THE KEY-NOTE FOR THE NEW YEAR, 1896.

WE congratulate our readers on the opening of the New BANNER Year, which commences, as it should, on Jan. 1. It is likely to be a year of great and significant events in the direction of the restoration, after recognition, of the House of Israel, to God's favour, and their representative return, in due time, to their land, the land of the inheritance, in company with the whole House of Judah, and their brethren of the Tribe of Manasseh, in America. We do not suppose that that splendid event is quite at the doors; but that matters are taking shape in connection with the development of the federation of the empire, which will prove to the world that the British Empire is best described in Scriptural phraseology as "a nation and a company of nations," a nation surrounded by "an escort of daughter nations," attached to us by what seem to be the slenderest ties, but yet ties strong enough, with God's blessing, to be like adamant, and capable of holding together the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. That dominion has to support it, the empire of the seas throughout the globe, the heathen empire of India and Africa—besides wealth inconceivable—and a moral character derived straight from the Divine Author and Creator of the race, to be His instrument "to show forth His praise" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.).

Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, recognised some of these facts, when, a few weeks since, he spoke of the empire whose destinies he directs. He called the British Colonies, which constitute our Greater Britain, "great communities having within them every element of national life, which have taken their rank among the nations of the world"!

The "company of nations" surrounding Israel are thus before the world, and so present a spectacle unique in the history of the nations since the world began, attached to us by mere silken threads, but destined, according to the Scriptures, to remain attached by the cords of love and loyalty to the parent stem. "The possibility of the separation of the colonies has become greater," said Mr. Chamberlain, "but the desire for separation has become less." These are wonderful words, and the sentiments of the speaker are like the forecast of events which he said himself were immediately before us, to be realised in the next few years—certainly within the next generation. His remarks, uttered on November 6, last, on the occasion of the banquet which took place in London in honour of the completion of the Natal-Transvaal Railway, are as applicable to-day as when they were spoken, and we record them now as a fitting introduction to the New Year, to encourage us to meet its coming surprises, and to prepare us as "conscious Israelites" for our duties in connection with them. He said inter alia:—

I think it will not be disputed that we are approaching a critical stage in the history of the relations between ourselves and the self-governing colonies. We are entering upon a chapter of our colonial history, the whole of which will be written in, perhaps, the next few years, and certainly in the next generation, which will be one of the most important in our colonial annals; but upon the events and the policy that it describes will depend the future of the British Empire. (Hear hear.) That empire, gentlemen—that world-wide dominion to which no Englishman can allude without a thrill of enthusiasm and patriotism (hear, hear)—which has been the admiration and perhaps the envy of foreign nations—hangs together by a thread so slender that it may well seem that even a breath would sever it. There have been periods in our history not so very far distant, when leading statesmen, despairing of the possibility of maintaining anything in the nature of a permanent union, have looked forward to the time when the vigorous communities to which they rightly intrusted the control of their own destinies would grow strong and independent, would assert their independence, and would claim entire separation from the parent stem. The time to which they looked forward has arrived sooner than they expected. The conditions to which they referred have been more than fulfilled, and now these great communities, having within them every element of national life, have taken their rank amongst the nations of the world; and I do not suppose that anyone would reckon the idea of compelling them to remain within the Empire as within the reach of intelligent speculation. (Hear, hear.) And yet, although, as I have said, the time has come and the conditions have been fulfilled, the results which those statesmen anticipated have not occurred. (Cheers.) They felt perhaps overwhelmed by the growing burden of the vast dominions of the British Crown. They may well have shrunk from the responsibilities and the obligations which it involved, and so it happened, at any rate, that some of them looked forward not only without alarm, but with hopeful expectation to the severance of the union which now exists. But if such feelings were ever entertained, they are entertained no longer. (Loud cheers.) As the possibility of separation has become greater, the desire for separation has become less (renewed cheers); and while we on our part are prepared to take our part and to do all that may be fairly expected from the mother country, and while we should look upon the separation as the greatest calamity that could befall us, our fellow-subjects throughout the world on their part see to what a great inheritance they have come by the mere virtue of their citizenship, and they must feel that no separate existence, however splendid, could compare with that which they enjoy equally with ourselves as joint-heirs of all the traditions of the past and as joint partakers of all the influence, resources, and power of the British Empire. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I rejoice that that change has taken place. I rejoice at the wider patriotism, no longer confined to these small islands, which embraces the whole of Greater Britain and which has carried into every clime British institutions and the best characteristics of the British race. (Cheers.) How could it be otherwise? We have a common origin, we have a common history, a common language, a common literature, a common love of liberty and law. (Cheers.) We have common principles to assert, we have common interests to maintain. (Renewed cheers.) I have said that it is a slender thread that bound us together. I remember on one occasion having been shown a slender, a frail wire which a blow might break, and I was told that it was capable of transmitting an electrical energy that would set powerful machinery in motion: May it not be the same in the relation that exists between our colonies and ourselves, and may not that thread be capable of carrying a force of sentiment and of sympathy that will yet be a potent factor in the history of the world? (Cheers.)

IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

Mr. Peace, there is a word which I am almost afraid to men tion lest at the very outset of my career I should lose my character as a practical statesman. I am told on every hand that Imperial Federation is a vain and empty dream. (Cries of "No, no.") I will not contest that judgment, but I will say this—that that man must be blind indeed who does not see that it is a dream which has vividly impressed itself upon the mind of the English-speaking race, and who does not admit that dreams of that kind, which have so powerful an influence upon the imagination of men, have somehow or another an unaccountable way of being realised in their own time. (Cheers.) If it be a dream, it is a dream that appeals to the highest sentiments of patriotism and even to our material interests. It is a dream that is calculated to stimulate and to inspire every one who cares for the future of the Anglo-Saxon people. (Hear, hear.) I think myself that the spirit of the time is at all events in the direction of such a movement. How far that will carry us no man can tell, but believe me upon the temper and the tone in which we approach the solution of the problems that are now coming upon us depend the security and maintenance of that world-wide dominion, that edifice of Imperial rule, which has been slowly built up for us by those who have gone before. (Cheers.)

Such are the joyous anticipations of coming events which Mr. Chamberlain can hardly fully realise, since he sees nothing of Israel in them or knows whither they really tend. He does not know that the splendid empire he helps to administer is the growing kingdom of Christ, destined to cover the earth and to bring all mankind within its beneficent control. There is much to be done meanwhile, no doubt, before the end can be reached; but to those who have eyes to see there is that occurring, furthering the progress of these events, which the Lord no doubt is manipulating. What was the Japanese and China war but the preparation for the downfall of China and its "break up" to prepare it for Israel? What is it men see now before them plainly, and announce it to their readers as obvious facts? Let The Investor for October last tell us:—

Upon the whole there are plenty of sparks in the political air, as well as no lack of combustible matter on which they might fall. Russia and Japan have their eyes on each other, and each owes the other a considerable grudge. The breaking up of Turkey in Europe and of China in Asia are evils which must fall upon the present generation, and will be far-reaching in their consequences.

This reminds one of Rev. xvi. 18, writes an Anglo-Israelite, but the real fact is that the "break up" of Turkey now at hand is to usher the Twelve Tribes of Israel into the Holy Land, with British-Israel at the head of the glorious procession; and "the break up" of China is to give Israel her share (the most valuable portion no doubt) at once; and with Japan as her ally to neutralise the strength of Russia at Port Arthur, or wherever else she may succeed in planting herself in China. How Russia and France are working together to deprive Israel of her inheritance is told in a few pregnant words by The Investor, also, thus:—

Russia and France steadily continue to mix war-paint. The one grinds the colour and the other prepares the oil against the day when they may determine to paint Europe red. Asia also appears destined to have her share, judging from the quiet movements of Russian troops and war material. A volunteer fleet to run to Vladivostock during the winter is to bring up the army there to 90,000 by the spring. This is intended, no doubt, to facilitate negotiations with Japan.

Our little army of fellow-helpers in the cause of British-Israel are still at work, and doing good service for the Lord. Miss Rush, Miss Fitzpatrick, Mrs. Woolcott, Mr. Marchant, and Col. Senior are all in their several spheres of labour zealously carrying out their allotted functions, and each needs the prayers and co-operation of our readers. The able editor of The Covenant People (Oxonian), supported by the British-Israel Association in London, is doing a good work, and the BANNER following in the wake, or leading in the van (whichever our readers please), is engaged in the friendly contest to make known our good news that Israel is found, in ever-widening quarters. May the Lord give us all His presence, and lead us in our efforts during 1896. May He cause the knowledge of our nation's Identity with Lost Israel to be widely published and universally accepted during the time before us, is our hearfelt desire and prayer. To Him shall be all the praise.

In conclusion, we would again ask our friends to recommend the BANNER far and wide; to read and lend the paper; to order it through country and other booksellers, by placing it in public libraries, railway-station waiting-rooms, and carriages, and by enquiring for it at the railway bookstalls.

P.S.—The events of the last fortnight in the United States, which have so startled our own and continental nations, will be our subject next week, God willing.

THE SUN-CLOTHED WOMAN.

By the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

The vision of the sun-clothed woman (Rev. xii.) has had many interpreters and many interpretations. I am not aware that it has yet been explained in the light of the Identity. This knowledge has solved many difficulties, and whether the following statement may prove as unsatisfactory as the many contradictory interpretations or not, it will, I think, present at least one coincidence which may lead other students to more successful results. To this end I shall make use of statements and admissions to be found in the notes of the "Speakers' Commentary," and endeavour to show wherein they fail, and whereby they can be supplemented.

In the first place, the "great sign" is figurative of two opposing powers or principles during a long period of time. Both the Woman and the Dragon existing and being ideally animated by the same opposing desires before the birth of "the Man Child," at the time of His birth, after it, until the woman fled to the place of safety, and for the 1,260 years of her being nourished there. The Woman representing the Church of Israel before and after the first advent of the Lord, the Dragon representing a hostile evil power. In the woman clothed with the sun, "we have an ideal picture of the Church of God, the true Israel, the Bride, the spiritual mother of Jesus Christ; as such she wears the crown of twelve stars." "The Woman who gives birth to the Messiah and has yet other seed, can only be the Old Testament Church of God, the true Israel. She represents not only the ancient . . . Church, but likewise the Church of God in its New Testament form," but yet (knowing that the Jews did not become Christian, and being ignorant of recovenanted Israel) the admission is forced that, "To apply the symbolism here exclusively to either the Jewish or the Christian Church fails to meet the requirements of the language used. Burger tries to meet this difficulty by understanding "the woman to be the Church of Christ in her final condition, and including converted Israel."

Ebrard also being ignorant of Christian Israel, and recognising in the woman converted Israel, thinks that two attacks upon her are foretold. The first he holds to be relatively identical with the fifth trumpet, the second during the time of anti-Christ. The Dragon,—of whom more further on,—having failed to devour the Man Child, Jesus Christ, persecutes in after years the Woman, "now become the Church of Christ," who flies, born on the eagles' wings of God's protection, into the wilderness or prepared place, where she is nourished and hidden for the period of 1,260 days (assumed here upon the year-day interpretation, to be years). Note here that this prepared place of safety was long before promised to Israel. 2 Sam. vii. 10: "Moreover, I will appoint a place for My people Israel, and will plant them that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more as aforetime." In this place Christian Israel is to be nourished. "Ebrard understands here, that the woman being the representative of Israel, qua the object of the promises, must be preserved; and, accordingly that Israel is not extirpated . . . but preserved by God in national separation from other peoples;" a fair and truthful comment, written by a man who had no idea of how or where the preservation was accomplished.

Christian Israel in this place of safety, and condition of national separation, is to continue there for the specified period. This same period is predicted for the treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles: "The holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months" (Rev. xi. 2). This period has not expired, and Israel, or the woman, is yet not manifested; therefore, it seems not to be unreasonable to assume that the two periods synchronise—viz., that the flight of the woman, and the specified treading down of Jerusalem, commenced in or about the same period, and that the manifestation of Israel, and the ceasing to tread down Jerusalem, will be events corresponding in time.

Jerusalem was taken by the Mohammedan power, A.D. 636, and if the foregoing assumption is correct, there must be some remarkable event in the national history of preserved Israel at the same period. The coincidence to which I referred is this, that the Anglo-Saxon nation was at this very period converted to Christianity by the labours of S. Columba and the missionaries who went forth from Iona. At the battle of Heaven's field, 635, the cross was fixed by the hands of King Oswald and his nobles, in the centre of the position; and after many struggles, paganism was overthrown in England, at the battle of Winwoed, A.D. 655. A more remarkable religious movement than that which acknowledged Columba as its leader, is scarce to be found in the annals of Christendom.

"It was not the Church of Paulinus (or the Roman Mission) which nerved Oswald to this struggle for the Cross. The Roman Church in Kent shrank into inactivity before the heathen reaction. Its place in the conversion of England was taken by missionaries from Ireland. While the vigour of Christianity in Italy, and Gaul, and Spain, was exhausted in a bare struggle for life. Ireland, which remained unscourged by invaders, drew from its conversion an energy such as it has never known since. . . . The science and Biblical knowledge which fled from the Continent took refuge in famous schools which made Durrow and Armagh the universities of the West. . . . Patrick . . . had not been half a century dead when Irish Christianity flung itself with a fiery zeal into battle with the mass of heathenism which was rolling in upon the Christian world . . . for a time it seemed as if Celtic, and not Latin Christianity, was to mould the destinies of the Churches of the West."*

Thus the life and learning of the Church, which was driven from both East and West by an overwhelming hostile power, found refuge in Ireland, and perpetuated itself in England, nearly 1,260 years ago. It became the source and nucleus of that form of Christianity which is peculiar to the Anglican Church, the origin of a living power which cast off Western mediæval accretions, and which has been nourished, protected, freed from invasion, and fed, by the overruling Providence of Him, who bore Israel as on eagle's wings, and also caused, that though sifted as corn in a sieve, yet not a grain was lost, or her Identity merged in the surrounding people.

It was in the beginning of the seventh century that the Saracenic woe was launched against Western Christendom. "In the ten years of Omar's Caliphate, from 634 to 644 A.D., the Saracens had reduced to his obedience three thousand six hundred cities or castles, destroyed four thousand churches, and built one thousand four hundred mosques for the exercise of the religion of Mohammed." Within one hundred years the Arabian Empire reached from the confines of India to the shores of the Atlantic. Over all this ample space the venom of the scorpion sting was made to rankle in the breasts of the subject-Christians. But the sun-clad woman was far removed, and in her prepared place, her sea-girt isles, the Church of Israel was causing the heptarchy to consolidate, and thereby the British people was formed.

It seems, therefore, that Apollion of the first woe (Rev. ix.) and the Dragon of chap. xii. are identical; and that the Saracen treader down of Jerusalem, and the enemy of the sun-clad woman and of the remnant of her seed, are one and the same.

There was an actual attempt to destroy the Man Child, Christ, as soon as He was born, made by Herod the Idumean. The slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem manifested the same spirit that caused the Idumeans and Arabs, and other neighbouring nations, to combine to destroy the whole race of Israel, one hundred and sixty years earlier. Herod was in league with the King of Arabia, and in Arabia arose the leader of the Saracen hordes, that animated by the same spirit swept over Christendom in the early years of the seventh century. The same spirit is manifested to-day in the Turkish successors of the Saracenic power. The massacres in Armenia are an evidence of the readiness "to make war with the remnant of her seed," which was displayed during the first woe. It seems to me that the sun-clothed Woman and the Dragon are to-day face to face. One, the Christian nation, animated as a people (despite of many evils) with the Spirit of Christ. The other, the anti-Christian power that even in its death-throes exhibits implacable hostility to whomsoever has the testimony of Jesus Christ.

"The people which were left of the sword found grace in the wilderness: even Israel, when I caused him to rest . . . declare it in the isles afar off, and say, He that scattered Israel will gather him, and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock. For the LORD hath redeemed Jacob, and ransomed him from the hand that was stronger than he. Therefore, they shall come and sing in the height of Zion" (Jer. xxxi.). Here we have an intimation that the people preserved in "the wilderness" are to come to the height of Zion; the preservation is to last for twelve hundred and sixty years; they cannot return with joy and singing until the city ceases to be trodden down: thus it seems to be necessary that the period of Israel's hiding, and the time of the treading down of Jerusalem, will end together when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled. There seems to be little doubt that the times of the Gentiles—a full week of years (solar)—is exactly bisected by the capture of Jerusalem by Omar, and will end in or about Easter, 1898. Until that time the sun-clad woman is to be nourished in the wilderness, and until that time Jerusalem is to be trodden down. Let the knowledge of Our Identity with Israel spread as it may, there will be no public recognition of it until the period is fulfilled. It may be thought by many that our progress as teachers of the Identity is slow. Many seem to lose their interest in the facts which once convinced them. THE BANNER OF ISRAEL has been witnessing for twenty years, and although there is undoubted evidence that the knowledge of the evidence is spreading, yet as a nation and Church we make no recognition of our origin. A few of the seed of the sun-clad woman think that there may be reunion with the woman clothed in scarlet, so ignorant are we of our true position as the Israel of God. It requires but little foresight to see that, if there is reason to believe that the two periods here treated of synchronise, the occupation of Jerusalem, by Israel, will cause the wilderness hiding of the sun-clad woman to cease, and her manifestation as Israel will be her warrant for the occupation.

It may be that for us, even at the end of the age, it is not given to us "to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power," nevertheless, such an inquiry as this is not presumptuous. And whatever events may occur before the restoration which God has promised is brought about, our national character, our Christian witness, our protest for the truth, our preparedness for service, our humility, because of national and ecclesiastical sins and divisions, will all be purified by the knowledge of Our Identity with the Woman clothed with the Sun.

"THE FIFTH MONARCHY": A CONCIO AD CLERUM.

BY THE REV. P. CARLYON, M.A., CANTAB.

AN octogenarian clergyman claims the privilege of age and of thirteen years' devoted study of the subject, in appealing once more to his brethren in Christ on the necessity of either accepting or refuting the teachings of British-Israelism. He appeals especially to all the clergy. Conventional theology so absolutely rules their minds that they fall behind their flocks in realising the vital importance of the new truth developed by the fulfilment of prophecy, and they accept tradition instead of historic facts as prophetic evidence. Consequently, they are behind not only their flocks, but also the condition of the world and the exigencies of the present age. So vast, however, is the field of investigation that any appeal to the fulfilment of prophecy must be limited in its scope, and confined to instances as examples. The one chosen in this article is "The Fifth Monarchy." We want the true solution of the question, What is the fifth monarchy in the book of Daniel? Previous claims to its possession have been refuted, and recourse is usually had to a spiritual interpretation (which widely leads our clergy astray) in the assumption that it means the Christian Church. But this fifth kingdom must as surely constitute a part of the world's historic system as the four previous kingdoms of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which are described as "bearing rule over all the earth (chap. ii. 39), and known in Biblical exegesis as the four world-empires or monarchies. Hence "the fifth monarchy" is a household term. What is it? We read the whole book of Daniel, and gather out of it a plain and conclusive answer.

In chap. ii. 44 we read, "In the days of these kings—viz., the four previously described—shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed (nor) left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." And the symbol by which it was represented in the dream was "a stone cut out of the mountain without hands," at that time "a stone"; but ver. 33 declares that after the four kingdoms were swept away, and "no place was found for them," the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth.

So far, then, we have these materials to work upon, and the familiar fifth monarchy and stone kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar's dream are one and the same. We read on, and find amongst various visions of the book of Daniel two ecstatic dreams of the prophet himself (ecstatic as being out of himself and in the Spirit) wherein God repeats to him, in whole or in part, the same prophetic forecaste that He had disclosed to Nebuchadnezzar; and as it was said of one, "The great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter" (chap. ii. 45), so Michael, the archangel, informed Daniel that he was sent to explain the other, "To make thee understand," he said (chap. x. 14): "what shall befall thy people in the latter days." Note the words, "what shall befall thy people," and "in the latter days." En passant, it is all about Daniel's people.

To resume our thread. These two ecstatic dreams are narrated in chap. vii., in the vision of the four beasts, and in chap. viii., in the vision of the ram and the he-goat; and there can be no need to say more than that, by general consensus, the four beasts represent the same four kingdoms as Nebuchadnezzar's image, and the ram and the he-goat are revealed to be the second and third kingdom of the same succession to the world's dominion. "The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia, and the rough goat is the king of Grecia" (chap. viii. 20).

The outcome of the whole matter is summed up in the concluding chapters of the book; the final kingdom is "given to the people of the saints of the Most High," and the consummation is the evolution of "the fifth monarchy" out of the débris of the previous four. "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men," and the fifth monarchy is permanently established as a complete and perfect theocracy. Perhaps Christ will reign personally in Jerusalem over the empire admitted by other powers as dominant, and now recognised to be the people whom God has chosen to be Israel, His glory, from the call of Abraham to the union of the two Houses into one nation, again to be no more pulled up from their own land, but to be the fifth and final world-empire, seen and known and read of all men.

This empire clearly has a past and a future history; and as greater things are yet to come, it has hitherto escaped men's notice, and continues to blind their eyes to the now yellowing harvest.

Before, however, we look on the fields to see what is coming, let us note a few points in the prophetic forecaste to make the more sure that our fifth monarchy is not what current theology accepts and supposes it to be. It is not the Christian Church. It is not an elective invisible society consisting (whether as adjuncts or supplanters) of Gentile converts to Christ, whom we admit to be fellow-citizens (under the "new covenant") with the saints (Eph. ii.) in things spiritual; but it is a kingdom of this world, as Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome have been; and the difficulties and discords of the popular idea that the fifth monarchy is the Church, when placed side by side with the prophetic narrative, are so many and so inconsistent that they at once condemn the delusion and put it out of court.

1st. The inconsistency of making out of five world-empires represented and symbolised in one vision, four of them secular and one spiritual, is of itself sufficient to refute it.

2nd. The existence of the fifth "in the days" of the kings of the first four makes it impossible to be the Christian Church.

3rd. The turning of the gospel of peace and love into the battle-axe of the Lord (Jer. li.) perverts the truth.

4th. The Church ever preaches subjection to the "powers that be," and history testifies that the Church did not destroy, but for many years prolonged, the Empire of Rome.

5th. The modern reading of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, from the enumeration backwards of the iron, clay, brass, silver, and gold crumbling down "together" which throws the fulfilment of the whole into the yet future, after nearly 3,000 years, is inconceivable; besides that, in ver. 45, the clay comes in the middle of the five emblems, and the Hebrew or Aramaic word for "together" does not express simultaneous action, but similar catastrophe, the last with the first, one and all. In this, as in all cases, prophecy must not be interpreted by the mere emblem, which can never be exact in all points, but by facts; and it is hard to imagine how a statue, the symbol here employed, could be planned like views in a revolving lantern to show the decapitation first, then the crash of the bust, and so forth—a reductio ad absurdum. History is our interpreter, and its evidence is dead against the interpretations of modern popular theology.

From the discordant conclusions of the negative side of our inquiry, we may now proceed to the investigation of our positive contention that the fifth monarchy is no other than the kingdom of Israel as a worldly empire under the theocracy of the King of kings, from the time of "the oath that He sware unto David" for a thousand generations, that, David should never want a son to sit on his throne for ever (2 Sam. vii. 10—13) down to the re-enthronement (yet to come) of his lineal seed on Mount Zion over the re-united twelve-tribed nation (Jer. xxxiii. 17, &c.). Wonderful! but we ought to have learnt long since that with God nothing is impossible. God is only vindicating the truth of His own Word and fidelity to His covenant. We take the words of the Bible in their plain literal meaning, and then, instead of discord, we find harmony. The notion that the four monarchies of Nebuchadnezzar's dream and Daniel's vision still exist, awaiting destruction by some future catastrophe is (independently of historic fact) refuted by the Biblical statement, "The wind carried them away; and no place was found for them" (chap. ii. 35). And (omitting Rome) what historian disputes that Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Grecia, the first three ancient empires, have disappeared as monarchies from off the earth? A new modern idea that these three constituted the first four monarchies is amply refuted in the notes of the "Speaker's Commentary." Moreover, the symbols of the ram and the rough he-goat which are revealed to be emblems of Medo-Persia and Grecia show absolute overthrow and extinction. They are gone, and the only doubt remaining is whether the fourth monarchy still lingers on in some divided existence of its miry toes, and yet awaits the stone to fall. The wish is father to the thought. The iron empire is also gone, and for it also, as ver. 35 declares, "no place is found." "In the days" of their own kings the stone smote Babylon, Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Rome, one and all alike, one after another, and "smote them in pieces" together. Our opponents say it was the Church that did it. If so, she forsook her vocation. They mean, when they say it, the Christian Church; but "in the days of the first three of those kings" she did not exist. Well, then, they retort, it was the Jewish Church. Worse still! for it could only be a branch and fraction. Let them say it was the Hebrew Church, and we will grant them this Salvo; but it contributes nothing to their interpretation, for the Hebrew Church—"the Church in the wilderness"—was identical with the whole people; and their contention simply merges into ours.

The stone kingdom was indeed the Hebrew Church, the then existing Ecclesia (or calling out) God's elect, His chosen people separated from all other peoples to do His work, and to be His witnesses, unto the ends of the earth. God plants and pulls up nations at His will, but how, and with what weapons? not through His own direct Word and

THE KEY-NOTE FOR THE NEW YEAR, 1896.

WE congratulate our readers on the opening of the New BANNER Year, which commences, as it should, on Jan. 1. It is likely to be a year of great and significant events in the direction of the restoration, after recognition, of the House of Israel, to God's favour, and their representative return, in due time, to their land, the land of the inheritance, in company with the whole House of Judah, and their brethren of the Tribe of Manasseh, in America. We do not suppose that that splendid event is quite at the doors; but that matters are taking shape in connection with the development of the federation of the empire, which will prove to the world that the British Empire is best described in Scriptural phraseology as "a nation and a company of nations," a nation surrounded by "an escort of daughter nations," attached to us by what seem to be the slenderest ties, but yet ties strong enough, with God's blessing, to be like adamant, and capable of holding together the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. That dominion has to support it, the empire of the seas throughout the globe, the heathen empire of India and Africa—besides wealth inconceivable—and a moral character derived straight from the Divine Author and Creator of the race, to be His instrument "to show forth His praise" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.).

Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, recognised some of these facts, when, a few weeks since, he spoke of the empire whose destinies he directs. He called the British Colonies, which constitute our Greater Britain, "great communities having within them every element of national life, which have taken their rank among the nations of the world"!

The "company of nations" surrounding Israel are thus before the world, and so present a spectacle unique in the history of the nations since the world began, attached to us by mere silken threads, but destined, according to the Scriptures, to remain attached by the cords of love and loyalty to the parent stem. "The possibility of the separation of the colonies has become greater," said Mr. Chamberlain, "but the desire for separation has become less." These are wonderful words, and the sentiments of the speaker are like the forecast of events which he said himself were immediately before us, to be realised in the next few years—certainly within the next generation. His remarks, uttered on November 6, last, on the occasion of the banquet which took place in London in honour of the completion of the Natal-Transvaal Railway, are as applicable to-day as when they were spoken, and we record them now as a fitting introduction to the New Year, to encourage us to meet its coming surprises, and to prepare us as "conscious Israelites" for our duties in connection with them. He said inter alia:—

I think it will not be disputed that we are approaching a critical stage in the history of the relations between ourselves and the self-governing colonies. We are entering upon a chapter of our colonial history, the whole of which will be written in, perhaps, the next few years, and certainly in the next generation, which will be one of the most important in our colonial annals; but upon the events and the policy that it describes will depend the future of the British Empire. (Hear hear.) That empire, gentlemen—that world-wide dominion to which no Englishman can allude without a thrill of enthusiasm and patriotism (hear, hear)—which has been the admiration and perhaps the envy of foreign nations—hangs together by a thread so slender that it may well seem that even a breath would sever it. There have been periods in our history not so very far distant, when leading statesmen, despairing of the possibility of maintaining anything in the nature of a permanent union, have looked forward to the time when the vigorous communities to which they rightly intrusted the control of their own destinies would grow strong and independent, would assert their independence, and would claim entire separation from the parent stem. The time to which

WE congratulate our readers on the opening of the New BANNER Year, which commences, as it should, on Jan. 1. It is likely to be a year of great and significant events in the direction of the restoration, after recognition, of the House of Israel, to God's favour, and their representative return, in due time, to their land, the land of the inheritance, in company with the whole House of Judah, and their brethren of the Tribe of Manasseh, in America. We do not suppose that that splendid event is quite at the doors; but that matters are taking shape in connection with the development of the federation of the empire, which will prove to the world that the British Empire is best described in Scriptural phraseology as "a nation and a company of nations," a nation surrounded by "an escort of daughter nations," attached to us by what seem to be the slenderest ties, but yet ties strong enough, with God's blessing, to be like adamant, and capable of holding together the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. That dominion has to support it, the empire of the seas throughout the globe, the heathen empire of India and Africa—besides wealth inconceivable—and a moral character derived straight from the Divine Author and Creator of the race, to be His instrument "to show forth His praise" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.).

Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, recognised some of these facts, when, a few weeks since, he spoke of the empire whose destinies he directs. He called the British Colonies, which constitute our Greater Britain, "great communities having within them every element of national life, which have taken their rank among the nations of the world"!

The "company of nations" surrounding Israel are thus before the world, and so present a spectacle unique in the history of the nations since the world began, attached to us by mere silken threads, but destined, according to the Scriptures, to remain attached by the cords of love and loyalty to the parent stem. "The possibility of the separation of the colonies has become greater," said Mr. Chamberlain, "but the desire for separation has become less." These are wonderful words, and the sentiments of the speaker are like the forecast of events which he said himself were immediately before us, to be realised in the next few years—certainly within the next generation. His remarks, uttered on November 6, last, on the occasion of the banquet which took place in London in honour of the completion of the Natal-Transvaal Railway, are as applicable to-day as when they were spoken, and we record them now as a fitting introduction to the New Year, to encourage us to meet its coming surprises, and to prepare us as "conscious Israelites" for our duties in connection with them. He said inter alia:—

I think it will not be disputed that we are approaching a critical stage in the history of the relations between ourselves and the self-governing colonies. We are entering upon a chapter of our colonial history, the whole of which will be written in, perhaps, the next few years, and certainly in the next generation, which will be one of the most important in our colonial annals; but upon the events and the policy that it describes will depend the future of the British Empire. (Hear hear.) That empire, gentlemen—that world-wide dominion to which no Englishman can allude without a thrill of enthusiasm and patriotism (hear, hear)—which has been the admiration and perhaps the envy of foreign nations—hangs together by a thread so slender that it may well seem that even a breath would sever it. There have been periods in our history not so very far distant, when leading statesmen, despairing of the possibility of maintaining anything in the nature of a permanent union, have looked forward to the time when the vigorous communities to which they rightly intrusted the control of their own destinies would grow strong and independent, would assert their independence, and would claim entire separation from the parent stem. THE KEY-NOTE FOR THE NEW YEAR, 1896.

WE congratulate our readers on the opening of the New BANNER Year, which commences, as it should, on Jan. 1. It is likely to be a year of great and significant events in the direction of the restoration, after recognition, of the House of Israel, to God's favour, and their representative return, in due time, to their land, the land of the inheritance, in company with the whole House of Judah, and their brethren of the Tribe of Manasseh, in America. We do not suppose that that splendid event is quite at the doors; but that matters are taking shape in connection with the development of the federation of the empire, which will prove to the world that the British Empire is best described in Scriptural phraseology as "a nation and a company of nations," a nation surrounded by "an escort of daughter nations," attached to us by what seem to be the slenderest ties, but yet ties strong enough, with God's blessing, to be like adamant, and capable of holding together the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. That dominion has to support it, the empire of the seas throughout the globe, the heathen empire of India and Africa—besides wealth inconceivable—and a moral character derived straight from the Divine Author and Creator of the race, to be His instrument "to show forth His praise" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.).

Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, recognised some of these facts, when, a few weeks since, he spoke of the empire whose destinies he directs. He called the British Colonies, which constitute our Greater Britain, "great communities having within them every element of national life, which have taken their rank among the nations of the world"!

The "company of nations" surrounding Israel are thus before the world, and so present a spectacle unique in the history of the nations since the world began, attached to us by mere silken threads, but destined, according to the Scriptures, to remain attached by the cords of love and loyalty to the parent stem. "The possibility of the separation of the colonies has become greater," said Mr. Chamberlain, "but the desire for separation has become less." These are wonderful words, and the sentiments of the speaker are like the forecast of events which he said himself were immediately before us, to be realised in the next few years—certainly within the next generation. His remarks, uttered on November 6, last, on the occasion of the banquet which took place in London in honour of the completion of the Natal-Transvaal Railway, are as applicable to-day as when they were spoken, and we record them now as a fitting introduction to the New Year, to encourage us to meet its coming surprises, and to prepare us as "conscious Israelites" for our duties in connection with them. He said inter alia:—

I think it will not be disputed that we are approaching a critical stage in the history of the relations between ourselves and the self-governing colonies. We are entering upon a chapter of our colonial history, the whole of which will be written in, perhaps, the next few years, and certainly in the next generation, which will be one of the most important in our colonial annals; but upon the events and the policy that it describes will depend the future of the British Empire. (Hear hear.) That empire, gentlemen—that world-wide dominion to which no Englishman can allude without a thrill of enthusiasm and patriotism (hear, hear)—which has been the admiration and perhaps the envy of foreign nations—hangs together by a thread so slender that it may well seem that even a breath would sever it. There have been periods in our history not so very far distant, when leading statesmen, despairing of the possibility of maintaining anything in the nature of a permanent union, have looked forward to the time when the vigorous communities to which they rightly intrusted the control of their own destinies would grow strong and independent, would assert their independence, and would claim entire separation from the parent stem. THE KEY-NOTE FOR THE NEW YEAR, 1896.

WE congratulate our readers on the opening of the New BANNER Year, which commences, as it should, on Jan. 1. It is likely to be a year of great and significant events in the direction of the restoration, after recognition, of the House of Israel, to God's favour, and their representative return, in due time, to their land, the land of the inheritance, in company with the whole House of Judah, and their brethren of the Tribe of Manasseh, in America. We do not suppose that that splendid event is quite at the doors; but that matters are taking shape in connection with the development of the federation of the empire, which will prove to the world that the British Empire is best described in Scriptural phraseology as "a nation and a company of nations," a nation surrounded by "an escort of daughter nations," attached to us by what seem to be the slenderest ties, but yet ties strong enough, with God's blessing, to be like adamant, and capable of holding together the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. That dominion has to support it, the empire of the seas throughout the globe, the heathen empire of India and Africa—besides wealth inconceivable—and a moral character derived straight from the Divine Author and Creator of the race, to be His instrument "to show forth His praise" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.).

Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, recognised some of these facts, when, a few weeks since, he spoke of the empire whose destinies he directs. He called the British Colonies, which constitute our Greater Britain, "great communities having within them every element of national life, which have taken their rank among the nations of the world"!

"The possibility of the separation of the colonies has become greater," said Mr. Chamberlain, "but the desire for separation has become less." These are wonderful words, and the sentiments of the speaker are like the forecast of events which he said himself were immediately before us, to be realised in the next few years—certainly within the next generation. His remarks, uttered on November 6, last, on the occasion of the banquet which took place in London in honour of the completion of the Natal-Transvaal Railway, are as applicable to-day as when they were spoken, and we record them now as a fitting introduction to the New Year, to encourage us to meet its coming surprises, and to prepare us as "conscious Israelites" for our duties in connection with them. He said inter alia:—

THE KEY-NOTE FOR THE NEW YEAR, 1896.

WE congratulate our readers on the opening of the New BANNER Year, which commences, as it should, on Jan. 1. It is likely to be a year of great and significant events in the direction of the restoration, after recognition, of the House of Israel, to God's favour, and their representative return, in due time, to their land, the land of the inheritance, in company with the whole House of Judah, and their brethren of the Tribe of Manasseh, in America. We do not suppose that that splendid event is quite at the doors; but that matters are taking shape in connection with the development of the federation of the empire, which will prove to the world that the British Empire is best described in Scriptural phraseology as "a nation and a company of nations," a nation surrounded by "an escort of daughter nations," attached to us by what seem to be the slenderest ties, but yet ties strong enough, with God's blessing, to be like adamant, and capable of holding together the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. That dominion has to support it, the empire of the seas throughout the globe, the heathen empire of India and Africa—besides wealth inconceivable—and a moral character derived straight from the Divine Author and Creator of the race, to be His instrument "to show forth His praise" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21, R.V.).

Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, recognised some of these facts, when, a few weeks since, he spoke of the empire whose destinies he directs. He called the British Colonies, which constitute our Greater Britain, "great communities having within them every element of national life, which have taken their rank among the nations of the world"!

The "company of nations" surrounding Israel are thus before the world, and so present a spectacle unique in the history of the nations since the world began, attached to us by mere silken threads, but destined, according to the Scriptures, to remain attached by the cords of love and loyalty to the parent stem. "The possibility of the separation of the colonies has become greater," said Mr. Chamberlain, "but the desire for separation has become less." These are wonderful words, and the sentiments of the speaker are like the forecast of events which he said himself were immediately before us, to be realised in the next few years—certainly within the next generation. His remarks, uttered on November 6, last, on the occasion of the banquet which took place in London in honour of the completion of the Natal-Transvaal Railway, are as applicable to-day as when they were spoken, and we record them now as a fitting introduction to the New Year, to encourage us to meet its coming surprises, and to prepare us as "conscious Israelites" for our duties in connection with them. He said inter alia:—

I think it will not be disputed that we are approaching a critical stage in the history of the relations between ourselves and the self-governing colonies. We are entering upon a chapter of our colonial history, the whole of which will be written in, perhaps, the next few years, and certainly in the next generation, which will be one of the most important in our colonial annals; but upon the events and the policy that it describes will depend the future of the British Empire. (Hear hear.) That empire, gentlemen—that world-wide dominion to which no Englishman can allude without a thrill of enthusiasm and patriotism (hear, hear)—which has been the admiration and perhaps the envy of foreign nations—hangs together by a thread so slender that it may well seem that even a breath would sever it. There have been periods in our history not so very far distant, when leading statesmen, despairing of the possibility of maintaining anything in the nature of a permanent union, have looked forward to the time when the vigorous communities to which they rightly intrusted the control of their own destinies would grow strong and independent, would assert their independence, and would claim entire separation from the parent stem. The time to which they looked forward has arrived sooner than they expected. The conditions to which they referred have been more than fulfilled, and now these great communities, having within them every element of national life, have taken their rank amongst the nations of the world; and I do not suppose that anyone would reckon the idea of compelling them to remain within the Empire as within the reach of intelligent speculation. (Hear, hear.) And yet, although, as I have said, the time has come and the conditions have been fulfilled, the results which those statesmen anticipated have not occurred. (Cheers.) They felt perhaps overwhelmed by the growing burden of the vast dominions of the British Crown. They may well have shrunk from the responsibilities and the obligations which it involved, and so it happened, at any rate, that some of them looked forward not only without alarm, but with hopeful expectation to the severance of the union which now exists. But if such feelings were ever entertained, they are entertained no longer. (Loud cheers.) As the possibility of separation has become greater, the desire for separation has become less (renewed cheers); and while we on our part are prepared to take our part and to do all that may be fairly expected from the mother country, and while we should look upon the separation as the greatest calamity that could befall us, our fellow-subjects throughout the world on their part see to what a great inheritance they have come by the mere virtue of their citizenship, and they must feel that no separate existence, however splendid, could compare with that which they enjoy equally with ourselves as joint-heirs of all the traditions of the past and as joint partakers of all the influence, resources, and power of the British Empire. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I rejoice that that change has taken place. I rejoice at the wider patriotism, no longer confined to these small islands, which embraces the whole of Greater Britain and which has carried into every clime British institutions and the best characteristics of the British race. (Cheers.) How could it be otherwise? We have a common origin, we have a common history, a common language, a common literature, a common love of liberty and law. (Cheers.) We have common principles to assert, we have common interests to maintain. (Renewed cheers.) I have said that it is a slender thread that bound us together. I remember on one occasion having been shown a slender, a frail wire which a blow might break, and I was told that it was capable of transmitting an electrical energy that would set powerful machinery in motion: May it not be the same in the relation that exists between our colonies and ourselves, and may not that thread be capable of carrying a force of sentiment and of sympathy that will yet be a potent factor in the history of the world? (Cheers.)

IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

Mr. Peace, there is a word which I am almost afraid to men tion lest at the very outset of my career I should lose my character as a practical statesman. I am told on every hand that Imperial Federation is a vain and empty dream. (Cries of "No, no.") I will not contest that judgment, but I will say this—that that man must be blind indeed who does not see that it is a dream which has vividly impressed itself upon the mind of the English-speaking race, and who does not admit that dreams of that kind, which have so powerful an influence upon the imagination of men, have somehow or another an unaccountable way of being realised in their own time. (Cheers.) If it be a dream, it is a dream that appeals to the highest sentiments of patriotism and even to our material interests. It is a dream that is calculated to stimulate and to inspire every one who cares for the future of the Anglo-Saxon people. (Hear, hear.) I think myself that the spirit of the time is at all events in the direction of such a movement. How far that will carry us no man can tell, but believe me upon the temper and the tone in which we approach the solution of the problems that are now coming upon us depend the security and maintenance of that world-wide dominion, that edifice of Imperial rule, which has been slowly built up for us by those who have gone before. (Cheers.)

Such are the joyous anticipations of coming events which Mr. Chamberlain can hardly fully realise, since he sees nothing of Israel in them or knows whither they really tend. He does not know that the splendid empire he helps to administer is the growing kingdom of Christ, destined to cover the earth and to bring all mankind within its beneficent control. There is much to be done meanwhile, no doubt, before the end can be reached; but to those who have eyes to see there is that occurring, furthering the progress of these events, which the Lord no doubt is manipulating. What was the Japanese and China war but the preparation for the downfall of China and its "break up" to prepare it for Israel? What is it men see now before them plainly, and announce it to their readers as obvious facts? Let The Investor for October last tell us:—

Upon the whole there are plenty of sparks in the political air, as well as no lack of combustible matter on which they might fall. Russia and Japan have their eyes on each other, and each owes the other a considerable grudge. The breaking up of Turkey in Europe and of China in Asia are evils which must fall upon the present generation, and will be far-reaching in their consequences.

This reminds one of Rev. xvi. 18, writes an Anglo-Israelite, but the real fact is that the "break up" of Turkey now at hand is to usher the Twelve Tribes of Israel into the Holy Land, with British-Israel at the head of the glorious procession; and "the break up" of China is to give Israel her share (the most valuable portion no doubt) at once; and with Japan as her ally to neutralise the strength of Russia at Port Arthur, or wherever else she may succeed in planting herself in China. How Russia and France are working together to deprive Israel of her inheritance is told in a few pregnant words by The Investor, also, thus:—

Russia and France steadily continue to mix war-paint. The one grinds the colour and the other prepares the oil against the day when they may determine to paint Europe red. Asia also appears destined to have her share, judging from the quiet movements of Russian troops and war material. A volunteer fleet to run to Vladivostock during the winter is to bring up the army there to 90,000 by the spring. This is intended, no doubt, to facilitate negotiations with Japan.

Our little army of fellow-helpers in the cause of British-Israel are still at work, and doing good service for the Lord. Miss Rush, Miss Fitzpatrick, Mrs. Woolcott, Mr. Marchant, and Col. Senior are all in their several spheres of labour zealously carrying out their allotted functions, and each needs the prayers and co-operation of our readers. The able editor of The Covenant People (Oxonian), supported by the British-Israel Association in London, is doing a good work, and the BANNER following in the wake, or leading in the van (whichever our readers please), is engaged in the friendly contest to make known our good news that Israel is found, in ever-widening quarters. May the Lord give us all His presence, and lead us in our efforts during 1896. May He cause the knowledge of our nation's Identity with Lost Israel to be widely published and universally accepted during the time before us, is our hearfelt desire and prayer. To Him shall be all the praise.

In conclusion, we would again ask our friends to recommend the BANNER far and wide; to read and lend the paper; to order it through country and other booksellers, by placing it in public libraries, railway-station waiting-rooms, and carriages, and by enquiring for it at the railway bookstalls.

P.S.—The events of the last fortnight in the United States, which have so startled our own and continental nations, will be our subject next week, God willing.

THE SUN-CLOTHED WOMAN.

By the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

The vision of the sun-clothed woman (Rev. xii.) has had many interpreters and many interpretations. I am not aware that it has yet been explained in the light of the Identity. This knowledge has solved many difficulties, and whether the following statement may prove as unsatisfactory as the many contradictory interpretations or not, it will, I think, present at least one coincidence which may lead other students to more successful results. To this end I shall make use of statements and admissions to be found in the notes of the "Speakers' Commentary," and endeavour to show wherein they fail, and whereby they can be supplemented.

In the first place, the "great sign" is figurative of two opposing powers or principles during a long period of time. Both the Woman and the Dragon existing and being ideally animated by the same opposing desires before the birth of "the Man Child," at the time of His birth, after it, until the woman fled to the place of safety, and for the 1,260 years of her being nourished there. The Woman representing the Church of Israel before and after the first advent of the Lord, the Dragon representing a hostile evil power. In the woman clothed with the sun, "we have an ideal picture of the Church of God, the true Israel, the Bride, the spiritual mother of Jesus Christ; as such she wears the crown of twelve stars." "The Woman who gives birth to the Messiah and has yet other seed, can only be the Old Testament Church of God, the true Israel. She represents not only the ancient . . . Church, but likewise the Church of God in its New Testament form," but yet (knowing that the Jews did not become Christian, and being ignorant of recovenanted Israel) the admission is forced that, "To apply the symbolism here exclusively to either the Jewish or the Christian Church fails to meet the requirements of the language used. Burger tries to meet this difficulty by understanding "the woman to be the Church of Christ in her final condition, and including converted Israel."

Ebrard also being ignorant of Christian Israel, and recognising in the woman converted Israel, thinks that two attacks upon her are foretold. The first he holds to be relatively identical with the fifth trumpet, the second during the time of anti-Christ. The Dragon,—of whom more further on,—having failed to devour the Man Child, Jesus Christ, persecutes in after years the Woman, "now become the Church of Christ," who flies, born on the eagles' wings of God's protection, into the wilderness or prepared place, where she is nourished and hidden for the period of 1,260 days (assumed here upon the year-day interpretation, to be years). Note here that this prepared place of safety was long before promised to Israel. 2 Sam. vii. 10: "Moreover, I will appoint a place for My people Israel, and will plant them that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more as aforetime." In this place Christian Israel is to be nourished. "Ebrard understands here, that the woman being the representative of Israel, qua the object of the promises, must be preserved; and, accordingly that Israel is not extirpated . . . but preserved by God in national separation from other peoples;" a fair and truthful comment, written by a man who had no idea of how or where the preservation was accomplished.

Christian Israel in this place of safety, and condition of national separation, is to continue there for the specified period. This same period is predicted for the treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles: "The holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months" (Rev. xi. 2). This period has not expired, and Israel, or the woman, is yet not manifested; therefore, it seems not to be unreasonable to assume that the two periods synchronise—viz., that the flight of the woman, and the specified treading down of Jerusalem, commenced in or about the same period, and that the manifestation of Israel, and the ceasing to tread down Jerusalem, will be events corresponding in time.

Jerusalem was taken by the Mohammedan power, A.D. 636, and if the foregoing assumption is correct, there must be some remarkable event in the national history of preserved Israel at the same period. The coincidence to which I referred is this, that the Anglo-Saxon nation was at this very period converted to Christianity by the labours of S. Columba and the missionaries who went forth from Iona. At the battle of Heaven's field, 635, the cross was fixed by the hands of King Oswald and his nobles, in the centre of the position; and after many struggles, paganism was overthrown in England, at the battle of Winwoed, A.D. 655. A more remarkable religious movement than that which acknowledged Columba as its leader, is scarce to be found in the annals of Christendom.

"It was not the Church of Paulinus (or the Roman Mission) which nerved Oswald to this struggle for the Cross. The Roman Church in Kent shrank into inactivity before the heathen reaction. Its place in the conversion of England was taken by missionaries from Ireland. While the vigour of Christianity in Italy, and Gaul, and Spain, was exhausted in a bare struggle for life. Ireland, which remained unscourged by invaders, drew from its conversion an energy such as it has never known since. . . . The science and Biblical knowledge which fled from the Continent took refuge in famous schools which made Durrow and Armagh the universities of the West. . . . Patrick . . . had not been half a century dead when Irish Christianity flung itself with a fiery zeal into battle with the mass of heathenism which was rolling in upon the Christian world . . . for a time it seemed as if Celtic, and not Latin Christianity, was to mould the destinies of the Churches of the West."*

Thus the life and learning of the Church, which was driven from both East and West by an overwhelming hostile power, found refuge in Ireland, and perpetuated itself in England, nearly 1,260 years ago. It became the source and nucleus of that form of Christianity which is peculiar to the Anglican Church, the origin of a living power which cast off Western mediæval accretions, and which has been nourished, protected, freed from invasion, and fed, by the overruling Providence of Him, who bore Israel as on eagle's wings, and also caused, that though sifted as corn in a sieve, yet not a grain was lost, or her Identity merged in the surrounding people.

It was in the beginning of the seventh century that the Saracenic woe was launched against Western Christendom. "In the ten years of Omar's Caliphate, from 634 to 644 A.D., the Saracens had reduced to his obedience three thousand six hundred cities or castles, destroyed four thousand churches, and built one thousand four hundred mosques for the exercise of the religion of Mohammed." Within one hundred years the Arabian Empire reached from the confines of India to the shores of the Atlantic. Over all this ample space the venom of the scorpion sting was made to rankle in the breasts of the subject-Christians. But the sun-clad woman was far removed, and in her prepared place, her sea-girt isles, the Church of Israel was causing the heptarchy to consolidate, and thereby the British people was formed.

It seems, therefore, that Apollion of the first woe (Rev. ix.) and the Dragon of chap. xii. are identical; and that the Saracen treader down of Jerusalem, and the enemy of the sun-clad woman and of the remnant of her seed, are one and the same.

There was an actual attempt to destroy the Man Child, Christ, as soon as He was born, made by Herod the Idumean. The slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem manifested the same spirit that caused the Idumeans and Arabs, and other neighbouring nations, to combine to destroy the whole race of Israel, one hundred and sixty years earlier. Herod was in league with the King of Arabia, and in Arabia arose the leader of the Saracen hordes, that animated by the same spirit swept over Christendom in the early years of the seventh century. The same spirit is manifested to-day in the Turkish successors of the Saracenic power. The massacres in Armenia are an evidence of the readiness "to make war with the remnant of her seed," which was displayed during the first woe. It seems to me that the sun-clothed Woman and the Dragon are to-day face to face. One, the Christian nation, animated as a people (despite of many evils) with the Spirit of Christ. The other, the anti-Christian power that even in its death-throes exhibits implacable hostility to whomsoever has the testimony of Jesus Christ.

"The people which were left of the sword found grace in the wilderness: even Israel, when I caused him to rest . . . declare it in the isles afar off, and say, He that scattered Israel will gather him, and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock. For the LORD hath redeemed Jacob, and ransomed him from the hand that was stronger than he. Therefore, they shall come and sing in the height of Zion" (Jer. xxxi.). Here we have an intimation that the people preserved in "the wilderness" are to come to the height of Zion; the preservation is to last for twelve hundred and sixty years; they cannot return with joy and singing until the city ceases to be trodden down: thus it seems to be necessary that the period of Israel's hiding, and the time of the treading down of Jerusalem, will end together when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled. There seems to be little doubt that the times of the Gentiles—a full week of years (solar)—is exactly bisected by the capture of Jerusalem by Omar, and will end in or about Easter, 1898. Until that time the sun-clad woman is to be nourished in the wilderness, and until that time Jerusalem is to be trodden down. Let the knowledge of Our Identity with Israel spread as it may, there will be no public recognition of it until the period is fulfilled. It may be thought by many that our progress as teachers of the Identity is slow. Many seem to lose their interest in the facts which once convinced them. THE BANNER OF ISRAEL has been witnessing for twenty years, and although there is undoubted evidence that the knowledge of the evidence is spreading, yet as a nation and Church we make no recognition of our origin. A few of the seed of the sun-clad woman think that there may be reunion with the woman clothed in scarlet, so ignorant are we of our true position as the Israel of God. It requires but little foresight to see that, if there is reason to believe that the two periods here treated of synchronise, the occupation of Jerusalem, by Israel, will cause the wilderness hiding of the sun-clad woman to cease, and her manifestation as Israel will be her warrant for the occupation.

It may be that for us, even at the end of the age, it is not given to us "to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power," nevertheless, such an inquiry as this is not presumptuous. And whatever events may occur before the restoration which God has promised is brought about, our national character, our Christian witness, our protest for the truth, our preparedness for service, our humility, because of national and ecclesiastical sins and divisions, will all be purified by the knowledge of Our Identity with the Woman clothed with the Sun.

"THE FIFTH MONARCHY": A CONCIO AD CLERUM.

BY THE REV. P. CARLYON, M.A., CANTAB.

AN octogenarian clergyman claims the privilege of age and of thirteen years' devoted study of the subject, in appealing once more to his brethren in Christ on the necessity of either accepting or refuting the teachings of British-Israelism. He appeals especially to all the clergy. Conventional theology so absolutely rules their minds that they fall behind their flocks in realising the vital importance of the new truth developed by the fulfilment of prophecy, and they accept tradition instead of historic facts as prophetic evidence. Consequently, they are behind not only their flocks, but also the condition of the world and the exigencies of the present age. So vast, however, is the field of investigation that any appeal to the fulfilment of prophecy must be limited in its scope, and confined to instances as examples. The one chosen in this article is "The Fifth Monarchy." We want the true solution of the question, What is the fifth monarchy in the book of Daniel? Previous claims to its possession have been refuted, and recourse is usually had to a spiritual interpretation (which widely leads our clergy astray) in the assumption that it means the Christian Church. But this fifth kingdom must as surely constitute a part of the world's historic system as the four previous kingdoms of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which are described as "bearing rule over all the earth (chap. ii. 39), and known in Biblical exegesis as the four world-empires or monarchies. Hence "the fifth monarchy" is a household term. What is it? We read the whole book of Daniel, and gather out of it a plain and conclusive answer.

In chap. ii. 44 we read, "In the days of these kings—viz., the four previously described—shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed (nor) left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." And the symbol by which it was represented in the dream was "a stone cut out of the mountain without hands," at that time "a stone"; but ver. 33 declares that after the four kingdoms were swept away, and "no place was found for them," the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth.

So far, then, we have these materials to work upon, and the familiar fifth monarchy and stone kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar's dream are one and the same. We read on, and find amongst various visions of the book of Daniel two ecstatic dreams of the prophet himself (ecstatic as being out of himself and in the Spirit) wherein God repeats to him, in whole or in part, the same prophetic forecaste that He had disclosed to Nebuchadnezzar; and as it was said of one, "The great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter" (chap. ii. 45), so Michael, the archangel, informed Daniel that he was sent to explain the other, "To make thee understand," he said (chap. x. 14): "what shall befall thy people in the latter days." Note the words, "what shall befall thy people," and "in the latter days." En passant, it is all about Daniel's people.

To resume our thread. These two ecstatic dreams are narrated in chap. vii., in the vision of the four beasts, and in chap. viii., in the vision of the ram and the he-goat; and there can be no need to say more than that, by general consensus, the four beasts represent the same four kingdoms as Nebuchadnezzar's image, and the ram and the he-goat are revealed to be the second and third kingdom of the same succession to the world's dominion. "The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia, and the rough goat is the king of Grecia" (chap. viii. 20).

The outcome of the whole matter is summed up in the concluding chapters of the book; the final kingdom is "given to the people of the saints of the Most High," and the consummation is the evolution of "the fifth monarchy" out of the débris of the previous four. "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men," and the fifth monarchy is permanently established as a complete and perfect theocracy. Perhaps Christ will reign personally in Jerusalem over the empire admitted by other powers as dominant, and now recognised to be the people whom God has chosen to be Israel, His glory, from the call of Abraham to the union of the two Houses into one nation, again to be no more pulled up from their own land, but to be the fifth and final world-empire, seen and known and read of all men.

This empire clearly has a past and a future history; and as greater things are yet to come, it has hitherto escaped men's notice, and continues to blind their eyes to the now yellowing harvest.

Before, however, we look on the fields to see what is coming, let us note a few points in the prophetic forecaste to make the more sure that our fifth monarchy is not what current theology accepts and supposes it to be. It is not the Christian Church. It is not an elective invisible society consisting (whether as adjuncts or supplanters) of Gentile converts to Christ, whom we admit to be fellow-citizens (under the "new covenant") with the saints (Eph. ii.) in things spiritual; but it is a kingdom of this world, as Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome have been; and the difficulties and discords of the popular idea that the fifth monarchy is the Church, when placed side by side with the prophetic narrative, are so many and so inconsistent that they at once condemn the delusion and put it out of court.

1st. The inconsistency of making out of five world-empires represented and symbolised in one vision, four of them secular and one spiritual, is of itself sufficient to refute it.

2nd. The existence of the fifth "in the days" of the kings of the first four makes it impossible to be the Christian Church.

3rd. The turning of the gospel of peace and love into the battle-axe of the Lord (Jer. li.) perverts the truth.

4th. The Church ever preaches subjection to the "powers that be," and history testifies that the Church did not destroy, but for many years prolonged, the Empire of Rome.

5th. The modern reading of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, from the enumeration backwards of the iron, clay, brass, silver, and gold crumbling down "together" which throws the fulfilment of the whole into the yet future, after nearly 3,000 years, is inconceivable; besides that, in ver. 45, the clay comes in the middle of the five emblems, and the Hebrew or Aramaic word for "together" does not express simultaneous action, but similar catastrophe, the last with the first, one and all. In this, as in all cases, prophecy must not be interpreted by the mere emblem, which can never be exact in all points, but by facts; and it is hard to imagine how a statue, the symbol here employed, could be planned like views in a revolving lantern to show the decapitation first, then the crash of the bust, and so forth—a reductio ad absurdum. History is our interpreter, and its evidence is dead against the interpretations of modern popular theology.

From the discordant conclusions of the negative side of our inquiry, we may now proceed to the investigation of our positive contention that the fifth monarchy is no other than the kingdom of Israel as a worldly empire under the theocracy of the King of kings, from the time of "the oath that He sware unto David" for a thousand generations, that, David should never want a son to sit on his throne for ever (2 Sam. vii. 10—13) down to the re-enthronement (yet to come) of his lineal seed on Mount Zion over the re-united twelve-tribed nation (Jer. xxxiii. 17, &c.). Wonderful! but we ought to have learnt long since that with God nothing is impossible. God is only vindicating the truth of His own Word and fidelity to His covenant. We take the words of the Bible in their plain literal meaning, and then, instead of discord, we find harmony. The notion that the four monarchies of Nebuchadnezzar's dream and Daniel's vision still exist, awaiting destruction by some future catastrophe is (independently of historic fact) refuted by the Biblical statement, "The wind carried them away; and no place was found for them" (chap. ii. 35). And (omitting Rome) what historian disputes that Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Grecia, the first three ancient empires, have disappeared as monarchies from off the earth? A new modern idea that these three constituted the first four monarchies is amply refuted in the notes of the "Speaker's Commentary." Moreover, the symbols of the ram and the rough he-goat which are revealed to be emblems of Medo-Persia and Grecia show absolute overthrow and extinction. They are gone, and the only doubt remaining is whether the fourth monarchy still lingers on in some divided existence of its miry toes, and yet awaits the stone to fall. The wish is father to the thought. The iron empire is also gone, and for it also, as ver. 35 declares, "no place is found." "In the days" of their own kings the stone smote Babylon, Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Rome, one and all alike, one after another, and "smote them in pieces" together. Our opponents say it was the Church that did it. If so, she forsook her vocation. They mean, when they say it, the Christian Church; but "in the days of the first three of those kings" she did not exist. Well, then, they retort, it was the Jewish Church. Worse still! for it could only be a branch and fraction. Let them say it was the Hebrew Church, and we will grant them this Salvo; but it contributes nothing to their interpretation, for the Hebrew Church—"the Church in the wilderness"—was identical with the whole people; and their contention simply merges into ours.

The stone kingdom was indeed the Hebrew Church, the then existing Ecclesia (or calling out) God's elect, His chosen people separated from all other peoples to do His work, and to be His witnesses, unto the ends of the earth. God plants and pulls up nations at His will, but how, and with what weapons? not through His own direct Word and fiat, but with arms of flesh wielding bow and arrow, sword and spear, and all other weapons of war. Therefore, He says to Israel, "Thou art My battle-axe; with thee will I break in pieces the nations, and with thee will I destroy kingdoms" (Jer. li. 20). Israel My people, Israel My glory, Israel My battle-axe, are the Lord's hammer, just as Nebuchadnezzar in the zenith of his power is designated the "hammer of the whole earth" (Isa. l. 23). The Hebrew word for battle-axe signifies rather a crushing club, such as mythology gives to Hercules. Such are Jehovah's "weapons of war" to which belongs "the stone cut out without hands."

To seal the proof, "Oxonian" in his excellent book, "Israel's Wanderings," has demonstrated how Israel was mixed up with, or constituted, the armies of each empire that overthrew its predecessor, as an emancipated army in Media, as Sacai in the army of Alexander the Great (himself probably a son of Abraham, as Getæ, Scythians, or Goths, in their encounter with (first, the successors of Alexander fulfilling the prophecy of Zech. ix. 13; and, secondly, "the iron empire," &c., &c.) the iron Empire of Rome, which they resisted, threw back, and finally broke up. Read "Oxonian." This fifth power has had no successor. It exists somewhere. "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people (therefore not to Gentiles); but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever" (chap. ii. 45).

Not one word of all that the Lord our God has promised and confirmed by an immutable oath has failed, nor can it; and this irresistible people, after their repulse of the Roman legions, fought their way to their "appointed place" (2 Sam. vii. 10), whence they should never be dislodged, and where they have dwelt and expanded and multiplied "like fishes" filling up colonies till they have grown already into the largest empire that the world has ever seen! Shall not God complete His work and purpose? Surely; but to inquire what future expansion awaits the final fulfilment of our subject, lies beyond both our scope and space. And with one further corroboration of our argument we must leave judgment to our readers. Our opponents exult over the ultimate assignment of this kingdom to "the saints" as if they must be the elect in their elective view; but a glance at their description in the book of Daniel, as well as their designation throughout the Word of God, should convince them (especially if tested by the Hebrew) that "the people of the saints of the Most High" are especially * and characteristically His chosen holy people, written in one word with a hyphen (Am-kodesh—Dan. xii. 7), where, moreover, we are taught by one word (kobal), translated in A.V. by two, that when "He shall have finished to scatter the power of the holy people; all these things shall be finished." "The mighty and the holy people" (chap. viii. 24) are doubtless one and the same, and can be no Gentile Empire, for St. Paul teaches that Gentiles, when grafted into this olive tree (Rom. xi.) to partake in common of all the spiritual gifts of the Abrahamic covenant, are thereby made "fellow-citizens with the saints" (Ephes. ii.), and the root bears the branches. And leaving our readers to trace out this mighty Empire from its "appointed place" in the West to its re-instalment on Mount Zion (to which the present stage of the "Eastern Question" seems to be rapidly propelling us), we conclude with words of certainty taken from our "Handbook," p. 66. The promise was made by God to David and recorded in 2 Sam. vii. that from "the appointment of a place of safety where Israel should dwell safely, and move no more from it", and also a place where they should be established as a nation under His rule for ever (with the assurance): "If these ordinances, sun, moon, and stars depart from before Me, then the seed of Israel shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever." It follows that, according to God's Word, an Israelitish nation is not to cease as long as the sun gives light, and must therefore be existing at the present time. And the writer of this article, in appealing to theologians and to his brethren in Christ in the Anglican Church in particular, is confident that, in the face of all the signs of the times and of events now looming in the East, they cannot, if they will read prophecy by history (its sole evidence), and with unbiassed minds will study this subject, they cannot much longer shut their eyes to this great truth, which will be the "Epiphany of the Parousia" (2 Thess. ii. 9), and convert the whole world to Christ.

WORLD EMPIRES RISE FROM THE SEA.

(Dan. vii. 3; Rev. xiii. 1.)

By the Rev. J. McIntosh,
Vicar of Sacriston, Durham.

"And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another." The inspired records furnish us with the key to the mystery, how dominion of the world must and can be obtained. Maritime supremacy carries with it the supremacy of power by land. It is related of the Goths and Greeks, that when the contest between them took place in the Adriatic, they were about equal in number, but the superior skill and dexterity of the Greeks gave them the victory over the Goths. "The Goths affected to disparage an element in which they were unskilled, but their own experience confirmed the truth of the maxim, that the master of the sea will always acquire the dominion of the land" (Gib., vol. iv., 521).

We see that the four great empires, represented by these wild and ferocious beasts, were in character similar to the animals which represented them. The lion, bear, leopard, and the beast diverse from these, but combining in itself all the features of rapacity of the three first (Rev. xiii. 1), express the terrible cruelty of the empires which became world-wide. You find from their history, their insatiable appetite to devour, and their unquenchable thirst for blood. They preyed upon the weak and the defenceless, and made blood to flow as rivers; they carried fire and sword wherever able, and spared neither woman nor babe, but bathed their swords in the blood of the innocent, and boasted of the number of the victims they immolated upon the altars of their own ambition. Their sole object in making war upon their neighbours seems to have been to gratify their ferocious instincts and to drag all men into submission to their arbitrary will. They followed the natural instincts of wild beasts in the vast carnage they perpetrated in the countries they overran.

There is no mention made of a fifth beast, though a fifth empire is distinctly described. The last great empire is that of the saints, and is represented by a man standing on the waters. His mission is peaceful. His character righteous, and forms a complete contrast to the fourth beast, so terrible in its power to destroy. This fifth empire is the peaceful empire of Great Britain. We shewed in an earlier paper, from the law of analogy, which these empires followed, that each of the four empires had extended its sway more and more towards the sea, and towards the west; that each of them, in turn, possessed Egypt, Cyprus, Palestine, Asia Minor, and India. In the case of Medo-Persia, it extended its empire to Greece, which became the seat of the third great empire. Then Greece extended her conquests to Italy, which, in turn, became the seat of the fourth empire.

Rome extended her conquests beyond the Mediterranean, and embraced the larger part of Britain, which ought to become, in turn, the seat of Universal empire. Besides, each of these world empires in their seats approached more and more in shape to the island. Each of them had maritime supremacy, in order to make itself master of the land. Each of them came up out of the sea, according to the vision of Daniel, and their history is in complete harmony with what the prophet saw. Nebuchadnezzar was thirteen years engaged in besieging Tyre before he could take it, and he could not hinder the Tyrians from removing from the mainland to the adjoining isle. His maritime power grew, and he was able to extend his conquests to Cyprus. The first great empire was nearly all continental. Its seat was on the Euphrates, but the next possessed a sea-coast. And the Medo-Persian sway for some time embraced the Mediterranean.

These two empires depended largely on their armies for conquest, but as soon as they extended their conquests beyond the limits of their own kingdoms they felt the need of having possession of the sea. No sooner had the Medo-Persian exercised its immense power in seeking to bring the Greeks into subjection than the Grecks wrested the sovereignty of the sea from her, and henceforth the Persian empire lay at the mercy of the Greeks. Alexander completed the conquest of Persia, which had been foreshadowed by Agesilaus, King of Sparta. After the death of Alexander, his successors made full use of this power by sea, and each strove to become its master, but while they were engaged in mutual combats for supremacy, another power more terrible than any of the former empires, was emerging from the sea. The prophet Daniel describes it thus, "After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly, and it had great iron teeth, it devoured and break in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it; and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it, and it had ten horns" (see Rev. xiii. 1).

This power rose out of the sea, on the occasion when the Carthagenians, a colony of Tyre, took Sicily. The Romans, in attempting to drive them out of the island, found that they never would be able to do this successfully so long as Carthage held undisputed sway of the sea. Rome, therefore, determined to construct a fleet, and she trained crews to man it in such a way that they might obtain readiness in managing their clumsy vessels. When the day of action came, the Carthagenians thought they would have an easy victory over the Romans; but, alas! they miscalculated the courage of these naval warriors. The battle was soon decided in favour of Rome, and from this time she held the empire of the sea.

There now began those long and tedious wars between Carthage and Rome for the world's empire. After many severe contests, with victory changing from side to side at different times, Rome came off victor, and in the end utterly destroyed the power of Carthage, and even blotted her out of existence. Henceforth, Rome was in a position to interfere in all the contests which arose among the nations on the coast of the Mediterranean. The weak and oppressed nationalities appealed to her for defence against the might and tyranny of their stronger neighbours. Rome took them under her wing, and soon she carried her sceptre over the whole extent of the Macedonian empire. Only one power seemed able to arrest her progress, and this was the Parthian empire, which was not completely conquered for several centuries.

Since Rome emerged from the sea, what great and persevering efforts have been made by herself or by her offspring to maintain this supremacy by sea. Spain and France, both Roman states, have sought in turn to retain this empire, but in vain. The loss of the Spanish Armada crippled the naval power of Spain for ever. And France, though assisted by Spain, Holland, and others, could not drive Britain from the seas. The vision of the prophet is nearly completed. The four empires have lost their power by sea, though they remain as shadows of their former grandeur. Another empire has grasped the empire of the ocean. And that empire, according to the sure word of prophecy, is that of the saints of the Most High, these must now possess the empire of the world, and be succeeded by no other empire.

The four empires were confined within the narrow limits of the Mediterranean, but after the discovery of the New World a desperate rivalry sprang up for supremacy among the maritime nations, as England, France, Spain, Portugal, and Holland. For a long time the issue was doubtful, but by-and-bye England left all her competitors far behind in the race, and she stands forth to-day confessedly the mistress of the ocean, and, as they who possess the empire of the sea will always acquire the dominion of the land, we see our destiny is indicated. The saints shall possess the kingdom for ever and ever. This vision affords comfort and encouragement to us as a nation. It is well seen that the nations of the world are all anxiously engaged in strengthening their fleets, to place themselves in readiness for the next great struggle, which casts its dark shadow in front of it. Had China not lost the supremacy of the sea, Japan could never have conquered her. As long as Britain holds undisputed sway upon the great ocean routes, she is safe to follow her peaceful mission, and to carry on her industrial pursuits without interruption.

The nations seem to feel by common instinct, that the supremacy of the sea will give paramount power by land. They fear that Britain, in possessing such an immense superiority at sea, holds in her hands the supremacy of the world. They know that they hold their colonies in Africa and elsewhere only by Britain's sufferance. She could soon either wrest them from their grasp or hinder them from using them for any purpose for which they hope to profit by them. In the expansion of Britain as a world-wide power, the nations behold the marvellous increase of the Anglo-Saxon race, which indicates a period when this race will be the chief factor in the councils of the world. There looms forth the terrible thought that all the world will become Anglo-Saxon.

How can we account for the rise of Britain to her present position of pre-eminence among the nations, and for the marvellous development that has taken place in her wealth, colonies, and maritime power, but by allowing that God designed it? The people living in the "regions beyond" the Pillars of Hercules, or the true "Hebrews," dwellers beyond the sea, as Abraham was called the Hebrew, from his dwelling beyond the river Euphrates, so the dwellers in these islands might properly be designated Hebrews from their dwelling beyond the Mediterranean. Hence Britain may signify Hebrew land; Ireland has its equivalent in Hibernia, and then we have the isles of North Britain, called Hebrides. The descendants of Abraham retain their patronymic, as they were situated in the islands of the west beyond the sea, and were properly Hebrews, and so they inherit the promises made unto their fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that they should become multitudinous, wealthy, and possess the Gates of their enemies.

We read that only four wild beasts were seen; that no other beast is to arise, but that only offshoots from the fourth were to continue as we find them now, but that these must make way for the fifth kingdom which was to arise, and is known as the people of the Holy Covenant, or saints of the kingdom. Possibly we may have our name, Britti, from the Hebrew word, signifying covenant. This fifth empire is described in its rise and progress as a stone cut out of the mountain without hands. And what mountain can this refer to but to Rome, which is the counterpart of Babylon, and is called by this name in the book of the Revelation. We find Babylon described as a mountain by Jeremiah (li. 25).

And when the stone cut out of the mountain without hands is spoken of, let us understand it of that mountain commonly called the city of the seven hills, which Babylon typified. We read that one-tenth of the city fell of this ten-horned kingdom, which has been interpreted of England in the time of the Reformation, having been abruptly broken off from the rest of the Roman states in her religion and in her subservience to papal decrees. This stone empire itself, before smiting the feet of the great image by its overthrow of Spanish and French supremacy, and by its renunciation of the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome, has literally been cut out of the mountain without hands, and is now filling the earth as a mighty empire.

Is it not then marvellous that these world empires should have been described as having their origin from the sea? And we find that history so thoroughly corroborates it that Gibbon speaks of it as a maxim. As Britons we have every reason to look forward to the future with perfect confidence. Britain now marches along the great ocean routes of the world in undisputed might. No single power could hope to rival her maritime sway. It would only be by a combination of maritime nations that her freedom could be checked, and even then it is most questionable whether the world in arms could dispute our right to rule the seas.

It is the policy of our statesmen to make our navy stronger than any possible combination that could be formed against us. If then our progress in the future continues as it has done during the past few years with such vast tracts of land added to our territories, with such large increases to our population, with such wondrous developments of our industries, and with such increases to our volume of trade, why then, in a short time, we shall have achieved the end we never sought. We shall have obtained such a commanding position in the world that no combination of nations would dare to menace us. And when our colonies and dependencies enter into a league with us for mutual trade and for mutual defence, we shall reach a position which cannot be assailed.

Whatever may be the outcome of the present crisis in Turkey, whether the Moslem Turk may unite with Russia against us, and the subject-races seek our protection and fight with us against the unspeakable Turk, one thing is quite plain, the British navy will obtain a fair share in any partition that may take place of that moribund empire. Yea, we believe that we shall come in as legatees for that inheritance of Edom. There is no doubt that the end of Turkish misrule, of Turkish despotism, and infamous cruelties is nigh at hand. Her savage ferocity against her brethren shall be recompensed. God shall bathe His sword in the blood of Idumea, when the whole world rejoices. Soon shall Jerusalem become a name and a praise in the earth. The land, down-trodden so long by these barbarous tyrants, will soon be freed, and Jerusalem shall be the mother city of the world.

THE NECESSITY FOR LOSS OF IDENTITY.

By the Rev. Edward K. Tullidge, M.A.,
Rector of St. Paul's, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A.

If we of English name are flesh and blood of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, it is very clear that our Hebrew forefathers lost the knowledge of their origin. Is it not then natural to suppose that this did not come about by accident, but that it was simply part of the all-wise plan of Him who brings all things to pass according to the counsels of His own will? Does not the following question almost necessarily suggest itself? May it not be that the full Divine purpose for Israel could not be carried out except by causing the greater part of them to lose the knowledge of their origin? It has long seemed clear to the writer that this is capable of absolute demonstration on the ground of fundamental theological principles. Moreover, experience has abundantly shown him that this is decidedly the most effective means for waking up the minds of others to take an interest in the great subject of Our Identity with Israel. But to our argument.

We may at least assume, for the purpose of argument, that it was actually part of the Divine plan to exalt Israel to supreme dominion over the world. But, if we know this, we of course know, as Christians, something more. We know that this must have been simply part of the plan devised by Divine wisdom for the blessing of all mankind, that Israel was hereby to be but God's special instrument for bringing the world to the knowledge and obedience of Christ. It could only be, therefore, under the Christian Dispensation that we could possibly expect to see Israel exalted to supreme dominion. But was there not a most serious obstacle in the way of giving such wonderful distinction to Israel and at the same time making them the world's benefactors? Is not this most abundantly clear from the history of that portion of the nation who have never lost the knowledge of their origin? The thought that God had destined them to such greatness filled them with the most insensate spiritual pride. They came to look upon themselves as God's favourites instead of God's ministers. They could not endure the thought that they were simply appointed to be the channels of blessing to others. They did not shrink from asserting that the world was created for Israel, that all other nations were of no account in God's sight, that they were but as spittle, as the dropping from a vessel.

As the brilliant Rabbi Krauskopf, of Philadelphia, recently said: "On the day of reckoning, Israel will be awarded its well-deserved meed of praise for having received and guarded certain valuable religious truths; but the crown for having scattered them abroad, and for having made the world better for them, will be awarded to another. (?) A more paradoxical people than Israel it would be difficult to find. It set up for its religion the claim of universality and yet kept it from all save its own people. It professed the religion of humanity, and yet never suffered it to leave its narrow racial grooves. All men are brethren, it said, and yet refused to keep up social intercourse with any save with those of its own people. All that God asks, it said, in the way of service, is justice and mercy and humility, and proceeded to pile up ceremonial duties, and dietary restrictions to such an extent, that religion became a yoke harder to bear than many a tyranny, and God a kitchen, wardrobe and liturgy-inspector, more difficult to escape than a thousand argus-eyed detectives."

Now to what was all this frightful development of spiritual pride due? The only possible answer is that it was due to the corruption of human nature. But this is only another way of saying that, sooner or later, spiritual pride was sure to develop itself in a people who believed themselves destined by God to supreme dominion over the world. Here, then, was a tremendous obstacle that must be surmounted before Israel could be trusted with world-wide empire. To allow a people, puffed up with spiritual pride, to become rulers of the world, would be to make them an unmitigated curse instead of a blessing. It is, therefore, abundantly clear that Israel would become utterly unfitted for supreme dominion over the world by being always conscious of God's purpose to exalt them to it. How, then, could such a tremendous obstacle be overcome? How else but by causing the greater part of them to lose the knowledge of their origin, until such a time as it would be safe to entrust them with world-wide empire? Would it be a hard task for God so to order the workings of His providence as to accomplish this without doing the least violence to the laws of human nature?

Since, then, we started with the supposition that it was the Divine intention to exalt Israel to supreme dominion over the world for the world's benefit, and since we have seen that this was possible only by causing them to lose the knowledge of their origin, we are therefore forced to look among the peoples of Christendom to see by which of them the destiny which God appointed to Israel is being carried out. We hold that there is no possible escape from this conclusion, unless it be held that God never intended any such destiny for Israel as Israel expected. But would a believer in any sort of inspiration of the Bible dream of seriously attemping to prove that the children of Israel never had the least justification in believing that God had destined them to world-wide dominion? Our argument has very materially narrowed this issue. It has made it impossible to argue from any seeming failure to accomplish it, that there was therefore no intention to accomplish it; because we have proved that seeming failure, that is loss of Identity, was simply a necessary step in order to its accomplishment. If any one seriously believes that Israel was mistaken in supposing that God had declared to them His purpose to make them rulers of the world, will he not tell us what more was needed to make their belief in such a Divine purpose justifiable.

IS BRITAIN IN THE BIBLE?

BY REV. IDRISYN JONES.

THE first answer which we are prompted to make to the above question is, Why not? Modern nations of Europe are mentioned in the Scriptures, such as Russia, Italy, Spain, and Greece. Britain is an empire of more majestic proportions, and more allied with the schemes and aims of the Bible, and, therefore, it would be a mysterious problem if no trace of her can be found. Reference may be made to a nation otherwise than by name; and, therefore, it is not necessary that the word "Britain" should be written down by the sacred penmen. It is doubtful whether this name of our country was then sufficiently known, for although Aristotle, some three hundred and fifty years before Christ, mentions the word "Britannic," yet it was the Romans who first gave it the wider publicity by putting "Britannia" on the current coin of the realm; and it may be that the term "British" was to be that other "name" by which Israel, in after ages, should be known, in fulfilment of the prophecy, "And thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name" (Isa. lxii. 2). But, in any case, it is only reasonable to expect, that a nation so surpassingly great, and so largely bearing with it the fortunes of the world, should be inwoven in the fabric of prophecy when foretelling the march of events in the future ages of time; for such a nation, even if distinct from Israel, must have formed a worthy theme of inspiration.

Our nation is remarkable, viewed only in the light of Shakespeare's description:—

> "This royal throne of kings;
> This seat of Mars;
> This other Eden: demi-Paradise;
> This happy breed of men; this little world;
> This precious stone set in the silver sea,
> Which serves it in the office of a wall;
> This blessed plot; this realm; this England."

But if Britain be the home of Israel, and if she constitutes a part of that FIFTH kingdom, which is to smash the four kingdoms in the metallic image, and to occupy their place, then it is incredible that no mention is made of her in the sacred writings. Some parts of the British Empire of to-day are frequently referred to in the Bible. India belongs to her; but India, according to such scholars as Max Müller, is no other than the "Ophir," whose gold is so often referred to by the authors of the Old Testament. Egypt, and Cyprus, and Malta have the British flag waving above their ramparts, and each is a familiar name in the Bible. Why not the British Isles themselves? If so, how has the fact escaped the notice of the literary and theological world? It is because they have failed to perceive that the British nation is descended from the Lost Ten-tribed Kingdom of Israel. If the students of the Bible first recognised this point, they would naturally look for her in the Bible, and would find her; first concluding that she ought to be there, sooner or later they would come across her, just as, not very long ago, the astronomer said that there ought to be another planet outside of "Uranus," and then pointed the telescope to the spot in the heavens where she ought to be, then came to see the new orb, now known as "Neptune."

Let us now enquire how we may get a glimpse of Britain in the Bible.

(I.) BY HER GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION.

Palestine was, to the ancient seers, the starting-point of all latitudes and longitudes. Jerusalem was their Greenwich, so outside countries were indicated often by their mere position on the compass. A land situated north from Palestine would be designated as the North country, others the South, East, or West country; we, therefore, can tell exactly where certain countries lie. Now, we find it stated that the final return of Israel to her land shall have its starting-point, not only in the four cardinal points of the compass, but specially in a country north-west from Palestine. There a strong and maritime nation will be seen one day, filling her ships with Israel and Jewish exiles, and steering in triumph across the waves, for the shores of Syria and the promised land. The Divine Captain has already given the signal for that brief but illustrious voyage: "Go and proclaim these words towards the north, and say, Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord" (Jer. iii. 12). Again, "In those days the House of Judah shall walk with (to) the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers" (Jer. iii. 18). And again, "Behold, these shall come from far; and, lo, these from the north and from the west" (Isa. xlix. 12). Now, if we draw a straight line from Palestine on a map of the earth in a north-west direction, we shall touch the British Isles. Here, then, is a glimpse of Britain; for in that line of the earth there is no other country to perform the glorious task, or which is so fully equipped to command the ocean in that important exodus of the wanderers to their land. Yes, we recognise Britain in the Bible by her geographical position.

Digitized by Google

(II.) BY NATIONAL EMBLEMS.

The Bible gives noticeable prominence to a Lion-nation, whose appropriate symbol is the noble king of the forest; a nation, therefore, with lion-like characteristics. Israel is that nation, and to Israel only is the emblem assigned. The following texts will be a verification: "Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion" (Num. xxiii. 24); "And the remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles in the midst of many people, as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep; who if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver" (Micah v. 8); "The merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, shall say unto thee (Gog), Art thou come to take a spoil?" (Ezek. xxxviii. 13). Therefore, it must follow, that whenever Israel is found, she will have the lion symbol and the lion characteristics. Britain is, emphatically, a lion nation, and adopts the lion as her national emblem, led to it unconsciously by the guiding hand of Providence. It is her, then, we see in the Bible as a lion among the Gentiles. The whole world is familiar with the British lion, and many nations of Gentiles have trembled at its roar; while others have welcomed the sight of "the lion-flag" as the signal of deliverance and help.

"The poor its succour craving,
The tyrant at its prowess raving,
Alike have seen its lions waving."

Our national life is full of the lion: enshrined as he is in the Royal Arms, engraved on every Act of Parliament, stamped on every State document; lions are conspicuously seen on our gold and silver coin; while all around the British Empire they stand in full view, going with our army and navy wherever they may march or sail; while no colonial operations are deemed to be rightly carried on apart from the lion symbol.

But in addition to the lion there is a remarkable STONE emblem connected with Israel. It comes first to view in that pillow of Jacob's, on which he received the covenant of the Almighty; it is seen again as the memorial pillar, set up and anointed at Bethel; it comes again to view in his dying moments, as he speaks concerning the destiny of Joseph-Ephraim, "From thence is the shepherd the stone of Israel"—or the guardianship of that certain stone. It comes to view subsequently as the "head-stone of the corner," in the psalmody of Israel; and again, as the "stone" which smites the metallic image, and afterwards expands till it fills the whole earth. Israel, then, stands pre-eminently related to some great stone. But Britain is the one stone nation of the world. Russia, France, Germany have no stone interwoven in their histories; but a stone is embedded in the British Constitution. If so, we have a glimpse of Britain in the stone kingdom of the Bible. There it is—in the Coronation Chair; and for 2,500 years of British monarchy it has been the seat on which the kings of the realm have been crowned. Its task as an emblem is not yet finished, and we know not what startling prominence may yet some day be given to it.

(III.) IN HER ASSIGNED DESTINY.

A people are set forth in the Bible as destined to carry the Gospel through all the world. We can fix our eyes now on such a nation, that is Britain; and as this great honour belongs to Israel only, it is Britain that stands included in the ancient promise and prophecy, "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed My voice" (Gen. xxii. 18). This prediction was not fulfilled by Israel while in Palestine, for the Gospel was then forbidden to be sent abroad; it was not fulfilled by any of Israel's contemporary nations, such as Assyria, or Babylon, or Egypt, for they had no Gospel to disseminate: but this is the great achievement of the British nation, in an emphatic sense, for her Gospel missions are in every clime. It is of her, therefore, we catch a glimpse in the ancient prophecy.

We likewise see portrayed in the Bible a great and strong nation, which should become the mother of nations. Have we not here again Britain foreshadowed? Britain only has fulfilled this distinguished destiny. Nor can any nation now arise to fulfil it, for it is too late. The available habitable islands and continents of our globe are practically filled up and taken possession of, but the young rising nationalities are the offspring of this one mother country. Jacob said of Ephraim, that from him should come forth a "multitude of nations." Britain, then, is Ephraim: the lineaments of Ephraim are all seen in the countenance of the British nation. Thus, our country is honoured, and her importance manifested, in the fact that she is fore-announced in the Book of books, wherein wise men and seers have portrayed her rise and development as the mistress of the world. Nor is it presumption to apostrophise her, and say, "Happy art thou, O Britain! who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the Shield of thy help, and who is the Sword of thy excellency? and thy enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places." To the Lord God of Israel be all the praise!

OUR FRONTISPIECE—THE ROYAL ARMS.

By H. R. Shaw.

The Royal Arms of the United Kingdom must, by this time, be very familiar to our readers, since a copy of them appears upon the head and front of every number of the Banner that has been issued. By the indulgence of the publishers we are now enabled to present readers of the present New Year's number with the Arms in their proper heraldic colours, together with accompanying sketches, showing the historical development of these Arms, from the time when the three kingdoms first became united under one Crown in the person of King James VI., of Scotland, and I. of England; all of which we trust will be found interesting, and useful for future reference.

It seems a matter of some difficulty to determine the precise date of the origin of Coats of Arms and of heraldry which is defined as the art of blazoning and assigning coat armour. Sir Bernard Burke, Ulster King at Arms, in his treatise on Heraldry, writes, "Sir John Ferne is of opinion that the science was borrowed from the Egyptians. Sir George MacKenzie ascribes it to the age of Charlemagne, and says it began and grew with the feudal laws, but took its origin, perhaps, in the time of Jacob, who, blessing his sons, gave them marks of distinction, which the Twelve Tribes afterwards bore on their ensigns; but Guillim will have it that Heraldry—as a science in England—cannot go back to an earlier epoch than about the year 1200. For my own part, I consider that the registry of its birth may be found among the Archives of the Holy Wars; that its cradle was rocked by the soldiers of the Cross, and that its maturity was attained in the chivalrous age of feudalism." Nevertheless, Burke somewhat inconsistently prefaces his essay with a text of Holy Scripture, taken from Numb. ii. 2, which records the command of the Lord by the mouth of Moses. "Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard with the ensign of their father's house." And Burke might, but did not, go a little further back in Scripture history and discover what we take to be a very genuine instance of heraldic blazonry or assigning of distinctive coat armour, as recorded in Gen. xxxvii. 3, when Jacob, who loved Joseph more than all his children, made him, at the age of seventeen, a coat of many colours, in anticipation, we have no doubt, of the birthright blessing in store for him. That this coat was intended to be, and did in fact become an honorary distinction, we may be well assured, since it was the provoking cause of the envy of his brethren, as well as the clue to his identity when he was supposed by his father to be torn by wild beasts.

We may take it, however, as a fact, and as a somewhat remarkable fact, that heraldry in our own country took its rise towards the end of the twelfth century, and was brought hither by the Crusading Knights, members chiefly of that Norman aristocracy, which we, in agreement with Edward Hine, are accustomed to consider as descendants of the Israelitish light-bearing and warrior tribe of Benjamin, full brother to one who, as we have seen, was probably the original recipient of heraldic distinction. Since the time of Joseph and Benjamin, the Arms of royal and noble personages have developed considerably, and consist now, besides the coat or shield, of helmet, with crest, supporters, motto and badge.

Although "Coats" of Arms were unknown apparently in Europe before the twelfth century, it nevertheless seems certain that at a very early period the sovereigns of England, in common with other monarchs of Christendom, adopted various devices of which the lion (of Judah) seems to have been the favourite. Thus Burke, in his Peerage, credits our William I. with two lions passant gardant, Stephen with a centaur, a creature resembling the zodiacal sign of Sagittarius. Henry II. has three lions in pale, and passant gardant, which, according to Chambers, were also borne by Cœur-de-Lion, upon his great seal, after his return from the third crusade, and in manner as they have been almost uniformly depicted ever since, for England.

Edward III. appears to have been the first who quartered arms in England, in 1340, when in virtue of the supposed right of his mother, he assumed the title of King of France, and quartered the Arms of France, fleurs-de-lys without number, with those of England, the three lions in pale, giving to the former the precedence by placing them in the first and fourth quarters of the shield. In the latter part of the reign of Henry IV., the unnumbered fleurs-de-lys were reduced to three golden blossoms on a blue field. No further change took place on the royal escutcheon until the time of James I., except that Mary on her second great seal, made after her marriage with Philip, impaled the Arms of Spain and England.

James VI., of Scotland, on becoming James I., of England, quartered the Arms borne by preceding sovereigns, with those of Scotland and Ireland in the manner shown in our frontispiece—No. 1, the first and fourth quarters being France and England quartered as before; the second quarter, the lion rampant of Scotland within the double tressure, &c., and the third quarter, the harp of Ireland. The Royal Arms were similarly borne by all the sovereigns of the House of Stuart till the reign of Anne, except that William III. bore over all the Coat of Nassau, on an escutcheon of pretence.

In the reign of Anne, the legislative union with Scotland brought about a material change. England and Scotland impaled were placed in the first and fourth quarter, France in the second, and Ireland in the third. The accession of George I. displaced England and France from the fourth quarter to make way for the Arms of His Majesty's German dominions, as shown in our frontispiece, No. 2. These latter were the two golden lions, passant gardant, in pale, on a red field, for Brunswick, impaled with a blue lion rampant on a golden field sprinkled with red hearts, for Luneburg, and having at the base the Arms of Ancient Saxony—viz., a white horse running on a red field; and in a red shield over all, the Crown of Charlemagne in proper colours, being the badge of the Arch-treasurer of the Holy Roman Empire.

A further alteration took place on the union with Ireland, when George III. laid aside the titular assumption of King of France, and abandoned the French ensigns, and as shown in our frontispiece, No. 3, the Arms of England were now made to occupy the first and fourth quarter, Scotland, the second; and Ireland, the third; while the German ensigns were relegated to an escutcheon of pretence, surmounted by the electoral bonnet for Hanover, which, in 1816, was replaced by a regal Crown upon the occasion of the erection of Hanover into a kingdom. These last were finally abandoned on the severance of Hanover from the Crown of Great Britain, which took place on the accession of Queen Victoria; and the royal escutcheon thus assumed its present arrangement, as shown in frontispiece, No. 4, and which may, omitting some of the Norman-French terms, be described as quarterly, first and fourth, three golden lions on a red field for England; second, a red lion rampant on a golden field having a red double border flowered, for Scotland; third, a golden harp, with silver strings, on a blue field for Ireland; all surrounded by the Garter, of which Order the English monarch is the Sovereign.

Upon the royal helmet is placed the crest, consisting of the imperial Crown in proper colours, and thereon a golden lion standing with full face displayed and crowned with the imperial Crown, also in proper colours. The well-known lion and unicorn, as supporters of the Royal Arms, require a word of explanation. These embellishments as legitimate parts of armorial bearings do not appear to have been recognised in England earlier than the reign of Edward III., and from that period onwards, our monarchs have made many changes of heraldic supporters, the list comprising the lion, raven, stag, swan, antelope, leopard, bull, boar, dragon, greyhound, and eagle. James I., for the first time, clearly defined the royal supporters, adopting the golden lion of England, and the silver unicorn of Scotland, as they have ever since been borne, the unicorn having been up to 1707 allowed the precedence in Scotland, and we have no need here to remind our readers of the deep significance of these emblems to our nation from the point of view of our Anglo-Israelitish Identity; the moral is pointed upon the first page of each of our issues.

We are reminded by Burke, that the proper position of heraldic supporters is always erect, and he says that nothing can be more at variance with true blazonry than the absurd attempt of some modern artists to display them in picturesque attitudes; and this recalls a curious circumstance that whereas we are supposed by the fact of the nine lions being comprised in our Royal Arms to be displaying our decided Jewish sympathies, yet not one of the nine is represented as the dormant lion of Judah, the badge of David and Solomon, according to Burke, and which our Richard I. adopted as his badge, on assuming the title of King of Jerusalem. Can it be that Judah's old lion was roused up at the time of the Crusaders, and, thereupon, commenced the proceedings anticipated for him in Micah v. 8? The Arms are completed by the motto—Dieu et mon droit, in a scroll below the shield, with the Union rose, shamrock, and thistle engrafted upon the same stem, which will be found in a somewhat more displayed form surrounding the three shields of our No. 5 figure.

In conclusion, we cannot forbear to remark that, heraldically, British-Israel is now exactly in the position to which Israel was invited to withdraw herself by her prophet Isaiah (xxvi. 20, 21), in preparation for the coming of the Lord out of His place to punish the Gentile inhabitants of the earth. For four or five centuries our kings laid claim to rule over France, as evidenced by the fleurs-de-lys upon their shields, and it was only when the dry bones came finally together by the Act of Union, 1801, that Israel cast them out as presumably, at that time, unworthy of her consideration; while the last shred of excuse for Continental interference was taken away from British-Israel when our beloved Queen ascended the throne, and as a consequence cast off the Hanoverian Sovereignty, and retired practically, within her chambers with her people.

AN OLD GRAVEYARD.

By T. ROSLING HOWLETT, PHILADELPHIA, PA., U.S.A.

THE oldest graveyard, of which we have any distinct record, is the lot which Abraham bought of the sons of Heth. The price paid was "four hundred shekels of silver current with the merchant." This is the first recorded transaction in the purchase of real estate. It is also the first mention of silver as a medium of exchange. The deed given was a verbal one, "given in the presence of the sons of Heth, before all that went in at the gates of the city." Its validity, however, has never been questioned. "The field, and the cave that was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all its borders round about, were made sure."

Here Sarah, Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob were buried. Abraham dwelt in Bethel, Gerar and Hebron, but the field which he bought of the sons of Heth, and which contains his tomb, was the only spot that belonged to him, in the land which God gave by promise to him, and to his seed for ever. The wall which surrounds this tomb is the most ancient and best preserved monument in Palestine. Josephus speaks of it in these words: "The monuments of Abraham and his sons are still to be seen in the town, all of fine stone, and admirably wrought." It is described by modern writers as a quadrangular building of about two hundred feet in length by one hundred and fifteen feet in breadth, its dark grey wall rising fifty to sixty feet in height, with no window or opening of any description, except two small entrances at the S.E. and S.W. corners.

The most surprising discovery of modern times is that the descendants of the two parties represented in the purchase of this field, Abraham and the sons of Heth, have become the two mightiest Island Empires of history—Great Britain and Japan. The Rev. Jonathan Goble, for many years a missionary in Japan, and at one time the English teacher of its present Prime Minister, but now a resident of Germantown, Pa., in a letter to the writer of this article, after hearing from him an address upon the organic and ethnic unity of the races, Israel and Saxon, said:—

"Dear Brother,—Not since I parted company with the late Nathan Brown, D.D., have I enjoyed such a treat as you gave us yesterday, and the light you throw upon your line of human archæology, history, and destiny, fully confirms my own studies and investigations in other lines of other facts in the origins and character of other ancient peoples and tribes—viz., how erroneous have been the theories most in vogue on these subjects. Most popular writers have classed the Japanese people as Mongolians, but recent discoveries in ancient philology find the language still in use in Japan, plainly traceable on old monuments, all the way from Hamato or Yamato, in Japan, through Siberia and intervening countries to Hamath, in Syria, proving that the Japanese, without doubt, are of the same race as the sons of Heth, with whom Abraham bargained for the burial place. A great and radical revision of current ethnological theories will soon be needed, so that the nations may understand clearly who were their real ancestors.

"I feel greatly to rejoice in view of the discovery that Abraham was doubtless our father, and that we are indeed princes of the theocratic Royal House of Israel."

The fate of the ancient Hittites, as well as that of the Ten Hebrew Tribes once composing the Kingdom of Israel, has been, for ages, among the unsolved problems of history. It is pleasant to know that the Hittites, who were among the bravest and most noted people of antiquity, are represented in descendants so worthy of their sires. They, like their ancient neighbours, the Hebrews, are now islanders, one occupying islands at the Eastern extremity of the Asiatic and European Continent, while the other possesses the "Islands of the sea"—"the isles afar off," so often and so conspicuously mentioned by the wonderful prophets of old; "islands" that were commanded to "keep silence" while "the people renewed their strength." The people have renewed their strength mightily, having become not only an empire, but the mother of empires. Gladstone says truly: "In all the records of the world there is no parallel to that prolific British mother, who has sent out her innumerable children to found a half-a-dozen empires." Such empires they have formed, and are forming, in America, Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and in all the desolate regions of the earth. It is impossible to deny that the Saxons, who bring about these results, are the party mentioned in Isaiah as "The people of My covenant to raise up the land, to divide out desolate heritages." They are not only the most successful, but the only successful colonizers of modern times. This indentifies them with the one race to which such a destiny is assigned in the Scriptures —the race of Abraham. This fact is a conclusive answer to the declaration of some modern scholars, who tell us that "history has reversed prophecy." Quite the reverse. History has fulfilled prophecy with marvellous exactness. In no century have so many of the predictions and expectations of Israel's future been matched with accomplishment as the one in whose waning years we now are. No imagination of man is vivid enough to portray the wonders that are to occur in the century so soon to open. The past have been years of preparation: the future are the years for fruition. It is refreshing and exhilarating to see, that in compliance with the word of the prophet, Jacob has taken root; Israel has budded and blossomed. It only remains for the remainder of the promise to be accomplished—"And shall fill the face of the world with fruit." That in the fulness of its time will come, as true as that "the Scriptures cannot be broken."

FORGOTTEN TEACHINGS OF FAVOURITE TEXTS.

By J. G. Taylor.

In the imaginations of most people there is as great a difference between the last page of the Old Testament and the first page of the New as between night and day, body and soul, Jew and Gentile. The Old Testament is deemed an austere book: a book of unbending laws, stern threats, and physical punishments directed at carnal Israel, with a promise here and there bearing on "the calling of the Gentiles"; whilst the New Testament is a message of peace for the same fortunate Gentiles, displaying to them the catholicity and depth of God's grace. Similarly, the Old Testament régime is considered a harsh discipline, in which the "Jews" are brought upon the scene for a season, to be oppressed in Egypt, tried in the wilderness, spoiled in Canaan, and finally thrown to human wolves; all this being for the purpose of implanting spiritual lessons in the Gentile breast. On the other hand, the Christian era is looked upon as a period of comparative liberty, when Gentiles may commit the sins of Jews without incurring the penalties; in which, also, the Gentiles are relieved from the galling yoke of a law they were never burdened with, and are feeling the healthy effects of a discipline they never underwent. So far, this mysterious process by which one race inherits at a moment's notice the fruits of a long and tedious training experienced by another race, has not been satisfactorily explained. To judge of what is complicated by what is simple, if a father wishes his eldest son to be a bootmaker, he will have him instructed in the details of the craft, after which we should not expect the youngest son to construct the boots and the eldest to black them, nor would we think it proper for the former to receive the rewards merited by the latter. But this is precisely the policy which God is supposed to be carrying out, and which is strenuously defended by the advocates of a "Gentile dispensation."

They agree that the legal economy was an educational stage, designed to prepare Israel for the reception of the Gospel, yet they hold that the results of Israel's hard schooling were by some means transmitted to aliens at the Advent, and that the Gentiles are enjoying the mental and moral wages which Israel earned with the sweat of her brow. Surely this is not the "wisdom of God" in which St. Paul gloried, nor the "good news" resounding from the Gospels? No doubt it suits the Roman pontiff, who claims not only the earth but much of heaven, and the attributes of God Himself. No doubt it suits the Papal Church, which sprang like a phœnix from the embers of Jerusalem, to seize the prerogatives and usurp the functions of national Israel. But, as the theory is irrational, it is to us utterly untrue. We have sufficient respect for God's methods to believe that what is illogical cannot be divine.

Unquestionably the Old Testament has a tone of severity which, as a rule, does not characterise the New; but it also contains a wealth of tender expression which is not equalled in the New. Even the chief and absorbing feature of the New Testament, the Atonement, was but the realization of Old Testament pledges. The Gospel is not confined to the Gospels—a fact which theologians acknowledge when they speak of the "Gospel of Isaiah." But, unhappily, Isaiah's Gospel, like those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, has been confiscated on behalf of the Gentiles; so that whatever God may say or do—no matter how emphatic His declarations may be, and no matter whether they are stationed in the Old or the New Scriptures—Israel is cut off from divine favour. We do not accuse Christians in general of any deliberate injustice. There are certainly many who wilfully shut their eyes to the light which streams around them; but the vast majority act in innocence, thinking probably that they honour God by excommunicating His people, which merely confirms our contention that the mind of the Church is possessed with a fatal misapprehension regarding the temper and requirements of the Old Testament. Maledictions are, of course, plentiful in that book; but they are not all heaped on the head of Israel, nor are its beatitudes all showered on the Gentiles. For them, indeed, there is little to contemplate but warnings, denunciations, and predictions of doom. God said to Abraham, "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee" (Gen. xii. 3), while, through the evangelical prophet, he announces of Israel, "I will contend with him that contendeth with thee, and I will save thy children. And I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh, and they shall be drunken with their own blood." This is not empty verbiage. God's treatment of the Gentiles is largely regulated by their treatment of Israel; and, as the disposition of the Gentiles towards her has always been distinguished by hatred, we should hardly anticipate that the Bible would exhibit special affection for them. And it does not. Ever since Pharaoh, God's hand has lain heavily on them. Ammon, Moab, and Edom; Tyre, Sidon, and Philistia; Assyria, Babylon, and Rome have felt His vengeance, and there is no change in His attitude. The ten kingdoms into which Rome was divided are on the downward path; Gog, and Gomer, with all his bands, are appointed to destruction; and Armageddon will complete the catastrophies of the Gentile world. Hence, the composure, not to say elation, with which Gentile races have viewed the introduction of New Testament principles, and the dispersion of Judah, is seriously misplaced.

Coming to the promises, we find no lack of them in either the law or the prophets. Numbers of them are as familiar in our mouths as homely proverbs, and have been the basis for thousands of consolatory and encouraging sermons. They are systematically offered to and accepted by Christian society as its own; but, on enquiry, Christian society would be surprised to learn how few of them relate to the Church. "Read the context" is an ever-ready piece of advice given us by opponents who are not very well acquainted with contexts; but, as it is a sensible recommendation, we have read the context of various texts embedded in our memory. If this habit were extensively cultivated, Christendom would recognize that the Old Testament is not a desert, but a garden, that the garden belongs to Israel, and that, like a busy bee, the Church has gone from flower to flower, gathering the honey of which it boasts. Evidence of this abounds; but where shall we begin with it, and, having begun, where shall we stop?

"No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper" (Isa. liv. 17). This is an assurance of which the Church has made perennial use, and there could be no objection to the practice if it did not lay the Bible open to a charge of falsehood. The Church being in God's keeping, we are conscious that no hostile power can obtain a permanent victory; but many a weapon, many a political and spiritual foe, has triumphed over it. What weapon has not prospered? The early Church was torn by heresies, which prospered amazingly; then arose Popery to corrupt and tyrannize; next came the Inquisition, with its fiendish machinery, strangling the Reformation wherever it gained a footing; and now we have an outbreak of scepticism, which has blighted what religion there remained in Europe, and is extorting groans from every devout community. No intelligent person will have the boldness to assert that in these times evil is not prevailing, and it has seldom been otherwise. Was Isaiah, therefore, subject to a delusion? On the contrary, the public is subject to a delusion; for the prophecy has no more to do with the Church than with the Philistines. It refers to a people from whom God, in a little wrath, had hidden His face for a moment, but who were to lose the remembrance of their shame, inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited. God has never forsaken or hidden His face from the Church, and that is enough to condemn the spiritual interpretation. The context concerns literal Israel in her re-betrothed conditions and consequently the text is an engagement that no invasion, or conspiracy, or malignity, shall circumvent her.

"When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned" (Isa. xliii. 2). If no weapon formed against the Church has to prosper, we may infer that the Church itself would do so, and on this supposition it is strange that she should have to pass through rivers and fires of adversity, as here represented according to ordinary exposition. It is not to be wondered at that the words are utilized by the Church, for they are decidedly more adapted to her case than Isa. liv. 17. Even this is scarcely a reason why they should be wrenched from their surroundings and put to an end for which they were not intended; but if the spiritualizers would allow that they are simply borrowing what is really Israel's, we should not dispute with them. Seeing they insist, however, that in this verse "the Lord comforteth His Church," as the headlines aver, we must ask, when did God sacrifice Egypt, or Ethiopia, or Seba, or Chaldea, to ransom the Church; and what is the meaning of "I will bring thy seed from the east and gather thee from the west. I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back"? If Jacob and Israel of the first verse symbolize the Church, so will the Jacob and Israel of the last verse; but when did God abandon His Church to the curse? The chapter, with all the comfort which the Church has found in it, is the heritage of Israel; so that we hear God proclaiming His love, solicitude, and sleepless care for the nation of His choice. He was with her in the hour of trouble, and is with her still.

"YE ARE MY WITNESSES."

By E. Reep.

If we are persuaded of the truth of Holy Writ, we must believe that God had a deep and peculiar purpose in taking to Himself a special people, to love, serve, and obey Him. A child is known by his doings; so also a people. The children of Israel in ancient times apparently failed to realise the greatness of their office; that to them pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the service of God, and the promises. Notwithstanding their faithlessness and ignorance, Christ came to confirm the promises made unto the fathers (Rom. xv. 8), thereby ratifying the fulfilment of the Divine prediction that in Isaac's seed should all the families of the earth be blessed. Probably it was the thought of this great prediction that caused the Psalmist to say, "Truth shall spring out of the earth." It may, too, have presented itself to our Lord's mind when He declared that He was born to bear witness unto the truth (John xviii. 37), of which truth Moses wrote (John v. 46).

It has been noticed that Christ's command to the twelve disciples to go not into the way of the Gentiles, but rather to the lost sheep of the House of Israel, is peculiar to St. Matthew's Gospel. It has also been remarked that Moses and our Lord, when closely examined and studied as to the more fundamental parts of their respective systems, are found to teach in perfect harmony with each other. The law and the prophets of the Old Testament, and the Gospels and Epistles of the New, exhibit but different phases of the same wondrous scheme of grace. When commentators thus express themselves we feel some astonishment at their obtuseness in expunging from their theology Israel's great function, according to the precognition of God, as the mouthpiece of the Messiah. Rightly apprehended, the Scriptures focus all prophecy into two special events: the coming of Christ, and the redemption of Israel, the salvation of the Gentiles being a subsequent contingency. Nevertheless when by Divine intervention the House of Israel separated from the Jews, or House of Judah, the deliverance of the Gentiles may be said to have been in part accomplished. Startling as this assertion may appear to some, it is seen to be true in the fall of Samaria and the dispersion of Northern Israel among the Gentiles. For, as it would seem, only by the dispersion of the bulk of the recipients of Divine revelation could the whole Gentile world be brought to a knowledge of the true and eternal God, and prepared for the kingdom of the Messiah. Hence the division of the descendants of Isaac into two nations was of God; one had its work to fulfil in Palestine until the birth of the Redeemer, the other in witnessing for God among the heathen. For though the iniquity of the House of Israel in their own land had been such as to make the earth quake and the heavens tremble, yet in their dispersion they were to be gathered to a place of safety, there to stretch forth their habitations, to revive as the corn, to grow as the vine, to be blessed in such manner as to make it apparent that of them God had said, "Ye are My witnesses, the servants whom I have chosen." Therefore, though cast out of their land, though often devoured and persecuted by their enemies, they still represent, by virtue of God's love and faithfulness, a kingdom that is imperishable. So long as the sun, moon, and stars give light, so long will the seed of the House of Israel remain an elect nation (Jer. xxxi.). Accordingly, as an elect nation and God's special witnesses, they must in this dispensation of grace be under the law of grace, bringing forth the fruits thereof. Never utterly cast away at any time (Lev. xxv. 44), it is with a quickened intelligence that they should now, in these latter days, be found keeping God's commandments, judging uprightly, hating deceit, pitying the destitute, exalting righteousness. They must, in short, respond to the Divine description, "Ye are My witnesses . . . in the latter days ye shall consider it."

Where shall we find such a people? Christianity is said to have floated into the Roman Empire on a wave of credulity; British-Israelites are also supposed to float on a wave of credulity; therefore unwitting evidence, and consequently impartial evidence, best answers our question. Mr. Chamberlain is no self-proclaimed British-Israelite, but he thinks and speaks like one. Very recently he affirmed that the British Empire is visibly destined to outstrip all the greatness of the older civilisations of Europe; that of all the nations of the world the greatest of governing races is the British. And this, he tells us, is no empty boast, as proved and evidenced by the success which we have had in administering the vast dominions connected with our islands, to whose influence in the future he believes there are no limits. Of course we cannot agree with Mr. Chamberlain except the British be the House of Israel. If they be not Israel they are as unstable as Daniel's image, and in the same peril of being broken to pieces, to be no more a people.

Nor can we altogether follow Dr. Clifford in his address at the London Nonconformist Council, except the British be the House of Israel, to whom Christ was specially sent (Matt. xv. 24). Speaking more particularly to Nonconformists, he said it was their absolute duty to get the will of God done on earth and in the whole of human life. Virtually he was impressing on the British the fact that they above any other people are God's chosen witnesses. Furthermore, he asserted that it was the special work of British Protestants to inform as well as quicken the conscience of men everywhere, to show what was and what was not just and equal, to label acts according to their real character, to prevent crimes against society being regarded as the permissible pleasures of wealth and power, to lift the veil from vices that debased humanity under the false plea of necessity, to put into the category of sins all violations of the laws of God, though they might be sanctioned by the customs and upheld by the inherited prejudices and traditions of men. Lastly, we are assured that we are Israel, inasmuch as we are told that it is the function of Protestant Britain to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, to let the oppressed go free, to break every yoke, to teach, even as the great Milton had said, nations how to live.

Turning to the Bible, we find all that Dr. Clifford has said of British responsibilities has been said over and over again by the inspired prophets of Israel's responsibilities. They naturally belong as much to her to-day, in Britain, as when God enjoined, through Moses, the ethics of the Christian faith (Lev. xix.). The religious contemplative life of the Brahmin may be beautifully introspective, and even holy; but it is not the Bible conception of a religious life. The religion of Israel was to become a social force applicable to every nation and every clime. As Matthew Arnold has observed, the faith taught by Moses was not based on a metaphysical conception, but on a moral perception of a rule of conduct not of human making. Thus the religion of Israel was to be singularly practical. In no other form could it promote the happiness of mankind; in no other fashion could it provide the necessary healthy conditions for the apprehension of the spiritual, of the one God and Father, who is above all, through all, and in us all.

In an extraordinary manner our Parliamentary annals imply, in very confident language, that on Britain alone rests the reformation of humanity. The British are veritably God's witnesses. At a time when England was filled with loathing and distrust of Romanism, Charles II. was frequently addressed by Lords and Commons in words that could not have been more appropriate had they been addressed to an acknowledged king of Israel. Assurance is made to him that his Protestantism is undoubted; that it is felt by his people that nothing could prevail to make him forsake the Rock of Israel, the God of his fathers. By asserting himself the Defender of the True Protestant Faith, judgment must run down like a river, and justice like a mighty stream. The Roman heroes courted the praises of men; the victories of England's king are of another nature. He, unlike the Romans, who conquered bodies, will conquer souls; they conquered by force; the king will conquer with faith. The Roman triumphs were in narrow streets, but the king's triumphs must be in large hearts; the Roman triumphs lasted but for a day, but the triumphs of England's king must last all his days, and after that triumph in heaven to all eternity.

Such language as this cannot be justified if the British have no claim to be Israel; if they have no reason to suppose that to their forefathers was said, "Ye are My witnesses, the servants whom I have chosen." But if we cannot justify the language of Parliament, what are we to say to that of the immortal Milton? He says: "Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Transylvanian sends out yearly from as far as the mountainous borders of Russia and beyond the Hercynian wilderness, not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language and our theologic arts. Yet that which is above all this, the favour and the love of heaven, we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending towards us. Why else was this nation chosen before any other, that out of her as out of Sion should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings of Reformation to all Europe? . . . Why does God reveal Himself to His servants, and as His manner is, first to His Englishmen—I say as His manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of His counsels and are unworthy? . . . Let us then be more considerate builders, more wise in spiritual architecture. For now the time seems come wherein Moses may sit in heaven rejoicing to see that memorable and glorious wish of his fulfilled, when not only our seventy elders but all the Lord's people are become prophets." *

If the British be not the House of Israel, if God has not said of them, "Ye are My witnesses," then we must again repeat that the language used by our race with regard to our responsibilities and destiny cannot be justified; we are not God's people, neither are we His witnesses. But believing we are His witnesses, we can say, as we say in our churches, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for He hath visited and redeemed His people," and with the poet Campbell:—

"The meteor flag of England
Shall yet terrific burn;
Till danger's troubled night depart,
And the star of peace return."

RIGHTLY DIVIDING THE WORD OF TRUTH.

By Douglas A. Onslow.

PART I.

Amongst other solemn exhortations addressed to his disciple Timothy by St. Paul, in his second Epistle, not the least important is the one selected for the heading to this article. Elsewhere in the same Epistle he tells Timothy that, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction, in righteousness." But in order that Scripture may be profitable for reproof, correction, or instruction, it must assuredly be rightly divided; or, in other words, rightly understood, and rightly explained by those whose duty it is to expound the "word of truth."

The very first command given by Moses to Israel, when he had completed his speech, delivered to them in the end of the fortieth year of their sojourning in the wilderness, was, "Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it." Again, in Prov. xxx. 6, we are thus cautioned, "Add thou not unto His words, lest He reprove thee, and thou be found a liar." How great then becomes the responsibility of those whose business and duty it is to explain the Scriptures, to see that they are "rightly dividing the word of truth" when criticising, and professing to explain, the writings of God's inspired servants.

At p. 192, in Appendix C of "British-Israel Truth," a certain reverend writer and a D.D., in his criticisms on the arguments used by the writer of our Handbook, thus delivers himself against the views put forth therein: "You take the expression, 'the fulness of the nations,' and use it of Israel after the flesh, in spite of the fact that in Rom. iv., the Holy Spirit has interpreted His own words, and explained clearly that He uses them of Israel after the Spirit—viz., the spiritual children of Abraham, who possess his faith. The Holy Spirit declares in Rom. iv. 11, that he was 'the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised, that righteousness might be imputed unto them also . . . . who walk also in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham which he had, being yet uncircumcised.' In ver. 13 it is distinctly declared again that the promise in question was not given to his seed according to the flesh, but through the righteousness of faith. In ver. 14 we are told that on the other interpretation (i.e., your's), 'faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect.' Therefore it is of faith that it might be by Grace, to the end that the promise might be to all the seed, not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all, as it is written, 'I have made thee a father of many nations.' Your interpretation is just the opposite of this. You make the descent from Abraham to be not by faith, not by grace, but a descent according to the flesh in the whole Anglo-Saxon race, thus making 'faith void and the promise of none effect.' I must therefore reject it as being opposite to the Holy Ghost's own explanation. . . . . Pray consider this fatal objection before you ask anyone to 'accept this fact.' It is not a fact. It is a practical denial of the Spirit's own interpretation, and therefore, I cannot accept it. . . . . I should not be surprised if it is accepted by many more, for we know that 'strong delusions' will mark the closing years of this dispensation, and I look upon this as one of them, which is diverting the minds of many from the great and fundamental doctrines of grace." I have given this very long quotation, first in justice to the Rev. D.D., and next because I purpose showing that "strong delusions" upon the meaning, as well even as the very utterances, of the Scripture itself, may be entertained by the very man who suggests that we hold them.

The only possible method of effectually disentangling this confused and erroneous pronouncement of the Rev. D.D., will be to take it to pieces, step by step, and test what he says the Scripture says, with what the Scripture really does say, as recorded in our Authorised Version of the Bible; and we shall then see where the "strong delusions" come in, and who is most likely to come under the condemnation of the latter portion of ver. 6 of Prov. xxx. ! ! In order to carry out this analytical process properly, it must be done in detail, and will necessarily take time. I must therefore ask the indulgence of the readers of the Banner of Israel for the trial of their patience, but I hope to vindicate our own views, and show that Scripture unmutilated supports us, but cannot be made to support the mystifying interpretation put upon it by the Rev. D.D., without doing that which Moses denounced, Solomon warned against, and the Holy Spirit threatens punishment for in Rev. xxii. 18.

To commence with, the term "fulness of the nations" is first employed by the Holy Spirit, speaking through Jacob, when he was blessing his grandsons. It is applied to the afterseed of Ephraim, the younger son of Joseph, when Jacob was conferring, or perhaps it would be more correct to say transmitting, the great blessing of the birthright on to him, and his brother Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 12). Ephraim and Manasseh's descendants were to "grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth."

Now, I do not think that even our learned and Rev. D.D., or any of his followers, will contend for a "spiritual descent" from, or even a "spiritual seed" of Ephraim. We have, therefore, an absolute warrant for the first application of the term "the fulness of the nations" in the sense we use it,—viz., to "Israel after the flesh." But our learned opponent says we do this "in spite of the fact that in Rom. iv., the Holy Spirit has interpreted His own words, and explained clearly that He uses them of Israel after the Spirit—viz., the spiritual children of Abraham, who possess His faith."

* Milton's "Areopagitica."

Digitized by Google

Rom. iv. is open to all of us, and first I do not find, nor can any one else find, the phrase "the fulness of the nations," nor can I find that the Holy Spirit has anywhere interpreted His own words, in that chapter, or anywhere else for that matter, that He uses any words of "Israel after the Spirit," or of the "spiritual children of Abraham." Neither of these phrases, nor anything like them, are to be found in this chapter. The explanation which the Rev. D.D. says is given of the words actually used in the Scripture, is not the Holy Spirit's but his own. And I challenge any honest disproof of this. He has deliberately added to the Word, that which it most assuredly does not contain, and what I say it does not imply.

Before proceeding to deal with the rest of the Rev. D.D.'s arguments, which are brought out in such array to show the "strong delusions" under which muddle-headed Anglo-Israelites are supposed to labour, I must finish with the question of our application of the term "the fulness of nations." This peculiar expression is neither used by St. Paul, nor explained by the Holy Spirit in Rom. iv., whatever our opponent may say. It is, however, employed once again in Scripture by St. Paul in Rom. xi. 25: "For I would not, brethren, that ye shonld be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness (hardness, or unbelief) in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." The marginal reference to "the fulness of the Gentiles" in this verse takes us to Luke xxi. 24, and as a consequence it has been generally supposed that "the fulness of the Gentiles" and the "times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" are identical expressions, and refer to the same event. But I think a little more careful examination of the Scripture, and the very admission even of one of those who strongly oppose our views in general, will show that we are right in identifying the expression "the fulness of nations" of Gen. xlviii. 19, with the precisely similar expression in Rom. xi. 25.

SOUTH AFRICA.

By W. L. Blore.

When one surveys the civilized and the uncivilized world, one is struck with the evidences of the near approach of the fulfilment of prophecy. In every direction we hear the cry, "To arms! To arms!"—and for what purpose? For purposes of aggression and supreme domination. Regardless of the history of the past, which certifies that supremacy over this world is not to be acquired viet armis, the continental nations seem to be hurrying to their own destruction by wasting the energies of the flower of their population in the prosecution of so vain a dream, the folly of which may be seen in the history of Egypt, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, as well as in our historical atlases in more modern times.

There is but one force that can establish this supremacy, and that force is righteousness, as we read in Isaiah xxvi. 2, "Open ye the Gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in"—the Gates of our strong city, whose walls and bulwarks are salvation. But as to the nations, we read in Isaiah lx., "The sons of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee, and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves at the soles of thy feet; and they shall call thee, The city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel." "The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish, yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted."

Now, where else in the whole earth is there a nation outside of Anglo-Israel answering to this description? Nowhere. But it may be asked, "Are the nations serving Anglo-Israel?" Yea, verily, every one of them, and they acknowledge it publicly in every possible way. The evidences are, to the careful observer of current events and of the condition of things, manifold; and, even in Africa, the nations are acting as a police, whilst the kingdom of God is being there fully established, and already, Ethiopia, in its widest sense, is stretching out her hands to God, and we are seeing fulfilled the prophecy in Zephaniah iii. 10, "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia shall they bring My suppliants, even the daughter of My dispersed shall bring My offering."

Here we find a country mentioned which is thus described by a recent commentator: "Even from the southern limit of the known world." The southern limit of the known world is South Africa. Ethiopia was situated to the south of Egypt, and, in Stanford's Africa, the King of Abysinnia is styled the King of Ethiopia, and the language of those parts as Ethiopian, whilst Cuvier, one of the greatest naturalists the world has produced, asserts that the whole of the negro race is Ethiopian.

In Scripture the river of Egypt is often mentioned. Here we have the rivers of Ethiopia, which lie to the south of Egypt, mentioned, and beyond these the prophet tells us that, when all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of the Lord's jealousy, the people of a pure language shall bring His suppliants, those that call upon the name of the Lord; even the daughter of My dispersed shall bring My offering." In Isaiah lxvi. 20 an offering is, in the 19th verse, mentioned in connection with the declaring of "My glory" by them "who escape," even the House of Israel, who are sent to Lud, which, in the judgment of most scholars stands, for an African nation, for this purpose.

And to-day we see British South Africa brought by the "daughter of My dispersion" as an offering to the Holy One of Israel.

In Luke xxi. 28 we read that when certain things begin to come to pass we are to look up, lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh. The things here mentioned precede the coming of the Son of Man with power and great glory.

We are now living in the midst of this process, which began with this century, when strife and bloodshed prevailed throughout the civilized world, and it was during this period that the House of Israel initiated its Missionary, Bible and Tract Societies, and extended its civilizing and liberating power to Africa and to other parts of the globe.

In South Africa, after 154 years' occupation by the Dutch, we found a population of only 62,000, of whom only one-third were European, whilst one-third were slaves, and the remaining third natives. Now, with an extended territory, we have a population of 3,000,000. Then there were but ten preachers of the Gospel, now there are one thousand. Then the trade amounted to £100,000, now it amounts to £30,000,000. Then it took three months for my friends Moffat and Livingstone to reach their stations. Now these are reached in forty-eight hours. But not only so, the British boundary has been moved on and on until it touches Lake Tanganyika, and soon there will be a railway to the Zambesi, and telegraphic communication with Cairo, linking together South Africa, Uganda, and Egypt. And thus the route northwards is in process of completion, and the time is not far distant when "the daughter of My dispersed shall bring My offering completed."

Digitized by Google

And the signs of the times in Turkey and in China and throughout Europe point to the condition of things preceding the introduction of this offering. Zeph. iii. 8, "My determination is to gather the nations that I may assemble the kingdoms to pour upon them My indignation." And from the 13th verse to the end of the chapter, we have the condition of the House of Israel certified after the production of the Ethiopian offering by the "daughter of My dispersed." So that it is evident that the marked prophetic changes that are taking place in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America are all conducing to that glad time, which is so clearly and so emphatically set forth in the sixtieth chapter of the prophet Isaiah, and we already hear the command, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." "The sun shall no more be thy light by day; but the Lord shall be to thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory." Amen.

Far to the South behold arise
The Southern Cross in glory bright!
But not alone, in those clear skies,
Does it shine forth and gild the night.

Surrounded by its myriad hosts,
It proudly brings them forth to sing
His power and love, who from those coasts
Has told "His daughter" forth to bring

An offering, meet to crown His brow,
Who is to us the Morning Star,
Whose brightness and whose lustre glow
In Israel's home—the isles afar,

Whence went "His daughter" forth to show
His love to all the sons of night,
And bring them from the shades below,
An offering to the God of Light.

With her His suppliants lowly bend,
With her they praise His glorious name,
Who, from the realm of light, did send
His chosen daughter to proclaim

His power and love as Israel's King;
His sympathy with Ethiop's race;
That they with her might joy and sing,
And see their Saviour face to face.

Behold the cross on Britain's shield
Is lifted high, all men to draw,
That they to Israel's King may yield
Allegiance, and observe His law.

IMMUTABLE THINGS.

By V. Cox.

THE history of our world is a story of perpetual change. The physical contour of the planet is for ever changing; volcanic agency, storm and flood, and other forces less evident, but no less potent, are always at work, altering the aspect of the land surface of the globe. The political changes are yet more rapid and more startling. Kingdoms arise, dynasties are overthrown, territories change hands, and the map of a century ago is to-day obsolete and useless. Is it not a relief to turn our vision, wearied with the contemplation of an unrestful and changeful world, to the blue heavens overhead, wherein "the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels," bloom on, night after night, year after year, age after age, immutable? And yet it is these very orbs which still proceed on their majestic march, unchanged in the midst of mutation, that have been adopted by God as fitting symbols of His faithfulness to His people Israel. There they are, the same to-day as when David gazed on them from the silent pastures of Bethlehem and sang, "He telleth the number of the stars; He calleth them all by their names"; or, as when Job looked up at their calm brilliancy and listened to the Divine questioning: "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion? Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season? or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?" It is, too, a sweet and solemn reflection that our Lord often gazed on them, and that they were the silent witnesses of those nightly vigils when He held communion with God, His Father, beneath the brightness of the clear sky of Palestine. As they were then, such are they now; the constellations to which the old Chaldean astrologers gave their names are still shining in the midnight heavens, and appear the same to us as to the men and women who peopled our planet thousands of years ago.

All else in the realm of nature has changed; they change not. And in the divine Word of truth we have the unmistakably clear assertion, "If these ordinances (the sun, moon, and stars) depart, then shall the seed of Israel cease from being a nation before Me for ever." Not an alien race, therefore, but the literal seed of Abraham must to-day be in possession of the covenant gifts and blessings. What follows? Assuredly that the nation and race found in possession of these is the same that was originally selected by Jehovah to be the inheritor of the covenant promises. He says, "If these ordinances depart"; but have they departed? Look up to the starry firmament and find the reply. Those silent witnesses of His faithfulness shine on still, as they shone when first the everlasting covenant was signed and sealed, and the measure of Israel's national existence is the measure of their continuity. They are the visible symbol and pledge of an inalienable promise and a peerless inheritance.

Where, then, shall we seek this nation? for there can be only one thus circumstanced. One alone presents the unique spectacle of a nation and a company of nations united under a monarchy. One alone monopolises the function of filling the waste places of the earth with her surplus population. One alone holds the keys (or Gates) of all the great ocean highways of the world. And, lastly, one alone has in her keeping the grand trust of the oracles of God, and is divinely empowered and commissioned to disseminate them among the heathen peoples of the globe. Were it possible for two nations or races to divide this honour, we might be in doubt; but there is no possible second claimant for the gifts of Israel's birthright, and it is therefore beyond dispute that the nation occupying this position is Israel, and no other.

This is what Britain with her grand company of colonies does. It is also what no other nation on the face of the planet does, and the conclusion is inevitable to those who really expect God to keep His word. Some say much about His faithfulness, but their belief in it does not convince them that He has the slightest intention of really giving Israel what He promised her. If He has broken His word once (which we do not admit, and never can), He may break it a thousand times. It is because we are assured that He has kept it, is keeping it, and will keep it for evermore, that we are not afraid to trust in His hands the interests of our own souls. If He has been faithful to Israel as a nation, we know that all His Word is true, and that in a world of unrest and change we have found a rock against which the waves shall beat in vain. On this rock, the truth of God Himself, we rest, exclaiming with one of old, "Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea: "The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge."

"Changeless the word of truth!
Changeless Immanuel's name!
Changeless the covenant of peace,
Eternally the same!
'I change not,' is Jehovah's word;
And, 'I am with thee,' saith the Lord."

"IN THE FEAR OF THE LORD."

By B. Hailes.

At a Bible-reading which the writer was privileged to attend a little time ago, this rendering was given to the first clause of the third verse of Isa. xi.: "He shall draw his breath in the fear of the Lord." Though neither the Authorised nor Revised Versions give this rendering, it is very beautiful, lifting the mind at once to recognise that the sinless Jesus, though in this world, was not of it. He could touch the leper without receiving taint; He could eat with publicans and sinners, and was not ashamed to call them friends. Just as the traveller, when he gains the summit of the mountain, draws breath in God's pure, fresh air, uncontaminated by the smoke and pollution of the world below, so in that higher atmosphere of "the fear of the Lord" did the sinless Saviour draw His every breath, living above the sinful earth, though in it, to heal, to save, and to bless. And is it not so that His followers, the "children of light," though living in the world, and, unlike Him, feeling too often its polluting touch, yet sometimes reach the mountain height, and always long to draw each breath "in the fear of the Lord." What courage, what strength, what beauty such inhalation gives them. Not sinless or perfect are His people; yet to them He says, "Be ye holy; for I am holy."

Turning back to the Old Testament, we find that this command, quoted by St. Peter was given in the first instance, not to individuals, but to a people, a nation, to the people of whom God said, "This people have I formed for Myself; they shall shew forth My praise." Naturally we ask, Does such a people exist now? or is it a fact that the people whom God formed for Himself failed to shew forth His praise, and therefore God in His disappointment cast them off for ever? Readily does the answer come to many lips, God's ancient people, the Jews, still exist, and though for a time He has cast them off, they will again be gathered to their own land and will then shew forth His praise.

But this answer does not satisfy. Is it possible that during all the centuries that have passed since the Jews were cast out of the land no people "have drawn breath in the fear of the Lord?" that the people whom God formed for Himself "have not shewn forth His praise?" No doubt we shall be told to refer to the 15th chapter of the Acts, where, in the 14th verse, we read "how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for His name." And so the argument is followed up, that this people who fill, as it were, the place which God gave to His own people Israel, and are the Church gathered from all nations, are the people who during the times of the Gentiles shew forth God's praise, But "Known unto God are all His works, from the beginning of the world," and if we turn to the Old Testament passage from which James quoted, we find God's gracious promise that though the House of Israel was sifted like corn in a sieve, "yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth." And taking the context of both passages, we clearly see that the people taken out from the Gentiles is none other than the House of Israel (not Jews), whom, even in their long dispersion, God never lost sight of. Too much stress cannot be laid upon the difference between the two Houses of Israel and Judah. "This people have I formed for Myself." "I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon." God did not repent that He had made Israel, and so cast him away. No! He said, "I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is My firstborn." "Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations, and declare it in the isles afar off; and say, He that scattered Israel will gather him, and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock." This Israel then whom God keeps, who was to become a multitude of nations, who was to be blest with "blessings of heaven above," and "blessings of the deep that lieth under," who with his horns was "to push the people together to the ends of the earth," and to "tread upon their high places," of whom God speaks as "Israel Mine inheritance," must be somewhere in the earth, a people "drawing their breath in the fear of the Lord," shewing forth His praise. We cannot say that this at all applies to the Jews in their present condition. Therefore we must look for another people who answer to this description of God's people Israel. Nor shall we have far to look, if we carefully compare what is written in God's Word with the evidence which we have daily before our eyes of Britain's place in the world.

Perhaps we shall be told that ours is a sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity. Be it so. Not yet have we attained to that "righteousness which exalteth a nation"; not yet is every breath drawn in the clear atmosphere of "the fear of the Lord"; but can we look around without seeing how signally our nation is blest? Can we look at India, at Egypt, and the rest of Africa without seeing that she has been a blessing? Can we remember that "when the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel," without seeing that that is why Britain "pushes the people together to the ends of the earth," why Joseph's daughters (or colonies) run over the wall? Do we not Sunday after Sunday pray, "Bless Thine inheritance"?

The subject is too great to be dealt with in a short space, but amply repays study. If we look at it alone from the missionary point of view, how vast the importance! Our Lord said "that the kingdom of God should be taken from the Jews and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Where then is this nation? To the Jews "were committed the oracles of God." Not now can they be said to be the keepers thereof. Who then now keeps that sacred trust? Whose great Bible Society sends forth the Word of God in its own language to every known country under the sun? Whose great Missionary Societies send forth their servants into every clime? What nation subscribes annually immense sums for the conversion of the heathen, having laid upon them the Master's command, "Go ye and teach all nations, making disciples of them, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." What will it be when the blind, having been "brought by a way that they know not," their eyes are opened, and statesmen and preachers and people all know that not for any good in themselves—for, like their forefathers, they are a stiffnecked and rebellious people—but because God delights in the people whom He has chosen. They are Israel His inheritance, Ephraim His firstborn, God's witnesses. What will it be "but life from the dead"? What an impetus then will be given to missionary work! Now Israel is "blossoming and budding, and filling the face of the world with fruit." Then, when the sticks of Ephraim and Judah have become one, shall the whole "earth be filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

We know that before this time comes much must happen; and even now, whether people think of Constantinople as the Gate or no, everyone is more or less interested in what is taking place there. At present there seems to be a lull, and a hope that things may improve, and much stress is laid upon the concert of the Powers; but with M. Edouard Hervé, we cannot but doubt how long this accord may last. With him we agree that eventually "the Turkish gendarme having proved inadequate, a European gendarme will be called up to interfere." "Who," he says, "would be that gendarme? He must be either Russian or English." We know from the prophecy of Ezekiel that between Rosh and Israel there will be a deadly feud, and we know also that God has said, "I am against thee, O Gog," and that then, "when He has set His glory among the heathen, the House of Israel shall know that He is the Lord their God from that day and forward."

What better wish can we have for the readers of the BANNER OF ISRAEL, and for the British nation, for the year upon which we are entering than that God may hasten the glorious time when the cry shall go forth, "Open ye the Gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in," when Israel, like his great Redeemer, "shall draw his breath in the fear of the Lord"!

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have" (2 Cor. viii. 11).

OBJECT:—To assist in making known, by special means, the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 100 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

M. A. FITZPATRICK, Hon. Treasurer.

Westgate-on-Sea, Dec. 14th, 1895.

The distributors of the Anglo-Israel Distribution Fund have greatly rejoiced, with thankfulness, for the most welcome help that has been given to the Fund since last month's Report, by friends at home and far away, who have shown by their good gifts a true sense of the value of the proclamation that the House of Israel is discovered in the British people; and the very kind words with which they have proved their sympathy in our work have encouraged us, after a time rather of waiting for supplies, to start again with fresh energy our Seed-packets, to bear the good news all round the world of the faithfulness of the Lord God Almighty to His chosen people.

To all who have aided us during this now out-going year we desire to offer our earnest, heartfelt thanks, and with gratitude and dependence on the loving Providence who directs the good intentions of all hearts, we look forward hopefully to the New Year. Already we have an earnest of the good support we look for, in the first subscription that has been most kindly sent for 1896. God grant that our work may redound to His glory and the salvation of souls.

The distribution of 124 packets of literature, with weekly and monthly journals, have been made, during the last four weeks, to the under-mentioned places:—

HOW MANASSEH LOVES US!

IT must have been a mortifying surprise to most of our readers to learn the kind of treatment the American people, our Israelite brethren, favour us with when a chance offers to them to "twist the lion's tail;" and when their President, as their chief political ruler, sounds the note by which an affront may be offered to us as a nation, and war be threatened on grounds that surely never have been advanced before, of so slender and so ridiculous a character. The enthusiasm of the Americans to offer an insult to us, and then threaten us with war if we refuse to submit to the dictum of their own commission in a boundary dispute we have in South America, acting therein on ex parte investigations, was surprising and totally unexpected. Twenty-eight out of forty-five governors of States have declared in favour of the President's policy of fire and sword, and apparently there is but one influential newspaper in the United States, The World, which opposes the President and his policy as unjust and unworthy of the nation.

It is a remarkable fact that jealousy and hatred towards the British should still be so deeply rooted in the American mind that the smallest excuse is seized for an explosion such as we have witnessed, volcanic in its character. The commerce between our two countries is, of course, sure to suffer, and already it is reported in The Times that financial enterprises have come to a standstill, while the money loss to the United States is even now reckoned by millions. Who can confide in the commercial aptitude of a people subject to such whirlwinds of passion that with a light heart and reckless speech they make ready for war with their blood relations, because we fail to conform to what they call the Monroe doctrine! What this doctrine is no one can exactly define. European nations are not bound by it, nor has it ever been communicated to them. It is not part of the law of nations, and yet without warning, for the first time, the United States puts forward this doctrine, and claims under it absolute control over the action of our own nation in its dealings with a petty Republic in South America, a thousand miles distant from the capital of the United States, under the penalty of war if we refuse. An American writer, on Dec. 20, tells us that "the question is one of sentiment and of principle" with the Americans, and that it means, as respects ourselves and foreign nations, "We don't want you, and we won't have you, here, or near." The answer to this sentiment is, that, as regards ourselves, we are in Canada, and mean to stay; in British Guiana, in Jamaica, in Trinidad, and in Honduras, and mean to stay there too, managing our own affairs in our own way, but not under the dictation of any foreign governments soever. Lord Salisbury made that very plain in his calm and sensible reply to Mr. Olney's despatch on the subject, dated Nov. 26 last.

What the outcome of the present misunderstanding will be we cannot yet say. It seems impossible to imagine that two such nations as the British and Americans, speaking the same language and thinking the same thoughts, can deliberately be embroiled in a savage war with each other, regarding a matter of no vital importance to either of them. A terrible calamity seems impending over the whole civilized world, and there seems no power, but that of the God of Israel, to control the evil, or bring good out of it. Our danger, hitherto, has been in other directions, and the "war-woe" of the East seemed to be imminent. But no one anticipated that the Anglo-Saxon brethren of Great Britain and America would lightly plunge into hostilities, or bitterness leading directly to war, as the Americans seem quite willing to do for a sentiment.

One direction in which this mischief has worked, and will work further, is that described in the money market article of The Times, on Dec. 21, in the following words:—

It is now clearly perceived that, whatever may be the political consequences of the action of President Cleveland, its commercial and financial consequences have been disastrous to the United States. For a long time to come it will be difficult to make the ordinary prudent investor believe that it is safe to lend money in a country where the responsible head of the Executive can commit such a mistake as this and yet retain the confidence of the nation he represents. The more immediate effect has been to cause a restriction of the credits on London hitherto enjoyed by New York houses and the prompt withdrawal from New York of as much capital as possible.

On the continent of Europe our trouble with the Americans is rather relished, because, starting with the assertion that ours is the best hated nation in the world, they ask us the reason of it, and answer their question in a manner which acknowledges the truth of our often repeated assertion, that, being Israel, the earth is largely in our possession to-day, and is going to be yet more so in the future. The Soir, a Paris paper, wrote thus, according to The Times correspondent (Dec. 20) :—

The writer affirms that among all the Powers there is an ineradicable distrust of England, which at the present moment induces Europe, although bound in this particular case to back England in its own interest, to watch the existing conflict with a certain sardonic pleasure. What is the origin, he asks, of this formidable and universal unpopularity? If Englishmen, he says, will ask themselves this question, when once the crisis is over, "they will end, perhaps, by understanding the too legitimate reasons of this unconscious coalition of all peoples keenly devoted to their rights and to the equilibrium of the world against this insatiable appetite for conquests and annexations, against this gradual confiscation of the two hemispheres for the benefit of a nation of islanders, against this insolent pretention to the Empire of the seas, to the occupation of the whole of Africa, to the monopoly of Australia and Polynesia—in a word, against those unhealthy dreams of universal dominion in which the school of jingo and Imperialist Chauvinism indulges. For my part I am very far from wishing to see an Anglo-American war, which would be a blow dealt at civilization, but it is not amiss that American arrogance should teach British egoism to see itself as it is seen by the rest of the world.

The empire of the sea—the possession of continents, North South, East, and West, with the expectation of universal dominion, these are God's promises to Israel, and they are the possessions or expected inheritance of the British people according to the hardly-concealed envious accusations of our French accusers. It appears to us that the present outburst of the American President and people has its origin in the same envious feelings which cannot bear the idea of British territories in the Western hemisphere. The origin of the explosion being such, we hardly think it will lead to serious results. God will, we are convinced, overrule the passions of the Western Republic, and bring about peace, for a time, till He comes to whom the world belongs, to hush these angry uprisings against the people whom the Lord has blessed, and who, therefore, verily, shall be blessed indeed. In this confidence we rest contented to watch the Lord's interposition for us His people, and so to fulfil to us the promise, "Lord, Thou wilt ordain peace for us" (Isa. xxvi. 12, R.V.).

"THE FUTURE OF THE JEWISH NATION."

At a meeting of the Clerical and Lay Association of the Bristol branch, held at Clifton, on the evening of December 13th last, a very interesting discussion took place, on the subject opened by the Rev. J. M. Eppstein, a convert from Judaism, and now the head of the Wanderers' Home, in Bristol and Clifton. There were several incumbents of churches present besides influential laymen. The opener having closed, the reply was given by the Rev. P. Carlyon, of Edinburgh ; Philo-Israel, Drs. Ewens and Prowse, of Clifton, besides the Rev. Secretary of the local Jews Society, who seemed somewhat in favour of the opposition. A Bristol incumbent thought the rev. opener had a wide grasp of the subject, and evidently believed he was right. The other speakers said little to the point, and seemed carefully to avoid it. Col. Senior was unavoidably absent, but, we learn, sent a note to be read to the meeting. It was not, however, brought forward by the Rev. Secretary, for some reason which did not transpire.

The opener's statement was singularly in agreement with the views which the Anglo-Israelites hold except in one vital point. He did not believe there was any Israel now forthcoming to share in the promises ! Being a Jew, learned in the Scriptures, this seemed strange. Being driven at last to the bare acknowledgment that the Ten Tribes may be somewhere, he said regarding them, that if asked "where they are to-day ?" he would answer, "I do not know !" ; and if he were called on to find them, he replied that God undertook to find them, and would do so, if He thought good, and it was not our part to take any steps in that matter ! The following is the outline or gist of the opener's argument.

My subject (he said) is: "The Future of the Jewish Nation." I make no difference between Israel and the Jews. They are the same. I regard the two terms prophetically as synonymous. But I cannot regard Israel and the Church as one, in the manner our modern expositors do ! Those terms are not synonymous. Neither can I say of the covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, by the Lord, that it was conditional. It was absolutely unconditional. Abraham's covenant was universal in its application. No conditions were attached to it. It was all of grace, and confirmed by the oath of the Lord. It was permanent. It descended from Abraham to Isaac, then to Jacob, who was also called "Israel," and lastly to his descendants for ever. They were a people adopted by God (Isa. xliii. 21). They were separated to the Lord and redeemed for ever, and also protected by unconditional covenants. (See Deut. ix.)

They were a people whom God undertook to preserve, as Jer. xxxi. 35, 36 prove, a text in which He took the heavens and the earth to witness that this people of Israel should be a nation before Him for ever, and never cease to be such at all ! There was no shadow of repentance in this covenant on the Lord's side, and it never was annulled. But it may be asked, has not Israel been rejected by God and dispersed among the nations ? Yes, certainly ! They broke the covenant God made with them in Horeb, and, therefore, Israel has ceased to be a witness to the world for God; though in their dispersion they still remain the best witness and evidence of the truth of the Bible. But, hereafter, this same Israel shall become one nation, great and glorious, a witness to the goodness of the Lord, their God.

Remark, that the scattering of Israel has been literal and true. The gathering shall also be literal and true, for the promise is unconditional. This gathering of Israel was not fulfilled and completed on the return from the Babylonian captivity, because then Isa. xi. was not fulfilled, and the gathering was not permanent as promised in Amos ix. 15. The gathered people were subsequently dispersed again, thus showing that the final permanent re-gathering has not yet taken place. The future gathering of Israel will be from many countries. Eleven times is the re-gathering of Israel mentioned in the Scriptures. The proceedings, during that event, according to the Scriptures, seem to take place in the following order:—First, a partial restoration of Israel will occur in unbelief. Secondly, the time of Jacob's trouble comes on. Thirdly, Christ's appearance happens when the Jews will be converted to Christ by His own operation. The world will then be ruled by Christ, and it will cease to groan as it does to-day. Israel (the Jews) shall then be the joy of all lands. They will be blessed in all ways—going out and coming in. All men shall then bless them, and they will be the great missionaries of the world. Now as to the "times and seasons." These are not revealed to us.

What is the duty, however, of the Christian Church to Israel? The Lord alone will convert Israel. But we have as Christians to preach the Gospel, but "to the Jew first." Have we done this? We have done something—but the results are from the Lord! Good results certainly have followed. Hundreds of Jews have been converted to Christ, and are occupying positions as Christian ministers and clergymen everywhere. Why not more of the same kind of results? Because we have failed to go "to the Jew first." We have indulged in prejudices against the Jews. We have as Christians persecuted them! But we owe much to the Jews. If the Lord "loved the people," meaning "doted on them," as stated in Deut. xxxiii. 3, how ought we not to "love them," and help them with the Word of Life according to the commandment!

Such, roughly, was the outline of an excellent paper, tainted, however, by a radical error, seeing that the opener wished to enact the play of Hamlet without Hamlet, and interpreted all God's purposes respecting this people, by carefully eliminating the House of Israel from any part or lot in it! He taunted our side by asking, "What did Israel gain by 'the birthright?'" It was only "a double portion," which Joseph gained by the admission of his two sons into the tribal ranks. Joseph had two shares! "That was all"! Then as to "the Gates." Where, he asked, do you find that word in Scripture? The promise is only "the Gate," not "the Gates;" and the Gate did not mean Gibralter, Malta, and the vast number of other places named by the Anglo-Israelites! If so, have you got the sublime Porte (a Gate)? The Dardanelles (a Gate)? He did not see that "the Gate of the enemies" was the several Gate of many enemies, therefore 'the Gates.'" (See Rev. C. W. Hickson's argument as to "the Head of Oreb and Zeb," in Judges vii. 25, where the Hebrew words are "the Head of Oreb and Zeb," was cut off, meaning and translated into English "the Heads of Oreb and Zeb")! (See BANNER, vol. v., November 2nd, 1881, p. 466.)

In reply on the whole case, Philo-Israel claimed that the text quoted by the opener (Jer. xxxi. 35, 36) sufficed to invalidate the whole structure of his argument respecting the modern disappearance of "the House of Israel" (that is, of Joseph or Ephraim) from the benefit of the prophecies. Because as Judah is not a nation now, as admitted by Mr. Eppstein, God's Word must stand, and Israel must be a nation before Him, extant, to-day, since sun, moon, stars, wind and waves exist. The only alternative is, that God's Word, oath, and promise, in Jer. xxxi. 35, 36, are not true, which God forbid! The return to the land further of Judah or the Jews cannot take place alone, but must be accompanied by that of the House of Israel. As to the title adopted by the opener, "The Future of the Jewish Nation," there is no Jewish nation now existing anywhere as he admits; and as to the future of it, it can have no future at all, since when the Jews return they will merge into Israel's polity, and are to be one stick with them by God's own act, and then as Ezek. xxxvii. 21—28 teaches, the people will be, as before time, known as the "the children of Israel," not as Israel and Judah; one nation, and one kingdom, upon the mountains of Israel, "for ever," and "for ever more." As to the events of the restoration, Jer. iii. 18, clearly shows the duality of the return; for then "the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north, to the land which I have given for an inheritance, unto your fathers."

It was curious, if not amusing, to hear Mr. Eppstein, in his reply, forget both himself and his unconditional teaching, and see him (both by word and significant gesture) "cast away" Ephraim, as "wholly given to idols," and "left alone." This seemed a new way of cutting asunder the other staff "Bands," and breaking the brotherhood between Judah and Israel, by leaving Judah only, but Ephraim nowhere. (See Zech. xi. 14.)

"The Rev. P. Carlyon said: After thirteen years of devoted study, I am a confirmed British-Israelite; and I am pleased to find myself in agreement with the lecturer on most points of his argument. I am especially delighted at hearing him advocate the literal, and not the spiritual, interpretation of prophecy. 'The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy'—an object essential to us all to keep in mind; for if prophecy could be fulfilled in the heart it would give no testimony, and afford no evidence to an unbelieving world. We must, therefore, interpret prediction by history, and by facts; and it is through neglect of this that scepticism is so prevalent. Spiritualising, or (Dr. Wolff called it) phantomising the promises of God fosters unbelief. Hume, the historian, said the God of Moses broke His word and oath to His own people, how, then, can I trust Him? Literal fulfilment vindicates the fidelity of God, and inspiration of the Bible. Further, the lecturer based his argument on the Abrahamic covenant, which he said was permanent, and absolutely unconditional; wherein again we agree: but he added, and 'all of grace.' If those words imply, the covenant is all of equal grace as 'the Gospel' is, which 'was preached unto Abraham'; or, a free gift of equal blessing to all of Abraham's lineal seed, I must object. There is a temporal as well as a spiritual side in it. In the midst of the spiritual and universal blessing, which confirms the promised seed of the woman in the lineal seed of Abraham, is inserted the special promise: 'And thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies, each, and all of them,' which is purely an earthly pledge, and (unless explained) out of tune with the Gospel of peace and love. Our view is that, setting aside equal grace or favour, God has chosen a people for Himself, to declare His name amongst the heathen, and with this commission has given the means and power of preaching the Gospel in all the world. He has given 'a double portion' to Joseph, and a greater dominion to Ephraim (over and above his portion) than to Manasseh, turns his discord into harmony. Hence out of Judah is the Prince, and the birthright is Joseph's. Hence also the same distinction sustained so late as by Jeremiah: 'I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is My first-born,' which no sin of Ephraim can forfeit, because the covenant is absolute and unconditional, and because Jehovah Himself has avowed "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? Ephraim is My dear Son!" The glory of Israel is wrapped up with the fulfilment of God's purpose of making Ephraim 'a great nation and a company of nations,' and 'the fulness of the Gentiles:" and we contend that these tokens are already verified sufficiently for identification in the expansion of the British Empire, and its exclusive characteristics and blessings; whilst fifteen millions of Jews (dispersed at present, and not a nation) are totally inadequate to satisfy these and many like conditions of the 'stone kingdom,' growing into the 'mountain,' which, Daniel says, is the destiny of Israel. It is astonishing to us how any students of the Bible can limit God's promises to Israel to two of its Tribes; or how He can promise one and give to another! And, then, as they look around on the world, and see its scattered handfuls of Jews no longer a nation, how can they magnify the restoration of the Jews to Canaan into a repossession of the promised land? Why! The Jews in Canaan would be in a corner! Israel in 'their own land' would occupy all the vast expanse, fertilised by the healing and sweetening waters foretold by Ezekiel, and Zechariah, and Joel, that stretches, including Arabia, from the Euphrates to the Nile! Let us not take a microscopic view of our hopes, nor see the whole in a part, nor Israel in the Jew alone; but let us recognise Israel in the empire that is already the largest the world has ever seen, and is still lengthening its cords and strengthening its stakes; and let us look for the promised glory of Israel, to be developed in its own land, as well as in the west, in its 'appointed place,' and occupied by (not fifteen millions but) 200 millions of Abraham's seed, for which the land is large enough! I should like to say more, as I feel myself to be on the same road as the lecturer, but fear I may be taking more than my share in this discussion."

Dr. H. B. Prowse and Dr. Ewens, replied to various points mooted by the opener, after which the latter replied, alleging that he had read and annotated all our works, and disagreed with their conclusions in toto.

OF THE EARTH, EARTHY.

By H. R. Shaw.

It is currently reported that the literature of the New Year would not be complete if the Banner did not undertake some little disquisition of the Great Pyramid, and its teachings to mankind. True it is, indeed, that the Pyramid lately seems to have been suffering unmerited neglect at the hands of its students.

Perhaps this may be in some measure accounted for by the fact that Anglo-Israelites, as well as other people who are not quite of that way of thinking, have ever been prone to expect more than was at all reasonable in the way of signs and wonders from the Great Pyramid, and thereby have brought themselves perilously near the condemnation of those learned folks of old to whom the Son of Man gave the sign of the prophet Jonah.

From time to time, going back to the days of Sultan Al Mamoun, more than ten centuries ago, mankind have been possessed of vague dreams of heaps of treasures of gold and jewels secretly buried within or underneath this mighty building, and all modern readers are aware how that potentate burglariously entered therein, literally quarrying his way to the supposed centre, only to find nothing but an empty, lidless stone box of granite, now known as the Coffer, or Sarcophagus; while it appears ever since that time to have been the determined effort of most of the "intelligent" visitors to try and extract either material or scientific treasures by force from the long-suffering edifice. Thus much is self-evident from the published writings of all the Pyramid explorers, not excepting even Piazzi Smyth, who, in one of his earlier volumes, seems somewhat inclined to try the effect of raising the granite leaf in the Ante-Chamber, but he was fortunately restrained by his promise to the Egyptian Khedive, "not to break the Pyramid." True, this was before he and we had had the benefit of the researches of the Rev. C. W. Hickson, and others, who taught us how much could be obtained from the Leaf, by leaving it alone and undisturbed.

The latest "happy inspiration" of this kind came to hand last autumn, from the editor of a popular monthly, seeking an article on the lines of a letter by an enthusiastic politician, who shall be nameless, and who gained admittance into the columns of an evening newspaper, to set forth that the final and only full and perfect cure for English agricultural distress is for the farmers of England to get up a grand expedition to the Great Pyramid with Mr. H. M. Stanley, M.P., to lead it to its successful outcome, which is to discover untold treasures under the Great Pyramid where they have been laid up from the beginning of the world, exactly to meet such a case as this—viz., the ruin of an honest population for want of proper assistance from their own Government, and that a Christian one of the latter days!

Truly one knows not which party to this indictment is deserving of most commiseration—the honest population apparently going to ruin while only fulfilling its Israelite destiny of increasing like fishes and overflowing its boundary; the Government which does not quite rise to the preternatural sagacity of Khedive Joseph of old; Mr. Stanley, M.P., who is to take a darker journey than any he has previously taken on Africa's dark continent; or the Pyramid itself, butchered to make not even a Roman holiday. It need scarcely be said that the friend to whom this communication was made, did not feel himself able to hold out any hopes of discovering material treasure under the Great Pyramid, even with the aid of the renowned African explorer, and so, for the present, the building has a respite.

But lest there may be even yet a lingering suspicion that the Great Pyramid conceals a gold or diamond mine of the South African pattern, it may be well to recapitulate briefly at this season of New Year, what really are the treasures contained in this building. They are as hinted by the title of this paper, entirely of the earth, earthy. In making use of this expression, we mean no disparagement of the Great Pyramid, nor yet of the Earth, which we are now regarding primarily as the abode of man, but chiefly as a planet, and, indeed, one of the heavenly orbs. But the building never gets away from the earth; notwithstanding, it may lead the mind in a variety of directions, the earth is always a factor—indeed the very focus of the problem or theorem, and it would seem that man, earth's inhabitant, may herein find an epitome of all that it is of importance for himself to know, but nothing beyond the earth he is actually living upon, just as the Holy Bible confines itself to man upon the earth, and the religion appropriate thereto, and takes absolutely no account of other material worlds and their possible inhabitants, or religions.

Geographically, the Great Pyramid stands probably near the centre of the ancient inhabited earth, as most assuredly it stands accurately in the centre of the modern inhabitable earth; its position on the 30th parallel of N. latitude, marks the line, which by the geometrical properties of a sphere, divides the surface of the Northern hemisphere into two equal portions, one-half towards the Pole, and one-half towards the Equator. By its height and shape it measures the distance of the sun, which is, in fact, the radius of the orbit of the earth; by either one or four sides of its base, as well as in other ways, it measures the diurnal and annual motions of the earth; by the cross diagonal lines of its base, and in other ways it expresses the precessional movement of the earth's axis; by certain eccentricities of its entrance it expresses the obliquity of the earth's axis to the plane of its orbit, as well as the flattening of its poles.

Taken in its bulk, it measures the earth by the earth's own measures, lineally, superficially, and geometrically, in a manner that has often been explained in these pages and need not be now repeated; it weighs the earth absolutely and relatively; gauges its surface temperature and atmospheric pressure; and even when we come to the points which have provoked dispute among men—viz., the sacred and prophetic, and historical teaching of the building, we find that nothing is claimed on this head that does not relate to the history and fortunes of man upon his home—the earth. The flood, the call of Israel, the disruption of her kingdom, the loss and recovery of her Tribes, the birth, death, resurrection and ascension of her Redeemer and His Second Coming—the Sacred Law, the Sabbath—all these are matters of purely earthly history and concern. So far as can be ascertained by personal research, or from information supplied by others, there is no suggestion of any other place —no heaven beyond the sky, though, probably, a heaven on earth is foreshadowed—not a scrap of information or suggestion, say of such bodies as the Sun, or Mars, or Venus, or even of the Moon, the satellite of the earth.

Nevertheless, from certain indications in the numbers and proportions of the building which have been quite recently observed by the writer, and which may, perhaps, be considered in a future paper, it now seems exceedingly probable, that the Great Pyramid, although silent as regards heavenly bodies other than the earth, is yet capable of furnishing a clue by means of analogy for determining many physical facts concerning, at any rate, our Solar System. The clue is, indeed, in hand, but the end is at present uncertain.

"DO TELL ME, WHAT IS REALLY THE IDENTITY?"

By Joseph Thomson.

The subject of our national Identity with the Lost Ten-tribed House of Israel, has now for a long period of years been prominently before the public, so that it may confidently be said that it has been, or is being, taught in almost every parish of this kingdom. And yet it has not been accepted as true so generally as we wished, or possibly expected. How is this? To this query many answers might be found, but we think the chief place will be given to the indifference of the age to Biblical subjects. If the question was one of "higher criticism,"—one of calling the truth of the Bible into question, there would be many adherents, possibly simply echoing the teachings of science,—"falsely so called"—dishonouring God by calling the truth of His word in question.

Perhaps the class who have disappointed us the most have been our religious teachers,—our professors, preachers, bishops, and the "clergy" generally. These, it would naturally have been expected, should have been the first to be found examining the claims of this subject; but, alas! such expectations have been grievously disappointed: and humble students of the Bible, and the Bible alone—which is the "religion of Protestants"—have been left to themselves, —the shepherds caring little what the pasturage of the flock may consist of. This is more evident when a shepherd has been cornered, and he has felt himself getting into a "tight place." Putting on a winsome smile, the question is asked, "And suppose all this is true, and we allow it all, what difference does it make to anyone? we still believe the Scriptures, and that they are necessary to salvation," &c.? This is just the old Cui bono? over again in another form. What does it matter? Why, every thing almost. It honours God by showing that His Word is indubitably true; and this is the great truth universally wanted in this scepto-critical age; and in our opinion is the only one which will be found effective in stemming the tide of indifferentism, scepticism, and agnosticism of the present time.

In a certain sense and within due limits, we admit the reasonableness of the query Cui bono? but when that query is fairly answered, reasonable credit should be allowed for that answer; and old objections should not be trotted out again and again, only clothed in a different garb, as though that was all. Anglo-Israelites never fear legitimate discussion, and the testing of their arguments and teaching by an appeal to Scripture. That is the fountain of all truth, and the ultimate authority by which every word shall be established, or shown to be unworthy of our acceptance.

Opening the Bible, and calmly reading its promises to Abraham and his descendants, we find an expanding character attaching to them down the line of prophecy, from Genesis to Malachi; even as the tree of a thousand years hence, is embraced within the present insignificant acorn. To Abram it was promised that his seed should be as numerous as the stars of Heaven, and as the sand by the sea-shores—for multitude innumerable. He was to be a father of many nations; himself blessed, and blessing many more. As the patrimony of these multitudes, an extensive tract of a splendid country was promised to them, where they should live, as a prosperous and a united people, as long as the world should last. As time went on, and prophecy vouched more details, we find this people by-and-bye settled in their own land; but, not agreeing very well, we read that they had something like civil war, and the bulk of the nation was rent from a smaller portion, after the death of their wisest king, and two nations or kingdoms, or houses, were established in place of the original one. The legitimate one, the House of Judah, was determined to contest the other House—the separatist—and forcibly compel their adherence to the royal line of David, but were prevented by God Himself, who affirmed that "this thing" was from Him, and must be allowed. What then becomes of the prophecies which appear to be in direct contradiction to all this sort of political development? Is God's plan fallen through? Is He foiled by short-sighted, wilful men? By no means. He sees the end from the beginning, and provides accordingly. This division of the kingdom, in itself, was a punishment upon the line of David for Solomon's sin of idolatry; and now, looking back upon the centuries, we see that the division served wider and higher ends in the history of the Hebrew nation. We can now see that the division of the kingdom, and the expatriation of the Ten-tribed House after a separate existence from the kingdom of Judah of about two hundred and fifty years, and from which they have never yet returned, removed them from the land of Israel from that time till now, so taking no part in the crucifixion of their Lord. They have not yet returned, but will do so in God's due time; for the word of prophecy as distinctly announces their return and union with their brethren of the House of Judah, as any other prophecy which we know has already been clearly fulfilled. Listen,—it is God that speaks,—"The word of the Lord came again unto me" (i.e., Ezekiel), "saying: Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions; then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the House of Israel, his companions; and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand. And when the children of Thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, Wilt Thou not shew us what Thou meanest by these? say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God: Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in Mine hand. And the sticks upon which thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes." So far the symbolic prophecy, about which there can be no mistake: now for the explanation, which is even clearer and cannot be spiritualised away by the most spiritual among us:—"Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God: 'Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all: neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestible things, nor with any of their transgressions; but I will save them out of all their dwelling-places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall they be My people, and I will be their God. . . . And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob, My servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children, for ever, and My servant David shall be their Prince for ever. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set My sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be My people. And the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when My sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore.'" (Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28).

Now, what can we make of this? If it cannot be all spiritualised, it must be understood literally, all of it, and not a portion. And it speaks plainly that, as this nation of chosen people were real people, and had a national existence in long ago times, so also must they again have existence as a nation, pre-eminently favoured by God, and established upon the mountains of Israel, as one nation only, never more to be divided into two nations, or kingdoms at all. Mark, God Himself says that He will do it. And what He promises, that He can, and will perform. We know who are the Jews—the descendants of the House of Judah—but the tribes of Israel and fellows of Ephraim, where are they? According to this prophecy, they still exist separate, wherever they are, for this prophecy proclaims it; it distinctly says that after their union they shall dwell in the land given unto Jacob, "they, and their children, and their children's children, for ever!" or as another prophecy puts it, "I" (i.e., God) "will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them,' saith the Lord thy God." The Jews do not yet possess their own land. It is still in the hands of the "unspeakable Turk," though he may soon be forced to relinquish it.

We may safely leave the problem "what to do with the Jews"? in the hand of Him who has made such large and implicit promises to His chosen people Israel. The question, however, remains for the sceptical to answer, where is the lost House of Israel of the Ten Tribes, in these our times, if the Anglo-Saxon race be not they? We accept the Identity because the character, position, and prospects in the immediate future of the British race, are exactly those portrayed by Holy Writ; and as time goes on we believe that these characteristics will develop more clearly, so as to elicit the testimony of all thoughtful persons, "What hath God wrought?" Who could have thought it? The knowledge of the division of the kingdom, its continuance, and, probably near, future re-union of the two Houses, or kingdoms, into one, for evermore, should always be kept in mind by Bible students; for, like master-keys, they will unlock apparent mysteries in Divine prophecy that nothing else can.

RIGHTLY DIVIDING THE WORD OF TRUTH.

By Douglas A. Onslow.

PART II.

At the Conference between the British-Israel Association and the Prophecy Investigation Society, held at Exeter Hall, in the morning and afternoon of May 2nd 1895, one of the speakers for the Society, the Rev. James Neil, M.A., in the discussion which followed Dr. Aldersmith's paper (reported in the Covenant People for September, 1895), spoke as follows:—"I think, in fairness, I must now make an admission about the expression in Gen. xlviii. 19 (melo-hagoyim). This is evidently definite and means, literally, 'the fulness of nations,' not 'a fulness of nations,' as some opponents of the opener (Dr. Aldersmith) have stated. Every Hebrew grammarian knows that a noun in the state of construction as, melo,—'fulness' certainly is here—is held to be so clearly defined by its position that it cannot possibly admit of a definite article before it. . . . The literal translation, therefore, of melo-hagoyim is without doubt 'the fulness of nations.' It is, I contend, those two exceedingly pregnant figures in the Old Testament, 'the genitive of character,' and the 'plural of majesty' for 'the great national fulness,' that is, Ephraim rather than Manasseh should contribute to fill or swell out the nation into which Joseph's tribe was to grow."

The contention of British-Israelites is, that St. Paul, in using this term in Romans xi. 25, is referring to the "fulness" of the nations predicted by the Holy Spirit for Ephraim's afterseed, and we say we are justified in taking this view for the following reasons:—

(1) Because this particular expression is used only twice in the Bible—viz., in Gen. xlviii. 19 and Rom. xi. 25, where the Hebrew and Greek rendering in each case are identical.

