forms—es. Another mode of forming the genitive is similar to the Hebrew usage, where the noun in which of is implied is placed immediately before the genitive, in which position it in some instances remains unchanged; in others its last letter is omitted or changed, or a terminal letter is added.

In treating of the Hebrew verb, it is remarked in Dav. Ges.: "In the Germanic languages there are distinct forms for only two tenses, present and imperfect. In the formation of all the others auxiliary verbs are employed." The simple form of the Hebrew verb (Qal), in addition to two tenses, past and present-future, consists of infinitive mood, imperative mood 2*nd person*, and two participles, in which forms are comprised all the parts of the English verb which can be expressed without auxiliaries.

The functions of the Hebrew tenses are far more varied and comprehensive than those of the English present and imperfect, but some like usages may be noted, as:—

"The future tense‡ [in Hebrew] is employed of single acts that are done and past, where the preterite might be expected. Such is the case, at least in poetry, on the same principle as we employ the present tense in lively representations of the past."—Dav. Ges.

The present tense in English to some extent expresses the future:—

"If the English or Saxon language do possess a tense capable of implying futurity, then that tense is the one commonly considered as the present." [E.g., "I go a-fishing" (John xxi. 3); "We go to town to-morrow."]—Bosworth.

"Notwithstanding its name, the present in English does not express a strictly present action. It rather expresses an habitual one. It has also, especially when combined with a subjunctive mood, a future power."—Latham.

Latham's view of the English present tense may be compared with that taken by Dr. Robert Young of the Hebrew present or future, viz, "an indefinite present expressive of habitual action, which may very naturally be viewed as being or continuing in operation at some period afterwards, as well as present."

The present is most frequently denoted in Hebrew by the participle, as in English:—

"If a man means to say that he is in the act of speaking, he says, 'I am speaking.'"—Latham.

Infinitives in Hebrew may be preceded by prepositions, as "for to say," that is, "saying." As examples of the use of this mode of expression in our literature, I quote:—

"And, sooth to say, why I lefte you so long,
Was for to seek adventure in straunge place."
—Spenser, "Faerie Queene."

"Which for to prevent,
I have, in quick determination,
Thus set it down."—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

"O what a happy thing it is,
And joyful for to see,
Brethren to dwell together in Friendship and unity."
—Whittingham (Sternhold and Hopkins' Psalms).

To "omit for before infinitives" was one of the alterations suggested by the American revisers of the Old Testament, but disagreed with by their British brethren.

Do and did we now employ for the emphatic form of present and imperfect. Not so in Early English. "'Do' was then used only in the sense of 'to cause,' 'to make,' &c.; and in this sense was followed by an infinitive."* The use of this form of the verb seems to have been like that of the Hebrew conjugation Hiphil, signifying causation.

"Two negatives in the same sentence, instead of destroying each other, as in Latin and English, make the negative stronger."—Dav. Ges.

Our modern practice is contrary to the Hebrew usage; but about three centuries ago the use of the double negative to express negation was common in literary English. It is still common in the speech of children and the vulgar. Of the double negative Dr. Abbott writes (Shakespearian Grammar): "This idiom is a very natural one, and quite common in Early English."* And Nares observes (Glossary): "The duplication of the negative did not always in our earlier writers destroy its force, but rather strengthened it; nor was this peculiar to one, or two, but general. Instances in Shakespeare are innumerable. [Beaumont and Fletcher, Spenser, Drayton quoted]. Nothing could be easier than to multiply these examples to a great extent. It was the genuine language of the time." As in the following:—

"Good sir, let not my rudeness be no breach Unto your patience."—Spenser.

"And, behold, the whole family is risen against thine handmaid, and they said, Deliver him that smote his brother, that we may kill him, for the life of his brother whom he slew; and we will destroy the heir also: and so they shall quench my coal which is left, and shall not leave to my husband neither name nor remainder upon the earth" (2 Sam. xiv. 7).† The word not is omitted in R.V.

Repetition is still used to strengthen negation in Psa. xiv. 3, liii. 3: "There is none that doeth good; no, not one" (A.V., R.V.), and in the parallel passages in Rom. iii. 10, 12.

* Abbott, "Shakespearian Grammar." † Quoted by Bp. Chas. [illegible] in his work on Shakespeare and the Bible.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES AND THEIR CAPITAL.