(2) Because the promise that Ephraim's seed should become a "multitude of nations," as translated into our Authorised Version, must be fulfilled to his descendants during this Christian Dispensation, for it never had fulfilment prior to Christ's coming.

(3) Because that, as there is this promise of "fulness" to Ephraim, and nowhere in the Old Testament is there any prediction of "fulness" to any other people, the "fulness of the Gentiles" (nations) spoken of by St. Paul could only have reference to the "fulness" predicted of Ephraim's seed.

(4) Because it is contrary to reason that there should be a fulness of Ephraim's seed, and a fulness of Gentile non-Israelite nations, existing pari passu, both to be completed in this dispensation, and as there must be Ephraim's "fulness of nations," there cannot be the non-Israelite "fulness of nations."

(5) St. Paul's pleroma ton ethnon, must, therefore, be Ephraim's "fulness of nations."

But as if to knock this monstrous figment of a spiritual descent from Abraham on the head by anticipation, and before he commences his general argument about Abraham being justified by works or by faith, the apostle commences the chapter (iv.) thus, "What shall we say then that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?"

In order that we may be sure who the people are of whom St. Paul speaks of Abraham their father "as pertaining to the flesh,"—i.e., their carnal and certainly not spiritual father—we have only to turn to Rom. i. 7, and we find that the people the epistle is addressed to are "All that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints," etc. So that these Romans of Rom. iv. 1 are Abraham's carnal and not spiritual seed. If it were otherwise, should not Rom. iv. 1, have read thus, "What shall we say then that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the spirit, hath found?" If the intention of the Holy Spirit had been to prove that these Roman saints—who certainly would not have been addressed by Paul as "beloved of God, called to be saints" unless they by faith had accepted Christ—were Abraham's spiritual seed, why commence the chapter by alluding to Abraham their father "as pertaining to the flesh"?

By way of illustrating his idea that the Holy Spirit means "the spiritual children of Abraham who possess his faith," and not the lineal descendants of Jacob, the Rev. D.D. writes, "The Holy Spirit declares, in Rom. iv. 11, that he (Abraham) was 'the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised, that righteousness might be imputed unto them also,'" &c., but there is not a word in all this that indicates that the Holy Spirit meant "spiritual" children of Abraham, and not carnal descendants. And most certainly the Holy Spirit does not explain His meaning to be what the Rev. D.D. says it is.

Again, he writes, "In verse 13 it is distinctly declared again (again, mark!) that the promise in question was not given to his seed according to the flesh, but through the righteousness of faith."

The audacity of this reverend doctor is really surprising, and doubtless his bold assertions are meekly accepted by many as being the truth, especially by those who are anxious to believe that they are, in order to support their long-cherished notions, without their going to the Word to test them. This is what verse 13 actually declares, "For the promise that he should be the heir of the world was not to Abraham, or to his seed through the law, but through the righteousness of faith." Where is there a word here that the promise was not given "to his seed according to the flesh?" In order to fit Romans iv. 13 into his views, and to foist up his spiritual seed idea, this reverend doctor eliminates the words "through the law" which are in the Bible, and substitutes the words "according to the flesh," which are not there! If this is not taking from the word, and also adding to it, it would be difficult to say what would be.

Next, as already quoted, we read, "In verse 14 we are told that on the other interpretation (i.e., yours—the interpretation of British-Israelites), 'faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect.'" This is what verse 14 actually says, "For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect." The interpretation put upon this verse by British-Israelites, which he calls "the other interpretation," i.e., carnal heirs as opposed to spiritual heirs, is not the interpretation at all as understood by the Rev. D. D. And what is more, if it were it would not militate against the Scripture. But the reverend doctor is wrong again, for verse 14 says nothing about heirs carnal or spiritual, but of heirs "which are of the law." Now, it is quite evident that there can be no question here of the descent from Abraham, with reference to these people, who if they are, as the apostle says, heirs, are to make faith void. For if it is a question of descent, then we get into another very formidable tangle. We have, through the ingenuity of the Rev. D. D. and his followers, got two manners of descent from Abraham: (1) his seed according to the flesh, and (2) the spiritual children of Abraham. He now introduces (3) his seed according to the law!! However, I will say this for him, that he tries to identify No. 1 with No. 3. He evidently implies that Abraham's seed "through the law" is identical with his seed "according to the flesh," and in order to make his argument possess any sense, it is necessary to contrast Abraham's seed "through (or according to) the law" with Abraham's seed "through (or according to) the righteousness of faith," as though the apostle was writing of two different modes of descent from Abraham.

But I do not for one moment admit this to be the apostle's meaning. What I think to be the meaning of the apostle is that he is writing about all Abraham's seed in the line of Isaac alone, some of whom, being still under the law, considered that this fact entitled them to heirship of the promises, and that it was not necessary for them to have faith in Christ; whereas, the apostle teaches that the heirship is only obtainable through the righteousness of faith in Christ, which the Jews under the law refused to acknowledge.

That I am not wronging our reverend opponent is clearly shown, for he thus writes, "You (British-Israelites) make the descent from Abraham to be NOT by faith, not by grace, but by a descent according to the flesh in the whole Anglo-Saxon race, thus making 'faith void and the promise of none effect.'" Will any person possessed of God's most blessed gift of reason, explain why the mere fact of our claiming for the whole Anglo-Saxon race direct lineal descent from Abraham, carnally through the line of Isaac, Jacob and his sons, should make faith void, and the promise to Abraham "of none effect"! And further, will any one who has not been moonstruck explain how it is possible for any one born of a woman to be able to claim descent from Abraham either by faith or by grace? If there was to be a "spiritual seed" of Abraham, how is it that no mention, no hint, no suggestion, of such a seed is ever made by any of the prophets, or any of God's holy servants anywhere, either in the Old or in the New Testament. It is an absolute impossibility that there should be either man or woman descended by faith, or by grace, or spiritually from Abraham. Such an idea involves a paradox. There can be no other descent than lineal, or carnal; and in order that our blessed Lord Himself should be able to claim descent from Abraham and David He had to be born of a woman.

There is, therefore, no "spiritual seed" of Abraham, and there most assuredly is none mentioned in the Bible from beginning to end. To say that "the Holy Spirit has interpreted His own words, and explained clearly that He uses them of Israel after the Spirit—viz., the spiritual children of Abraham"—is to insult the common sense of ordinary intelligence, and adds to God's Word what is not there, and cannot be deduced, or inferred from it.

Thus to argue about a "spiritual seed" of Abraham or a descent "by faith" from him, when the Word of God nowhere makes allusion to any such children, is indeed to labour under "a strong delusion," and to place oneself in imminent peril of meriting the condemnation of Proverbs xxx. 6.

Our interpretation is NOT a practical denial of the Spirit's own interpretation, for the Holy Spirit most certainly has NOT interpreted His own words in the sense claimed for them by our opponent.

THE VISION OF ETHAN;

OR, "WE HAVE TEN PARTS IN DAVID."

By Mrs. G. Albert Rogers

(Author of "Britain in History," "The Coronation Stone," &c.).

Our almanacks this year register a fact of no small interest to all loyal Anglo-Israelites. It is one which has not been recorded in our history since England became a nation. It sent a thrill through many hearts when it was announced that one of the names bestowed upon our infant prince—the eventual heir to the throne of the House of Israel—was that of his royal ancestor, King David. It recalled the promise upon which God had long taught us to take our stand, "For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel." And it seemed as though the promise were thus accepted afresh by our royal house.

A revelation from God should be held in remembrance, for "I am the Lord; I change not: therefore"—and therefore only—"ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." It may be matter of question whether the Maschil of Ethan was written by David and delivered by him to Ethan, or whether it was given to him by Jehovah direct. The Vision given and declared in Psa. lxxxix. 19—37, its inspired contents, concern us who are of the House of Israel no less truly in these last days than they did Ethan the Ezrahite. Surely for our instruction was it said to him as to John in Patmos, "Write the things thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter."

What then, we should enquire, was the purport of this vision? An announcement is given in ver. 3 of a solemn covenant made by God Himself with David. But are we to take this grand promise in its literal signification, when it is manifest that the transgressions of both Israel and Judah moved the Lord to destroy them and to cast them out of the land? Truly, had this been a conditional covenant, it had long since been torn to shreds and its promises scattered to the four winds of heaven. But turn to this royal psalm—Israel's Magna Charta—and see how solemnly God binds Himself. Unlike a modern Act of Parliament, through which men tell us a coach and four may be driven, this ancient treaty, this irrevocable decree, was prepared and signed and sealed by God Himself, and "The writing which is written in the king's name and sealed with the king's ring may no man reverse."

> "It stands like the cerulean arch we see,
> Majestic in its own simplicity.'

Jehovah simply announces, "I have made a covenant with My chosen, I have sworn unto David My servant, Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations;" and it is at our peril if we disbelieve Him.

But you hesitate to accept its literal application to the seed of Judah's king, the "man after God's own heart." You say, "God forbid that I should question Jehovah's faithfulness to His word and oath, but if no descendant of David's royal house can be produced, how can he sit on David's throne? Again, Where should his throne be set up? For 1800 years Judah has had no certain dwelling-place, and even now she is bitterly persecuted and outcasted from lands in which she had sought shelter. How can we point to her country or nation? Are we to believe in an impossibility?" Nay, we ask you not to find the throne of Judah's nation, for the promise runs not thus. Turn to Jer. xxxiii. 17: "Thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of"—what?—"of the House of Israel." It is the House of Israel which we must seek and find, must recognise and acknowledge ere we can point out the faithfulness of our covenant-keeping God. It is impossible to study the 31st chapter of Jeremiah without seeing that in the purpose of God the virgin of Israel was to be pardoned and recalled, that they should come with weeping and supplications, and be led by Jehovah Himself; "for I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is My first-born."

When met, therefore, with the hackneyed Cui bono? is it not worth our while to study this subject, so as to be able to show to all objectors that David's line is now on the throne, and that our Ten-tribed House is the heritage over which his seed now rules? Until we can do this it is vain to proclaim that Jehovah's word cannot be broken. Even the faith of Ethan, which sings with such triumphant assurance in the first thirty-seven verses of this Maschil, seems almost to faint in view of passing trials, but we who have now seen God's word and oath to David—reiterated as it is in Jer. xxxiii. 19—26—fulfilled in its entirety, have no excuse for mistrust or doubt. Following, as this Maschil does in the arrangement of the Psalms, upon the sore anguish of a soul in darkness depicted in Psa. lxxxviii., it seems to say, "Take heart of grace, O child of Zion; thy God hath not forsaken thee." Look to the fulfilment of His promises to thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. Not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you. And now hearken to the covenant which He hath made with David His servant. He who cannot lie hath sworn that the seed of David shall be established for ever, and his throne, though the sins of Judah may remove it from the land, shall, notwithstanding, be built up to all generations. Judah's iniquity may exile both prince and people from Palestine, but in a place of God's appointment, impossible as it would then appear, David's throne should be re-established, not indeed over Judah, but over the long-scattered and now recalled House of Israel. In the person of his descendant, Queen Victoria, David is now reigning over the House of Israel, which God has in His faithfulness gathered together in these Isles of the West. "He hath said of David, "My covenant shall stand fast with him. . . . My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of My lips. His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me."

Take heart, then, sorrowing child of God. If He has so wondrously brought to pass the good things He promised to David His servant; if He has so guided and guarded the wandering House of Israel and brought them by unknown paths to this fair heritage; if He has by another path brought the daughter and heiress of the last king of Judah to these isles, and established her posterity upon the throne of Great Britain to rule over them, canst thou not trust Him with thy spiritual needs? Take heart, O mourning believer, grieving like Heman that the face of thy God is hidden from thee. Cling to Him in the darkness, and rest assured from "the majestic covenant Psalm" before us, penned perchance by another of Zerah's sons (1 Chron. ii. 6), or, if not, by one of the gifted trio, "Heman, Asaph, and Ethan" (1 Chron. xv. 19), that He who has proved faithful to His covenant with the House of David will never leave thee nor forsake thee.

RANDOM SHAFTS.

To those who are imperfectly acquainted with Our Identity a very strong reason against its probability is the altered complexion of society: the transformation in manners, language, and sentiment. The changes are more apparent than real, as enquirers would soon find, but changes there have undoubtedly been. That, however, is not only what might naturally be expected, but what has taken place over and over again in the history of nations. The ease and celerity with which one race can adopt the garb of another is shown by Norman annals, and in the checkered fortunes of Alsace-Lorraine we have a further example. After the Franco-Prussian war that territory was added to Germany, but, as the people were intensely French in their sympathies, the annexation was considered bad policy, and met with widespread disapprobation. The feelings of Alsatians fourteen years later are given by Miss Betham-Edwards in her introduction to Arthur Young's "Travels in France": "The sorrowful, indeed agonising clinging of born Alsatians to the mother country once witnessed can never be forgotten. . . . When spending an autumn in Alsace-Lorraine, five years ago, I found Mulhouse still a French town in every respect but name. 'We are more French than the French themselves,' was the universal sentiment of rich and poor, expressed without reserve in English hearing."

But the philosophic traveller whose diary Miss Betham-Edwards is here editing had explored the same provinces a century before her visit, and this is his testimony: "In Savern I found myself veritably in Germany. . . . Looking at a map of France, and reading histories of Louis XIV., never threw his conquest or seizure of Alsace into the light which travelling into it did; to cross a great range of mountains; to enter a level plain, inhabited by a people totally distinct and different from France, with manners, language, ideas, prejudices, and habits all different, made an impression of the injustice and ambition of such a conduct much more forcible than ever reading had done." So that in 1789 we have Young bewailing the transfer of Alsatians from Germany to France, because they are essentially German, while in 1884 Miss Betham-Edwards is regretting their transfer from France to Germany, because they are essentially French. And this metamorphosis, which turned Germans into Frenchmen, was accomplished in the course of a few decades, with the Fatherland alongside.

Music and the fine arts generally are affairs for which the Briton is supposed to have no instinct, but I have submitted on more than one occasion that this idea is mere fable, and confirmatory facts are not wanting. During the recent Purcell celebration it was pointed out that Handel had borrowed from him in a wholesale way, which is confessed by his German biographers; and if Handel was indebted to Purcell for his music, Germany is indebted to England for a good deal of its musical reputation. With regard to painting, the Art Journal for December contains a paper on Constable, who so influenced, or rather revolutionised, the French profession, in which the writer says: "It is singular indeed that a nation which is denounced as barbarous in matters of fine art should at intervals have produced poets and painters of world-wide renown, which their own countrymen have invariably delighted to *dis*honour! It is something against this to have sent forth a champion who has virtually divided the French landscape school, and, in addition, has founded the most fashionable and costly school of modern times." All this seems to indicate that the artistic element dwells in the British to as great an extent as in their neighbours, if not to a greater extent, but that a thousand years of wandering and strife had blunted or obscured it. The national character has not even yet entirely thrown off the roughening effects of that ordeal; and there would be no need to mourn if it never did.

What are the requisites in the training and capacities of curates? I used to be under the impression that God's Word was the subject of their closest study, and the furtherance of God's cause the object of their existence; but this conception has had to put up with a number of severe shakes. Their dislike of the Identity, coupled with their liking for lawn-tennis, was not a recommendation, and their amazing darkness on Biblical details led me to wonder how they employed their time when at college. Perhaps, said I, they burn the midnight oil over Greek and Latin, or practice the newest ritualistic pose. And they may do so, but evidently this does not exhaust their exertions, as one of them is advertising for a benefice in that eminently religious paper, The Field, his qualifications being that he is not simply 6 ft. high but an old 'Varsity Blue, an excellent shot and fisherman, and "thoroughly understands country life and sport in all its branches." This explains much, and is calculated to increase our faith in the judgment of curates on sport in all its branches, but it will not deepen our reverence for their interpretations of Scripture in any of its branches.

George Ebers has written two or three fine works of fiction dealing with ancient Egyptian history, prompted by the revelations of such as Petrie and Sayce. But he is himself an ardent investigator of those antiquities, and declares that our primitive medical recipe books, both English and German, owe to the Egyptians many of their quaint nostrums, in support of which he produces samples. To him this is exceedingly strange, and, it being difficult to see how they could have come into our possession, scientists are in no hurry to accept his "notion." Ebers, however, is confident, and, as any theory is better than none, he suggests that we obtained them through the school of Salerno, which may have handed them down from Coptic and Arabic translations. If the British are Israel, there is no necessity to fall back on a speculation of this kind, but the same failings which prevent people from believing in Dr. Ebers' discovery would no doubt incline Dr. Ebers to despise our Israelitish origin.

The pursuit of truth, whether it concerns Egypt or Israel, archæology or theology, demands a mind emptied of bias. Descartes could speak with authority, and he says: "When I set forth in the pursuit of truth I found that the best way was to reject everything I had hitherto received, and pluck out all my old opinions, in order that I might lay the foundation of them afresh, believing that by this means I should more easily accomplish the great scheme of life than by building on an old basis and supporting myself by principles that I had learned in my youth, without examining whether they were really true. . . . For if we would know all the truths that can be known, we must, in the first place, free ourselves from prejudices and make a point of rejecting those things which we have received until we have submitted them to a new examination." It may be hard to imitate Descartes, but, if this is not done, there can be no pursuit of truth, and no getting at it unless—as, fortunately, often is the case—the truth pursues us.

JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

SOWING THE SEED.

THE quotations from letters, under the above heading, included in the Report of the Anglo-Israel Distribution Fund, having been unavoidably crowded out when the New Year's Number of the BANNER was prepared for printing, are now put before our readers with much pleasure. First we turn in thought to where the heats of summer are now blazing in the Antipodes, we think of our friends who have been so eager to tell the wonderful story of Israel's preservation and revelation. The news has spread well in many districts, as our readers have already been informed, and now it is time to quote, as promised last month, from a letter that shows the good method of working followed by one of our Sowers in New Zealand. This may be instructive to others who may be as earnest, but have met with scant success.

"Our Association is flourishing. Our plan is to lend rather than to give literature, to offer reading matter at considerably under cost price, by inviting small subscriptions from several householders, who receive the literature in turn. The fact of having to pass it on from one to another excites a little curiosity, perhaps envy, amongst those who are out of the circle. They want to know what it is about; they find they can have the privilege at a very small cost in money and trouble. I respectfully throw out a hint not to dwell (in the first instance) overmuch on the Church aspect of the question. Beyond all doubt, if England be Ephraim, an important part of God's people, then the Church of England is—what it is not expedient to say to a Dissenter by way of urging him on to a study of the subject. When he has grasped it, then it is safe to say something about it. You may not make a Churchman of him, but if he was bitter against the Church before, you will greatly smooth his asperity. I used to correspond with a dear old Wesleyan, now dead, Mr. H. Farnell (a some time Sower for the A-I. D. Fund), a staunch Israelite. He told me that when he went to Auckland he generally went to one of our churches at least once on Sunday for the joy of joining publicly in the service, full as it is of Israel's claims and the promises to Israel.

"One clergyman has so far relented that he wishes to see some of our literature. The particular article that aroused his curiosity was Dr. Hanan's, on the succession promised to the Levitical priesthood (Jer. xxxiii.), that appeared in the BANNER OF ISRAEL. I have told you how we send round the BANNER and the Covenant People in four lists, or groups of people, comparatively conveniently placed as to residence. The question has come up for discussion several times what we would do with the old ones. I like to keep one file, but as to the rest the question is solving itself beautifully. At the nearest seaport, and also at a mining centre, there are sons and daughters of some of our members, themselves interested enough in the good news to wish to circulate it." In these places the papers of lists B. and C. go a fresh round, and others have an opening made for them in another district, where our Sower has "an old friend who is greatly interested in our origin, well up in his Bible," and he is striving a little to stir up others to read; and he adds, "I am daily expecting, or hoping, to hear of an Association being started. A few shillings have come from there to help our Association, always a good sign. Altogether I am very cheerful and hopeful at the progress we are making, but, above all, thankful for the glorious news from England." We thank our friend for his news, and hope it may encourage others in many places.

From India came the following warm expression of appreciation: "May God bless you for the weekly packet of the BANNER OF ISRAEL. I have four officers, regular readers. They look forward eagerly for the mail and my appearance. I have spoken to some of them about small donations to help to defray the expenses of the Distribution Fund, and so extend the work far and wide. To the devout student of Scripture the study of Our Identity affords ample food, as he searches the Scriptures and finds the faithfulness of our God towards His people. I have not a few of our soldiers, as well as outsiders, who are solemnly impressed by the truth. I never give away a paper indiscriminately. I pave the way by conversation, and admit only those who are really impressed and anxious to learn more. I shall thank you very much for more leaflets." This Sower, like others in India to whom we send, has grand opportunities for instructing many of the brave defenders of our Empire, and we should be glad, were it possible, to send them supplies that should have but small limit.

I see that the space at my disposal is rapidly reducing, but before closing I would mention the great pleasure the distributors of the A-I. D. Fund have had in receiving a kind note and very welcome donation from "three subscribers," readers of the BANNER OF ISRAEL, in Valparaiso. It is the first intimation we have had of the BANNER having penetrated thus far in South America. We rejoice to know of the wide flight, ever increasing, that this journal takes. One thing we would ask—that these Valparaiso friends who have noticed and interested themselves in our work, will let us have a name and address where we may send some other publications that probably they have not yet seen, and that may be very helpful to them and others who may be induced to read them, and earnestly we hope that the New Year may witness a still wider field for our distribution of literature than we have yet covered, and that there may be much sympathetic response from many more conscious Israelites in lands far away, and from those in our home fields, to enable us to sow the good seed without stint, for many a difficulty stands now before our people in various parts of the world, and a right understanding of the British Israel question would solve others, besides that burning one that has so disturbed Great Britain and the United States—Ephraim and Manasseh. Well may we pray to Him Who rules from above—"Let our nation wake up to a sense of its responsibilities and respond to Thy call."

THE BRITISH IN JOHANNESBURG AND THE BOERS IN THE TRANSVAAL.

THE problem which has been puzzling everybody in regard to the Boers in the Transvaal and the 60,000 British and other outsiders who occupy Johannesburg, within the territory of the Boers, is, How long is the existing state of things going to last? Evidently the 60,000 British residents have not been anxious to compel the Boers to do them justice, for otherwise it is inconceivable that with a distinct majority of 20,000 men on their side, the British should have been willing to submit to the usage they complain of, but take no steps to remedy. The Boers number about 40,000 to 50,000 souls, and occupy a country nearly the size of France. The British in a single town, Johannesburg, are a solid majority of 60,000, and yet have filled the papers with complaints of their sad lot living among the dominant minority, who have refused them all rights. The oppressed majority are increasing rapidly, and yet the Boers have trampled on them all with ease and impunity! Every month there land more than 2,000 immigrants at the Colonial ports, from all parts of the world, and most of these go to the Transvaal and settle down in Johannesburg as mining adventurers. The consequence is that the town, now a city, has grown during the last year enormously. The place is enlarging, and towns are rising in the suburbs to accommodate the increasing population. House rent varies from £8 to £30 per month! and a six-roomed house, with kitchen, commands a rent of £20 a month, or £240 a year! The Boer Government has made life as hard for these multitudes of Britons and others as they could. They have imposed so heavy a tax on imported food-stuffs that the prices of provisions are high enough to cause a famine. The Boers have done all they can to prohibit the import of goods by the Cape Railway, and have closed the Vaal River drifts for a time so as to prevent the import by the British of goods from the South. They have striven at the same time to force these imports to come by their own Delagoa line, and by the Netherlands Railway Company. Well may the people of Johannesburg be complimented on their patience with the Boer Government! The foreigner has long "submitted to be flouted," "he has been jeered at," and "almost spat upon"; but he has meekly borne it all, and has been submissive when M. Kruger, on the part of the Boer minority, has told the majority that the schools must be in Boer hands and the English children must be taught, if they want schooling at all, in the Dutch language!

This meekness in the British character, especially when exhibited in the garb of the rough miner, would be inexplicable if we were not to reflect that the gold-seekers' gains are so enormous that the population of Johannesburg has been willing to put up with any indignity so long as the Boers would only allow them to search for gold and leave them alone to attend to that one calling.

That the Boers are most ungrateful to the British and foreign community is a self-evident proposition. The British, now settled in the Transvaal, have brought nearly all the trade and prosperity it enjoys to the country. The whole burden of taxation is mainly borne by the English. Before the latter came, the state of the Transvaal was one of almost total bankruptcy. The British gave them an overflowing revenue and sound credit. Their exertions have enriched the Boers, who have kept all the emoluments of government in their own hands. The British miners are not only the majority of the population, but have a monopoly of "energy, enterprise, and education," while they have paid all the taxes and duties, they have had no share in the government of the land, but apparently have made no serious effort to obtain it!

The completion within the last few weeks of the Durban Railway into Pretoria and Johannesburg (in the Transvaal) is an event which must make the present crisis more acute than ever. The influx of British and other miners into the Transvaal will be soon greatly accelerated, and the day must arrive speedily when the multitudes of immigrants who refuse to become naturalised subjects of the Boer State and decline to abandon their British citizenship, will demand the franchise as a right and take their proper share of the government of a State which, after all, acknowledges the British Queen as its Suzerain. Whenever these events occur, there will be added another great province which will fall into line as a fresh member of the great British Empire, one of the South African States, united yet self-governing, which all together will at last be the predominant Power upon earth, holding it in trust for their Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, the rightful Sovereign of the globe, and imposing peace upon the other nations in His name. May that day soon arrive, and restore harmony and happiness to this distracted earth! Meanwhile it is a comfort to us to know that the British are Israel, and therefore the Lord's agents in this matter to bless the nations, and finally to restore peace to the inhabitants of the world. We see them carrying out this blessed work already, though in an imperfect way, but the testimony of men is, as we have often shown, that British rule makes generally for justice and equity towards the subject and allied races. Men therefore desire the continuance of the British domination, and acknowledge that this nation is "the one the Lord hath blessed" (Isa. lxi. 9, R.V.).

Thus far had we written when there was published in the London papers an announcement that an effort has been made by the British there to secure a Bill of Rights for the Transvaal "Uitlander."

At last then matters are coming to a crisis in the Transvaal, and the British settlers there have issued a Manifesto, dated Dec. 26th, claiming for "the Uitlander," or foreign settler, "substantial equality with the Boers within the territories of the Republic." The Manifesto demands "an equitable Franchise, and fair representation, the equality of the Dutch and English languages, responsible ministers, the removal of religious disabilities, independent courts, an efficient Civil Service, liberal education, and free trade in African products!" A National Union for the Transvaal has been established, and on the 6th Jan., 1896, it is proposed to bring these demands before a meeting of the Union that they may pass or reject them, and if they adopt them that they may furnish to the National Union a definite "mandate" whereon action may be taken and the objects desired carried into operation. The Manifesto concludes thus: "We shall expect an answer in plain terms, according to your deliberate judgment at the meeting to be held on January 6th." The object arrived at is stated to be "the establishment of a Republic as a true Republic under a Constitution approved by the whole people."

Matters have come, it seems, to the long-foreseen issue. The British settlers are the great majority of the population, and these, joined by immigrants of other nationalities, now demand that while they have furnished the wealth, the taxes, and the bone and sinew of the country, they shall have a voice in its government, have a share in its representation, and no longer be ignored by the small minority of Boers, who are outnumbered by the British and European population in the ratio of more than three to one. The Boers are 40,000 in all, but the British Uitanders number, we are informed, over 130,000! The question is only one of time. If the Boers do not yield with a good grace now (as is probable), they must sooner or later do so. They cannot expect to find a British, high-spirited population, who are ready to submit for the sake of peace to great indignities and injustice, to remain so always. The Boers have treated the Uitlanders shamefully in the past, and the time for a change has arrived at last. The strain, it appears, can be borne no longer. The settlers have been denied by the Boers a fairly efficient police in their towns. The mining population of British and other nationalities have asked for the appointment of qualified mining inspectors. The Boers have refused. The English-speaking members of the people requested that State Schools might be provided for their children; but the Boers, who use British money to support the State Schools, refused instruction in any but the Dutch language. Thereupon the British settlers have resolved to provide for the teaching of 5,000 children in their own schools, 5,000 more being under instruction in their own homes. These being, as described above, intolerable troubles and disabilities, the matter is now to be brought to an issue, on the 6th January, unless the Boers yield at once, or proceed in the hopeless effort to put down by force their troublesome Uitlanders (the majority being British), who are clamouring for their "Bill of Rights," and mean to have it!

Majuba Hill is indeed revenged, and the Lord has given His people, indirectly, a victory, as we hope it will be, which will once for all set matters right, absorb the Boer population into the British, and so establish a British-Boer Republic, as one of the British federation of States under the Crown of Israel of the Isles, in South Africa.

There is, of course, another aspect to this question, and authorities on the Uitlander side are of opinion that the latter, if they should resort to armed force, could not withstand the Boers, who are organised and well supplied with Maxim guns, whereas the Uitlanders have no weapons and would be exposed to attack in Johannesburg, a town the Boers could easily surround. The matter will probably be settled before we can go to press, and we must leave it to Him who will decide for Israel according to the right.

THE SIGNS OF THE NEAR APPROACH OF THE "END OF THE AGE."

THE Venerable Dr. Hughes-Games, of Hull, has lately been preaching on the subject of "The End of the Age," and its near approach. The heads of his discourse were published in the Daily Mail, of Hull, on November 2nd, and are quoted below. The report was as follows:—

"The Ven. Dr. Hughes-Games delivered a sermon last night in Holy Trinity Church, Hull, in the course of which he gave his opinion on the great Eastern problem. He said 'the end of the world' meant the end of the age, and not the end of this terrestrial globe. The destruction of Jerusalem was the end of the Mosaic dispensation, and the present dispensation would, he thought, probably close with the second siege of Jerusalem. They could not doubt that now they had approached a crisis in the world's history. Many of God's people were asking, 'Is the end near?' The subject of the prophecy then was one of deep moment, and especially to the people of God. Amongst the

were the political signs. One of these was the present condition of the Jews. They ruled the finances of the world; they are professors in universities out of all proportion to their numbers; they are the healthiest and most vigorous race in the world; and they are regarded with more consideration to-day than they have been. No solution of the present Eastern problem is more probable than that Palestine will be handed over to the Jews. Every other nation would be jealous of any other possessing Palestine, and nothing is more probable than that they would agree, as a solution of the Turkish difficulty, to hand Palestine over to the Jews. The Jews are there already in great numbers. The fact that they are ceasing to be trodden down by the Gentiles is an indication that these times are nearly completed. Then, the ending of the Mohammedan rule is compared to 'the drying up of a river.' They knew that for the last seventy years the Mohammedan power had been gradually decaying. Any day they might hear of that power coming to an end. It is the great thing in our papers every day—that

"APPROACHING DISSOLUTION OF THE TURKISH POWER.

Now there are clear signs in Christendom. The Roman Empire was succeeded by the Romish Church. It has uttered great boastings and blasphemies against the Most High, and it was weakened by the Reformation. It has been silently decaying in influence ever since. In the hundred years ending 1886, while Roman Catholics only increased twofold in the world, Protestants increased fourfold. The Great Apostasy is decaying, and its final destruction is made contemporaneous with the Marriage Supper of the Lamb. Another sign is the general corruption of morals. Externally, no doubt, there is more decency in society, but it is as a skin covering a festering sore. Selfishness and luxury prevail. Are we not always boasting of our achievements—our power over nature and our scientific knowledge and diffusion of culture? Besides, children are not so respectful or as they used to be. Then, was there ever a time when people of all classes so sought after pleasure as they do to-day. But one of the most remarkable signs of the coming of the end of the age is being fulfilled in our own time. 'Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.' When was there so much locomotion as in our days? When was there ever a greater diffusion of literature? 'The Gospel must first be preached in all the world, and then shall the end come.' Surely this is in course of fulfilment? Yes; the end of the age cannot be very distant. For my part, I do not see how things can go on much longer as they are. Depend upon it, the end is near at our doors. We may not see it, yet our children most probably will; and we can only hope to bring about the fulfilment of one of the prophecies, and that is the making of the Gospel known amongst all nations."

We are not going for a moment to deny that the signs of the times support the Venerable Doctor in his view thus propounded. We see with him that the Turkish Empire is rapidly approaching its allotted period of dissolution. There are symptoms, which all perceive, that by gross misgovernment, by cruelty to his Christian subjects, the Sultan is bringing about his own destruction as the ruler of an empire.

The Papacy, too, is, save in this favoured land of Protestantism and Bible light, gradually wasting away. Vice and ungodliness are rife in all directions under the surface, even in our midst, in this "favoured land." There are indications also as to movements among the Jews, and re-settlements by them in the Holy Land, which at first sight lead men to come to the conclusion that, there being no Israelites in existence but the Jews, they must be the sole heirs of God's Palestine, and that the future will see them placed in possession of the whole country as their own. But Dr. Hughes-Games ought to know as one learned in the Scriptures, that whatever he may think about it, God's plan for the restoration of the Jews is quite different from the one he has sketched out. They are not to return to the inheritance alone. Only one-thirteenth of the land is for them, as Ezek. xlviii. 7 teaches us. In their return they will be accompanied by the Ten Tribes of Israel, then a mighty, very multitudinous, Christian nation, who, taking Judah (or the Jews) under their wing, will go back with them to the land and settle down there with them. Eleven-thirteenths of the territory will be theirs. One-thirteenth will be Judah's, and the remaining thirteenth will be God's, for service, and for the holy temple worship yet to be. Hos. i. 10, 11, Jer. iii. 18, Isa. xviii. 1—7, with Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28, and xlviii., sketch out the plan with many details which we greatly wonder how the learned doctor has totally overlooked. If he will only consider the matter he will certainly see that the House of Israel is before the world detected to-day, doing her appointed work as the messenger for God to all the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth, not omitting their kinsmen the Jews; blessing them, benefitting them, in every imaginable way; giving them the Bible and the Gospel, civilisation and Christianity, abolishing the idols and bringing peace and prosperity to the nations.

The British race answers to the portrait which the Scriptures furnish of Israel in every iota, and not one is lacking. Why has Dr. Hughes-Games passed Israel by, and refused to recognise the nation which is the pivot race in God's hands, among the rest, whom He has abundantly endowed with all the good things He promised to "Israel, His people," in the days of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, followed by all the prophets of the Lord who have given their testimony since?

We believe, however, with Dr. Hughes-Games, that the fall of the Turkish Empire is preparing; and that events which are now taking place will probably lead to its disruption within a few years. The Armenian atrocities are merely an incident preparing the way. The origin of these, of course, is the hatred ever existing between Mohammedans and Christians, which shows itself where the paramount power is not strong enough to put it down. In Armenia not only is there no such power fitted and ready to act (as in India), but the close neighbourhood of Russia, which has all to gain by provocations from Mussulmans, justifying interference, makes it always possible that outbreaks may be looked upon with some kind of favour from that quarter. The difficulty in respect to the troubles in Christian Armenia is, of course, the fact that geographically the country is completely cut off from European help, and is only open to assistance in case of need from the direction of the Russian Empire which has already absorbed the northern portion of Armenia.

The Sultan being unable or unwilling (or both) to put down the ill-treatment and gross misgovernment of his Christian subjects, the danger will arise when one of the nations of Europe—say, Russia,—breaks off from the present condition of European concert and resolves to apply the remedy by the protection or annexation of the persecuted country. That would be the signal for the violent disruption of the Turkish Empire, and for its partition among the Christian Governments, each of whom desires to acquire a portion of the spoils.

The well-known passage in Ezek. xxiv. 14 seems to show, however, that the Lord means "to lay His vengeance upon Edom"—if Edom be Turkey (?)—"by the hand of His people Israel," and "they shall do in Edom according to His anger and His fury."

It would seem, then, that the British will strike the blow which will be followed by the frightful catastrophe which is the subject of Rev. xvi. 18. From a qualified source we learn that there have been at least 35 massacres in Armenia lately, involving the loss of no less than 17,670 Christian lives by deliberate murder. Other accounts place the totals at 40,000. But, allowing for exaggeration, the figure first named is terrible enough. The case is appalling, however, when it is remembered that no Mussulman has been brought to justice for these butcheries, and that for the future no preventive force can be brought to bear against the Mussulman population and soldiery, who are the guilty parties, from outraged Europe, unless it be the Russian, to be quickly followed in other directions by Austria and Greece, and, shall we add the British-Israelites, who are as nations each resolved, if Turkey is to fall, and be dismembered, that certain territories well known and certain "Gates," named in prophecy perhaps, must be allotted to the proper heirs, but not otherwise. The matter is, however, in God's hands, and we had better leave it there, and praise Him for His past gracious care of us His chosen people.

BRITISH SETTLERS IN THE TRANSVAAL AND THEIR GRIEVOUS COMPLAINTS AGAINST THE BOERS.

In the Critic of August 23rd last, published in Johannesburg and Pretoria, we have to notice a remarkable document purporting to be "A Petition to Queen Victoria," in which the British portion of the population lay their grievances at the feet of the British throne. There are many statements in this document which will excite a good deal of surprise among us, not only that the petitioners bear their sufferings and disabilities so patiently, but that the Boers and their Government can be so blind to their own interests as to treat so great a multitude of Britons as they do, knowing as they must how impatient that race always is of anything like political injustice or oppression.

In the first place, it appears, that in the Transvaal there are now about 70,000 British subjects as against some 40,000 or 50,000 of all other nationalities, of whom many are suffering from disabilities of a nature like those of the British. The latter have an interest in the country amounting to some three-fourths of the whole: and the revenue of the country is almost all paid by the British section of it. The British majority are heavily taxed by the Boer minority to pay not the legitimate and necessary expenses of Government, but these are being hoarded by the Boer minority in order to benefit themselves, and also to injure the British majority. The latter are being also denied the use of their own vernacular, English, though the use of that was guaranteed to them in the London Convention.

The petition speaking of the franchise and the inability of the British to take part in the government of the country, add that the offer to the "new comer" is generally this, as made by the Boers:—"Two years after you arrive here, you may, after observing certain formulæ, taking the oath expressly repudiating all allegiance to your former Sovereign, and receiving a certificate of character from your landdrost, become naturalised. Two years after becoming naturalised, you may become eligible, if you are over thirty, as a member of the second raad. Ten years after becoming eligible for the second raad, you may become entitled to full burgher rights, if the first Volksraad decide, on your application, to grant them." Thus the "new comer" cannot obtain burgher right before he is forty years of age, and even then his obtaining them depends upon the raad to give or refuse them. The "newcomers" being British subjects and unwilling to become naturalised Boers, and yet resolved to stay where they are on account of their mining pursuits, are in a dire strait. If they wish for their rights, it appears, they must, to succeed, conquer them by taking up arms. They are unwilling to do that if those rights can be obtained by peaceful means. They appeal, therefore, to their Queen and fellow-subjects in Great Britain to interfere and secure for them what they desire—namely, the power to take their due share in governing the country, by virtue of their majority, and in accordance with just and equal laws. One or two clauses of the petition are important, and place the position of the complainants very clearly before the world. We quote them thus; they said:—

"There would appear to be but one course open to us. The vast majority of the newcomers are, according to the report of the British Resident at Pretoria, British subjects. We are here by the international right of free selection of residence, a right which, by international usage, brings with it, in every civilised country in the world, the power to obtain absorption into the citizenship of the country selected for abode on reasonable terms.

"The newcomers into this country are so overwhelmingly the majority of its whole population, our interests are so overpoweringly the dominant interests in the country, and are of a nature so foreign to the character and comprehension of the older population that it is absolutely impossible for us to allow the older population the sole say in the direction of this country's affairs without the very gravest detriment to our said interests, to the real progress of the country, and to the mass of foreign shareholders interested with us in this country; or without a neglect of the obligations laid on us by our position as the most powerful section of this State, which would make us, rather than the Boers, answerable for the evils resulting from the acquiesced-in situation.

"We are bound by every moral law, by every claim of self-interest, to agitate against the existing false position of this State, until we obtain that it be placed on the historic and economically proved basis of "no taxation without representation." The peculiarity of our position here not only places a powerful means of agitation at our disposal, but forces us—by the refusal of the Boers to listen to any representations made by us on the desirability of arriving at a mutual understanding without outside interference—to turn to it as our natural and legalised last resort. . . .

"We have tried hitherto to become burghers of the Transvaal on the lines of the Boer constitution, trusting to work reforms in this State from within. It is now time that we assert ourselves purely and simply as a body of some seventy thousand British subjects resident in a State in vassalage to the British Crown, and claim protection of our natural rights and interests at the hands of Great Britain; to the obtaining, through the influence of Great Britain, some compromise between the majority, or British section of the inhabitants of this country, and the minority, or Boer section, to their joint interest and the fair guarantee of their several rights.

"It is a further open secret that the utterances of Sir Hercules Robinson, at Pretoria, revealed that Great Britain is fully prepared to intervene on our behalf when appealed to by us so to do."

When it is considered that the British subjects in the Transvaal are in the proportion of two to one to the Boers, that they pay nine-tenths of the revenue of their adopted state, that without them the Transvaal would speedily be bankrupt as on a previous occasion, and that the active, intelligent, powerful, body of Britons are simply trodden down by half their number of ignorant Boers, we wonder at their self-restraint and anticipate for such a state of things a sudden and disastrous change in respect to the Boer element. The petitioners put their case with much self-restraint, but they cannot make it stronger than they do in their opening statement. They say :—

"We have now for the second time approached the representatives of the older population of this State. We have laid before them each time with a more overwhelming proof of our numbers and importance, but each time with a scrupulous regard for the forms required by their existing laws and constitution, the plain and incontrovertible fact that we are a large, powerful, consolidated and phenomenally increasing body, that we are now permanently established in this country and already form two-thirds of its population, that we have saved the State from bankruptcy, have raised it to the position of the first gold-producing country in the world, and are now paying nine-tenths of its total revenue. We have pointed out that for the entire political power of the State to be in the hands of the less educated minority—a minority whose hold on the country is constantly diminishing—to the perpetual exclusion of the majority of its inhabitants—a majority to whom the country owes its present well-being and the assurity of its future—is to leave the peace and security of the whole State on an absolutely false and unsound basis, and to prevent the legislation and administration of the country being conducted with due regard to the needs and claims of the larger but unrepresented portion of the community.

"Our representations were met last year with open ridicule and derision, and replied to by an accentuation of our disabilities, which made our acquirement of the franchise practically a permanent impossibility."

Believers in Our Identity will view the facts of this case with great interest, and will joyfully wonder at the way in which our God is working out His purposes in the Transvaal to our nation's advantage. Seventy thousand British subjects are put under great pressure by half their number of Boers, whose case is perfectly hopeless. The British numbers are incessantly increasing, that of the Boers is stationary. British States are forming all round the Transvaal, and presently the Boers will be completely stifled with the pressure of British influence, power, and population. Without war or a single blow struck in anger, this problem is likely to be solved and another immense province (once British, but insanely thrown away by a late Prime Minister of England) will be peacefully, and finally incorporated with Her Majesty's dominions. The progress of these events is simply marvellous, and we can but stand by, and, watching for the coming crisis, lift up our voices and with one accord praise the Lord for His faithfulness to His people Israel.

Since the above was written, Dr. Jameson's foolish raid has precipitated events which will force the hands of the Boers. Jameson failed; but the just claims of the British must be conceded at last in spite of his failure.

In our next number we shall publish an article giving Lieut. Totten's views on the Difficulties that have arisen between Great Britain and America.

RIGHTLY DIVIDING THE WORD OF TRUTH.

By Douglas A. Onslow.

PART III.

The contention of British-Israelites is, that St. Paul, in his argument throughout Rom. iv., and especially in verse 16, is not making a distinction between Abraham's seed according to the flesh, and Abraham's so-called seed according to the Spirit, i.e., between his carnal children and his so-called spiritual children; but that the apostle is distinguishing between the circumcised seed the Jews, still under the law, called the circumcision, and those who were known as the uncircumcision, the Ten-tribed division of the Israelite race, who, centuries before his time, had been divorced from the law and covenants; and who,—though by Christ's death and resurrection they had been redeemed from the curse of the law, and recovenanted in Him through the bringing in of the new covenant—were still known and written of as the uncircumcision. It is the same distinction we contend for, between Judah and Israel, which runs through the whole Bible from the days of Rehoboam onwards until to-day.

The former (the Jews) rejected Christ; depending for their salvation on the performance of their works, under the law, and claimed hiership, to Abraham's, and the father's promises, by virtue of that title and their own righteousness. The whole argument of the apostle is to show these self-righteous Jews that, without the righteousness of Christ, imputed to them through faith in Him, the mere fact of their being Abraham's children would not give them a title to the heirship of the promises. But acknowledging Christ they attain the heirship, as we read in Gal. iii. 29, "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."

In Rom. iv. 18, we read of the result of Abraham's faith. "Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, so shall thy seed be." To find out the circumstances, and the occasion under which this was spoken, we go back to Gen. xv. 2—6, "And Abram said, Lord God, what wilt Thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? And Abram said, Behold, to me Thou hast given no seed; and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir. And, behold, the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, This shalt not be thine heir; but he that shall come forth OUT OF THINE OWN BOWELS shall be thine heir. And He brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now towards heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and He said unto him, so shall thy seed be." If these verses do not most absolutely and conclusively link the promise of the multitudinous seed of Abraham, not only with him, but also with him that should "come forth out of his own bowels," and who alone is to be counted Abraham's heir, then it becomes impossible to comprehend the Word, and it may be made to mean anything which ingenious men, by specious sophistry make it to mean, especially when not content with sophistical reasoning, they both add to, and take from it.

But, to continue with St. Paul's argument, and clench the nail in the coffin of the spiritual seed theory, let us finish Rom. iv., and teach our rev. opponent his lesson thoroughly. "And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet THE DEADNESS OF SARAH'S WOMB; he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being fully persuaded that, what He had promised, He was able also to perform. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness."

But St. Paul teaches this same lesson in another part of his Epistle to the Romans, for we read in chap. ix., "Not as though the Word of God hath taken none effect. For they are not all Israel which are of Israel; neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children: but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and SARAH SHALL HAVE A SON. And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac. . . . It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated" (verses 6—13). From the foregoing we learn, first, that not all the sons or lineal descendants of Jacob are entitled to the appellation of Israel. Next, that not all the children of Abraham are counted for the seed—that is, Ishmael's descendants—and the sons of Keturah are not included in the covenant, "But the children of the promise are counted for the seed." This most assuredly must mean that the inheritors of the promises, made under oath to Abraham, who are to be counted "for the seed" or his legitimate heirs, must be descended from the son of promise born of Sarah, and that by natural descent. Will it be contended that Sarah was to be the mother of a spiritual seed, as it is contended that Abraham is the father of a spiritual seed? If not, what of Sarah's children descended through Isaac and Jacob? Are they to give place to Abraham's spiritual seed? But, as if to make assurance doubly sure, the apostle goes on, "And not only this," and immediately introduces Rebecca on the scene. Thus the whole fabric of the spiritual seed theory of inheritance is swept away by the apostle himself, and justifies us in classing it as a "strong delusion" of modern times.

If this does not settle the question of the descent from Abraham and the spiritual seed notion, nothing will. But it does, for the very essence of Abraham's faith, referred to above in Rom. iv., is that he believed that God would give him a son who should come forth from his own bowels, and also be born of Sarah his wife, notwithstanding the fact that she was long past the age of child-bearing. And this promised son, promised to them both under conditions that were altogether contrary to nature, was alone to be heir to the promises, and to him alone, and his direct lineal descendant, Jacob, and his children and children's children, naturally born, was the everlasting covenant confirmed.

The apostle demonstrates in the most unmistakable manner possible that the heirship to the promises is to carnal seed and not a so-called spiritual seed; for if he had been contending for a spiritual seed of Abraham, what possible reason would there have been for making reference to Abraham's "own body now dead, . . . neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb"? How could either Abraham's or Sarah's inability naturally to have children, affect the question of an alleged spiritual seed, who, according to the arguments of those who uphold this view, might spring from anybody and everybody, other than those two?

In order that there may be no mistake, for those who rely upon what the Scriptures say, as to who the people are that are the inheritors of the promises and who seek the imputed righteousness of Christ, let us look to Isa. li., and if that chapter does not, throughout, treat of Israel after the flesh, then there is no understanding Scripture. "Hearken to Me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord: Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged. Look unto Abraham your FATHER, and unto SARAH THAT BARE YOU: for I called him alone, and blessed him, and increased him. For the Lord shall comfort ZION: He will comfort all her waste places . . . Hearken unto Me, My people; and give ear unto Me, O MY NATION," &c. (vers. 1—4). The marginal reference to "Ye that follow after righteousness" takes us to Rom. ix. 30—32, and we find that it is the Gentiles "who have attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith," and Isaiah (chap. li.) tells us that these people are the children of "Sarah that bare" them, as well as of Abraham their "father"; certainly not a spiritual father, for Abraham had Isaac the son "of promise" born of Sarah his wife, in the ordinary course of nature. The marginal reference to "Look unto Abraham" takes us to Rom. iv. 1, 16. Verse 16 of Rom iv. is the one relied upon by our D.D. opponent for proof that his spiritual-seed theory is correct, but Isaiah destroys it "root and branch," for it is Zion that the Lord comforts, and Zion's children are Sarah's children, who are NOT a spiritual seed.

But the same people who are commanded to "Hearken to Me," are also addressed as "O MY NATION." The only two families, two kingdoms, or two nations that the Lord recognises as His, throughout the whole of Scripture, are the nation of Judah and the nation of the House of Israel. Now we have it on the undisputed authority of St. Paul that the nation of Judah had "not attained to the law of righteousness," but that the Gentiles had attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith. Consequently the "nation" of Isa. li. 4, not being the nation of Judah, MUST have been the nation of the House of Israel.

I have thus carefully and critically considered the learned doctor's alleged "fatal objection" to the views put forth by the writers of "British-Israel Truth," and I venture to think I have most effectually disposed of it. If I have succeeded in doing this, and shown in the course of my arguments that our belief in the descent of the Anglo-Saxon people from Jacob is no "strong delusion," but a perfectly legitimate faith, founded upon the Scriptures of both the Old and New Testament, then we cannot be accused of diverting men's minds "from the great and fundamental doctrines of grace." I have shown that the man who accuses us of doing this has not rightly divided "the Word of Truth," but can only maintain his arguments by adding to and taking from that sacred Word, and if by so doing he has brought himself under the condemnation of Prov. xxx. 6, he has only himself to blame.

JACOB'S TROUBLE.

By A. H.

SUCH attacks on Our Identity-belief as those made by Things to Come, and other like opponents, must necessarily greatly hinder the spread of our views, which we, for our part, earnestly desire to extend as rapidly as possible to the glory of God. Now the Scriptures tell us, that "His word shall not return to Him void, but shall accomplish that which He pleases." It is not said that it shall accomplish that which Anglo-Israelites please, or that which any other party, or people, or Church, may please, but what God shall please. Now, if Our Identity should spread as fast as everyone of us would like, and if it became universally known and accepted, say in a couple of weeks' time, it may be taken for granted that in a year at furthest all the world "would acknowledge us that we are the seed which the Lord hath blessed," being "the Israel of God" (Isa. lxi. 9; Gal. vi. 16).

But it is quite evident that the Lord does not appear in quite so much haste! Events according to His plan transpire quietly one after the other. We read of "a time of trouble" yet to come called "Jacob's trouble." As Anglo-Israelites, we are sure that that time of trouble will be experienced by our nation. We think that we may conclude that that "trouble" will arise through the "gathering together" of the Gentile nations of the earth, against ourselves. Should the fact of Our Identity with Israel be fully understood and accepted by the bulk of our people, as well as by our Government and Legislators, how would it be possible for "Jacob" to feel "troubled" or anxious about the matter, seeing that God has promised that "Jacob" shall be saved out of it? also seeing that He has engaged, when the nations shall gather together, against Israel, as they surely shall do and will (Isa. liv. 15, R.V.), but not by Him, "whosoever shall gather together against thee, shall fall because of thee."

Possibly, then, while God does not wish us to slacken our efforts in trying to spread abroad this His glorious truth, yet, at the same time, He permits the opposition (which He will take care to keep in proper bounds) lest the prediction of the "trouble" be not fulfilled to our people, and thus in one matter, at least, the Scriptures should be broken, which our Lord emphatically tells us, cannot possibly be. Our subject is full of comfort, in whichever way we view it, and while we see that sin is what God hates, and will invariably punish, it is deep consolation to know that Israel's sin has been visited on Jesus, the Captain of their salvation, who has been made sin for them that they and all who believe on Him may become the righteousness of God in Him (2 Cor. v. 21, R.V.). To the Lord be all the praise!

THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN ISRAEL AND JUDAH.

By W. H. Larkins, Lieut.-Col.

PART I.

So much has been said and written on this subject that I need hardly go into this matter any further than is necessary to set forth the various titles given to the two Houses of Israel and Judah respectively, by which they may be known. Moreover, to show that this distinction is maintained between Judah and Benjamin, even after the separation of the latter from the House of Israel to which it belongs.

The division of the rights of primogeniture by the patriarch Jacob was the first step taken, pointing, at some future period, to the separation of the Twelve Tribes into two Houses (Gen. xlix.). At a later date, in a dispute that took place between the men of Ephraim and the men of Judah, we have indications of the dimensions of these two Houses: Ephraim claiming ten parts in their king, leaving only two to Judah (2 Sam. xix. 43). This is precisely what became a reality at the death of Solomon, when the kingdom was taken from Rehoboam, his son, and given to Jeroboam, a servant of Solomon. Of the Ten Tribes promised to Jeroboam he was to give one to Rehoboam, in order "that David My servant may always have a light before Me in Jerusalem" (1 Kings xi. 30—36). So that Jeroboam had nine tribes which formed "the kingdom or the House of Israel" (Hos. i. 4) or Samaria. This title is not to be met with elsewhere, but at the same time it is a very appropriate one, inasmuch as it was made up of tribes belonging to the House of Israel. The prophet Hosea may possibly have given it this designation in order to distinguish it from the Twelve-tribed, kingdom of Israel. To speak of this kingdom as a Ten-tribed kingdom, as it is sometimes styled, appears to me to be a mistake and misleading, for never during its existence did it consist of more than nine tribes. If, on the other hand, Manasseh is counted as a tribe to make up the ten, then you make the number of the tribes thirteen in place of twelve. Manasseh, however, is never counted as a tribe, except in some instances to take the place of the Levites, and on one occasion that of Dan, so as to retain the original number of the tribes at twelve (Num. xiii. 11; Josh. xiv. 4; Rev. vii. 5).

It will be observed that in neither case does "the House" and "the kingdom" of that House correspond, for in the one we have a Ten-tribed House, with a nine-tribed kingdom; and in the other a two-tribed House, with a three-tribed kingdom. Benjamin was the tribe of the House of Israel, which was given to Rehoboam for a special divine purpose already referred to. It formed a part of the kingdom of Judah, but was never incorporated in the House, "and when the object for which this tribe was lent to Rehoboam was accomplished, Benjamin, with the other Christian Hebrews, separated itself from Judah, and thus broke the brotherhood between Judah and Israel" (Zech. xi. 14).

There are various names by which the two Houses of Israel and Judah may be known respectively. As regards the former there are only two that can be relied upon as exclusively applying to that House—namely, "the House of Joseph and Ephraim." All the others, as regards their meaning, must be decided by the context. For instance, "Israel" sometimes applies to the Twelve Tribes (1 Kings ii. 11); sometimes to the Ten Tribes (1 Kings xii. 16), and in some instances to the two-tribed House of Judah, the Jews (Rom. ix. 31; x. 1 and 21). The same may be said of "All Israel." Sometimes it applies to the Twelve Tribes (1 Kings xi. 42); sometimes to the Ten Tribes (1 Kings xii. 1, 18, 21). The "House of Israel" is the name by which the Ten Tribes are more commonly and generally known; but the prophet Ezekiel, unlike the other prophets, calls the House of Judah by this name. Why he does so is one of those questions which it is not in our power to explain. That he does so is nevertheless a fact, although your correspondent, Miss Pearse, seems to doubt it. Let your correspondent just referred to, or anyone else, take the "House of Israel" in Ezek. xvii. 3, and see if it will admit of any other application than to the "House of Judah." In verse 2 the prophet is told to "speak a parable unto the House of Israel." Then follows the parable giving in figurative language a true picture of the captivity of Jehoiachin, King of Judah (verses 3—8). In ver. 12, Ezekiel is told to say to "the rebellious House," "Know ye not what these things mean?" Then the prophet proceeds to explain them.

Now, in both these verses the same people are addressed. In the one as "the House of Israel," and in the other "the rebellious House," which applies always to the House of Judah. So that the context clearly shows that in verse 2 Ezekiel calls the House of Judah by the title of "the House of Israel."

If this was the case in one instance, why not in others? for it must be remembered that the prophet had had to deal with the House of Judah and one tribe of the House of Israel (Benjamin). He could not address the latter as the House of Judah, because Benjamin did not belong to that House, but as they were all "children of Israel," the title of "the House of Israel" might be taken as embracing both Houses; more especially as we find this title applied to the Twelve Tribes. For instance, when it was said of David that he should never want a man "to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel," Jeremiah clearly referred to the Twelve-tribed Kingdom (Jer. xxxiii. 17). Again, the angel Gabriel told the Virgin Mary her Son should sit upon the throne of His father David, and reign over the House of Jacob (or Israel) for ever (Luke i. 33). Here, again, the Twelve-tribed Kingdom is referred to. If this is applied to the Twelve Tribes, and also to the Ten, then why should it not be also applicable to the three tribes that went into captivity to Babylon?

"THEY THAT DWELL UNDER HIS SHADOW SHALL RETURN."

A MISSIONARY from India dealing with this text (Hos. xiv. 5, R.V.), in our hearing lately, admitted that the passage referred to "Israel restored." He quoted ver. 1 in proof: "O Israel, return unto the Lord thy God: for thou hast fallen by thine iniquities. Take with you words and return unto the Lord." Having admitted thus much, the preacher proceeded to apply the whole passage to "spiritual Israel," and arrived at the point that the verse quoted above is the privilege of every believer, wherever he may be, and that it is their's "to revive as the corn and blossom as the vine," and their fruit is from the Lord. In a sense, of course, it is true that the believer shares with the remnant of Israel all her spiritual blessings even now. But the question is whether the text, which was a message to Israel, restored to God's favour, can be diverted to "spiritual Israel," whoever they may be, or how the interpretation proposed can explain the text that "they that dwell under Israel's shadow" (the true believer's shadow?) "shall return." How can the believer "return" to the Lord, when he or she has never been to the Lord, or dwelt with Him, before? We fall into all these difficulties the moment we discard the plainly-expressed meaning of the prophecy, and put upon it a fanciful meaning which the Holy Spirit does not sanction. The address is to Israel, described by the Lord as Ephraim in ver. 8. "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?"

In the context, the glories of Ephraim-Israel's restored condition are described. Their blessings are connected with enlargement, blossoming and budding, and the filling the face of the earth with fruit. "His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon." It is of these favoured ones that it is written: "They that dwell under His shadow shall return: they shall revive as the corn, and blossom as the vine; the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon." Who are these that dwell under the shadow of Ephraim-Israel—who are "to return," and revive, and blossom, and shed forth a sweet-smelling savour to the glory of the Lord? They are clearly Israel's companions, living with them under banishment from Palestine, and destined to "return" there with them, according to Isa. xviii. 1—7, Jer. iii. 18, Hos. i. 11, and Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28.

In Israel's case, the "return" is evidently first a return in the spiritual sense of "repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xx. 21). Verses 1, 2, of Hos. xiv. show us that. When the House of Israel becomes "Israel obedient," the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land the Lord has given for an inheritance to their fathers (Jer. iii. 18). This is the return in the literal and physical sense to the Holy Land, which is promised to those who "dwell under the shadow" of Ephraim. These must be the House of Judah, who have, prior to the return, to "walk to the House of Israel," as they have done in measure for some time past to these shores, and will do so more and more, till the set time for the restoration of the tribes shall have arrived. Then the idolatry of British-Israel will cease, and they shall say, "What have I any more to do with idols?" Their repentance is heard and seen by the Lord, who assures His suppliants that "from Him is their fruit found." "Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? Prudent, and he shall know them? For the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them: but transgressors shall fall therein." To the Lord be all the praise!

ASSYRIA, SYRIA, AND ISRAEL.

By Rev. T. Rosling Howlett,
Author of "Anglo-Israel."

THE Assyrians were the ancestors of the Syrians and the Israelites. The Syrians and Israelites were not only neighbours, but relations. The migrations of the former from the East were contemporary with that of Abraham to Palestine. They were both of Assyrian origin, as the sacred records clearly show. Thither the servant of Abraham went to obtain a wife for the son of his master, because Abraham would not have Isaac marry a woman belonging to an alien race. He said to his faithful servant: "Thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites among whom I dwell; but thou shalt go unto my country and take a wife unto my son Isaac" (Gen. xxiv. 3, 4). He there found the daughter of Bethuel, Abraham's nephew, the beautiful Rebekah, who became Isaac's wife. Her son Jacob became the husband of the daughters of her brother Laban, Leah and Rachel, "which two did build the House of Israel" (Ruth iv. 11).

These facts are of particular interest to us, because it now transpires that the Syrians were the progenitors of the modern Germans, while Saxons are shown to be the descendants of the ancient Israelites. They hold almost the same relative position toward each other as in days of old. Sacred history teaches us that they were both carried into exile contemporaneously, or nearly so. Ahaz, the king of the Jews, hired the king of Assyria to come up and save him out of the hand of the king of Syria and the king of Israel, who were at the time confederates in a war against him and his nation. This union of the two kingdoms Israel and Syria caused the greatest consternation and indignation in the more southern nation, known at that time as the kingdom of Judah, or House of David, because his descendants were its kings. "And it was told the House of David, saying, Syria is confederate with Ephraim. And his heart was moved, and the heart of his people, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind" (Isa. vii. 2). Brave Isaiah, on this occasion, predicted that in less than threescore years Ephraim should be broken, that it be not a people. "At this time Ahaz, the king of the Jews, took the silver and the gold that was found in the house of the Lord and in the treasures of the king's house, and sent it as a bribe to Tiglath-Pileser, the king of Assyria, saying, Come up and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria, and out of the hand of the king of Israel" (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8). He accepted the bribe, and, marching against Damascus, took the city, slew Rezin the king, and carried the Syrians into exile, settling them in Kerr, a district about the river Cyrus, emptying into the Araxes, which in its turn empties into the Caspian Sea. The destruction of the kingdom of Israel followed, the trans-Jordanic tribes being the first to fall under the stroke. They were removed, and settled between the Araxes and the river Gozan, the latter stream also emptying into the Caspian. They, after their exile, received the name Massa-Getæ, a patronymic derived from two of their tribes, Manasseh and Gad. With the fall of Samaria a few years later the last instalment of the Hebrew captives were settled south of the Gozan, in the cities of the Medes. Thus the Syrians and the Israelites held the same geographical relations after the exile as before, as may be seen on any map showing the locations of the rivers Cyrus, Araxes, and Gozan.

It is remarkable that, after thirty centuries, the descendants of these two parties are still neighbours in western Europe, their geographical situation being similar to that of their earliest history, except that it is not mountains now, but the sea, that divides them. It was in this sea that the great Armada of Spain, their mutual enemy, was wrecked and destroyed in the time of their extremest peril. It lives in the history and traditions of their later years, as the companion piece of Pharaoh and his host, overthrown in the Red Sea at the Exodus. It was as fatal to the power of Spain as was the former to the Egyptians.

It is worthy of special observation that Isaiah, in his predictions of their then distant future, mentions these three powers as sharers in each other's work and blessing. "In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land; whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance" (Isa. xix. 24, 25).

STEAM AND CABLE COMMUNICATION BETWEEN AUSTRALIA AND GREAT BRITAIN, VIA CANADA.

THE project now on foot to establish swift steam communication between Australasia, Canada and Great Britain, seems "within measurable distance of practical politics." A twin idea of starting a gigantic cable service from Australia to the United Kingdom, following the same route, but with landing stations on British territory, and under British control, exclusively, is also receiving acceptation among our influential classes here, and both will, doubtless, ere long, be accepted by the nation and our company of nations throughout the world. The colonies interested have taken up these matters warmly. The Canadian Government have obtained tenders for laying the cable. But nothing can be done, it seems, till the British Government has been approached, and it has been ascertained from it what money share they would be prepared to contribute to these projects.

To learn this, a deputation of colonial representatives approached Mr. Chamberlain, on November 19th, to discuss the question with him, and learn how far he was inclined to go to assist them. The meeting was private, but it transpired that the Secretary of State was favourably impressed, and was ready to join the colonial representatives in the formation of a Joint Commission, to examine into and report upon the whole subject. The deputation consisted of Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada, the Agents-General of the several Australian Colonies interested in the object, as well as the Agents of the Cape and Natal, who were, however, not directly concerned in the business. This fact was believed to prove the united feeling and community of interests existing between all the colonies and mother country, but not existing only between the colonies directly concerned. Of course, these facts are interesting, as showing that the colonies have existing ties between themselves and the mother country, and are ready to sacrifice much in order to promote union amongst themselves and independence of the outside world. Herein lies the path of safety. Lord Salisbury saw that clearly, when speaking at Brighton. He then said that though this country was, for the moment, more thoroughly friendly with all the world than it has been for some time," yet that it was necessary to see "that no foreign alliances could be able for a moment to threaten our safety at home." An isolation which would make the Anglo-Saxon race, speaking the English language, one in all possible respects, would meet the necessities of the case, and make our empire, under God, safe in the coming times of trouble.

In regard to the Pacific cable scheme, it seems that foreign nations are quite alive to the advantages of the scheme, and mean, if they can, to forestall our British efforts and to make a cable for themselves. The first section will be to Hawaii and New Caledonia, being American; and the lines beyond to join it, will be possibly the existing cable between New Caledonia and Queensland—belonging to the French. We have strong faith in British perseverance and endurance, and despite present pessimistic views as to the advance of foreign countries and their successful efforts to exclude us from markets which we have considered hitherto to be all our own, we believe that our Israelite birthright blessings will yet keep us in advance of all competitors and "set us high above all nations," according to the prophecies (Deut. xxviii. 1—13).

THE MERIDIAN OF GREENWICH.

FRANCE at length seems inclined to adopt the meridian of Greenwich. Since the Geographical Congress reported in its favour, neither the Ministry of Marine and Colonies nor the Academy of Sciences has opposed the change, although, for the present, the Paris meridian remains in general use in the French charts. Russia, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Austria, and the United States have already officially adopted the Greenwich meridian, but Spain still clings to that of San Fernando (Cadiz), and Italy is loth to give up that of Naples, while that of Pulkowa (St. Petersburg) lingers in some Russian charts. Uniformity is for all reasons desirable, and, as we certainly shall not surrender to France, France may as well put a good face on the matter and give way to us. The once commonly-used meridian of Ferro has, by the way, become nearly obsolete.—Daily Graphic, November 5th, 1895.

ISRAEL'S SCRIPTURE AND PRAYER UNION.

DURING the last month two new members have been added, making a total of 1,550.

The Secretary would be pleased to receive the names of any Identity believers who are searching the Bible, and are willing to join us in prayer to God.

The month of January would be a good time to begin regular reading, and it is hoped many will do so, also that old members will renew their membership.

Subject for prayer on last Sunday in January: "Prayer on behalf of the House of Judah."

The Card of Membership has a list of chapters for the whole of 1896, also suggestions for study, prayers, etc. It is of a size convenient for keeping in the Bible, and will be sent on receipt of six stamps.

The first and second series of Monthly Comments on the whole Bible, by Philo-Israel, may be obtained. Price, in paper covers, 1s. 2d. each; in cloth, 2s. each, post free.

The "Prayers for Daily Use," being a prayer for each day of the week, by Philo-Israel, are 1d. each, or 9d. per doz., postage extra.

Review.

Ephraim: a Sacred Song. Music by Mrs. K. Ransom; words by Rev. H. J. Lyte. London: Weekes & Co., 14, Hanover-street, Regent-street, W. 4s.

WE are glad to see that the authoress of this tuneful and pleasing "Sacred Song" has made over the first fruits of the sale of her work to the Rev. Marcus Bergmann, to help him in preparing his translation of the Scriptures in Yiddish for the Russian Jews (p. 538, BANNER, vol. xix.). In his notice of the Sacred Song, Mr. Bergmann has, adverting to Mrs. Ransom's text, Jer. xxxi. 6, 7, given us some valuable light upon it. The words may be read thus: "For there shall be a day that the Nazarenes (or Christians, Acts xxiv. 5) upon the hills of Ephraim, shall cry, "Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion unto the Lord our God." The next verse identifies Ephraim as "the chief of the nations," those who publish the glad tidings of the Gospel, and ask for salvation for the remnant of Israel, "God's people." As Mrs. Ransom observed in addressing Mr. Bergmann, her song prays that "the Lord's salvation might come out of Zion, while Jean Charles' Anthem gives forth the Lord's reply, "The Lord shall comfort Zion!" We hope our friends will encourage Mrs. Ransom by purchasing her work, and so enable her to give her generous help to Mr. Bergmann in his translations of the Holy Scriptures into a language "understanded of the (Jewish) people, the brethren of "Ephraim."

APPEAL FOR A WIDOW AND ORPHANS.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Permit us to lay before your readers a most deserving case for "lending to the Lord." In Liverpool, for between three and four years, Mr. Payne lectured on the Identity every Sunday afternoon in Virgil-street. Through loss in business he was compelled to sell his property at a sacrifice and go as baker on a vessel sailing to Peru. After calling at Havre, he was standing on the deck talking to the cook and steward. A quarter of an hour afterwards he was wanted, but could not be found. The captain ordered a thorough search to be made, but with no result, and it was concluded that with a lurch of the ship he must have fallen overboard and been drowned. He leaves a wife and eight children unprovided for, and the friends in this district are trying to raise a sum of money to place Mrs. Payne in a little shop.

We are but a small band, and none wealthy, but perhaps some who read these lines, if not able to visit "this widow and these fatherless ones in their affliction" in person, (which St. James tells us is "pure and undefiled religion"), may yet do so by their contributions to this good cause, which shall be thankfully received and acknowledged in the BANNER by

Yours faithfully,

THEODORE S. HILL, 6, Christ Church-road, Birkenhead.

December 2nd, 1895.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Some time ago there was a suggestion advanced that greater facilities should be given for the sale of Identity literature, and that use should be made of the ordinary channels of trade. There was regret expressed that our booksellers and railway bookstalls rarely had a supply of literature on hand, or, if they had, did not expose it in the usual way. Could not one bookseller in each town be made an agent, especially if good terms were offered on all sales effected? I have looked in vain in the windows of booksellers and on bookstalls for any indication that the valuable suggestion in your paper was being practically carried out, but so far I have been disappointed. I remember, some twelve or fifteen years ago, finding a copy of the BANNER on sale on the bookstall at the Newark G.N. Station. Since then I have failed to meet with Identity literature under any circumstances prominently brought under public notice. Recently I visited a public library in one of the largest towns of England—I carefully scanned the books and papers, and also the catalogue of weekly and monthly periodicals, but, to my regret, the BANNER or Covenant People was minus. Every scientific and religious organization had its representative organ, but the grand belief of God's faithfulness to His people Israel lacked its treatise. Even the Theosophist could boast of a place for his monthly exponent, then why should not British-Israelites endeavour to be represented by a reliable periodical? I would suggest that where an association exists, it should take steps to support and introduce the BANNER into the principal libraries of our country. I appeal to the generosity of a few earnest believers, or even one individual, to see that our views have an equal share of public consideration and facilities for dissemination with those of other beliefs and doctrines.

Yours sincerely, W. T. W.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—In reading this week's BANNER I have been interested in "A Glimpse at Early Britain," by E. Reep. There is one part of the article commenting on the chariots armed with scythes, which our ancient forefathers used, that I think is a very strong identity. In Rollin's "Ancient History," vol. ii., there appears the history of Cyrus, in book 4, chap. i., sec. 5; also an account of the famous battle of Thymbria (B.C. 555), between Cyrus and Cræsus. The defeat of the latter led to the downfall of Babylon. The army of Cyrus amounted to 196,000 men, consisting of Persians, Medians, Armenians, and Arabians. Besides these troops, Cyrus had 300 chariots of war, armed with scythes, each drawn by four horses abreast, covered with trappings that were shot proof. Such is the extract from Rollin's History.

The Israelites of the first captivity were taken to Media 166 years before this great battle, and I think it is from Media that our forefathers brought the idea of their war-chariots armed with scythes. I don't know if you will think this extract worthy of a place in the BANNER. I shall look with great interest for the coming parts of E. Reep's article.

Truly yours, R. JONES.

DEAR SIR,—Can any of your readers tell me the origin of the name "Lehmann" and its meaning? Thanking you for the favour,

Yours truly,

THE NATION WHICH IS HATED BY NEARLY ALL MEN.

THE hatred exists! No man can doubt it. We British are the hated of mankind because we are blessed above all nations, being Israel, according to the promises; and envy and jealousy are so excited thereby, that it is no wonder jealousy flames into rage, and rage at present makes men ready and eager to rush into war to bring down these proud islanders who promise to rule the world. This is the observation of all our secular papers just now. Our writers notice the gruesome fact, marvel at it, and see clearly that if we do not take great care, there will be such a combination or coalition formed against us, as we shall find it impossible to resist. There is no doubt of it. We shall not be able to resist it. But here comes in Our Identity. We have an Almighty Helper. He made, created, and formed us to be His people, to show forth His praise. He will succour and defend us. We are groping in the dark ourselves, but He undertakes our guidance, and "will never leave us nor forsake us." "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (Isa. xlii. 16; Psa. cxxi. 4, 5).

We have two remarkable statements in journals recently published in London pointing out the hostile feelings against us entertained by the nations, and the reasons for them, to which we ask our readers' attention. The first is from Mr. Fred. Harrison's annual address, as reported in the London Standard of January 2, 1896, and the other from the Daily Telegraph, of December 31 last, dealing with the history of the year as it affects our own people and country. Mr. F. Harrison, among other things, made the following remarks:—

What was specially striking just now was to find an Empire like ours without a friend in Europe, and regarded with ill-concealed dislike and illwill by all. It was true the opinion of Europe was with us for the moment, but that opinion was expressed in grudging terms and with a running commentary on British selfishness and greed. We were used to that, and perhaps no people were so thick-skinned as we were in treating these attacks upon us. The English people at home were conscious of no illwill to any nation. Alone of the nations, we had voluntarily given back in times of peace territory we had won in war. We had entered into an arbitration and paid enormous sums of money for mistakes that we had made. We had carried forbearance, surrender, and sacrifice in Europe to a point which wounded the feelings of some among our own people, and had fostered the idea abroad that we would do anything rather than go to war with a strong Power. He asked why it was that the way we saw ourselves and the way others abroad saw us was so widely different? We had a boast, of which we were never tired, that England held the largest Empire in the world, that Britannia ruled all seas, that Britain was firmly planted in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in America, in Australia, in Oceania. That brought us in contact with almost every nation on the planet, and filled great Powers with envy and jealousy. We had frontier relations with every Power in the world, and had rich Colonies in all quarters. It rankled in other nations to see such a widespread Empire built up with such little cost in blood and treasure to the people at home. That might be pitiable jealousy, but they must take it into account. No other nation gave cause for such universal jealousy. Towards the United States and European Powers our attitude abroad was always courteous and studiously just. Yet we were accused of aggression. In Africa and Asia matters were very different. If our policy was not aggressive, our colonists were. Our explorers, miners, traders, and adventurers treated every open country as if they were conquerors. They made small wars, and, uprooting old, devised new settlements. The Home Government did not acknowledge them at first, but in time had to do so. Every few years a new province was added to the Empire without the Government firing a shot, and every nation on the globe looked at the growth of this automatic Empire with envy and jealousy. These remarks were not called out by what had taken place in the last few days in the Transvaal, because they were written before that; but that exemplified what he had already said. In that way we had more territorial disputes than any nation in the world. We waged more wars than all the nations together. Since the Queen was crowned the Empire had doubled, and there had been more wars than years in her reign. The peaceful, law-abiding citizens in this country were constantly being dragged into wars by a few filibusters of whom they knew nothing, but for whose acts they had to answer (hear, hear). That was why we stood without friends, and were constantly subject to accusations of bad faith and breach of contract. He protested against traders involving the nation into so much danger. We might yet live to see the hard-working citizens of this country plunged in misery and ruin for the sake of a few gamblers, gold miners, hucksters, and traders who knew no country and obeyed no moral law (hear, hear). In conclusion, he warned well-meaning philanthropists of the danger of involving Europe in widespread disaster over the subject of Armenia, and urged more confidence in the diplomatic concert of Europe, and trusted to a wider realisation of the common humanity to avert the dangers which now overshadowed the world.

We are not responsible, of course, for such wild proceedings as those of Dr. Jameson, who has brought ruin on himself and hundreds of his British followers, by invading in arms a territory where his Sovereign was Suzerain, and he was commanded not to go. He has suffered for his folly, and done deep injury to the cause he wished to serve. But these proccedings were not the cause of the disturbance in the Transvaal. The cause still exists unremedied, and must now be taken in hand and settled.

The discovery of gold in the territory drew thousands and tens of thousands of our countrymen, and of those of other lands, to dig it up; and to these multitudes the Boers would give no equal political rights, no protection, no countenance, and hardly tolerance. The Uitlanders have come to stay, and mean at last by their force of numbers, power, and character, to win their equal rights. The fact is known to Europe, and they chafe under its pressure. It has made even the German Emperor forget himself, and offer a deep affront to his British allies by sending his offensive message to Mr. Kruger, declaring the independence of the Transvaal as if he were the arbiter of its destiny, and the British nothing in his estimation.

The wide expansion of the British Empire, which fills European nations, and even our American brethren, with such envy and jealousy, is merely the fulfilment of God's promises to Jacob in Gen. xxviii. 14, R.V., since we have accordingly "spread abroad" or "broken forth to the West, the East, the North, and to the South," with a company of British States and nations to support our Power in the four quarters of the earth. These things necessarily anger our neighbours, who, lacking Israel's birthright blessings, are envious, jealous, angry, and ready even by war to destroy us. We thank God for Isa. liv. 17, xlii. 16, and such like texts which comfort and support us.

The Daily Telegraph, on the other hand, wrote as follows on Dec. 31 last, respecting the then rapidly dying, waning, year:—

Like its antecessors, it came with gifts in one hand and trials or judgments in the other, neither wholly propitious nor wholly unkind. It is the law of human history that events should thus be of a mingled character, and the epochs of our time, in the words of Andrew Fairservice, "ower gude for banning and ower bad for blessing." But, certainly and palpably, the magnificent structure of the British Empire has taken no harm during the past twelve months, and—under the favour of Heaven—stands firmer and stronger than ever perhaps, before, "none making us afraid." If it be true, as is currently alleged, that England is "isolated"—that we are not loved even by those to whom we have been most generous and faithful—we are all the more free from entangling alliances. The answer to such unfriendly words lies in the poet's lines,

> "'Tis well! from this day forward we shall know
> That in ourselves our safety must be sought:
> Ah! dastards, whom the knowledge doth not cheer!"

One great and dark trouble has, indeed, been bequeathed to us by the departing year, fraught alike with sorrow and with danger—the Armenian Question. Public opinion in this country owes to Lord Salisbury, while this evil question pends, a confidence and a support a great deal more sincere and frank than that shown in Lord Rosebery's recent letter on the subject. Lord Salisbury's earnest goodwill to redeem the pledges which his predecessor left to be redeemed cannot possibly be doubted. If, however, he has encountered obstacles which only an unfortunate policy could reveal, if he has had to perceive that solitary and quixotic action could only lead to a sanguinary convulsion in European history, then we must be patient until all that painful chapter is revealed of which the preceding Administration had not even the courage to publish that awful preface which it possessed in the "Consular Reports." It would have been a fine position for England at the close of the year to be face to face in arms with a disrupted "concert of Europe"; President Cleveland egging on a kindred people against her beyond one sea, and beyond another France and Russia intriguing together against her financially, commercially, and territorially! Furthermore, it has never been with the wide-spread creed of Islam that we have any quarrel. Strong, fearless, and just as is this Empire, it has not forces enough to set right all the oppressions of the earth, to vindicate the cruelly-illused Jews in Russia, the Siamese and Malagasy who suffer harm from France, and all the many other possible objects—besides the Armenians—of impulsive compassion. The old year, now nearing its latest hour, has brought, together with many a good and memorable blessing, plenty of strong reasons to make Englishmen stand shoulder to shoulder as they never did before, and to keep themselves ready for events considerably beyond the expectation of those whose political wisdom begins and ends with hysterics rather than history.

Our readers may wonder, as we often do, why Israel (the British) should in the providence of God be placed just now in such a vortex of troubles—now in America, then in Armenia, to-day in the Transvaal, and only lately in regard to East China. In each case as a nation we have done no harm; yet the nations—even our own kith and kin in the United States, execrate our very name, and wish to rob us of our possessions. The reason seems to us the old one. Our nation is Israel. We have our "trouble," called "Jacob's," to pass through, and we must do it, looking for the salvation of the Lord (Jer. xxx. 7, R.V.). But we have, as part of the means of safety, to "hide ourselves," to become "isolated" in the world—hated by all, unable to stir without offending some, defending our own possessions, but giving as little occasion of offence as possible till the Lord gives us permission to come abroad. Why this should be, Isa. xxvi. 20, 21, and Zeph. iii. 8, 9, explain.

It is ours to submit, recollecting Noah in the Ark, Lot in Zoar and his cave, and Israel in her time of trouble and dismay with no refuge save Him who guides her always, and "will never leave her, nor forsake her," because "no weapon that is formed against her shall prosper," and "every tongue that shall rise up in judgment against her, they shall condemn. "For this is their inheritance as the servants of the Lord, and His righteousness is their's," for God hath sworn it.

Let Israel, therefore, praise the Lord for His faithfulness, and His abiding love for them, His people.

Some of readers appear to have experienced difficulty in obtaining extra copies of our New Year's Double Number, having been informed by booksellers that it is "out of print." This is not the case, and copies may still be had; and we shall be obliged if persons who have experienced difficulty in obtaining copies will show this notice to their bookseller. —The Publishers, Jan. 15.

PROFESSOR TOTTEN ON THE AMERICAN DISPUTE.

OUR American friend, Professor Totten, well-known on this side of the Atlantic, has published his views in reference to the Venezuelan crisis. He would have this country proceed to arbitration in regard to this "miserable little Venezuelan business—the whole of it; that will get it off her hands, and let her and us awake to the full gravity of our Eastern affairs." This, of course, is good advice from the American point of view. Her unfriendly action toward her brethren would thus be passed over and condoned, and we should probably lose our South American territory, driven thereto by the threat of war from the States. Such advice is freely tendered to us also from this side, but we hardly suppose the same will be accepted, unless our leading statesmen find that the justice of the case demands the sacrifice of national self-respect. However that may be, we re-publish a part of Lieut. Totten's letter to the New Haven Register (U.S.A.) on this subject, the date of publishing being Dec. 9th, 1895; the remainder of the letter does not bear much on the matter. He said:—

". . . Affairs are swiftly moving towards the condition of necessary confederation between these two Powers, and it must be laid upon a purely fraternal basis. Let us look, for instance, at the Venezuelan and Trinidad matters. I have a Black's Atlas of 1852. It gives the boundaries of British Guiana, and they run nowhere near the Orinoco river, except a bare touch at the very mouth, where a narrow strip of British coast comes up to the edge of the lower lip of the river, as on all standard and official maps from that day to this. Query: Since when, and by what recognised authority, has this been changed? Of course we bar all ex parte surveying, unless Venezuela took part in running the Schomberg line, the which is not understood to have been the case.

"These facts are prima facie as to boundaries and ownership. Now, it is manifest that all issues, as to the right of domain in those parts, can be settled justly by a direct appeal to facts before a competent board of arbitration, and that a resort to arms, other than to enforce an arbitrated right, is, to say the least, unwise. For I am as free to assert that American sentiment will never countenance any encroachment whatsoever upon the four-fold conditions of the Monroe Doctrine, as I am to avow that I yield to no one in the desire to see England and America thoroughly united far above the remotest intention of ever interfering with each other's distinctive and established principles of autonomy. And I am confident that I voice the sentiment of Greater America when I say that we deprecate whatsoever may tend to retard the growing friendship between the two great halves of Anglo-Saxondom.

"But aside from all this, let me point out that England cannot afford to push at Venezuela out of her front door, and so as it were, at us across the Monroe Doctrine; because, by so doing she would leave her back door wide open to all sorts of European, Asiatic, and African embroilments of far greater moment. The whole brood of her other difficulties would head up at once if she were to become seriously and unfortunately occupied with us.

"Nor, on the other hand, can we ourselves afford to come into strained relations with the mother country, with whom, more than with any other nation upon earth, our interests are in every way bound up.

"In China, Japan, and all the East, we are as indirectly interested as England is directly; the fact is, we were, by virtue of Perry's treaty, primarily interested in those parts, and the moment the dominance of Russia and her allies is established in that locality, no other nation can tell where it stands, either at home or abroad. The 'far East' owes all it has of modern polish and progress (civilization) to the Anglo-Saxon, and nothing whatsoever of intrinsic value to other nations. It is a serious condition then, that threatens to unbalance what has hitherto been done in that quarter, and to give the harvest of the toil to a Power which after all has naught in common with true liberty.

"Now, while one need not care a snap for transient politics, except to hate it, he must have a regard for statesmanship, and abroad, far-reaching natural and racial projects, looking first homewards, and then outwards unto all concerned, and I contend that it is the duty of the English-speaking race, the world around, to unite for their own benefit and that of all mankind. It is our plain destiny thus to unite, look at it howsoever one will, and while I, personally, must look at it from the familiar standpoint of the prophets of our race, I am not blind to the fact that all English-speaking statesmen see it as a focus, and from whatsoever point of view is immaterial, so long as the objective is a common one.

"I am satisfied that Russia and her allies are the ultimate foes of the whole Teutonic race, and indirectly now, but directly to-morrow when the long-delayed crisis comes, whatsoever in the Eastern question affects the 'mother country' of the Anglo-Saxon branch thereof affects all of her offshoots, and threatens their whole future. I do not know how many grasp this; surely more do now than when these views were ridiculed a week of years ago, for the effort at confederation has spread to all Saxon quarters since then, and all will know it when the crisis is on. Therefore, to be forewarned, if only by a few notes, is to be somewhat forearmed against what is written on the horizon of our race.

"Let England therefore arbitrate this miserable little Venezuelan matter, the whole of it; that will get it off of her hands, and let her and us awaken to the full gravity of our Eastern affairs, and let both, as the two nations of destiny, begin to get together upon a more lasting basis. In other words, I firmly advocate an offensive and defensive alliance of the United States of America with Great Britain, whatsoever that involves, looking towards the preservation and dominance of Anglo-Saxon interests for all future time.

"It was no mere coincidence that, in 1882, the arms and flags of these two nations were united in the streets of Alexandria for the first time since our independence, and now the continuation of Mohammedan atrocities in Armenia comes home to both and gives each of us an even more direct occasion for uniting once more on Turkish soil; and we should unite not only as champions of civilization and Christianity, but as Crusaders, looking both homeward irredentally and towards the rescue of the holy places from those usurpers who have now come to the full end of their times and seasons. It has been said that 'Jerusalem shall be trodden under foot until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' Now, if they began with the era of Nabopolassar in 625 B.C., they surely must be near their termination now in 1895 A.D., for 625 B.C. plus 1895 A.D. is equal to 2,520 years, or is the full measure of 'seven times,' i.e., of 7 × 360 years. Moreover, if the 'Time (360) Times (720) and half a time' (180), or $3\frac{1}{2} \times 360$ equals 1,260 years of Mohammed's dominance over the Holy Land began, as all suppose, when the Saracens invaded Palestine, in 635 A.D., then they too, as the latter half of the entire 2,520 years, must also be equally nigh to their coincident termination, for 635 A.D. plus 1,260 equals 1895 A.D.

"Such figures, Mr. Editor, do not lie. Their plain significance was pointed out in your own journal five years ago! Then we wrote in faith as to the materialisation of what they portended, but behold now the forerunners of fulfilment are already at hand, on time! The closing decade of this nineteenth century has but five more years to run; what has transpired in the first half of this decade has more than justified the soundness of what you published at the beginning thereof, and it fully warrants me in recalling attention to those articles, and to the published studies with which they have since been complemented. In my own judgment, the latter half of this decade will be the most remarkable pentade the world has ever known, and even were I a mere soothsayer, and not a conservative student of prophecy, interpreted upon sound historic premises, I should not hesitate to prognosticate against the year 1896-97 A.D., that it will mark the beginning of the 'bouleversement' prophesied of old by Moses, the law-giver, Daniel the prophet, and by that other Prophet who has come and who comes again to take upon Himself the kingdom He has won the right to rule. THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN JUDAH AND BENJAMIN.

BY W. H. LARKINS, LIEUT.-COL.

WE now come to the second part of our subject—namely, the distinction between Judah and Benjamin. The distinction between the two Houses of Israel and Judah would of course include Benjamin as belonging to the former, and therefore distinct from the latter; but I think that further marks of distinction may be traced even between Judah and Benjamin after the separation of the latter from its brethren of the House of Israel, and which I shall proceed to point out.

The Jebusites were one of the nations in the land of Canaan which Joshua subdued, and divided their possessions among certain tribes of Israel. Jebusi, or Jerusalem, is one of twelve cities which fell to the lot of Benjamin as a portion of their inheritance (Josh. xviii. 28). I cannot, however, trace the names of either Zion or Jebusi (Jerusalem) among the cities assigned to Judah; but at the end of the chapter there is the following remark: "As for the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out, but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah unto this day at Jerusalem" (Josh. xv. 63). In Judges i. we are told that Judah took Jerusalem, and smote it with the edge of the sword (ver. 8), and (in ver. 21) that Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites, but they dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day. The passage from Josh. xv. 63 must refer to the stronghold of the Jebusites on Mount Zion which Judah, on the two occasions alluded to in Judges i., failed to get possession of, but which was subsequently taken by King David (2 Sam. v. 6—9). It was here the city of David was built, which was called Zion. It was here also, on the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite, that King Solomon built the temple on the borders of the Two Tribes, the temple itself being within the borders of Judah, but the courts of the temple extended into that of Benjamin. Mount Zion was a portion of the possessions of the Jebusites which fell to the lot of Judah, and the delineation of the boundary between the Two Tribes is clearly laid down in Josh. xv. and xviii.

The following passages, from among many others that might have been cited bearing on the subject, will be sufficient to show that, as in the case of Israel and Judah, so between Judah and Benjamin, there exists a marked line of distinction:—

First, the prophet Micah, foreshadowing what would befall Zion and Jerusalem in the future, says, "Zion shall be ploughed like a field, and Jerusalem become heaps" (Micah iii. 12; Jer. xxvi. 18). Here, then, we have a clear distinction made between these two places; for the one (Zion) was to be plowed like a field, and Jerusalem become heaps.

Secondly, the prophet Jeremiah again, when speaking to Judah and Benjamin, addresses them as "the men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem," as in Jer. xvii. 20: "Hear ye the word of the Lord, ye kings of Judah, and all Judah, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem" (see also Jer. i., xviii. 11, xix. 7). Now, as Jebusi, or Jerusalem, fell to the lot of Benjamin as a part of their inheritance, we have a right to assume that the inhabitants of Jerusalem were the children of Benjamin.

Thirdly, this same prophet, in another place, speaks of "the princes of Judah and the princes of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxxiv. 19). Who are the princes of Jerusalem but the princes of Benjamin?

Fourthly, the prophet Isaiah, in answer to the prayer of Hezekiah king of Judah, asking that he might be saved from the hand of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was told to give the following answer: "The virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn, the daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head at thee" (Isa. xxxvii. 22). Here, again, the daughter of Jerusalem must be the daughter of Benjamin.

Fifthly, if there is any doubt as to this, we have only to turn to the words spoken by Jesus to the women who bewailed and lamented Him as He was being led to the place of His crucifixion. Turning to them, He said: "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves and your children" (Luke xxiii. 28). We may be quite sure that these women were not Jewish women, the daughters of Zion, for they would hardly have bewailed and lamented the acts of their brethren and kinsmen. Some of these women had followed Jesus from lower Galilee, the inhabitants of which were Benjamites. They were therefore Israelitish women of the tribe of Benjamin; and, having become converts to Christianity, they were followers of Jesus in more than one sense. These women bewailed and lamented Jesus as they saw Him being led away to the place of His crucifixion, under the impression that they were on the eve of losing their beloved Lord and Saviour.

There is very little mention made of the tribe of Benjamin by name after their separation from their brethren of the House of Israel, but they are referred to in the passages above by Jerusalem their inheritance. If, again, we turn to the parable of the two baskets of figs, given in Jer. xxiv., we shall there find the same omission of the name of Benjamin, although clearly implied in the basket of good figs, representing those that were carried away captive of Judah for their good (ver. 5), whereas Zedekiah, his princes, and the residue of the people, were sent out of the land for their hurt (ver. 8). These were the evil, too bad to be eaten.

In the passages quoted above I think we may fairly come to the conclusion that a marked line of distinction was drawn between Judah and Zion on the one side and Benjamin and Jerusalem on the other. To enter into the after history of these Two Tribes would be taking us beyond the purport of this paper. I might say this much, however: during our Lord's presence upon this earth, the distinction grew far wider when Benjamin accepted the Gospel, and became the firstfruits of Christianity in Israel; whilst Judah, on the other hand, through her blindness and hardness of heart, refused to believe, and crucified the Lord of glory. This, again, was followed by a still further breach when Benjamin broke the "bands of brotherhood" (Zech. xi. 14) between them, and separated herself from Judah, thus leaving the latter in the isolated condition predicted by Moses (Deut. xxxii. 7).

"LET SUCH AS LOVE THY SALVATION SAY CONTINUALLY, LET GOD BE MAGNIFIED."

THE above are words taken from Psa. lxx. 4, R.V., and they contain a lesson even for Anglo-Israelites. They thoroughly justify our constant call upon the readers of the BANNER to "Praise the Lord" as His chosen people, for we of all men love the salvation of the Lord, and therefore as those who know they have been redeemed at such a cost too as the precious blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, feel called on to say continually, not now and then, but "continually," "Let God be magnified," "Let Israel praise the Lord"! There is a contrast in this Psalm of David, which should not be passed over. In ver. 3 the Psalmist says, "Let them be turned back for a reward of their shame that say, Aha, aha!" or "There, there!" Their cry is one of detraction and depreciation. The Christian's and the Anglo-Israelite's reply must be the reply, in answer, "Let God be magnified." Let us "praise the Lord," and that continually. The character of those who use these words must be such that they love "His (the Lord's) salvation." The question is, What salvation is intended here? It is the salvation God has approved and supplied, the salvation by the blood of His well-beloved Son. None other will He accept or own! It is the salvation by substitution which is described in such texts as these:—"He was wounded for our transgressions: He was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed" (Isa. liii. 5). "He was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification" (Rom. iv. 25); and "He made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him."

Those who love this salvation are bound to be seeking the Lord, and the bare act of seeking Him must bring rejoicing and gladness in Him, even though they have not yet found and embraced their Saviour. That is the testimony of this Scripture: "Let all those that seek Thee rejoice and be glad in Thee; and let such as love Thy salvation say continually, Let God be magnified." The state of mind that refers all to God, and praises Him for all incidents, national or personal, is that which is safe for the individual and for the nation. We note the prophecies which relate to Israel of the House of Joseph, and as we see them fulfilling and fulfilled in the British nation we rejoice and praise the Lord for His goodness to His chosen ones. We recognise all that God has done for His people in pursuance of His promises "to Abraham and his seed for ever," and we recollect that Israel's Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, was the Promiser! also that "Abraham rejoiced to see His day. He saw it and was glad" (John viii. 56, R.V.).

The Lord promised to Israel to bestow His blessing upon the great and mighty sea power that was to come of them in the Christian Dispensation, and gave them the priceless gift of the stewardship of the Gospel, to the world of nations, whereby they were all to be blessed in them. He gave them wealth to support the Abrahamic stock; an expansion to the four quarters of the world to make their influence irresistible as "a company of nations," and to qualify them for their spiritual functions, they were entrusted with the Sabbath, the Word, and laws of God, besides the love of souls and the power to "blossom and bud and fill the face of the world with (Gospel) fruit." These are all things which accompany salvation, and as those who love these gifts and the Giver of them, are we not right at all times, and at all seasons, to call upon the readers of the BANNER to bless and praise the Lord for all His goodness and faithfulness to the children of Israel?

ENGLAND'S DEFENCES.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, Wednesday Night.

"THE last issue of the semi-official Military Weekly contains a very interesting article on 'English Views on Warfare and the Defence of a Country.' The writer speaks very favourably of Mr. Spenser Wilkinson's recent publication on this subject, and among other things says:—

"'Through all his writings runs the endeavour to restore its old greatness to his country. He makes no secret whatever of this, and aims at nothing less than making England so powerful that she would be not only independent of all other States in all situations, but also in a position everywhere to speak with a decisive voice. This amounts to little less than the dominion of the world. The means to the fulfilment of the former demand—viz., the command of the sea to the extent required by him—is, at the same time, the means to the fulfilment of the latter. Whether such ideas are practicable depends on the men more than on the system, and this is not the place to discuss these political questions. We have to do here only with the military phases—that is, with the means demonstrated by him and interesting both to ally and adversary alike. One point deserves special study—viz., the importance of the Mediterranean with reference to the supply of food to the Continent, under various circumstances. According to Wilkinson's convincing demonstrations, the combatants will have to take England into account as an essential factor, especially if she takes serious steps—with a view to increasing her power of defence. From this point of view, Wilkinson's uncommonly noteworthy writings deserve much more attention than seems to have been paid them hitherto.'"

The above is from the London Standard of Sept. 26th last, and points, as many are pointing just now, to a state of things when the British will dominate the world! The writer also admits what we have so often insisted upon—namely, that the means to that end is the possession of the sea power. This is secured to us by the gift of the Gates in the promise, "Thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies" (Gen. xxii. 17). These considerations give force to the view which so many are pressing on us at this time, that the true defence of this country is her naval preponderance, and she is not safe till her navy is absolutely superior to the navies of all the Powers likely to be her enemies.

It is no want of faith in our nation to see to this important means of defence. For God works by means, and He provides His people with the necessary wealth, Gates, warships, commerce, and colonies to enable them to acquire the supremacy of the sea, which, in time, must make over to them the dominion of the land as well. He does this that the Gospel may reach all the nations, families, and kindreds of the world, and so His name may be praised, to the glory of His grace!

SOME RECENT PUBLIC UTTERANCES CONCERNING ISRAEL AND JUDAH.

It is wonderful to note, that whenever a number of Englishmen meet together, to consult upon subjects in which most of them are mutually interest , if a patriotic turn is given to their cogitations, it is won rful, we say, to see how they swell with the feeling that they belong to a great nation! a wonderful people! a nation and State pre-eminently favoured by Providence over and above every other nation upon earth! Some of the speeches made at the recent Church Congress (October 7—12, 1895) furnish several illustrations of what we mean. Thus, in the Record of Oct. 11th, p. 1,008, the President, in his opening address, is reported to have said :—

"The Church of England rests, as does the whole Gospel kingdom, upon the sure ground of historic fact. . . . Its business is to go forward, and contend for victory. 'Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward.' It must be plain to all who have eyes to see, how great is the work to which the Supreme Governor of the world has called the Church of England" (By this he means the Episcopal section). "How striking is the thought that in another century there will be, according to calculations made, 1,000,000,000 (one thousand millions) of people in the world speaking our vigorous English tongue! To be a chief instrument, if she rise to her opportunities, of ministering the Gospel of salvation to the world-spreading Anglo-Saxon race in this wonderful age, and the wonderful ages yet to come, times of change, of controversy, of material progress, of discovery in the world of thought, and science; of bold inquiry and eager speculation ever going on, while holding fast to the prime revealed truths of the Gospel, which, because revealed, may never be changed nor forgotten; yet to adapt herself to the wants of the age, and change, if need be, her methods to meet the requirements of the times, against the ever-varying assaults made by the proud and restless intellect, to defend and elucidate the Christian dogma—and, oh! how thankful, my friends, we ought to be for the pre-eminent part which the Church of England, in our own generation, has taken by her noble literature in this indispensable work! to uplift the cross of Christ in every corner of the world where Christian zeal and Christian energy can penetrate; and by ministering the good things of God to the immortal soul, to be ever adding to the number of the redeemed and thus preparing for the coming of the Lord—this is the glorious work to which our Church has been called by her Lord. And may we not believe that by His providential dealing God has intended to fit her for the task which He has laid upon her? Mercifully preserved in all her vicissitudes from abandoning any essential part of Catholic truth" (this may be questioned, but we allow it to pass at present), "in her past history she has overcome many obstacles, and, like a shining glacier on its onward march, has cast out from her bosom not a few impurities. In the great crisis of the sixteenth century, for which the mediæval Church was responsible"! (and was not that the Church of England?), "she was enabled to get rid of doctrines and practices which would have sorely hampered her in her work, because incapable of defence; and which assuredly will appear more and more indefencible by reason in the coming years." Our right-reverend is evidently a good special pleader, and makes the best for his cause. At the risk of being tedious we quote a few more lines from this part of his discourse. "She"—i.e., the Church of England, "is in many ways calculated to be the organ of the religious feeling of a free people. If in times past she has leaned too much upon external props, upon a privileged position—at one time upon the favour of arbitrary kings, at another time upon the assistance of the Legislature" (a very candid confession—there is much to hope for in this bishop)—"she has for some time been learning the lesson of self-help, and finds that the lesson is a good one, though by no means learned as yet." (If his friends do not teach him better, we fear this bishop may yet develope into a "disestablishment" if not "disendowment" advocate). "She has never declared war against the spirit of the age (!) nor done aught which would prevent her from meeting the wants of the present or succeeding ages (! !). Loyal to constituted authority she must ever be. It is one of her principles. But courageously worked, she is adapted to be a popular institution; and indeed in our great towns is being more and more worked upon a popular basis. It is evident, indeed, that in her merely human aspect, as an earthly institution, she is dependent upon the good will of the people to whom she has been called to minister (!). As a God-inspired society, in the exercise of her Divine commission, she depends wholly and solely upon the loving will of her Divine Head."

It is something new to hear these admissions from the mouth of a bishop. Let them be attended to, and the Church of England, as an earthly institution, will long exist; but there must also be the full and faithful preaching of the Divine Word, which is the undoubted mission and commission of every society claiming to be God-inspired; and if the bishop will only be faithful, and fearlessly inquire into the meaning of divine prophecy, he will, we have no doubt, see the real "reason why" this country and people have been so pre-eminently selected by the Almighty as the recipients of blessings so undeserved, and yet so freely and fully bestowed. To say the least, it is surely worth the while of our teachers to inquire calmly into the alleged fulfilment of the divine promises made to the fathers of old, and continued down through centuries, and which are evidently being fulfilled in the past history, present position, and probably the still more pre-eminent position of the "world-spreading Anglo-Saxon race."

We now turn to the utterances of another earnest churchman, quoting from the Record of October 18th, 1895, p. 1,032. At the "Devotional" meeting of the Congress, towards its close, on the Friday morning the subject was the "Second Advent, or return of our Lord," which is a subject akin to the Anglo-Israelite inquiry. We hold that the latter, and the, at least, partial universal acknowledgment thereof, precede the appearance of the former. But this idea does not appear to have much occupied the speakers at this meeting. The Rev. Principal

Moule, D.D., gave certain landmarks by which the approach of the Second Advent may with certainty be looked for. It was "infinitely mysterious; but veritable and unfigurative. 'This same Jesus shall so come in like manner, as He was seen going up into Heaven.'" Again, another landmark is "a grand development of the power of the Holy Ghost in the Church and for the world. 'I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh.' That word was, indeed, a prediction of Pentecost." But it connects itself with other predictions, which promise almost universal spiritual power and bliss. "Such promises certainly have yet to be fulfilled; and the course of things in Christendom shows no very clear tendency of its own motion towards the fulfilment." It is because this rev. gentleman has not, in our opinion, got the key to the promises, that he so speaks of the course of things showing "no very clear tendency" towards the fulfilment of the prophecy. May he not be too much occupied in looking one way, while prophecy points out another, more hidden, perhaps, but not the less practical? Our advocate adduces "notably, that prospect which connects itself with the promise of a return of blessing to the Hebrew race. It is written, 'All Israel shall be saved;' and that in a context which reasonably assures us is national." And do we not see a return of the people to their own land has already begun, and, to all appearance, the political aspect of the problem will soon present itself, and that before the nation is converted to Christianity. The great mistake, in our opinion, that students of prophecy make here is supposing that the Jews, as we know them, are all Israel; and that they must be converted before going back to their own land. The contrary, in our opinion, is taught by divine revelation, Which is the right view, the event alone can finally determine.

Mr. Moule proceeds to observe that the promised blessings to All Israel (by which he understands the Jews) "again is linked with a prospect of altogether abnormal blessing for the world; For 'what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?' To that future few would say that the normal course of things in either Israel or Christendom is tending."

Our Identity friends will at once here see that this "blind" witness is in error in imagining that Israel is not at all Christianized. It is evident he draws a great difference between Israel and Christendom, as at present existing. But, on the Anglo-Israelite view, "Christendom" already includes Israel of the Ten Tribes, which are, both in character and position, right in the forepart of Christendom, and stand forth as the hope of the world.

We agree with this writer, generally, in his other anticipations of the future, and pass on to notice what Bishop Blyth has to say about the Jews and their present condition.* He says "There is scarcely a question of the day more vital to the future of the Church than the recognition of the claims of the Jews upon Christianity." He does not say why this is so, and asserts that "it is a misconception to suppose that the subject of Jewish missions is not of Catholic interest, but the enterprise of a party in the Church. . . . Party principles fluctuate; but the claim of the Jews is universal and perpetual, and is upon the Church herself." Here we see the Jews are prominent, and have a perpetual claim upon the Church, but where is All Israel? Ah, it is vanished; but where? Bishop Blyth sees the Jews clearly enough, and is inclined to patronise them if they will only be converted to his views. Their national church is "one of unique promise; the great prospect of the Holy Land, and even of Christianity; was the first to be planted, where the blood of the Saviour—and of His first martyr—still pleads for mercy, and has a Scripture future—the Church of the Hebrews."

Here, then, we have evidently found the Church of All Israel—viz., in the Church of the Hebrews; for this latter term can embrace All Israel and the Jews, just as the greater always embraces the smaller.

Dr. Blyth goes on to say, "It has been a strange and baneful disobedience on the part of the Church of Christ, which has for so many centuries denied to the Church of the Hebrews the place and primacy which Christ assigned to her in His kingdom upon earth. . . . . The missionary commission is as universally binding as is that to baptize; and Jewish missions are as obligatory as are those to the Gentiles. This order was invariably obeyed by the apostles, 'beginning at Jerusalem,' until the return of the Jews to the Holy Land." With these sentiments we cordially agree, only observing that the Jews had the first offer; but having, nationally, rejected their royal King, killing Him with cruel and wicked hands, their punishment came upon them, as it had been threatened long before (see Deut. xxviii. 15—68). But notwithstanding that the punishment which has followed the Jews wherever they have gone for their sin of unbelief is unquestionable, we do not deny that the so-called Christian Church has also often inflicted unjust cruelties upon the "tribes of the wandering feet"; and we may ask with Dr. Blyth, "Who can say what gloom of the 'dark ages' of the Church, and what deadness of spiritual life and influence have not resulted from the prejudice that prompted disobedience and fired persecution? . . . . Who can estimate the loss to the Christian Commonwealth through the injustice of the Church, to those on whom rests the commission of the apostle of the circumcision, 'When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren' in the faith; and whose restoration to the Church, as her missioners, was to be to her 'as life from the dead?'"

To the query, "Are there no signs of improvement in the state of the Jews of to-day?" Bishop Blyth gives noteworthy evidence:—"How startling are the facts of the day? The newspapers bristle with the movements of the Jewish people. What they now are, commercially, to the world's industries; financially to the world's progress; towards social questions and to those of peace and war, everyone knows and feels. How long will their rights in Christ be ignored? If the order to "begin" missionary work at Jerusalem was suspended only by the fact that the Jews were no longer there to begin amongst, how about the state of the Holy Land to-day? When the century opened we might scarcely count their hundreds. In 1841 they were 8,000. In 1887 they were 60,000. Now they are about 125,000, or three times as many as returned from the captivity in Babylon." (We presume these numbers are of the Jewish population, and not of converts from Judaism to Christianity). Dr. Blyth goes on to testify, "The land is also ceasing to sit desolate; it can support a larger population than it now holds. The restoration, with efficient regularity, of the 'latter rains,' for so many centuries withheld, gives back its historic fertility wherever the hand of the cultivator is upon his plough, and his sickle upon his vineyard and his fig trees. God's Providence must be concerned in bringing back the exiled race, and we note that His eye is again upon the land for good, in its necessary preparation for its inhabitants. And then, whilst everywhere there is on the surface the old prejudice against the Gentiles and the old avowal of refusal of Christ, there is a real and significant change from the bitterness of Jewish infidelity. Christ or Atheism is alternative before the Jew. The revival of a religion of types and sacrifices is impossible" (Why? See Ezek. xl.—xlviii.; Zech. xiv. 12—19). "I do not say against the spirit of this century, but against a simpler and purer dispensation from God, which has fulfilled them all. But admit as due to the indifference of Atheism amongst educated Jews, much present toleration of our faith which once they opposed; give again to education, give to friendliness to a Church and nation which recognize their claim in the brotherhood of man, due weight and influence, and still there remains a change of front towards Christianity which cannot be explained away, and which is a vast encouragement to missionary effort. There is an avowal of disapproval of the crucifixion of Christ. There is an admission of His claim to be the Messiah, at least, of the Gentiles, to be the holiest of the sons of man. The assertion of the Yemenite Jews, 'Our fathers never returned from the captivity until now, we are not chargeable with the black deed of the rulers against Jesus,' is but the expression of a wide-spread desire to reverse the imprecation of eighteen centuries past; it seems like a prayer, 'May His blood be forgiven to us and to our children!'" To this we add our "Amen."

We need quote no more from the Bishop of Jerusalem, who seems desirous of making the Church of the Hebrews the primary, or leading Church of Christendom. This would take a long time to develop so as to command the acknowledgement of the other churches, while some think it would issue in the appearance of a personal Anti-Christ. With all this we have but a minor sympathy. Our chief concern is to know that the pure unadulterated Gospel is preached. If it is, this has our best wishes, all other additional ritual being non-essential, and we can then intelligently unite with all who "pray for the peace of Jerusalem"; for assuredly "they shall prosper that love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee. Because of the House of the Lord our God, I will seek thy good" (Psa. cxxii. 6—9). The Jews, in common with the other tribes of all Israel, i.e. of the whole Hebrew nation, have an intensely interesting future before them as depicted by divine prophecy, and of which we, at present, can form but a feeble conception by the study of those divine predictions (2 Peter i. 16—21).

THE GROWTH OF POPULATION IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

THE following important article appeared in the London Standard on December 3, 1895, and should be carefully studied by our friends. It carries its own lessons with it, and has a strong bearing upon many of our prophecies, especially such as Gen. xxii. 17; Deut. xxviii. 1—13; Hosea i. 10; Ezek. xxxvii. 10; Zech. x. 6—10; &c., &c.

"THE POPULATION OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

"The question as to the growth of France and the United Kingdom respectively, in point of population, is one of more than mere idle or patriotic curiosity; it is obviously a matter of the highest practical and political moment. Few people appear adequately to realise the enormous change which has been wrought in the relative positions of the two nations in this respect in the present century, almost within the memory of persons still living. Suffice it to say that while Britain has been advancing at an increasingly rapid rate, France has been almost uniformly dropping behind, the addition she made to her population by the annexation of Savoy and Nice having been counterbalanced a few years later by the loss of Alsace-Lorraine. How the two nations now stand will appear within the next few months, when the next Quinquennial Census (1896) will be taken in France. The result promises to be a surprise both for Englishmen and for Frenchmen, for it will almost to a certainty demonstrate the fact that the United Kingdom, for the first time in history, now possesses a larger population than France.

"At the commencement of the nineteenth century, the French vastly outnumbered the British. Throughout the war against the First Napoleon, there were seven Frenchmen to every four Britons. In the year 1801 France possessed a population of between twenty-seven and twenty-eight millions (27,349,003), while the United Kingdom numbered less than sixteen millions (15,896,412). In other words, the French in 1801 outnumbered the British by eleven and a-half millions. This enormous disproportion has, however, long ago disappeared. Almost every census that has been taken in the two countries since 1801 has reduced the difference between their respective populations, and almost invariably to the advantage of Great Britain, until in 1891 it was found that the French superiority in numbers had shrunk to little more than half a million. The census which was taken in both countries in that year gave France a little over thirty-eight and one-third millions (38,343,192), and the United Kingdom rather less than thirty-eight millions (37,797,013). We observe, therefore, that during the first ninety years of the century, the increase in France was (in round numbers) only eleven millions, while in Great Britain it was twenty-two millions. That is to say, Great Britain had been increasing twice as fast as her neighbour. It then became a practical certainty that, even before the next British census of 1901, the population of the British Isles would, for the first time in the history of the two nations, be larger than that of France.

"But we have official returns, published on the authority of the two Governments, which enable us already to go further than this, and which justify us in affirming that, even at the present date (December, 1895), the population of Great Britain is larger than that of France—larger, probably, by fully one million souls. The returns relating to the births and deaths in France have in recent years been such as to inspire thoughtful and patriotic Frenchmen with the gloomiest apprehensions. They have discovered, to their surprise and alarm, that the French race, instead of increasing, have actually been declining, and that not owing to the ravages of war or disease, but chiefly as a consequence of the habits and deliberate choice of the people themselves. In proof of this statement, it is sufficient to mention one or two significant figures. In the year 1891 the number of deaths exceeded that of the births in all France by over ten thousand (10,505). In the following year (1892) the excess of deaths over births was more than twenty thousand (20,041), so that in the two years there was, apart from immigration, an actual falling-off of over thirty thousand in the French population. In 1893, it is true, there was a slight recovery, the births being about seven thousand (7,146) more than the deaths; but the balance on the three years was a decrease of over twenty-three thousand (23,400) in the total number of people of French birth in 1893 as compared with 1890. French writers have naturally taken alarm at these figures, for they suggest the ominous questions, 'Are the natives of France, then, actually on the decline? Is the population of the country henceforward destined to dwindle year by year? And if its numbers are kept up, is it to be, not by the natural increase and multiplication of the native race, but wholly and solely by the immigration of aliens?' It is already sufficiently clear that, unless there has been a change in 1894 and 1895 in regard to the births and deaths, the census of 1896 will show a decline in the numbers of the native race, and that, if there be any increase at all in the total population in 1896 as compared with 1891, it will be due exclusively to foreigners settling in the country.

"The contrast presented by the additions France and Great Britain have made to their respective population in recent years is very striking. Between the census of 1881 and 1891, Great Britain added more than two and three-quarter millions (2,862,547) to her inhabitants; France less than seven hundred thousand (671,144). In other words, the British in that decade were increasing more than four times as rapidly as the French. What is more, the drop in the case of France has been progressive, and has recently been more rapid than ever. Between 1876 and 1881 the addition to the French population was over three-quarters of a million (766,260); between 1881 and 1886 it dropped to about half a million (546,055); but between 1886 and 1891 it went down to less than a fourth of this (124,289). In these fifteen years Great Britain, on the other hand, has increased by over four and a-half millions, while France has added less than one and a-half million (Britain 4,597,019, against France 1,437,404).

"It must, moreover, be remembered, in comparing the progress and reproductive vitality of the two nations, that in spite of the enormous increase in the population of the British Isles, there has been a vast emigration of British and Irish-born persons going on throughout the nineteenth century, while from France the emigration has been relatively quite insignificant. While the British population at home has risen from less than sixteen millions (15,896,412) in 1801, to over thirty-nine millions (39,134,166) in 1895—an increase of over twenty-three millions—11,500,000 persons of British and Irish birth have left the old country for new homes over the sea. In the same period of 95 years the French have only added about 11,000,000 to their numbers at home (having increased from 27,500,000 in 1801 to, it is estimated, 38,500,000 in 1895), while the total number of emigrants of French birth in the whole of the nine and a-half decades amounts to less than 500,000. The British and Irish emigration in that period has, therefore, been equal to, if it has not outnumbered, the entire addition of the population of France and the whole of the French-born emigrants put together, while Great Britain, quite apart from her emigrants, has also added twice as many people as France to her home population.

"On all these points the French census of 1896 may be expected to throw fresh light, but it seems idle to expect that the result will show any material change in the growth of the population. It is a significant fact that marriages have for years been more numerous in France than in Britain. Thus in 1892 there were over 290,000 marriages in France, against 277,000 in the United Kingdom, and in 1893 the respective numbers were 287,000 in the former country, and only 267,000 in the latter. Yet the births in France in 1892 were but 856,000 (against 876,000 deaths), while in the United Kingdom the births numbered nearly 1,127,000 (against 725,000 deaths). In 1893 the births in France were 874,000 (against 867,000 deaths), compared with 1,147,000 births and 732,000 deaths in the British Isles. In the two years, therefore, while the deaths outnumbered the births in France by nearly 13,000, in the United Kingdom, on the contrary, the births exceeded the deaths in the same period by no less than 817,000.

"These two opposite tendencies in regard to the growth of the population in Great Britain and France—the rapid augmentation of the British race, while the French are stagnant, if not decreasing in numbers—cannot fail to have an important bearing on the mutual relations of the two Powers, as well as on their respective relations to the world at large. As we have already pointed out, it is sufficiently evident that Great Britain is already superior to France in the numbers of her population, and it may pretty safely be predicted that by 1901, when the first census of the twentieth century is taken, it will be found that the British at home have outstripped the population of France by probably about two millions, and that, too, in spite of four times as large a foreign immigration, and of a considerably larger number of marriages in France than in the United Kingdom. In fine, it is here that we have to seek the explanation of the fact that the native race of France is on the decline, and may, perhaps, be said to have begun to die out. Such a prospect may well inspire patriotic Frenchmen with despair."

The above remarkable statement shows us how God is working out His purposes by increasing His people almost miraculously, while He is lowering the strength of our great rivals, the French, whose longing for paying colonies will certainly never be gratified while they lack the people to occupy them, and whose strength at sea must diminish by reason of their failure to secure the Gates, and because of their weakness in respect to wealth, arising from the falling off of their population, to aid in earning it. The figures published by the Standard, are startling in their greatness and importance! They prove that God is fulfilling the prophecies which relate to Israel's increase before our very eyes in respect to the British people; and we are bound, in noticing the fact, to praise the Lord for His faithfulness to His promises to His people.

We conclude with a few lines from the Christian World, of recent date, which will be read with interest in connection with the above :—

"THE WORLD IN 1920.

"An anonymous political prophet has been looking ahead five-and-twenty years, and he tells us, in the Contemporary Review, that in 1920, or thereabouts, there will be only two races left of real account in the world—viz., the Anglo-Saxons and the Slavs, or, in other words, the English and Americans, and the Russians. He arrives at this conclusion from the consideration that the Anglo-Saxon race, in possession of fifteen million square miles of the earth's surface, and the Russians, with 8,660,000 square miles, are the only two races with room to expand, and as a matter of fact the birth-rate of each race is exceedingly high. Each year Russia provides a surplus population of well over two millions. By 1920 the Anglo-Saxon race will number 180 millions, with more than double that number of subjects, the Russians will number between 150 and 200 millions, and the Chinese will be 500 millions, but China is 'a dark horse.' The French are diminishing, and will have sunk to a third-rate Power, with a population under forty millions, while the Germans will outnumber the French by at least 60 per cent., and may be twice as numerous. The political deductions from these calculations are that England and Russia should come to terms, and 'divide the primacy of the world between them,' England making the sacrifices necessary to secure the consequent advantages. England should further knit the Empire together in every possible way. She should keep free from all entangling commercial treaties with foreign Powers, and from Continental alliances. This would mean increasing our navy to an equality with the combined navies of any three Powers, but as France is certain to drop out of the competition, this would only be temporary. The mysterious writer says a cardinal fact of foreign policy on which we should all be agreed is that Turkey is doomed. Not another drop of British blood nor a sovereign of British gold should, under any circumstances, be spent to save her from the inevitable and righteous consequence of her own misrule."

UNSCIENTIFIC MEASURES.

By H. R. Shaw.

As a further striking commentary upon the speech of the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour on the occasion of his receiving the deputation from certain Chambers of Commerce, to which allusion has been made in the Christmas No. of the Banner, and when the right hon. gentleman was reported to have stigmatised our British system of weights and measures as being utterly irrational, perverse, &c., the following remarks cut from a West of England newspaper, of Dec. 12, 1895, may be of interest to our readers :—

"THE SIZE OF A HALF-PENNY.

"Sir Robert Rawlinson, the great engineer, has recently been calling attention to the value of a half-penny in surveying work. That humble coin was made the size it is with a view to its being a standard of measure, and is exactly one inch in diameter. If it is placed on an Ordnance map of an inch to the mile it covers an area of 500 acres within one or two per cent., so that no one need be at a loss in roughly estimating areas. There are other coins that come in conveniently for similar purposes. A sixpence, for instance, is three-quarters of an inch across, and a half-crown is an inch and a quarter. A postage-stamp, too, is an inch high, and a Bank of England note is five inches high, the rough edge of the note and the perforation of the stamp having to be included."

It may well be doubted whether the French system, with all its boasted science and rationality, has any such group of small conveniences to shew us in the like compass, and it is worthy of special notice that the postage-stamp and the five pound note, both of them unscientific British inventions, should practically have already secured the world-wide predominancy of the despised British inch and sacred cubit fifth, as found together monumentalised it may be remembered in the breadth and thickness and eccentricity of the Boss upon the granite leaf within the Ante-chamber of the Great Pyramid in, but not of, the land of Egypt.

To these observations may now be added the additional information that three perfect penny pieces weigh exactly 1 ounce avoirdupois. This was culled from an unremembered source, 9th Dec., 1890, but may be quickly verified by our readers, who will likewise discover that six half-penny pieces also weigh an ounce when slightly worn.

GLEANINGS.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

Dear Philo-Israel,—The world, to the Israelite who obeys the command "Watch!" is like a chessboard, and the nations are the pawns, whilst Anglo-Israel and his companions are the "pieces"—king, queen, knights, bishops, and castles; and it is very interesting to note how these are all moved by Providence, who regulates all the movements of white; whilst the great adversary directs the movements of black. He also has certain nations and pieces under his control, all of which have to be taken, and he himself checkmated.

I now proceed to give you some gleanings from our leading journals as to the movements to date.

First, China and Burma:—"The Times Weekly, Nov. 29, 1895. The Burmo-Chinese Convention. Our Rangoon correspondent telegraphs: 'The pusillanimity and bad faith of China in ceding to France Mungu and Mungutai, two districts of Kiang-Hung, in breach of the conditions of the Burmo-Chinese Convention, have brought a heavy retribution. Lord Salisbury's reply to the Chinese action was to insist on the recognition of all British claims abandoned in favour of China by the Convention. At first, in the negotiations which are now practically concluded, his lordship demanded the retrocession of every scrap of territory along the frontier which was in dispute three years ago, including Sima, Latha, Hotha, Sadou, and Kokang; but later he relented somewhat, permitting China to retain Santa, Hotha, and Latha. Sima, Sadou, and the extensions of the Kachin country to the north-east of Bhama, which were given to China in 1894, are now added to Burma, which thus obtains a greatly extended frontier, the boundary to the north-east of Bhamo almost coinciding with Hobday's frontier. The future of Kokang is undecided, but it is earnestly hoped here that the State, which is the only British territory east of the Salween at that point, will be retained. The commercial importance of this State, which is on the main trade route between Burma and Eastern Yunnan, has vastly increased since it was decided to construct the Mandalay-Kunlong railway. An extension of that line to China would run through Kokang.' Our correspondent adds. 'The reference to Mungu and Mungutai, the French acquisitions, in recent reports, prove them to be worthless possessions.'"

Now, let all young Anglo-Israelites take their maps and read up "China," and they will find that this district of Eastern Yunnan contains twelve million inhabitants within 122,000 square miles. It is very mountainous and salubrious.

Second:—"Public Opinion, Nov. 29, 1895.—How the New Russian Code will affect the Jews. The Journal of the Minister of Justice published in an Appendix the proposed New Criminal Law, which has been drawn up by the Revision Committee. Chapter XII. has the following two Articles:—'Article 209.—Any person guilty of having allowed a Jewish public or communal prayer-meeting to be held in his house, or in a building belonging to him, without the license of the authorities, is liable to a penalty not exceeding three hundred roubles. Article 210.—Any person guilty of making any private building into, or of erecting a Mohammedan mosque or a Jewish synagogue or prayer house, without the necessary permission from the authorities, or at a smaller distance from a Christian church than is allowed by law, is liable to arrest for a period not exceeding three months, or to a fine not exceeding three hundred roubles.'"—Jewish Chronicle.

Third:—"News from Uganda" informs us that there are in that part of the world three hundred natives engaged in evangelistic work, without any other remuneration than food and necessary clothing, and that these missionaries are most earnest and successful in this work. Truly it may be said that Ethiopia is stretching out her hands to God.

I remain, yours truly,

W. L. Blore.

ISRAEL'S PRESENT ISOLATION.

ON all sides the statement is made that our Empire and nation are "isolated." We decline to join the Triple Alliance in Europe, or give aid to the so-called allies—the French and Russians. We are consequently despised by the continental nations, who feel safe in insulting us, and filling their journals with daily abuse of a Power which it is said never fights, and is too weak to resent injuries. They admit we have a grand navy, but while they see that our military strength is absolutely nothing, compared to their own, they think that it is safe to treat us as though we did not exist, and in fact to "isolate" us. But this is not all. If the European nations merely wished to put us on one side, and absolutely neglect us, they would be welcome to do so, as long as they pleased. But they do more than that. They envy us our wealth, our colonies, our successful government of the cheaper races, and the ease with which we make them obey us. Their envy merges into hate, and every now and again it suddenly bursts out, making us feel how dangerous are our surroundings, and how little we can depend upon the good will of our neighbours.

The tone of the European Press for a long time past has been bitterness itself against us. The French have not a good word to say of us, and the Germans, whom we always believed to be our good friends, have, it seems, been nourishing their anger against us, the acute symptom of which was the late outrageous message of the German Emperor to President Kruger of the Transvaal, congratulating him on his success against Dr. Jameson and his party of raiders, and clearly intimating to the world that he did not recognise the Suzerainty of the British over the Transvaal, but regarded the latter as independent territory.

I express to you my sincere congratulations that without appealing to the help of friendly Powers you and your people have succeeded in repelling with your own forces the armed bands which had broken into your country and in maintaining the independence of your country against foreign aggression.

There were many stings in these few words which our readers can see for themselves, and we need not point out. They are unfriendly to an old ally to the last degree; but have been applauded to the echo by the whole German nation. What can have made us so hated? Why is the chorus of hate, envy, and jealousy so general throughout the world? Why do even our brethren of Manasseh exhibit it and threaten us with war about a frontier dispute in South America, which has been going on before the States existed?

A German writer in the Times, of January 6, had an explanation which we think our readers would like to see. Writing of the events succeeding the Franco-German war he said:—

But as Russia alienated herself more and more from Germany, and as France with the most incredible vitality recovered by leaps and bounds from her wounds—showing to Germany her everlasting desire for revenge—the one wish of our great statesman must have been to draw England into the sphere of interests in which the Triple Alliance moved.

No efforts were spared to this end; while, at the same time the newly-formed Franco-Russian understanding was working for an identical object.

All in vain! England forgot completely that, with the enormous armaments established by all the Continental Powers, she would soon find herself in different circumstances from those in which she has occupied one of the prominent positions in the world. To develop her interests, her commerce, her colonies; to fight her petty wars as they arose; to avoid exhausting, like her neighbours, her vast resources in gigantic armaments; to try and live in peace with all the other Powers, wishing to harm none and not needing the help of any of them, to do her duty by herself and those who depend upon her—these politics, which her geographical position justified for centuries, and which would be the ideal of the world, if everybody thought so, or was allowed to think so, made her blind against her growing isolation and the growing hatred of all the Continental nations. The two great European groups learned to hate her, not only because they considered her ways those of selfishness and insular indifference, but, most of all, because they were foiled in their own plans through England's sticking to her traditions of neutrality. Each hoped to gain so much from England siding with them. The ensuing disappointment has produced the unanimous condemnation of that "selfish English policy." Hence the universal hatred with which she is pursued to-day, and which to her, innocent as she feels herself, is a matter of utter astonishment.

Not the envy of England's world-wide position, although it may have contributed to it, but the disgust at never having their own ends furthered by England's help, has united the two camps of Europe in their hatred of her. What actual wrongs they may have received from her count for nothing against this principal cause.

Germany at this moment hates her more bitterly than any other nation does, because she had to give up more through England's keeping aloof than any other. She has lost, in part, the supremacy on the Continent gained by Bismarck's genius; she sees Russia in the ascendant now, and she had to make various sacrifices before she secured her future peace by seconding Russia, which is to-day well-nigh the master of the European situation.

All the rage of this disappointment speaks in the violence of the German official, and in fact of the whole Press, the whole nation. "What could the Triple Alliance have become with England?" This is the key to their hatred.

And worst of all for England, as she continued always true to her old traditions to consider herself grand and safe without throwing herself into the European mêlee, she did not see that she is on the verge of becoming a quantité négligeable in the European concert. True, her fleet is the first still, her wealth, her commerce the first, and she ranks behind none in science, in literature, in civilization.

But Europe is a camp; and if it came to fighting, England, with all her wealth and position, would rank as a second-class Power, because she has not the number of soldiers, not sufficient armament for a great struggle.

With the growing hatred on the Continent a kind of contempt has grown; and a kind of sneering Schadenfreude that she gets what she seems to the others to have deserved. They are grouped, as they wanted or were forced to be; England is left in the cold, and nobody minds her.

With this contempt is mingled in Germany, more than anywhere else, irritation arising from a continuous series of mistakes in her own colonial politics. What between Government and Parliaments, Germany has missed every single chance of forming a colonial empire, as she might have done; and now she not only sees France arrive at this desideratum, but she sees England more powerful than ever in the one continent the opening of which is the marvel of this age. Many of our German blunders we call English perfidy in Africa, and we abuse her for it.

All this is not a beautiful spectacle which Europe now presents. But if the Powers, all of them, are unanimous, must it not strike you that much of the fault lies with England?

She cannot continue to sit in the midst of a tavern-brawl, while all hit one another, and pretend herself that she is there to take her morning cocoa as a peaceful citizen.

She can only do one thing—arm herself, like everybody else. No other remedy is left to her. A man need not fight, like our students, for the least-provoking look of a boy of another "colour," but he must be able to stand his ground amongst his equals. If they are armed to the teeth, he must do the same. The times of hiring soldiers, when all nations are armies, are past. Nor is personal bravery of much use in these days without preparation.

If you introduce universal service and spend some of your wealth in arming yourself in the same way the others are armed, in a very few years—because you have the best of material that our common Germanic race can give—you will regain all you have lost. And as soon as you are feared again, and then continue with your traditional policy, every one of the Continental Powers will judge you differently from what they do now.

The deplorable antipathy with which at this moment your German brothers are filled against you will disappear, not because we should fear you, but because we understand you and appreciate you.

There are some admissions in the above which we should note. First that the Germans envy us. Next that they have failed to obtain a colonial empire like our own, while the French seem to have succeeded, and the Empire of Africa is to a large extent British. What the Germans will never see us do is to undertake enormous military armaments founded on conscription in order that we may help to fight their battles and so ruin ourselves with them.

The fact is this. The British being Israel, God has in store for us a very different destiny from that. He positively forbids us to arm and fight the battles of our Gentile neighbours. We are, on the contrary, to isolate ourselves, and hide ourselves for a time in our chambers with our doors shut behind us, in order to escape their coming divinely inflicted punishments. This is clearly stated in Isa. xxvi. 20, 21; Zeph. iii. 8, 9; and Luke xxi. 25—28, R.V. In Isa. xlii. 16 He tells us that as a blind people, He means to guide us and safeguard us till He brings us into the light, and for crooked things bestow on us things that are straight. He assures us finally that "He will never leave us, nor forsake us." He confirms His goodwill towards His people by telling them, as He does in Isa. liv. 15—17, R.V., "Behold they may gather together (margin 'stir up strife') but not by Me. Whosoever shall gather together (or stir up strife) against thee shall fall because of thee. Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the fire of coals, and bringeth forth a weapon for his work; and I have created the waster to destroy. No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness, which is of Me, saith the Lord."

We have thus great consolation in the midst of our discouragements and troubles in British Guiana and the United States, also in the Transvaal wherein the German Emperor desires to interfere as the arbiter of treaties between the British and the Boer Government. In vain! He has thought to form a weapon against us, but it shall not prosper, and by his message to President Kruger to rise in judgment against us, but we have already condemned him in the name of the Lord, and rising up like a lion are bidding the nations to cease their clamour, for Israel's ships are to issue forth in the service of the great King. To Him be all the praise.

THE JEWS OF MODERN TIMES; AND, IN CONTRAST, "THE ISRAEL OF GOD."

THERE seems a wonderful unanimity among men in regard to the fact that the Jews to-day fulfil the Scriptures. Their present condition is actually advanced even in the secular press, as an evidence, which no one can deny, that the Scriptural prophecies respecting them, at any rate, are true. The Liverpool Courier in October last published several letters, some in favour of, and others opposed to the Jews. One of these we quote, as showing the points which the correspondent relies upon to demonstrate the remarkable manner in which the Jews of modern days respond to the Scriptures of truth. He was preceded by an apologist for the Jews, to whom "an Englishman" answered that the Jews must be a bad race indeed, since they have been caricatured as "dishonest money-getters by every race in Europe and America in the present day, and have also borne an evil reputation for centuries"! He added, that as "human parasites they feed on their fellow-men, though (he admitted) all Jews were not dishonest. There are some honest Jews, as there are some brave Chinamen!"

The next writer was R. Griffiths, whose letter we quote in full, as follows:—

To the Editor of the "Liverpool Courier."

Sir,—Would you please allow me to say a few words in explanation of why the Jews are held up to popular contempt?

Frederick the Great, on one occasion, said to one of his marshals, who was a devout believer, "Give me in one word, proof of the truth of the Bible." "The Jews," was the laconic reply, and on reading the prophecies of Moses one cannot help being struck with their wonderful fulfilment in these people. On turning to Deut. xxviii., we find the promise, that if "Israel hearkened to observe and do all the commandments of God, the Lord would set them on high above all nations of the earth and abundantly bless them with cities, offspring, fields, fruits, cattle," etc., and all the people of the earth should look upon them as wonderfully blessed of God. On the contrary, if they departed from God and refused to obey His commandments and laws they were to be terribly cursed. Among the many prophetic curses uttered against the Jews, we find they were to be scattered among all nations; they should have no power to withstand their enemies; they are to be oppressed and spoiled evermore, and no man shall save them; they are to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, to be a reproach, a proverb, a bye-word, a taunt, and a curse in all places whither the Lord shall drive them.

Space will not allow me to show how these people have suffered throughout all history; how they were murdered, and dispersed by the Romans at the destruction of Jerusalem; how they were banished from Alexandria (their safest resort) in the fifth century; how they were persecuted in Spain, and then in France; how Mahomet in the Koran infused a spirit of deadly enmity into the millions of his followers; how they were persecuted by the Church of Rome; at Beziers they were attacked with stones from Palm Sunday to Easter Monday; how 170,000 families were expelled from Spain; how thousands were massacred at Treves, Spires, and Mentz; how in England, during the crusades, the whole nation joined in massacring and pillaging them; how 1,500 perished at York. But I must stop; the catalogue is too long to be mentioned here. But let me just notice the persecutions that took place in Turkey, Egypt, Arabia, Portugal, Prussia, and Germany—I need hardly mention Russia.

That the Jews are a proverb and bye-word in the land I think the present correspondence in your paper sufficiently proves.

Yours, &c.,

R. GRIFFTHS.

Liverpool, Oct. 28.

In Deut. xxviii. 37, it was predicted of Israel disobedient that "they should become an astonishment, a proverb, and a bye-word among all nations whither the Lord should drive them." In 1 Kings ix. 7, Israel disobedient was threatened, likewise, with outcasting from the sight of the Lord, and should "be a proverb, and a bye-word among all people." In Jer. xxiv. 8, it was declared by the Lord, of Judah, represented by the bad figs, that they and their king should be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, to be a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse in all places whither I shall drive them." In respect to the Jews, disobedient to the Lord Jesus Christ their King, they have, indeed, right up to this hour, literally fulfilled the prophecies of the Holy Scriptures, as even the secular journalists and their correspondents amply prove. They are suffering the Lord's anger, for their provocation to this day. But why does the correspondent stop there? If Israel disobedient has suffered, does not the prophecy of Deut. xxviii. 1—14 contemplate the existence of Israel obedient? Surely it does; and other Scriptures tell us what blessings they shall certainly enjoy. Hosea i. 10, is the proof.

In Deut. xxviii. 1—14, we have the obedient portion of the race blessed as R. Griffiths describes they were to be, "Set high above all nations of the earth, as the head and not the tail, above only, and not beneath;" blessed as to their cities, offspring, fields, fruits, cattle, kine, and sheep. In Hosea i. 10, we have the unconditional promise of the Lord to Israel of the Ten Tribes, after all their terrible curses and punishments, restored to God's favour as to temporal blessings, and as to spiritual gifts as well, thus: "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass that in the place where it was said to them, Ye are not My people (Lo-ammi) it shall be said unto them, Ye (are) the sons of the living God." The matter being thus certain, why do men fail with their best endeavours to find this so lost and so blessed Israel among the nations distinguished for vast and incredible population-increase, as well as by the pure faith of Christian believers, so pure and bright, that men seeing them must recognise "the sons of the living God," or believers on the name of their Lord Jesus Christ? (John i. 12, R.V.)

The search, we promise them, would not be in vain! For the marks which serve to instantly detect the Jews to-day, R. Griffiths being the judge, would surely tell all honest men what nation is described in Deut. xxviii. 1—14! Hosea i. 10, supplies some of the clues. Deut. xv. 6 and Zech. x. 6—9, R.V., gives others. Isa. xviii. 1, 7, furnish valuable hints. Matt. xxi. 43; Isa. xxvii. 6; Gen. xxii. 17, 18, xxviii. 14, and xxxv. 11, besides many another text, point with one accord to "the isles afar off" from Palestine (Jer. xxxi. 10), and to "the isles of the west," or sea (Isa. xxv. 15), as the habitation of lost Israel, the mighty owner of three Empires—namely, that of her colonies (Gen. xxxv. 11; xlviii. 19), of the oceans of the globe (Gen. xxii. 17), and of the heathen world (Psa. cxi. 6; Psa. ii. 8; and Rev. ii. 26, 27, R.V.).

It is strange that those whose mental vision is so acute that they never fail to point out the Jews as the present sufferers from the curse pronounced against "Israel disobedient," cannot in the faintest way see, that the British are to-day blessed with all the gifts God promised to bestow upon "Israel" unconditionally (Gen. xxii. 17—18), and that of the large and glorious number of such blessed gifts, our nation enjoys them all exclusively, while all the other nations, the Jews especially, enjoy not so much as even one! Yet this is the case! and while men like the Rev. J. C. S. Kroénig, vicar of Hull, and many others like him, admit that it is so, they strenuously deny that the British can be "lost Israel," but are a Gentile race to whom God has given Israel's blessings during a sort of Gentile parenthesis, contrary to His oath, His covenants, and His promises, which were all in Israel's favour, and never breathed a word about "the Gentile parenthesis" or any such modern invention of the opponents, who refuse to take God at His word in regard to Israel's blessings. Yet they are glad at the same time, to saddle the Jew with all His terrible curses, which are held up as decisive proofs of God's unflinching faithfulness and truth! Well may a friend remark, on this subject lately, that "the blessings that have been vouchsafed to Israel of the Ten Tribes are quite as strong as the curses inflicted on the Jews." The fact is so; and let Israel therefore praise the Lord, and give Him all the glory!

THE FIRST JEW AND THE WORST JEW.

By H. R. Shaw.

One of the greatest obstacles to the spread of Anglo-Israel truth is the unaccountable blindness displayed by most people, especially Bible-reading Christians, to the difference between an Israelite and a Jew. Because our Lord and Saviour came to His own people and they received Him not, and because that people, called at that time Jews, were then, as now, the only visible representatives of the once mighty nation of Israel, it seems to be quietly taken for granted that the less includes the greater, instead of the greater including the less; and that it is not the Assyrians or the wilderness of the North and West, or the Isles afar off, but the Jews that have swallowed up the lost tribes of Israel and left their splendid heritage to be taken up by a mixed company of Gentiles; and so when an average Briton is told for the first time that he is an Israelite he most likely smiles incredulously, shrugs his shoulders, and answers in the words of Pontius Pilate, "Am I a Jew?" Instances of this mental confusion have, no doubt, been met with by most of us, and a recent experience of the present writer seems worthy of placing on record in the Banner.

A short time ago, being desirous of conveying a little elementary Anglo-Israel instruction to the mind of a young Christian friend, who was well past the years of childhood, and by no means unacquainted with our views concerning Holy Scripture, I ventured to propound to my correspondent a query of which the title of this paper forms a portion—viz., "Name the first Jew and the worst Jew mentioned in the Bible, and state in what point of character or notable action of their respective lives do they resemble each other, if at all." And this was the young Christian's answer:—"If by the term Jew is understood God's chosen people, Abram was the first. The Jews traced their descent to him and said, 'We have Abraham to our father.' Judas Iscariot seems to have been, as far as one can judge, the worst Jew, for his betrayal of our Lord led to the crucifixion. Judas, however, may not have been worse than others who indulge in like passions, but his led to the most awful results. Abraham and Judas resemble each other in that they are both spoken of as God's friends. Abraham was called the friend of God. Our Lord said to Judas, 'Friend, wherefore art thou come?'"

This solution of the query, which cannot be said to be lacking in ingenuity, may be taken as conveying a fair idea of the prevailing state of mind of the average Bible-reader regarding Israel. Of course, I was obliged to explain to my young friend that in my opinion the term "Jew" does not exhaust the chosen people of God who had two chosen families or nations, of whom the first-born was Ephraim-Israel; but that a Jew is a man of Judah, and whether by Judah is understood the kingdom of Judah, as left to Rehoboam, the son of David, or whether we merely take the name as descriptive of the actual tribe of Judah, it must be granted that the "first Jew" was the man from whom all these Jews derived their distinctive name—viz., Judah the patriarch, the fourth son of Jacob (Gen. xxix. 35). The worst Jew, it may be unreservedly admitted, was Judas Iscariot, the Lord's disciple.

Before discussing the actions or character of these two Jews, it may be pointed out as a remarkable coincidence that their names were the same, Judas being only the Greek reading for Hebrew Judah. The point of character in which they resembled each other was one which it is scarcely uncharitable to say is a very particular inheritance to this day amongst Judah's children—viz., commercial shrewdness, degenerating sometimes into mercenary meanness, a characteristic not quite absent from some of the dealings of his father Jacob, nor yet, it must be confessed, confined to Judah alone in these days.

As regards Judas Iscariot, his special crime of selling his Lord for thirty pieces of silver was engendered of his covetousness—"he was a thief and had the bag" (John xii. 6; Matt. xxvi. 14, 15). And the original Judah displays something exactly similar in his dealing with his young brother Joseph, as from the account given in Gen. xxxvii. it may be perceived that it was Judah who was the man of business, who thought it would be as well to turn a thievish penny instead of committing murder, and it was by his advice that Joseph was sold for the twenty pieces of silver; and I think we generally understand from Matt. xxvii. 3 that Judas Iscariot had no intention of being the death of his Master, but had expected that the Lord would deliver Himself from His enemies by some miraculous proceeding, as on former occasions, and so when his ingenious little plot proved a failure he gave way to despair and committed suicide.

As Israelites of the Northern Kingdom, however, venturing thus to notice the mote in the eye of our neighbour Judah, we must never forget that both of these tragedies were fore-ordained of God, and that each of them was designed for the ultimate redemption and blessing of Twelve-tribed Israel; and viewed in this light it seems scarcely possible to withhold, at any rate, our human sympathy from Judah, or even from Judas Iscariot, both of whom came to ruin, the one as a man and the other as a nation, in order that we and the rest of the world might have the blessing of everlasting salvation. Truly "the Son of man goeth as it was written of Him, but woe unto that man by whom He is betrayed; and truly, we may say, woe came in abundance to Judah the patriarch, when he stood with his ten brethren before the mighty lord of Egypt, the disguised Joseph, humbly begging permission to be made a bondman, and expecting little else than to be immediately ordered for execution (Gen. xliv. 16—33). Nevertheless, by the word of this same Joseph (xlv. 5, 7, 8) it was God, not Judah, who sent him down to Egypt to save the lives of Israel by a great deliverance.

Before leaving the subject of the treachery of Judas Iscariot, it might be interesting to note the number of the thirty pieces of silver, the price of Him that was valued, as being emphatically in accord with the numbers forming the root of the name Jehovah, the God of Israel, whom we, as Christians, claim to be the same person as Christ. Five, alternating with six, is what the Hebrew Kabbalist reads in the body of the Sacred Name, and it has been many times told in the Banner how these numbers are to be read off in the Biblical records of the temples, tabernacles, and various sacred buildings of Israel, not to mention times and seasons, and various natural and human phenomena, all of which acknowledge or speak of the God of Israel by these two numbers. Could it have occurred to the chief priests, when they had covenanted with Judas and were counting out to him his thirty pieces of silver, that they were profaning the great Name which it was their special office to protect from insult, inasmuch as they were purchasing the human body of the owner of that name for a number of coins, 6×5, which expressed the roots of the name in emphatic form? Perhaps it did so occur to them, and they may even have remembered their little encounter with Him recorded in John viii., and may even then have been saying among themselves words of similar import to those recorded to have been uttered by their forefathers at Dothan, when, seeing young Joseph approaching, they said one to another, "Come, let us slay him; and then we shall see what will become of his dreams," or as the husbandmen of Matt. 21—28 said also among themselves, "This is the heir; come, let us kill Him, and let us seize on His inheritance."

SIDE-LIGHTS.

In Sir Herbert Maxwell's "Post Meridiana" we read:—"There is another remarkable feature about these gatherings [the Isthmian Games]—namely, the unchanging character of the performance enacted at them. Assuming the era of Homer to have been five centuries earlier than the inauguration of the Isthmian Games—that is, about B.C. 1000—the sports which he enumerates as taking place at the funeral of Patroclus were identical not only with those of the Olympian, Nemean, and Isthmian celebrations, but strangely similar to a programme of the present day. Chariot and foot races, boxing, wrestling, putting the stone, are counterparts of competitive exercises of the nineteenth century."

The following extract is from "The Gurneys of Earlham," by Augustus J. C. Hare:—

"Joseph John Gurney wrote: 'Norwich, Sept., 1811. Nothing could be better contrived than our Bible Society meeting. . . . The mayor looked magnificent, with his gold chain, in the chair. The bishop first harangued, and admirably well, upon the excellence of the British and Foreign Bible Society—its object, constitution, and effects. He then introduced the secretaries. Steinkopf, a most interesting German and Lutheran, and, as far as I can judge from an acquaintance of three days, a remarkably simple and devoted character, first came forward. . . . He was followed by Hughes, the Baptist secretary—an eloquent, solid, and convincing orator. The company was now ready for the resolutions. The bishop proposed them, I seconded them; and, after I had given a little of their history and purport, they were carried with acclamation. This was a great relief, as we trembled at the idea of discussion. The bishop was thanked for his liberality. It was really delightful to hear an old Puritan and a modern bishop saying everything that was kind and Christian-like of each other. The bishop's heart seemed quite full, and Primitive Kinghorn, when the bishop spoke of him so kindly, seemed ready to sink into the earth with surprise and terrified modesty. . . . We had a vast party at Earlham, and a remarkable day—a perfectly harmonious mixture of High Church, Low Church, Lutheran, Baptist, Quaker! It was a time which seemed to pull down all barriers of distinction, and to melt us all into one common Christianity.'

"John Tulwin Sherwell writes: 'Oct. 18, 1811. The opening of the Auxiliary Bible Society at Norwich has been delightful. At five we adjourned to Earlham Hall to dinner, where we sat down, thirty-four in number, a mixture of different sects and persuasions. Words fail to express the delightful harmony of our feelings. Soon after the cloth was removed, our dear friend Elizabeth Fry knelt down, and in a sweet and impressive manner implored the divine blessing upon the company present, and for the general promotion of truth upon earth. On her rising, the secretary, Joseph Hughes (a Dissenting minister), observed in a solemn manner: "Now of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but that in every age and nation those who fear Him and work righteousness are accepted of Him," and the conversation, becoming general, flowed on in a strain which assuredly has less in it of earth than heaven.'"

The italics are mine in the foregoing extract, which gives a remarkable instance of an united effort made by members of differing sects for the promotion of God's glory and the salvation of their fellow-men, by the spreading far and wide of the Bible. I question whether any but Israel's people, even amongst Protestant nations, could claim a similar triumph over sectarian prejudices through zeal for the Lord's work. How the hearts of these witnesses for God would have rejoiced if, with the "foreseeing eye," they could have seen our loved Queen with her own hand giving to the African chief and his companions Bibles printed in the language of their country!

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE CROWN COLONIES.

Mr. Chamberlain's Projects.

It is understood (says the St. James's Gazette) that Mr. Chamberlain intends to begin at once with his plan for the development of the Crown Colonies, and that his time up to the reassembling of Parliament will be much taken up with settling the preliminaries of his scheme. It will be remembered that certain surveys have been made in Sierra Leone, Lagos, and the Gold Coast, for the purpose of laying down short railways. Mr. Chamberlain, we have reason to know, intends to develop this system of railway communication into the interior for the purpose of opening up the Hinterland. Together with Lord Salisbury he has also been working hard at the solution of the Venezuelan difficulty, with the object of utilising the vast resources of British Guiana. Gold is known to exist there in payable quantities, and if only the Imperial Government were to give some kind of encouragement to individual effort it may be assumed that the necessary capital for mining purposes would be forthcoming. Another colony which it is supposed will occupy the attention of Mr. Chamberlain is Dominica. Not very long ago a Royal Commission enquired into the domestic affairs of the island, with the result that the undeveloped state of the country was fully brought to the notice of the Government. Mr. Chamberlain's attention has for some time been directed to the island, and doubtless it will probably find a place in his programme for assisting the Crown Colonies. Rumour has it also that the Government will shortly consider the question of Cyprus. Ever since we entered into occupation of that island there has been a deficit of close upon £30,000 annually in the annual balance-sheet of the local expenses; and although Parliament has yearly placed that sum to the credit of Cyprus, the Treasury have absorbed the money in order to pay the Turkish bondholders, with the result that Cyprus has not benefited by the allowance at all. The problem which the Government have to solve is how Cyprus is to be developed. If nothing is done to bring the country into closer touch with the European ports, it is impossible to take due advantage of its commercial possibilities. Irrigation works are sorely needed, and proper harbour accommodation is absolutely necessary if Cyprus is to cease being a burden upon the Imperial Exchequer. It must be remembered that the local authorites have to find over £90,000 annually to pay the Sultan of Turkey out of a revenue of not much beyond £200,000. This in itself is a considerable charge upon the income of the island, and, as it cannot be avoided unless the Government come to its aid, the resources of Cyprus, without Imperial intervention, will remain undeveloped, to the great disadvantage of the British taxpayer. —From the Birmingham Daily Post, Nov. 4, 1895.

SOME NOTES ON ANCIENT ERIN.

By the Rev. J. F. Lynch.

I have just read the paper on "Early Britain," in the November number of the Banner, which I would like to supplement with a few remarks on Ancient Erin. Many of the manners and customs of the Celt still survive in Erin, while in England they have long since passed away, so that it is in Ireland, and not in England, that information must be sought concerning the powerful race which once owned western Europe.

Some writers deny altogether that writing was practised by the Irish Celts before the arrival of St. Patrick in 432. This seems to me to be an absurd statement, for many Christian Missionaries had come to Ireland before that date, of which there is abundant proof, and they would necessarily have introduced the use of letters; but there is also a positive statement in the ancient Tripartite life of St. Patrick, that the Druids possessed many books, and this is substantiated by a passage from the works of a Greek traveller named Æthicus, who is asserted to have belonged to the second century. Æthicus says, "He hastened to Ireland and made some stay there, examining their volumes."

In Ireland, also, over two hundred inscriptions in a very Old Alphabet called Ogham, have been discovered. Mr. Brash, who devoted considerable attention to the study of Ogham, is of opinion, that many of these inscriptions belong to a very early period, and that Ogham was introduced into Ireland by an immigrant race, who landed in the South of Ireland, where most of the inscriptions have been found. Mr. Rhys remarks, that the circumstance of Ogham inscriptions existing both in Ireland and Wales, which present grammatical forms, agreeing with those of the Gaulish linguisitic monuments, is enough to show that some of the Celts of the islands wrote their language before the fifth century, the time at which Christianity is supposed to have been introduced into Ireland. My opinion is, that the race who introduced Ogham into Ireland are the Iverni, given in Ptolemy's map as inhabiting the district now included under counties Kerry, Cork, Limerick, and Tipperary.

Ptolemy's map was drawn up in the first half of the second century, but his work is the copy of another, written by Marinus of Tyre, and the latter is believed to have copied an ancient Tyrian Atlas, which was composed from materials supplied by Phœnician voyageurs. These Iverni or Iberians came from the borders of the Caspian Sea. This is stated in the "Leabhar Gabhala, or Book of the Invasions." North of Armenia, it will be remembered, there was a province anciently called Iberia. In the "Book of Leinster" there is a quotation from the "Cin of Drom Snechta," of which the following is a translation:—

"Historians say that there were exiles of Hebrew women in Erin at the coming of the sons of Milesius, who had been driven by a sea-tempest into the ocean by the Tirrean Sea. They were in Erin before the sons of Milesius."

The tradition concerning the book called "Cin of Drom Snechta" is, that it was written before St. Patrick's time. It was from those Iberians that Ireland received its name of Erin. In St. Patrick's confession the name in Latin is Iberio, the old Welsh form is Iweredon, so that Erin is no doubt a contraction of a form such as Iberend. I think this name Iberia also assumed the form Ara. The genitive case of Ara is Arand. Tiobraid Arand is the old Irish name of Tipperary. It means the well of the Ara. In County Limerick there is a hill called Knockaney, which means the hill of Anu; in County Kerry. near Killarney, are the Paps, the name in Irish being da chich Anu, the two Paps of Anu. In Irish mythology Anu is a chief deity, and is the same in Babylonian mythology. In County Clare there is a well-known plain, Magh Adar. Some explain this as meaning the plain of devotion, others the plain of Adar, a mythical Firbolg Chief.

Adar was the name of an Eastern Fire-god. Traces of fire worship still exist in Ireland, for bonfires are lighted throughout the country on St. John's Eve. The early Christian missionaries, not being able to eradicate the custom, changed the date of the lighting of the fires, from La Bealltaine (May Day) to the eve of St. John's festival. This was done in honour of St. John, who was a burning and a shining light. Bealltaine has nothing to do with Baal, as I saw noted some time ago in the Banner. It simply means "goodly fire," from the two Celtic words "Bel" good, and "Tine" a fire.

When St. Patrick came to Ireland, he found the people worshipping at wells, in which some of their deities were said to reside. Throughout Ireland at the present day there are numberless holy wells, at which people pray, and go round the well sunwise, three times barefoot. This is called "paying rounds." In some of these wells there are "blessed" trout, which perform wonderful cures amongst the diseased folk who patronise them. To the bushes growing beside these wells, rags and other things are fastened. Travellers in Persia say the same of that country. Perhaps the blessed trout may find its parallel in the fish-god of the Philistines.

Pliny informs us, that the Gaulish Druids had a serpent's egg suspended by a string from their necks, and tells a wild story of the mode in which this egg was procured. This egg corresponds to the Khosen mispat which was the receptacle of the Urim and the Thummim. I have no doubt, whatever, but that the serpent was once worshipped in Erin. Our old literature is simply packed with stories of the terrible combats which the mythical heroes of Irish romance waged with them. Cuchullin of the first century, and Finn Mac Cumhaill of the third century, killed untold numbers of them, and St. Patrick of the fifth century, standing on the top of Croagh Egli, a holy mountain in County Mayo, banished what was left into the Atlantic Ocean. And yet, there were never any serpents in Ireland, for Solinus, who wrote before the birth of our Lord, mentions that there were no serpents, but few birds, and no hive bees in Ireland.

Keating, the Irish Historian, says, that the banner of the Milesian invaders of Ireland was a serpent twisted round a staff after the manner of their Gadelian forefathers. At the present day nearly every lake in Ireland has some story about an enormous serpent. In the early Christian Art of Ireland the serpent is very much used for ornamentation.

The Celts had their sacred groves in which they worshipped, and paid great reverence to the oak, from the Celtic name of which the word Druid is derived. That the idolatrous Israelites also regarded with reverence the oak, we know from Isaiah i. 2—9, and other passages. Stones were also superstitously regarded by the idolators of Israel, as they were in Erin St. Patrick on one occasion is said to have thrown down the chief idol of Erin, a large pillar stone, called Cenn Cruaich. It was covered with gold, and twelve other stones, ornamented with brass, stood around it. Near the shores of Lough Gur, County Limerick, there is a pillar stone of which the name, Cloughavilla, means the stone of the sacred tree. This combination of stone and tree is very remarkable. The same combination occurs in Judges ix. 6. Erin must have been a very well-known country in ancient times, for Tacitus says that "its road-steads and harbours were better known by commercial intercourse, and to merchants than those of Britain." "Melius aditus portusque per commercia et negociatores cogniti." Mr. Reep's remark, that "though common among the ancient nations of the East, and in the wars of the Hebrews, the custom of fighting with chariots is said to have been confined to the Britons," is not quite correct. The three great divisions of the Celts made use of chariots in war; of this there is no doubt. The Roman writers tell us that the British and the Gaulish Celts did so, and the ancient Irish writers say the same of their own countrymen. The Gaulish word for chariot is esseda, the term for the British chariot is cygwein, the covinus of the Romans, and the Irish chariot is called Cath carpat catha or serda, battle chariot of battle or serrated, because being closely spiked, it presented the edge appearance of a saw. Professor O'Beirne Crowe collects the following description of the Irish war chariot from the ancient records: "That its framework was made of wood; that its body was formed of wicker-work on a strong sloping frame and was very high; that like Gaulish this body was occasionally adorned with tin; that it had two projecting, quite straight, hind shafts; that it had a pole, occasionally made of white silver, to which a single yoke for two horses was attached; that it had two wheels, only sometimes all of iron or of brass, about three feet in diameter; that it had a regular hood and interior furniture; that the chariot when used in war was covered along the edges, and in every available point with hooks and nails and spikes, &c., both for defensive and offensive purposes."

Britain, I think, is to be derived from two Celtic words signifying painted and district, and took its name from the custom of the inhabitants painting themselves blue. The Irish on the other hand must, I think, have painted themselves red. I am of opinion, that the Picts and the so-called Milesians were one and the same people. The story of the Spanish Colonisation of Ireland, I regard as a fiction. The ancient inhabitants of Erin came to the country immediately from Britain. The Irish name for Picts is Cruithni, which means red. The native Irish wheat, for instance, which was of a reddish colour, was termed Cruithneachd. Extraordinary romances are weaved about the coming of the Picts to Ireland, and our old annalists endeavour to distinguish between them and the Milesians, and say that the latter provided them with wives and packed them off to Scotland, or Alba, as it was known then, before it borrowed the name Scotia, from Erin. Quantities of red pigment have been found on the sites of cronnogs, or lake dwellings, in Ireland. A superstitious regard must have been paid to these colouring matters in all ages, for it has been remarked that the practice of interring war paint with the dead is still observed among the North American Indians.

"The paints that warriors love to use,
Place here within his hand;
That he may shine with ruddy hues,
Amidst the Spirit Land."

JEWISH PAUPER ALIENS.

A REMARKABLE series of papers appeared in the Daily Graphic on Oct. 17 and following dates respecting the "Influx of pauper aliens" being mostly Jews. The object of the papers is to prove that the Russian and Polish Jews who have hitherto invaded our shores, are not formidable at all in numbers, and that they do our labouring classes no real harm, but good. In 1881, there were only 15,271 Russian and Polish Jews in the United Kingdom; in 1891, 47,695; the increase being only 3,200 a year.

Few go to Scotland, or Ireland. They congregate mostly in three spots; the East End of London, Manchester, and Leeds. They congregate in Whitechapel; 1st, because there alone they can speak their own language, knowing no English on arrival; 2nd, there they can enjoy the blessing of a common religion; 3rd, there they can find food prescribed by their national customs; 4th, they can there assemble in the Jewish Synagogues; and 5th, work on the English Sunday. They do not undersell and starve our poorer labourers, because, in truth, the Jews refuse to take the worst paid work. The Jewish workmen and work-women make as good daily earnings as their English fellows. The Jewish girls, as a rule, earn more for a day's work than English women and girls. The Jewish immigrants, as workmen, do not deprive our poor of work. On the contrary, they consume as well as produce; and, as a consequence, give employment to many more. Since the Jews have settled down as operatives in the boot trade in England, the export in that branch has increased by 228,000 dozens of pairs; the imports have increased by only 12,000 dozens. A part of this enormous increase is due to the Jewish immigration; and as to "the ready-made clothing trade," it is practically a new trade, of Jewish creation. In regard to the accusation that these immigrants become a charge upon the British ratepayer, it is asserted by the writer in the Daily Graphic, that "Jew pays for Jew" in this matter. The rich Jews look after the poorer Jews.

There are "the Jewish Free Shelter for Immigrants" arriving in London, then the Jewish Free School, and lastly, the Jewish Board of Guardians. These and other institutions paid for by Jews, support the pauper aliens. A handful of Jews, it is true, are paupers, and some few are in the workhouses, but thousands are ratepayers. Jews arriving, have frequently a little money in hand. To save this, they are directed to the Jewish Shelter in Leman Street, and are there provided with shelter free of cost for a fortnight. The Jews arriving, are in a position to leave again in a few days for destinations abroad. They depart for the United States, South America, Canada, Australasia, Africa, and the United Kingdom. The mass goes to the Continent. The departure of these immigrant Jews to the Cape has become important. On arrival at the Cape the Jews are absorbed at once into the general population. They do very well once they have settled at the Cape.

The chief attraction the foreign Jews find to draw them to Whitechapel, is "the Jewish Free School for boys and girls." This is believed to be the largest school in the world.

Digitized by Google

The average attendance is about 3,500 children. This vast assemblage of children under one roof consists of children born abroad, or of foreign-born Jewish parents. The children who enter know mostly nothing of English. When they leave they know English well. This school is known all over Poland, for the education is religious and Jewish. The schooling is free. Free meals are given to the children needing food, and in some cases free clothing. Not all Jewish parents will accept these free gifts; they are too proud to do so, and pay for them. This great school turns out its little Jewish pupils and converts them into English boys and girls. "This school" says the Daily Graphic, "supported by Jewish subscriptions, is, in effect, a huge factory for the production of English citizens from foreign material."

The Jewish Board of Guardians does a good work as regard the Jewish immigration, but possesses no workhouse. The relief of the distress falls heavily on the Jewish community here, and they strive to check the immigration. They send on to America or the British Colonies about 3,000 of the immigrants every year, and strive to deter fresh paupers coming by circulating information in Poland as to the miseries of London among the poor. The American Government have tried to check their pauper Jewish immigration, but with poor success. In 1892, they turned back 2,137 applicants, but in the same year 372,000 were allowed to land in the States. Anyone is allowed to land who states he is going to join a relation. For a small consideration, agents will find for "the pauper alien as many kinsfolk as he cares to ask for," and so secure a right to land. We cannot well refuse to allow the Jews to land in England when our own people wander over and settle in all lands. "On the basis of freedom we have built up the greatest Empire in the world. For centuries it has been our boast that the oppressed of all nations could find refuge on our shores. Are we to forget the splendid traditions, part and parcel of our national life, in order to exclude a few hundred aliens, fleeing to us for protection against foreign tyranny and bringing us the benefit of their industry?" "These Poles and Russians, with their barbarous jargon and their unsavoury habits, become, in the second generation, if not in the first, English in language, English in habit, and English in loyalty; they become our people." "The foreign Jew has no foreign allegiance. The country that gives him shelter, and allows him to practice in peace, and in time, maybe, to forget in peace, the ritual of his creed, that country is his country. Is it nothing that we should win so easily, so many sturdy new adherents to our race and to our ideal?"

These are the words and views of the Daily Graphic. How strong its arguments become and how powerful its words when it is remembered that the Jews and British are both Israelites, and of the same race. The House of Judah is coming daily to the House of Israel, either here or abroad, in the United States and our British Colonies. It is meanwhile becoming one with us, and by-and-bye the Jew will with us go back together to the land of the inheritance given by the Lord to their fathers and ours. To Him be all the praise!

Death of Prince Henry of Battenberg.—We are sure heartfelt sympathy will be felt for the Queen and Princess Beatrice in the sad bereavement that has fallen upon them by the sad death of Prince Henry while serving her Majesty and country in Africa. We are glad to note that the Queen and Princess are well in health, although overwhelmed with grief.

LOST ISRAEL FOUND IN THE BRITISH NATION.

By W. Hopton.

PART I.

Our Saviour speaking to His disciples said, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not, but go rather to the lost sheep (Lost Ten Tribes) of the House of Israel" (Matt. x. 5, 6). Again said Christ, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep (Lost Ten Tribes) of the House of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24). What did Christ mean by saying, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel"? Did He not come to save and redeem the whole of the human race?

Certainly He did. Then what did He mean? I consider His meaning was that He came to commission the lost House of Israel, and only them, as a nation and people to preach the Gospel to all nations of the earth. They were to be Christ's witnesses, the light to lighten the Gentiles and to bless all nations.

The passage named and the next I shall name are, I consider, strong proof that one nation, and one only, is appointed by the Lord to preach the Gospel to all nations. I consulted Dr. Adam Clark on the two passages: in reference to the first passage—viz., "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the House of Israel," Adam says, "By the Divine appointment Christ came to preach the Gospel to the Jews only." But, Adam, let me tell you, the Jews were never lost; Christ came, you know, to a people who had been lost: then why do you say He came to preach the Gospel to the Jews only, when the Jews had never been a lost people. Again, the Jews are the House of Judah; Christ did not say that he came to the House of Judah, a people who had never been lost, but He came, said He, to the House of Israel, the very people who had been lost. I also consulted Adam on Christ's words to the Jews where He said, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation, bringing forth the fruits of righteousness" (Matt xxi. 43). Note what Christ said, "It was to be given to a nation," not to a number of nations, but given to a nation, meaning one single nation only.

In reference to this passage Adam Clark says, "The Gospel shall be taken from the Jews and given to the Gentiles." Adam shows in one passage that Christ came to give or preach the Gospel to the Jews only; in the other passage, that they were to have the Gospel taken from them and give it to the Gentiles. One contradicts the other. But to what Gentile nation did Christ give the Gospel? Because there are many, and He only gave it to a nation, meaning one.

I know, and every Briton ought to know, that there are two nations of Israelites; one had been a lost people, the other had not. Christ distinctly said He came only to the lost people or nation. Was there any cause whatever then to say He came to the one which had not been lost? I think not. Great men, it is said, make great mistakes; yet I know Adam Clark was a great, good man. Adam appears not to have considered that there are two nations of Israelites. One is the House of Judah, called Jews, who were never lost; the other is the House of Israel, who were never Jews, which became lost. This House is sometimes called the House of Ephraim, and sometimes called God's inheritance, and four-fifths of the Bible speaks of them.

When Christ said, "The kingdom of God should be taken from the Jews and given to a nation," He meant one single nation only, and "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep (Lost Ten Tribes) of the House of Israel." To my mind Christ came to commission lost Israel as a nation, and them only, and not the Gentiles, to preach the Gospel to all the nations of the earth. If so, it is only in accordance with other parts in God's Word. Hear what Scripture says: "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord, for God hath choosen thee to be a peculiar people unto Himself above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth" (Deut. vii. 6). "Ye are my witnesses," saith the Lord, "and My servants whom I have chosen" (Isa. xliii. 10). "And they shall call thee the holy people, the redeemed of the Lord" (Isa. lxii. 12). "But ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a people for God's own possession" (1 Pet. ii. 9). "I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be My salvation to the end of the earth" (Isa. xlix. 6). Isaiah says in reference to the nation of Israel, "But ye shall be named (named what?) the priests of the Lord, men shall call you (shall call you what?) the ministers of our God, and their seed shall be known among the nations, and their offspring among the people; all that see them shall acknowledge them that they are the seed (or nation) that the Lord hath blessed" (Isa. lxi. 6—9). Again Isaiah says, "I, the Lord, have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee and give thee for (for what?) a covenant of the people for a light of the Gentiles (Isa. xlix. 6).

What does God mean by giving the nation of Israel for a covenant of the Gentiles and people?

He means they shall carry to the Gentiles God's law, His plan and terms of agreement for their salvation from sin and wickedness. Thereby they will be the light of the Gentiles and not the Gentiles the light to them. God says: "For Zion's sake will I not hold My peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest until her righteousness go forth (yes, to the nations of the earth!) as brightness, and her salvation (as what?) as a lamp that burneth, and the nations shall see thy righteousness and kings thy glory, and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name. Thou shalt also be a crown of beauty in the hand of the Lord, a royal diadem in the hand of thy God" (Isa. lxii. 1—3).

What more do you require to show and prove that God has commissioned the nation of Israel as His ministers to preach the Gospel to all nations of the earth? However, I will give you a few more.

God said, through Moses: "Now therefore, if ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep My covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure to Me from among all peoples; for all the earth is Mine, and ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, an holy nation" (Exod. xix. 6, 7).

It is evident God has selected one nation, and one nation only out of the many nations, to become His peculiar possession, His inheritance. Moses said to the Lord, "If now I have found grace in Thy sight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray Thee, go among us, for it is a stiff-necked people; pardon our iniquity and our sins, and take us for Thine inheritance" (Exod. xxxiv. 9). The Lord did take them for His inheritance, for Moses told the people that the Lord had brought them out of Egypt "to be unto Him a people of inheritance as ye are this day" (Deut. iv. 20). Israel became then the special properity of the Lord. When they sinned Moses prayed, "O Lord God, destroy not Thy people and Thine inheritance. They are Thy people and Thine inheritance" (Deut. ix. 26, 27). Solomon gloried in the fact and said to the Lord, "For Thou didst separate them from among all the people of the earth to be Thine inheritance; for they be Thy people, Thine inheritance" (1 Kings viii. 51—53). David prayed the Gibeonites that they might bless the inheritance of the Lord (2 Sam. xxi. 3). The prophet Isaiah prayed the Lord to "return for Thy servant's sake, the tribes of Thine inheritance" (Isa. lxiii. 17). Thus no nation on earth can be considered the inheritance of the Lord but the nation of Israel. He has separated them from all nations of the earth, a proof one nation only is God's ministers to bless and preach the Gospel to all others.

Do you find any nation in the world doing what the nation of Israel was called to do except the British nation? The British people have blessed and profited all nations of the earth in such a way as no other nation ever did. For the good of all nations we have invented railways, telegraphs, steamboats, steam engines for manufacturing purposes, and gas-light, also sent missionaries to the nations by thousands. Look at the Salvation Army what they have done and are doing. They are preaching the Gospel in every quarter of the globe and almost to every nation on the earth. Did you ever know any nation on earth, except the British, since the days of Adam, send men out like General Booth and the Salvation Officers? No, never, never! Only a few years ago ten persons left the Salvation Army in England to preach the Gospel in India, and now they number over ten thousand converts to Christianity in that part of the world. We print in this nation millions upon millions of Bibles for the nations of the earth at a great cost of money. Nearly eight Bibles are printed every minute, and are translated into nearly 200 languages. Millions of pounds are spent by this nation in order to spread the Gospel of Christ to the nations of the earth. In 1834 this nation paid down the sum of £20,000,000 sterling in order to liberate the slaves.

Do we not then bless and benefit all nations? If not, show us the nation which does, and if only our nation is doing what the nation of Israel was to do, is it not a proof the British are the Israelites?

If in the first subject I have not fully satisfied you that lost Israel is found in the British nation, I hope so to do in our second.

Our next subject is, "What Nation is the Largest, the Most Powerful, Wealthy, and Never to be Conquered?"

In speaking on lost Israel found in the British nation, I have met with people of strange views. Some will turn and twist all ways and every way and believe almost anything but truth in God's Word, and even leap over mountains, if possible, to evade the truth. They say, Are we not all Abraham's seed when we are believers in Christ, and therefore Israelites! Allow me to show you who are Abraham's seed. The Israelites only are Abraham's natural seed as pertaining to the flesh, but Abraham is also the father of the faithful. All believers then in Christ are Abraham's spiritual adopted seed according to the grace of God and faith in Christ. Just as Timothy became St. Paul's spiritual son in the Gospel, believers of all nations become Abraham's spiritual adopted seed in Christ, but not his real natural seed. You will now understand who are the real natural seed as pertaining to the flesh, and who are the spiritual adopted seed in Christ. Britons who believe in Christ are both his spiritual and natural seed and no Gentile nation can claim that honour.

BRIGHTON BEACH WORK.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—BANNER readers have seen from time to time something of the work which I have been doing during 1895. With regard to my open-air work, my object is to get as great a variety of approved literature as I can possibly get, and change the sort distributed as often as possible. The lectures excite people's curiosity, and then they are very eager to get something to read; whereas, if the lectures and the literature did not go together, neither would do the same amount of good. Over and over again, those who refuse literature when it is first offered to them, will, after listening a while longer, humbly ask for what they had previously refused—an evident sign that their curiosity had been aroused. With my many lectures in Brighton, London, Eastbourne, Worthing, Turner's-hill, Copthorne, and West Hoathley, I can truly say it has been a year of hard work; and I bless God, at this crisis of our country's history, that so many thousands have had their attention called to the glorious fact that we are His people of promise. Many have met me during the last few days, and passed remarks concerning what they have heard from me, and also read in the literature distributed, which shows clearly that the seed is being sown in the hearts of the people. I scarcely know how to calculate the enormous amount of literature which has been distributed in all the above places. Between thirty and forty thousand BANNERS, about seven thousand of which were from Mr. Banks; whilst it is useless to attempt to calculate the number of tracts, pamphlets, and leaflets. I can only say their name is legion. Of "Handbooks," I am pleased to say I am now selling my tenth hundred since its publication. Miss Rush has been a dear good friend to me during the year, as heretofore, and has given me much valuable help. Mr. Rowland Mackworth and Mr. Vince rendered valuable assistance at Regent's- and Hyde-parks, whilst I scarcely know how to thank Mr. and Mrs. Reep for their kind hospitality, and for bearing all the expense of the Eastbourne campaign, and purchasing a part of the literature for distribution. What might we not do if we had a few such in all our large towns! It gives one double courage when they are supported by a few faithful friends in a cause like this. During August several friends of the cause were visiting Brighton, and we had some happy gatherings in my house, where we spent the time in discussing this glorious truth, and several inquirers were brought. One of these friends, Miss Bell, as soon as she has read the Morning Post, kindly forwards it to me the same day, for which I thank her very much.

So many friends have sent valuable parcels of literature that I can only give their names, or I should fill the BANNER with descriptions of what they have sent. I must thank Mrs. Plummer for paying for Pool's (10s. 6d.) "Anglo-Israel," and Lady Jane Ellice and Surgeon-General Hungerford sent valuable parcels of works. Miss S. A. Matson sent me many valuable cuttings, and two volumes of her work, "St. George and the Dragon." Miss L. A. Hennington also sent many valuable cuttings and extracts in answer to my request for Anglo-Israel tit-bits. Mrs. Maxwell Reeves sent me twenty copies of her poetical work, "Faithful for Ever," which is much appreciated. Mrs. Koe and Mr. Charles G. Porter both sent me some bound volumes of the BANNER, for which I am very thankful. I only need the last four volumes to complete the set. Many thanks also to all the following for literature:—Miss Elizabeth Pierce, R. T. Martin, E. G. S., Miss M. E. Lawson, Miss Cox, Mr. E. Jones, Mr. H. Wicks, Mrs. M. S. White, Mr. J. Reeves Banks, Mrs. Harrison, Mrs. Femaris, Mr. J. H. Weldon, Mr. J. M. W. Young, Mrs. Inceldon, Mr. W. J. Green, F. A. R., Miss L. A. Groom, Mr. Isaac Loveland, Mrs. Netherclift (a valuable parcel), Mrs. E. Blenkinsop, Miss M. Mullett, Mr. C. Quinton, Hon. O. Lambert, Mrs. N. Cameron, Mr. Parker, Miss Lewis, Mrs. Thompson, Mr. G. H. Southport, Miss Willis, G. E. T., Dr. Styrapp, Mr. Seagram, "Philo-Israel," Mr. Gouch, S. H. L., Mr. Hird, Mr. Bennett, Mrs. Host, Miss James, Miss Harriss, Mr. Beethan, Miss Cullum, Mr. Cullin, and Miss Sharpe. Some of the above have sent as many as half a dozen different parcels during the year.

The following friends have also kindly helped with cash:—Balance in hand, 6s. 3d.; Mr. Charles G. Porter, £3 3s.; L. P., £2; "Philo-Israel," 10s.; J. C. F., 5s.; E. B., 1s.; Mr. J. G. Taylor, 10s.; Miss James and friend, 10s.; In an anonymous parcel, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. Hird, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. Eliz. Pierce, 10s.; Miss Lawrence, 5s.; Mrs. A. Moody, 10s.; W. W. (Norwood), £1; Mr. W. E. Bennett, 5s.; Mr. J. R. Banks, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. A. Mullett, 2s. 6d.; A Reader of the BANNER, 5s.; Miss L. G. Cox, 10s.; A BANNER Reader, 3s.; Misses Foat, 10s.; Mrs. Netherclift, 5s.; W. J. P., £1; S. H. L., £1; Mrs. Morling, 10s. 6d.; Ashton-under-Lynn, 7s. 6d.; Mr. Isaac Loveland, 10s.; Mrs. Wytel (Edinburgh), 10s. Total, £15 16s. 3d. As I am a very busy man, please notify any error.

Expenditure.—Robert Banks & Son, £7 12s., for literature; British-Israel Association, £2 10s., for literature; travelling expenses, Messrs. Vince and Marchant, for London, and Mr. and Mrs. Marchant, six journeys to Worthing, £3 10s.; postage for correspondence and literature, £1 10s.; stationery, 7s. 6d.; Mr. Taylor, beach seat-owner, 15s.; carriage of parcels, 8s.; "Handbooks" presented, 9s. (twelve were left at Gravesend to be sold, and I heard no more of them, as I had to run away to catch train); miscellaneous, 15s. Total, £17 16s. 6d.

If England and America only knew the truths we are seeking to make known, would they dream of quarrelling over the expansion of the British race. And it seems hard that funds should be so low that one like myself should be forced to wait for the weather ere a word can be said, at this important period of our country's history, now is a glorious opportunity to draw attention to British-Israel truth. Are we taking advantage of it? Even this last summer I was so short of funds that I had to draw on my own slender income. I have two courses before me at such times—viz., work at my own cost, or do nothing. Even when we went to Worthing, I had no funds to pay our railway fares! No doubt it is for want of asking; but if I find time and strength for the work, I cannot do more, and I never write for cash, or ask in any way other than through the BANNER. It is against my grain to solicit subscriptions. I am ready to begin again soon, but I hope none will think I am in no need of funds to work with, because I do not send to our friends individually a letter to say so. I do not need a large amount of funds to do a large amount of work, and it is for the cause only that I am asking. May God bless all who have helped in the cause of Israel. I am longing for a good year in 1896. If any call for a lecture, I will try and come; but pray let us be up and doing, for Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix. may soon call for their fulfilment.

Yours faithfully, H. A. MARCHANT.

60, Upper Lewes-road, Brighton, Jan. 13, 1896.

P.S.—Did J. C. F. send 5s. twice or once during 1895?

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Thinking that you may not have noticed the paper on Music in this month's Blackwood, I enclose you an extract from it, as perhaps you might think it worth inserting in the BANNER OF ISRAEL.

Yours, &c. B. C.

Leamington, Dec. 4th.

"ON PURCELL AND THE MAKING OF MUSICAL ENGLAND.

"England, in this fin-de-siécle age, is awakening to a sense of her importance in music. Sufficient material has been traced to show that for invention and learning in the early years of music's first growth and development, Britain was far in advance of any nation, when the art, with the migration of the races westwards settled in the European countries, where it has since developed so wondrously. In this peaceful art, England, as recent researches show, then surpassed the world, and that as early as 1250, England was 200 years and more in front of other musical nations.—From Blackwood's Magazine for December, 1895.

THE YOUNG LIONS' ROAR.

IT is very satisfactory to know that "The young lions" of the British Colonies, six of them together, with one outburst of sympathy for their "Old mother in the West," have sent home from Sydney, under date January 12th, 1896, the following most welcome words. They were published in the Times on January 13th, and no doubt have been noted by the nation concerned, on the Continent. Lord Salisbury's reply is attached, published in London on January 15th.

TELEGRAM FROM THE AUSTRALIAN GOVERNMENTS.

Sydney, Jan. 12.

The Hon. G. H. Reid, Premier of New South Wales, has sent the following telegram to Lord Salisbury:—

"The Governments of Australia and Tasmania view with satisfaction the prompt and fearless measures adopted by her Majesty's Government in defence of the integrity of the Empire. We desire to convey our united assurances of loyal support. The people of Australia are in full sympathy with the determination of the mother country to resent foreign interference in matters of British and colonial concern.

"Signed, on behalf and at the request of the Governments of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia, "G. H. REID."

—Reuter.

LORD SALISBURY'S REPLY TO AUSTRALIA.

The following reply has been addressed by Lord Salisbury to the telegram sent by the Hon. G. H. Reid, Premier of New South Wales, on behalf of the Governments of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia:—

"Her Majesty's Government heartily thank you, and through you the Governments of Australia and Tasmania, for your patriotic assurance of sympathy and support. Nothing can give to us greater confidence in maintaining the rights of our country than the knowledge that we have the full approval and good will of our fellow-subjects in the great colonies of the Empire. "SALISBURY."

Here we have six young lions roaring in chorus. They are one with us "in defending the integrity of the Empire." They want us to know that they give us "loyal support." They unite with us as one man, "in the determination" of the old mother, "to resent foreign interference in matters of British and colonial concern"! Well said, young lions! worthy daughters of the stalwart mother in the land of the north, who lovingly answers you!

We notice, of course, that New Zealand is not represented in the above. She prefers, perhaps, to act on her own behalf and independently. No doubt she will send us some words of cheer before these lines see the light, in the same direction as her Australian and Tasmanian sisters. But there is more to tell. Our American brethren of the United States, who have been trying to pick a quarrel with us lately about the Venezuelan matter, cannot bear to think that anyone should seem to bully their blood-relations the British! We see that the Daily Graphic of January 10th, publishes a paragraph from the Morning Press of New York of the previous day which is a remarkable declaration. The Americans, it seems, would not interfere in a stand up fight between Germany and Great Britain. But if France and Russia were to join Germany and all three were to unite to crush the British Empire, then blood would be found thicker than water, and the United States would throw in her lot with her relations and fight her continental assailants! The words were these:—

THROUGH DALZIEL'S AGENCY.

New York, Thursday.

A leading double-headed editorial in to-day's number of the Morning Press, which has been extensively copied into the afternoon papers, is as follows:—

"There is just one possible condition of affairs which would cause the United States to depart from their historical policy of non-intervention in the affairs of Europe. That condition is a concert of European Powers against England. We may have our differences with England. It is always easier to quarrel with a brother than with anybody else, because we expect more from him and have a better right to feel aggrieved when he wounds our feelings or seeks to encroach upon our rights. But, after all, the English people are our people, and we are theirs. They are a magnificent force in defence of liberty and civilisation, and any absolute monarch who thinks he can arrange an alliance to humiliate England, and to break her influence, should consider the resources, not only of England, but of the United States as well, before committing an act of war. His triumph will not occur until he has exhausted both. That will never happen. If Germany wishes to fight England let her, but France and Russia should keep out. A voice of wrath would go up from the United States when it became known that three such Powers were leagued together for the destruction of the British Empire. Every human interest is involved in the development of Anglo-Saxon civilisation, and however vital to that cause our power and influence may be, the power and influence of England are not less so. Her cause when at bay confronting the Continental Powers of Europe would become the cause of human liberty and of free government."

"The English people are our people, and we are theirs." There is a pleasing ring about these words, though no doubt some three weeks ago they seemed ready enough to cut our throats, and rob us of a part of the same Empire on which we understood they had set their hearts. Putting this aside, and "letting bygones be bygones," it is pleasant to know that the young lions who are represented in the prophecies of the Word of God (Ezek. xxxviii. 13, R.V.), are already wide awake to the coming and present dangers threatening the Empire, and assure us of their "loyal support" in resenting "foreign interference," to wit, the German Emperor's, "in matters of British and colonial concern," that is affairs British and South African. It is certain then that though "isolated" just now in respect to the nations of Europe, we are far from isolated as regards our daughter nations and in certain conditions, in respect also, of our American brethren of the States.

These are facts for which British Israelites should be really thankful. We have been passing through a time of national trial and distress. But we are glad to observe that British-Israelites are for the most part cheerful and confident, while passing through it, knowing who we British are, and why the trial has come upon us. We have found that our unbelieving friends were nervous and timid, not knowing whither these strange circumstances were destined to lead the nation; being ready privately to ask our opinion on the matter, and to examine patiently the nature of the comfort we were ready to offer them. The German trouble, we believe, has already passed away. The American difficulty is likely to be dissipated by friendly means; and if the Transvaal "sore" is still threatening by reason of the obstinacy of the Boers to give any relief to the Uitlanders of Johannesburg, it is permitted to hope that President Kruger may have the wisdom to avoid an appeal to force, and so learn that if adequately opposed by the ordinary powers of the Empire, his brave Boers will yet find their masters, and will have to acknowledge that God did not in vain promise "to set His people Israel, high above all the nations of the earth," and therefore "high above" the ignorant, but puffed-up farmers of the South African Republic.

The difficulty respecting the Boers of the Transvaal is, that they know nothing of the outside world. They have no conception from experience or history of the real strength of the Empire, and believe, for instance, that if the troops of Britain were too much for them in the field, they could easily call the German troops and navy to their rescue, and place the South African Republic under German protection instead of the powerless British Flag! They do not know that Germany could not keep the sea at all in a war with the strength of Britain, or that save by the outlet of Delagoa Bay, which is already blocked, the Germans could never approach the Transvaal. There is but one argument which the Boers as a race will now be able to comprehend. They must try their strength against a British force, aud see if their 10 or 20 thousand farmers, good marksmen and soldiers as they are, can withstand the onset of the conquerors of India! They recollect Majuba Hill, no doubt; but forget the mismanagement which lost that day, and Mr. Gladstone's horror of "blood guiltiness" which forced on a dishonoured peace with rebels on British ground, who had inflicted an unavenged defeat on British troops. Whether this necessity can be avoided and the longsuffering miners of Johannesburg will long be able to endure their position as the burden-bearers of President Kruger and his followers, remains to be seen! If they can endure it, there is no reason why they should not; or why British soldiers and miners across the border should imperil their lives again to help them, their wives, or children. The matter is in the Lord's hands, and He declared that "His people should never be ashamed." (Joel ii. 26, 27).

BRITISH INFLUENCE IN ARABIA.

THE London Standard of Nov. 26 last published the following on the subject of British influence in Arabia, and the necessity that exists for the protection and consolidation of those interests in the not unlikely event of the disappearance ere long of the waning empire of Turkey. Men's minds are exercised by the coming problems of the great "partition," and are looking around for the share which must needs fall to Israel. These were the views of the writer:—

"Whatever the political outcome of the present crisis may be, the situation is one that cannot be viewed with indifference by Great Britain. Our route to India brings us into contact with Arabia at so many points, that a peaceful understanding with her rulers is a matter of prime importance with us. Moreover, whatever may be the fate of Turkish rule in Europe, it is to Mecca, rather than to Constantinople, that the religious thoughts of Indian Mohammedans must naturally turn. The never-ending stream of pilgrims will continue to flow to the holy places of the Hejaz as heretofore, and it ought to be the object of the British Government to establish relations with the de facto authorities of those towns which shall ensure that our Mohammedan fellow-subjects in India are exposed to as little inconvenience and molestation as possible in the exercise of their religious avocations. Moreover, our interests at Aden, Muskat, and in the Persian Gulf and Red Sea, impose on us the moral duty of doing our utmost for the development of those regions, and for the welfare of their inhabitants. Should the Turkish Government find itself compelled to withdraw from Arabia, there is absolutely no other Power, except that of Great Britain, that can, with the slightest show of justice, lay claim to exercise, if not a protectorate, at all events a general supremacy over Arabia. The fifty millions of Mohammedans in India would doubtless view such an arrangement with satisfaction, and the necessity of safeguarding our material interests along the route to India affords an additional reason for assuming, in such a contingency, an extension of that general responsibility which, in regard to various detached tracts of Southern and Eastern Arabia, we already possess."

LORD BRASSEY, THE GOVERNOR OF MELBOURNE, ON FEDERATION AND THE EMPIRE.

At the annual banquet given by the Mayor of Melbourne on November 9th last, in the Town Hall, the guests were His Excellency the newly-arrived Governor of Melbourne, and a distinguished assembly, including the Consular body, the Representatives of the Legislature, the judges, the military and naval forces, and others. In reply to the toast of his and Lady Brassey's health, his Lordship spoke regarding the late Imperial Federation League, whose work was done, and in respect to the British Empire and its permanent unity. In regard to Colonial self-government and other matters connected with it, he spoke as follows :—

"By a wise policy the old country has given to all her sons unrestricted powers of self-government. (Cheers). If you were to make to-morrow a declaration of independence you could not be more free and more self-governing. (Great cheering). On the other hand, enjoying to the fullest extent this self-government, if you remain in union with the old country, part and parcel of the British Empire, then you have, and that at no cost to yourselves, as a shield against the external foe, the protection of a navy whose supremacy upon the seas has not been at any time during the long interval which has elapsed since the great war so marked and so decided as it is to-day. (Cheers). The sacrifice which the mother country has made in order to assure the safety of the Empire may perhaps be best appreciated by a few figures. When I went to the Admiralty in 1880, the expenditure for the construction of new ships for the British Navy as provided in the Estimates which we received as a legacy from our predecessors in office amounted to £1,425,000. In the same year the corresponding provision for the French navy was £1,325,000. In the year 1885-6—the last year for which I had the honour of moving the navy estimates in the House of Commons—the expenditure upon the construction of new ships for the British navy had advanced to £3,475,000, while in the interval the expenditure for the French navy had been increased by the fractional sum of £10,000. The policy initiated by Lord Northbrook has been carried forward with no hesitating hand by his successors, and the expenditure during the current year for the construction of new ships for the British navy will fall little short of £6,000,000. The provision for the manning of the navy has grown in proportion to the ships, and the result is that the old country will have to bear this year, as the cost of her patriotic endeavours for the defence of the whole Empire, a charge for the navy alone amounting to not less than £18,700,000. (Great cheering.) If I were to go on from a statement of the expenditure to a comparison of the ships—the efficient ships—which constitute our navy, taking them class by class, I should be able to establish to your satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of any competent minds, this conclusion—that we have attained and more than attained to the standard which the Parliament of the old country has adopted, and that standard is that the British navy shall be at all times maintained at a strength which shall be in excess of the strength of any two foreign Powers combined. (Prolonged cheering.) While I have not classed all the expenditure under the construction of ships, let me invite you to remember this—that a comparison limited to the expenditure upon our navy or to the strength of the ships would be a very inadequate comparison of the whole forces which you are taking into your consideration. It takes no account of internal resources. It takes no account of the relative command of material and skilled workmen who can be employed in ship-building. It takes no account of the maritime population at home and in the colonies, their number and their personal qualities. It takes no account of the resources which the Powers possess in regard to coaling stations, their number, defences, and geographical position. And for myself, and I am sure for the Admiral—(cheers)—and there can be no greater expert than my gallant friend on this momentous question—I say that for anybody who has examined this subject there can be no other conclusion than this—that the wider we extend the field of view, the wider the range of the comparisons we make, the more assured we feel as to our maritime position. (Cheers.) Sir, I would say for myself that the confidence I feel in the maritime position of the Empire, of which I am proud to be a subject, gives me the assurance that we shall pass through the critical situation in which we are now involved in the east of Europe without any breach of the peace. (Applause.) We are resolved to maintain in its integrity our noble Empire. (Cheers.) We are resolved to keep open the highway of the seas for the interchange of commerce, but we cherish no ambitious schemes, and, speaking as a colonial Governor, I feel the firm assurance that in any solution which may be approved by Lord Salisbury due regard will be paid to colonial opinions and to colonial interests. (Cheers.) When I turn to other Powers I am convinced that their rulers and statesmen will hesitate long to incur the risks of war when all the reasonable concessions which they could possibly demand would be better obtained by peaceful negotiations. Mr. Mayor, I might have been glad to occupy you with other topics, but I have already detained you too long. ("No, no.") I know that your proposals of hospitality will afford me many other opportunities of speaking on this question. (Cheers.) I hope that it will be your opinion that I have not inappropriately used the opportunity afforded me on the present occasion. This is the first time that I have spoken in your splendid hall at the bidding of the chief magistrate of this noble city, and I have been naturally drawn to the consideration of topics which necessarily suggest themselves to one who has had the experience that I have had ever since my first landing amongst you, and whose traditions of public life naturally lead him to the consideration of Imperial defence. And all I should like to say as a peroration is said in the noble lines familiar to you all, and composed by Lord Tennyson, who not long ago was an honoured guest on the Sunbeam :—

"'To all the loyal hearts who long
To keep our English Empire whole;
To all our noble sons, the strong
New England of the Southern Pole;
To England under Indian skies,
To those dark millions of our realm:
To Canada, whom we love and prize,
Whatever statesman holds the helm—
Hands all round. God the traitor's hopes confound.
To this great name of England drink, my friends,
And to her glorious Empire, round and round.'"

It may be thought that Lord Brassey spoke in a tone of optimism, which he was hardly justified in using. But we believe he was stating well-established facts, when he was describing our Navy at the present date, though he was not correct in deeming a navy as strong, or rather stronger than those of any two foreign Powers combined, sufficient for our necessities. For we have not only to defend our own shores and seas from attack, but we have a vast Colonial Empire in the four quarters of the earth requiring defence as well; and a floating commerce larger than that of all the other nations put together. It was satisfactory to know that six millions sterling was to be spent on war ships during 1895, and that, including the manning of our fleets, quite eighteen millions sterling was to be expended in that year on this one object alone! On one point, certainly, his Lordship said too little. He made no mention of God's protecting care of His people, British-Israel, and did not recognize that "the Lord is their keeper, the Lord is their shade upon their right hand." The Lord preserves their going out and coming in, even for evermore, and "except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it; and except He keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain" (Psa. cxxi. 4—8; and Psa. cxxvii. 1, R.V.) The Lord has given us "the Gate of our enemies" and "the power to get wealth" in order to enable us to become pre-eminent in the earth, set high above all the nations of it (Deut. xxviii. 1 and 13). This He does, not to exalt us in our own estimation, and give us proud and ambitious feelings, but to enable us to present to the nations—no one preventing us—the glorious Gospel of the grace of God, as wrought out for us by the Lord Jesus Christ. In another part of his speech, which we have not quoted, Lord Brassey spoke of his confidence in the American Republic and in their resolve to continue in brotherly friendship with the British Empire. He did not know then of the sudden outburst of warlike sentiment which the people of the United States recently discharged against our own nation, and how near we were to a war with our brethren, urged thereto by a mere word thrown out by the President in reference to our boundary dispute with the South American Republic of Venezuela. That danger, it is hoped, has passed away, though there are unpleasant reminders that there are sections of the population of the States who still wish us to vacate the Canadian Dominion and give it over to them in free gift, with war in reserve if we hesitate to respond! We are living indeed in critical times, and it behoves us to take all precautions against being hurried into a warlike spirit, which is often the precursor of war itself. Urgent and instant prayer is also needed that our God will fulfil His promises to us His people, and guide us, blind as we are, till He brings us out in safety and fulfils to us His word contained in Isa. xlii. 16, R.V. To Him shall be all the praise!

FOREIGN TESTIMONY.

By John S. Anderson.

We have never to look far for Identities. In these latter days of wars and rumours of wars (how the words of Scripture are fulfilled to the very letter) the newspapers are full of them. The following from the Standard of to-day, being testimony from a foreign source, seems worthy of a place in the columns of the Banner of Israel. It is dated Berlin, Dec. 30, and runs thus:—

"The fact that President Cleveland's anti-English message has increased, rather than diminished, Russia's aversion to a war with England, is further confirmed by the following St. Petersburg letter, dated the 26th of December, to the Frankfurter Zeitung:—

"'The fact that the mere threat of war has already cost the Yankees pretty dear has had a sobering effect on those Russians who, in consequence of Cleveland's message, counted with certainty on the outbreak of a war between Great Britain and the United States. Here in Russia, where, as in several other countries, people overwhelm "the British nation of shopkeepers" with scorn and mockery, because it can hardly mobilise half a million of soldiers, and is wont to fight shy of every serious danger of war, they are quite dumb at the spectacle of the unshaken composure with which the British received the American threat, and of the mighty shaking of the American money market in consequence of Cleveland's ill-considered utterance. They seem only now to understand how enormous is the power of England; and this perception may have a useful effect here, too, far beyond the limits of the present dispute. Nobody here any longer believes in a war between England and America, which would cause such far-reaching convulsions.'"

It will be noticed from this that, however other nations may deride, they know perfectly well that we have the power, and, if necessary, the will to put it forth, to hold our own, and, with God's blessing, to carry all before us. They may laugh at the smallness of our military strength, but they evidently feel that there is more than that behind it. For all this, they may not perceive that it was promised to Israel in Deut. xxviii. 13: "The Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath."

LOST ISRAEL FOUND IN THE BRITISH NATION.

By W. Hopton.

PART II.

My subject then is Abraham's real natural seed. Therefore, do not (as many do) misunderstand which of the two is meant. God put marks upon lost Israel by which they would be discovered in the latter days from among other nations. By way of illustration, allow me to say, a friend of mine was appointed to meet a person at the railway station whom he had never seen in his life. He wrote him the following letter: "Sir,—I am appointed to meet you at the station, and not to my knowledge having seen you before, can you give me any marks by which I shall know you from others, because hundreds of people may come when you do, on the same train." My friend received the following reply: "1. I am a man with a long leg and a short one. 2. I am blind of one eye. 3. I am very much pock-marked. 4. When I come I shall wear a white neck-tie. 5. I shall carry in one hand a white handkerchief. 6. I shall have on my head a soft billy-cock hat. 7. I shall carry a ham in the other hand." My friend considered, no doubt, that if he were not able to pick such a man as that out from among hundreds, it would appear that he was himself blind in both eyes.

I shall now give you some marks that God put upon lost Israel. Such will be as clear and striking as the marks given to my friend to find the man at the railway station. I hope you will pick out the nation of Israel from among others, for I have no wish you should all be blind in both eyes.

Mark first—God said, the Israelites should become a great and mighty nation, the head and not the tail; above and not beneath all the nations of the earth (Deut. vii. 6, xiv. 2, xxvi. 18, 19, xxviii. 1—13; 1 Chron. xvii. 21, 22).

What nation on the earth is the greatest, the most powerful, because, whichever that nation is or whatever it may be called, that people is Israel.

Let me say, upon the sceptre of Queen Victoria the sun never sets. Our colonies are so placed that they encircle all the other nations of the earth. We have some 60 colonies; they belt the earth right round. The Queen's Empire is nearly one-fourth part of the earth's surface and includes nearly one-fourth part of the population of the globe. There is not another nation in the world so large and so great; therefore we must be Israel.

I will give you another mark. Mark second—God said the nation of Israel should lend (money) to many nations, but should not borrow (Deut. xv. 6, xxviii. 12). If you can find one single nation with this mark, that nation is Israel. There is one nation only with this mark, and that is the British nation. Nearly all the nations of the earth are in debt to the British; they have all borrowed money except England. We have not borrowed a single penny from any nation, but lent to nearly all about two thousand million pounds. The other nations have been adding to their debts the last 30 years nearly 3,000 millions of pounds. As we are the only nation which has lent money but never borrowed, we must therefore be Israel.

I will give you another mark. Mark third—God said the nation of Israel should rule over many nations but no nation should rule over them (Deut. xv. 6). If they are never to be ruled over, they can never be conquered. The British have never been conquered in their island home, but all nations excepting England have been conquered. We rule over many nations; yes, we rule over nearly as many nations as all other nations put together; therefore, we must be Israel.

Mark fourth—God said the nation of Israel should possess the Gate of their enemies, and their Gates should not be shut day nor night, but opened continually, that men may bring the abundance or wealth of the nations to them (Gen. xxii. 17, xxiv. 60; Isa. lx. 11). History proves the Gate blessing to have been enjoyed by the British, and, according to the promises, with an ever-increasing power. No nation secures the Gates of their enemies like the British. We possess Gibraltar, the Suez Canal, Malta, the Cyprus Gates, the Gates of India and China, the Red Sea Gate, the Cape Horn Gate, the Cape of Good Hope Gate; indeed, Britannia rules the main. We possess the Gates of our enemies in such a way as no other nation in the world ever did or will. The other nations, if they take a Gate, it is with the object of closing it, but the British keep them open day and night, not allowing any one to be closed. We must therefore be Israel.

Another mark. Mark fifth—God said, "I will give thee power to get wealth" (Deut. xxviii. 8—12). There is no nation with this mark but the British; we have obtained nearly all the land in the world where gold, silver, copper, iron, brass, and coal is found. It is considered that in Western Australia there is one million square miles of gold-fields, and in Africa gold deposits stretch through the Transvaal towards Egypt; the country is full of indications of gold in every direction. The writer says: "It dazzles and overwhelms the imagination." In those two countries alone, there is work for millions of gold-seekers for generations; therefore we have power to get wealth. The annual income of our nation is about two thousand millions of pounds, and the nation's savings 250 millions, or nearly five millions per week. There was deposited in a few banks in London, a short time ago, 253 million pounds—London may be said to be the world's banking-house. God has given our nation power to get wealth in a way no other has. We must then be the Israelites. I believe if the people in this nation knew and saw who we are, and that their wealth was God's gift, where now they give one thousand pounds to the mission cause, they would give one hundred thousand pounds, and poor people would be helped more than is now the case.

I will give another mark. Mark six—God says: "Thou shalt do business in deep waters, going down to the sea in ships" (Psa. cvii. 23). The British nation may be said to be the world's carriers, having thousands of sailing vessels, and more steamships than all the other nations of the earth. We do business in deep waters—we must therefore be Israel.

I have still a vast number of marks, but I will only give another one. Mark seven—God said: "The people of Israel should multiply as the stars of heaven, and as sand on the seashore; they should spread abroad to the East, West, North, and South, and fill the waste and desolate parts of the earth" (Gen. xxii. 17, xxviii. 14; Isa. xlix. 8, 9; Hos. i. 10). Our population is increasing at the rate of 1,200 per day. We are populating Canada; its area is 3,610,257 square miles. It would find room for all the present population of the globe. We are populating Australia; its area is three million square miles; it would also take in the population of the globe. We are populating Africa; its area, under the British, is over 70,000 square miles. If all the population in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales went to Africa, there would be 26 acres of land for every man, woman, and child. We spread abroad and are filling the waste and desolate parts of the earth. We must be Israel.

I have given you seven marks. Are you now able to pick out the nation of Israel from others, as my friend did the man at the railway station? Had the British failed in one single mark, that one would disqualify them, but not one is missing—therefore we are Israel.

Our next subject is to find the nation on which David's seed-royal sits as monarch and rules it unto all generations.

It will be well to show first, from the Word of God, that David's kingdom, throne, and seed will continue to all generations. Hear what God says: "I have made a covenant with My chosen, I have sworn unto David, My servant, Thy seed (David's) will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations; My covenant I will not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of My lips. Once have I sworn by My holiness that I will not lie unto David; his seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven" (Psa. lxxxix. 34—37). It appears one generation may come, and another go, but David's throne, kingdom, and seed will continue to all generations. Nations, kingdoms, and empires fall and are broken up. Not so with David's throne and kingdom. God says they shall never fall, they shall continue to all generations. They must then exist to-day in the earth. Some men say Christ came to destroy, to put away and make an end of the Old Testament Scriptures. He brought in, say they, a new dispensation. Christ came, said He, not to put away and destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil; yes, to fulfil, to make good what had been spoken, to see that the words spoken by the prophets were faithfully carried out, and adopted, and not to destroy and put away. Therefore I do not believe all that enters into men's heads to say. I believe words spoken by the God-man. Let us see what more God says about David's throne and kingdom. "When thy days be fulfilled (David) and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for My name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever" (2 Sam. xii. 13—16). Again Abigah stood up before all Israel and said: "Ought ye not to know that the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom of Israel to David for ever, even to him and his sons (after him) by a covenant of salt" (2 Chron. xiii. 5).

Who will or dare say God has broken His covenant, and that the Israelites are extinct? (read Isa. xlix. 9). They were not extinct in Christ's days, because, "I am not sent," said He, "but unto the lost sheep (Lost Ten Tribes) of the House of Israel." St. Paul also asks: "Hath God cast away His people (have they become extinct?) God forbid! (in proof) for I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin" (Rom. xi. 1, 2). I request those who make such statements to read and believe God's Word more. We read Jehoram walked in the way of the kings of Israel, (in wickedness) like as did the house of Ahab, howbeit the Lord would not destroy the House of David, because of the covenant He had made with David (2 Chron. xxi. 6, 7). It is evident God meant to fulfil His promises, though they were bad. It is said in Jeremiah: "If ye can break My covenant of the day and My covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season (but no man can), then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David My servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob" (Jer. xxxiii. 20—26). If any person made such faithful promises to a friend or enemy and broke them, I should consider he was a scoundrel But "God is not a man that he should lie, neither the son of man that He should repent. Hath He said and shall He not do it? or hath He spoken and shall he not make it good?"

I have produced proof from God's word that David's kingdom, throne and seed, will continue to all generations. I have also been speaking of two nations of Israelites. There was a time when the two were but one nation, when one king reigned over all. Solomon was the last king to reign over the whole nation. After his death they became divided into two kingdoms. Ten tribes had their kingdom in Samaria, and were called the House of Israel, and sometimes the House of Ephraim. Two tribes had their kingdom in Jewry or Judea, and was named the House of Judah. The Ten-tribed House became so desperately wicked, that, 720 years before Christ, the Lord caused them to be taken captive to Assyria, beyond the river Euphrates, locating them south of the Caspian Sea.

The tribes of Dan and Simeon escaped to the British Isles, England and Ireland. The Danes you have often heard of (which was the tribe of Dan), settled down in the North of Ireland. The tribe of Simeon settled in Wales, so that the Welsh people are Simeonites, and their language is changed little from that of the Israelites, though it is 2,400 years ago since they left at the captivity. The other tribes taken captive to Assyria came to these Isles some hundreds of years after, because Sharon Turner and all historians say our forefathers, the British people, came from the river Euphrates, south of the Caspian Sea, the very locality the Tribes of Israel were taken captive to. Queen Victoria must either be the royal seed to King David, or the British people are not Israelites, and if she be the royal seed, then the British are Israelites—one cannot exist without the other; both had to be together.

I must speak now on the Babylonish captivity of the Two-tribed House of the Jews, and why it is supposed that Queen Victoria comes to be the royal seed to King David the psalmist. Zedekiah their king was David's royal seed. Before his death, and also those of his two sons, at the Babylonish captivity, he was crowned (it appears to me) standing near a pillar, or sitting upon a stone, because when kings of Israel were crowned, it was their custom or manner so to crown kings of Israel (2 Kings xi. 12—14). Just in the same way our English kings are crowned sitting upon Jacob's stone in Westminster Abbey, London. This stone, I say, in Westminster Abbey, is named Jacob's stone; how it came to have the name Jacob's stone appears a mystery. It will be remembered when Jacob had his wonderful dream at Bethel he said, "This stone which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house" (Gen. xxviii. 22). Not that a single stone would become God's house, but its meaning, no doubt, might be that the stone was to be in God's house with his seed the Israelites, in remembrance of God's covenant with him when he had the dream. Therefore, as the manner was to crown kings of Israel sitting or standing near a pillar or stone in God's house, it is supposed to have been Jacob's stone, and that it was in the temple at Jerusalem at the Babylonish captivity, at which time Jeremiah the prophet and Baruch the priest took charge of Zedekiah's daughter (xliii. 6), she being at the death of her royal father and brothers, the direct seed of king David. They all three left Jerusalem at the Babylonish captivity. Scripture gives no account afterwards of Jeremiah's life, death, nor that of Baruch the priest. How remarkable that about six years after they left Jerusalem, several old Irish histories (the Rev. Joseph Wild says) state that a great prophet, a priest named Brug, and a royal princess from the East, landed in the north of Ireland. The three persons brought with them the so-called Jacob's stone (stone similar to it is found in Bethel, where Jacob had the dream, but no stone like it can be found in Ireland), on which stone this royal princess was crowned, after her marrriage with a prince of the tribe of Dan. See the first chapter in Jeremiah. "God told him that he should destroy and build up kingdoms" God sent him to pull down Zedekiah's kingdom, but scripture names nothing of his building up a kingdom, yet when God said he would do both it must take place in some quarter of the globe. Therefore, if information is obtained only from history, it ought to be as truthful as if found in the Bible. If God did not send Jeremiah to plant and build up a kingdom in Ireland, where did he build one up; therefore it is quite possible Jeremiah built up a kingdom in Ireland, and if so it shows God had not broken His covenant (so faithfully promised) to David that his seed, throne, and kingdom should continue to all generations. If this prophet was Jeremiah (and no doubt it was), this princess who was crowned upon Jacob's stone was King David's direct royal seed. Monarchs in Ireland, of the same direct royal seed, were crowned upon the stone for about one thousand years. It was then removed to Scotland and there for hundreds of years, monarchs (of the same direct seed) were crowned upon the stone. It was then removed to England and for nearly 600 years monarchs have been crowned upon this stone. Queen Victoria was the last crowned upon Jacob's stone, now in Westminster Abbey. This shows Queen Victoria is the royal seed to King David, the Psalmist. Irish histories say when this princess came to Ireland, they built her a large palace, or temple, 300 yards square and 20 yards high; it stood in all its glory 800 years, and in it 1,000 guests were fed daily. Admittance into it was through twelve porches and through twelve doors, and each wing of the palace had twelve divisions, thus typifying (I consider), the Twelve Tribes of Israel. The ruin of this vast building is 24 miles from Dublin. An old manuscript history of it can be seen in Trinity College, Dublin. Money is being collected (I hear) with the object to excavate the ruins, and by so doing it might bring things to light.

BRITISH-ISRAEL'S SURE DEFENCES.

BY THE REV. THOMAS LOWE.

ENGLAND is not vainly boastful, and proudly defiant. Confident in her sublime destiny, trusting in the righteousness of her actions in the main, relying on the purposes of Jehovah, she is invulnerable; amid war's alarms, the muttering thunders of coming conflict, she is secure at home and abroad, unassailable when "the cloud of battle lowers." Fearless, calm, collected, peaceful, impregnable, challenging the tyrant Powers of the world, ready for every emergency and crisis. Our shores, our Gates, our colonial dependencies and possessions, our rights and liberties, civil and religious, are inviolate. "Couched as a lion, as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?" (Gen. xlix. 9). "His hands made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob" (ver. 24). "And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord, as showers upon the grass, that tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men. And the remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles, in the midst of many people, as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep, who, if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver. Thine hand shall be lifted up upon thine adversaries, and all thine enemies shall be cut off" (Micah v. 7—9). Beware of "twisting the lion's tail!"

> "He comes, the tall jungle before him loud crashing,
> His mane bristled fiercely, his fiery eyes flashing;
> With a roar of disdain he leaps forth in his wrath,
> To challenge the foe that dare leaguer his path."

"England is old England still!" Tyrants, beware!

"Now gather thyself in troops, O daughter of troops," &c. (Micah v. 1). Our resources of defence are exhaustless, "grasping ten thousand thunders," when the trumpet of battle sounds.

> "Think of our sea-girt island! a harbour where alone
> No Englishman, to save a life, has failed to risk his own!"

We are not omnipotent, but the omnipotence of the God of Israel is our safeguard. "The Lord of hosts is with us," &c. (Psa. xlvi. 7). We are not to be fully roused by panics; but, when the hour for action arrives, we are resistless as the avalanche, and stern as doom, when our long-tried patience burns in "swift destruction."

It is with no mere optimist views we look to the future, when the wail of suffering humanity shall be hushed, when crying human wrongs shall be redressed and avenged, when the weary earth shall be mossed with peace, and

> "Man, in the sunshine of the world's new spring, > Shall walk transparent, like some holy thing!"

"Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thine excellency? and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places" (Deut. xxxiii. 29). "Comfort ye, comfort ye, My people saith your God," &c. (Isa. xl. 1).

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

I SYMPATHISE most heartily with the increasing love for England among my countrymen. I find, on inquiry, that they stop longer and in greater numbers every year in the old home, and feel more deeply its manifold charms. They are also beginning to feel that London is the centre of the races that speak English, very much in the sense that Rome was the centre of the ancient world; and I confess that I never think of London, which I love, without thinking of that palace which David built for Bathsheba, sitting in hearing of one hundred streams—streams of thought, of intelligence, of activity.

One thing about London impresses me beyond any other sound I have ever heard, and that is the low, unceasing roar one hears always in the air; it is not a mere accident, like a tempest or a cataract, but it is impressive, because it always indicates human will and impulse, and conscious movement; and I confess that when I hear it I almost feel as if I were listening to the roaring loom of time.

We, as well as you, have inherited a common trust in the noble language which, in its subtle compositeness, perhaps is the most admirable instrument of human thought and human feeling in cunning hands that has ever been unconsciously devised by man. Let our rivalries be in fidelity to that trust.

We have also inherited certain traditions, political and moral, and in doing our duty towards these it seems to me we shall find quite enough occupation for our united thought and feeling.—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

The Echo, Feb. 9, 1892.

MANIFEST DESTINY.

ALREADY the large activities of the English people are beginning to run according to the lines of a real social organism. From the old Universities are going out efforts which unmistakably suggest the nation organised for culture. The House of Commons and the City Governments express more closely every year the public interests of all the people. Out of the toiling majority there comes a great impulsive rising which shews that the period of confusion and chaos in the industry of the nation is almost at an end. In any case, whatever other characteristics this coming democracy may have, it is certain to be a social democracy. It will not disappoint its people by removing one kind of democracy merely that another may arise. It will not be swept and garnished of ancestral privilege in order that the privilege of commercial craft may more fully enter in. Rather it will be as a fertile field levelled of the remnants of a former season, where all that nourishes the better nature may freely grow. In the approach towards such a national life—towards a republic of industry of letters, of art, of pure religion and undefiled—England, of all countries in the world, holds for the next following generations the manifest destiny.—R. A. HOODS, "English Social Problems.

BRITISH EXPANSION IN AFRICA.

THIS formed the title of a most interesting lecture which was given in the Philosophical Hall, Leeds, on Tuesday, under the auspices of the Leeds Literary and Philosophical Society, by Captain Lugard. There was a very large attendance, and the lecturer was listened to throughout with great interest. He was briefly introduced by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, and spoke for about an hour, dealing principally with British prospects in Uganda, a district with which he has been intimately connected. He prefaced his remarks by pointing out the necessity for the provision of new markets and fresh outlets for British enterprise, and dealt with the suitability of that country for these purposes. Then he alluded to the new colonial policy recently enunciated by Mr. Chamberlain —that of investing capital in the expansion and improvement of our colonial possessions. This, in his opinion, was a proper step, and he indicated to his audience the ways in which his experience suggested that the money should be spent. Great care should, he said, be taken to encourage the proper class of settlers, and he suggested that loans might be advanced to them on their stock and plant, assistance provided in the direction of seeds and plants of economic value, in providing Government veterinary aid, and in other directions. He also referred to the labour difficulty in the locality, described how it was the result of Arab traders being willing to pay any price for food when they were not strong enough to take what they required without any payment, and expressed his opinion that the inauguration of railways would provide an opportunity for putting prices on a proper footing. Captain Lugard also spoke of the prospects on the West Coast, where, he said, the British protectorates were able to pay for their railway extensions out of the enormous revenues without any assistance from the British taxpayer. He could not say anything about British South Africa, because he knew nothing of the prospects of the gold mines, upon whose future that locality depended; but, summing up his remarks on Uganda and the Gold Coast said that in the former a good field for settlers was offered, and in the latter a more thorough exploitation of the natural resources of the country was needed. In both cases the future prosperity would largely depend upon the proper handling of such questions as the liquor traffic and the slave trade. The lecture was illustrated with lantern slides. A vote of thanks to the lecturer concluded the proceedings.—Yorkshire Post, Dec. 12, 1895.

THE BRITISH FLAG.

"STRANGER!—That ragged ensign,
By northern winds unrolled,
Is dipped in blood whose colour
Was never bought or sold.
The heart of England's bravest
Still beats on the bending mast,
Still burns at the battle signal,
And rushes before the blast!"

From the iron-bound Crimea
Came this royal crimson stain;
This from the palms of Lucknow,
This from Egyptian plain.
This from the wave-worn sailor,
This from the Christian seer;
This from the Austral desert,—
The blood of the pioneer.

And this, the heroic story
Of mother, maid, and wife,
Who gave to its hue of glory
All the dearest light of life.
So, wrapped in these faithful colours,
And looking with hope on high,
Our England presses forward
To her immortality.

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have" (2 Cor. viii. 11).

OBJECT:—To assist in making known, by special means, the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 100 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

Westgate-on-Sea, Jan. 18th, 1895.

We have included in this month's list of donations a legacy, devoted to our work by the late Miss Ledger, of Eltham, who, for many years, rejoiced in the thought that we are partakers of Israel's inheritance, while believing truly the necessity of salvation through Jesus Christ. With earnest interest Miss Ledger endeavoured, herself as far as she was able, to make others alive to British-Israel truth, and generously contributed regularly to our Fund, and to the British-Israel Assoiation. We have lost in her a personal, true, and loving friend.

SOWING THE SEED.

It will be readily imagined that letters received latterly, shew how very much alive are British-Israelites to the problems that are before the nation, and of the difficulties which the Government has to meet, also the great need on the part of Israel's rulers for wisdom and firmness to deal with them peacefully and effectually. Evidence is also constantly given by correspondents of the help and assurance of providential care in the present hours of anxiety, by the knowledge that the British are truly God's people Israel. Quotations from letters that I have to give, touch on other aspects of the revelation of Israel, and will be thought over probably by many interested readers, who will note also that the light is still spreading.

A friend in Victoria, Australia, wrote:—"I am forwarding P.O.O. for 10s. I would like to make a large donation, but Australia is now suffering from a severe drought, and our harvest prospects are not at all satisfactory." Since that was written, it may be that rains as given to New South Wales have also been bestowed on Victoria. We need so much to realise our dependence for all things upon Him who ruleth in the heavens that, for the benefit of all in these serious times throughout the Empire, I venture to draw from a letter of a Sydney correspondent of the Colonial and Continental Church Society on this very subject of the drought. "There has been granted to this colony a remarkable answer to prayer. For months a severe drought had prevailed. Sun and strong winds had destroyed the vegetation. There was great scarcity of water, and in the country sheep and cattle were dying and lying dead. The Government, moved by the Churches, set apart Sunday, September 22nd, as a day of humiliation and prayer for rain. On the 21st there was no more appearance of rain than there had been in the past. On Sunday rain fell in some parts of the Colony. 'Before they call, . . . and while they are yet speaking I will hear.' Since then rain has continued to fall over the Colony. Sunday, October 6th, was set apart by the Government as a day of thanksgiving." As of old when Israel turned to the Lord, He gave deliverance, so may we all turn in the hour of our trouble.

Our Victorian friend continues: "The critical state of affairs is keenly watched in Australia, and many are the expressions of satisfaction both in the press, and in conversation that the foreign affairs of our Empire are at this critical juncture entrusted to such a strong and capable statesman as Lord Salisbury has proved himself to be. If God be for us (and as redeemed Israelites we believe this) who can stand against us? Surely not corrupt Turkey, nor conscience-bound Russia, nor infidel France.

"I have read with interest the papers read at the Prophecy Investigation Society Meeting, as given in the Covenant People. All through I have noticed the strong confidence of the exponents of the truth of the Identity, in contrast to the uncertain and sometimes conflicting opinions of various speakers who tried to refute the points so clearly stated by Anglo-Israelites, and so ably proved by constant reference to God's Word in both the Old and New Testaments. "I have given some literature to a young State school teacher; he told me he had read it with interest." Other satisfactory references to literature distribution are given, and the letter closes with "trust" that we "will forward papers as usual."

Considering how easily friendly relations with our kith and kin in the United States of America may be interfered with, as we have lately seen, it is a matter for much thankfulness that we know that the knowledge that we are brethren of Israel, is spreading as leaven in the States. What power can be so great as that to draw us together as it increases! Being, with us, of the "chosen people," it must be looked for that in the future, near or distant, we shall be joined together again; therefore it is with peculiar satisfaction that news is received of work accomplished by our friends that is bound to bring light to others of Manasseh. One wrote:—"The package received, I carried with me to the Springs in the interior, where I was ordered to recruit after a spell of sickness, and there distributed most of the contents. I found them very valuable." Then he also refers to "the discussion of Anglo-Israelism before the Prophecy Investigation Society," adding "I am gratified to see that our belief has been so ably advocated. I have no fear of injurious effects from the most searching criticism, but the contrary, and thank God that opportunity to present its claims so forcibly has been afforded to its able advocates."

"We are living in stirring times now," writes a home Sower, and the remembrance that we are Israel comes forward to encourage with the words, "I am convinced that the light of Our Identity is spreading;" and another says, "I wonder what the New Year will bring to us as a nation, the outlook seems so very dark. I can never be thankful enough to know for sure that we are God's people Israel." Yet a third Sower expresses his gladness "to receive the pamphlets, and will distribute them to the best of my ability for the cause I have so much at heart. I may point out," he adds, "that the study of the British-Israel question has enlightened my mind more than any study I have yet undertaken."

The study of this great question has "enlightened" his mind, by the blessed aid of the Holy Spirit we know. It is surely a fact to endeavour to realize, and to make us try to take every possible means to kindle light for others, that our God may be glorified thereby, and many hearts be strengthened and comforted.

We acknowledge with much pleasure and best thanks, 3 dozen of the New Year's No. of the BANNER from the Lady Jane Ellice, also 4 dozen BANNERS of Jan. 8th, from Messrs. R. Banks and Son; thus with 16 dozen New Year's BANNERS purchased, we have been able to make a goodly distribution in addition to the regular weekly supply. Address, Mrs. Woolcott, 74, Saltram-crescent, St. Peter's-park, London, W.

HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS, PRINCE HENRY OF BATTENBERG.

EXPRESSION has already been briefly given in the pages of the BANNER to the grief felt by all Anglo-Israelites for our Queen and her afflicted and widowed daughter, H.R.H. Princess Beatrice of Battenberg, on the occasion of the death of H.R.H. Prince Henry, from fever, contracted during the march to Kumassi on the Empire's service. Whatever afflicts our beloved Sovereign afflicts us, and all who think with us in respect to our glorious subject. We offer to the sufferers our humble but sincere condolence. The subjoined letter speaks of the sympathy with Her Majesty and her daughter of ten of the allied colonies of this great Empire. The communication is calculated to minister comfort, and we re-publish it as proof of the sincerity of the loyal affection of "the company of nations" for Her Majesty's person and family, which is also felt universally at this time of sorrow and trial.

The Agents-General for the Colonies have sent the following letter to the Queen through Mr. Chamberlain :—

Westminster, S.W., Jan. 23, 1896.

Sir,—Having with the deepest regret learnt that Colonel H.R.H. the Prince Henry of Battenberg has died of fever contracted on the West Coast of Africa while there in the nation's service, and knowing the deep-seated feelings of loyal devotion to Her Majesty's august person and family which animate the people of the colonies we have respectively the honour to represent, we hasten to request that you will lay at the foot of the Throne the humble expression of their respectful and heartfelt sympathy in the grief which the untimely death of the gallant Prince has inflicted on Her Majesty, on the now widowed Princess, and on all the Royal Family. We cannot but hope that the certain knowledge that their grief is shared by the people throughout Her Majesty's widespread Empire may prove of some consolation to the august mourners. We have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servants (signed)—SAUL SAMUEL, Agent-General for New South Wales; W. B. PERCEVAL, Agent-General for New Zealand; MALCOLM FRASER, Agent-General for Western Australia; R. G. W. HERBERT, Agent-General for Tasmania; WALTER PEACE, Agent-General for Natal; DUNCAN GILLIES, Agent-General for Victoria; THOMAS PLAYFORD, Agent-General for South Australia; SPENCE BRYDGES TODD, Agent-General for the Cape of Good Hope; J. G. COLMER, Secretary at the Office of the High Commissioner for Canada; CHARLES S. DICKEN, Assistant Agent-General for Queeensland.

Mr. Chamberlain forwarded the foregoing letter to the Queen and, as the result, has been commanded by Her Majesty "to assure the Agents-General how deeply touched she and the Princess have been by this expression of loyal sympathy and condolence, of which genuine sentiments they feel that the letter is indicative."

CLERGYMEN AND SUNDAY MUSEUMS.

To the Editor of the "Standard."

SIR,—A careful analysis of the fifty-nine names of clergymen and ministers who were announced to preach last Sunday in favour of opening Museums on Sundays gives the following results :—Unitarian ministers, thirty; Church clergymen, twenty-two; Ethical preachers, two; Scotch clergyman, one; Congregationalist, one; Baptist, one; Theist, one; Positivist, one.

When we reflect that there are some fifty thousand clergymen and ministers of all denominations in the United Kingdom, the above analysis bears eloquent testimony to the faithfulness of our religious teachers to the great principle of Sunday closing and Sunday rest.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES HILL,
Secretary Working Men's Lord's-day Rest Association.

"WIDOW PAYNE FUND."

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—We desire to express the hearty thanks of Widow Payne, and her eight fatherless children, to you in the first place, for permitting the appeal for aid to appear in the pages of the BANNER, contrary to the usual rule, and also to those kind friends whose hearts the Lord has touched to "visit" this widow and these orphans by their contributions. Permit us also to assure these friends that every penny of their money will be expended to good purpose, in aid of Mrs. Payne and family; whatever expenses are incurred shall not fall on the fund, which will, we may intimate, be kept open until Feb. 29th, thus enabling any further contributions which may come to hand after this acknowledgment is sent off to be included.

Jan. 28, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Having been a believer in the Identity for nearly twenty-five years, and finding my "craze" becoming more and more deepened by recent events, it gives me much pleasure to be able to inform you that there is a growing interest in the matter in this part of our world-wide Empire. I send you a small contribution to the ever-broadening stream of evidence, in the shape of an extract from the last quarterly statement of the Palestine Exploration Society that has reached me here. On page 292 of the quarterly statement for July, 1895, there is an article entitled, "A Journey in the Hauran" (East Palestine), by the Rev. W. Ewing: "It was in 'Akrabah that I first heard of an idea—I met with it often afterwards—prevalent all over the East. There is a strong belief that in the far past the country belonged to the ancestors of the white men of the West; and it is regarded as a certainty that our people will one day return to take possession again of the heritage lost for so long." I think, sir, that is pretty definite evidence, from one who does not claim to be himself a believer, that a "strong" Anglo-Israel craze is "prevalent all over the East."

I remain, sir, with all good wishes,

Yours faithfully, R. G. B.

AN EXALTED "FOREIGNER" ON ENGLAND'S ENEMIES.

IT is said, though with what truth we know not, that the King of the Belgians, now visiting this country, was the author of the remarkable letter which appeared in a conspicuous part of the Times of January 18th last, in large type. The writer who was thus honoured by the Times, spoke as one who knew the Germans well, and he came out boldly with his thoughts. He was greatly astonished to discover how heartily the world hates us British, and that the hate is not confined to the Turks and Boers, but that nearly all the nations of Europe and Asia feel bitterly towards us; even the Americans showing, very unexpectedly, that they have a desire to quarrel with us. The royal foreigner asks himself why the English are so detested, and why the hate is universal? The reply to these questions shall be in "The Foreigner's" own words. He said:—

In the first place, it is envy and jealousy which have made England hated and feared by her rivals on the field of competition. The sight of a relatively small nation spreading a net of colonies and possessions all over the globe, bringing forward extraordinary and salutary changes in the social and political conditions of distant wild and semi-civilised nations, and, above all, earning moral and material successes for her strenuous work, could hardly have been viewed with indifference by those European nations whose awakening is of a more recent date, and who do not dispose of the means and qualities which have helped you. Success has in all times engendered envy and animosity, and particularly if this success is the outcome of national qualities in which others are lacking. Germany, France, and Russia, in comparing their gigantic military budget with the comparatively small outlays of England for her defence, must certainly feel vexed, and still more will the respective peoples envy the British citizen, who does not feel the burden of a compulsory military service, and still enjoys the liberty, might, and power of the greatest Empire that ever existed. I have often had very lively disputes about this question. The Frenchman of the better class is comparatively less blind in his judgment than the others. He says, "Je dèteste les Anglais, mais je les admire." The Russian, like all Asiatics, is carefully hiding his feelings. He imitates the Englishman in habits and manners, he acknowledges his mental superiority, in appearance he respects him even, but the more deep-seated are his hatred and his efforts to oust him in Asia. In Germany the relation is totally different. Since 1870 the formerly modest, quiet, and inoffensive German has decidedly fallen into the vice of self-admiration, and one has only to mention the spreading of the English language all over the globe, the gigantic commercial relations of Great Britain, and the ubiquity of the Union Jack in all the seas to rouse his anger and his dislike. He is immediately ready to point to the conquest of German capital and German influence in China, he alludes to the successful German policy in Turkey, and, in spite of having shown much sulkiness when Bismarck first supported the idea of African colonies, he is now dreaming already of paramount influence over the Dark Continent and of superseding England altogether. It is useless to tell him that it is only a nation brought up in liberal institutions, individuals armed with the spirit of enterprise, perseverance, and self-reliance, that will accomplish great things, and that Germans, sadly wanting in these qualities, must grow up and get ripe before they can emulate the English. He is deaf to all kinds of similar argumentation, he forgets that he resembles rather the spirited boy defying a grown-up man, and he will continue as long as forbearance will give a free course to his juvenile recklessness. I emphasize the word forbearance, considering that it is this virtue, which England has practised for several decades under the title of Love of Peace, that has mostly encouraged her rivals and adversaries, and has raised the spirit even of those whom one would have least expected to come forward with aggressive tendencies.

There are other reasons assigned why Great Britain is unpopular, connected with the outbreak of the Armenian atrocities, and our failure to put them down by force. But our "Foreigner" sees that we are not to blame, since to interfere now would bring on the disastrous war-woe, called "the general war," and that would be far worse than waiting with patience for matters to settle themselves in Armenia without violently interposing as conquerors in the territories of a friendly Power. The writer concludes with the following pithy sentences :—

In summing up what has been said about the enemies of England, we can easily come to the conclusion that their desire to injure British interests in the world is much greater than the power they dispose of. England must be prepared to have intermezzos like the recent ones more frequently, but there is not the slightest danger in store as long as the nation continues in the spirit which has made her great, free, and powerful.

The "forbearance" of this country towards her enemies was exemplified in the conduct of the then Prime Minister towards the Boers, after the defeat at Majuba Hill. The "forbearance" was misplaced, and worked evil. It has led to bloodshed and rebellion already, and is likely to do so again. Our nation is verily, in some of its moods, "a meek" race, to whom, however, in Matt. v. 5, R.V., "the inheritance of the earth" is promised. We are dealing again with the Boers in the very spirit of meekness, because of Dr. Jameson's faulty conduct in respect to his late "raid." It has encouraged even the German Emperor to administer a blow at British pride, which he thought the nation would not have the spirit to resent.

"Envy and jealousy" it seems, then, to our "Foreign" friend, as it has seemed to us, are at the bottom of all our late troubles. We have too many colonies; too much success in commerce; too much resultant wealth; too large and increasing a population to be acceptable to our would-be rivals. We pay little or nothing for our secure domicile in these "Isles of the West," whereas they pay in compulsory military conscription, and by tremendous burdens borne to defend their frontier, and a colonial empire which is mostly situated (so different from ours) in the hot and unhealthy portions of the world. They envy us our coal mines, diamond and gold mines, especially those of the Transvaal, and dream of turning us out of South Africa to occupy it themselves. In vain!

The "Foreigner's" answer is a good one, but we have a better! The British are Israel, and to Israel the Lord has given "the ends" and "uttermost parts of the earth," the inheritance of the heathen, nay, the kingdom of the world itself! He has granted our race, being Israel, wealth, power, influence, the Gates, with the supremacy of the ocean accompanying it, and all spiritual gifts needed to make us the successful missionaries of the world, the depositories of the Word of God, and its distributors to all "the nations, families, and kindreds of the earth." This vast mass of blessings, exclusively bestowed by the Great Giver, and exclusively enjoyed by the British only, among all the nations, suffices to embitter the latter, not so favoured, against us. The result shows us the wisdom of God in hiding the knowledge of Our Identity from ourselves, as well as from the world, during these past many centuries. Since thus we have escaped the envy of the nations till these latter days, when the signs of our origin could no more be hidden, henceforth the Lord must take up our defence into His own hands, and shield us from our enemies, as, indeed, He has promised to do to His "blind people," in Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.

In regard to the Armenian question, respecting which the "Foreigner" speaks also plainly, we hardly see how we can patiently stand by and allow a race of Christians related to us, as it is suspected, to be done to death by the Mahomedan subjects of the Sultan, in the hope that something will "turn up" to stop the awful carnage. If the time be come, as most men declare it is, the hour for action is not far off; and God's Word declares that, "by the hand of My people Israel I will lay My vengeance upon Edom" (Ezek. xxv. 14). The strong probability seems to be that the Turkish Empire represents the prophetic Edom, and her implacable hatred of the Christian, and the Christian Israelite in particular, is especially marked in the present time. How, when, and where the blow will fall upon the Turk we know not, but it surely cannot be long delayed. That it will fall by means of the British-Israelites, we regard as very probable, and, as far as the Armenians are concerned, the sooner the better. Meanwhile, it is a comfort to be told, and told truly, why the nations hate us. They hated our King, the Lord Jesus Christ, and "they hated Him without a cause." They hate His people now; and we praise the Lord that, foreigners being our judges, it is clear that we have given them no just cause for such great hostility envy, or jealousy.

GOD'S PROMISES TO ABRAHAM.

By J. Bradley.

PART I.

If the absolute proprietor of an extensive and valuable estate, after having conducted the reader into the very midst of it, and told him to survey it in every direction, to behold it in its length and in its breadth, and to mark its distinguishing peculiarities, should say to him, "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever, what would he infer from such a promise?" Would he infer that the proprietor of the estate, instead of intending to bestow it upon him, according to the plain import of the language he employed, intended to bestow it upon another, and that in a country which he never saw? or would he infer that he intended to bestow upon him something which, although it might be of greater value, was altogether different from what had been so distinctly pointed out to him? On the contrary, would he not infer, from the very specific character of the promise made, that if it were fulfilled, the estate which he then beheld would be his own? that he would enjoy the possession of it himself, as well as his posterity, and that his posterity would continue to possess it until the end of time?

Now the case supposed is a fair illustration of the position of Abraham, in the land of Canaan, when Jehovah, the sovereign and original proprietor of all things, thus addressed him :—Gen. xii. 1—3: "Now the Lord said to Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee; and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing; and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xiii. 14, 15: "And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, southward, eastward and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever."

And although it was undoubtedly the ultimate design of God to remove the patriarch and his believing posterity to a "better country, that is, an heavenly," yet that Canaan was the direct object of the promise must be obvious to the plainest mind. For it was upon that very land the patriarch was then standing; and the promise being confined to the land which he beheld, it could not have had a distinct or immediate reference to any other, much less to that high and heavenly land, in which the holy God resides, and which, being very far beyond the range of the contracted vision of man, could not at that time have been beheld by him.

And that Canaan was the direct object of the promise very plainly appears, not only from its being confined to the land which Abraham beheld while standing on it, but from the command immediately given him to walk through it. Gen. xiii. 17, 18: "Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto thee. Then Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plains of Mamre, which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord."

Now that the land through which Abraham was commanded to walk was the land which he beheld, cannot admit of a reasonable doubt; and that Canaan was the land which he beheld, when God commanded him to look at it and to walk through it, is evident from ver. 12 of the chapter where the command is recorded, and where it is distinctly written, "Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan."

God not only makes these promises of the land, but gives to Abraham the very boundaries of it which he and his seed should inherit for a possession. As everyone at all acquainted with the geography of the earth must be distinctly aware, it can refer to none but the land of Canaan. Gen. xv. 15—18: "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt (the Nile) unto the great river, the river Euphrates."

Now, although the bare promise of Jehovah would secure the fulfilment of any engagement into which he had entered, yet, upon the occasion before us, he was pleased to ratify the promise which he made to Abram in a very solemn manner. Gen. xv. 7—17: "And He said unto him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees to give thee this land to inherit it. And he said, Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it? And He said unto him, Take Me an heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle dove, and a young pigeon. And he took unto him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another; but the birds divided he not. And when the fowls came down upon the carcases Abram drove them away. And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him. And He said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years: and also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge; and afterward shall they come out with great substance. And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again; for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full. And it came to pass, that, when the sun went down and it was dark, behold, a smoking furnace and a lamp of fire that passed between those pieces." Such then was the solemn ratification of the covenant Jehovah made with Abram; and, in consequence of which Canaan is more than once referred to by Moses and Joshua, in addressing their brethren in the wilderness, as that which God sware unto their fathers that he would give unto them. Yea, Jehovah Himself has thus referred to it—Gen. xvii. 8: "And I will give thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land of thy sojournings, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." Exodus xxxiii. 1: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Depart, and go up hence, thou and the people which thou hast brought up out of the land of Egypt, unto the land which I sware unto Abram, to Isaac, and to Jacob, saying, Unto thy seed will I give it." There cannot be any doubt remaining in our minds as to whether Canaan be distinctly intended in these promises God made to Abraham.

To Isaac, the heir of Abraham, the child of promise, the land of Canaan was just as specifically referred to, as that which should be the future inheritance both of himself and his posterity. Gen. xxvi. 1—4: "And Isaac went unto Abimelech, king of the Philistines, unto Gerar. And the Lord appeared unto him and said, Go not down into Egypt; dwell in the land which I shall tell thee of. Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee and will bless thee; for unto thee and unto thy seed I will give all these countries; and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham, thy father. And I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and I will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

Now, as the land in which Isaac was at the time sojourning, was the land of Gerar, belonging to Abimelech, king of the Philistines, which was situated upon the south-west of Palestine, the promise of all these countries must consequently refer to those that were immediately connected with it, or, in other words, to the land of Canaan.

Now Isaac had two sons, the elder Esau, and Jacob the younger brother, and in Gen. xxv. 31—34, we find that the younger supplanted the elder, and Jacob said, "Sell me this day thy birthright. And Esau said, Behold, I am at the point to die; and what profit shall this birthright do to me? And Jacob said, sware to me this day; and he sware unto him; and he sold his birthright unto Jacob. Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles; and he did eat and drink, and rose up, and went his way. Thus Esau despised his birthright."

To Jacob, who, although the younger son of Isaac, was, nevertheless, to inherit the birthright, the promise of Canaan, to himself and his descendants, was quite as distinct as it was to Abraham and to Isaac, if not more so.

Jacob, although appointed to the birthright by the sovereign will of God, nevertheless obtained the blessing in a highly dishonourable manner, for he obtained it by fraud. The consequence was, that his brother Esau, as we might naturally suppose, was strongly incensed against him. So that his mother Rebecca, fearing that it might lead to fatal consequences, immediately advised him to flee to Haran, to her brother Laban. In obedience to which command, in connection with a similar one from his father Isaac (Gen. xxviii. 10—14), "Jacob went out from Beersheba, and went toward Haran. And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillow, and lay down in that place to sleep. And he dreamed, and behold, a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and, behold, the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And, behold, the Lord stood above it, and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed; and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt break forth abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south ; and in thee, and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Now, as the land on which Jacob was then lying was Bethel, in the land of Canaan, a more direct reference to Canaan, as the future inheritance of himself and of his posterity, than the one here made, it is hardly possible to conceive.

In Gen. xxviii. 15, God promises to be with Jacob in all places in these words, "And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land ; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of." During the stay of Jacob with his uncle Laban, we cannot help seeing how the blessing of God followed him, and how his own character as the supplanter was developed, for he obtained possession of the best of Laban's flocks'. Gen. xxxi. 1 : "And he heard the words of Laban's sons, saying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our father's ; and of that which was our father's hath he gotten all his glory." In Gen. xxxi. 3, Jacob receives the command of God to return unto the land of his father in these words : "And the Lord said unto Jacob, return unto the land of thy fathers, and to thy kindred ; and I will be with thee " ; and to that land Jacob did return. Gen. xxxv. 10—15 : "And God said unto him, Thy name is Jacob ; thy name shall not be called any more Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name ; and He called his name Israel. And God said unto him, I am God Almighty ; be fruitful and multiply ; a nation and a company of nations shall be of thee, and kings shall come out of thy loins ; and the land which I gave Abraham and Isaac, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed after thee will I give the land. And God went up from him, in the place where He talked with him. And Jacob set up a pillar in the place where He talked with him, even a pillar of stone ; and he poured a drink offering thereon, and he poured oil thereon ; and Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him, Bethel." During Jacob's short sojourn in this land, his favourite son Joseph was removed from him and sold into the land of Egypt, there to become the chief ruler of the land, and next to Pharoah, so that no man could lift his hand or foot without him in all the land of Egypt. Gen. xli. 40, 41 : "Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled ; only in the throne will I be greater than thou. And Pharoah said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt." During Joseph's early life in this strange land, God brought Jacob and all his family to dwell in that land of plenty during the great dearth, which visited that and all lands. Gen. xlvi. 3, 4 : "And he said, I am God, the God of thy father ; fear not to go down into Egypt ; for I will there make of thee a great nation, I will go down with thee into Egypt ; and I will also surely bring thee up again ; and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes." Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years, and the time came for him to die.

Before passing away, Jacob has to bless his children and select his heir to the covenant promises God had made to him. Joseph having two sons born to him in the land of Egypt, they are brought to Jacob to receive their blessing. Genesis xlviii. 5 : "And now thy two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, which were born unto thee in the land of Egypt before I came unto thee into Egypt, are mine; in place of Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine." Jacob passes over his two eldest sons, giving the blessing to the two sons of Joseph. For proof of this turn to Genesis xlix. 3—7 : "Reuben, thou art my firstborn, my might, and the beginning of my strength, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power: unstable as water, thou shalt not excel; because thou wentest up to thy father's bed, then defilest thou it: he went up to my couch. Simeon and Levi are brethren; instruments of cruelty are in their habitations. O my soul, come not thou into their secret, unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united: for in their anger they slew a man, and in their self-will, they houghed oxen. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel : I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." 1 Chronicles v. 1, 2: "Now the sons of Reuben the firstborn of Israel (for he was the firstborn, but, forasmuch as he defiled his father's bed, his birthright was given unto the sons of Joseph, the son of Israel: and the genealogy is not to be reckoned after the birthright. For Judah prevailed above his brethren, and of him came the chief ruler; but the birthright was Joseph's)." This birthright and the blessings it carries with it has never yet been changed, but continues to this day with the true descendants of Joseph and Judah. Genesis xlxix. 1: "And Jacob called unto his sons, and said, gather yourselves together, that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days." Nothing can be more clear to a reader of God's Word that the latter, or last days, are this our Christian dispensation. During this time, these blessings given upon the heads of Judah, and Joseph must be receiving their fulfilment. Genesis xlix. 8—10: "Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise; thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies: thy father's children shall bow down before thee. Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion ; who shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be."

This blessing of Judah has not yet had its perfect fulfilment, and we hope to speak of it in a future chapter. The same can be said of the blessings to Joseph and his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh. Genesis xlviii. 13—22: "And Joseph took them both, Ephraim in his right hand towards Israel's left hand, and Manasseh in his left hand toward's Israel's right hand, and brought them near unto him. And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands wittingly; for Manasseh was the firstborn. And he blessed Joseph, and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long, unto this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Isaac; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth. And when Joseph saw that his father laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, it displeased him; and he held up his father's hand to remove it from Ephraim's head unto Manasseh's head. And Joseph said unto his father, Not so, my father: for this is the firstborn; put thy right hand upon his head. And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a fulness of nations." (Rom. xi. 25: "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that hardness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the nations be come in,") "And he blessed them that day, saying, God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh: and he set Ephraim before Manasseh. And Israel said unto Joseph, Behold, I die; but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers. Moreover, I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow." Genesis xlix. 22—24 confirms the fact that Joseph received from his father, Jacob, the promise that the multitudinous seed should come from him and his children: "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose daughters run over the wall. The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: But his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob: from thence is the shepherd the stone of Israel." It is quite clear from the above portion of God's Word, that a great and important duty was imposed upon Joseph and his descendants, that they were to be the shepherd, or caretakers of the stone of Israel; so wherever that stone, the pillar, or pillow of Jacob, or the stone of destiny can be found, there the House of Israel, with Judah reigning over them, must be also.

1 Kings viii. 25: "Therefore now, Lord God of Israel, keep with Thy servant David my father that Thou promisedst him, saying, There shall not fail thee a man in My sight to sit on the throne of Israel."

1 Kings ix. 5: "Then I will establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever, as I promised to David thy father, saying, There shall not fail thee a man upon the throne of Israel."

2 Chron. vi. 16: "Now therefore, O Lord God of Israel, keep with Thy servant David my father that which Thou hast promised him, saying, There shall not fail thee a man in My sight to sit upon the throne of Israel."

Jer. xxxii. 17: "For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel."

ISRAEL AND THE NATIONS.

By John S. Anderson.

At the present moment, when so much attention is being called to our movements by the nations, to the north, the south, the east, and the west, it is very comforting to hear words at church, in the first morning lesson for the day (1st Sunday after Epiphany), of such import—promise and prophecy side by side—as the following verses from the said lesson, Isaiah li. They are so much to the point that we hope we may be allowed space to quote them in full.

Verse 4: Hearken unto Me, My people; and give ear unto Me, O My nation: for a law shall proceed from Me, and I will make My judgment to rest for a light of the people.

Verse 5: My righteousness is near; My salvation is gone forth; and Mine arms shall judge the people; the isles shall wait upon Me, and on Mine arm shall they trust.

Verse 7: Hearken unto Me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is My law; fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings.

Verse 8: For the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool; but My righteousness shall be for ever, and My salvation from generation to generation.

Verse 11: Therefore, the redeemed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their head: they shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow, and mourning, shall flee away.

Verse 22: Thus saith thy Lord the Lord, and thy God that pleadeth the cause of His people, Behold I have taken out of thine hand the cup of trembling, even the dregs of the cup of My fury; thou shalt no more drink it again.

Verse 23: But I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee; which have said to thy soul, Bow down, that we may go over; and thou hast laid thy body as the ground, and as the street, to them that went over.

Now, let us make a few comments on these most remarkable passages of Holy Writ. In verse 4 the Lord is speaking to His people and His nation. Everyone knows who are called God's people, and we are not aware that anyone has yet been able to show that our nation is not the nation to which the Scriptures refer, and as if to make it more evident, the prophet, in verse 5, alludes to "the isles," and in a reference to chap. lx. 9 we read, "Surely the isles shall wait for Me, and the ships of Tarshish first, to bring thy sons from far."

We should very much like to hear the replies which would be made by a majority of the thousands of clergymen who have read these words this day, to the question, What people now represent "the Isles"?

Then with regard to verse 7, there is not a newspaper you take up in which you will not find quotations from foreign papers, containing reproaches and revilings against us and our behaviour. By some, we are called very hard names; yet, jealous as they are, many of them every now and then admit that we are the most powerful, in fact the first nation in the world. Is not this another identity?

The promises and prophecies now follow in verses 8, 11, 22 and 23, but they embrace, in fact the whole subject embraces, such a wide field, that only the fringe can be touched within the limits of a moderate notice.

Some of these prophecies have not yet been accomplished, but they hold out to us a most cheering prospect, that after a severe trouble we shall emerge unhurt, and that the evil which was intended by our enemies for us, will be turned upon them with a tremendous retribution.

It must not be forgotten, however, that there remains a great deal for us as a nation to do. We cannot expect God to assist us, if we do not obey His laws, and although many of the Abrahamic promises are unconditional, circumstances might arise which would cause them to be delayed; moreover, we must do something ourselves, bearing in mind the promise written in Psalm lxxxi. 10, "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it."

"HER MAJESTY'S EARTH."

Two middies on board H.M.S. —— were en route to the China Station. It was the first time they had ever been abroad, and what struck them most forcibly was the fact of the Union Jack waving gaily in every port they entered—Gibraltar, Malta, Aden, Colombo, and others. At last they reached Hong Kong. The Union Jack fluttering in the breeze over the Government House was the first thing that caught their eyes. "Well, I'm blessed!" said one to the other, as he leant against the side of the gunboat; "I wonder which will be the next place on her Majesty's earth we shall go to?"

THE WOMAN CLOTHED WITH THE SUN.

By the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

A reader of the Banner of Israel, who signs himself "Issachar," has done me the favour of criticising my article on The Sun-Clothed Woman, which appeared in the New Year's number. He maintains that the man-child who was born, escaped the dragon, and was caught up to heaven, was not Jesus Christ, but represents the Church of the elect, which "is to be caught up as soon as complete."

He maintains that this is so because the Apocalypse is a prophecy given by the Lord, and could not, therefore, refer to events that had taken place, except those events were to be repeated, which, of course, they are not. In his interpretation he attempts no explanation as to who the woman is; he only states that the man-child is the elect body that is to be caught up. He gives no exposition of the wilderness or of the 1,260 days. He assumes that this separate vision (chap. xii.) "is not only a revelation but a prophecy," and can have no reference to things that were past, or to things that were present (when it was recorded), or to things that shall be hereafter, i.e., up to this period, but only to things that are yet future. He gives no reason for this opinion except that he understands the mystery of Christ and that others do not.

But to me, and to the authorities that I quoted, this ultra futurist interpretation reduces the Apocalypse to confusion; it is a virtual acknowledgment that those who hold it cannot attempt to interpret the book, and therefore push it forward into a future of which they know less.

Why should the great Revealer have been debarred from a survey of the past when opening up the future; or ignore the body in its earlier stages when telling of the wilderness hiding, and of the ultimate triumph? Is it reasonable that in order to interpret the man-child as an election from the Church, every other mark and symbol should be ignored?

I stated in my article that "the great sign" is "figurative of two opposing powers or principles during a long period of time." Before the Christian age, at the time of the first Advent, and during this age, I gave an interpretation of each figure—the woman, the child, the dragon, the wilderness, the period; I gave historical data for their identification. The futurists' interpretation attempts nothing of the kind. They only desire that the book may be so handled that their pet theory concerning the rapture may not be disturbed, and so that they are caught away they are perfectly satisfied to leave the world to the non-believing and carnal who are left, and to the dragon. But this is not the mind of the Lord Jesus, who in order to save the world would not Himself be saved from suffering; and who purposes to rule the world and to bless it through recovenanted Christian Israel, and those united to Israel who partake of His self-sacrificing spirit and are willing to go or to stay, to be caught up or to sleep, to be in the body or out of the body, just as will best suit His purposes of love for the world for which He died, and for His manifestation through Israel which He redeemed, and not for their own ease. I would ask "Issachar" how in the name of wonder can the child be the Church, and, if so, what is the woman—his mother? How can the rapt body of Christ rule all nations with a rod of iron, and after this man-child body is taken away, what is the woman or where is the wilderness of her preservation? I suppose "Issachar" would say that she is to be there for but three and a half years! through which short period of trouble the Saviour must do His work through "the earthly family" and establish His rule without the assistance of the ease-loving and faint-hearted "rapt" saints.

P.S.—Of course, the Banner of Israel is not the place in which to repeat the contention between differing schools of interpretation. But this only I would say, that the mystery of the body of Christ is as well understood by those who hold to the historical and year-day view, as by those whom "Issachar" represents, and is as fully valued.

Little has been revealed as to the communion between the Church militant and the Church triumphant at present; and less as to the relationship between the Resurrection Church (if I may coin an expression) and the Church on earth during the thousand of years of peace.

RANDOM SHAFTS.

It is miraculous how circumstances alter cases. All our lives we have been hearing or reading of the advantages attached to the Hebrew birthright, and the lofty rank of the firstborn. But when men find that "the birthright was Joseph's" they concurrently discover that there really is not much in it. What did Israel gain by the birthright? Simply a "double portion," and Joseph received it. These are the sentiments of, among others, the Rev. J. M. Eppstein, who likewise declines to discriminate between Israel and Judah, but regards the two terms as prophetically the same. "Being a Jew, learned in the Scriptures, this seemed strange," is the editor's comment, and perhaps it will be felt that this somewhat satirical allusion to the profundity of Mr. Eppstein's researches is a very slight punishment for his misdemeanours. His powers of discrimination are certainly not excessive, but it is to be hoped that he will not take the compliment seriously and remain satisfied with the laurels he has won. Personally, I should recommend him to carry on his studies with increased vigour, and especially to make a thorough examination of the birthright question, for he has much knowledge yet to gather.

Esau, it is said, sold his "birthright," and I can remember a congregation almost in tears over the woeful recital of his tragic loss. In this instance, however, there was no mention of a "double portion." Esau was represented as having forfeited everything worth having, and the aspiration went up that he at least saved his soul. That the birthright included a double portion is true; that it was composed of a double portion is untrue. It might be asked, a double portion of what? but, as Mr. Eppstein further remarks that Joseph obtained it, we may infer that he means a double share of the land. Now it is obvious from the actions of Jacob (Gen. xlviii. 14—20) and the words of Jeremiah (chap. xxxi. 9) that the birthright descended from Joseph to Ephraim, and if it implies a double share of territory when did Ephraim inherit it? Curious to say, Manasseh actually did get a double portion. Was this an error of judgment, or is it intended to discredit the new-fangled theory that the birthright consisted of a two-fold allotment?

"Eadie's Biblical Cyclopædia" contains the following:

"The firstborn son among the Jews enjoyed special privileges above his brethren, and these privileges were hence called his birthright, or his right by birth. Among these privileges were consecration to the Lord (Ex. xxii. 29), great dignity (Gen. xlix. 3), a double portion of his father's estate (Deut. xxi. 17), and (in the royal families) succession to the kingdom (2 Chron. xxi. 3). . . . The paternal blessing was also in a peculiar sense the right of the firstborn. . . Whoever enjoyed the birthright was regarded as invested with great dignity and superiority. So the phrase is used figuratively to denote the chief or highest" (Job. xviii. 13). This is a proper statement of what the birthright entailed in its private aspect. But the birthright of a tribe or nation must differ widely from the birthright of "a son and heir." Consequently, the particular duties and prerogatives of the eldest son in a family cannot determine the exact shape of Joseph's political birthright. But its character may be gleaned from such passages as Gen. xlviii. 19; xlix. 22—26; Deut. xxxiii. 13—17, and Zech. x. 7—9; and they reduce the "double portion" idea to the veriest of nonsense.

Mr. Eppstein informs us that to the enquiry, Where are the Ten Tribes? he would reply, "I do not know"; declaring that God undertook to find them, and that it was not for us to interfere. The reverend gentleman seems to assume that what he does not know nobody else can know, which is liable to produce laughter. As for the intimation that our efforts on behalf of Israel's manifestation are not required, the artifice is not altogether original. When the modern missionary movement began, the Church's responsibility was brought before a Scotch Presbytery by a minister who, with commendable fervour, advocated the sending of the Gospel to benighted lands; but he was not encouraged, and the venerable Moderator settled him entirely by saying, "Young man, when God wants to convert the heathen He will do it without your assistance." So far as I am aware the name of this sage has not come down to posterity, but I will try to preserve Mr. Eppstein's. He has evidently fenced off the Divine vineyard into two departments, and as he appears to have ascertained precisely what section of it God has reserved for His own exclusive operations, and what section is open to those who would be co-workers with Him, he should publish a suitable guide for the benefit of the Christian public, shewing the human and superhuman spheres in parallel columns.

There is probably not in the whole universe a member of any Church but who has been indoctrinated with the principle that "God's work is the work of every Christian." Apathy and indolence, lack of zeal and generosity are condemned as unworthy of "God's professing people," and displeasing in His sight. How does it happen, then, that the identification of Israel is an exception—that in this matter apathy becomes a virtue and zeal an evil? On the strength of the aforesaid principle money is collected for all conceivable objects, but until Mr. Eppstein has furnished us with the suggested guide-book we shall have in future to be very careful with our subscriptions, even subscriptions to Jewish missions. And when compiling this book he should not forget to notice Isa. xliii. 8, "Bring forth the blind people that have eyes," for it has a bearing on the Ten Tribes. It may, of course, in our opponent's opinion, refer to Judah, not Israel, but as he believes that the two terms are "prophetically synonymous" and "makes no difference between Israel and the Jews," the Ten Tribes cannot well be excluded.

As the British Empire grows in greatness, the "reasons" and "secrets" of this greatness grow in number, which, perhaps, is natural. But surely we must be nearing the end of the series when our supremacy is attributed to —education. Pleading for a fuller education, the Christian World observes: "Without education the possibilities would largely remain undeveloped, and no one can calculate what would be the total loss to the nation thirty years hence. England will be face to face with a highly-educated Europe, and a highly-educated United States, and unless she can compete with them on terms of equal intelligence her doom is sealed, for it is education and not geographical situation and brute force that will decide in the long rnn." It would be folly to depreciate education; its influence is immense. But it is not the pillar of the realm any more than brute force or geographical situation. Relatively, we have been face to face with a highly-educated Germany and a highly-educated Switzerland for generations, and if schooling "decides in the long run" why is Germany a mere duchy in comparison with the British Empire? Education did not scatter the Spanish Armada, it does not bestow the colonising genius, and it is not to be thanked for the fact that the richest parts of the earth have been placed in our keeping. The true "secret of England's greatness" is that blessing of Moses, "the goodwill of Him that dwelt in the bush": the essence and corner-stone of Joseph's inheritance, and the possession of this favoured British nation.

The report of the Conference, at Exeter Hall, between representatives of the British-Israel Association and the Prophecy Investigation Society, which has been issued as a pamphlet, ought to do the Identity an excellent service, for it is a double-barrelled weapon. It exhibits not only the solidity of our contentions but the frailty of the other side, and many who are proof against the former will be quick to see the latter. The multitude fancy that the Identity argument is extremely weak, and even the few who know it is strong are inclined to suppose that the opposition is stronger. This report should go a long way to remove that delusion. There are, no doubt, some whose prejudice on this subject is so intense that their logical faculties are never used in the consideration of it, but those who have a candid mind will not fail to appreciate the main lessons of the discussion. After perusing the pamphlet, a minister residing in the North writes of the Prophecy investigators: "What ignorance they display of their Bibles—I should imagine they sadly need instruction." This will be the reflection of every thoughtful person, and it daily becomes clearer that ignorance, not learning, is the arch-foe of our view. JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

THE EARLIEST CHRISTIAN NATION.

BY D. H.

THE following letter appeared in the Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette on the 10th January:—

"SIR,—In the Gazette of the 20th Dec. you quote Dean Hook's words, 'The Armenians are the Christians of Armenia, the first country in which Christianity was recognised as the national religion in consequence of the preaching of Gregory, called the Illuminator, in the beginning of the fourth century.'

"The question as to which was the first Christian nation is more than an interesting historical study. It cannot be dissociated from our blessed Lord's prophetic words, 'The kingdom of God shall be taken from you (Jews) and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.'

"Here the first Christian nation was present to our Great Prophet's mind, and not an election from amongst the nations. If then there was no transference of the kingdom of God until the fourth century, and that the nation that then received it has not influenced Christian thought or brought forth fruit, it must appear that the Lord's words had a very dubious fulfilment. But the Dean ought to have looked nearer home for the earliest Christian nation, and then he would have, although unconsciously, shewn a marvellous fulfilment and vindication of the truth of the prophecy. The kingdom was finally taken from the Jews when Jerusalem was destroyed, A.D. 70. A nation ought, apparently, to have received the faith of Christ before or at that very time, and that nation ought to have brought forth the fruit thereof in unbroken succession up to the present day.

"There is historic evidence that Christian teachers came to Britain as early as the year A.D. 43, if not earlier, and that the faith of Christ was nationally accepted as the religion of the British, at a public assembly convened by Bran or Brennus, the father-in-law of Caradog, or Caracticus, in or about the year A.D. 65. This royal and national act was reaffirmed A.D. 165, when, as recorded by Bede—'The faith which was adopted by the nation of the Britons in the year of our Lord 165 was preserved inviolate, and in the enjoyment of peace to the time of the Emperor Diocletian.'

"The reliability of these early accounts, and also of what is known as the Glastonbury legend has been questioned; but, on the other hand, a mass of evidence corroborative of their truthfulness has been produced, and to the Christian who believes that the words of the Lord Jesus respecting the transference of the kingdom to a nation must have been fulfilled, 'These statements have less the appearance of an unexpected application than of a conclusion rendered necessary by a series of antecedent facts and reasons."

MATTHEW HENRY ON MATT. XXVIII. 19.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—In a commentary on the New Testament by the above (lately published in 10 vols., with Authorised and Revised Versions, by W. Mackenzie, 69, Ludgate-hill), there are some very strange theories propounded. One of these I think should be brought before the readers of the BANNER.

Commenting on Matt. xxviii. 19, he says, "How far his commission is extended: to all nations. 'Go and disciple all nations,' not that they must go altogether into every place, but by consent disperse themselves in such manner as might best diffuse the light of the Gospel. Now this plainly signifies it to be the will of Christ, first, That the covenant of peculiarity made with the Jews, should now be cancelled and disannulled."

I assume that the word "Jews" is used here as meaning "Israelites," or "Hebrews," with whom the covenant was made; this I gather from the remainder of his writing. It will be seen from the above, that the idea of the writer was, that the covenant made with "Abraham and his seed for ever," was not "for ever" after all, but was "cancelled" and "disannulled" by our Saviour.

This kind of comment does right enough for unthinking people, who would never even dream of disputing such an authority as Matthew Henry; but thinking men, with an open Bible before them, cannot but pause and reflect.

But the question remains—Has God kept faith with Abraham, or has He not? The apostle St. Paul, in writing to the Romans, says (Rom. xi. 2), "God hath not cast away His people (Israel)," which is sufficient proof for me that in St. Paul's day, the covenant with the Israelites was neither cancelled or disannulled. St. Paul and the other apostles being witnesses proving to the world, that the great mission given to Abraham and his seed, of "blessing all the nations of the earth" (Gen. xxii. 18), was being carried out by them (being Israelites), and is none the less being carried out by the seed of Abraham to-day; the British, or Israel, being the great missionary nation.

I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

JOHN R. QUAYLE

Kirk Michael, Isle of Man.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Lately you have been asking for correspondence, so I have sent some. The Rev. Mr. Gibb, of the First Church, Dunedin, recently returned from a trip to Britain and the Holy Land. On his return a reporter of the Otago Daily Times interviewed him, and amongst other things gave some good, though blind evidence for the Identity, which I have enclosed with this. I wrote and asked him if he was a believer in the Identity. His answer was that "he had never given the subject any serious consideration, and thought it did not make any difference whether we were Israel or not, but thought if he went closely into the subject he might modify his opinion, which at present he had neither inclination nor spare time to do it justice."

General Booth gave an address to a large audience on his social scheme and operations, on his recent tour through the Colonies.

The Rev. Mr. Harrison, "Jewish Rabbi," in speaking to the motion of a vote of thanks, remarked, "he did not know if the General had any of the Jew in him, but he had the appearance of one."

This was referring to the General's nose, while the Rabbi's was not at all prominent; so if one were to judge by the size of this favourite organ of identity, the General would be taken for a Jew before the Rabbi himself. "Judge not by appearances."

I may mention this same gentleman (the Rabbi) answered two important questions for me two years ago.

The first was, "Are the Ten Tribes, or House of Israel, among your people (the Jews) at the present day?"

His answer was, "No, they are not, excepting a few stragglers."

Question No. 2 was, "Do you know where they are?"

Answer No. 2 was, "No, we do not know where they are."

The following is the Rev. Mr. Gibb's testimony, published in the Otago Daily Times:—"The conversation then drifted upon the travels of Mr. Gibb, who has not only visited the home country, but journeyed throughout Europe and the Holy Land, viewing with interest all those places in Palestine the sacred associations of which render them so famous throughout Christendom. 'I was very greatly impressed,' he added, 'everywhere I went with the strength and greatness of the British Empire. Travel where you will, you will find England either in possession or exercising a very great, if not predominant, influence in the disposition of affairs. Everywhere you can see tokens of her power, and if she and her colonies will stand shoulder to shoulder she need fear simply nothing. We have had on the whole a magnificent history thus far, but if we only stand together and continue in the practice of that righteousness which maketh a nation, the historian of a century hence will have a far grander story to tell about us than any that has yet been penned. That is my sober conviction. Evolutionists tell us that from the beginning and right along the whole course of development nature had man in view as the goal and crown of all her efforts. Well, I feel as if I could go a step further, and say that the particular race of men Providence has had in view as the ultimate human type is the race to which we belong. That sounds big, I know—"like your arrogance," a Frenchman would say—but such is my feeling. Long ago Emerson defined the British man as he who of all men stands firmest in his shoes. I always believed that to be a correct definition. The result of my travels has been to make me absolutely sure of its accuracy.'"

The Lord bless you in your work for His chosen ones is the wish and prayer of C. B.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR SIR,—To-day's BANNER requests a meaning for "Lehmann," and I venture to submit one for you to accept or reject at your discretion. S. A. MATSON.

Wellesley Road, Brentwood, Essex, Jan. 16, 1896.

NOTE BY S. A- M-

IN the BANNER to-day, Jan. 15, 1896, a correspondent asks for the meaning of the term or title "Lehmann." It probably comes from the German "Lehen" or "lehn," feudal-tenure, or fief; as do the words Lehenbar, feudal; Lehendienst, feudal service; Lehenherr or Lehnsherr, feudal-lord. So Lehmann may be defined as feudal-man or vassal.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

SIR,—The following is a cutting from a paper called The Investor, published in London Nov. 30, 1895, and cut from under the heading of "News from South Africa," which is mostly of a mining character; but the item in question is indicative of another attempt on the part of the Boers to harass, and as far as possible drive out, the hated Saxon, who seems to be slowly but surely swallowing them, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Boers to prevent it. What will be the ultimate end of all their efforts against the people who are enriching them, and paying so much of their taxes, is in the near future a little uncertain; but they appear to me to be very much in the position of the man or men of whom Charles Kingsley speaks in one of his works somewhat in the following line: "Woe be to him who stands still when the many are on the march, for he is sure to be trodden down." Few will doubt the Anglo-Saxon race is on the march in South Africa, and their ever-increasing numbers will make it a serious matter for the handful of Boers to stand in the way of that living flood of humanity:—

"The Transvaal Government is about to submit to the Volksraad a Bill for levying a war tax of £20 per farm, and £10 per erf on non-resident owners, and on all companies, whether registered locally or not. Up to now companies have escaped this taxation; but, as the Donegal man said, 'the whole country-side is swarming with absentee landlords'; and, inasmuch as the Boers anticipate the time when they will have to fight for supremacy, or be effaced by the influx of Anglo-Saxons, shareholders in mines must submit to the inevitable." E. L.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—May I commend to the notice of your readers in these anxious times the following encouraging texts:—

"Hearken unto Me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is My law; fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings" (Isa. li. 7).

"Be strong and courageous, be not afraid nor dismayed, for the king of Assyria, nor for all the multitudes with him; for there be more with us than with him: with him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God to help us, and to fight our battles" (2 Chron. xxxii. 7, 8).

Yours truly, A. M. T.

Backwell, near Bristol, Jan. 12, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I have been having such great encouragement among the officers of the Church Army, that I really must rush into print. I only wish other Anglo-Israelites could witness the burning interest of all I could get a few minutes with—have shown in Our Identity. The points to overcome were our old bogies—1st, Confusion as to Jews and Israelites. All are "Jews" with them. I would not be surprised to hear them say, Adam was a Jew. And 2nd., That the "spiritual" Israel stultification was true. Yet the humble young officers soon see through the blindness traditional spiritualizing has thrown over us. Now this is one line I take to correct irrational spiritualizing. The fact that the Israel of God is founded and based on Israel after the flesh is very harmonious, very symmetrical, and the symmetry is intensified when we find it is a powerful nation now known as Saxons, i.e., sons of Isaac.

The complete Israel of God will comprise all outsiders that truly call on the Lord Jesus, as it comprised immigrants to the camps of Israel in the wilderness, and in the cities of Palestine, who said, "Truly this is the seed which the Lord hath blessed." Israel is only "spiritual," in so far as God's Spirit is put in their hearts; they remain mortal, corruptible flesh, but shall have incorruptible bodies, and still be the Israel of God. There is never any annihilation of the first scheme, i.e., a peculiar people to go on by set stages to perfection. To deny this, would be as absurd as to say, that when Christ told the blaspheming Jews that they were not Abraham's seed, but that the devil was their father, He meant they were born of marriage contracted by a spirit with a mortal. I wonder that the spiritualizers have not coined "spiritual Judah" in contradistiction to "spiritual Israel"! If they were logical they would do so; wresting the mere warning Christ gave to certain Jews that their bodies could be tabernacled by the "strong man armed," into a statement that Satan's kingdom was Judah. No! the first scheme holds good; a great kingdom (Israel and Judah reunited) must appear, some members of which would be captured by Satan, but still the kingdom out of which evolves that mighty, absorbing olive tree, which must shelter all Gentile believers in Israel's Redeemer as their Saviour. As Professor Totten says, "Common sense resides in the heart, not the brain, and the simple-hearted accept the Anglo-Israel facts at once, and then put it on its trial at the bar of the intellect, the Bible, history, science," &c.

Yours very sincerely, R. MACKWORTH.

WE all expect the English language to be the language of the future, and it does not surprise us that it is still enlarging its empire. "Hitherto," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "considerations of etiquette, if not of convenience, have required diplomatists to conceal their thoughts in the French language, and whenever it was necessary to put an international cryptogram, such as a treaty, upon record, to employ the tongue of Talleyrand—more or less—for the purpose. Now, to its horror, a Paris journal has just discovered that the Simonoseki Treaty between China and Japan was actually in English when it was ratified. Our contemporary's mind misgives it much. It sees in such a departure from established usage an ominous intimation that English influence will eventually 'saturate' the Far East. We are not going to dispute the likelihood of such being the case. Indeed, we have a good many reasons, some of which are philological, for confidently looking forward to such a consummation. For we do not waste time in doubting that English is destined to become the language of the world. Nor, we fancy, do the Japanese. And this explains to us why they chose to have their treaty in the world's language."—Christian Globe, Dec. 10, 1895.

THERE is no truth in the statement published in New York, from Rio de Janeiro, to the effect that the islet of Trinidad has been recognised by Great Britain as a Brazilian possession. The question stands precisely where it was left by Brazil, the Government of which country refused to have the matter submitted to arbitration.

THE LATE MR. EDWARD TUDOR.

THE grand old man of the Manchester and Salford British-Israel Association, passed away to his rest, Dec. 23, 1895, in his 85th year, after a few days' illness, honoured, respected, and greatly lamented by all who knew him.

"A better man, a man more genial and kindly than Edward Tudor never lived . . . . that no man has done his life's work more faithfully or with a kindlier hand. He worked up to the last almost, and then having won his crown of 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant,' he entered into his rest." Such were the words printed in the Manchester and Salford Co-operative Society's monthly report, where our esteemed friend laboured for many years. Mr. Edward Tudor was the first chairman of the Manchester and Salford British-Israel Association, in the year 1880, and was elected president in 1890, which position he held for two years, and was always to be seen in his place at the proper time—an example to all his younger brethren.

His knowledge of the Scriptures was profound, as one of his dear friends (Mr. Brockbank) informed me; whenever he visited him he was always busily studying his Bible.

The usual fortnightly meeting, on Jan. 7, of the Association was a memorable one. After earnest and solemn prayers had been offered to Almighty God on behalf of those whom our late friend had left behind, and special hymns had been sung suitable to the occasion, the president addressed the members, who remained standing until the close of the address, out of respect for the memory of their late distinguished brother and vice-president, concluding with those soul-stirring words of St. Paul to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 7, 8), which he, the president, thought applied forcibly to their dear old friend: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing."

Mr. Tudor's remains were interred in the Ardwick Cemetery, Dec. 27, amidst the deep regrets of many friends representing various Churches and religious institutions with which he had been identified. He leaves one son, six daughters, and many grandchildren to mourn his loss, to whom, and to many others, his active life will be a precious memory.

The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. A. Hebblethwaite, B.D., the minister of the Primitive Methodist Church, Wellington-street, Openshaw, where our late "father in Israel" attended.

The funeral sermon was also preached by the same minister, on Sunday, Jan. 11, 1896, before a crowded congregation, many members of the German-street, and the Manchester and Salford British-Israel Association being present. A touching and very eloquent sermon was preached. The Rev. gentleman said, Mr. Tudor was a giant in intellect and Biblical knowledge, and that three men were appointed to fill the vacancy in the Church as his successors, one being insufficient for the purpose—that he was always active in every good cause, in fact, activity from head to foot, and that he was like an angel walking about the streets of Bradford, where he was located—that although he was poor, yet undoubtedly he was the King's son, and that he would

"See the Pilot face to face,
Now he has crossed the bar."

The text was taken from 1 John iii. 2: "It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."

LO-AMMI AND AMMI.

My people! My people! Ye would not have Me;
And—Scuthai, ye wander—Lo Ammi ye be.
In sieve you've been sifted, 'mong all nations tossed:
Yet—My Ammi for ever—no grain of you lost,
Awake ye, Lo-Ammi! My Ammi, not lost!

Yes, Scuthai, we wander, lost sheep of the fold,
Lo-Ammi men call us, as God's seers foretold.
Yet—His Ammi—He will lead us to the old land again,
And over us for evermore Jehovah, King, will reign.

Lo Ammi! Lo Ammi! Go, name dreadly won!
For we are God's Ammi, redeemed by His Son.
And we're coming with our Judah; Thy "present," Lord, to bring,
And earth shall hallelujahs raise, with Israel, to the King.

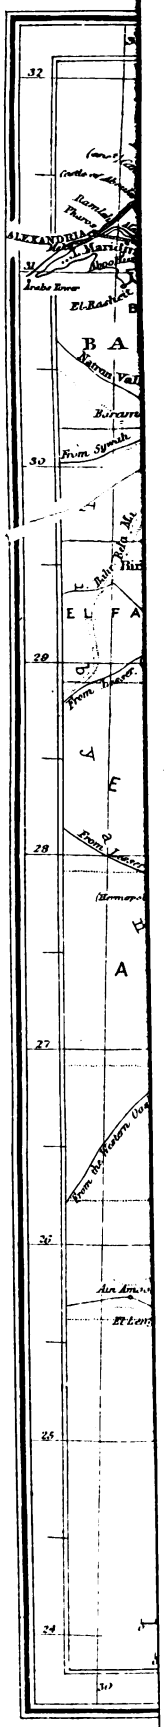
The above little piece is more effective when sung to two lovely Highland Laments, which are admirably adapted to its two several parts.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."



DEAR SIR,—Being a constant reader of the BANNER for many years, I thought it might interest you to know how the good cause progresses in this out-of-the-way corner of the globe. It is not very long since, that the subject was quite unknown here, but I am happy to state that such is not the case now. There is hardly a man in this town who takes the trouble to read anything at all, who, if not a firm believer in the Anglo-Israelite theory, yet will admit that there is "somthing in it." And this belief leads to investigation, and investigation ultimately leads to conversion. The BANNER is welcomed here at all times, and is more widely read than many other periodicals. We all feel very much interested in what is now going on in the world, and it would seem that the time of Jacob's trouble is at hand. The war-woe which hangs overhead, seems, as time goes on, to get more gloomy and threatening. The whole world is apparently in a state of disquietude, and under present circumstances we do not know what a day may bring forth. I do hope and trust, however, that all will work together for good to the chosen people of the Lord, and that when He arises to shake terribly the earth, our beloved nation will be safe under the shadow of the Almighty.

In conclusion, I hope that the BANNER will still go on and prosper, and bring the truth home to many an obdurate and unbelieving heart. The belief that the Anglo-Saxon race are the people of the Most High is spreading rapidly in America, and I trust, before long, the theory will be universally admitted to be true, as without doubt it is. And once firm in this confidence, though the nations whet their swords, and though the enemy come up like a flood, we will calmly rest in the assurance that, "the Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." Assuring you of my best wishes,

I remain, yours faithfully,
JAMES STEWART.

MADAGASCAR, A "FLOURISHING FRENCH COLONY."

AFTER infinite pains, great losses in human life, and large expense, the French conquered Madagascar, and have now declared their incorporation of the island into the French Empire. When the enterprise was about to begin they announced that once they conquered it they would never evacuate it nor renounce their rights. They declared they would pursue the advantages they gained, and "Madagascar would become a flourishing French colony." The French have not only conquered but annexed the vast island, allowing the puppet queen to reign still under their direction, and henceforth we must watch the growth of the new French colony, and see if it flourishes like the other French colonies which have preceded it. Hitherto it cannot be said that French colonies, properly so-called, have flourished at all.

They have never paid their way. The Frenchman is no colonist, and does not understand the business at all. He goes to the colony for a time with no view to stay. His one thought is to get away as soon as he can, and return to the delights of La belle France. His colonies, further, do not invite a lengthened stay. They are, with some exceptions, in hot and unhealthy climates. French Cochin China and Tonquin are tropical countries, unpleasantly warm, and as unsuited for European colonists as Burmah is for ours. Madagascar is notoriously unhealthy and hot, as the French have already found to their cost, full of mountains and valleys which contain a population, not warlike it is true, but difficult to subdue and keep under subjection. Algeria and Tunis are not colonies in the true sense, but military possessions held down by military force, ready if the pressure be removed to rise up and assert their independence. Besides this the French regard their colonial possessions as existing for the benefit and aggrandisement of the mother country. They make no attempt to develop the resources of the colony in the interests of its own inhabitants; in consequence of which, the French colonies as a whole, are almost bankrupt, while the British, in comparison, are growing rich and advancing in all ways.

The Melbourne Age, of Dec. 7 last, has an article on this subject, throwing a good deal of light on the French colonial system, so-called, and the mode in which our neighbours treat them. The Age takes the case of the colonies generally belonging to France, and deals in particular with the state of things in Tonquin, thus:—

Together the French colonies contain a population of 20 to 24 millions of inhabitants. They cost yearly 70 millions of francs, of which 53 millions figure in the colonial budget proper, 12 millions in the budget of the navy, and 5 millions in the budget of posts and telegraphs. Their total commerce is 410 millions per annum. Of that sum the importations into France are valued at 170 millions, and French importations into the colonies reach only 70 millions. She thus spends 70 millions in order to dispose of 70 millions of her goods. This in brief is the pitiful result of the colonial system as it is worked by French statesmen; and how it is brought about we may learn by taking a single colony, such as Tonquin, and passing its administration under review by the light thrown upon it in Mr. Henry Norman's recently published work on "The Far East."

The first thing that strikes us is the utter lack of all cohesion among the several classes of the small white population. Society is divided into three parties, each of whom is at daggers drawn with the other two—the official, the military, and the civilian proper. The official accuses the military of usurping functions to which it has no right, and both co-operate only to thwart and suppress the civilian. The extent to which functionaryism is carried is scarcely credible to the simple-minded English colonist, who is always on the look out to retrench his modest Civil Service. M. Etienne, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, drew the following picture of the state of things which existed in Cochin China for the benefit of Frenchmen at home:—"What is the population of the country? It is 1,800,000 souls. There is a French population of 1,600, and of these the functionaries are just 1,200, who elect the Colonial Council that advises the Government." In 1887, M. Etienne made an attempt to reduce the number, and in fact did reduce the cost to the extent of 3,500,000 f. out of 9,000,000 f. He took that step in October. Six months afterwards all the dismissed functionaries had reappeared on the colonial list. In the same year that the salaries of these functionaries amounted to £360,000, the sum expended on public works in the colony—the one expenditure on which the productive future of the place depended—was £16,000. But this was not all. The sum allotted to the supervision of the works was also £16,000. So that in point of fact the works could not be done, the money being expended in salaries.

The terrible cost of the colonies to France is thus stated by The Age. If it is so great without Madagascar, what is it likely to be when that country is added, which is unfit for railroads, and the people are a despicable race, as the late events proved them to be, having everything yet to learn. The Age writes as follows:—

Not the least extraordinary thing is that the colonial system of France is the invention of French statesmen, and that to extend such a system, which involves national loss at every turn, so much money and blood should be wasted in annexing new colonies. The total cost of Tonquin to the mother country up to 1892 inclusive has been 476,422,522 f., and the total French trade during the same period amounted to 63,231,247 f. That is to say, France has spent over 476,000,000 of francs on the colonisation of Tonquin to dispose of 63,000,000 f. worth of French products; and after all these years of French administration, the loss of tens of thousands of valuable French lives, and the waste of the taxpayers' money in a countless quantity, Tonquin is not conquered yet, but at best only pacified.

If the French colonisation of Tonquin illustrates the fate that is in store for Frenchmen in Madagascar, no patriotic Englishman need envy France her latest acquisition. Colonies that are suckers instead of feeders to the mother country fight in the cause of its enemies. Where would the British Empire, or, what is the same thing, where would Lord Brassey be at this moment if its method of colonisation had been restricted in practice to an army of soldiers, followed by an army of functionaries, accompanied by a handful of dealers to supply them with the necessaries of life?

In regard to railways in the French colonies, Mr. Henry Norman, quoted by The Age, declares that all sorts of restrictions are placed in the way of their construction, with the result that where most wanted they are not made. None but Frenchmen, for instance, can be allowed to work on them. The materials must all be imported from France alone.

The country in Tonquin abounds in coals and minerals, but no encouragement is given to test them. One of the conditions is, that no man employed on the railways, not even an engineer employed by the Company, shall be other than a French subject. We can see, therefore, why the French colonies are handicapped in the race. We have reason for doubting why Madagascar should succeed when other French colonies have failed. The fact is, the French are not Israel, and they have no promise from God that they shall "spread abroad," "inherit the Gentiles," or that "dispersed," as Israel were to be, they should be the means of blessing all nations, all families, and all kindreds of the earth.

Like the Germans, the French see that colonies yield vast wealth to our nation, and they conclude that if they can only secure some too, no matter in what localities, they are sure to succeed as our Australian, Canadian, South African, and New Zealand Colonial Empire have succeeded. These, filled with British men and women, have grown in population and wealth, and are bringing us untold wealth, influence, power, and greatness, because God's blessing follows us according to the promises and prophecies which the Word of God proclaims, by reason of our Israelitish origin. Let Israel therefore praise the Lord for all His unbounded mercies to us His chosen ones; and let us carry out the purposes for which "He formed us" (Isa. xliii. 21, R.V.).

THE INFLUENCE OF THE COUNTY OF ESSEX ON THE SETTLEMENT AND FAMILY HISTORY OF NEW ENGLAND.

By Colonel Joseph Lemuel Chester (deceased).

Late Corresponding Member of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society and Honorary Member of the Essex Archæological Society.

PART I.

The founders of a great nation, whatever its history and ultimate fate, are justly entitled to remembrance and the respectful consideration of posterity. Nations are not created by accident, nor do they afterwards grow altogether at random, like prolific weeds; but, while subject of course to the usual operation of natural laws, they take their character, and shape their destinies according to the wisdom and foresight, or folly and recklessness, of certain individuals, who, singly or combined, presided at their birth and nurtured their infant existence. As the influence of the mother for good or evil upon the future career of the child to which she has given being, so, to a greater or less extent, upon the organic nature of a nation, is the effect of the character and conduct of those to whom it owes its position on the pages of the world's great history.

Among all the nations of the earth, there is none that appeals so directly and unresistingly to the consideration of the people of Great Britain as the one which sprang originally from their own loins. Whatever may have been the temporary alienations and dissensions that have since occurred between them, it is impossible for either of them ever to forget their relative characters of parent and offspring. The child may have been, at times, rebellious and self-willed, and the parent, perhaps, too rigid and overbearing; but that tender domestic relation has continued to exist for nearly two centuries and a half, and is recognized at this day, on this island, and on that continent by every man and woman of both nations whose feelings and sentiments are entitled to any regard. It is possible that the more modern transatlantic generations have come to regard the relationship as of a still more venerable character, and to speak of their great ancestress as one or two degrees farther removed in consanguinity; but this should rather be construed as a respectful and affectionate compliment than otherwise—for who does not know and venerate all that is embodied in the character of a good old English grandmother? That the original founders of New England—that germ of the great nation which subsequently spread itself so rapidly over the half of a continent—were generally of English birth and descent, is a fact I need not stop to discuss. My present object is to show, especially, that in the foundation and early history of the colonies the single county of Essex, and, to be still more particular, this precise portion of that county in about the centre of which we are to-day assembled, had more to do, and exerted more influence, than all the rest of England combined; and consequently that it is to this identical neighbourhood, strictly speaking, rather than to the entire kingdom, that the origin of New England, and through it the American nation, must be traced by the careful antiquary.

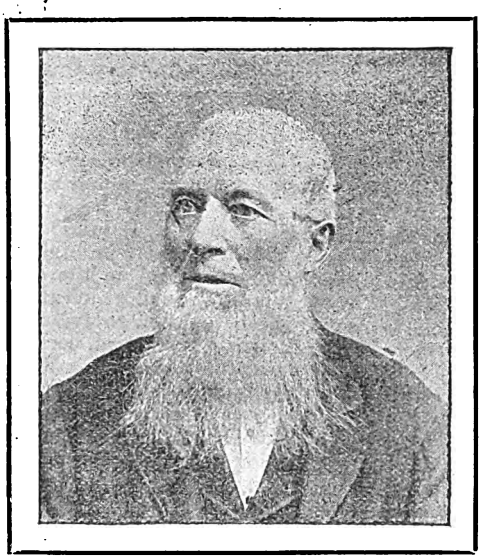
From a list of the earliest settlers in New England, being those who were technically made freemen of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay between the years 1631 and 1641, comprising about 500 names, generally of heads of families, and representing the real strength of the Colony, I have selected, almost at random, the following :—

Abell, Adams, Allen, Angier, Ames, Appleton, Archer, Arnold, Atkinson, Barker, Barnes, Bell, Bendall, Bennett, Biggs, Blake, Bloomfield, Bourne, Bradbury, Brewster, Bridge, Briscoe, Brooke, Browne, Bulkeley, Burton, Button, Carrington, Chamberlain, Chapman, Clarke, Coggeshall, Coldham, Cole, Coleman, Collins, Cooke, Cooper, Cotton, Crane, Cross, Curtis, Dalton, Davenish, Davies, Davis, Davy, Day, Dean, Dinney, Dudley, Dyer, Eaton, Elliott, Ely, Emery, Farr, Firmin, Fiske, Fitch, Ford, Fowler, Freeborn, Freeman, French, Fuller, Gardner, Gibbs, Gibson, Gill, Godfrey, Goff, Grafton, Greene, Hale, Hall, Harlakenden, Harris, Harrison, Hart, Hawkes, Hawkins, Haynes, Haywood, Howe, Hubbard, Hudson, Humphreys, Jackson, Jeffrey, Jenner, Johnson, Kempe, King, Lake, Lambert, Langley, Lightfoot, Lockwood, Marshall, Marsh, Martin, Meade, Minot, More, Morris, Morse, Mott, Mills, Nelson, Newman, Nutt, Page, Palmer, Parker, Parkes, Parmenter, Partridge, Peacock, Perry, Peters, Phillips, Porter, Purchas, Pynchon, Pyne, Rainsford, Rawlins, Raymond, Roberts, Robinson, Rogers, Rowe, Ruggles, Russell, Sadler, Saltonstall, Sandford, Sands, Scott, Sharp, Shaw, Sherman, Smith, Southcott, Sparkawk, Spencer, Stanley, Stebbins, Steele, Stevens, Stone, Strange, Swan, Swift, Symonds, Tabor, Talcott, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Tower, Towne, Townsend, Turner, Tuthill, Wade, Walker, Walton, Ward, Warner, Warren, Watson, Webb, West, Weston, Wilcox, Willis, Wheeler, White, Whiting, Wood, and Wright.

These are not only all ancient Essex surnames, but were borne, by men whose origin, in most instances, has been traced directly to that county; and this selection, it will be seen, comprises considerably more than one-third of those contained in the list mentioned. A little care would, doubtless, enable me to add from fifty to one hundred more to the number, but the predominance is already sufficiently great for my present purpose.



These were the men who, nearly two centuries and a half ago, actuated by various sentiments, bade farewell to their friends and the scenes of their infancy and manhood, and left these smiling plains and valleys, to encounter, with their wives and little ones, first, a perilous sea-voyage of several thousand miles, and then an equally perilous struggle for existence on a strange and inhospitable shore, under an unnatural climate, and among the human savages by whom the western world was then peopled. These were the men to whom what was afterwards a great Republic owed its first existence—brave English men, who took their very lives in their hands, and faced with dauntless courage all the certain dangers and the uncertain terrors of the enterprise to which they had committed themselves—aye, and brave English women, too, whose sublime devotion has never since been paralleled, and to which ample justice has never yet been done.

I am very much afraid that, if you look for most of these names in that wonderful collection of family histories so admirably perpetuated at the College of Arms, the obliging and usually successful Heralds will be utterly unable to gratify your curiosity. They are not strictly speaking heraldic names. While a few of the lesser gentry may have been among their numbers, the pioneers of New England generally had other uses for their shields than simply to exhibit a blazonry of arms. The men who, clad in homespun garments, as they sat in their rough pews in their humble places of worship, kept one hand upon their Bibles or psalm-books, and the other upon the triggers of their muskets, were not, it must be frankly confessed, usually of what is known of gentle blood. We must look elsewhere for the records of their ancestry, and the search is not a difficult one. The moss-grown tombstones in every neighbouring churchyard, and the mildewed pages of your venerable parish registers, reveal these names at every step and on every leaf, and it is almost exclusively to these that the American genealogist can appeal with any hope of success.

One reason why due credit has not hitherto been given to the county of Essex for its paramount influence on the early history of New England arises from the fact that many of the original settlers have been assigned to other portions of England, while properly belonging to that county. As an illustration : two men named Rogers who emigrated in one of the earliest ships, from their personal character, scholastic attainments, and position as eminent divines, probably had more to do with moulding both the social and political character of the colony than at least any other two men in it. One went directly from Rowley, in Yorkshire, and the other from Assington, in Suffolk, where they had been respectively preaching for some years, and they are therefore usually spoken of as belonging to those counties. But the former was born at Wethersfield, in Essex, where his father —the Rev. Richard Rogers—preached for forty-one years, and where he died and was buried ; while the latter was the son of the Rev. John Rogers, "the famous preacher of Dedham," in Essex, the inscription under whose bust, still in good preservation in the chancel, records that he had ministered in that church for the space of thirty-one years. These were, therefore, really both Essex men, and their personal importance and influence on the early fortunes of New England may be discovered by a reference to quaint old Cotton Mather, who carefully embalmed their memory in his "Magnolia." I might adduce numerous other instances of a similar character, and indeed my investigations into this subject already enable me to affirm unhesitatingly that, of the early New England settlers, the origin of considerably more than one-half can be traced directly or indirectly to the county of Essex.

Another proof of my original proposition is to be found in the fact that, so predominant were the Essex men in the early days of the colony, the settlements as they were organized one after another received names, the majority of which had their prototypes in the neighbourhoods they had quitted, and their attachment to which they thus manifested. I need mention only the names of Billerica, Braintree, Chelmsford, Colchester, Dedham, Eastham, Hadley, Harwich, Haverhill, Malden, Newport, Springfield, Topsfield, Waltham and Wethersfield. These names were given to the very earliest settlements established by the colonists, and are retained to this day, while the mere hamlets which they at first represented have now swelled into important towns, and even cities. I may also add that these names have been reduplicated, and now represent towns and cities in almost every State in the Union, as the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers in their turn sought new homes in other portions of the country. One in particular seems to have been a universal favourite, for I find in the latest "United States Gazetteer," the name of Springfield repeated no less than forty-eight times. Another significant fact, worthy of notice in this connection, and which tells its own tale

THE LATE MR. EDWARD TUDOR.

THE grand old man of the Manchester and Salford British-Israel Association, passed away to his rest, Dec. 23, 1895, in his 85th year, after a few days' illness, honoured, respected, and greatly lamented by all who knew him.

"A better man, a man more genial and kindly than Edward Tudor never lived . . . . that no man has done his life's work more faithfully or with a kindlier hand. He worked up to the last almost, and then having won his crown of 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant,' he entered into his rest." Such were the words printed in the Manchester and Salford Co-operative Society's monthly report, where our esteemed friend laboured for many years. Mr. Edward Tudor was the first chairman of the Manchester and Salford British-Israel Association, in the year 1880, and was elected president in 1890, which position he held for two years, and was always to be seen in his place at the proper time—an example to all his younger brethren.

His knowledge of the Scriptures was profound, as one of his dear friends (Mr. Brockbank) informed me; whenever he visited him he was always busily studying his Bible.

The usual fortnightly meeting, on Jan. 7, of the Association was a memorable one. After earnest and solemn prayers had been offered to Almighty God on behalf of those whom our late friend had left behind, and special hymns had been sung suitable to the occasion, the president addressed the members, who remained standing until the close of the address, out of respect for the memory of their late distinguished brother and vice-president, concluding with those soul-stirring words of St. Paul to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 7, 8), which he, the president, thought applied forcibly to their dear old friend: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing."

Mr. Tudor's remains were interred in the Ardwick Cemetery, Dec. 27, amidst the deep regrets of many friends representing various Churches and religious institutions with which he had been identified. He leaves one son, six daughters, and many grandchildren to mourn his loss, to whom, and to many others, his active life will be a precious memory.

The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. A. Hebblethwaite, B.D., the minister of the Primitive Methodist Church, Wellington-street, Openshaw, where our late "father in Israel" attended.

The funeral sermon was also preached by the same minister, on Sunday, Jan. 11, 1896, before a crowded congregation, many members of the German-street, and the Manchester and Salford British-Israel Association being present. A touching and very eloquent sermon was preached. The Rev. gentleman said, Mr. Tudor was a giant in intellect and Biblical knowledge, and that three men were appointed to fill the vacancy in the Church as his successors, one being insufficient for the purpose—that he was always active in every good cause, in fact, activity from head to foot, and that he was like an angel walking about the streets of Bradford, where he was located—that although he was poor, yet undoubtedly he was the King's son, and that he would

"See the Pilot face to face,
Now he has crossed the bar."

The text was taken from 1 John iii. 2: "It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."

LO-AMMI AND AMMI.

My people! My people! Ye would not have Me;
And—Scuthai, ye wander—Lo Ammi ye be.
In sieve you've been sifted, 'mong all nations tossed:
Yet—My Ammi for ever—no grain of you lost,
Awake ye, Lo-Ammi! My Ammi, not lost!

Yes, Scuthai, we wander, lost sheep of the fold,
Lo-Ammi men call us, as God's seers foretold.
Yet—His Ammi—He will lead us to the old land again,
And over us for evermore Jehovah, King, will reign.

Lo Ammi! Lo Ammi! Go, name dreadly won!
For we are God's Ammi, redeemed by His Son.
And we're coming with our Judah; Thy "present," Lord, to bring,
And earth shall hallelujahs raise, with Israel, to the King.

Sept. 21, 1895. JESSIE READ.

The above little piece is more effective when sung to two lovely Highland Laments, which are admirably adapted to its two several parts.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Being a constant reader of the BANNER for many years, I thought it might interest you to know how the good cause progresses in this out-of-the-way corner of the globe. It is not very long since, that the subject was quite unknown here, but I am happy to state that such is not the case now. There is hardly a man in this town who takes the trouble to read anything at all, who, if not a firm believer in the Anglo-Israelite theory, yet will admit that there is "somthing in it." And this belief leads to investigation, and investigation ultimately leads to conversion. The BANNER is welcomed here at all times, and is more widely read than many other periodicals. We all feel very much interested in what is now going on in the world, and it would seem that the time of Jacob's trouble is at hand. The war-woe which hangs overhead, seems, as time goes on, to get more gloomy and threatening. The whole world is apparently in a state of disquietude, and under present circumstances we do not know what a day may bring forth. I do hope and trust, however, that all will work together for good to the chosen people of the Lord, and that when He arises to shake terribly the earth, our beloved nation will be safe under the shadow of the Almighty.

In conclusion, I hope that the BANNER will still go on and prosper, and bring the truth home to many an obdurate and unbelieving heart. The belief that the Anglo-Saxon race are the people of the Most High is spreading rapidly in America, and I trust, before long, the theory will be universally admitted to be true, as without doubt it is. And once firm in this confidence, though the nations whet their swords, and though the enemy come up like a flood, we will calmly rest in the assurance that, "the Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." Assuring you of my best wishes,

I remain, yours faithfully,
JAMES STEWART.

Etienne made an attempt to reduce the number, and in fact did reduce the cost to the extent of 3,500,000 f. out of 9,000,000 f. He took that step in October. Six months afterwards all the dismissed functionaries had reappeared on the colonial list. In the same year that the salaries of these functionaries amounted to £360,000, the sum expended on public works in the colony—the one expenditure on which the productive future of the place depended—was £16,000. But this was not all. The sum allotted to the supervision of the works was also £16,000. So that in point of fact the works could not be done, the money being expended in salaries.

The terrible cost of the colonies to France is thus stated by The Age. If it is so great without Madagascar, what is it likely to be when that country is added, which is unfit for railroads, and the people are a despicable race, as the late events proved them to be, having everything yet to learn. The Age writes as follows:—

Not the least extraordinary thing is that the colonial system of France is the invention of French statesmen, and that to extend such a system, which involves national loss at every turn, so much money and blood should be wasted in annexing new colonies. The total cost of Tonquin to the mother country up to 1892 inclusive has been 476,422,522 f., and the total French trade during the same period amounted to 63,231,247 f. That is to say, France has spent over 476,000,000 of francs on the colonisation of Tonquin to dispose of 63,000,000 f. worth of French products; and after all these years of French administration, the loss of tens of thousands of valuable French lives, and the waste of the taxpayers' money in a countless quantity, Tonquin is not conquered yet, but at best only pacified.

If the French colonisation of Tonquin illustrates the fate that is in store for Frenchmen in Madagascar, no patriotic Englishman need envy France her latest acquisition. Colonies that are suckers instead of feeders to the mother country fight in the cause of its enemies. Where would the British Empire, or, what is the same thing, where would Lord Brassey be at this moment if its method of colonisation had been restricted in practice to an army of soldiers, followed by an army of functionaries, accompanied by a handful of dealers to supply them with the necessaries of life?

In regard to railways in the French colonies, Mr. Henry Norman, quoted by The Age, declares that all sorts of restrictions are placed in the way of their construction, with the result that where most wanted they are not made. None but Frenchmen, for instance, can be allowed to work on them. The materials must all be imported from France alone.

The country in Tonquin abounds in coals and minerals, but no encouragement is given to test them. One of the conditions is, that no man employed on the railways, not even an engineer employed by the Company, shall be other than a French subject. We can see, therefore, why the French colonies are handicapped in the race. We have reason for doubting why Madagascar should succeed when other French colonies have failed. The fact is, the French are not Israel, and they have no promise from God that they shall "spread abroad," "inherit the Gentiles," or that "dispersed," as Israel were to be, they should be the means of blessing all nations, all families, and all kindreds of the earth.

Like the Germans, the French see that colonies yield vast wealth to our nation, and they conclude that if they can only secure some too, no matter in what localities, they are sure to succeed as our Australian, Canadian, South African, and New Zealand Colonial Empire have succeeded. These, filled with British men and women, have grown in population and wealth, and are bringing us untold wealth, influence, power, and greatness, because God's blessing follows us according to the promises and prophecies which the Word of God proclaims, by reason of our Israelitish origin. Let Israel therefore praise the Lord for all His unbounded mercies to us His chosen ones; and let us carry out the purposes for which "He formed us" (Isa. xliii. 21, R.V.).

THE INFLUENCE OF THE COUNTY OF ESSEX ON THE SETTLEMENT AND FAMILY HISTORY OF NEW ENGLAND.

By Colonel Joseph Lemuel Chester (deceased).

PART I.

The founders of a great nation, whatever its history and ultimate fate, are justly entitled to remembrance and the respectful consideration of posterity. Nations are not created by accident, nor do they afterwards grow altogether at random, like prolific weeds; but, while subject of course to the usual operation of natural laws, they take their character, and shape their destinies according to the wisdom and foresight, or folly and recklessness, of certain individuals, who, singly or combined, presided at their birth and nurtured their infant existence. As the influence of the mother for good or evil upon the future career of the child to which she has given being, so, to a greater or less extent, upon the organic nature of a nation, is the effect of the character and conduct of those to whom it owes its position on the pages of the world's great history.

Among all the nations of the earth, there is none that appeals so directly and unresistingly to the consideration of the people of Great Britain as the one which sprang originally from their own loins. Whatever may have been the temporary alienations and dissensions that have since occurred between them, it is impossible for either of them ever to forget their relative characters of parent and offspring. The child may have been, at times, rebellious and self-willed, and the parent, perhaps, too rigid and overbearing; but that tender domestic relation has continued to exist for nearly two centuries and a half, and is recognized at this day, on this island, and on that continent by every man and woman of both nations whose feelings and sentiments are entitled to any regard. It is possible that the more modern transatlantic generations have come to regard the relationship as of a still more venerable character, and to speak of their great ancestress as one or two degrees farther removed in consanguinity; but this should rather be construed as a respectful and affectionate compliment than otherwise—for who does not know and venerate all that is embodied in the character of a good old English grandmother? That the original founders of New England—that germ of the great nation which subsequently spread itself so rapidly over the half of a continent—were generally of English birth and descent, is a fact I need not stop to discuss. My present object is to show, especially, that in the foundation and early history of the colonies the single county of Essex, and, to be still more particular, this precise portion of that county in about the centre of which we are to-day assembled, had more to do, and exerted more influence, than all the rest of England combined; and consequently that it is to this identical neighbourhood, strictly speaking, rather than to the entire kingdom, that the origin of New England, and through it the American nation, must be traced by the careful antiquary.

From a list of the earliest settlers in New England, being those who were technically made freemen of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay between the years 1631 and 1641, comprising about 500 names, generally of heads of families, and representing the real strength of the Colony, I have selected, almost at random, the following :—

Abell, Adams, Allen, Angier, Ames, Appleton, Archer, Arnold, Atkinson, Barker, Barnes, Bell, Bendall, Bennett, Biggs, Blake, Bloomfield, Bourne, Bradbury, Brewster, Bridge, Briscoe, Brooke, Browne, Bulkeley, Burton, Button, Carrington, Chamberlain, Chapman, Clarke, Coggeshall, Coldham, Cole, Coleman, Collins, Cooke, Cooper, Cotton, Crane, Cross, Curtis, Dalton, Davenish, Davies, Davis, Davy, Day, Dean, Dinney, Dudley, Dyer, Eaton, Elliott, Ely, Emery, Farr, Firmin, Fiske, Fitch, Ford, Fowler, Freeborn, Freeman, French, Fuller, Gardner, Gibbs, Gibson, Gill, Godfrey, Goff, Grafton, Greene, Hale, Hall, Harlakenden, Harris, Harrison, Hart, Hawkes, Hawkins, Haynes, Haywood, Howe, Hubbard, Hudson, Humphreys, Jackson, Jeffrey, Jenner, Johnson, Kempe, King, Lake, Lambert, Langley, Lightfoot, Lockwood, Marshall, Marsh, Martin, Meade, Minot, More, Morris, Morse, Mott, Mills, Nelson, Newman, Nutt, Page, Palmer, Parker, Parkes, Parmenter, Partridge, Peacock, Perry, Peters, Phillips, Porter, Purchas, Pynchon, Pyne, Rainsford, Rawlins, Raymond, Roberts, Robinson, Rogers, Rowe, Ruggles, Russell, Sadler, Saltonstall, Sandford, Sands, Scott, Sharp, Shaw, Sherman, Smith, Southcott, Sparkawk, Spencer, Stanley, Stebbins, Steele, Stevens, Stone, Strange, Swan, Swift, Symonds, Tabor, Talcott, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Tower, Towne, Townsend, Turner, Tuthill, Wade, Walker, Walton, Ward, Warner, Warren, Watson, Webb, West, Weston, Wilcox, Willis, Wheeler, White, Whiting, Wood, and Wright.

These are not only all ancient Essex surnames, but were borne, by men whose origin, in most instances, has been traced directly to that county; and this selection, it will be seen, comprises considerably more than one-third of those contained in the list mentioned. A little care would, doubtless, enable me to add from fifty to one hundred more to the number, but the predominance is already sufficiently great for my present purpose.

These were the men who, nearly two centuries and a half ago, actuated by various sentiments, bade farewell to their friends and the scenes of their infancy and manhood, and left these smiling plains and valleys, to encounter, with their wives and little ones, first, a perilous sea-voyage of several thousand miles, and then an equally perilous struggle for existence on a strange and inhospitable shore, under an unnatural climate, and among the human savages by whom the western world was then peopled. These were the men to whom what was afterwards a great Republic owed its first existence—brave English men, who took their very lives in their hands, and faced with dauntless courage all the certain dangers and the uncertain terrors of the enterprise to which they had committed themselves—aye, and brave English women, too, whose sublime devotion has never since been paralleled, and to which ample justice has never yet been done.

I am very much afraid that, if you look for most of these names in that wonderful collection of family histories so admirably perpetuated at the College of Arms, the obliging and usually successful Heralds will be utterly unable to gratify your curiosity. They are not strictly speaking heraldic names. While a few of the lesser gentry may have been among their numbers, the pioneers of New England generally had other uses for their shields than simply to exhibit a blazonry of arms. The men who, clad in homespun garments, as they sat in their rough pews in their humble places of worship, kept one hand upon their Bibles or psalm-books, and the other upon the triggers of their muskets, were not, it must be frankly confessed, usually of what is known of gentle blood. We must look elsewhere for the records of their ancestry, and the search is not a difficult one. The moss-grown tombstones in every neighbouring churchyard, and the mildewed pages of your venerable parish registers, reveal these names at every step and on every leaf, and it is almost exclusively to these that the American genealogist can appeal with any hope of success.

One reason why due credit has not hitherto been given to the county of Essex for its paramount influence on the early history of New England arises from the fact that many of the original settlers have been assigned to other portions of England, while properly belonging to that county. As an illustration : two men named Rogers who emigrated in one of the earliest ships, from their personal character, scholastic attainments, and position as eminent divines, probably had more to do with moulding both the social and political character of the colony than at least any other two men in it. One went directly from Rowley, in Yorkshire, and the other from Assington, in Suffolk, where they had been respectively preaching for some years, and they are therefore usually spoken of as belonging to those counties. But the former was born at Wethersfield, in Essex, where his father —the Rev. Richard Rogers—preached for forty-one years, and where he died and was buried ; while the latter was the son of the Rev. John Rogers, "the famous preacher of Dedham," in Essex, the inscription under whose bust, still in good preservation in the chancel, records that he had ministered in that church for the space of thirty-one years. These were, therefore, really both Essex men, and their personal importance and influence on the early fortunes of New England may be discovered by a reference to quaint old Cotton Mather, who carefully embalmed their memory in his "Magnolia." I might adduce numerous other instances of a similar character, and indeed my investigations into this subject already enable me to affirm unhesitatingly that, of the early New England settlers, the origin of considerably more than one-half can be traced directly or indirectly to the county of Essex.

Another proof of my original proposition is to be found in the fact that, so predominant were the Essex men in the early days of the colony, the settlements as they were organized one after another received names, the majority of which had their prototypes in the neighbourhoods they had quitted, and their attachment to which they thus manifested. I need mention only the names of Billerica, Braintree, Chelmsford, Colchester, Dedham, Eastham, Hadley, Harwich, Haverhill, Malden, Newport, Springfield, Topsfield, Waltham and Wethersfield. These names were given to the very earliest settlements established by the colonists, and are retained to this day, while the mere hamlets which they at first represented have now swelled into important towns, and even cities. I may also add that these names have been reduplicated, and now represent towns and cities in almost every State in the Union, as the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers in their turn sought new homes in other portions of the country. One in particular seems to have been a universal favourite, for I find in the latest "United States Gazetteer," the name of Springfield repeated no less than forty-eight times. Another significant fact, worthy of notice in this connection, and which tells its own tale distinctly, without the necessity of any comment, is that the original Wethersfield in New England, like its prototype in ancient Essex, has from its earliest existence maintained a pre-eminent reputation for the character and inexhaustible supply of its onions, and controls to this day the American market, so far as that pungent but very useful vegetable is concerned; the "ropes" of which in unlimited quantities, bearing the Wethersfield brand, are annually exported to every quarter of the world.

Again, still confirmatory of my proposition, was the action of the colonists, as late as the year 1543, when it became necessary, for the purpose of more convenient government to subdivide the colony into counties. The order of the General Court—the Colonial Ministry and Parliament combined—dated at Boston on the 10th of May, reads as follows:—

"The whole plantation within this jurisdiction (i.e., the Colony of Massachusetts Bay) is divided into four shires, to wit—Essex, Middlesex, Suffolk and Norfolk."

True to their instincts, even in this apparently trifling formality, the Essex men of New England would persist not only in perpetuating the name of their ancient county, but also in placing it first and foremost in the new calendar.

DOES NOT WANT TO FIGHT.

THE following appeared in the Charleston News and Courier of January 11, 1896. We hardly think the writer's sentiments agree with those of a majority of the Americans of the United States:—

To the Editor of the "News and Courier."

War with England about the boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela would be excessively foolish and wicked. Suppose England should extend her dominion over a part of Venezuela, how in the name of common sense could it imperil our peace and safety? The best thing for Venezuela, and, indeed, all South America, Mexico and Central America would be absorption in the British Empire. It would give those countries good and stable government, fill them up with the foremost race of the world, develop their resources, extend their commerce, and prove of great benefit to the United States. The prosperity of those countries would promote ours by opening an immense and profitable commerce, which is now comparatively unimportant.

A British Empire on our northern frontier is no menace to our "peace and safety," and why should a similar one on our south? Great Britain does not need strategic points from which to attack us in case of war—she has them now. We are able to take care of ourselves, no matter what Power or Powers may control the South American Continent.

Great Britain is a blessing commercially, politically, and religiously to every people over whom she has extended her dominion, and all have prospered under this wonderful colonizing people. We are one people with our British brethren, with mutual interests, and cannot afford to involve ourselves in a ruinous and fratricidal war.

The greatest blessing to the world would be an alliance between these two kindred Powers, Great Britain and the United States. They would then control the world for the world's good and preserve its peace.

The Monroe doctrine has no binding force, is, under the changed condition of things, unnecessary, obsolete, and absurd. Let not this century be blackened with another atrociously wicked war like that from which we are just recovering. These are the views of an OLD CONFEDERATE.

GOD'S PROMISES TO ABRAHAM.

BY J. BRADLEY.

PART II.

THAT Canaan was the land referred to by God, in His promise to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, as that which they themselves and their posterity should inherit, still further appears from the fact, that it was so understood by Moses, the servant of God, to whom was committed the charge of conducting the people of Israel to that very land. Exodus iii. 8: "And I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them out of that land unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey: unto the place of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites." Exodus vi. 8: "And I will bring you in unto the land, concerning the which I did swear to give it to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob; and I will give it you for an heritage: I am the Lord." Exodus xv. 15: "Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazed: the mighty men of Moab, trembling shall take hold upon them: all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away." Exodus xxiii. 23, 27, 31: "For Mine angel shall go before thee, and bring thee in unto the Amorites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites; and I will cut them off. I will send My fear before thee, and will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come; and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee. And I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river: for I will deliver the inhabitants of the land into your hand; and thou shalt drive them out before thee." Exodus xxxii. 13: "And all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever." Deut. i. 5—8: "On this side Jordan, in the land of Moab, began Moses to declare this law, saying, The Lord our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and to all his neighbours, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the seaside, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates. Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them, and to their seed after them. Another proof, if another be at all necessary, that Canaan was distinctly referred to by God, in the promise which He gave to Abraham, may be found in His own declaration to Joshua, upon whom, at the death of Moses, had devolved the office of conducting the descendants of the believing patriarch to their promised inheritance." Joshua i. 1—4: "Now after the death of Moses the servant of the Lord it came to pass, that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying, Moses My servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses. From the wilderness and this Lebanon, even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast."

If the promise of Canaan to Abraham and his seed was specific, it was also unconditional. The final accomplishment of which was not to depend upon any obedience either on the part of Abraham or his descendants. Abraham having left his native country, at the command of God, and, as the apostle tells us, in the exercise of faith, not knowing whither he went, was at length directed into the land of Canaan; and while tarrying there, He who ruleth among the kingdoms of men, and giveth them to whomsoever He will, made a positive and unconditional grant of the land to him. It is impossible to conceive of any grant more free than was that of Canaan to Abraham and his descendants. Read it and you will see that not a single condition or stipulation is annexed as the terms on which either he or they should possess it." Gen. xii. 6, 7: "And Abram passed through the land unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh. And the Canaanite was then in the land. And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him."

Hence the possession of Canaan by the seed of Abraham, was not to depend upon any contingency, which would most assuredly have been the case, had it, in any degree, depended upon their obedience. No contingency, as subsequent events have very plainly shown, could have been greater than this. But that it might not so depend, Jehovah, in His sovereign will and pleasure, was pleased to make the promise of Canaan for an everlasting possession to Abraham and his descendants absolute and unconditional. And having afterwards ratified it in a very solemn manner, it stood in the form of a covenant, which no one could set aside.

These promises made to our fathers, Jesus Christ came to confirm. Rom. xv. 8: "Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers."

Had obedience been the condition upon which the posterity of Abraham should inherit the land of Canaan, there could have been no certainty whatever that a single individual amongst them would possess it, much less that they should possess it as a national body. And, as in many things, they have all offended, their right and title to it would long ere this have been completely forfeited; so that to expect their possession of it, under such circumstances, would be to expect the fulfilment of a promise when the condition upon which it had been made to rest, was broken. But God, having determined that Abraham and his seed should possess the land of Canaan, in the first instance made a free and gratuitous promise of it to him, a promise which rested on no condition, and which had nothing to do with the "works of the law." And this He did in order that their final and everlasting possession of it might be sure. And how very explicitly is all this stated by the apostle (Rom. iv. 13—15). The time and season when the posterity of Abraham should inherit the land of Canaan, the Father had indeed, put in His own power, and they greatly depended, as we afterwards find, upon obedience to Him. Insomuch that, for their murmurings and rebellion in the wilderness, they were detained from it for the length of forty years, when they might easily have entered the land in the space of a few days.

But although the time and season, when the posterity of Abraham should inherit the land of Canaan, at first depended upon their obedience, their final and everlasting possession of it does not. For God gave it to Abraham by promise; that is, gratuitously and unconditionally.

The grant of all the land of Canaan, to Abraham and to his seed, was not only specific and unconditional, but perpetual. "For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, and I will be their God." Now, although a doubt may be raised as to whether, by the expression here translated "everlasting and for ever," an interminable duration be intended, to me it appears to admit of no doubt whatever, that it denotes a period which shall continue as long as the earth itself. And that they to whom the promise of the everlasting possession of Canaan is made, shall, at least, be the final inheritors of it and that in the latter day. Numb. xxiv. 14, 17 to end: "And now, behold, I go unto my people: come therefore, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days. . . . I shall see Him, but not now; I shall behold Him, but not nigh; there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth. And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession for his enemies; and Israel shall do valiantly. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city. And when he looked on Amalek, he took up his parable, and said, Amelek was the first of the nations that warred against Israel; but his latter end shall be that he perish for ever. And he looked on the Kenites, and took up his parable, and said, Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock. Nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted, until Asshur shall carry thee away captive. And he took up his parable, and said, Alas! who shall live when God doeth this? And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur, and shall afflict Eber, and he also shall perish for ever. And Balaam rose up, and went and returned to his place. And Balak also went his way."

This is, no doubt, the kingdom spoken of by Daniel in the second chapter of his book and the 44th verse. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." Daniel vii. 18—27: "But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever. And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him." Matt. xxi. 43, 44: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. And whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken, but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder."

For under any qualification of which the word "everlasting" may be susceptable, it must surely be regarded as far too strong to express a period which shall expire before the consummation of all things, and especially a period which has elapsed ages before it, as has been the fact with that in which the seed of Abraham have hitherto possessed the land of Canaan; so that if Canaan is to be no more inherited by them, then the everlasting possession of it, which Jehovah so solemnly promised to give them, dwindles into their partial, precarious, and almost continually disturbed occupation of it for a few short centuries.

In answer to the above observations, it may be said, that whilst the words "everlasting and for ever," may denote perpetuity of possession, yet this perpetuity was not intended of the land of Canaan, but of the heavenly world; and that it was so understood by Abraham himself. How the everlasting possession of heaven could be intended in the promise of God to Abraham, when He said, "I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession," and how the partriarch himself could have so understood it, it is difficult to conceive. One or two Scriptures, I am perfectly aware, are usually brought forward to support such a position, which texts, if properly interpreted and understood, would, I think, be found to give no sanction to it whatever. True, it is written, "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and ruler is God" (Heb. ix. 10).

But from such a declaration does it necessarily follow, that that glorious city for which the patriarch was looking should not exist on earth? Is there any thing so incredible in the circumstance, that even the land of Canaan should become the site upon which it should exist or be erected? And will not such undoubtedly be the fact, when the apocalyptic vision is realized? "Rev. xxi. 2—10: "And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God, out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God." Isa. xxiv. 23: "Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign over Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients, gloriously. Micah iv. 4, 7: "And I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation; and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even for ever."

It is quite clear to my mind from the texts quoted that the new Jerusalem will be upon Zion, the site of so many that are now past. Apart from which, the connection of the passage seems almost necessarily to confine the site of the city for which the patriarch was looking, to the land of Canaan. For in Heb. xi. 8—10, it is said, "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise." And here, you will observe, that although Abraham is represented as at this time dwelling in the land of Canaan, as in a strange country, it is nevertheless termed the land of promise. And, if Canaan were the land of promise, or that which Jehovah sware that He would give to Abraham for an inheritance, and if it were so regarded by the apostle himself, upon what ground could he represent him, as many have supposed that he has done in the verse directly following, as looking for his inheritance in a place altogether distinct from it, that is, from Canaan or the land of promise; which would most assuredly have been the fact, had heaven been the city, or the site of the city, for which he was looking? "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." That the heavenly world should be necessarily intended, seems to go upon the supposition, in my view, a very wrong one, that a city like this could, by no possibility, exist on earth.

Another, and indeed, principal passage usually brought forward in support of the opinion that the everlasting possession of heaven was intended in the promise of God to Abraham, and not the land of Canaan which had been so distinctly pointed out to him, may be found in the 16th verse of the chapter from which the above quotation is made. "But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, for He hath prepared for them a city." The fact that the better country so ardently desired by the ancient pilgrims, is by many considered altogether conclusive in favour of the opinion just mentioned; but why it should be considered so I cannot imagine. For, I would ask, is it beyond the range of possibility, or even probability, that the land of Canaan itself should hereafter become this heavenly country? And when we consider the very specific manner in which it was pointed out in all the promises of God to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, as that which He would give them for an inheritance, and that without the slightest intimation, so far as I can discover (for there is none upon record) that by the promise of Canaan for an inheritance He intended a place altogether distinct from it, might we not positively conclude that it will eventually, and in very deed, become the heavenly country which these holy men desired? True, in the language of the apostle, they died not having received the promise, or the things which God had promised, and among which the everlasting possession of Canaan for an inheritance is most conspicuous; but although they died, not having received the promises, they died in the firm belief that they should receive them; for these all died in faith. And, although they beheld them afar off—that is, the accomplishment of them—they were persuaded of them and embraced them, and fully believed that they themselves, though dying, should nevertheless see the day when God would fulfil them all. Job xix. 25—27: "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and after I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another, though my reins be consumed within me."

But some individuals may say, if the land of Canaan was that which Jehovah had chiefly intended in the promise which He gave to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, then their resurrection from the dead is essential to the fulfilment of it; and to such I would point to Acts xxvi. 6—8: "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our Twelve Tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" Why should it be thought a thing incredible that He, again, should raise these holy men from the dust of death to give them the possession of a land which He not only promised, but sware that He would give unto them and their seed after them? Heb. vi. 13, 14: "For when God made promise to Abraham, because He could swear by no greater, He sware by Himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee." To raise them from the dead would be but a very slight exertion of His almighty power; not to give them the land concerning the which He lifted up His hand to give it unto them (Ezek. xlvii. 14: "And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another; concerning the which I lifted up Mine hand to give it unto your fathers; and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance") would be to do that which the apostle tells us He cannot do, namely, deny Himself. 2 Tim. ii. 13: "If we believe not, yet He abideth faithful: He cannot deny Himself. But that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For He is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto Him" (Luke xx. 37, 38). Therefore Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob must one day rise again from the dead. And why? Because these words must be understood with a supply of that to which they have reference, and that to which they have reference was the covenant which Jehovah made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and in respect to which He calls Himself their God. This covenant, as already observed, was to give unto them, and to their seed after them, the land wherein they were strangers (mark it); not to their seed or offspring only, but to themselves. If God, then, made good to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, this His covenant, and whereby He undertook to be their God; then Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob must needs one day live again to inherit the land which He covenanted to give them, and which hitherto they have not done. For the God that has covenanted with them, covenanted not to make His promise good to them dead, but living. This is the strength of the divine argument, and irrefragable; which otherwise would not infer any such conclusion.

Had heaven and its everlasting felicity been intended in the promise of Canaan to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, there is no reason whatever for the stress which the apostle has certainly laid upon the fact that these holy men had died not having received the promises; since, if heavenly happiness were primarily meant, it was not, in the nature of things, possible that they could receive them before they had left the world. Neither, under such circumstances, could it with any propriety have been said of them, when dying, that they beheld them, or the accomplishment of them, afar off, inasmuch as in a very little while they would enter upon the felicity intended by them.

That the grant of Canaan to Abraham and to his seed was not only specific and unconditional, but perpetual, might be argued, finally, from the immutability of Jehovah's character (Mal. iii. 6): "For I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." Canaan was the gift of God to Abraham and to his seed; and the apostle tells us, and that in reference to this subject, in Rom. ii. 29: "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." And these gifts and promises could not have been granted to them till after the death of the Giver (Heb. ix. 16, 17): "For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth."

SPIRITUALIZING.

By the Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

I desire to give in this article (1) an example of what is called spiritualizing the prophecies, and (2) to examine a text which is supposed to give an inspired sanction to this method of interpreting the oracles of God.

The example is from Isaiah ii. 1—6. Here Jerusalem and Mount Zion are taken to represent the Church; the law going forth is the preaching of the Gospel; the swords beaten into ploughshares, etc., the supremacy of Christian love.

This opinion is supported by the text, Gal. iv. 26, "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all," and upon this the statement is founded that it is a low and carnal idea "to make Jerusalem consist of bricks and mortar."

This mystical, or subjective ideal, is termed a spiritual fulfilment, and a literal or objective fulfilment is dubbed carnal. The mystical fulfilment being to the Church Catholic, and the carnal to the actual Israel and Zion. But is a fulfilment to the Church Catholic (if such be admitted) spiritual? or is it an actual accomplishment to a people other than those to whom the promise was made? If the Church Catholic is Jerusalem and Zion, then the Church Catholic has received a literal fulfilment; but to the exclusion of the actual Israel and the geographical Zion. In this sense it is manifest that the word "spiritual" is misapplied, for the word "substituted" would more nearly express the idea. The Gentile body being substituted for the Abrahamic stock, the non-Abrahamic peoples being substituted for the house of Jacob, the Church being substituted for Mount Zion, privileged Christians substituted for Israel, but the Jews, strange to say, retaining their literal and unsubstituted place and curses! When Isaiah ii. 1, &c., can be thus treated, any other prediction can be turned in the same way. And this use of Scripture is justified by St. Paul's allegory (Gal. iv. 21, &c.). Here Sarah represents the new covenant in Christ, and Hagar represents the old covenant—the Levitical. Those who were in covenant in Christ being in the position of Isaac, the son of promise—those who were under the circumcision covenant being in the position of Ishmael, the son after the flesh, "and the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman"; that is, St. Paul claimed for the baptized the position of Isaac, and for the circumcised the position of Ishmael, the former being the Israel of God (chap. vi. 16), the latter being cast out; and he makes this unmistakable by quoting a prophecy concerning Israel, the once outcast and desolate wife, who was to rejoice and be blessed in contrast with Judah, the very people whom Isaiah distinctly apostrophises in chap. liv., "Rejoice thou barren," &c., &c. So far we have the apostle's recognition of a literal and actual fulfilment to Israel of the sonship of Isaac, in contrast with the bondage of Judah, one possessing the blessings of "Jerusalem which is above," the other occupying the place of Jerusalem which now is." So that the freedom of "Jerusalem which is above" was possessed by Israel on the earth. "So then, brethren, we," i.e., the once desolate and barren house, "are children of . . . the freewoman," of the Jerusalem which is free, which is from above.

This is as literal a fulfilment to Israel of all that the sonship of Isaac implied, as it is an actual relegation to Judah of all that the state of bondage implied.

Jerusalem which is above is not the substituted Gentile Church, nor is it spiritualized Jerusalem, but it is the freedom and sonship of heaven, which was the inheritance of Isaac, as contrasted with the bondage of the superadded law (chap. iii. 17), of which Ishmael was here the allegorical representation. Thus, the words relied on, "Jerusalem which is above," so far from sanctioning a non-literal, or substitutional, or a so-called spiritual use of this passage, or of any passages which mention the land of promise, or the house of Jacob, are a distinct statement of the literal and non-substitutional and Divine fulfilment to Ephraim-Israel of the very position which was literally and unequivocally and absolutely promised to her in Christ, as the immediate result of the travail of His soul, for the words quoted by St. Paul in ver. 27 are those which immediately follow after Isa. liii. 11, 12.

The call of the Gentiles was not a substitution for Israel, but an admission by grace to the original Abrahamic stock

(Rom. xi.), and was and is as literal a fulfilment of Isa. lv., "Ho every one that thirsteth," &c., as the words quoted by St. Paul have been, and are, literally fulfilled in the literal Israel—God's firstborn; and as Isa. ii. 1 will yet be fully accomplished in the Holy City when she ceases to be literally trodden down by very literal flesh and blood enemies of the Lord Jesus Christ.

BRITAIN'S GREAT INHERITANCE.

THIS was the subject of a very interesting lecture delivered last (Thursday) evening, in St. Saviour's Schools, Westgate, by Col. H. W. J. Senior. There was a large attendance, and the lecture was made more interesting by the exhibition of a large number of photographic views, shown by means of a powerful oxy-hydrogen lantern. The Vicar, the Rev. A. A. Lyne, presided, and having briefly introduced the lecturer, Col. Senior proceeded to show by Biblical history the distinction between the Houses of Israel, and the Jews to be distinct from the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel. He pointed out that it was God's command that Israel was never to cease from being a nation, but that the Jews were to have no national existence. From this he argued that the remaining Ten Tribes must be one of the nations of the earth, and then he went on to show how the Scriptures were being fulfilled, and how Britain was to be indentified as the Lost Ten Tribes. "Israel," the Bible said, "was to be under a monarchy of the Royal House of David to all generations," and he showed there was reason to believe that the line of descent of our Queen could be traced back to the House of David. The nation of Israel, though at one time a small one, and cast far off, was to become a strong nation, and the lecturer went on to show that Britain's colonies and dependencies made her the greatest nation on the earth. Israel was to be above all nations, provided that she was obedient to God and tried to do her duty, and it was a fact that England's supremacy began after the Reformation, and more especially when she began missionary work and the translating and distributing of the Bible, and the putting down of slavery, oppression and cruelty. Then there was the present general expectation of the Second Advent and consequent restoration of Twelve-tribed Israel, and they were told that the proclamation for Israel's return was to be made "in the chief nation" and in the "Isles afar off," and that they were to be gathered from the north and from "the coasts of the earth." Then the lecturer gave a summary of evidence in respect of land area, population, wealth, commerce, shipping, &c., which he said proved that at the present time the British Empire was the chief nation both by land and sea. The photographs which were shown illustrated biblical facts, all of which were applicable to the British nation only, and that as they consisted of the veritable promises made by God to Israel, His chosen people, and as God was unchangeable and true it followed, the lecturer argued, that we must be Israelites; but as the Jews had been cut off from these and other blessings, we could not belong to the House of Judah (Jews), but to the House of Israel (viz., the ten remaining tribes), once lost but now found and gathered to a place of safety in order that we might renew our strength and fulfil the final destiny of restored Israel.—The Ramsgate Gazette, Dec. 7th, 1895.

NAUTICAL NOTES ON INDIA.

THE first English navigators to India, after rounding the Cape, seem to have followed the route through the Mozambique Channel up North as far as Socotra, and then stretched across the Indian Ocean for Surat. At all events we find Captain Hawkins, in the Hector, doing so in A.D. 1607, or just 100 years after the Portuguese captured Socotra. Hawkins founded the first English factory at Surat, after great opposition from the Portuguese, who were most jealous of the English competing with them for the Eastern trade. The same route was followed, in A.D. 1610, by a fleet under Sir Henry Middleton, and probably it was adopted as much as anything to avoid meeting the Portuguese, whose chief station was Goa, on the Malabar coast, 200 miles South of Bombay, and who were all powerful about that time in Indian waters. It may be, however, they had some notion of reviving the trade by way of the Red Sea, for Sir Henry Middleton touched at Mocha, but was badly received by the Arabs, and made prisoner for a considerable time. The idea of either making a trade for themselves by this route to India, or controlling that of others, seems to have been common to all the European Powers at this epoch, even Avory, the pirate, having attempted to establish himself on Perim for the latter purpose, A.D. 1696. Finding no water there, however, he removed to St. Mary's Island, near Madagascar, which was, from his point of view, more suitable, and there he and others flourished for about 100 years, preying on ships of all nations passing to India through the Mozambique Channel, between Madagascar and the mainland of Africa. Madagascar is too much out of our present subject to be more than alluded to en passant, but I now propose to briefly touch on Socotra, Perim, Aden, as well as the more especially Indian ports. As the chief trade route to the whole East is again through the Suez Canal, down the Red Sea, past Perim, Aden, and Socotra, a few remarks on them and the surrounding coasts and peoples may not be valueless, although our proper subject is India, Burmah, and the Straits Settlements, all on the other side of the India Ocean.