"FROM a Parliamentary Blue-book, published yesterday morning, on joint-stock companies, it appears that the total number of paid-up capital companies carrying on business in April, 1896, was 21,223, with a total capital of £1,145,402,993. Of this amount no less than £1,035,442,852 was subscribed to 18,514 companies registered in London, £82,508,882 was in reference to 1,804 companies registered in Edinburgh, £27,342,368 to 895 companies registered in Dublin, and £108,891, to 10 companies registered in the Stannaries. The amount, £1,145,402,993, is the largest sum of money that has been invested in registered companies during the past twelve years, and shows an increase on the amount invested in April, 1884, of £669,851,698. There has been a steady growth of the amount invested in joint-stock companies from 1884, and the increase has been more marked since 1892, when the amount was £989,283,634. In April of the following years the sums were:—1893, £1,013,119,350; 1894, £1,035,029,835; 1895, £1,062,733,821; 1896, £1,145,402,993."

The above was published in the Bristol Times and Mirror of October 28th, 1896. The figures present a wonderful view of the wealth of this country. It is almost impossible to realize the fact that the investments of the British people last April were about double the amount of the national debt, and that in respect only of one class of investment, namely, "Joint-stock Companies." The mind recoils from and cannot grasp such a sum as a thousand millions sterling, or ten times the revenue of this country, during last official year! Verily God has given us "the power to get wealth," and He has afforded us very tangible proof of the fact when He enables a secular newspaper, quoting a Parliamentary blue book, just published, to tell us of the vast volume of our national wealth and how it is increasing "by leaps and bounds." These figures, and those which our friend Mr. W. L. Blore has so ably been placing before us lately in the BANNER, give us the true measure of British progress and prosperity as compared with our envious and jealous neighbours. The latter are striving hard to rob us of our Israelitish blessings, but fail to realize the while that He who is Omnipotent and Almighty has given us as Israel, His people, the power to get the wealth they covet, and cannot obtain against His will, His promises and covenants, which He has sworn to fulfil, as it is this day. To Him be all the praise.

"THE ASSYRIAN."

A FRIEND at Wootton Bassett, on reading our review of Dr. Aldersmith's lecture on "Coming Events in the East," &c., on page 432 of the BANNER, No. 1,033, propounds the question, whether and how Isa. xiv. 25 can be reconciled with Isa. xix. 23—25. The two passages run thus:—

"The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass: and as I have purposed, so shall it stand: that I will break the Assyrian in My land, and upon My mountains tread him under foot; then shall his yoke depart from off them, and his burden depart from off their shoulder." The above is in Isa. xiv. 25, R.V.

The well-known passage in chap. xix. 23—25, reads thus, and the question is how "the Assyrian" of the first, doomed to destruction, is to be reconciled with "the Assyria" and

"Assyrian" of the following destined to be blessed (like Israel), and being "the work of the Lord's hand?" Ver. 22: "In that day there shall be a high way out of Egypt to Assyria" (a railway probably), "and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptians shall worship with the Assyrians." Ver. 24: "In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, a blessing in the midst of the earth." Ver. 25: "For that the Lord of hosts hath blessed them, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel, Mine inheritance."

The explanation of the difficulty seems to be that "the Assyrian" of chap. xiv. destined to fall on the mountains of Israel, belongs to a different race from the "Assyria" and "Assyrian" of chap. xix. The latter is a blessed country and people existing after Assyrian-Gog has been destroyed; and with Israel and Egypt, is to be blessed of God and made a blessing to the world. The application of the name "Assyrian" to Russian-Gog in the divine prediction, seems to be for the purpose of intensifying the enormity of Gog's wickedness, and to show the depth of the assailant's sin in the sight of God. The Speaker's Commentary on the difficult passage in Isa. xix. 23—25 is to the following effect: "Then the nations who have so long been rival claimants for the empire of the world, both of whom had been Israel's oppressors, shall find themselves joined in unity, by their common service of God." Dr. Aldersmith is inclined to concur with this comment and to consider that "at the last, Israel's two great enemies will be obedient to God through Israel, but Israel will still remain 'the nation,' and God's inheritance."

To ourselves it has always been a puzzle to identify the nation answering to Assyria and the Assyrians of Isa. xix. 23—25. We are too far yet from the event to dogmatize about it, and probably do wisely to let the matter rest, till the light grows brighter and we are closer to the fulfilment of this glorious prophetic event.

MARQUIS OF RIPON ON THE QUEEN'S REIGN.

SOME NOTABLE ACHIEVEMENTS.

By J. Thomson.

The Marquis of Ripon has been giving his opinion of the beneficial character of the Queen's reign, and it so strikingly bears out the views advocated in the Banner that we think they deserve wider notice than they yet have had. Anglo-Israelites will notice that he testifies (1) to the long acquaintance our Queen has had with public affairs, and that (2) she is a bright example of what a constitutional sovereign should be. These political blessings distinguish this country from every other nation in the world. Few have any correct idea of the great blessings the acquaintance of the sovereign with political questions has had in securing this steady character of our public affairs.

Our blind witness also notices (3) the great and enormous change that has been made by the "admission of the great mass of England's citizens to a direct voice in the government." What the result of this will eventually be it is impossible for the wisest among us to foretell.

Our blind witness also refers (4) to the two great wars which have distinguished our Queen's reign—the Crimean and the Indian Mutiny—and avers, though he does not admire the policy which led to them, that during their progress there "was displayed one of the most magnificent examples of the qualities of our fellow-countrymen that had ever been seen in the world."

The noble marquis also noticed (5) the great expansion of the British Empire during the past sixty years, but only mentions this great phenomenon with tardy praise. He, however, affirms (6) that we have "had enormous responsibility thrown upon us in the government of an Empire which was greater than any nation—not excepting the Roman—had ever undertaken;" and finally he unhesitatingly says (7) "that Empire, he believed, had been placed in our hands by God, and we owed to Him a duty in its goverment which we ought not to forget."

In all this the noble marquis speaks like an Anglo-Israelite. But if the question was put to him, he would hardly admit it, but, as nearly all others do, smilingly say, "Oh, I do not know anything about the Identity. I read the Bible occasionally" (as much as his priest allows), "and leave the rest to God." But this is, in brief, the way the generality of persons talk of the Identity when it is mentioned to them. But it is something to them, and to all the world. God promised these glorious blessings to one nation only—His chosen people Israel. Where is that chosen people that England may retire before them?

"Speaking at the Mayoral entertainment at Ripon, the Marquis of Ripon referred to the fact that that annual gathering was for people aged sixty years and upwards, and pointed out that that period covered almost the reign of our present gracious Sovereign. (Applause.) Her reign would not be remembered so much for its length, as for the great events which had occurred during those sixty years, and, perhaps, above all, for the fact that she had been the most constitutional Sovereign that this country had ever had, and the bright and unfailing example of what a constitutional Sovereign should be. (Applause.) At the present time Queen Victoria was the most experienced Sovereign in Europe. She had had a longer acquaintance with the public affairs of the world than any other ruler of the present day, and she had had a greater and closer experience than any statesman now alive, because she had known everything under all Governments, whereas the statesmen of the country, as Governments changed, had an intimate acquintance only with those affairs with which they had been personally engaged. We must be struck by the marvellous advance which had been made, not in this country only, but in others. Sixty years ago there were in this country but few railways, no electric telegraphs, no penny postage. The whole means of communication between the people of the different parts of the country was very inferior to what it was now. Vast changes had taken place within that period in all directions. Looking at it in a political, not a party, point of view, the earlier portion of that period was distinguished by legislation which tended to remove those fiscal burdens which, at the commencement, lay upon the people of the country. Governments and Parliaments devoted themselves in cheapening articles of consumption most needed by the people. The second half of that period might be called the period of political enfranchisement, because a great and enormons change had been made in the admission of the great mass of the citizens of England to a direct part in the government. (Applause.) These changes marked an important alteration in our political constitution, which had not yet fully borne all the fruits likely to be derived from it. With regard to the public services, the army and navy were animated by the same noble spirit and that determination to do their duty and to sacrifice themselves for their country always marked them, but almost everything else in regard to them had changed. During the time to which he alluded we had had two great wars. There was the Crimean war, which was founded upon a policy which filled them with hope at the time, but which had utterly failed. Then followed the Indian Mutiny, of which it was difficult to speak without feelings of poignant regret, but in which was displayed one of the most magnificent examples of the great qualities of our fellow-countrymen that had ever been seen in the world. (Applause.) During the sixty years there had been a great expansion of the British Empire, which led foreign countries to imagine that we had always some secret object of our own interest, especially some commercial object, in everything we undertook. Though we might in the course of our history have done things that we had better not have done, it was a great mistake to suppose that in that great advance of the British Empire we had been actuated by mere sordid influences. (Applause.) We in England had enormous responsibilty thrown upon us in the government of an Empire which was greater than any nation, not excepting the Roman Empire, had ever undertaken. That Empire, he believed, had been placed in our hands by God, and we owed to Him a duty in its government which we ought not to forget. (Applause.) He and his guests that evening were passing away from the scene, and their public life was drawing to a close. They had endeavoured to do their duty in the times in which they lived, and they handed over those great responsibilities to those younger and more active men who would come after them. He hoped that the administration of the Empire would be conducted in such a way that they would hand it on to the following generation, feeling that they had done something to fulfil the purposes for which God had given them that realm. (Loud applause.)"—Leeds Mercury, Oct. 16, 1896.