Socotra is said by the Arabian voyagers of the 9th century to have been colonized by Greeks, sent there by Alexander the Great, 327 B.C.; but it is more probable this was done under the Ptolemies,—the Grecian rulers of Egypt, who succeeded Alexander—being so much more within their reach. Socotra, lying so near the track of what was then, as now, the chief trade route to the East, attracted the notice of the great Portuguese Viceroy of Goa, Alphonso D'Albuquerque, who hoped by establishing there a strong military post to domineer over all the traffic to India, or stop it entirely, and transfer it to the ships of his own nation voyaging round the Cape from Portugal. Accordingly in A.D. 1507 he attacked and captured Tamarida, the chief city of the island, after a strenuous resistance from the natives, in which he himself was wounded. A strong fort was built, ostensibly for the "protection of the Christian inhabitants," of whom possibly there might be many at that time, for the celebrated Marco Polo, who wrote in the 13th century, states that all the inhabitants were Christians of the sect known as Nestorians; and one Nicolo Conti, who spent two months on the island early in the 15th century, says it was for the most part inhabited by Nestorian Christians. When the English first took possession of it, however, in 1834, the population was Mussulman, and ruled by the Arab Chiefs on the mainland at Kisseen, from whom it was purchased by the British for 10,000 dollars. In A.D.

1508, when D'Albuquerque returned, he found his garrison in the last extremities of famine, and seems to have subsequently withdrawn them, turning his attention to Aden, as stronger and better suited for his purpose. Aden proved too strong, however, for when he attacked it, on 10th February, A.D. 1513, with 20 sail and 2,500 men, he was entirely discomfited, as was also Alvarez (his successor in the Viceroyalty) on another occasion.

Some idea of the great naval power of the Portuguese about this period may be formed from the fact that they could fit out for an expedition up the Red Sea, against Suez, a fleet of no less than 72 sail, 12 of them being war-ships of large size with 2,000 picked soldiers on board. Socotra was occupied by the British for a few months in 1834-35, with the intention of forming there a coaling station for the steamers of the "Overland Route" through the Red Sea to India and the East, which had been recently established by Lieutenant Waghorn, of the Indian Navy, the first "Overland Mail" having been despatched from England in January, 1830. Socotra was found, however, to have no good harbour, although there are anchorages on the East, West, and North sides of it, which can be used respectively in the N.E. Monsoon and in the S.W. Monsoon, but none affording shelter in both Monsoons. The site chosen for locating the troops, near Tamarida, its chief town, was also extremely unhealthy, although a few miles off, higher up the hills, a most salubrious climate is found. Socotra was abandoned, therefore, in 1835, and was never troubled by any European nation, till, on 30th October, 1886 it was again occupied by the British—probably with a view to keeping anyone else from getting hold of what is undoubtedly a place of great importance now that such an enormous commerce by steamers to the East, through the Suez Canal, passes close by it; for it lies only 120 miles East of Cape Guardafui, on the African coast, and right on the track of all vessels going or coming between Suez, India, and China. Socotra is 71 miles long, and 22 miles broad at its widest part. It has a very high mountainous interior, with a steep slope to the sea nearly all round it, and can be seen 20 miles off.

Socotra produces very little, the land being mostly sterile; excellent aloes, used in medicine, are, however, procurable, and a small amount of a resinous gum called dragon's blood. Fresh water is scarce, and so are provisions of all kinds, although bullocks, sheep, goats, and fish may be had in small quantities at reasonable prices, also grapes, water-melons, pumpkins, oranges, and plantains in spring-time, dates being plentiful in summer. It is not unlikely that under English occupation agriculture may advance with artificial irrigation and so forth, one remarkable peculiarity of English rule being the prosperity which almost invariably accompanies it. In Cyprus, for example, where everything had gone to decay and ruin for centuries, the prices of land and houses and most articles immediately jumped up 100 per cent., so soon as it became known that the English had taken possession of it by treaty with the Turks, 1876.

The small barren island of Perim is situated just at the entrance of the Red Sea, in the Straits of Babel-Mandeb (the Gate of Tears). It has a good harbour on the S.W. side, where there is now an important coaling station. It cannot command the wider part of the Strait with its guns, that being 14 miles to the opposite African shore, but the best channel lies between it and Arabia, and is only 1¾ miles wide, which of course in these days, is easily commanded by artillery, especially as ships must keep near the Perim shore on account of dangers to the navigation. The Portuguese Viceroy of Goa, D'Albuquerque, is said to have been the first European to visit it when he landed there in 1513, and having erected a large cross, called it Santa Cruz Island.

Perim has a very small amount of vegetation on it, but no trees. It had vast numbers of sea birds on it when first occupied, as well as many turtles. But these have doubtless disappeared long ago. Avory, the pirate, tried to do something with it, but failed, and in 1738 the French occupied it for a short time, as a base for warlike operations against the town of Mocha (celebrated for its coffee), in which they were then engaged. They did not keep it, however.

The English first occupied Perim in 1799, with 300 soldiers, under Colonel Murray, but it was very soon abandoned for want of fresh water. Later on, however, in 1856, as commerce increased by way of the Red Sea, the English Government ordered its re-occupation, and on 12th January 1857, it was again taken possession of by Lieutenant Templar, in the Indian Navy schooner Mahi, about which there was a great diplomatic controversy in Europe when it became known.

The English Government had probably got wind of the intention of the French to again occupy Perim; and some wonderful yarns are told about how the English Governor of Aden, General Sir William Coghlan, jockeyed the French officers who were sent in a gun-brig for the purpose of annexation. One version is that this French gun-brig Nisus put into Aden, which is only 96 miles from Perim, and her captain and officers were very hospitably treated by the Governor. Under the influence of wine—so it is said—the Frenchmen let out their secret, and before daybreak the Governor sent off Lieutenant Templar in the Mahi who got to Perim first, and hoisted the grand old Union Jack just before the French arrived!

This is a very good story, but, like many other good stories, not quite accurate, Sir W. Coghlan's own account of the transaction being that the occupation had been already determined on when the Nisus arrived at Aden in distress from a gale she had encountered, and her advent, interpreted by previous suspicions (as the Frenchmen said nothing about what they were going to do), certainly hastened, and very much hastened, our action—"accelerated action" is a good name to give it—but there seems very little doubt the French were outwitted in the matter, although a decent face was put upon it by the British. However obtained, Perim is British now, and will probably remain so long enough.

In a learned work by a Mr. Harris on the commerce of Greeks and Romans with the East, a place called Eudeman (by Arrian, who wrote A.D. 140) is identified with Aden, which had then a great commerce. The Roman Emperor Trajan, about A.D. 110 sent a fleet to destroy the Red Sea pirates, and for some cause they destroyed Aden or Endeman, which never again became of much importance commercially till our own times, notwithstanding its being visited by Chinese as late as A.D. 1455, whose junks were laden with porcelain, silk, musk, and other valuable products, with which they traded with the Arabs.—From the Calcutta Evening News, Nov. 17th, 1888.

We regret to record the death of Mr. Henry Leslie, the well-known musical conductor. He was 73 years of age. For many years he took considerable interest in the study of the Identity of the Ten Lost Tribes and kindred subjects.

"ASSYRIA, SYRIA, AND ISRAEL."

THE REV. T. ROSLING HOWLETT'S paper with the above title appeared on p. 42 of No. 994 of the BANNER, and has given rise to several rather decided notes of opposition here. For, whereas our American author holds that "the Assyrians were the ancestors of the Syrians and of the Israelites," his readers here, especially one in Leamington, while admitting these nations were all the offspring of Shem, cannot understand how Assyria derived from Shem's second son Asshur, could be the ancestor of Israel and the Syrians who descended from Shem's third son Arphaxad? Perhaps Mr. Howlett would explain; since at present some doubt is cast upon the foundations of his article in question. We do not notice further the statements of our Leamington correspondent regarding the origin of the Turks, the Germans, the Druses, the Malagasies, the Aztics and Cubans! We have trouble enough to persuade our fellow-country folks that the British are Israel without going into the vast ramifications J. M. wishes to open out. One thing at a time! Our first object is to show that the British are Israel; and to clear the way for some to that inquiry, we hope our American friend will explain to us what just now seems an error in his otherwise suggestive paper.

JEWISH HISTORY IN RHYMES OF THE NURSERY.

THE following has already appeared in the BANNER, and the idea has been ridiculed that such a nursery rhyme could have any connection with the histories of the Houses of Israel and Judah, as distinct from one another. Yet we have it quoted in the July and August number of Hermann Warszawiak's journal, the Jewish Christian, just to hand,—and recognised also as based upon "the history of the Jewish people." We quote the article once more, as it is a curiosity in itself, and worthy of attention when its origin is considered. The subject, further, is closely connected with our own:—

In looking over the "accumulative stories" which form part of the collection of "Mother Goose Tales and Jingles" with which our little ones are so familiar, we were very much surprised and interested to find a rhyme which is based upon the history of the Jewish people. Thinking that this oddity from the literature of the past may prove of interest to our readers, especially the younger portion of them, we insert it here for their perusal. We would suggest that this "story," which is but one of a number of a similar character, affords a good opportunity for teaching the history of God's chosen people in a way which is sure to attract the attention of the children. We give the first and last stanzas only, each verse being the repetition of all that precedes it with the added line:—

"A kid, a kid my father bought
For two pieces of money.

* * * * *

Then came the Holy One, blessed be He!
And killed the angel of death,
That killed the butcher,
That slew the ox,
That drank the water,
That quenched the fire,
That burned the staff,
That beat the dog,
That bit the cat,
That ate the kid,
That my father bought
For two pieces of money."

The following is the interpretation:—

The KID, which was one of the pure animals, denotes the Hebrews.

The FATHER by whom it was purchased is Jehovah, who represents Himself as sustaining this relation to the Hebrew nation.

The TWO PIECES OF MONEY signify Moses and Aaron, through whose mediation the Hebrews were brought out of Egypt.

The CAT denotes the Assyrians, by whom the Ten Tribes were carried into captivity.

The DOG is symbolical of the Babylonians.

The STAFF signifies the Persians.

The FIRE indicates the Grecian Empire under Alexander the Great.

The WATER betokens the Romans, or the fourth of the great monarchies to whose dominion the Jews were subjected.

The OX is a symbol of the Saracens, who subdued Palestine and brought it under the Caliphate.

The BUTCHER that killed the ox denotes the Crusaders, by whom the Holy Land was wrested out of the hand of the Saracens.

The ANGEL OF DEATH signifies the Turkish power, by which the land of Palestine was taken from the Franks, and to which it is still subject.

The commencement of the last stanza is designed to show that God will take signal vengeance on the Turks, immediately after whose overthrow the Jews are to be restored to their own land, and live under the government of their long-expected Messiah. May He speedily redeem His people Israel!

Obituary.

WE are grieved to report the death of our old friend and fellow-believer, Mr. William Henry Peters, J.P., D.L., of "Harefield," Lympstone, near Exeter, Devonshire, aged 82. Mr. Peters had been in feeble health for some time; but he had lived to a ripe, good old age. We append a notice of the deceased which appeared in the Devon and Exeter Gazette of Jan. 28th. It will be acceptable to those who knew and respected our friend:—

"THE LATE MR. W. H. PETERS.

"Before the commencement of the business at Woodbury Petty Sessions yesterday, the Chairman of the Bench (Colonel Birch) said he wished, on behalf of the justices sitting in that Court, to express their sense of the great loss they had sustained in the death of the senior magistrate, Mr. W. H. Peters, who for forty years occupied a place there, to the advantage of the community and to his own honour. The deceased possessed in a high degree the attributes which went to constitute an ideal English gentleman. He was kindly, courteous, and considerate to all of every degree, and his every action was governed by the highest standard of right. His generosity was unbounded; there was hardly a cottage in the neighbourhood in which his loss would not be mourned for many a day to come. Their late colleague left to them the example and memory of a simple, single-minded, noble life. Colonel Birch asked the assistant Magistrates' Clerk (Mr. Adams, jun.) to convey an expression of their Worships' sense of the great loss they had sustained, and of their deep sympathy to the family. Mr. C. T. K. Roberts, solicitor, endorsed the observations of the Chairman, and bore his testimony to the kindness and courtesy which the late Mr. Peters always showed to representatives of the legal profession. Mr. Adams, jun., spoke of his life-long knowledge of Mr. Peters, and for himself and his father he paid a warm tribute to the memory of the deceased gentleman."

Mr. Peters always took a lively interest in all matters connected with Our Identity, and was ever ready to sustain any deserving movement connected with it which was brought to his notice. He was a staunch Conservative, and frequently wrote to the newspapers of Exeter and Devon in the interests of the party. His loss will long be felt in Devonshire; and our Metropolitan British-Israel Association will regretfully call to mind his voice and figure on our Exeter Hall anniversary platform, where, when in health, he was never absent, but ready and prepared to support the cause.

"HUMAN BLOODSHED, MISERY, AND TEARS," IN ARMENIA.

THINGS have come to a terrible pass in Armenia, and there seems to be no remedy available to the Powers of Europe to put an end to the dreadful state of things existing. The European concord does not reach as far as Armenia, because the nations now assembled near Constantinople in their ships of war are unwilling in union to undertake to coerce the Sultan. The British, who would like to do so, cannot alone undertake the task. For them it is physically impossible. Their strength is in their ships, and the ships cannot approach even the borders of Eastern Armenia where the massacres have taken place. Reference to a good map will show that clearly to an enquirer. The duty doubtless is ours under the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty, but at present, circumstances prevent us undertaking the duty alone.

Jealousies between the Powers, which the Lord doubtless is stirring up according to Isa. xlii. 13, hinder anything like a combined operation. Gradually men are all coming to the conclusion, which will be a step towards the fulfilment of Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix., that the only Power which can do the work is Russia, since she is placed in close contiguity to the disturbed districts, and as a Christian nation, will doubtless protect the persecuted Armenians, and save them from their cruel enemies, the Kurds and Turks. The Duke of Argyll's letter to the Times of Dec. 25, shows that he is a convert to this view, and sees that the only thing to be done now is to bury our jealousies and give Russia that mandate of united Europe to do what lies in her power, but does not in ours, and give that relief to our fellow Christian sufferers in Armenia which they sorely need. The Duke wrote thus:—

It is not too much to say that England has twice saved Turkey from complete subjection since 1853. It is largely—mainly—due to our action that she now exists at all as an independent Power. On both occasions we dragged the Powers of Europe along with us in maintaining the Ottoman Government. On both occasions we did so avowedly, and on the last occasion expressly, on the ground that we—Europe—would undertake that Protectorate over the Christian subjects of the Sultan which Russia sought to establish in her own hands alone. We are bound by every consideration of duty and honour to do our very utmost to discharge so solemn and so tremendous an obligation. It is one which does not arise only, or even mainly, out of general considerations of humanity. It arises out of our own decided and repeated action in keeping up what is now seen to be a Government which is weak, cruel, and corrupt. In deciding on any course of action, of course we are free to weigh the consequences of every act. The rest of Europe does share with us the terrible responsibility of bolstering up a decaying Empire from sheer jealousy of each other as to the division of the spoils. But we share it in an especial degree, because our jealousy of Russia was, and still is, pre-eminent among all the other jealousies concerned.

I felt in 1853-54, and I feel still, that there was reason in that jealousy. My view has always been that in Asia Russia is essentially a civilizing Power, but that in Europe she is not. We have nothing to hope for, and might have a good deal to fear, from her undue political predominance. Her system of government may be a stage in human progress, but it is certainly not a high one, and we had a perfect right to object to her seating herself upon the Bosporous. But, as regards the Asiatic provinces of Turkey, in which her maladminstration is especially abominable, I am bound to say, that if we cannot get other Powers to combine with us in the discharge of our common obligations, we must give up our jealousies, and even invite Russia to do what she could undoubtedly accomplish with comparative ease, from her geographical position and her military power. At all events, if we keep up our jealousy, let us not hide from ourselves what it is costing in human blood, misery, and tears.

Your obedient servant, ARGYLL.

ference compelled it to accept arrangements, the outcome of which we see to-day to be the murder of thousands of the Armenian Christians. The writer prefers Russia to Turkey in the matter, and would entrust to the former the duty of protecting the hapless Armenians. He would also give Russia an outlet into Europe, which we cannot see to be safe or desirable, in the event of the fall of the Turkish Empire.

The Daily Graphic of Dec. 3, has an article written long before the Duke of Argyll's letter to the Times appeared, in which the same view was enunciated. A map is also furnished showing how the writer would divide Armenia; giving Russia "Great Armenia," or the six Eastern provinces, to administer, while Great Britain, according to his scheme, would occupy and rule for the time, under "the mandate" of Europe, the two Western provinces called Celicia, opposite Cyprus. The idea is thus gaining ground, and is being expressed in various quarters, that there is no option now but to employ Russia to defend the persecuted Armenians, and to occupy that part of Turkey in place of the Sultan by reason of the gross and culpable failure of his Government to protect his Christian subjects—the Armenians.

There will be bitterness and humiliation, of course, in our soliciting the Russian Government to interfere to protect the Armenian Christians, who should according to treaty look to the European Powers, Great Britain being the chief, to save them from Turkish misgovernment. There will be great danger, too, in giving so large a share of Turkey to Russia, with the consent of Europe. For, look at it how we will, if Russia occupies Armenia to prevent future massacres, Austria will certainly seize on Salonica, France will make a bid for Syria, and the British will be forced to put in a claim for their due share of the Turkish ruins—a Gate or two, here and there; the great Gate of all the Gates perhaps (who knows?) may be included in her demand. However that may be, the step which now is unavoidable seems to be the fatal opening of the Sluice Gates and the beginning of the end. We should not be surprised if the proposal and the mandate be the work of Great Britain herself, and thus the prophecy of Ezek. xxv. 14, may come to be fulfilled, "I will lay My vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel: and they shall do in Edom according to My anger and according to My fury; and they shall know My vengeance, saith the Lord God."

These events, so accomplished, should operate as a new and convincing proof of the Identity of the British with the Lost Ten Tribes, and satisfy the doubters that the Lord is true, His Word that which cannot fail, and His people those who in the very jots and tittles are even unwittingly fulfilling His prophecies. The vengeance of the Lord must be a terrible experience to those who have to suffer it; and surely no nation seems so richly to deserve it as the Turkish Empire, whose rule is founded on tyranny, cruelty, violence, and injustice, as described by Obadiah the prophet (verses 8 to 21). Well may British-Israel rejoice that God is on her side, and has redeemed her by the precious blood of Christ. To Him be all the praise.

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND (February 18th). The Hon. Treasurer gratefully acknowledges £1 1s. from "Isaac," Rochester, on January 28th, for special distribution of New Year's Number of the BANNER OF ISRAEL; by a misreading of the letter, the donation was entered for the March Report instead of the next week's issue of the BANNER. The delay is much regretted.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.

By GEORGE BULLOCK.

"And Jesus went about all the cities and villages of Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease amongst them."—Matt. iv. 23.

PREACHING the Gospel of the Kingdom. In our own day we hear a great deal about preaching the Gospel, but I am afraid that many, even of the preachers, have never given much consideration to the nature of the kingdom; and as it is a point of vital importance, there will be no sure way to determine the matter but by an appeal to the Word of the living God, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; even He, who is this day the God of Israel. Trusting to this unerring guidance, I will try to set forth what is therein stated as to the nature, purpose, and the duration of the kingdom with which the Gospel is so intimately connected.

When the glorious Elohim entered into covenant relationship with Abraham, making him His adopted son, and giving him the heirship of the world, this heirship must have included the government of the world. The Word declares: "And God talked with him, saying: As for Me, behold, My covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee. And I will make thee exceedingly fruitful, and I will make nations of thee and kings shall come out of thee" (Gen. xvii. 3—6). Here, we get the first glimpse of the kings of the kingdom. Following the history of this adopted race, there is the first shewing forth of an everlasting sceptre as a centre point in the blessing given to Judah (Gen. xlix. 10). And as they march towards their God-given inheritance, after their deliverance from Egypt, Balaam, under divine inspiration, bears unwilling testimony to their future greatness, declaring amongst other predictions: "He (God) hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel; the Lord his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them. God brought them out of Egypt; He hath as it were the strength of an unicorn" (Numbers xxiii. 21, 22); and in the 24th chapter he says: "He shall pour the water out of his buckets, and his seed shall be in many waters, and his king shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted. God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn; he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows. He couched, he lay down as a lion, as a great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee." And in continuance he declares: "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth" (vers. 7, 8, 9 and 17). This is a foreshadowing of a kingdom that is not only powerful, but extensive. Now, it is not possible to follow this kingdom in all its various stages of development, and sometimes of declension, in the limits of a short paper; so I shall have to be content to take some of the main facts of its marvellous history. These children of adoption, this royal seed of promise, who are now the children of the kingdom, were, for the most part, rebellious children, and were never satisfied that the Lord their God was King over them. So they asked for an earthly king, even as other nations; God granted their wish, and gave them Saul, the son of Kish, and he proved as rebellious as his subjects, and was cast off from being king of Israel. Then the Lord chose David, and set him over His elect people, promising him a never-ending sceptre. That is, if we may suppose that the Word, which it is declared shall never pass away, is as reliable as its Divine Author made it. Here is the promise, "Also the Lord telleth thee that He will make thee an house. And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build an house for My name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be My son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men; but My mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it away from Saul, whom I put away before thee. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever" (2 Samuel vii. 11—16). This is surely distinct enough. Hearken to the confirmation: "I have made a covenant with My chosen. I have sworn unto David My servant, thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations" (Psa. lxxxix. 3, 4). And again, "Once have I sworn by My holiness that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven" (35—37). And I would ask, Are not these promises part of the "sure mercies of David," and do they not refer to David's earthly throne? Then, I ask, where is David's throne to-day? Has it passed away? or has it become spiritualized? No; there is not a single passage in the Word of the Lord indicating anything of the sort. There is this set forth in the Divine Word, that when the house of David was pulled down by the rod of Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans, the prophet Jeremiah was appointed by the God of Israel to rebuild it again; for we must recollect that there has not been one of David's race on the throne of David, in the city of Jerusalem, from the year 588 B.C. even unto this day. Shall I, therefore, say that the Word of the Lord has come to nought? and that the "sure mercies of David" have failed? or that they failed for 588 years? Again, I say, No; for the Word of the Lord endureth for ever. The Son of David, in His incarnation, came to redeem Israel from the curse of the law, not to sit on the throne of His father David. But He will come again as Messiah, the anointed King, for that is the true Hebrew meaning of the word Messiah, and He shall reign for ever and ever.

And we may be absolutely sure that Herod, the Idumean, who was only a Roman Satrap, and who was not of David's family, or even of David's race, did not, and could not, occupy the throne of David. So we are logically forced to this conclusion, that David's sceptre is over the House of Israel to-day (see "Queen's Descent from King David, the Psalmist"), and has been for the last 2,474 years. And where is the House of Israel? Where! what does the sure word of prophecy teach? Listen! "Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God, Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come" (Ezekiel xi. 16). Need I ask, is there safety in this little sanctuary of the Lord God of Israel? Is it not dwelling under the shadow of the Almighty? And is there not a people who are abiding in sanctuary to-day? over whose national life there is a manifestation of lovingkindness and tender care, which equals, if not excels, that over Israel in the land of promise, and that people are the British, who are God's elect, called by another name according to His promise. This lovingkindness, which is better than life, no one who has given the subject any attention attempts to deny, although I have never found any of them able to render a reason why. I think the reason is not far to seek, for a careful study of the Scriptures shew that the blessings that were promised to lost Israel were all unconditional, the promise of sanctuary amongst the rest. And this is not a matter of His people's worthiness or unworthiness, but because He is faithful that has promised. Has the sworn covenant with David failed? Listen to the words in which its abiding is set forth: "Moreover the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, saying, Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying, the two families which the Lord hath chosen (Israel and Judah), He hath even cast them off? Thus they have despised My people, that they should be no more a nation before them. Thus saith the Lord: If My covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David My servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them" (Jer. xxxiii. 23—26). Now, I ask, have we lost the covenant of day and night? Have the ordinances of heaven and earth passed away? Are they not at present amongst our common mercies, so common that we hardly think about them? Yet they are God's pledge of His faithfulness, and so long as they endure, one of David's seed is reigning over the chosen people Israel. How truly does that book describe us as the blind people that have eyes, blind enough to believe that we have come into Israel's inheritance, and yet are not Israel, that we are children of God, and yet not His chosen people Israel. This horrible system of spiritualising lies at the root of most of the mischief. This very wonderful spiritual Israel, about which the (so-called) theologians talk so glibly, has no place in the Word of the Lord. And the kingdom is not a spiritual kingdom, but it is the veritable kingdom from heaven, which the Jehovah Elohim once and for all established under the man after His own heart, even David, which is in the earth to-day, and is destined in the fulness of time to be ruled over by the Root and the Offspring of David, the Bright and the Morning Star, whose dominion shall be an everlasting dominion.

We should always remember, that this kingdom was established under the Covenant of Adoption, and is continued under the Covenant of Redemption; it is also the kingdom appointed, or fore-ordained, before the beginning of the world; and the Gospel is the good news of this kingdom, and this kingdom is our own kingdom, and it is because there is so little earnest study of the Word of the Lord that we do not realise the position to which the God of the whole earth has appointed our nation in the carrying out of His behests towards the children of men. Moses had a much truer grip than our modern divines. They seem as foolish as the children of adoption were to whom he spoke, saying, "Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people and unwise? is not He thy Father that hath bought thee? hath He not made thee, and established thee? Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations: ask thy father, and he will shew thee: thy elders, and they will tell thee. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is His people, Jacob is the lot of His inheritance" (Deut. xxxii. 6—9). The Hebrew says, "Jacob is the measuring line of His inheritance." Is not this a foreshadowing of the rule of the Lord's inheritance over the whole earth, as it is so often set forth in the Word of Truth, which will not fail? Here I would simply ask, Is there any nation on the face of the earth fulfilling the duties which were laid upon this adopted race by Him who made all things unto Himself in infinite wisdom, and who sustains all things by His infinite power, and who has declared "that the word that goeth out of His mouth shall not return unto Him void, but shall accomplish what He pleases, and shall prosper in the thing whereunto He hath sent it?" The answer is, None, except our own nation. We are trying, not very perfectly, to perform some of them, in the recognition of God in our National Assemblies, and also in our National Church, and especially in the obligation of keeping the Sabbath, as set forth in the statute book of our nation, for that immutable word of Jehovah declares that the Sabbath should be a sign between Himself and Israel for ever, throughout their generations; so Israel's Sabbath sign can never pass away, and this alone is sufficient to prove that we are "the Israel of God."

In conclusion, I must once more protest against the perversion of the Scriptures involved in the spiritualising so current in the so-called theological teaching, and declare that it is a darkening of God's council by words without wisdom, and advising all who are in earnest pursuit of the truth to be unwearied in searching the Scriptures.

A GOOD WORD FOR ISRAEL.

THE late troubles that have passed over our nation found a host of writers and speakers on the Continent ready to point the finger of scorn and hatred at us, with hardly one to speak of our nation with respect. But things are changing fast. The German Emperor's mistake is being rapidly dropt by those who applauded him at first. The Ashantee war has been settled without a shot being fired, or a life lost in battle. The sudden outburst of wrath against us in the United States seems to have subsided in a measure, and the desire to go to war with us seems to survive in a powerful section of the people who, we hope, are not the majority.

The terrible mistake of Dr. Jameson and his valiant band will be atoned for, when the court which is to try him has heard his defence, and given its verdict. There is hope of a peaceful ending to the Transvaal uproar, and Mr. Chamberlain must find some way by which proud and successful Boers, now with the upper hand, can give three times their number of mining Britons, Americans, Germans, and French, some share in the Government of their Republic. Last of all, there has been the calm and unruffled attitude of our people, patching up their quarrels with the French in Siam and West Africa, and setting vigorously to work to strengthen the navy. This has been done in a wonderfully short space of time, and continental writers have, as a consequence, in many directions completely altered their tone, and speak respectfully of us, where lately they despised and sneered.

The following in regard to Professor Vambéry's opinion of our late trials, is a good specimen of the Hungarian philosopher's opinion respecting our power in South Africa compared with that of the German Emperor's. The London Standard of January 18th, reported the matter thus, quoting its Vienna correspondent:—

"An honest effort to educate his countrymen on the question of England's power and position has been made by Professor Arminius Vambéry, of Buda-Pesth University, in an interview which the Editor of the Revue de l'Orient had with him on Tuesday, a report of which has since been reproduced by numerous Hungarian papers. Professor Vambéry states that the late Dr. Nachtigal, a German African traveller, said to him many years ago:—

"'Angra Pequena, the bay on the south-western coast of Africa, which Germany annexed in 1884, is destined to be the nucleus of a great German Colonial Empire.'

"The Professor, who mentioned further facts proving how long it is since the Germans began to cast longing eyes upon the Transvaal, continued:—

"'Never will Germany oust England from South Africa. The German Fleet, compared with the English, is good enough for the pleasure trips of the Kaiser, but it is ridiculous to think that the Germans are in a position, or ever will be, to shake England's Colonial power, or to replace in the world the gigantic Empire founded by a nation educated to free principles, a people relying upon their own energy, individual independence, and public spirit which has no equal. The Germans as a Colonial Power are babies in leading strings. The English are grown-up men, bronzed by exposure to all weathers, and for three centuries masters of all the seas.'

"The interviewer confesses that he looked a little perplexed when he heard from an authority so respected in Hungary as Professor Vambéry what the position of England in the world really is."

"People who have been watching the progress of the storm that broke so suddenly over England are now marvelling at the ease with which she is now settling one difference after another, in spite of the whole world having but yesterday apparently been against her. The unmistakable moral and material defeat of Germany in South Africa, the end of the Ashantee war, the understanding with France about Mekong, the change of feeling in the United States on the Venezuela question; then, too, the unparalleled rapidity with which a fleet of the highest efficiency, and larger than the entire navy of Austria-Hungary (apart from obsolete vessels), has been commissioned and put under steam, and, above all, the unanimous outburst of patriotism which has been evoked throughout England and her world-wide Colonies by foreign menaces, constitute collectively and severally an object-lesson which has come as a complete surprise on political writers and on the mass of newspaper readers on the Continent, more especially in this country."

No doubt the storm which has raged round our Empire for the last few weeks has been sent us by our Father in heaven, to teach us and our jealous neighbours too, some salutary lessons. To ourselves to trust less in ourselves, our fighting ships, and our natural strength and wealth, but more in the God of Israel, who stands behind and around us, to guard and guide us, during our prescribed passage through this world, to the destiny that awaits us; also to our carping, frowning, angry neighbours, to prove to them that we have a strength they all grievously lack—namely, the strength of Omnipotence, which is pledged to fight for us, and give us the victory over all our foes (Psa. xlvi; Isa. xlii. 16). "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Defended and directed by Him, who can withstand "the nation and the company of nations," which last, on two occasions recently, have stood up to show the world-powers that the United Kingdom does not exist alone, as they imagine, but that as the Agents-General of the British Colonies have told us ten British daughter nations, strong and willing, are on our side ready and anxious to support and help us, if occasion should arise.

New South Wales, New Zealand, Western Australia, Tasmania, Natal, Victoria, South Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, Canada, and Queensland, were united lately to express Greater Britain's grief to our Sovereign and her widowed daughter, on the occasion of the death of H.R.H. Prince Henry of Battenberg; and, prior to that, the six daughters in Australia sent loyal words of support and help to Lord Salisbury, when the German Emperor's telegram to President Kruger sent a hot thrill of anger through the Anglo-Saxon race, that he should dare to interfere in our own South African affairs, as if he were the lord paramount of that continent! These things bring consolation to our bewildered nation at this time; but amidst our perplexities we can give praise to our God, because He is our Helper and our Defender, and He has supplied us with the aid of our own loyal children in the four quarters of the earth!

THE INFLUENCE OF THE COUNTY OF ESSEX ON THE SETTLEMENT AND FAMILY HISTORY OF NEW ENGLAND.

By Colonel Joseph Lemuel Chester (deceased).

Late Corresponding Member of the New England Historic Genealogical Society and Honorary Member of the Essex Archæological Society.

It is a mistaken notion, although the one usually received, that the early New England settlers were all, or even generally, men properly classed under the denomination of Puritans; and the stereotyped declaration in all secular and religious American histories, that the continent was first settled exclusively by a band of men fleeing from severe and unrighteous persecution, and enforced to seek a new home where they might enjoy unmolested their freedom of conscience, etc., is one that involves both an absurdity and a falsehood, and ought at once to be expunged from the record. That many, perhaps most of the early emigrants were Nonconformists, to a greater or less extent, is doubtless true, and that some of them desired "a larger liberty of speech" than was just then permitted them in England may also be admitted; but beyond this, there is no foundation in actual truth for the frightful picture so persistently presented to the mind of the young American student, whether he stands in his pinafore at the knee of his village schoolmistress, or pores over the ponderous volumes of American history at the University. At the risk of being charged with heterodoxy and a want of patriotism, I venture the assertion, after protracted researches into the family history of the earlier settlers, that not one-half of their number left England on account of religious persecution, or were men and women who could justly be termed Puritanic in their notions. Indeed, from the voluminous criminal records of the colony in its earlier days, detailed with painful minuteness by the official historiographers of the time, and the long catalogue of peccadilloes and more serious offences, which they reveal as of constant occurrence, it may be safely doubted whether a goodly number of the so-called "Pilgrim Fathers" (and Pilgrim Mothers too) possessed any religion at all.

The simply fact is, that the colony was composed—as all colonies ever since have been—of a heterogeneous admixture of very good people, and very bad: with still another, and perhaps larger class than either of the others, that may be described as neither the one nor the other, but simply indifferent. That the good eventually predominated over the bad is, I think, a matter of history; and it is greatly to the credit of the early rulers of the colonies that they were able from such rude and antagonistic materials, to lay the foundation of a nation that has proved so respectable as it has.

Speaking particularly of the early emigrants from Essex, it is unquestionably true that a large portion of them were actuated by a desire for more religious latitude than they then enjoyed at home; but there was still another and I think equally large class for whose motives I entertain a respect quite as sincere, and for whose character a reverence quite as profound. These were men in the humbler walks of life, whose circumstances were moderate, whose families were large, and who foresaw, in remaining at home, only a perpetual struggle for bare existence, without the prospect or hope of elevating their offspring above the level of their own ineffective lives. To such men as these the New World opened a vista of positive enchantment. The farmer tilling laboriously land not his own, and certain only of the conventional six feet of soil where his worn-out bones would at last be laid, believed that there, after a little season of toil and hardship, and perhaps even of extreme suffering, he would be able to stand under the shelter of his own vine and fig-tree, call broad acres of wood and meadow his own, and having distributed his possessions, and seen his sons and daughters comfortably settled in life, lay down calmly satisfied that he had fulfilled his duties as a parent and a citizen. In the same manner, and from the same motives, were the Western States subsequently settled by the descendants of the early colonists, imbued with the spirit and following in the footsteps of their Essex fathers.

Of such men as these the New England colonies possessed many: and from among this class, in nine cases out of ten, sprang the future great men of the nation. It is an indisputable fact, that very few of those who have become eminent as statesmen or scholars, or who have won for themselves reputations in any of the professions or pursuits of life, can trace their origin to any comparatively higher position in the social scale. I have an illustration exactly in point, which I use the more readily as it also illustrates my other propositions:—

Of the ancestry of two of the American Presidents—father and son in succession (and the son and grandson of whom now represents the country in whose history they bore so conspicuous a part at the Court of St. James), there is no record whatever. It has been only known with certainty that the first of the name emigrated to New England early in the days of the colony, taking with him a numerous progeny, and that he died and was buried there. Who was his father, or from what portion of England he came (though tradition fixed him in Devonshire), or what was his occupation, social condition, or personal circumstances, have hitherto been impenetrable mysteries, in spite of urgent and anxious efforts to solve them. The Herald's College, the various county histories, and all the genealogical repositories of the land contain no reference to his particular family, thus leading to the inevitable conclusion that his origin was very humble. From recent investigations that I have been making, I have at last arrived at the moral certainty that, before quitting England, he followed the occupation of a malster, in a small way, in a parish within ten miles of where we are now standing.

In numerous other instances I have pursued similar re-researches with similar results. Repeatedly, as in the case just mentioned, when long tradition has established the ancestors of a New England family in other counties of England, a careful investigation has dissipated the illusion, and they have been traced to some quiet nook or corner of Essex. It is not without good grounds therefore, that I have attributed to this county a greatly predominant influence in the foundation and history of New England, and hence of the American nation, for there is no portion of the vast country to which the people of that section have not penetrated, or which they have not, more or less, imbued with their character and spirit.

One word as to the people of New England themselves. The conventional portrait, which represents an ungainly personage, lean in his limbs and lank in his visage, with long straight hair, and an eye twinkling under the double influences of greed, of gain, and an intense desire to outwit his neighbour in every bargain, and who invariably utters his words with a nasal intonation, is not that of the genuine and historic New Englander—who does not bear this appearance, does not bear this character, and does not talk through his nose, but uses the ordinary vocal organs like an Englishman or any other sensible human being—but rather one of that spurious sort, the result of indiscriminate and protracted admixture with almost every other species of the human race, from the native Indian to the native Ethiopian, including the denizens of every clime, from the North Pole to the South, and from the first to the last degree of longitude. The natural history of modern America is chiefly that of hybrids. There is no country under the sun that has not contributed its quota to its magnificent census. The blood of Saxon and Teuton has long ceased to flow there in separate channels. English, Scotch and Irish, French, Dutch and Spanish, Italian, Greek and Turkish, Swiss, Austrian and Russian, in their elementary constituents, have been gathered into a common crucible, and the extraordinary result of this still more unnatural combination has been the "Universal Yankee"—a sort of ethnological monster—a being who seems to find no status in the rigid classification of animal existences.

From this class, I confess—and I also freely admit that it is a large one—there is naturally to be expected little regard for, or attachment to, the Mother Country, its people or its institutions. Suppose, for a moment, the presence of a representative of this class in our midst to-day. One of his grandfathers grew to manhood among the Scottish mountains, while the other was reared among the dykes of Holland. One of them married a ci-devant French countess, and the frau of the other once wore the coronet of a princess in sunny Italy. This accounts fully for his quadruple character. The vari-coloured streams will not mingle freely, but flow side by side in jealous antagonism, like the waters of the Arve and the Rhone. He retains, although in a modified form, the peculiarities of each of his four ancestors, and, as there is no singleness in his composition, so there is none in his character. He has no antecedents to control his sympathies, no historical associations to cherish, no antiquities to revere. He cannot look back into the past records of any one people, and say that they are also his by inheritance. His very being is divided—he belongs nowhere (I trust that my mythical countryman will excuse the personality: of course it is not his fault).

On the other hand—(and I pray that the apparent egotism may be pardoned, for the sake of the practical illustration)—I claim a pure descent. Bone, blood, flesh and muscle—all is English. Born, though I was, through the accidents of time, among the rugged hills of grim New England, the four sources of my natal streams were in honest Essex, smiling Kent, busy Gloucester, and sunny Devonshire. For aught I know, one set of my earlier sires flourished in the court of King Lear himself, and the other displayed their prowess in field and tournament side by side with the gallant Courteneys. One thing I do know: I cannot open a page of English history, where deeds of valour and acts of grace for centuries back are recorded, without finding among the names of the actors those of some of my great ancestors. I cannot go into a village churchyard, or tread the dim aisles of a venerable cathedral—at least within the limits of these four shires—without reading on either side, the solemn testimony that I am wandering among the dust of those long-departed ones, of whom I am so unimportant a descendant. If my heart swells, it is with honest pride that even in these sad memorials I have a personal interest. These are monuments, not of strangers, but of my own family. What though my paternal roof-tree stands three thousand miles away? The vast expanse of sea shrinks to a mere rivulet, over which I leap with a single stride, claiming a lawful right and receiving a cordial welcome to a place in the lofty halls and at the spacious firesides where those of my own blood have made merry for at least half a decade of centuries.

This, then, is the difference between my supposititous countryman and me to-day: he is paying a formal visit to a distant relation; while I have come home to my mother! I speak not for myself alone. There are, I am happy to say, thousands of my countrymen—of full, half, and even quarter English blood—who would echo every sentiment I have uttered; and who, although they may never make, as I have done, a holy pilgrimage to these hallowed shrines, cherish an intense and reverential affection for the ancient land and its people, which has and will for ever set at defiance all the arts and wiles of designing statesmen and crooked politicians who may seek to weaken or destroy it. There is a world of meaning in the old maxim, that "blood is thicker than water," and therein, we may safely conclude, lies the whole secret.—Copied from Vol. III., part 1, of "the Transactions of the Essex Archæological Society, 1863."

NOTES BY S. A. M.

"He who will not open his eyes is, at present, to all intents, and purposes, as blind as he who cannot."—Dr. South.

THE aphorism of the great preacher of the time of Charles the Second, comes to us in full force in these enlightened days, enlightened especially in this century by the discovery, the revelation, or lifting of the veil cast for more than 2,000 years over the wanderings of the Lost Tribes of Israel; lost to history by the will of God, but leaving traces all through the time of their dispersion till in this enlightened age they are found with all the marks and signs by which God ordained they should be known as the end of their separation drew near, though the wilfully blind refuse to acknowledge in these matters what they cannot see, and feel, and touch; and even but few Christians comparatively understand "the signs of the times" now passing over us, though indicative, as they are, of "the times of the end."

Sir John Lubbock, in his recent work, "The Pleasures of Life," draws largely on various authors in illustration and confirmation of many a point which he brings before his readers; from Ruskin especially, exemplifying the faculty of seeing or not seeing, defining art as the type of strong and noble life; for as the ignoble or uninformed person, in his dealings with all that occurs in the world about him, first sees nothing clearly, looks nothing fairly in the face and allows himself to be swept away by the trampling torrent of unescapable force of things that he would not see, and therefore could not understand, so the noble person, looking the facts of the world full in the face, and fathoming them with deep insight, deals with them in unalarmed intelligence and unhurried strength, and becomes with his human intellect and discerning will, no unconscious or insignificant agent in consummating their good and restraining their evil.

Now, as the Hebrews well called their poets "Seers," we may apply the term to the authorities so ably brought forward by Sir John Lubbock himself, thus helping us to perceive more than others that which would be otherwise obscure to us. As a true Englishman, he says most of us are proud of belonging to the greatest Empire the world has ever seen; nor does he shrink from holding the onerous position of chairman to "the General Council of the British Empire League," the primary object of which, under the presidency of the Duke of Devonshire, is to maintain and strengthen the connection between the United Kingdom and the out-lying portions of the Empire, thus confirming in every zone the tie which binds all Israel together.

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

Annual Report, 1895.

The Distributors of the Anglo-Israel Distribution Fund have very much pleasure in presenting their Annual Report to the readers of the Banner of Israel, through which paper, by the kindness and courtesy of the editor and publishers, month by month they are enabled to communicate with the friends who with generous sympathy support the Fund, and by the same means news of progress is reported, and the needs of our fellow-workers shewn.

On our list of Sowers there are now 163 names, each of which has one, two, three, or four X's placed against it to indicate the proportion of literature to be supplied, according to the area over which each Sower works, and with regard to the good results attained so far as we may be able to judge. The results looked for are threefold: 1st, Each Sower manifesting a continual and serious appreciation of the revelation of Israel; 2nd, an increasing interest shewn in the field over which the Sower works; 3rd, an evidence of readiness on the part of the Sower and those whom he instructs to contribute to the Fund, so far as anyone may be able to do. This may be expected in thankfulness to God for the light He has given us upon the Scriptures, and for the purpose of helping the Fund, in sympathy for the numbers in Israel who are still in total darkness as to their origin.

A few words as to giving, we would address to our Sowers and others. There seems to be no sounder basis to go upon than that of apportioning a tenth of our income, be that small or great, for missionary and other good works in harmony with the commands impressed upon us in the Bible. Many will recognize that for some people more than one-tenth can, and should be given, others will feel that the same proportion might be an impossibility for them to spare. When the Word of God indicates a rule, the fault is ours if we doubt the necessity for its application. See Mal. iii. 10: "Who would not rejoice to receive the promised blessing." This is but one reference from Scripture. Now for an example in present every-day life of what can be done.

There are few who will not have an idea of the small salary received by Scripture Readers, in making a total of the same we are not likely to see three figures. One of our first Sowers, working with us for many years until he was called home, was an Army Scripture Reader, devoted to the Society that employed him, full of faith in the Lord and love of the Word of God. He tithed his tiny income and yet found it sufficient for family needs. He did it in full assurance that he was doing his duty to his Creator, and he remarked upon the real satisfaction he experienced in knowing positively what he ought to set apart, and upon the joy of having it to bestow. When one and another special appeal came before him he would give out until the little store was expended, and then feel he must wait until the time for replenishing came. Our dear old fellow-worker took the "Anglo-Israel Free Distribution Fund" into his heart with other works he cared for, and regularly subscribed 2s. 6d., and from time to time gave donations. If all Christians would give freely in his spirit, by the same rule of the Almighty, what grand results would quickly shew up from the heathen world as well as from our own lands, and return in blessing to those who had willingly made their offering to the Lord!

When the tenth is first estimated, people are mostly utterly surprised at the amount they have to give away, and recognise how little they have previously given, and therefore how at their hands the service of God has suffered loss.

This subject just considered being of moment to the whole world, it is evident how careful all conscious Israelites should be that they come not short in offering their tenths for the furtherance of all good works, as Israel is "to fill the face of the earth with fruit." When and wherever the tenth is divided we will hope that our Fund may ever be remembered in the distribution of the bounty, for how great is the work we have in hand! Still have British-Israelites to be instant in sowing "the seed of the whole truth of the Gospel—of the kingdom, of salvation—to give out that knowledge which will stem the stream of infidelity, because "this gospel of the kingdom" gives proof that the Bible is true. "Even as the Bible Societies are needed to feed all missions with the word of life, so it is necessary for British-Israelites to follow with the news and detailed proof of the revelation of Israel. Accumulated errors, that have caused a veil to be drawn over much of the Scriptures, have to be cleared away before full and true effect can be attained by the teachings from every church, chapel, Sunday-school and Mission, and without leaving such a reserve of difficulties as is now apparent. Therefore is there required, as much as in past years such a Fund as ours, with Sowers to supply, where needed, the seed of British-Israel Truth for those who cannot obtain it, or who are ignorant of its value, or even of its being in the book market. As the past seems plainly to prove, human efforts and printed words have been adopted by the Almighty as the means, by His blessing, through which Israel is to become known to herself, and revealed to other peoples in these latter days. May our God, fulfil every desire of goodness and every work of faith, with power!

The Distributors of the Fund desire to offer their best thanks to all who have supported it with their gifts of money and of literature, and we wish to thank warmly our many Sowers for all they have accomplished and attempted in conjunction with us. We desire also to record our special thanks to Miss Olive B. Mount, who has again carried on the arduous work of packing and despatching much of the literature, and also of regularly sending out the weekly issue of the Banner of Israel.

The account of Literature distribution is as follows:—

Parcels of Literature sent out	1,487
Book Packets of the Banner of Israel ...	4,607

Literature purchased:—

The Banner of Israel	12,123
The Covenant People	2,400
Leaflets	28,650
Pamphlets and Tracts	903
Almanacks	338
Books...	156

Many gifts of Literature received have not been included in the above, but they have helped to swell the account for postage, as given below. Economy under this head is carefully practised, and letter postage is not charged to the Fund, so that as much literature as possible may be bought, and no necessary correspondence be checked.

A list of the places sent to during the year, is not now given, as they appear month by month in the BANNER OF ISRAEL, but if it should be considered advisable to issue a reprint of this Report, a full list would then be added, but the Distributors of the Fund hesitate about setting aside money for a reprint unless it is called for, and justified by donations for the purpose.

MANASSEH LOVES EPHRAIM.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel," London, England.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER,—We who are studying into the Anglo-Israel Identity greatly regret the occurrence of aught that stirs the spirit of antagonism or even jealousy between the people of Great Britain and the United States, who seem quite undeniably to represent Ephraim and Manasseh, in the "after-seed" of Jacob. We also much regret that the apparent conditions here cannot be better distinguished from the real, by the people of Britain, many of whom cannot be expected to grasp the situation here, where the masses of the people have the ballot and the preverted liberty of speech, etc. Enclosed I hand you a few lines giving some points not generally understood by those not in our midst, which may, perhaps, if you care to grant them space, assist your readers to better comprehend how such an "explosion" was possible.

With best wishes for the continued growth and influence of the BANNER, and trusting that its voice shall be duly heeded,

I am, your brother in Isaac,
F. E. HARRINGTON, Sec.

Denver Colorado, January 27th, 1896.

MANASSEH AND EPHRAIM.

Your readers in the United States regret exceedingly that their brethren, "your readers," in Great Britain, should experience such a "mortifying surprise" as indicated in the article with the almost sarcastic caption, "How Manasseh Loves Us," in the BANNER of January 8th. From the Editor's point of view, nothing severe was meant by saying, "It is a remarkable fact that jealousy and hatred towards the British should still be so deeply rooted in the American mind." . . . Let me assure our British-Israel brethren, however, that the real status of the deep regard of Americans for Britishers can not be correctly estimated from any standpoint other than that of the American himself—i.e., the native-born Anglo-Saxon, not including the "naturalized" citizen. If your space permits, some points as to the existent conditions which contributed to the possibility—that sprung unheralded into a glaring reality—of giving such "affront" and "insult" to Great Britain, may perhaps bring many readers to a clearer apprehension of the real situation as we understand it.

First, then, the threatening message of the President "came out of a clear sky; it was not the echo of any wide-spread public demand or fully-grown sentiment of patriotism or obvious necessity. The people were not parties to it before the fact, nor are they such parties even after the fact, save in quarters where it is taken for granted by them that the administration had already fully canvassed the whole matter before acting, and could prove its case." *

Second.—As to the governors who endorsed "the President's policy of fire and sword," they, the Congressmen, and the host of other officials who did likewise, were acting the part of politicians rather than statesmen, being controlled by selfish ambitions rather than patriotism; not that we believe they actually considered it probable that war would eventuate.

Third.—The apparent strength and volume of public sentiment, as proclaimed by the irresponsible and largely subsidized press of the land, did not express the sentiment of true Americans, nor even of a majority of our people. It is only too true that, while the conservative, righteous portion of the people keep steadily on their way, being and doing all that true patriotism requires, the vicious and incendiary elements raise a tumult and make themselves heard "from Dan to Beersheba." When the World and several other papers opposed such an unwarranted policy, when men like Hon. Chauncy M. Depew, Senator Wolcott, &c., speak out with no uncertain sound, denouncing the message and proclaiming the true status of the matter, they are howled down by the press in general. Here, in Colorado, their speeches are given by the newspapers in limited or garbled reports. We must look to eastern publications for full and fair reports.

Fourth.—The people generally form opinions more quickly and less conservatively than do the statesmen. In this case they acted upon supposition that the previous effort upon the part of the administration had exhausted its means for securing amicable adjustment of matters, and concluded, too hastily, that the apparent ultimatum dictated by the message must be the final resort. But, sober second thoughts, reinforced by fuller information, soon reversed the opinion.

* From News-Leaflet No. 50, by Prof. C. A. L. Totten, in which he gives the history of the rise and growth of the Monroe Doctrine, and presents more than twenty reasons for denouncing the recent message by the President as "absolutely unwarranted." It is well worth perusal by your people as well as by our own. (Price, 25 cents.)

Fifth.—And this, alas, is too true! The large number of unemployed and almost starved men, some merchants and commercial concerns on the verge of bankruptcy; the pot-house politicians, reinforced by the "tramps" and criminal classes, these consider that a war—with whomsoever—would prove to them "a blessing in disguise," and these are the "war" criers to a large extent! Thus the recent "explosion" was not so much an expression of "jealousy and hatred towards the British," as the senseless clamour of these classes of the populace.

Sixth.—And possibly the keynote to the origin of the message. Persons in a position to know whereof they speak, tell us in unmistakable terms, that the Executive and Cabinet are largely under the influence of the Church of Rome. And in this spasm of patriotism, we seem to see the "fine Italian hand" of the Jesuit endeavouring to set these two, these only two, champions of Protestantism at each other's throats. And as though this was not enough, they must inject an added discord, in the person of the erratic ego, who fancies he guides the destinies of the great German race.

We consider that the numerous ties, the many mutual interests of "the Anglo-Saxon brethren of Great Britain and America," will prove abundant reason for true Americans to decline to make war upon Great Britain, although they might be plunged into it by the sudden and unwarranted action of ambitious rulers and politicians. The gist of the Monroe Doctrine, which bears no relation to the matters concerned in the present discussion, is briefly this: "You mind your business, and we will mind ours." We deem this a safe, peaceable doctrine. The United States ought to abide by it. If ever the Almighty permits brothers John and Jonathan to close in mortal combat, it will be for the purpose of humiliating their mutual arrogance and egotism, and rendering them willing tools in His hand, to go forth no longer in their own pride, but confiding in the strength of the Mighty God of Jacob.

Some in our city who weekly assemble together to study prophecy, revelation, history, etc., etc., with reference to Anglo-Israel Identity, and to learn more fully the lessons of this long-neglected portion of the Word, treating of the descendants of Israel, and the coming reunion as "one nation," have heretofore felt that, as so very few of even our most earnest Christians and Bible-students have grasped or even entertained anything along this line, we had better keep to ourselves, and spread it only in quiet, conservative ways. But this recent "explosion," with the accompanying manifestation that most of our Christian people are liable, yes almost certain, to make grievous errors in forming opinions regarding the necessity for amicable relations between Ephraim and Manasseh is such, that it has brought forcibly, to the writer at least, the conviction that it is plainly our duty to henceforth proclaim and publish this truth through the most public and influential channels accessible. We will bring it before our Camp "Tea Tephi" (an Anglo-Saxon Identity Association) for consideration and action.

Your brother in Isaac and "in Christ,"

FRANK E. HARRINGTON.

Denver, January 27th, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I most sincerely thank you for permitting me from time to time to acknowledge the kind and generous gifts of the readers of the BANNER, and in doing so, may I this time again encroach on your kindness to allow me a little space for a few extracts of the letters accompanying their kind gifts towards helping me to give the Scriptures to our brethren of the House of Judah.

The first I should like to give is from Jean Charles, the authoress of the Identity anthem, "The Lord shall comfort Zion," the sale of which has now realised £1 6s. 6d. She says:—"I think it a wonderful coincidence that Mrs. K. Ransom and myself, should have both (unknown to each other), been inspired with the hearfelt wish to help forward your most unselfish and devoted work for the Lord, by giving the proceeds of the Identity song, 'Ephraim,' and the Identity anthem, 'The Lord shall comfort Zion,' to your fund for the translation of our beloved Bible—the true Bread of Life—into the Yiddish language, so that all poor Jews may be able to read and understand the holy Scriptures. May not the two Identity songs be prophetic in these latter days? Ephraim cries, 'Oh, that the Lord's salvation were come out of Zion!' and it is the British Christians' Mission to carry salvation to all nations, and without the knowledge of God's Holy Bible, and the redeeming blood of Christ, this cannot be accomplishd, and it is a distinct command to British-Israel. Surely, we should bestir ourselves, and hasten God's kingdom, by giving the grand old Book, that has been our salvation, to the poor persecuted Jews, a remnant of God's chosen people, who are at present in gross darkness and great ignorance of their own Scriptures, and who are hungering for the true Bread of Life (see Amos viii. 11, 12), in the only language (Yiddish) those poor foreign Jews can understand.

"If every reader of the BANNER and Identity literature, and all Christ-like Christians who love and value their Bibles, and are daily receiving comfort, help, and spiritual strength through its blessed promises and teaching, would each purchase a copy (or more) of this Identity song and anthem, you would soon (D.V.) be able to accomplish your arduous but needful task for the Lord. Then would the text of the Identity anthem be fulfilled, 'For the Lord shall comfort Zion, He will comfort all her waste places, and He will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody.' . . .

"May the God of Israel put it into the hearts of His redeemed ones to help forward this blessed work."

This dear friend has kindly placed at my disposal 100 copies of this beautiful anthem, and I shall be pleased to send a copy to any friend for 2s.

A domestic servant writes:—"Having read of your work in the BANNER, I send you the enclosed 3s. out of my Christmas-box towards your blessed work of giving the Bible to our Jewish brethren in Yiddish. I wish I could send more, but I am only a servant. Praying earnestly that the time may soon come for all to have the Bible."

This is not the only domestic servant who has been kind enough to help me to give the Bread of Life to the many hungry ones in Judah.

A British sailor writes:—"I am a regular reader of the BANNER, and am glad to see from it your noble work. Please accept the enclosed 5s., a poor sailor's mite; I wish it was £5. It is accompanied with the earnest prayer that the God of our fathers may bless your noble work for our brethren of Judah, and that He may be graciously pleased to raise up many friends who are able and willing to help you in it."

Another friend who has previously helped me, writes:—"Seeing from the BANNER that you are still in great want of help for your great work, my sister and I send you £1, and regret that it is not more. We trust, indeed feel sure, that all that is necessary for the completion of it will be supplied in due time."

I will give just one more extract from one who signs himself, "A British-Israelite." He says:—"I have been very pleased to see that the Identity friends in Bath have contributed £25 towards your noble work, especially for the Book of Hosea. As there are, no doubt, some Anglo-Israelites who like myself know something of Hebrew, may I suggest to give a few verses of the first chapter of that book in the BANNER. I feel sure that if this be done, it will help to create an interest among British-Israelites in your noble work for your people the Jews."

This friend has sent me £1 to be used at my own discretion either for the poor Jews or for the translation. If you think it advisable to follow the above suggestion, I shall be pleased to lend a stereotype page containing the first chapter of Hosea.

Thanking you most heartily for your great kindness in thus helping me in the work for the good of our brethren of the House of Judah, and the Master's glory,

I am, dear Philo-Israel,

Yours faithfully in Jesus, and Hope of Israel,

MARCUS S. BERGMANN.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—A short time ago I was looking through some of the earlier volumes of the "Transactions of the Essex Archæological Society," when quite unexpectedly I came upon a most instructive and interesting paper by the late Colonel Chester, entitled, "The Influence of the County of Essex on the Settlement and Family History of New England." The facts given, the arguments advanced, and the conclusions arrived at by the worthy colonel, so rivetted my attention and aroused my interest that I could not refrain from transcribing the whole of his valuable essay; and, having obtained the kind permission of the secretary of the society for whose benefit it was first given to quote largely from it, I am now sending it to you, in the hope that some of it may find a place in the BANNER, as, in my humble opinion, it goes a long way in solving a problem concerning "our kinsmen across the sea" which for a considerable number of years has occupied my thought and attention.

Though I, for one, never doubted the literal fulfilment of the patriarch Jacob's remarkable predictions concerning Ephraim and Manasseh, yet it was always a puzzle to me how our "transatlantic cousins" could be descended from the single tribe of Manasseh as distinguished from the others. One had always been led to believe that New England was first peopled by emigrants, not from one special locality, but from all parts of this home-land. If, however, Colonel Chester's statements may be relied upon, they show very clearly that the generally accepted idea is an erroneous one, and that the district which had the honour of sending forth the founders of the American Republic was a very limited one indeed, consisting probably of portions of the four counties of Essex, Middlesex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. It only remains, therefore, to identify the tribe of Manasseh with the settlers in this part of our country, in order to show how literally and minutely Jacob's prophecies have been fulfilled, and Jehovah's designs carried to a successful issue. I have no doubt in my own mind that the Saxons, who were by far the largest and strongest of the emigrant bodies who settled in the "appointed place," consisted of both Ephraimites and Manassehites, the former of whom, remaining in this country, became, as it were, the nucleus and backbone of the British polity, while the latter in due time crossed the ocean, and became the founders and framers of the vast confederacy known as the United States.

Wishing you a very happy and successful year in your editorial labours, and trusting that our cause may continue to grow and prosper.

I am, &c., THOMAS PITT COUZENS.

JANUARY, 1896.

THE Nations watched Britannia, with furtive eyes of hate,
As calm she sat, and silent, above her narrow strait;
They deemed her sunk in slumber, absorbed in greed of gold,
And that the Lion beside her was grown effete and old.

They marked the gathering war clouds with ill-disguised content,
"She stands alone and friendless, and will not dare resent!"
And so the nations muttered till one rose in his place,
To hurl with reckless challenge an insult in her face.

. . . . . .

Who said Britannia slumbered? Who thought her pride gone by?
Lo! English hearts by millions have thrown them back the lie!
A sound thrilled through the Island,—a growl the stillness brake,
The nations wondered awestruck—the Lion was awake!

From seaboard unto seaboard, from Portsmouth to the Nore,
From Plymouth Sound to Spithead, all round the southern shore,
In squadron after squadron, full-armed from keel to peak,
The great war vessels muster along the silver streak.

And o'er the dim horizon, from lands beyond the sea,
Her vast Colonial Empire, where British hearts beat free,
From North, South, East, and Westward, by ties of blood held dear,
Her children's loyal voices give their Great Mother cheer.

Britannia rouses slowly, her patience suffers long,
But wrath once kindled blazes before the sense of wrong;
The spirit of their fathers, her sons inherit yet,
And the Lion once awakened, he doth not soon forget!

And thus before the nations, Britannia stands and waits,
Her Royal beast beside her, to guard the narrow straits;
"God and St. George for England!" the watchword of her might,
Heaven grant us peace with honour, and God defend the right!

The Fort, Bristol, Jan. 13.—From the Bristol Times and Mirror, Jan. 18, 1896.

IN his "Armies of Asia and Europe," the late Gen. Upton, contrasting China and India, employs words which aptly fit the present occasion of comparison between Russian methods of conquest and those of England in India and elsewhere:—"In the language of one the word 'liberty' is unknown, in the other the rights of the people are protected by a firm and impartial despotism. In the one rulers may seize the property and sever the necks of their subjects, almost with impunity: in the other sacredness of person is secure. In Russia, men without trial languish in prison, cruel and unusual punishments, injustice, bribery and corruption prevail. In India, English law secures speedy trial, and protects life and property. In India, schools, churches, railroads, steamboats, telegraphs and just laws are giving new life and energy to the people." So, too, in Russia some of these improvements obtain, but their end is military only, and looks alone to Russian aggrandisement. "With such weighty contrasts, no stranger free from national prejudice can visit India without rejoicing that England controls the destinies of two hundred millions of people."

"THE GREAT LONE, ISOLATED MOTHER."

WE have noticed in these columns the hearty expressions of affection, loyalty, and support which the Australian and Tasmanian Governments sent to the Prime Minister here in reference to the affront passed on our nation by the German Emperor. We have now to notice the hearty expression of the same sentiments by the members of the Government and by those of the Opposition in the Canadian House of Commons on February 5th, when Mr. McNeill's motion of "sympathy with, and loyalty to, the Mother Country," was debated, and an unaminous vote taken affirming it, "amid prolonged cheering." The speech of Mr. Davies, the leader of the Liberals of the Maritime Provinces, spoke of the Canadians' "old Mother in the West," as "the Great lone, isolated Mother," which happily describes the "Mother of nations," as the "great" nation; "the lone and isolated Mother," in accordance with the Scriptural character of Israel in these last times, when Israel was to become "a great and mighty nation" (Gen. xviii. 18), one which was "to dwell alone" (Numb. xxiii. 9); "isolated" from other nations (Isa. xxvi. 20, 21), yet "the Mother of nations." The report of the debate appeared in the London Times on Feb. 7, and must be quoted in the BANNER. It was styled:—

CANADIAN LOYALTY.

Ottawa, Feb. 6.

The Press generally commends the calm, dignified, and statesmanlike tone of yesterday's debate in the House of Commons on Mr. M'Neill's motion. Thirteen members took part in the debate. All the speakers, Ministerialists and Opposition members alike, were in accord in their expressions of loyalty to the Empire, and there was not one unfriendly utterance respecting the United States.

Mr. M'Neill's patriotic speech furnished the keynote to those who followed him. He justified the presentation of his resolution, not because it was necessary to assure her Majesty and the people of the mother country of Canadian loyalty, but because the feeling seemed to prevail in the United States that Canada was only watching her opportunity to become part of the American Republic. War with the United States was a dreadful thing to contemplate, and he prayed that such might never occur, but if it did Canada would never shrink from her responsibilities, whatever might be the consequences.

Adverting to the recent war cloud, Mr. M'Neill said:—"How has England, our own England, borne herself in the midst of the menace and anger which compass her about? She has borne herself like the mighty mother of heroes that she is. The great heart beat fuller and prouder in the hour of danger, and the spectacle of England's composure and unflinching self-reliance in the presence of the undisguised and altogether unexpected hostility of so many of the great Powers of the world has sent a thrill of admiration and pride through the veins of every loyal subject of the Queen. (Cheers.) I venture to say that England's conduct of to-day will not be found wanting even when, in far-off summers that we shall not see, it is weighed in the balance against some of those splendid incidents that are set like precious jewels in the history of mankind.

"We wish the people of England and of Ireland and of Scotland to know that the people of Canada are no mere fair-weather friends. We want our kinsmen in Australia, some of whom we welcomed here so recently, to know that we are with them in this issue, heart and hand. We want the people of the world to know that, come what may, in whatever part of the Empire they may happen to reside, the British people are one people, animated by one spirit, and determined to stand as one man in defence of their common rights and in the maintenance of their common interests. We desire peace before all. We regard war with horror, but we are prepared to accept it with all its consequences, come from what quarter it may, if it be necessary to do so in order to maintain and defend the honour and integrity of our own Empire." (Prolonged cheers.)

Mr. Davies, leader of the Liberals of the Maritime Provinces, seconded the resolution, and in the course of his remarks said:—"The hearts of her children have gone out to the great lone, isolated mother, and we to-day do but our duty when we sternly pledge ourselves to substantial sacrifices in her behalf. (Cheers.) Responding to the call of her people, she supplemented her normal fleet with a magnificent flying squadron, which showed the world that if in numbers she was not a first-class Continental Power she was at least now, as of yore, mistress of the seas. (Cheers.) As part of Great Britain, Canada, more than any other part, is open to attack. With thousands of miles of continuous frontier, and divided only by an invisible line from the United States, with many exciting international questions calculated to cause bitterness and srtife, it becomes doubly our duty so to conduct ourselves that we shall lessen and not increase Great Britain's difficulties. Recent troubles have accentuated our determination to remain part and parcel of the Empire. The splendid dream of Imperial federation has never yet presented itself in such practical form to the colonies as to command their adherence, but its underlying sentiments evoke hearty sympathy from many who could not openly support a scheme. We may have no logical scheme ready, but in our own blundering way I doubt not that we shall yet achieve the desired result, and the national pledge which we are asked this day to record is one step in that direction." (Cheers.) Mr. Davies urged the cultivation of friendly relations with the United States, for in that way Canada could render material assistance to the mother country.

Sir Richard Cartwright's speech was noteworthy. He said that he was not accustomed to make a profession of loyalty, but he thought the resolution was appropriate. He did not think war with the United States was possible, but in slightly different circumstances there might have been real danger in President Cleveland's message. It seemed to him that the choice of Canada lay between two alternatives. Canada would either have to be a hostage for the good behaviour of England towards the United States, or she would have to be a bond of union. Which was the more honourable course and one more likely to promote the welfare of Canada he would leave the country to judge.

"But," continued Sir Richard Cartwright, "while we desire, as long as we are part of the Empire, to do our duty to the utmost, while we are prepared to shrink from no proper sacrifice for the purpose of assisting the Empire to the best of our means, yet as a Canadian I take leave to tell the country that there is not a question of obligation between Canada and the Empire, or, if there be a question of obligation, the obligation is by no means confined to our side. Among her hundreds of colonies, Britain has but one which was founded and created by men who did not leave the shores of England to benefit themselves, but who gave up all they had for the purpose of maintaining their loyalty to England, and the name of that colony is Canada. (Cheers.) Nevertheless, although it is largely by England's own fault, it must be confessed that, as regards the United States, Canada is a weak spot in the British armour. There can be no doubt that we are liable to sudden attack from the South, and there is no doubt that it would tax all our resources and the resources of the British Empire effectively to defend this country against such an attack."

Personally, Sir Richard Cartwright hoped and believed that means would be found to prevent any hostility between Great Britain and the United States. He commended Mr. Chauncey Depew's proposal for the creation of an independent tribunal to settle international differences between the Anglo-Saxon peoples. This must be the first step towards Imperial federation. With a union of 150,000,000 persons, such as would be constituted by Great Britain and the United States uniting even in so simple a manner as this, it would be an effective guarantee for peace and harmony and the future progress of the world. Statesmen and journalists who would help in promoting that object would be rendering the greatest service to Canada and the Empire. (Loud cheers.)

Two French-Canadian leaders, Sir Hector Langevin (Conservative) and Mr. Laurier, leader of the Opposition, heartily endorsed the resolution. The latter spoke with his usual eloquence. He eulogised the achievements of Great Britain, whether in war or in peace. In conclusion, he said :—"When England should have to repel her foes, I am quite sure that British subjects all over the world would be only too glad to give to her what help they could —British subjects all over the world, not only British subjects of her own blood, but British subjects who are not of her own blood, but who have received from her the inestimable blessing of freedom." (Cheers.)

Among the others who spoke were Mr. Cockburn, Mr. Sutherland, and Sir James Grant, prominent Scotch-Canadians ; Mr. Craig, an English-Canadian; and Mr. M'Shane, Mr. Davin, and Mr. Casey, Irish-Canadians.

Mr. Foster, leader of the House, expressed the concurrence of the Government with the resolution, and, as I have already stated, it was adopted unanimously amid prolonged cheering.—Our Correspondent.

Mr. Davies' remarkable words applied to the British of the United Kingdom, that she was "the great, lone, isolated Mother," brought to our recollection God's prescription to His nation at the time we have now entered on, in the dregs of "the latter days," "Come My people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast" (Isa. xxvi. 20, 21 R.V.). The people addressed were to efface themselves, and keep to themselves. They were, in fact, to "dwell alone," as predicted in Num. xxiii. 9, R.V., and "not to be reckoned among the" (Gentile) "nations." Yet it should be "a great and mighty" nation (Gen. xii. 2, xviii. 18, R.V.), and evidently separated from the rest by reason of God's presence with it and by His preservation of it, in concealment, apart from the others.

The Canadian statesmen fully realise the isolation of our country at this moment, and seem to glory in it. There is an affectionate ring in Mr. M'Neill's apostrophe to "England, our own England" in this her hour of trial when it has been "the world against her." Our troubles have exhibited our tremendous strength, for the God of Israel is on our side, and of whom shall we be afraid? Luther's Psalm (the 46th) is our Psalm at this time, and well suited to our case :—

"God is our refuge and strength
A very present help in trouble. . . .
The Lord of Hosts is with us :
The God of Jacob is our refuge."

He bids us "Be still and know that He is God," "Though the nations raged, the kingdoms were moved," God shall help Israel, as indeed He has done already in our case to-day, for He utters His voice and the earth is melted, because "the Lord of hosts is with us, and the God of Jacob is our Refuge."

Within the last few weeks, there were some among us who were ready, like poor Jacob under his sore trial, to cry aloud, "All these things are against me" (Gen. xlii. 36, R.V.). But out of them all the Lord is bringing our nation, having begun to do so immediately we asked Him "to undertake for us" (Isa. xxxviii. 14). The American people are inclined to take reasonable views of the facts, and are a little less warlike in tone. Dr. Jameson's dangerous adventure has not ended in a general war in South Africa. Matters are calming down. The German Emperor and his people, hating us as they do, meant to insult and lower us; but the lion has risen up in his anger, and the Germans (Emperor and people) must perforce in our case, at least, leave us to ourselves, and give up their foolish dream of taking South Africa from our grasp.

The Armenian troubles continue; but it is seen that we cannot single-handed abate the horrors we have heard so much of. We shall not try; and have left the scene of the disturbance to itself. The trouble will probably right itself. Dr. Jameson's rash raid has done this for us. It has shown us that, as regards the nations alien in race, we are isolated. But our "company of nations," Israel's "Daughters," have come round their "great, lone, isolated Mother," and with hands joined around her have told her that they are all of one mind, and will perish, each and all, rather than see her hurt. God has comforted His people, and we are glad! To the Lord be all the praise! He promised that His people "should never be ashamed;" and though the circumstances have greatly tried us, we are not ashamed! (Joel ii. 26, 27, R.V.).

"THE 'BLUNDERERS' INTO ALL THE BEST PLACES OF THE EARTH."

SURELY there never was a grander or more noble speech than that of the Secretary of State for the Colonies reported in the Times of January 22nd, on the occasion of the banquet to Lord Lamington at the Hôtel Metropole, London, whereat he presided. He spoke in decisive and statesmanlike tones regarding our Colonial Empire, and treated with contempt the ideas of those who declare that our nation "has had no Colonial Policy but have simply blundered into all the best places of the earth." We certainly have acquired for our colonies the very best places the world could offer, in the Canadian Dominion, in Australia, in New Zealand, and Tasmania, in the temperate portions of South Africa, in the very countries where gold and diamonds lay hidden, till we found them. The Scotsman has a strange comment on the facts of the case when it said on January 22nd, that those who allege that we "blundered" into all the best places of the earth "must suppose that we have a special Providence guiding our 'blundering' footsteps, and bringing good results out of our errors." This is nothing but the truth, as Isa. xlii. 16 will prove.

We fear we cannot quite follow Mr. Chamberlain in thinking that we fixed on Australia, or New Zealand, the Cape, or Canada, in pursuance of any fixed national policy, originally, or that our wonderful advance in South Africa in its beginnings had any prospect or object before it like the vast and splendid Colonies which are now ours in Australasia, and South Africa. The Matabele war, which was the means of our acquiring glorious regions fit in climate for British Colonies, and as to wealth, rich mines of gold, to give our nation unheard of affluence, formed no part of our Colonial policy. These all have been unsought by us at first; but like India have fallen into our hands from time to time as gifts direct from God to His people Israel, to enable them to succeed to their allotted inheritance in "the desolate heritages of the earth," which is their exact description. In many cases, no doubt, we have "blundered" in our advance (pace Mr. Chamberlain), but like a blind people God has led us from year to year and brought as He promised in Isa. xlii. 16, R.V., into unparalleled prosperity, greatly to our own astonishment and to the envy and jealousy of the nations who surround us, who find themselves beaten in the race, because, being not Israel, they lack Israel's blessings and are nowhere in the matter of the Colonial Empires they so long for and have so diligently sought. Mr. Chamberlain's speech, however, must have a place in the BANNER, though in the respect we have indicated, he sees not as we see, our nation's past, present history and future destiny. They are words to remember and pass on to our distant readers as those of an able patriotic guide who deserves our fullest support. He said as to

"THE SOLIDARITY OF THE EMPIRE:

"I think that I see before me a representative gathering of British subjects, whose chief, or, at all events, one of whose principal, interests lies in that great group of Australian Colonies, whose present greatness and importance give us but a faint indication of the splendid future which awaits them. (Cheers). For of one thing I am certain, whatever may be the fate of the old country—and even as to that I have sufficient confidence (cheers)—no man can doubt that our vigorous offspring in the Southern Seas are bound at no distant time to rival the older civilization of the Continent of Europe in wealth, in population, in all the attributes of a great nation. (Hear, hear.) But, although, as I have said, your interests lie in this direction, I have an instinctive feeling that to-night you are thinking not so much of Australian politics and of Australian progress as you are of events that have recently occurred (loud cheers) in another quarter of the globe and of their connexion with Imperial interests. And if that be so, I hail the fact as another proof of the solidarity of Imperial sentiment in making it impossible that a blow can be struck, or a chord be sounded, in even the most distant part of this Empire without an echo coming back from every other part. (Cheers.) It would be inopportune to me, it would be improper, if I were to dwell on the incidents which have diverted attention to South Africa. Those incidents will be the subject of judicial inquiry in this country and in Africa, and I assume that, with the fair-mindedness which distinguishes them, my countrymen will wait to hear both the indictment and the defence before they pronounce a judgment. (Cheers). But, in the meantime, I will venture to say that I think there is a tendency to attach too much importance to sensational occurrences which pass away and leave no trace behind, and not enough to the general course of British policy and the general current of colonial progress. I have heard it said that we never have had a colonial policy, that we have simply blundered into all the best places in the earth. (Laughter.) I admit that we have made mistakes. I have no doubt that we are answerable for sins of commission as well as sins of omission; but, after all is said, this remains—that we alone among the nations of the earth have been able to establish and to maintain colonies under different conditions in all parts of the world, that we have maintained them to their own advantage and to ours, and that we have secured, not only the loyal attachment of all British subjects, but the general good will of the races, whether they be native or whether they be European, that have thus come under the the British flag. (Cheers.) This may be a comforting assurance when we think of occasional mistakes; and when we are rebuked even for our misfortunes (laughter) we may find some consolation in our success. (Cheers.)

"SPLENDID ISOLATION.

"There is, gentlemen, another consideration which I think is not inappropriate to such a gathering as this. A few weeks ago England appeared to stand alone in the world, surrounded by jealous competitors and by altogether unexpected hostility. Differences between ourselves and other nations which were of long standing appeared suddenly to come to a head and to assume threatening proportions; and from quarters to which we might have looked for friendship and consideration (cheers)—having regard to our traditions and to a certain community of interest—we were confronted with suspicion, and even with hate. We had to recognize that our success itself, however legitimate, was imputed to us as a crime; that our love of peace was taken as a sign of weakness, and that our indifference to foreign criticism was construed to an invitation to insult us. (Loud cheers). We had to admit that the prospect of our discomfiture was regarded with hardly disguised satisfaction by our competitors, who at the same time must have been forced to admit that we alone held our possessions throughout the world in trust for all (cheers), and that we admit them to our markets as freely as we admit our own subjects. (Cheers.) I regret that such a feeling should exist, and that we should be forced to admit its existence; but as it does exist, I rejoice that it found expression.

(Cheers.) No better service was ever done to this nation, for it has enabled us to show, in face of all that, while we were resolute to fulfill our obligations, we were equally determined to maintain our rights. (Loud cheers.) Three weeks ago, in the words of Mr. Foster, the leader of the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, 'the great Mother-Empire stood splendidly isolated.' And how does she stand to-day? She stands secure in the strength of her own resources, in the firm resolution of her people without respect to party, and in the abundant loyalty of her children from one end of the Empire to the other. (Loud cheers.)

"THE MORAL OF RECENT EVENTS.

"The resolution which was conveyed to the Prime Minister on behalf of the Australian colonies and the display of patriotic enthusiasm on the part of the Dominion of Canada came to us a natural response to the outburst of national spirit in the United Kingdom, and as a proof that British hearts beat in unison throughout the world, whatever may be the distances that separate us. (Cheers.) Then let us cultivate those sentiments. Let us do all in our power by improving our communications, by developing our commercial relations, by co-operating in mutual defence (cheers), and none of us then will ever feel isolated, no part of the Empire will stand alone, so long as it can count upon the common interest of all in its welfare and in its security. (Cheers.) That is the moral I have derived from recent events. That is the lesson I desire to impress on my countrymen. In the words of Tennyson—

"'Let Britain's myriad voices call,
Sons, be welded each and all,
Into one Imperial whole,
One with Britain, heart and soul!
One life, one flag, one fleet, one Throne!'

(Loud cheers.) And in the time to come, the time that must come, when these colonies of ours have grown in stature, in population, and in strength, this league of kindred nations, this federation of Greater Britain, will not only provide for its own security, but will be a potent factor in maintaining the peace of the world. (Cheers.) Our guest to-night goes out to take his part in this work of drawing tighter the bonds which unite us to our children in the Antipodes. He goes to an infant colony, an infant which is destined to become a giant, and the possibilities of which no man can measure. Queensland has an area, which—shall I say?—is three times greater than the German Empire. (Laughter and cheers.) It has a soil which can produce anything. It has vast mineral resources. In a generation its population has increased 15-fold. It has already a revenue of three or four millions sterling. It has completed 2,500 miles of railway. It has exports of 10 million sterling, all of it, except an incalculable fragment, coming to the United Kingdom or to some of the British possessions, and yet this colony of Queensland, great as it is, is only one of seven, all equally important, equally energetic, equally prosperous, equally loyal. (Cheers.) I say that the relations between these colonies and ourselves are questions of momentous import to us both, and I hope that our rulers and our people will leave no stone unturned to show the store that we all set on the continued amity, the continued affection, of our kindred beyond the sea. That is the message we ask Lord Lamington to take with him, and we wish him health and prosperity in the colony over which he is about to preside. (Loud cheers.)"

"A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee," was the Lord's promise to Jacob as recorded in Gen. xxxv. 11; the result being the outcome of the preceding words, "be fruitful and multiply." To-day, it is obvious that both these prophecies have been fulfilled. This nation must be Israel, the lost House of Ephraim; because as a nation, we have been wonderfully blessed from on high; we have been fruitful and greatly multiplied; and as the direct consequence of all this, we have, in "the desolate heritages" of the earth, had our portion allotted to us as colonies, where our race has miraculously increased, till we find six nations extant in Australia only, another in New Zealand, an eighth in the Dominion of Canada, to the North and West; and a ninth forming in South Africa; the whole being "a company" of several nations, all but independent of their "old mother in the West," but content to abide in concord and loyal union with her,—

"One with Britain, heart and soul!
One life, one flag, one fleet, one Throne!"

The reproach of the Continentals that we are isolated from them, we can well bear. Our isolation is indeed "splendid." It is separation from them, as God would have it be; but union with a company of daughter nations, who are ready to cry "Hands off," should any foreign power, or crowned head, dare to interefere with our possessions beyond sea, or dream of occupying them themselves, in spite of our rights and claims. In vain such dreams! Our colonies and our possessions abroad are God's own gifts to us, as Israel, and none may touch them without His leave. Not in vain has the Lord given us just now proof of the loyalty of "all our kindred, in all our colonies." "The isolation of Britain" says the Scotsman of January 22nd, "is the isolation of a mother of nations in the midst of a loyal family"; which we deem an apt and striking paraphrase of Jacob's blessing we have just quoted, "A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee." Our public writers seem to think that the British band of loyal nations, the mother and her daughters, will, united, suffice to abolish war, and command peace upon the earth. This can hardly be, since their union and isolation in union, is to be a time of war for all the other nations of the world "such as there has not been since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, so "great"! These considerations and these facts make Our Identity so vitally important at the present time, since in the crash and ruin of the nations, our Empire alone will survive, blessed of the Lord, as His servants, His messengers for good, and His inheritance. Let Israel therefore praise Him, for His mercy, lovingkindness and truth towards the seed of Abraham, His friend (Isa. xli. 8—15, R.V.).

ANOTHER REASON WHY THE NAVY SHOULD BE STRENGTHENED.

ALMOST all men see now that we must safeguard our own interests, and that there is no time to lose if we mean to do it at all. Everyone agrees that in only one way can we do it effectively. It is no use increasing our land forces. At that game the Continental Powers are sure to beat us. But as naval power and ascendency in the end always secure the supremacy on land of the nation possessing them, we have nationally to strive, by might and main, to maintain the supremacy of the sea. There is one reason which men are beginning clearly now to see, which satisfies them that we must not relax our defensive measures, and that is, that throughout the world the one nation that men hate, because they envy her, is Great Britain! It is the penalty we pay for our astounding greatness, expansion, wealth, and influence, which the other nations seek, but cannot obtain, and, therefore, envy our superiority, and bitterly hate us for it.

In the Weekly Telegraph, of November 9th last, an article appeared on the remarkable fact respecting our nation's universal unpopularity, which is noteworthy at the present juncture. But the editorial conclusion on the whole matter is of the gravest importance, because if all men hate and envy us, it is clear they may soon attack us, and we must be ready to defend ourselves. There is no way so effective for us to do that as "going on strengthening the Navy!" The article is worth recollecting, and we re-publish it accordingly :—

"IS IT THE BEGINNING OF THE END?

"'SPECTATOR.'

"Twelve men once agreed that each should ask the most unpopular man of his acquaintance to dinner. They sat down thirteen, for the twelve votes had all fallen on one man. It is very much to be feared that if the peoples of the earth were to be asked to name the most unpopular nation, they would, with one assent, name England. Some of them might say that, personally, they liked her, but all would agree in the fact that she is the most unpopular member of the family of nations. With the French, our unpopularity as a nation almost passes into actual hatred; while Germany, though she agrees with us in many things, and has many points of sympathy, finds us all over the world a source of dislike and irritation. By Russia, we are still more openly regarded as the disagreeable Power whose function is to be stolidly and stubbornly tiresome and unamiable. Even Austria, though she has little real cause to hate, and some cause to like, admits, with a sigh, that we are intolerable, 'like all selfish people'—for that we are always selfishly looking out for our own interests she regards as an undeniable fact. To Italy alone of the Powers we present a pleasant face; but she, while she disavows the feeling for herself, has to admit that her experience is contrary to the rest of mankind, and that, therefore, in the true sense of the word, we are unpopular. She may deny that the unpopularity is deserved, but she cannot but note the phenomenon. Our own flesh and blood in America join the chorus, and declare that though we are sound at heart and in essentials virtuous, and full of moral worth, we are in the daily intercourse of international life very unpleasant—a blundering, bullying, grabbing Power, with no regard for the feelings of others, and, therefore, naturally and inevitably disliked. Even the Colonies are often inclined to represent something of the same feeling, and to express the opinion that they do not wonder the Governor is so much disliked when he pays so little attention to other people's views, and is so dashed patronising. 'Of course, one doesn't mind it a bit from one's own father, but it must be decidedly annoying from a stranger.' As for the little Powers, they are white with rage when they think of England. It is no good to tell them that they always get justice from England, when what they want is a touch of 'high consideration.' They would far rather be robbed and injured than, as they think, humiliated. The poor Southerner would always rather be plundered by a nobleman who gives him a bow and a salute, than have a loaf of bread chucked him by a rich bourgeois, who makes a joke about his lantern jaws and empty belly. With Spain, Holland, Denmark, Belgium, Portugal, Sweden, and the Spanish Republics of South America, we are, therefore, quite as actively unpopular as we are with the great States. They may not hate us for any cause, or have, indeed, any sort of real grievance against us, but our unpopularity with them is a matter of instinct. We are Dr. Fell to each and all of them.

"But though the fact of our unpopularity is so clear, it is by no means easy to state the cause. No doubt, in the case of the Great Powers, our vast commercial prosperity, our success in the work of governing distant Empires, and in doing what all the world now wants specially to do—i.e., develop colonies—our easy solution of the Socialist problems, and our stable yet democratic scheme of government, all tend to make us deeply envied and so very unpopular. 'Look at England,' says the Frenchman—and here it is worth while to point out that it is the country as a separate entity which is unpopular, and not the individual Englishman; he, of late years, has become exceedingly popular on the Continent. 'England has a bad climate, and a poor soil—she has, that is, not half the natural riches of France, and yet she is far less hardly pressed by taxation. Outside Europe she has all the best pieces of the world, and holds them so easily that they do not cost her sixpence, and indirectly bring her in a great deal. On the other hand, the French Colonies are a constant drain of money and men on the mother country, and no one can ever get satisfaction out of them. In spite of all that is done for them, they are the source of countless regrets and disappointments. England, again, has no conscription, while our life-blood is drained by it. If England had this boon through her own wise policy or courage, or admitted peacefulness and want of aggression, I could bear it. But she has not. It is simply hers by luck, and such undeserved luck cannot, while human nature remains what it is, be anything but bitterly disagreeable to those who are less fortunate, but in reality far more deserving.' That the apparent ease with which we surmount the difficulties, commercial, financial, and political, that poison the life of so many States, should raise such feelings in our nearest neighbours, is most natural; nor is it to be wondered at that these feelings are echoed with more or less intensity by all the Powers. Our present and past good fortune, as long as it lasts—though how long that will be who can tell?—must be paid for in the unpopularity which envy always breeds. It is a law of nature. You cannot grow and prosper above others without envy, and envy must fasten unpopularity on the object envied. But this is, of course, not the sole source of our unpopularity. That is also based on a general belief that we are at once selfish and materialistic in our aims, and that we never act on large or wide or noble ideas, but merely look to the main chance. The nations would hate us less if we had tried or were known to aim at universal dominion. What they cannot bear is the feeling that we intend to have the best of every bargain, and that having got it, we always explain that we only got it because we were more business-like and efficient than other people, and from no other cause, in fact, than our own natural superiority. In other words, we are supposed to be a patronising Power, and patronising is always a cause of unpopularity.

"What is the remedy? There is none as far as we can see. We cannot strip ourselves of our great possessions, or destroy our prosperity, or adopt the conscription merely to avert the evil eye. Again, nothing we can do will take away the supposed taint of hypocrisy. We have just got to bear our unpopularity, and look as pleasant as we can. Fortunately, we are not a thin-skinned people, and, as we think, quite rightly, never bother about the opinions of our neighbours, whose competence to form an opinion worth having in regard to our actions is more than doubtful. But though no attempt must be made to get rid of our unpopularity we must not ignore it or forget it. It is a most important fact, and must be noted by our statesmen, for it is a distinct and unfavourable factor in our dealings with foreign Powers. It makes our duty plain on two points. We must go on at all costs strengthening our Navy. A popular Power in our position might afford to run the risk of losing the command of the sea. Our unpopularity, pure and simple, might easily lead to a combination against us with the object of spoliation. While we have the undoubted and effective command of the sea, we can laugh at such combinations. If we lose it, God help us."

Our nation's unpopularity, which is a fact, seems to explain to us God's command to His people, in these our latter days, "to enter into our chambers, and shut our doors about us, and hide ourselves for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast" (Isa. xxvi. 20, R.V.). For while the nations are suffering the wrath of God, they who hate and envy us would be sure, at such a time, to strive and fix a quarrel upon us as the cause of all their sufferings. It will require, therefore, a policy of isolation on our part to avoid contact with them, and great circumspection lest we provoke them in the slightest degree in matters where our own interests are not concerned. In short, while God is dealing with the nations, we have to stand aside, and not to interfere. As Noah was shut up in the ark, where he could neither see nor hear the terrible effects of the wrath of God; and as Lot in Zoar, and then in his cave, could not witness the calamities of his late fellow-citizens, with whom God was personally dealing, so now the indignation of the Lord will be spent upon the nations of the earth what time Israel-Britain is hidden in the safe shadow of her God's hands, neither seeing, nor hearing, nor able to help those, who will then be past all help, seeing that the fire of Jehovah's "jealousy will be then devouring them." They visit Israel now with their jealousy and hate, because of God's blessing on His people. Then they will have to endure the fierce fire of God's jealousy themselves "in the day of His vengeance, and in the year of His recompense in the controversy of Zion" (Isa. xxxiv. 8, R.V.). It is a comforting thought for our nation and ourselves, that in the coming times of trouble, which are in a measure even to envelope our own nation, "the everlasting arms" will be about us, "for the eternal God will be our Dwelling-place, or Refuge, for He rideth upon the heaven for our help, and in His excellency on the sky" (Deut. xxxiii. 26, 27, R.V.).

"Israel dwelleth in safety,
The fountain of Jacob alone,
In a land of corn and wine;
Yea, His heavens drop down dew.
Happy are thou, O Israel;
Who is like unto thee, a people saved by the Lord,
The shield of thy help,
And that is the sword of thine excellency!
And thine enemies shall submit themselves unto thee,
And thou shalt tread upon their high places."
(Deut. xxxiii. 28, 29, R.V.).

To the Lord be all the praise for the consolation these thoughts give us!

THE BRITISH GATES WHICH ARE ROUND THE WORLD.

A FRIEND in Liverpool has sent us the following few lines from a recent number of Tit-Bits, which, as he says, "furnishes independent or outside testimony to the world-wide possessions of British-Israel." Our correspondent rightly describes the words as, "blind testimony"—blindly, unknowingly testifying to the Israelite origin of the British. For the latter own these places all round the world; places which men call "the keys" of the Empire, and we "the Gates," that God promised "to Abraham and his seed for ever," in Gen. xxii. 17, when He said, "And thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies." This promise includes nothing less than "the many Gates of Israel's many enemies." (At the request of some friends, we propose to republish the argument of the Rev. C. Hickson on this subject, as it appears on page 466 of BANNER, Vol. V., November 2nd, 1881.) To Tit-Bits, then, we are indebted for the following:—

"ROUND THE WORLD BY BRITISH TERRITORY.

"An Englishman can go round the world and touch on British territory all the way—viz., from England to Halifax, N.S., across Canada to Vancouver, across the Pacific to Hong Kong, thence to Singapore, Penang, Mauritius, Cape Town, St. Helena, and England; or from Penang to Ceylon, Bombay, Aden, Perim, Malta, Gibraltar, and home. This is a 'sea connection' that no other nation in the world possesses."

Each one of the places named above we, of course, know is a British Gate; some of them, like Halifax (Nova Scotia), Vancouver, Hong Kong, Singapore, Mauritius, Cape Town, and St. Helena being of great importance, and second only to such Gates, also mentioned, as Bombay, Aden, Perim (Egypt, too), and Malta, with Gibraltar, all British fortresses, or strategic possessions, of extreme importance to the whole Empire. (See "The Geography of the Gates," by Philo-Israel.) The Gates are Israel's unique and exclusive possessions, and it is interesting to see the fact noted by Tit-Bits that "no other nation in the world possesses them"; the reason, of course, being that to none but Israel only did God grant the gift of "the Gates," and that the British are Israel exclusively. They, therefore, are the owners of these strategic places, which fact enables them to travel round the world without leaving or touching any but British soil. They are enabled, too, by reason of the position of their colonies, to construct their chief telegraphic cables in such wise that "the stations" are always on British soil, and the cables lie between such stations at the bottom of the world's oceans which, after all, are also British, by reason of our nation's supremacy at sea! Many of these "possessions beyond the sea" are British naval stations where our nation constantly maintain powerful fleets, ready to keep the peace, to protect passing British commerce, and to send help, when needed, to naval localities where British interests are threatened, or British subjects are in danger. Thus recently the British Government despatched several war-ships from the naval station at Simon's Bay, near Cape Town, to act as guard-ships at Delagoa Bay, and so to prevent the German Emperor carrying out his recent threat to send help to President Kruger against Dr. Jameson, and his too impulsive "raiders." Help could also go in a few days to Delagoa Bay from the British station at Trincomalee, in Ceylon, from British India generally, and from Zanzibar, where some British naval power is also located.

We have, thus, enormous power entrusted to our hands by the naval dominion God has given us, and it is advantageously placed to enable us not only to acquire territory and influence, but also to keep and safeguard that which we already have. The nations, of course, envy and hate us, because of our exalted privileges. But God promised to Israel-obedient, in Deut. xxviii. 1 and 13, that "He would set them high above all the nations of the earth." This fact brings with it the hatred of the nations who suffer eclipse. The way in which greatness has come to us serves to show that God is guiding our destinies, and giving us the greatness without our seeking, or even wishing for it. A writer in the Liverpool Courier, of January 13th last, dilates on this subject on these very lines. He said:—

"Foreign nations all dislike us. That is quite true. They attribute to deliberate forethought what is the outcome of pure chance or luck. British luck is proverbial. Even bad luck, somehow, usually turns to our advantage. Our national policy has been, in fact, created by sheer drift of events, and framed by circumstances; the national instincts and characteristics largely adapting themselves to such lines of action, or inaction, as the case might be. Britons believe that our course is heaven-directed. The surprising and continued success of our efforts and the extension of our power, totally against all calculation or probability, seems to warrant this belief. Our statesmen, as a rule, blunder immensely; the leaders of our armies, with few exceptions, have been incompetent; our policy changeable as the sea. Still, in a stupid, good-natured sort of way, we forge ahead somehow. We fight well when we must, but we often forego advantages afterwards, especially if our enemy be sagacious and respectable; and we often give much away that would be better kept, even without fighting. Germany has received at our hands the space of whole kingdoms in East, West, and South Africa, and in the Pacific, not to speak of the strategic point of Heligoland, which we shall hear unpleasantly about in the next naval war.

"In the Mediterranean and elsewhere, and in the far East, we have been equally obliging. . . . To America we have given way on all sorts of points again and again whenever the matters were at all debateable. But we can put up with more from America than from a foreign Emperor, who is now approaching middle-age, but still lacks much experience, especially of realities in life. France we have gracefully stepped out of the way of in various directions rather than assert ourselves to the full. With country after country we have allowed treaties to be cancelled in their favour. The little Boer Republic has had much to thank us for, both before and after the unpleasant incident of Majuba Hill. We have always given them full fair play, which they have never given to their Johannesburg subjects. We admire the immense sturdiness and solidity of the Boers; but we don't like their peculiar form of Republicanism—oppressing, grinding down, and tyrannising over all within their limits who are not of their blood. Great Britain is good natured enough with the Boers, without animosity, and with the usual blundering statesmanship at the moment when we could have reduced them to their proper position, our senators sowed the seeds of present trouble by patting the Boers on the back, and giving them possibilities for untold mischief. We saved them from the overwhelming Zulu armies, and they hated us. After re-establishing their Transvaal Republic and conferring further powers, they hated us still more. Their stupid rule over Johannesburg is a disgrace to Republicanism, and provokes free-born fellow-citizens. Real freedom they do not understand. This probably accounts for their support from other nations. Great Britain, having so much at stake, must settle this question, whether liked or disliked by other nations. She will give fair play to the Boers, punishment to those in fault, and insist upon fair play being given by the Boers to all fellow-subjects, white and black. And she will take care that the Boers keep to this."

We have, indeed, in the words of the late Professor Seeley, apparently annexed half the world "in a fit of absence of mind." We had no intention to do it when we began, but we did it! It has been the same exactly with the Gates. We acquired them, some accidentally, some by fortune of war, and some by surrender of a friend or enemy. God foreknew, but we did not, the future value of each acquisition for the purpose He intended it to be put. On our side the operation was apparently carried out without the least idea what a vital part in the future these Gates would play. Then, when Gibraltar, Malta, Perim, Madras, Bombay, Singapore, and Calcutta, were incorporated by our nation, what thought had the statesmen of those days of the grand British Colonies in Australasia and South Africa, of the overland route to India, and of the tremendous importance of these coaling stations, or ocean fortresses (which most of them are), to the British Empire of the then future but our own now present day? The Lord, then, is guiding and guarding us, His people Israel. Let us, therefore, praise Him, and beseech Him never to leave us, or forsake us, according to His promises (Josh. i. 5; Deut. xxxi. 5, 6; Heb. xiii. 5).

THE VISION OF THE TWO BASKETS OF FIGS.

(JEREMIAH XXIV.)

BY W. H. LARKINS, LIEUT.-COL.

THIS vision was shewed to Jeremiah the prophet after that Jaconiah, the son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, had been carried away captive to Babylon. And "Behold two baskets of figs were set before the temple of the Lord" (ver. 1). "One basket had very good figs, and the other very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, they were so bad" (ver. 2). The first point for consideration is, what were these baskets of figs intended to represent? The two baskets of figs, two different people, but of the same race, inasmuch as the fruit in both were of the same kind. Moreover, as the word came to Jeremiah from "the Lord, the God of Israel," we have good grounds for assuming that the racial people referred to were "the children of Israel' (ver. 5). The people represented by the good figs were to be sent into the land of the Chaldeans for their good (vers. 5—7). Those represented by the evil figs were to go into "all the kingdoms of the earth" for their hurt (vers. 8, 9).

There is no difficulty in understanding whom the evil figs represent and who were to go into captivity for their hurt, for this is fully explained in ver. 8—namely, "Zedekiah, king of Judah, his princes, and the residue of Jerusalem that remain in the land." This would not, of course, include those represented by the good figs, who were to go into captivity for their good. As regards the latter, at first sight ver. 5 would appear to be somewhat obscure in its meaning, but the difficulty disappears on reading the context. The captivity to Babylon embraced the House of Judah and one tribe (Benjamin) of the House of Israel, and if the evil figs represented the House of Judah, then the good figs must represent the tribe of Benjamin, referred to in ver. 5 as of Judah.

There are very few instances in which any mention is made of the tribe of Benjamin, by name, after their separation from their brethren of the House of Israel. There are, however, many passages in Scripture which undoubtedly apply to this tribe, but not by name. The prophet Jeremiah, for instance, frequently speaks of "the children of Benjamin" as "the inhabitants of Jerusalem" (Jer. xvii. 20, xviii. 11, and xix. 7). Jebusi, or Jerusalem, was one of twelve cities which fell to the lot of Benjamin as a portion of her inheritance (Josh. xviii. 28) in the land of Canaan, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem would be the children of Benjamin. Judah obtained Mount Zion, also belonging to the Jebusites, and it was here the city of David was built which was called Zion, and it was here that King Solomon built the temple of the Lord on the threshingfloor of Araunah the Jebusite, on the very borders of the Two Tribes, and the boundaries of which are fully described in Josh. xv. In another place he speaks of "the princes of Judah and the princes of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxxiv. 19). Here again we have a right to assume that the princes of Jerusalem are the princes of Benjamin.

Once more, Isaiah, in answer to the prayer of Hezekiah, said, "The daughter of Zion has despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn, the daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head at thee" (Isa. xxxvii. 22). Here again the daughter of Jerusalem must mean the daughter of Benjamin, and if there be any doubt on this point we have only to turn to the words of our Lord addressed to the women who were following Him as He was being led to the place of His crucifixion, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves and for your children" (Luke xxiii. 28). We may rest assured that these women whom Jesus addressed as "Daughters of Jerusalem" were not Jewish women, for they would hardly have bewailed and lamented the acts of their brethren and kinsmen. Some of these women had followed our Lord from Lower Galilee, the inhabitants of which were chiefly Benjamites. They were Israelitish women of the tribe of Benjamin who had become converts to Christianity, and they bewailed and lamented when they saw Jesus being led to the place of His crucifixion, thinking they were about to lose their Lord and Master.

In the passages quoted above there is sufficient to show a marked line of distinction drawn between Judah and Zion on the one hand, and Benjamin, though not named, and Jerusalem on the other hand, and in the vision of the two baskets of figs there is the same omission of the name of Benjamin, but I feel convinced that this tribe is referred to as "of Judah" in ver. 5, who were to go into captivity for their good, and the after history of this tribe will fully confirm this prediction, that they went into captivity for their good. Why Benjamin is spoken of as "of Judah" it is beyond my power to explain. It formed a part of the kingdom of Judah, but was never incorporated in that House.

On the expiration of the seventy years, the limit prescribed for their captivity to Babylon, the three tribes of Judah, Levi, and Benjamin returned to the land of their inheritance. From that time up to the coming of our Lord, extending over a period of more than 500 years, Scripture furnishes us with little or no information regarding these tribes. We learn from the prophet Isaiah, that the Lord's coming would be preceded by a forerunner to prepare the way before Him, and that John the Baptist, the son of Zacharias, was the forerunner referred to (Isa. xl. 3; Luke i. 17 and 76). It was said by the angel to Zacharias that his son John should "turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God" and "make ready a people prepared for the Lord" (Luke i. 16, 17). The people here referred to are the children of Benjamin. As there was a beloved apostle, so also was there a tribe "beloved of the Lord" and that tribe was Benjamin (Deut. xxxiii. 12). This is the tribe of the House of Israel that was given to Rehoboam in order that they might furnish a light before the Lord in Jerusalem during His stay upon this earth (1 Kings xi. 36).

It was by the preaching of John the Baptist that the tribe of Benjamin was prepared and made ready for the coming of our Lord, and whom they accepted as the promised Messiah, and thus they became the "first-fruits" of Christ in Israel (Rom. xi. 16). When Jesus left Nazareth and dwelt in Capernaum, which is on the sea-coast, in the borders of Zebulun and Naphthalim, then, St. Matthew tells us, was fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, "the people that walked in darkness have seen a great light" (Isa. ix. 2; Matt. iv. 13). It was here, on the sea-coast of Lower Galilee, that Jesus chose His apostles from among the poor Galilean fishermen who were Benjamites (Matt. iv. 18), and they became the light-bearers of the Gospel to their brethren, the lost sheep of the House of Israel, when the purpose for which the tribe of Benjamin was given to Rehoboam was accomplished. Warned by Jeremiah in the first instance, and later on by our Lord Himself (Jer. vi. 1; Mark xiii. 14), shortly before the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans they left that city and proceeded to Pella, thus separating themselves from and breaking the last link in the chain that bound the Two Houses of Israel and Judah together (Zech. xi. 14).

The House of Judah, the Jews, represented by the evil figs, went into captivity for their hurt, and although the captivity had the effect of stamping out idolatry, other errors had crept in which still remained. That such did exist is clear from the fact that when John the Baptist saw the Pharisees and the Sadducees coming to his baptism, he said unto them, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth fruits meet for repentance, and think not to say, We have Abraham to our father, for I say that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham" (Matt. iii. 7—9). The Pharisees sent men from Jerusalem to John to ask him, Who art thou? He confessed that he was not the Christ. Then said they, "If they be not that Christ, why baptizest thou?" (John i. 19, 20, 24, 25). John said unto them "I baptize with water" (John i. 26) "but He baptizeth with the Holy Ghost" (ver. 33). The blindness and hardness of heart of the Jews was foretold by the prophets and the psalmist some 500 years and more B.C. and when Christ "came unto His own, His own received Him not" (John i. 11). The Jews refused to accept the Gospel or to believe in Christ as the promised Messiah, and they condemned Him to death, even to the cruel death of "the cross." This brought down upon the Jews all the judgments denounced against them by our Lord Himself, and in A.D. 70 followed the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans attended with a great slaughter of the Jews and the scattering of the remnant of Judah througout all the kingdoms of the world. Some 1900 years have passed since this happened, and the Jews are still scattered over the face of the globe, still in unbelief and under the curse of the law.

When the natural branches of the good olive tree (the Jews), broken off for unbelief, no longer abide in unbelief they shall be grafted into the parent stock from whence they were taken. "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" (Rom. xi. 15, 23). The foregoing remarks bear ample testimony to the fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecy concerning the two baskets of figs—namely, that the one representing Benjamin would go into captivity for their good, and the other representing Judah, the Jews, would go into captivity for their hurt (Jer. xxiv. 5, 9).

THE IDENTITY OF THE TURKS.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—At a recent meeting of our Anglo-Israel Association the query arose as to the identity of the Turks. At our last meeting an essay was read, bearing upon the subject by our worthy president—Rev. W. G. Davenport. To us it seemed to be of considerable merit, and it was resolved to send it to you for publication in THE BANNER OF ISRAEL. If, after perusal, you should so decide, we would be pleased and the readers of THE BANNER would be instructed. You have an interested constituency in America. We thank you for your good work. May God keep you and guide you, that in all your "labours begun, continued, and ended in Him" you may bring forth fruit to His glory. And now, dear sir, wishing you a very happy New Year,

I remain, yours truly, JNO. G. COOK, Secretary.

"ISAIAH LXIII. 1—6.

"This part of Isaiah's prophecy has been understood by commentators to refer to the final triumph of our Lord over the power of His enemies. This is undoubtedly a true interpretation, as far as it goes. He who "speaketh in righteousness, mighty to save," can be none other than the Son of God, the Redeemer of the world; and of Him only may it be said, whatever we understand the words to mean, that He hath 'trodden the winepress alone.' Bishop Horsley's comment, that 'it is Christ that is thus magnificently described, returning to His capital from the land of the enemy, after His passion,' probably expresses the common understanding of the passage. But should the 'coming from Edom' be assigned to the first Advent, according to this interpretation, or to the second, when the wicked shall be 'cast into the great winepress of the wrath of God'? (Rev. xiv. 19.) And more than this, is it a mere allegorical figure, having no reality in fact? If it be, Egypt would have been a better symbol, for Egypt stands pre-eminent in Holy Scripture as a great type of the spiritual powers of evil. Evidently, there must be some hidden truth here, some special reason why that victorious coming is said to be from Edom, and not from the land of Israel's bondage. What is that reason? Why is our Lord represented as 'coming from Edom, and with dyed garments from Bozrah'?

"I.—To find an answer it will be necessary to trace briefly the history of Edom, and recall what the prophets have said concerning that remarkable people.

"Edom was the name given to Esau, in allusion to the colour of the lentil pottage for which he sold his birthright. The word means, simply, red; and the red stains upon the garment of the Conqueror 'Who cometh from Edom,' seem to be aptly symbolized by that little circumstance. The hatred of Esau towards his brother Jacob clung traditionally to his descendants. It seems to have directed their conduct on the very first occasion of their national contact with the Israelites. Their country lay south-west of the Dead Sea—with Bozrah as the residence of their king—on the direct route from Egypt to the Holy Land; and when Moses, leading his people from the land of their affliction to the land of promise, asked the privilege of passing quietly through their territory, 'Edom said unto him, Thou shalt not pass by me, lest I come out against thee with the sword' (Numb. xx. 18—20). To every appeal of Moses the answer was the same: 'Thou shalt not go through.' This repeated refusal was but an expression of the old grudge of Esau against Jacob, and the sacred writer has evidently recorded it as a great offence against the Most High.

"The same spirit of hostility was shown repeatedly in the subsequent intercourse of the two nations. In the wars that followed between them, Edom's acts were characterized by excessive cruelty. This fact is celebrated in the 137th Psalm, which pathetically recounts the mourning of the Jews in captivity, when they hung their harps upon the trees and refused to sing the songs of Zion: 'Remember the children of Edom, O Lord, in the day of Jerusalem, when they said, Down with it, down with it, even to the ground.'

"History tells us that at a still later period, just before Titus besieged Jerusalem at the time of its final downfall, 20,000 Edomites were admitted within the walls, coming ostensibly to aid the Jews; but in return for the confidence reposed in them, they plundered the city and filled it with bloodshed. 'The vile wretches,' says Josephus, 'cut the throats of the high priests, that so no part of a religious regard to God might be preserved; they thence proceeded to destroy utterly the least remains of a political government, and introduced the most complete scene of iniquity in all instances that were practicable." (Josephus' "Wars," vii. 8, Sec. 1).

"The three great acts of enmity, to which I have thus called attention, were committed in times of Israel's need and helplessness, and, inspired by the old animosity of Esau, were perfectly in keeping with the character divinely imputed to the Edomites in these words of inspiration: 'He did cast off all pity, and his anger did tear perpetually.' May it not be that Amos alludes to these very same 'transgressions,' when he says, adding the words just quoted: 'Thus saith the Lord: For three transgressions of Edom, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof'? (Amos. i. 11). If so, the fourth transgression must be still in the future, unless it has already occurred somewhere in modern history, or is being enacted now amidst the stirring events of the day. In either case, Edom must necessarily be in existence at the present time as a powerful people, disposed still to war against the people of God.

"II.—But, like the Ten Tribes of Israel, the Edomites have disappeared from history. We read no more of them after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. Their name is no longer applied to any place or people. Their country lies, as prophesy fortold, a desolate waste. 'Edom shall be a desolation,' cried the prophet Jeremiah, and travellers say that his words have been verified. Isaiah speaks in the same strain also: 'From generation to generation it shall lie waste.' Now, these words taken alone, apart from all connection with what precedes and follows them, may indeed find a sufficient fulfilment in the present condition of ancient Idumea. But a careful study of the thirty-fourth chapter of Isaiah, in which the words quoted from him occur, leads to the conclusion that this fulfilment can be only partial and typical. For the very predictions to which they belong are clearly prophetic rehearsals of events connected with the second coming of our Lord. In the same breath in which he declares that Edom shall lie waste from generation to generation, he employs the very language used by St. John the divine, describing the final punishment of the worshippers of the beast (Isa. xxxiv. 10; Rev. xiv. 11). This thirty-fourth chapter of Isaiah—said by some to be allegorical, probably to get rid of its difficulties—evidently deals with the final judgment of the nations, and there are repeated references in the margin to other places in Holy Scripture, where it is universally understood that the sacred writers treat of the Second Advent. For instance, some of the events foretold are also described by St. Peter in his second epistle, and consigned to that 'day of the Lord which shall so come as a thief in the night.' 'All the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll' (Isa. xxxiv. 4), declares the prophet; and the apostle echoes his thought in these words: 'The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat' (2 Pet. iii. 10). And later on St. John beholds a vision, which he describes under the sixth seal, and, like St. Peter, echoes the thought of the prophet, but quotes a part of his very words: 'And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island were moved out of their places' (Rev. vi. 14). There can be no reasonable doubt, it seems to me, that Isaiah, in this twenty-fourth chapter, treats of events associated everywhere else in Holy Scripture with the second coming of Christ. And in a prediction that thus clearly rehearses what shall come to pass in the time of the end, we find him foretelling, as a part of its very warp and woof, the divine punishment of Edom. It follows, of necessity, that in that great day, the Edomites must still be in existence as a people, or the judgment of God could not fall upon them.

"In another chapter the same prophet, describing the 'glorious rest' of the Son of God, when, as God says, 'They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (a consummation which the present state of affairs in all Bible lands, particularly Armenia, to say nothing of the rest of the world, proves to be still in the future)—describing this 'glorious rest,' the prophet declares that 'it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people . . . and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth . . . They shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines toward the west; they shall lay their hand upon Edom and Moab; and the children of Ammon shall obey them' (Isa. xi. 9—14). Now it is perfectly evident, from these words, that Israel and Judah cannot 'lay their hand upon Edom' until the 'dispersed of Judah' shall have been 'gathered together from the four corners of the earth'—an event certainly expected, but not yet realized. Thus, the prophets compel us to believe that, in the course of divine providence, Edom was to reappear among the nations, and take a prominent part in the affairs of the world.

"III.—If all this be true, Edom, under a different name, must be in existence now. Are there any predictions of Holy Scripture which, pointing to a particular people of modern times, serve to identify them as the Edomites of old? Before seeking an answer to this question, let us ask another: What race or nation of these days has seemed to possess, throughout its history, an undying animosity against the people of God? There is but one answer—the Turks! Historians tell us that they came from Central Asia, conquered the Mohammedan Arabs then in possession of Jerusalem, adopted their religion, and gradually forced their way into Europe. Their empire has always been a dark blot upon European civilization. They have been the implacable enemies everywhere, of Jews and Christians alike. Their very religion has, embodied in it, undying hostility to the religion and the followers of the Son of God. In fact, God has recorded His wrath against Edom in words that are scarcely applicable, in the fulness of their meaning, to any other people than the modern Turks. The language of Amos, already quoted in part, sufficiently proves this statement: 'For three transgressions of Edom, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because he did pursue his brother with the sword, and did cast off all pity, and his anger did tear perpetually, and he kept his wrath for ever' (Amos i. 11). Is it at all unlikely that the Edomites are now perpetrating in Armenia that fourth transgression, which shall bring down upon them the final retribution foretold by the prophet Ezekiel, when he says, 'There is Edom, her kings and all her princes, which with her might are laid by them that were slain with the sword; they shall lie with the uncircumcised, and with them that go down into the pit'? (Amos i. 11; Ezek. xxxii. 29).

"But Ezekiel gives us the clearest proof of Edom's identity. Describing the restitution of the Holy Land, and its final recovery from the heathen, he says: 'Therefore, thus saith the Lord God: Surely in the fire of My jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the heathen, and against all Idumea, which have appointed My land into their possession with the joy of all their heart, with despiteful minds, to cast it out for a prey' (Ezek. xxxvi. 5). The Turks, above all the heathen, have 'appointed' God's 'land into their possession.' They have conquered and now rule the heathen who once possessed it. They hold it 'with despiteful minds,' and for no other purpose than to 'cast it out for a prey.' And they possess it all. The traveller, in order to visit the principal places made sacred by the hallowed association of Scripture, must needs tread on Turkish soil. Verily, the prophet points to Turkey here as certainly as he does to the Holy Land.

"IV.—So we have found an answer to our question, 'Why is our Lord represented as coming from Edom, and with dyed garments from Bozrah?' He comes from the slaughter of those old enemies of Israel. Again, they have 'cast off all pity,' and dyed the sacred soil with the blood of God's people. There is every reason to believe that the Armenians, like ourselves, are Israelites as well as Christians. Because of this fourth offence against God and His people, which completes the measure of Edom's transgression, 'the sword of the Lord is filled with blood . . . for the Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a slaughter in the land of Idumea' (Isa. xxxiv. 6). Thus, retribution in kind is to fall upon the Edomites, as God has said by the mouth of Ezekiel, 'Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred, and hast shed the blood of the children of Israel, by the force of the sword in the time of their calamity, in the time that their iniquity had an end'—observe these words, 'in the time that their iniquity had an end'; they can refer to no time before the final destruction of Jerusalem—'therefore, as I live, saith the Lord God, I will prepare thee unto blood, and blood shall pursue thee; since thou hast not hated blood, even blood shall pursue thee.' He that 'cometh from Edom' is He that shall come to judge the nations, and at some stage in the course of the judgment of that day He will return from a great slaughter of the Turks, the Edomites of old—'the people against whom,' according to Malachi, 'the Lord hath indignation for ever' (Mal. i. 4). He is red in His apparel because He hath 'trodden the winepress alone.' These words certainly refer to the execution of divine wrath upon Edom. The speaker goes on in the same breath, 'I will tread them in Mine anger, and trample them in My fury, and their blood shall be sprinkled upon My garments, and I will stain all My raiment.' Is not this clearly 'the winepress of the wrath of God' described in Revelation? (Rev. xiv. 18—20). It is 'trodden without the city,' not at the beginning, but at the end of the Christian dispensation, when the angel shall 'thrust in his sickle' and 'gather the clusters of the vine of the earth.' In other words, the coming from Edom clearly belongs to the Second Advent. It is out of all harmony with the Scriptures to assign it to that period of His work when Christ came in humility, to suffer and die for all mankind. He did not then 'tread His enemies in anger, or trample them in His fury.' This exhibition of divine wrath is reserved till that great day of the Lord, when He shall come in power and great glory to judge the world. Then, and not till then, will He tread 'the winepress of the wrath of God'

"And He will tread it 'alone.' Alone He has redeemed the world from sin, with His own precious blood. Alone has He triumphed over the powers of death and hell, by His glorious resurrection. He has overruled the affairs of the world and shaped the destinies of nations alone. He alone will save His people out of the hand of their enemies, and punish those who have afflicted them. There is none other that can help. 'Of the people was there none with Me.' 'I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold.' The Powers of Europe stand to-day hesitating and helpless. He alone will solve their problems, and with the instruments in His hand bring just judgment upon the nations. The chief instrument in His hand is Great Britain. By the hands of Britain He will surely bring retribution upon the Turks; for He has said, 'I will lay out My vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel' (Ezek. xxv. 14). Thus will He come 'in the year of His redeemed,' to tread the winepress of His vengeance alone; and to Him alone shall His redeemed give all the glory. "W. G. DAVENPORT,

AN AMERICAN VIEW OF BRITISH PROGRESS.

FOR the first time in the history of the world (says the New York Tribune) the population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is greater than that of France. This statement may be made with confidence, though its absolute confirmation may have to await the census which will be taken next year. At the beginning of this century France had 27,000,000 and the United Kingdom only 16,000,000 inhabitants. The discrepancy between them has been diminishing steadily, so that the last census, in 1891, gave France 38,343,000 and the United Kingdom 37,797,000 inhabitants—a French majority of only 546,000. The vital statistics of 1892 and 1893 showed that in those years the deaths in France outnumbered the births by more than 12,000, while in the United Kingdom the births were more numerous than the deaths by about 817,000. Since then a change for the better has been observed in France, so that the births now probably outnumber the deaths by a small margin. Nevertheless, the figures we have quoted indicate almost beyond the shadow of a doubt that the island kingdom is now the more populous of the two. The result had been attained not so much by any very rapid increase of British population, as by the abnormally slow increase, and sometimes actual decrease, of the French. Making all allowances for the disastrous effects of the Napoleonic wars and of the war with Germany in 1870-1, the native growth of France has been too small. In a century it has amounted to only 11,000,000, or about 40 per cent., while that of the United Kingdom, despite the famines in Ireland and the enormous emigration from all parts, has been over 21,000,000, or more than 130 per cent. In recent years the contrast has been most striking. In the 10 years from 1881 to 1891 the growth of France was only 671,144, while that of the British Isles was 2,862,547, or more than four times as great. Moreover, the evil in France is—or has in recent years been—progressive. Thus in the quinquennial census period, in 1876-1881, the growth of population was 766,260. In the next, 1881-1886, it was 546,055. In the next, 1886-1891, it was 124,289. And there are those who reckon that in the next, 1891-1896, it will be a minus quantity. Still more impressive is the contrast if we take the emigration from the two countries into our reckoning; as, indeed, we properly should. We have said that during the century France has grown from 27,000,000 to 38,000,000. She has also sent to her colonies and to foreign lands about 500,000 souls, making her total growth 11,500,000. The United Kingdom has increased from 16,000,000 to 37,000,000, and at the same time has sent abroad no less than 11,500,000, or as much as the total growth of France, making the actual British increase the enormous total of 32,500,000. These figures eloquently and convincingly explain the incomparable pre-eminence of Great Britain as a colonising Power, and establish her rank far above all competitors as a "mother of nations." They also give vivid colour to the visions of those who see in English the practically universal language of the future. For if, to the great growth of the British Isles we add the native growth of the English-speaking British colonies, and also that of the English-speaking United States, it becomes evident that no other tongue is worthy to be reckoned for a moment as a serious competitor. To rehearse in detail the apparent causes of this striking supremacy of Great Britain over France would be to repeat a twice-told tale. A few figures will express the gist of the matter more effectively than anything else. In 1893 there were in France 287,000 marriages, 874,000 births, and 867,000 deaths; while in the United Kingdom there were only 267,000 marriages, but 1,147,000 births, and only 732,000 deaths. That is to say, marriages are more numerous in France, but far more fruitful in Great Britain, and the death rate in the latter country is far the lower. If these conditions are to prevail in future, and these movements of population to continue, France may well be seriously concerned; and those who are speculating on the decay and fall of the British Empire may well revise their estimates. A country whose native population is at a stand-still, or actually declining, can scarcely hope greatly to extend its power. One that shows so great vitality and increase of native stock as does the United Kingdom has not yet reached the last chapter of its history.

The above appeared in the Edinburgh Evening News of January 4th last, and speaks for itself. It confirms, without meaning it, much that we have been asserting respecting the Identity of our race with the lost House of Israel for many years past, even before the increase of our nation's population developed as it has done in the enormous proportions noticed by the American writer in the New York Tribune, quoted above. The promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Israel always pointed to "population increase" as one of the chief marks by which His people would be distinguished during all time. Accordingly we find that in conformity with all observations and observers our race is pre-eminent in respect to this sign, till men are forced, like the American writer we quote, to confer on our race "a rank far above all competitors as a mother of nations!" This strange supremacy among the nations has filled the Transvaal at this moment with a huge mass of British miners and others, whose political rights call for recognition by the Boer Government in the South African Republic. These rights have been hitherto denied and rejected, which has led to the sad and humiliating events which we have had to deplore in respect to Dr. Jameson, and his too daring, but lawless and hapless, "raiders." The same abnormal and constantly increasing redundancy of British population will, we believe, ere long, compel the Boers to give the dangerous, but now disarmed and dejected, British population, equal and common rights of citizenship, which is all they have ever demanded. We doubt President Kruger's ability to refuse this reasonable demand in the long run, though, of course, it will take power out of the hands of the Boer-oligarchy, and confer it on the whole of the inhabitants of the Transvaal, the majority of whom are British subjects even now.

The power of rapid increase of numbers has, of course, led to our vast expansion in the world; and as God has given our race, in a special degree, the ability to govern "the cheaper races" of the earth successfully, and to colonise profitably, too, our possessions have been firmly established and consolidated. But this very fact has given rise to fierce jealousies on the part of the nations, who, as we have lately seen in the instance of Germany, cannot endure our Colonial successes, and their own worse than failures in the same direction. They resent our "power to get wealth" from our colonies and our military possessions, like India, and chafe at the fact that we have secured all the desirable spots on the face of the earth in the best and most salubrious climates, leaving the hot and unhealthy regions for their own German operations,—regions where gold mines and diamonds exist not, where good coal is not to be obtained, and mines are not to be discovered to make men rich. Jealousy speedily breeds hatred and revenge, a specimen of which we have lately seen exhibited in the conduct of the German Emperor, representing the German people. Even Russia hates us with exceeding hatred, by reason of our commercial successes, as the following from the Novoe Vremya, published in St. Petersburg, testifies:—

THE GREAT SEA SPIDER.

The Novoe Vremya of St. Petersburg calls special attention to a correspondent who recommends the purchase from Holland of the Island of Pulo Babi, or Hog Island, to the north-west of Sumatra, as a coaling station for the Russian Pacific squadron. Russia is further advised to ally herself with the smaller Powers possessing colonies in the Pacific in order to support them against the "insatiable sea spider," otherwise England, whose character is blackened with every kind of accusation throughout this and other articles in the Press.

How the Boers have come to regard us with contempt, by reason of their easy victory at Majuba Hill, and their very recent success over Dr. Jameson and his heroic band of "raiders," is well told in the Scotsman, on January 8th, and is worthy of repetition. It is from the pen of M. T. C. Meiklejohn:—

Let us go back a few years in the history of the South African Republic, and see to what conclusion the successive steps will lead us.

At about noon on February 27th, 1881, a comparatively small band of Boers rushed a strong British position on Majuba Hill. Our troops were defeated, and Sir George Colley was killed. The result was an immediate armistice, and, under the auspices of Mr. Gladstone, a subsequent peace. This peace was made (1) after the Boers had inflicted a crushing and disgraceful defeat on the British forces, and (2) after they had actually remained for some time in possession of British territory. For Majuba Hill is in Natal, and not in the territories of the South African Republic. Mr. Gladstone then made us stomach three things—defeat, occupation of British soil, and thereafter a peace. It is easy now to suggest the "might have been"—to suggest, for example, that the Boers should have received one sound thrashing (which the reinforcements, then pressing to the front, would have enabled us to give in the end), and that they then should have been offered peace on fair terms. British prestige would have been satisfied, and the Dutchmen might have received the independence they had fought so bravely to secure. But it was not so. And what was the outcome? The mass of the Boers was left to think of England as nix werd ni—cowardly and contemptible. Anyone who knows anything even of the Boers of the Cape Colony will bear me out in this. It is now that verdomte Engelsman, though before the war the name of Englishman was one to conjure with. "The rooibatjes" (red-jackets), they will tell you, "are no good; our Transvaal cousins beat them once, and they could beat them again." And how much more contemptuous was, and is now, the language and feelings of the average Boer of the Transvaal!

Then came the opening of the famous Witwatersrandt in 1886. Immigrants poured in—chiefly English, home-born and Colonial—and they made the Transvaal what it is to-day, the greatest gold-producing country in the world. These immigrants naturally did not at first care about political rights; their only care was gold, and how to get it. The gold might "peter out," and they would then leave the country. But the gold did not give out, and so far from leaving the country, most of them looked forward to making it their future home. They then asked for their ordinary rights—asked to be made citizens of a country the wealth of which they had done so much to develop. Again and again they asked their bare political rights, but always in a perfectly orderly and constitutional way. What was the Boer answer? Just what might have been expected from a people obstinate, slow-thinking, and puffed up with the knowledge that they had beaten England, and that England had, as they held, humbly kissed the rod. They answered by suppressing public meetings, and a Volksraad member challenged the Uitlanders to fight for what they wanted.

The answer was not unnatural. Your Boer knows nothing of the world at large. Quite an intelligent Boer in the colony once asked me if it was not true that England derived her wealth from a private gold mine in England, wherefrom the Government dug gold for sovereigns. The instance is quite typical of the utter and dense ignorance that obtains among the Boers generally. Was it likely that your wild Waterberg Boer, in whose cottage hung a "Majuba" rifle, would make the Englishman, whom he despised, a political equal of himself? Agitation grew hotter and hotter, the first note of serious warning being sounded by Mr. Lionel Phillips. The people of Johannesburg—as irresponsible crowds will—became wildly alarmed, and in their extremity send an appealing message to Dr. Jameson for help—help for their property and their lives. Jameson, unwisely perhaps, but with a splendid dash, consents. The rest we know.

Here, then, is the historical sequence—Majuba, Mr.

Gladstone's peace, consequent Boer contempt for the English name and English power, immigration of the Uitlanders, their agitation for a franchise, Boers' contemptuous refusal, threatened revolution, defeat and capture of Dr. Jameson. Those who know the Cape Colony will testify to what racial feeling this Majuba peace has engendered; how English prestige has been lowered; how, after the war, the Afrikander Bond sprang into existence, to assert Dutch rights and Dutch nationality, which nobody before ever thought of attacking. And all because the Boers were not taught the salutary lesson that, had England chosen, she could have done with them as she willed. Hence, is it too much to say that Mr. Gladstone's peace policy was the first cause which had for one, at least, of its effects the defeat and surrender of Dr. Jameson?

Let us be thankful for the firmness and sanity of Mr. Chamberlain's policy, and for the skilful way in which he has treated the contemptible outburst of the German Emperor."

In all that is occurring in the Transvaal we see the hand of God manifestly working, but our blindness prevents us comprehending the object of each move, and whither the Lord is leading us. Two things reassure us, and make us content to leave all our matters in His hands. One is, that the troubles in the Transvaal are distinctly the result of our own vast population increase, the chief of all the blessings God promised to Israel His people. The other is, that we have found there prodigious wealth, in gold and other precious commodities, with which the Uitlander British have enriched the land of their adoption in a manner which is marvellous; and we see, therefore, that God is true to His promises to Israel, and is following us there with His presence and His blessings. We conclude that He means yet to give us an expected end, even in the Transvaal; and that we shall not, as His people, be brought to shame in the regions where just now our countrymen seem to be passing under a heavy cloud. For all the Lord is doing for us let Israel give Him all the praise.

SOME EVIDENCE FROM NEW ZEALAND.

By T. A. Finlay, N.Z.

One of our leading ministers, the Rev. James Gibb, of the First Church, Dunedin, the Pioneer Church of Otago, has just returned from a trip to Great Britain. He was interviewed on his arrival by representatives of our leading newspapers, and the report printed in the Otago Daily Times. I have clipped some closing remarks. Of course Mr. Gibb does not believe in our Israelitish origin, but the extract is none the less valuable on that account. It goes to swell the evidence in favour of the faithfulness of the Lord Jehovah, the God of Israel, and is another link in the chain which connects our British Empire with that favoured people, so favoured to-day, that even blind witnesses are forced to confess that "their seed is known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people—they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed" (Isa. lxi. 9.).

The following is the cutting:—"I was very greatly impressed," he added, "everywhere I went, with the strength and greatness of the British Empire. Travel where you will, you will find England either in possession or exercising a very great if not predominant influence in the disposition of affairs. Everywhere you can see tokens of her power, and if she and her colonies will stand shoulder to shoulder she need fear simply nothing. We have had, on the whole, a magnificent history thus far, but if we only stand together, and continue in the practice of that righteousness which maketh a nation, the historian of a century hence will have a far grander story to tell about us than any other that has yet been penned. That is my sober conviction. Evolutionists tell us that from the beginning and right along the whole course of development nature had man in view as the goal and crown of all her efforts; well, I feel as if I could go a step further and say that the particular race of men Providence has had in view as the ultimate human type is the race to which we belong. That sounds big, I know—'Like your arrogance,' a Frenchman would say—but such is my feeling. Long ago Emerson defined the British man as he who of all men stands firmest in his shoes. I always believed that to be a correct definition. The result of my travels has been to make me absolutely sure of its accuracy." Mr. Gibb has also been contributing "Jottings from his Holiday Journal" to one of our weekly papers, the Christian Outlook. These "Jottings" are intensely interesting and very readable. They are not only full of interesting descriptive matter, but they bristle with information of a valuable kind.

On his way to the "Home Land" he "did" the Holy Land, and several articles are devoted to what he saw there. In No. 5 of the "Jottings" he has some remarks on the Turk in Palestine. He points out very vividly the blighting and corrupting form of government carried out by that nation, and adds that "The day of doom cannot surely be very far distant for this wild-beast empire."

But in commenting on who shall take the "sick man's" place in Palestine he again adds some interesting remarks concerning our nation. Mr. Gibb says:—"And when the doom falls, who will assume the control of the peoples now so fatally misgoverned? Some of them will probably follow the example of these provinces which in recent times have been mercifully delivered from the thrall of Turkey, and are now independent States. Some—but not all. Palestine is not fit, will not for many a day be fit, for self-government. When the Turk marches out of Jersualem, who will march in? An Anglo-Israelite would say this was a superfluous question. Well, I'm not an Anglo-Israelite, and am not likely to become such. I have never found the literature of this sect other than a weariness to the flesh. But for all that, I should not be surprised if in the lifetime of this generation, the Union Jack of Christian England is seen floating over the grey walls of the Tower of David, near the Jaffa gate of Jerusalem, where only a few months ago I saw displayed the Crescent of Mohammedan Turkey. May God speed the day!" Mr. Gibb never spoke truer words, prophetical (in a way) though they may be as yet. The flag that will certainly float over Zion's hill will be "The Union Jack of Christian England," and with Mr. Gibb I fervently add, "May God speed the day."

But what about the "heirs" whom God chose to possess that land? What about God's solemn oath to Abraham? "I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. And I will establish My covenant between Me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, and I will be their God" (Gen. xvii. 6, 7, 8). Add to this those solemn words in Jer. xxxi. 35, 36, "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waters thereof roar; the Lord of Hosts is His name; if those ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever."

When we read this, and note the presence of the "Union Jack" everywhere, and the predicted planting of it in the near future on the "grey walls of the Tower of David, near the Jaffa gate of Jerusalem," we are bound to exclaim, "Who is Britain, that she should possess what God has bequeathed so solemnly to Israel? Let God Almighty be true. "Hath He said and shall He not do it? Hath He spoken and shall He not make it good?"

Since God is true, the fulfilment of all His covenants to the British people must prove them to be one and the same as His people Israel.

This matter has been treated so often in the BANNER that it is superfluous for me to add any more. My motive in writing is to hand on to you, for circulation, testimony (blind though it be) from distant New Zealand which is well worth noting. May the God of Israel speedily open the eyes of our people to the fact that we are indeed His chosen people, and that He is using us to-day to the honour and praise of His great name.

Purekireki, Owaka, New Zealand, Dec. 7, 1895.

THE COLONIES.

COLONIAL LOYALTY.

WHILE the Empire draws breath after the stormy opening of the year, the moment is opportune to consider one permanent aspect of the crisis through which a portion of it has passed. The loyal demonstrations made on the first hint of danger by our principal colonies have enabled the English-speaking public to appreciate better than when Mr. Foster, the Finance Minister of Canada, first used his striking phrase, the significance of that "splendid isolation" in which Great Britain elects to stand. The vigour and promptitude with which an English Colonial Minister has dealt with an English difficulty in one portion of the Empire has caused his name to be greeted with English cheers all round the world. The demonstrative applause of a London theatre finds its echo on the Stock Exchange of Melbourne, and while Canadian shipmasters on Lake Ontario meet and pass resolutions to place their services at the disposal of the Imperial Government, the Australian Natives Association, ordinarily quoted as an anti-Imperialist body, suspends a meeting at the antipodes in order that the National Anthem may be sung. From Cape Town, from Natal, and from Rhodesia, where late events have naturally stirred a sterner spirit, expressions of confidence have made themselves passionately heard. Throughout the entire Empire British subjects have felt themselves at one, and the expression of their unity has been made no less forcibly by the popular than by the responsible official voice.

Speaking in Sydney on the first day of the year, Mr. Reid, the Premier of New South Wales, pointed out that the pressure of external events was a force likely to operate in the interests of Australasian union. Little more than a week had passed before he was deputed by the Governments of Australia and Tasmania to give wider significance to his own forecast by telegraphing in their names to the Imperial Government a united assurance of loyal support in the measures taken for the "defence of the integrity of the Empire." The Government of New Zealand forwarded a practically similar resolution, and announced that the colony was fully equipped to resist invasion. Lord Salisbury in his reply accepted the resolutions in all their gravity. Nothing, he said, could give greater confidence to her Majesty's Government in maintaining the rights of the country than the knowledge that "we have the full approval and good will of our fellow subjects in the great colonies of the Empire." In the scheme of federal defence which is to be discussed by the Australian Premiers at Sydney next month it is, we learn, intended to give practical form to the assurances addressed by the colonies to Lord Salisbury. From the Government of Natal a resolution of the same kind was received, and the inevitable tendency to bitterness of Dutch feeling at the Cape did not prevent Mr. Hofmeyr, in his capacity of leader of the Dutch party, from strongly supporting the attitude of the Imperial Government towards any foreign interference in the South African affairs.

In Canada the expression of loyalty early took the form of a resolution brought forward by the Canadian Government to "put the militia and defences of this country, as far as it can possibly be done by Canada, into a state which is adequate to the feeling, interests, and security of this country in itself and as a portion the Empire." During the same sitting of the House of Assembly, Mr. M'Neill, an Ontario member, gave notice of a resolution to the effect that the "House desires to assure her Majesty's Government and the people of the United Kingdom of its unalterable loyalty and devotion to the British Throne and Constitution, and of its conviction that, should occasion unhappily arise, in no other part of the Empire than in the Dominion of Canada would more substantial sacrifices attest the determination of her Majesty's subjects to preserve unimpaired the integrity and inviolate the honour of her Majesty's Empire." The resolution was adopted unanimously a few days ago amid prolonged cheers by an assembly composed in great part of Irish and French Catholic Canadians. In the debate which preceded the adoption of the measure nothing was more noteworthy than the position taken by Mr. Laurier, the French leader of the Opposition. It was made clear by the mover and seconder of the resolution that the intention was to demonstrate to other parts of the Empire and the world that the British people, in whatever portion of the Empire they may happen to reside, are "one people, animated by one spirit, and determined to stand as one man in defence of their common rights." Recent troubles were declared only to have accentuated the Canadian determination to remain part and parcel of the Empire, and the resolution was spoken of as a national pledge to move towards Imperial federation. If there were a movement to which French Canadians might be pardoned for hesitating to commit themselves with enthusiasm it would be a movement prompted in the British interest by a sentiment so sincerely British. Nevertheless, among the supporters of the resolution none were more cordial than the French Canadian members of the House, and we have good ground to believe that Mr. Laurier expressed something more than a personal sentiment when, after a warm eulogy of British institutions, he declared his conviction that should England be called upon to repel her foes she would have the ready service of British subjects all over the world, "not only British subjects who are not of her own blood, but British subjects who are not of her blood, but who have received from her the inestimable blessing of freedom." This is the same spirit as that which caused the leader of the Dutch party at the Cape to offer, on the day after the surrender of Dr. Jameson, to use his influence to obtain from President Kruger redress of the legitimate grievances of Britis' subjects living in the Transvaal and leniency of treatment for the prisoners. It is a spirit justly born of the liberality of British rule in those colonies to which self-government has been granted. It finds an echo in Mr. Chamberlain's recent declaration that he intends to base a strong British policy in South Africa upon the support of the Dutch majority at the Cape and in Natal. It is a spirit which renders it possible to look with hope for the ultimately peaceful solution of all the internal difficulties inseparable from the maintenance of the Empire. The existence of such a spirit is, in one word, the highest testimony that an Imperial people can receive of their fitness to occupy the position in which contemporary history has found them.

Much has been said at various times of the disruptive influence likely to be exercised by the discontented Irish element throughout the Empire. If we may trust our late experience, an Irishman has only to leave Ireland in order to become a loyal defender of the British flag in any other portion of the earth in which he finds it float above him. There is no British colony in which the Irish element has not a Parliamentary representation. There is no Colonial Government which does not depend on Irish support. Yet from every Government of the Empire loyal resolutions have come unopposed.

We have heard also a great deal of the Separatist tendencies of the native-born Australian. Yet it is not only through the Australian Governments which his vote is supposed to govern that the expression of the feelings of Australia reaches us. The popular demonstrations which have been already noticed are indication enough that there is no magic in Australian air to tempt the native-born to forego his birthright. Australia has lived her short century of life in practical immunity from external danger. The same developments of modern science which have given her the benefit of European resources and brought the markets of the old world to her shores have included her within the European system and laid her open to the dangers long sustained by other peoples. For her, as for the other portions of the Empire, strength goes hand in hand with unity. It is not the least of the advantages which may be reaped from late events that this appears to have been generally realized.

Again, in South Africa and in Canada it has been asserted that the Dutch and French elements of the population were elements of discord certain to develop sooner or later into elements of disruption That in such an experience as that through which we have lately passed we should be able to base our policy with confidence on Dutch loyalty in the South African colonies goes far to disprove this theory, while from Canada we are happy in the assurance that our French subjects are no less keen than those of Scotch and Irish and English races to defend the freedom of the flag.

In return for their devoted loyalty our colonies trust to us for the naval protection of their shores. We have done our part in the movement of the last few weeks by showing that we are both able and determined to accord it. The troubles which for a moment seemed to threaten the peace of the Empire have served a valuable purpose in drawing closer this mutual compact of allegiance and of strength. They leave us the richer for the new conception which they have enabled us to gain of a possible splendour in Imperial isolation.—The Times, Feb. 17th, 1896.

A NEW ZEALAND DISCUSSION.

PART I.

THE New Zealand Herald of November 16, 23, and 30, published a discussion on the subject of "Where is Israel?" between a correspondent "Colonus," who took our view, and a Dr. Giles, an authority in Auckland who opposed him. It is interesting to see how the matters which occupy our attention here are viewed by our antipodean fellow-subjects, and we are glad, therefore, to introduce the parties to the discussion to our readers' notice at home. Colonus of course led the way.

"WHERE IS ISRAEL?

"The intense interest that is now centreing in Bible lands cannot but revive enquiry as to a people once the most prominent in Bible history, but now lost to sight.

"The disappearance of the Ten Tribes is an incident familiar to all Bible readers. They were carrried away from Samaria into captivity 720 years or so before the Christian era; and planted in what was then Media, now the Persian province of Azerbigan, skirting the south-western shores of the Caspian Sea.

"There they disappeared from history so far as the Bible is concerned. They never returned to Palestine, though their brethren, the Jews, did, who had been subsequently borne captive to Babylon.

"Josephus, the oldest historian who takes up the sequel of old Hebrew history, tells us so, and writing in the first century of the Christian era, says that at that time the Ten Tribes were 'beyond the Euphrates, still,' a great multitude whom no man can number.

"Where is that people now? One might be satisfied to let them sink in the night of history in which so many other people have been submerged, but that the Bible which had carried on the history of the Hebrews for so many centuries up to that disappearing point of ten of the Twelve Tribes constituting the race, refuses to let them be forgotten; and at the very time when they were exiled, speaks of a glorious future for them, such as was given or destined to no other people on the face of the globe.

"Of course, to those who don't believe the Bible, so much prophecy is simply fairy tales, and with them there is no use in discussing the subject. But to the many who constitute the great bulk of our community, to whom the Bible is what it professes to be, the Word of God, it is certainly treating it with little concern to turn an incredulous ear to that portion of it which professes to literally tell of the greatness and expansion in the future of a people which had occupied almost the whole of the history contained in the Bible.

"There are those of them who accept the records of the past, and the doctrines and teachings of the Bible in so far as they tell of what had happened; but when the Bible points forward to what is to happen, they treat its sayings as not worth minding, and even piquantly say that when a man turns to the study of prophecy he is yielding to the dotage of senility.

"This smartness on the subject is paralleled by others, who, as the easiest way of getting over the prophetic history of the still chosen people, say God did not mean it, only in a mystical sense; and that the statements, however vraisemblablement, are to be 'spiritually' understood.

"But anyone with honest candour looking at the prophecies, and seeing the way in which they are mixed up with warnings and threatenings, and references to incidents past or then proceeding or impending, must conclude that the prophetic utterances are either real things or nonsense.

Digitized by Google

"That they are nonsense will hardly be asserted by anyone that takes the Bible for what it purports to be, and the statements of future history should be taken for what they also claim to be.

"In this light it is beyond dispute that Israel, after the carrying into captivity, was still to be under the special protection of Heaven, and that it was promised, after years of suffering and wandering, to become the mightiest nation on the face of the globe.

"In this survey Israel, or the Ten Tribes of the captivity, is to be viewed as quite distinct from Judah or the Jews. Notwithstanding that they are as distinctly separate in history, and character, and destiny, as England is from France, it is the fashion of clergymen and others to indolently mix them up as if they were the same.

"The two families of the Hebrews parted in the revolt led by Jeroboam after the death of Solomon, and throughout the whole of subsequent history, and in their after fates and fortunes as shadowed forth in prophecy, they are never confused or blended except by clergymen in their pulpits; and so they are to continue separate and distinct, if the Bible tells the truth, till that day when, in the words of Jeremiah, 'In those days the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers.'

"But let us see what traces have been found of the further history of these exiled tribes in Media. The Apocrypha is not recognised as among the canon of Scripture, but it is usually regarded as a probable record of traditional history; and in the second book of Esdras, reference is made to the next migration of the exiles.

"The writer says, 'These are the Ten Tribes which were carried away prisoners out of their own land in the time of King Hoshea, whom Shalmeneser, the King of Assyria, led away captive, and carried them over the waters, and so they came into another land. But they took this counsel among themselves that they would leave the multitude of the heathen and go forth into a further country, where never mankind dwelt, that they might there keep their law, which they had never kept in their own land. And they entered into Euphrates by the narrow passages of the river. For the Most High then showed signs for them, and held still the flood till they were passed over. For through that country there was a great way to go, namely, of a year and a-half; and the same region is called Ar-Sareth. Then dwelt they there until the latter time.'

"This region was on the northern shore of the Black Sea, where the river 'Sereth,' flowing from the Carpathian mountains into the Danube near its mouth, and the city of 'Sereth' near its source, bear testimony to the identity of the region to this day.

"Herodotus, the father of history, corroborates the statement, showing that the inhabitants of this country, whom he names the Scuthoi or Scythians, had come from south of the Araxes or Media. He describes them as highly civilized and very warlike, 'wiser that any other nation,' possessing no houses, but waggons, and 'unconquerable and even unassailable.'

"This historian, whose accuracy in inquiry is famous, describes the minutiæ of their forms of sacrifice, which are identical with the Hebrews rites of sacrifice, says they never used swine, the unclean animal of the Hebrews; and they claimed to have a national existence of only a thousand years—which from that date B.C. 500, exactly reached back to the exodus of Israel from Egypt.

"Herodotus gives the limits of the territory of these people from Media, at the time he wrote, B.C. 450, as reaching from the Danube to the Don, being a square of 4,000 furlongs each way, one end of the realm thus reaching to Poland.

"M. Paul du Chaillu, who has recently investigated the records and traditions of the Scythians, in a research extending over eight years, carries the advance of this great warlike race further towards the north-west. Odin, a mighty Scythian leader, had led a host of warriors from Asgard, now Kiev, on the Dnieper, the central river of ancient Scythia, and not far from the Ar-Sarath of Esdras, sweeping the tribes in his track back on the Roman Empire, until he and his warriors occupied and settled Saxony and the lower Elbe, and other Scandinavian territories to right and left of the Danish Straits.

"That this region was the cradle of the Anglo-Saxon race, from which, in swarm after swarm, Angles, Saxons, Jutes, and Danes passed over into England, is recognised by all.

"This blend of Apocrypha and history, of traditions, and Eddas, and Sagas, is not, of course, conclusive testimony, but the undoubted passage of the Median exiles to the north of the Black sea, confirmed by the unquestioned accuracy of Herodotus, taken in conjunction with the facility for their extending their migration to the shores of the German Ocean, as traceable in traditions and the twilight of history, shows at least the possibility, if it does not also the probability, of the Angles, Jutes, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, the progenitors of the Anglo-Saxon race, being the descendants of the exiled tribes from Media.

"But turning from this excursion in history and tradition, let us come again to the Bible, and see what it was that was predicted of Israel in the land of its exile.

"And in this connection more force will perhaps attach to what was said of these tribes immediately before their captivity or when already in exile, than of the promises given to Abraham and Jacob and others before the time of the comparative greatness of the children of Israel under David and Solomon.

"The prophet Hosea says, 'They shall be wanderers among all nations,' and 'Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured or numbered; and the children of Judah and the children of Israel shall be gathered together, and they shall appoint themselves one head" (Hosea i. 10, 11.)

"The prophet Amos says, 'I will sift the House of Israel among all the nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth' (chap. ix. 9.)

"And again he says, 'And I will bring again the captivity of My people Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and shall inhabit them.' . . . 'And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be plucked up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God."

"Isaiah says, 'The Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people, . . . and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth" (chap. xi.).

"In the book of Jeremiah, referring to the 'remnant of Israel,' the prophecy says: 'Behold, I will bring them from the north country, and gather them from the uttermost parts of the earth' (chap. xxxi.)

"In all these cases, and in hundreds besides, the promise is specific to the House of Israel as distinct from that of Judah, to whom other promises run concurrently and separately, sometimes in contrast, sometimes in resemblance, but always distinct, until the time when, as told by Jeremiah, Judah is to walk to Israel, and in conjunction be brought back to their fathers' land.

"To suppose, therefore, that the House of Israel has disappeared off the face of the earth, would be to stultify the whole of the prophets; and if it is still existing, and still the heir to such promises of greatness, and glory, and power, the question ought to be one of surpassing interest,—Where is Israel?

"Without referring specifically to the prophetic utterances descriptive of it, it is, wherever found, to be 'a great and mighty nation,' 'a nation and a company of nations,' the 'chief of the nations,' 'dwelling by itself apart,' it is to be 'in the isles,' or as some have it, 'the coast lands of the sea,' in the 'isles afar off,' in the 'North Country,' and also in the 'West' from Palestine.

"It is to be a great maritime people whose 'seed shall be in many waters,' owning the 'ships of Tarshish,' with which it will bring Judah home to the land of the fathers, possessing 'the waste places of the earth' and filling them with its swarms of people.

"It must be an unconquered and unconquerable race; with the lion and wild ox or unicorn for its national emblems. It must be the means of blessing to all nations and God's messenger of salvation to the heathen. It must be possessed of enormous wealth, lending to many nations and borrowing from none, and it must be a nation distinguished for observing the Sabbath as a perpetual sign of its identity, however otherwise concealed.

"And according to the prophecy of Ezekiel it will have to meet and conquer on the hills of Israel, Gog, the 'Prince of Rosh,' in decisive combat for the possession of the Holy Land.

"In the present concentration of the attention of the whole world on the lands of Bible history, and the gathering of the storm clouds in the East, and in view of the evident foremost part which Israel with her 'ships of Tarshish' is to take in the final settlement, the question is a grave one, Where is Israel?"

"WHERE IS ISRAEL?

"To the Editor.

"Sir,—In proposing to your readers the question, "Where is Israel?' your contributor, 'Colonus,' invites their steps to a track which proves rather slippery to those who do not guard their goings with a little judicious scepticism. In the first place, what certainty have we that the whole people of the Israelitish kingdom were carried away? Is it not more likely that only the people of mark, as Professor Wellhausen thinks, were taken into captivity, and that the mass of people remained, mixing with other inhabitants of the land, and losing, to some extent, the purity of their religion though retaining much of the Mosaic tradition? This supposition seems to account better than any other for the offer made to the Jews at the restoration to join with them, on the ground of a common worship, in the re-building of the temple, as well as for the relations known to exist between Jews and Samaritans in the time of Jesus Christ. This apparently reasonable doubt which attends the first statement of the question must necessarily infect all the subsequent arguments consisting of etymological conjectures, inferences from old legends, and gratuitous assumptions concerning prophecy, which constitute the usual armament of Anglo-Israelism.

"To go further into the subject would occupy more space than perhaps you would be willing to allow me; but I may be allowed to suggest that 'Colonus' has perhaps rather misunderstood the meaning of Herodotus, who, I think, does not intend to assign Media as the cradle of the Scythians, a race whom he describes in such a fashion as scarcely to admit of their identification with a band of captives who had been brought over from Samaria 200 years before..

"One more word. If it is true that the Israel so long lying hid 'must be a nation distinguished for observing the Sabbath, as a perpetual sign of its identity, this surely must at once dispose of the claim of the English people to be the lost Israel. Of course I know that many good people are in the habit of giving to the first day of the week, or Dies solis, the name of the Sabbath, and of inculcating a sort of half and half Jewish observance of it, but as a matter of history and fact I have never heard of any time or place in which any considerable section of the Anglo-Saxon race have paid any attention to the Sabbath.—I am, etc., "J GILES.

RANDOM SHAFTS.

BEING separated by only twenty miles of water, the difference between the characters of French and British would be incredible if it were not well authenticated. Despite their nearness, the French do not understand us, nor do we understand them; and this is partly accounted for by the fact that we are so diverse in constitution. Perhaps the dissimilarity is most patent in the arena of colonisation, for while the Anglo-Saxons have the colonising instinct to an abnormal degree, it is totally absent in the French. But the element which Britannia rules is responsible for a further conspicuous example. The French are not very clever on the ocean—they admit that, but the truth is they have no natural liking for the sea; whereas with us it is a favourite, and for tens of thousands it has a fascination. Hence our people are at home with the waves, yachting is a leading sport, and the British tar is the best of tars.

I am aware that now-a-days Jack is often contrasted with Scandinavian or German sailors, and said to be distinctly inferior. But self-depreciation is a popular pastime with Englishmen: in that respect they certainly "dwell alone." If we are to believe what we read, French, Germans, Scandinavians, Swiss, Dutch, Belgians, Italians, Russians, Turks, Chinese, and Matabele all tower above us, and our proper business in the world is to blush. John Bull is never satisfied with his lot or his children. The Israelites of old, it will be remembered, were noted grumblers, and grumbling still runs in the blood. On the whole the British mariner is not so abstemious as the foreigner, and he may not be quite so docile or so cheap. But for the necessary qualities of a seaman—for skill, coolness, and courage—he has no peer. Alien crews for those who want them, and in fine weather it does not much matter; but when the gale is raging I would rather be in the hands of an English crew even if the crew consisted of lads.

That, however, is by the way. We were dealing in particular with the French, and a new appointment to their navy brings out the disparity of which I was speaking. It would seem that the French bluejackets are unhappy on board the ironclad, although the large majority of them belong to the maritime province of Brittany, which should be a nursery for the naval spirit, if there was any naval spirit to nurse. Taking no interest in their duties, they become depressed; and as depression is not the stuff of which victories are made, the Government are anxious to remedy the evil. . With this end in view they have hired a gigantic Breton called Yann Nibor, who combines in his person the poet, the vocalist, and the elocutionist, whose task it is to visit the ships, singing patriotic ballads and reciting rousing tales of battle. By this means it is hoped to cheer the hearts of the languishing sailors, and we need not grudge the poor fellows what pleasure they can extract from their minstrel. But that such a functionary should be required is curious and significant.

British "greed" is a perpetual theme of the foreign press, and the editors of our own religious papers, whose wisdom is equalled by their charity, heap calumnies on Anglo-African "robbers." In this connection a couple of recent utterances deserve notice. Mr. H. M. Stanley contributes an article to the February Century Magazine on the development of Africa, in which he reminds the public that Great Britain was actually the last Power to join in the scramble for it, shewing that we were driven by events, not by avarice, to adopt a forward policy. And, again, the Rev. T. W. Bates, an American missionary, declares that "Too much is being said about the greed of England. She has done more for Africa than any other nation. She has a history in Africa extending over centuries. Her occupation has always resulted in the elevation of the natives. She alone of all the nations forbids the sale of intoxicants to the natives; she aids in education and civilisation; she gives the natives the rights of a man. It would mean a decided advance in civilisation if England might have all of Africa instead of the small share that has fallen to her." She will get it all, Kaisers and Krugers notwithstanding.

Little Englanders have two or three stock, stale, and stupid arguments, one of which is that after stealing a piece of territory we deprave the inhabitants, "poison them with rum," and so forth. Of course they do not fail to extol the virtues of our Continental rivals, but whether they write in ignorance or malice is an open question, for they have a considerable allowance of both. The witness of Mr. Bates as to the attitude of this country on the drink subject is valuable, seeing that it is impartial; and those who wish to know the truth concerning our neighbours may learn something from the complaint of a German missionary stationed at the Cameroons. The German Government having resolved to lay out plantations in that corner of their dominions, 200 negroes were employed at the work, and, according to this gentleman, they each received on Saturdays a bottle of spirits in part payment of their wages. The next day, as a consequence, they were intoxicated, or half-intoxicated, entirely unfit for the devotions of the Sabbath; and when the missionary protested against this system of fostering drunkenness he was informed that it saved 100 marks in the week—sixpence per head. For which contemptible amends the officials were willing to blight a community.

A short time ago the Editor criticised a paragraph in Cassell's Encyclopædia, which not merely aspired to expound the Identity, but, in the usual off-hand style, pretended to dispose of it. The obnoxious words were: "Anglo-Israelite theory, the view that the English people are the descendants of the lost Ten Tribes, recently made prominent by the writings of Edward Hine and Philo-Israel, but hopelessly at variance with linguistics, ethnology, and historical evidence." The author does not say what phases of ethnology and history conflict with the "Anglo-Israelite theory," but as other opponents have been more communicative and less judicious, we are at no loss to interpret his ideas. Were he asked to be explicit, he would tell us what we have been told on a thousand occasions: "The British have not the remotest relation to Israel; they are Aryans."

It is, therefore, worth while turning to an article on the Aryans in the same publication, from which we find that the origin of the Aryans is a matter of pure speculation, and that the only safe conclusion to arrive at is that "the Aryans must be regarded not as a single race, but as an amalgam of many Caucasic and no doubt some Mongolic peoples." If, then, the British are Aryans, and the Aryans consist of many Caucasian races—names, pedigrees, and sources unknown—there is no apparent reason why our Israelitish lineage should be "hopelessly at variance" with ethnology. And if those various tribes have been "endowed with a certain racial uniformity," by a "general adoption of Aryan speech, traditions, and usages," it is difficult to see how the circumstance that we talk English instead of Hebrew can be "hopelessly at variance with linguistics." For it is clear that the operation of changing a language was once "general," and that we have probably done it ourselves whether we are Israelites or not. Having pronounced so forcibly against Anglo-Israelism, the managers, of Cassell's Encylopædia should be very careful as to what they insert. There are pitfalls on every side.

JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

THE ISOLATED NATION.

AFTER all there is nothing particularly new in the isolation of England about which many of our Continental critics have so unduly excited themselves during the past few weeks. Virgil remarked on it long ago:

"Et penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos."

Surely, when we have classical authority for our position, it is rather late in the day to grumble at us for not being over anxious to change it, especially as we have done pretty well in the circumstances for nearly two thousand years.—Globe.

"Lo the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations" (Numb. xxiii. 9).

BANK SECRETS.

THE ink which is used in the printing department of the Bank of England is made from the charred stem of the Rhenish vine, which produces the richest black of any ink in the world. Each portion of the die from which the notes are printed is made by a different engraver. There is a small safe in one of the vaults of the bank which contains £8,000,000 sterling, and one vault, the richest in the Bank of England and in the world, contains £80,000,000.

"The Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store, and thou shalt lend unto many nations. Thou shalt not borrow" (Deut. xxviii).

ANGLO-ISRAEL DISTRIBUTION FUND.

"To make known to the sons of men His mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" (Psa. cxlv. 12).

"Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have" (2 Cor. viii. 11).

OBJECT:—To proclaim by specially defined means the fact of the Identity of the British people and the whole Anglo-Saxon race with the House of Israel, distinct from the Jews, the House of Judah. Method of work: Literature treating of the above subject is purchased and distributed by a staff of carefully-selected workers, over 150 in number, who are requested (1) to give freely to those who desire to read, but are not able to buy for themselves; (2) to lend, or give when necessary, to those who will read, but who are not in the first instance sufficiently interested to purchase publications; (3) to avoid, as far as possible, waste of literature. The Sowers of the Seed are in the Army, Navy, Police, and in private life, and are stationed in the British Isles, Canada, United States, West Indies, Malta, India, Burmah, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, South Africa, &c.

Westgate-on-Sea, Feb. 22nd, 1895.

SOWING THE SEED.

We have received special reports of work going on in Canada, United States, New Zealand, Burmah, and India, which give much cause for rejoicing, as there is proof of knowledge extending, and that which we have most to be thankful for, is evidence shown of a deepening feeling of the solemnity of our work. British-Israelites, who recognise their duty to God in respect to His revelation to them of their origin and mission, we hope may be counted by our Lord amongst His "watchers," for are not they in earnest watching "the signs of the times," and trying to prepare the way ere He comes?

From one and another place in our Colonies comes a longing desire for lecturers to proclaim the truths they have a long time studied and set their hearts upon; men who can speak, and also reply to enquirers and opponents because they are familiar with various arguments and the grounds for our belief that we are Israel. The same desire is constantly expressed by our home correspondents. People must read for themselves, we know, must study the Word of God, but the living voice, telling out the wonderful truth with power, warms the heart and stirs to action in a way that the written words can seldom do. We want the good news to go apace to kindle weary hearts and minds to fresh devotion in the service of our Lord. And it might thus fly, it will do so,—who shall doubt it?—when the "watchers" shall be in constant prayer for the gift of the Holy Spirit Who alone will awaken the people. Yet, still, we believe frequent use of human means is made by the Almighty.

So are we led to consider that we have in reality, in the body of British-Israelites, men whose utterances of the newly revealed truths of God have been blessed by Him, aye, and far more than our general public are aware of. They are ready, and willing, and are wanted, but they are not free. Is it yet impossible for British-Israelites to provide their thousands of pounds for the great Mission to proclaim the advent of the literal, as well as the spiritual, kingdom of the Lord to which He has promised to come, the kingdom of Israel? If we will look in faith to the hand of God, and all realize the honour of doing His work, it will surely be possible for the gifts for this great Mission to flow in. One central Source might be established in the near future, and our lecturers be never left idle. Then should we delight to be ever following with the many publications that will be needed for the further instruction of the people, for the benefit of the many who cannot buy freely for themselves.

I hope and trust, with some confidence, that ready action shall be taken. I would ask that the BANNER OF ISRAEL, and the Covenant People would dwell upon the great need in these days when so many things shew a hastening on to the time of the end of this dispensation, and invite heavy subscriptions and wide support to be given for British-Israel Mission lectures, for the glory of God, and the salvation of souls. What are the so-called pleasures of this life in comparison with the joys derived from consciously, faithfully trying to do the will of God? May His blessing rest upon all our work for Him!

In the last four weeks 140 packets of literature have been sent to our Sowers and others, to whom some special gifts have been made. The BANNER OF ISRAEL, and the Covenant People have been despatched as usual. The places included in the general distribution are given below.

BRITISH-ISRAEL PRAYER UNION.

THE Secretary is glad to report that during the last month eight new members have joined, making a total of 1,567.

A donation of 1s. was kindly sent by Miss. R. Westgate-on-Sea; and one of 2s. from Mrs. G. Edinburgh.

The Secretary would be pleased to receive the names of any Identity believers who are searching the Bible, and are willing to join us in prayer to God, and hopes that many will do so.

Subject for prayer on last Sunday in March: "That God will guide our Statesmen in dealing with South African affairs."

A statement of the accounts for the Prayer Union for 1895 is as follows:—

Audited and found correct,

M. GOODCHILD.

The sum of £1 15s. 0d has been sent to the Rev. F. Aston as a donation from the Prayer Union, to the British-Israel Association. Members will see that by joining the Union and renewing their membership, they are helping to swell the funds of the Association, and so aiding the spread of British-Israel knowledge, besides benefiting themselves by their regular study of God's Word.

The number of new members admitted during 1895 has only been 18 as against over 50 for each of the two previous years. In spite of this decrease, let us still "go forward" and each and all be workers in our Master's vineyard.

The number of old members renewing their Cards was 68, which, compared with the number of members, is a very small one.

The Card of Membership has a list of chapters for the whole of 1896, also suggestions for study, prayers, etc. It is of a size convenient for keeping in the Bible, and will be sent on receipt of six stamps.

The first and second series of Monthly Comments on the whole Bible, by Philo-Israel, may be obtained. Price, in paper covers, 1s. 2d. each; in cloth, 2s. each, post free.

The "Prayers for Daily Use," being a prayer for each day of the week, by Philo-Israel, are 1d. each, or 9d. per doz., postage extra.

Review.

"Ada, Love at Jerusalem, Divine and Human." By Henry Francis Gordon. Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., Ltd., London. Price 10s. 6d.

THIS is a handsomely bound volume, profusely illustrated, well got up, giving interesting information regarding Jerusalem chiefly, Palestine in general, Egypt, Cairo, the Great Pyramid and other subjects interesting to readers of the BANNER. To give attraction, we suppose, to the volume the author brings into his narrative a love story, the heroine being Miss Wayton, travelling as her father's nurse and companion, and the hero who woos and marries her, Captain John Beaulite, V.C. Royal Navy. The matter that concerns us chiefly is the fact that the young lady is an Anglo-Israelite, as is the author of the book, and throughout it we have Identity teaching largely interspersed during the adventures of the party. The Captain is very strong respecting the scriptural distinction between Judah and Israel. Quoting his own father's words, he said that the two Houses became separated. "Just as distinct as the United States are from Great Britain, and under independent rule, since they took their freedom from the British Sceptre; so distinct and separated have been the two parts of the House of Israel, since the days of King Rehoboam's folly. . . . God took one of these (Ten Tribes), and loaned it to Judah for a certain time." From Captain Beaulite's conversation we suppose he holds the Teutonic theory, regarding the German nation as a part of the Ten-Tribed House of Israel. This is a great error; but quite as great a one is his assertion that Germany is Manasseh! The proof seems to be that "we won Waterloo, together," and that we both are in "God's Great Nation" Covenant. Nothing can be more absurd than this. Late events have shown that Germany is far from being Britain's helper or assistant in slave liberation in East Africa. She appears now in the light of our nation's pronounced enemy, intriguing to supplant us in the Transvaal.

The work before us contains much varied information regarding Palestine and the East. Chap. IV. deals with the tomb lately purchased by British subscribers. Chap. V. gives details of a visit to Calvary. After proceeding to Egypt, a trip to the Great Pyramid is superficially described on p. 422 to 426, and the author recognises that the great British Empire will ere long hold Jerusalem as its capital with the Lord Jesus Christ as its King.

We should have preferred a less liberal use of italics, capitals, and double capitals than has appeared good to the author, and the love scenes are perhaps a little too prominent in the work, though that may be deemed a matter of taste. Mr. Gordon has produced a very handsome book, which we hope will have many readers and answer his expectations. In regard to his Identity teaching it seems, as we have hinted, somewhat at fault in one important respect.

A NEW IDENTITY LECTURER.