IN MEMORIAM: REV. THOMAS LOWE, PREACHER AND WRITER ON BRITISH-ISRAEL.

ENLIGHTENED readers of the BANNER OF ISRAEL (and who are not?), have increased their light by the varied articles written herein by Thomas Lowe; and will be thankful to know a little more about the writer.

He was born at Liverpool in 1821; was trained as a Presbyterian Christian, and converted to God at the age of twelve in a Primitive Methodist service. He was so consecrated, and studious, and zealous, that the Church in which he was thus "born again," actually called him into the regular Christian ministry at the early age of fifteen; and he then entered, being in the succession of Samuel, the Seer, Jeremiah, and many other glorious prophets in Israel. His ordinary ministry was in North, South, East, and West of England; in Scotland, Ireland, and the Isle of Man, and his special services were in almost, if not quite, every city of the British Isles.

As a pulpit preacher and platform orator he far excelled the ordinary minister. Thirty years ago, in Spurgeon's Tabernacle, he charmed and lifted the thousands present into rapturous joy, missionary zeal, and increased offerings. By his public speaking and writings he was one of the chief fathers of our foreign missionary work.

His egg-shaped head, like the head of Shakespeare, shows he had a poet's brain; and his beautiful compositions in verse and prose prove that he had the poet's soul and inspiration. See his books, "The Pilot of the Galilean Lake;" "The Folded Lamb and Gathered Lily;" "Shakespeare under the Stars," &c.

At Great Yarmouth Circuit, only one of his many successful fields, he added three hundred converts to his Church. He became the second Primitive Methodist minister known to openly preach the glorious gospel of the British race as Israel. For preaching that gospel, the Conference of 1885, sent me like John to a starvation Patmos, that made me absolutely penniless. And that was a little after I and the Rev R. W. Burnett, by the grace of God, had with great sufferings, founded their first Church and educational work in and for all Africa. This drew the spirit of Thomas Lowe to seek communion with my spirit; a blessed communion that never ceased in this world, and will not cease in the next.

Within that same dark Conference, like another "Ruler of the Jews that came by night," this Thomas Lowe came to my side, and pressing my hand in his, whispered softly, "Tell me about the British being Israel. Let me have your second pamphlet called 'Israel's World.' The following part of his letter shows the result of that: "What the works of Mr. Hine failed to do in my enlightenment, 'Israel's World' has accomplished, resulting in my adoption of the British-Israel teaching. I now read the Scriptures in a new and vivid light. No opposition, petty or powerful, can arrest the march of truth.

'Men smote it, but it struck them dumb;
They knew not what a power had come.'"

Since then I've heard him in Shakespeare's native town and other places, publicly preach and teach that the British are Israel; and a number of his articles on the same have appeared in former numbers of the BANNER.

After a very successful ministry of sixty years, being the oldest Primitive minister in full work, he took cold in a mission street procession at Hove, near Brighton, Nov. 12, 1896, and died at Hove on Nov. 18, of inflammation of the lungs, aged 75. Minister of God, WELL DONE!

His body was buried at Hove, Nov. 23, being followed by eight mourning coaches, and very many people on foot. In the Church and at the grave the following took part in the services: five Primitive ministers, two Primitive laymen, two Congregational ministers, and one Wesleyan minister. The following hymns were sung amid many tears:—"Come, let us join our friends above;" "Lead, kindly light;" "There is no night in heaven."

At Swinefleet and Reedness, I preached memorial sermons on him with this text, "He was a burning and a shining light."

Who will be the next Primitive minister to preach the glorious gospel of the British being Israel? Who will pray "Thy kingdom come" to every preacher's eyes and soul? Who will follow Christ in coming out to seek and to save the lost sheep of the House of Israel? O reader, now say, I will!

Yours to help you, HENRY ROE.

The Britannic-Israel Almanack, 1897, issued by the North of England Anglo-Israel Council. Secretary, Mr. Joseph Hayden, 2, Grant-street, Halifax. Price one penny; one dozen, carriage paid, 1s. 3d.; 50 for 4s., and 100 for 7s. 6d.

WE welcome the first sheet almanack which has yet been put forward by our British-Israel friends anywhere. We have in the present one four woodcuts representing Canterbury Cathedral, York Minster, St. Paul's Cathedral, and Durham Cathedral. These occupy the four corners of the sheet. In the centre we have a pretty little picture of two "penitents," a girl and a dog, who have, we see, between them broken in pieces a glass or china stand which clearly they had no business to touch. But it is as a teaching almanack that the one before us is to be recommended. It gives us fifteen prophecies concerning Israel with the texts connected with each, pointing distinctly to our own race. We give three specimens of this part of the almanack:—

"Israel had to be preserved during their wanderings, and gathered together."—Amos ix. 9; Jer. xxxi. 10.

Digitized by Google

"Israel had to possess the Gate of their enemies" (Gen. xxi. 17)—e.g., Gibraltar, Malta, Aden, &c.

"Israel had to be at the head of the nations."—Jer. xxxi. 7; Deut. xxviii. 13.

The feature of the almanack, however, which gives it its chief value is the fact that it contains no less than twenty-five quotations from leading writers on our side with the subjects they each illustrated by their remarks, and the Scriptural texts named, which were in question. The writers quoted were Ed. Hine, Philo-Israel, Bishop Titcomb, D. A. Onslow, Denis Hanan, Joseph Wild, J. Leechman, Earl of Radnor, Totten, Aston, J. McIntosh, Mark Guy Pearse, Idrisyn Jones, Aldersmith, P. Carlyon, Cavill, Milner, J. G. Taylor, Rosling Howlett, Bridgman, Rev. G. A. Rogers, and others. A useful comparison of the great empires of the world, past and present, follows, with the usual calendars and postal information, to be found in other annuals of its kind.

We transfer to our columns some of the remarks of our writers which appear in the Almanack, to give our readers an idea of the usefulness of this little work, which is designed and very well calculated to do great things for the advancement of our views among the people.

"'EPHRAIM IS THE STRENGTH OF MINE HEAD; JUDAH IS MY LAWGIVER.'

"The Ten Tribes are at the present time inheriting an entirely different class of prophecies to those that now apply to the Jews. By examining just a few of them, we cannot fail to see the marvellous distinction of the two Houses. As those applying to Judah are known by us all to have an actual fulfilment among the Jews at this day, it is only logical to conclude that the prophecies given of Israel must also in our days be having an equally positive and literal fulfilment."—Edward Hine,

"'The chief of the nations' (Jer. xxxi. 7). Britain has already performed a great part of the mission with which Israel was entrusted, and she now stands forth before the world as the most extensive, most powerful, most wealthy, most vigorous, most fruitful, most gifted in colonization, most wise in administration, and most equitable in governing subject races, among the nations of the world. Britain is fulfilling all that was spoken of Israel, and therefore, as Israel, not only in name but in deed, she looks forward to greater blessings than she has yet obtained."—Rev. James McIntosh.

"'I will bring the blind by a way they knew not' (Isa. xlii. 16). Just as the comet that goes and comes travels unswervingly in its appointed orbit, apparently free, yet controlled by mighty forces, from which it is powerless to break, so the lost tribes of Israel were bound at the dictate of prophetic impulses to take the journey, assume the shape, and perform the mission which has been realised to the letter, and realised alone, in the past and present experiences of the British people."—J. G. Taylor.