THE following appeared in the South Durham and Cleveland Mercury of January 31st last. The new lecturer bears a good Identity name; though he is, we suppose, no relation of Mr. John Wilson, the predecessor of Edward Hine. We hope our British-Israel Association will have their attention drawn to Mr. J. Wilson, and as we understand he will be willing to work for the cause, from love of it, will make full use of his ability and powers. The report was to the following effect:—

"Last night a lecture, the proceeds of which will be given to the Yarm and Eaglescliffe Nursing Association, was delivered in the National School, Yarm, by Mr. John Wilson. The subject was 'The Origin and Destiny of the Anglo-Saxon Race,' showing from Bible prophecy and the classic historians that the great Anglo-Saxon race is simply the House of Israel literally transferred from the East to their new home in the West, whence they are destined to be a blessing to all mankind, and that their monarchy is the fifth and final predominant empire of the world. Mr. Wilson apparently had become fully acquainted with his subject, and spoke fluently all through, his remarks from time to time being deservedly applauded. An amiable discussion followed, in which it is pleasing to notice party politics and sectarianism were never introduced. Mr. C. J. Archer, chairman of the Parish Council, presided, and both he and Mr. Wilson were thanked for their services. There was a good number present, and the funds of a deserving institution will benefit in consequence."

Mr. Wilson reports to us, as one result of his lecture, that "at the least four persons who heard it, have now begun to read their Bibles with increased light." This is exceedingly important and satisfactory.

WE are glad to learn that a Second and Enlarged Edition of Mrs. Reep's useful pamphlet, "Is British-Israelism True?" is now in the press, and will be issued in a few days.

THE POWER OF ENGLAND.

IT seems that in the Russian press one paper, the Novosti, has an article recognising "the power of England," and warning Germany that in despising it, she may repeat the error of France in 1870, and of Russia in 1854. We allude to the following:—

"THE POWER OF ENGLAND."

St. Petersburg, Sunday.

The Novosti, in a leader headed "The Power of England," says Russia in 1854 and France in 1870 paid very dear for their illusions concerning the supposed weakness of their adversaries. The same might happen now with Germany, if she cherished similar illusions regarding Great Britain. The Novosti recognises the enormous real power of England, and refers to her advantageous geographical position, her unrivalled fleet, and her immense wealth and high standard of civilisation.

After the manner of the whole press of Europe, including, we grieve to say, our own secular papers, the Novosti takes no cognizance of the power which is behind our nation, being Israel, and is directing all her movements, arming her also for the work she has to do. "This people have I formed for Myself," is the declaration of the Lord, "they shall show forth My praise" (Isa. xliii. 21, R.V.). Having formed them for Himself and for His own service, He has given them power to contend against and conquer their enemies. He has given them with this object "the power to get wealth," the command of the sea, "the Gates," besides an Island Home, which He has guaranteed shall never be molested by their enemies, never successfully invaded, nor conquered. Our own endeavours have effected and could effect nothing, apart from this blessing and presence of God. The latter assured, we may defy all our enemies, as we did in the recent crisis, and await calmly the shock of nations, none making us afraid. Our comfort is, that our promised help from the Almighty King of Israel is perfectly unconditional. God's hand in the creation and building up of His nation is a fact clearly and broadly stated, "This people have I formed for Myself." The result which was looked for and promised was that they shall set forth God's praise!

It seems such miserable ingratitude that men so highly favoured should persistently, in all their public utterances, refuse to admit God's interference in their national condition, their immense wealth, their advantageous insular position, and in their vast real power as a nation. We are ready enough to boast of these things ourselves; but we seldom or never praise God for arming us as He has done, for giving us an impregnable island fortress for a home, for bestowing on us superabundant wealth, with "the power to get it," and "our high standard of civilization." With thankfulness to Him who is forming British-Israel to carry out His purposes to His glory we republish from the Times of January, 1895, a part of a Parliamentary paper issued by the Government giving us a comparative return of sea-going war ships belonging to our own and foreign nations, showing our country to possess 52 battleships building or built, 137 cruizers armoured and unarmoured, and 174 other vesels not torpedo boats. Total 363 (with gunboats and torpedo boats 747)! [For table see end of article.]

The full text of the letter or article of the Novosti mentioned above is too long for our colums and it is not devoid of venom. But we may venture to republish a few more of its sentences as they appear in the Times of Feb. 1st, followed by an opponent on the other side who did his best to show that ours was a "rickety" Empire, which would require a very slight push to upset it. The words were these:—

It is high time, therefore, that all sensible people should know that Great Britain is an Empire of such colossal strength as the world has never seen before. If we measure her power by extent of territory and number of population, she possess no fewer than 20,000,000 versts of land more than

Russia, and 375,000,000 inhabitants. It is true that her army is small, but she does not require the numbers of Continental armies to protect the seagirt positions of her own island and of most of her colonies, and her enormous navy of 747 vesels is immensely superior to any other fleet. Owing to her political constitution, the highly-developed autonomy of the different portions of her Empire, the inimitable energy of her citizens, and the inexhaustible wealth of the nation, Great Britain, in case of necessity, could exert such a force and power as no other country in the world, except perhaps the United States, could even dream of raising. Add to this the exceptionally high state of culture which renders available all means of science and experience, the incomparable political education, not only of the governing classes, but also of the mass of the people, her great knowledge of other countries for political and commercial purposes, and, again, the unexampled wealth by which to a certain extent the whole world is held in subjection, and we begin to understand that there is no State, no nation, more firmly secure than Great Britain. So great an Empire, of course, has its vulnerable points, but her power is very far from being as rickety at present as some of our home-bred politicians represent it.

This letter was promptly answered in the next number of the Novosti by the celebrated painter Verestchagin, who has just opened another exhibition of new and remarkable pictures representing various episodes of the Napoleonic invasion. M. Verestchagin is so well known everywhere that his view of England is interesting. He says :—

In opposition to the opinion of M. Modestoff, I take the liberty of declaring my belief that the world-wide power of the English is, indeed, rickety, and is held together not so much by the actual strength of that highly cultured and wealthy people, as by their astonishing self-assurance and diabolical insolence. This is shown by the example of British India, where 280,000,000 people are kept down by 60,000 English soldiers. Of course, the English are strong and clever enough to set one people against another, and thus to damp all aspirations after independence even among such great numbers. But let political disorders break out in two or three places in two or three different parts of the world and England would have to capitulate. Their lack of all discrimination in the choice of means for enriching themselves at the expense of others, or, in other words, for the economic enslavement of all the careless and unwary peoples of the world, together with their shocking cruelty in avenging attempts at revolt, make this nation, which consists individually of affable, educated, and well-mannered persons, the most unsympathetic for all other States. Let England take the mountain territories of the Himalayas. There is no need for us to dissuade or stop her. The exploit can only be a source of political weakness. The more Khanates and passes the English acquire, the sooner their dominion will break up in India and everywhere else. We took 100 years to conquer the Caucasus with the immense territory of Russia immediately at our backs, while England in her conquest of the Himalayas has to depend upon India, which is hostile. If war breaks out in Europe and simultaneous risings occur in India and Africa, which is not impossible, England would have to think of her safety. Only there must be no fear, no hesitation in acting without a moment's delay if that melancholy necessity ever presents itself. Let us hope it may not. I repeat, the English individually are splendid people and real gentlemen, with whom it is pleasant to have relations, but as for the whole English nation, if it is better to live in peace than a quarrel, then we must at least always keep a stone in our pockets.

The writer of this last specimen of national hatred, forgets that in respect to India we have seen the spontaneous union the whole strength of our Empire there effected by the bare mention of the alternative, that if they could get rid of the British power, they must accept that of Russia ! He forgot also, that on the occasion of the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857-58 we had a war on hand at the same time with China, and were able single-handed and with the help of the native races of the Punjab, then recently conquered, to destroy the 100,000 Sepoys who revolted and to recover the whole country they had overrun. Further he does not see, that if our Government were not founded on justice and equity towards the subject races, our 60,000 British soldiers could never hold in check the 300 millions (many of the military class) who there submit to us as the paramount power. So universally is it admitted in the East that our Indian Government is founded on justice and truth, that throughout the East, in Syria, Palestine, Arabia, and North-east Africa, the British Goverment, as administered in India, is looked forward to by the native races, as a coming welcome substitute for those which tyrannise over them now.

Our national Identity with Israel concludes the matter. The nation which God formed and defends, is bound to be the foremost nation of the world ; and Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. tell us in plain language, how she will fare in the coming collision with the Czar of all the Russias, and what then will be boastful Russia's own fate ! To the Lord Jehovah let Israel give all the praise ; for He only is, and will be, our sufficient defence in the coming time of trouble!

CONSTANTINOPLE.

"THE fabled American traveller who declined to leave the deck of the steamer on which he arrived at Constantinople, lest the beautiful impression should be destroyed by the dirt on shore, and so departed as he came, was wise up to a certain point, but it was a short-sighted wisdom. He lost more than he gained. Enjoying the panorama, he missed the diorama, for a walk about the city can be compared to naught else so fittingly, in its sudden and endless changes of points of view. The same features are beheld under half-a-dozen different aspects, and unexpected vistas and vignettes break upon the pedestrian at every turn. It is the paradise of the 'snap-shotter.' No great city has the quality of displaying itself to such an extent as Constantinople. You never see London, or Berlin, or Vienna, except by bits. Your impressions of them are disjointed. Neither the eye nor the mind can seize them as a connected whole. But Constantinople unrolls herself on her hills around her heart of azure waters, shewing all her charms at once. A German engineer and fellow-resident once said to the writer, 'Constantinople is an immense village, a huge collection of houses without a centre to which the life of the place converged.' To a certain extent this is true, but in the sense that there are several centres neutralising each other. The city of Constantine, the Stamboul of to-day, compact on its peninsula, was more homogeneous than the present capital, and the great hippodrome, the Al-Meidan of modern Constantinople, was undoubtedly the great feature and common centre. Stamboul is still the seat of Government, and the political and Imperial centre, but it cannot be called the nucleus of Constantinople life. The tracts of sleepy, deserted streets, interspersed with great vacant spaces, of which it is mainly composed, the shabby buildings of the Sublime Porte, and ramshackle Government offices, are not compensated for by the life around the bazaars and on the edge of the Golden Horn, and it is far outweighed by the commercial activities of Galata and the social importance of diplomatic Pera. To an inhabitant of either, Stamboul is a vague region, a city distant and apart, yet always in view; a beautiful mirage of cupolas and slender minarets, but little more.

"The real centre of Constantinople is, after all, the sea, which flows through it and embraces it, and winds about it, and comes home to it, with a fondness that not even Venice can claim. For the shallow, dull green lagune is not the strong, deep, laughing blue sea which kisses the feet of Constantinople. Long voyaged ships sail through the triple city, and what a fairy vision it is for the Russian steamers from far off Vladivostock, or the hundreds of English grain ships bound to and from the Black Sea, this apparition of domes and towers, this steaming between hills of houses, and through that magnificent marine street called the Bosphorus—the grandest thoroughfare in the world. There are some twenty-five miles of buildings between San Stefano and Buyukdere, and the aspect of the ships is as strange to those on shore as the metropolis to those on board. They hold on their course as they did in mid-ocean; they are not arriving, but performing their voyage, and the sea is brought home to the city as it is nowhere else in the world. There are three ways of approaching Constantinople, of which the railway within the walls on the Marmara face of the city is the worst. The one from the Black Sea and through the Bosphorus is stately, and if the sun is setting behind the cypresses and minarets of Seraglio Point, it is of entrancing beauty, but the approach from the West through the Sea of Marmora is to be preferred. The sudden revelation of the scene is more complete than in the route through the Bosphorus, which prepares the traveller, and takes the edge off the final effect.

"From the Marmora the sea-face of Stamboul, with its crumbling walls, painted wooden houses, and white mosques, is only seen, until Seraglio Point is rounded, when the heart of the place, hitherto hidden, bursts upon one, as by enchantment, with the suddenness of a transformation scene. It is so startling as to seem unreal at first. Still at sea, you are in the middle of a triple city. The Golden Horn, banked on either hand by hills of buildings, sweeps inland and round to the north, Stamboul to the left of it, and Galata and Pera to the right. Half-way up, the massive Galata Tower springs high above the houses, the dominant feature, and behind, roof above roof, rises the hill of Pera, the mass of buildings crowding round the great Embassies, which seem to keep guard over them. Stretching along the shore of the Bosphorus are Top Haneh and Fundukli, and beyond gleam the white lines of the Imperial palaces. The opposite shore is crowned by Scutari and Kodikeny, the old Chalcedon, predecessor of Byzantium. There are several cities vaster than Constantinople, not one of which gives such an idea of vastness in a single coup d'œil. When we enter it the impression of vastness gives place to one of continuity of pettiness, as far as concerns its architecture and plans; but the diversity of its human interests soon absorbs other considerations."

[The above appeared in the London Echo, of Dec. 14, 1895, and at this critical time will be of interest to those whose thoughts are occupied by the mighty events which just now seem to be preparing in connection with the Great Gate of all the Gates, promised to God's people Israel. (Gen. xxii. 17, R.V.).

BRITISH EMPIRE LEAGUE.

By H. R. Shaw.

Under the above title the Daily Telegraph of January 26th, 1896, contains the report of a meeting held the previous day at the Mansion House, under the chairmanship of the Lord Mayor, for the purpose of forming an association bearing this name, for maintaining and strengthening the connection between the nation and company of nations known just now as the British Empire, with its colonies and dependencies. The speech of Sir John Lubbock, in moving the first resolution, is worthy of being placed upon permanent record in the Banner, containing, as it does, many evidences of Our Identity with lost Israel. It runs thus:—

"Sir John Lubbock, M.P., moved the first resolution, as follows: 'That the attention of our fellow-countrymen throughout the Empire is invited to the recent establishment of the British Empire League, and that their support by membership and subscriptions is strongly recommended.' In support of his motion Sir John pointed out that, much to the regret of the City Branch, the Imperial Federation League had, by a majority of one, been dissolved in consequence of some difference of opinion on the council. Though this resolution had no reference to recent events, and had been arrived at months ago, still the circumstances of the last few weeks had shown the importance of, if not necessity for, some such organisation. In ancient history there were great empires which crumbled to pieces by their own weight, but they rested on the power of a despotic monarch, or were kept together by armed force; ours was knit by affection for our gracious Sovereign, by the force of our common interests, sympathy, and goodwill, and our pride in the great Empire of which we formed a part. (Hear, hear.) Our Army and Navy, like our Volunteers, were for defence, not defiance. We threatened no one, but fully intended to defend what was our own. When he spoke of the Empire he included the colonies as fully as the mother country; he included India, which we were glad to know was loyal, prosperous, and contented. For all this we had to thank our statesmen, our Army, and our Navy, and above all the character and indomitable energy of our own people. No nation had contributed more to the progress of human knowledge. (Cheers.) No nation had a purer or nobler literature, and the English language was a bond of union and bade fair to be the general language of the human race. In the art or science of government our country was the Mother of Parliaments. We often spoke of these islands as the Old Country, but that was only by comparison; we still glowed with fire and force of youth; we were still growing, not merely in numbers and wealth and material prosperity, but in those social and moral conditions which constituted the true glory of a country, and formed the only solid basis of the prosperity of a people. We were told that we were isolated. That he denied. There might be jealousy in some quarters, but there were many countries which did us justice. In any case, it was somewhat absurd to speak of the isolation of 300,000,000 men. (Cheers.) We had not owed our position either to the kindness or forbearance of other nations, but had won it for ourselves. There never was, he believed, a time when the Mother Country and the rest of the Empire were more firmly bound together by mutual sympathy and goodwill. Of that the league was evidence, and to promote and preserve happy union was the main object with which the league had been founded. The Duke of Devonshire had consented to become president, and they could have no better, none who would more unite them all. (Cheers.) In founding this league they would be taking a step which would tend to maintain and to strengthen the unity of the Empire." (Cheers.)

Sir John's reference to the crumbling monarchies of ancient history manifestly recalls the Stone Kingdom, whose smiting and growing is now, as ever, that which causes the despotic empires to crumble to the dust, and it is a matter of much surprise that the speaker should apparently miss the obvious conclusion, that given a system of old world empires palpably crumbling to dust before the advance of another system rapidly growing into a nation and a company of nations as is the British Empire, then this latter system can be none other than Israel, the Stone Kingdom foreseen by the King of Babylon, as being about to become the heir of the world. Sir John rightly praises the purity and nobility of English literature, and anticipates that the language will become the general language of the world, as who can doubt? and he accurately gauges the absurdity of talking about the isolation (splendid isolation it has been elsewhere called) of 300,000,000 men!

But, like the rest of our public men, the speaker fails to trace our splendid good fortune to its true source—viz., the love of Jehovah for His Israel whom we obviously must be if Sir John reports truly. Our envious neighbours can see, and are not slow to express the opinion, that we are no better as individuals than themselves, but in their opinion, rather a trifle worse than they, in spite of the patriotic utterances of our countrymen, and, if it be permissible to correct so great an authority as the kind-hearted inventor of Bank-holidays, we would like to say that it was not we, in this generation, who won our present position of splendid isolation, &c., but rather that it was won for us once for all by our Hebrew ancestor Abraham upon Mount Moriah, upon the momentous occasion of the last severe trial of his faith and obedience, as recorded in Gen. xxii.

"ISOLATED WE ARE, AND ISOLATED WE MUST REMAIN."

BY E. REEP.

IN the principal magazines for February there has been quite an irruption of articles on the present position of Britain. The Fortnightly Review has perhaps the lion's share of these. One which purports to be "A Lesson in German" has a word of admonition for those Englishmen who are as ready to lose their heads and temporarily dispense with brains as the most excitable of their continental neighbours. Instead of "swelling the chorus of clamourous accusations against German impudence, perfidy, and meanness, Englishmen should endeavour to understand their German kinsmen, for it is not Germany's fault that she is occasionally driven to live by her wits." On the contrary, "it is her misfortune, not her pleasure, that her national existence and her colonial enterprise, or something else she values or desires, have so often determined her to trample on the rights of the weak and defenceless, which she would have so gladly defended had it paid her to do so."

So long as Germans are designated our "kinsmen" it is as well that we should strive to know them intimately. What is the general line of German policy? Has it any especial features by which we can recognise the Germans as part of the latter-day House of Israel? "A Lesson in German" compels us to rebut any such assumption. All through that lesson we do not detect one link or sign by which Germany can be affiliated to British-Israel.

Neither here nor there, in a national sense, is she taking the Gospel to all nations, educating the heathen, abolishing slavery, conferring the rights of citizenship upon subject races, distributing justice to all, opposing tyranny, and maintaining liberty. It is perfectly true that Germany's lines have not fallen in pleasant places. Her position, as our lesson in German tells us, is well calculated, if not to evoke our moral sympathy, at least to arouse a feeling akin to compassion. She has had to struggle for national existence in fear and trembling. Unlike British-Israel, she has been gathered into no place of safety; she has, as it is said, since Alsace and Lorraine been positively living on her wits. She has endeavoured to hypnotise Austria, to court Russia, to charm Italy, which coquetry has been anything but an advantage to those countries. Russia has been jilted and expelled the Triple Alliance, Austria has not in the smallest way bettered herself, and Italy, by having been induced to supplant Russia, and through her efforts to qualify for the position, has been brought to the verge of ruin.

Thus we cannot recognise Germany as a part or subdivision of that nation in whose seed all the families of the earth were to be blessed. If a section of the latter-day House of Israel, whence the necessity for casting in her lot with a Triple Alliance? Israel's appointed rôle, at this particular period of her history, is obviously that of isolation. And since Germany is perforce entangled in foreign alliances, without whose support she would be a nation of straw, and Britain, on the other hand, is exhibiting more conspicuously every day her individualism, it is patent to all who care about the matter that Britain is Israel and that the Germans have no claim to be called our kinsmen. The very fact that Germany cannot afford to extend mercy and protection to the helpless unless it pay her to do so, is in itself a sufficient disproof of her affinity with the British. Israel was not formed to study her own interests before being generous, but to show herself a nation, at whatever sacrifice, in whom God could be glorified (Isa. xlix. 3).

To show that Germany is no friend to England it is alleged that she has aspired to bring about a Franco-Russo-German alliance, to the end that a check might be imposed on the British vampire. "In the Siamese question," it is pointed out, "she was on the side of France; in the Russo-Japanese difficulty she was on the side of Russia; in the Turko-Armenian question she baffled England's disinterested efforts to put an end to wanton bloodshed, and as if that were not enough she hatched a very elaborate plot to entangle us in serious difficulties in South Africa." In short, Germany is our enemy. For our friendship she has nothing to give in return—even if she would—for her magnificent army in Europe is of no use to us.

Therefore "A Lesson in German," in ignorance of the true destiny of the British race, would have us cultivate the friendship of Russia, now that isolation is fraught with danger. "Russia," we are assured, "has it in her power to give us everything we need, without the loss of anything she values, while we are in a position to help her to everything she desires without inconvenience to ourselves."

This now popular conception of a friendly and disinterested co-partnership between England and Russia would, not more than a decade ago, have been regarded by the whole British people as a mendacious joke. Ten years ago there was not a politician in Europe but that was convinced that a collision between England and Russia would sooner or later be inevitable. But to-day we are told that Russia, and Russia alone, can confer upon us the thing we value and need most—a long spell of genuine peace. Of course she would only afford us this blissful condition of well-being for a consideration: the consideration being Constantinople. It was once feared that Mr. Gladstone might, in his desire for peace, jeopardise the honour of England by being too lenient in his treatment of Russian encroachment and ambition. That fear has quietly subsided; hence we have not only a German lesson to learn but a Russian lesson also. Woe, according to the proverb, is bound to follow wickedness. How it will tread on the heels of Russia's future wrong-doing is a lesson set for us to learn in Holy Writ (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix., R.V.). Englishmen would do better to study that lesson than any put before them in German, even though Germany's policy is as it is described: "Let enemies and friends perish, if only Germany can scrape together enough to live."

As one sheep follows another, so we have in the Fortnightly's articles under review, in a paper entitled "Two Eastern Questions," a reiteration of the needfulness of an Anglo-Russian rapprochement. We are exhorted to remember that we are the rich man in a den of thieves, and that a good chance of despoiling us would unite all the Powers against us. The colonial mania which has seized France, Germany, and Italy has made them all more or less rivals with ourselves, and this rivalry is progressive. Our hope then should be in Russia, for she of all the Powers is the one which competes with us least.

There are few of us who do not hope for a more peaceful age, but hope grows by what it feeds on. Although Russia may not compete with us on the same lines as France, Germany, and Italy, her history does not inspire a large expectation that from her will proceed the voice of a peacemaker. Faith in Russia requires us to forget India as well as Palestine; to likewise get rid of certain reminiscences of her designs upon Afghanistan, to say nothing of closing our eyes against her partiality for China.

Within the next three or four years we shall see the completion of the Siberian Railway, an event that is not likely to curb Russian ambition. Indeed it is anticipated that she will then be prepared to take the Pekin Government and the northern part of China under her control. Thus, it is foreseen,* that we shall be forced into taking counter measures, which will involve the conquest of Southern China—the richest and most prosperous provinces south of the Great River. With such possibilities in prospect, the probability of an alliance between England and Russia is not very likely. Wherever Russia essays to advance beyond her proper boundaries there is the "British Vampire" an obstacle in her path.

And so, simply because we have a destiny to fulfil, every Power is against us. How unalterable is this destiny is suggested in the "Isolation of England," which of all the Fortnightly Review articles perceives that whatever sacrifices we might make to conciliate Russia, such sacrifices would only secure momentary immunity from danger.

In this same article we have a further lesson in German. It is said: "German colonists at present go abroad in search of employment, either to England, America, Africa, or Australia, make homes for themselves in these countries, adopt their nationality, and become lost to the Fatherland." With Germany, as with Russia, England bars the way to her expansion in almost every part of the world open to emigration. She moreover excites Germany's envy "because as a nation, the British are richer, freer, and more successful than their neighbours." Germany, however, has numerous sympathisers, for "there is not a State in the civilised world to whose vanity the magnitude of our prosperity and grandeur is not a cause of constant offence." And so, is the final conclusion, "isolated we are, and isolated we must remain." Nevertheless Britain, as Israel, must be in the midst of many peoples as a dew from the Lord (Micah v. 7).

AN INTERESTING MEETING WITH JEWS.

By Marcus S. Bergmann.

On Saturday, February the 22nd, Colonel Senior gave a lecture to a large Jewish audience in Christ Church Hall, Spitalfields, London, E. (the Jewish quarter). The Rector, Rev. J. H. Scott, presided. After prayer in Yiddish by the Rev. A. Bernstein, B.D., who is helping me in the translation of the Bible, the Rector, with a few well-chosen remarks in English as plain as his Jewish parishioners could understand, introduced the lecturer, Colonel Senior. The subject which the Colonel had chosen to speak on was "Nebuchadnezzar's Dream, illustrated by a large painting in gold, silver, brass, &c., of the wonderful image," as you will see by the enclosed notice (in Yiddish and English), which was widely circulated among the Jews by myself and a few helpers. After the Colonel had fully explained the image and the representing four kingdoms, he proceeded to show who the Stone Kingdom was, and read many passages from the Old Testament, from which he proved God's faithfulness in preserving the nation of Israel and centuries ago leading them into Britain, and that from this island they have been spreading and branching out in the very manner God had promised to our patriarch Jacob, "to the West, to the East, and to the North and to the South." The lecturer also showed the distinction between the Jews of the two tribes, and Israel of the ten, and also pointed out that the prophets plainly foretold that the House of Ephraim-Israel shall be found in the "latter days" as a great nation, possessing "the Gate of his enemies," and shall be a nation and a company of nations, and under a new covenant, or in other words as Christians, and that they were also to be a great maritime people and a missionary people witnessing to all nations by giving them God's Word translated in the various languages of the people. The Colonel also showed that in these "latter days" the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that God hath given unto their fathers for an inheritance.

The Colonel did not fail to give his large Jewish audience the Gospel. They were very attentive, though they were not able to grasp all that was said unto them in English. But their attention was most marked when I spoke to them in their own native Yiddish, and briefly explained all that Colonel Senior said with reference to the Identity, and especially I brought before them the remarkable manner in which our patriarch Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, by crossing his hands, thus showing that the blessing was given through the Cross, thereby testifying that in the "latter days" the House of Joseph shall be found a Christian nation. I put the question to my brethren, whether, supposing that the British people are really the Ten Tribes of Israel, there is anything in that fact to make us ashamed that they call us their brethren? I for one am exceedingly proud to belong to such a nation which has the mark of God's richest blessing upon it, and that this nation is indeed His own chosen witness unto the utmost parts of the earth, especially now unto us who have from various causes been driven away from our own countries and led hither that we may hear the glad tidings of the Gospel of the grace of God, and, like our fathers of old, may recognise in this nation our brother Joseph.

An hour and a half has been thus spent in placing before our brethren of the House of Judah the truth, not only of the Identity, but more especially as it is in the Lord Jesus Christ. The Rector again spoke a few kind words and I closed the meeting with prayer in Yiddish.

I think that altogether we had over 200 Jews in the Hall.

I may say that about half an hour before the meeting I took Colonel Senior about to some of the Jewish streets. We also visited a Jewish eating-house, and had some conversation with Jews; Colonel Senior took some views as we went along. Many of these streets now forming the Jewish quarter were a few years ago inhabited by the ordinary English people. But during the last ten years or so the anti-Semitic agitation on the Continent has had the effect of nearly trebling the Jewish population of England. Consequently, there are now in every large town, such as London, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, &c., large districts where the Christian population is being gradually pushed out by the Jews arriving from all parts of Eastern Europe. Here we have indeed Jeremiah iii. 18 fulfilled before our very eyes.

The Lord brings them here in order that they may have the Gospel preached unto them, which cannot be done on the Continent with such freedom as here. Though they arrive here full of prejudice against Christianity and the Christ, because of the persecutions and the terrible sufferings they have endured for so many centuries at the hands of those who call themselves Christians, after a short residence in England and their coming in contact with their own brethren, as for instance on the above Saturday afternoon, who thus show them Christianity in its true light, they are obliged to acknowledge that the Christianity of the English is nothing less than the religion of Moses and the prophets.

BRITAIN'S GREAT INHERITANCE.

Col. Senior's Lecture at Wellingborough.

"At the Central Hall, Wellingborough, on Wednesday evening, Colonel H. Senior, lecturer of the British-Israel Association, lectured on 'Britain's Great Inheritance.' The chair was occupied by the Rev. E. P. B. Weber, and there was a large attendance, the hall being filled. The meeting was opened by prayer and hymn, and in his introductory address the chairman said the subject of the lecture was a most interesting one, and at the same time one of vital importance, which they, as Christians, ought to consider. The subject had received great attention from many learned men, and the more the matter was entered into, and the more research made, it was very wonderful how minutely certain things were brought home, and absolutely proved Col. Senior's conviction that the English people were descended in direct lineage from the Ten Tribes of Israel, so-called lost. Proceeding, the chairman referred to prejudicies existing among Englishmen against claiming any descent from the Jews, but he claimed that there was no disgrace attaching to such a connection, because the Jews were God's chosen people.

"Colonel Senior, whose remarks were listened to with great attention, in the course of his address, first explained how he came to study the subject, and went on to remark that at the end of a year's study he came to the conclusion that the British nation was the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel. He characterised the arguments of opponents of the suggestion as weak and mis-stated, and said he had been able to answer every argument brought against him, because the matter was so simple and plain if only the Word of God were studied. God's promises were the base of the conclusions arrived at, and he was sure if his hearers would only look about them they would see that every one of those promises that had reference to the present time had been fulfilled, while others remained to be fulfilled. Proceeding to made deductions from the Bible, the lecturer showed that God had told the Israelites they should not be His people for 2,520 years. That time expired about 100 years ago, and it was a very remarkable fact that since 100 years ago the British nation had been rising and receiving all the blessings. But those blessings did not begin to arrive until the Israelites had finished their punishment, and then Israel began again to get all the blessings. People had not been able to find out the lost tribes because they had been utterly lost and scattered all over the world, and it was in consequence of that people were inclined to believe that the Jews represented the whole Twelve Tribes. That, however, was a mistake. The Jews themselves proved that, because every Thursday morning they offered up prayer for the Ten Tribes. He then alluded to instances in the Bible showing that the Ten Tribes were put into captivity, while he also contended that the Bible proved that these tribes were totally distinct from the Jews. He next stated that the punishment inflicted on the Jews would not expire until 1928, or 32 years hence, and then, according to God's promise, the restoration would take place, and the promised land also given. People thought the time of the second coming of our Lord was very near, and also the restoration, because the time of the banishment of the Jews was nearly at an end. The Jews could not represent Israel, because in Jeremiah the Lord said that when the sun should cease to shine, and when the ordinances of the moon and of the stars should cease, and when the waves should cease to roar, then only should His people cease to be a nation; and inasmuch as those ordinances were still going on they had evidence that God was true, and that these people had not ceased to be a nation. That could not apply to the Jews, because they had not got a national existence, but were only a scattered lot of people. Therefore, the lecturer maintained, that since God's Word was true and was fulfilled it followed that one of the nations of the earth must be the Ten Tribes of Israel. That being the case, they must go further, and in Jer. xxxiii. they would find that God promised to David He would establish his throne unto all generations, and he should never want a man to sit on the throne of Israel. Therefore, it followed that not only one of the nations must be Israel, but one of the nations must have a descendant of David sitting on the throne. It was a very remarkable fact that they were able to trace the pedigree of their beloved Queen Victoria through all antecedents to the kings of Ireland, through Zedekiah's daughters, up to David himself. So they believed God had fulfilled His promises in establishing the throne of David unto all generations for ever. Therefore, their Queen and throne was the throne of David, so often referred to in the Bible. Moreover, the Bible said the nation of the Israelites would be a strong nation, while God also said He would make the Ten Tribes the chief nation which should be in the last days, and the last days, Colonel Senior continued, were the present days. He maintained the British were the chief nation, which fact he would prove by the extent of her territory and the amount of her population. Another fact tending to prove that the British nation was the Ten Tribes was that God promised the Israelites that they should be a company of nations and that they should inhabit desolate territories and possess the Gate of her enemies. There was no nation that responded to that description more than the British.

"The lecture was abundantly illustrated with limelight views, demonstrating the greatness of the British nation and showing that the lecturer's remarks applied only to that nation. At the conclusion of the lecture, which was of a lengthy character, votes of thanks were accorded Miss E. Sharman for her exertions in promoting the lecture and to the chairman and lecturer."

Miss E. Sharman, in forwarding the above to us for publication, states that Col. Senior's lecture was very well received by his audience and did much good. She recommends the delivery of such lectures in other places also, as addresses do more good, in her estimation, than many years' labour in other ways. Col. Senior has given great encouragment to believers in the Identity in her town. She wonders why the Metropolitan British-Israel Association's Council do not promote more lectures, throughout the country giving notice of each in the BANNER OF ISRAEL. Literature distributed, she thinks, is good enough if people can be got to read it. "But no one will read it," she remarks, "unless first interested." Her long experience of twenty-three years in Wellingborough enables her to declare for lectures by able lecturers such as Col. Senior is. We also wish that there were a few more like him (half a dozen would do), able and willing to go through the land and make known "the glad tidings" that "lost Israel is found," to the glory of God, and to the blessing of the world at large.

THE FUTURE RULER OF THE WORLD.

By GEORGE COOPER.

FROM across the water, from the land of Manasseh, come frequent acclamations that the omnipotent hand of the Creator is in active operation, through the instrumentality of His "peculiar" people Israel, to perform all His will among all the nations of the earth. But there comes to hand this week, from a New York paper, a flat contradiction to God's assertion respecting Ephraim-Israel, that "he shall eat up the nations." It comes from the pen of a Chinese Gentile, a certain Wong Chin Foo, described as "probably the brightest and best educated Chinaman in America." We should like to know from what source his reported enlightenment has sprung. He describes the Anglo-Israelites as a "besotted, foppish, woman-ruled, debt-burdened, and divided civilized people." Unconsciously he places himself in the front rank of jealousy, beside the Russian and Frenchman, against the Anglo-Saxon people. We wonder whether he or any of his relations were engaged in the "Opium War" or not. Probably he is feeling, with the two above, the weight of that "stone" which was "cut out of the mountain without hands;" and probably the knowledge of such still "sticks between his teeth," as with the others. Twice he emphasizes the effeminacy of them by the fact of their being governed by a woman. It is evident that he has not yet learnt that, although the head of the Anglo-Saxons is a woman, she is, nevertheless, a representative of the throne of David, which He (God) has established over Israel for ever.

We need not here separately dissect the adjectives of sarcasm mentioned above, but leave Mr. Curzon, in the "Problems of the Far East," to silence, as a blind witness for Anglo-Israelism, the arguments of the supposed enlightened Chinaman. The latter's argument runs thus:—

"I am glad to see this war. It is the beginning of the final and inevitable struggle between two masterful civilizations—that of the East and of the West. . . . The virility of Oriental civilization is found in China. China—and China single-handed—must fight out the inevitable battle to a finish with the civilization of women and the West. She will fight it out, and the older, manlier, grander civilization will triumph over the puny civilization of the woman-ruled races and effeminate creeds of the West. China has bulk—homogenous, cohesive bulk—both in religion and race. The West is divided against itself. In religion it has a multitude of sects, all ready to turn upon each other. In time of war, as in times of peace, the almighty dollar rules, and each nation, like each man, will turn a traitor for temporary gain. Honesty is an unknown quality of your Western peoples. 'Swindle your neighbour as he would swindle you,' is truly your golden rule. Against these divided, battling tribes of the West—divided also among themselves—China will some day cast her ponderous bulk, and the civilization that existed thousands of years before the twilight of Christianity will triumph. Japan, the traitorous emissary of Western civilization in the East, is but the first; the balance of the world next. What are the advantages of your boasted Western civilization? your civilization is borrowed, adapted, and shaped from our older, more virile form. China has a national history of at least four thousand years, and had a printed history 3,500 years before a European discovered the art of type-printing. In the course of her national existence she has passed through mythology, superstition, witchcraft, established religion, to philosophical religion. She has a population of four hundred millions, and not a single dollar of national debt. There are more dollars within her confines, with which to purchase either the weapons of peace or war, than in all the rest of the world. She is sufficient unto herself. When it comes to this final struggle between this manly, virile civilization of the East and your besotted, foppish, woman-ruled, debt-burdened, and divided civilization of the West, where will the victory lie? The first gun in a struggle that it may take a century to settle has been fired. When the last has been fired there will be but one ruler, one triumphant, conquering race, and one religion, in all this wide world."

Here we see that Wong Chin Foo, in his opinion that China will conquer the world after Japan, is ignorant of the destined supremacy of British-Israel in the future, as recorded in Dan. ii. 44—viz., that "in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people. But it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever;" and that contained in Isa. lx. 12, where it says: "For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted."

There is a variance of opinion respecting the Celestial Empire, and her destiny in the future, between this Wong Chin Foo and the Honourable G. N. Curzon, M.P., in his "Problems of the Far East." Mr. Curzon evidently sees no sign of the real awakening of China, so often prophesied; still less any probability that the Chinaman will subdue the world either by the sword or the purse! He says:—

"The continued national existence of the Yellow Race may be regarded as assured. But that the Empire which, in the last fifty years, has lost Siam, Burmah, Annam, Tonking, and part of Manchuria, and has already seen a foreign army in Peking; whose standard of civil and political perfection is summed up in the stationary idea; which, after half a century of intercourse with ministers, missionaries, and merchants, regards all these as intolerable nuisances, and one of the number with intolerable aversion; which only adopts the lessons they have taught her when the surrender is dictated by her necessities or her fears; and which, after a twenty years' observation of the neighbouring example of Japan, looks with increasing contempt upon a frailty so feeble and impetuous—that this empire is likely to falsify the whole course of its history, and to wrench round the bent of its own deep-seated inclinations, simply because the shriek of a steam-whistle or the roar of a cannon is heard at its gates, is a hypothesis that ignores the accumulated lessons of political science, and postulates a revival of the age of miracles. I have narrated the stages of China's tardy advance; it is an artificial, and not an organic reform. . . . Politically speaking, her star is a waning and not a rising orb."

Further on in his book, Mr. Curzon is of opinion that the Chinese are neither formidable nor aggressive; and, respecting the emigration of them, he assuredly has the British folk in mind for a contrast, and affords blind evidence that they are Israel in their great efforts for imperial expansion. Finally, Mr. Curzon entirely refutes Wong Chin Foo's statement that China will conquer the world, for he says:—

"It is assumed that the steady infiltration of Chinese emigrants into these regions, and the control of the labour market which they so rapidly acquire, are the inevitable precursors of a complete political and commercial domination. These anticipations I do not share. Chinese emigration I beileve to be dictated by the animal interests of self-maintenance, and by the craving of masculine labour to find an outlet, which is denied to it by the selfish and rapacious tyranny of the Chinese administrative and economic system at home, and to be divorced from any ulterior intent of conquest or dominion. . . . There is no country in this world where the military profession is of smaller account, or where the science of warfare is less intelligently studied, than in China. The phrase, "Cedant arma togæ," is there no aspiration for honourable peace, no sigh of satisfaction over the conclusion of a successful campaign, but is the confession of an abiding contempt for the art that prefers the sword to the pen. The Chinese army, under Chinese officers, even with muskets in its hands and cartridges in its pouches, is an undisciplined rabble of tramps, about as well qualified to withstand a European force as a body of Hyde Park processionists would to repel a charge of the Life Guards."

Anglo-Israelites greatly fear that the Chinaman's supposed enlightenment is dark enough; and his education requires an additional course in the study of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, and Daniel, under the able tutor, the Rev. E. K. Tullidge, M.A., of America, in order that the future of the woman-ruled British-Israelites may be enrolled before his Gentile vision. Let British-Israelites praise the Lord that Mr. Curzon has, in his recent publication, given the answer to the distinguished Chinaman, that "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven," shall not fall into the hands of heathen China, but let them be doubly assured by his statements that the kingdom "shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him."

"THE SECRET THINGS" CONCERNING ISRAEL AND "THOSE THAT ARE REVEALED."

In Deut. xxix. 29, we have the well-known passage regarding "the secret things" concerning Israel which "belong to the Lord Jehovah our God," and the things which are "revealed, which belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law," meaning the law given to the tribes at Sinai. There are secrets which are not divulged as yet, and there are things which are revealed, but men will neither believe nor accept them as true: though God Himself, our God, tells us they are coming or have already come to pass. Among "the secret things" in Moses' day was the position of the land, that other land, where the sinning tribes were to be cast out for sin. It was to one single land, the appointed place, doubtless, of 2 Sam. vii. 10, where, if Israel is to be found anywhere, they must be discovered there. Another secret of the Lord was the precise way in which Israel would be dealt with in order that they might return again to "obedience to their God."

Digitized by Google

The process was to be through the Gospel, as Deut. xxx. 11—14, compared with Rom. x. 6, etc., teaches us. The commandment, which was to be the test of their obedience, leading to national salvation, pointed to Christ incarnate, Christ sacrificed for men, dead, buried, and risen; Christ preached, confessed, and believed in the heart, unto salvation. These were secrets in those days of Moses, belonging to the God of Israel. Now they are revealed, "belonging unto us" Israelites, "and to our children for ever," that thus we may do, through Christ our law-keeper and Mediator, "all the words of this law" and so become righteous before God, nay, "the righteousness of God in Christ" (2 Cor. v. 21). It was a further secret in Moses' day how the blessing and the curse together were simultaneously to come upon the tribes of Israel in after days, as described in Deut. xxx. 1—20. It was not known then that the House of Judah would crucify and murder the Lord Jesus Christ and so be scattered among the nations in God's wrath; but the Ten Tribes in God's mercy, being not guilty of that awful sin, were followed by His pardoning mercy, were brought to repentance, were restored to God's favour and blessed with the Abrahamic blessings of the birthright of Israel, even in an alien land, made theirs in addition to the Holy Land, by God's special appointment. These truths are revealed now to a few, but the majority of Israel cannot discern them yet, their eyes being holden. To some "it is too good to be true." To others it is simply incredible, though none can deny that the British are enjoying to-day the very blessings God had sworn to give to the seed of Abraham exclusively, such being both temporal and spiritual blessings, as promised (Gen. xxii. 17, 18, Deut. xv. 6). Among the things which are revealed, and therefore belong "to us British and to our children for ever," because we are Israel of the House of Joseph or Ephraim, are such as these: 1, that Israel shall return to the Lord and obey His voice (Deut. xxx. 2); 2, that the Lord will then have compassion on His people and restore them to their land (vers. 2, 3); 3, that He will multiply them (ver. 5); 4, that He will convert them and their seed, and cause them to love the Lord their God, with all their heart and soul (ver. 6; comp. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, Heb. viii. 10—12). It is further shown by Deut. xxx. 9 that wonderful prosperity will follow; a fact which Jer. xxxiii. 9 corroborates and Ezek. xxxvii. 22—28 confirms. It has been revealed that during their banishment the Ten-tribed House of Israel would develop into a multitude of people, become a nation and a company of nations, that they should be a great and mighty Christian, Sabbath-keeping, Bible-circulating race, blessing all nations, and supreme at sea. These and many other signs are visible now on the British race, and point to them as the House of Israel once lost, now found according to the prophecies. This is a series of facts, which serve to indicate that the British are Israel, and it belongs "to us and to our children for ever," according to Deut. xxix. 29. To the Lord be all the praise and all the national thanksgiving.

"OUR INHERITANCE IN THE GREAT PYRAMID." By Professor PIAZZI SMYTH, late Astronomer Royal for Scotland. For some months there has been a difficulty to obtain this volume. Arrangements have now been made with Messrs. BANKS AND SON to have a supply on hand, and if orders are sent direct to them, the volume (the fifth edition, published at 16s.) will be sent post free to any address in the world for 11s. 6d.

NORTH OF ENGLAND COUNCIL.

A CONFERENCE of the above Union was held at the North Bridge Restaurant, Halifax, on January 4th, and among those present were Mr. J. G. Taylor, Newcastle-on-Tyne; Mr. Jas. Paylor, Leeds; Mr. G. W. Surgey, Sheffield; Messrs. R. Wilson and S. J. W. Sherwood, Hull; Mr., Mrs. and Miss Dean, and others.

The following were elected new members of the Council, viz.:—Councillor John Ineson, Mr. Geo. Marsden, both of Birstal; and Mr. T. B. Hurst, of Bradford.

The proceedings of the Conference almost entirely consisted of discussion upon the circulation of Identity literature. It was felt that nothing was being done to bring our books, &c., within easy reach of the people. Among other plans the suggestion was made that every Public Library should be supplied with an Identity Serial, and the question of a van was again mooted. It was decided to start a Penny Sheet Almanack at the end of the year, and a committee was formed to look after this and kindred projects. The proposed magazine received further consideration, and as there have been enquiries about the date of issue, it may be said that the preliminary arrangements for a venture of this character need a good deal of time. This is all the more requisite in the present case, seeing that, outside the borders of the North of England Council the support obtained for the paper has so far been of a very moderate kind. But as such a periodical is absolutely necessary, and is intended for the public rather than for our own people, it will appear as soon as possible—probably in a couple of months.

It was decided to hold the next Conference at Manchester, during the Easter Holidays. All British-Israelites who wish to be present should communicate with the Hon. Sec., Mr. J. Hayden, 2, Grant-street, Commercial-road, Halifax.

THE SEA-QUEEN WAKES!

THE following verses by a Canadian poet, Mr. Clive Phillips-Wolley, lately published in The Daily Columbian, called "The Sea-Queen Wakes," are so full of the fire both of poetry and patriotism, that they may well find a place in the BANNER OF ISRAEL:—

"She wakes! in the furthest West the murmur has reached our ears;
She wakes! in the furthest East, the Russian listens and fears;
She wakes! the ravens clamour, the winds cry overhead,
The wandering waves take up the cry, 'She wakes whom nations dread!'
At last, ye have roused the Sea-Queen at last, when the world unites.
She stirs from her scornful silence, and wakes to her lust of fights;
Alone, with a world against her, she has turned on the snarling crew,
No longer the Peaceful Trader, but the Viking North Seas knew.
She calls, and her ships of battle—dragons her seas have bred—
Glide into Plymouth Harbour, and gather round Beachy Head.
She wakes! and the clang of arming echoes through all the earth,
The ring of warrior's weapons; stern music of soldiers' mirth.
In the world there may be nations, and there gathers round every throne
The strength of earth-born armies, but the sea is England's own;
As she ruled, she still shall rule it, from Plymouth to Esquimalt,
As long as the winds are tameless—as long as the waves are salt.
This may be our Armageddon; seas may purple with blood and flame
As we go to our rest forever, leaving the world a name.
What matter? There have been none like us, nor any to tame our pride;
If we fall, we shall fall as they fell, die as our fathers died—
What better? the seas that bred us shall rock us to rest at last,
If we sink with the Jack still floating, nailed to the nation's mast."

[Fine as these lines are, the poet's inspiration would lack the note of sadness if he knew that the Armageddon overthrow is for the enemies of the sons of the Vikings, and that the British being Israel, the ultimate victory is theirs. Let us hope also that the national pride which has not been tamed by man, may be humbled in the dust because of the national acknowledgment, which will be taught by the national recognition, that our strength, safety, and preservation has not been because of our own prowess, but because of the covenant faithfulness of the Lord God of Israel.—ED.]

SCOTTISH CATHOLICS AND THE HOLY SEE.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

SIR,—The Archbishop of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's, Dr. McDonald, in explanation of the Pope's Encyclical, said, "No words of ours are needed to commend this object to you." We would merely add one word for ourselves, "The 20th September, 1870, witnessed the closing scene in a policy of impious spoliation, when the head of the Universal Church was stripped of his patrimony, fettered in his liberty, which of right and necessity belonged to him, and made a virtual prisoner in his own city."

What a confession to make after our Saviour's declaration, "That He would plant His Church upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against her." If Rome is the true Church would Garibaldi ever have been permitted to enter Rome? Would the poor old Pope, who is styled "the vicar of Christ and the chief shepherd of the sheep," have to complain of being a prisoner in the Vatican? No, Rome never was the true Church. The true Church is Hebrew, Israelitish, not Jewish; the Church of God was in existence long before Rome was known. "Hearken, O daughter, and consider; forget thine own people and thy father's house, so shall the King greatly desire thy beauty, for He is thy Lord and worship thou Him."

The Jews have not forgotten their father's house, and are not likely to. The Church of the Old Testament is the Church of the New Testament. St. Stephen says this was He that was in the Church in the wilderness, and St. Paul says they drank of that Rock that followed them, "and that Rock was Christ." "Christ loved the Church and gave Himself for the Church," and that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures. Isaiah's declaration is, "For the transgressions of My people was He stricken;" and St. Peter says, "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree." St. Paul told his brother disciples to feed the Church of God which He had purchased with His own blood. Christ said "He would plant His Church upon a Rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against them." And He calls upon them through the prophet Isaiah, "Let the inhabitants of the Rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains, let them give glory unto the Lord God of Israel in the Islands." There is only one people, one Church, and one nation in the whole universe against which the gates of hell have never been able to prevail. "He blew with His winds and they were scattered." The only one God has promised to fight for, and defend her from the assaults of all her enemies. "Whoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall it will grind him to powder."

Yours truly,

JAMES WRIGHT.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I have often thought of writing you to express my thanks for the great pleasure and instruction that I have enjoyed for many years past, in reading and studying your weekly BANNER OF ISRAEL. How anyone can be found to scoff at its teachings, I cannot tell. Its doctrine is, "Search the Scriptures." My experience is, that it is far more difficult to get the clergy (there are many bright exceptions) to study this great and important subject—viz., "the House of Israel, and the House of Judah," than with the laity. I wonder if you would like to hear how it was I first became interested in "Identity literature." I will risk it.

I think it was in 1873 I was staying in a small town in the South of Scotland, with my wife and two sons (both of whom I have since lost in the service of their country). We were trout-fishing; the weather, one day, was too bad, even for a fisherman, so we stayed at home. I asked our landlady, a good old "Scot bodie" if she had any books to lend us. "I have just the Beeble!" was her reply. After a little while she entered the room, and said, "Here is something that will interest you, as you are an Israelite" (this was "Hine's Identifications"). I must here say, I owe Mr. Hine a deep debt of gratitude for putting the Bible in a totally different light to me since that day. "I a Jew!" I said, I fear a little indignantly. "I have not the Jewish type of nose," &c. "That's why you are an Israelite," was the answer I received. I was now puzzled, and said, "But the Israelites are Jews!" Her answer to this was, "Read this carefully, and you won't think so any longer."

We all studied the book, and from that moment our eyes were opened, and we began to "Search the Scriptures, to see if these things were so." Again I thank you. I look forward to getting your weekly "BANNER" with the greatest pleasure. I have been a constant reader of it for the last eighteen years, and I deem those fortunate who have been introduced to these writings. I firmly believe we are a portion of God's "chosen people," and am proud of such an honour.

I am dear Philo-Israel,

Yours very faithfully,

H. I. DYER.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—With your kind permission, I desire through the columns of the BANNER, to express my thanks to M. Trew, King James'-place, Perth, Scotland; W. H. Billing, Toronto, Canada; and to Mr. D. MacMurray, of Philadelphia, G. Town, Penna, U.S., for their generous response to my request for copies of the BANNER, as per this month's issue. As one waters, and another plants, the increase being guaranteed through Him who never fails, it will doubtless be a pleasure to our friends to know that already the seed so planted and watered has brought forth fruit and will continue so to do. "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him" (Psa. cxxvi. 5, 6). "They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them: I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble: for I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is My first-born" (Jer. xxxi. 9). So with such assurance, we cannot, must not fail to spread His truth, for indeed wonderful and great will be the harvest.

Sincerely yours, GEO. E. INGLISS.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I do not remember having come across the following points in the pages of the BANNER, or in any of the books I have read on British-Israel truth.

It would appear that not a few of our opponents try to make a little capital over the throne of David being perpetuated through Irish, Scottish, and English monarchs to her Majesty Queen Victoria, in that the promise was, that David should never want a man to sit upon the throne. I presume that our opponents do not deny that this promise was made to David, so they have only to refer to 2 Kings xi. where they will see that subsequent to that promise Queen Athaliah reigned. She was the seventh monarch from Rehoboam. Regarding Manasseh, is it not only right that we should speak of our American cousins as such, for are not the descendants of Ephraim and the descendants of Manasseh cousins? We do not apply this term of relationship to any other nationality.

Yours truly,

J. C. HASSELL.

ITALY'S DISASTER AT ADOWA, AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

THE terrible overthrow of Italian power in the northern limits of Abyssinia has been a severe blow to Italy as an European nation, and an appreciable loss to the Triple Alliance, of which it formed a third. Italy is a poor country, and its inhabitants are not many but few. Why it should have troubled itself to enter on the path of conquest in an African region only ten degrees from the Equator, opposite Mocha in the Red Sea, and not far from Perim, has always been a puzzle. There was not much to be gained by acquiring the Red Sea Gate Massowah, which is too hot for an European colony, and where nothing but hard blows and fighting were to be expected. We refused to occupy it, and offered it to the Abyssinians. In default of the latter, the Italians entered on possession, but their experience has not been a happy one. The overthrow which has just occurred proves the wisdom and truth of the advice tendered by the Times to our ancient ally, that it would be well for the sake of Europe if they left North-east Africa to itself, and, clinging only to the coast, refuse to be led inland, where their strength is overmatched by the native forces, such as have just brought upon them so terrible a calamity. The loss of military power and prestige which the Italian people have sustained will work mischief for Europe. It will wonderfully help Russia, without the loss to the latter of a single man. The Times, on March 7th, saw this clearly, when the following sentences appeared in its sub-leader that day:—

Unfortunately (it said) it cannot be denied that the situation thus created has crippled the power of Italy for the moment, and hampered her freedom of action, and that, in consequence, the Triple Alliance has been greatly weakened. Like many other events that have happened during the past two years, this tends to strengthen the influence of Russia without any effort on her own part. If the compact between France and Russia were what it is believed to be in the former country, the French might expect to be now aided in recovering the provinces they lost in 1870, and Germany might come near to finding herself isolated. But the Tsar will, no doubt, prefer the safer and wiser course of standing as a benignant patron and impartial arbiter between the two rivals.

Whatever strengthens Russia, and weakens her adversaries, Germany and Austria, weakens the Triple Alliance, and makes Germany's case more deplorable. Russia is being made strong by the Lord to enable her, we suppose, to play her dreadful part towards Europe of the coming "war-woe"; and when that tragedy is over, of fulfilling the destiny which will drive her to the Holy Land, to seize and occupy it, as well as the treasures of Egypt, for a time, till the Lord Himself shall interfere in Israel's favour, and utterly destroy them on the mountains of Israel, according to the prophecies of Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix., which tell us what Russia's end must be. We would have our readers, therefore, to recollect, as they see Russia growing daily in military and naval power, that thus it must be, to enable her to play the part of "Gog" in the coming times of Europe's discomfiture at her hands, and then of her invasion of Palestine. This she does in order to grasp the dominion of the world, just before the Lord Himself withstands her, and brings her down on the very scene of her anticipated triumph, "the mountains of Israel." We look on the defeat of the Italian army, composed largely of native levies, however, at Adowa, as a link in the chain of coming events, which, sad and terrible as they must appear to us, Italy's ancient ally, are in reality one of the means God is using to strengthen Russia for her work of conquest, but final downfall and utter destruction, by the power of God, in the Holy Land. The Italian people, brave and gallant as they are, are chafing and angry at the humiliation of their present defeat. It will be a bitter pill to them to accept the defeat and never to avenge it. But events are approaching to which this occurrence will be a trifle, and it will be well that Italy should husband her strength and her resources for the tremendous work which awaits her nearer home, and leave North and Central Africa to itself, in order that she may save her men, material, and money for the sterner trials coming on her in Europe. The disaster may have other effects in regard to Egypt which will be felt by ourselves as protectors of that land for its good. It may embolden the Mahdi and the dervishes once more to try if they cannot push into Egypt, and so endeavour to get rid of its English protectors before subduing and governing it themselves.

The difference between our case and the Italians' is this. We are Israel, and are in Egypt to bless it, as part of our commission from the Lord (Isa. xix. 20—25). The Italians have gone to the Egyptian Soudan on their own account, and to serve their own interests. They have no mandate to take the Gospel to the heathen in North-east Africa, and therefore they can hardly expect that their way will be made plain, and resistance to their entry into the land subside. Knowing this, we yet feel sincere and true sympathy for a brave and spirited nation in the sore national trial which has come upon them. We believe, with the Times, that the safe course will be to abandon all thoughts of recovering the lost ground, or hoping for the conquest of Abyssinia. It will be wiser to hold the sea-coast and Massowah as the Gate of the position, waiting the course of events in Europe without risking further loss in blood or treasure for a conquest which, even if possible, will not be worth the cost.

Our British disasters in the past have been equally tremendous, as in the case of Insandlana and the Indian Mutinies. But God gave us the victory in both cases at last, and to Him we return all the praise for His mercy to His people Israel!

UPON THE LITURGY AND ITS HEBREW AFFINITIES.

COMPILED BY J. B.

PART I.

THE object is to show that our national Book of Common Prayer is drawn up and designed for a revived Israel people. I will begin at the beginning, only taking up the parts that touch on the subject.

The first of the prefatory sentences with which our Service opens is taken from the 18th chapter of Ezekiel, which is addressed to the House of Israel and points to the chosen race, sometime long subsequent to their captivity, turning again to the Lord. This is followed by three verses of the 51st Psalm, a Psalm of David in which we acknowledge our sins, and beseech forgiveness for them in conformity with God's plan of repentance and salvation thus given to His people Israel first. The next is from Joel ii., which has truly been said to begin and end with Zion, and is addressed to the children of Zion. It begins, "Blow the trumpet in Zion," and in the concluding verses we have the first outpouring of the Spirit on Israel promised, to qualify them to call on the name of the Lord. Taking the passage in Daniel from the 7th verse we see it is addressed to all Israel far and near, verses 9 and 10 being in the Prayer Book, and the 11th verse is "Yea, all Israel have transgressed Thy laws." But of all the texts there is no one more remarkably to the point than the Prodigal Son; that being spoken by our Lord, teaches His lost people their own history and the position in which they then stood. At that time the prodigal Israel had left his Father and his home, and we find Judah in possession and saying to him, "Get you far from the Lord; unto us is this land given in possession," and even now it is not known what Christ meant when He said, "When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh what will he do unto these husbandmen?" and they answered, "He will miserably destroy these wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their season." Thus said the prodigal (Israel), "I will arise, and go to my father, and say unto him, I have sinned, and am no more worthy to be called thy son, and his father saw him a great way off, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him, saying, Bring forth the best robe (Christ's righteousness) and put it on him, and put a ring on his hand (the ring of betrothal), and put shoes on his feet (shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace), and call together his friends and let us eat, and drink, and be merry, for this my son was dead and is alive again, was lost and is found." This also describes us at the present day. The next, "Enter not into judgment with Thy servant" (by which each member of the congregation is made to apply to himself that distinguishing appellation "servant of the Lord") is taken from the 143rd Psalm, where the Psalmist prophetically pours forth his complaints of God's chosen people in the land of their captivity. The first Epistle of John, too, is theirs. It begins, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life." What people could say this but His chosen ones?

Let us ask ourselves, How came it that the compilers of our Liturgy chose those texts, so remarkably appropriate and suitable for the descendants of the lost tribes, if they were at the same time in the belief that they were Gentiles, and in no way connected with Israel in the Bible history? The whole question seems to be worthy of further consideration, and I am sure all who are interested in it will find it profitable to study these chapters and Psalms with this thought before them.

In the address of the minister recommending us to confess our sins that we may obtain forgiveness by the mercy and goodness of God, we feel that none can so entirely acknowledge the marvellous goodness of the Lord and thank Him with a fuller heart for all His benefits than those who know that from the beginning of the world till now, they have never altered for us His favoured people. Surely it must be natural and easy for us (who believe in British-Israel) to set forth His most worthy praise.

The first prayer assumes that God is our Father, and He has said, "I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is My first-born." Then we claim to be His children who have sinned and strayed like lost sheep, recognising our likeness, if not identity, with the lost sheep of the House of Israel. Like them we are a wayward and perverse people, "following too much the devices and desires of our own hearts," and Israel only has gone astray from the covenants and offended against His holy laws, because it was to them they were given, whilst the Gentiles did not know them. Every sentiment of this prayer is in accordance with the characteristics and necessities of the lost House of Israel. Our petition "to restore them that are penitent," is very like the nation's request not only to be restored to the Divine favour, but also to our long lost inheritance in the Holy Land; and we know it will be so, for Scripture says, "I will bring them again and place them, and they shall be as though I had not cast them off, for I am the Lord their God, and I will hear them" (Zech. x. 6), which is only one of very many passages in which this promise is made to them.

The absolution is then pronounced to His people being penitent, and the remission of their sins, as in the prophecy of Isaiah, "In a little wrath I hid My face from thee for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." From the rest of this chapter (the 54th of Isaiah) this is plainly to Israel.

Our Lord's prayer was given to Israel. His words in the Sermon on the Mount are, "When ye pray use not vain repetitions as the heathen do, for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be not ye therefore like unto them, for your heavenly Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask Him. After this manner therefore pray ye, Our Father," &c. Christ uses that name twelve times in that one chapter, and at the end of it we have the same idea again. "Take no thought," or, as it is in the Revised Version, "Be not therefore anxious, saying, What shall we eat, or What shall we drink? for after all these things do the Gentiles seek; but seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." We, as Israel, especially ought to desire that His name may be hallowed, His kingdom come, His will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Our Saviour certainly does not endorse the laxity of principle that is so largely prescribed in the present day. Of course, we exclude none, on the contrary we ought to bring all, Jews, Gentiles and heathen, &c., to Christ. Those who are adopted (grafted in) are often those who have endured persecution, great suffering, and even given up their lives for Christ's sake, these have a place given to them even better than sons and daughters; but we want to put the restored of Israel, who are completely consigned to oblivion and have no place at all according to the theology of the present day, into their proper Scriptural place.

"Open Thou our lips, and our mouth shall shew forth Thy praise," is most suitable to Israel, of whom our Lord, through Isaiah xxiii., says, "This people have I formed for Myself; they shall show forth My praise." I need hardly mention, though the Jews are a small portion of Israel, they do not and cannot do that; they at present can only mourn, it does not apply to them, and must therefore be the other branch of the family who are to show forth His praise, and who are they?

"Behold the cross on Britain's shield
Is lifted high all men to draw,
That they to Israel's King may yield
Allegiance, and observe His law."

The Doxology. "In the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," shows the fixity of purpose of our Triune God. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away; I am the Lord, I change not; and lo I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world," was spoken by Christ to His disciples, who were Hebrews to a man.

"Amen" is a pure Hebrew word and untranslatable. It has been used by our race for at least 3,500 years. "Let all the people say, Amen," is the rubric of the Hebrew Liturgy. Mr. Bergmann, a converted Jew, who is translating the Scriptures for the Jews into a language they can understand, says of the prayers of the Church of England, "I found them Jewish in their arrangement, and even in their sentiment, and that 'the Liturgy' was so framed that but for the name of Jesus which occurs so often, it might serve for use in the synagogues." As every sentence of our Liturgy can be met with parallel passages from our Bible, this is not to be wondered at. Bergmann also says, "There are many Jews who take a special interest in the Identity, and I find that through this subject I am able to lead them on to the subject of Christianity. I pray earnestly that the time may soon come when Jer. xxxi. 34 shall have its fulfilment, British-Israelites can help to hasten it." The text he refers to is, "I will put My law in their minds, and write it in their hearts, and they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, for all shall know the Lord from the least first, even to the greatest," not kings, bishops, or learned men. The same is repeated in Heb. viii. 8, which makes it applicable now. So far the Morning and Evening Service is the same.

THE NEGLECT OF PROPHECY.

By E. Reep.

At a meeting of the Jewish Historical Society on Feb. 9th, the President is said to have alluded to Oliver Cromwell as the supreme embodiment of the Puritan movement, which had done more to mould the character of Englishmen and English women, and to purify the moral atmosphere of English social life, than any of the complex forces which had made English history. Cromwell it was that made the glorious attempt to work out the salvation of England in the light of Bible truth. It was Cromwell and his followers who made the oracles of Israel a living force in England, and who saturated the land with Hebraic teaching.

Undoubtedly the British race is indebted to Cromwell for much of that transcendant respect for the authority of Scripture which, from the 16th down to the 19th century, has so potentially neutralised ecclesiastical dogmatism and tyranny, to the steady advancement of civil and religious freedom. But it was not Cromwell, nor his followers, that made the oracles of Israel a living force in England; it was God Himself. The time had come in Cromwell's day for the lost House of Israel, hidden away in the West, in the Isles of Britain, to emerge into the light of Bible truth, as predicted in Ezek. xxxvii. It was, however, the study of prophecy, and not the neglect of it, that eventually helped to set Britain free, to pursue her destiny. Yet to-day, in this last part of the 19th century, there is a growing tendency to shelve the Bible, to ignore prophecy. Hence, a revival of what was best in Puritanism would do the British race no harm. It would certainly do good, and it would not be out of place in the light of Our Identity with Israel, for the modern Englishman to say with Cromwell: "My soul is with the Congregation of the Firstborn, my body rests in hope; and, if here I may honour my God either by doing or suffering, I shall be most glad." Nor would it be amiss if the whole British people were to lift up their hearts and acknowledge, like the Puritan protector, that God is not enough owned; that too much dependence is placed on men and visible things, to the hindrance of blessing and success.

Oliver Cromwell put the saddle of failure on the right horse. If success and blessing are to rest upon our nation, without hindrance, we must progress in the right direction. As a first step we must expurgate agnosticism, that we may strengthen ourselves morally, as well as materially. With a more abundant faith in the Divine, we need not to fear "menacing animosities," nor to safeguard our Empire under the wing of foreign alliances. Rather should we seek to discern what the dominion and greatness of our kingdom mean in the inspired word of prophecy. At no time of her history has Britain had greater need of enlightened perspicacity, greater need of spiritual discernment in solving the mystery of her world-wide power. Anything like this dominating sovereignty is, we are constantly told, unknown in the history of any nation. Every kindred and tongue and people are more or less affected by it. The well-known Parsee, Mr. Naoroji, at a London Conference of Indians recently declared that such was the benignity of British rule that the native princes and people of India were keenly and sincerely loyal to the British connection and supremacy. Taking it on the lowest and most selfish ground of their own interests he could say "that the British connection was one of the greatest good fortunes that had happened to India, so far as the future of Indians was concerned. It was under British rule only that the people of India could expect liberty and freedom of speech. They had some things to complain of, but they would remain staunch and devoted to the British connection. The people of India had some pride in being British citizens, and they ought to feel that pride, for let them examine the character of every nation on the face of the earth and they would find that during this century the British had been foremost in all works of humanity and advancing civilisation."

To know that hundreds of millions of people are happy under the sceptre of British rule is naturally gratifying to the Bristish race, but to be gratified is not enough. It is not enough for Englishmen and Englishwomen to know this fact without learning the reason why the British are in India, and ruling so vast an empire. Their duty is to endeavour to discover whether or not there is an interposition of Providence in the matter; whether or not the British are a specially chosen people, of whom Balaam prophesied, and whose mission in the latter days was to be a blessing in the earth. On the supposition that we are a peculiar people, the author of "The Hand of God in History" (Hollis Read) assures us that our national parentage was eminently religous. "We were born," he says, "to a rich inheritance, to an undying love of liberty, to toleration, to a high state of intelligence, to the sternest principles of morality, to the unwavering practice of virtue. We ought, therefore, to be the most religious, free, happy, benevolent people on the face of the earth." It is because we, in large measure, answer to this picture of a happy people that we have become the object of envy, hatred, and malice to the continental nations. On all sides it is easy to discern our enemies and slanderers; and were it not true that, as Israel, we are a living force in the world, our national prayer, offered every 20th of June, for peace upon Israel, would hardly lead us to expect, as in the days of our fathers, and in the old time before them, that God will stir up His strength and come and help us. Neglect of divine prophecy, however, can alone depress us. By closing our eyes to it we consider not its warnings, nor its encouragements; we lose the prospect of knowing even as we are known. Let us not suffer for lack of knowledge. In the past God has, in the language of Scripture, been unto the House of Israel as a moth, and to the House of Judah as a worm. But not again will He so appear unto Israel. The devourer will be reproved for our sakes, and we shall, whatever our national isolation in time of trouble, be no more consumed. The nations that purpose to afflict us will, like Mount Seir (Ezek. xxxv.) themselves be laid desolate; for the time of Israel's iniquity or punishment has had an end. Therefore it must be that God will use us for His own good purpose, causing us to blossom and bud, and to fill the face of the world with fruit (Isa. xxvii. 6).

Only to those who neglect prophecy is it forgotten that "The Lord giveth the word: the women that publish the tidings are a great host." As an example of the fulfilment of prophecy, the Rev. A. R. Buckland has published a work on "Women in the Mission Field." Lest it should be thought that women should be excluded from foreign missions, on account of the late massacre in China, he has interestingly shown what the growth of women's work is in the propagation of Christianity. One of the most marked features in the religious life of the Christian Church to-day is, he thinks, the growth of new organisations for the conduct of women's work in the mission field. In India they have worked upon educational lines, little by little, through the instruction of children, improving the general family life. The great need in China for women missionaries has largely increased the number of workers in that country. Indeed, everywhere, British mission women who not long ago were but units or tens, are now, it is said, hundreds. In Africa, North, South, East, and West, they are to be found helping to lay the foundations of a civilisation that will some day rise to prove how true is that prophecy which has declared that in Abraham's seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. Then will it be seen that the Lord is in the midst of Israel, that the Lord is God and none else. If this be so, can any one of British blood despise a Hebrew origin or justify the neglect of prophecy?

THE COVENANT APPERTAINING TO ISRAEL.

A Paper read at a Meeting of the British-Israel Prophecy Investigation Society, at 29, Blenheim Gardens, Willesden Green, N.W., Feb. 11th, 1895,

By Arthur R. Granville.

Of the many covenants of the Bible there are three, made with Abraham and his seed in the line of Isaac, which are of utmost importance to us who believe ourselves to be subjects of Israel's Empire. They are the Abrahamic, the Mosaic, and the Christian or New Covenant, sometimes called the Covenant of Redemption and Salvation. And as they may be called the Magna Charta of that kingdom, a duty devolves upon us to enquire into their scope and import; in other words, to examine the clauses of its charter, and thereby satisfy ourselves as to the foundations upon which our Israelitish privileges rest.

First, let us ask ourselves the question: What is a covenant?

The Hebrew word so translated is "B'rith" or "Brit," upon whose precise meaning I believe commentators are not agreed. It is rendered in various ways, such as "that which is closed, sealed, or confirms"; "that which is a purification or purifier," referring to the end and design of shedding the blood of Jesus Christ, who is called the "Brit" of the people of God (Isaiah xlii. 6, xlix. 8); "that which gives the idea of cutting or cutting asunder," since it was the custom in making solemn covenants to pass between the divided parts of victims; and that which signifies "an eating together, a banquet," because, among Orientals, to eat together is almost equivalent to a covenant of friendship. All these renderings merely express the outward signs of ratification of covenants; and rank on a par with the rainbow, circumcision, and the Sabbath, which were tokens of the Brits made with Noah, Abraham, and the Israelites. But "Brit" also signifies a "compact between parties," for which we use the word "covenant." Our English translators sometimes used this word indifferently for a "token" or a "compact," and in such cases the context must be examined to ascertain which is the intended meaning. For instance, in Gen. xvii. 10, 11, we read: "This is My covenant which ye shall keep . . . Every man among you shall be circumcised . . . and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt Me and you '—i.e., My covenant of circumcision is a token of the covenant. So also the feast is called the Passover, although it was only the sign of God's passing over the Israelites *; and when Isaiah (xlii. 6, xlix. 8) spoke of Christ being given for a covenant of the people, he meant that He is given for a sign or token of the covenant—that He is the medium or means by which a covenant shall be made with the people.†

We need not trouble ourselves about these token meanings of "Brit" when considering the three great covenants of our subject; but confine ourselves to the modern meaning, which is undoubtedly that of the inspired writers—viz., compacts between parties for the performance of conditions, the non-performance of any of which, by either of the contractors, nullifying and voiding the compact. Such is man's covenant. To God's covenants we must however, add this important qualification, that He sometimes covenants without imposing obligations on His creatures.

Now, of the Abrahamic, the Mosaic, and the New Covenant, the Abrahamic is the most important. I look upon it as the genesis of Revelation concerning God's redemptive purposes through the instrumentality of one particular man, and his children in one particular line. The Mosaic was grand and important, and the New Covenant is grander and more important still; but they were designed to bring about the fulfilment of the Abrahamic, and were to that extent subsidiary to it. I say no more on this point at present, but proceed at once to discuss the he authors of "British-Israel Truth" (page 64) say that this covenant was conditional with respect to Abraham, but unconditional with respect to his descendants. I strongly demur to this statement. It was unconditional to Abraham as well as to his children. Read the Bible as carefully as I can, I find no indication that God gave him the land and multitudinousness, &c., if he performed certain conditions. Not even were these gifts bestowed as a reward for anything already done, although Gen. xxii. 16—18, might lead a superficial reader to suppose they were—viz., "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing . . . in blessing I will bless thee, &c. . . . because thou hast obeyed My voice." This was not a giving of the covenant, but a confirmation of it. The covenant had been already made; the gifts had been already given at the very opening of his Bible history—they were freely and sovereignly bestowed, unaccompanied by any terms of contract.

But, say some: An unconditional covenant is a paradox, for it is a compact between non-contracting parties. The paradox is in appearance only. It is evident from the one made with Noah that God does so covenant:—"And I, behold, I establish My covenant with you and with every living creature that is with you . . . to every beast of the earth" (Gen. ix., 9, 10). Will anyone assert that this imposed obligations upon animals? and if not upon animals then not upon Noah, for both animals and Noah were equally interested in the covenant. Clearly then it was unconditional with regard to Noah; and, if such could be made with him, it is clear a similar kind of compact could be made with Abraham. We may explain the seeming paradox by saying that this class of compacts is not actually made with man, but that the fruits of the covenant are given to him *; and that God Himself is the covenantors, or agreeing parties, who pledges Himself to bring about the end or design of the compact. This gives rise to the question how God can covenant with Himself. My reply is that He can do so as easily as swear by Himself: "By Myself have I sworn . . . that in blessing I will bless thee," &c. (Gen. xxii. 16, 17). Who is the maker of the covenant? It is Elohim, a comprehensive name for the Divine Trinity of Persons, signifying the covenanting parties, the adjudicators, or persons joined together by oath for the common purpose of redemption.† This same Elohim it was who said, "Let us make man in our image after our likeness," &c. (Gen. i. 26), wherein we detect a covenanting principle among the Three Persons of the Godhead to give to man dominion over the earth. Of the same character is the Abrahamic covenant, whose fulfilment does not depend upon anything done, or to be done, by either Abraham or his descendants, but rests solely upon the power and faithfulness of Elohim (the Trinity) to perform his promises.

The Abrahamic Covenant contains the following specific promises:—

1. Gift of the Holy Land for an everlasting possession.
2. That Abraham's seed should be multitudinous.
3. That God would be a God to Abraham and his descendants.
4. That Abraham should possess the Gate of his enemies.
5. That Abraham and his seed should be a blessing to all the families of the earth.

Beyond the fact that these promises were several times confirmed to Isaac and Jacob, we learn nothing more regarding them until Jacob lay dying (Gen. xlxix.) when, "rapt by the Spirit into future times," he prophecied the destiny of each of his sons in the last days. Till then the light of Revelation had been as the first faint blush of early dawn; but now Jacob lifts a small corner of the veil that hangs over futurity, and lets in a bright beam which reveals the pre-eminent positions assigned to Judah and Joseph, and a foreshadowing of the ultimate division of the Twelve Tribes into Two Houses. To Judah was allocated the sceptre, or the kingship, "until Shiloh come." Upon Joseph was bestowed multitudinousness and great temporal blessings in the most emphatic and inclusive language, which, read in conjunction with the special blessings given to Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii.) means that Joseph's tribe was to be imperial and richly endowed with all the wealth and power necessary to so grand a destiny.

From the later prophecies we learn that the object of the covenant is the making of Israel "an eternal excellency" (Isa. lx. 15), to educate a people in order that they might educate the world in the knowledge of God, and in His plan of salvation in Jesus Christ.‡ Now, as long as the people remained uneducated the Abrahamic Covenant remained inoperative. Consequently it was necessary that a schoolmaster should be appointed, and for that purpose the was instituted; whose school premises (the Holy Land) were walled in by strict prohibitions against mixing with outside nations; whose scholars were set the lessons of the Mosaic Law; and to whom, for disobedience, was meted out the punishments of invasion and exile.

The laws, or lessons, are divisible thus :—

1. The Moral Law expressed briefly in the Ten Commandments. It is an expression of the Divine Will in reference to duties which arise from the unchangeable distinctions of right and wrong, and is repeated all through the Bible as the fundamental rule of human life. Clear and bold, on the very front of the whole system, was written the truth that there is but one God, and that no image or similitude is to be made in His worship. This law, though fulfilled by Christ, has never been cancelled. It still remains the rule of human life; and sums up our duty to God and man, as shown by Christ when asked which was the chief commandment: "The Lord our God is one Lord. And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength: this is the first commandment. And the second is like, namely this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Mark xii. 30, 31)

2. The Ceremonial Law, which is the wonderful system of Rituals whose types and symbols prefigure the grand truths of the Gospel. These all pointed to Christ, the nation's Messiah. Having proclaimed His gospel of reconciliation and peace, and having fulfilled for his brethren in the flesh the whole of the Ceremonial Law, this part of the Mosaic Covenant has been abrogated because no longer required for the House of Ephraim-Israel, which is now being educated under the New Covenant.

3. The Judicial Law, regulating the administration of justice, the rights of property, the punishment of criminals, the care of the poor, the education of the young, the numbering and registration of the people, and other matters commonly regulated by civil law in such countries as our own. This is the social side of the covenant, and sets forth the duties of man to man, without which no stable or peaceful form of government can exist. Its spirit still remains in force.

Such are the wise educational decrees of the Mosaic covenant, made with Israel as units of the nation more than with them as individuals. Its object was the fashioning of the Israelites into a peculiar people separated from every other nation in religion, morals, and social life, and to consecrate them unto God for His after use as instruments for bringing the world into subjection to their Messiah. It taught them morals that they might become teachers of morality to the Gentiles. It trained them for priests to the only true God in order that they might be His priests to heathen races. It schooled them in righteous dealings one with another that they might be powerful to exercise righteous rule over others, when, in the last days, they should enter into their inheritance of the world. Was ever before or after any other people so highly favoured? Was ever other nation so intimately allied to the Lord of Hosts? Israel was His special care, nurtured and trained with a jealous eye; and so closely associated with Him that the closest ties of nature were employed to describe the mutual relationship. Son and father, wife and husband, are some of the affectionate terms; to which must be added, "espoused," "betrothed," and "married." These show how great was the Divine love to an unmeritorious people, and how great was Jehovah's determination to carry out the glorious promises promised to their fathers.

One of the chief distinctions between the Abrahamic and Mosaic Covenants (which we ought constantly to bear in mind) is that the former is unconditional, inviolable, and cannot be abrogated—only delayed; whereas the latter was full of conditions voluntarily accepted by the people on two occasions, and therefore, through unbelief and disobedience, was always liable to become an ineffectual instrument of education. Do this and live! was the reward held out to all Israel for obedience; do that and die! the penalty for disobedience. So high a standard as this it was impossible for unaided human nature to live up to; and, therefore, we are not surprised to find that it proved a failure, became a dead letter, lifeless in power to educate the people—all of which was foreknown by God, as declared by the mouth of Moses: "I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves; and evil will befall you in the latter days; because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord to provoke Him to anger through the work of your hands" (Deut. xxxi. 29).

Not only was the law a schoolmaster, but it was the motive power ordained of God to set in motion the Abrahamic Covenant. The two covenants were to each other as the key to the lock, the trigger to the gun, the fire to the locomotive; for, as the lock opens when the key is applied, the gun goes off when the trigger is pulled, and the locomotive starts when steam is generated, so does the Abrahamic Covenant operate when the terms of the Mosaic law are fulfilled—and only then.

A NEW ZEALAND DISCUSSION.

WHERE IS ISRAEL?

[BY COLONUS.]

THE interest which has apparently been excited by the question, "Where is Israel?" compels our return to the subject.

There has been a strange awaking within the past decade or two, both in England and America, with regard to the whereabouts of the lost Ten Tribes; and it should not be surprising, seeing that events are hurrying in the direction of a cataclysm over the ancient places of the Bible, which is as pointedly foretold in Scripture prophecy as its nearness is indicated in the gathering of navies to the East, the excitement of diplomacy, and the approaching break-up of the Turkish Empire.

Scripture prophecy is quite distinct in its utterances that Israel is to take a principal part in the struggle which is to culminate in the destruction of "Gog the Prince of Rosh" and his hosts on the hills of Palestine at the hands of the armies of Israel.

In these circumstances it is not unreasonably thought that Israel should be showing to the front by this time, and if that nation is not represented in any of the Great Powers at present in readiness, for trying conclusions in the great struggle of the nations, we naturally ask, Where is Israel?

In another column, a correspondent comes to the root of the matter in attacking the theory which was advanced by us, to the effect that the Anglo-Saxons trace their ancestry, through the Angles, Saxons, Jutes, and Danes, back through the Scythians of the northern shores of the Black Sea, to Media, where the captive tribes of Israel were located by Shalmaneser after he had carried them off from Palestine.

Dr. Giles' opinions deservedly carry great weight in this community, and it is therefore that we make an exception in singling out his letter in order to deal with the difficulties that have presented themselves to his mind.

Digitized by Google

Our correspondent asks, "What certainty have we that the whole people of the Israelitish Kingdom were carried away?" and suggests the supposition that only the people of mark were carried off, and that the mass of the people remained.

Our answer to this is reference to the best authority on the subject, that of the Bible itself. In 2 Kings xvii. 18 it is said, "Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight. There was none left but the tribe of Judah alone." That seems pretty definite.

But further in the same chapter it is shown that the king of Assyria sent large numbers of people "and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel;" and so complete was the change of inhabitants, that after lions came among the new residents they sent for someone to teach the "manner of the God of the land," and the king sent them a single priest, and he dwelt in Bethel, and so far as the Bible tells us, this was the only one of the captivity that returned to Samaria.

As the writer of the Book of Kings emphatically says, "So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day."

Coming to Josephus, who wrote A.D. 70, we find him state "The Ten Tribes did not return to Palestine; only Two Tribes (Judah and Benjamin) served the Romans after Palestine became a Roman Province." And, again, he says, "There are but Two Tribes in Asia and Europe subject to the Romans; while the Ten Tribes are beyond Euphrates till now, and are an immense multitude."

Further than this, the Jews, in every age and now, avow that Israel is not among them, but must yet be "found," and with them return to Palestine.

Going further, Dr. Giles states that "Herodotus does not intend to assign Media as the cradle of the Scythians, a race whom he describes in such a fashion as scarcely to admit of their identification with a band of captives who had been brought over from Samaria 200 years before."

Our correspondent is quite correct. Herodotus does not assign Media as "the cradle of the race." On the contrary, he says that he traced them back there, but that they were not "Autochthones," or aboriginals of the country; but where they had come from to Media, he said he was not able to make out.

We know whence they came, for the Bible tells us they had come from Samaria, and were Israelites.

But Herodotus distinctly states that these Scythians came from south of the Araxes, the very "cities of the Medes" where Shalmaneser had placed their forefathers some 270 years before.

So careful was this "father of history" to verify his statements that he even visited the land from which these Scythians had come, Media, in order if possible to trace them further back, but failed to find the "cradle of the race," which the Bible had already found for us.

But Herodotus does more than this, for he fixes the age of their nationality. He says:—"The Scythians call themselves the youngest of all nations, as from the time of their first leader to the invasion of their country by Darius is a period of one thousand years, neither more nor less"—a period which exactly carries back to the delivery of Israel from Egypt.

Diodorus, again, says:—"The Scythians, formerly inconsiderable and few, possessed a narrow region on the Araxes" —Media again.

Ptolemy speaks of the "Sakai" as a Scythian race that had come from Media; and Pliny says that "the Sakai were among the most distinguished people of Scythia, who settled in Armenia and were called Sæca-Sani"—the sound of whose name is, to say the least, suggestive.

We do not know what further evidence our correspondent might desire as to the identity of the captives of Media with the conquering race whom Herodotus found in Southern Russia, and whose onward progress to the shores of the German Ocean, the home of the Angles and Saxons and Danes and Jutes, has been so distinctly traced by Sharon Turner, the "father of Anglo-Saxon history."

This historian, who could not have heard of the modern Anglo-Israelite theory, and had certainly no particular views on the origin of the race to maintain, in his two volumes on the "Early History, Manners and Customs of the Ancestors of the English-speaking Races," distinctly traces back the Anglo-Saxons to the Scythians of Herodotus, and sums up his conclusions in the words, "The Saxons were a Scythian nation, and were called Saca, Sachi, Saki, and Sach-sen."

As for Dr. Giles' objection to the "sign of the Sabbath," which may be regarded as one of the minor identifications, we may waive it for the present, merely remarking as a singular incident noted in the great whole-world Exposition in Paris, that the British and the American Courts were the only Courts of all the nations that closed their doors on the Sabbath.

Dr. Giles sees a difficulty in identifying the great and powerful Scythians of Herodotus, with a band of captives brought from Samaria 200 years before. But when we see the American branch of the Anglo-Saxon race "breeding as the fishes breed" from a handful of two millions or so to sixty-six millions, not in 270 years but in a century, we can hardly question the possibility of such an increase if the promises of multiplication to the House of Israel in the Bible go for anything.

We entirely agree with Dr. Giles in attaching the value which he does to the historical aspect of this question, as more likely to influence many minds than the lines of prophetic identification.

It is needless to say that it is impossible in our limited space in this column to do full justice to this department of the question. But one thing is quite clear, that the Ten Tribes of Israel were wholly exiled from Samaria to the land of the Medes, south of the Araxes, and that they never returned to Palestine, or were mixed up with the House of Judah again.

That from the place of their exile a nation—presumably their descendants—emerged, and travelled onward to the southern shores of the Black Sea, where they were known as Scythians, Saccæ, Sakasunæ, and Kimmerians or Kymri. That these, becoming numerous, very warlike and powerful, after ravaging the nations, ultimately debouched on the shores of the German Ocean, exhausted and weakened, and there rested; and that from the districts occupied by them the Angles, Saxons, Jutes and Danes, followed at a distance by the Normans, poured over into the British Islands, and blending there with wanderers who had previously reached the country by other routes, became the progenitors of the Anglo-Saxons.

If space allowed we could also show that the tribe of Dan, the maritime tribe of Israel, from an early period had been engaged in commercial and colonising enterprises in distant seas, and there are evidences that tend to the belief that a large portion of that tribe, and of Simeon, its neighbour, fled by sea and settled, the one in Ireland and the other in Wales, many years before the rest of their brethren, after their troubled wanderings by land, had reached the same haven of rest.

Historical evidence is also forthcoming to show that the prophet Jeremiah—whose wanderings between Jerusalem and Egypt, with Baruch his scribe, and the daughters of the last king of Judah, Zedekiah, are described in his book in the Bible—disappeared from Palestine, and reappeared in Irish history as arriving in the vicinity of Carrickfergus; and that he proceeded thence to Tara, the court of the kings of Ireland, where he is recorded as a venerable prophet from the East, accompanied by his scribe, Simon Brug, and a beautiful Eastern princess.

It can also be shown that this beautiful Princess, Tea Tephi—presumably the daughter of the last king of the Royal House of Judah—subsequently married Heremon, the chief of the kings of Ireland, who was himself of the tribe of Dan, settled in the country; and that from this princess has descended the succession of the kings of Ireland, the kings of Scotland from them derived; and that from these is descended Her Majesty Our Gracious Queen, Victoria, a daughter thus of the Royal House of David, wielding over the once lost but shortly to be revealed tribes of Israel, that sceptre which was not to depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet until the Shiloh come.

Where is Israel?

To the Editor.

Sir,—The trouble involved in the very courteous reply of "Colonus" to my letter demands, not only my acknowledgment, but also a little fuller explanation of my objections, in which, from my desire to avoid prolixity, I somewhat fell short on the last occasion. I shall esteem it a favour, therefore, if you will allow me to state more fully the objections which seem to me to encounter the Anglo-Israel theory at the very threshold.

The passage quoted from the Book of Kings is, as "Colonus" says, "pretty definite" as to the whole of the tribes having been carried away, but the question is whether we can be sure that it is an accurate statement and free from exaggeration. I think there is room for at all events a suspicion of the latter. When the Jews came back to rebuild their temple an offer of assistance was made to them by a neighbouring people who wished to fraternise with them on the ground of common faith and worship, but this offer was repulsed by the returned exiles. At a later date we find the Jews and Samaritans related to each other as rival sects, whose bitterness, as is usual in religious disputes, was intense in proportion to the minuteness of the points of difference between them. All this does not seem to fit very well with the belief that the whole of the Israelitish people were taken away, and indeed some difficulty seems to have been felt about this by the Jewish writers themselves, and so we have the story of the lions to explain the remarkable fact that the new possessors of the deserted cities of Israel had somehow attained to a knowledge of the true faith. Josephus, by substituting a plague for the lions, has made the story a little less grotesque, but not much more credible.

Now for Herodotus. "Colonus" is, I think, mistaken in supposing that Herodotus intended to describe the Scythians as having resided in Media, whence they crossed the Araxes and migrated to the Northern shore of the Euxine. The error arises from identifying the Araxes of Herodotus with the river which is marked by that name on our maps of ancient geography, and which flows eastward into the Caspian Sea. There seems to be a difference of opinion as to what river the historian really meant. Gaisford, the learned editor of Herodotus, thinks it was the Volga; but Professor A. von Gutschmid (in Encyclopædia Britannica) says that wherever Herodotus mentions the Araxes he means the Amu Darya—i.e., the Oxus. This, certainly, better harmonises with the narrative about the Scythians being pressed by the Massagetæ, as well as with the fact that Herodotus describes Cyrus as crossing the Araxes to fight his last battle with the Massagetæ—a campaign which surely had nothing to do with Media. What Herodotus does say about Media in connection with the Scythians is clear enough. He describes the latter as expelling and following the Cimmerians from Lake Mæotis (Sea of Azov) until in the neighbourhood of the Caucasus they lost the trail and went on to invade Media. Not a word is said about their crossing the Araxes to get there, though they must have crossed the river which goes by that name on the classical maps, which again corroborates the notion that Herodotus meant by that name some other river. The Scythians conquered Media, ruled in Asia twenty-eight years, and then returned to their own country to the north of the Black Sea. It is clear, therefore, that to suppose Herodotus to trace the Scythian nation back to Media, and not to be able to trace it any further, is to err entirely as to his meaning. I am quite at a loss to understand how anyone can suppose the Scythians to be the same as the exiled Israelite tribes. The Scythians were living about the lower Dnieper long before Israel was taken captive. It seems that their own tradition claimed for them an origin as far back as the time of Moses, but Israel must indeed have forgotten his own history when he had nothing better to tell Herodotus than the story of his ancestor Targitaus, who was son of Jupiter and a river goddess! These same Scythians in the reign of Josiah threatened Palestine, and fluttered Jerusalem not a little. Yet Jeremiah failed to recognise his kith and kin in these horsemen and bowmen of the North.

Is it necessary to pursue the argument further? Identify the English with the Scythians as much as you please; but that is nothing to the purpose unless you show either that the Scythians were the lost tribes of Israel, or that Israel got amongst the Scythians and preserved his separate identity for centuries, coming out eventually as an Anglo-Saxon. But I scarcely think that either of these things has been shown yet.

When "Colonus" says that at the Paris Exhibition the British and American Courts were closed on the Sabbath, he surely does not mean on Saturday, and, if not, what has this got to do with Israel?

I have tried to be as brief as was consistent with clearness, and I have confined myself to the questions which demand an answer before the inquiry can profitably be pursued into all those ramifications that "Colonus" seems to have traced. I do not pretend in any way to the learning of an expert, and I now leave the matter in the hands of "Colonus," and of those who know more about it than myself—satisfied if I have induced any reader to be a little cautious about accepting a theory which must, I think, tend to make us Anglo-Saxons more bumptious than we are already, by encouraging the notion that we are favoured by Heaven, and that when the general melee comes, we are bound, if I may use an expressive piece of slang, to come out at the top of the heap.

I am, etc.,

J. Giles.

[SUPPLEMENTARY.]

WHERE IS ISRAEL?

With Dr. Giles we feel the difficulty of dealing in limited space with the ramifications into which this question spreads.

The identity of the Sabbath, the literal accuracy of Scripture, the disputed interpretation of Herodotus, and other questions raised in his latest letter, published in the Herald a few days ago, would each require many columns and many issues to enable Dr. Giles or ourselves to exhaust the arguments, even if we were to pass away from the main question of the Identity of Israel, which would require many volumes for itself. If we therefore waive the opportunity of pursuing the ramifications of this contention, it is not from unwillingness to follow up the discussion of a very fascinating subject, but because in the track in which "Colonus" travels, objections are as thick as blackberries on a bush, and if he got entangled in the brambles he would never get on.

However, we may explain to Dr. Giles, and others who have been canvassing the arguments, that though we believe in the soundness of our contention—that Israel in Media were the forefathers of the Scythians that emerged from Media, according to Esdras, Diodorus, Ptolemy, Pliny, and, we think, Herodotus; and that these same Scythians, as shown by Sharon Turner, fought their way to the mouths of the Elbe, and became the progenitors of the Angles, Saxons, Jutes, and Danes that swarmed over into England—the only value which we attach to the historical phase of the contention is its showing that such a migration was not impossible. That is all. It is part of the Anglo-Israelite theory that the clear Identification of Israel in their exile and their wanderings would have been contrary to the specific terms of prophecy. As Judah was to be distinctly known by name and many characteristics, even by the "show of the countenance," Israel was to be literally lost, speaking "another tongue," "called by another name," abandoning the Mosaic ordinances, and losing every vestige of identity till the fulness of the time comes.

If it is only shown, as we believe it has been shown, that the track of Israel from Samaria to England was possible—and it is more than that, for it seems probable—that is all that is wanted, the extraordinary identifications in Scripture do the rest.

A more entrancing study than the Bible in the light of Anglo-Israel truth it it impossible to conceive, and ministers of religion put from them one of the most powerful weapons in the armoury of the Christian faith in neglecting it. This action of theirs is come perhaps of the "blindness in part that is happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in," and ministers of religion are, unwittingly no doubt, performing their part in the dispensation under which Israel, miraculously preserved as Judah is, must lie concealed until the time appointed for the manifestation. The after fate of Israel has been aptly described as the "romance of history"—a nation lost to sight and coming to the front again—and in our case as the "paradox of history," a nation searching for itself.

PRINCESS MARY ADELAIDE DUCHESS OF TECK is particularly devoted to her eldest grandson, whom she calls by the last of his seven names (David), and of whom she is exceedingly proud. He is a fine manly little lad, and bright and sunny of disposition. Should he come to be generally known as Prince David it would be an auspicious cognomen, if unusual, for an English king. It appears, however, to be handsome, genial Princess Mary's special pet name for her grandson.—Lady's Pictorial.

"THE GENTILE" AND "JEWISH" CHURCHES.

THE following letter appeared in The Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette on the 7th February:—

SIR,—Your correspondent, C. M. Wilson, when writing very well upon the use of the word, "Catholic" in your issue of the 24th January, makes this statement: "'Catholic' only meant originally the same as 'Gentile' Church, as opposed to 'Jewish' Church, which latter has ceased to exist for centuries." Your correspondent states a very common opinion, which is, I believe, erroneous. The knowledge possessed by St. Paul caused him to state that Gentile Christendom was not a separate Church; rather it is a wild olive grafted in upon the original stem, not bearing the root, but being borne by the root. In fact there never was such a body as the Gentile Church. Gentiles were admitted to the Church of Israel, the continuity of which was never broken. The Jewish portion of the Church was broken off and the Gentiles grafted in; but note the apostle's words: they partook with and among the other branches (Rom. xi. 17). Therefore the original root ever gave its fatness to certain natural branches as well as to the wild grafts. These wild grafts from the very first, boasted themselves against the branches and claimed to be the root, the Church, the body substituted for Israel. But Judah never was and never can be All Israel, and when the kingdom of God was taken from Judah it was to be given to a nation (St. Matt. xxi. 43), not an election from amongst the nations such as Gentile Christendom. In this nation was maintained the continuity of the Church of the earlier dispensation. Gentile Christendom partook of the root and fatness with it, and it has not ceased to exist, for it is to bring forth the fruits of the kingdom; against this national Israelite Church, the wild grafts have ever boasted themselves, and they will continue to do so until men learn to distinguish between Israel and Judah, between the excised branches and her who was once desolate and Lo Ammi, but who, because redeemed by Him who came to be the glory of His people Israel, became Ammi rebetrothed and fruitful, as prophets foretold and history testifies. BRIGHTON BEACH WORK.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Several friends have very kindly sent me enough to clear off the balance of last year's work and about £12 to the good, most of which I am just about to spend on a good stock of literature to begin what I hope will be my most successful year's work. My sphere of labour, I trust, will be wider than ever. I hope to have some good times in London parks. There are, doubtless, many believers in the South of England, saying to themselves, "I wish something could be done here." Well, dear friends, where is "here?" Why don't they write to me and ask what I think can be done? If they will tell me what they think, I will put it beside what I think, and by God's help between us we will find a way, or make it, for something to be done. I can lecture indoors or out; by the seaside, or on the village green. Only I cannot undertake to do long walks, as my legs are overdone in that direction to get my daily bread. I feel sure that the British-Israel Association will co-operate with me, so that we may make the most of the time that is before us, as we all know that the summer no sooner comes than it begins to go, and I would much rather have fifty enquiries in April than in October.

Perhaps you think I am joking, but if I have health and strength, I would lecture in 50 Southern towns and villages if you will only give me the chance, and I am not over particular whether I receive the hospitality of an alderman or a cottager. If either are ready to work, and my humble services are requested the poorest village will be thought of and helped as well as the great city of London. I am a great believer in the village work, because our large towns are replenished from the rural districts. As it is I go to the country one Sunday a month and come in contact with many happy and rejoicing British-Israelites.

As usual I shall be glad of all the old BANNERS and other literature that our friends can spare. There is never any necessity to write and ask me if I want them; my work will consume any quantity. All will be received with thanks and acknowledged by post and in my annual report. Financial help is much more valuable at the beginning than at the end of the year. I do not mean to say that it will not be acceptable at any time. But it is nice to be able to see what one may do rather than wonder if it will be safe to spend another pound. I usually lecture one or two nights a week near Pool Valley. I have no regular nights, as I go by the weather. My Sunday lectures this year will probably be delivered out West. I remain, yours faithfully,

THE VISION OF THE TWO BASKETS OF FIGS.

(Jer. xxiv.)

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR PHILO,—Since sending you a paper on the above vision, which very recently appeared in your columns (at page 111), I have come across quite a different view taken of this vision by a lady writing under the initials of J. M. in a pamphlet on the Twelve Tribes you have already reviewed (page 344, vol. xix.). J. M. takes up each tribe separately, and under the tribe of Judah she gives her view of this vision as follows. J. M. says only a remnant of Judah returned from Babylon, and that the good figs which represented those of that tribe which remained at Babylon on the termination of the captivity "are somewhere, although unrecognised, under God's blessing."

Whether the opinion expressed by me in the paper referred to above, is the correct one or not, I leave it to your readers to decide, but there are serious objections to the view taken by J. M. of this vision, and which I shall proceed to point out. It has been suggested by J. M. that these good figs which went into captivity for their good "might be the Waldensians, or some of those German princes who at the time of the Reformation protested so strongly against Rome, and whose blood runs in the veins of our Royal Family." 1st, The Jews were never lost or unknown, for had they been unrecognised how could the prophecy have been fulfilled concerning them that they were "to be a reproach, a taunt, and a curse in all places?" (Jer. xxiv. 9). This prophecy applied to the whole tribe and not only to a part of it. 2nd, Our Royal Family are descended from the House of David, and if they are sprung from the good figs that remained at Babylon and did not return, how then was the prophecy fulfilled that Christ should be born in Bethlehem of Judæa? 3rd, Does J. M. suppose that those represented by the good figs, and said to be "somewhere," are under the blessings enumerated in vers. 6 and 7? How could it be possible to apply such blessings to Judah which if not in letter but in spirit are identical with the terms of the new covenant promised to the House of Israel? These could not under any circumstances be applied to Judah, but would be applicable to Benjamin, one of the tribes of the House of Israel and the firstfruits of Christianity in Israel (Rom. xi. 16). Under the tribe of Benjamin, J. M. merely says that some of this tribe went into captivity and the rest on the warning of Jeremiah escaped to a place of safety (Jer. vi.). Scripture does not say so, but on the contrary, that those that escaped into the district and returned to Jerusalem on the murder of the Governor fled into Egypt, form part of the evil figs (ver. 9) and shared their fate. I see no reason to induce me to alter the opinion already expressed in my paper on this vision, which lately appeared in your columns. On the contrary, vers. 6 and 7, which I inadvertently omitted to bring forward, rather strengthen than otherwise my view in favour of Benjamin being the good figs, and on the other hand they raise an insuperable difficulty in the way of the adoption of the view taken by J. M. of this vision.

Yours truly,

ALLEGORIZING.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—May I supplement Dr. Hanan's excellent and useful article on "Spiritualizing" in this day's BANNER, by sending a few extracts from Bishop Marsh's lectures (published in 1810) on "Allegorizing." They should do good. Dr. Hanan has reminded me of having taken note of them sixty years ago, when I was reading for Holy Orders. First contrasting metaphor with allegory, Bishop Marsh says allegory is used of things, and metaphor of words. Allegory uses one thing to represent another thing, and is not a fictitious narrative, a picture of the imagination, but a fact. Some allegorical interpreters, not content with their own perversions, attempt to enlist St. Paul into the service of infidelity. But St. Paul never employed the word (the noun) "allegory." Nor is it found in the New Testament. Had St. Paul meant that the Mosaic narrative was an allegory (as the A.V. unhappily translates it), he need not have used the verb and allegorized it. History may be allegorized (which is the verb employed by St. Paul), without converting it into fable. Therefore the true interpretation of St. Paul's Greek verb in Gal. iv. 26 teaches that the things recorded were true history, only allegorized for illustration.

Your's faithfully,

P. CARLYON.

P.S.—The R.V. is an emendation on the A.V., but only partially.

Clifton, 19th February, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—Very many thanks for your kind donation to the "Widow Payne Fund;" also through your kindness in letting the appeal appear in the BANNER, over £15 has been thus "given to the Lord;" the friends have raised over £20 beside, and the relatives are going to double whatever is collected. Mrs. Payne has taken a shop to open in the hardware line, and two of the children are to go to the Seamen's Orphange. The eldest is a boy of 13, earning 6s. a week, the youngest a baby nine months old.

I never had so much evident blessing as I have received in connection with this little effort to help one of God's widows, and it is marvellous to observe how the letters come (as from Him direct); no name or address, frequently only "one who receives comfort from the BANNER," or from a "knowledge of our Identity," and so on. The truth of GOD is with BANNER readers, and I have proved it!

How wonderful that you have been preserved to edit the BANNER nearly twenty years!

I suppose it will be better not to trouble you with a further letter on the "Widow Payne Fund" till after the 29th? Meanwhile these amounts have been received since last acknowledgment:—

"THEY SHALL SURELY GATHER TOGETHER, BUT NOT BY ME!"

WE have recently had a specimen of the gathering together of the nations against Israel (represented now by the British nation), which has been striking in its sudden and furious development, and remarkable for its equally rapid subsidence. We discovered that the nations, if they had the chance, were quite ready to destroy our Empire and share it among themselves. But the chance was not given them. The Lord would not permit it. The late gathering was not by Him. The British, in the face of the danger, rose as one man. They quelled the devices of the enemy by showing their strength. The Flying Squadron was the means used in God's hands to rebuke those who wished to destroy us. It brought reason to the German Emperor and people, to those also who raged against us amongst our own brethren of Manasseh. It softened the asperity of the Continentals who had no good word to say of perfidious Albion before. The fact is, God has made us far too prosperous and great to enable us to escape the jealousy and envy of our neighbours, who naturally cannot see why we, as a nation, should have all the good things of this world, the wealth, the colonies, and the power, while they are put off with our mere leavings. It was hard to bear that we should be supreme in Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, and largely in Australasia. But when they saw that South Africa was likely to be ours as well, while Germany and France were in a far worse position in that continent, and failed in whatever they did acquire, human nature could endure it no longer! Hence the German people, and the German Emperor at their head, resolved to humble the pride of these islanders and teach them a lesson, to check their intolerable ambition.

The result we know. There was a gathering of the nations, but not by the God of Israel (Isa. liv. 15, R.V.). The gathered ones have been rebuked. Israel rose in her strength. She has declared that her supremacy in South Africa she will maintain against all opponents abroad, at every cost. That purpose, clearly declared, with sufficient force behind her to make her respected and feared, the gathering of the nations subsided and the hopes of peace are brighter. The Times on Feb. 13, expressed opinions on the subject which support this view thus :—

> It is true that the dangers which presented themselves with such extraordinary suddenness and unexpectedness now wear a much less threatening aspect. Her Majesty is able to allude to them in terms which indicate a good hope of peaceful and honourable solutions; while there has been not only a very marked diminution of rancour in the comments made upon our affairs abroad, but also a gratifying display of willingness in certain important quarters to get rid of irritating questions and to enter into more cordial relations. All this is highly satisfactory, but it must not be allowed for an instant to obscure the lesson so emphatically taught by events in Africa, America, and the East. On the contrary, that lesson is enforced in a remarkable manner by the improvement which we so gladly note in the general situation. For that improvement dates from the moment when it became clear that England had large reserves of naval force ready to be brought into line at short notice, and that she had not forgotten that the use of her strength is to defend her rights. It is the Flying Squadron which converted the hectoring of Germany into assurances that nothing offensive had ever been dreamed of; it was that vigorous response to her action in the Transvaal which touched our American brethren with a sympathy and pride in their kin, that have done more than anything else to modify the attitude they assumed upon the publication of President Cleveland's message; and it was the same agency that hushed the outcries against us upon the continent.

The world saw, in fact, that the nation which had grown rich and prosperous, and was filling the earth, had not fallen into decrepitude as they hoped and believed. She was ready indeed to defend herself.

God, too, placed upon us that terror which men call

Digitized by Google

"prestige," and the protection of our God has sufficed to preserve us from the attack, which at one time seemed very near indeed, and that from several quarters.

That we are not as men regard it defenceless, is very clear, from the account which the Daily Chronicle gave us on Jan. 20 last, in the comparative statement of the naval strength of our own and other maritime nations. The stake we have in the matter, as regards the 13,000,000 tons of commerce and food we have afloat, was compared with France, our next competitor in the list. She deals with only 1,000,000 of tonnage. We quote the passage as important during the present crisis :—

In the matter of battleships England stands easily first with twenty-six in commission, sixteen in reserve, and ten building or completing for sea—in all, fifty-two. Let us compare this with Germany and the United States. Germany has twelve in commission, eight in reserve, and three building or completing for sea—in all twenty-three. The United States has eight building. So that if we put Germany and the United States together, we still have twenty-one more than both, even if we imagine all those in the shipbuilding yards are possible factors in any struggle. France is a more serious competitor in the naval race. In all, she has thirty-four battleships either ready or preparing. Russia has seventeen, Italy has fifteen, Austria has eight, and Spain has two. If we take the battleships, both present and prospective, of all the Powers together, we have roughly a proportion of two to one against England—ninety-nine belonging to the Powers and fifty-two to England.

Under the other headings we compare as follows, taking into account all ships, both in commission, in reserve, and preparing for sea :—

	Coast Defence.	Cruisers.	Other Ships.
England	17	... 137	... 174
France	14	... 69	... 44
Russia	18	... 17	... 38
Germany	13	... 27	... 12
Italy	0	... 23	... 38
Spain	1	... 17	... 54
Austria	3	... 12	... 21
United States ...	20	... 23	... 27

If we compare the totals of all ships, except battleships, we do not come out so very badly from the comparison :—

England	328	Italy	62
France	127	Spain	71
Russia	73	Austria	36
Germany	52	United States	70

Here we are a match in numbers for at least any three of the other great Powers. But it must be remembered that we have a large proportion unprepared—fifty-four, as against France's twenty-two, Germany's six, Italy's eleven, and America's eleven.

But if our fleet is thus larger than that of any other two Powers, we must remember that our stake is far larger, and that we are far more vulnerable on the high seas. The aggregate tonnage of our mercantile marine is hugely out of proportion to that of any other nation.

England	13,227,185	Italy	778,941
France	1,094,752	Spain	554,238
Russia	487,681	Austria	304,970
Germany	1,886,812	United States	994,675

Altogether, the return is very interesting and suggestive, and though it will reassure anyone who may have fears as to our strength on the seas, it will breed a wholesome caution in those who are here reminded of the tremendous issues at stake for us, as a Naval Power, in any combat for the supremacy of the ocean—the highway of our commerce and our food.

We do not rely upon the greatness and power of our ships. But God works by human means, and He looks to His people to prepare themselves to resist their enemies, to defend His wondrous gifts to them, leaving the final result of all to His providential care.

"No weapon that is formed against us," He promises, "shall prosper," and every tongue that shall arise against us (His people), in judgment, "we shall condemn." He calls this "the heritage of the servants of the Lord," being Israel, and "their righteousness which is of Me, saith the Lord" (Isa. liv. 17, R.V.). Herein is the secret of British-Israel's security! They are the people of the Lord, His chosen ones, His servants. They are set apart to experience His protection and favour, because the blood of Christ is sprinkled upon them as a nation, and their righteousnes therefore, by virtue of the blood, is His own!

Can there be anything too good or too precious for the Lord to give to a people so equipped and so sanctified? Christ died for them! God's own righteousness, which is Christ's, is their's by God's own determination! Do we claim too much, when we say that the Lord must, as He promised, protect and bless them? He swore by Himself to Abraham, their forefather, that "blessing He would bless them," and make them in their turn, as Abraham's seed, to bless all nations of the earth (Gen. xxii. 18, R.V.).

The ennumeration of our naval ships of war with their fighting strength, as compared with that of other nations, is satisfactory as far as it goes. We are fairly equal to any two of our opponents, but not for three or four. We have however, as we all well know, an enormous area to guard, and our rivals are striving hard to overtake us in commercial activity, as well as colonial expansion.

We have, therefore, to provide for a greatly increased navy, and signs are not wanting that our nation, too, perceives the necessity, and means also to provide for it.

This is from the Lord, and we are bound to praise and thank Him for His sleepless care over us, His people (Psa. cxxi. 3, 4).

WHAT BRITISH OFFICIALS HAVE DONE FOR EGYPT.

THE Glasgow Herald has been publishing a series of letters on the subject of "Britain and Egypt," the final one of which appeared on February 1st, last. The conclusion of the correspondent is highly satisfactory in regard to the British officers who have done so much for the land, and we gladly draw attention to it. He wrote thus :—

"Before parting from the subject of these letters, a tribute must be paid to all these British administrators who have severally succeeded in doing various things that had previously been deemed impossible. They have, to a great extent, cured the native Egyptian of his aversion to military service; the conscription has now become almost popular. They have organised an efficient police force; have set up a coinage which substitutes for the previous chaos a currency combining the pound sterling with the decimal system; and they are only debarred from pushing on a large scheme of education by the absence of funds. I have presented many witnesses in the course of this inquiry, and I have not in any instance, although it has not invariably been of the same purport, warped or modified the evidence collected. Let the concluding sentences be yet the words of others :—'I do not know if the English govern everywhere as they govern in Egypt,' said to me at Cairo a native of high and responsible position—a gentleman whom Mr. Chamberlain saw and questioned very minutely when he was in Egypt—'but if they do, then I declare that they must be sent by God to rule the world.' The Arabesque of language and Oriental decorativeness may be pardoned in a man who has lived beneath the miseries of the misrule in the past. For an utterance in a different tone, and from a different source, but not less vigorous in corroboration, I may quote the verdict of a somewhat cynical Hellene, who closed a survey of human liberties and international politics with this paraphrase of a mot long famous—'Si l'Angleterre n'existait pas, il faudrait l'inventer.'"

The popularity of the British Government in Egypt is testified by the following, from the same pen, and is, as far as it goes, in the same direction, and in British favour.

"When at the capital I repeated to a personage well situated to follow popular sentiment throughout the country the assertion by the well-known Austrian financier at Alexandria, that a plebiscite through Egypt would certainly yield a majority in favour of the British occupation. 'He might have gone farther,' was the response; 'he might have added that if the vote could be secret it would yield not a majority, but unanimity.'

"And what will be said of this, by way of testimony to the progress achieved under the British—that a movement has latterly arisen in Syria for union with Egypt! A Syrian gentleman of independent position, and of the remarkable culture which is the splendid fruit of the work done in that province by the American Missionary Society, admitted the existence of the movement to me in the cautious words —'Many Syrians would be ready, on a partition of Turkey, to propose to the Khedive that Syria should be annexed to Egypt.'"

If Syria would desire in the coming collapse of the Turkish Empire to be attached to the Egyptian Government, we may be sure that it is to Egypt when ruled by British officials she desires to be united. Syria wishes for British annexation even now, and would hardly care to belong to the native Government of the Khedive, apart from the British Protectorate and guidance which now exists in fact, though not in name.

It is a pity that late Governments in these islands have allowed it to be understood by the French and others who wish us out of Egypt that "we shall go when our work is done, and when Egypt can stand alone." The question arises and is discussed in "the final letter" of the Glasgow Herald correspondent's letter, "Can we go out of Egypt?" Lord Cromer, called, it is said, "The King of Egypt," declares (it is thought) that he does not see "how Britain possibly can go out of Egypt!" The machinery by which such prosperity has been brought about in Egypt as now exists, cannot possibly be allowed to collapse, which it would do if we departed and left it to itself. The idea of our leaving Egypt at all will have finally to be abandoned! That country is now, as it always has been, a strategic land. It is the Gate of the approach to India, Australia, and China, from Israel's home in "the Isles of the West." It is the land which is the Key, or Gate, of the two routes by which Israel and Judah, with Manasseh united, must march to the land of the inheritance from the West, as well as from the South and South-East. It must therefore remain in Israel's possession until and after the tribes have been restored to the Holy Land. After that event it is impossible to say how the possession of Egypt may affect our occupation of Israel's ancient home, but it will remain "a Gate" even then, because the Gates are Israel's for ever by God's solemn oath recorded in Gen. xxii. 17, R.V.

Egypt, Israel, and Assyria are to be united for ever with Israel, "the third," to bless her inseparable partners, as Isa. xix. 24, 25, R.V., assures us. We are in Egypt now, a veritable blessing to the latter, as men of all shades of opinion agree. Geographically it is inconceivable that a land which is the Gate between the West and the East, between Britain's Western home and her Eastern possessions in India, Australia, Western, Southern, and Central Africa, can be allowed to slip away again from our own grasp, and fall into that of our opponents and rivals, the French, or of those who hate us, like the Russians and the Germans.

On scriptural and prophetic grounds, therefore, we argue that Egypt having been given to us by God's direct gift when Alexandria was bombarded on July 11, 1882, we shall never again relinquish or surrender it, until the Lord returns to reign. The country will then be left to be disposed of by His divine will, and not by ours. But that the connection between Israel and Egypt can be severed even then, we cannot conceive, since, by Isaiah's prophecy, Egypt's blessing will be the result of Israel's union with her, but not otherwise. Egypt is to be blessed, but it can only be by Israel's home being the adjacent land of Palestine —and so be "the third" with Egypt and with Assyria, "a blessing in the midst of the earth" (Isa. xix. 24).

THE COVENANTS APPERTAINING TO ISRAEL.

By A. R. Granville.

PART II.

(Concluded from page 140.)

The honour and faithfulness of Jehovah are pledged to the fulfilment of His promises to Abraham; and the children of Israel having miserably failed to keep the Mosaic Covenant, Christ came in the likeness of sinful flesh to keep it for them: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy but to fulfil" (Matt. v. 17). By this condescending act, and the sealing of it with His blood, He proclaimed Himself a new schoolmaster, and instituted the which is not however "new" in the sense of the old being replaced by an entirely fresh one. It is a Covenant based upon the Mosaic, infused with Christ's energising Spirit, and thereby renewed—just as the old world was renewed by the flood; or that there will be new heavens and a new earth, a new heart, and a new spirit.

This New Covenant is like a diamond with many facets, each of which reflects its own particular ray of the Divine Spectrum, and all of which, united, reveal the totality of God's purposes towards Israel and mankind in general.

Its concern is the redemption of National Israel, as well as the salvation of individual souls. Christ, the servant in whom God delighteth, is the sum and substance of it. As already inferred, it grows out of, is an offshoot from, the old Covenant of works, which, by the infusion of Christ's Spirit and the superaddition of His life-giving words and teachings, becomes a New Covenant of Grace empowering Israel to bring forth the "fruits of the Spirit," or the "fruits of the kingdom." The basis from which it springs is a national observance of the moral and judicial (but not of the ceremonial) precepts delivered from Sinai's mount. I purposely exclude the ceremonial law because the types of the Mosaic religion were changed for the more ennobling and exalted worship of the Christian faith.* By our Lord's fulfilment of the whole law (moral, ceremonial, and judicial), He became a covenant of peace to national Israel (if so be He be accepted and acknowledged in faith), and His fulfilment of the law is imputed unto His people. For that reason they are no longer called upon to justify themselves by the Levitical law, but have, through faith, already vicariously justified themselves. This is the difference between "justification by works" and "justification by faith."

Israel, under the old dispensation, could not keep the law; but, under the new dispensation, the precepts of the law of the New Covenant are engrafted into her nature, and she is able to obey them through the power of the Holy Spirit and faith in Christ. "This is My covenant with them. . . . My Spirit that is upon thee, and My words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever." So spake Isaiah (lix. 16—21); and thus spake Jeremiah (xxxi. 31—34), "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers . . . but this shall be the covenant . . . I will put My law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts."

From what has been said it will be seen that the first of the three covenants is entirely distinct in character from the second and third, and that the second and third are closely allied to one another. This distinctiveness is not, however, generally understood; and hence arises much confusion when reading those portions of the Old Testament which have reference to the Abrahamic and Mosaic Covenants, and they are, in consequence, curiously jumbled together. Many examples can be given, but the following must suffice:—"On reaching the summit of Mount Sinai the Lord called unto Moses, and made known His intention of renewing the patriarchal covenant, which, though it might seem to have been forgotten during the weary years of bondage in Egypt, had never been annulled (Gal. iii. 17) and was now to be solemnly republished. Like all covenants it contained a stipulation and a promise." † Here we have the unconditional and everlasting Abrahamic Covenant confounded with the conditional, and, therefore, terminable Mosaic Covenant. The former stretches from eternity past into eternity future, when the kingdom of God, planned for, will be perfected and delivered over by the Son to the Father. The latter, made in time, is the means designed for fulfilling the former. How Dr. Maclear can have imagined Gal. iii. 17 to refer to one covenant, instead of two, is past comprehension. The quotation runs thus:—"And this I say, that the Covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was 430 years after, cannot disannul, that it should be of none effect." Though involved, the language clearly mentions two covenants, one of which could not annul the other. The Revised Version is somewhat clearer, but not so clear as that given by Ferrar Fenton in his "Translation of the New Testament into current English:—"And I assert this—the rituals, being 430 years after, could not cancel a covenant previously established by God, so as to abolish the promise."

This inability to distinguish between the Abrahamic and Mosaic Covenants is largely responsible for the "spiritualising" method of interpreting the prophecies; by which, whilst all the curses pronounced upon the Houses of Judah and Israel are accepted as literal, the blessings upon the same Houses are asserted to be "spiritual," i.e. not given to the literal Houses but to spiritual believers in Christ of every country, clime, or kindred. This system reduces the glorious promises of God to an absurdity, and one wonders at the perverseness of the clergy in rejecting the light of British-Israel revelation which intelligibly interprets these prophecies with honour to God. In former days, before Ephraim-Israel was found, it was concluded that that house was Lo-Ammi for ever. To those early theologians we are not so surprised that the prophecies were tangled and incomprehensible. A people had, they thought, entirely and for ever disappeared, of whom great future promises were made. Consequently a theory of substitution was invented—viz., that the blessings promised to Abraham were not literal, but symbolical of the spiritual blessings of the Christian Dispensation. Acting upon this assumption, the terms of the prophecies themselves became symbolical: the "House of Israel" was made a figure of speech for "the Church," Abraham's "seed" was deemed to signify "Christ," or, if forced to admit that the "seed" is multitudinous, that it meant Christ and His spiritual brethren; and the "Wilderness" became synonymous with the world of unbelievers in which the Church is said to dwell. The force and beauty of the prophetic narratives are spoilt by this curious spiritualising process; and makes one ask why the prophets were commissioned to speak in such ambiguous and misleading language if the House of Israel of the later prophets is not the House of Israel formed under Jeroboam, but simply a church?

But we are thankful that these errors are now dispelled by the light of British-Israel truth, which advocates a literal interpretation of the Bible. When God spoke of the House of Israel He meant that house, and none other. When He promised great temporal blessings to Ephraim-Israel, He intended to fulfil them to Ephraim-Israel, and to none other. Our truth gives stability, continuity, and grandeur of purpose to the three great covenants. It destroys the necessity for denying the existence of the House of Israel; or for declaring that the two Houses of Judah and Israel have been amalgamated, and that the whole people are now known as Jews. It relegates the Church to its proper place as a gathering of saints. It shows how Christ is Redeemer of national Israel, and the Saviour of lost souls; how by His death He opened the door of entry into the great literal promises of the Abrahamic Covenant. And it adds force and charm to those beautiful references to Israel's espousals, marriage, divorce, re-betrothal, and re-marriage to their God, with which the sacred pages are loaded. For instance:—"I remember the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after Me in the wilderness" (Jer. ii. 2) is correctly expounded by spiritualisers in its literal sense as an expression of God's close relationship to the literal descendants of Abraham; but the New Covenant prediction "I will betroth thee unto Me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies. I will even betroth thee unto Me in faithfulness" (Hosea ii. 19, 20) is wrested from its connection (by the same expounders) as not applying to literal Israel in the latter days, when they shall have returned to the Lord, but to a totally different people who are called "spiritual Israel." Continuity is broken and the whole sense of the prophecy marred. Can anything be more sad than this twisting and straining of Scripture? So absurd is it, that I feel sure that the clergy would perceive their error, were it not for their life-long education in the practice and the centuries of episcopal authorisation it has received. Let us hope that public opinion will soon compel them to unclose their eyes; for, not only will their flocks be then induced to investigate for themselves through force of example, but the gain will be greatly to their own advantage in the enjoyment of a beautifully harmonised Scripture and a wider scope for their pulpit powers.

* It was asked during the discussion that followed the reading of this paper whether Christ's words, "For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled (Matt. v. 18)," do not militate against this statement. I think not. It rather infers that when all is fulfilled the law may, and will be, changed. When these words were spoken Christ was just entering on His work, and the fulfilment was still future. But as soon as the solemn cry went up from Calvary's cross, "It is finished" (John xix. 30) all was fulfilled, and the whole system of ceremonies and types of the Mosaic ritual was replaced by a new worship in spirit and in truth. The House of Judah, it is true, still practise their old form of religion—or as much as they can without temple, priest, altar, ark, or mercy-seat—but it is no longer efficacious in God's sight. Christ, having descended to earth and ascended into heaven the Great High Priest for His people, has for ever put aside the worship which pointed to Him as the coming Messiah.

I do not forget that Abraham never owned so much as a single foot of the country given to him—except the cave of Machpelah, which he purchased—nor that in their palmiest days under David and Solomon the nation never conquered, much less occupied, the whole of it; that the Israelites in Palestine were never a company of nations, nor populous above other nations. The land was unquestionably given, and multitudinousness promised; but the time of fulfilment was movable and dependent upon the faith and obedience of the legatees. We can illustrate how a gift can be made and its possession postponed, by citing the case of a parent who leaves to his son and heirs an estate already occupied by a tenant for a long term of years. The son cannot enjoy possession until the termination of the lease; nevertheless, the property is his although his own actual possession of it may be problematical. To his heirs it is, however, assured. Such were the gifts to Abraham. Actual possession of the promises was not to be "until Shiloh come" (Gen. xlix. 10)—a fact apprehended by the patriarch himself:—"Your father Abraham rejoiced to see My day: and he saw it and was glad" (John viii. 56).

It is now time for me to close by summing up and contrasting the three covenants.

The first, the Abrahamic, gives certain unconditional great promises of world-inheritance, power, and wealth, to Israel. It is an everlasting covenant which God has sworn to carry out into effect upon Israel, and Israel only.

The second, the Mosaic, is entirely conditional, and quite distinct from the first. It was designed for the purpose of fitting the people to receive the Abrahamic promises. It pointed by its system of types to Christ, "the one Seed," through whom alone an entry to the promises can be secured to the "multitudinous seed." But it was faulty through Israel's disobedience.

The third, the New Covenant, is separate from the two others, though allied to the second. It is in a sense conditional, but Israel is helped to keep it through faith in Christ and the power of His Spirit: "The promise that Abraham should be heir of the world was not . . . through the law, but through the righteousness of faith" (Rom. iv. 13). It is primarily founded on the moral and judicial precepts of the Mosaic Covenant, to which it is consequently subsidiary. The Law, or the Mosaic Covenant, must be fulfilled in every jot or tittle before the promises can take effect, and since Israel failed to fulfil it, Christ came in the likeness of sinful flesh that "the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us" (Rom. viii. 3, 4); and to Israel (Abraham's real flesh and blood descendants) this fulfilment is imputed through faith, so that she is justified before God, receives a new heart, is re-married to the Lord of Hosts, and inspired with the will to be obedient to Him.

If we bear these characteristics in mind, when reading the sacred pages, they will be found to shine with a light we never saw before. The Divine purposes of God with respect to the "restoration of all things" will be more fully evident. God Himself will be honoured, and we, His creatures, shall be abundantly edified.

ENGLAND'S SIN—THE GREED FOR GOLD.

THE Rev. C. E. Eastgate, the Vicar of St. Paul's, Ramsgate, preached a sermon at St. George's Church, on Sunday, January 19th, from Psa. xxx. 6—8, as "A warning against national avarice." The preacher drew his illustrations from the history of the Israelites, and applied the facts to that of our own country during the troubles we have recently passed through. The conclusion was very much against our people, who, according to the preacher, are open to the charge that the love of money will be the ruin of us. Our failing is national avarice, "the sin of the trader, the greed for gold." He admits we are the richest nation upon earth, but our one national object seems to him to be to keep what we have got, and get more. He believes that even though our cause of quarrel with other nations be a just one, we cannot be sure of God's protection. For God used the heathen nations around "the Jews" (He meant the Israelites), though more wicked than the latter, to punish them for their sins, and so He may do again with us, though our cause as respects our enemies may be just. Our nation's sin, in Mr. Eastgate's sight, seems to be that we give so little compared to our income towards Home and Foreign Mission, that in India and "the far wilds" of Africa "the missionaries of the Roman Catholics outnumber our English ones,"(!) and we spend but little of our profits from trade for the benefit of those lands. He complains too at our national sins in respect to Home Missions, which are so inadequately supported that our Churches have lost their hold on the working classes, and on many of the educated classes too. In all this, of course, the preacher did not recognise our national position as the House of Ephraim. He did not stop to recognise God's promises to, and covenants with, His Ten-tribed people of Israel, or notice the provision God has made to correct the sins and shortcomings of His people, which we do not attempt to deny or extenuate. In Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, and Heb. viii. 10—12, we have Israel's sins passed in review by God Himself; and the remedies He proposes are not punishments but blessings of a spiritual kind, which leave nothing for His people to do to earn them, but which will have the desired effect, since God Himself will work the whole plan out and see that it succeeds. "This is the covenant that I will make with the House of Israel after those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts, and in their heart will I write it, and I will be their God, and they shall be My people; and they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, 'Know the Lord,' for they shall all know Me, from the least of them to the greatest of them, saith the Lord; for I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin will I remember no more." This will, indeed, be an effectual remedy, and Mr. Eastgate will hardly deny it?

The sermon, however, was well intentioned, and will bear repetition in the BANNER. The report of it in the Thanet Advertiser, of January 25, was to the following effect:—

"He founded his address on Psa. xxx. 6—8: 'In my prosperity I said, I shall never be moved. Lord, by Thy favour Thou hast made my mountain to stand strong. Thou didst hide Thy face, and I was troubled. I cried unto Thee, O Lord, and unto Thee, Lord, I made supplication.' "In the course of his remarks, the rev. gentleman said: Many times during their history must God's ancient people have had to re-echo the experience of the Psalmist. The maintenance of their prosperity and of their national life itself depended on their faithfulness to Him who had covenanted to be their Keeper as well as their Ruler. They were to live in isolation, free from alliances with the different races around them. 'The people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations,' was the prophecy of Balaam concerning them; and yet in their solitariness they were regarded with envy and jealousy by rival nations in the days of their national greatness, on account of the strength of their position and the vitality of their national life. Their security and prosperity rested on their allegiance to the God who had made them what they were, and who demanded in return their respect and obedience. And then arose time after time the source of their great danger. 'They forgot God their Saviour, who had done so great things for them;' they counted their national stability as a thing of their own making, that would go on irrespective of the conditions upon which it rested. They lost sight of the fact that they had to be true to God if He was to be true to them. The rights which He demanded, although continuing in theory, were evaded or laid aside by many; the mingling with the heathen and learning their works, so strictly forbidden, was gradually connived at, and then tolerated, with the effect of degrading and sullying the whole religious life of the nation; and in the days of the tottering Jewish monarchy we find them ready to seize eagerly the chance of any alliance against the foes that threatened them regardless of the prophet's warnings that it would be unavailing. And when the crash came they were simply startled to find that the protection of Jehovah with which they had started had failed them. They seemed unable to understand that the mere fact of a religion being recognised among them was useless unless it was ever kept before them as the moving principle of their lives. Habits foreign to the simple lives of their forefathers, inconsistencies between profession and practice, a general neglect of putting God's claims first and their own inclinations last, undermined the bulwarks which protected them, and brought them to their last condition of a feeble people, groaning for their lost liberty, under the iron heel of their Roman conquerors. I venture to think (the preacher resumed) that after the period of terrible anxiety on many sides, and perhaps over-confidence on some others, through which our country has been lately passing, it may not be without profit to see if we can apply some of the lessons of Israel's self-assurance and failure to ourselves. I do not, of course, mean to say that we are in a like position to theirs as the only nation on the earth among whom God was at all recognised. There are, thank God, other nations as Christian as we are ourselves, at least. But there seem to be points of resemblance between the position and dangers of Israel and our own which we shall do well to lay to heart. God has given England a special position in the world—a position from which she has sent out her children to occupy and thrive upon the waste places of the earth as no other race has hitherto succeeded in doing. And this has brought prosperity and wealth—and wealth has engendered avarice; and England's sin of to-day, at home and abroad, is the sin of the trader—the greed for gold. She is the richest nation on earth, and the one national object seems to be to keep what she has got and get more. It is a sickening and humiliating thought that the trouble that she has experienced lately, both in South Africa and America, has arisen from one cause: not the difficulties of bona fide colonists, not the need of opening up new countries, but because the lands in which disputes have arisen are rich in gold; and where the gold prospector goes, he carries all the demoralizing influences of the world in his train. Yes! God has given England wealth and the means of acquiring wealth, but we know of old, from St. Paul, that it is a dangerous gift if its responsibilities are not duly recognised —that the love of money is a root of all evil. Perhaps God, in the late crisis, is giving us a warning as He did many times to the Jews—not merely that we should look with pride to our national defences, but that we should ask whether, standing alone as we do, we have so used our opportunities and recognised our responsibilites at home and abroad as to warrant our believing our cause to be secure in His hands. And we must not take for granted that if a dispute arises with other nations, and our grievance with them is a just one, that God will therefore fight for us. The nations who attacked the Jews were heathen, and far worse morally than they, and yet God used them to chastise His people, because those people had not been faithful to Him. They did not realise this, and it bewildered them, because their cause for the moment was just; and they did not see how by their inner national life they had forfeited God's protection. We need to understand this, so as to reform the sins of our national life ere it be too late. And these sins arising from national prosperity do infect every class of society. Long years of peace will breed, and have bred, habits of luxury and selfishness in every class. With those who have the means it has led to the mad determination to get all the pleasure possible out of life with the very slightest regard to the claims of others; and with those who have not, it has fomented a spirit of envy and sense of injustice which is not by any means without foundation. And so class and class draw farther away from one another for lack of that charity of each to each by which alone Heaven's law of unity can be preserved. And then, again, we are too apt to say with the Psalmist, "I shall never be removed," in a spirit of self-reliance with a due remembrance of divine order, taking for granted that England's prosperity is of her own making, or, at least, the due reward of her merit. We have seen—we ought to know it well by ordinary common sense —that wealth has its responsibilities, and one of the leading responsibilities is the claim of the Giver. Do we recognise that? Let us take a few cases. (a) Foreign missions. Is it not a shame that in British India and in the far wilds of Africa French Roman Catholic missionaries outnumber our English ones? And that missionary organisation in all countries is crying out for some of that wealth that Englishmen are heaping up by means of those very countries day by day; and that all missionary enterprise is hampered by the comparatively paltry contributions made to it out of the millions of pounds that are being raked in? (b) Home missions. Why is it that in our large towns so much hold has been lost on the working classes and many of the more educated classes too? Because men have been content to let their brethren shift as they may, while they spend the wealth they have gotten on their families and themselves; and so it comes to pass that in so-called Christian England many a soul for whom Christ died has hardly heard His name, or turns it into derision as he sees the selfish indifference of those who profess to be called Christ's people. (c) The needs of God's poor, who too often look upon their better-off neighbour as an enemy, when God intended they should regard Him as a Father: wretched and often without fire or food, within a stone's throw of those who complacently hug their better fortune close to their own bosom, and spend on themselves and their own pleasures the money that should meet the first claim of God and His people. Surely it is sad that there are so many who forget that self-denial is one of the first of Christian duties, so strongly insisted on in Holy Scripture as a leading feature of our imitation of Christ; and who will not stint themselves in pleasures, gaieties, and expensive food and drink, so that they might have the more to give to him that needeth. It may be said that much money is given for good works. But compare it with the national income: let each man compare his gifts with his own income, and see what it amounts to. A pound here and there out of an income even amounting to a few hundreds is an unworthy return to the Giver of all good things. Generous giving, making the offering to God a first charge on what we receive from Him, instead of the residue when we have taken all we want for ourselves, is the only antidote for the danger of national avarice. Our Master says: 'Give alms of that ye have and behold, all things are clean to you.' But we must see that the alms form a respectable proportion of the receipts, and thus test the truth of the prophet's promise: 'Prove Me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it.' In the prophet Ezekiel there is a terribly-fulfilled description of the fate of Tyre, a place built up by trade; in the Revelation there is described a more awful fate of some city or nation under the name of Babylon under similar circumstances. Who shall say that that chapter may not be a warning to a great country like ours, if in its prosperity it forgets what is due to God, and to those who need a share of the national wealth, from the hands of those to whom it has been entrusted? We have to be aroused from a selfish indifference to the welfare of those whom God has placed at our gates to receive our ministrations and to share the good things He has given us. For these, as far as this place is concerned, I am here to plead with you to-day, and I would ask you to accept as a warning the danger which has lately threatened our country, and, like the Psalmist, 'to get me to my Lord right humbly,' and by renewed activity in God's cause, by cutting off many of the luxuries which have grown up so thick around us, and by generous help to those whose needs are so many, to aid in making our land earnest and zealous in the work God has given it work to do."

With all due allowance for the wickedness of our race and of our times, we cannot but think the preacher, in the above, has put out of sight all the good our nation is doing with her God-given wealth; and that when all is said and done, there is no nation like ours so noted for the world-wide extent of her national beneficence, or for the strenuous efforts all classes of the people make for the publication of the Gospel, and of God's Word among the nations and kingdoms of the world, or for the sacrifices they make to alleviate the miseries and suffering of the godless races. Her government of India and of the heathen nations under her hand, are models of the world. Her benefactions to all suffering peoples, whether of her own or alien stocks, are notorious. These would be a hundred-fold what they are now, were only our people individually converted to Christ, and all made by the power of God true Christians indeed as a nation. We wait and long for that time, and we can pray for its advent too, because this is precisely the most glorious and magnificent of all God's promises to His people. It is therefore, sure to come pass, as He is true. Let Israel, therefore, rejoice for this consolation, and praise the Lord for His mercy to us His chosen ones.

THE "Venite," taken from the 95th Psalm, has been used from time immemorial. In it we say, "He is the Lord our God, and we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hand." If we be not they, why do we say we are? And in the rest we apply events in the history of Israel to ourselves. "Forty years long was I grieved," &c, would be very appropiate if they were our fathers; but if not, quite inapplicable. Truly we English have sins enough of our own to confess without taking on our shoulders the sins of the Israelites in the wilderness. One sentence suits us all, Jew and Gentile, or more correctly speaking Gentilized Israel, "It is a people that do err in their hearts, for they have not known My ways." True then and now; still they are a people.

The chapter appointed to be read in the Old Testament seems to give a new impulse to join in the glorious hymn of praise known as the "Te Deum" which was written by Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, A.D. 248 or 258. The Roman Catholics use the same. It is, however, a mistake to say our Liturgy comes to us through a Latin channel. Its service books were essentially its own, and much more allied to Eastern and to primitive uses than to Roman. In fact, the contrast of its worship with that of the Mass is one strong evidence of our being Israel. It was designed to correct and overthrow that apostate Church, though some parts inserted at different times by the Whitby Conferences have been retained. The above is on the authority of an episcopal clergyman. In this wonderful hymn we join the angelic host, the Church triumphant of the apostles, prophets, martyrs, and believers in all ages, past and present, in singing the praises of the Trinity, and the Lord God of Sabbaoth, or of the people of the Lord. "The holy Church throughout the world may well be ourselves, as we certainly are everywhere, and I believe all Israel should be the Church, and the time is soon coming when we shall see eye to eye and be one as He is." "Help thy servants whom Thou hast redeemed." Isaiah xli. 9 says, "Thou art My servant, O Israel; I have chosen thee and not cast thee away." "Make them to be numbered with Thy saints in glory everlasting." In the Bible, saints generally mean those who were under the covenants of the Old and New Testaments. All these titles—Servants, Saints, Thy People, Thy Heritage—are names of Israel, but of none other. The Redeemed, too; the word meaning those whom the Lord has bought back, having been His own before. The Gentiles are saved, Israel is redeemed, of course understanding they only are Israel, which is being miraculously fulfilled to us in the present day. No wonder that a lady says she always thought the prayers were for the Jews. "Govern them and lift them up for ever" is our petition.

In the "Benedicite" we praise and bless Jehovah, or the God of Israel, for His wonderful works, it is in the song of praise of Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego in the Apocrypha. "It is not found in the Hebrew of the Book of Daniel, but in part of the Greek addition to it in the Septuagint. It is a paraphratical exposition of 148th Psalm, and was used in the later Jewish Church, and commonly sung in the Christian Church in the 4th Century" (from "Book of Common Prayer," by Procter and Maclean).

The "Benedictus" coming after the second lesson, seems most suitable, expressing the believer's joy that he lives in the time of the Messiah. It is sung every Sunday in all the Churches, but not understood either by preacher or people, it has been said. It is the prophecy of Zacharias being filled with the Holy Ghost. "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for He hath visited and redeemed His people, and hath raised up a mighty salvation for us in the house of His servant David." "He hath redeemed His people"—that is done, which was the result of Christ's mission—"as He spake by the prophets which have been since the world began;" not only the writers of those books which we call the prophecies, but Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, &c., were prophets. "Our forefathers" we say, and "to perform the oath that He sware to our forefather Abraham that He would give us." Then we are Abraham's children. A friend of ours has said, How can we repeat the verses of Luke i. if we do not believe that we are the sons of Abraham and that He has redeemed His people? "That we might serve Him without fear," as we at present certainly can. History repeats itself, and it would be in keeping with the rest of this Canticle if the child who is to prepare His way "was a call to us to prepare for the Second Advent of our Lord; and instead of waiting idly for a future when it is expected that the Jews are to teach the world, we are to give knowledge of His salvation through the tender mercy of our God, whereby the dayspring from on High hath visited us to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death and to guide their feet into the way of peace." When these words were first spoken we (Israel) were indeed sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death, but Christian light was at hand,—now birthright light is bursting through the veiling clouds, yet men draw down the blinds of prejudice and indifference, and say, We see it not, and sing the songs of Israel believing they are Gentiles. But the time will come, and soon, when our Church will be forced to open her eyes to the real meaning of much of the language she has been providentially led to use in her daily worship, and to realize what it is to sing, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel." Not only in the Benedictus but the whole order of our morning and evening prayer, the marriage and commination services, and in fact the Liturgy as a whole, is suited for a restored Hebrew people; nor can we doubt that the minds of the compilers of it were overruled by the Holy Ghost for this reason and end, and we surely in especial as British Israelites can now pray to Him with more intelligence and intensity than before.

"Jubilate," "O be joyful in the Lord, all ye lands." It is for us as Israel to spread the glad tidings into all lands, to be thankful unto Him, and speak good of His name, to show that His mercy is everlasting and His truth endureth from generation to generation. Where is the place for a Gentile parenthesis here to inherit the promises which were made exclusively to Israel? Our Lord said, "Abraham rejoiced to see My day, and he saw it and was glad." Why was he glad if it was only Gentiles that were to benefit for 2,000 years at least?

The Creed, which comes next, and all the 39 Articles may be accepted and believed along with Our Identity. There is nothing to prevent it; in fact when the trumpet call awakes us, we shall find that God has so provided that we can answer, "When I awake I am still with Thee."

Putting together the different prayers for the Queen, we have, "O Lord, save the Queen; with Thy favour behold her; grant her in health and wealth long to live." And in the Litany and Communion Service, "That it may please Thee to keep in righteousness and holiness of life Thy servant Victoria, our Queen and Governor; that it may please Thee to rule the heart of Thy chosen servant in Thy faith, fear, and love, that she may evermore have affiance in Thee, and that, knowing whose minister she is, she may above all things seek Thy honour and glory, and study to preserve Thy people committed to her charge in wealth, peace and godliness; and that it may please Thee to be her Defender and Keeper, giving her the victory over all her enemies." These blessings we ask for her are all promised to Israel and abundantly bestowed on her (Deut. xxxii. 9—14, viii. 18; 1 Sam. ii. 32). Returning to our place in the Prayer Book, "Make Thy chosen people joyful" (Deut. vii. 6). "The Lord hath chosen thee to be a special people above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth. O Lord, save Thy people, and bless thine inheritance." This is taken from Psalm xxviii. 9, a Psalm of David, who was speaking of his own people, not Gentiles. "Give peace in our time, because there is none other that fighteth for us but only Thou, O God." This is a promise given to Israel, and literally fulfilled to them and to us, and confirmed in Scripture. Now may Israel say, "If it had not been the Lord who was on our side when men rose up against us, then they had swallowed us up quick. Great shall be the peace of Thy children. I will extend peace to her as a river" (Exod. xiv. 14, &c.).

In the last prayer, "Fulfil, O Lord, the desires of Thy servants as may be most expedient to them, granting us in this world knowledge of Thy truth, and in the world to come life everlasting."

This concludes the Morning Service, some of the last prayers being again the same morning and evening.

FOREIGN ARMIES AND THE HOME FORCES.

A MILITARY correspondent to a newspaper has prepared an interesting article on, "Up-to-date Details of Foreign Armies," including the details of the European and Asiatic Resources of the various nations. The figures he gives us are terrible in their magnitude, and plainly point to the coming convulsion among the nations, which we see reason to believe is not far distant. The writer quotes from the very latest authorities the following figures, dealing with "the peace effective strength" of the following European Powers: Thus Russia is credited with 858,000 soldiers (9 soldiers per 1,000 inhabitants); Germany with 580,000 (13 soldiers per mille); France, 512,000 (14 per mille); Austria Hungary, 380,000 (10 per mille); Italy with 300,000 (or 1 per mille); Switzerland, 131,000 (46 per mille); Spain, 100,000 (or 6 per mille); and Belgium, 31,000 (8 per mille). The list gives us 3,400,000 fighting men on the peace establishment. The military correspondent thinks the figures are terribly misleading, when the war strength is called for. Russia, for instance, is said to have a war strength of seven millions of soldiers. But it is ridiculous he adds, to suppose that the Czar will ever have the chance of calling out more than a quarter of that number, or about 1,800,000 men. The following from the correspondent's paper had regard to the comparative times it will take now, to "mobolise" the armies of the various Powers to enable them to cross the frontiers of the enemy and to deliver their attack. He wrote:—"A couple of striking instances may be given to show how much modern procedure on the outbreak of war differs from the leisurely methods of even fifty years ago, as well as to demonstrate in a simple and effective manner the military strain to which Continental nations are subjected in comparison with our happy insular selves. As noted above, the regular active army of Germany is about 580,000, of which about 100,000, plus 50,000 cavalry, are ready to move in 48 hours, and could be concentrated in four days. But on the ninth day from the issue of the order to mobolise, Germany could have nearly three-quarters of a million men either over or within easy reach of the frontier. As France would not be ready before the twelfth day, and the Russian mobilisation takes some weeks, it will be seen that Germany would at any rate have a fair start, even if she had to take the initiative in a war upon two fronts. But it must not be forgotten in this connection that, although Russia might not be able to assume a brisk offensive against either Germany or Austria, she possesses in the Warsaw military district alone a force of all arms which would probably enable her to act effectively on the defensive until her colossal system of mobilisation was complete. On the left flank, facing the Austro-Hungarian frontier, Russia has 47,200 men, in the centre at Warsaw and Petrokov 52,000, and on the right flank facing the Prussian frontier 49,000; in all, about 110,000 rifles, 26,500 sabres, and 344 guns. The large proportion of cavalry is significant, its raison d'être being, on the outbreak of war, to promptly cross the frontier, or frontiers, and not only to strike hard and often but, more particularly, by cutting telegraph wires and destroying communications generally to render the enemy's mobilisation as difficult and as tardy as possible."

The correspondent bears testimony to the sinister fact that the nations are still preparing for war with the most feverish haste and anxiety; while compared with them we are supine and sluggish, as if we had nothing to fear in the coming crash of the nations.

He writes: "Further instances could, but surely need not, be given to show that all over the world, so far from there being any rest from military progress, the cry is all for greater efficiency and, above all, more rapid means of mobilisation for war. It would be wrong to say that all this makes for war itself, but it is certainly wonderful that where so much inflammable material is lying about there has been such comparatively little conflagration, especially where hot-headed little nations with new guns and other material are concerned. For ourselves perhaps the most soothing reflection is that, while we can to some extent afford to move more slowly as regards our army than most Continental nations, we, too, in the course of the next few years, shall be marching in the van of progress, and shall have all these excellent models on which to shape our own creations in the way of organisation, administration, or equipment. We may also, perhaps, further congratulate ourselves that whatever else foreign armies may have brought forth, they have never yet produced anything to quite equal that often maligned but not unpopular article of home growth—the British soldier."

Our own achievements in the way of preparations for war, it seems, are all to appear in due time—in the future. At present there is not much to show but the raw material, the British soldier, a most excellent article, but with hardly enough of him if he be meant to do much mischief to other nations. It will be seen, if we reflect upon the matter, that God has given us remarkable protection from attack from our enemies, in the fact that we are an isolated people, "dwelling alone." In our northern home, we are surrounded by water, and to those who want to destroy us, their attack is sure to prove rather hazardous while we command the sea. God is helping and protecting us in so doing. In regard to India, we are vulnerable at only one point, the Northern frontier; and there God has pushed us forward to the North till He has given us the Himalayas to protect and defend us, with their Gates or passes in our hands, to prevent the approach of the Russian Bear to our invaluable strongholds there. In Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, and Australasia, we have island possessions for the most part to defend, and here again the command of the sea is our sure and adequate defence, for it is the gift of the Lord God to Israel, dependent upon the possession of the "Gates" of our enemies (Gen. xxii. 17, R.V.). South Africa is ours because our colonies there follow the coast lines and the sea; and the circumstances are such there, that the paramount power is British, and towards the North we have none to fear. In the Canadian Dominion we have only one frontier to defend; but as our brethren of Manasseh hold the country beyond it there will never be feuds between us, and the possession of those vast territories is as safe as are the British counties at home. There remain only the Gates and ocean fortresses of Israel to consider. These will stand or fall with our possession of the command of the sea. The Gates minister to our mastery of the ocean, and are promised by the Lord to His people, obviously in order to make the supremacy of the sea our nation's property for ever. We see, then, as compared with the nations of Europe, why it is that, being Israel, we can afford to live "confidently and carelessly" in the Isles (Ezek. xxxix. 6, R.V.), while the other nations, wherever they may be, are alarmed as to their own vulnerable and dangerous positions, exposed to the attacks of their neighbours, and without the invaluable protection of the sea, or of the supremacy thereof, conferred by God's gift of the Gates to them. Thrice happy are God's people, the British-Israelites, seeing they have God for their Guide, Guardian, and Protector, for ever (Isa. xlii. 16 R.V.); also the Lord Jesus Christ as their Redeemer, solemnly pledged as "a Minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made to the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8, R.V.). Well may Moses our prophet sing to the praise of the Lord in those grand verses which close Deut. xxxiii. 26—29 R.V.:—

"There is none like unto God, O Jeshurun,
Who rideth upon the heaven for thy help,
And in His excellency on the skies.
The Eternal God is thy dwelling-place,
And underneath are the Everlasting Arms;
And He thrust out the enemy before thee,
And said, 'Destroy.'
And Israel dwelleth in safety,
The fountain of Jacob alone,
In a land of corn and wine;
Yea, His heavens drop down dew.
Happy art thou, O Israel;

Who is like unto thee, a people saved by the Lord,

And that is the sword of thy excellency,
And thine enemies shall submit themselves unto thee,
And thou shalt tread upon their high places."

Let Israel therefore, praise the Lord and bless His holy name.

WIDOW PAYNE FUND.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—In closing the above fund permit us to express, on behalf of Mrs. Payne and her fatherless children, as well as on our own, our gratitude to the Lord God of Israel for His bountiful goodness in again hearing the cry of His children, and providing for their wants. In seeking to assist in this matter we have been greatly blest ourselves—have felt our Father's smile resting upon us, and proved that religion is mainly active benevolence, which all the super-abundant attendance on outward observances, (which we see on all hands to-day) cannot supersede. We have also proved that among the BANNER readers are numbered very many whose discipleship leads to acts of kindness done for our Master's sake.

We have been much struck with the many acknowledgments, from donors to this fund, of "comfort," "help," and "encouragement," received, by a world-wide circle of readers, from the BANNER; a testimony to the solid value (God-given) of your efforts, dear sir, in conducting our paper, which we feel it would be wrong to withhold.

The amounts received since the last acknowledgment are: C. A. C. Florence, £1; L. G., Bournemouth, £5; "a BANNER reader," Canonbury, 2/6; H. H. P., Bromley, £1 1s; "two friends," Chichester, 5/-; R. H., Chiswick, 5/-; Chester, 5/-; Birkenhead, 2/-; "Anglo-Israelite," Bournemouth, 5/-; L., Eltham, 10/-; "BANNER reader," Ilford, 2/-; Philo-Israel, 5/-; W. C., Wandsworth Common, 5/-; J. B., Bradford, 5/-; Total £9 12s. 6d., making, with £7 1s. 6d., the amount previously acknowledged, £16 14s. contributed in answer to the BANNER appeal. Including the subscriptions of Identity friends in the district a sum of £37 1s. has now been raised, and the relatives of Mrs. Payne's late husband are also helping to stock a hardware and chandler's shop for her, which is situated at No. 135, Walton Breck-road, Liverpool. Two of the children are to be assisted by the Seamen's Orphanage; two girls will help their mother (the youngest child being only nine months old); the eldest son, 16½ years old, is at present earning 6/- a week, and the other children are attending school. We think it right to let the kind friends who have so generously helped know these facts, for they will thus see what substantial benefit has accrued from their efforts, and what a stupendous fact it is that our dear Master takes these gifts as to Himself; "Ye did it unto Me!" (Matt. xxv. 40, R.V.).

Yours faithfully, in Israel's hope and glory,

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Your article on "How Manasseh Loves Us," in your issue of January 8th, betrays a fear that there is a possibility, if not a probability, of hostilities between England and America.

I am glad to be able to assure you that there is an immense and still rising tide of feeling against any such monstrous thing as that.

That Mr. Cleveland did not rightly represent American feeling, as he did not rightly interpret the Monroe doctrine, is beginning to be a settled conviction amongst millions. Some of us believe that, reading between the lines, we detect the fine Italian hand of our common foe.

Be that as it may, however, there is another very weighty consideration which may have possibly inspired Mr. Cleveland's letter, and that is, the fact that himself and his party through him had been rapidly dropping to zero in the political thermometer, and a move like this was calculated to check the falling tendency. There is that in us, as in you—a common heritage—that is quick to resent even a fancied interference with even a fancied right, but I firmly believe that neither Rome nor France will ever rejoice at the sight of our two great peoples imbruing their hands in each other's blood. The day for such a possibility is past. There is, however, a large element here who would gladly hail the beginning of hostilities. I mean the Roman-Irish. You have doubtless heard of the A.P.A., an organization that stands for the protection of American institutions; chiefly as against Roman aggression. It came into existence none too soon. This organization has unearthed a good many things concerning Romanism and its designs; amongst others, its official organs made the statements two years ago that Rome was arming—that thousands of her able-bodied men were ready at a moment's call—that arms and ammunition were stored away in church and monastery and convent. These charges were assiduously denied from altar and rostrum and in public press, but presto:—Mr. Cleveland's manifesto elicited in an unguarded moment, from head-quarters of these nefarious rebels and plotters, an offer of almost a million men all ready for the field.

The question that is now bothering a great many Protestants is, Where did they come from, and what is the need, of their existence anyhow?

That question may take us some time to answer, and may fill our hands in the answering ere it is settled. We have a foe in our midst, and one of her designs is to create animosity and secure a rupture, if possible, between these two great Protestant nations, who ought to be, for mutual advantage, practically one.

I know there are not a few who still have a spirit of antagonism to England. I mean among others than Romanists, but it is rapidly and surely dying out. I sincerely hope the day is not far distant when all the past shall be covered up in one mighty wave of brother-feeling and brother-love. The near future has wonders in store for us.

A crisis is evidently approaching. Yea, we are in its rapidly intensifying beginnings. We shall ere long, I believe, be in a fulness of time that will call for the positive interposition of a Hand divine.

Oh! that Christians everywhere could be brought to a keen realization of the situation and be led to voice the prayer of the Revelator in one mighty chorus of petition, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." Yours in His name, H. R. BALDWIN.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—In reading over your article in the BANNER of Jan. 8th, "How Manasseh Loves Us," I see you say "Apparently there is but one influential newspaper in the United States, 'The World,' which opposes the president and his policy, as unjust and unworthy of the nation."

I send you a digest of the question issued from the office of The New York Evening Post, with a summary of leaders from that paper. The Post, I may say, is one of the most respectable and best read papers in New York, or the United States, and there are plenty more which see matters in the same light as it does.

I am a regular reader of the BANNER, and there are plenty such in this country. With every good wish for the success of the BANNER, and the propagation of the Identity, Believe me, very truly yours, HERBT. WALLIS.

THE TWO ELECTRC STORM-CENTRES ABOUT TO BURST OVER "YONDER ILL-CONSOLIDATED EUROPE."

THE existence of the two storm-centres over Europe, is the fact that underlies all the anxieties of European statesmen at the present time. The one has reference to the loss of the two French Provinces to Germany, as the result of the war of 1870, and the resolve of the French nation to recover them one day.

The other storm-centre is the Eastern Question, the last word in which is, "Who shall have Constantinople?" Men in all parts of the world are considering these two imminent dangers to the well-being of Europe at the present hour, and are busy devising ways and plans of their own, by which the impending wars may be avoided, and profound peace be the result, instead of the state of universal war which men are anticipating.

The Age newspaper, for instance, at Melbourne, discussed the position of affairs on January 13th last, and came to the conclusion that if British statesmen would be satisfied with the guarantees that Russia would offer, that Egypt shall be safe, and that the Suez Canal and all the British Gates in the Mediterranean shall remain in British possession undisturbed, Russia might to-morrow occupy Constantinople, but once inside could never be dislodged. These, with other convenient arrangements, the Age thinks would suffice to get rid of the Turk, and restore peace and safety to Europe.

But who is to answer for Russia's guarantees, and how is she to be trusted after her conduct for the last 100 years? With Europe at her feet and the key of the East in her possession, how long would she respect our right of way by the canal, or the safety of the Land of the Inheritance, or of Egypt?

The following, which are the words of The Age, puts the question in a nutshell, and describes the two storm-centres in much the same language we are accustomed to use regarding these subjects. It said:—

Only by some such arrangement as this does it seem possible to secure a general disarmament of the nations, or to substitute a peace of any duration for the armed truce that mocks our hopes. At present every nation is waiting to spring at its neighbour's throat, and no nation can relieve the tension with safety. One armament begets another. France is eager to fight Germany for her lost provinces, and this necessitates Germany maintaining an enormous force to repel her. Russia covets Constantinople, and Austria and Italy must be ready to take the field to check her march. Both France and Russia are suspected of harbouring concerted designs against Great Britain, and increased activity in English naval dockyards is the result. The Franco-German question in the West, and the Russo-Turkish question in the East, are the two storm-centres about which the electric cloud is gathering that must shortly burst over Europe and the world. If Great Britain likes to take the initiative, as we have shown, both those questions can be settled peaceably to-morrow. To be sure, the settlement means the aggrandisement of Russia by the acquisition of Constantinople, but the acquisition of Constantinople, or rather the eviction of the Turk by some Power or other, is imminent, and cannot be postponed. Russia is the Power which is designated by tradition and local circumstances to succeed to his inheritance; and whether Great Britain acquieces or not, the free passage for her fleets through the Dardanelles, to be followed probably by the conversion of the Black Sea into a mare clausum, will most certainly accrue to her out of the present imbroglio. The acquisition of Constantinople will remove the political centre of Russia from the north to the south of Europe, but the advantage she will gain will not be an unmixed one. She will still have all Europe on her western flank, and there will not be a country in Europe that will not have an additional motive for treating her colossal growth as a common danger, to be suppressed if necessary by a common resort to arms. The real gainer by the new situation will be Great Britain, who will see France isolated, the Mediterranean littoral under the joint protection of Italy, Austria and resuscitated Greece, and the greatest maritime power on earth next to herself pledged by gratitude as well as policy to give her a free hand in the colonisation of Africa.

These are man's plans for settling the coming "war-woe," but it puts God and His determinations quite on one side, and ignores His intentions and purposes as if they did not exist, and had never been revealed.

The Bible is never so much as mentioned, much less consulted, with a view to obtain light upon a terrible catastrophe, which all men see to be nigh, even at the doors. The Book teaches us that the British are Israel, and that the Lord having His people's interest at heart, means to protect them in the hollow of His hand while He visits upon the nations "His indignation, and all His fierce anger," in order "to devour the earth with the fire of His jealousy." At that dread crisis He will turn to His people Israel "a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve Him with one consent" (Zeph. iii. 8, 9, R.V.).

God's purposes are those of love, mercy, and protection towards British-Israel, but of vengeance and punishment towards the nations of the earth. "For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance, the year of recompense in the controversy of Zion" (Isa. xxxiv. 8, R.V.). It is not then a question of confidence in the promises and guarantees of Russia! Her aim is the domination of the world, and the possession of Constantinople would give it her! It is really a question of God's promises to Abraham in respect to the possession of the Gates. To whom did He promise it? And as Constantinople is the chief of all the Gates, to whom must that spot be transferred when the Empire of the Turk breaks up? To Abraham and his seed for ever! The British are Israel. To them, therefore, the reversion of that stragetic position belongs by promise of God. How it will fall out we cannot say, for it is not revealed; but that it will be so we cannot but make sure. Some entertain the idea that it may be God's will to place the Russians first in possession of this splendid Gate, and that it will then, somehow, be transferred to the British-Israelites! This can hardly be, without a sanguinary war, in which the strength of Great Britain must be taxed to the very utmost. As, however, "the Lord will ordain peace" for His people, according to Isa. xxvi. 12, we cannot see how this great Gate can be transferred to the arch enemy of Israel, in the very teeth of the promise that the latter shall ever be the heirs of this stupendous earthly blessing. The fall of the Turkish Empire will settle almost immediately the fate of the Gate of Russia's house, and we shall see then that the promise of the Gate has not been inserted in the very forefront of the Bible for nothing.

In regard to the other storm-centre (that which relates to the coming war of revenge between France and Germany), there is not much to say. The facts are palpable to all, and the settlement of the dispute can only be by the sword. The matter is in the hands of God, and it will be well if we leave it there. Whether by war or peace, maybe by both, the glory shall be His, and it is for Israel to praise the Lord for His goodness and mercy towards us, His people.

GOD'S PROMISES TO ABRAHAM: TO WHAT EXTENT HAVE THEY BEEN FULFILLED?

By J. Bradley.

In my previous paper I tried to make it plain that the special promises and blessings given to Abraham must now be in possession of his children, the House of Israel, but allow me to take you back just for a few moments to Abraham, the founder of the Hebrew race, and note the special blessings vouchsafed to him, the reward for his exceptional faithfulness, promises that his descendants should become great, mighty, and prosperous. This Abrahamic covenant passed on through Isaac, and then through Jacob, to the rejection of Ishmael and Esau. Jacob's name was changed to Israel, hence the appellation of the Twelve Tribes. Israel had twelve sons, ten of whom each founded a tribe, and named it after himself. Of the other two, Joseph and Levi, Levi was not reckoned a political tribe, as it is written in Numbers xvi. 9: "Seemeth it but a small thing unto you that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel, to bring you near to Himself to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord, and to stand before the congregation to minister unto them?" (Joshua xiii. 14): "Only unto the tribe of Levi He gave none inheritance; the sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as He said unto them." But Joseph, although having no tribe of his name, was doubly represented by his two sons (Joshua xiv. 4): "For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim." (1 Chron. v. 1): "Now the sons of Reuben the firstborn of Israel (for he was the firstborn); but, forasmuch as he defiled his father's bed, his birthright was given unto the sons of Joseph, the son of Israel; and the genealogy is not to be reckoned after the birthright." This birthright portion was double that of the others (Deut. xxi. 17): "But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his."

In reference to Abraham himself, the promise was not fulfilled (Acts vii. 5): "God gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on." And although Abraham resided in the land of Canaan for a great number of years, and that after Jehovah had promised that He would give it to him for a possession, yet he dwelt in it as one who had no right or title to it whatever. He dwelt in it as one whose abiding in it was merely tolerated, and out of which he was liable to be driven every moment. For in Heb. xi. 9. it says, "By faith Abraham sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise." The only possession, if such it could be called, which Abraham ever had in the land of Canaan, was that of the field of Ephron; and the cave which was therein, as a burying place, both for himself and family. And even this he was obliged to purchase as a favour from the sons of Heth, which he most assuredly would never have done, had he had any inheritance in the land itself; and especially had he possessed the whole of the territory which God had promised.

But so far from having any inheritance in the land itself, Abraham, in the very petition which he made to the sons of Heth, for a possession of a burying-place, acknowledges that he had none; for he confessed himself a stranger and a sojourner in the land, which is very certainly not the character of a permanent resident in it, or lawful possessor of it (Gen. xxiiii. 3, 4): "And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying, I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a burying place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight." And in the 16th verse of the same chapter, we find that the field and cave were made sure to him by the sons of Heth for a possession of a burying place, the only possession which he ever had in the land of Canaan, a very plain proof that "God gave him none inheritance in it; no, not so much as to set his foot on," since to purchase was the privilege of others besides Abraham. So that in this respect the heir of Canaan, or of the world, as in Romans iv. 13, was not more distinguished than any other individual who had similar means at his command. And here it may be necessary to revert to what indeed I have already hinted at, namely, that the promise of all the land of Canaan was made not only to the seed of Abraham, but to Abraham himself (Gen. xvii. 8): "And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." These are the words in which this deed of gift are couched.

If the promise of Canaan for a possession was not fulfilled to him to whom it was first made, neither was it fulfilled to Isaac and Jacob, his immediate descendants. These righteous characters had no more inheritance in the land than the patriarch himself (Heb. xi. 9): "For by faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in moveable tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise." And yet nothing can be plainer than that the promise of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, was made to themselves individually as well as to their posterity: so that if it could be proved that the posterity of these holy men possessed the land, and that to the fullest extent which God had promised, yet since these holy men themselves had none inheritance in it, the promise, to all intents and purposes, is unfulfilled, and yet in the future.

But it is evident that the promise of Canaan for an inheritance was not fulfilled to their posterity. It was not fulfilled to the twelve patriarchs who descended from the loins of Jacob, inasmuch as during their lifetime those circumstances occurred which, under the overruling providence of God, took them away from the land of Canaan, even as a place of residence, and brought them into that of Egypt, in which they died. Nor was it until after their posterity began to multiply, and had continued in it for the space of two hundred and fifteen years, that there was even an appearance of the fulfilment of the promise to any of the seed of Abraham. At that time, however, the providence of God began to move toward the partial and temporary accomplishment of it. For the cry of the children of Israel, by reason of their taskmasters, having entered the ears of Jehovah; and, having beheld the cruel oppression under which they suffered, He was determined to effect their deliverance from it, and to bring them out of the land of Egypt, preparatory to their entering into that of Canaan. Moses was selected to accomplish this great deliverance, and the instrument by whom it was at length effected (Exod. iii. 7—10): "And the Lord said, I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows, and I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey; unto a place of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites. Now, therefore, behold, the cry of the children of Israel is come unto me: and I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them. Come now, therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharoah, that thou mayest bring forth My people the children of Israel out of Egypt."

But, notwithstanding, the children of Israel were thus delivered from the land of Egypt, and were brought within a very short distance of that of Canaan, they were detained for the space of forty years in the wilderness, before they could obtain even the smallest possession of it, during which the whole of the men that came up out of Egypt, and whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai, died in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them to see the land which God sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun (Num. xxvi. 64—65).

The first occupation of the land by the seed of Abraham was at the termination of their forty years' wandering in the wilderness, when, under the command of Joshua, they obtained possession of the city of Jericho, which Jehovah, in a very miraculous manner, delivered into their hand. The next possession which they obtained was the city of Ai. The next were the cities belonging to the Gibeonites, which were Gibeon, and Chephirah, and Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim. After which, a considerable number of cities, belonging to the different inhabitants of the country, fell into their hands. But, notwithstanding the number of cities which, in the time of Joshua, the children of Israel had obtained, and the large extent of territory which, by means of it, they had acquired, it was nevertheless small, when compared to even that particular portion of the land of promise which constituted the first allotment of the Twelve Tribes, as very plainly appears from the declaration of Jehovah Himself to Joshua His servant, when old and stricken in years (Josh. xiii. 1—6): "Now Joshua was old and stricken in years; and the Lord said unto him, Thou art old and stricken in years, and there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed. This is the land that yet remaineth: all the borders of the Philestines, and all Geshuri, from Sihor, which is before Egypt, even unto the borders of Ekron northward, which is counted to the Canaanite, five lords of the Philistines; the Gazathites, and the Ashdothites, the Eshkalonites, the Gittites, and the Ekronites, also the Avites; from the south, all the Canaanites, and Mearah that is beside the Sidonians, unto Aphek, to the borders of the Amorites, and the land of the Gibbites, and all Lebanon, toward the sunrising, from Baal-gaa under Mount Hermon unto the entering into Hamath. All the inhabitants of the hill country, from Lebanon unto Misrephoth-maim, and all the Sidonians, them will I drive from before the children of Israel: only divide thou it by lot unto the Israelites for an inheritance, as I have commanded thee."

Such, then, was the great extent of territory which, upon the death of Joshua, remained to be possessed by the tribes of Israel. But had even the whole of the extensive country above mentioned been possessed by them, it would not have equalled in extent the limits of the land which God had promised. For, although coinciding with the line of the Mediterranean, and reaching as far as Lebanon, it would, I believe, be found impossible to extend them to any part of the Euphrates or the Red Sea: and that in the time of the Judges the people of Israel did not effect any permanent inroad upon their enemies, or acquire any greater extent of territory than that which Joshua had left them, is plain (Judges ii. 20—23): "And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel; and He said, Because that this people hath transgressed My covenant which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened unto My voice; I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died: that through them I may prove Israel, whether they will keep the way of the Lord, to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or not. Therefore the Lord left those nations, without driving them out hastily; neither delivered He them into the hands of Joshua." In Judges iii. 1—4 we not only have these nations enumerated, but are told for what purpose God left them, to prove Israel, and to teach them the art of war. "Now these are the nations which the Lord left, to prove Israel by them, even as many of Israel as had not known all the wars of Canaan; only that the generations of the children of Israel might know to teach them war, at least such as before knew nothing thereof; namely, five lords of the Philistines, and all the Canaanites, and the Sidonians, and the Hivites that dwell in mount Lebanon, from mount Baal-hermon unto the entering in of Hamath. And they were to prove Israel by them, to know whether they would hearken unto the commandments of the Lord, which he commanded their fathers by the hand of Moses." And these particular nations not being driven out, it is added in ver. 5, "And the children of Israel dwelt among the Canaanites, Hittites, and Amorites, and Perizzites, and Hivites, and Jebusites."

BIG CHEQUES.

By Henry Francis Gordon.

Under the above heading the Leisure Hour for this month has the following interesting brief article:—"We have been hearing a good deal lately about big cheques. Some of the wine merchants and whisky merchants have been sending out as advertisements copies of the cheques they have paid the Government on account of duty. These puny amounts, however, sink into insignificance when compared with the gigantic sums that have been changing hands at the Bank of England on account of the thirty-seven millions of indemnity that China has to pay to Japan. In the old days a good deal of fuss would have been made about handing over some five millions of money. If it had been paid in specie about thirty-five vans would have been required to carry it, but we do not do business in that way now. A gentleman representing Japan and a gentleman representing China call by appointment on Mr. Bowen, the chief cashier, who solemnly presents the Chinaman with a cheque for £4,900,000, which the Chinaman, probably wishing it was all his own, hands over to the Japanese with a dignified bow, and the Japanese, in an equally dignified way, and with perhaps similar private sentiments, gives back to the cashier, who fills up a pay-in slip, and promptly passes it through the till-book. Nothing could be simpler; bows all round; that part of the account is settled; and Japan will evacuate the Liao-Tung Peninsula. This, however, was a small affair to what occurred a week or so before, when the first quarter of the main indemnity was paid. Then the cheque was for eight millions—£8,225,000 1s. 10¾d., some more or less veracious newspaper man informs us. Anyhow, it is the largest cheque on record, and its handing out and paying in occupied ten minutes, all told. As China has about a couple of dozen more millions to dispose of in this pleasant, gentlemanly way, we may soon hear of similar cheques, or even bigger ones, and Japan will have a nice little credit balance to draw upon when the bills come in for the new ships and guns that are making business lively up Newcastle way. The most striking thing about the affair is that the two far-eastern powers have to come all the way to the metropolis of the monetary world to settle their little arrangements. We should not be surprised to hear that China sold some of her consols to honour the drafts, for the methods of finance are intricate and peculiar, and the banks of the world are as one, with the old lady of Threadneedle-street to back them."

In this cutting from one of our leading church papers of a Protestant and Evangelical character, The English Churchman, January 30. 1896, reproduced from The Leisure Hour, we have dignity, fun, and interest combined.

The interest upon such vast gigantic loans must be immense, and the funny part is the account of the Chinese gentleman receiving so large a cheque, and wishing it was all his own, whilst with a dignified bow he hands it over to the Japanese gentleman, who also probably has similar private sentiments. Then, yet again, the cheque is handed on with a solemn bow, and the head cashier fills in a pay slip, and promptly the cheque passes through the till book and it is carefully preserved in the Bank of England.

When nations borrow money, or pay a war indemnity, the amount is sure to be a very large one; yet, still more wonderful is the fact that the business for these Eastern, and indeed, most other nations is done—and the money changes hands between representatives of the nations in the Bank of England. There, in that mansion of solid financial security, gigantic sums of money can pass rapidly, even in ten minutes, from one nation to another through the hands of their representatives.

Truly, a wonderful nation, and a marvellous Empire is that of Great Britain. In their central metropolis they control the money market of the world. They, and their brethren, the Jews, are the great financiers of the world. The rich Jews are safely consolidated in our national security, and are combined with the rich capitalists and merchant princes of Great Britain, so it may truly be said the Bank of England is at "the head" of all the intricate financial methods of the world's finance, and provides the cash. Therefore in their national financial life the British are fulfilling that promise of Jehovah, quoted many times by the Banner, "Thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail, and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them" (Deut. xxviii. 12, 13).

Is this nation Israel, or do we look for another?

John Baptist sent disciples to the Lord Jesus with a similar question, "Art Thou He that should come? or look we for another?"

The Lord performed many miracles, as the Messiah, in full view of the messengers, and having fulfilled prophecy in that wonderful way, then, He answering said unto them, "Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the Gospel is preached" (Luke vii. 22).

This to one like John Baptist, who knew the prophetic Scriptures, was the surest proof that our Lord Jesus was indeed the Messiah.

So the various fulfilments of prophecy by the British national life, reported from time to time in the BANNER OF ISRAEL, ought to convince every reader with a judiciously balanced mind, that here indeed we have Israel, with Ephraim's birthright blessings.

BRITISH-ISRAELISM EXAMINED AND NOT FOUND WANTING.

CONTRIBUTED BY J. S. BARTON.

PART I.

IT will be in the memory of some of the readers of the BANNER that in the Nos. for Dec 4th and 11th, 1895, was given in full, a paper read at a meeting at Willesden Green, N.W., entitled "Cui Bono?" which at the time was taken exception to by a young Congregational Minister who was present, but time not allowing to discuss the matter on that occasion, he was asked to formulate his objections at a later meeting. This he engaged to do, and stated them at the same place on January 14th, to the following effect. (We will call our friend C.M., as short for Congregational Minister).

The British-Israel theory was very fascinating, but unfortunately was untenable. Men of learning were unable to sustain it, and its central positions would not stand examination. His position and duty on the occasion was to show where the theory was unsatisfactory, not to substitute another for it; therefore he would divide his objections into:

I.—THE HISTORICAL ARGUMENT. It was a mere assumption that the Sacai of Herodotus were the same people as the Israel of Esdras, and it was disproved by the history of the Sacæ, dates being assigned in the "Handbook" to certain events quite impossible. Josephus also contradicts the assumption.

II.—THE PHILOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. (1) "Saxon" from "Isaac" not proven and impossible, and if possible, the sudden change of name about 700 B.C. from Israel to Sacæ, needs explanation. Israel was not known as "Sons of Isaac," notwithstanding Gen. xxi. 12 and Amos vii. 16, which mean something totally different. What has become of the first syllable in Yitzkhaq-Isaac? (2) "Angle" derived from metaphor applied to Ephraim, is apt to strike one as ridiculous. Besides the n remains to be accounted for, for according to Dr. A. B. Davidson "it is decidedly wrong to represent 'ayin' by the nasal ng." (3) Cymri from Beth Omri raises more difficulties than it solves. The Cymri are also identified with the Cimmerians of Homer, who existed long before Omri. The German language also is closely allied to the English, and especially to the Anglo-Saxon, in having the verb at the end of the sentence.

III.—THE SCRIPTURAL ARGUMENT. (1) The expatriation of Israel not perfect, nor possible; many Israelites were left in the land, 2 Chron. xxxv. 17, 18 has reference to such. Sargon's recently discovered inscription says, "27,280 of inhabitants I carried away, the rest of the people I caused to keep their possessions." Josephus also speaks of those "Israelites who had escaped captivity" (Antiq. x. 4, 5). (2) Ezra and Nehemiah mention 42,360 as the number of Israel returning from exile, yet give only 30,000 according to families; might not some of the 12,000 be Israelites? (3) The distinction between Israel and Judah was broken down after the captivity (comp. Ezra ii. 3; Neh. vii. 7; Ezra vi. 17, viii. 35; Esther iii. 6); and that the two Houses should be united in their return, C.M. relied upon Isa. xi. 11, 12, Jer. iii. 18, Ezek. xxxvii. 23, Hos. i. 11. Other passages prove, as Philo-Israel admits in BANNER No. 977, p. 395, 6, that the "rigid distinction between Judah and Israel cannot be maintained." That is described by a supporter as destructive of ANGLO-ISRAELISM (vide same No. of BANNER). Let a critic therefore say the same. In studying prophecy we must not read into it our own preconceived ideas. The messages of the prophets had reference to the prophets' own day, and it was exceedingly dangerous to regard their words as having to do with events still in the future.

C.M. having thus stated his case, was replied to by Messrs. Onslow, Weller, Granville, Stubbs, and others, and in so doing it was thought best to invert the order of the argument, taking No. 3 first, No. 2 second, and No. 1 last. Nineteen persons were present, and the following embodies the replies given.

That some Israelites remained in the land of the Ten-tribed kingdom after the taking of Samaria, no British-Israelite will deny, and seeing that in Elijah's day Jehovah had 7,000 there that had not worshipped Baal, and that He will always have a remnant even in the most evil times, it is only natural to suppose that these would be attracted to Judah to cast in their lot with them under such kings as Hezekiah and Josiah. These, sharing the Babylonish captivity with them, may have formed part of the 12,000 named, but we take it to be more likely that the 12,000 were chiefly composed of those mentioned in Esther viii. 17 and ix. 27, as those of the people of the land that joined themselves to the Jews, like the mixed multitude that went up with Israel out of Egypt. Also most likely there were many Gibeonites, Jebusites, &c. amongst them (2 Sam. xxi; 2 Chron. viii. 7, 8). In New Testament times we read of Anna of the tribe of Aser, but this is a case in point. It is expressly stated 2 Chron. xxx. 11, that "divers of Asher and Manasseh and Zebulun" did hearken and attend the feast of Jerusalem, but had 12,000 of such returned from Babylon, surely we should have had more than one mentioned in the New Testament. Silence is often as eloquent as speech. It is evident that the great bulk of the inhabitants were carried away into Assyria, or escaped (teste Josephus), either by sea, as Dan had left the land long before, or overland and into Europe. In fact, when Darius invaded Europe, 513 B.C., he found a colony of Getæ (Gadites or Gittites?) in Thrace, and subdued them and enrolled them in his army. That the passages referred to point to a future return, and possibly a very near future return, there can scarcely be reasonable doubt; if otherwise, we challenge C.M. or anyone else to tell us when the land of Israel was redivided according to Ezek. xlviii., or where the highway of Isa. xxxv. 8, 10, is to be found. As regards the drawing a rigid distinction between Judah and Israel, when in later times Israel alone is mentioned, the context and circumstances are sufficient to guide, otherwise it is best to take Israel to mean Israel. That the distinction between Israel and Judah utterly broke down after the captivity is disproved by the testimony of the New Testament, as see Heb. viii. 8, quoting Jer. xxxi. 31, "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the House of Israel and the House of Judah;" and going on to verse 10 we find the covenant with the House of Israel only mentioned. The fulfilment of the new covenant with the House of Judah is being reserved to the time pictured to us in Zech. xii. 10, xiii. 1, and xiv. to end. It is obvious in reading the prophecies that two distinct destinies are marked out for Judah and Israel, the one of affliction and the other of prosperity. This is evident in such passages as Micah iv. 6, 7, where Judah that halted (stayed behind) was kept back for the manifestation, betrayal (Zech. xi. 12—14), and rejection of Messiah, and became a remnant, while the other that was driven out—Israel—should be made a strong nation, and this immediately precedes the reign of Jehovah over them, both in Mount Zion for evermore; and certainly this is future.

Read also the two experiences marked out by Moses (comp. Deut. xxviii. and xxix. 24—29); and by Ezek. (comp. iv. 4, 5, and 6; also xvii. 1—10, explained in 11—21, whilst 22—24 refer to the Divine preservation of the royal family of David to the throne of Israel during the period of expatriation). Respecting Acts xxvi. 7, what we have already said holds good as to some of the Ten-tribed house being in Judah during Paul's day and until the breaking of the staves Bands and Beauty (Zech xi. 7—14) at the last stage of the siege of Jerusalem, when, as Philo-Judeus tells us, on the retiring of Titus from the walls of Jerusalem for a short time, all the Christians mindful of their Lord's words in Matt. xxiv. 16, and Luke xxi. 21, fled to Pella, and so were saved from destruction with the city. The Parthians, Medes, &c., of Acts ii. 9—11, were called Jews, being proselytized to Judaism, as is evident by their presence in Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, but by their coming from the parts they did, proved themselves members of the House of Israel, on the westward journey to these Isles of the West.

We next take our friend's philological argument. He says that to derive the name of Saxon from Isaac is impossible, and that the sudden change of name about 700 B.C. from Israel to Sacai needs explanation, and that Israel was not known as "Sons of Isaac"; and notwithstanding Gen. xxi. 12, and Amos vii. 6, what has become of the syllable in Yitzkhaq (Isaac)?

We reply that seeing that other names have dropped the initial "I," which forms no part of the root word, but is simply the prefixed sign of the 3rd pers. masc. of the future tense of the verb "tzakhaq" = to laugh, it is by no means difficult of explanation. We have the same thing in the name of Jeconiah changed to Coniah in Jer. xxii. 24, and respecting which the commentator Rev. Thomas Scott remarks, "that he is called Coniah in contempt, as it is generally thought, the first syllable of his name, being a part of the name of Jehovah, is cut off, perhaps as an intimation that the Lord no longer owned him." Without endorsing this, we may suggest that as Israel of the northern kingdom had cast off the worship of Jehovah, and adopted that of Ashtaroth and Baal, the worship of these being attended, and in fact mainly consisting in, festivities, revellings, and the grossest of obscene orgies, as it is written, "the people sat down to eat and drink and rose up to play," it was consistent then that they should cast off also the covenant name of Israel, and adopt that of Isaac (Yitzkhaq), as being the house of laughter, at the same time altering the laughter of holy joy intended in the name Izaac into Isaac, indicative of the laughter of fools, which is mad—becoming scorners and deriders of those who still clung to the worship of Jehovah the God of Israel, as see 2 Chron. xxx. 10, 11: "So the posts (from Hezekiah) passed from city to city through the country of Ephraim and Manasseh even unto Zebulun; but they laughed them to scorn and mocked them. Nevertheless divers of Asher and Manasseh and of Zebulun humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem." Thus from Isaac to Sakai was but a very small step. We have also the same contraction of name in Jehoshua to Hosea, Jedidiah to David, Iconium to Konia, Hispania to Spain, Idumea to Dumah, Istamboul to Stamboul, Ibrahim to Brahim, Iskanderson to Skanderson, &c., &c. On this change of the name of Isaac, Dr. George Moore, in his very scarce work, "the Saxons of the East and of the West," says, "Could we find the word Sacæ spelt in characters equivalent to the three letters that form the root of the word Isaac, the question would be almost decided, for the word is too peculiarly Hebrew in its form to have any other derivation than that assigned to it in Holy Writ (Gen. xxi. 6.)" (p. 107); and at p. 90, "That these Sacas or Sacs, were of a race identical with those races that entered India and overran a great part of Asia, is either implied or expressed by all historians who mention them, whether in the east or the west;" and at p. 97, "The word Isaac, is from Yitzkhaq;" p. 98, "The origin of the name Sacæ or Sakai, for the inhabitants of that part of Armenia which the Sacæ occupied after the expulsion of the Scythians, is thus naturally accounted for. That they should be confounded with the Scythians is equally natural, especially as there is reason to suppose that they afterwards colonized amongst that widespread race of marauders, and gave their name to the country they occupied beside the Massagetæ."

Having thus, we trust, proved the identity of the Sacæ with the exiles of the northern kingdom, we shall by and by show that neither the Sacæ, Getæ, Massa-getæ, Goths, Danii nor Scythians, stayed in the parts to which they were exiled, but became as Hosea ix. 17 said they should, "wanderers among the nations" or "goyim."

Exception is also taken to the derivation of "Angle" from the Heb. word for calf or heifer. Without the use of Heb. characters this is exceedingly difficult to explain, the pronunciation of the initial letter being disputed by Heb. scholars. It is the letter "ayin," by some pronounced "oiyin," "ghain" or "gnain," or being in the position of our letter "o" in the alphabet, it is by antipunctists taken as the equivalent for that letter. It is the initial letter of such different names as Adah, Eber, Gomorrah, Hebrew, Ibri, Omri, Obed, and Uzziel; altogether it begins 268 names in the Old Testament Scriptures, and is pronounced by punctists according to the accompanying vowel pointing. C. M. quotes Dr. A. B. Davidson's Heb. Gram. which says, "It is decidedly wrong to represent either of its sounds by the nasal 'ng.' As this is a matter of so much importance in our friend's estimation, although a mere trifle as effecting British-Israel teaching, it may be as well to know what can be said in opposition to Dr. D's dictum. Gesenius says, "Ayin is represented on Phœnician remains as 'o,' and has two sounds, represented by the Greek spiritus lenis or asper; the first to resemble a furtive a or e, the other called by the Arabs 'Ghain,' has a harsh sound uttered in the bottom of the throat, together with a kind of whirring, so that it comes near to the letter r, and this the LXX. generally express by the letter gama, as Gaza, Gomorrah, &c." The late Dr. Margoliouth, in his prospectus to his proposed "Hebrew Student's Library," says, "In giving the pronunciation of the Hebrew words in English characters, I have represented 'ayin' in certain positions as 'ain,' the n to be pronounced as it is in the French language in 'on,' i.e., ong." Ewald, Fürst, Bythner, Sebag, Ballini, and many others, both English and foreign writers, agree to these descriptions, and the present writer would add that he has read the Heb. S.S.

with three Jews of different nationalities, who, though differing in their pronunciation in some other respects, all agreed in pronouncing "ayin" as the French terminal "on," i.e. "ong," and as in the Heb. newspaper "the Shamang," or in Jacob as Yangcov (in the Englishman's Heb. concordance written Yah-ngakohv) and in the English Heb. con. it is invariably written ng; so that as far as authority goes we are right in pronouncing the word Angle or Ongle. Dr. Parkhurst gives as derivatives from the Heb. word, the Saxon "thwogal" or Eng. "Wheel" and Ogle and Goggle. The idea is roundness, and Julius Bate on the word says, "It is surprising what rounds upon rounds a young calf will fetch in a field," like the Druids in their ceremonies.

Then C. M. says, "Cymri from Beth Omri raises more difficulties than it solves. The Cymri are also identified with the Cimmerians of Homer (? where) who existed long before Omri." With the declaration that the Cimmerians of Homer existed between Omri we fully agree, but who identifies the Cymri with the Cimmerians? We certainly do not, but this will be dealt with under the historical heading. That the names given as Omri in our Bibles, and Cymri or Khumri on the Black Obelisk in the British Museum are identical we take it to be impossible to dispute; it is this letter "ayin" that causes the difference both in spelling and in pronunciation, and is impossible of entire explanation in English.

HAVE THE TEN TRIBES RETURNED WITH THE TWO FROM THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY, UNDER EZRA AND NEHEMIAH?

By the Rev. Marcus S. Bergmann.

It is maintained that several prophecies foretell the settlement in Palestine of all the tribes of Israel; and therefore, the return from Babylon included the Ten Tribes. But it is certain that from Babylon no more than two tribes returned. Besides the work of Josephus, Holy Scripture itself contains four books especially calculated to impart correct information respecting those who returned from Babylon. Ezra, Nehemiah, Haggai, and Zechariah were personally engaged in offices of the first importance during that event. Is it not reasonable to expect that the historical and prophetical books of these inspired men would so coincide with the prophecies of those prophets who preceded them; that, whenever predictions most momentous in the history of Israel were being fulfilled, they would take particular care to record such a fulfilment. And was the recovery of the Ten Tribes, who had been so much longer in captivity than Judah, a fulfilment of prophecy of so little importance that not one of these holy inspired men judged it worthy to announce such a fact? Surely, such questions may be well considered by those who maintain that the Ten Tribes formed part of the Babylonish restoration. It is true, that many years after the arrival of Zerubbabel in Judea, a small body of Israelites reached Jerusalem under Ezra. But Josephus, when speaking of the supplementary return under Ezra, observes, "So Ezra read the epistle at Babylon to those Jews that were there; but he kept the epistle itself, and sent a copy of it to all those of his own nation that were in Media; and when these Jews had understood what piety the king had towards God, and what kindness he had for Esdras, they were all greatly pleased. Nay, many of them took their effects with them and came to Babylon, as very desirous of going to Jerusalem; but then the entire body of the people of Israel remained in that country (Media); wherefore, there are but two tribes in Asia and Europe subject to the Romans, while the Ten Tribes are beyond Euphrates till now, and are an immense multitude, and not to be estimated by numbers" (Book xi., ch. 5, s. 2, Antiq.). The testimony of Josephus is decisive as to the fact that the great body of the Ten Tribes did not return to Judea with the two. It cannot be denied that some of the Ten Tribes joined the two at Jerusalem, but it cannot justly be considered an adequate representation of the several tribes to which they belonged. On the contrary, Josephus expressly declares that the Ten Tribes remained in Media.

If we examine the Scriptures especially dealing with the restoration from the Babylonian captivity, we shall find that the Ten Tribes have never returned. In the accounts given in Ezra and Nehemiah, we find that both these writers employ the names of Judah and Benjamin in such a manner as to imply that they considered the restoration from Babylon was limited to those two tribes. A few passages will suffice. "Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests, and the Levites" (Ezra i. 5). "Now when the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin heard" (chap. iv. 5). "And Judah said, The strength of the bearers of the burdens is decayed" (Neh. iv. 10). "And the rulers were behind all the House of Judah" (Ibid, ver. 16). "Moreover, in those days the nobles of Judah sent many letters" (Neh. vi. 17). It cannot, however, be denied that both Ezra and Nehemiah often employ the words Israel and children of Israel, but a close examination of such passages will soon convince us that the terms Israel, all Israel and children of Israel, were given by Ezra and Nehemiah to the people of Judah and Benjamin, who were after the Babylonian restoration the only ostensible representatives of their nation, of which the majority of the Ten Tribes were still in captivity. When Ezra was enumerating the people who returned with Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, he certainly says in the 2nd chap., ver. 2, "The number of the men of the people of Israel," and then proceeds to reckon those who, it is clear, belonged to the two tribes, viz.: Judah and Benjamin with the Levites. For in the first ver. he said that they "came again unto Jerusalem and Judah, every one unto his own city." Later on, in chap. vi. 16, when the temple was finished and consecrated he says, "And the children of Israel, and the priests, and the Levites, and the rest of the children of the captivity, kept the dedication of this house of God with joy." In the 21st ver. of the same chap., mention is again made of "the children of Israel, which were come again out of captivity, and all such as had separated themselves . . . to seek the Lord God of Israel, kept the feast of unleavened bread with joy," &c. But on close examination we find that the events to which these passages refer, took place before the return of some of the Ten Tribes under Ezra himself, as is evident from the first ver. of 7th chap., "Now after these things." This proves it very plainly that Ezra was recording in the former chapters events which took place at Jerusalem before he arrived there himself with the Israelites who accompanied him, though he calls the former "people of Israel" and "children of Israel," whom he mentioned in chap. i. 5 and iv. 1, as Judah and Benjamin alone. But after Ezra had reached Jerusalem, we are told in chap. x. 1, that although there assembled unto him out of Israel a very great congregation of men and women and children, yet Ezra writes of that "very great congregation" in the 9th ver. of the same chap., as "all the men of Judah and Benjamin." So we see that even after the addition of Israelites under his own leadership a very great congregation of Israel was held, it was still, in his own opinion, only a gathering together of Judah and Benjamin. Similar arguments may be drawn from the book of Nehemiah. Just one or two references where the term Israel is mentioned by this inspired writer will suffice. Chap. vii. 7, 73; xi. 3, 20; and xii. 47. From these it is evident that both Nehemiah as well as Ezra considered that the restoration from the Babylonian captivity was limited tribally to Judah and Benjamin, who became for a time the ostensible representatives of the whole nation, and were, therefore, frequently called by both these inspired writers "Israel," "children of Israel," or "people of Israel," although only certain members of the Ten Tribes were among them.

As a Jew, I am able to state, without fear of contradiction, that we are agreed that the Ten Tribes did not return with the two from Babylon, but that their descendants, at least some of them, either emigrated or yet remained in the neighbourhood of their original captivity.

The inspired records of Jeremiah and Daniel are also authorities equally to the purpose. For the seventy years' captivity was only predicted of the two tribes, for the ten have been made captives long before. They, therefore, who maintain the restoration from the Babylonian captivity extends to more than the two tribes, perceive more than the Holy Ghost was pleased to reveal to Jeremiah, and more than Daniel, "a man greatly beloved," was permitted to understand.

Upon the whole we must conclude, not only from the authority of Josephus, but more especially from the inspired books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Jeremiah, and Daniel, and other prophets, that the restoration from Babylon was limited only to the two tribes. It is not doubted that many devout Israelites were among those who returned from the Babylonish captivity, but these were the very same who had incorporated themselves from time to time with their brethren of Judah and Benjamin, taking refuge from the idolatry of Samaria in the yet remaining purer worship of Jerusalem at the time of the separation of the kingdom; for we have the authority of Scripture to this effect in 2 Chron. xi. 16, and in Hezekiah's time (xxxi. 6).

Kimchi, one of the most trusted of Jewish commentators, speaking of some of the descendants who were left in the land by Shalmanezer, says expressly, "These went into captivity with the tribes of Judah and Benjamin to Babylon, and returned with them when they returned." But these few Israelites who thus were among Judah and Benjamin, were not considered a real and fair representation of the Ten Tribes to which they belonged; these were captives in Media.

There is a good reason for the frequent mention of the terms, "Israel," "people of Israel," and "children of Israel," so often occurring in the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and those prophets especially dealing with the people forming the House of Judah, because Benjamin did belong to the House of Israel and not to Judah.

In the Talmud the question is asked, "Why was Mordecai called a Jew, seeing he was not of the tribe of Judah but a descendant of the tribe of Benjamin? The answer is, "He was called a Jew because he feared the Lord, as all Jews should do."

OUR LORD'S PROPHECY RESPECTING "THE OTHER SHEEP."

Among all the prophecies of the Old and New Testament, there is surely none other so direct, so clear, and coming to us with the direct authority of the Son of God Himself as that which is contained in John x. 16, R.V. The Lord Jesus was speaking to Scribes and Pharisees who, being blind, professed that they could see. He told them that He was the Good Shepherd, and His sheep, His own sheep, those among the seed of Abraham who hear His voice and follow Him. He laid down His life for those His sheep. Just so in Isa. liii. 8, R.V., it was declared that "for the transgression of My people was He stricken" (to whom the stroke was due). In the Gospel referred to, the Lord said, continuing the subject, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold," meaning, of course, not of the Jewish fold. These other sheep must be those mentioned in John xi. 52, R.V., for whom Christ also died; sheep spoken of thus by Caiaphas, as a prophet, "Being high priest that year he prophesied that Jesus should die for the nation (the Jews); and not for the nation only; but that He might also gather together into one the children of God that are scattered abroad." The next clause of the Lord's prophecy was this, "Them also (these other sheep) I must bring." This is the announcement of a fixed and decided purpose. These other sheep, outside the Jewish flock, must be somewhere. "Them also I will bring." "And they," this other flock, "shall hear My voice." The Lord will provide for their conversion and submission to His Gospel. "They shall hear His voice." "And they shall become" (or, marg., "there shall be") "one flock" (not one fold), "one Shepherd." The Lord's flock are men, Israelite men; and He is their God and their Shepherd, as Ezek. xxxiv. 1 to 31, and xxxvii. 27, 28 teach us. Surely the Lord, when He uttered His prophecy in John x. 16, R.V., was looking down the vista of the ages, and saw in our own days the nation, even the British nation, He has made so strong for Himself. These having heard and followed Christ, and being now "the sons of the living God," the Christian nation of Hosea i. 10, are alone among the nations, preaching Christ to the whole world, and benefiting them in every imaginable way, as His missionary agents. So believes, and almost as clearly declared, the Rev. Canon Hurst, the secretary of the Colonial and Continental Church Society, when he preached in Clifton Parish Church for that Society on Feb. 23rd last. He has strong faith, we believe, in our nation's Israelitish origin. His statement, almost to the effect above described, was no doubt received with astonishment by his hearers [illegible] it was no less true and welcome to those who know th[illegible] the British are carrying on the work of Ephraim-Israel in the last days, to God's glory, according to the prophecies. It is a comforting thought which those who talk to us of "Cui bono?" sadly miss, that the Lord Jesus Chris[illegible]; when upon the earth delivered such a prophecy as that we have noticed from John x. 16, respecting His other shee[illegible]p, then existing in separation from the Jews, and not then "[illegible]olded" with them. These also He resolves to bring or lead [illegible]in. He "must," He says, do it. They are to hear the [illegible]oice of Jesus and become "the sons of the living God" as [illegible]romised to the House of Israel in Hosea i. 10, R.V. The t[illegible]o flocks then will be occupants of one fold in Palestine acc[illegible]ding to Isa. xxxiv., and He promises to be their Sheph[illegible]rd, the Shepherd of the whole twelve-tribed nation, not e[illegible]cluding Manasseh. To this effect, too, was the Lord' deeply spiritual promise and prophecy, made in Matt. xxi. 43, R.V., in Israel's favour, but against the Jews. "The kingdom of God," He said, "shall be taken away from you, and given to a nation" (the other flock of Israel) "bringing forth the fruits thereof." The Lord's mercy towards Israel, as distinguished from Judah, is clearly illustrated by Isa. lxv. 1 and 2, R.V., which reads thus: "I am inquired of by them that asked not. I am found of them that sought Me not. I said, Behold Me, behold Me, unto a nation that was not called by My name." Here was Israel sought out and found of the Lord Jesus. Them also He must bring. They shall hear His voice. But in regard to the rebellious House of Judah, the record is this: "I have spread out My hands all the day unto a rebellious people, which walketh in a way which is not good, after their own thoughts; a people that provoketh Me to My face continually . . ." In the end, however, there is mercy yet in store for Judah too, as Ezek. xxxvii. and the two following chapters show. In the restoration and blessing of Israel, Manasseh, and Judah united, there is promised abundant blessing to the world at large through the instrumentality of His people. To Him who has redeemed His chosen ones be all the praise.

M. A. FITZPATRICK, Hon. Treasurer.

Westgate-on-Sea, March 14th, 1896.

We shall be obliged if the friends who have been sending the BANNER OF ISRAEL and other literature to Mr. John May, Malta (who has returned to England), will be good enough to address packets to Mr. J. Carey, 66, B. Strada Mercato, Florina, Malta, who can make good use of a large amount of literature for many coming to and going from the island.

SOWING THE SEED.

Our anonymous friend through many years, "N. E. V," has again most kindly sent a welcome gift, for the distribution of the BANNER OF ISRAEL, accompanied by pleasant words of cheer, shewing, as aforetime, such sympathetic and appreciative thought for our work that to express adequate thanks is impossible. It is a particular pleasure to receive from friends, wishing to remain incognito, the gifts they put so trustfully into our hands. Our real desire is to work worthily of the trust, and while we would gladly send the usual receipt and note of thanks, we can but acknowledge here the favour shewn, and thank most gratefully one and all for the confidence placed in us, and the help given.

We rejoice when feeling free to keep up the usual number of BANNERS for despatch each week, and to be able to have an extra supply from time to time; for the little paper throwing light, by the knowledge of the British being Israel, upon much that transpires in the world, is a good guide through matters political, as well as helpful in things spiritual, and so has a peculiar value for many who care to watch the signs of the times. Here is a postcard, about as concise in the expression of the writer's wide interest as could well be. It has come from the far East, and indicates how keenly alive our Sowers can be to the special difficulties which accumulated these early months of the present year for our home Government to deal with.

"Your Postcard of Jan. 8th, 1896, recived, also BANNERS for which many, many thanks. Events in America, at the Cape, in Europe, and Armenia closely watched. Russia, cause of Armenian massacres; Johannisburghers desertion of Jameson a shameful affair; Cleveland's interference in South America, and William II. in the Transvaal uncalled for. Great comfort in 2 Sam. xvii. 10; Isa. liv. 17. M. O. for ten shillings posted Feb. 3, 1896."

Truly a disturbing element has passed over the earth; matters of great moment remain to be settled peaceably, if so they may be for our people. How should we rejoice if our rulers and responsible guides could act with assurance of the foreordained destiny of British-Israel, and rest, as our Sower evidently can and does, upon the word of truth of our God, while yet there is much to learn concerning what has passed, much to see settled in the immediate future. We would that literature upon the British-Israel question could be before all minds; still we must be patient while we continue to push on with all possible energy in private study and public proclamation of British-Israel truth.

From as far West, as we have been looking East, has come evidence of activity to encourage us, and prove again how men's minds are being instructed in the great truths we desire to see universally accepted. Later on, we hope, BANNER readers will be given the papers referred to.

From Scotland has come a letter, which we have been pleased to receive, appreciative of good things sent. "I have been far too long," wrote our Sower, in "acknowledging your kindness in sending the 'Covenant People,' and other publications connected with 'Identity.' I have sent them round after reading every one myself. I very much enjoyed accounts of the Conference, and discussion, &c., on Identity truth. I thought opponents had a very poor case indeed. My wife lends BANNERS and 'Covenant People' to neighbours. You will be glad to hear that two different families have, quite recently, had their eyes opened to the truth, and in consequence have enjoyed reading their Bible more than they did before. I continue to give away all on the subject that I can get hold of to the soldiers. Some of them do not seem to care to hear anything if I cannot give them a BANNER, they mostly hear me patiently on this subject."

Knowing this, how thankfully we rejoice to help our Sower in his work. May our God bless the sowing of the seed in the minds of these young soldiers, who, in time to come, may, we trust, let it root in their hearts, and render their service all the more faithful as they recognise the faithfulness of their Divine Guide and Master. Our Sower refers also to civilians, saying, "I find even among the civilians that the people are quite ready to embrace the truth, but we cannot have it generally accepted until the Lord opens the blind eyes of the shepherds. Let us hope it may be soon." Yes, indeed, let us so hope and pray that the Holy Spirit may speedily influence all to whom the truth about Israel is presented, that the blind may "see," that our hearts may be cleansed, and the glory of the Lord God Almighty be magnified upon the earth.

During the last four weeks, 173 book post packets of the BANNER OF ISRAEL, and 132 general parcels of literature have

Correspondence.

To the Editor of "The Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL:—I send you another brief note from America, for the BANNER OF ISRAEL. Long may it wave!

Yesterday morning an address of great interest and power was delivered on the awful condition of affairs in Armenia, by H. L. Wayland, D.D., before the Baptist Ministers' Conference of Philadelphia. It was followed by an animated and thrilling discussion, in which Lemuel Moss, D.D., quoted with general approbation, the words of Senator Frye, uttered the other day in the Senate of the United States, in which he said, there was one quality of the English Government which he admired. "England protects her citizens at all times and under all circumstances. This is a trait to call forth admiration unstinted." As an illustration, the Honourable Senator drew a vivid picture of the rescue of an Englishman imprisoned by the King of Magdala some years ago. "Ten days after the news of this subject's peril reached England, there were 10,000 English soldiers and 5,000 Sepoys on their way to his rescue, which was accomplished. This was done at a cost of no less than $25,000,000, but it was a mighty achievement, and no one could withhold his admiration." The Senator then exclaimed, "In God's name who would not die for such a country?"

Dr. Moss closed his address by giving what he termed a word picture of the Sultan, from an English poet. In the discussion that followed the general impression seemed to be that in the present case we could do nothing but pray and hope that God would move Russia, "which is a progressive empire," to do something for the protection of Armenia.

The author of "Anglo-Israel and the Jewish Problem" then arose and said: Mr. President, I have no compliments for Russia. The Turkish and the Russian empires are twin sisters in intolerance, barbarism and cruelty. Dr. Moss has given us a word picture of the Sultan. I will give a word picture of the situation of my own, as I have just drawn it.

THE PROMISED LAND.

Under the Crescent and the Bear,
There's nought but dread and ill to fear:
The lurid skies pour down red rain,
And desolation rules the realm.

The Lion and the Eagle there,
Would fill with joy the very air;
The vines again on Carmel's hill,
And olives would the valleys fill.

Old Bashan would again rejoice,
Sweet Sharon's plain lift up her voice,
And all the hills of Galilee
Resound with anthems of the free.

Mount Zion would her songs resume,
Jerusalem her rights assume,
And sing hosannahs to the King,
Who came His Israel to redeem.

Then all the world would join the strain,
And sing with joy beneath His reign,
And kingdoms of the world become
The kingdoms of the Risen One.

The words of prophets long foretold,
Thus bring the promised age of gold
The reign of sin for ever gone,
The kingdom of our God is come.

The will of God on earth is done,
As once it was in heaven alone:
The kingdom here and kingdom there,
Is heavenly kingdom everywhere.

T. R. H.

"England and America, two nations but one race, can save Armenia, and rescue the 'Holy Land.' God speed the day when this shall be done."

At the close of the meeting a number extended personally their thanks for what they termed my "brave words." One, a distinguished preacher and a D.D., said contemptuously, "the Ten Tribes will settle the Armenian Question." I replied, "They will, if God's council stands." And thus closed another "Red Letter Day" for Anglo-Israel. Thus the work moves on in America. The God whom we serve is removing "the blindness in part that is happened to Israel."

THE NAVAL ESTIMATES AND THE NATION'S APPROVAL OF THEM.

THE Government's prosposals regarding their shipbuilding scheme, and the men required to carry out their policy were brought before the House of Commons on March 9th, and carried by immense majorities. Mr. Labouchere was right when he said what virtually amounted to the fact that whereas formerly there were two parties in the House and the country in regard to war and navy expenditure there was now only one. Men are all of one mind in regard to its necessity. The idea of Mr. Labouchere is that the desire for "universal dominion" was at the bottom of the proceedings of Government on the subject! It may be very certainly affirmed that our nation never has aspired to universal dominion, and does not wish for it now. At the same time, universal expansion and conquest in many directions have been going on for years, and the result is that without wishing or working for it, our nation is in fact going in for "universal dominion" which is the goal which the Lord places before the children of Israel of the House of Joseph in such passages as Dan. vii. 27; Rom. iv. 13; Gen. xxii. 17; and Deut. xxviii. 1, 13. At the present moment the strange outburst of world-wide jealousy against our nation exhibited by the Germans and Americans, provoked by the conduct of President Kruger and by the hapless raid of Dr. Jameson, lead us to look to our defences. We find them defective, and our floating commerce coming from the ends of the earth, is in jeopardy, because our command of the highways of the ocean is not quite so decided as it ought to be. Hence the great increase of our naval preparations, and Mr. Goschen's able defence of the proposal of the Government at the present juncture. The addition of the cost to the nation will not be small. It will amount to over 22 millions sterling, for which provision will be gladly made by our people. That the increase was needed independently of the late war scares, appears from the fact that these navy estimates were prepared in November last, before our late troubles began, and that they are not based upon the foreign policy of the Powers, that so suddenly sprung up to assail us. The division list shows how entirely the nation is with the proposals of the Government, for they were carried by 261 votes to 45. This occurred in a House where the Government majority is 150, showing that 110 of their usual opponents joined hands with them and deemed this a vital question. Mr. Goschen in his speech gave us good news, and true comfort on many points. We indicate a few of them. He said:—

"Hon. members sometimes complain of the comparatively small number of men who are left behind when ships are commissioned. I do not know whether the House is aware of the enormous number of ships which we have in commission at the present moment—a far larger force than, I believe, has ever been in commission in time of peace before. If you compare them with the ships in commission in foreign countries, excluding the torpedo-boats and similar vessels, you will find that we have nearly as many ships in commission as all the Great Powers of Europe put together. (Cheers.) We use our ships so much more. It has been stated that the Government have said—that I have said—that we must have a navy as large as all the navies of the world combined. None of us has given expression to so preposterous a statement. (Hear, hear.) On the contrary, the leader of the House pointed out very effectively that such a policy is impossible. Some hon. members who take an extreme view of our necessities, and think our proposals inadequate, ask us what will we do if there is a war combination of various Powers against us? That question brings back a classical incident to my mind. When the statesmen in the Athenian assembly were asked—'What will you do if there is a combination of the other States against you?' they replied, 'Trust in Providence and in a good admiral.'" (Cheers.)

If our leading statesmen, if only Mr. Goschen, would look at the matter from a Scriptural standpoint, and allow the Lord God of Israel to have some influence in the disposal of the destiny of His own people Israel, they and he would soon find out that God Himself has given a very direct reply to the question he says people ask him, "What will you do in the case of a combination of States against you?" In Isa. liv. 15, 17, R.V., we have the Lord's answer clearly stated: "Behold, they may gather together, but not by Me! Whosoever shall gather together against thee, shall fall because of thee." . . . "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn!" But why is this? Why is the Lord so favourable to His people British-Israel? The Lord answers even this presumably daring question. "This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord; and their righteousness, which is of Me, saith the Lord." Israel's heritage, their right by inheritance and covenant with God is that He will always appear for their defence. As He fights for His people by human means He views with favour no doubt our proper and adequate preparations for our national defence, and that must succeed, since "no weapon formed against us can prosper," and no offensive alliance of our enemies against us can succeed, because God engages that it shall fall, and dissolve because of His people. These considerations are without any value to our political statesmen, who never so much as breathe the fact that God rules in our human affairs, or that He has anything whatever to do with such a matter as our navy estimates for 1896, or the object we have in view in spending 22 millions sterling on them to-day. How the Lord can restrain His anger in the face of His people's persistent refusal to acknowledge His presence, direction, and disposal of all our national affairs, is to us a perfect enigma. He is patient and long suffering, and hence as regards our nation, "mercy and truth are met together, righteousness and peace have kissed each other" (Psa. lxxxv. 10, R.V.). May we early realise our Israelitish origin, and rejoice in Him for the consolation He has given us in regard to our national and personal righteousness in His sight through the precious blood of Jesus our King. To Him let Israel give all the praise.

THEN C.M. remarked that "the German language was more allied to the English and especially so to the Anglo-Saxon" in its idiomatic structure, which he says has the verb at the end of the sentence. This is contrary to Tyndale's idea and that of many other learned men. But let this pass. Philologists are generally agreed that language is not a sufficient test of race in itself; the Jews having lost their language in so short a time as the 70 years of Babylonish captivity (see Neh. vii.), and the same in the cases of the Huguenots and the negroes of America. But R. Govett, the author of a little work, "English Derived from Hebrew," says in the commencement, "As the result of my enquiry, I should be inclined to say that there are not five per cent. of Saxon words which cannot be traced to Hebrew," and he makes good his assertion. And now having devoted so much space to this part of the question, let us consider

THE HISTORICAL ARGUMENT.

C.M. says that "it is a mere assumption that the Sakai of Herodotus are identical with the captive Israelites, an assumption disproved by the history of the Sakai, and dates assigned to certain events. Josephus also contradicts the assumption." The appeal being to history, we will let history speak. Rev. Isaac Taylor in his "Names and Places," on p. 28 says: "It is mainly from the study of local names, that we must reconstruct the history of the Sclaves, the Celts, and the Basques, as well as the earlier chronicles of the Scandinavian and the Teutonic races," &c; and again on p. 29, "If we were entirely ignorant of any historical records of the actual course of American colonization, it is evident that with the aid of the map alone, we might put together an outline of the earlier history of the continent. The study of the local names would enable us to reconstruct the history of the country," &c. And again on p. 47, he says: "Conquering tribes, numerically insignificant when compared with the other elements of the population, have not unfrequently bestowed their names upon extensive regions. England for instance, takes its name from the Angles, who only colonized a portion of the country. In the case of Scotland, we may believe that the Angles, the Norwegians, and the Cymric Celts severally constituted a larger element in the population than the Scots, yet this conquering Irish sept, which appears to have actually colonized only a portion of Argyle, has succeeded in bestowing its name upon the whole country."

In 2 Kings xv. 19, and 1 Chron. v. 18 to the end we read that in about B.C. 750—740 Pul or Tiglath-pilneser, king of Assyria, carried into exile the tribes of Reuben, Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh and placed them in Halah and Habor and Hara, and to the river Gozan, i.e., in Media Atrophane, the mountainous district west of the Caspian Sea. These would be, there can be no reasonable doubt, the same people that we read of known as the Massa-getæ, a name corrupted from the twin name Manasseh-Gad; and these remained there until the time when 1 Chron. was written, say B.C. 400. These people came prominently into view in the days of Cyrus, who made war upon them, and according to Herodotus, under very tragical circumstances fell in so doing, B.C. 530. Dr. Geo. Moore says in his preface: "As to the connexion and origin of the Danes, the Goths and the Saxons, we here find a people or tribe named Dan distinctly associated with the Goths and the people of Saka, while Cyrus is referred to as the desolater of Saka, in his conquests that extended over Northern India as well as Bactria and the country of the Massa-getæ. It may be interesting to remember that in the distribution of the Israelitish tribes, that of Dan embraced the country of the Gittites or people of Gath," and on p. 149, he traces the name to the Heb. Gété. Rawlinson in his essay on "The Ethnic Affinities of the Nations of Western Asia," § § 10—12 says: "The scene of the original development of the Indo-European dialect, was the mountainous district of Armenia." And this is the district to which the captives were deported; and he goes on to say that "as Cymri, Gaels, Pelasgi, Lithuanians, Teutons, Arians, Sclaves, &c., they poured forth, spreading themselves in three directions, North, East and West." Amongst the first he puts the Celts and Teutons amongst the second, the Pelasgi; and amongst the third, the Arian tribes, fixing their home on the Pamir Steppe, and Affghanistan and the Upper Indus. Again, he says: "It is perhaps allowable to conjecture that the Massa-getæ and Thyssa-getæ (Greater Goths and Lesser Goths) of the Steppe country near the Caspian . . . and the Thracians of Asia Minor appear to have been an eddy from the first stream." And amongst those of the western migration he places the Matiene. The Matiene mountains was the district west of the Caspian, and of them, Rawlinson says: "The term itself may not be a real ethnic title; it is perhaps only a Semitic word signifying 'mountaineers,' and may not have been really borne by the people. It certainly disappears altogether from the locality after the time of Herodotus," &c., B.C. 484—430. Hence, then, we deduce these facts, that subsequently and not before the time B C. 740 we find certain tribes called Gimri, Scythians, Massa-gatæ and Sacæ present in the very district to which the Ten Tribes were deported, and that after the time of Alexander, B C. 330—324, they ceased to be found there, except a few existing amongst the Parthians in the 1st century B.C. to 1st A.D. and now represented in the Armenians. Let us now see if we can find any Scripture reference to these facts that will throw any light hereon. We think we can. We have a most remarkable historical landmark given us in Ezek. iv., which unfortunately is comparatively ignored by British-Israelites. The late Surgeon-General Grant says in his "Origin, &c., of the Kingdom of God," at p. 73, that "no explanation has ever been offered as I know of the 40 days" or the 390 days, therein spoken of, notwithstanding that the following (which we hold to be conclusive) explanation appeared in the BANNER vol. xii., p. 435 (Oct. 31st, 1888):—

"Ezekiel wrote about B C. 592—570, and in ch. iv. is pourtraying the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in B.C. 601—599, and says that 'the House of Judah' should bear her iniquity 40 years. King Josiah was slain by Pharaoh Necho at Megiddo in B.C. 610, and the battle of Carchemish took place B.C. 609, in which Nebuchadnezzar defeated Necho, and followed him beyond Jerusalem, where after confirming Jehoiakim in his kingdom as a tributary, and bringing Palestine and Philistia and Syria under his sway, he bound Jehoiakim in fetters to bring him to Babylon, but being recalled to Babylon by the death of his father Nabopolasser, he left him to govern as his suzerain, contenting himself with taking with him Daniel and his brethren; this was in B C. 605 (see Rawlinson's "Egypt and Babylon"). We then read in 2 Kings xxiv. 1 that "Jehoiakim became the servant of the king of Babylon for three years; then he turned and rebelled against him." This brings us down to B.C. 602. News of this rebellion coming to the ears of Nebuchadnezzar, and it not being convenient, on account of troubles nearer to Babylon, to undertake a distant campaign, he commissioned Judah's neighbours to molest him, with "bands of the Chaldeans, and bands of the Syrians, and bands of the Moabites, and bands of the children of Ammon, and sent them against Judah to destroy it."

Concerning this multitude that came against Judah, Rawlinson ("Egypt and Babylon," p. 38) says, quoting Polyhistor: "That the expedition was one in which Nebuchadnezzar called in the aid of his allies, among others, of the Median king, called by him Astibaras, who seems to represent Cyaxares. The number of troops employed was unusually great, amounting, according to the same authority, to 10,000 chariots, 120,000 horsemen, and 180,000 infantry. These numbers," says Rawlinson, "imply an army gathered from many nations, and account for the expression in 2 Kings xiv. 1—7, as well as for the following in Ezek. xix. 8: 'Then the nations set against him on every side from the provinces, and spread their net over him; he was taken in their pit.'" These nations, not being able to capture Jerusalem, at length Nebuchadnezzar appeared upon the scene, and Josephus tells us (Bk. x., c. 6, s. 3), "That Jehoiakim received him into the city, out of fear of Jeremiah's prophecies, supposing that he should suffer nothing terrible; yet Nebuchadnezzar did not observe the covenant he had made, but slew such as were in the flower of their age, and such as were of great dignity, together with their king Jehoiakim, whom he commanded to be thrown before the walls, without any burial (see Jer. xxii. 18, 19), and made his son Jehoiachin (i.e. Jeconiah or Coniah) king (B.C. 599). He also took the principal persons captives, three thousand in number, and led them away to Babylon; amongst whom was the prophet Ezekiel, who was then but young. And this was the end of Jehoiakim. But Nebuchadnezzar only suffered Jehoiachin to reign for three months and ten days, putting his uncle, Zedekiah, upon the throne instead" (in B.C. 598). "As Jehoiachin was carried captive to Babylon in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar, and he (Nebuchadnezzar) reigned forty-three years, according to Berosus, Ptolemy, and the tablets, commencing his reign in B.C. 605, and ending it in B.C. 562, the thirty-seventh year of Jehoiachin's captivity (see 2 Kings xxv. 27—30) would exactly coincide with the first regnal year of Evil-Merodach, which was B.C. 561" (Rawlinson).

So it is from this date B.C. 601 we date the commencement of Judah's 40 years of bearing her iniquity, which was terminated in B.C. 561 by the death of Nebuchadnezzar, as related in 2 Kings xxv. 27—30.

We now turn to the House of Israel's bearing her iniquity for 390 years, which we take to commence with the siege of Samaria in B C. 724—1, and during which time (the 390 years) only, the captives remained in the country of their captivity. 390 years onwards from B.C. 724—1 will bring us down to B.C. 334—1, the era of Alexander's triumphs over Darius. Born in B.C. 355, he entered at the head of his army into Asia, fought and gained the battle of the Granicus in B.C. 334, that of Issus in 333, and after spending two years in the reduction of Syria, Palestine, Philistia and Egypt, he met and conquered Darius with an immense army on the plains of Arbela in B.C. 331. Thus he became the master of all Asia, and turning his hand against the Sacæ and Massa-getæ, who had proved themselves the best troops in the Persian army, he drove them westwards, some taking the northward course encompassing the Euxine, whilst others took the course through Asia Minor, and were found here in the days of Josephus, not staying there until to-day, however, but pressing westward still, their graves, dated the 1st century A.D., being found in the Crimea and border of the Black Sea, and the grave stones preserved in the St. Petersburg Museum. Thence, as "the names of ancient tribes are also very frequently preserved in the names of modern cities" (Taylor, p. 48), and countries, and rivers, we trace these Sacæ and Massa-Getæ in Susiana, Saxonia, Saxony, Gothland, &c., to Britain.

But, though we have occupied so much time and space in thus tracing our ancestors, the Sacæ, it must not be forgotten that these were not all of the kingdom of Israel that escaped destruction. For although C. M. declares that "the expatriation of Israel was not actual, nor possible," we prove it to be both actual and certain.

It is not reasonable to suppose that the greater portion of the inhabitants of the northern kingdom, with the knowledge of the capture of the trans-Jordanic tribes, and Sennacherib's capture of Damascus, would stay to share the same fate, if escape were possible in any other direction. Moses had said 700 years before, "Dan is a lion's whelp, he shall leap from Bashan," and elude his pursuers. How? Bashan was situated on the east of Jordan, and Dan was the most northern city of the territory of Israel, but this was within 50 miles of the seacoast of Tyre and Sidon, with whom the Danites were always on familiar terms. Dan also had territory assigned to him directly on the sea, which included the important seaport of Joppa (Jaffa). Dr. Latham, the ethnologist, in his "Ethnology of Europe," p. 137, says: "Neither do I think that the eponymous of the Argave Danai was other than the Israelite tribe of Dan; . . . the seaports between Tyre and Ascalon, of Dan, Ephraim, and Asher must have followed the history of seaports in general, and not have stood on the coast for nothing." It is by this means we trace Dan as settled in Ireland in the Tuatha de Danaans centuries before, and in the names Don, Danube, Dneister, Rhodanus, Dantzic, and the like, and last, but not least, in Denmark, whence the Danes came to England, and put their names on Danbury, Doncaster, Darenth," &c. (see Taylor, pp. 111, 112). In these journeyings the Israelite Sacæ, &c., were accompanied by the previously well-known Scythians, and were often called by their name, hence Scyth has been derived from the Heb. Succoth. Taylor (p. 52) says: "The name of the Scots has been deduced from an Erse word, scuite, meaning 'wanderers,' which is preserved in the English word scout. The name of Scythians may possibly be allied to that of the Scots. The Parthians are also the 'wanderers' or strangers."

We have now dealt, we believe, with all C. M.'s objections or arguments, except that concerning the Cimmerians, who, he says, existed before Omri. Perhaps they did; but let us first determine who they were, and not confound them with Cymri or Gymri, who, we contend, were Israelites. We first read of the Cimmerians, not in Homer's time, but as dwelling in the Crimea; and in the reign of Ardys (B.C. 686—637) were driven from their homes into Asia by nomad Scythians, captured Sardis, and one hundred years later formed a permanent settlement at Sinope." Rawlinson gives them a kinship with the Celtic Gauls, who afterwards settled in Asia Minor, and from whom that part of it was called Galatia. But Josephus ("Antiq." Bk. i., c. 6, s. 1) says: "Gomer founded those whom the Greeks now call Galatians, but were then (i.e., in the earliest ages) called Gomerites," and consequently Japhetites; whilst Rawlinson identifies the Gymri with the Sacæ, calling them Gymri-Sacæ. The solution of this problem is in the meaning of the name Gymri, which, Rawlinson says, is met with for the first time in the cuneiform records of Darius Hystaspes (cir. B.C. 500) as the Semitic equivalent of the Arian name, Saka.

Rawlinson (in Appendix to Bk. i. "Herodotus") says: "Strabo expressly states that the Cimmerians made several distinct incursions, and seemingly brings them into Asia across the Thracian Bosphorus. To some of these incursions he gives a high antiquity. In this he is followed by Eusebius, who places the first Cimmerian incursion in B.C. 1076. In the minds of the Greeks upon the coast, Cimmerians and Treres were confounded together. The Cimmerians were neighbours of the Thracians; but the Cimmerian invasion spoken of by Herodotus, he says, came from the East, by the Caucassian Gates, B.C. 686, in which no Thracian would participate. Alyattes, grandson of Ardys, king of Lydia, drove the Cimmerians out of Asia B.C. 603.

On the other hand, the Assyrians had held the empire of Upper Asia for 520 years (cir. B.C. 1140 to 620), when the Medes set the example of revolt, and upon their success the other nations (among them the Sacæ and Massa-Getæ) revolted also, and gained their independence, but only to fall again under the rule of the Medes, and afterwards of the Persians. Thus was fulfilled Nahum i. 12, 13; but Nineveh was not finally destroyed until B.C. 603 or 601; and the Gimri-Sacæ remained under the yoke of Media and Persia until 330. Thus, following Mr. Grainger in his "Seed of Isaac," we distinguish between the Gimri and Cimmerians.

Thus, we trust, we have satisfactorily answered all C. M.'s objections, and commend him to further study of the subject, assured that by so doing, he must, as so many have done before him, acknowledge that "the Israelite's grave is the Saxon's birthplace."

GOD'S PROMISES TO ABRAHAM: TO WHAT EXTENT HAVE THEY BEEN FULFILLED?

By J. Bradley.

PART II.

During the first occupation of the land by the Twelve Tribes, it was divided into twelve portions, each portion called after the tribe that possessed it. These so-called twelve, were, with the Levites, virtually thirteen tribes of Israel, but the Levites were dispersed throughout all their cities. At first the Israelites were content in being under a Theocracy, but afterwards desired a king. To gratify their wishes, Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin, was selected, and he reigned over them. The kingship, however, was not permitted to remain in his family, but was taken from it because of certain presumptuous uses he made of his power, and was transferred to David, of the tribe of Judah, for to him was given the right to reign in Genesis xlix. 10: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." During the reigns of these two monarchs the separation of Judah from the other tribes of Israel in actions, thoughts, and political history became strikingly manifest.

We are told (1) 1 Sam. xi. 8, when he numbered them in Bezek, the children of Israel were 300,000, and the men of Judah 30,000, thus reckoned separately.

(2) 1 Sam. xvii. 52: That after David had killed Goliath, the men of Israel and of Judah arose, and shouted, and pursued the Philistines. Again spoken of as distinct people.

(3) 1 Sam. xviii. 16: That when David was made captain over a thousand, all Israel and Judah loved David.

(4) 2 Sam. ii. 4 and 10: That after Saul's death, David was anointed king over the House of Judah, and Ishbosheth Saul's son, over all Israel, so at that time they were two separate kingdoms, each with their own king.

(5) 2 Sam. v. 5: After the murder of Ishbosheth, that David reigned in Hebron over Judah seven years and six months; and in Jerusalem, he reigned thirty and three years over all Israel and Judah. Again spoken of separately.

(6) 2 Sam. xx. 2: "So every man of Israel went up from after David, and followed Sheba the son of Bichri; but the men of Judah clave unto their king, from Jordan even to Jerusalem." Here they are quite antagonistic in their action towards their king.

(7) 1 Kings i. 35: That when David transferred his throne to Solomon, he said, I have appointed him to be ruler over Israel and over Judah; and we read that Judah and Israel were many, and Judah and Israel dwelt safely, &c.

These are only a few of the test cases, and show the general recognised distinction between Israel and Judah, incidents all tending to bring about that great and important disruption which occurred in the reign of Rehoboam. There is, therefore, nothing very remarkable in Israel and

Judah being distinct to-day, since, when together, they each had their own kings, the one reigning in Jerusalem, the other in Samaria (1 Kings xii. 19), "So Israel rebelled against the House of David unto this day" (1 Kings xi. 30, 31): "And Ahijah caught the new garment that was on him, and rent it in twelve pieces; and he said to Jeroboam, Take thee ten pieces; for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give Ten Tribes to thee." Not only do the books of Kings and Chronicles speak of this division in the tribes, but all the prophets. These I shall hope to bring before you when we consider their several books.

With David, indeed, there began a new and more prosperous era in the history of Israel. In a succession of victorious battles, he subdued the Philistines of the west, the Geshurites, Gezrites, and Amalekites, of the south, even unto the land of Egypt. He subdued also the Jebusites in the midst of Canaan; the Edomites, Moabites, the Ammonites, who till then had confined the Israelites within narrow limits. In addition to these he subdued the Syrians of Damascus, Zobah, and other kingdoms, as far as the Euphrates. So great, indeed, was the influence which he had obtained, and such the authority of his name, that Tyre and Sidon became his voluntary servants, and Hamath courted his protection. The consequence was, that Solomon, his son, inherited a glorious dominion. And, having reduced those which remained of the Canaanitish tribes to a state of servitude (1 Kings iv. 21), "Solomon reigned over all kingdoms from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt; they brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life." In proof of which, he built Tadmor in the wilderness, with other cities in Lebanon, in Hamath, and in all the land of his dominion; and, as if to show the magnificent establishment of his empire, and his navy, look at 1 Kings ix. 26—28: "And king Solomon made a navy of ships in Ezion-geber, which is beside Eloth on the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom. And Hiram sent in the navy his servants, shipmen that had knowledge of the sea, with the servants of Solomon. And they came to Ophir, and fetched from thence gold, four hundred and twenty talents, and brought it to king Solomon." Hence the largest extent of territory which Israel ever possessed in the land of Canaan was unquestionably in the time of Solomon.

But in reference to the above statistical account of the empire of Solomon, and its extent, it may be necessary to ask two questions: First, Did the empire of Solomon comprise the whole of the territory which God has promised? and, secondly, Can the mere dominion of Solomon over that large extent of country over which he ruled, be regarded as equivalent to the actual possession of it by the seed of Abraham, in the sense intended by God in his original promise of the land to him and his descendants? As regards the first question, Did the empire of Solomom comprise the whole of the territory which God had promised? There would assuredly be no considerable difficulty in deciding this point, at least in a south and south-western direction, provided we could with certainty ascertain what was distinctly intended by the river of Egypt in Genesis xv. 18: "In the same day, the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates," there being a difference of opinion upon this subject; some, referring it to the Nile, and others to a small rivulet just at the entrance of Egypt, and at no very great distance from Azzah, or Gaza. If the latter be intended, then, as the empire of Solomon extended to the border of Egypt (1 Kings iv. 21): "And Solomon reigned over all kingdoms from the river unto the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt: they brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life" it would in this direction reach to the utmost limits of the promised land; but, if the former, it certainly did not, as the Nile was considerably within the border of Egypt, and comprised a tract of country containing some very important towns which essentially belonged to Egypt itself.

In other directions I am inclined to conclude that the empire of Solomon did extend to the limits of the land which God had promised, although some of the cities which it contained, Zidon and Tyre especially, although in very close alliance and friendship with Solomon, did not appear to have been particularly under his subjection. But, admitting that his dominion over all these cities was absolute, as it was extensive, yet, before it can be assumed, as it has frequently been done, to be the fulfilment of Jehovah's promise to the tribes of Israel as to the extent of country which they should possess, the second question must be considered: Can the mere dominion of Solomon over that large extent of territory over which he ruled be regarded as equivalent to the actual possession of it by the seed of Abraham, in the sense intended by God in His original grant of the land to him and his descendants? And to this I unhesitatingly answer, No; since receiving tribute from a land, and possessing, and dwelling in it, are certainly two very distinct things; and, to my mind, the promise of God to Abraham most unequivocally conveys the idea of such a possession of Canaan by his descendents as that in every part of it—namely, from the river of Egypt (the Nile) to the Euphrates, they should be the only people to possess and populate it. But that such was not the fact in the time of Solomon is plain, since the very Scripture which defines the boundary of Solomon's empire, defines also the limits of the land which, at that most prosperous period of their history, the tribes of Israel really possessed; and which, by a reference to the map, will be found to come, especially that in a north and north-eastern direction, very considerably within those of Solomon's dominions (1 Kings iv. 24, 25): "For he had dominion over all the region on this side the river, from Tiphsah even to Azzah, over all the kings on this side the river: and he had peace on all sides round about him, and Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig tree, from Dan even to Beersheba, all the days of Solomon." This was the boundary and the limits of their possessions, even in the days of Solomon. For how strange would it seem that, under the rule of that powerful monarch, the tribes of Israel should have dwelt safely only within the limits of Dan and Beersheba; and yet this is the conclusion to which we must come, had their actual possessions extended beyond them.

Another circumstance which very strongly proves that the real possessions of Judah and Israel did not, even in the days of Solomon, extend beyond the limits of Dan and Beersheba, is to be found in the fact that the division of the land among their tribes remained the same as when first settled and defined in the time of Joshua. Now, had the boundaries of their different tribes been subsequently enlarged, and had they in the days of Solomon covered the whole of the territory over which he ruled, then might the promise as to the extent of land which Israel should possess be said to be fulfilled, as will certainly be the fact when that other division of it, so minutely detailed in Ezekiel xlvii. 13—21 and xlviii. 1—29, shall be really made. But that no division of the land among the tribes of Israel, different from that which had been settled and defined by Joshua, ever took place in their subsequent history, we may be sure, since nothing of the kind could have taken place without some direct intimation from God upon the subject, and which, had it been made, would most assuredly have been acted upon and recorded. For nothing, I think, can be plainer to a careful reader of the history of the tribes of Israel than that, while God promised them a very large extent of country, reaching from the river Nile to the Euphrates, yet they were not allowed to possess and to occupy it as they pleased, but that, in this respect, they were under the most stringent regulations. Thus, although Edom, Moab, and Ammon were evidently within the limits of the promised land, yet, on the first possession of it by the people of Israel, they were strictly inhibited from occupying so much as a foot breadth of any of these different countries. Look at Deuteronomy ii. 5, 9, 19 : "Meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a foot breadth, because I have given Mount Seir unto Esau for a possession. And the Lord said unto me, Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle; for I will not give thee of their land for a possession, because I have given Ar unto the children of Lot for a possession. And when thou comest nigh over against the children of Ammon, distress them not, nor meddle with them : for I will not give thee of the land of the children of Ammon any possession; because I have given it unto the children of Lot for a possession." Indeed, I believe that at any period of their history it would have been at the peril of the tribes of Israel to have occupied a larger extent of country in the Land of Promise, even had they possessed the power to have acquired it, than that which Jehovah Himself saw fit to settle and define for them.

NOTE ON "THE GATE OF HIS ENEMIES" IN GEN. XXII. 17.

By the Rev. C. W. Hickson, M.A.

[We have much pleasure in publishing a memorandum on the subject of the correct translation of that clause of Gen. xxii. 17 (which we have so often quoted in these pages), by the Rev. C. W. Hickson. It will be seen that Mr. Hickson fully supports our view that the passage, though it speaks only of "the Gate" of Israel's enemies, may be read perfectly correctly as referring to "the Gates" in the plural number. The genius of the Hebrew language indeed seems to demand that reading. To avoid confusion and error we publish the Hebrew words used in the following in the English character.—Ed.]

In Gen. xxii. 17, the words are shăhăr, ōyĕbhăyo; shă'hăr, singular in construct state, meaning literally "gate of;" o-y'bhayo, plural with pronominal affix, "his enemies." I am satisfied that this really means "Gates of his enemies," for more reasons than one.

1. Shă'hăr, it is true, is singular, so far as the form is concerned; but singular nouns are sometimes used as collectives —e.g., âdhām, "man," "men;" îsh, "man," for "men;" dābhăr "a word," for "words;" ôyēbh, "an enemy," for "enemies," and as the last word is the very word here employed, the fact that it is in the plural seems to show that different groups of "enemies" are referred to, which would imply that "Gate" means "Gates."

2. "When a compound idea, expressed by a noun in the construct state, followed by its genitive" (which is the case here: shahar-oyebhayo being a compound idea, having shahar in the construct state, followed by its genitive, oyebhayo) "is to be made definite, it is done by prefixing the article to the noun in the genitive;" îsh mĭlkhāmāh, "a man of war;" ish hammilkhāmah, "the man of war." If, therefore, the inspired writer wished to express "THE Gate of his enemies" he would most probably have written shahar hā-ōyēbh, which would mean "the Gate of the enemy, or enemies," or "the Gate of the enemy, par-excellence;" this form of expression being ambiguous.

3. There are three ways of expressing the plural of a compound idea: (a) putting the first word in the plural; (b) putting both in the plural; and (c) putting the second, or governed noun in the plural—e.g., bēyth âbh, literally "house of a father"—i.e., "a family:" (bēyth âbôth) (not bōttēy âbh), "houses of a father"—i.e., families. The two nouns are regarded as one compound noun, and the plural termination of the second applies to the whole idea. Now, as before observed, ōyēbh in the singular is sufficient to express plurality, as far as the enemies are concerned, so that shăhăr ōyĕbhayô would mean "Gate of his (enemy or) enemies," therefore shăhăr ōyĕbhăyo must mean, I think, "Gates of his enemies." Shahar oyebh, "enemies' Gate;" shăhăr ōyebhîm, enemies' Gates. My authority for the rule given under (2), and also for what I have stated under (3), is Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, § 111, 1: and § 108, 3. He refers to Judges vii. 25, the "head of Oreb and Zeeb," where "head," evidently means "heads," unless Oreb and Zeeb were a sort of Siamese twins, with one head between them. The Authorised Version translated it "heads." He also refers to îr mĭbhtsārôth (Dan. xi. 15), which is literally "a city of munitions;" but the expression îr mĭbhtsar is a compound one meaning "a city of fortification," or "a fortified city;" and the plural of the compound expression is not ārēy mĭbhtsār, but îr mîbhtsarôth, "fortified cities;" Authorised Version, "most fenced cities."—Banner, Vol. V., p. 466.

THE LOYALTY DEBATE AND RESOLUTION IN THE CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS, FEB. 5th., 1896.

PART I.

We take the following report of a remarkable debate on the late "Loyalty Resolution" of the Canadian House of Commons, on Feb 5 last, from The Gazette, Montreal, of the 6th. Our friends will read it with pleasure as proof that the young lions are true to their old mother in the Isles of the West, and mean to stand by her. We gave a short precis of the debate on p. 105 of the present vol. But the following is given much more in detail, and is worth recording.

Mr. McNeill's Loyalty Resolution.

"Mr. McNeill moved the following resolution, which, by special arrangement, had the first place on the orders of the day :—'That, in view of the threatening aspect of foreign affairs, this House desires to assure Her Majesty's Government, and the people of the United Kingdom, of its unalterable loyalty and devotion to the British Throne and Constitution, and of its conviction that, should occasion unhappily arise, in no other part of the Empire than the Dominion of Canada would more substantial sacrifices attest the determination of Her Majesty's subjects to maintain unimpaired the integrity and inviolate the honour of Her Majesty's Empire; and this House reiterates the oft expressed desire of the people of Canada to maintain the most friendly relations with their kinsmen of the United States.'

"Mr. McNeill said—Mr. Speaker, there is an obvious objection that may be urged against the resolution which I have placed in your hands. It may be said, that it is superfluous; that it is unnecessary to inform the Government and people of the United Kingdom of what they already know full well. I do not doubt, that it is well understood in the United Kingdom that the people of Canada are devotedly attached to the throne and to the Constitution under which they live, and that they would be prepared to make most substantial sacrifices in defence of the honour and integrity of their own Empire. But, Mr. Speaker, we have to consider not only how it will be regarded in the Mother Country and the other parts of the Empire. We have also to have regard to its effect in foreign countries. (Hear, hear.) It would appear that, in some quarters, ideas prevail as to the political aspirations of the people of Canada, which, to those who have knowledge of the facts, can only appear ludicrous. If you can judge from speeches delivered by public men and articles written in the newspapers of the neighbouring Republic, an impression prevails there that the people of Canada are only waiting a favourable opportunity to transfer their allegiance from the Crown of England to the Republic of the United States. To the members of this House, the representatives of the Canadian people, it is simply amazing that the sentiment of the Dominion should have been so completely misapprehended. From Halifax to Vancouver, there is not a constituency in which the advocacy of a policy of annexation on the hustings would not entail the hopeless, overwhelming defeat of the candidate who had the audacity to make it a plank in his platform. (Applause.) If there be any one question on which the rank and file of the people of Canada (irrespective of party) are solid, it is this question of annexation. (Cheers).

"It is the earnest wish of every Canadian to maintain the most friendly relations with the great people who divide this North American continent with us, whom we hold as kinsmen, and in whose magnificent achievements in behalf of civilization Canadians have almost a personal pride. But while we admire the many great qualities of our kinsmen of the neighbouring Republic, we have no desire to enter into a political partnership with them. We very much prefer our Constitution to theirs, and we very much prefer British connection to connection with the United States. We claim that we have the right of a free people to choose between our own Mother Country and the American Republic, and we only ask our good neighbours to let us alone and allow us to work out our own destiny in the way that, to us, seems best. We choose the British Empire, as against the American Republic.

"Should occasion, unhappily, arise, we are prepared to do what men may do to preserve for ourselves and those who come after us what we regard as our most precious political heritage—their birthright as British subjects. (Cheers.) It is far better that there should be no mistake about this, and I have endeavoured to state the position plainly. Mistakes in reference to such matters have, before now, given rise to great complications. The people of Canada are determined to maintain the position of the Dominion as an integral part of the British Empire, and they are fully satisfied that, in case of need, a united British Empire can take care of itself. (Cheers.) We are for peace first of all—an honourable peace. But if we are assailed, we believe that we shall prove not unworthy of the stock from which we come. (Applause.) And we know that at our back will be all the resources of an Empire whose resources are almost inexhaustible—more especially as regards the number of fighting men that could, in the long run, be placed in line. Those who know anything of the Sikh war and of the losses inflicted on the British by the magnificent troops opposed to them at Chillian-walla, and on many another hard fought field; and those who know anything of the extraordinary military powers of the Goorkhas and other hardy races of hill-men of India—among the most warlike races of the world—will understand to what I refer. The resources of the Empire as regards fighting men are, practically inexhaustible, and we are not altogether destitute of the financial strength necessary to prosecute a great war to its conclusion. (Hear, hear.)

"After referring to the enthusiastic response made when Lord Beaconsfield summoned the Indian troops to Malta, Mr. McNeill continued:—We do not want war, and we do not expect we are going to have war. Least of all do we want war, and, least of all, do we expect to have war with our own kith and kin. (Hear, hear.) There has been an extraordinary development of the sentiment of kinship, if I may so express it, among British people during the last ten or fifteen years, so that, in the Empire of to-day, even more than ever before, a war with the United States would be regarded as a horrible and unnatural fratricidal strife. We have been surprised and pained by the recent explosion of ill-feeling towards this country, and towards the Mother Country, in the United States of America. But we refuse to believe that that explosion of ill-feeling adequately expresses the sentiments of those who are most competent to speak for the people of the United States. Furthermore, we believe, and hope as we believe, that it does not even express the sentiments of so large a section of that people as at one time was supposed. (Hear, hear.) But it would be an act of simple folly, it would be an act of culpable negligence on the part of any reasonable people not to recognize the fact that there is a disreputable and rowdy section of the American people who may, some day, cause us trouble, and it is absolutely necessary that any sober-minded people should take means to meet that trouble if, unfortunately, that trouble should arise in the future. I have been much gratified, and I am sure the country has been much gratified, to find that we have been called upon to make provision for the better defence of Canada. Not that I wish to assume, or to suggest, that this provision for better defence arises altogether because of anything that may have happened on our southern border. For it is not only from our neighbours that unexpected proofs of unfriendliness have proceeded. From the four quarters of the world they come. It would seem as though the unexampled magnitude and wealth, and prosperity and happiness of our Empire have engendered envy and cupidity where least we expected to find them, and now it appears that trouble and trial, and even danger, are closing down upon those famous islands set in the silver sea that we hold so dear. (Cheers.) For, suddenly, there have loomed up the most ominous thunder-clouds of war that have darkened the political horizon of England for many a long year. And how has England borne herself whilst menace and danger compass her about? She has borne herself like the mighty mother of heroes that she is. (Cheers.) The great heart but beats fuller and prouder in the hour of peril. The spectacle of England's majestic composure and unblenching self-reliance, in the presence of the undisguised and altogether unexpected hostility of so many of the great Powers of the world, has sent a thrill of admiration and of pride through the pulses of every loyal subject of the Queen, and I venture to say that England's conduct of to-day will not be found wanting, even though in far-off summers, that we shall not see, if it be weighed in the balance against some of those splendid incidents which are set like precious jewels in the history of mankind. (Applause.) Mr. Speaker, we want the people of England, and of Ireland, and of Scotland, to be well assured that the people of Canada are not mere fair weather friends. We want our kinsmen of Australasia, some of whom we welcomed here so recently, to know that we are with them, in this issue, heart and hand, and we want the whole world to know that, in whatever quarter of the Empire they may chance to reside, the British people are one people, animated by one spirit, and determined to stand together as one man, in defence of their common rights and in the maintenance of their common interests. (Cheers.) We earnestly desire peace; we regard war with horror, but we are prepared to accept it with all its consequences, from whatever quarter it may come, if it be necessary to do so for the defence of the honour and the integrity of our own Empire.

"Mr. Davies (P.E.I.) seconded the resolution. He began by quoting the words of Shakespeare :—

> "'Come the three corners of the world in arms,
> And we shall shock them. Naught shall make us rue
> If England to herself do rest but true.'

"Since Shakespeare wrote those lines, a greater Britain has arisen, but they were no less true to-day than three hundred years ago. The hearts of the children in the colonies went out to the great lone isolated mother, and Canadians were doing their simple duty in saying that they were prepared to make material sacrifices for the integrity of the Empire. (Applause.) By the bold response England made to the threatening attitude of the German Emperor England had shown that, if she was only a third rate continental Power, she was still the mistress of the seas. (Cheers.) Imperial Federation seemed to have produced no scheme that was practicable, but he did not doubt that some arrangement would be made by which the Empire would be more closely united together, and the national pledge given on Canada's behalf by this resolution was an important, though, perhaps, a small step in that direction. (Applause.) The resolution reiterated our desire to maintain the most friendly relations with the United States. Commercially and socially our relations are intertwined and united, and becoming yearly more so. The Republic is grappling with some of the greatest problems the world has ever seen, and, while we have every sympathy with them, and wish them well, we do not desire to take any part in the solution of these problems from a political standpoint. (Cheers.) We draw inspiration from the same sources, and worship at the same altars. We look forward to a union with them in the sense that we will unite to promote civilization and Christianity, but, while we feel that blood is thicker than water, we desire to work out our own destiny as part of the British Empire, and under the Empire's flag. (Cheers.) The man, or the nation, who precipitates a war, with all its horrors, upon two great English-speaking nations, would be committing a crime against civilization and humanity. As Canadians we can assist Great Britain in two ways—with means and money. Perhaps our contribution would be small, compared with the amount required for the defence of the Empire, but the feeling at the back of it would make it valuable. But we can assist Great Britain, also, by cultivating the kindest feelings with the Republic to the south of us. A hearty union between Great Britain and the United States would be a magnificent guarantee for the world's peace. No nation, or combination of nations, could withstand the united strength of the world's greatest Empire and the world's greatest Republic. (Cheers.)

"Mr. Cockburn congratulated the Canadian press on the attitude they took during the recent crisis. He contrasted the moderate and self-reliant attitude of the Canadian people and press with the spread-eagleism of pinchbeck patriots, and the bray of the asinine mob on the other side of the line. He concluded:—I trust that, when this declaration comes out, it will be felt that we have, once for all, and finally, determined, at all hazards, to throw in our lot with the mother country, that we have no desire to change our allegiance, politically or commercially, that we desire to live peaceably here, on this northern half of the American Continent, and that we intend, as British subjects to live, and as British subjects to die. (Cheers.)

RANDOM SHAFTS.

SUFFER me to announce another "Secret of England's Greatness." It would be interesting to see all the secrets in a row, and if we live long enough we shall perhaps do so in a museum. I venture to prophesy that the day is coming when some enterprising party—probably an antiquary—will make an "extensive and valuable collection" of these imaginary reasons for British pre-eminence; but they will then be fossils of a by-gone epoch, not the serious sentiments of intelligent men. And none of the specimens will be more admired than this one, found embedded in the Investor's Guardian: "England is great because she has cultivated the arts of peace, and filled the world with the products of her industry."

What can we say to this curiosity of the brain? We are not the only people who fill the world with the products of their industry. Germany is doing so, often to our discomfiture. But the result of that is—cash, not a colonial family, or a heathen empire, or sovereignty of the seas, or the Gates of the globe. Nor are we the only people who cultivate the arts of peace; and with our army, navy, and volunteers, our Aldershots, Elswicks, and Bisleys, it is absurd to suggest that we do not cultivate the arts of war. The fact is, that the arts of peace are very poor things to buttress a State when they stand alone. China has been devoted to such pursuits for centuries, if not for millenniums; but tiny Japan, which cultivated the arts of war on the sly, has shown her that nankeen and porcelain are profitless when opposed to guns. The common impression is that when a nation becomes immersed in pacific affairs and neglects the martial instincts it begins to decay. History seems to support this; but whether the view is sound or not, it is preposterous to suppose that trade has created and preserved from a hundred foes the conglomerate British Power.

John Davidson, like all our newer bards, finds an attractive theme in the vast expansion of the Anglo-Saxon folk, and that is as it should be. But his logic is not so good as his poetry. In "A Second Series of Fleet-street Eclogues" he writes:—

> "Bold tongue, stout heart, strong hand, brave brow,
> The world's four quarters win;
> And patiently, with axe and plough,
> We bring the deserts in."

Digitized by Google

If the allusion to brave brow is intended to explain why we have succeeded in reclaiming the deserts and building up a colonial empire I am afraid the theory has grave flaws. Let the national character be what it may, colonization is impossible without a prolific population, and this is not to be had for the asking.

Spain tried to raise colonies when she had South America at her feet, and it is undeniable that she possessed a brave brow, but the effort so drained her that she never recovered from the effects. Besides, had we inhabited an enormous territory such as Russia or India we might have multiplied even faster than we do without feeling the slightest necessity to migrate. But a rapidly increasing people placed on a narrow strip of land are bound to overflow, and those who see nothing except a "coincidence" in the combination of these two circumstances have not much philosophy about them. Poets, at any rate, are expected to get behind the scenes and discover the Divinity that shapes our ends.

There would be no excuse for recurring to the musical talents of our countrymen if the foreigner had not assured us that they possess none, and done so until we have almost come to believe it. Judging from French literature it would appear that the early English were mere slaves to beef and the wassail bowl, while the modern Briton is a shopkeeper of an extremely sordid type. Whatever is the standard of the present-day British—and perhaps they will compare favourably with their neighbours in every department of civilised life—there can be no doubt that the English of the middle ages were equal if not superior to the rest of Western Europe in the matter of music. I know that the Scotch, the Irish, and the Welsh, were also musical, but would rather they spoke for themselves, and am sure that articles would be acceptable to the Editor, nor less acceptable to his readers.

Awhile ago, Mr. Squire, of the British Museum, wrote a letter to the Times in which he said:—"Theorists and historians are agreed as to the existence in this country in the 15th century of a school of musicians whose influence upon the development of the art was so considerable, that it was even said by one early writer, that the 'new art' of music originated in England at this time, and that the first musician to make a name of more than local celebrity was John Dunstable, an Englishman. . . . The difficulty of estimating the true position which Dunstable occupied with regard to the Netherlandish school, has hitherto appeared insurmountable, owing to the fact that his music had apparently entirely disappeared. . . . Not only had Dunstable's work vanished, but also there was hardly any trace to be found of English music of his day—the period in which the 'new art' was said to have originated in this country."

This blank is attributed by Mr. Squire mainly to the destruction of monastic libraries during the Reformation. "At all events," he continues, "the effacement of all trace of the early English school was so complete, that in a little more than a hundred year's time all that was known of its founder and chief glory was that he died in 1453, and was buried in St. Stephen's, Walbrook." But he proceeds to intimate that Dr. Haberl has turned up six large volumes of 15th century music in the Capitular Archives of Trent, which contain numerous pieces by English composers, including Dunstable; and since then a further book of music belonging to the same century has been brought to light at Modena, embodying 31 motets by Dunstable, as well as 17 by other Englishmen. Copies of the latter are in the British Museum; but the Trent MSS., which have been deposited at the Imperial library, Vienna, are deemed so precious that its proprietors will not allow the contents to meet the vulgar public gaze.

No one, of course, can tell how many native productions we lost at the Reformation, nor how many may yet be exhumed in the ecclesiastical establishments of the continent. But from what has reached us, it is ascertained that Dunstable and his compatriots were fertile composers, that their works were sought after by Europe, and that instead of being disciples of "the great Netherlandish school," they were the precursors of it. These, I think, are very weighty disclosures. The Hebrews were undoubtedly a musical people, which the Jews are still, and if it were true that the English are singularly deficient in this respect, the kinship between them would, to some extent, be prejudiced. What we were five hundred years ago is far more important than what we are now, because Time is a revolutionist; and the nearer we can go to the captivity the better chance we have of sighting the primitive qualities of the race. Unfortunately the evidence decreases as we ascend the stream; but sufficient has emerged from Trent and Modena to dispel various deeply-seated delusions, and show that Europe is our pupil, not our tutor.

JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

AN AMERICAN LECTURE DELIVERED IN DES MOINES, IOWA, U.S.A.

"AN instructive and interesting address was given by George E. Inglis, of this city, before the History Classes of the High School, yesterday afternoon, upon the 'Identity of the Anglo-Saxon Race with the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel.'

"Dr. Inglis carried the pupils back to the calling of Israel into a national existence, enumerating the wonderful promises made to them by God, as recorded in the Bible. He sought to demonstrate that, in the days of King Saul, owing to the natural growth of the tribes, the tribes of Simeon, Gad, and Reuben expanded, and migrating to the Euphrates and the land bordering about the Caspian and Black Seas, founded colonies which, in later times, became known in history as the Sakai, Sciutes, and Scythes, afterwards called Scythians. From these people came the Anglos or Scots and Saxons who peopled England.

"The speaker also called attention to the migrations of the tribe of Dan into Greece, the Danai into Spain, the Danans from Spain into Ireland, whence came the Tuatha de Danans, and with them is believed to have been taken into Ireland the Coronation Stone, now in the coronation chair of the English monarchs, upon which have been crowned the monarchs of Ireland, Scotland, and England since 500 B.C. This stone is said to have served Jacob as a pillow before the gates of Luz on that memorable night of his vision of the ladder reaching from earth to heaven, at which time the covenant of perpetuity to Abraham and Isaac was renewed in Israel.

"The evidences to-day, biblically, that we of America and of England, being Saxons are Israel, chiefly centres in the fact that we are to-day fulfilling to the letter, and are in possession of all the wonderful blessings promised to Israel. The speaker compared some of these promises with England, which were to be fulfilled in Ephraim-Israel, and Manasseh in the latter days. Israel was to be punished and scattered throughout the nations for a season, gathered together again, placed in a new land, given a new name (Saxons, sons of Isaac), British (from the Hebrew Berith and Ish, covenant man) to become a

the land among the tribes of Israel, different from that which had been settled and defined by Joshua, ever took place in their subsequent history, we may be sure, since nothing of the kind could have taken place without some direct intimation from God upon the subject, and which, had it been made, would most assuredly have been acted upon and recorded. For nothing, I think, can be plainer to a careful reader of the history of the tribes of Israel than that, while God promised them a very large extent of country, reaching from the river Nile to the Euphrates, yet they were not allowed to possess and to occupy it as they pleased, but that, in this respect, they were under the most stringent regulations. Thus, although Edom, Moab, and Ammon were evidently within the limits of the promised land, yet, on the first possession of it by the people of Israel, they were strictly inhibited from occupying so much as a foot breadth of any of these different countries. Look at Deuteronomy ii. 5, 9, 19 : "Meddle not with them ; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a foot breadth, because I have given Mount Seir unto Esau for a possession. And the Lord said unto me, Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle; for I will not give thee of their land for a possession, because I have given Ar unto the children of Lot for a possession. And when thou comest nigh over against the children of Ammon, distress them not, nor meddle with them : for I will not give thee of the land of the children of Ammon any possession; because I have given it unto the children of Lot for a possession." Indeed, I believe that at any period of their history it would have been at the peril of the tribes of Israel to have occupied a larger extent of country in the Land of Promise, even had they possessed the power to have acquired it, than that which Jehovah Himself saw fit to settle and define for them.

NOTE ON "THE GATE OF HIS ENEMIES" IN GEN. XXII. 17.

By the Rev. C. W. Hickson, M.A.

[We have much pleasure in publishing a memorandum on the subject of the correct translation of that clause of Gen. xxii. 17 (which we have so often quoted in these pages), by the Rev. C. W. Hickson. It will be seen that Mr. Hickson fully supports our view that the passage, though it speaks only of "the Gate" of Israel's enemies, may be read perfectly correctly as referring to "the Gates" in the plural number. The genius of the Hebrew language indeed seems to demand that reading. To avoid confusion and error we publish the Hebrew words used in the following in the English character.—Ed.]

In Gen. xxii. 17, the words are shăhăr, ōyĕbhăyo; shă'hăr, o-y'bhayo, plural with pronominal affix, "his enemies." I am satisfied that this really means "Gates of his enemies," for more reasons than one.

1. Shă'hăr, it is true, is singular, so far as the form is concerned; but singular nouns are sometimes used as collectives —e.g., âdhām, "man," "men;" îsh, "man," for "men;" dābhār "a word," for "words;" ôyēbh, "an enemy," for "enemies," and as the last word is the very word here employed, the fact that it is in the plural seems to show that different groups of "enemies" are referred to, which would imply that "Gate" means "Gates."

2. "When a compound idea, expressed by a noun in the construct state, followed by its genitive" (which is the case here: shahar-oyebhayo being a compound idea, having shahar in the construct state, followed by its genitive, oyebhayo) "is to be made definite, it is done by prefixing the article to the noun in the genitive;" îsh mĭlkhāmāh, "a man of war;" ish hammilkhāmah, "the man of war." If, therefore, the inspired writer wished to express "THE Gate of his enemies" he would most probably have written shahar hā-ōyēbh, which would mean "the Gate of the enemy, or enemies," or "the Gate of the enemy, par-excellence;" this form of expression being ambiguous.

3. There are three ways of expressing the plural of a compound idea: (a) putting the first word in the plural; (b) putting both in the plural; and (c) putting the second, or governed noun in the plural—e.g., bēyth âbh, literally "house of a father"—i.e., "a family:" (bēyth âbôth) (not bōttēy âbh), "houses of a father"—i.e., families. The two nouns are regarded as one compound noun, and the plural termination of the second applies to the whole idea. Now, as before observed, ōyēbh in the singular is sufficient to express plurality, as far as the enemies are concerned, so that shăhăr ōyĕbhayô would mean "Gate of his (enemy or) enemies," therefore shăhăr ōyĕbhăyo must mean, I think, "Gates of his enemies." Shahar oyebh, "enemies' Gate;" shăhăr ōyebhîm, enemies' Gates. My authority for the rule given under (2), and also for what I have stated under (3), is Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, § 111, 1: and § 108, 3. He refers to Judges vii. 25, the "head of Oreb and Zeeb," where "head," evidently means "heads," unless Oreb and Zeeb were a sort of Siamese twins, with one head between them. The Authorised Version translated it "heads." He also refers to îr mĭbhtsārôth (Dan. xi. 15), which is literally "a city of munitions;" but the expression îr mĭbhtsar is a compound one meaning "a city of fortification," or "a fortified city;" and the plural of the compound expression is not ārēy mĭbhtsār, but îr mîbhtsarôth, "fortified cities," Authorised Version, "most fenced cities."—Banner, Vol. V., p. 466.

THE LOYALTY DEBATE AND RESOLUTION IN THE CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS, FEB. 5TH., 1896.

PART I.

We take the following report of a remarkable debate on the late "Loyalty Resolution" of the Canadian House of Commons, on Feb 5 last, from The Gazette, Montreal, of the 6th. Our friends will read it with pleasure as proof that the young lions are true to their old mother in the Isles of the West, and mean to stand by her. We gave a short precis of the debate on p. 105 of the present vol. But the following is given much more in detail, and is worth recording.

Mr. McNeill's Loyalty Resolution.

"Mr. McNeill moved the following resolution, which, by special arrangement, had the first place on the orders of the day :—'That, in view of the threatening aspect of foreign affairs, this House desires to assure Her Majesty's Government, and the people of the United Kingdom, of its unalterable loyalty and devotion to the British Throne and Constitution, and of its conviction that, should occasion unhappily arise, in no other part of the Empire than the Dominion of Canada would more substantial sacrifices attest the determination of Her Majesty's subjects to maintain unimpaired the integrity and inviolate the honour of Her Majesty's Empire; and this House reiterates the oft expressed desire of the people of Canada to maintain the most friendly relations with their kinsmen of the United States.'

"Mr. McNeill said—Mr. Speaker, there is an obvious objection that may be urged against the resolution which I have placed in your hands. It may be said, that it is superfluous; that it is unnecessary to inform the Government and people of the United Kingdom of what they already know full well. I do not doubt, that it is well understood in the United Kingdom that the people of Canada are devotedly attached to the throne and to the Constitution under which they live, and that they would be prepared to make most substantial sacrifices in defence of the honour and integrity of their own Empire. But, Mr. Speaker, we have to consider not only how it will be regarded in the Mother Country and the other parts of the Empire. We have also to have regard to its effect in foreign countries. (Hear, hear.) It would appear that, in some quarters, ideas prevail as to the political aspirations of the people of Canada, which, to those who have knowledge of the facts, can only appear ludicrous. If you can judge from speeches delivered by public men and articles written in the newspapers of the neighbouring Republic, an impression prevails there that the people of Canada are only waiting a favourable opportunity to transfer their allegiance from the Crown of England to the Republic of the United States. To the members of this House, the representatives of the Canadian people, it is simply amazing that the sentiment of the Dominion should have been so completely misapprehended. From Halifax to Vancouver, there is not a constituency in which the advocacy of a policy of annexation on the hustings would not entail the hopeless, overwhelming defeat of the candidate who had the audacity to make it a plank in his platform. (Applause.) If there be any one question on which the rank and file of the people of Canada (irrespective of party) are solid, it is this question of annexation. (Cheers).

"It is the earnest wish of every Canadian to maintain the most friendly relations with the great people who divide this North American continent with us, whom we hold as kinsmen, and in whose magnificent achievements in behalf of civilization Canadians have almost a personal pride. But while we admire the many great qualities of our kinsmen of the neighbouring Republic, we have no desire to enter into a political partnership with them. We very much prefer our Constitution to theirs, and we very much prefer British connection to connection with the United States. We claim that we have the right of a free people to choose between our own Mother Country and the American Republic, and we only ask our good neighbours to let us alone and allow us to work out our own destiny in the way that, to us, seems best. We choose the British Empire, as against the American Republic.

"Should occasion, unhappily, arise, we are prepared to do what men may do to preserve for ourselves and those who come after us what we regard as our most precious political heritage—their birthright as British subjects. (Cheers.) It is far better that there should be no mistake about this, and I have endeavoured to state the position plainly. Mistakes in reference to such matters have, before now, given rise to grave results. The people of Canada are determined to maintain the position of the Dominion as an integral part of the Empire, and they are fully satisfied that, in the British Empire can take care of itself peace first of all —an honourable peace, we believe, that we shall procure from which we come. (Applause.) And we know that at our back will be all the resources of an Empire whose resources are almost inexhaustible—more especially as regards the number of fighting men that could, in the long run, be placed in line. Those who know anything of the Sikh war and of the losses inflicted on the British by the magnificent troops opposed to them at Chillian-walla, and on many another hard fought field; and those who know anything of the extraordinary military powers of the Goorkhas and other hardy races of hill-men of India—among the most warlike races of the world—will understand to what I refer. The resources of the Empire as regards fighting men are, practically inexhaustible, and we are not altogether destitute of the financial strength necessary to prosecute a great war to its conclusion. (Hear, hear.)

"After referring to the enthusiastic response made when Lord Beaconsfield summoned the Indian troops to Malta, Mr. McNeill continued:—We do not want war, and we do not expect we are going to have war. Least of all do we want war, and, least of all, do we expect to have war with our own kith and kin. (Hear, hear.) There has been an extraordinary development of the sentiment of kinship, if I may so express it, among British people during the last ten or fifteen years, so that, in the Empire of to-day, even more than ever before, a war with the United States would be regarded as a horrible and unnatural fratricidal strife. We have been surprised and pained by the recent explosion of ill-feeling towards this country, and towards the Mother Country, in the United States of America. But we refuse to believe that that explosion of ill-feeling adequately expresses the sentiments of those who are most competent to speak for the people of the United States. Furthermore, we believe, and hope as we believe, that it does not even express the sentiments of so large a section of that people as at one time was supposed. (Hear, hear.) But it would be an act of simple folly, it would be an act of culpable negligence on the part of any reasonable people not to recognize the fact that there is a disreputable and rowdy section of the American people who may, some day, cause us trouble, and it is absolutely necessary that any sober-minded people should take means to meet that trouble if, unfortunately, that trouble should arise in the future. I have been much gratified, and I am sure the country has been much gratified, to find that we have been called upon to make provision for the better defence of Canada. Not that I wish to assume, or to suggest, that this provision for better defence arises altogether because of anything that may have happened on our southern border. For it is not only from our neighbours that unexpected proofs of unfriendliness have proceeded. From the four quarters of the world they come. It would seem as though the unexampled magnitude and wealth, and prosperity and happiness of our Empire have engendered envy and cupidity where least we expected to find them, and now it appears that trouble and trial, and even danger, are closing down upon those famous islands set in the silver sea that we hold so dear. (Cheers.) For, suddenly, there have loomed up the most ominous thunder-clouds of war that have darkened the political horizon of England for many a long year. And how has England borne herself whilst menace and danger compass her about? She has borne herself like the mighty mother of heroes that she is. (Cheers.) The great heart but beats fuller and prouder in the hour of peril. The spectacle of England's majestic composure and unblenching self-reliance, in the presence of the undisguised and altogether unexpected hostility of so many of the great Powers of the world, has sent a thrill of admiration and of pride through the pulses of every loyal subject of the Queen, and I venture to say that England's conduct of to-day will not be found wanting, even though in far-off summers, that we shall not see, if it be weighed in the balance against some of those splendid incidents which are set like precious jewels in the history of mankind. (Applause.) Mr. Speaker, we want the people of England, and of Ireland, and of Scotland, to be well assured that the people of Canada are not mere fair weather friends. We want our kinsmen of Australasia, some of whom we welcomed here so recently, to know that we are with them, in this issue, heart and hand, and we want the whole world to know that, in whatever quarter of the Empire they may chance to reside, the British people are one people, animated by one spirit, and determined to stand together as one man, in defence of their common rights and in the maintenance of their common interests. (Cheers.) We earnestly desire peace; we regard war with horror, but we are prepared to accept it with all its consequences, from whatever quarter it may come, if it be necessary to do so for the defence of the honour and the integrity of our own Empire.

"Mr. Davies (P.E.I.) seconded the resolution. He began by quoting the words of Shakespeare :—

> "'Come the three corners of the world in arms,
> And we shall shock them. Naught shall make us rue
> If England to herself do rest but true.'

"Since Shakespeare wrote those lines, a greater Britain has arisen, but they were no less true to-day than three hundred years ago. The hearts of the children in the colonies went out to the great lone isolated mother, and Canadians were doing their simple duty in saying that they were prepared to make material sacrifices for the integrity of the Empire. (Applause.) By the bold response England made to the threatening attitude of the German Emperor England had shown that, if she was only a third rate continental Power, she was still the mistress of the seas. (Cheers.) Imperial Federation seemed to have produced no scheme that was practicable, but he did not doubt that some arrangement would be made by which the Empire would be more closely united together, and the national pledge given on Canada's behalf by this resolution was an important, though, perhaps, a small step in that direction. (Applause.) The resolution reiterated our desire to maintain the most friendly relations with the United States. Commercially and socially our relations are intertwined and united, and becoming yearly more so. The Republic is grappling with some of the greatest problems the world has ever seen, and, while we have every sympathy with them, and wish them well, we do not desire to take any part in the solution of these problems from a political standpoint. (Cheers.) We draw inspiration from the same sources, and worship at the same altars. We look forward to a union with them in the sense that we will unite to promote civilization and Christianity, but, while we feel that blood is thicker than water, we desire to work out our own destiny as part of the British Empire, and under the Empire's flag. (Cheers.) The man, or the nation, who precipitates a war, with all its horrors, upon two great English-speaking nations, would be committing a crime against civilization and humanity. As Canadians we can assist Great Britain in two ways—with means and money. Perhaps our contribution would be small, compared with the amount required for the defence of the Empire, but the feeling at the back of it would make it valuable. But we can assist Great Britain, also, by cultivating the kindest feelings with the Republic to the south of us. A hearty union between Great Britain and the United States would be a magnificent guarantee for the world's peace. No nation, or combination of nations, could withstand the united strength of the world's greatest Empire and the world's greatest Republic. (Cheers.)

"Mr. Cockburn congratulated the Canadian press on the attitude they took during the recent crisis. He contrasted the moderate and self-reliant attitude of the Canadian people and press with the spread-eagleism of pinchbeck patriots, and the bray of the asinine mob on the other side of the line. He concluded:—I trust that, when this declaration comes out, it will be felt that we have, once for all, and finally, determined, at all hazards, to throw in our lot with the mother country, that we have no desire to change our allegiance, politically or commercially, that we desire to live peaceably here, on this northern half of the American Continent, and that we intend, as British subjects to live, and as British subjects to die. (Cheers.)

I know that the Scotch, the Irish, and the Welsh, were also musical, but would rather they spoke for themselves, and am sure that articles would be acceptable to the Editor, nor less acceptable to his readers.

Awhile ago, Mr. Squire, of the British Museum, wrote a letter to the Times in which he said:—"Theorists and historians are agreed as to the existence in this country in the 15th century of a school of musicians whose influence upon the development of the art was so considerable, that it was even said by one early writer, that the 'new art' of music originated in England at this time, and that the first musician to make a name of more than local celebrity was John Dunstable, an Englishman. . . . The difficulty of estimating the true position which Dunstable occupied with regard to the Netherlandish school, has hitherto appeared insurmountable, owing to the fact that his music had apparently entirely disappeared. . . . Not only had Dunstable's work vanished, but also there was hardly any trace to be found of English music of his day—the period in which the 'new art' was said to have originated in this country."

This blank is attributed by Mr. Squire mainly to the destruction of monastic libraries during the Reformation. "At all events," he continues, "the effacement of all trace of the early English school was so complete, that in a little more than a hundred year's time all that was known of its founder and chief glory was that he died in 1453, and was buried in St. Stephen's, Walbrook." But he proceeds to intimate that Dr. Haberl has turned up six large volumes of 15th century music in the Capitular Archives of Trent, which contain numerous pieces by English composers, including Dunstable; and since then a further book of music belonging to the same century has been brought to light at Modena, embodying 31 motets by Dunstable, as well as 17 by other Englishmen. Copies of the latter are in the British Museum; but the Trent MSS., which have been deposited at the Imperial library, Vienna, are deemed so precious that its proprietors will not allow the contents to meet the vulgar public gaze.

No one, of course, can tell how many native productions we lost at the Reformation, nor how many may yet be exhumed in the ecclesiastical establishments of the continent. But from what has reached us, it is ascertained that Dunstable and his compatriots were fertile composers, that their works were sought after by Europe, and that instead of being disciples of "the great Netherlandish school," they were the precursors of it. These, I think, are very weighty disclosures. The Hebrews were undoubtedly a musical people, which the Jews are still, and if it were true that the English are singularly deficient in this respect, the kinship between them would, to some extent, be prejudiced. What we were five hundred years ago is far more important than what we are now, because Time is a revolutionist; and the nearer we can go to the captivity the better chance we have of sighting the primitive qualities of the race. Unfortunately the evidence decreases as we ascend the stream; but sufficient has emerged from Trent and Modena to dispel various deeply-seated delusions, and show that Europe is our pupil, not our tutor.

JOHN SHOOTINGHAM.

AN AMERICAN LECTURE DELIVERED IN DES MOINES, IOWA, U.S.A.

"AN instructive and interesting address was given by George E. Inglis, of this city, before the History Classes of the High School, yesterday afternoon, upon the 'Identity of the Anglo-Saxon Race with the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel.'

"Dr. Inglis carried the pupils back to the calling of Israel into a national existence, enumerating the wonderful promises made to them by God, as recorded in the Bible. He sought to demonstrate that, in the days of King Saul, owing to the natural growth of the tribes, the tribes of Simeon, Gad, and Reuben expanded, and migrating to the Euphrates and the land bordering about the Caspian and Black Seas, founded colonies which, in later times, became known in history as the Sakai, Sciutes, and Scythes, afterwards called Scythians. From these people came the Anglos or Scots and Saxons who peopled England.

"The speaker also called attention to the migrations of the tribe of Dan into Greece, the Danai into Spain, the Danans from Spain into Ireland, whence came the Tuatha de Danans, and with them is believed to have been taken into Ireland the Coronation Stone, now in the coronation chair of the English monarchs, upon which have been crowned the monarchs of Ireland, Scotland, and England since 500 B.C. This stone is said to have served Jacob as a pillow before the gates of Luz on that memorable night of his vision of the ladder reaching from earth to heaven, at which time the covenant of perpetuity to Abraham and Isaac was renewed in Israel.

"The evidences to-day, biblically, that we of America and of England, being Saxons are Israel, chiefly centres in the fact that we are to-day fulfilling to the letter, and are in possession of all the wonderful blessings promised to Israel. The speaker compared some of these promises with England, which were to be fulfilled in Ephraim-Israel, and Manasseh in the latter days. Israel was to be punished and scattered throughout the nations for a season, gathered together again, placed in a new land, given a new name (Saxons, sons of Isaac), British (from the Hebrew Berith and Ish, covenant man) to become a multitude of people, a nation and a company of nations, as the dust of the earth, ruling over kings, and not to be ruled by any; lending unto many nations, but not borrowing; possessing the Gates of their enemies, such as Heligoland, Channel Islands, Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Crete, Suez, Aden, &c.; the chief missionary power, or God's witnesses. Each of these prophecies and many others, he said, are fulfilled to-day by England. Manasseh, too, was to become a great people, which the United States fulfils.

"A union of the whole house of Israel. Judah or the Jews are to become one with Israel in the near future, and are to again build up and occupy with Israel the land of Palestine as at the first.

"The lecture was listened to with evident relish, and for an hour thereafter Mr. Inglis answered questions fired at him by inquiring minds, evidently to the satisfaction of the pupils." —The Des Moines Daily News, Jan. 9, 1896.

"ISRAEL A NATION."

To the Editor of the "Daily Chronicle."

SIR,—As you have given such prominence to the scheme of Mr. Holman Hunt, may I ask you to insert this letter in reply? The Jews are only a small section of the Hebrew race, and represent that portion known in the Scriptures as the nation of Judah. The people of the nation of Israel never were Jews and never were known as Jews, and were not in Judea at the time of the crucifixion. The Jews know perfectly well that the bulk of the land belongs to the nation of Israel, and that the rights of the Jews are not more than a fractional part of the whole. They know also that before they can return to this land they must go to the nation of Israel, and that both shall return together out of the land of the north, and that God has promised to give back the land to Israel and Judah, and to make them again one nation with one king of David's line reigning over them. Neither Israel nor the Jews will insult God by offering to buy from the Sultan of Turkey what God has declared a thousand times He will give to them.

The wisdom of raising £100,000,000 to bolster up for another fifty years one of the most wicked and effete Empires that has ever existed may seem "a glorious scheme" to the correspondent of the Daily Chronicle and Mr. Holman Hunt, but neither Israel nor Judah will contribute as many pence for such a purpose, so the Turk will never have the opportunity of either accepting or rejecting such a proposal.

Mr. Hunt seems to have been actively interested in this question some seven years. I may say that, as I have set it before and above every question affecting my life for over a quarter of a century, I consider that I have a right also to my opinion, which is, that the scheme proposed shows utter ignorance of the nature of the question; that it is a reflection upon the promises of God, and is of the same spirit that induced Simon to think he could buy the "gift of God" with money. I have no hesitation in repeating the reply made on that occasion, "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money; thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter."

As to Israel and Judah consulting and asking for the approval of the "Great Powers," there is only "One Great Power" that they need to consider, the other Great Powers will have to consider them. Let Mr. Hunt read again the covenants which God has made with Israel, and the rights and privileges which He has conferred upon them before he recommends us to negotiate with that arch enemy of our God and mankind, the Sultan of Turkey.

Yours faithfully,

A. K. ROBINSON.

T. S. H.

Birkenhead, March 24, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I write to say that I have been a continuous reader of the BANNER OF ISRAEL for seven years, and I have found the Bible to have become a new book. The more I have studied the truth as taught in the BANNER, the more I am convinced that those truths are founded on the impregnable rock of Scripture. I have done my best to spread the great truth by lectures and talk, and I find that many persons are beginning to believe that the British are the descendants of the Ten Tribes of Israel. While studying the return of Israel and the Jews in the last days, and while reading the last eight chapters of the prophet Ezekiel, which give not only the boundaries of the several tribes, and the most minute measurements and description of the holy city and its glorious temple, and the various ordinances of worship, I see that the sacrifices and entire ritual of the ancient Jewish Church, just as prescribed by Moses, are destined to be revived and practised with even greater strictness than ever. I find in those chapters most specific directions for the due performance of the various kind of offerings—the meat-offering, the sin-offering, and the burnt-offering. And seeing that those chapters refer to times yet future, even to the world's history in the yet future, I have been accustomed to look upon the Mosaic rites as merely shadows of "good things to come," and as having been fulfilled, and altogether done away with in the one offering of Christ once offered, by which one offering He hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified.

To us who are called to "walk by faith, not by sight;" to us, whose calling is altogether heavenly and spiritual, those rites, and ceremonies, and bloody sacrifices appear most strange, and even revolting. I think that the above rites, &c., will only be temporary, for I see, in Rev. xx. 7, after the "thousand years are expired" they will be succeeded by that "holy city," which shall come down from heaven upon the "new earth," wherein we are expressly told there shall be no temple, and therefore no temple sacrifices or ceremonies of any kind (Rev. xxi. 22). With the temple itself all its services will be done away for ever. In this way, I take it, can we understand the predictions of Ezekiel, which are so distinct, so positive, and so precise that it is impossible to gloss them over (as some have attempted to do) without altogether sacrificing that reverence for God's Word, and the childlike confidence in its truth, which is the Christian's surest safeguard and most precious comfort? I should like to get your opinion on the subject.

I am, sir, yours truly, JAMES DOWNING.

Commercial-road, Hayle, Cornwall, Feb. 10, 1896.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We agree with our correspondent that the sacrifices will be offered again, as prescribed in Ezek. xlvi., but not nearly to the extent directed under the Mosaic covenant. Whether these will be temporary or not we cannot say. It is best to wait for the time and then see. If the sacrifices before the first Advent were anticipatory of the sacrifice of Christ, we do not see why those yet to take place should not be commemorative of the sacrifice already made. Here again we had better wait and see.—ED.

THE ADVANCE TO DONGOLA.

THE overthrow of the Italians at Adowa has already borne fruit. It gives Israel reasonable grounds for another step forward in the path of national expansion, repudiated, of course, by all parties, but still a fact which no one can deny. We are compelled to go forward, because our allies the Italians have been badly beaten by the Abyssinians at Adowa, and our advance, it is said, will aid them in the direction of Kassala. Besides that, it is stated that the defeat of the Italians has so encouraged the Dervishes of the Soudan, that they are already threatening Upper Egypt by advancing in the Desert northwards, and the way to stop them is to recover Dongola for the Egyptians, and so add a large extent of country between Wady Halfa, Egypt's present southern extremity, and the headquarters of the Dervishes, to the Anglo-Egyptian possessions. The proposal has been debated and opposed in the House of Commons by members who rejoice in the defeat of the Italians, and scoff at the idea of our wishing to stop the advance of the Dervishes towards Cairo, because such advance is, they allege, quite impossible in a military point of view. The expedition will, nevertheless, take place, and Dongola finally as the result be added to the Egyptian Government, with British-Israel to guide its destinies for the future. The opponents of the Government said roundly, in the debate of March 16th, that we were advancing to Dongola "in order that we may have an excuse for remaining there for all time" (Sir Charles Dilke). Mr. Labouchere declared that we had undertaken the expedition that "we might carry out the 'Alexandria to the Cape' doctrine, and that we were going into the Soudan to oblige our occupation of Egypt to continue for the next 100 years!" We do not stop to discuss the reasons assigned for our coming expedition from Wady Halfa to Akasheh, and then to Dongola, but desire our readers to note that our advance on some pretext or other is perpetual and incessant. In Egypt and Africa we are on ticklish ground, because, for several reasons, France is very jealous of our having so successfully turned her out of the country in and after 1882 (it was the fault of the French only!), and she longs for the moment when she can persuade us to retire and leave the field open for herself alone once more. In vain! We have healed the sores of Egypt according to Isa. xix. 20, and the time to give good government to the Soudanese—nay, to the people of Khartoum too—is at hand. We may be sure, then, that our hold of Egypt at one end of the Nile and of Uganda at the other, has not occurred by accident. The sources of the Nile, and the Nile itself, must be under one Government, and that Government Israel's! Israel is to be a blessing to Egypt; and no doubt the Soudanese, the neighbours of the Egyptians, must share in that blessing; since to confer it on all nations of the earth is one of Israel's special blessings. In the face of the tremendous overthrow of the Italian troops at Adowa, we see that our Government is about to send out Egyptian native regiments of horse and foot to meet the onset of the Dervishes. We know not how such a decision could be arrived at on reasonable military grounds, and wonder why a brigade of British troops has not been added to the advancing line. We shall be able, we believe, in the end to point to the fact that God fights for Israel, and that He will not allow His people to be ashamed before their enemies. He will give us the victory, though He has withholden it from the Italians; because we are, and they are not, Israel. We have thus now, enacted before our eyes, a piece of evidence which should appeal to all men. Being in Egypt, a land given over to Israel to bless, we are acting our destined part towards her, and now we are about to take a step almost in faith in God's protecting providence, and mean to issue forth with most inadequate means, apparently, to reconquer a land belonging to Egypt, which we now think ought to revert to her. Let us watch the proceedings and their result, and decide therefrom whether, in fact, the British are Israel or no. How men ignorant of our subject make use of our arguments, and use our very words, let the Daily Graphic, of March 13th, prove. The witness is "a blind one," as we say. Mr. Arnold Forster, M.P., who was "interviewed" by a reporter, said this :—

"A CONFERENCE WE MUST HAVE."

"Then you agree with Sir John Colomb's views as to the necessity for decentralising our system of supply so far as munitions of war are concerned?"

"Entirely; but I'm drifting into details again. Let us keep broad facts fully in view. England has now in her possession the temperate zones of the earth, and she commands the Gates of the world. These are heritages in which all our Colonies share. Are we to keep them, or shall we let them slip from our hands? A feeling of loyalty to the Empire has been aroused among all sections in every great Colony. We have an opportunity now that may never occur again of directing this sentiment to practical ends. Let us take care that the opportunity is not lost."

"As the first step, then," asked our representative as he rose to take leave of Mr. Forster, "you would have a conference called?"

"A conference certainly we must have," was the reply, "and the sooner the better. The time has come for England to make the first move."

Another witness, reported in the Evening Observer of Queensland, dated January 27, 1896, was a preacher, the Rev. W. Whale, whom we must not, we suppose, describe as an unwitting or "blind" witness. His sermon was reported thus :—

THE ANGLO-SAXON RACE.

The sermon delivered yesterday morning at the City Tabernacle by the Rev. W. Whale was of special interest, by reason of the local application of some of the preacher's remarks. The subject of the discourse was "The Destiny and Duty of the Anglo-Saxon Race," and was based on the 10th and 11th verses of Hosea i. Mr. Whale pointed out that we are citizens of the world—fractions of the human race; and showed how, in both a broad and a narrow sense, we recognised our duty as such. Men were not less patriotic for being human, and oftentimes the narrower view was the most national one. Man often did for his own family, for instance, what he would not do for humanity. It was ours to be colonists of a nation which seemed to have a glorious destiny; a small nucleus in itself, yet it had expanded by growth and extended by conquest. He spoke of what had come to us through the two mediums, showing the relationship which existed, and explaining what was held by military force, and what by kinship and social ties. The destiny of the Anglo-Saxon race was seen in the increase of its numbers, and, by way of comparison, he quoted figures to show what it was a century ago and now, making special reference also to the extent of its wealth and its commerce. As to the religious privileges of the race, he pointed out that God had said to the Hebrews, "You are my people." The Anglo-Saxon race seemed in one sense to have a special providence over it. It stood in the world more for justice than many others; it was also a nation which lent to all, yet borrowed from none. Some people said we were the Lost Ten Tribes. Without discussing the question of the Anglo-Israel race, it did seem that the saving providence which was put over the children of Israel rested more over the British nation than any other. He held that relation to God decided the influence a nation would have in the world. Speaking on social progress, he referred to his text, which said the people should be gathered together—the aggregation of the races, which might intimate federation. The text further stated that the people should appoint themselves one head.

We see here, by the testimony of our two witnesses, as well as from the evidence of Egyptian facts, that the best parts of the world are falling into our hands, as well as "the command of the Gates of the world;" that we are rapidly increasing in numbers as a people, and so filling the earth; our wealth and commerce being vast. We lend to many nations, but borrow not from them; and we are, in fact, filling in all respects the destiny predicted in the Bible for Israel. The conclusion to our own mind is, that we, therefore, must be Israel! The fact calls for our nation's praise to Him who is the King Divine of Israel.

"SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT also wanted to say a word or two on this subject. He did not believe much in loud professions of loyalty, but there was a time for all things, and he thought that now was a very proper time, indeed, for such a resolution as this. (Hear, hear.) I do not mean to say, he continued, that there is, at this present moment, danger of war with the United States, but I do mean to say that, under very slightly different conditions, there might have been very real danger in such a message as that delivered by President Cleveland, had it been received in England in the same tone and temper as in the United States. Therefore, I agree in highly commending the temper in which the Press and the people of Canada received that threat, for it amounted to no less, and I hope that we will hear the last of those idle and foolish expressions thrown out by one side of the House on the loyalty of the other. I speak for myself alone, and I wish it to be understood that no responsibility attaches to anyone else for what I say. It seems to me that, to a very great extent, the choice for Canada lies between two alternatives. As Canada is placed between England and the United States, Canada will either have to be a hostage for the good behaviour of England to the United States, or to be a bond of union between those two countries. Which destiny is the more likely to promote our self-respect and the real welfare of Canada, I leave, without hesitation, for the people of Canada to decide.

"As to whether England stands in a place of splendid or dangerous isolation, I will not further discuss, but I will offer a compromise which, perhaps, will be accepted by both parties. I will say that she stands in splendid, but dangerous, isolation. I think that will pretty nearly define the actual state of the case. But, whatever may be the truth as to that, I think there is no doubt that the spirit and pluck with which President Cleveland's message was received, has extorted unwilling admiration, even from those who formerly were most disposed to disparage England—(hear, hear)—and has shown, as few other things would have shown, the great vitality and resources which the British Empire undoubtedly possesses. It has filled Englishmen, all the world over, with just and honest pride. The tone and temper of the message was most unfortunate, and very greatly to be regretted by all, but I think good will come out of evil, and that it has done something to pave the way to a better understanding between the two countries. It wrought more ruin in American than in English homes, and the people of the United States now know two things which I doubt if they understood before. They know, in the first place, to what an extraordinary close extent the interests of England and the United States are intertwined in a thousand ways, and they know further, what they did not fully understand before, the tremendous cost to them, as well as to us, which would be entailed by a war with England. Mr. Chauncey Depew estimated that the mere name and sound of it cost the United States a thousand million of dollars on the depreciation of United States securities in one week, and I think he was well within the mark. The sensible portion of the people of the United States, at least, realised what tremendous consequences must be entailed by a collision between the two great Anglo-Saxon communities. It would be no light matter if we had found ourselves suddenly thrown into war about a few acres of bog in Venezuela, with which we have no sort of concern.

"What I think we have a right to claim, is a co-equal right, not the sole right, in all things pertaining to North America, and, after recent events, I am not sure I should not say, in South America, too. That is a claim which I have advanced here and in England, and which I maintain, not as a favour, but as a right. Rights and duties are strictly co-terminous. Every man who has a right has a duty to perform. Five-and-twenty years ago England withdrew from Canada and left us the task of defending it. We accepted this responsibility. We are willing to maintain peace and good order in this Northern half of the Continent and defend it against all comers to the best of our ability; but, hand in hand with that comes the right to a free hand on this hemisphere, at least. All other risks Canadians are ready to face, if not with a light heart, at any rate, with a cheerful heart, and, if the efforts of the combined European Powers were to threaten our territory, I have no doubt that Canada would gird herself up to meet any emergency. There is but one foe, and that is the foe to the South, whom, undoubtedly, we might fear to enter into a conflict with. Not for any unworthy reason, English statesmen talk of fratricidal war. I won't say it is a mere phrase in their mouths, but, while they talk of fratricidal war, we know it would be a fratricidal war. There has been an enormous change in the position of Canada during the last thirty years, as everyone who has watched the flow of population on this continent knows. There is scarcely one family in ten, in the Dominion of Canada, who has not a son or brother, or near relative, in the United States, by no fault of the people of Canada. Canada is one of the most defenceless countries on earth, from Maine to the Rocky Mountains, at least. The United States seaboard, from Maine to New Orleans, and from San Francisco to Oregon, is, likewise, to-day, one of the most defenceless on the face of the earth, and, if it be possible, as some of these people have threatened, that they would carry fire and sword to every town in Canada, it is, at least, equally true that the British fleet could lay in ashes every seaboard town on the United States coast. They might destroy tens of millions of dollars worth of property, or hold it to ransom, but it would be, in part, property held by British subjects, resident in the United States. They could do infinite harm to each other, but I trust that means will be found whereby England and the States will never engage in hostile collision. The true attitude of the people of Canada, now and always, is that of a people who are loyal, but not subservient, who know their rights and are not afraid to claim them. If there is one thing that true Englishmen dislike it is anything that savours of flunkyism or gush, or, among the better classes, anything that savours of jingoism.

"Should Do Our Duty.

"While I desire that, so long as we continue a part of the Empire, we should do our duty to it to the utmost; while I am disposed to shrink from no proper sacrifice for the purpose, yet I, as a Canadian, tell the House and the country that it is not a question of obligation between Canada and the British Empire, and, if it be a question of obligation, it is by no manner of means confined to one side. England has acquired colonies in every possible shape and way, but, among all her hundred colonies, she has but one which was created by men who did not leave the shores of England to benefit themselves, but who gave up all they had for the purpose of maintaining their loyalty to England, and the name of that colony is Canada. (Applause.) Nevertheless, although it be largely England's own fault, it must be confessed that, as regards the United States, Canada is a weak spot in the British armour. There is no doubt that we are liable to sudden attack from the foe on the South, and there is no doubt that we would require all our resources, and the resources of the British Empire, to defend us. As to the Venezuelan question, my opinion is pretty well expressed in the words of Prince Bismarck, when difficulties arose with reference to the Eastern frontier, and he declared that he would not like to sacrifice a single Pomeranian Grenadier for all the Turks in Europe and Asia put together. (Laughter.) I think it would be a thousand pities if one drop of Anglo-Saxon blood were shed for the sake of those murderous man-monkeys in the Central American Republic. All that they do is to have a revolution every half year, and the only possible chance of their living in peace is when some strong tyrant keeps them in subjection at the point of the bayonet. (Renewed laughter and cheers.)

"Sir Richard concluded by strongly advocating the formation of a common tribunal for the settlement of all disputes between Great Britain and the United States. In his opinion, this was within measurable distance of the range of practical politics, and no better service could be done by the journalists and public men of Canada than by helping to bring about such a result. A union of one hundred and forty millions of English-speaking people would have tremendous power over the rest of the world, and what was agreed upon between them would not easily be gainsaid.

"Messrs. Craig and Casey also supported the resolution."

"French Canadians.

"Mr. Hector Langevin said he could not allow the debate to close without a word being said from the Province of Quebec. (Applause.) He felt that it was scarcely necessary to remind his hearers of the constant loyalty of the French Canadians. It was too well known how truly and faithfully they have always maintained union with Great Britain. Only a short time after the cession of Canada, an invasion of the country had taken place from the thirteen revolted States; but, instead of being received with open arms, as the invaders expected, they had been sternly repelled, even although the French officers serving in the United States urged the French Canadians to join them. All overtures had been rejected, and the French Canadians had remained faithful to the British flag. (Applause.) As it was in 1776, so it was in 1812–15, when Canada was again invaded, and again the French Canadians had shown that they could not be allured from their allegiance to Great Britain. (Applause.) So it always had been, and so, he believed, it would always be. Whenever the Empire was threatened, and whenever a defender was needed, there you would find a French Canadian. (Great applause.)

"Sir James Grant made an eloquent speech in support of the resolution, taking the line that we wished to maintain the most friendly relations with our neighbours, and to walk side by side with them in the march of civilization, but we wished to remain under the British flag and in unfaltering loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen.

"Mr. Sutherland was glad that the Convertives had taken this opportunity of contradicting their absurd charges of disloyalty against one-half of the population of Canada, and hoped that the loyalty cry would not be again raised for political purposes.

"Mr. Foster said he did not intend to make a speech, but merely to express in a very few words on behalf of himself and the Government entire accord with this resolution. He most warmly complimented the mover of the resolution on his speech. The matter was excellent, and all was in such good taste, that no citizen of this or any other country could find fault. Mr. Foster thought the resolution was an opportune one. It would tend to increase the feeling of common interest which was growing between Great Britain and her colonies, and which, despite all obstacles and difficulties which might seem to be in the way, was tending continuously and strongly to a complete union of the colonies and the mother country. The resolution could do no harm, it must do a great deal of good, and it would be as agreeable to our own people as to the people of Great Britain, to whom it was specially addressed. (Cheers.)

"Mr. Laurier, who was received with applause from all parts of the House, said: Mr. Speaker, though this resolution meets with general acceptance from all sides, and though it requires no support on my part, I also beg to add a few words, just to express my entire approval of it. I am glad to believe that, at this moment, when this resolution comes up for debate, there is, perhaps, less necessity for it than there was one month ago, when it was first placed on the order paper. At that time the sky was cloudy, now it seems brighter. At that time it looked as if England was on the verge of war, and would have to fight single-handed almost the whole world, and face many enemies combined, both from quarters where she might expect to find foes, and also from quarters where she might have expected to find friends. At this time, I am glad to say, matters look better. It is true England was, as the Minister of Finance said on a former occasion, and is yet, isolated—whether splendidly isolated or dangerously isolated, I will not now debate; but, for my part, I think splendidly isolated; because this isolation of England comes from her superiority, and her superiority to-day seems to be manifest. (Cheers.) Apart from the realm of letters and art—in which, in my humble judgment, France is her competitor, and even her superior—in everything that makes a people great in colonizing power, in trade and commerce, in all the higher arts of civilization, England not only excels all nations of the modern world, but all nations in ancient history as well. (Applause.) She is isolated to-day, but we can remember that the present position of England, the degree of marvellous development she has attained, dates from the day when her fortunes seemed to be at the lowest ebb—that is, from the close of the American war in the last century. At that time England had just lost her Colonial Empire. She had lost her American colonies; the only colonies left her were a few isolated spots here and there, and the Colony of Canada, at that time containing only about 80,000 souls. Since that day the career of England has been simply marvellous. Since that day she has conquered India, grappled with Napoleon and brought down the Colossus, reduced her public debt, reduced the number of her paupers and jails, doubled her population, trebled her trade, and planted strong and permanent colonies in Asia, Africa, Australia, and almost every corner of the world. As I said, these splendid accomplishments date from the day when her position seemed to be at the lowest ebb. She has done more; she has done what has not been done by any other nation. At the present day, when the nations of Europe, her competitors, have been concentrating all their energies in the creation of standing armies, and in maintaining stupendous armaments, England has devoted all her energies to the arts of peace, and to-day her accumulated wealth is such that she is the banker of the world. The citizens of England to-day hold in their pockets the bonds of kings and nations, and, on the recent occasion when she was threatened with warfare across the sea from a quarter where she had reason to expect nothing but friendship, just by declining the bonds of that nation, she inflicted upon it almost as much harm as war itself. Well, these are guarantees of peace—I think they are splendid guarantees of peace; but, if the day should come—which God forbid, if the day should ever come—which, again, I say God forbid—when England should have to repel foes, I am quite sure that all British subjects all over the world would be only too glad to give to her what help they could—all British subjects all over the world, not only British subjects of her own blood, but British subjects who are not of her own blood, but who have received from her the inestimable blessing of freedom. (Cheers.)

"After orations from Mr. James McShane and Mr. Davin, the resolution was carried unanimously amid a scene of great enthusiasm."

THE METHOD OF REVELATION,

Being a Paper read before the Cashel Clerical Union,

By Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

We may theorise as to the kind of evidence that, according to our judgment, would produce the greatest amount of conviction in our own minds, or the minds of others, as to the being of God and the reality of the life beyond: but it is wise to remember that the method chosen to produce conviction is not what we would have evolved, but what the Revealer selected.

The revelation of God which has been made known to the world—to us—has been given through the life of a nation and the life of a person, and I must ask you to distinguish between the nation and its history, between the Messiah and His biography.

At first it may be thought that revelation is by a nation and by a Person, is contradicted by the fact that God spoke to men by men. But leaders and seers, kings and priests, were employed to form and to instruct the nation. Apostles, evangelists, prophets, and martyrs were employed to prepare the way for, and to proclaim, the Person. The nation is the seed of Isaac. The Person is the Lord Jesus Christ.

This revelation does not clash with a priori arguments as to a first cause, or as to the probability of a first cause energising now: but it is not dependent upon such reasonings. It occasionally brings us into contact with beings not of this sphere, but it is not based upon such casual manifestations; it rather slights the evidence of such experiences, e.g., "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." Angels seen or devils cast out will not constrain belief, for faith must rest upon the eternal fitness of the revelation and upon the character of Him who is revealed. A malefactor's cross was, humanly speaking, a strange method of revelation, and yet the experience of millions is this, that no more true words were ever spoken than these, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me." It is a historic fact that the cross of Christ is a mighty power and a supreme revelation.

But there are many non-Christian peoples, and many individuals among the Christian nations, who do not understand; they want evidence such as they can comprehend of the being of the God of Israel and of the future life. This is not a wilful rejection prompted by allowed sin, but a painful experience of an unsatisfied void. The souls of many such, we may hope, are athirst for God; they would fain know the presence of God, and to such there will come, when God's own method of revelation is better understood, the comfort that came to the Psalmist, who was similarly tried. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the health of my countenance and my God."

The selection of Israel in order that through one nation the world might be taught, was made that the character of Him who is unseen might be manifested, and thereby to reveal His existence. Mankind were then, as now, conscious of a first cause, but they drifted into merely human conceptions, and made unto themselves "Gods many, like unto wood and stone." If there was in those early days a philosophic denial of the existence of God, it would then, as now, have been corrected by a revelation of character, and of power to fulfil a predicted purpose.

The direction to follow a certain course of action, the fulfilment of promised blessing, or of foretold punishment upon obedience or disobedience, were at the same time a revelation of character and of power, that is, of being. Thus it was that from the time of Abraham to the captivities there was a constant manifestation through a people, of God's rule, and that people was being gradually fitted to receive the lessons of the revelation in order that by their obedience the knowledge should spread. There were always those among them to whom the historic facts connected with the national existence were manifestations of God: and in no way could the finite be enabled to understand and trust the infinite, in no way could human reason have been more satisfied than through a revelation thus conveyed. The moral evidence, such as men were then capable of estimating, went hand in hand with the sensible experience of rule: right and wrong, law and obedience, blessing and punishment, gave evidence by the manifestation of character, of the existence of the Moral Ruler. With all reverence it may be said that God could not have revealed Himself to man in any other way. Even anthropomorphic appearances, or constant angelic visitation, or the bringing up of dead men from their unseen abode, would not have had the effect desired and produced by the method of revelation employed. It is generally assumed that the revelation through a person has superseded that through a nation, and that the providential preservation of Judah up to the time of Christ's ministry, was the last use that God would make of a nation as the instrument of revelation during this age. But there is no intimation of this in the Bible, and on the contrary there is distinct teaching that it was not God's purpose to change His method. "Ye are My witnesses saith the Lord, and My servant whom I have chosen, that Ye may know and believe Me and understand that I am He. . . . ye are My witnesses saith the Lord that I am God."

The more the history of God's witness, Israel, is known, and the more it is studied, not alone in the past, but as it speaks to-day, the more will man be able to understand God in the way of self-revelation chosen by Him. Nay, further, the more the nation as a living entity is known, and the more the Lord Jesus is manifested in Christ-like men and women, the more clearly will God be revealed by the perpetual teaching which is the method of His selection, and which is superior to the written record, insomuch as that without it the book would only testify to a dead and vanished past.

The hand of God in history and in the life of a nation, can only be known when a foretold plan has been worked out. The accomplishment in our own day of a destiny that was appointed when Israel was first formed, is evidence of the will and providence and rule, i.e., of the being of Him who thus reveals Himself. This is evidence which scepticism has to submit to, and which strengthens the faith of the believer.

It is a surprise to many to be told that this evidence is as potent to-day as ever it was; that the witness of God to Himself through a nation has never been set aside, that it is inseparably connected with the witness through a person, that the one does not supersede the other, that the redeemed nation of Israel and the Redeemer, the servant of the Lord and the servants unite in manifesting the truth of God.

"And I will strengthen the House of Judah, and I will save the House of Joseph, and I will bring them again to place them: for I have mercy upon them . . . and they of Ephraim shall be like a mighty man, and their heart shall rejoice . . . and the Lord shall be king over all the earth." This is but one brief quotation taken from among many statements of God's purposes to continue to manifest Himself through a nation in order that all the peoples of the world may thus learn of Him. For this purpose the preservation of Ephraim as well as of Judah, is necessary, and the fulfilment to Ephraim of his especially predicted future, as, for instance, that of being a nation and company of nations: the fulness of the Gentiles, a people recovenanted in Christ, multitudinous, wealthy, powerful, separate or "isolated" from the nations, and free, and possessing the gate of his enemies, or in modern language the strategic points by possession of which their power can be controlled, is an indispensable part of the evidence; as well as the historic identity between the nation so blessed with the captives of the Assyrian invasion who were brought to the Caspian Sea B.C. 721.

When it is shewn by incontrovertible evidence that this revelation of God through the fulfilment of His declared purpose is not a thing of the past, or to be read of in a book only, but that it is to be read by those who run in our own day, then we may expect a rapid development of blessing to the world, and of comfort to those who are athirst for God.

But it is supposed that the Church militant here on earth, as disassociated from a nation, is the alone witness to the being of God. The Church is an election from all the nations and peoples, and cannot have been the power spoken of by the Lord Jesus when He said, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you (Jews) and given to a nation." This nation was to be Christian, for it would "bring forth the fruits" of the kingdom; it was through this Christian nation that the witness was to be borne, and this nation is none other than Israel, for it is Israel that is to "blossom and bud and to fill the world with fruit."

The predicted purpose as to Israel fills the inspired record. Her outcasting, her preservation although scattered, her westward march, her reception of mercy when in her "wilderness" state, her obtaining a place of her own, free from invasion, her recovenanting in Christ, her consequent national prosperity, resulting in increase, wealth, power, &c., constituting her "the chief of the nations;" her return to Palestine (Judah walking first to her and then returning with her), her empire power as a nation and company of nations, her inheritance of the heathen and possession of the uttermost parts of the earth, the peace that she is to impress upon the nations when the law goes forth from Mount Zion. All this is God's declared purpose, and in the fulfilment of it He manifests Himself. It is the same method of revelation which He who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, has always employed; the teaching, which is in itself blessing, given through the multitudinous seed and the One Seed, through a nation and a person, through the seed of Isaac and the Messiah. The revelation cannot be made by the nation if not Christian, or by the Church as distinct from Israel; but when united every declared purpose is fulfilled and the witness to Him who purposed and accomplished is irrefutable.

It is in the historic fact of the identity between Israel, of whom the purposes were declared, and Britain, in whom the predictions have been fulfilled, that the witness to God is borne. When this identity is unknown the witness is hidden, when the knowledge is ignorantly spurned the witness is rejected, and the rejection incurs a serious responsibility, because the evidence is not humanly devised but God-chosen.

The continued life of the nation of Israel is closely connected with the good news brought by the Son of God, and to the knowledge of the life beyond. The revelation through a person did not supersede that through the nation, but it was its complement, the national life being made possible by the recovenanting through the work of Him who "visited and redeemed His people," and her continued life being the type of the life beyond: for, for her, as for the forefathers, it is true that "God is not the God of the dead but of the living."

Let Britain possess the land of promise and be recognised as the rightful owner thereof, i.e., Israel, then the witness to the purpose and fulfilment, to the providential rule and care, to the mercy and faithfulness and justice of God will be recognised by all. The revelation through the nation will speak to the peoples of the earth, the effect of the national redemption wrought by the Lord Jesus will be apparent to all, and then by the power of the united witness of the nation and the Person, "The Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord and His name one."

The practical personal teaching given by the knowledge that the method of revelation is unchanged ought to be apparent. The manifestation of God in Christ is not made known to us through the written record alone, but through the living witness of Christ-like men and women. The Church is a living body because composed of living units. She is the witness to, and the keeper of Holy Writ, but if she was not alive the record would be ineffective. The revelation through a Person is perpetrated by personal witness borne collectively or individually, and the responsibility that rests upon each unit, is known by each, and can only be efficiently performed by each, when the fact is grasped, that we, the members of Christ's body, are they through whom He reveals Himself to others.

So also with respect to the nation. The national awakening to responsibility is to be produced by the knowledge of its true position. As in many other instances, it is the teaching of duty that is blessed to produce obedience, and not the desire to obey that creates the duty. We are nationally a sinful people, a very small per centage of our population are consciously witnessing for God. But let us awake to our origin, to the fact that to-day, as of old, we are the nation through whom God reveals Himself to the world, and then by the power of the Holy Spirit, that wondrous change will be wrought, when it will not be necessary to say "Know the Lord," "for all shall know Him from the least to the greatest." This will be the ultimate result of the unaltered purpose displayed in God's method of self-revelation.

There are some who think that as the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ and the Christian faith have been perpetuated through eighteen centuries without Israel's national witness being known, that the historical facts concerning the nation are useless now; and some would add that they are opposed to the Catholic Church. Others would imply that the revelation of the Lord Jesus, and of the Father in and through the Son, needs no aid either of Church or of nation. To such I would repeat that the method of revelation is not what we would have evolved, but what the Revealer selected: that there are millions to whom the Church has not witnessed, and yet these are to know God during the coming age; that I have not been writing about the evidence which believing people receive when the blessed Spirit teaches them to see the grace and truth that are in Jesus. I have been surveying the world. Look upon a missionary map. So much coloured black, a smaller portion grey, and a yet smaller red (much of that not pure), and allow me to suggest this: that the witness to the Lord Jesus as the Redeemer of the nation, and of the redeemed nation to her Messiah, will be God's way of reviving the purity of the faith, of reforming spurious Christianity, of convincing the monotheistic peoples, and of bringing the light of truth to the dark places of the earth.

Does Israel exist as a Christian people? If she does, is it not presumptuous to think that God's method of revelation is unnecessary? Can it be that the Messiah is to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, but not to be the glory of His people Israel! I maintain that it is because He is the glory of Israel that He will be a light to the Gentiles.

AN ESTIMATE OF ISRAEL'S POSSESSIONS IN AFRICA AND THEIR VALUE.

On Feb. 15th, the Times presented to its readers a very excellent article on "The Commercial Value of Africa," comparing our own with the possessions and acquisitions of the other European nations who have recently divided it among themselves. The struggle among the Powers for a share in African Colonies such as they are, has only arisen during the last twelve years. Then it was that Germany resolved to acquire a large proportion of the vast continent; and the rush for the land took place then. The Times correspondent deals first with Central Africa, and estimates the value of each nation's "takings" by the worth of its commercial dealings. The region in question contains seven million square miles, lying between the tropics, between 18° North and 18° South latitude, extending from the Zambesi to the South, to the bend of the Niger to the North. This region is double the size of Europe, or of Canada, or of Australia! In this immense territory the British own two million square miles out of the seven million square miles, and the trade which falls to them is about nine and a half million pounds sterling for exports and imports together. This, of course, is only "the day of small things" in Central Africa as far as we are concerned, since this trade is much less than that of Ceylon, and about five million less than the value of exports only from Cape Colony.

Taking French possessions next, we find she owns one million square miles in Central Africa, the value of exports and imports being two and a half million sterling. The French thus possess a trade here which is only a little over a quarter that of the British. It is a remarkable fact that "the bulk of the trade of British Africa is with the mother country, but only one half of the trade of French tropical Africa is with foreign countries."

As to German Africa, she owns 900,000 square miles, of which only 550,000 square miles lie to the north of the Zambesi within the tropics. Her trade there is worth one and a half million sterling, but it is carried on chiefly with other countries than Germany. The trade, however, is very satisfactory for the Germans.

Portugal, the oldest of the African Colonial Powers, has possessions almost entirely within the tropics. She owns 750,000 square miles in Africa. Her trade is worth two and a quarter millions sterling. The Congo Free State possesses about one million square miles. The exports are about £300,000, and the total imports £400,000.

The whole in a condensed form, appears thus, according to the Times:—

Territories.	Total Exports.	Total Imports.	Grand Total.
British Sphere	£4,720,000	£4,715,000	£9,435,000
French ditto	1,050,000	1,400,000	2,450,000
German ditto	710,000	780,000	1,490,000
Portuguese ditto	1,061,000	1,222,000	2,283,000
Italian ditto	—	—	500,000
Congo Free State	300,000	400,000	700,000
Liberia	—	—	500,000
	£7,841,000	£8,517,000	£17,358,000

The matter is summed up thus in the Times:—

"The conclusion to be drawn from what has gone before, though we have by no means stated all the elements of the problem, is that it would be wrong to take the present contemptible value of the trade of Central Africa as a test of its capabilities. If, indeed, we measure it by the white population which has been engaged in superintending or in encouraging its production, it is by no means so contemptible as at first sight it seems to be. The exports, taken at about eight and a half million sterling, amount to about £1,400 per head of each of the six thousand whom we estimate to compose the more or less temporary white population of Central Africa, or double that amount if we take the total trade into consideration. In the case of Brazil the amount per head of the exports divided among the white population is only about £5. Of course, if the white population increased to ten times or a hundred times its present number we could hardly expect the trade to increase in the same ratio. Nor is it fair to exclude altogether from our estimate the Indians, the Arabs, the half-breeds, and the considerable number of natives who have a share in the production and conduct of the trade of Africa. Still, these figures and the considerations which we have advanced may afford some rough idea of what is the present value of Central Africa, and what might be made of it in the future. That it is not the hopeless continent that not very many years ago it was supposed to be is becoming every day more and more evident, and it is quite clear that when the world has reached a stage at which there will be an increased demand for such products as Africa can supply, that continent will be found quite capable of yielding them. In the meantime, it is for England and for the other Powers who have hastily snatched enormous portions of this long-neglected continent to consider what had best be done with them. It is possible that considerable readjustments might be for the profit and convenience and peace of all concerned. Some portions it would be folly for England to part with, while other portions might be best used as counters for advantages to be obtained elsewhere. These and other matters are for the consideration of the statesmen who have the true welfare of the British Empire at heart."

"The fact is that up to within the past few years Africa has hardly been needed by the rest of the world except as a slave market. But her turn has come, and the need for her co-operation in the general economy of the world will become greater and greater as population increases, as industry expands, as commerce develops, as States grow ambitious, as civilization spreads. It is a discreditable anomaly that at this advanced stage in the progress of the race nearly a whole continent should still be given over to savagery. We may be sure that, as the necessity for the utilization of Africa increases, ways and means will be found for the European to take a greater and greater share in its development. We now take only what is most easily reached; hence the wrangling among the Powers for certain delimitations, which, in the future, when routes to all parts of the interior are opened up, will have little importance. When the time is ripe, moreover, means will be found to solve the difficulty as to harbours, and to overcome some of the other drawbacks which have doubtless contributed to keep the ancient continent so long in the background. These considerations might be taken into account by shrewd statesmen in estimating the real value of any rearrangements of existing spheres, or in negotiating with respect to the few patches that still remain unattached. There are other considerations, of course, besides the commercial to be kept in view by the statesman in his negotiation concerning our position in Africa, but the discussion of these would be foreign to the purpose of this article."

It appears thus on the whole that British success is marked in regard to African possessions and their value as compared with those of the other Powers. In the South we have a trade amounting to thirty-five million pounds exports and imports, and ten million of these exports are the value of gold and diamonds dug up out of the earth. Eight millions of that sum come from the Transvaal, and so give evidence of the great value of that territory, which already is under the flag of the Empire of Britain, however strenuously President Kruger may object to the arrangement. Our African possessions are very valuable, but they are as nothing in this respect in comparison with what no doubt they will become when Africa is covered with a network of railways and telegraphs. The Gospel also has to evangelise the vast native populations of these savage regions, and bring them within the influence of Christianity and religion. It is a comfort to know that being Israel, God has given the ministry of the Word to our race, and is gradually filling the temperate regions of South and Central Africa with a population which, if gold be found extensively, will settle there to found new British Empires. To the Lord, the giver of all our blessings, be all the praise!

GOD'S PROMISES TO ABRAHAM: TO WHAT EXTENT HAVE THEY BEEN FULFILLED?

By J. Bradley.

PART III.

And then, as regards the dominion of Israel over what might be considered that extent of country which Jehovah had promised to them for a possession, how very evanescent was it. Having, in the person of their sovereign, attained to great dominion, and to a state of great glory and prosperity as a nation, and having in it enjoyed a kind of anticipation of what, as a nation, they will ultimately become, it almost immediately began to depart from them. (2 Kings x. 31, 32): "But Jehu took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel with all his heart: for he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin. In those days the Lord began to cut Israel short: and Hazel smote them in all the coasts of Israel." Even in the time of Solomon, Edom and Syria began to dispute his power; in the following reign, Shishak, the Egyptian conqueror, took and sacked Jerusalem; after two generations, we find a king of Syria, at the head of two and thirty vassal princes, making war upon Samaria; Moab soon rebels, and is followed by Edom and Libnah; and at length, after some alternations of success and defeat, the Ten Tribes of Israel are swept off the land by the overwhelming torrents of Assyria. For proof of this turn to 1 Kings xi. 14, 23, 25: "And the Lord stirred up an adversary unto Solomon, Hadad the Edomite: he was of the king's seed in Edom. And God stirred him up another adversary, Rezin the son of Eliadah, which fled from his lord Hadadezer, king of Zobah. And he was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon, besides the mischief that Hadad did: and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria. 26, 30, 31, 32, of the same chapter: "And Jeroboam the son of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, Soloman's servant (whose mother's name was Zeruah, a widow woman), even he lifted up his hand against the king. And Ahijah caught the new garment that was on him, and rent it in twelve pieces: and he said to Jeroboam, Take thee ten pieces: for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give Ten Tribes to thee: (but he shall have one tribe for My servant David's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake, the city which I have chosen out of all the tribes of Israel)." (1 Kings xiv. 15, 16): "For the Lord shall smite Israel as a reed is shaken in the water, and he shall root up Israel out of this good land which He gave to their fathers, and shall scatter them beyond the river, because they have made their groves, provoking the Lord to anger. And He shall give Israel up, because of the sins of Jeroboam, who did sin, and who made Israel to sin." (1 Kings xx. 1): "And Benhadad, the king of Syria, gathered all his hosts together: and there were thirty and two kings with him, and horses, and chariots: and he went up and besieged Samaria, and warred against it." (2 Kings i. 1): "Then Moab rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab." (Chap. xv. 29): "In the days of Pekah king of Israel, came Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachah, and Janoah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria." (Chap. xvii. 3, 6, 18, 23, 24): "Against Hoshea came up Shalmaneser, king of Assyria; and Hoshea became his servant, and gave him presents. In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes. Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of His sight: there was none left but the tribe of Judah only. Until the Lord removed Israel out of His sight, as He had said by all His servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day. And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthath, and from Ava, and from Amath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria, instead of the children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof." (1 Chron. v. 26): "And the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul king of Assyria, and the spirit of Tilgath-pilneser, king of Assyria, and he carried them away (even the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh) and brought them unto Halah, and Haber, and Hara, and to the river Gozan, unto this day."

More passages of God's Word could be quoted to prove that Israel was carried captive and completely uprooted. This captivity was signal and decisive; so much so that since it occurred the world in general has never heard anything of these captive tribes; to this the Jews in their catechism attest, as they believe that the Ten Tribes carried into captivity by the kings of Assyria, and not since known or heard of, shall again be discovered, and joined to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. This was to be as we have read, spoken of by His servants the prophets. They also tell us that a plucking up, and a planting was to take place, and that in a place appointed for them." (1 Chron. xvii. 9): "Also I will ordain a place for My people Israel, and will plant them, and they shall dwell in their place, and shall be moved no more: neither shall the children of wickedness waste them any more, as at the beginning." (2 Sam. vii. 10): "Moreover, I will appoint a place for My people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, as beforetime."

A similar fate overtakes the House of Judah, but with a very different result, for they returned after a captivity of seventy years. We will refer to a few prominent portions of God's Word, to show the difference between the two captivities. (1 Kings xiv. 22—25): "And Judah did evil in the sight of the Lord, and they provoked Him to jealousy with their sins which they had committed, above all that their fathers had done: for they also built them high places, and images, and groves, on every high hill, and under every green tree. And there were also Sodomites in the land; and they did according to all the abominations of the nations which the Lord cast out before the children of Israel. And it came to pass, in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, that Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem." (2 Kings viii. 22): "Yet Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah unto this day. Then Libnah revolted at the same time." (2 Kings xv. 37): "In those days the Lord began to send against Judah, Rezin, the king of Syria, and Pekah, the son of Remaliah." (Chap. xvi. 6, 7): "At that time, Rezin, king of Syria, recovered Elath to Syria, and drave the Jews from Elath; and the Syrians came to Elath, and dwelt there unto this day. So Ahaz sent messengers to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, saying, I am thy servant, and thy son; come up, and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria, and out of the hand of the king of Israel, which rise up against me." (2 Kings xvii. 19): "Also Judah kept not the commandments of the Lord their God, but walked in the statutes of Israel, which they made." (2 Kings xxi. 13): "And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab: and I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down." (2 Kings xxiv. 1, 2, 14): "In his days Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, came up, and Jehoiakim became his servant three years: then he turned and rebelled against him. And the Lord sent against him bands of the Chaldees, and bands of the Syrians, and bands of the Moabites, and bands of the children of Ammon, and sent them against Judah to destroy it, according to the word of the Lord, which He spake by His servants the prophets. And he carried away all Jerusalem, and all the princes, and all the mighty men of valour, even ten thousand captives, and all the craftsmen and smiths: none remained, save the poorest sort of the people of the land." (2 Kings xxv. 1, 5, 6, 7): "And it came to pass, in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, came, he, and all his host, against Jerusalem, and pitched against it; and they built forts against it round about. And the army of the Chaldees pursued after the king, and overtook him in the plains of Jericho: and all his army was scattered from him. So they took the king, and brought him up to the king of Bábylon to Riblah; and they gave judgment upon him. And they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, and put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon." (2 Chron. xxxvi. 20—23): "And them that escaped from the sword carried he away to Babylon, where they were servants to him and his sons, until the reign of the kingdom of Persia: to fulfil the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years. Now, in the first year of Cyrus, king of Persia, that the word of the Lord spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah might be accomplished, the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus, king of Persia, All the kingdoms of the earth hath the Lord God of heaven given me; and He hath charged me to build Him an house in Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Who is there among you of all His people? The Lord his God be with him, and let him go up." It is needless to pursue the history; everyone knows how little the State of the House of Judah (the Jews), after their restoration from Babylon, agreed with the grandeur of the patriarchal covenant: scarcely could they maintain even the form of an independent State, during the short interval between the dissolution of the Persian empire and the establishment of the Roman; and since her desolating standards defiled the holy place, we look for the House of Israel and the House of Judah (the Jews) in every part of the world, rather than in the land of their fathers.

Plenty of proof can be obtained from God's Word that only the House of Judah returned (and that after their seventy years captivity in Babylon) and dwelt in the promised land till their final dispersion by the Romans. Turn to Ezra i. 1, 2, 5: "Now in the first year of Cyrus, king of Persia, that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also into writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus, king of Persia, The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and He hath charged me to build Him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests, and the Levites, with all them whose spirit God had raised, to go up to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem." (Chap. ii. 1): "Now these are the children of the province that went up out of the captivity, of those which had been carried away, whom Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, had carried away unto Babylon, and came again unto Jerusalem and Judah, every one unto his city." We are then given the whole list of men and numbers of their children, amounting to forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore, besides their servants and their maids, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and there were among them two hundred singing men and singing women. We find the above statements confirmed by Josephus in his "Book of Antiquities," book ii., par. 2 and 3.

Such then is the extent to which the promise of Canaan, for an everlasting possession to Abraham and his seed, has been accomplished. To Abraham himself it was not fulfilled at all; neither was it fulfilled to Isaac and Jacob, his immediate descendants; nor to the twelve patriarchs who descended from them; neither was it in any way fulfilled to the seed of Abraham until the time of Joshua, when under his command they obtained a partial possession of the land, which in the very heart of their enemies, and subject to their repeated molestations and incursions, they continued to occupy until the time of David, who subdued their enemies and greatly enlarged the extent of their dominion. So that in the days of Solomon, it is possible that what might be fairly considered the dominion of Israel, extended to the limits of the land which God had promised; but that that dominion was not possession, is obvious from the fact that the boundaries of their tribes remained the same as when first settled and defined by Joshua. And had it even been possessson, it could not in the lowest and most circumscribed sense of the word be termed everlasting, since it ended with the death of Solomon, and continued to decline until first the ten, and then the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, were taken captive from the land; since which it is not professed that the people of Israel, in a way even of dominion, have possessed it to the extent which God had promised; and seeing that at this very day both houses are outcasts from it, the House of Israel for over 2,500 years, and the House of Judah (the Jews) for over 1,895, it surely cannot be said that any possession of it which they then enjoyed was everlasting.

SIDE LIGHTS.

By L. P.

In "Graven in the Rock," by the Rev. Samuel Kinns, it is said:—"The Egyptians of all the dynasties were particularly fond of gold chains, and we find this Pharaoh (Apepi) bestowing one upon Joseph as a badge of his high office. Is it not singular how this very ancient custom has come down to us, and still is indicative of an official position, from the Lord Chancellor down to the provincial Mayor?"

Again, in the same work it is stated, "It was a very ancient custom to present robes as a mark of honour (see Luke xv.); and Herodotus mentions that Otanes, a Persian prince himself, and all his posterity, were annually presented with a Median habit."

"We sometimes smile at this custom, and yet we have some remains of it still lingering amongst us, for when men are invested with the orders of the Garter, the Bath, etc., etc., the long, outer robe or cloak is put on by one or more of the Knights, and the chain is hung round the neck by the Queen or her representative. . . . When he (the Prince of Wales) was installed as Knight of St. Patrick, in Dublin Cathedral, . . . the Duke of Cambridge and another Knight put upon the Prince the beautiful light blue mantle, and then the Lord Lieutenant placed upon his neck the golden collar, whilst England's Prince bent on one knee to receive the honour."

I think "C. M." stated some years ago, with reference to the English language resembling German as to words, that that may prove contact, but not affinity, and that the construction of the language was in reality the important point. He instanced some cases where the formation of a German sentence differed greatly from what it would be in English.

In reading Mr. Kinns' quotations from translations made by those who have been almost miraculously enabled to decipher the sculptured writings of Nineveh and Babylon, it appeared to me as if the sentences were better adapted to translation into German than into English. It may be so with other European languages. I do not know, but if my view is a correct one it seems worth noting in connection with the old suggestion that the Germans are descendants of the Assyrians.

The following are selected from Mr. Kinns' second vol., n an account given by Nebuchadnezzar of building ramparts.

Its moat I dug, and the back of it with bitumen and brick I bound together, and a mighty rampart on the marge of mountain high I built."

Of his palace he says, "Stout cedars for the roofing of it I laid on. Doors of cedar (with) a plating of copper sills and hinges of bronze work in its gates I set up." . . . "That house for gazings I caused to be made, and for the beholding of the multitude of the people, with carven work I had filled." . . .

"My posterity within it for evermore over the black-haired race (i.e., the Accadians) may they rule!"

The annexed sentences are, I believe, literal translations of two German sentences, "Sign it should I have it done." "Soon will she herself here be."

From his writings I surmise that Mr. Kinns has no knowledge of, or no interest in, the question of our Identity.

WHAT ITALY THINKS AND FEELS.

THE following appeared in the London Daily News of January 24 last, and is an interesting but rather a sad reflection on the part of the Italian writer, who admires "England" greatly. The Italian writer said:—

"In a leader on 'England and Italy,' the Corriere di Napoli' the other day said, among other things: 'Given, but not conceded, that England is passing through a momentary storm, there cannot be a shadow of doubt that she will overcome all obstacles, and that hers will be the final victory. And this for two reasons. First, because at the bottom she has right on her side; and, secondly, because she possesses strength and will, energy and patience, to obtain full recognition of her rights from be it who it may. We Italians, imaginative and nervous, believe that the world will fall if any question concerning us is not settled within fifteen days. The English—calmer, more tenacious, and less impressionable—are not the least discomposed when time is needed to arrive at certain ends. And with time one gains everything. . . . The friendship of free, civilized, and flourishing England is a real good fortune for Italy. We ought to have no difficulty in acknowledging this, for an equal friendship for England on our part is not only our interest, but a debt of honour and a true comfort. Let us hope that the political follies of the last days will not be able to undo the work of Robilant, and place us in a bad position with England, as we are already with almost all others.'"

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—I have just received my BANNER for this month, containing extract from Presbyterian Banner of Pittsburgh, Pa., by myself, on "Israel and Judah," and as in this article no mention was made as to where Israel to-day is, I write you this explanation, which will set this apparent omission aright. I sent three articles to the Presbyterian Banner, 1st, "Judah and Israel" (which was published); 2nd, "Where is Israel?" (which also was published); 3rd. "Signs of the Times" (which also was published). In the two last articles Israel and the Anglo-Saxon were demonstrated as synonymous, i.e., slightly more than a hint that the Anglo-Saxon is Israel. I first wrote sparingly, knowing full well, as results have demonstrated, that were I to come boldly out asserting facts each of which could hardly be Cavinistic, that the matter would be returned "with thanks," possibly without. I was indeed, surprised at the publication of "Signs of the Times," in which I emphatically stated that the Anglo-Saxon to-day, performing the mission of Israel, etc., was none other than Israel. I then again sent two more articles to the Banner, "Israel at the Time of Christ and To-day;" "Why Spiritual Israel?" but neither of these have been published, as I believe in each was clearly demonstrated "spiritualizing" an absurdity, etc., and to such an extent that I fear the editor himself, not being able to logically, or scripturally refute, hesitated through fear of too voluminous an influx of possible replies, which was my object—discussion. However, the work goes on, we have a few converts in this city, and the writer is scattering all the copies of the BANNER forwarded to him, through your kindness, together with suggestions to subscribe, the results of which effort you will doubtless before long hear.

I sent you by mail a day or two ago, copy of Des Moines Daily News, containing a short synopsis of an address, delivered to the 200 pupils of history, in the High School of this city; and I am pleased to say much interest has been aroused, not only upon the subject of Identity alone, but, better far, to a searching out of God's Word by young people, in whom seeds planted certainly will bear fruit. One of the teachers of the school, is to-day a strong believer, a convert of but a few weeks, and through whose invitation I was enabled to address the school. She being one of an audience who listened to an hour and a quarter's address upon Identity, some few weeks ago delivered by myself, to the United Presbyterian Church, and with others received the word with gladness, as throwing "new" light upon the Word of God. Hoping and praying,

I am, my dear sir, very sincerely yours,
GEO. E. INGLIS.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL.—Will you kindly, through the medium of the BANNER, convey the warmest thanks of myself and several other true Israelites of this far-off land, to Miss E. M. Rush, the Hon. Sec. of the Anglo-Israel Distribution Society for the nice selection of Anglo-Israel literature she so kindly sent to me lately.

The gift is very much appreciated among us here, not only for the choice articles set forth, but also it goes to show that there is a bond of union which binds children of the same faith together, no matter how widely they may be separated on this earth. We are children of the same parent stem and all are animated by the same glorious hope. To Jehovah be all the praise. Yours faithfully, JAMES STEWART.

"THE FORTUITOUS MASTERS OF A GOOD PART OF THE GLOBE."

IT is a curious fact, which everyone who has studied the question must have noticed—namely, that our vast possessions throughout the earth have dropped into our hands almost accidentally, in haphazard fashion, and without the least foresight or premeditation on our part in respect to our future world-wide dominion. As Professor Seeley finely remarked, we seem to have annexed a great part of the earth in a fit of abstraction. This is, as we have elsewhere shown, particularly the case in respect to the acquisition of the Gates; and as to the object each had to serve, as experience and subsequent history have amply proved. Thus, Gibraltar was captured in A.D. 1704, long before the value of the Overland Route to India, or indeed the British Empire in that Peninsula was thought of. So Malta was taken in A.D. 1800, without reference to its coming importance as the chief ocean fortress in the Mediterranean, dominating the trade route to India, and giving the British vast naval and political power in the direction of the Levant. The Gates that gave us India (Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta) were occupied in A.D. 1639, 1662, and 1700 respectively, without any thought at the time that they would separately be influential in enabling us to take possession at last of the whole of that vast country, and rear upon it an Empire unparalleled in the history of the world. So it has been everywhere: Cape Town, Natal, Mombassa, and the Western Gates of Africa; Hong-Kong, the Straits Settlements, and the early Australasian ports were taken one by one, without any apparent plan, and quite apart from the intention to build upon them a future Colonial Empire founded on the dominion of the seas. Our attention has again been drawn to this subject by a sub-leader in the Standard, wherein the writer, connecting the victory at Trafalgar with the rise of British supremacy at sea, says that, on that occasion, "Defence, not aggression, was the motive power that ended in making England sovereign of the seas." He adds—

Nothing is more striking than the utter want of intention, the absolute absence of consciousness, with which the foundations of the British Empire were laid. Far from deliberately setting to work to annex seas, to establish colonies, to hold vast territories in Asia, Africa, and America, our forerunners found themselves fortuitously masters of a good portion of the globe. Not a little of this happy accident must be traced to the stimulus given to their energies by the cosmopolitan ambition of their nearest neighbours. In the competition for Ocean Empire thus forced on us, it was to us that victory fell. But from the day of Trafalgar to the present hour, it has been the expansive vitality of the English race, not the daring projects of State-craft, nor the inordinate covetousness of a conqueror, that has steadily enlarged the limits of our sway. With its extension, and with the commensurate growth of our commerce, the necessity for the maintenance of an all-powerful and efficient navy has been forced upon the public mind. The moment Englishmen reached that conviction they cheerfully voted any sum their Rulers asked them for, in order to equip and man a predominant Navy. It only remains for us, as a nation, so to maintain our power at sea that all attempts to destroy it shall be mere waste of money and endeavour. We owe that to Nelson. We owe it to ourselves.