"'Ephraim is My firstborn' (Jer. xxxi. 9). It was reserved for Ephraim to become the head of the House in Britain, and Judah is to find in Ephraim her long-lost brother, who shall restore her to her ancient home and prosperity. If England is Ephraim, then I can see this whole book of prophecy living to-day and being fulfilled in our midst. If England is not Ephraim, there is no nation answering to this description, nor as yet has there been one, nor is there at present any promise of such a nation appearing." — Rev. Mark Guy Pearse.

"'The promises made unto the fathers' (Rom. xv. 8). These are the marks and signs which God has given us in His Word, by which we may know and recognise His lost people. Not one of the nations of the globe—Christian, Mahommedan, heathen, or Jewish—responds to all these identifications, with one exception, and that is Great Britain; she, and she alone, responds to them every one. She, and she alone, lacks not one. This is the ground on which we take our stand, and on which we challenge discussion."—Philo-Israel.

These samples ought to suffice. The new annual is a success, and ought to receive great encouragement. If each of our associations at home and abroad will order, distribute, or sell 200 or so of the Sheet Almanack early in 1897, we believe inquiry into the Identity will be stimulated, believers secured to God's glory, and the object of the authors, as well as of ourselves, secured.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

SIR,—Our work on behalf of the spread of British-Israel Truth in Scotland, has increasing encouragement, by applications for more lectures to educate the mind of the people; and although striving to the best of our ability, we cannot overtake the increasing work, pecuniarily, without help beyond what we are already receiving.

We would ask the readers of the BANNER, who have at heart the spread of this great truth—"The Faithfulness of God's Promises to Israel," and as God has prospered them, that they will assist us out of their abundance.

We have a clear headed and vigorous lecturer and secretary, Mr. J. D. Reid, who is willing to spend and be spent in this service for "The Master," but that cannot be done in efficiency unless we have £100 per annum more income than we have.

May God, who giveth all, incline the hearts of some of your readers, to whom He has given means to spend for His glory, to come to our aid. Our Secretary is a business man, who has given in the past more of his time to our cause than we could ask to be continued, without our giving him that assistance which is necessary. We would be sorry to lose his valuable services, and are thus constrained to ask from readers of the BANNER, who have the ability, that they may help in this work for our Lord and Master.

Trusting that God may incline the hearts of His servants to reply favorably to our appeal.

On behalf of the "Northern British-Israel Council,"

R. A. WHITLAW, President.

Kelvinside, Glasgow, Nov. 21st, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—As an instance of "Blind Evidence" I must call your attention to a book, "Egypt under British," by Wood, published this year (Mudies). "I do not know if the English govern everywhere as they govern in Egypt," summed up a native of high and responsible position, a gentleman whom Mr. Chamberlain saw when he was in Egypt and questioned minutely, "but if they do, then I say they are sent by God to rule the world." As Mr. Chamberlain was not a minister at that time there was no deep motive in telling him. Soon after Mr. Chamberlain, if you recollect, acknowledged that his views were much changed by his visit; perhaps the remarks made by the native might have had something to do with the change. Mr. Wood also speaks of a movement which has latterly arisen in Syria since we have governed Egypt, namely, for Syria to join Egypt. A Syrian gentleman of independent position and of high culture, admitted the existence of the movement in the following cautious words: "Many Syrians would be ready on a partition of Turkey to propose to the Khedive that Syria should be annexed to Egypt." Yours very truly, W. D. ALLEN.

3, Trafalgar-square, Chelsea, S.W., Oct. 23rd, 1896.

THE TITLE PAGE AND INDEX to the Volume for 1896 will be ready next week, price one penny.

CASES FOR BINDING, in handsome blue cloth, gilt, may also be had, price 1s. 6d. May be ordered of any bookseller or bookbinder, or post free from the publishers on receipt of Post Office Order.

THE subject, "A Peculiar People," chosen for the next lecture (as per advt.) at Kennington is apropos of the fact that the hall of the Shakers, or Peculiar People, is adjacent to the hall where Mr. Mackworth is to give the lecture.