The expansive vitality of the English or British race is, however, under God, the true secret of our position in the world. It is a quality of our race, being Israel, which God has implanted in us, exclusively among the nations, that we might carry out His purposes by "spreading abroad to the West, and to the East, and to the North, and to the South" (Gen. xxviii. 14). It is inherent in us, too, as anyone can see. We founded our Canadian and Australasian Colonies, and to-day these have started into life as nations on their own account, almost as independent and self-governing as their old mother in the West. But have the energies of the parent stock dried up and withered, and refused to undertake fresh adventures of the like kind in the direction of empire manufacture? On the contrary, "we are still adding new colonies" to the old "with a levity which strikes some of the older countries with amazement." The Sussex Daily News, of Nov. 13, in an able little article on the topic of "England's Expansion," notices Germany's "push" in Africa for empire. But she found out soon that we were beating her. France tried "the Far East for glory with new markets." We answered her by annexing Upper Burmah and Malaya. The Dutch tried hard for a Boer Empire, but we went round their possessions, and surrounded the Transvaal by British annexations of enormous territorial extent, right up to and beyond the Zambesi. In doing so, we find the whole of our new possessions paved with gold, so to speak—with diamonds, asbestos, coal, and precious stones thrown in! The old features of our race remain. We insist on exploring and occupying new regions, and we find they "pay." Our new "native" subjects ask us to stay, and if they fight us, as did the Matabele, with Lo-Bengula at their head, they accept defeat with composure, and become loyal subjects of the British Crown at last! At Chitral the same features re-appear. We go where no one in their senses would venture to go. We conquer men who refused to submit before; and now the latter ask us to stop, and show they are sincere by doing us all good and faithful service even as we withdraw. "The Canadians, the Australasians, the men of South Africa are full of life, grit, and the power of governing." Even the missionaries who die at their post rather than flee from the impending danger, "are," says the Sussex Daily News, "warriors under the garb of peace." The writer in question draws this moral from the facts: As the rate of national expansion is so enormous, we must federate the whole Empire if we mean it to survive. In politics and commerce the Empire is already one. We must also unite "in military and naval organisation." The article concludes thus respecting "Federation":—

There is no other element of safety. Otherwise, how is Great Britain to defend India, hold Burmah, protect Canada, retain the Australian Colonies, and preserve the Cape? Our responsibility grows out of all proportion to our organised fighting power. Here we are, holding Egypt at the present moment, and full of the humour to tackle China and Turkey with a fleet. Is the cost of Empire all to be borne by the taxpayers at home? As regards India, we say no. But the Colonies have only just begun to awake to a sense of their high privileges and great responsibility. We cannot expect them to be in a tremendous hurry to tax themselves until they are in the close grip of a great idea. That idea is Federation. All British people must admit their duty and glory in their right to keep the old country in its place as the champion of justice, liberty, and peace. When this is done we shall have solved one of the great problems of the age, for we shall have an Empire without subordinate kings, an Empire full of free Parliaments, and an Empire that exists for the benefit of the human race.

We see then a people, British by name, who, blindly led, have been placed by God Himself, during a long course of years, in certain positions on the globe which have enabled them to acquire the birthright blessings of Israel, and become thus the owners of the Gates, the possessors of three Empires—namely, those of the Colonies, of the Ocean, and of the Heathen World. This nation He has endowed, and that exclusively, with a certain "expansive vitality," which enables them to fulfil the prophecies of Gen. xxviii. already quoted, and to persist in adding to their dominions till men rear that the whole earth will at last be brought under their influence (Dan. vii. 27). Their wealth, and "the power to get it," is a marked feature in their case, and this is found to be also an Israelite blessing (Deut. viii. 18; xv. 6). In short, "the masters of a good part of the globe, fortuitously obtained," can only be God's people Israel; and for that fact we British, as that nation, are bound to praise the Lord.

AS OTHERS SEE US.

ANY of us who are concerned to know in what light we are regarded by other nations have lately had ample means of satisfying their curiosity. They have not had to go in search of information. It has been brought home to them, put in the plainest terms, and rung out till their ears have been dinned with it. If we are to accept the testimony thus thrust upon us, we shall henceforth have to look upon ourselves as about the worst set of people on the face of the globe, hardly deserving of a place within the bounds of Christendom. We learn to our surprise that our foreign policy is one of unmitigated selfishness. We are said to be covetous, grasping, rapacious, fixing our greedy eyes upon every spot of land in either hemisphere that is either without an owner, or with an owner too weak to resist our power, and never resting till we have annexed it to our already overgrown empire. It is said that we have done all this with a sagacity which would be creditable if it were more honestly employed. We have taken up the best positions for the command of sea routes and for the security of our trade. You can hardly steam in any direction, they tell us, without coming upon some British fortress which guards some ocean highway as the robber-knights of the Middle Ages used to guard the Rhine. Without declining to avail ourselves of opportunities of aggrandisement in any quarter where we could extend our sway over easily conquered races, we have preferred as permanent settlements for our people the fertile regions of temperate climes. Nor have we measured our claims by the extent of land which they are able to occupy. We insist upon leaving them large elbow-room, and if strangers under another flag venture to visit our half-occupied territories in quest of some spot which they can colonize, we simply order them away. "We too," say some of our rivals, "would like to possess lands in distant parts of the globe. We, too, have a flag which we should like to see waving from point to point over some greater 'Fatherland.' But we search the globe in vain. It is all appropriated. The earth is divided, and we are left out—thanks, not wholly but mainly, to these grasping islanders, who have sown and gathered their wide territorial harvests before we awoke to a sense of our larger destinies."

It is well to listen to the remonstrant voices. It is well to find out what the rest of the world thinks of us. Acting always in the innocency of our hearts, unconscious of any guile, and persuaded of our perfect rectitude, we may not quite know ourselves. Possibly, perhaps probably, the accusations levelled at us may not be quite just; but yet it may be worth while to pay some attention to the testimony of outside observers, even though they may not be absolutely impartial. It may be useful to put ourselves as far as we can in their place, and try to see with their eyes. Even if the result of our efforts should not be to convince us of the truth of their conclusions, it may at any rate help to soften our resentment at charges which we may have good reason to consider unfounded. Expeditions under distinguished guidance, well provided with learned lecturers, leave our shores almost every month. Let us join one of the bands of tourists and note down what we see. We naturally steer for the Mediterranean, as affording an agreeable change at this season of the year. On entering the Straits we see the British flag floating over the rock of Gibraltar, an impregnable fortress belonging by right of geography to Spain, but ours now for nearly a couple of centuries. Halfway through this inland sea we come upon Malta, which we annexed at the beginning of the century, and yonder, in its north-eastern corner, lies Cyprus, which we took charge of only yesterday. Touching at Alexandria, we are on the verge of Egypt, the land of the Nile and the Pyramids. At present it is virtually under British rule, and in the keeping of a British army of occupation. Taking the canal, one half of it British property, and steaming down the Red Sea, we find Aden and Perim standing as British sentinels over its outlet to the Sea of Arabia. Muscat, on the far Arabian coast, is virtually under our protection. Soon face to face with us is the vast peninsula of India, with its teeming population. Next to it lies Burmah, which is also ours. We are at home in the Straits of Malacca. We have on our left a fringe of settlements under British rule. Not very far off Rajah Brooke hoists the British flag on the great island of Borneo. Passing through Torres Strait, we have on one side New Guinea, which is partly ours, and on the other the vast island continent of Australia, twenty-five times the size of Great Britain and Ireland, and south of it Tasmania and New Zealand. It seems needless to mention the smaller islands of the Pacific, but many of them are in our possession.

This is pretty well for one voyage, but we will at once begin another, going back to the Gulf of Aden as our starting-point. We have lately annexed Socotra, the large island near the entrance to the Gulf. Further on we come to the territory lately administered by the East Africa Company, but now taken over by the British Government, with the access it gives us to the Equatorial Lakes and to the Valley of the Nile. The island of Zanzibar, long under our influence, is now under our protection. Inland, beyond the Portuguese territory on the coast, we have Nyassaland, including the highlands of the Shiré and the road to Lake Tanganyika. South of the Zambesi we enter the territories assigned to the South Africa Company, at present of ill omen. We have the colonies of Natal and the Cape, with the protectorate of all the native tribes and territories from Zululand to Bechuanaland. On the West Coast we hold Gambia and Sierra Leone, the Guinea Coast, and the delta of the Niger, together with a protectorate over the Lower Niger and the Benue. From this part of Africa it is but a comparatively short run to the American continent, to Brazil and the West Indies. This was well known in the days when the slave trade flourished, and the captured negroes were carried off to supply the slave-markets of the European colonies of the West. Of that marvellous arc of islands which extends from the coast of Florida to the mouth of the Orinoco, we hold Jamaica, Trinidad, and Barbaboes, most of the Windward Isles, and the whole of the Leeward Isles, including Dominica, the scene of Rodney's great victory, so differently described by Captain Mahan and Mr. Froude, and St. Lucia, one of the prizes which then fell to us, and now being fortified as an important defensive post. The canal at Panama is not yet cut, and that which has been planned across Nicaragua has encountered unexpected obstacles; but we can easily imagine ourselves on the western side, and arriving in due time at Victoria, the capital of British Columbia, where we again salute the British flag. We then go on to the town of Vancouver, on the mainland, and take the train by the Canadian Pacific Railway for Montreal and Quebec, extending our journey eastwards to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. We have traversed the vast Dominion of Canada, which, as we have lately been reminded from New York, covers a larger area than the whole of the United States. In the territories of the North-west we have one of the largest wheat granaries in the world. The Parliament at Ottawa makes laws for the whole Dominion, and they are made and administered in the name of the British Crown.

Our long journey is now at an end. We have gone rather rapidly round the world, noting what we have seen and endeavouring to realise the enormous extent of the British possessions. No such colossal empire ever before existed in the history of mankind. Of course we are proud of it, and justly proud. It is a monument of our pluck and our good fortune. We do not wish it to be smaller. We do not desire to give up any part of it. Our proudest boast is that of the great self-governing colonies, which well deserve a greater name; there is not one which is held by force, nor could we ever wish in any circumstances to use force against them, even if the very idea of such a thing were not in itself absurd. They all know that the union is voluntary on their part, and that any resolution passed by their Legislatures and supported, as in such a case it would be by the people would suffice to dissolve the tie. All we say is, that so long as they wish to remain with us we have no wish to be severed from them, but very much the contrary. But what is the impression which the spectacle of this world-wide empire is likely to make, and does make, upon other nations? Does it not, at any rate, offer some reasonable explanation of the protests and rather jealous remarks we hear them utter from time to time? Does it not happen to be true that we have so far appropriated the wide spaces of the world as to leave but small room for such colonising capacities as they have, or think they have? They are not all in the same position. Germany, though one of the oldest groups of States in Europe, is new as a single political Power, and has entered the sphere of naval enterprise rather late. Since the days of the Hanseatic League, Germany has had but few ships, and till lately but little foreign commerce. The problems she has had to solve have been of a domestic order. Long reduced to comparative helplessness by territorial divisions, due in a great measure to the selfishness of her princes and the submissiveness of her people, she had to attain to unity within herself before she could aspire to influence abroad. Now, when she gathers up her energies and surveys the globe, she finds most of it already occupied and complains that no room has been left for her. We could hardly be expected to repress the energies of our people and wait till she could join us, so that we might both "start fair," as they used to stipulate when the news of a wreck reached a Cornish village. Germany has done great things for herself, and that may well be accepted as something like a compensation. The greatest military Power on the Continent, only yesterday celebrating exploits which echoed through the world, may well recognise without grudging our superiority at sea, and permit us quietly to enjoy the empire we have won by traversing the "waters wan," an empire which, we may boldly say, is in no instance at variance with the obligations which we owe to the rest of mankind.

Other nations there are whose position is different, and to whom we owe the most generous consideration should they ever express their feelings with unusual warmth. Spain, Portugal, and Holland were abreast with us or before us in maritime enterprise, and founded great empires or dependencies of which now only a few fragments remain. Commercial rivalry was the great cause which led to these political changes, naval prowess coming in to make them permanent. In the seventeenth century Spain was the greatest Power in the New World. Her viceroys ruled in Chili and Peru, in the territorities now covered by the States of the Argentine Confederation, in the colonies of Central America, in Mexico and Texas, with pretensions northward extending over most of the region beyond the Rocky Mountains. Her continental possessions are all gone. Of the islands, Cuba and Puerto Rico alone remain. France also has occasion for some patriotic regrets. It is impossible for her to quite forget the time when her chances of preponderance in India were at least as good as ours; when Dupleix by land and Suffren by sea for a long time seemed to hold the balance even, and government blunders at home had a large share in depriving them of what appeared to be a probable prize. They had even fairer prospects in the New World. Canada belonged to them by right of discovery and exploration and early settlement. Those who have read Parkman's Canadian histories must have had a feeling of deep sympathy with the efforts made by French priests to convert and civilise the North American Indians, with the hardships they underwent and the sufferings they endured, and with the difficulties of successive Governors in contending against neglect and ingratitude at home. Canada then included the whole of the Great Lakes and extended to the Mississippi. Their explorers sailed down the great river and claimed the territory on both sides for the King of France, leaving eventually nothing but the name of Louisiana as a memorial of their exploits. Wolfe's victory on the Heights of Abraham determined the fate of Canada, and when our thirteen colonies established their independence they claimed a new dividing line between Canada as it was then and the Canada of to-day. It is perhaps fortunate that the French Revolution has supplied a new era beyond which the thoughts of Frenchmen seldom stray, but to the few who go further back some natural regrets may be forgiven.

The complaints and protests which we have heard lately against what is regarded as our overgrown power no doubt derive some of their force from the great expansion of the empire of late years. Its increase during the present reign challenges some comparison with our acquisitions of the last century. The wonderful development of the Australian colonies has been the work of the last fifty years. What were mere wildernesses at the beginning of that period have since become the seats of established governments and numerous populations. The extension and consolidation of the Dominion of Canada, with its wonderful Pacific Railway, are still more recent. Our Indian territories have been extended by fresh annexations, both on the east and on the west. Upper Burmah, with its Shan States, is a fresh annexation. In the recent scramble for Africa we have shown as much zeal as our rivals, and then has come perhaps the most provocative action of all, our summary, and till the other day the completely successful, subjugation of Mashonaland and Matabeleland. This adventure, with its administrative arrangements, is at present under a cloud, and only by firm and enlightened measures, will it disappear. On the whole it will perhaps be conceded that we owe some indulgence to outside opinion. Our policy and our good fortune do put some strain upon international forbearance. Out of this concession we would only draw a plea for patience, good temper, and goodwill, and a readiness to adopt all conciliatory measures. This we are strong enough to do with a good grace, and we ought not to do less. VERAX.

WHEN ARE WE GOING TO EVACUATE EGYPT?

How happy the world would be if only we would agree to clear out of Egypt. The French would shout for joy, because then they would see the possibility of one day taking our place there, of conquering the Soudan, and becoming the owners of all North Africa, besides spoiling our rich trade with India, viâ the Canal and the Red Sea! We can see how anxious they are about it, because they never let the question rest. They are always casting it in our teeth that we did agree some time ago to retire and leave the country to itself; forgetting to add that it was on the understanding that we should go only when Egypt became strong enough to stand alone, but certainly not to make way for a French garrison, or a Russian one either. What makes the French so nervously anxious on the subject? We believe it is because they well know that without the Gate of the route to the East their Colonies or possessions in Cochin China, Madagascar, and Reunion would be untenable in time of war, and without Egypt they cannot injure our trade, our hold of India, Australia or the Cape Colonies. The question now arises, is the evacuation of Egypt possible for us?

The Spectator of Feb. 29 last, in an able article, argues strongly that it is no longer in our power to give it up, and that the sooner we say so publicly, the better. It is just as impossible for us to give up Egypt now, as it is impossible for the French to give up Tunis now. They cannot do it safely if they would. Neither can we evacuate Egypt if we desired it ever so much! The case is put that if for reasons of naval necessity it were needful for us to abandon the Mediterranean for a time, our hold upon Egypt would be a danger to us, as we should have to keep a naval force there to defend it. The answer is that Egypt can be held by Sikh troops from India quite easily, as was done by Lord Wellesley about 100 years ago, when 6,000 native troops were landed under General Baird from India at Kosseir, marched to the Kenneh on the Nile, and then floated down to Cairo, to the consternation of the French. The dominant factor in regard to Egypt is the power of the sea. Whichever Power holds that, can hold Egypt. If the French beat us at sea, North and South of the Canal at Suez, Egypt must fall to the French. If the British dominate at sea, they might abandon the Mediterranean for a season, sure that the French would not dare to touch Egypt. "Napoleon went to Egypt before the command of the sea was decided. We won the battle of the Nile, and Napoleon's army, caught in a trap, had to surrender."

We have saved Egypt by good government, and made her a prosperous, if not a wealthy State. "We have protected her from wrong and oppression at the hands of her native rulers, and we have and are still defending her from the Mahdi and his savage followers, who if we left, would conquer and destroy Egypt, burning and pillaging it from South to North." We cannot "commit this act of crime and folly." We cannot, therefore, leave Egypt, and it is honest and right we should say it to all Europe, but to France especially, as soon as maybe. The Spectator's advice to our nation is this: "Let us say to Turkey, and to the world in general, we cannot enter upon negotiations in regard to the evacuation of Egypt, for that course supposes the possibility of withdrawal! In reality, no such possibility exists, and now that we realise that fact, we will not pretend to ignore it." At present no doubt injury is being done to Egyptian credit by the way in which our Government plays fast and loose with our protectorate, such as it is. We cannot leave Egypt to be destroyed by the Dervishes, and we cannot afford to evacuate the country while our incalculable wealth-giving commerce between England and India passes by and through Egyptian territory. Those who talk about our evacuating Egypt, and they are chiefly the French, know nothing of course of God's promises to Egypt, and how He has linked Egypt with Israel, now known by us to be the British nation. Israel is to be linked with Egypt, to smite and heal her, and to be a blessing to her, giving her the Gospel, the knowledge of Jesus, her Saviour, and to make her "the people of God" (Isa. xix. 20—25, R.V.). These are the chains which are binding us to Egypt and forcing us to remain there, in spite of the French and their threats. The power and will of God are on our side, and though our nation knows them not, they will suffice to hold us tight in our position as the protectors of Egypt, as God's messengers to her to give her good government, prosperity and happiness according to His promises. Of course, these are considerations which will have no weight with the French, for they know not the Scriptures nor regard the promises of God. But we who know the truth are aware of the strength of our position in Egypt, and how impossible it will be for our nation to abandon that people to their own guidance and defence. She is incapable of these and must have a protector. God has given us, being Israel His people, these duties to perform, on the Nile; and perform them we must. To Him be all the praise for the power, ability and will to carry out His purposes; though withal we are at present, as a nation, totally unaware of our obligations, and whence they arise!

Since the above was written, we see Mr. Chamberlain, on March 20, during the debate on Egypt, declaring over and over again that though we cannot go just now, we shall evacuate the country when we can do so safely. Surely Mr. Chamberlain knows that that day never will or can come? Why then constantly repeat a pledge which there is no chance of being made good?

"FIVE IN ONE HOUSE—DIVIDED—TWO AGAINST THREE."

(Luke xii. 52.)

THE Reserve Fund in Egypt, which has been got together by the good government and splendid management of the British officers who administer the finances of that country, has been called upon by the latter to contribute to the expenses of the expedition against the Mahdi and the Dervishes, having for its object the recovery for Egypt of the Province and town of Dongola, now in the grasp of its enemies. But the Commissioners of the Caisse de la Dette are, by the terms of an existing convention, left in the sole charge of those funds, and it depends upon them whether the British can have the modest sum (half-a-million) which is demanded of them for the purposes of the military operations. The Commissioners are—1, the British; 2, Germany; 3, Austria; 4, Italy; 5, France; and, 6th, Russia. Four of these six are decidedly in favour of the grant being made—namely, Britain, Germany, Italy, and Austria. The Germans are grudgingly willing because they see the expedition will serve the Italians after their late defeat at Adowa; Austria and Italy, of course, are in favour of the British operations in the Soudan; the Austrians because they believe in us and think we can do no wrong; the Italians because they know that at Dongola much of the Dervishes' pressure against them at and round Kassala will be relieved. Three of the Continental Commissioners thus are on our side in the matter, and vote with us for the withdrawal of the amount we ask for from the Reserve Fund to enable us to carry on the war for Egypt, as a measure of defence for her against her southern enemies. With ourselves, then, a clear majority of four is in favour of the payment, as against two who refuse. The two are Russia and France. The latter shows her jealousy of us for our successful management of Egypt since 1883, and wishes anyhow to get us out of the country and take our place there herself. Russia is ready to follow France in all matters indifferent to her own designs, and, therefore, gives France her moral support in this question of the Reserve Fund, but means little more. When France asks her to oppose our wishes in Egypt in regard to this money question, Russia looks at the matter as one pleasing to France and acts accordingly. She and France in this matter of the Caisse, have divided off from the other three Continental Powers, and cried, "No." While the majority of three, the Triple Alliance, have voted together that the British shall have the money needed for the Expedition. The five Powers in the Continental House have even in the matter of the Egyptian Reserve Fund split into two camps, and thus show to Europe that there are two parties there, three on one side, two on the other—and both are bidding for British aid in their own coming collision. Whatever may be the precise meaning of our Lord's words in Luke xii. 52, the fact is that Europe is divided into two parts at the present moment, and even this dispute in Egypt regarding its Reserve Fund shows that it is the antagonism of two of the Powers against three, which is the marked feature of our times. The Triple Alliance is anxious for the benefit and help of our fleet in their approaching wars, and the Russian and French are willing to carry out the policy of the latter and worry us till we surrender Egypt, and thus get us to furnish them with the sword which they may use to destroy us therewith. "In vain is the net spread in sight of any bird" (Prov. i. 17). The British are not to be terrified into giving up Egypt to the French, and they will not be foolish enough to unite with the Triple Alliance to help them to fight the French for Alsace and Lorraine, or do battle with Russia for Constantinople, the Gate, when Germany and Austria must in self-defence fight that battle for them. The London Standard no doubt thinks there is a possibility of our joining the Italian Germano-Austrian allies against the Franco-Russian. But we have reason to doubt if that can ever come to pass. It is well, however, to see how the Standard deals with the subject. It does so thus:—"But now that the thing is done, some qualms seem to have arisen in the minds of the French politicians as to the wisdom of the course they applauded as alone patriotic, or even possible, for a Ministry that wished to enjoy the respect of the nation. We are not wholly surprised to learn that some Deputies are beginning to ask themselves seriously whether it was prudent to put this vexatious, though futile, obstacle in the way of England. The consequences are so obvious that they can hardly have escaped the notice of even the most frivolous of those Frenchmen who make a trade of preaching enmity to this country. Europe, by the action of France, has been sharply divided into two hostile camps. On the one side are France and Russia; on the other are the States forming the Triple Alliance and England. This is the very distribution of the Powers of Europe which France has the greatest reason to dislike. It surely cannot be considered wisdom by any of her citizens to drive the Naval Power of England into alliance with the armies and navies of Germany, Austria, and Italy. Yet it ought to be perfectly manifest that the course which the French Government persists in following is calculated to produce that result by an inevitable process. We had no wish to be forced out of that position of friendly independence towards our neighbours which it would naturally be our choice to preserve. But we are not without a national capacity for looking facts in the face. If Europe is to be divided on the model of the Commissioners of the Caisse in their vote of yesterday ; if it is to be an understood thing that the Powers are to decide every question, not according to its merits, but on mere party lines, then we must make up our minds to act with those who have shown a disposition to co-operate with us. The consequences must be palpable to the meanest capacity. There may be no formal treaty made, but there will be a conformity of interests between us and the Triple Alliance, which will be no less efficacious, and this result will have been brought about by the deliberate action of the French Government. They will have forced us to range ourselves against them, by making it impossible for us to remain on their side. That is the situation which the French are doing their best to create in Europe. When the prospect is suddenly brought close to their eyes by this last conflict in Egypt some of them do not like it. The belief in the Russian Alliance is no longer what it was in France. An uneasy feeling is growing up that the great Northern Empire is making a convenience of its friend in the West. It gets substantial services, and gives in return only very shadowy diplomatic equivalents. Even in this Egyptian matter it does not mean to go beyond Platonic protests and votes. Frenchmen may well begin to doubt whether, for the sake of no more than this, they are wise in pursuing that continual hostility to England which must, in the long run, drive her into the arms of the Triple Alliance."

Such is the anticipation of the secular journalist. But it strikes us as likely that in order to make our alliance with the three great Continental Powers impossible, God is preparing for us great difficulties in South Africa, where all our power by land and sea will be called for by Him to overawe Boer and Dutch opposition, fomented by German jealousy, and prevent a war of races. That will indeed be a serious matter for our Empire, and one which will enforce on us the policy He has marked out for us in the Scriptures, namely, a "splendid isolation" regarding the nations of the continent, and in reference to our colonial empire a sleepless vigilance and armed watch. To the Lord our Guardian and Protector at all times and places be the praise.

ENGLAND'S STORY.

By L. P.

The knowledge of Our Identity with Israel (surely) greatly increases our interest in English history. It seems to give it added reality, to breathe fresh life into it, and even to shed a lustre over such parts as in past times might have tended to produce that "weariness of the flesh" which the Rev. Mr. Gibbs suffers from the perusal of Identity literature. But what in truth is England's story but the *un*inspired continuation of the *in*spired history told in the Bible ? There has been a break of centuries in the narrative, and a thick fog has hidden from us the circumstances of our wanderings and drifting northwards and westwards to the "wilderness" where we were to rest and grow strong during many weary, long years. But now bright shafts of light are piercing the gloom. The veil that concealed our origin for past centuries is being withdrawn, and we who see that is so, praise God and rejoice in deep humility and thankfulness for the advancing fulfilment of His promises of old.

Let us remember that we are nationally and individually mere instruments in God's hand, and that it is by His permission alone that other peoples may envy and hate us for the exalted position He has assigned to us on the earth. But He may yet see fit again to send us troubles and afflictions, by want, and war, and woe, for possibly punishing or refining purposes. If so, let us bow in meek submission to His will.

It is a sadness often to remark how little acknowledgment of God is made in books and public papers as a Factor in the current events of the day, while good fortune, happy chances, luck, coincidence, are the grounds for gratulation, with perhaps a rare half-deprecatory allusion to Providence. It is well not to use sacred names recklessly and with irreverent frequency, but are they to appear only in professedly religious books, or be heard but from the pulpit or the platform alone ? Surely not.

Though but a slight example, I give as a case in point, the following from Mahan's "Influence of Sea Power," etc. The italics are mine.

"Thus was successfully formed the combination of the northern powers against Great Britain, the first and most willing of those effected by Bonaparte. By a singular coincidence, which recalls the opportuneness of his departure from England in 1798 to check the yet undivined expedition against Egypt, Nelson, the man destined also to strike the coalition to the ground, was during its formation slowly journeying from the Mediterranean, with which his glory both before and after are most closely associated, to the North Sea; as though again drawn by some mysterious influence, to be at hand for unknown services which he alone could render." In the spring of 1801, the battle of Copenhagen was fought!

ISRAEL A NATION.

By John S. Anderson.

In the Daily Chronicle of the 24th February, there appeared a column headed—

"Israel a Nation :
Is the Promised Land in Sight ?
Mr. Holman Hunt's Scheme."

The writer of the article had interviewed the above-named gentleman, who, for the last seven years, has been advocating peopling Palestine with the Jews. He says that the present state of affairs in Turkey foreshadows in a marked manner such an opportunity. But the way in which he would go to work does not accord with the views taken by Identity people.

In the first place, the heading of the article is incorrect, as the writer was meaning to describe the Jews, not all Israel.

We have headed this paper "Israel a Nation," to agree with the title of the article in question, and because it will be through Israel that the restoration of the Jews will be accomplished. He proposes to raise a loan of, say, £100,000,000 to buy out all Turkish rights in Palestine, to purchase that country out and out, to do away with the Turk entirely, and make the kingdom the full extent of the Promised Land as indicated by Moses.

Digitized by Google

We may say at once that this cannot possibly be accomplished in such a manner, for the land is ours by inheritance, and in due time a way will be opened out for us to carry out the Divine will.

Surely a careful study of the various prophecies would show intending philanthropists something of the manner in which this has to come about, for taking the Sacred Volume as containing the history of the inhabitants of the world from the commencement until the end of time, how can anyone fail to grasp the various points which the Editor of the BANNER OF ISRAEL and other writers have for the last twenty-two years and more, been endeavouring to show their fellow-countrymen?

How could anyone conscienciously ask for money to purchase the land, when God, in Gen. xvii. 8, promised it to Abraham, thus, "And I will give unto thee, and unto thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, and I will be their God." Again, supposing we are not Israel, to say nothing of the Jews who have a share in the inheritance, how can land which God has given to a certain people unconditionally, be either bought or sold?

The few remarks made by the Daily Chronicle on the matter are amusing—viz.:—

"Mr. Holman Hunt's proposal for the return of the Jews to Palestine is a picturesque revival of an historic idea which has always had great traditional influence on the Jewish mind. We confess we doubt its realisation. You cannot turn the stream of events backward. The Jewish race to-day is in one sense what it was eighteen hundred years ago, a distinct, a peculiar people. But it is also interwoven with the life-story of every civilised nation, save perhaps, the United States, Ireland, and Scotland, and it has its finger on the purse-strings of Europe. Its activities are all modern. What is such a race to do on the barren plains of Palestine? Johannesburg is the modern Jerusalem."

A thoroughly worldly exposition, and one which does not allow the Bible a single word in the argument.

What is meant by turning the stream of events backward? Does the commentator think that the return of the Jews to Palestine would have that effect? It only shows the grossest ignorance regarding matters which any person who has read the Scriptures to any purpose cannot be supposed to possess.

Those having their finger on the purse-strings of Europe are few in comparison with their poor brethren, so nothing can be deducted from that, and supposing the activities of the Jewish nation were all modern, what has this to do with the question? The Bible tells what such a race has to do on the barren plains of Palestine. They have to go there in the near future. We may fairly ask the question, Is it generally known that in Palestine there are hundreds of cities where the houses built ages ago are only waiting to be inhabited? It may not be amiss while on this interesting subject to quote a few sentences from the Rev. J. L. Porter's fascinating book, published in 1866, called "The Giant Cities of Bashan and Syria's Holy Places."

"Salcah. Joshua tells us that the kingdom of Og the giant included all Bashan unto Salcah (Josh. xiii. 11, 12), and the Israelites took and occupied the whole region from Mount Hermon 'unto Salcah.' Salcah, the eastern frontier city of Bashan, . . . is one of the most remarkable cities in Palestine. It has been long deserted, and yet as nearly as I could estimate, five hundred of its houses are still standing, and from three to four hundred families might settle in it at any moment without laying a stone, or expending an hour's labour on repairs. The circumference of the town and castle together is about three miles. . . . From the top of the castle, wherever I turned my eyes, towns and villages were seen. Bozrah was there on its plain, twelve miles distant. . . . On the section of the plain between South and East, I counted fourteen towns, all of them, so far as I could see with my telescope, habitable like Salcah, but entirely deserted! From this one spot I saw upwards of thirty towns! . . . Everywhere on that vast panorama, on plain and mountain side, in Bashan, Moab, and Arabia, as far as the eye could see and the telescope command, were towns and villages thickly scattered, and all deserted, though not ruined."

In the same manner he describes other deserted but habitable cities. A few words about Kerioth are interesting:—

"Now, the houses of Kerioth and other towns in Bashan appear to be just such dwellings as a race of giants would build. The walls, the roofs, but especially the ponderous gates, doors, and bars, are in every way characteristic of a period when architecture was in its infancy, when giants were masons, and when strength and security were the grand requisites. I measured a door in Kerioth; it was nine feet high, four and a-half feet wide, and ten inches thick; one solid slab of stone. I saw the folding gates of another house in the mountains still larger and heavier. Time produces little effect on such buildings as these. The heavy stone slabs of the roofs resting on the massive walls make the structure as firm as if built of solid masonry; and the block basalt used is almost as hard as iron. . . .

"We have thus at Kerioth and its sister cities, some of the most ancient houses of which the world can boast; and in looking at them and wandering among them, and passing night after night in them, my mind was led back to the time now nearly four thousand years ago, when the kings of the East warred with the Rephaim . . . and they are, I believe, the only specimens in the world of the ordinary private dwellings of remote antiquity . . . in many cases perfect, as if only completed yesterday."

Reference to Ezekiel xxxvi. 38 will show how these cities are to be dealt with in the future: "As the holy flock, as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts; so shall the waste cities be filled with flocks of men: and they shall know that I am the Lord."

Then with regard to the climate, which a few years ago was very unfavourable to vegetation, it is now much altered, so that the ground is beginning to be productive again, and ere long will the prophecy of Isa. xxxv. 1, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose," be fulfilled in its entirety.

There are several other points to which we might refer, one of them being the fact of Mr. Holman Hunt building up his project on a Scriptural basis, but unfortunately the Bible has not been sufficiently studied to make the plan agree therewith. We will note one inconsistency.

The interviewer enquired, "If Palestine became open to the Jews, in your sense, would there be any difficulty in peopling it? Reply, "Difficulty! why the Jews would fly to it from all parts of the world."

Now see what Holy Writ says, in Jer. iii. 18: "In those days the House of Judah shall walk with (or to) the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers." And Ezek. xxxvii. gives a detailed account of the coming events.

Since this was written, we find that the Daily Chronicle has published a letter from Mr. A. K. Robinson, of 9, Vernon-road, Leeds, on this scheme, which should induce people to weigh the matter well before joining it.

He pointed out that the Jews are only a small portion of the Hebrew race, that the people of the nation of Israel never were Jews or of the nation of Judah. That the Jews know perfectly well that the bulk of the land belongs to the nation of Israel, and that the rights of the Jews are not more than a fractional part of the whole. Neither Israel nor the Jews, he says, will insult God by offering to buy from the Sultan of Turkey what God has declared a thousand times He will give to them.

The remainder to Mr. Robinson's letter is so good, to say nothing of its actual appearance in the columns of The Daily Chronicle, that we hope room will be found for the following abstracts :—

"The wisdom of raising £100,000,000 to bolster up for another fifty years one of the most wicked and effete empires that has ever existed may seem 'a glorious scheme' to the correspondent of The Daily Chronicle and Mr. Holman Hunt, but neither Israel nor Judah will contribute as many pence for such a purpose. . . .

"Mr. Hunt seems to have been actively interested in this question some seven years. I may say that, as I have set it before and above every question affecting my life for over a quarter of a century, I consider that I have a right also to my opinion, which is that the scheme proposed shows utter ignorance of the nature of the question: that it is a reflection upon the promises of God, and is of the same spirit that induced Simon to think that he could buy the 'gift of God' with money. . . .

"As to Israel and Judah consulting and asking for the approval of the 'Great Powers,' there is only 'One Great Power' that they need to consider. The other great Powers will have to consider them. Let Mr. Hunt read again the covenants God has made with Israel, and the rights and privileges which He has conferred upon them before he recommends us to negotiate with that arch enemy of our God and mankind, the Sultan of Turkey."

We will conclude with a little blind evidence, to be found in a most interesting work written by the late Edwin Heycock, of Manchester, in the year 1849, entitled "The Kings of the East, an exposition of the prophecies determining from Scripture and from history the Power for whom the mystical Euphrates is being 'dried up,' with an explanation of certain other prophecies concerning the restoration of Israel."

"However we may forget the Jew, it is manifest that with God the remembrance of him is ever present; and we may rejoice that the Lord has chosen Britain 'to be His servant, to raise up the Tribes of Jacob, and to restore to them their desolate heritages.'"

This is good confirmation by a writer who discovered that our nation is specially alluded to in the Bible, but had not sufficient light given him to enable him to see that nation is Israel.

Israel, praise ye the Lord!

THE Monthly Part of the BANNER OF ISRAEL is now ready. Price 6d., post free to any part of the world.

"TURN US AGAIN, O LORD GOD OF HOSTS."

THE 80th Psalm should be a favourite with the readers of the BANNER. It relates to the times of Israel's outcasting —of God's anger against them, when they were dispersed among the heathen, a bye-word amongst them, sorely in need of the salvation by Christ. Thrice is the Lord invoked in the same words, showing the intensity of the peril, the urgency of the need, and the felt want of the Lord's salvation. The prayer is addressed to the God of Israel under three separate titles—"the God" of Israel according to verse 3, "the God of Hosts" of verse 7, and "Jehovah the God of Hosts" of verse 19. In each case the prayer was identical. "Turn us again"—that is, restore and bring back Ten-tribed Israel—that is, Joseph, or Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, to the condition of favour they once enjoyed under "the shining face" of the Lord Jehovah, the covenant God of Israel, and so "we shall be saved" (or return). (Comp. Rom. ix. 27 with Isa. x. 22.) The pulpit explanation of this Psalm, we observe, takes no notice of the opening sentence of this national prayer :—

"Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel,
Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock.
Thou that sittest upon the Cherubim, shine forth;
Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up Thy strength
And come to save us.
Turn us again, O God;
And cause Thy face to shine, and we shall be saved."
(Psa. lxxx. 1, 2.)

It is plain that the House of Joseph, i.e., Ephraim, was the utterer of this sublime prayer, and it was addressed to the "Lord God of Hosts." It was a humble confession on Israel's part that she had gone far astray from Him—and required to "turn again," or return with repentance to Him, but that of her unassisted strength she could not. She called upon the Lord therefore, to Jesus, her covenant God, to "turn her," to regard her with "His shining face" of reconciled love, with the Father's hand upon the Man of His right hand, even on the Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ, the God-Man, who as Emmanuel, God with us, died for sinful men, and so made peace (ver. 17—19). If that were done, then Israel pleaded that her salvation were secure, her return to Him assured. The spiritual aspect of the whole Psalm is preferred by our teachers to the literal. But by such preference the plain words of the Psalm are ignored, and Israel's exclusive interest in the Psalm completely hidden and obscured. That there are spiritual lessons to be derived from this portion of the Word no one would deny. But why the Ten Tribes, or British people, should be put aside in the explanation of it is perplexing, since the best spiritual teaching and results can be obtained by applying the whole to "the outcasts of Israel," pleading God's promises to them with Him, with the assurance expressed, which is good news for our race and nation, that what is so faithfully and persistently asked will assuredly be granted, because God has promised it in Deut. xxx., Ezek. xxxvii. 1—28, and in divers other passages, not excluding Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, and Heb. viii. 10, 12. It is noteworthy that in the opening of Psa. lxxx. the Lord's guiding care over Ephraim, even in exile and outcasting, is asserted. He leads Joseph like a flock. They are blind (Isa. xlii. 16), but "He leads them," and before His Ten-tribed House He has stirred up His strength. Since the Reformation He has come and saved us; causing His face to shine and opening for us the way of salvation. Here is a fact of which the British pulpit need not be ashamed; but it should rejoice to proclaim it as a glorious proof of the faithfulness of our Jehovah God-Man, who is the Lord God of Hosts.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The British and Foreign Bible Society celebrated its 92nd birthday on Saturday afternoon, by holding a meeting of its juvenile collectors at the Guildhall. The fine old hall was crowded with young people, and there was a considerable number of older folk present. In the unavoidable absence of the Lord Mayor, Alderman Sir Henry Knight presided, and amongst those on the platform were Alderman and Sheriff Pound and Mrs. Pound, Sheriff Cooper and Mrs. Cooper, the Bishop of London, and Miss Wilkin, daughter of the Lord Mayor.

The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, extended a hearty welcome to the young people present, and went on to remind them of many interesting facts connected with the history of the Society. The Society owes its origin to a simple but striking incident. Less than one hundred years ago, a young Welsh girl, who had saved enough money to purchase a Bible, had to walk fifty miles in order to obtain a copy of the coveted book. This fact was brought to the notice of the London Missionary Society, with the result that in 1804 a Society was formed to promote the circulation of the Scriptures. It is computed that at that time there were scarcely 5,000,000 Bibles in existence, and the number of languages in which they were written was only about thirty-five. Since then the British and Foreign Bible Society alone has distributed 147,000,000 copies of the Scriptures in 330 different languages, and each year it puts into circulation 4,000,000 additional copies. At the present time something like 1,000 scholars are hard at work translating the Holy Book into a hundred languages other than those already dealt with, and it is hoped that the task will be completed by the end of this year.

In the course of the meeting the Bishop of London delivered an address, in which he dwelt on the immense increase in the facilities for intercourse between different nations which had taken place during the present century, and pointed out its value in enabling them to spread the Gospel all over the world.

The children were afterwards entertained to tea, a feature of which was the distribution of pieces of the enormous birthday cake of the Society, weighing 92lb., as souvenirs of the occasion.

RUSSIA AND ENGLAND.

(From the Times, Jan. 25.)

"[Our Own Correspondent in St. Petersburg.]

"Nearly all Russian writers, however they may squabble over home matters, are pretty unanimous in working up ill-feeling against England. This has gone on, with only occasional abatement, ever since the Pamir arrangement, in which Russia thinks England had the best of her, and especially since England declined to join in putting pressure upon Japan. It is not, as I have said, so much on any particular current question, as on general grounds of apparent or latent dislike—or rather, perhaps, of envy and jealousy—which are easily called forth by every and any pretext. If to be abused and vilified for everything she does and does not do is better than to be ignored, then England may be congratulated. If we take the principal popular journals, like the Moscow Gazette, the Novoe Vremya, the Sviet, the St. Petersburgshiya Viedomosti, and, to a somewhat less extent, the Novosti, we find the most uncompromising hostility towards England in all the questions that have recently agitated Europe. Some of these newspapers have published such extravagant remarks that it is difficult to take them seriously. In fact, on such occasions the Russian Press should be read rather as an interesting curiosity than as a seriously dangerous institution. Here is a specimen from the Viedomosti, under the editorship of Prince Ukhtomsky, the president of the Russo-Chinese Bank. The writer says:—

"'British pride, the most characteristic feature of the English people, and an infallible sign of their political ruin in the near future, forms a glaring contrast with the self-stultifying and humble resignation of the Asiatic-Slavonic races. All England's unrighteous deeds in Constantinople, Armenia, Africa, and America have lowered British prestige on the Continent. At the same time, it is a gratifying fact that the Russians are now recognising more clearly and definitely every year the unimpeachable truth that the one single enemy of Russia is England. This old truth, which for a long time was not admitted, or was partly ignored, is to-day the alphabet and guiding principle of thoughtful Russians.'"

[Note by the Editor of the "Banner."—If this hostile spirit be sufficiently and long indulged, we can quite understand how Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. will be brought about.]

JACOB AT JABBOK, AND NOW.

Jacob! Now, strive with Me
Even as thou didst of old,
Wrestling hard by Jabbok's brook—
Not yielding up thy hold.

Did I say "Let Me go?"
Who could straightway have gone?
Yea—but from Jacob I'll not go
While still his arms hold on.

O, Israel, My Prince!
The name I gave to thee
Use 'mong thy myriad sons!
Israel, "prevail with Me."

. . . .

Lo! Esau comes again.
The nations quake with fear:
From Edom living, Edom dead,
Passeth their wit to steer.

Israel! See now thy name
Writ large o'er all the earth:
My word wrought out to thee
Read at thy world-wide hearth.

Brit-Israel, Prince of God,
As in the Bible tale
Strive now, as erst at Jabbok's ford;
And now, as then "prevail."

Haste thee to use the power
'Dued thee with God and men.
Subdue the nations unto Christ,
The Father's sure Amen!

Haste to the earth's sore need!
Lo! He waits to come down—
In sceptred law, and sceptred love—
Whose is the Eternal Crown.

. . . . .

Jehovah! God of hosts to helps!
Give us to use the grace
That made of man its minister
To man's own recreant race.

And our own "trouble's" coming, Lord!
But we're not left alone.
Foemen press close, closer do'st Thou
To Israel, Thine own

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—The flood of your BANNER OF ISRAEL, direct evidence and witness in regard to the fulfilment to the Anglo-Saxon race of God's promises to Israel, has risen to such high water mark that it requires great growth on the subject to be able to maintain that level, and to Christian believers the Anglo-Saxon possession of the promised blessings must identify "lost Israel" in such possessors.

What you denominate "blind witness" is an acknowledgment of the existing blessings and a definite application of your conclusions in regard to the recorded promises and their particular fulfilment, and as you may not be otherwise dealing with such witness, I venture to call your attention to the following:—

In the Review of Reviews, Mr. Stead writes under the heading, "The Rhodesian Religion," that, "His Israel is the English speaking folk wherever they are found on land and sea, and in them he sees the Providential race, the called of God, predestined rulers of the world."

"All over the world they have proved and are daily proving their superior capacity in the struggle for existence—Spaniard, and Portuguese, and Dutchman, and Frenchman had the start in the race, but one by one all have been distanced by the Anglo-Saxon."

"To-day from Nova Scotia to San Francisco, from Behring's Sea to the Gulf of Mexico, the English-speaking man is supreme."

"Australasia has fallen as the golden fruit of Hesperides into the lap of the Briton."

"In India, 300,000,000 Asiatics acknowledge the supreme authority of the Englishman."

"In South Africa, Black and Boer alike admit that the sovereignty of the continent will ultimately be vested in those who speak the tongue of Shakespeare and Milton."

"Clearly revealed . . . in the living pages of contemporary history that of all the nations, the English speakers possess the secret of the salvation of the world."

"It is the old Hebrew idea—Mr. Rhodes has no more doubt of the Divine mission of the English folk than had Joshua of the Divine call of ancient Israel."

"Impossible to serve God better than by painting as much of the map British red as possible, and assisting so far as may be possible in facilitating the survival of those whom Milton called God's Englishmen."

Hoping these quotations may be acceptable to you.

I remain, yours faithfully, M. M.

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—The enclosed (especially the last part) from the London Correspondent's letter to the Manchester Courier of Tuesday last, March 17th, is remarkably in accord with the certainly unfulfilled prediction in Isa. xix. 5, &c. Russia and Abyssinia may some day bring it all about.

Yours, &c., M. A. BAXENDELL.

The Observatory, Birkdale, Southport, March 20th, 1896.

The following was the enclosure:—"A curious reason is assigned for the interest which the Egyptian fellaheen, or peasants, take in the proposed expedition from Wady Halfa. It is known to all of them who have received some little culture that the waters of the Nile come from 'the land of dark men'—from the mountains of Abyssinia. In 1874, at the time of the war with Abyssinia, it happened that the Nile was slow to rise, and the opinion was expressed that 'no doubt the King was revenging himself on the Egyptians by preventing the waters of the Nile from flowing down to them.' The peasant, whose conceptions of the world and men are most limited, lives in constant dread of the fulfilment of the ancient threat of Ethiopian kings to lead off the Nile before its entrance into Egypt through a canal into the Red Sea. It is only necessary that he should learn of the victory of the Abyssinians to imagine that he is about to be deprived of that river which gives him all he has and all he needs."

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—Some few weeks ago, in making mention of the weights of certain British coins, you said that six half-pennies, "slightly worn," weigh an ounce. That is rather indefinite. I think you will find that three pennies, or five half-pennies weigh an ounce. I enclose list of the standard weights and measurements of British coins, in case they may be of any use to you or any of your correspondents.

I remain, yours truly, A. BRADSHAW.

DEAR SIR,—I think your readers may be interested in the following cutting from the Lady's Pictorial of March 14th:—

"Princess Mary Adelaide, Duchess of Teck, is particularly devoted to her eldest grandson, whom she calls by the last of his seven names (David), and of whom she is exceedingly proud. He is a fine, manly little lad, and bright and sunny of disposition. Should he come to be generally known as Prince David, it would be an auspicious cognomen, if unusual, for an English king. It appears, however, to be handsome, genial, Princess Mary's, special pet name for her grandson."

One's thoughts cannot help stretching forward and wondering what the future of this royal child of the House of Judah may be, and whether he may one day reign over the re-united Twelve Tribes (as foretold by Ezekiel) when once more settled in their own land.

I am, dear Sir, yours truly, ANGLIA.

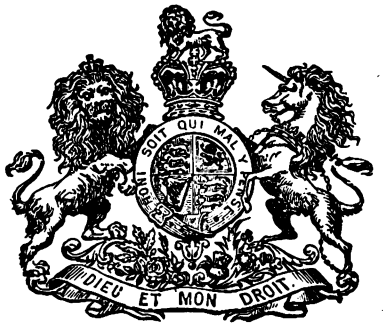
THE WORLD'S COAL PRODUCTION.

INTERESTING FIGURES.



THE report of Sir R. Giffen to the Board of Trade on the coal production of the principal countries of the world shows that in 1894 the exports from the United Kingdom were 42,690,000 tons. Germany, the next largest coal producing country, is credited with an export of 12,345,000, while Belgium, third on the list, exported only 6,263,000. Among the countries which import coal in excess of the amount they export is France, with an excess import of 9,571,000 tons. In the year named (1894) the estimated number of persons employed in the production of coal in Great Britain was 665,747, in Germany 299,627, in Belgium 117,103, and in France 131,587.—(Deut. xxviii. 1 and 13, and viii. 18.)

THE MATABELE RISING AND THE RAILWAYS AS OUR WEAPON OF DEFENCE.

THE news in respect to the progress of the Matabele Rebellion seems to increase in gravity day by day. The whole Matabele nation, joined by other native tribes, are up in arms and seem resolved to stamp out the British and other intruders in their land, fighting us this time, not with assegais but with rifles, with which our over-confidence in our native enemies, usual with our nation in India and elsewhere, has armed the Matabele Native Police Force we employed before the outbreak. The Police, of course, were the first to join the rebels, and they absconded with their rifles and ammunition, since used with deadly effect on their late employers! We seem, nationally, both in England and at the Cape, to have despised the enemy. The fault which gave the Mutinies in India their awful power—namely, our reluctance to believe in native treachery or their power to combine—seems already to be working mischief in respect to the Matabele rebellion. The Cape is absurdly underarmed in respect to the British garrison, and the Government, appealed to by the Press at home and the public opinion at the Cape, still refuses to stir or add to the feeble British force in the Cape Colony! The following is part of the Times cable report, published on April 13, in London, illustrating this point:—

The news of the straits in which the white inhabitants of Rhodesia are placed, has evoked a strong public feeling throughout South Africa, that prompter and fuller measures should be taken to suppress the revolt, whether the additional men are under Imperial command or not.

The resources of South Africa are ample. Serviceable volunteers accustomed to native warfare will offer themselves in every quarter if the authorities will respond. Useful native levies could be raised instantly. It is also felt that an urgent duty rests upon the Imperial Government to guard against any native disturbance in the Bechuanaland Protectorate arising out of the measures necessarily taken for the extirpation of rinderpest, since if any native troubles arose upon the line of march from Mafeking the situation in Bulawayo would become most critical.

The disturbance has taken place at a vast distance from the Cape, and the help that is going forward under Government orders from Mafeking, under Colonel Plumer, has only just begun to send the relief in men, ammunition, and food urgently called for, at the rate of fifty men a day, who will reach the seat of war in three weeks! The whole of the 500 men and horses will take months to get to the front from the date of the departure of the first detachment. It is clear, therefore, that the insurrection has come upon the Government perfectly unawares; but now that matters are looking as black as they can be, there seems a want of preparation and an inability to realise the serious nature of the outbreak: perhaps, also, a timid wish to avoid alarming the Boers by a show of military force in the neighbourhood of the Transvaal frontiers! We believe it will not be long before the acute stage of this trouble will be reached, when the Home Government will be compelled to take steps to reinforce the weak British garrisons on the coasts of South Africa, and to pour in the help, in ammunition and food, required, by the Beira route. The railway from that port is approaching Umtali, in the confines of Mashonaland, on the road to Salisbury. As reported by the Herald, Mr. Rhodes, at Salisbury, is of opinion that "a rapid development of railways would put an end to these troubles;" which, no doubt, they would. The account in the Times of April 13th, of the progress of the Beira Railway from the coast to Chimoio, is marvellous, showing that the South African railways, once completed, will be the means of subduing the native enemies of the British. The account is as follows:—

BEIRA AND BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA

The rapidly-growing importance of Beira to the trade of British South Africa is shown by a report from Mr. Ross, the British Consul at Beira, which has just been issued by the Foreign Office. In 1892 the transit trade of Beira amounted only to £440; in 1894 it was £42,300, and last year £142,960, and would have been much more had there not been a breakdown in the wagon transport for three or four of the best months of the year in consequence of the destruction of the pasture from Chimoio onwards by drought and locusts. Rates from Chimoio to Salisbury went up from 15s. to £2 4s. per 100lb., which stopped all imports of prospecting and mining material, and limited even the supply of the necessaries of life. The great increase which took place in spite of these is due to the natural progress of the country and to the greater facility and rapidity afforded by the addition of 43 miles to the railway, so that the journey to Salisbury has been reduced for passengers to less than a week at a cost of £14, and for goods to three weeks at £25 to £35 per ton. A survey for the line between Chimoio and Umtali commenced in November, and will soon be completed. The country through which the route passes offers considerable engineering difficulties, and two years is the shortest time in which the line could be laid. If it is completed, and Mashonaland prove as rich as is expected, the transit trade at Beira will increase immensely. The line from Beira to Fontesvilla is progressing rapidly, and will shortly be opened to traffic. Passengers usually start from Fontesvilla in the morning, spend a night at the 80-mile station, reach Chimoio early in the forenoon of the next day, and in the afternoon leave by post-cart for Umtali. This is drawn by oxen, and takes two days to cover the 75 miles. At Umtali mules take the place of oxen, and the remaining 150 miles to Salisbury take two days. The country is very rough and uneven, and the road is in bad order. On the Umtali-Salisbury section the contractors get a subsidy of £3,000 a year; the carts run each way once a week. Last year the transit trade of Germany into British South Africa, through Beira, amounted to £7,160; of France, £1,365; of Great Britain, £70,840; of Bombay and Zanzibar, £1,480: of the Cape, £22,100; of Natal, £31,340; and of Port Elizabeth, £3,275; so that Great Britain and her colonies sent nine-tenth of these transit imports.

The British, of course, possess the lion's share of the trade, which is as it should be. But it will be seen from the maps that the route from the sea to Matabeleland is far the shortest by the railway from Beira to the disturbed districts. If completed now, they would have enabled us, with God's help, speedily to put down our savage enemies by pushing forward men and material, with food, to the spot, where already all are so sorely needed.

Since the above was written, we have seen it notified by the Cape Government that reinforcements are to leave the Cape and Natal at once for the front; the 7th Hussars furnishing 300 men and 150 Mounted Infantry from Natal, with 100 trained Mounted Infantry from the Cape Town garrison. Besides the above, 100 men who are volunteers have left Johannesburg by rail for Mafeking, with a detachment of Volunteers from Kimberley for the same place. This spot, being due west of Pretoria, is the present terminus of the Northern line, whence all detachments must proceed by road towards Bulawayo in the North, several hundred miles distant. Time is an ingredient in the problem before us. But no doubt our God is guiding His people, and having allowed these grave dangers to encompass them, He is preparing to rescue them from the impending danger. We believe troops from this country will ere long be sent to the Cape and Natal to strengthen the garrisons there; and there is no lack of colonists ready and willing to help if the Government will only give the order. The following, from the Times of April 14th, is encouraging:—

Cape Town, April 13.

Mr. Duncan has applied to Sir Hercules Robinson, from Bulawayo, for a further force of 500 whites and 500 Basuto scouts.

The South African Telegraph, in an article to-day on the Matabele rising, says:—

"A strong party in England seems to think that it is positively necessary to send troops to suppress the outbreak. South Africa, however, is strong enough to squelch any trouble of this kind. We are not among those who fear the presence of Imperial troops in South Africa, because we have the strongest belief in the good faith of the Imperial Government during recent events. We only fear lest the home authorities may be wrongly informed. All know how unfitted the average soldier is for this kind of work, and Sir Hercules Robinson was quite right in advising that reinforcements were not needed. Thousands of men in this country have seen service and know the natives well, and it would be possible to raise at least 2,000 colonials to relieve the whites in Matabeleland in a few weeks. Meanwhile, the settlers should laager and await reliefs."

Our difficulties are God's opportunities. Let Israel, therefore, praise Him for His mercy towards His people!

NOTES UPON THE CATHOLIC AND APOSTOLIC CHURCH OF BRITAIN,

Which originated from the Mother Church of Jerusalem in the Year of our Lord 39, by Joseph of Arimathea, Lazarus, Aristobulus, and St. Paul.

BY FERRAR FENTON.

A.D. 38-9. Joseph of Arimathea and friends, flying from Jerusalem to escape Paul's persecution, arrive in Britain. Built the first church at the Isle of Avalon, called now Glastonbury, which was regarded as the most holy place of Britain for 1,500 years after, and free from taxes in consequence.

52. Conversion at Rome of Claudia, the British princess, daughter of Caractacus, the Dictator-King of Britain, who had been adopted by the Roman Emperor Claudius. She married and converted the Roman senator and general, Rufus Pudens, supposed to be St. Paul's half-brother.

56-58. St. Paul went to Rome to appeal to Cæsar. Stayed at her palace.

60. St. Paul visits Britain with her and her husband and family, her sister Eurgain, and brother Ilid, whom he appointed Bishop of Britain, and they founded the college of Cor-Ilid, or Bangor-Iscoed, upon St. Paul's rule, to train missionaries and clergy.

165. The Christian faith adopted by the Britons, under Lewer Mawr, in Latin Lucius.

305. Constantine, the British Christian, Roman Pro-Consul of Britain, declared Emperor of Rome at York by the British army, and establishes the Christian faith of his native land (Britain) as that of the whole empire (305 to 323).

350. Pelagius, in British tongue Morgan, chief professor of Bangor-Iscoed, first attempted to arrange Christian doctrine on a scientific basis. His genius and eloquence in Latin or British (or Kymraeg) tongues have left their stamp on theological science to our day.

460-544. St. David reformed the British Church and sent St. Patrick to convert Ireland.

449-600. The Anglo-Saxon conquest of South-east of Britain, when Norse heathenism became the faith of the military aristocracy in the eastern half of England, from the German Ocean to the Midland counties, whilst the subject masses of the people there remained Christian.

Digitized by Google

West of the Midlands and in Scotland and Ireland the Church remained the faith of all classes.

597. First attempt of the Romanist Papacy to acquire power over the British Church by Augustine of Canterbury's mission to Ethelbert, Saxon King of Kent, from Pope Gregory the First. Converts Ethelbert, but the Synod of the British Church repudiated and refused to acknowledge the supremacy of Rome.

664. Second attempt of Rome to obtain domination over the British Church made under Wilfred and Paulinus at the Synod of Whitby. The Saxon King of Northumberland accepts it, but the bishops and representatives of the Church reject it. Forty years civil war followed, Wilfred attempting to force it on, and Oswy trying to banish the British bishops and subject the clergy.

750. Tithes first noted by Egbert, Archbishop of York, as payable to the clergy. No doubt a continuation of the old Druidic times, as in all nations, heathen or other, tenths were a usual religious offering. That they were of voluntary origin to the Church, and not a general nationally imposed tax, is proved by the fact that Ethelwolf, King of Mercia in 855, granted tithes of his own private estates for ever to maintain clergy.

1066. Norman conquest of England and imposition of the Roman supremacy in that part of Britain, and a steady attempt made to support it and destroy the national Church of the people by the introduction of Papal dissenting sects, called monastic orders. Monasteries encouraged in all parts for foreign orders of monks who were not subject to the British or English bishops, but only to their own sectarian chiefs or generals and the Pope of Rome. The marriage of the English clergy was forbidden, and all married priests expelled from their parishes.

1210. King John, however, first acknowledged the subjection to Rome by agreeing to pay "Peter's Pence," as a sign that a national Church had ceased to exist, and that only a branch of the Roman was in being. The nation thereupon revolted against him and the Pope, and obtained Magna Charta, securing and asserting for ever the independence of the British Church and liberties.

1250-1390. The nation and parochial clergy revolt against the Romish usurpation, backed by Wycliffe and the University of Oxford, which refused to allow a Romish monk to hold office or preach there.

1400. The first act to persecute the members of the British Church obtained by monastic fraud, and the fourth attempt of Rome to supersede the national church made under the leadership of Arundel, an ex-monk, who had bought the Archbishopric of Canterbury from Henry IV. War with France was excited to draw off the national attention from this design, and all the sectarian monasteries contributed largely to the funds for the beginning of that war under Henry V., the wealthiest even pawning their table plate, as well as the sacramental vessels, for the object. Monasticism rapidly increased, and in the confusion of the following Wars of the Roses, the monks seized a large part of the glebe lands and tithes, and even parish churches, from the national Church.

1492. Restoration of the ancient British royal line in the Tudor dynasty by Henry VII., when the government decided to force the monasteries to disgorge their plunder.

1509-47. The operation began systematically under Henry VIII. and his strong national parliaments. All chantries for souls were abolished as a superstitious practice always forbidden by law. Church buildings and the land and tithes belonging thereto were restored to the parishes and use of the British Church. Lands and tithes obtained by the monasteries themselves confiscated and restored to the heirs-at-law of the donors, or sold for national use. With considerable part, however, of them, colleges, schools, new bishoprics, and parishes were established.

1551-2. Re-organization of the British Church fully planned under Edward VI., but left incomplete at his death.

1553. Fifth attempt of Rome to destroy the Church of Britain under Mary.

1558. Accession of Elizabeth, "Good Queen Bess," who, under Archbishop Parker, fully restored the sole supremacy of the Apostolic British Church, by a reformation of the abuses of doctrine and practice introduced since 1066 by the Roman monastic sects, and the attempted restoration of them under her sister and predecessors, Philip and Mary. The whole nation heartily consented, and a period of such high pride and delight ensued in the British people, freed from the curse and worry of sectarian strife, that the nation adopted the title of "Merrie England," as a distinction from the world without. The general enthusiastic triumph, at length being free in mind as well as body, produced a tropical luxuriance of genius in literature, statesmanship, war, discovery, commerce, and philosophical origination and research, such as our race never before or since displayed, and which at once placed our nation in the forefront of the civilized world, just as a similar period of triumph did Old Israel under David and Solomon.

1570. Roman dissent again organized by Pope Pius V., who sent emissaries out to create religious divisions among the people.

1571. Followed by the start of Protestant dissent by Brown originating the sect of the Independents, whose theory rejects the idea of a national or State Church, and asserts each congregation to be an "independent church." Hence, now called "Congregationalists," but at first "Brownists," after their founder.

1605. Attempt of the Gunpowder Plotters to destroy the national British Church by blowing up the Parliament Houses, with the Commons, Lords, and Bishops, and Royal Family, on the 5th November, but prevented by one of the gang informing.

1623-40. Union of the Stuart dynasty and the Papacy to subject the British Church to the jurisdiction of Rome. See letter of Charles to the Pope, given in Macfarlane's History of England. During this period, probably at the subtle instigation of Jesuit conspirators, innumerable sects, some professing the most blasphemous and profligate and absurd doctrines, suddenly sprang up to assail the National Church, and that Church itself was filled in its highest offices by men who laboured to overthrow and enslave her to the Papacy at the bidding of their promoters, the Stuart family, who were on the throne.

1641. But all were defeated by the Long Parliament. (See debates of the Parliament, 1640-41, published from day to day. A rare old volume, a copy of which of that date is in the hands of the author of this diagram.) Charles I., attempting to carry his designs against the National Church, began war, and originated the Great Rebellion, which resulted in his death, and ultimate safety to the Church, after desultory attempts of the sectarians to supplant her.

1656. Cromwell, sick and wearied of the contention, rancour, and bitterness of the sectarians, resolved upon the reorganisation of the British Church, and restored and confirmed her endowments, declaring he would collect her tithes and rents by his troops if needed.

Digitized by Google

1662. The intention of the restoration of our great National Church to legal station effected, all the population assenting, with the exception of a few led by Baxter and Calamy, about 200 in number, and Howe, who formed the modern sect of Independents.

1665-88. The second attempt to introduce the Papacy by the Stuarts, not as under Charles I., by leaving the doctrine and ritual of the old Catholic Apostolic Church practically untouched, and the Roman Bishop only to be acknowledged as a Supreme Archbishop or Pontiff, as had been effected for short periods in former ages, as shown above, but by a total destruction of the British Church of Jerusalem, and a full substitution of that of Pagan Rome. Charles II. and James II. on the throne.

1688. Final revolt of the British Church and nation against the Papacy in all forms, either as a dominant power or as an absolute substitute for herself. On this occasion, as by a divine impulse, her most bitter sectarian assailants united heart and hand with the national bishops and clergy to expel her old enemy for ever. The result being the Revolution of 1688, and the complete declaration that the Apostolic Church of Britain was sprung direct from the first Church of Jerusalem, and representing "the faith of Abraham," was the exponent and the guardian of the religion of the British race. This was accompanied by the adoption in civil statesmanship of the imperial policy of John Milton and Cromwell, that the British race were the inheritors of the promises made to Abraham and his seed, with the addition of the dominating and organizing power of old Rome. And, as a corollary, that it was our duty to become a conquering and a colonizing people, so as by that to secure the means in all parts of the world to display the power of the God of Israel, and spread the light of His revelation before all heathen and Papal nations. To this end the rights of British citizenship were offered to all Jews or Israelites, who were invited to settle in England and her dominions at a time when the Jew was regarded as a slave through the world, and denied citizenship in all other lands. From the events of 1688, accordingly, the two great British Church Societies were founded, with the full approbation of the civil government—those of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts—which two began the great educational and missionary works that have developed the powers of civilization at home and abroad, and in reality have given birth to a new and better civilisation than any old philosophy had ever dreamed of. The foundations of this work were completed by 1704, the accession of Queen Anne, whose "Bounty" donation to the Church also began the mighty movement for parochial church extension in the British Isles, so as to meet the spiritual wants of an increasing population.

1701-40. The moral reformation of the people began by Bishop Beveridge and others in the foundation of "The Society for the Reformation of Manners," and the introduction of evangelical work by societies or "classes" of lay workers. Whilst Sir Richard Steel, aided by his friend Addison, engaged to help the movement by purifying literature from the Papal defilement of vice introduced during the Romanising attempts of the Stuarts. He showed that genius and vice were not synonymous, but that faith, purity, and wit were three sisters, never to be separated without mutual injury.

1760. Accession of George III., who entered ardently into their movement, and powerfully patronised the chief workers in it, after the death of Beveridge, by patronising Whitfield, the Wesleys, Romaine, Toplady, and Lancaster the Educator, as well as by selecting for the higher offices of the Church men of pure moral character and learning.

1795. Modern dissent was originated, after Wesley's death, at the Leeds Conference of his followers in 1795, a considerable part deciding to secede from working in active union with the National Church. But the larger portion of his followers remained, without doubt, within the British Church, and formed the party called "Evangelicals," gradually developed.

1811. The Church National School Society established as an extension of the Christian Knowledge Society, which had originated by a bequest from Robert Boyle, the founder of modern chemical science, over a century before, but whose powers were not equal to the vastly extended field demanding cultivation. Decision also taken to extend our Church organisation to India and the Colonies.

1828. The renewal of Romish power in England, which began in 1780, and culminated in the Catholic Emancipation, and re-admission to all State affairs of Roman Catholics.

1833. Reaction against the effect of this manifested in the movement of the High Church party, the offspring of the Evangelical one. This party, by a renewed research into our Church history, pointed out to the nation the Eastern origin of the National Church, and has ardently sought to effect reunion with the Oriental churches.

1840-44. The British Church system of polity or government extended to all our colonies and dependencies by means of colonial bishoprics. This movement had begun in 1784, when the first extension of the Episcopate of the British Church was effected in the United States after their declaration of Independence, at the request of the ex-colonists themselves. The next step was in 1813, when the Episcopate was organised in India under Wilson and Heber, but the work was now fully completed for all our colonies and dominions.

1844-70. United struggle of confederated Nonconformist, Romanist, and Infidel parties against the growing and expanding British Church, resulting in the confiscation, or "disendowment" as politely called, of the property of the branch of the Apostolic Church in Ireland.

1870-86. Continued struggle of the confederates to proceed to the same end upon the Church in Britain. Yet, amidst it all, the enlightenment of the Church and her spiritual life continued to increase, and the masses of the British race returned to her with all the old fervour of the mediæval battle against the Papacy and disbelief. So that, in spite of the attempt made by Mr. W. E. Gladstone, the eminent statesman, to drive the Church from educating the nation, by forming a system of State-endowed schools, the fundamental idea of which was and is to prohibit the teaching of the Christian faith in any form in them, the Church, by the will of the people, continues to educate three-fourths of our population. So that the anomaly of a supposed Christian Parliament and Government making their professed faith the only kind of knowledge it forbids to be taught to its people has failed to produce the result intended, and the masses are brought to cling more closely to the faith of the God of their fathers than before,—a beautiful illustration of the promises made to our fathers during the time when our Church wandered in the Arabian wilderness, "No weapon formed against thee shall prosper."

GENERAL NOTES.

As will be seen by the above, the British Church is a direct branch of the original Church of Christ, founded by the Messiah at Jerusalem, and therefore is correctly called the Catholic and Apostolic Church of Britain, more popularly, of England. It is not only the first Church founded outside the realm of Israel in Palestine, but the British nation were the first people in Europe to accept it and the Christian faith it embodied as their national religion, which they did A.D. 165, or 140 years earlier than any continental people. In fact, the Continent and Rome herself only ceased to persecute the faith when in 313 Constantine the Great, after the battle of the Milvian Bridge, at the head of his victorious army of Christian Britons, forced it upon that reluctant city. We need not repeat that Constantine was not only a Roman general, but also a native British prince in right of his mother, Helena, as he was a Roman by his father, Constantine Chlorus. This imposition of the Christian faith on heathen Europe and Asia by a victorious Prince and army we hope to be typical of the destiny of our race and Church, whose mission in the world is by conquest and just government to impose the worship of Jehovah upon all nations in the near future, as the old House of Israel did upon Canaan and the East in the earlier operations of the Divine Will. Constantine was by ancestry a descendant of Caractacus, the most dangerous opponent Rome ever met and conquered, if we believe her own historians, and our beloved Queen Victoria is stated by genealogists to be the same through the Tudors, by virtue of which origin she reigns over us. It is of interest as a curious fact that the reigning monarch of Britain is by inheritance a Canon of St. David's Cathedral, and that our Queen Victoria is one. Her stall is always kept ready for her entry in that Church. It would be an interesting event if anyone were to induce Her Majesty to actually enter upon her right. Why not? All her loyal subjects would be glad to see it, especially those of her own blood in Wales. Who will ask her? It would be an event in our history. Especially if she read the lessons in her beautiful voice.—(See "The Queen's Descent from King David the Psalmist.")

Moreover, this Apostolic British Church never ceased to exist, but was continued as the Church of the subject masses during the Saxon period of aristocratic Norse paganism, ranging during the period of conquest from 449 to 597-664. At the first of these dates, 597, the south Saxons abandoned heathenism, and at the latter period, 664, the north Anglo-Saxons did the same, but the latter, under Oswy, King of Northumberland, adopted the Roman ritual in place of the old British one, at least amongst the Saxon aristocracy.

REVENUES OF THE CHURCH.

During this long period of our Church's existence, for over 1,800 years, the accumulation of revenues given by the pious and benevolent of former ages, and over and above all others for the necessary support of those who attend to the altar, has been large. The kings were to be her nursing fathers, and queens her nursing mothers, as they have been and are. All her revenues have been originated voluntarily during the course of years, the nation as such never having granted an endowment. It has been estimated by careful statisticians that during the period called the pre-Reformationary, 1,500 years, equal to a yearly income of £1,950,000 had been given; whilst since then, in only 300 years, there has been given voluntarily equal to an income of £2,250,000, a proof of greater popularity since than before that period.

WHAT TURKS AND ARABS THINK REGARDING THE TURKISH EMPIRE.

"WHILST spending this winter in Cairo I had frequent occasion to speak, and to speak very freely, with Arabs from all parts, and also with Turks of high and low degree, and could only wonder at the unanimity with which all expressed themselves concerning the impossibility of the duration of the present régime. Military men and Ulema, Sheikhs, politicians, and merchants, only had one voice to condemn and deplore the corruption and rottenness of the Empire. I remarked earlier that I intended to give a striking proof of the hatred of the Arabs for the Turks of to-day, and cannot more fittingly illustrate all I have already said than by relating the following incident, the full significance of which will, unfortunately, only be understood by the few who are aware of the sanctity of the surrounding circumstances. The story is as follows, told by one present:—During the annual pilgrimage lately, whilst a small and select party from Syria and Constantinople were visiting the shrines at Mecca, the Sheik ul Islam, ushering them into the Most Holy Place and standing before the Beit-Ullah, or Tabernacle of God, prayed aloud that the scourge of Turkey might be quickly removed from them, even if it were by the English taking over the guardianship of Mecca and Medina. The pilgrims were thunderstruck, but kept silence; but the tale is now slowly being passed along, and probably losing nothing in the telling—another weapon winging its way towards fated Yildiz. Nothing can be added which would lend additional force to this picture of the feelings of the latter-day Arabs towards their Ottoman Suzerain, and with this little anecdote the letter may appropriately close."

The above appeared in The Scotsman of April 11th, being the words of a correspondent of the Standard on the subject of "The Arabs and the Sultan." The friend who sent us the paper heads the article with a quotation from Ezekiel xxv. 14, and Obed. 21st: "I will lay My vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel; and they shall do in Edom according to Mine anger and according to My fury, and they shall know My vengeance, saith the Lord." Also, "And Saviours shall come up on Mount Zion to judge the Mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's."

On all sides, at the present time, we see the Turkish Empire the object of the hatred of its own subjects. The end is obviously drawing near, but what will lead to the fatal blow which God's people Israel are to inflict, no one can yet guess. It has not been revealed. Men must therefore wait till the fulness of the time shall come, and then the Turkish woe will have passed away, and the Russian "war-woe" will be at the doors. The catastrophe is awaited with alarm by the nations of Europe, for they know it will be succeeded by "an earthquake such as there was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, so great." And then the last word of the Eastern Question will be spoken—viz., "Who shall have Constantinople?" Sir Arthur Cotton, in his letter, published on p. 204 of the present BANNER, makes a very interesting suggestion to the effect that Constantinople will not exist at all as an object which the nations will covet, as it will, he believes, become an active volcano according to the meaning of Isa. xxxiv. 1 to 15, wherein the present capital of Turkish Edom stands for Idumea and Bozrah. In Ezek. xxxv. 1 to 15, we have another prophecy against Mount Seir (a prophetic name for Edom and Idumea), declaring that the Lord will pursue Edom with blood. "I will make thee perpetual desolations; . . . I will make Mount Seir most desolate, and cut off from it, him that passeth out and him that returneth." The reason of this severity is clearly stated in this chapter: "Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred and hast shed the blood of the children of Israel by the force of the sword in the time of their calamity . . . I will prepare thee unto blood . . ." "As thou didst rejoice over the inheritance of the House of Israel because it was desolate, so will I do unto thee. Thou shalt be desolate, O Mount Seir, and all Edom, even all of it, and they shall know that I am the Lord" (ver. 15, R.V.).

That the desolation of Edom's land shall be the result of a volcanic and continuous outburst seems indicated by ver. 9 and 10, R.V., which reads thus, "And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up for ever; from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it for ever and ever."

It has occurred to some that the allusion, in ver. 7, to "the wild oxen coming down with them (the lambs and goats), and bullocks with the bulls," is a figure to represent that the British will also be present at the outpouring of God's vengeance on Edom, and have a hand in it; because the two symbols here named (the wild oxen and bulls) are the prophetic symbols of England. We hardly can concur in this, because the symbol of the lion is lacking. Further, in the parallel passage in Isa. lxiii. 1 to 6, R.V., we have it stated that the Lord comes from Edom, with the blood-crimsoned garments from Bozrah, because "He hath trodden the winepress alone, and of the peoples there was no man with Me." "There was none to help." Israel, therefore, is to be absent, not present, at that awful scene of punishment of the Edomite foes of His people and of the Lord Himself! Because of that gracious interposition Israel's hymn of praise and supplication is the subject of the rest of the chapter, vers. 7 to 14, R.V.

In Isa. xxxiv. 7, R.V., the reference to wild oxen, bullocks, and bulls, with the blood thereof, seems to refer to the universality of the destruction to be effected in Edom and Bozrah. Not the lambs and goats only, but the bulls, the bullocks, and the wild reem also, will be destroyed, the weak and the strong together, and the land will be drunken with their blood. "For that is the day of the Lord's vengeance, the year of recompense in the controversy of Zion" (ver. 8). For Israel's preservation in that day, let the people of the Lord, even Israel, praise His holy name for ever. Isa. xxxv. 1 to 10, R.V.

"ADMIRAL SIR GEORGE TRYON, OF H.M.S. VICTORIA."

EXTRACTS from Review of Reviews (page 13), dated London, July 15th, 1893 :—

"One-fourth of the world, being land, is divided into a considerable number of States more or less insignificant, among which some half-a-dozen great Powers stand conspicious. The remaining three-fourths of the world being salt sea, is divided into several huge satrapies, over each of which reigns with supreme, although not exclusive, sovereignity the British admiral who is, for the time being, Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station. Of these great watery dominions the most important, although almost the smallest, is the Mediterranean, and among the great potentates of the world the Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean Station ranks among the first. This may sound hyperbolical to those who have never been at sea. Possibly enough many of our readers may be somewhat incredulous as they hear, perhaps for the first time, of authorities whose existence is not hinted at even in Mr. Arnold Foster's patriotic 'Citizen Reader,' but that is because they have lived like earthworms in their holes in the ground, and have never in all their lives once realized that the familiar song of 'Rule Britannia,' however bombastic it may sound on land, is sober, serious fact the moment you embark upon the sea.

"It is not until you are out of sight of land that some faint, far-away conception of the might and majesty, the power and glory of the sovereignty of the sea begins to dawn upon the mind. But as day follows day, and everywhere across the billowy expanse, from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same, you are alone between two infinitudes, the firmament above and the abyss of waters below, you begin to understand. And as you cross the track of the innumerable argosies which are ceaselessly engaged in bearing the garnered wealth of the harvests of the world to the Thames and the Mersey, the Humber and the Clyde, when almost every ship you pass flies the English flag or is bound to British ports, the sense of the magnificence of our ocean heritage imperceptibly deepens. And when after a tour round the world, you find you visit no port that is not crowded with British shipping, that every mile of the endless circle you never passed out of range of the authority of some British admiral, wielding an actual ever-present force, stronger than that of any rival Power, and irresistible by reason of the limitless resources of the Empire at his back, the great truth dawns upon your mind, and you begin to realize, more or less dimly, the reality of the overlordship of the sea.

"Her Majesty Queen Victoria reigns on the Thames; but her sea kings both reign and rule on every ocean between the poles. Sea king is no mere phrase as applied to the Admiral Commander-in-Chief of a British Naval Station. His fleet is an array of floating fortresses, detached for a time from their native land, and he himself is the living personification, the incarnate embodiment of the Empire. On all the world's broad surface no living man wields more absolute authority than the Admiral on the quarter-deck, nor have Tzar and Kaiser, in all their hosts, more obedient subjects than he. He is monarch and diplomatist and warrior and judge all in one. He is the warden of the watery marches, the naval overlord of the ocean. It is he who sustains the fabric of our Colonial possessions. Without him and his warships our world-circling fortresses would be as worthless as the Pyramids. It is his patrols which make the traffic on the trade routes from continent to continent as safe from molestation as the tramways in Hackney and Islington. And this puissant sovereignty, built up by the valour and the labour and the lives of successive generations of British seamen, is maintained to this day by the same means, and exercised as of old in the ever present menace of Death.

"When Admiral Tyron went down with his ship, a great man and a ruler in our naval Israel perished in his prime."

THE REGNANT SCOT.

By J. B. S.

In a British contemporary, there lately appeared an article, on the Queen's blood nationality. After exhaustive research from genealogical data, the writer proves that Queen Victoria is consanguineously related to Germany with $\frac{6}{64}$ths, and to France with $\frac{2}{64}$ths, thus leaving in her nationality composition only $\frac{1}{64}$th of "British" blood. If, for the general term "British," we read the specific term, Scotish, the national consanguinity of our Queen stands unique, for it is this $\frac{1}{64}$th alone which is the one factor in bequeathing to her the first of the regnant titles she hereditarily possesses, that of Queen o' Scots. For, with that one-sixty-fourth of Scotish blood in her veins, our good Queen, as the successional descendant of the last of the Scotish kings to reign at Edwinsberg, she is:—firstly, the Queen o' Scots, and, secondly, the Queen of England, for there never yet was a king of Scotland, or of the land of the Scots, and though some of the monarchs of England have, on isolated occasions, assumed the popular title, yet, as kings of England, and not of the English, are they historically known. Louis Phillipe, king of the French, was never king of France, while on the other hand, his predecessors were all kings of France, so that the popular title of Louis Philippe is to be looked upon as merely an incidental one, granted him by popular acclamation. Kaiser William, the German Bretwalda, though king of Prussia, from his Brandenburg descent, is not the Emperor of Germany (though he claims it!) nor is he Emperor of the Germans, but simply the German Emperor. His position amongst the princes of the Germanic or Allemanic Confederacy is that of Bretwalda, as was the case during the Anglo-Saxon Heptarchic period, when the dominant Prince of seven-kingdomed England sat in the council of the Witenagemot, as Regium Rex or Bretwalda.

In Judah's-land, or in Israel's-land there never was a king who bore the territorial, in contradistinction to the popular, title—they were all kings of Israel, or, of Judah and upon the Cross of Calvary, with the finger of destiny pointing thereto, the very words of the Roman superscription ran thus:—"Jesus Nazaraeus Rex ille Judaeorum."

Here we have the title, King of the Jews—not of Judah's-land. With this most ancient regal title, "The King o' Scots," which is to be found in all our most ancient records and legal documents, and rigidly adhered to, up to the assumption of the Crown of England by James VI., King o' Scots, and up to the present hour, we have the identical regal title as borne by the kings of the people of the covenant, thus affording to us one more of the innumerable proofs we already possess of the Israelitish Identity and the regnant destiny of the Scotish race.

In 1st Samuel 10th chapter, there is the account of the anointing or installation of Saul as king of Israel, but not of the land of Israel! and in the 24th verse of the said chapter, we have the first time in Holy Writ the popular acclamation: "God save the King," so that the salutation given at the coronation of the first of Israel's kings, in 1095 B.C., is composed of the identical words of our National Anthem in 1895 A.D., and at the present moment belong to no monarch on earth save the successional descendant of James VI. the King o' Scots! The British Constitution is tri-partite, consisting of "The King, the Lords, and the Commons," and according to Israel's law in the furthest West the generic, and not the sexual, term being always applicable, the Queen is always King!

From the days of Moses, the first leader, the rulers of the children of the covenant had all borne, like the Kings o' Scots, the popular, instead of the territorial regnant, title. In the 76th Psalm (sung by the Remnant on the day of Drumclog, A.D. 1689), "In Judah's-land God is well known, His name in Israel's great;" the terms, "in Israel," "of Israel," and "over Israel," are all of them Bible terms, referring in every case to the people and not to the land inhabited by the people. In reviewing all these stern and stubborn facts that openly confront us, even the destiny-Identity student is apt to exclaim, like the Rabbi of old, "How can these things be?" Yet these things are; Holy Writ declares them, and profane history confirms them. There never was a king of Israel's-land, and there never was a king of Scotland.

Edwinsberg, now Edinburgh, the present capital of the Scoti, was anciently the Berg or stronghold of the kings of North-Humber-land, delimiting their kingdom and held by them as a sallying point to prevent the further ingression of the Scots. At Scone, the ancient capital of the Scots, whereat rested, for many ages, the Stone of Destiny, brought from Innisfail (Insula Fatale, or Island of the Fatal Stone), the kings o' Scots were all crowned, and under conditions similar to the coronation of the kings of Israel. That self-same stone of destiny now rests in the coronation throne at Westminster, and thitherward was James VI., King o' Scots called, and, in England, his successional descendent, in the person of Victoria first, reigns as Queen o' Scots, Queen of England, and Empress of India, for these are her titles, given in their successional order. Not as the lineal descendent of any other of the monarchs of Europe, does Victoria, the Queen o' Scots, reign over England and over "an Empire whereon the sun never sets," but as the crown-assumptive descendant of the last of Scotish kings who independently ruled over the Scoti before changing his Taht-gah* from Edinburgh to London. As king o' Scots, all that were possible, but not as king of Scotland—with the latter, the title would have merged into that of England, and the identity lost, but as King o' Scots, the identily is paramount and ineradicable. It is a vulgar error, having the credence of the many uneducated, to believe that Scotland is united with England—geographically that is so, but, politically, the Crown of England is united to that of the Scoti, as, it was assumed by one who was at the time an independent King of an independent Nation. These are the historic facts, and the logical deduction is that the Crown of England is subsidiary to that of the Scots. Some centuries before the Scotish assumption of the Crown of England, "Proud Edward" by means of a prospective marriage, endeavoured to effect the political union of the two countries, but destiny forbade him! Had such an event come to pass

* Taht-gah—Throne-city, or Metropolis.

(at man's proposal!), there would have been no independent king's assumption of England's Crown by a Regnant Scot; no truth in the basis of British-Israelism, and in the prophecy that:

"Wherever rests this Holy Stane,
The Scotish race shall surely reign."

would have become a truthless prediction. But, happily for the logical basis of British-Israelism, these things have not come to pass, but the successional descendant of the crown-assuming King o' Scots now reigns over the greatest of the world's empires, which is but the fulfilment of destiny. "God save the Queen."

"WATCH."

By B. Hailes.

"What strange times we live in! What is coming next?" Such has been the not infrequent greeting which has passed between friends since the year 1896 began—and, truly, ere the first quarter of the year has run out, we have seen and heard strange things! No sooner had our feelings been stirred by mingled anger and sorrow at the very prospect of a disagreement with our brother Manasseh, than they were almost forgotten in the all-absorbing news from the Transvaal, and the wave of indignation which followed the German Emperor's message to Oom Paul. We are still on the tenter hooks of expectation, wondering what will come out during the trial, and by what means the assured supremacy of Britain in South Africa will be brought about. Side by side with this runs our anxiety about Armenia and the outcome of the Turkish question. We are no longer asked to believe in "the concert of the Powers;" that policy has evidently resulted in failure, and already it seems that M. Edouard Hervé was right when he said, "The Turkish gendarme having proved inadequate, a European gendarme will be called up to interfere. Who would be that gendarme? He must be either Russian or English." For the present it seems as if he would be Russian, and with Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. open before us, is it possible not to feel that within measurable time, the great company may not be assembled to whom "Sheba and Dedan and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, shall say, Art thou come to take a spoil?" Perhaps a secular paper like Punch hardly knew how closely its cartoon, which appeared about the time of the German Emperor's émeute (the British lion surrounded by the young lions, or colonies) ran upon Scriptural lines. Yet, surely, it made one stronger while looking at it to remember that it was Israel's God who had foretold that thus the young lions should support the mother country.

Strange times indeed! What is coming next? Who can tell? Europe, nay, the world, is like a huge chessboard. Anxiously do the watchers follow the moves and wonder at the changes. Let us always remember that as the Spirit of God moved of old upon the face of the waters, so does it now move upon the face of the nations, bringing them nearer and nearer to "the day of the Lord in the valley of decision." We cannot prophesy, but we know that the "stone shall become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth." And so, as we watch the moves, we feel certain that Israel will be led safely through all perilous times, not because they are more righteous, more powerful, or in any way more deserving than other nations, but because of God's promise to Abraham—because He has said, "I will have mercy upon the whole House of Israel and will be jealous for My holy name." And He "will be sanctified in them in the sight of many nations."

Then, if such be the case, if we know that the final struggle will be between Rosh and Israel, and we can identify Rosh as Russia when we read the solemn words, "I am against thee, O Gog, prince of Rosh," it surely behoves us to seek until we find Israel. If we be right in our identification of Rosh, as we see her silently, persistently, pushing on to take that position which will eventually enable her to enter Palestine, then Israel must also be preparing to resist her, and, unknown to herself, be working out God's purposes. Where, then, shall we find this great rival nation? Let us search our Bibles and see there the marks by which Israel is to be known. Where is the nation who, with his horns, is pushing the people together to the ends of the earth? Ask the Boers, the French, the Germans. Who is the people who possess "the precious things of the earth and the fulness thereof?" What people have "grown into a multitude in the midst of the earth?" To what nation was the kingdom of God given when taken from the Jews? "To a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Look around. What nation is the great civiliser, the great missionary of the world? To what nation is committed the oracles of God? What people keep the Sabbath? The answer to these and many other questions can only be, the British, and, if so, may we not logically conclude that Israel and Britain are one? God hath not cast away His people, but through the ages has preserved them in all their wanderings and changes that they should shew forth His praise, and they should be His witnesses. Very remarkable has been the influx of Jews to this country, leading the thoughtful to ponder over the words of Jeremiah, "In those days the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers." Very remarkable also is our position in Egypt, where, Isaiah tells us, "Israel shall be a blessing in the midst of the land." Wherever we look in these strange times, events seem to be leading up to the great cataclysm which will usher in another state of things. Then shall Israel be known, and Israel's King "shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously." In the meantime, while we watch and wait, let it be without undue anxiety. It is right to take every precaution, right that our statesmen should see to it that England holds the supremacy of the sea, that she is ready, in the isolation to which the other nations wish to relegate her, to meet whatever contingency may come; yet she must not trust wholly to an arm of flesh. Israel must know that the Lord is her Saviour and her Redeemer, the Mighty One of Jacob. Surely, "the isles shall wait for Him," and whatever dark days may be before them, He will lead them until all men "shall call them the holy people, the redeemed of the Lord."

We do live in strange times, and morning after morning, as we open our newspapers, we are inclined to say, "What is coming next?"

"So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." "Wars and rumours of wars" being about, let us remember that "in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength," and, patiently waiting, listen to our Lord's own command:—"What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!"

UNITY.

"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

THE following was written in June, 1883, and recent events justify its publication at the present time :—

"Our dear old England! and her glorious daughters! An empire such as this world never saw. Let us take the great empires that have passed away. Babylon in the zenith of her golden power. Medo-Persia in the plentitude of her far-reaching sway. Greece in all her Alexandrian pride of conquest; and Rome in the cruel savagery of her universal domination. Our British Empire is larger and stronger and better than them all. Larger in area and population. Stronger in doing battle for the right. Better, because her laws being founded on divine truth are fit for the universal domination for which she is destined. If such be our duties, and such our responsibilities, we ought to take the more earnest heed to the work that lies before us.

"The first, the wisest, and most imperative thing that lies in our path is, the realisation of the bond of universal brotherhood, which shall bind our far-reaching Empire in federal union, and make us (what we are now in race and blood) a perfect, mighty whole. This is no wild dream, but a thing that is as certain of accomplishment as anything can be, because the materials are all ready to hand; and the hour will surely come, the hour that will see us, in the order of divine providence, as the fifth and last universal empire that shall bear sway in the earth, as set forth in that 'sure word of prophecy' to which we as the children of promise are commanded to 'take heed.' Of the blessings and advantages which would result from a realisation of this union, he would be a prophet indeed who could bring before our mental vision what the ultimate must necessarily be.

"It surely ought to be a comfort and solace to our national life that we have this high destiny set before us, and an incentive to higher and nobler efforts, that we may be found worthy of our high calling and honourable stewardship. Therefore, there is laid upon us solemn duties and privileges, and we are commanded 'to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke;' and more, 'Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out, to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him? and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?' and we have tried and are trying nationally in some sort to carry out these high behests. We have struck the fetters from the slave, and let the oppressed go free, and we hope to break every yoke. But some traitors in our midst have raised a cry that the doctrine of non-intervention is higher and holier than any divine command; therefore, that all these great duties had better be left undone. So this precious high-sounding phrase concentrates within itself the vilest treason against God and man. We have not stinted nationally to deal our bread to the hungry; and we have tried more or less imperfectly to perform the duties incumbent upon us; but withal we are to-day unprofitable servants, with many of our duties neglected, or only imperfectly performed. Very much of our remissness is due to the false teaching that has become so current in our day. What could be more dangerous than the glib phrase that 'Force is no remedy!' which means, in other words, that the law ought not to be made for the evil doers. We had better stick to the Divine Word.

"Let us ask ourselves why we occupy the position of eminence amongst the nations of the world to-day? why God cares for and watches over us so tenderly and unceasingly? Is it not that we are set apart for the accomplishment of His high purpose? And in committing to our care the oracles of His divine will towards the children of men, He has honoured us before all the nations of the earth, and we ought to take very great care that under no pretence whatever shall any treason be tolerated to this solemn God-given trust. In the history of mankind throughout all ages there is no parallel to our own case, where so vast an empire has come from such small beginnings; and just in proportion as we are true to God, we shall be true to ourselves and the rest of humanity; and our British Empire, made up, as it is, of the 'multitude of nations' of our own blood, shall march on united in the pleasant bonds of love and righteousness toward that higher life which is set as the reward of those who love God and keep His commandments. And I appeal to my fellow-countrymen, who, as Britons, are heirs of the Royal Heritage, to use their best individual efforts to try to hasten the consummation of this glorious work, as this matter is practically in their own hands, and could not be long delayed if they understood and desired it. Then let our watchword be Union! Union in the love of God, and in the best interests of common humanity."

THE OFFER OF THE ARAWAS.

Rotorua, January 17.

THE following is the translation of the telegram sent to the Governor yesterday, being the outcome of the meeting held on the previous night:—"It has been resolved that, should affairs in the Transvaal require it, we (certain chiefs of the Arawa) should express our readiness to form a guerilla regiment for service in that country. Kindly convey our renewed assurances of affection and loyalty to the Queen." Signed by certain chiefs on behalf of the Arawa people. In spite of a certain amount of ridicule thrown on this movement by some people here, the natives are most earnest in their demeanour.—From Auckland Weekly News—weekly form of the Herald.

THE ARAWA'S OFFER TO THE QUEEN.

Rotorua, Thursday.

The following reply has been received from the Private Secretary to the Governor in response to a telegram by the Arawa chiefs:—"To the chiefs of the Arawa tribe, Rotorua. —The Governor has received your telegram, and in Her Majesty's name thanks you for your loyal offer of service in the Transvaal. You are now aware that the crisis which appeared so serious is passed, but your offer was none the less most creditable to your patriotism, and she thanks you for your devotion to Her Majesty's interests which promoted it." —From Bay of Plenty Times.

The Arawa tribe number about 3,500—not actually the most numerous of the Maori tribes, but about the leading and most important. Fancy a tribe of Arabs in Algeria volunteering to fight for the French against the Germans!—Forwarded by CAPT. H. STEWART, New Zealand.

HERR MAX NORDAU ON ENGLAND.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, Thursday Night.

HERR MAX NORDAU contributes to the Neue Freie Presse to-day, in the form of a feuilleton, running into eleven half-columns, an appreciation of the new Poet Laureate. It is the most elaborate study of modern English literature which has appeared in any German paper, and does ample justice to Mr. Austin, though not, perhaps, an equal degree to his contemporaries. At the same time, Herr Nordau is highly laudatory of Englishmen in general, and it is interesting to note that his panegyric appears in the Neue Freie Presse, which not very long ago permitted another feuilletonist to call the English "the Chinese of Europe," and to enlarge upon that happy idea.

Dr. Max Nordau considers Mr. Austin "the most perfect embodiment of Anglo-Saxonism in the literature of our time; arch-English in his likes and dislikes." He goes on to explain what the English are, and to ridicule the notion, so dear to Continental writers, that the British are a nation of shopkeepers. "Shopkeepers, indeed!" he exclaims. "Those who fought at Hastings like giants and Titans, who subdued two continents, are ruling two hundred million Asiatics by the will and nerve of a couple of thousand of their race, who brought to their knees such men as Napoleon I. and Nicholas I., and who still have their Jamesons to demonstrate that their old strength of will and power of ruling over others have not yet died out! If these are the characteristics of shopkeepers, what is the essential difference between shopkeepers and the heroes of the Greek Myth?" "The ruling classes of England," he proceeds, "are the most powerful race of masters the world has seen since the Republic of Rome and the early Roman Empire, and Alfred Austin is one of that stock. To please an Englishman one must be strong and daring. The English are a bluff race, incomparable friends and terrible enemies, rather proud of being more feared than loved." I never remember to have seen in the German language, and least of all in a Vienna paper, such an eulogy of England, and, at the same time, so thorough an understanding of the English character by an author of another nationality.—Standard, Feb. 21, 1896.

ISRAEL'S SCRIPTURE AND PRAYER UNION.

THE Secretary is pleased to say that we still keep adding to our numbers, though but slowly; two have joined since last month, making the total up to 1,579.

The names of any Identity believers who are searching the Bible, and are willing to join us in prayer to God, will be gladly received.

Subject for prayer on last Sunday in May: "That God will guide our statesmen in dealing with South African matters."

The Card of Membership has a list of chapters for the whole of 1896, also suggestions for study, prayers, etc. It is of a size convenient for keeping in the Bible, and will be sent on receipt of six stamps.

The first and second series of Monthly Comments on the whole Bible, by Philo-Israel, may be obtained. Price, in paper covers, 1s. 2d. each; in cloth, 2s. each, post free.

The "Prayers for Daily Use," being a prayer for each day of the week, by Philo-Israel, are 1d. each, or 9d. per doz., postage extra.

A donation of 2s. 6d. was kindly sent by Mr. R. T. M. of Artane.

Address, Mrs. Woolcott, 74, Saltram-crescent, St. Peter's-park, London, W.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—In your paper received to-day, you deal with the subject of Constantinople. A new thought has come into my mind about that of late, which, as I have not seen any mention of it anywhere as yet, I here offer for your consideration, as I should like much to have your thoughts about it.

May I first say how entirely I approve of your way of discussing these subjects, so simply, clearly, and honestly?

What has led me to this attempt to satisfy myself about the future of Constantinople, is this:

I observe that throughout the world there are exceptions to our holding the Gates. Why is this? My conclusion is that as one of the great signs of "the end" of these times is the restoration of life so generally to extinct volcanoes, some Gates have been held back on account of their being volcanic.

We possess the whole area from Perim to New Zealand, with the exception of a small patch, the volcanic Islands, in the East Sea, Sumatra, Java, the Phillipines, &c.

We actually ruled Java at one time, but then gave it up, as well as our possessions in Sumatra. Why is this patch excepted? Is it not because the most terrible explosions have taken place there that have ever been recorded? Especially one at the west end of Java, and one a little eastward of the east end.

So we do not hold Fernando Po., Tahiti, Hawaii, Madiera, the Ionian Isles, all volcanic centres! May this not be because all these old volcanoes are to burst into new life soon, and therefore are not fit for our occupation? Again, there seems no possible question about the end of Rome. Its utter destruction by fire seems certain (Rev. xviii. 9, &c.). And lately the man who calls himself God had to run in his night clothes to escape from the ruins of his idols and his palace, which he expected would fall upon him.

Everything there seems prepared for a complete catastrophe, and it is certain that the city stands upon the crater of a volcano. If God should thus set His mark of reprobation on the site of this head quarters of heathen and Papal rebellion against Him, may not this be also the end of the site of the city of the other great apostacy? Lately in the very heart of Constantinople they had an exactly similar warning to that in Rome. Many buildings were destroyed, and the whole city was very near destruction. As God will set His mark of blessing upon His own chosen site of Jerusalem, may He not also leave both the sites of the cities of the great apostacies to be marks of His curse?

I cannot but think that this is worthy of investigation. It is evident that the modern prophets are quite at a loss about this, the Gate, and for my own part I cannot think of any probable solution of this great complication, if Constantinople continues to exist.

If it comes to an issue whether Russia or England should possess it, it seems impossible but that it should be the centre of a life and death struggle between the two Powers, of which I can find no intimation in the prophecies. I may take this opportunity of saying that I think a great mistake is commonly made about England's protecting Palestine when Gog attacks it, for in the account of his overthrow there, I can find no mention of anything about England beyond Tarshish and all the young lions thereof looking on intelligently as fully understanding the case, and confidently expecting the immediate hand of God in the matter, as in the case of Sennacherib. Nothing is said about their interference.

How wonderfully every day brings news of God's blessing on Ephraim. Only a few weeks ago all his enemies were going to see his entire overthrow, and all the preparations for it have already vanished without a shot fired!

What an extraordinary position Lord Salisbury holds! With an overwhelming majority, and a revenue beyond what anybody ever dreamt of, £109,000,000. To your striking notice of the settling of accounts between China and Japan at the Bank of England, you might have added that before the war the two Plenipotentiaries discussed the matter in English, as the only language common to the two.

Yours sincerely, ARTHUR COTTON.

SOUTH AFRICA, AND ITS ANXIETIES.

No one can say that our country is without its trials at this moment, or that our nation is not learning some lessons in South Africa not unlike those which God gave us to learn in British India during the terrors of the Sepoy mutinies forty years ago. After grievous national suffering He sent us the needed help on that occasion, and we doubt not that, black as matters have looked, there will be peace again in due time. In regard to Matabeleland and the Transvaal, it is manifest that the insurrection of a native tribe—the Matabeles—is fully developed, and, perhaps, 14,000 armed natives are bringing deadly peril upon our countrymen, now shut up in beleagured places, like Bulawayo, Gwelo, and other isolated spots. At such places, and in open fight, about 200 European lives have already been lost, by murder and battle. But the trouble does not end there. The state of things in the Transvaal is unsatisfactory in the extreme. President Kruger is exhibiting a rather hostile spirit, and is arming, as his Consul-General in London admits, because, in consequence of Dr. Jameson's late miserable raid, it is discovered that the defence of the country has been unduly neglected. On our part, the weak garrisons at the Cape and Natal have been called on to furnish, for the Matabele war, 300 cavalry and 100 mounted infantry. To make good that deficiency, a couple of battalions of infantry are to be sent on to the Cape, to defend our possessions there. It is admitted that our strength at the Cape and Natal is "dangerously" attenuated by the withdrawal of 450 men for the war against the Matabele, but it is deemed that that danger will be turned into safety if two infantry regiments, and one of cavalry, about 1,900 strong in all, are sent to recruit our slender forces in the South African Peninsula! The fact is, our Government at home is apparently afraid lest these so-called strong measures should drive the Boers into a declaration of war, or alarm the President into rash measures against the British subjects he is engaged in trying for high treason in Pretoria. Hence we have the following explanation addressed by Mr. Chamberlain to the President for sending troops to defend our own Gates, in the face of the Matabele rebellion. The words appear to us almost like the expression of an inferior to an acknowledged superior, and, to our view, are as dangerous to the public peace of the Colony as Mr. Gladstone's submission to the victorious rebel Boers after Majuba Hill, when, in arms on the Queen's own ground, they extorted from him a humbling peace. The message was this, as it appeared in the Times of April 18th:—

> The Prime Minister's Department, instructed by Sir Hercules Robinson, the Imperial Commissioner, has informed President Kruger, on behalf of Mr. Chamberlain, that the British Government consider it necessary to reinforce the Imperial garrisons in Cape Colony and Natal by one regiment each in view of the withdrawal of the drafts which are being sent from those places to assist in dealing with the troubles in the North.
> The President has also been informed that these measures do not indicate any change in the policy of friendliness which it is the earnest endeavour of the Imperial Government to display towards the Republic. Mr. Chamberlain states that he wishes the Transvaal Government to be informed of that decision, being aware that efforts may be made to misrepresent the intentions of the Imperial Government by those who wish to prevent a satisfactory understanding of the lasting character from being arrived at as desired by the two countries.—Reuter.

We regret the tone of this communication, which is sure to be misunderstood by such a man as President Kruger, because it offers a sort of apology to the Boers for defending our own territories, and begs them to understand that the 1,900 men we are forwarding to posts, far removed from their borders, are not meant to hurt them! This is, of course, as noble as Mr. Gladstone's conduct towards the same race, but it is not good policy, and it will not, we believe, have the effect intended. We know, of course, that this, as all our other matters, are in the hands of God, and that He is guiding us as certainly by the agency of the Colonial Secretary to-day, as He did by Mr. Gladstone years ago, when bloodguiltiness had such terrors for him, that he carefully secured a peace without honour for this nation, to be followed, as the fruit thereof, by what may probably soon be a state of war with the Boers, and, as connected with it, a rebellion of bloodthirsty native savages, who mean to destroy the white man if they can, and restore the reign of murder and pillage throughout Rhodesia and beyond. In vain! We believe that the reinforcements now going up to the seat of war will be in time to turn the tide, and drive back the Matabele Impis. The promise of God to Israel was that, "Behold, they may gather together, but not by Me! Whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall because of thee" (Isa. liv. 15, R.V.) "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper" (ver. 17). These promises suffice! When things look at their blackest we may trust the Lord to fulfil these His words of grace and love to Israel, and to deliver them from the hands of those who hate them.

We quote some cheering words, spoken by the Earl of Selborne, at the anniversary dinner of the Royal Colonial Institute, on April 24th, at the Hôtel Mètropole, regarding the Matabele rising:—

The Chairman next gave the toast of "The United Empire," and the Earl of Selborne, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, in responding, referred to events in South Africa. He said that the incursion into the Transvaal had fallen like a bombshell into the camp of the Dutch in South Africa. It destroyed for a moment, he hoped only temporarily, the confidence of the Dutch in the bona fides and the honour of their British fellow-subjects, and it had produced, he felt sure only temporarily, that cleavage of opinion which went by race, which must be most disastrous to any country which found itself in the circumstances of South Africa. (Hear, hear.) Under the circumstances the policy of the Government was in the first place to maintain unimpaired all the rights of the British Crown in South Africa (cheers), to maintain all the honourable obligations of the British Empire there, and to try and weld once again into one great South African public opinion the opinions of the Dutch and of the British and make that the potent, and all-powerful, and invincible instrument of progress and reform in South Africa. (Cheers.) There were those who were clamouring for the despatch of immense reinforcements for South Africa. With regard to the question of an adequate garrison for the coaling-station at the Cape, they might be perfectly certain that the Government would never shrink from increasing that garrison for that purpose to the full extent which their military and naval advisers considered necessary; but when they were asked to send large bodies of troops—5,000 from England and 5,000 from India had been suggested to him from one quarter—for quelling the Matabele rising, he must ask them to pause and consider the circumstances of the case. There was, no doubt, some alarm in the public mind as to whether the reinforcements that were to be sent were adequate for the purpose. He thought they might reassure themselves, when he assured them as a certain fact, that those on the spot, whether at Bulawayo, Mafeking, or Cape Town, had received every single man for whom they asked, and if any necessity for more should arise, that more would be forthcoming. (Cheers.) When Sir Frederick Carrington was in a position to take offensive measures to quell this insurrection, he would have at his disposal from three to four times more men under arms than there were under arms in the first war in which the Matabele were conquered. He thought the public might reassure themselves as to Bulawayo. The Colonial Office was in daily telegraphic communication with that place; omnibuses were daily running into the town. Therefore, they were under no uncertainty as to the actual position of affairs there. There were plenty of men, there was an immense store of ammunition. There was not as many rifles as they should like to see there, but they were on their way, and no doubt had been expressed to them from those in Bulawayo lest their food supply should fall short. (Cheers.) The great difficulty of the case was getting the men, the munitions of war, and horses and food from Mafeking to Bulawayo. It was a most difficult business, water was scarce, and as if South Africa were not already plunged into enough trouble, there had come a gigantic calamity in the shape of the most malignant form of rinderpest. The difficulty was not to find the men, but to get them on the spot, and those at Mafeking who were responsible, whether Imperial officers or officers of the Chartered Company, were showing most determined energy and splendid self-reliance in pushing forward those reliefs most anxiously expected. (Cheers.) Meanwhile, their fellow-countrymen in Bulawayo were proving themselves worthy of their forefathers. (Cheers.) Nothing could be finer than the way in which they had faced their difficulties and refused to be shut in without taking the offensive, and the way in which they were carrying the war into the enemy's camp. (Cheers.) As nothing could be more disastrous to South Africa than disaster, Mr. Chamberlain had, he felt sure, with the unanimous assent of his fellow-countrymen, without in the least hampering or restricting the efforts of those brave men in Bulawayo to relieve their own difficult position, enjoined on them great caution in taking that offensive which must be preliminary to the final crushing of the rebellion. Far better to wait and get sufficient forces on the spot. Sir Frederick Carrington would once and for all crush this unhappy insurrection. At any rate, the duty of the Colonial Office was clear. They had to absolutely crush this rebellion so that it could never recur, but with as much consideration and humanity to the unhappy natives as was possible. (Cheers). They had to give the Chartered Company a fair field for again setting in order the machinery of administration and for that development of the country which it so sorely needed. They had firmly, but with the greatest courtesy and in the most friendly manner, to continue their representations in order to secure for their fellow-countrymen in the South African Republic those reforms which free men throughout the world and all who respected nationality claimed to be their legitimate rights. (Cheers.) But they intended to use as the all-powerful and invincible instrument for that purpose that united public opinion of Dutch and English in South Africa, without which no Government there could permanently exist, and, finally, they had to see that the position of the British Empire, as the paramount Power in South Africa, was imperilled by no foreign intrigue (loud cheers), and remained what it was—the controlling and last word in South Africa. (Cheers.)

"THY LIGHT IS COME."

(Isaiah lx.)

ARISE, shine, for thy light is truly come!
Oh, blest command from angel heights above;
And soon shall we return to Israel's home,
Jerusalem, whose King is Prince of Love.

The glory of the Lord is upon thee,
The Gentiles shall behold thy risen light!
For the people who were blind, now can see
The loving wisdom of the Lord of might.

Lift up thy eyes, then, O Ephraim, and sing!
Break forth, O barren one, cry aloud, rejoice!
Gather thy sons from far to meet thy King,
And praise Him, with one heart, one mind, one voice.

The sun shall be no more thy light by day,
Nor brightness shall the moon give light to thee;
For God will keep us in His perfect way,
And on His arm our trust shall ever be.

PALESTINE RE-PEOPLED.

ISAIAH XVIII.

By Rev. J. Idrisyn Jones.

There are three names, which have often resounded in our world, in the past—viz., Palestine, Israel, Britain; with still greater significance shall they ring in the ears of men, in the days that are yet to come. They are links in a golden chain: a chain which neither Satanic nor any earthly power can break. If it be attempted, "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision." These three names stand related to the great things of time. What is Palestine? Like its own Galilean Sea, it is in itself but a little thing, which yet has a prouder history than the vast Atlantic Ocean and the still prouder Pacific; so this little country is more renowned than all other lands, for it is the Redeemer's native soil—it is, therefore, richer than any other in its titles—"The Holy Land," "Immanuel's Land," "The Land of Promise," &c. While within its confines are the greatest sleepers of the world, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and ancient kings and prophets are slumbering there till the day dawn and the shadows flee away.

What is Israel? The chief people of mankind: a people terrible from their beginning until now; a people to whom all others are made subordinate in God's scheme of this inhabited planet, for is it not written. "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel" (Deut. xxxii. 8). How strikingly did Baalam under Divine inspiration, set forth their superiority over other races: "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign aloes which the Lord had planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters, and his king shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted. God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn: he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows. He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee" (Num. xxiv. 5—9).

What is Britain? To-day the finest nation in the world; the Mistress of the Seas; the civilizer and evangelizer of all the peoples who have sat in darkness; the nation whose Empire is the largest in the history of the world, and whom Victor Hugo thus describes: "Over that sea proud and majestic, lies the proud island, whose existence consoles me for a thousand Continental crimes, and vindicates for me the goodness of Providence. . . . Henceforth there are no nations, no peoples, but one and indivisible will be the world—and all the world will be one England;" and whom Vernadsky, the Russian, further describes as "a spider whose web encompasses the whole world within her own dominions: she has all the resources of all the Continents; her Empire is stronger and vaster than the coalition of other States. . . . The aggressive Empire, unless speedily checked, will establish a universal dominion over all the people of the earth." Surely then, Palestine, Israel, Britain, are names which it will be impossible to obliterate from the minds of men, or the vocabulary of the earth.

But what binds these three links into this golden chain? Palestine is the land to be re-occupied; Israel is the people who shall return to it; Britain is the nation who is appointed to carry it into execution. In support of this we offer the following arguments:—

1. Britain is the House of Israel.

The restoration of the House of Judah is to be accomplished by the strong arm of the House of Israel, as announced in the prophecy of Jeremiah, "In those days the House of Judah shall walk with (to) the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north, to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers" (chap. iii. 18). We cannot stay now to supply the evidence that Britain is the House of Israel, but take for granted on this occasion, that such is the case, except merely to state, that Britain possesses all the marks given of Ten-tribed Israel in the prophecies: such as—dwelling in N.W. Islands—being chief of the nations—having ocean supremacy—consisting of a multiplicity of nations—as having occupied the desolate heritages—as possessing the Gates of the other nations—as to increase of population—as lending money to other nations—as keeping the Sabbath—as being a blessing to all peoples—as having migrated from the land of Canaan, and the locality of Israel's captivities—and to her the House of Judah must come in order that by her aid and in her companionship the land of promise might become theirs for ever.

2. There are Present Indications of it.

A remarkable friendship has for ages subsisted between the British people and the Jews. To us, at the present moment, they are flocking as exiles from Russia, whose Government compels their departure by harsh and cruel persecutions. How significant also is the fact that we are now posted on the border-land of Palestine, by our occupation of Egypt; which we so strangely occupy alone, by the sudden withdrawal of the French authorities; while even if we were to retire from Egypt (than which nothing is more unlikely) we should still be at Cyprus, not far away from it. Is not all this showing us the finger of Providence, in preparing our way for the task of restoration committed to our hands? This special friendship of England in regard to Palestine and the Jews, has been well set forth some years ago, at a banquet given at Damascus to Col. Churchill as the military representative of England, who said: "I trust, my friends, that I may claim for my country the first place in your recollections. In the hour of your darkest trial and adversity England hastened to extend to you the protection of her glorious and triumphant ægis. Other Powers no doubt exhibited a generous sympathy in your behalf; but in England your woes and sufferings and misfortunes found an echo, and exercised a national exhibition of feeling which struck down the fiendish malace which oppressed you to the earth, and rescued you from the hands of your malignant persecutors. She has proved herself to be your most steady, persevering, and uncompromising friend. May this happy meeting be looked upon as a pledge of that friendship, and as the forecast of such a connection and alliance between the English and the Jewish people, as shall be alike honourable and advantageous to both. Yes, my friends, there was once a Jewish people, famous in arts and renowned in war. These beautiful plains and valleys, which are now tenanted by the wild and wandering Arab, on which desolation has fixed her iron stamp, once revelled in the luxuriance of their fertile and abundant crops, and resounded with the songs of the daughters of Zion. May the hour of Israel's deliverance be at hand——[Here the gallant speaker was interrupted by the cries, 'May God grant it, may God grant it, to England alone we look, to England alone we look.'] May the approximation of western civilization to this interesting land, be the dawn of her regeneration and of her political existence; may the Jewish nation once more claim her rank and station among the Powers of the world. The descendants of the Maccabees will yet prove themselves worthy of their illustrious ancestors." Surely these are indications.

3. It is Foretold in Isaiah (chap. xviii.).

This is said to be the darkest chapter in the Bible; so at all events the commentators have told us; some of whom have introduced no less than ten theories of exposition—and were themselves unable to decide which of them to accept; while others have confessed that after having read them, they were plunged in still greater darkness. So a cabinet may be very difficult to open until one possesses the key. Bishop Horsley a hundred years ago had more real insight into the meaning of the dark riddle than any of his contemporaries, or his successors as expositors, to this day, for he understood it to mean "the restoration of the Jew by a distant nation skilled in navigation." That is the key which unlocks the mystery of the chapter. Its contents may be summarized as follows:—

1. The restoring nation described (ver. 1, 2).
2. The earth summoned to watch (ver. 3).
3. Judgments on the enemies of Israel—(ver. 4—6).
5. The restoration accomplished (ver. 7).

In order more clearly to receive the teaching thus divinely given, it will be necessary to offer an amended translation of verses, first, second, and seventh.

Ver. 1.—It is important to alter the first word into "Ho," as all critics agree. It should be the Hebrew form of interjection, calling attention. Some would render it "Hail," in the sense of salutation. In either case it is a message to some great maritime country concerning its mission of restoring Israel—understanding the term "wings" to refer to its ships, by the aid of which the restoration should be accomplished. The three following amended translations are worthy attention:—(1) A Hebraistic translation or paraphrase, B.C. 50, "Ho to the land to which they come in ships from a distant country, and spread their wings as an eagle flying upon his wings." (2) The translation offered in the Speaker's Commentary: "Ho to the land of overshadowing wings"; which it regards as a great naval power. (3) Dr. Sheppherd's "Hail to the land of ships which is far distant beyond the west." Taking the passage as pointing out a naval power, we see how aptly it is descriptive of Britain, whose "wings" are on every sea. The gathering of Israel will thus be in ships—and the statement is in harmony with another prophecy—"Surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first, to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, and to the holy one of Israel, because He hath glorified thee." It will be interesting now to notice that the Tarshish of the above prediction may be fairly understood to fit in with Britain. (1) This Tarshish of prophecy lies also west of Asia, for in the 48th Psalm the ships of Tarshish threaten the Coast of Palestine, which is west, and Britain lies also west, as the starting point. (2) Tarshish is identical with "the Isles," which is a correct description of Britain. (3) The Tarshish of prophecy is rich in iron, tin and lead, which is again eminently applicable to Britain. (4) There are in prophecy the "young lions of Tarshish," an apt allusion to the Colonial possessions of Britain. Again, these ships lie beyond the rivers of Ethiopia—and Britain is situated in that direction—so this first verse may be fairly taken as a reference to Britain, in regard to its maritime aspect and its geographical position.

Ver. 2.—Dr. Sheppherd supplies the following translation:—"That sendeth missionaries in swift vessels upon the sea, saying,: Go ye swift messengers in behalf of a nation mighty and civilized, a nation terrible from its beginning until now, a nation that portioneth out and treadeth down, whose land is apart in the waters."

Ver. 7.—Dr. Sheppherd's translation is as follows:—"But in that day shall a present be brought to the Lord of hosts of a great and polished people, a people warlike from their beginning; hitherto a nation that divideth and conquereth, whose habitation is an island, at Mount Zion, the place of the Lord of hosts."

This altered rendering makes the prophecy still more applicable to Britain, as regards the fact that she herself is Israel, and shall bring them to the land of promise as a present to the Lord of hosts in the appointed time.

Let us re-state the argument for Britain being the instrument of the tribal restoration to Palestine. (1) Britain is herself the House of Israel, to whom the task is committed. (2) There are national indications that she is likely to undertake such a work. (3) Isa. xviii. seems to point to Britain as the nation destined to carry out the enterprise.

Such then, is the glorious event for which the ages have waited. It must come to pass, as the integrity of the Bible is at stake. Its great credential is, that all which is written cometh to pass. "And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the Lord hath spoken? When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken" (Deut. xviii.). If, then, Israel shall not be restored to their land, the Scriptures are broken, and all their value is gone.

But are there no signs that such an event is even at the door? Is the land not held by the "sick man," whose tenure is fast hastening to its close? as seen in the decay of the Turkish Empire, whose carcase will soon be a prey to the already-gathering vultures. Some new occupant is therefore near at hand. Why should it not be Israel, whose everlasting inheritance the land is made by covenant? Already the children of Judah are hastening back to it, consequent upon the unrest given to them among the nations; the builder and the railway engineer are busy at work, arousing the land from the slumber of ages, as if to intimate that Israel's time of redemption draweth nigh, and the "Eastern Question" about to come up for its final solution. Britain is also busy preparing her "ships," as if in readiness for their great commission—which is not so much to demolish foreign ramparts as safely to convoy the children of Abraham to their desired haven. The era is pregnant with stupendous issues; we are ringing out the old—and ringing in the new—what is it, but the glorious dawn foretold by the prophet-bards.

"For lo the days are hastening on,
By prophet-bards foretold,
When with the ever-circling sun,
Come on the age of gold."

To every serious observer, the crisis of the centuries is rushing upon us; and this upheaving of nations must shortly culminate in the fulfilment of the words, "And in that day will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people." But after the storm will come the calm; for the cry shall be: "For lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone: the flowers appear on the earth: the time of the singing of birds is come." It shall be the Advent of Israel's King—and the inauguration of His kingdom from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

ISRAEL AT WORK IN NYASSALAND.

THE following appeared in St. James' Gazette of April 15, last, and if the facts be true, which we cannot doubt, we have cause for great national thankfulness. The statement was this:—

"While the ship of the Chartered Company is tossing in stormy waters, the Nyassaland bark is sailing triumphantly under the skilful guidance of that great little man, Sir H. H. Johnston. This morning a despatch is published from him, in which he says:—

"'I have the pleasure now to inform your lordship that, as far as I am aware, there does not exist a single independent avowedly slave-trading chief within the British Central Africa Protectorate, nor anyone who is known to be inimical to British rule.'

"It is a great result to have been achieved by a few hundred Sikhs and a mere handful of young Englishmen, civil and military. There has been hard fighting in it, as well as hard marching, skilful organization, and well-judged African diplomacy. If we have made some mistakes in South Africa of late, we are at least entitled to congratulate ourselves on this admirable piece of work in the trans-Zambesi country. No European Power—neither France, Germany, Italy, nor Belgium—has done anything to compare with it in the Dark Continent of recent years."

The work which our nation is engaged upon in Nyassaland on the shores of the lake of that name is truly Israelitish—namely, the abolition of the slave trade in the very country where it has hitherto been successfully carried on with great boldness. The Indian warlike races have co-operated with us there, and, as we see, a few hundreds of Sikh soldiery led by young Englishmen, and supported by a few English civilians, have done what no other European Power, French, German, or Italian, have succeeded in carrying out in recent, or indeed in past times. It stands to reason of course that these results could not be effected without war in some shape or other. Those native tribes who oppose us in reference to the slave trade are bent on destroying us by force of arms, and they call on us to defend ourselves. The result is a foregone conclusion. In the long run Sikhs led by Englishmen are sure to conquer, and then peace with good government follows as a matter of course. The slave trade is then destroyed; and civilization with Christianity take the place of cruel lawlessness, murder and depopulation.

The problem we have to face in Matabeleland is of the same character, though our savage and cruel enemy there is supported by great numbers, by a species of military discipline and by great personal bravery. But the contest is no less a struggle between Christianity, freedom, and prosperity, on the one side, against bloodshed, murder with horrible cruelty and political chaos and red ruin for a whole country as big as France on the other! We do not doubt what will be the outcome. As in Nyassaland the native slave hunter has been put down, so in Matabeleland the cruel Impis of the natives will be destroyed, the peaceful settlement of the land will be restored, and the condition of prosperity will once more return to the distracted country. During the period of suspense we trust our friends will not abandon their faith in the power and lovingkindness of our God, who has just now placed us in circumstances of serious trial, to test our faith and to see if with Our Identity to sustain us we can trust Him to care for us, protect, and save us as a nation. He has promised that He will do this for us in Isa. xlii. 16, R.V. Why should we suspect that He will fail us now?

It is true that the wires have been cut south and east of Bulawayo for a short space, and that for the time the town and its inhabitants of European descent, were in great straits. But aid is rapidly approaching from the east and the south, and the only fear, it appears, is, that ammunition or food may fail the garrison of that and other places in Matabeleland and Mashonaland where the troubles have arisen. But the Lord is above all, and He has engaged to protect His people, and never to forsake them. We may confidently therefore look to His interposition, and to be sure that what He has done for the occupants of Nyassaland against the Arab slave dealers and slave raiders, He will surely do in respect to the murderous Matabele who are thirsting for the moment when they may rush in and slay their beleaguered victims. Whether it may be God's purpose that disaster should precede our final victory in South Africa, as was the case during the Indian Mutinies (vide, the awful occurrences at Cawnpore before the capture of Lucknow) no one may say. But in the end He gave us complete victory over the Indian rebellion; and has for forty years restored peace to India, placing the country no longer under a Chartered Company as in Matabeleland, but under Israel's Crown itself, which we believe will be the change which must take place in South Africa, before we can have peace again permanently. This is the change which has given us a peaceful and contented Uganda, and we believe is God's purpose in respect to the Charterland where Mr. Cecil Rhodes and Lord Gray are to be her Majesty's representatives.

There is a mighty work of preparation now going on in South Africa, of which we see a part only now. For the consolation that nationally we know what the end is likely to be, we must needs praise the Lord, since we are Israel, and all things are to work good for them.

ANGLO-SAXON ENERGY.

WHAT GREAT BRITAIN HAS DONE FOR SCIENCE AND CIVILIZATION.

CHICAGO, Jan. 14.—To the Editor of The Chicago Times "Herald." Permit me to answer in your valuable journal the empty mass of vituperation inspired by prejudice from such correspondents as J. A. Gregorowitsch.

I have read with patience dozens of such letters in the columns of your esteemed paper, thinking that the average American would take them for what they are worth—nothing—and simply set them down as being the bait of some politician fishing for votes. But the persistency with which they are fired at you, Mr. Editor, has exhausted my good temper. By all these blatherskites England is denounced as a robber, a tyrant, cruel, unjust, avaricious, in fact every known crime on the calendar is laid at her door. And why? What is the real root and reason of all this outcry against Anglo-Saxon success? It is simply an outcry of malignant jealousy and envy at seeing the triumph of the Anglo-Saxon over all difficulties as against those of any other nation under the sun. This malicious envy is mortally afraid that the English-speaking race is going—as it surely is—to lead the world and plant the banner of civilization everywhere. One instance of the absolute surety of this is that the recent treaty between China and Japan was drawn up in the English language, clearly showing that that language is paramount above all others in the transaction of the world's affairs, and that the people who speak that language are the foremost people on earth, not even excepting the nation of Mr. Gregorowitsch.

The "tight little island," Mr. Editor, is not big enough to hold in the energy of the Anglo-Saxon; he wants room; and wherever he can plant himself without treading on a civilized nation's ground there he is going to stay. And what is the result of this same energy stretching out and spreading over dark and hitherto unknown lands and making them fit places for the habitation of civilized people? These term it British tyranny, barbarity, etc. The result is that the darkness which reigned supreme in these lands, the awful practices which these races in their ignorance were guilty of in their sacrifices to their gods, and other superstitious rites, have been, wherever the Anglo-Saxon civilizer has planted his foot, wiped out. Such societies as the stranglers of India and Burmah are exterminated, and such acts as mothers sacrificing their babes to the Ganges are of the past. These and other horrible practices, too numerous to mention, which were incorporated in the lives of the "harmless and peaceful peoples of Asia and Africa" Mr. G. refers to are no more.

And these races are cared for and protected by this same "greedy" England every whit as well as the United States ever cared for or protected her Indians. This, I think, goes without saying. But I do not blame the United States for spreading herself. It is the same Saxon energy which knows no bounds in getting ahead. Of course, every intelligent man knows that in this tremendous progression some acts of seeming cruelty have been committed by the Saxon in his dealings with the North American Indians, as well as with the cannibals and murdering races of Africa and India—Mr. G.'s harmless and peaceful peoples. It is impossible for such progression to succeed without someone going to the wall, and it is absolutely right that these races who have never in all the centuries advanced one step nearer civilization should be the ones to get set back rather than that the world's advancement and progress should be stayed indefinitely until they died out. What would the United States be to-day if the Anglo-Saxon had held in his energy until the lazy, good-for-nothing Indian had decided to accept civilization and its methods, or journeyed to the happy hunting-grounds? It is the same thing in India and Africa. This untiring energy has advanced steadily and will continue to advance until the Anglo-Saxon is master of the world.

Everything, Mr. Editor, points that way. I think the dispute over Venezuela is a step in the right direction. I think it has done more good to the English-speaking race than anything that could have happened, and Mr. Cleveland has unwittingly and most innocently been the means of starting on foot one of the grandest advances toward civilization possible. I mean the appointing of a court of arbitration, which is being discussed by all influential men of England and America, to settle the dispute between the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon tongue, and which same movement is, in my opinion, the grand starting point for a coalition of the English-speaking people which can dictate to the world, and which the world may be assured will always take the stand for the right. England is blamed by Mr. G. and others of his ilk for the massacre of the Armenians. Mr. G. and others do not seem to think that if England made a step toward saving them it might be the signal for the great barbarian of Europe—Russia—to inaugurate a war that in a few weeks' time would cost more lives and treasure than a dozen Armenias. This is a little matter which has to be taken into consideration in dealing with the Armenian question. England is blamed for such acts as blowing from the canon's mouth the Sepoy fiends. I wonder if these howlers ever read the story of the massacre of Cawnpore by these devils who were so justly punished. I think not. If they did they would think twice before speaking once. And such peoples and races must, in the interest of civilization, learn to know that when this Anglo-Saxon energy has made a home for itself in these wild and unknown lands, they cannot with impunity rob and murder any of these civilizers without paying dearly for their crimes. The American Indians have learned that lesson, and Uncle Sam has been their teacher. If this letter, Mr. Editor, will have any effect in stemming in the least degree the torrent of "tail-twisting" letters, then I am sure you at least will feel my effort has not been entirely in vain.

ISRAEL A NATION.

MR. HOLMAN HUNT'S SCHEME FOR THE RE-PEOPLING OF PALESTINE.

BY C. W. HAWES.

AN article has recently appeared in the Daily Chronicle setting forth a great scheme by Mr. Holman Hunt, the eminent artist, for re-peopling Palestine with Jews, thereby making it once more a great nation. This idea seems to have been in the mind of Mr. Holman Hunt for some years, and the present state of Turkey, in which he sees the Sultan's power and dominions evidently falling to pieces, suggests the desired opportunity. He says, "Make Palestine a Jewish nation—a centre of peace, stability, and security—and you take a notable step towards the settlement of the difficulties in the far East."

The idea is, that a group of leading Jews should take the question up, and raise the sum of say £100,000,000. Then, with the approval of the great Powers, approach the Sultan, and buy out all Turkish rights in Palestine, and purchase the country absolutely and completely. Sir Samuel Montagu, in another article, seems to fall in with the scheme, and sees no difficulty about raising any amount of money that might be required.

But both Mr. Holman Hunt and Sir Samuel Montagu seem to lose sight of the intention of One higher than themselves in regard to the chosen people, and they each seem to forget the fact that the Holy Land really belongs to Israel by right, because it was promised to them by Almighty God Himself, through the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, as an everlasting possession, or in other words, it formed part of the Abrahamic Covenant. They have never yet really possessed the whole of the land promised to them by God; but if we believe the Word of God to be really true, we must see plainly that they will possess it in God's own appointed time, and according to His promise.

The idea of purchasing the land from the Turks would seem like an attempt to frustrate the Divine purposes; and here it would be well to remember, that the Jews did attempt to return to Jerusalem, and to re-build the temple, in the time of the Emperor Julian, who gave them permission to do so. They were full of triumph at the thought of being restored to their own land, and of reviving the greatness of David and Solomon. But it had been declared that the temple should be overthrown, and that Jerusalem should be "trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled" (Luke xxi. 24). This undertaking to re-build the temple was nothing less than a daring defiance of Almighty God, and it pleased Him to defeat it in a terrible manner. An earthquake scattered the foundations which had been laid: balls of fire burst forth from the ground, scorching and killing many of the workmen; and stories are told of other fearful sights which put an end to the attempt. I have merely mentioned this to show that God has His own plans respecting His people, and that it is not for man to attempt to frustrate them.

Both Mr. Holman Hunt and Sir Samuel Montagu seem to think that if only the Jews could be made a nation, and occupy Palestine, much good would come out of it. We are assured in the Bible that Israel shall indeed possess and inhabit the land: "They shall build the old wastes: they shall raise up the former desolations; and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations;" and "Jerusalem shall be a praise in the earth."

But there comes a question, Who are Israel? This may seem a strange question: for have we not been taught that the Jews are the chosen people of God—that they are Israel? If we look closely into the history of Israel we shall discover that the Jews are but a small portion of the chosen people—that they are but two tribes, and known in Scripture since the division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, as the House of Judah; and it was during their 70 years captivity in Babylon that they were first called Jews. But there was another and much larger portion, known as the House of Israel, or the Ten Tribes. These were carried captive into Assyria more than a century before their brethren of the House of Judah went to Babylon, and they were placed in Halah and Habor, on the river Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes. There is no record in Scripture that they ever returned, or that they ever became again amalgamated with their brethren of Judah, and their history seems to cease. It is very important to bear this division in mind, for it is a fact which seems to have been strangely overlooked. The question is, what became of this other portion?

In the book of the prophet Jeremiah there are these words: "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and stars for a light by night. . . . If these ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever" (Jer. xxxi. 35, 36).

Now the only logical conclusion that can be drawn from this quotation is that some portion of Israel must exist as a nation at the present day. We know very well that the Jews are not a nation, for they are scattered all over the world. Then, that other portion must be in existence as a nation, and must of necessity be their long-lost brethren of the House of Israel.

That the House of Israel must exist is absolutely certain, according to God's arrangements for their return to their own land. For it is written: "Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah and for the children of Israel his companions. Then take another stick and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the House of Israel, his companions; and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one stick. And the sticks whereon thou writest shall be in thine hand before their eyes. And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God: Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel: and one King shall be King to them all, and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all" (Ezek. xxxvii. 16, 17, 20—22).

Again: we are told that the House of Judah are to walk to the House of Israel for re-instatement in their own land. When this recognition of the House of Joseph, or Israel, is made by the House of Judah, their long-lost brethren will be found to be a powerful Christian nation, and fully able to replace them in the land.

"And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and increased in the land . . . in those days the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given them for an inheritance" (Jer. iii. 16—18).

"Therefore, behold the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, The Lord liveth, which brought up, and which led the seed of the House of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land" (Jer. xxiii. 7, 8).

I have said that when the Jews recognise their long-lost brethren of the House of Israel, they will be found to be a powerful Christian nation. Have we any clue whereby we may find this lost portion of Israel?

It was promised to Israel obedient (or Israel Christian):

"That they should become a great and mighty nation, the head and not the tail: above, and not beneath all the nations of the earth" (Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18, 19; xxviii. 1—13; 1 Chron. xvii. 1, 22).

"That the nation of Israel should lend to many nations, but should not borrow" (Deut. xv. 6; xxviii. 12).

"That they should rule over many nations, but no nation should rule over them" (Deut. xv. 6).

"That they should possess the Gate of their enemies, and their Gates should not be shut day nor night, but opened continually, that men may bring the abundance, or wealth of the nations to them" (Gen. xxii. 17; xxiv. 60; Isa. lx. 11).

"That they should have power to get wealth" (Deut. xxviii. 8—12).

"That they should do business in deep waters, going down to the sea in ships" (Psa. cvii. 23).

"That they should multiply as the stars of heaven, and as the sand on the sea-shore; they should spread abroad to to the west, east, north, and south, and fill the waste and desolate parts of the earth" (Gen. xxii. 17; xxviii. 14; Isa. xlix. 8, 9; Hosea i. 10).

There is one nation in the world, and one only, which answers to this description, and that is the British nation, whose ancestry is traced from the very district where the Ten Tribes were last heard of. The British Isles constitute the "appointed place" mentioned in 2 Sam. vii. 10:

Digitized by Google

"Moreover, I will appoint a place for My people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, as beforetime."

Every time we use the beautiful Liturgy of our National Church, we acknowledge (unconsciously) that we are God's chosen people—His inheritance. Very much more might be written to show that our British people are none other than God's chosen people—divorced from the Mosaic Law, and under the Christian Covenant, proving that our God hath indeed been faithful to the promises made to our forefather Abraham, and to his seed for ever.

I have endeavoured to show that the Land of Palestine is not to be purchased for Israel, for it is Israel's by right, and in God's good time will be again possessed by Israel. The more we search the Old Testament Scriptures, as well as the New Testament, the clearer shall we understand God's purposes concerning His people Israel.—The Uxbridge Gazette, March 14th, 1896.

RANDOM SHAFTS.

An American publication called, "The Bible Triumphant. Twelve Dozen Skeptical Arguments Refuted. A reply to a work entitled, '144 Self-contradictions of the Bible,'" by Elizabeth A. Reed, is a useful little book for those who are troubled with atheistic acquaintances and want to parry their thrusts. The authoress is a writer who hits a nail squarely on the head, and her vindications of Scripture are highly satisfactory. But there is one exception to the rule; one flaw in the fabric which is so glaring as to be almost painful, and I would not have noticed it were the remedy absent. The 107th "self-contradiction" advanced by the Freethinker concerns David's throne, and he pits Psa. lxxxix. 35—37 against Psa. lxxxix. 44 thus: "Once have I sworn by My holiness that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me. It shall be established for ever." "Thou hast made his glory to cease and hast cast his throne down to the ground."

Mrs. Reed is evidently in a dilemma here. She deals with the other "self-contradictions" by showing that the contradictions do not exist: that where the texts seem to conflict there is a mistranslation or a misconstruction. But that method fails her in this case, so she boldly sides with the 44th verse and, at considerable length, maintains that it is perfectly true! "Truly," remarks Mrs. Reed, "Thou hast made his glory to cease, and hast cast his throne down to the ground. But this statement, so far from being a mistake of the inspired penman, is confirmed by every historical record, and not only so, but the fact here spoken of is in itself a fulfilment of prophecy." The Atheist, however, does not say that Psa. lxxxix. 44 is a mistake: his contention obviously is that verses 35—37 have turned out to be a mistake. He would concede gladly, eagerly, that verse 44 harmonizes with history, but what he wishes to know is how it harmonizes with verses 35—37. Mrs. Reed raises a false issue.

It is not pleasant to see defenders of the faith playing into the hands of infidelity as if they were veritably blindfold, and it is equally disagreeable to find them forcing Scripture into hostility with itself. History, as it is understood by most people, unquestionably favours the notion that David's throne has been abolished for 2,500 years. That is a stronghold of the Atheist; and if Christians care to make common cause with him there is nothing to prevent them so long as our views remain in the "unorthodox" stage. But when they claim prophecy to help them in this Unholy Alliance the matter assumes a different complexion. Despite Mrs. Reed's confident assertion, there is not, from end to end of the Bible, a single scrap of prophecy supporting her interpretation of Psa. lxxxix. 44. The only prediction quoted in this connection is Ezek. xxi. 25—27, and the reasoning of our authoress thereon is more sophistical than logical. It certainly foretells the overturning of Israel's kingdom as she states, but not the suppression of David's throne. "Remove the diadem," not the throne. "This shall not be the same"—the ruling line was to be changed. "Exalt him that is low"—this cannot refer either to the incarnation of Messiah or to His future personal sitting on the Davidic throne.

"The Bible Triumphant" does not advocate a spiritual fulfilment of the promises made to David. It frankly rejects the idea that the advent and ascension of the Saviour meet the requirements of Scripture, as "a spiritual throne erected in the heavens, could not fill the promise." All it contends for is that Christ will eventually occupy David's throne, and advances Isa. ix. 7, Jer. xxiii. 5, &c., in proof. Doubtless, the Christian has no difficulty in trusting this; but he may have some natural suspicions about the soundness of a theory which taints the promise with a tremendous gap of at least twenty-five centuries. And as for expecting Atheists to accept it we might as well whistle at the moon. They judge the Bible by its actual, not prospective, merits, and are hardly likely to set much value on prophecies concerning futurity if prophecies concerning to-day are lying in ruins. But if it can be shown that, so far, God has faithfully and wonderfully kept His oath to David we have every chance of convincing them that He will keep it to the close.

Mr. H. L. Hastings, in his preface to this work, remarks that "There may be isolated instances where arguments might be strengthened, or where other solutions of seeming difficulties might be preferred to those here offered," and he is right. There is a better way of explaining Psalm lxxxix. than that adopted in "The Bible Triumphant." Verses 28—37 (not to speak of Jer. xxxiii. 25, 26, and 2 Sam. vii. 14—16) signify that David's throne should be existing, and it is existing. On the other hand, verses 38—44 are not a communication from God, but a moody complaint which foolishly charges Jehovah with having broken His Word. The Psalm was written three or four centuries before the captivity of Judah; and as Ethan lived in the time of Solomon it is probable that his lament owes its origin to the rebellion of the Ten Tribes, and subsequent misfortunes, which left the royal House in reduced and perilous circumstances. But whether that is so or not, his murmurings are simply those of a short-sighted man, and can have no more effect on the stability of David's dynasty than the laughter of Sarah had on the birth of Isaac.

At page 26 of his new volume, "Patriarchal Palestine," professor Sayce has a sentence which exemplifies the loose style of language used by those who teach and train the British public. After describing the geographical features of Canaan he states: "Such was Palestine, the promised home of Israel. It was a land of rugged and picturesque mountains; interspersed with a few tracts of fertile country. . . . It was, too, a land of small extent, hardly more than one hundred and sixty miles in length and sixty miles in width." Professor Sayce must know that this was not Israel's promised home, but merely a very slight portion of it. Certain Bibles or Bible Atlases contain two maps of Israel's territory; one the "land of promise," the other the "land of possession," and if the professor consults them he will observe a wide difference between their boundaries. The presence of these twin maps is an admission on the part of scholars that Israel did not possess what God promised, although I confess I never heard a clergyman point the fact out. But Sayce goes a step further and leads his readers to suppose that the province measuring 160 miles by 60 was Israel's promised inheritance. In a superficial individual this would be intelligible, but it does not correspond with a reputation for learning and criticism.

A paragraph which follows the above is, however, more worthy of erudition. "The sea-coast with its harbours was in the hands of the Phœnicians and the Philistines, and although the Philistines at one time owned an unwilling allegiance to the Jewish King, the Phœnicians preserved their independence, and even Solomon had to find harbours for his merchantmen, not on the coast of his own native kingdom, but in the distant Edomite ports of Eloth and Ezion-geber in the Gulf of Aqabah." From which it can be gleaned that even if the district 160 miles long and 60 broad represented the dimensions of the land covenanted to Israel she has never yet enjoyed it. Of course we were aware of this, but we are nobodies, and it is good to have a friendly affidavit from the unfriendly pen of professor Sayce.

NOTES ON M. LAGRANGE'S PYRAMID BOOK.

BY H. STEWART.

I DO not remember that this has been noticed in the BANNER since its translation into English. There is a splendid tone in the book, which deserves to be welcomed with hospitality, though it introduces some novel ideas, notably as to the duration of a "time" in Scripture, and misses some points which are thoroughly established in the minds of readers of the BANNER OF ISRAEL and "Monthly Comments." For instance, p. 99, it is sought to identify the four beasts in Rev. iv. 7, 8, with four separate nations, the Lion for Babylon, Calf for Egypt, Man for Judah, Eagle for Greece. At p. 101, referring to Ezekiel's four-faced vision, an attempt is made to identify it with the same four. Of course the visions refer to the same nation, which is God's glory—but there are no Babylonians nor Egyptians in it! at least nationally.

At page 106 is a suggestion to be received with respect and gratitude. "About the space of half an hour" shown to be synonymous with "half a time"—that is, half of 528 years according to Lagrange, or 180 years according to our ideas.

In page 108, par 71, "The chosen people" and "the Church of Christ" contrasted as if they were separate bodies; therefore the reasoning founded on this must fall to the ground in toto.

In page 117, par 85, to be again received with gratitude, the number of the beast = 666, meaning Babel or confusion.

In note to page 145, after connecting the four beasts of Dan. vii. with those of Rev. xiii. 1, xvii. 3, 7, 8 (to which there is no objection) and with those of Rev. iv. 7, 8, to which we must demur, England is brought in as one of ten kings of Europe, although it is a part of our charter that we shall not be reckoned among the nations. Very good, though I cannot agree with the application, is the principle on which the epistles to the Churches is dealt with, p. 151, 156, notably p. 160. The Greek derivation of the names of the Churches is considered and periods assigned the Churches according to the meaning of their names, more especially the study into the meaning of the word Nicolaitanes, the announcement regarding whom has been a trouble to many a perplexed spirit. "This name is, in fact, like all the others, a symbolical name; it is derived from Nikein, to conquer, to rule, and from Laites, man of the people, the people. The spirit of the Nicolaitanes is that of human domination over the souls, ostensibly in the name of spiritual truth; it is this which to-day is called the clerical spirit (ruler of the laity), that spirit which hides from the people the true authority, that of the Word, which engenders almost fatally the loss of sincerity and goodness. . . . The Lord declares that He hates it and praises the Church of the Mosaic law for hating it also" (page 264).

Totten's chronology is belittled, which is a pity; for you cannot capsize his reckonings, although we may well use a little reserve in adopting his views (oh why so certain?) as to future events. On the book generally I think it a very valuable contribution to our literature. Some very difficult passages of Holy Writ have been rendered clear. Personally I do not think a sufficient case is made out for accepting 528 years as the duration of a "time" in Scripture, though this can be left a matter of opinion. We have always taken a "time" to mean 360 years and have used the argument of "seven times" of the punishment of Israel running out in 1800 as conclusive. If any change were made in the value of a "time" I would suggest that for certain purposes it may mean 360 years and for certain other purposes it might mean 365·24. Seven of these last would run out in 1837. If our religious life woke up in 1800 our scientific progress may be said to have commenced almost with the reign of our beloved Queen. On this head Besant's "Fifty Years Ago and Now" may be read with advantage.

Objection must also be taken to any theory of the life of nations which, including England, requires that England shall decay after so many years, and be succeeded by some other nation as the chief of the nations; for not only do we read that the stone kingdom shall be everlasting (Dan. ii.), but that (Isa. ix. 7) "of the increase of his government and of peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David. . . . The zeal of the Lord of hosts shall perform this."

SOWING THE SEED.

A Sower in one of our great Naval Ports has sent us a good account of some results from seed-sowing which has made us thankful, and will be read doubtless with similar feeling by others. The letter opens with many thanks for the literature that has been sent him, and reference is made to a contribution to our Fund, an aid, given we believe, according to his means, for the work he greatly values. He speaks of his lively interest, and continues:—

"This I know will read as somewhat egotistic, but it is not written in that spirit. No, the question is too precious to cause me to feel vain. I have found it to be too helpful to me in my work of spreading the Gospel of Christ, to ever allow me to forget that I am treading upon other people's ground. The subject is one which ought to fill every Englishman's heart with thankfulness to Him who is faithful to His promise. My work, as you may have learned from ——, throws me in contact with a large number of men, as many as 30,000 in a year, and I never lose an opportunity that presents itself for bringing forward the 'Identity,' and I have found some very grand results attending my efforts. I will give you two or three, which will only be specimens of many more."

The first is from a foreigner, a Protestant. Our Sower continues—"He had read several books, became interested, and said, 'I am deeply indebted to you for the loan of the books, and truly believe what they set forth. I have for a long time studied the progress of England and its people, and concluded in my own mind there is something wonderful about them, but never before did I fully understand the cause of this progress, but now I see it. You have the Bible, which is the pure word of a true God. It is put into the hands of your children, and they are taught to read it for themselves, while our Roman priests tell us it is unfit for the common people to read, consequently we are kept in ignorance unless we kick over the draught straps as I have done, and if we do this, and read for ourselves we are called "heritics." What is the result? Rome has shut and locked the Bible, and now her nation is one of the most impoverished of the earth, while the people who follow her teaching are the most bigoted and ignorant of any. England opens the door of truth and bids the children enter. As a natural result, Englishmen are the most just and open-minded. Having read the Anglo-Israel books, and studied the Scriptures, I am convinced you are the people whom the Lord has blest, and although I do not belong to that nation by birth, I am glad I am under its flag, because I am sure that as God has blest her, He will not forsake those whom she has taken under her wing.' The foregoing was given unsolicited. Not long ago I met a man who was in a deplorable state of mind through reading 'The Signs of the Times,' &c. He spoke to me about it, and I at once pointed him to the prophecies which have not been fulfilled, and to modern history, especially that of our own little Islands, &c., &c. On his return, he told me, 'I am persuaded, and now believe God's Word, and will henceforth take the BANNER regularly, and read it and compare it with the Scriptures.'

"Another, a Scotchman, was sceptical as to the Bible in general, but after having a quiet talk about our 'Identity," and bidding him read the Scriptures in a common-sense manner, he changed his tune, and said, 'I never read of such a theory before, and will give it a good consideration.' Judge my surprise when I visited him the next Sunday to find him with the Bible, and the pamphlets I gave him placed between its pages, ready for consultation when I should arrive, 'for,' said he, 'I can never doubt the Word again. I thank you for drawing my mind to this subject.' I think these cases are sufficient for my present purpose." We heartily agree, and send thanks to our Sower, who does not consider himself a correspondent, and assure him we feel satisfied that he is making good use of the literature sent from our Fund.

From a new Sower in the Canadian Dominions we have the words, "I thankfully acknowledge receipt of literature so kindly sent me. I am trying to make good use of it so far as I can. I have distributed amongst ministers, Sabbath school superintendents, and teachers. I have also copied several of the articles, both from the BANNER and from the 'Covenant People,' and given them to some friends, asking God's blessing on my endeavours to promote the knowledge of the glorious theme." We may be sure that in the last sentence lies the secret of all success. We rejoice to acknowledge it, and hope and trust that continual prayer, in furtherance of our work at home, and that of every individual Sower all round the Empire, ascends to the Lord God Almighty, that all our labours may be directed by His Holy Spirit, and that the publication of the good news He has sent us may glorify the Father, and quickly win many more to accept the Gospel of our Lord. May we all be led to proclaim with thanksgiving, that He is "the Christ, the Son of the living God," for whose glorious kingdom we desire to prepare. E. M. RUSH, Hon. Sec.

BRITISH DOMINION IN AFRICA.

IT seems that the continental nations, Germany and France especially, are greatly exercised, through jealousy and other reasons, by the contemplation of the fact that Britain is already the chief European Power in Africa; that she is constantly advancing her influence there, and that it is not at all unlikely that, following the example of India and Canada, it may one day turn out that the British king or queen of some decades hence, may really prove to be "Emperor" or "Empress of Africa," as well as of India, and the Australian and North American Canadian continents. We have ourselves in these columns often expressed that belief, and given reasons, more or less cogent, why it should, nay must, be so. We wish now to continue the subject and advance another reason which seems to us to be of much force, to lead us to the belief that God means us to possess Africa in spite of its immense extent of equatorial tropical territory, in order that it may be brought to the feet of Christ Jesus our Lord.

The reasons which seem to point to this conclusion, are founded on an article on "Indian Affairs," respecting "India and Africa," which appeared in the Times of April 7, last. It is manifest that, in the providence of God, we have quite recently been placed in charge of large and important territories in Africa, annexed indeed in some cases to the British Empire itself, which demand of us some military force to control, police, and defend it. Such a country is the equatorial British province of Uganda, the sub-tropical portion of East Africa, which is included within the "British sphere of influence," the torrid strip of land on the east coast in the Red Sea, in which Suakin, Sinkat, and Tokar are situated, besides more of the same kind in the southern tropic. In none of these regions can the British Government allow her European troops to be employed, on account of the fervid climate of those parts. How then can the British Power be upheld in those equatorial and tropical regions, which must be maintained by her soldiery, but cannot be defended by the European army of Great Britain?

The answer is, that Indian troops which have within our own memories been summoned to Africa and served there very usefully before, must be used again by the Paramount Power in Hindoostan, for the defence of her African possessions, and, if need be, in the acquisition of fresh territories, if required. The question may be asked whether India can afford this strain on her fighting manhood? and are those we might employ ready to come? In regard to the last question it is quite certain that our native fellow-subjects in India would now, as on previous occasions, be proud to go where their British officers may lead them, and that there will be no difficulty in inducing the Sikh, Ghorka, and Bombay troops to fight our battles for us in Africa, under British officers. A few words from the Times article explaining how this has come about, may be interesting as showing the enormous fighting power we have in India, available for military purposes in Egypt, West, South, or in Equatorial Africa. The Times writer said this:—

Great Britain enters on her new spheres of influence with a force at her disposal which not one of her rivals can command. She has in India an overflowing population, composed in part of the finest military races in the tropical world, in part of races the most patient of labour, inured to a tropical climate and to tropical conditions of life. Each year India adds nearly three millions to the number of those races; during the next ten years the increment will aggregate 30 millions. This inexhaustible reservoir of human life, this great recruiting field for tropical service and source of labour supply for tropical work, gives to England possibilities of African development such as no European nation possesses.

How to organize that vast industrial force, and to dispose of it so that its very numbers shall not tread each other down, is becoming the supreme problem of British rule in India. The services rendered by Indian troops in Africa are well known; Abyssinia, the Nile Valley, and the eastern coast stand out conspicuously on the record. But the record is not one of successful campaigning alone, but of steady watch and ward, little recognized, indeed, in Europe and almost unknown to the mass of Englishmen. On Saturday morning we got incidental glimpses at the part played by Sikh soldiers during the past five years in Nyasaland. As a local force and as military police the Indians have proved invaluable in Equatorial Africa, and recent events point to the expediency of thus employing them a good deal further south. Indian native surveyors have helped to make the map of British Africa. Indian traders conduct the retail supply and not a little of the general business of the East African ports, and are finding their way far inland. Indian labourers cross the sea by thousands a year to the British and independent States of the new continent, and in Natal alone number 51,000, or more than the whole European population. The connexion between India and Africa consists, therefore, not of a few thrilling episodes like those of Magdala or Malta, but of continuous services rendered during a quarter of a century, and now being rendered on a rapidly extending scale. It does not arise out of exceptional contingencies, but results from permanent economic laws. The truth is that Indian labour is cheapest where European labour is dearest, and effective under conditions which to the British working man would mean misery and death. Africa lies open to the overflowing population of India now freed from internecine struggles, as America opened up to the population of Europe when relieved from the drain of mediæval wars. But Africa is to India a more accessible America; a new world in which Indian soldiers have contributed to the establishment of the British Power, and in which Indian merchants and labourers are assisting in the development of British enterprise.

Our readers will notice the hand of God manifest here, in first giving us India; enabling us next to put down wars there among the native races; and then when the effect has been vastly to multiply the military element in that land, to give us and them a continent like Africa, where their services may become invaluable to us, in enabling us to conquer our African enemies, and to hold the land open for the Gospel of Christ and His civilization, that the whole continent in time may hear the good news, and become a portion of the kingdom of Christ won for Him by Israel. We are now acting through the conquered races of India, who are the willing servants of the King's own children, the children of Israel. These "possibilities of African development are such as no other European nation besides the British possesses!"

The Indian races in question constitute in short a force "at the disposal of the British which not one of her rivals can command!" We recognize, in fact, that in India, as well as in Africa, God has placed the best portions of those countries in our hands, in such wise that it will take but a short period to bring Africa as a continent into subjection to the King of kings.

To do this, we can imagine that, excepting Israel (the British), there can be found no other better fitted agency to carry out the purposes of the Lord. To no other nation has the Word of God been committed. "He showeth (and hath shown) His word unto Jacob, His statutes and His judgments unto Israel; He hath not so dealt with any nation!" To no other race has He entrusted the Gospel for publication by preaching; His laws are respected only by them nationally, and to none other nation has He given the birthright blessings of Israel, the power to rule the nations, and the power to get wealth, that thereby He may establish His covenant which He sware unto their fathers as at this day (Deut. viii. 18, R.V.). These promises are our great and sufficient consolation. Believing them we can joy and rejoice in Him, and with heart and soul praise the Lord.

In our next issue we shall publish Mr. Reid's address delivered at the Annual Meeting of the British-Israel Association.

FORGOTTEN TEACHINGS OF FAVOURITE TEXTS.

By J. G. Taylor.

PART II.

"I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction," and the whole of Isaiah xlviii. is strictly national. In it God expostulates with Israel for their persistent backsliding, but assures them that He will restrain His anger, "For how should My name be polluted? And I will not give My glory unto another" (ver. 11). "Say ye, The Lord hath redeemed His servant Jacob" (ver. 20). But theologians invariably associate ver. 10 with the penitent heart or the afflicted pious, and the satisfaction drawn from it is that adversities are not unmixed evils, that they are blessings in disguise, and that God will infallibly bring His people out of the "furnace" purer than when they went in. We do not question it; and as the people involved are the Hebrew people, it follows that the expulsion of Israel and scattering of Judah are temporary, not lasting. They do not afford the slightest pretext for holding that God has cast them away because of their "enormities." Even if this ver. 10 were the only line in Scripture to rely on, we should be compelled to believe that the punishment of Israel is correctional in its nature, that it will terminate at the earliest moment compatible with God's benevolent purpose, and that the race will emerge from its fiery ordeal "refined as silver," fitted for the mighty tasks and solemn responsibilities with which the prophets have laden it.

"Comfort ye, comfort ye My people" (Isa. xl. 1), is analogous to the foregoing, and is analogously abused. We are told that Isaiah was glancing forward into the distant future, where he sees the Gospel Church waging its Holy War, and is commissioned to convey the needed solace. The keynote of such commentary is "Rejoice in tribulation." Troubles are transient, and the eventual happiness of the Church is as sure as its present perplexities. But ver. 2, besides alluding to Jerusalem, declares, "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins;" and if it is true that the Church has received, or ever will receive, double for all her sins, the countless prayers she has offered up must be untrue. For the usual confession of Christians is that they have not been visited with half the measure of their deserts. "It is of Thy great mercy that we are not consumed," or words in that strain, occur regularly in the Church's petitions; but if the spiritual conception is sound they should be altered to "O Lord, we have received double for all our sins." This would probably be considered inappropriate by even the most self-righteous. But when we reflect on the sorrows endured by the Jews for the past 2,000 years, and what they may yet have to face, we cannot but allow that the language of the prophet is perfectly justifiable. It is not possible for sentient creatures to experience worse cruelties than have the Jews. There is no disability and no outrage in this world of wicked inventiveness beneath which they have not lain prostate. They have drunk the cup of retribution to its dregs, and, if a nation can atone at all for its misdeeds by physical and mental agony, Judah has done so. As for the Church, is she suffering in any degree whatever for trespass? Papists might answer in the affirmative, their penances and purgatorial pains having been devised to purge them of their stains. But this would be thoroughly distasteful to those of the Reformed Faith, whose creed is that the Saviour paid the sinner's debt to its uttermost farthing. No Protestant dare inculcate that the travail of the Church is in expiation of her guilt, and it must be presumed that those who devote Isa. xl. 1, 2 to the Church do not realise the significance of their action.

"Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool" (Isa. i. 18). In the good old days of Gospel preaching this was an immensely popular text. Perhaps the sins of mankind are not so scarlet as they used to be, for it has fallen somewhat into the background. It is often quoted, however, and is still prized by missioners and revivalists. Of course, they always give it a personal application, and on the strength of it they pronounce with vehemence that no transgression is so black and no transgressor so sunken as to be beyond the reach of God's grace. The sole requisite is repentance; possessing this, the number and character of the convert's iniquities are as nothing. The teaching is faultless, and the more loudly it is published the better. But we have to remember that the passage has no bearing on any except "Judah and Jerusalem," "Zion," and "Israel"—the Israel which provoked and forsook Jehovah (ver. 4), not that "spiritual Israel" which is said to have supplanted these rebellious Hebrews. In the preceding and succeeding verses God complains of their stubbornness, entreats them to leave their evil paths, and promises the fullest of pardon. We do not wish to restrict the flow of mercy, but are decidedly unwilling to have the stream turned entirely from its intended channel. The very broadest construction which can be put upon the text is that both Gentiles and Hebrews may obtain forgiveness of sins the most heinous and most abounding. Consequently Israel's crimes, of which we hear so much, need not be discussed. To ransack Scripture for samples of those crimes is wasted labour. To write columns and pages upon her idolatries is wasted ink. To declaim about her religious and social degeneracy is wasted energy. The only problem for settlement—if it can be called a problem—is, Would Israel embrace God's invitation and be reinstated in His favour? Not the least mystery hangs around this. Vers. 25—27 are explicit; and if it is objected that they refer chiefly to Judah, there are other predictions of a similar tenour which deal exclusively with Ephraim-Israel (Hos. v. 15, xi. 10, xiv. 4—8; Jer. xxxi. 18—20).

"Ye have sold yourselves for nought, and ye shall be redeemed without money" (Isa. lii. 3), is the theme of innumerable discourses, but has its real import ever once been brought before a Christian congregation? We hope so, but think not. The head-lines inform us that in these words "Christ persuadeth the Church to believe His free redemption," and the pulpit persuadeth the Church to believe it also. The idea that Christ has redeemed a specific nation is repugnant to theologians. Souls are redeemed; the Church is redeemed; even the world is redeemed; but the opinion that "fleshly Israel" was redeemed is heresy of the grossest stamp. According to common report, those who can harbour such a fancy are not acquainted with the first principles of the Gospel; they are narrow and deluded; they are coarse and carnally minded. But we have already seen that the reading of contexts is pressed upon us as a most meritorious proceeding—one which is essential to the right understanding of Scripture; and, strange though it may seem, this reading of contexts is mainly responsible for the ignorance and coarseness of our notions. In the present instance it is scarcely necessary to consult the context. The text is conclusive, as it declares, "Ye have sold yourselves for nought," and to assert that the Church sold itself is preposterous. Sinners, previous to their change and reception into the Church, may be charged with having sold themselves; but they were not then a part of the Church, or of "spiritual" Israel, or of the "heavenly Jerusalem." The accusation obviously attaches to literal Israel, who had sold themselves nationally as well as spiritually; and this is borne out by the context. "Thus saith the Lord God, My people went down aforetime into Egypt to sojourn there; and the Assyrian oppressed them without cause. Now, therefore, what have I here, saith the Lord, that My people is taken away for nought?" (vers. 5, 6). "Taken away for nought," and "sold for nought," are parallel expressions, and the remainder of the chapter is a glad announcement of the deliverance of this captive people from bondage, their conversion to God, and their restoration to Palestine.

"He was wounded for our transgressions." "For the transgression of My people was He stricken" (Isa. liii. 5, 8). These venerated portions of a venerated chapter are never for an instant considered in conjunction with "fleshly Israel." Christians unanimously assume that "our transgressions" are the transgressions of humanity; and, far from supposing that the text has any particular relation to Israel, Israel is the last nation in the world with which the Church would think of connecting it. That Christ died for all of Adam is true, and, fortunately, the doctrine rests on better evidence than what is found in Isa. liii. It is extremely doubtful whether universal grace can be learned from that chapter, except by implication, for it contains no mention of Gentiles, and no indication that Isaiah was contemplating more than the salvation of his own race. On the other hand, ver. 8 limits the prophecy to Twelve-tribed Israel. "For the transgression of My people was He stricken," has received an altogether mistaken interpretation. The term "My people," scattered throughout the Bible, is a designation of literal Israel, but divines maintain that the ransomed of every tongue, being God's people, have a superior claim to the title, and they infer, therefore, that in Isa. liii. 8 we get an allusion to the Church. From vers. 1 to 10, however, it is not the Lord who speaks, but Isaiah, so that "My people" are the Hebrews. It may be freely granted that Israel here represents mortality, and that in suffering for Israel the Saviour suffered for mankind. But Isa. liii. manifestly coincides with the general witness of both the Old and New Testaments, namely, that the immediate and primary purpose of Messiah in sacrificing His life was to make reparation for the sin of national Israel and rescue them from its dire results. The provisional blindness of Judah has tended to obscure that fact, but fact it is. And the unbelief of Judah, instead of leading us to surmise that the Ten Tribes are also in unbelief, should convince us that they are not, for it is absolutely incredible that Christ's avowed mission can have been a blank failure.

When the preacher desires to exhibit the love of God in all its depth and His faithfulness in all its constancy, he has recourse to Isa. xlix., quoting "Can a woman forget her sucking child?" or, "I have graven thee upon the palm of My hand." To accentuate the teaching of those passages, the first one is usually enforced by a dissertation on the affection of mothers for their offspring, while the imagery of the second is strongly impressed upon the mind; the judgment being that God's love and faithfulness are simply unfathomable and inexhaustible. It need hardly be added that this love and faithfulness is then presented to the Church, nor need it be said that the literal Israelites are rarely noticed. When they happen to be honoured with a glance it is with the object of stating that "fleshly Israel was a type of the Church," and that it was "rejected for its wickedness." The incongruity of this is apparently overlooked; nevertheless it would be difficult to discover, even among the luxuriant extravagances of spiritualizers, more absurd or fatal assertions. For if "fleshly Israel" has been rejected on account of their provocations, God's love cannot be unfathomable and inexhaustible, since Israel has fathomed it —exhausted it. This being the case, it is possible that the Church also may exhaust God's love and be discarded. Indeed, it is not a matter of possibility but of certainty, because if Israel prefigures the Church and has undergone excision, the Church will have to undergo excision too, as the symbology will not be complete until that sad event comes to pass. The suggestion that so melancholy a fate is in store for "spiritual Israel" will be set down by many of our opponents to a diseased intellect, but it is more clearly traceable to a diseased theology. From the "type" standpoint alone it is plain that the prosperity of Israel implies the prosperity of the Church, and that the abandonment of Israel demands the ultimate abandonment of the Church. Yet the contention that Israel continues to enjoy God's blessing is denounced as if it were an attack on the Church's very foundations. Prove that the Ten Tribes are in possession of the Abrahamic gifts, and religious circles are shocked as well as indignant at this palpable sign of latter-day apostacy. But prove, or try to prove, that those tribes exist in the form of miserable savages or mangled Nestorians, and it is felt that the status of the Church is safe. From which we gather that the degradation of the type means the dignity of the antitype, and that the enrichment of an antitype requires the impoverishment of the type. Logic of this peculiar description will not bear much light, and sooner or later theologians will have to renounce the "type" theory, or the theory that God has relinquished Israel. For our own part we accept the view that Hebrew history has its spiritual or emblematic side, but repudiate that crude and vicious system which turns history into allegory and labels whole chapters "spiritual," whether their details authorise it or not. Isa. xlix. 17—23, for example, totally misfits the Church. Where are her waste and desolate places? The Church has no land, no frontiers; where, therefore, is the land of her destruction and when was she destroyed? How can it be said of the Church that her country is "too strait"—that her children will cry out for room to dwell in? A spiritual rendering will not satisfy this. The prophet is dilating on literal Israel, and ver. 19 is but the sequel of ver. 15.

"Before they call I will answer" (Isa. lxv. 24); "I will ransom them from the power of the grave" (Hos. xiii. 14); "I have loved thee with an everlasting love" (Jer. xxxi. 3); "As thy days so shall thy strength be" (Deut. xxxiii. 25); "In Me is thy help" (Hos. xiii. 9); "I will extend peace to her like a river" (Isa. lxvi. 12); "He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of His eye" (Zech. ii. 8); "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Micah vii. 19); "From Me is thy fruit found" (Hos. xiv. 8); "I will uphold thee with the right hand of My righteousness" (Isa. xli. 10), and scores of others, are passages on which the Church has fixed its heart, for the reason that they display the merciful phase of God's character, and supply a promise for every conceivable situation of trial and danger. Remission of sins, reconciliation with God, succour in trouble, guidance through wanderings, security against evil, triumph over enemies, termination of exile, and glorious reign, are all pledged to God's people in God's Word, and applied incessantly to the wants of the Church. But a study of the context shows that these pledges are the property of literal Israelites, not of the Church. Those who deny this are not qualified to expound Revelation; those who admit it have no ground for their dogma that the Hebrew has been disinherited and his estates transferred to a spiritual substitute. Only two alternatives are open to us. We have either to believe the Bible or disbelieve it. If we disbelieve it, controversy is at an end; but if we have faith in its utterances there can be no escape from the conclusion that Israel is still high in God's favour, the subject of His ceaseless regard, and the recipient of His choicest benefits. As Jewish Israel—the Two Tribes—does not furnish us with the fulfilment of God's lavish engagements, it is an imperative necessity that Ephraim-Israel, the Ten Tribes, should do so; otherwise Scripture forfeits our confidence, prophecy is discredited, and the men who class it with fable will multiply. Hence, those who inform the public that they can see no virtue or value in the descent of the Anglo-Saxons from lost Israel are merely advertising the shallowness of their Biblical knowledge, whatever may be their pretensions and rank in the science of theology.

ISRAELISM VERSUS ROMANISM.

By T. Reay, Gosforth.

While there is much to admire in the Romish religion, the unyielding faith and sturdy devotion of its worshippers, Britons would do well to study St. Paul's epistle to that nation, bearing in mind that we are the Israelites, or what is beyond dispute, that we alone of all the nations of the world are in the full enjoyment to-day of all the promises given to that people, and that no other nation can now possess the heritage. For even were it possible for our England to fall entirely under the sway of any foreign Power and its world-wide possessions to come under the dictatorship of such Power, the covenant would require us to quit so as to leave our conquerors everywhere more numerous than ourselves.

The world is not large enough now for such a transformation. Men hear of possibilities of inheriting wealth, and straightway strive in every way to prove themselves the rightful heirs. Others get wrongly in possession, but similarly strive to prove a title. Britons, however, are unique, for they possess Israel's heritage and tell the world they mean to keep it. Yet they spare no pains to prove that they are not the inheritors thereof. St. Paul in the 11th chapter of his epistle to the Romans and 17th verse (it will be seen in the first chapter that he writes to all that be in Rome; he consequently includes all from whom the present Roman Church sprang) tells them that they were chosen instead of Israel; that in fact they owe their position to Israel's disobedience; he calls them "the wild olive" and Israel the natural branches. Our version says, "graffed in amongst," but the marginal note, "or for," puts the matter clearer, supported as it is by the Latin version, "pro ipsis," or the French "en leur place."

Now had this Israel of Scripture implied a spiritual state as we have always been taught, St. Paul would have implored them to strive for, and aim at becoming Israelites themselves, instead of defining a wall of partition as he does, which bodes ill for even any hope of the much talked of union. Romans could not become Israelites, the children of promise in the flesh. This eleventh verse does, however, clearly justify much of the pretensions of the Romanists. They have been the foremost custodians of Christianity; they have in short filled Israel's place; but their lease of that position has expired. The first nation of the world whose duty is also to be the first Christianizing nation and whose glorious return St. Paul so clearly foretells in this very chapter cannot, to put it plainly, any longer dishonour God by even appearing as second to the Romish Church. Resting peacefully like the stranded ancient ark on the hillside here, and again yonder in the valley, and there again on the plain and in the busiest commercial centres of all our large cities, with her corners worn off by the incessant flow and ebb of humanity, is to be seen the true Church, and none with any knowledge of her Liturgy will dispute her title to "the Church of Israel." Mark her quiet, confident repose and note her "eastward position" officially consecrated to her just 2,900 years ago by Solomon at the dedication of his temple. Israel was to be graffed into their own olive tree (ver. 24). One of the characteristics of British Christianity has all along been personal union with a living Saviour, the only Mediator being the Holy Spirit. Contrast this with the Roman union with the Church; the priesthood, the Pope, the saints, all to be reckoned with before the Saviour is reached. Of union between the two Churches there is absolutely no hope. It could only mean absorption by one of the other. Would the highmindedness of Rome permit her to risk the loss of her identity by union with Britain? and could Britain, remembering that Rome seeks now as ever temporal as well as spiritual power, annihilate herself by union with Rome? Britain's position before God in the light of Scripture prophecy, renders the contemplation of such an union sinful. The Church of England to-day freely offers all and more than Rome has ever been able to give. The boasting foretold by St. Paul in ver. 18, which usually takes the form of a taunt regarding apostolic succession, continuity of the priesthood, validity of sacraments, &c., weighs with many men and causes many converts who overlook the fact that the apostles were ordained exclusively for Israel. St. Paul only for the Gentiles, his ordination also including Israel. This perpetual slander on these saints of God should find no echo in Israel, for it implies that the one special mission of their lives was not accomplished. Britons who, in their blindness, join the Romish Church cast aside their own glorious birthright, but the loss is to the individual and will not affect the final issue, for the Italian mission must pall before the glory of the already dawning Israel.

ISRAEL AND JUDAH, REUNITED AS ONE NATION.

THE following is a synopsis of a lecture by Rev. Joshua Gravett before Camp Tea Tephi, Tuesday evening, Feb. 18:—

"Two weeks ago we spake of God's dealings with His chosen people, the Israelites, down to the time of Christ. We must not forget that there were two covenants: the first, unconditional, made with Abraham, re-affirmed to Isaac and Jacob; the second, conditional, made with the people of Israel, upon Mount Sinai. For continued violation of the latter covenant, first, the Ten Tribes, and then the Two Tribes, went into captivity. Nevertheless, God did not utterly forsake His people, but remembered His promise, 'I will not make a full end of thee, but correct thee in measure.'

"We will now look at references to Israel and its return, found in the New Testament: and, first, read Luke xix. 11, which shows that the Jews were anticipating the restoration of the earthly kingdom of Israel, and the disciples supposed that Christ's mission was to establish it at that time. Then follows the parable which corroborates their expectation of a literal kingdom, but teaches that the time was not yet come for its establishment.

"But the 'fulness of time' had come, when God should begin to fulfil His promise to Abraham of the Seed, through whom all families of the earth shall be blessed. In Luke i. 30—33 we have the declaration to Mary by the angel: the portion concerning the conception, birth, etc., was all true, all literal; so also must that part relating to the throne and the kingdom be literal, and literally be fulfilled in due season. As Abraham was chosen to be the head of a race (Gen. xii. 1—3, xvii. 4—8), so David was chosen to be the head of a kingdom (1st Sam. xvi. 1, 12; Psa. lxxxix. 20); here is election, predestination. Down in verses 52—55 we have the words of Mary while filled with the Spirit, declaring that God's set time had come, 'The time has come to help Israel.' Zacharias also, 'being filled with the Holy Ghost' said, 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; He hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the House of His servant David . . . to remember His holy covenant, the oath which He sware to our father Abraham.'

"Luke ii. 25—32, Simeon testifies; when he came and met the parents bringing Jesus into the temple, arriving just at the moment, being 'come by the Spirit,' said, 'Mine eyes have seen Thy salvation, which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel." In Matt. xxiii. 39; Luke xiii. 34, 35, xxi. 24, Jesus tells them that although the Redeemer of Israel has come, that the rejection of Him by the people will result in the dispersion and scattering of the Jews among all nations, by whom they shall be hated and despised, and that 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' The kingdom could not be set up 'until' these and other things shall have been fulfilled, and they shall then say, 'Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord.' In Ephes. i. 14; Rom. xi. 25, 26, etc., we find the same limitations of 'until,' and when this period covered by 'until'—during which so many things must be consummated—has elapsed, then shall come the fulfilment of the promises, 'I will cause the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel to return, and will build them as at first.' (If the first were literal, so must the re-builded ones be!) 'I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the House of Israel and to the House of Judah . . . In those days shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely.' 'For I will cause to return the captivity of the land . . . the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and blossom as the rose: it shall blossom abundantly . . . Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree' (see Jer. xxxiii. 7, 14, 11; Isa. xxxv. 1, 2, lv. 13). Thus we have the literal land revived, in which there will be the literal descendants of the Twelve Tribes, again become a literal nation; and the unconditional promise to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, is that they shall inherit it for ever! Through them (then) shall all the nations of the earth be blessed! (Gen. xviii. 18, xxii. 17, 18).

"In Acts iii. 12—26, we have the testimony of Peter; he was speaking not to the Jews alone, but to all Israel, for they were there represented by the 'devout men out of every nation,' as seen in the second chapter. While urging them to repentance, Peter declares that God 'shall send Jesus Christ' at the expiration of that 'until' (ver. 21), to complete the promise made 'unto the fathers;' thus linking all Old Testament promises with Christ the Seed, through whom the blessings are secured to them; and in ver. 19 we see that he is talking to them as a nation.

"We find other similar testimony. When legalism had been asserting itself, the apostles and many disciples took counsel. Peter, Paul, Barnabas and James told how that 'God had chosen many among the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for His name,' and quoted the promise, 'After this' (after the believers of this present dispensation are taken out), 'I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David; that the residue of men might seek after the Lord.' We have now heard from eight witnesses who say that there is a glorious future for God's people, Israel; a literal, earthly future—viz., the angel, Mary, Simeon, Zacharias, Peter, Paul, Barnabas and James. And to this all the council agreed, as we read in Acts xv. 25.—From The Rocky Mountain Baptist, of Feb. 27, 1896.

THE BEST AND EASIEST WAY TO IDENTIFY "THE ISRAEL OF GOD."

By "the Israel of God" named in St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, vi. 16, R.V., we mean "the chosen ones" of God, the lost Ten Tribes, or House of Israel, now proved to be the British by many lines of evidence. That House is "lost," but it has to be found and brought to light, because God has a mighty work for that House to do, and will qualify it to do it. He means in the first place, by their agency, to cause all the nations of the earth to be blessed (Gen. xxii. 18, R.V.). It must be admitted, of course, that this blessing was pronounced by the Lord first "to Abraham," and then in succession "to his seed for ever." Accordingly Isaac, Jacob, and the whole Twelve Tribes of Israel were the true heirs of that glorious inheritance. Why is it, then, that at the present day, and for about eighteen centuries of past time, the Jews have had no part, lot or portion in this blessing? It is because they are incompetent to obtain it, being, as all must acknowledge, under curse and the hidings of God's face, on account of their share in the blood-shedding in the matter of the Lord's crucifixion, and because of their rejection of His salvation and redemption, effected at Calvary. As rebels and murderers of their Lord, the Jews, who were also true heirs of the blessings, promised on the oath of God to Abraham, to Israel, and to the seed of Abraham for ever, forfeited their share in those blessings for a time, and have been without them ever since they refused Him and desired a murderer in His stead. The Jews being set aside by their own act at present, the "House of Israel," or "Joseph," became from henceforth the ostensible sole heirs. They were lost to human knowledge, but in due time were made manifest according to the will of God, and because of the sacrifice of His beloved Son. They were to be manifested to the world by their possession of the signs which God Himself put upon them. These we have been contemplating in the BANNER, in a variety of aspects, for nearly twenty years, but the chief spiritual one of them all we have not studied as closely as perhaps we should have done, although it appeals to us in the very forefront of the Bible. In the book of Genesis, xxii. 18, R.V., God said: "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed (or bless themselves); because thou hast obeyed My voice." Here, then, is revealed the royal divine mark which God has placed upon His chosen people Israel. Even when hidden, and their identity unknown and unsuspected, they were to be recognised thereby. The sign is that they were to be "a blessing to all the nations." Find a nation fulfilling that destiny in very truth, and thereby Israel is discovered.

This, indeed, is the testimony of the whole of the Scriptures, of the Old and New Testaments alike. In the Old we have the passage in Gen. xxii. already quoted, which affirms the principle. God means to bless the whole earth by Israel. But, as we have seen, Judah-Israel is disqualified just now. Therefore Ephraim-Israel is the House indicated by the Lord. In Isa. xxvi. 7, R.V., we have the matter very clearly propounded: "In days to come shall Jacob take root; Israel shall blossom and bud; and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit." Judah was to deny the Lord Christ. They therefore would reject His blessed service. The testimony of nearly nineteen hundred years is that they have not fulfilled this prophecy of world-wide blessing. The British have, and therefore they have proved that they are the Lord's messengers, Israel. In Isa. xlix. 6, R.V., we have a passage that is usually, and we believe correctly, referred to the Lord Jesus as fulfilled in Him. But the New Testament applies it to Christian Israel, and to St. Paul, their representative: "I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be My salvation unto the end of the earth." In Acts xiii. 47, R.V., St. Paul, speaking to the scoffing Jews who rejected Christ, quoted Isa. xlix. 6 to them, and applied the promise to himself as Christ's representative, thus: "Seeing ye (Jews) thrust it (the Word of God) from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles, for so hath the Lord commanded us (saying), I have set thee for a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation to the uttermost part of the earth." St. Paul, speaking for Christianized Israel, declared here that they stood for Christ Himself as His messengers for salvation to "the ends of the earth."

The British people occupy all the literal "ends," or "uttermost parts of the earth," and there we are "for salvation," instrumentally as respects all the native inhabitants of those parts.

The Lord Himself, in His parables, addressed to the Jews of His day, plainly told them what duties were especially laid by Him upon "His missionaries to the nations," and that, from the nature of things, they were themselves disqualified. In Matt. xxi., R.V., we have three statements to this effect. The two sons of the divine Father, Israel and Judah, were both directed to work for him. Both heard; but Israel only obeyed. Judah said he was willing, but "went not" (ver. 30). The husbandmen were directed to bring the Master the vineyard's fruits. They disobeyed; and not only refused, but also proceeded to kill the Son of God! The facts were literally true in the history of the Jews, then and since. The "other husbandmen" were Israel, and of them it was predicted by the Lord that they, placed in charge of the vineyard, would "render to him the fruits in their seasons." The British have done this, and so proved their origin; the Jews never, as a nation, from that day till now!

But the Lord has, in ver. 43, given His final judgment: "Therefore I say unto you (the Jews), The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you and given to a nation"—not to a Church, or a cluster of Gentile peoples, or even to one such—but "to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." This was to be a Stone kingdom, prone to war—on whom whoever should fall should be "broken to pieces; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will scatter him as dust." This fruitful nation is "Ephraim," as the name declares (see Gen. xli. 52, R.V.), and the British nation answers to the description in more directions than one. Isa. xxvi. 7, R.V., describes one aspect of their case, as we have already shown. In the prophecy of Isa. lxv. 1, R.V., read in connection with Isa. lv. 5, R.V., we see that Christ's selection was of one nation only: one that, before He called and converted it, knew Him not; but, when it did turn to Him, ran to follow Him, and became "the sons of the living God" (Hos. i. 10, R.V.).)

The national selection of Israel as the one elected nation from among the rest is seen by the Lord's parable in Matt. xxv. 31—46. where the grand sessions of the nations is described: "When the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, He shall sit on the throne of His glory, and before Him shall be gathered all the nations." Only one of them is chosen. Israel is indicated by her character and marks. The rest are rejected, lacking them. Israel, His sheep, is in the place of honour on the King's right hand. The rest, the goats, are on His left. Why is Israel accepted? why the rest dismissed? Israel laboured for the Master. They were a blessing to the nations. "They blossomed and budded," and they alone, having "taken root," "filled the face of the world" (not of the earth only) "with fruit." Fruit, too, such as He acknowledged. They laboured in His name and for Him. They fed the hungry, gave the thirsty drink, housed the stranger, clothed the naked, visited the sick, and comforted the prisoners in their solitary cells. Doing this, they did it for the Lord, and He acknowledged and rewarded them. Christ's righteousness is theirs (Isa. liv. 17, R.V.), and as His servants they bless the nations

Here, then, is a mark by which Israel, the lost sheep, may be detected. They bring forth fruits for the Lord, and bless the world thereby. The Master recognises their labours, and before the whole world "acknowledges them that they are the seed the Lord hath blessed" (Isa. lxi. 9, R.V.). "Their seed," He says of Israel, "shall be known among the nations, and their offspring among the peoples. All that see them shall acknowledge them that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed." To Him be all the praise for the gracious consolation! For we all know well how exactly the British nation responds to the divinely drawn portrait, and how closely we resemble the Scripture picture of Israel, God's chosen. The sign we have selected is one of scores. But it is a remarkable one indeed!

THE ANNUAL MEETINGS OF THE BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION.

THURSDAY, MAY 7TH, 1896.

THE annual business meeting was held at 2.30, in Exeter Lower Hall, London. Douglas A. Onslow, Esq., presided, and the annual report and statement of accounts were submitted. The following is a somewhat full summary :—

The Council have much pleasure in presenting their seventh annual report, and desire again to express their gratitude to Almighty God for His many signal tokens of blessing, and for the continued success attending their labours since the last report.

The list of lectures given under the auspices of the Association during the year 1895 shows that its officers, and those of the allied Scotch Associations, have not been idle, though the Council greatly longs for more workers, as the field is a large one and many desirable places have to be neglected for want of suitable men to lecture. Nevertheless, the work steadily progresses, and the opposition, which at first was powerful and uncompromising, is now slowly yielding to the constant reiteration of arguments which, when considered dispassionately and with an unbiassed mind, bear the stamp of truth, and as reflecting the unchangeable purposes of the ever-faithful God. It will be seen that the number of lectures during the past year compares very favourably with that for the year 1894.

The Scotch Associations again took the lead in the number of lectures given, and much praise is due to the President and members of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Associations for the activity displayed by them, and the energy with which the cause was advocated in Scotland. The results obtained have been most encouraging, as indicated by the numbers who attended the meetings and the interest manifested in the subject of the lectures. Colonel Senior's illustrated lantern lectures never fail to give satisfaction, and they are calculated to create a more lasting impression upon the audiences who gather to them by the vividness with which the subject matter is illustrated. During the past year, 1895, no less than sixty-one lectures delivered and drawing-room meetings held in Scotland alone, mostly by Mr. J. D. Reid, though Colonel Senior gave fifteen of his lantern lectures, and one specially to Jews in Glasgow. Only twenty lectures and drawing-room meetings were held in England. A very important conference was held on May 9th, 1895, between the British-Israel Association and the Prophecy Investigation Society at Exeter Hall. The Rev. Denis Hanan, the Rev. S. Aston, Dr. Aldersmith, and Mr. Douglas A. Onslow read papers, each dealing with important points in arguments supporting British-Israel truth.

These papers were traversed by replies made to them by members of the Prophecy Investigation Society. The conference occupied two sittings, a morning and afternoon, but was not as well attended as the Council had hoped, for invitations had been sent to every member of the Prophecy Investigation Society by them, as the Conference was held under the auspices of the Association and at its expense.

After the reading of each paper and the reply, discussion was permitted, the reader of the paper having the privilege of a final answer.

The proceedings at this Conference and the papers and replies were all printed in extenso and reported in the Covenant People, and have subsequently been printed in pamphlet form, with a preface written by Mr. J. G. Taylor.

The Council has no cause for regret in arranging this Conference, as the papers read by the members of the Association were models of lucidity and close argument. The replies elicited to them, and the objections raised during the subsequent discussions showed how feeble and inconsistent were the reasons given for objecting to the propositions put forward by the British-Israel advocates, though these propositions were strictly confined to Biblical truths, and made no reference—except by inference—to Anglo-Israelism. Those who have the pamphlet, can easily see with which side, in this contest, the advantage lay.

Last year, 40 new members joined the Association, and through deaths, and from other causes, 17 old members have been lost to the Association. The present number of members is 315 against 292 last year.

The Council have to record, with sincere sorrow, the death of Mr. W. H. Peters, J.P., of Harefield, Lympstone, near Exeter. Mr. Peters, whose death took place in January, 1896, at the age of 81, was one of the earliest members of the Association in which he always took a most active interest, and on several occasions gave it considerable pecuniary support. Mr. Peters was a true friend in need, and any appeal to him was always most generously responded to. The Association has also lost by death several other prominent members, and generous supporters.

Legacy from the late Miss E. Ledger, a constant supporter for many years, of £100.

The income of the Association from all sources for the past year amounted to £360 11s. 5d., made up as follows:—

The Council desires to emphasize the great significance of the events that so greatly impressed this country and the world at large at the commencement of this year, the effects of which have not yet been fully felt. The isolation of this nation, and the antagonism of all the rest of the world, were made great features in the leading articles of the principal daily papers. Unconsciously the press of this country used terms in defining the position of this nation with relation to others that the Scriptures use and apply to Israel in the latter days.

This isolation of the British Empire, and the extraordinary jealousy exhibited by other nations of our colonial strength and wonderfully growing prosperity, are evidences that the Lord's Word is being fulfilled in and by us in a most remarkable manner. All the other signs of the times point to the near return of the people of Israel to their own land, and rapid approach of Jacob's trouble, until after which great event the truths now taught by this Association cannot and will not be nationally acknowledged.

The Afternoon Public Meeting was commenced shortly after four o'clock with singing and prayer. Robert A. Whytlaw, Esq., the President of the Scotch British-Israel Association, presided, and was supported by Dr. H. Aldersmith, Douglas A. Onslow, Esq., J.P., Rev. J. P. Britton, Mr. Marchant (of Brighton), Mr. J. D. Reed, secretary of the Scotch Association, and others. There was a good attendance of ladies and gentlemen. Mr. Whytlaw, in addressing the meeting, said:—

Our Saviour, our Redeemer, Jesus Christ, said: "God so loved the world that He sent His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life." These words of our Lord are a great manifestation of God's love for man. This we ever keep in the forefront, while speaking upon our special subject—the Identity of our race with the Lost Ten-tribed Israel, which is another manifestation of God's love to His chosen people Israel, in things material and things spiritual. Of that elect race we mean to speak; it is the object of our gathering here to-day.

Ladies and Gentlemen,—It was my intention to be present at this annual meeting of the British-Israel Association as a most interested listener, expecting to get some information and hints that would be useful in the furtherance of our cause on the other side of the Tweed. But, ladies and gentlemen, your secretary, the Rev. Mr. Aston, disturbed my intentions, and conveyed to me the desire of your committee that I should occupy the chair at this meeting. My personal feelings would have been to refuse, knowing that you had in the south gentlemen who could fill this honorary position much better than I can; but I felt that your request was a kind and interested recognition of our work in the north; and, as that work is not mine alone—for I am only a coadjutor with others, who have ably and heartily come forward whenever asked, and without whom our work would have been without that impress on the community that we have experienced, and as the representative of those workers in a corner of Israel's inheritance—I accepted the honour you have conferred upon me, and I crave your indulgence should I err from the usual lines of your procedure. At the risk of being considered egotistical, I think it may be interesting to you to have a sketch of how interest has arisen, and is spreading, in British-Israel belief in the north. From 1868 to 1878 I lived in London, and, being a City man, my walk was often about Cornhill and Lombard-street. One day, in passing through a short cut from Lombard-street to Cornhill, I saw upon a window a pamphlet, and, on getting nearer, found it called "Twenty-seven Identifications that the British are Lost Israel," by Edward Hine. Curiosity led me to ask if it was for sale, and, as it was not a bookshop, I felt diffident upon my question. The gentleman within was most agreeable, and I paid fourpence for the pamphlet, and wondered what it could mean (I was sure that I was not a Jew! and was this to prove that I was one?). I read the pamphlet, and later on I saw another similar to it in the same window, and bought it. Repeatedly I looked at that window again, but saw no more. That would be about 1870–73. For eighteen years or so I neither heard nor read anything further; my mind was engaged otherwise. But, about the year 1891, a good mother-of-Israel handed me the weekly paper of our friend "Philo-Israel"—the Banner of Israel, and asked if I had ever seen that. My answer was in the negative. But my interest was awakened, as I had always felt much interest in the Jewish question, in the lines of that saintly minister, the Rev. Dr. Andrew Bonar, under whose ministry I was privileged to sit and learn in Glasgow.

The Banner of Israel I subscribed for, and read regularly and studiously during the most part of the year 1892. I then felt an inward constraining power that some move must be made to interest others. In the winter of 1892-3 my wife and I had fortnightly readings in our house, taking with our Bible the "Handbook" as our text-book. We thus began to interest others. At that time I put myself in communication with your secretary, the Rev. Mr. Aston, who referred me to one of your council, "Oxonian," and he kindly began our readings by an address on the historical argument, illustrated by maps. Your secretary addressed two large audiences, at the close of that season, in a hall to which the public were invited by card, and notices from a few of the pulpits in churches near. In the following three years we made an advance upon the previous year, and had public lectures in a hall in the west end of our city. The lecturers were chiefly from clerical and lay gentlemen of your Association, from whom, let me say, we have at all times received the greatest courtesy and help. But, when in 1893 some of us formed ourselves into an association in the west end of Glasgow, believing that we were alone, we found that we were not alone in advocating this subject, but that Mr. Reid, who is with us to-day, and who is to address us by your kind invitation, had been going on with a series of lectures in a quiet way, for a few years, in the centre of our city, strongly advocating this Bible truth of the Identity of the British with Israel's lost tribes. Also, that in the town of Stirling an association had existed and flourished at the time Colonel Beresford was resident in the Castle; but that, on his leaving, the cause languished for some years, to revive again when our Northern Council was formed in 1894. In Edinburgh an association had also existed, and had been doing some good work there under the auspices of gentlemen deeply interested in the Identity of our race with lost Israel.

We united these forces, and thus began in 1894 our Northern Council of the British-Israel Association, with Mr. J. D. Reid as our general secretary and lecturer. Since then we have made advances. We have distributed a good deal of literature, and arranged with the well-known booksellers, Messrs. Bryce & Murray, Ltd., of Glasgow, to have on sale pamphlets and books, as may be recommended by us.

We have had audiences varying in numbers. We believe all were interested, and usually wanted to learn more. Our secretary, when lately in Forfar, Couper-Angus, and Peterhead, had audiences running from a hundred to sixteen hundred.

It is our aim to get a hold of the Guilds and Y.M.C.A. In 1894 we posted to these five hundred cards, with twelve subjects for selection for lectures. The response was very small. In 1895 we posted again five hundred cards, with twelve subjects for lectures. The response was an increase upon the previous year, and thus encouraging. This year we have again sent out five hundred cards, with twelve subjects for lectures, and we hope and expect an increasing application for our secretary to go and tell who we, the British nation, are, upon the Bible testimony.

We believe the fields are ripening; but can a harvest be gathered without effort, and can effort be sustained without help? If we believe that this is God's work—what then? Help should be forthcoming—generous help—that those who are willing to devote their time and ability be enabled to go forth telling this glad news.

The mode we have been following to arouse our ministry is as follows. Imagine a belt across Scotland, from Glasgow to Edinburgh, including Stirling, ten miles wide. We have twice sent to 1,603 ministers of all evangelical denominations in that supposed belt circulars and pamphlets. I am sorry to say that the response has been almost nil, but we have had evidence of their reception, and we have faith that these grains of effort, or seed, will yet bear fruit if we keep on with vigour at our work. To be standing still is retrogression—we must be aggressive—and that means faithfulness to our heavenly father, whose banner in this work we have the privilege to display because of its truth.

Let every man and woman, believers in the Identity of our race with lost Ten-tribed Israel, be active in interesting others! Let us show our colours; let us not be afraid of our belief, and the laugh of friends (for that is common). Let men see that we are in earnest, and that will make the unthinking think, and listen to our Bible story of God's faithfulness to His chosen people, elected in His sovereign love. At present we are preparing a series of ten questions to submit to our Scottish divines. A private meeting will be first arranged, and which proposal has been accepted by some of the most eminent ministers of the Free Church of Scotland. They see that we are in earnest, and that it will not be wise to refuse to meet us in conference. When that meeting is arranged for, I trust that your Association will send some of your able advocates in this cause to strengthen our hands. Would it not be well to try to kindle the hearts of our fellow-countrymen by having someone able and willing to travel from "Land's End" to "John O' Groats," who could speak on this subject clearly, impressively, and persuasively. For such an one, I would say £500 per annum is necessary. Are there not 50 ladies and gentlemen within our reach who would be willing to give £10 each, or 100 to give £5 each out of the tithes of that wherewith the Lord blesseth them yearly? Say not "Nay!" I beseech you.

Let the British-Israel Association of the South, and our Council of the North, have one common action in this to raise £500 annually for a lecturing fund. We have no political platform, no sectarian platform! Our only one platform is the Word of God—the Bible, the promises of God to Abraham and his seed, the whole House of Israel. If we are in earnest this can be done. Is it to be done? Blessing will follow the effort. May I suggest, that before we leave London, we evolve some system of work for this object. But we cannot pass from our theme without noticing three very important addresses, recently come into print, to the Two-tribed Israel (the Jews). Firstly: There is that scheme, by Dr. Theodore Herzl, described in the Jewish Chronicle of January 17, as a distinguished journalist, and litterateur of the first rank, in Vienna; no dreamer of dreams, but a practical man of the world, as that newspaper calls him. His scheme is "The restoration of the Jewish State," under the protection of the Powers, and called, "A Solution of the Jewish Question." It is a political and financial arrangement between the Jews on the one hand, and the Sultan and the great Powers of Europe on the other, for the Jews to enter into possession of Palestine. The details of this scheme is in pamphlet form, and can be had for 1s. Secondly: There is a scheme by Mr. W. Holman Hunt, a name familiar to us all. It is described in the Jewish Chronicle of February 21, and called, "The Re-settlement of the Jews in Palestine." The proposal is one of purchase, if the Sultan will sell, but he thinks the Sultan will be so ill-advised as to refuse the offer, till it is too late. Turkey having fallen into the hands of other owners, and Judea handed over to the Jews without price, the funds promised for purchase, and not thus required, to be used for development of the Promised Land. In the words of Mr. Holman Hunt, the offer of purchase to be made, not for Palestine only, but for "the widest extent of land defined by Moses." What is that? In Gen. xv. 18, God's promise is "From the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates"—that is, a land bounded on the west by the Nile from the Delta to a point yet unascertained beyond "Uganda," and in the north by east "by the great river, the river Euphrates." We thus see the extent of this land promised to Abraham and his seed. That is the land promised to the Twelve-tribed Israel, not to the Jews only, but Ten-tribed Israel as well. But we have also to remember what God says in Lev. xxv. 23: "The land shall not be sold for ever, for the land is Mine." Who is God reserving it for? Is it not for the seed of Abraham, the chosen people, the elect nation, the Twelve-tribed Israel. This is Israel's inheritance. The title deed is valid.

Thirdly. We have a sermon, preached at the West London Synagogue on the text, the 87th Psalm, by Mr. Claude G. Montefiore, given in the Jewish Chronicle of 14th February. The keynote of that address is, "In that day the Lord shall be proclaimed the only God and His name one." He Mr. Montefiore claims universal Judaism as the goal of his people. (Read Zech. xii. xiii., xiv.) We cannot shut our ears to this movement among the Jewish people, the Two-tribed Israel. Does this not mean an awakening from their dead past, an awakening of the captives in their captivity, the breathing of the spirit of life among the dry bones of Ezekiel's vision? Is not this a sign of the latter days?

If the Two-tribed Israel are moving for their rights, what are the Ten-tribed doing? Who are the Ten Tribes? we are asked. Ephraim and Manasseh, we reply. Who are Ephraim and Manasseh? Our reply again is, the British and American peoples. Believing that to be so, from biblical and historical argument, should we not unfold our ensign, and assert our Bible rights, along with Judah, for possession of the Land of Promise? Let us educate each other in this great truth; but how can our brothers and sisters know, unless we go over the length and breath of our country telling them the great news, who we are—the elect people (nation) of God? Why are the ministry not making this subject their study? It is their duty. We all remember those words, that no Briton can ever forget, "England expects every man to do his duty," and how much more does our Heavenly Father expect His sons and daughters to be dutiful to Him? It is the duty of the ministry of all denominations to tell of God's faithfulness, and display this banner, because of its truth, to their people.*

Fifty years ago, events had not ripened as they are at this day. May we not be found asleep, but awake to do our Lord's will, in whatever work we can make known this great Bible truth, as He in His providence may open up to us, and such openings we ought to be seeking for.

Mr. REID spoke of the promise of the kingly authority and rule of Judah that shall not depart "until Shiloh come," and proved that that is still future. Saul the first king was of Benjamin, not Judah; David 1055 B.C. to Zedekiah B.C. 588; Babylonish captivity when the kings of Judah ceased to rule over Jerusalem. He asked, Where is the continuity of the sceptre of Judah? Was there an interregnum of 600 years until Christ appeared?

"My kingdom is not of this world." But the throne of David was an earthly throne, and the sceptre of Judah is an earthly authority. Jeremiah the prophet had the mission "to root out and to pull down and to destroy and to throw down, to build and to plant" (Jer. i. 10). In 588 he was carried against his will to Egypt with the two daughters of Zedekiah, and the sacred Scriptures are silent on the subject after the record of their stay at Tahpanhes. Here the ancient records of Ireland fit in. At this time an Eastern princess, Tea Tephi, with a prophet and his secretary, came to Ireland. She marries the king of the tributary kings, and he changes the name of his capital to Tara (the two tables.) From this marriage descend the kings of Scotland and our beloved Queen by virtue of her descent from James I. Mr. Reid also advised a much more active aggression, on the mass of those who fail to appreciate the transcendant importance of this subject.

The Rev. J. P. BRITTON spoke of the Conference between the British Israel Association and the Prophetical Investigation Society, and remarked that he was astonished at the loose reading of the "learned interpreters." He especially alluded to the "Light of the Last Days" by Grattan Guinness with astonishment that such a mind could be so near the truth and yet fail to grasp it. Our critics seem imbued with the national prejudice, and argued thus:—"Our grandfathers say you are wrong, therefore we say you are wrong; therefore you are wrong." But the signs of the times are on our side. Judah, scouted by the nations, is walking straight to British-Israel. Our house is become "a nation and a company of nations" fulfilling the destiny of Ten-tribed Israel.

Mr. WILSON said he had studied the subject for twenty-five years, and was a profound believer in the truth of the Identity. At first he thought the statement was outrageously ridiculous, but calm, dispassionate study had convinced him that it was "the greatest truth of the age." It was a powerful lever to raise up our people, our colonies, and the nations who shall be blessed in us until the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.

The meeting having exceeded the time anticipated, the usual vote of thanks to the chairman was dispensed with.

THE EVENING MEETING

commenced at seven o'clock. Robert A. Whytlaw, Esq., again occupied the chair, and was supported by Dr. H. Aldersmith, Dr. Heyward Smith, Rev. F. Aston, F. C. Danvers, Esq., Douglas Onslow, Esq., J.P., and others.

The meeting was commenced by singing the well-known hymn, "Come, Holy Spirit, heavenly dove," followed by prayer by the Rev. Marcus Bergmann. The Chairman then made a few appropriate remarks, and called upon Mr. H. H. Pain, of Bromley, to give an address. Mr. Pain's address dealt largely with the bearing of prophecy and the recent and future events in the East, illustrating his subject by a specially prepared map. We anticipate publishing the address verbatim in an early issue of the BANNER. Mr. Marchant, of Brighton, next addressed the meeting, giving several illustrations of his experience as an outdoor lecturer, making particular reference to the ignorance frequently displayed by persons professing to have a good knowledge of Scripture, and who, in preparing books for the purpose of assisting in the study of the Bible, ignored such important points as the promises to Abraham, and the distinction between Israel and Judah. A hymn having been sung and the collection taken, the Chairman next called upon Mr. J. D. Reid, the secretary of the Scottish Association, to deliver his address. As we shall publish this in full in our next issue, it will be sufficient to remark that Mr. Reid gave a forcible and earnest address, which was listened to with marked attention and received frequent applause. Mr. Reid is a typical "hard-headed" Scotchman, and his address indicated him to be a man well suited to his position as lecturer and secretary to the Scotch Association, and we may hope his voice may not infrequently be heard in other parts of the country.

Mr. Onslow then made reference to the absence of Philo-Israel from the meeting on account of family bereavement (having lost by death his sister, Mrs. Butterworth, of Brighton), and expressed the sympathy of the Council and the members of the Association, and concluded by proposing a vote of thanks to the chairman and speakers.

The meeting was brought to a close by the benediction being pronounced by the Rev. M. Bergmann in Hebrew (he having noticed several Jews present at the meeting) and English.

WE regret to announce the death of the Rev. J. DAVIES THOMAS, Church Missionary Society, who was stationed at Ceylon. He took great interest in the Identity of Lost Israel, and will be recollected as one of the speakers at the annual meeting of the British-Israel Association at Exeter Hall in 1894.

ARE THE DARK CLOUDS IN MATABELELAND CLEARING OFF?

THERE seems to be no doubt that the Matabele insurrection has failed, and that the native impis, perceiving that they have been unable to rush their European enemies, are finding it needful to retire as suddenly as they rose up against us. Lord Grey, in his speech to the garrison at Bulawayo, 600 strong, told them that when the first murders were committed the garrison possessed only 379 rifles, but that now they had 1,000, and 200 more were coming. He declared that "Bulawayo was, therefore, as safe as London," and he hoped that with the troops before him, aided by Colonel Plumer's force, and those with Mr. Rhodes, the rebellion would probably be put down before the Imperial troops, 450 in number, could reach the scene. Lord Grey added his belief that "the back of the rebellion had been broken" by the admirable arrangements of Mr. Duncan, then in charge of the administration.

There is a formidable force, of course, collecting from all quarters in Matabeleland, which, however, will be fully employed in searching out and breaking up the power of the rebel savages in the Matoppo Hills and elsewhere, where, doubtless, they will remain while food lasts, in hopes of an opportunity to come down on the British. This will hardly arrive, because the road from Mafeking, whence the supplies, arms, and troops reach the front, is said to be open and safe; and progress, we hope, is being made with the railway to the North, which is our best defence. The contingents from the Beira, or Eastern side, are rapidly converging on Mashonaland and Matabeleland, helped by the existing railway to Chimoio. But the defence of Bulawayo has, under God's blessing, been accomplished hitherto by the garrison unaided. "These men," says the Times, of May 6th, "have shown the old gifts of the conquering races, individual initiative, coupled with discipline and power of organisation, energy and resource, tempered by caution, and steeled by dogged courage." The garrison thus highly praised are not all of one race. The Africander Corps have, throughout the siege, shown conspicuous gallantry and courage, "proving that Englishman and Dutchmen together have shown the world what fighting really is." They have stood together once more "in defence of civilization under the British flag." The danger just now in regard to the native enemy seems to be, not that the Matabele will attack and destroy our people in Bulawayo, but that they will slip away and disappear before being brought to action to receive due punishment for their savage and cruel murders of our peaceful settlers in outlying and solitary places. Unless this be done, there can be no security for the settlers of the future.

No doubt the Matabele have suffered much already, and their losses in the various actions have been large. But it is desirable that a pitched battle should be fought, that these brave savages should learn once for all that they cannot withstand the attack of the European, or overcome his defence. It seems probable, however, in spite of the highly optimist words attributed to Lord Grey, that "the back of the rebellion" is not "yet broken;" and that Bulawayo, which is still closely surrounded by savage bands of native foes, "is not quite as safe as London!" There is reported to be a lack of food in the besieged town, and it is clear there are not yet sufficient troops at the place to enable an attack to be delivered on the enemy. We believe that the war will tax the powers of the whole of the contingents, when they have reached within striking distance; and that it will require several successful engagements on the British side before this serious danger—the direct result of Dr. Jameson's daring raid—can be regarded as passing off.

It is difficult, of course, to write of events taking place at such a distance as Matabeleland, especially when those events are reported in language used one day to be contradicted the next. The outcry that is at present being raised to bring Mr. Cecil Rhodes to trial, and to cancel the Charter of the British South African Company, without further inquiry or investigation, may be safely ignored. There doubtless will be an inquiry, and it must be first elicited what provoked the British to act as they did in the matter of Dr. Jameson's raid, and why the latter so far forgot what was due to his own Government, and the rulers of a friendly State, that he invaded the territory by armed force, and thought evidently he was acting in a very meritorious manner in so doing!

The interests involved in these events, national and personal, are enormous in magnitude. They are evidently links in the hands of God to other changes yet to take place, which He is working out for the good of His people. We must wait with patience for the final issue, which, in His own good time, He will disclose. His promise to us in Isa. xlii. 16, R.V., is meanwhile sufficiently sustaining, and clearly indicates our position now as "His blind people," groping our way about! "He will," He says, "bring the blind by a way they know not, in paths that they know not will He lead them; He will make darkness light before them, and crooked places straight." "He will," He adds, "do these things, and He will not forsake them." Great is the comfort such texts afford in time of national perplexity. Recognising the present as one of them, we call on our readers, as Israelites, to praise the Lord for His goodness, and to bless His holy name!

MR. J. D. REID'S ADDRESS AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION IN LONDON.

At various times during the present dispensation, men have bethought themselves as to the existence of the Ten Tribes of Israel, who were removed from Palestine during the 8th century B.C. and placed in the land of the Medes, according to Holy Writ. Time and again have we, even in our own lifetime seen paragraphs in the daily papers detailing the discovery of these tribes. Now it may be in a remote part of China, anon in the uplands of Persia or Afghanistan. These discoveries have all come to naught, for it was the determined purpose of God that they should be hid (Hos. ii. 6.) Hid not only from other nations, but hid from themselves, until His time, His set time, was come. It has within the last twenty-five years been growing into a strong belief in the minds of many men, that God's set time is nearing, and that the days we now live in are the latter days. Peter in his first epistle says, they were "to be revealed in the last days." It behoves all men then to search for that people, for let us say what we like, let us form any opinion we may, the apostle Peter was convinced that the days of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, yea, the Christ would not come to this earth again until the men of Israel turned again, repented, and got their sins blotted out. If the Anglo-Saxon is the light-bearer, if it is he who is to-day preaching Christ, a risen Saviour to all men, bethink you of the importance of awakening these tribes to a knowledge of their responsibility.

If any here have a desire to search for that people, let me be permitted to assist them in their search. The plan will, I am sure, commend itself to all who are bent on this work of studying the guide book, so that ere starting on the quest they may get as much information as is possible to help them in their labour. We find then that on the death of Solomon, the kingdom of "All Israel" was split into two separate monarchies. Judah, Benjamin, and probably the larger part of Levi, called the House or kingdom of Judah, remained loyal to David's grandson, Rehoboam, while the other Ten Tribes, called the House or kingdom of Israel, Ephraim, or the compound Ephraim-Israel, and sometimes Samaria, had for king Jeroboam. This latter House (Israel) became idolatrous, led to it by the king, who set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel and called on the people to worship them. I need not dwell on that, but will pass over a period of 2½ centuries, to a time when "the Lord was very angry with Israel and removed them out of His sight; there was none left, but the House or kingdom of Judah only" (2 Kings xvii. 18).

Now you must understand those who were so removed were Israelites, not Jews; the latter were taken away also, but to Babylon, while Israel was taken to Assyria first, and from thence to "Halah and Hara and Habor by the river Gozan unto this day." The guide-book, you see, is precise as to their being removed, all removed, and also precise as to the locality to which they were so removed.

Let us thoroughly understand this matter. Bear with me, those of you who may know the geography of the district, while I try to make it plain to any others who may be present and who may not be familiar with it. This part of Asia, then, where the Ten Tribes were taken was 1,200 or 1,400 miles distant as the crow flies from Palestine in a north-east direction. To get to these places they had to cross the Euphrates and the Tigris rivers, and also had to get to the eastern side of a lofty range called the Zagros mountains. All on the east side of that range, on to the south-east end of the Caspian Sea was the land of the Medes, while on the west side the king of Assyria reigned supreme.

The mountains were as a dividing line. Immediately following on the destruction of Samaria, Sargon turned his attention to the Medes. They had been for a time tributary to the Assyrian kings, but had revolted. Once again were they subdued, and then the captive Israelites were placed in these cities and by that river. On the east of the Zagros mountains those cities and that river must have been. Here begins the trouble, for many of our Commentaries and Bible Dictionaries do not agree as to the location. The Bible, as I have said, is precise, "the cities of Hara, Halah and Habor by the river Gozan." But the writers of the articles in question say that the river Gozan is the district called Gauzonitis, through which the river Chabour flows (this Chabour is the river called by Ezekiel the river Chebar), but I need only remind you that the Zagros mountains were the west border of the land of the Medes, and it was to that land they were taken. The nearest spur of these mountains to the river Chebar was at least 450 miles due east, and when we find Hara, Halah, Habor and the river Gozan still on the east side, we need have no doubt that these books and book-writers are wrong. In truth that mountain chain is an insurmountable barrier to the trustworthiness of their dictum.

Can we say otherwise? These cities, Hara, Halah, Habor, are to-day by the river Gozan or Ouzan, as anyone can assure himself by turning to Johnston's map of Persia.

It is ridiculous, this argument. Scripture says the river Gozan; they say it was not a river, but a district. Scripture says Habor was a city; they say it was the river Chabour. No wonder the same and many other writers say the Ten Tribes were irretrievably lost, for if they were placed in the river Chabour, they might in one sense get on swimmingly, but they might all get drowned. No man can furnish us with more reliable, more trustworthy information than that the Bible supplies.

Many others say the Ten Tribes were not all taken away, that the great bulk of the people remained, while others assert they were taken away, but returned along with Judah from Babylon, and yet another section declare very emphatically that they were taken away and will never return to their land. All that is diametrically opposed to Holy Writ.

The prophets declare in clear, unmistakable language that these tribes were removed and will return to Palestine, not only return to, but will from Palestine rule the world.

Some here may pooh-pooh, but pooh-pooh is not proof. We are too matter-of-fact, hard-headed to take anything or everything that any man can say or look without well attested proofs. Nor will we ask anyone to take it from us. Let us to the proof then, and God defend the right.

He removed them out of His sight; there was none left, but the House or kingdom of Judah only—that is a clear, explicit statement (2 Kings xvii. 18). Again they were removed and placed in Halah, and Hara, and Habor, by the river of Gozan (1 Chron. v. 26). That also is a statement of the same clear nature as the other.

To prove they were taken away, we find from that time onward no mention made of any of the tribes that were deported, as being in the land. Israelites are mentioned, but you must recollect that there were eleven tribes of Israel. Ten only of these were removed; the eleventh, Benjamin, was for the time incorporated, lent to Judah, as God said, for a light in Jerusalem.

To answer the argument that they returned along with Judah from Babylon. Ezra is admitted to be the writer of the Chronicles. He it was who led the Jews back from Babylon, and he says in the passage I quoted (1 Chron. v. 26), that they were removed, and adds, "unto this day"—i.e., to the time in which he wrote that. They could not then have returned. That point we may consider as proved. The final argument then is they were removed to these cities and then ceased to exist. Now God by nearly all the prophets said that Israel would not be lost utterly. On the contrary, going back to the days of David, you will remember Nathan the prophet told David that God said, "I will appoint a place for My people Israel.

The inference is that up to the time that God sent that message to David the place had not been appointed, for the whole verse is in the future tense, "I will appoint," "I will plant," "that they may dwell in a place of their own." At that time all the tribes of Israel and Judah were in the land of Palestine and under David's sceptre. So that we are forced to the conclusion, and in my judgment a right conclusion, that the House of Israel were to have another land allotted to them which would be peculiarly their own land.

Again God by Jeremiah said that, "If the ordinances of the sun and the moon depart from before Me, then the seed of Israel shall cease from being a nation"—a nation, not a church.

We still have those luminaries; hence Israel cannot be swallowed up, but must be in existence, not in some undiscovered corner of the earth, not as a few scattered tribes in the deserts of Arabia, the wilds of Tartary or the backwoods of America, but must exist as a nation. For they were to be God's battle axe and weapons of war. The House of Judah is not that. They were to push the people to the ends of the earth. Judah does not do that. They were to inhabit the desolate heritages of the earth. That does not suit Judah, for they must always be in the crowd; desolation does not suit the Jew. Withal they were to have the good-will of Him who dwelt in the bush. Again, turning to the life of David, we find God promised to him, "Thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee; thy throne shall be established for ever." Going still further back, to the days of Moses (Deut. vii. 9), he tells the children of Israel that God keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love and keep His commandments to a thousand generations, and David the sweet singer says, "Be ye mindful always of His covenant, the word which He commanded to a thousand generations."

They were taken away in 721 B.C. Let us take a leap of 750 years, and we find when Christ sent out His disciples to preach He told them, "Go not in the way of the Gentiles, nor into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not, but go to the lost sheep of the House of Israel."

He and His disciples, it is quite evident, knew where they were. Later on He told those surrounding Him, the Scribes and Pharisees, "Whither I go ye cannot come." They said, "Will He go to the dispersed among the Gentiles?" Thus, you see, not only Christ, not only His disciples knew where these Ten Tribes were, but the Scribes and the Pharisees knew also. Still later we come to Peter, and he points out the localities in which they sojourned. He calls them "the dispersed." That could only apply to the Ten. It could refer to no other people, and Josephus, writing about the same time, says that the Ten Tribes were beyond the Euphrates, an immense multitude, and that only Two Tribes were under the Romans. These tribes of Israel were not then swallowed up. They did not return to Palestine with Judah, and they certainly were removed from that land.

Why will men persist in denying the veracity of the Bible? If any part of the Word of God is founded on error, most of all if the predictions anent Israel of the Ten Tribes are error, then is the Old Testament worth naught as a trustworthy record. Can it be God-inspired?

You will perhaps say errors have crept into the book, that there have been uninspired men employed in the translation, and so on. To that let me say, I cannot believe that God ceased His care for that people after He delivered these messages to those men from whom we have got them. On the contrary, He is by the prophets constantly alluding to them in loving remembrance, and it is only by supposing that His love had ceased and that He had broken His word that you can account for errors; and if you are going to suppose that, are you also going to suppose that Christ did not know whether they were correct or in error? Remember we have His testimony as to their truthfulness, "Not one jot or tittle shall in anywise pass till all be fulfilled."

Is all that is written in the prophets fulfilled? I say no! You cannot but agree with me in this. If then you are still going to wander in dreamland, your case is serious. There is God's written Word. By it you and I will be judged. Bethink you then of the very serious results to you, to all who will suppose it other than God's inspired Word.

It is an important matter this, the most important matter for you and me, aye for all the world. There is not any matter in heaven or earth to equal it. Think not that I am ignoring Christ's redemptive work. I am not. God forbid I should.

Let me show you I am right. If two-thirds of the Bible be devoted to the matter of Israel, their sins, their punishment, their repentance, and re-instalment in the land of Palestine, according to God's promise, if all that is nonsense, if it can be proved such, what is the good of paying attention to the remainder? The worth of the book as an infallible guide would be valueless. Of no part of it, not even of Christ's sojourn on this earth, is there any direct proof for other than this Bible. If then the testimony as to the redemptive work of Christ be on a par as to proof with the other part, and if we can prove from evidence, unmistakable evidence, that appeals to the eye, the ear, the understanding of any man who will devote a little thought to the subject, that the parts having reference to the Tribes of Israel are not nonsense, but truth, these parts rescued thus from the charge of unreliability, all the parts are then seen to be truly the inspired Word of God.

On the contrary, if you will not listen to our arguments, but rather share with these other authorities in their doubts as to the written Word anent the Ten Tribes, backed up as they are by naught, I must say I am unable to understand what you mean, if you say you have a reverence for that book as the Word of the God of truth. The Bible to you cannot be a lamp or a light, but you seem to put yourself in the position of being a lamp shining in a dark place to it. Away, I beseech you, with all such thoughts; accept the Bible as the infallible Word of the living God. Trust to its word implicitly, act up to its teaching, as faithfully, as earnestly as it is in your power to do; and if men will persist in teaching you that the promises of God have turned out miserable failures, believe it not! For it was to this people (that you and I are units of)—viz., the Anglo-Saxon, that our Saviour Himself alluded, and not to a Church or congregation, when He told the Jews who then stood by, "The kingdom will be taken from you and given to a nation"—a nation, mark you—"bringing forth the fruits thereof." Where is the nation, if it is not the Anglo-Saxon?" What nation other than they are bringing forth the fruits? Are the French? are the Germans? are the Russians? Spanish, Italian, Danish, &c. Travel in your mind over Asia, Africa, America, and find the nation—if you can—other than Anglo-Saxondom who are bringing forth the fruits of the kingdom, imperfectly bringing them forth, I grant you, but still bringing them forth. Find out, if you can, the nation other than Anglo-Saxondom who have it incorporated, imbedded in their statute book, the keeping one whole day in seven as the Sabbath, the sign which Israel was to have throughout their generations. Find out, if you can, the nation that can produce the genealogy of their ruler in an unbroken continuity from David to this day. We can;—thus fulfilling His promise to David that he should never want a successor to sit upon the throne, and that prophecy of Jacob's uttered on his death bed, "The sceptre shall not depart till Shiloh come."

If you cannot produce the nation other than Britain having these outstanding characteristics, and if you believe the Word of God to be true as we find it in the Bible, then, like sensible, matter-of-fact men and women, believe it to be the Anglo-Saxon nations, with our own beloved country at their head, and thank God it is so. Thank God that you are a unit of that nation, and thank God He has opened your eyes to see the truth. Then, do not pause—immediately begin the work of preaching it to your fellow-citizens, and thus fulfil your mission.

A final point let me touch on. All through the Bible, prophets from Isaiah downward, you are constantly meeting with "a strong" nation in contradistinction to the remnant of a nation; a pushing, goring, bullying people in contrast with a weak, timid people.

The weak people you know. Do you not know the strong one? It is standing before the world to-day, and you had proof a few weeks ago that not a nation in Europe—in Europe did I say?—not a people in the world would refrain from flying at her throat, if they dared. But the God of heaven, Jacob's God, is her sure defence, for has He not said, "No weapon formed against her shall prosper?" They do not believe that; albeit they are afraid to tackle her. No! We never were conquered, and thanks be to God NEVER WILL. I hope I have said enough to convince you of the fact, the momentous, awful fact, that we are none other than God's chosen ones, Ephraim, that son of whom he speaks thus: "Is Ephraim My dear son? is he a pleasant child? for since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still." If I have convinced you, I do trust that you will not be satisfied with what I have said, but that you will turn to the Book for yourselves, and see the many points I have spoken of to you now, that you will continue the search, and so get many more convincing proofs of Our Identity with God's chosen people; for what I have been able to show you now is only a very small part of the host of glorious promises and prophecies vouchsafed to us, His Israel, and may it cause you one and all to resolve, if you never resolved before; to resolve anew, if you are already soldiers of Christ's, resolve, like that grand old champion Joshua, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

"INTERPRET THIS TIME."

(Luke xii. 56, R.V.)

By P. CARLYON, M.A., CANTAB.

OUR Lord asks, "How is it ye know not how to interpret this time?" And He might have answered, "Verily, because ye heed not My words" (or, because ye follow your own traditions); "nevertheless, in an hour that ye think not the Son of man cometh." Men may ask, How are we to interpret the time? We reply, Look up, and see the fields yellowing already for the harvest. Our Lord has given us many unequivocal "signs of the times' of the "last days"—the last days of this our present æon or dispensation. He has given us in the Old Testament many prophetic warnings, and in the New Testament many characteristic tokens, whereby they who run may read.

Another question is often asked, Why they have not been interpreted before and revealed to after-generations? Because, we are told, that as far back as in Daniel's day, the words were shut up, and the book was sealed, "even to the time of the end!" Daniel himself did not understand what the Lord had spoken unto him; and it was said to him, "Go thy way, Daniel, for the words are closed and sealed till the time of the end" (Dan. xii. 9). "Go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days."

Besides, no prophecy is evidence until it is fulfilled; and, therefore, another reason why men do not interpret the time is that "the signs" have not been presented until these "last days" began to open upon us in this current century; nor are they fulfilled yet in their fulness, so that men, by habit, follow the tradition of their fathers. The harvest is not yet ripe, though the fields are yellowing. Our Lord's warning, however, was—"When ye see these things begin to come to pass then look up, for your redemption draweth nigh." If only stars are falling, and meteors are shooting, the time is come for all to mount the watch-tower and look out.

But we, who have been taught to see Israel in Britain, can discern the signs and tokens around the whole horizon; and we desire to call our friends and neighbours to come and see, and we will try to convince them that these very signs of our times are identical with the signs which are foretold as heralds of the last days of this dispensation, and of the Second Advent. All that we can do in one short article is to direct attention to a few of them; and our present enquiry is, What marks has Jehovah put upon His own people, as a people and as a nation? And what signs has He ordained as precursors of the final stage and condition of their destiny? I hope it will not be thought egotistic in me to refer to two previous articles published in the BANNER: one, on "The Evidence of Prophecy," the other, on "The Fifth Monarchy," as constituting the basis of this further investigation, and as forming preparatory links to the chain of this argument. We select but one out of the "fifty reasons" why Britain is Israel, and it explains at the same time why at this juncture Great Britain is the cynosure of all eyes, the marvel of all the other nations of the earth, who know not how to interpret it! We join these three links, or rather entwine three folds in our rope. In the first we have drawn out our proof that prophecy can give no evidence until it is fulfilled in history and in fact. In our second we have shown that "The Fifth Monarchy" of Daniel is the House of Israel, the stone growing into the mountain. And now in our third argument we can only come to one conclusion that the mountain kingdom of Israel and the Empire of Britain must be one and the same, which is the reason why our magnitude and isolation arrest the attention and respect of the whole world!

Our proof lies in the fulfilment of the prophetic promise of Jehovah in Dan. vii. 27: "The kingdom and dominion, and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him!" The double reign implied in this pledge admits of no apparent solution other than the completion of the Gospel that Christ will reign personally in Jerusalem over all dominions, and under Him the lineal throne of the issue of David's loins will be exalted into the dominant monarchy of the earth. Whether other Powers that may be permitted to retain their autonomy may do homage as vassals to their Suzerain only the future can reveal; but the "greatness of the kingdom" must abide with the lineal seed of Abraham, according to the covenant, and they possess "the Gate of their enemies" to secure them that supremacy. This pledge was given to Israel, and is now confirmed in Britain.

Has God been faithless to His chosen people, or is Britain Israel? Which? for one or the other must follow. The question proposed now admits no alternative answer. The features of the British Empire are patent to all the world. Not a statesman speaks, not a poet writes, not an enemy stands aghast, without wonder, inspiration, and envy, in contemplation of the extent, and power, and wealth, and influence of this Empire which belts the earth! If our own people are pessimists (like Labouchere), who wish to lop "the vine that came out of Egypt," let them read first and study, and answer (if they can) Dr. Poole's "Fifty Reasons Why Anglo-Saxons Are the Lost Ten Tribes," or Philo-Israel's "Thoughts for the British Folk," and then search deep into the enquiry, Why did God, amongst "the isles of the sea," select one little sanctuary in the North-west, cut off geologically from the continent, as "the appointed place" (2 Sam. vii. 10) of His exiled and divorced people? Why, but to secure this gem, this sea-girt England, as their own safe home and stronghold for ever? And why have successive waves kept flowing in, all of one race, to amalgamate into one great nation, whence in these last days the overflowing surplus has been filling the waste places of the earth, and whence now fleets of warships, and a countless commercial navy, verify our motto: "Britannia Rules the Waves;" whilst the silver streak of sea defies the myriad hosts of armed continental Europe! Why at this hour are all eyes turned towards Constantinople and Jerusalem? And why are six great Powers met in conclave over the complications of "The Eastern Question?" Is not Jerusalem the pivot on which the solution hangs? Is not the Holy Land the aim and object of Russia's ambition, and of Britain's defence? (Ezek. xxxvii. &c.) That land is Israel's by God's inalienable gift. He said, "The land shall not be sold for ever; for the land is Mine" (Lev. xxv. 23): and He had previously given it to Abraham, and his seed for ever (Gen. xiii.). If, therefore, we can trace our Israelitish lineage the land is ours; and, strangely, we have the protectorate over it already. Israel was promised, moreover, a third with Egypt and Assyria (Isa. xix.), and commentators differ whether that means a third portion of their territory, or the thirdship of power; and, strangely again, in either sense, we have already a protectorate over Armenia by treaty, and a power over Egypt by occupation. In this Eastern Question, Britain, of the six Powers in conference, has by far the greatest interest, and, by general consent, the loudest voice. She asserts her claim to be heard for her right of way to the Eastern portion of her Empire, and for her daughter nations beyond the Eastern seas. These daughters are in loyal league with their mother; whilst in every sea and ocean her flag is saluted. Already the nations have learnt that whatever land God entrusts by gift to her charge, she never abandons, except by some voluntary transfer or exchange for mutual benefit. And wherever she erects her standard, the standard of the cross is elevated with it.

Under such conditions and auspices, Great Britain already holds the rich plains, and fills the desolate places of the earth. And year by year God adds to her dominion. With her expansion of territory her language is becoming universal. Under her standard of the cross the world is becoming Christian, and the Gospel is in this age being fulfilled for the first time in the accomplishment of its purpose, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will amongst men."

"Ring out the darkness of the land, Ring in the Christ that is to be."

God gave that commission unto Israel. No Israel, except Britain, has the means of executing it. God be praised for bestowing on us that gift, and arming us now with that power. See how He works! Already Britain, "the remnant of Jacob," pushes the dark and savage and slave-dealing inhabitants to the corners of the earth, according to Deut. xxxiii. 17; already 300 millions of people speak our language; already the needful wealth is demonstrated by 100 millions of yearly national income, with a surplus of five or six millions in hand as these lines are penned; already we are the greatest of all nations, and "a company of nations;" and all because the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whom He will. So we ask our sceptics and our pessimists, "How it is that ye know not how to interpret this time?"

One word more. Britain's inheritance of Israel is her succession to the "birthright" of Ephraim, which includes the "dominion," and proves that the Jews are not the heirs, refuting that fallacy. The Jews are not a nation, but the twelfth of one, and a scattered handful of 12 millions, who will again possess a twelfth portion of the land (Ezek. xlvii.). How could they now develop into "a great nation, and a company of nations?" become a mountain and fill the earth? No kingdom can satisfy this magnificent forecast, except Britain. Neither Japhetic Russia, nor Mongolian China, nor any children of Ham, can now supplant Britain, and take her place by land and by sea, to be God's witnesses, to bring all the inhabitants of the earth into the one fold of Christ. Once more we ask, "How is it ye know not how to interpret this time?"

"I KNOW THEIR SORROWS."

THIS was the Lord Jehovah's testimony to Moses in the desert, when He came down to deliver the Twelve Tribes from their oppressor Ramesis II., the Pharaoh of the Exodus, having seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppressed them according to Exod. iii. 7—9, R.V. He knew their sorrows, and not twice or thrice in that and the following chapters called those suffering Israelites, "His people" (vers. 7, 10, iv. 22, 23, vii. 4, &c.). He gave the Land of Promise to Abraham, to Isaac, to Jacob, and finally "to Israel for an everlasting heritage," because He was a covenant-keeping God, whose name was, and is, "Jehovah" for ever (Exod. vi. 6—8, R.V.; Gen. xvii. 8, R.V.) It is impossible to conceive that the Lord, having made these promises to Israel, and ratified them by oath, "knowing also their sorrows," past and present, could abandon them now to hopeless banishment from their inheritance and forget those whose God He promised to be for ever, feeling for them in their sufferings, a pity and compassion divine and unfathomable. His attitude to Israel His people has always been the same. Under the greatest provocation He has never failed even the Jews, who drew upon themselves "His wrath to the uttermost" by killing the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, by persecuting the Christian Church, "pleasing not God, but being contrary to all men" (1 Thess. ii. 15, 16, R.V.). Even them He has preserved in being, reserving them to the day when His wrath will have subsided, and He will, according to His promise, restore them to His love and favour for Christ's sake. If such be His compassion towards the House of Judah, how much more will He remember the House of Joseph, whom He has promised so often in the Scriptures to bless, but never to forsake!

To them belong the clusters of blessings recorded in Gen. xlix. 22—26; Deut. xxxiii. 13—17; Zech. x. 6—12; Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Heb. viii. 10—12, and other like texts. In the restoration to the Holy Land, God has very carefully and particularly shown that Israel will be the strong nation "on whose strength the Jews shall lean, and so be able to return to Palestine." That is the testimony of Jer. iii. 18; Isa. xviii. 1—7; Hosea i. 10, 11; Ezek. xxxvii. 15—28, &c. To them, but not to the Jews, is given the priceless gift of the Gates of the ocean highways of the world. The possession of these gives the command of the sea, and supremacy there confers the dominion of the land. To Israel is another rich blessing given, in preference of the Jews. The Lord Himself passed judgment to this effect in Matt. xxi. 43, R.V. "The kingdom of God," He said, addressing the Jews, "shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." They were to be the fruit-bearing nation, the literal "kingdom of God," commended by the Lord Jesus Himself, and must needs be, therefore, a Christian nation, "sons of the living God" (Hosea i. 10, R.V.). Accordingly we find from Isa. xxvii. 6, R.V., that in times subsequent to the prophet's epoch, "Jacob shall take root; Israel shall blossom and bud, and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit." A nation so distinguished, so divinely favoured, and so highly blessed, cannot be forgotten or set aside by the Lord, the faithful Promiser. He knows our national sorrows, our backslidings, our constant provocations in His sight, and our utterly hopeless condition apart from His grace and guidance, His Holy Spirit and His comforts. He has accordingly given us as the ordinary means of grace, the custody and dissemination of the Word of God written, His ten true laws, His Gospel message to preach to all nations, and the abiding presence of His Holy Spirit. He has given us also that new covenant in Christ, which will effect the change in our nation's heart which is needed to convert it wholly to Christ the Lord. He will put His laws in Israel's heart and write it in their inward parts. He will be their God, they His people. They shall all know Him from the least of them to the greatest of them, for He will forgive their iniquity, and their sins He will remember no more (Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, R.V.). This, as we all know, is God's special promise to the House of Israel, as distinguished from the House of Judah. A covenant, we also know, is made sure by God Himself to the British people, "the remnant of Israel," since He undertakes the fulfilment of both sides of it. Nothing is left for Israel to deal with; God will work it all out and make "His people willing in the day of His power" (Psa. cx. 3, R.V.). How, in the face of all these rich blessings to which Israel is heir, men can still assert that Israel is "lost" and that God's special promises to her have been, for her unworthiness, transferred in a body to the Gentile nations, to the British, as the chief of all, passes our comprehension! If that be so, then has God forgotten His promises to Israel, and transferred His sworn favours from them to a Gentile race, with whom He never made such covenants on Mount Moriah! God forbid! God still remembers Israel, and "knows all their sorrows." He has come down to deliver "His people," and to restore them to His favour and to their promised inheritance, the land. To doubt it is to dishonour Him! His promises to Moses are a great encouragement to us, and should lead us as a nation to praise His glorious name!

"THE LOST TEN TRIBES" AND "THE CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER."

IN the issue of the Church Family Newspaper of April 24th last we find the following, which we almost apologise for re-publishing, since the writer—E. Rust, of Gateshead-on-Tyne—has managed to bring together in his remarks a good number of blunders and mistakes, which show that of our subject he knows really nothing, and yet rushes into print to depreciate it, by ignorant and ridiculous objections. The article appears under the head of "Facts for Inquirers," and is to the following effect:—

"THE LOST TEN TRIBES.

"Your contributors under this heading have so far been all on one side, perhaps because it seems hardly worth while to attack an opinion which in itself is perfectly harmless and innocent, and which appears to give great satisfaction to those who hold it. At the same time, if one calmly asks the question, Is the English nation a nation of Jews? there can be only one answer—Certainly not. The Jewish race is unmistakably distinct from the Anglo-Saxon race. The Jewish physiognomy, the Jewish characteristic, the Jewish aptitude for business, are well known. All the world over one can tell a Jew, and all the world over where money is to be made we can find a Jew. The number of known Jews all over the world is sufficiently large to prove the wonderful endurance and vitality of the race, in spite of the ages of persecution to which it has been subjected. The unmistakable characteristics of the Jews do not belong only to the children of Judah and Benjamin, but to all the Israelitish race. The science of ethnology is wholly at fault if the Semitic race cannot be distinguished from the Teutonic or Celtic race. But why should men seek to identify the Anglo-Saxon race with the Jews? Because they rejected Christ, the Jews were rejected of God, and for eighteen centuries since, until advancing civilisation, at any rate in English-speaking countries, somewhat improved their status, the Jews have been persecuted, hated, despised, and have wandered as aliens among all the nations of the earth. Contemporarily with their rejection the Gentiles were called into God's kingdom, and became God's chosen people by a nearer and holier bond of union than that of the old covenant. The history of the Jews throughout eighteen centuries has been one long commentary on their own mad and foolish prayer when they demanded that Christ should be crucified: "His blood be on us and on our children." Why should we English seek to renounce our high vocation as members of the Christian Gentile Church, the true Israel of God, and to put ourselves under the curse which still rests upon Israel according to the flesh. Even when that curse shall be removed, and they shall be fetched home to the flock of the true Israel, which is the Gentile Church of Christ, there is no special promise for the Jews. They shall only be at last raised to an equality with the rest of the Christian Church, and enjoy that light and blessing which we Christians now enjoy through Christ. But perhaps we can best confute this preposterous Anglo-Israelite theory by examining it a little further in detail. The people of England are said to be Jews who have wandered from Syrian and Assyrian exile. That involves, first, that the Celtic race must be Jewish, for our forefathers were Celts, and there is still a large admixture of Celtic blood in our race, especially in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. Then we have the Saxon, the Danish, and the Norman invasions, by which England was peopled by the Teutonic race. Unless we suppose that these invaders became Jews during the passage, we must allow that their kindred whom they left behind in Holland, Denmark, North Germany, Scandinavia, Normandy, &c., were also Jews. If the Teutons are of Jewish race, then at once half Europe must be Jewish. Since the Battle of Hastings there have been no more armed invasions, but a never ceasing invasion of one kind and another has gone on. The edict of Nantes drove the Huguenots to our shores. Spanish rule in the Netherlands supplied us with a stream of Dutch settlers, and a constant influx of aliens is still going on. German musicians, clerks, &c., Italian organ-grinders and restaurant keepers, and so on. Again, to carry the argument to its other conclusion, if England is Jewish, then America, Australia, South Africa, and the whole British Empire must be Jewish also. One might as well suppose at once that from the time of the downfall of Jerusalem the ordinary increase of mankind came to a standstill, and that the world has been repeopled with descendants of the lost tribes, whose kingdom in the time of their highest glory extended to about the dimension of three average English counties, and to a population very much less than is contained in that area. The theory appears to me to be so utterly unreasonable and untenable, and so entirely unnecessary, that I cannot understand any thoughtful man holding it. But to repeat my first remark, it is an entirely harmless delusion, and I do not wish to deprive anybody of the satisfaction which it may possibly give; only I think both sides of the question ought to be heard. "E. RUST.

"Gateshead-on-Tyne."

Our reply to E. Rust is as follows:—No one ever said or implied that "the English nation is a nation of Jews!" It is clear our objector knows nothing of the fact that the Israelites were divided after Solomon's death into two Houses, the Ten Tribes, or House of Israel, and the Two Tribes or House of Judah. He will find that fact stated in 1 Kings xi. 9—13, xii. 1—24; Jer. iii. 18, xxxi. 27—34, and many another text. These two Houses separated, as stated in 1 Kings xii., were never again re-united; and we connect the British nation, not with the Jews, but with this lost House of Israel, which the texts quoted will show to E. Rust are yet to be united, so as to form one nation again, and to return to their own land together in triumph, with the blessing of the Lord. We do not "seek to identify the Anglo-Saxon race with the Jews," but with the Israelites, the brethren of the Jews. "All Jews are Israelites, but not all the Israelites are, or ever were, Jews."

When the Jews were rejected by the Lord in Matt. xxi. 43, "the Gentiles" were not "called into God's kingdom and became God's chosen people," as E. Rust alleged, but cannot prove from Scripture, because it is nowhere so stated. But the Jews were rejected, and "a nation" (ethnos), not "Gentile nations," nor "the Church of Christ," but a single "nation," one bringing forth the fruits of the kingdom of God," was accepted by the Lord instead. This must be therefore a Christian nation, one "blossoming and budding and filling the face of the world with fruit," known as "the sons of the living God," and exhibiting a Christian character, as declared in Hosea i. 10, R.V., and Isa. xxvii. 6, R.V. God cannot cancel a covenant He made with Abraham "our forefather" on oath, as described in Gen. xxii. 18, R.V.; nor can He, as supposed by our opponent, cast Israel aside and put "the Gentiles" in their place in God's kingdom, since that would be to falsify His own oath, and nullify our Lord's own words in Matt. xxi. 43, already quoted, which God forbid! We are astonished that E. Rust should entertain so shocking an idea, and hope he will immediately abandon it. The Jews are under curse just now by reason of their murder of the Lord, but we do not put ourselves under curse with them; since that curse does not, prophetically or as a fact, rest at all on "Israel" of the House of Ephraim (or "Joseph"), who are nationally distinct from the Jews (vide Ezek. xxxvii. 16—19, R.V.).

We demur to the next statement of E. Rust, that "the people of England are said to be Jews who have wandered from the Syrian and Assyrian exile." That is not our statement, for our Israelites were never Jews at all!

We do not contend that the Celtic race must be Jewish! A part of the Celtic race so-called was, no doubt, of Israelitish origin. The Saxon, Danish, and Norman invasions of England were, we believe, carried out by portions of the Ten Tribes of Israel, of which the Danes bear the name of Dan, and the Saxons probably that of Isaac. We notice a non sequitur on E. Rust's part, that because some of the Celts were Israelites (he calls them absurdly "Jews"), therefore those they left behind them in Holland, Denmark, North

Germany, &c., were also Israelites (Jews?) The thing does not follow! There might be a few Hebrews with the Celts, and those few came on in a body according to the prophecies to the "Isles of the West" (Isa. xxiv. 15). That would falsify E. Rust's conclusion, and leave his argument in ruins. "If the Teutons are of Jewish race," he says, "then at once half Europe must be Jews." Non sequitur! Besides, who said "the Teutons were of Jewish race?" Not we!

Again E. Rust says: "If England is Jewish, then America, Australia, South Africa, and the whole British Empire must be Jewish also!" This is worse and worse! For England is not Jewish—and no one said it was. And if "England" be of Israel, then it does not follow, or can be made to follow, that the countries named are wholly Israelitish too! "The theory" appears to E. Rust to be "utterly unreasonable, and untenable, and unnecessary." We can assure him that it will so continue with him to the end of his days if he will neither read nor try to understand the subject which so puzzles him. It is as simple as A B C to those who will study it; but E. Rust is not one of those. We are sorry for him!

STRAY THOUGHTS.

In the annual report of the Salvation Army, written by "Commissioner" Railton, he says: "In India, after fourteen years toiling we have certainly caught something which appears to afford us the prospect of a great coming victory. It seems, indeed, inexplicably strange that the light of salvation spreading so rapidly in its first ages Westward, should have apparently failed so much to penetrate the gloom of those vast Eastern nations, who might have been expected to receive it so much more readily than the barbarians of the West. Strange, indeed, that the followers of Mahomet should have been the first to spread the Saviour's name in the far East, and that to this day, they should go on conquering heathendom far more rapidly than Christianity does, or ever has done. There must be a reason for this comparative hiding of the world's Saviour from the vaster half of its population for so many centuries; and we have really been unable to find a reason more sufficient than the race-alienation of West from East. . . ."

I would suggest that the reason has been, that it was Israel's appointed task "to fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6). That that nation had to go through a long preparation and training before entering upon the destined work, and the heathen nations were to wait for the elect people, descended from Abraham, and chosen of God as His witnesses, to bring to them the Gospel of heavenly light and peace through the atonement of the Saviour.

It is somewhat startling to know that "General" Booth was met as he returned from his remarkably encouraging tour round the world, by the announcement of the breaking away of an important branch of the Salvation Army from the parent body. No doubt it must be considered a dire disaster, more especially as the blow is inflicted by a son; but to Identity believers it may well deepen the conviction, that, the United States of America are possessed by Manasseh, whose descendants were to become a great nation, though inferior to that of Ephraim's offspring. This act of Mr. Ballington Booth would seem to shew that casting in his lot with the former people, and becoming thus one of themselves, he must accept the condition of being wholly independent of the latter nation, and reject its control even in religious matters. By so doing, we may believe he is unknowingly carrying out a detail of God's great plan, even as did the American States, when they broke away from the rule of Great Britain. That Manasseh is hereafter ever to be united in a brotherly tie to the other tribes, we cannot doubt, seeing that a portion of Palestine is to be allotted him, and that he is to have a claim on one of the Gates of the future temple as one with Ephraim under the headship of Joseph (Ezek. xlviii. 5 and 32).

In a volume called "The Geography of the Gates," by Philo-Israel, amongst those referred to, Gibraltar appears the most remarkable instance of a God-given gift to Israel. Some years ago, a circumstance relating to its being preserved to us, was told to me, and though I have now no means of testing the correctness of the quotation, I have no reason for doubting its accuracy. This anecdote concerning d'Aranda, whose full name was Don Pedro Pablo Abaraca, of Bolea, Count of Arando, is to be found in "Galtan de Raxis de Hassan's Histoire Générale est Raisonnée de la Diplomatie Francaise," Vol. vii. p. 350. His words are given as follows:—"Il est des momens où il faut savoir offrir sa tête à sa patrie. J'accepte les deux Florides à la place de Gibraltar, quoiqne ce soit contraire à mes instructions; et je signe la paix."

This appears to have taken place in August, 1782, at Versailles. Flassan gives a detailed account of the negotiations. This act of the Count d'Aranda in disobedience to his instructions, after (it is stated in another account) meditating for some time with his hands over his eyes, marks the especial interposition of the God of Israel, who thus caused one of the most precious gems in the crown of Spain to remain in our possession, through the apparently voluntary act of its minister. "A NATION BRINGING FORTH THE FRUITS."

The following is the outline of an address which Philo-Israel intended to deliver at the Anniversary Meeting, at Exeter Hall, on May 7 last, had he not, to his regret, been obliged to be absent at the house of mourning. It is published as a contribution towards the proceedings of the day, which the readers of the BANNER may find interesting and useful.—THE EDITOR.

DEAR FRIENDS AND MR. CHAIRMAN,—We have all been engaged for the last twenty years in striving to see from the Word of God, how best we may discover and detect "Lost Israel" among the nations. With most of the signs and marks of Israel, as portrayed in the Scriptures we are all quite familiar. She was to be found "a nation"—great, and mighty, and populous, wealthy, and expanding. Her colonies were to be "nations," "daughter nations." She was to be the holder of "the Gates," therefore mighty at sea, with a heathen empire, unique among "the nations," and so on. But there were to be, also, spiritual blessings attached to this people when discovered, which would mark them as Israel. They would be known as Christians; "sons of the living God," guardians of the Word, its distributors throughout the world: taught of God in regard to its mysteries; Sabbath keepers, respecters of the ten true laws of God, and, finally, preachers and propagators of the Gospel throughout all the nations, all the families, and all the kindreds of the earth.

We have hardly made enough of this last mark or sign, and yet it runs as a golden thread, right through the Bible. By it the people is, so to say, "ear-marked" as Israel. In the very fore-front of the Bible we have God's first promise respecting His people. "In thy seed—Abraham's seed—shall all the nations, families, kindreds of the earth be blessed." Find a nation fulfilling this destiny extensively and exclusively, then you have found Israel! Judah-Israel is disqualified just now, because of disobedience; therefore, Ephraim-Israel is the favoured House to carry out the function. In Isa. xxvii. 6, we have a text which points clearly in the same direction that Israel is set apart for world-wide service for the Lord: "In days to come, shall Jacob take root. Israel shall blossom and bud, and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit." Fruitfulness for God is thus the test; blessing to all mankind is the mark of genuine Hebrew origin, selected by God, and blessed.

In Isa. xlix. 6, we have a passage usually referred (and correctly) to the Lord Jesus: "I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My salvation unto the ends of the earth." But in Acts xiii. 47, R.V., St. Paul, speaking to the scoffing Jews, quoted Isa. xlix. 6, and applied the promise to himself as Christ's representative, thus, "Seeing ye (Jews) thrust it (the Word of God) from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, "I have set thee for a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation to the uttermost part of the earth." St. Paul, speaking for Christian-Israel, said they stood for Christ Himself as His messengers "for salvation" to the end of the earth. The British folk occupy just that position in the earth, and they are "for salvation" as the Lord's messengers to all the native inhabitants of the earth, to bring them to Christ. In all this see the gracious spiritual mark by which the lost people may be detected. Work for Christ—gracious effort or fruit for Him, to bring men saved to His Cross. In the New Testament parables the Lord told the Jews of His time to work for Him in "His vineyard." Israel and Judah were the two sons in Matt. xxi. 30. Both were ordered to work. Both heard. Judah agreed to go, but disobeyed. Israel declined at first, repented, and then went to work for Him, yielding fruit. The fruits rendered by the Jewish husbandmen of the next parable were what the Lord required. He sent His only Son to urge those obdurate worthless servants to render them. They refused, murdered the Son, and thought to keep the Heir's heritage themselves. In vain! They were expelled or destroyed, and other husbandmen (Ephraim-Israel), were installed. What for? To give the Lord the fruits!

Now mark the Lord's decree in ver. 43: "Therefore, I say unto you" (Jews), "The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Fruits again, the "ear-mark" of the chosen House! What are those fruits? Why, "Gospel fruits," of course! "Salvation fruits," whereby men are saved! How do they show themselves? See Matt. xxv. 31, R.V., where the assize of the nations is described. The divider is Christ. On the right hand, the nation Israel, the sheep. To the left, the nations of the earth. Israel is chosen. Why? Because of the fruits! What fruits? They fed the hungry, gave drink to the thirsty, received the stranger, clothed the naked, visited the sick, comforted the prisoners. They did it to men for love of Christ, and the Lord reckoned it as done to Him. Here are the fruits, acceptable to the Lord, the test by which Israel may be known. You know how all these marks unite in our nation and point to them as "the Israel of God," the "lost sheep," of "the House of Israel." One word as to the application of all this. If this be the character of Israel, Are we all possessed of it? Are we known each of us as the workers for Christ in the mission field or mission work? I know something of these societies in Clifton and Bristol, but I do not see that the Anglo-Israelites are very zealous in those causes! This is a grave mistake, and one we should look to to rectify. Meanwhile our national societies—the Church Missionary Society, the Jews' Society, the Bible and Tract Societies, the South American Missions, and the Non-conforming Societies, are inviting us to occupy the "whole world' and all nations as our field, and it is a real mistake that our British-Israelites take so little interest in mission work, which is the very raison d'être of Israel, and why God created, formed, and made them, that they might show forth His glory (Isa. xliii. 21), by bringing forth "the fruits" to His praise. May He give us each greater zeal in His missionary cause, and so enable us to wipe away the reproach that Anglo-Israelites neglect the spiritual side of their Christian character, and fail to practice what they preach.

THE VISION OF THE GOOD AND EVIL FIGS.

(Jer. xxiv.)

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I would like to write a few words in answer to Lieut.-Colonel Larkins' objections to my views on "The Good and Evil Figs," contained in the little book, "The Twelve Tribes." In the first place, he objects to the possibility of Judah being part under blessing and unknown, while those known as "evil figs" are "removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, to be a reproach, a proverb, a taunt, and a curse in all places whither God should drive them." God Himself told Jeremiah the "good figs" were they who were already carried captive into Babylon, viz., with Jehoiachim and Jehoiachin (see 2 Kings xxiv. 1, 8, 9 and 2 Chron. xxvi. 5—10). Daniel and his three friends were amongst the captives taken at that time. Jer. xxix. 1—14 gives us a glimpse of the loving thoughts of God towards that portion of Judah. Verses 15—19 give us a view of God's anger and judgments that were to fall on those who were left in Jerusalem (in this passage again called "vile figs") and who were not carried captive with Zedekiah until ten or twelve years afterwards. Ezekiel, too, who prophesied six years after Jehoiachin's captivity, is led to speak terrible things to the people and princes who were then in Jerusalem (see chap. v. 5 to end, xii. 8—16, and xxii. 15—22). In confirmation of the thought that probably those royal German families, which are so close akin to our own, are of Judah, even perhaps of David, I saw in the Morning Star an extract from the Jewish World, speaking of the late lamented Prince Henry of Battenberg as being allied in blood to the Jewish race.

From Ezra and Nehemiah we should gather there were about fifty thousand of Judah returned from the Babylonish captivity, including children of Judah, Benjamin and Levi. But there were many left in Babylon who were probably doing so well that, like some well-to-do Jews in England, would rather help the work in their Fatherland by their means than their presence. The last few verses of the second book of Kings shows how kindly the king Jehoiachin was treated by the king of Babylon. It is interesting to note, from St. Matthew's genealogy of the Lord Jesus, that it is from that king, on through Zerubabel (who helped to build the second temple in Jerusalem) that He is descended, and that genealogy does not give us the names of all the children of that king, only he who came in direct line with our Saviour: he was a young man when taken into captivity, and seems to have lived a fairly long life, so is it not possible and likely he would have many other sons? God fulfilled His word, that the Messiah should be born in Bethlehem, by means of the decree of Augustus Cæsar that all the world should be taxed; so it came that Joseph and Mary were obliged to go to Bethlehem because they were of the house and lineage of David, although Nazareth seems to have been their home.

I cannot at all see why we should be so certain that the people of Galilee, and especially the chosen twelve, should be all of Benjamin. We should certainly think St. John and his brother James might be, John was so truly the "beloved of the Lord." The people of Galilee seem to have been much despised by the people of Judah because they were rather a mixture of returned Israelites, and not so learned as themselves. They would not have despised Benjamin. St. Paul was one of God's favoured tribe of Benjamin; it would seem that his family had been long living away from Palestine.

In conclusion, as proof that the inhabitants of Judah were some of those who came under the similitude of "evil figs" in Jeremiah, we have our Saviour's parable of the barren fig tree (Luke xiii. 6—9), which He was especially addressing to the people of Judah. Trusting I have made the Scriptural grounds for my reasoning clear,

I am, yours faithfully, M. J.

"The Presbytery of Emporia having learned that our brother, Rev. Dr. Lackey, has determined to devote his entire time to the specific work of an evangelist within the bounds of the Synod of Kansas, take occasion to heartily commend him to the confidences and co-operation of our Churches. We appreciate the wide and promising fields now open for evangelistic efforts, and knowing that Dr. Lackey has special gifts for this particular department of Church work we fervently bid him God-speed, and anticipate rich harvests as the result of his zealous and untiring efforts." (Adopted by a rising vote.)

DEAR BRETHREN,—A friend, a poor missionary like myself, has shown me a few numbers of the BANNER OF ISRAEL. I am exceedingly pleased with it, and deeply interested in its teachings. My appetite is keenly whetted to read more. But I am a poor missionary, trying to live with my family of five persons on an income of 300 dols. a year, and cannot pay for it, cannot buy any books. I see what is said of your "Free Distribution Fund," and a hope springs up in my heart that perhaps I may have the BANNER for 1896 through that Fund. And so in our Master's name and for His sake I make my humble and respectful appeal to you for the BANNER, and anything else in the way of Anglo-Israel reading. I believe that as I go about my missionary and evangelistic tours I can create such an interest in your publications and in the BANNER especially, as will ultimately result in subscriptions to it, and purchases that will repay you a hundred times for anything you may send me. The BANNER for 1896, and in the future must be interesting, and I am itching to be allowed to read it.

Therefore, for the good I may do, through the reading of the BANNER, among my brethren of the Presbyterian Church on the Pacific coast of America and among the Jews here, I beg that my request may find favour with those who control the "Free Distribution Fund."

I am the permanent clerk and the present moderator of the Synod of Washington, embracing the whole State.

I bid you God speed, dear brethren, in your publication and dissemination of Anglo-Israel and Second Coming literature. Stirring times are upon us. I want to be posted and ready.

Very fraternally your fellow-servant for Christ's sake,

ALEX. H. LACKEY, Presbyterian Evangelist.

Aberdeen, Chehalis, Co., Washington, U.S.A., March 5th, 1896.

"The Rev. A. H. Lackey, D.D., has been conducting evangelistic meetings in the Presbyterian Church in this place, New Whatcom, for the past two weeks, with great success. Many persons attending, who were privileged to have heard all the evangelistic preachers who have preached on Bellingham Bay, say that he is pre-eminently the best. His preaching is characterized with clearness, conciseness, scripturalness, vivid illustration, simplicity, tenderness and intense earnestness. It is impossible to listen to him and not recognize his mastery of subjects, his ability to remove objections and difficulties out of the sinner's way and lead him by the Holy Spirit to the forgiving Saviour. Several confessed Christ through his instrumentality, and many were quickened in the new life. His services have been a great blessing not only to the Presbyterian Church, but to the whole community. "J."

[We are glad to be able to state that this missionary will receive a grant of literature from the Anglo-Israel Free Distribution Fund.]

A MILLENNIAL "AMERICA."

HERE is a letter from one of our Minnesota readers calling attention to a new international peace-song adapted to the famous tune of "America" and "God Save the Queen." Besides serving to emphasize our former passing comment, it will be intrinsically interesting to our readers everywhere.

"To the Editor of the 'Pathfinder.'

"Minneapolis, Minn., March 12, 1896.

"In a paragraph in the Pathfinder of last week the thought was expressed that the grand strain of music to which both England and the United States sing their national hymn might finally become a power for peace and closer union instead of a cause of dissension. The same thought has formed a happy expression in a beautiful international hymn suited to the air so dear to the hearts of the two great nations. It was composed by Prof. George Huntingdon, of Carlton College, Minnesota, and is as follows:—

"'AN INTERNATIONAL HYMN.

"'Two empires by the sea,
Two nations great and free,
One anthem raise.
One race of ancient fame,
One God whose glorious name
We love and praise.

What deeds our fathers wrought,
What battles we have fought,
Let fame record.
Now vengeful passions cease,
Come victories of peace;
Nor hate, nor pride's caprice,
Unsheathe the sword.

Though deep the sea, and wide
'Twixt realm and realm, its tide
Binds strand to strand.
So be the gulf between
Gray coast and island green,
Great populace and queen,
By friendship spanned.

Now may the God above
Guard the dear lands we love,
Or east or west.
Let love more fervent grow,
As peaceful ages go,
And strength yet stronger grow,
Blessing and blest.'

This song was first published in the Advance.—A FRIEND."

THE CHARTERED SOUTH AFRICAN COMPANY'S REPORT.

THE recent report of the Chartered South African Company was published in the London papers on February 27 last. It should be noted and studied by all who want to see how splendid is the territory which Dr. Jameson and his fellow-workers in Rhodesia have been instrumental in adding to the Empire. It is larger than the German Empire to begin with. No Imperial help has been given towards the acquisition of the country. The development of Rhodesia, called also "Charterland," has been simply wonderful. In what was desert ten or twelve years ago there are now flourishing towns, fully occupied by a white population. Good roads have been made and many miles of railway constructed. More of the latter are under construction. The same may be said of telegraph wires. The officials who have worked these wonders hardly exceed two hundred in number. The towns are supplied with all the necessaries, and many of the luxuries, of modern civilisation. Building is going on rapidly. Very little gold has yet been found in Charterland, but that is said to have been caused by the absence of the needful machinery, which, being very heavy, has not yet been carried largely into the Province. The shares of the Chartered Company are valuable in the market, and prove that the monied men believe in the future prosperity of the country. The chief agency on which the new addition to the Empire must depend for its progress is, of course, its railways. The Province lies so far inland that without railways the produce of the country could not reach the sea so as to return a profit to the emigrant. The Company, therefore, are paying great attention to this important branch of their work. The North Trunk Line was opened from Vryburg to Mafeking in October, 1894, and is found to pay handsomely. In July next the section between Mafeking and Gaberones, ninety-five miles long, will be opened. Preparations for carrying on the line still northwards for 175 miles to Palapye, are in progress; to end, by-and-bye, at Salisbury, via Buluwayo; thus to join the East Coast Line from Beira to Umtali. That railway is open from Beira, on the East coast, to Chimoio, and will be continued to Salisbury, through Umtali, the junction. In regard to telegraph lines, 1,354 miles are now open, and the financial returns are satisfactory. From the Beira Railway terminus at Chimoio, to Salisbury, the telegraph line is finished, and branches in several directions are being constructed. The defeated portions of Lobengula's crack regiments have been enlisted as a Native Police Force. On the whole, the new country, Rhodesia or Charterland, seems to lack but the presence of gold in paying quantities to make it what the Times calls, "A rich inheritance with ample natural resources." The probabilities that gold is to be found all through the country are said to be great. If so, we may yet find that the Uitlander of the Transvaal will see it to be more advantageous to transfer himself and all his goods and chattels to a country where a British Government, with representative institutions, is sure to be established, and thus leave the hitherto idle Boer to his own resources, which we know by experience may lead again to national bankruptcy, in the Transvaal.

No one can read the report of the Chartered Company without recognising how greatly the Lord has blessed the British Empire, being Israel, according to the prophecies. Not only is the Transvaal, with all its store of golden wealth, enclosed within the boundaries of the British African Empire, but the vast majority of those who have won the gold out of the Transvaal soil are British subjects, who only want fair play and decent treatment to make them willing and loyal members of the South African Republic, independent, if need be, of the British Government, save only in respect to the suzerainty of the Crown. The growth of the Rhodesian territory, which surrounds the Transvaal on the North and North-west, must in time exercise a potent influence over President Kruger's Government and bring it to reason. God's hand is clearly working in His people's favour in all these matters, and we have only to wait patiently to see how the end will surely prove to be to His glory and for the good of His people, Israel, His inheritance. At present, no doubt, there is a pause in the progress of Rhodesia by reason of the rebellion of the Matabele warriors, who were only subdued in part, and have imagined from the ease with which Dr. Jameson and his raiders collapsed at Krugersdorp, that the British power on the spot might yet be overthrown by a determined effort. There has, no doubt, been a grievous loss of British life among those who have been living in the land "carelessly and confidently," neglecting all defensive precautions. But we have no doubt that before long, by careful arrangements, the Matabele "young braves" will learn that a foolish raid into the Transvaal by men who made no serious preparations for war, is a very different thing from the power of a victorious race, who have at their back the whole strength of British South Africa and of the Empire besides; with the God of Israel to overlook the operations of His people, now engaged in a struggle to acquire a territory which must fall to Christian Israel in order that it may be included in the kingdom of the Lord. To Him will be all the praise.

"PROPHECIES FULFILLED IN HISTORY."

An Address by ANNIE K. BAILEY, M.D., of Danbury, Conn., U.S.A.*

THE address before us is the work of a lady, an American herself, we suppose; it was written for American readers, and is based on the views which are strongly held by the friends of the BANNER. The authoress distinguishes between the two Houses of Israel and Judah, and appeals to prophecy and history to prove that her conclusions are true. She rightly calls Our Identity with Israel the most important discovery, or properly revelation, both from a national and religious standpoint, ever made during the 19th century. The result to which she particularly points is "the marvellous, successful, and far reaching work in Africa." In regard to the House of Israel our lecturer spoke as follows:—

"THE HOUSE OF ISRAEL.

"The House of Israel went into the Assyrian Captivity 721 B.C., from which they have never returned. During their years of wandering before reaching their final destination many of the most gracious promises of God were given concerning them, and wholly unbeknown to them, the fulfilment of which should take place while they were in exile and would be found upon them when they should be found in the latter days, and these facts of fulfilment were to prove their identity. In the first place the prophecy in Gen. xlviii. 19, says that Ephraim shall be the greater nation, confirmed in Deut. xxviii. 13 in these words, 'And He shall make thee the head and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath.' 'A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee, and kings shall come out of thy loins' (Gen. xxxv. 11). 'The Lord shall bless all the work of thy hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow' (Deut. xxviii. 12). Being the head and not the tail is a guide to look for the after-seed of Jacob or Israel, to be the chief among the nations, and to-day the British nation is the leading Power among the nations. To-day the Israel of the House of Joseph is pronounced as 'Cosmopolitan in the broadest sense, a race in the unique sense, a people in a special sense, united in the best sense, and strong in every sense.'

"As a company of nations the kingdom of Great Britain includes 'British America, Canada, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Labrador in America, Honduras, Balize, Jamaica and the Bahamas in Central America, Hindostan, Burmah and the Straits in Asia, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, Colonies in the Pacific, the lion's share in Africa, Fiji Islands, India with her sixteen distinct nations, etc., etc. England also holds the six greatest gulfs and bays in the world—Gulf of Guinea, Oman, Bengal, Mexico, Baffin and Hudson's Bays.

"She commands nine seas—North, English Channel, Mediterranean, Adriatic, Ionian, Ægean, Persian Gulf, Red Sea, etc., and as to her islands they are simply innumerable. It has long been her boast that the sun never sets upon her possessions. As to her great wealth in lending to many nations and borrowing from none, a recent report stated that the immense sum of nearly 14,000,000,000 dollars is now owing England from foreign nations; so enormous are her loans that her interest at times exceed thirty to thirty-six millions in a single month, and they cannot find borrowers for their unemployed capital on loan of two per cent. In the second place we are instructed that this wonderful people will be located as an island people and possessing large colonies.

"In Isaiah xlix. we read, 'Listen, O, isles unto Me. Thou art My servant, O Israel, in whom I shall be glorified. In an acceptable time I have heard thee, and in a day of salvation have I helped thee, and I will preserve thee and give thee for a covenant of the people, to establish the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate heritages, that thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Shew yourselves.' 'Sing unto the Lord a new song . . . the isles and the inhabitants thereof' (Isa. xlii. 10). 'Let them give glory unto the Lord, and declare His praise in the islands' (Isa. xlii. 12). 'To the islands will He repay recompense' (Isa. lix. 18). I have already mentioned a sufficient number, aside from her immediate location, to show you how peculiarly island is England and her possessions. She is indeed a multitudinous people, as recorded by Hosea, 'The number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea which cannot be measured nor numbered;' and from the days of Abraham when the prophetic promise which reads thus, 'I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore, and thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies' (Gen. xxii. 17) was given, until the present, surely no one would attempt making a census. Let us examine the last clause of the prophetic promise to Abraham, 'Thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies.' These Great Britain has in all directions. The prophecy concerning this point says (Isa. lx. 11): 'Thy Gates,' or ports, 'shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night.'

"Concerning the possession of these Gates, or ports, by the covenant people with a new name, England or Britain controls 'France through the Channel Islands, Spain through Gibraltar, the Mediterranean people through Malta, Africa through Cape Town, Egypt and Turkey through Cyprus, China through Hong Kong, access to fifteen Chinese ports, South America through the Falkland Islands, the Atlantic through the West Indies, Afghanistan through Peshawar, Arabia through Aden, the Red Sea through Socotra, the Indian Ocean through St. Helena, Singapore, Malacca, Calcutta, New Zealand, Suez Canal, etc., etc., in fact all but the Gate, or port, at Constantinople, and that no doubt is only a question of time.

"'England owns coaling stations all over the world. No foreign war-ships can venture further than two thousand miles from home in time of war for want of coal, and thus would fall a prey to British ironclads.' Their coal is placed everywhere ready for emergency, and possessing the Gates to all the great commercial routes, enemies cannot pass them. Thus Britain dominates the nations and is indeed chief. Again, the representatives of Ephraim will be found having a descendant of David reigning over them. (2 Chron. xiii. 5): 'Ought ye not to know that the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and to his sons?' In Jer. xxxiii. 17 we read, 'For thus saith the Lord, David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the House of Israel. Zedekiah was the last king of Judah, and comparatively few can account for the apparent lapse in David's line from Zedekiah to the present time. David's sceptre ruled over the people up to the time of the Babylonish captivity, when Zedekiah, the king, had his eyes put out, his sons killed before him, and he taken to Babylon; but though his sons were slain, his seed, the legitimate ruling seed, was not extinct, because he had daughters, and the king's daughters escaped with their great grandfather, Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. lii. 1), and God said that the remnant that is escaped of the House of Judah, which was David's house, should again take root (Isa. xxxvii. 31), 'and I will provide a place for My people Israel and will plant them, and they shall no more be rooted up, and thy seed shall rule over them;" and thus from history we find, that where the thread was lost in Jewish history it begins in Irish history, the two events taking place at the same time. Jeremiah and the king's daughters escaped and came to Ireland. The princess Tephi was married to Eochiad, the reigning king of Ireland, who renounced his false religion and agreed to worship the God of the Hebrews. The ten commandments were accepted and became the law of the land from that time, and a whole system of new things having direct Hebrew origin appeared at Tara Ireland, at the same time. From this marriage we obtain a direct and unbroken line, without a flaw or a missing link, to Fergus I., who went from Ireland to Scotland, and from him the same unbroken line to James the First, of England, and from thence still unbroken to Victoria, the present glorious Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. So that it was through Ezekiel's tender twig of the topmost branch, or the feminine line of the royal house, through which David's unbroken line has been preserved."

It is interesting to see how an American authoress regards the United States as representing the tribe of Manasseh. She wrote thus on the subject:—

"MANASSEH.

"The prophecy of blessing says that Manasseh too shall become a people, and he also shall be great. (Gen. xlix. 22): 'Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall.' In Isaiah (xlix. 19, 20) we read: 'For thy waste and thy desolate places shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants.'

"'The children which thou shalt have after thou hast lost the other shall say again in thine ears, The place is too strait for me; give place to me that I may dwell.' In the patriarchal blessing, when Joseph was re-accepted in his sons, making Ephraim the younger synonymous with Israel, he constituted then and there Manasseh a 13th tribe, and from that time ever to be a 13th tribed Israel. Thus the birthright was so divided that the company of nations fell to Ephraim as a Ten-tribed, consolidated nation, and the single nation, the great people, to Manasseh.

"The first time the number 13 occurs in the Bible is with reference to rebellion (Gen. xiv. 4), and from that time to this it has been said by Cabalistic students to dominate all the historical eras in which rebellions have occurred.

"Manasseh being constituted a 13th tribe, that number became their tribal number. When we consider the tribal number, and the only instance of the loss of one child, or colony, by England, in the separation of the revolutionary struggle, and when you consider still further the 13 original colonies in the United States, the 13 stars and stripes on the American flag, and so well illustrated on our twenty-five and fifty cent coins for 1893, the 13 arrows in the Eagle's claws, the 13 leaves on the olive branch, the 13 stripes on the shield, the 13 stars at the top, the 13 letters in the National Motto—"E Pluribus Unum"—meaning one out of many, &c., &c., we have no small measure of evidence in this direction alone as to the race which to-day stands as the representatives of Manasseh, and not less remarkable from a prophetic stand-point is our national seal. Thus the nation of America also stands a brilliant witness of the truth of God's sure Word, the inspiration of which no one can question, and though lost to the mother country in the sense of separation, yet we are of the same stock and of the same Israel of the House of Joseph. 'The seed of Joseph touched and stamped this country at four principal points: Massachusetts, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Georgia.' 'It was the prevailing motive that stamped the character, that gave forecast to the institutions and pointed to the destiny of the prospective nation;' and as has been truthfully spoken, 'In the story of the settlement of Mass., it was as if the Ark of God were carried on the Mayflower by the chosen priests of the advancing service. Whoever stood at the helm, the Almighty hand of God was on the tiller.' Thus we find in Manasseh and his inheritance a new world, a new Government, with new resources untouched since the creation. So rapid has been its development, it has been declared that a decade in America is better and more fruitful in results than a century in Europe. It is pronounced as a scene without a prototype, a prospect without a horizon. 'Its geographical fitness brings it in the limit of the most favourable conditions for the essential demands for food, clothing and shelter. The geologic formation of the country gives it an outlook of paramount importance;' and the exchange and transport capacity of this new world are something marvellous. It is estimated that one State alone, under proper cultivation, could feed the present nation and meet the present cotton demand of the world. In addition, the metallic treasures of the mountains are of incalculable and inexhaustible value. These are a few of the cursory glances at the most striking features of this great country.

"My purpose is not to discuss European or American history as such, but to glean such facts only as will establish our claims in the identification among the nations as spoken from the beginning. The prophecy also reads, 'God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh.' Though as nations separate and independent of each other, yet, both being under equal favours from God, they are witnesses of that favour. Notwithstanding one should be greater than the other, and as a combined evidence, and as a golden clasp binding the two, we read, moreover, 'Also I gave them My Sabbaths to be a sign between Me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them.' Again, 'Speak thou unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily, My Sabbaths ye shall keep; for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations.' 'Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between Me and the children of Israel for ever' (Exodus xxxi. 13, 16, 17).

"In Great Britain and the United States only is the Sabbath kept nationally and by law, and this fact is not applicable to any of the Continental nations. It may help us quicker to get our balance and to correct our faults, and that speedily, if we know that Manasseh means forgetfulness. While it is a blessed provision that we may and can forget things that are unworthy and to be regretted, yet it is high time that Americans were effectually reminded that God says: 'Mine house shall be called a house of prayer (not amusements) for all people' (Isa. lvi. 7).

"It is high time that Americans were effectually reminded that God says: 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy' (Exod. xx. 8).

"It is high time that Americans were reminded of the double command, and that God says: 'Keep My Sabbaths and reverence My sanctuary' (Lev. xix. 30); and in Deut. x. 13 we learn why; 'Keep the commandments of the Lord and His statutes which I command thee this day for thy good.'

"Ephraim-Israel, or England, then, stands for nationality, Anglo-America for popularity, both for fraternity, and together, in the flood light of truth revealed, they are the very embodiment of Moses and the prophets." . . .

There is much more of the same sort in this address, in nearly all of which we can concur. Her remarks on the colonies of other nations are valuable. The chapter on "Anglo-America in Evangelistic Work," is original and peculiar, but is worthy of perusal.

REVIEW OF "AFTER THE THOUSAND YEARS."

By Rev. Denis Hanan, D.D.

There are many indications that the teaching which the Banner of Israel exists to promulgate is making its way both directly and indirectly. A few years since, if it was stated that Israel as a nation would be supreme during the millennium, it was thought to be a notion in opposition to all "spiritual" teaching.

But now I have before me, a book published at the office of The Christian, which maintains this view, although the writer seems to be unconscious that any but himself have so thought.

The author of "After the Thousand Years," is altogether in a fog as to the distinction between Israel and Judah. With him the Jew means all Israel. He has never heard that, according to the prophets, Ephraim-Israel is to be Christian, and therefore he makes a wide distinction between Israel nationally obedient to Christ, and the Church.

Nevertheless, there must be a certain readiness of mind in those who agree with this book to consider the statement, that if Israel is to be ready and fitted to enforce peace upon the world at a time very near at hand, as the author thinks, she must be in a very different position, both politically and religiously, from that which Judah occupies to-day.

The book is very strong upon a point which I have stated more than once in this paper—viz., that the peace foretold during the thousand years will be an enforced peace, and that the millennium, therefore, is not rightly called the age of peace, for punishment is to follow upon disobedience, and at the end there is to be an outbreak of rebellion against the rule of the Lord Jesus.

The author argues that after this event, the kingdom of Christ, in its fullest sense, will come, and that it will continue for a long period before it is abdicated and subjected to God the Father. With this distant speculation I do not concern myself, nor do I approve of the self-confidence of the writer, a self-confidence so often made ridiculous by ignorance of history; but with respect to his view of the approaching millennium and its character. I see in it an unconscious preparation for the reception of the historic facts concerning Israel, and of the teachings concerning her future, which the Identity of Israel with Britain alone can reconcile with the great purposes of God which are being wrought out as the times of the Gentiles come to their close.

I may, perhaps, mention that the author of this book seems to be on very familiar terms with "Paul" and other apostles; if he objects to the prefix of saint, why not use Mr. ?

MR. H. H. PAIN'S ADDRESS AT THE BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION MEETING.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen,—As this is the first occasion on which I have given a public address, I must ask your kind indulgence if I am somewhat hesitating in my delivery. I believe that the closing years of this century are fraught with events of great importance to the future of this country; events, too, which will plunge the whole nation in a sea of anxiety. But I venture to predict, with a confidence begotten of experience, that there is one class of Her Majesty's subjects who will not undergo a moment's anxiety, and they are Anglo-Israelites. (Applause). We who realise our Israelitish origin can take to ourselves the message of comfort contained in Isa. liv.: "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper."

I purpose this evening to address you on the

and in order that you may understand the basis on which my arguments are founded, I must

First prove to you the Identity of the British nation with the Lost House of Israel;

Secondly, the connection between Turkey and the House of Edom; and,

Thirdly, I must draw your attention to political events of the present day, in confirmation of the arguments put forward.

Doubtless, much that I shall say many of you will be already acquainted with; but I must ask you to remember that it is the hope of our Council, on this the occasion of our Annual Meeting, that many strangers may be present, with a view to learning what our ideas may be. If, by the blessing of God, I shall be the means of converting one stranger to our views, the time will not have been wasted.

THE IDENTITY OF THE BRITISH NATION WITH THE LOST HOUSE OF ISRAEL.

It will be within your recollection that in the time of Rehoboam the Twelve-tribed nation was divided into two—one called the House of Judah, or the Jews, which went to Jerusalem; the other the Ten Tribes of the House of Israel, reigned over by Jeroboam at Samaria. These were ultimately carried captive to Assyria, and placed in the cities of the Medes, South-west of the Caspian Sea. If you will kindly look on that map (hanging there) you will find the Scriptural names written in red and the modern names in black. We are told in the Book of Esdras that they took a long journey for a year and a-half, until they came to Arsareth, for the Most High showed signs for them, and held back the streams until they passed over, for through that country there was a great way to go. They came to this place called Arsareth, which, I may say, has been identified with a town on the river Sereth, a tributary of the Danube, which flows into the Black Sea.

Ar is a Greek transliteration of the two Hebrew words, meaning severally hill or city; and Sareth is identical with the river Sereth.

Herodotus gives an account of a people called the Scythians, who lived South of the river Aras, or Araxes, while Israel lived North of the river Ouzan, or Gouzan, from whence they came to the Kimmerian land, North-west of the Black Sea. From the description given of the country where they started from, and where they arrived, as also their habits, customs, and traditions, "Oxonian" has shown in his wonderful work, "Israel's Wanderings," that the two names mentioned by Esdras and Herodotus refer to one and the same people. That is the connecting link between the Scythians and the Israelites.

I have not time now to go into the historical argument; I intend to confine my remarks to the Scriptural argument. From Arsareth they passed into these islands that are now known as the British Islands. They came here as Anglo-Saxons, Danes, Normans, &c., but they were all of the same race, and they all came from the same place in Asia Minor. Sharon Turner, the historian of the Anglo-Saxons, points that out.

Jeremiah was told to go and proclaim these words "towards the North:" "Return, thou 'backsliding' Israel," in contrast to her "treacherous" sister Judah. And in Isaiah we read: "Wherefore, glorify the Lord in the East: even in the Isles of the West."

They were to be a money-lending nation. "Thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow." If you look down the Money Market columns in our newspapers you will see that nearly every nation under the sun has borrowed money of us. As a Member of the Stock Exchange, I should like to draw your attention to a statement I sometimes see in print, to the effect "that the Jews are the great money-lending people of the world." I deny that in toto. The people who lend money are the British people. Great Jewish houses, like the Rothschilds, etc., are the Agents or Brokers; they introduce loans for a commission, but the British public subscribe for them, and take the interest, when they can get it. (Laughter.)

It was promised to our forefather Abraham that "his seed should possess the Gate of his enemies." Look where you will all over the world, we possess the strategical positions which give us the command of an enemy's country.

We also live under a monarchy claiming descent from David. Jacob, you will recollect, in blessing his sons, the Twelve Tribes of Israel, declared what should happen to them "in the latter days." And in reference to "the latter days" it was said of Judah: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come." It, therefore, must be in existence at the present time, because that reference is not to the First Advent but to the Second.

We are also to be a nation and a company of nations. That is based on the blessings of Jacob to his grandsons, the two sons of Jacob, Ephraim and Manasseh. It is stated, in effect, that "Manasseh shall become a great nation, but Ephraim, his brother, shall be a greater nation than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations." Manasseh we identify with America, because it is said by the prophet Isaiah: "The children which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other, shall say again in thine ears, The place is too straight for me: give place to me that I may dwell." America is the only Colony lost to the mother country, and it is, in its own language, "a great nation," of the same race, the same language, the same traditions as ourselves. Well, all these blessings were to have their fulfilment in the latter days. Of necessity the promise of being a nation and a company of nations, must have its fulfilment in this the Christian dispensation, because during the Mosaic dispensation they were only one nation, or divided into two. Moreover, they cannot be a nation and a company of nations in the millennial dispensation, because then both Judah and Israel are to be joined together as one nation, no more to be divided, and "one King is to be King of them all."

I will now refer to

EDOM.

Ezekiel declares of Edom: "Because thou hast said, These two nations and these two countries shall be mine, and we will possess it; also that the holy places are ours in possession." These two nations refer to Judah and Israel, whilst their country is represented by Judea and Samaria. It is further said: "I will inflict vengeance upon Edom by the hand of My people Israel." There can be no question that both these prophecies have already had one fulfilment at the close of the Mosaic dispensation. But prophecy, like history, repeats itself, and there is no reason to doubt that it will do so in this case. In Ezek. xxxvi., a chapter which refers to the restoration of the chosen people, and to the turning out of those who have usurped possession of the land, it is declared: "Surely in the fire of My jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the nations, and against all Edom which have appointed My land unto themselves for a possession." Edom is here spoken of as possessing the land. Now Turkey, for centuries past, as at the present time, has been, we all know, in possession of the Holy Land. Baalam, who was called upon by Balak to curse Israel, told him what "this people should do to thy people (and Edom) in the latter days." At the time he prophesied, four thousand years ago, the Twelve Tribes of Israel were encamped in the valley beneath him, existing as a Theocracy, whilst this publication related to the latter days, when Israel should dwell in the Islands of the Sea North-west from Palestine, and living under a Monarchy claiming descent from David. With this explanation how easy it is to follow the blessing of Balaam.

"I shall see Him, but not now; I shall behold Him, but not nigh; there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel. . . . And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession for His enemies, while Israel doeth valiantly. And out of Jacob shall one have dominion, and shall destroy the remnant from the city." If it is asked, What city is here referred to? we get an answer to that enquiry in Psa. lx.: "Who will bring me into the strong city? who will lead me into Edom? Wilt not Thou, O God, which hast cast us off? . . .

Give us help against the adversary; for vain is the help of man. Through God we shall do valiantly; for He it is that shall tread down our enemies."

Two facts are here patent. If Turkey be Edom, their "strong city," without the shadow of a doubt, is Constantinople. Another fact, as pointed out, is the isolation of England; and that whatever we may have to do in capturing Constantinople, we shall have to do it, relying on our own strong arms, and with the help of God; "for vain is the help of man."

Turn to Obadiah, who prophesied exclusively of Edom. He began to prophesy about 587 B.C., and the passages he makes use of have a singular application to the present time. An ambassador is sent amongst the nations to say: "Arise ye, and let us rise up against her in battle." It will be within your recollection that the British Ambassador at Constantinople has done his best to get the Ambassadors of the other Great Powers to co-operate in impressing upon Turkey the necessity of carrying out reforms in that misgoverned province of Armenia. Our diplomatic efforts have, so far, met with no success; but we have the promise of the Government, in the House of Commons, that the matter has not been lost sight of, and will be taken up again when the opportunity occurs. That that opportunity will offer is perfectly certain, from the prophetical indications given us in the Bible. Turkey is also spoken of as being "small among the nations." "The men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to the border." When you think of what Turkey was centuries ago, and look at her present dominions in Europe, she is truly "driven out even to the border," for there is hardly anything left of Turkey in Europe. The greater part of what was formerly Turkey is now independent, including Roumania, Servia, Montenegro, Bulgaria, Moldavia, and other places. "Shall I not in that day, saith the Lord, even destroy the wise men out of Edom?" Lord Salisbury, on the death of Rustem Pasha, deplored the loss to the Turkish Empire of such a good man as he was, and said that had the Sultan more advisers of that stamp about him, Turkey would not be going to its end in the way it is surely now going.

"OTHERWISE"—THE WORD AT ROM. XI. 22.

A QUESTION having been raised as to the accuracy of certain words in the "Handbook of British-Israel Truth," issued by our Association, I submit the following to the criticism of the readers of "The Covenant People."

The objection is with reference to the meaning of the word ἐπεὶ (Rom. xi. 22). On page 21 this rendering is given, "Since thou also shalt be cut off," and again, a reference in Appendix C, page 193, "Hence as a Church destined to be cut off." It is said that the rendering of the A.V. and R.V. "otherwise" is more correct and is supported by the context.

The question is, in the first place, critical, and then exegetical; or what is the true rendering, and what does that rendering imply? I consider the former only, in this paper.

The word ἐπεὶ occurs twenty-seven times in the New Testament. As an adverb of time it is translated "when" in A.V., and "after" in R.V. As a conjunction it is rendered (a) by "since," "because," "seeing," "for," (b) by "else," "forasmuch," and "otherwise." Under the latter an elipsis has to be supplied, implying a condition; for this there is classical precedent, but is this precedent or Pauline use to be followed here? However, I am now stating the question only upon the evidence furnished by the two English versions.

One of these words is dropped in the R.V., which only retains (a) "since," "because," "seeing," "for," and (b) "else," and "otherwise." This word "otherwise," which occurs four times in A.V., is read but twice in R.V. The repetition at Rom. xi. 6 being rejected, and the word at Heb. ix. 17, being translated "for." Thus we find that in the R.V., ἐπεὶ is rendered by "otherwise" but twice, and this in the same chapter. Our enquiry is thereby narrowed to the question, Were the revisers justified in using a word with such a different signification in Rom. xi. 6 and 22, and there only? Why did they depart from their declared intention of not varying the renderings, and not translate ἐπει in the same epistle (chap. iii. 6) by the same word where it would have made good sense, if "for" or "for then" was not a more true translation?

There seems to be no other reason for the exceptional use of "otherwise" at verse 22, but that any of the other words would seem to be too harsh; and the use of the same word at verse 6, where "else," or "for then," would have given the meaning, was adhered to apparently as a colourable excuse for retaining the word at verse 22.

Thus our enquiry is narrowed yet more, to the justification for the exceptional use in the one sentence, "otherwise thou also shall be cut off."

If we regard St. Paul's words as hortatory only, "otherwise" might be excused. But the apostle must be regarded as recording a prophetic knowledge. Has the Roman branch of the Gentile wild olive ceased to boast itself against the branches? has it continued in the true faith? If the answer is in the negative, then are we not justified in attributing to St. Paul a deeper prophetic knowledge than that which is obscured by the word "otherwise?" In the same passage he does prophecy. Excised Judah can be grafted in again, and then all Israel will be saved. The re-engrafting of Judah seems to imply the excision of the wild graft, and "since" or "for" seem to suit the context more accurately than the exceptional rendering. Thus it appears to me that the substitution of "otherwise" in this place alone is not justified, and that although the rendering "else," or "since," or "because," or "for," does not absolutely foretell the ultimate failure of wild olive Christianity, or of a part thereof, we have no right to tone down the force of ἐπεὶ (and more especially of ἐπεὶ και), and that therefore the rendering adopted in the "Handbook" is correct.

The R.V. renders "seeing," at Luke i. 34; 2 Cor. xi. 18, and xiii. 3. "Since," Matt. xxvii. 4; 1 Cor. xiv. 12; Heb. ii. 14, iv. 6, v. 2 and 11, vi. 13, and xi. 11. "Because," Matt. xvii. 32; Mark xv. 42; John xiii. 29, xix. 13. "Else," 1 Cor. vii. 14, xiv. 16, xv. 29; Heb. ix. 26, and x. 2. "For then," Rom. iii. 6; 1 Cor. v. 10; Heb. ix. 17. "Otherwise," as stated above. DENIS HANAN.

One Hundred and Fiftieth Monthly Report.

The following subscriptions and donations, received from April 25th to May 16th, are very gratefully acknowledged:—

Our April Report having been unavoidably delayed a week, it included subscriptions and donations for five weeks, and now it will be observed that we have but three weeks to account for to bring the Report up to the usual time, the middle of the month, to appear in the first issue of the Banner for June.

SOWING THE SEED.

This Report for the Midsummer month brings us to our third jubilee of months, the 150th account of the work that has been carried on through the Anglo-Israel Distribution Fund, which was called into existence by Miss Jessie Lawrence in 1881. To make known the mighty acts of Jehovah, on behalf of, and for the good of His "chosen people," to fit them to act in accordance with His commission to Israel, that they should be a blessing to all the nations of the earth, has been the aim and object of the work from the beginning until now.

Probably to some minds, and specially in comparison with the funds of many religious societies, it may appear that what we have been and what we are doing is very little. A few pounds disbursed in the early years, and the amounts creeping up have but shown a total for 1895 of just over £174 for that year, yet we feel it is good, very good, and thank God for it. Who can calculate the sum of the influence for good which that amount really represents, and all for the preceding years? The many thousands of packets of publications put into careful hands through each twelve months, and passed out again to those we cannot number in and around the places where our Sowers, nearing now 200, reside in various parts of the British Empire, and also over the border! A mighty torrent is but composed of individual drops of water, and though our seed packets are not weighed by tons, the influence of the great truths they bear will doubtless be felt through all Eternity; for the revelation of ourselves, as Israel, to ourselves is the work of the Almighty. All of us concerned are but endeavouring to make known His Will. Even as "still waters run deep," so are the eternal truths, in great measure silently, making their way, and the under-current is washing away much that has banked up errors which are bound to come down in time. In God's time. Let that be sufficient for us; only let us see to it that we really do perform readily that which He has given each individual to accomplish, ever asking guidance to do it rightly.

We have very great pleasure in acknowledging a second special gift from the Rev. Dr. Tullidge, of Philadelphia, U.S.A., who placed a number of his admirable pamphlets "Lost Tribes of Israel in England and America" with Messrs. Banks & Son, on sale, for the benefit of our Fund. Not only for the sake of the money gift received are we glad of the sale, but also because of the internal value of the little work some of which we have gladly purchased and distributed to Sowers who will know how to use them well. If Dr. Tullidge's plan could be followed by others, it seems likely that much blessing would follow, not only to those who receive, but to those who give, and probably an increased circulation for the publications would result.

It is with very great satisfaction that we are able to notify several fresh places, in the list given below, to which we are regularly sending; literature has already been thankfully acknowledged by some of those who have received it; in other cases there has been barely time for reply, but from what has been learned of the new Sowers we hope the good news will be earnestly and faithfully proclaimed by them.

A letter from one of our regular Sowers in Canada will give a good idea of what is going on, and will, as letters before quoted, indicate the work and necessities of others in different fields, in various lands. Considering all that we are sending through the post, it seems time we recorded a special vote of thanks for the care taken in delivery. What follows is not the only tribute we have had of efficiency of this Service through Israel's dominions.

"Many thanks for your parcel of books received last mail, and also for the weekly supply which comes so regularly to hand. You will be gratified to learn that I have spread them far and near, and that they have been a leaven in the country, working incalculable good. I can now count believers by the dozen where formerly I could only barely obtain a scornful hearing. I find the clergy of the Church of England are the worst to approach; the one you sent literature to when in England left our diocese and went to the States, but in an interview I had with him prior to leaving he expressed a very deep interest in the subject.

"Our Rural Dean is interested, and if you can spare a 'British Israel Truth,' I think it would help him immensely. He was in the chair at a meeting at which I read a paper, and he expressed the greatest surprise, and said it was altogether different to what he had been led to think it was; he read several of the pamphlets you from time to time furnished me with, and also some of the Banners. Distances are so great in this country, and travel expensive, or I should like to have kept in touch with the people in——, and also in——. I have unfortunately had quite a hard struggle to keep above water since leaving the former place; that is why I have not subscribed to the Fund. I thank God quite a number of people here are more than interested, and I trust shortly to be able to form a society with the aid of the Presbyterian minister here, and to have a series of lectures in the school-houses around, and if possible illustrate them with lantern slides. Could we get slides for a small lantern (3½ by 4 slides) suitable, do you think? I thought of writing to Colonel Senior, but all public men like him are flooded with all sorts of communications, so did not write, preferring to enquire from you first."

Thus it seems some of our most active Sowers in distant lands are longing to attract their outside public, as is being done at home, by lantern views of the most striking places, particularly the Gates, of the British Empire. The expense of them is one difficulty, and another, that of obtaining suitable photographs from which to get slides made. If any friends at home can help those in New Zealand and Canada, we shall be pleased to put them in communication; beyond that the work would be outside that of our Fund, though if time were no object we would gladly do all that would be possible to assist.

The Canadian Sower continues, saying—"I hope to be able to attend the Synod this year, and carry the war into the midst of the clergy," and he closes his letter expressing his "trust soon to be a support instead of a drain" upon our Fund, by means of which he has that in hand which will give force to, and further explain his argument to those who will read.

Week by week, from year's end to year's end there has been continual flow from our Fund; that so it may continue, and ever steadily increase while the need for it exists, is our hope and prayer, that the Lord God may be magnified, "and the glorious majesty of His kingdom" may be made "known to the sons of men."

Since the Report last month, in addition to the usual number of the BANNER OF ISRAEL, 120 packets of Literature, including the "Covenant People," have been sent for distribution by our Sowers in the following mentioned places:—

HOW EPHRAIM ABSORBS THE NATIONS.

"NORWEGIANS are more steady. No, I do not care for men from the south of Europe. One peculiarity about the men of northern Europe is that they very soon become 'Englishmen.' You might find among a crew entered such a name as 'John Smith' or 'Thomas Robinson,' and all the while the man half-a-dozen years ago was a Swede or a Norwegian."—Extract from a London Paper.

LECTURE BY COLONEL H. W. J. SENIOR.

COLONEL SENIOR, of the Indian Staff Corps, delivered a lecture on Tuesday in the Banqueting-room of the Guildhall, under the title of "Footprints on the Sands of Time," the lecture being under the auspices of the Anglo-Israel Association, and illustrated by limelight views. The views were interesting and varied, and in connection with several Irish scenes, as Tara, the Round Tower, and the Coronation Stone, now at Westminster, which the lecturer traced from Ireland to Scotland and thence to England. He commented, among other points, on the ornamentations on the Tara brooch, which he connected with the Buddhist circles or concentric rings sculptured on the Sanchi Tope, and also repeated in the Shell Grotto at Margate and on the Logie Stone in Scotland, and the Sanscrit inscription on the Newton Stone in Aberdeenshire, all of which showed that there had been Buddhisth colonists in this country, Buddha being known as Sakya Muni, and those of his followers who had travelled through Armenia and Europe brought traces of the name Saki, Saxone, etc., with them. In the course of his remarks the lecturer related that he had inquired into an old legend that the grave of the prophet Jeremiah was near Lough Erne, but found the place pointed out nothing beyond what any ancient sarcophagus might be. At the end of his lecture Colonel Senior showed how erroneous the usual idea was that the ancient Britons were savages, the fact being that they were learned people, cultivating arts and industries, and carrring on agriculture, as the remains found in the Lake dwellings at Glastonbury prove; and also the knowledge of mechanics, displayed in the raising of the great stones at Stonehenge, evidenced that they were more than savages. In the course of the lecture Mrs. Street kindly sang "The Harp that once through Tara's Halls," admirably accompanying herself on the harp, and eliciting loud plaudits. Colonel Senior was awarded a hearty vote of thanks for his able lecture.—From the Bath Daily Chronicle, April 30, 1896.

THE CREST OF THE TRIBE OF JUDAH.

To the Editor of "The Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—I heard an interesting fact the other day which was new to me, and may possibly be new to some of your readers. There is at Romsey Abbey, Hants, on the outside wall, an old crucifix, with the figure of our Saviour clothed, always a sign that the date is not later than the 11th century; above is a hand. A clergyman, who has done an immense deal towards restoring the Abbey, and who is acquainted with its every detail, noticed a foreigner one day examining this crucifix. He approached him, and said the hand was supposed to be emblematical of God the Father. "I beg your pardon," returned the foreigner, "that is a mistake. I am a Jew from Asia Minor, and this hand is merely the sign of the Tribe of Judah. Every tribe has its sign, and it was always customary to put the sign of a tribe above a tomb-stone. There are some old Jewish cemeteries at Smyrna where you may still see these signs on the tombstones, for the custom was kept up long after the destruction of Jerusalem."

There is another of these clothed crucifixes outside the Church of Duddingstone, near Edinburgh. Perhaps some Israelite there can inform me if that also has "the hand" above it. It would also be interesting if anyone can tell us the signs for the other tribes. I only know that "grapes" belong to one, but I do not know which.

It is worthy of note that crests and coats-of-arms in Europe date from about the 12th century—i.e., from the return of the Crusaders from the East. They had, doubtless, obtained the custom from these tribal "signs" on the tomb-stones. We know the lion was the standard of the Tribe of Judah, but would not "the hand" answer to the crest?

Yours faithfully,
F. C. PRINGLE.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—The following is an extract from the Quiver of August, 1893:—"Oporto has an air of bustle and business, of trade and traffic, in river, road, and rail, not unworthy of the second city of Portugal. This last feature is, of course, greatly owing to the presence of a large colony of English merchants. But the thing that struck me most of all in Oporto was the amount and variety of the philanthropic and religious work carried on by these men, and the good done by them. I have no hesitation in saying that, wherever Englishmen settle, they carry a blessing in their train. . . . They inculcate by their example principles of honesty and truthfulness. . . . 'Swear by the words of an Englishman!' was an oath an Arab was heard demanding of another. At Oporto our countrymen are not content to be simply honest. They are all actively engaged in helping others" (page 729).

FRED. H. GRIFFITHS.

Rangoon, Burmah, Aug. 19, 1895.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—Having written a few notes on the Armenian Question, according to the light of God's Word, on the first of this month, we are encouraged to send them to you, by reading Mr. Davenport's article on the Identity of the Turks in the BANNER for March 4th. We are arrested by his similar belief, that Isaiah lxiii. is about to be fulfilled in direct consequence of

"THE ARMENIAN QUESTION."

Whilst all attention is being fixed upon what diplomatists will or will not do for "the perishing" in the land of Armenia (Assyria), the attention of Bible students is directed to what the Word of God has to say about the ultimate issue of this dire affliction of our brethren in Armenia, so that we may say together with Jeremiah x. 7, "Who would not fear Thee, O King of nations? for to Thee doth it appertain." Surely this is the time for the Church of God to cry, "Awake, O Lord, to the judgment that Thou hast commanded." What judgment? some may enquire; the inspired Word tells us, "That they who were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, shall be delivered." How truly we realise Psalm lx. 11. Joshua who was then fighting against Edom, says, "Give us help from trouble, for vain is the help of man." Even so Israel to-day, must so cry out, in attacking the present country of the Edomites. We have a similar analogy to the blindness of the people in the present day to the times of our Lord; He came and fulfilled the first paragraph of Isa. lxi., as He Himself testified in the Synagogue of Nazareth, saying, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your eyes, and He closed the book." Yes, but He will open it again, at His Second Advent, and will read the first paragraph of Isa. lxiii.: "For the year of My redeemed is come." What more graphic description of the situation of the day, than what is contained in this paragraph, let anyone shew. "I looked and there was none to help." Our blue books shew us that jealousy blocks the way. Yes, vain is the help of man, in the solution of the Edom of to-day, as of old. It is time for Thee, O Lord, to work, for the set time is come. (See Ezek. xxv. 14).

Yours in faith,
JOHN DUNFORD.

Marie House, Forest-hill, S.E., March 10, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

MY DEAR SIR.—I beg you to excuse my reverting to the subject of "The Gate," so often mentioned in the BANNER, and so ably discussed by the Rev. C. W. Hickson this week. In my study of your valuable "Monthly Comments," I find that "the Gate seems to refer to the fact that Palestine is the Gate of the world," as incidentally mentioned in Isa. xiv. 31, where the locality is called Palestine, in the A.V., and Philistia in the R.V.

Another writer in the same BANNER quotes Dr. George Moore as stating, that in the distribution of the land among the tribes, Dan's portion embraced the country of the Gittites, or people of Gath, which name he traces to the Hebrew Gété. The root, or a corruption of the same old word, appears to have been common in England in Elizabeth's reign, when "the Battle of Flodden," an ancient historic ballad, was issued; and again, in 1773, it was printed at Newcastle, edited by the Rev. Robert Lambe, Vicar of Norham-upon-Tweed. Two lines in the poem stand thus:—

"Thou in this gate should be our guide."
"I know right well you know the ground," a foot-note explaining "Gate" as "going," or "to go," from the verb "gae."

Yours, &c., S. A. MATSON.

Brentwood, Essex, April 17th, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—From Mr. A. Bradshaw's useful table of coins in BANNER of April 29th, it would appear that the mean diameter of our present coins, one with another, is just one inch. Taking the 13 coins he gives, the mean is 0·914 inch; but rejecting the two Maundy coins, which are not in circulation, it is 0·992 inch. If we omit the farthing, now rarely seen, the mean is 1·012; but retaining that coin, and adding the 4s. piece, which Mr. B. omits, and of which the diameter must be about 1·4 inch, the mean is raised to 1·026 for the twelve coins now actually in use. More notably, if the three representative and most important coins be selected, the sovereign, shilling, and penny, or "money of account," the mean comes out 0·999 inch! This by taking simple means. But if it were possible to average the diameters according to the numbers of each class of coin in circulation, perhaps a still nearer approximation might emerge, indicating even a Pyramid, or earth-axial, inch, instead of the present somewhat debased standard: (for it is known that an Elizabethan standard ell, in Government keeping early in this century, was found to give an inch = 1·00093 of the modern standard unit [Piazzi Smyth].) Apropos of this, only a few weeks ago an interesting find was made, in a forgotten receptacle of an old court house at Inverkeithing (about a mile from the north end of the Forth Bridge), of a standard ell-wand "more than 500 years old."* This precious relic was to be sent to the Museum of the Society of Antiquaries in Edinburgh, but I have not heard whether our present Astronomer Royal, or other expert, has yet examined it scientifically. In connection with the locality and supposed date of this "find," I may mention a curious piece of information given by Robert Chambers in his "Picture of Scotland" (1828)—namely, that tem. Alexander III. (1214-1249), "when Scotland was in a very prosperous state and enjoyed much commerce with the continental countries, a project was formed by some wealthy Jews to establish a sort of new Jerusalem upon this piece of ground" [the small promontory upon which North Queensferry is built] "which should become in some measure an emporium of commerce, and be a city of refuge and a rallying point to their wandering nation. They proposed to fortify it, which could have been very easily done, and the bays on each side† were to have formed the harbours. The project was given up, probably on account of some jealous interference on the part of the Government. The promontory in question is called the Cruiks." This is a rather curious episode. The Jews in England about that time suffered very barbarous treatment under some of the Norman and Plantagenet kings, and perhaps some of them hoped to find a secure retreat from persecution in the territories of the then generally hostile kings of the Scots. Inverkeithing is an ancient Royal Burgh (having charters from David I. and William the Lion), and was of old a place of much importance and wide jurisdiction, its magistrates having a power of pit and gallows, and a right to levy customs over a district (north of the middle of the estuary) of 20 miles in extent every way. Here also David I. had a minor palace.

To return to coinage: Mr. Bradshaw would enhance the value of his late communication if he were enabled to furnish similar tables showing the sizes and weights of the coins of the United States and of some foreign nations as well. We do not deem the 1 inch diameter a British peculiarity, but rather expect it to prevail universally—a telling proof of the natural or scientific origin of that unit of length measure, and its pre-eminent handiness as the most useful mean size or diameter of a great variety of common articles besides coins; such as the handles of tools, implements, weapons, machines, walking sticks, etc.; ropes, rails, lathing, flooring, frames (as of chairs, pictures, etc.), postage stamps, breadth of railway and tramway tickets, keys of an instrument, thickness of books ("manuals"), and, in short, of whatever is meant to be held or wielded by the hand or fingers. In such cases as spheroidal door or bell-handles and playing balls—cricket, tennis, billiard, golf, etc., the inch will appear as approximate radius rather than diameter, and naturally so, when the object is one to be grasped in the palm. Perhaps Mr. Bradshaw can give the exact diameter of the four shilling piece, also of the Jubilee £5 and £2 gold coins.

Apologising for the length of this letter, dealing as its does with points of only minor importance,

I remain, your constant reader, JAS. SIMPSON.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—The following is from the Weekly Rangoon Times and Overland Summary, page 5, Dec. 9th 1895. Our distinguished American visitors. "It is astonishing," Mr. Burden remarked, "how much has been done by the British since they have annexed Upper Burma, and how that spirit of uneasiness and unrest which was said to exist has vanished and peace and security taken its place. We were surprised when we got up there, and our thanks are due to Captain Browning, the Deputy Commissioner of Mandalay, for much of the enjoyment we had there. The Burmese people see that they are being fairly and squarely dealt with by the British, and that is all they want. 'To my mind this is one of the most interesting places we have yet seen in our trip round the world."

THE OLYMPIC GAMES.

THE Olympic games are producing nothing very wonderful in the way of athletic records, and yet even at this second or third-rate meeting the Anglo-Saxon element prevails. Out of eight events yesterday, seven were won by British or American competitors, and the eighth by a Dane. The modern Greek has not yet managed to "come off." The solitary Greek competitor to get placed yesterday was M. Gouskos, who put the weight 35ft. 10in., but was only second to an American with 36ft. 5in. These are the practical equivalents of the metric measurements given. But if the Olympic games are to take any place in international athletics, the English scale of feet and inches will have to be adopted. —St. James' Gazette, April 8th, 1896.

ISRAEL'S QUEEN!

MAY THE TWENTY-FOURTH.

THE God of mercies spares to bless
His chosen Israel, Israel's Queen!
Of David's seed and royal line;
Whose rule is that of righteousness:
Whose sceptre sparkles with the sheen
Of purity—and e'er shall shine
In her lovèd hand
Throughout the British fatherland
A third of the terrestrial orb—
Whose welfare her best thoughts absorb.
We hail with joy her natal day,
And to high heaven devoutly pray,
Her life so good, beyond compare,
Her peerless life to Britain spare
For many, many years to come,
To grace the throne, and guard the home;
And guide with wisdom every State
Within the Empire ever great—
Greater than Alexander's realm,
Guarded by conquering spear and helm;
Greater than Rome! whose eagles' wings
Struck terror to the hearts of kings,
And led them captives by the neck
Beneath the bays, that knew no check.
Four times as large as his whose sway
Was universal sovereignty—
Persia's Darius, he whose mace
Governed, he boasted, every race.
But these were Empires built on sand,
And such can never, never stand—
Ours is on rock! and God-bequeathed,
With heaven's eternal laurels wreathed;
A consecrated chosen one!
Stamped everywhere as Israel's own;
And it shall grow, and grow, and grow,
Till long degraded Judah come
And find in it their long lost home.
Whilst from Victoria's glorious reign
O'er island, continent, and main,
To every tongue and people free
Where floats the flag of liberty
Shall constant blessings ever flow.

OUR POLICY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR CHAMBERLAIN'S famous speech in the House of Commons, on our policy in South Africa, on May 8th, laid it down distinctly that it was a peace policy, but not one of war. War was out of the question, but we had two chief aims before us, and these we must achieve in some way or other. The first was to preserve our position as the paramount State in South Africa. The second to bring about union and concord between two great European races which inhabit that country. We had maintained our position as the paramount Power in South Africa, as well as in India, by a lavish expenditure of our blood and treasure for long periods of time. Especially as regards the Transvaal, by surrendering that country to the Boers after a severe check from them, in order "to avoid bloodguiltiness," and to persuade the latter that we desired peace, but not war. The policy was of course totally misunderstood. For the Boers thought we surrendered to them because we were beaten in battle, and had nothing to oppose their victorious troops after the affair at Majuba Hill. The consequence is, that they now do not understand our claim to be the "paramount Power," but rather imagine that they are in that position; and if they tried, would rule South Africa from Cape Town to the Zambesi and beyond. How this inveterate error is to be cured, is past men's understanding, seeing that the Boer is ignorant and vainglorious, and our own policy is hardly that of this world, but of a people averse to self-assertion, meek and very mild, opposed to war, and ready to offer to the Boers the left cheek after the right was smitten at Majuba Hill, and at Krugersdorp just lately, during Dr. Jameson's foolish raid.

In short the point is this, that without going to war with the Boers again, we are resolved to make them believe that we are better men than they, and entitled to the position of the paramount Power in South Africa. Of course, in India the question has ever been the same. We have claimed over and over again to be the paramount Power there, and the claim has been always disputed and denied by the native princes of South India, of Central and Northern India, by the Mahrattas, the Sikhs, the Burmese, the Scindis, the Bengal Sepoys, and by the Afghans, as now by the Boers. We have usually exhausted all the means in our power, short of war, to show our enemies that they were wrong and we were right in regard to our paramount position in the Indian Peninsula. But somehow, this gentle persuasion never succeeded, and we have in pretty nearly all cases been forced at last to show those who opposed us, that since we were not going "to clear out" for them, they had to submit to the sheer force of our arms. Among native opponents in other parts of Africa the same process is going on at this very moment. The Dervishes of the Soudan do not admit our supremacy in Upper Egypt, or on the Red Sea Littoral. The Arab slave dealers of Nyassaland, and Arabi Pasha in Egypt itself, had all to learn the lesson we offer to teach the Boers in respect to British supremacy; but we do not know a case in which they seemed willing to learn it without battle and war, defeat and submission to superior force, on land and sea! It seems to us that in order to avoid a war of races, Mr. Chamberlain is going to attempt the almost impossible, and to persuade by gentle means what the Boers, who know no better, will not concede—namely, that the British are stronger than they, or deserving of national supremacy, when facts have proved to them, in General Colley's case, and now in Dr. Jameson's, that we are the inferiors in war to the 40,000 Boers, the victors. Mr. Chamberlain seems confident of success, and we hope his efforts will not prove abortive. It is true that President Kruger, though willing to obtain German sympathy and German guns and gunners to support him, seems strangely as unwilling to provoke a quarrel as he is to give satisfaction to the unoffending Uitlanders, the origin of all the trouble. He may be waiting till he feels stronger for the contest, or sees his way to do without his discontented

British subjects. The fact remains, that while we are hard pressed on his frontier by the Matabele rebellion, he has made no hostile sign, but contents himself with having British officers and officials sentenced to death for rebellion, and then reprieves them, commuting their punishment to enormous fines and long years of imprisonment by way of national satisfaction. The path is dark and uncertain along which this proud nation of ours is travelling to-day; but as yet no impatience is exhibited on our side, but our law-abiding race is willing to proceed where God is leading us, and go where He tells us we must follow Him. The difficulty consists in the fact that the Boers have had no experience of our national power, and really do not believe in it. At least they believe their own is superior! How then are we to maintain our position as "the paramount Power," see that our countrymen are offered by the Boers some sort of liberal treatment, and then persuade them to live with us on equal and cordial terms? They deny the first, refuse the second, and scorn the last! To man these difficulties seems well nigh insuperable! Not so to God! We invite our readers to watch and see how all this will end! It will bring peace and advancement to Israel at last we feel sure; and we shall find that all these troublesome events have been needed to enable us to arrive at the conclusions Mr. Chamberlain has been aiming at; and that therefore it will be ours, after all, to praise the Lord for His goodness to His people Israel.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION AT EXETER HALL ON MAY 7TH.

The Chairman's Speech at the Evening Meeting.

Ladies and Gentlemen,—When we met in the afternoon, I then made certain remarks upon our work in Scotland that it will not now be necessary that I should repeat; but I may again say that I am presiding at to-day's meetings by the invitation of your committee, and that we in Scotland recognise in this step a desire for more work, and that in unison of aim, on behalf of this great subject, which seems laid upon us by the leadings of our heavenly Father; and we rejoice that men should be made willing, by His constraining power upon them, to come forward and declare the faithfulness of His promises made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

We believe we are come to a period of time that the Bible speaks of as "the latter days"—a time which is acknowledged by all prophetical writers as full of events of grave import—events that are fast fulfilling what has been written of old, and proving the truth of our Bible, not only by what we read therein, but that even the very stones are speaking out. We read of a city in Egypt, discovered in 1887, called "Tel-el-Amarna," containing tablets of date 1480 B.C. This city is a library of knowledge upon the past; it is one hundred and eighty miles south of Cairo. And, following upon that, we have other places opening up to view, and the light of the sun and the light of intelligence is thrown upon what has been for ages hidden, till God's time had come for these to be shown in evidence of the past. In the Jewish Chronicle of April 10th we read of what Mr. Flinders Petrie says of his recent excavations in Egypt. He said that the most important and interesting result of these excavations lay in the record, now discovered, of a connection between Egypt and the people of Israel. This was the first time that any mention of the Israelites in any form had been found on Egyptian monuments. Here we had the cardinal fact that Merenptah fought the people of Israel, apparently in Palestine, at about 1200 B.C. This enormous tablet—for its size, the length of its inscriptions, its completeness, and the unique importance of it to Biblical history—was one of the most notable monuments ever found. It will shortly be placed in the museum at Cairo, along with the statue of Merenptah. The hymn says:—

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

But to Him, not mysterious; all His plans emanate from the great Godhead, who doeth all things well. Let us use these evidences, as much as lieth in our power, and so uphold the truth of the Bible by making clear what may appear mysterious. This love of God, in the election of Abraham and his seed to great temporal blessings—besides spiritual blessings—we would press upon your attention with all urgency. It is not to be dreamed upon; it is to be laid hold of and acted upon. Let us stand upon our feet "an exceeding great army" of men and women, acknowledging our highly favoured position before God and the Gentile world, and claim our rights conferred upon us by His oath.

We of the Ten-tribed and the Two-tribed Israel are not (see Whittaker for 1896, "British Empire") Gentiles. We are a chosen people, an elect people. For what, then, are we chosen and elect? Not to nurse pride or vanity because of such election. Nay, verily, but as that election in these promises is true (Isa. xliii. 21), so is it also true that we ought to walk humbly, seeking to do the will of God in glorifying Him. Ought we not to cast aside all doubts and unbelief that may exist, and nobly accept our position, and show our colours, and work under this banner of truth? Let every man and woman present pioneer each a way in distributing literature, and so disseminate this great truth of God, and cause our countrymen from Land's End to John-o'-Groats to know who they are.

You may say, "How is that to be done?" I will tell you how, for I have done it: not from any oratorical gifts that I possess; for I am, like Moses, a man slow of speech. But let each soul present take his or her Bible, and a copy of the "Handbook" (costing one shilling)—these two books—and gather in your homes a few friends fortnightly, and read one chapter only of the "Handbook," beginning at the first chapter, and turning up every reference to the Bible quoted, reading the full Bible text referred to, and soliciting remarks from all present. Make up your mind to do this steadily for six months, on a certain fixed day of the week, and with prayer for divine aid and His Holy Spirit's enlightenment as you go on; and at the end of that time you will feel that you cannot cease, but must proceed with further search into the faithfulness of your loving God and Father. If one hundred homes will do this—and I pray God that it may be so—and God's blessing being continually sought for, would there not be an awakening of those "dry bones" that ought to be living, and working, and testifying that the Bible is a living Book—living as never thought of before. We are honouring God in such a work; we are opening up the Bible to our countrymen; we are inducing men to read and to learn that the whole Bible is a living Book for every day of our life, for the past, and for the future.

We have missionaries to tell of the love of God in Christ Jesus to the heathen. That is one of the signs of Our Identity. Would that everyone in our country would believe in these promises referred to, and we should be more a missionary nation to the Gentiles than we are.

Is my appeal to be in vain, or is there increased action in this work to arise from this meeting? Is it necessary that I should press this question? Surely not. It is profoundly interesting, as well as it is our duty to search the Scriptures concerning it. I appeal to you as Christian men and women; I appeal to you as of the seed of Abraham; I appeal to you as part of that vision of Ezekiel's hitherto "dry bones," now about to stand up an exceeding great army of men and women under the banner of Israel, the banner of our Lord and King. His is the kingdom and His is the kingship—the Prince of the House of Judah. We look for the coming of our Lord, and when He shall reign whose right it is.

Ladies and gentlemen, we have come to the close of our annual gathering of the British-Israel Association. We have heard of the truth of God's faithful promises to Abraham and his seed, and of the fulfilling of these gracious promises in days past, present, and to come. That not one of these promises shall fail is sure—as sure as there is day and night and the ordinances of heaven. This is God's oath (Jer. xxxi. 35—37).

Well, my friends, with these unconditional promises of our faithful heavenly Father before us; with a knowledge even from the daily press, as well as your own personal observation, of events evolving politically, showing that we are a very wonderful race, and confessed by all the nations of the earth to be so; our nation a mother of nations, and envied by all the Gentile nations, which the other nations are—knowing thus our position, shall we pass into another year of your Society, and, if God spare us, pass out of it twelve months hence as we are this day, if such were possible? for would not that be retrogressive rather than progressive? Or, shall we have made a great effort, by every means in our power, to enlighten our countrymen, and thus draw nearer and nearer to that day of union with our brethren of the Two-tribed Israel, the Jews, and be thus forwarding the fulfilment of the prophecy in Ezek. xxxvii. 19 of the two sticks becoming one?

We cannot do this alone. We can, however, be willing instruments in God's hands. Shall we be so? We can cry on our knees to Him, and say, "Lord, make us willing in this day of Thy power—willing to be active servants of Thine, in showing forth Thy wonderful faithfulness to Thy chosen people Israel. Lord, we beseech of Thee, remove the blindness that is upon our countrymen, upon Thy long-lost Ten-tribed Israel, and may their awakening be so rapid that we shall be as a nation born in a day."

In evidence that the "Ten Tribes of Israel" were not absorbed among the Jews, as some say, we have these two prayers, prayed every Monday and Thursday by our brethren the Jews, for themselves and for us, and these prayers are: for the tribe of Judah:—

"May it be acceptable in the presence of our Father who is in heaven, to cause us to hear the good tidings of salvation and comfort, and that our dispersion may be gathered from the four corners of the earth; and let us say, Amen." I am sure that everyone here will join in this prayer, and say Amen with our brethren of Judah. For Israel they pray thus:—

"May the Omnipresent have mercy upon our brethren, 'the whole House of Israel,' who may be in trouble and captivity, whether between the seas or on the dry land, and bring them forth from trouble to enlargement, from darkness to light, and from subjection to freedom—now, speedily, and in a time near at hand, and let us say Amen."

You will, I have no doubt, join in the spirit of this prayer for the "whole House of Israel," the Ten-tribed Israel, whom we believe we, the British, along with the Americans, are. How long this prayer has been uttered by our brethren, the House of Judah, for us, the House of Israel, I do not know; but I think it must have been from our captivity, so that will be 2,500 years fully, and in going over its petitions our hearts should be filled with gratitude to Almighty God: for we have been "brought out of trouble and captivity" experienced in centuries past for our idolatry, for we were "a stiff-necked and rebellious people." And "out of trouble to enlargement" God has indeed brought us; for we to-day are "the chief among the nations." And God has brought us from the darkness of idolatry to the light of His glorious Gospel in Jesus Christ, and from subjection to freedom—a freedom enjoyed by no nation upon the earth as it is in ours. And the prayer ends: "Now, speedily, and in a time near at hand, and let us say Amen." What does that mean? Does it not mean: If we are enjoying all those blessings, so long prayed for by Judah for us, that we and Judah should shake hands, and thus speedily become the one stick spoken of by Ezekiel (chap. xxxvii. 16 to end) that would take place? Shall it be so? or shall it not be so? Are we prepared to forward this union of the two sticks, or are we to be listless frustraters (if that can be possible) of God's designs of bliss. Blessing will follow the willing-hearted. Do we wish that blessing to descend upon us? or do we not? Every heart will respond, I am sure, in the affirmative.

THE "MELBOURNE AGE" ON BRITISH CONTROL IN EGYPT.

THE Melbourne Age of March 19 last, published some sensible editorial remarks on the subject of British control of Egypt and what has come of it. It is clear that we are there to stay, according to the Age. The nations steamed out of Alexandria Harbour on July 12, 1882, before the bombardment began, leaving the British to do the work alone. They did it alone, accordingly, and are entitled to stay in Egypt till their work is done. It will not be done for many centuries, and therefore, the country must remain under our protection for a long period, till, in short, we think fit to quit it. Writing of the present state of matters, the Age declares that the expedition towards Dongola now in progress, is a British expedition.

"That much the Government avows. Its ostensible and immediate object is to protect the frontier, and, whilst protecting British interests in Egypt, indirectly assist Italy under the reverses she has recently sustained. Rightly interpreted, however, it means more than that. It is an undemonstrative yet firm manifestation of British control in Egypt, and may be taken to signify her intention to continue the administration of Egyptian affairs. It affords one of many indications that when really pressed for a reply to the question, When does she mean to evacuate the country? her answer will be that she does not mean to evacuate at all. It is all very well for the German Emperor to say that Germany can only recognise the British in Egypt as a sort of police force for the protection of the interests of Europe. He surely forgets that the reason why England now stands alone in and controls the affairs of Egypt is because 'European' interests were abandoned on the day when the combined fleets of Europe left the British alone before the guns of Alexandria, and looked on from a safe distance while England bore the brunt of the struggle.

Digitized by Google

The Powers, Germany included, were invited to assist, but their respective 'interests' were evidently not deemed of sufficient importance to induce them to do so. England therefore went into action alone, not with the Quixotic intention of protecting the interests of Europe, but for the purpose of severely looking after her own, which outweigh five times over the interest of the rest of Europe all put together. By the restoration of law and order, and by the establishment of a stable government, a more equitable system of taxation and the suppression of official corruption and plunder, she has done much unthanked, it appears, for the interests of Europe whilst attending to her own affairs. But to pretend that she owes anything to the Powers for 'permission' to remain where she is, and to do the work of police in order to safeguard their small interests in Egypt, is arrant nonsense. For the rest, if any further justification for the 'occupation' were needed, it is to be found in a comparison between the condition of the people under native rule and what it has become under British control. Under no other régime, whether French, German, Italian or Russian, could Egypt have risen to the position she occupies to-day, for the simple reason that those Powers work upon a different system altogether.

"Of course it is understood that the Powers do not care two straws about the fellaheen, whether they be justly or unjustly governed, whilst as for their 'interests' in the country they are, as we know, capable of being compressed into small dimensions. What they desire is to oust England out of Egypt altogether, because they know its possession adds to the security of her Indian and Australian possessions, and for her Eastern trade generally. Eight out of every ten ships which pass the Canal are owned by British people, and their earnings help to make up the two hundred millions or so which constitute the annual national profit; whilst, on the other hand, Egypt, in the possession of any other Power, or of a native government subject to unfriendly influences, would be a standing menace to our Eastern Empire. Furthermore, recent developments in Turkey, and the underhanded intrigues of Russia in both Turkey and China, render it more imperative than ever that England should take a firm stand in Egypt. Such a course may precipitate a war. But war is imminent in any case, and is bound to come sooner or later; and if England is to hold her own amongst the nations now impatiently jostling each other it is next to impossible for her to avoid being drawn into it. It therefore matters very little what pretext may be seized upon for beginning the contest. The only actual certainty we have is that England's will not be the hand that applies the match. If she is destined to be one of the foremost in the conflict it will be because she is bound to resent interference in the management of her own affairs; and if she once becomes involved we may be sure that she will give a good account of herself."

We believe on Scriptural grounds that God means "by the hands of His people Israel" to inflict "His vengeance" upon Edom. If that name covers the Turkish Empire, which it probably does, it is quite conceiveable that some act of our nation (British-Israel) in Egypt will finally bring on the state of war which the nations so much dread, but is now near at hand. We do not believe, on the other hand, that we shall be nationally involved in war ourselves, since God has "ordained peace for us," as stated in Isa. xxvi. 12, R.V.

The speech which Lord Salisbury made on April 29, at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, at the Primrose League Grand Habitation Meeting, showed among other matters a reason why our stay in Egypt was likely to be a good deal prolonged. The Prime Minister spoke in a hesitating way about our leaving it at all, but clearly intimated that till the Soudan were restored to Egypt as we found it, we could not in honour withdraw. His lordship's words were these, as quoted in the Times on April 30th. He said, concerning "EGYPT.

"The only other matter on which I wish to say a few words is a question which interests us a good deal—namely, the question of the advance of troops in Egypt to Dongola. (Hear, hear.) I do not think there has been much difference of opinion in this country as to the expediency of the step which we recommended (hear, hear), but there has been a good deal of censure of it abroad, and it has been treated as though it were a method of putting off the final determination as to the destiny of Egypt, with the difficulty of which everyone is well acquainted. But I do not think that that accusation justly lies against it. Whatever our engagements with respect to Egypt may have been, whatever the solution may be which that most difficult problem shall ultimately receive, there seems to be no doubt that we were bound, sooner or later, before we resigned, if we were to resign, the trust that had been placed in our hands, to relieve Egypt of this fearful curse of savage incursion and domination which during our presence had been placed upon the people. (Cheers.) Remember, if at this hour we gave up Egypt we should not give it up as we received it. (Hear, hear.) We should, it is true, with respect to the northern half of it, give it up enormously improved in every circumstance which conduces to healthy social, commercial, and political life. (Cheers.) But we should only give up the half of the Egypt that we received. When we took Egypt over after the fall of Arabi the length of it measured by the Nile was about twice what it is now. Since that time, while we were there, half of it was taken away, and has remained since, as we know by the accounts of the prisoners who have escaped, under the most fiendish despotism that ever cursed any portion of the earth. (Cheers.) Should we be acting up to our trust, should we be justifying the confidence that has been reposed upon us, if we affected that our task was done whilst half the deposit that we received was subject to the fearful fate that I have described? Sooner or later we were bound, to some extent at all events, to restore the frontiers of Egypt as they were. I do not say that at any particular time that task was to be undertaken. The peculiar financial circumstances under which Egypt exists by international arrangement made it difficult to undertake that which, if Egypt had been free from all these trammels, would have been easy. It might be many years before our task was entirely accomplished, and no doubt the consideration for the dangers which both we and the Italians were exposed to from the Dervish advance had a large influence in the decision which we took; but when all this has been said, we have not been doing anything at variance with the trust we received or to make that trust longer than it otherwise would have been. On the contrary, we have been fulfilling one of its primary and most imperative articles, and until the frontiers of Egypt have been restored it could not be said that our period of influence there has been a subject of unmixed benefit to the population whom we desired to benefit. (Cheers.) Do not understand me to foreshadow any immediate advance to the south or to indicate anything with respect to military operations. That is not my business. I desire entirely to remove all suggestions of that kind from what I say; but what I wish is to show you that there has been no unfaithfulness, but rather a fulfilment of a pledge we were bound to regard in the measures which we have recently sanctioned."

All this circumlocution, and all this feverish anxiety to give no offence to anyone, but by no possibility to bring about a war in Europe, is on a par with the proceedings of Mr. Chamberlain, who treats President Kruger and the Boers as if they are our masters and we must be most cautious lest we give them cause for offence. We require from our Government that they shall so act that our neighbours shall respect us, but we do not see that it can be right to treat Mr. Kruger as if the British Empire depended on his good will, or that, meaning to stay in Egypt, we should be constantly reminding the continental world, and especially the French world, that we really mean to evacuate Egypt, but if they promise not to take offence, we do not wish to go just yet! If it is right for us and good for Egypt and the French, that we should go, let us be gone out of Egypt at once. But as we cannot go, with any justice to ourselves, to our Empire (to the South and East of the Red Sea), to our Colonies or to Egypt itself, we think it would be more manly and honourable to say so at once, and take the consquences. As the Lord is going before us and leading us in the way, as He led "Abraham and his seed for ever," we need be under no apprehension as to our personal safety. He has guaranteed that our proceedings shall prosper, and He will bring all His promised purposes to pass. It is ours to trust Him, and to act righteously and justly towards all, seeing that we are but a blind people, entirely dependent on our God's guidance and keeping, throughout our national career (Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.). "To Him be all the praise."

MR. H. H. PAIN'S ADDRESS AT THE BRITISH-ISRAEL ASSOCIATION MEETING.

As with that chapter in Ezekiel to which I have referred, so the first half of this chapter of Obadiah has doubtless already had one fulfilment. But, as I have already shown you, this prophecy of Obadiah dates about 597 B.C., whilst the Ten Tribes were exiled from their land about 740-721 B.C. Therefore, 150 years approximately after Ezekiel's prophecy, it is said: "The house of Jacob shall be fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau for stubble, and they shall burn them; and there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau." The house of Joseph is here referred to. Therefore, it could not refer to the past dispensation, for they were out of the land; hence, it must have a future application. (Applause.) I said just now that Manasseh represents America, and Ephraim represents England and her Colonies. If, therefore, you wish to speak of the two nations collectively, you would use the term House of Joseph. It is, consequently, a plain inference to my mind, that the two nations who are to inflict vengeance upon Edom are the English and American people. (Applause.) And as the Psalm lx. says, "Give us help against our adversaries, for vain is the help of man," we shall have to do that work alone.

Humanly speaking, it is impossible to tell what event may arise to bring about our interference with Turkey, but from the inference on that passage there can be no doubt that we shall have to do it. Our army, not being a military Power, would be incapable, in all probability, of carrying out that purpose. It will therefore, possibly, remain for the united Fleets of the English and American nations to appear at Constantinople, as the British Fleet has done once before, to turn Russia out, and then will come the end of Turkey. With the capture of Constantinople will be precipitated what is called for Constantinople is, after all, the crux of the Eastern Question. You will remember that our Saviour, when asked for "signs of the time of the end," declared: "Whereso-ever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together." I am of opinion that the carcase is represented by Turkey, whilst the eagles are the heraldic emblems of all the Great Powers, with the exception of England. They will enter into the struggle for "the sick man's inheritance." It will be interesting to contemplate what we may expect—on prophetical grounds—will be the outcome of the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire. So far as we can tell at present, the whole of Turkey in Europe will be distributed amongst the Foreign Powers, with the exception of Constantinople. That, we have a right to expect, will become a British possession by virtue of the promise to our forefather Abraham: "Thy seed shall possess the Gate of his enemies." Is it likely, considering that we hold the Gate of our enemies all over the world, that Constantinople, the Gate of all Gates, will not fall into our possession? Anyhow, we have the declaration of our Government that they will not interfere in this European Triple or Dual Alliance, or in other matters, until our interests are touched; and those interests have been defined in the House of Commons as Constantinople.

There now comes the question of what will become of the remainder of Turkey in Asia.

In considering that question it is well to bear in mind the promise to our father Abraham: "To thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates." If you glance at that map you will get a better idea than I am able to convey of what is included in the Promised Land. When I sat down to insert the different names which I wished included in those boundaries, I little realised how much it included. We will begin with Egypt. That, although nominally a Turkish possession, is practically British by virtue of our occupation. We are now sending an Expedition to conquer the Soudan, and we have three objects to attain, according to the declaration of Lord Salisbury. First, we undertook, after the defeat of Arabi, to put Egypt in a better position before we left it than when we found it. And Lord Salisbury pointed out, in answer to those carping Frenchmen, that Egypt's boundary was twice the length, measured by the Nile, of what it now is. Secondly, we want to do away with the Mahdi, and that dreadful cruelty which has destroyed, according to Slatin Pacha, eighty per cent. of the population of that country. Anyone who has read, as I have done, "Ten Years With the Mahdi," written by an Austrian Priest, will get some idea of the dreadful cruelty, desolation, and misery that has reigned over that land ever since we left it in the hands of the Mahdis. We now hope in the success of our arms to restore the Egyptian frontier to its original boundaries, and thereby in doing so to more effectively control the upper waters of the Nile. That is our bone of contention, practically, with France. She is doing her utmost to gain possession of it, but it has been declared in Parliament that we control the Nile by virtue of our occupation of Egypt. As I said, when I drew out that map, places were there which I never expected to find. One of them is Uganda. I little thought that Uganda is in the Promised Land. A railway is now being made there which will destroy slavery, and promote the welfare and prosperity of that country.

If you glance down the map, you will see that the British East Africa territory rounds off our possessions to the Indian Ocean. Therefore, I have had that coloured red, because everyone knows what red means—(hear, hear),—and it is only a question of time before we have the rest of it painted red. (Applause.) If you now follow me round by the Red Sea, you will notice that some of the land there is already in our possession, such as Aden, the Gate of the Red Sea. Then other places, including Suakin, Cairo, Alexandria, etc., where our troops are quartered. "Your valiant men shall be clothed in scarlet," the colour of our national uniform.

There is a singular passage in Jeremiah with reference to Edom. "The earth is moved at the noise of their fall; there is a cry, the noise whereof is heard in the Red Sea." I could not make out what the Red Sea had to do with the fall of Edom, but after some study of the map I discovered what the answer to that question was. You see there Mecca and Medina. Well, when the Mohammedan people there see the Sultan, the titular head of their religion, deposed, and his sovereignty destroyed by the British people, such an event will naturally produce great consternation amongst them. It is well, however, to recollect, that Her Majesty the Queen rules over quite as many, if not more, Mohammedan people than the Sultan of Turkey. (Applause.) And it was pointed out in the Standard last November, the matter being afterwards referred to in that excellent paper, the BANNER OF ISRAEL, so ably edited by our friend, Mr. Bird (my father in the faith), that we could not allow Arabia to fall into anybody else's possession but our own, when Turkey shall leave hold of the country. Otherwise, it would threaten our left flank to India. Arabia, therefore, in the ordinary course of affairs, will fall into our possession, and it will be the duty as well as the policy of Her Majesty's Government, to see that the holy places of our Mohammedan fellow-subjects are treated with the same respect as those of her subjects elsewhere. (Applause.)

We now turn to Armenia. What events will bring about our interference there time alone can show. But when we do get possession of Armenia it may possibly be the result of some agitation, or through a renewed outbreak of those dreadful persecutions which have so aroused the feelings, not only of the people of this country, but also of the people of America. If by some means we cannot at present foresee we go into occupation of that country—as we have done in Egypt—we shall thereby control the upper waters of the Euphrates in the same way as we now do of the upper waters of the Nile. It is declared by the prophet Isaiah, as also by the prophet Ezra, in reference to the restoration of Israel: "The Lord, with His mighty wind, shall He shake his hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dry-shod." In reference to Palestine, one of the signs regarded by Oriental Jews of the near approach of the return of the people is the making of railways in the Holy Land. The Holy Land, let me remind you, is one thing, whilst the Promised Land is another. The Holy Land is only a strip out of the whole, and is, of course, associated with our strongest feelings as Christians. In reference to railways that are already laid, or are in course of construction, the prophecy of Barak is a wonderful point, "Arise, O Jerusalem, and stand on high; and look about toward the East, and see thy children gathered from the East and the West by the work of the Holy One. For they departed from thee on foot, and were led away of their enemies, but God bringeth them unto thee in great glory. For God hath appointed that every high hill, and banks of long continuance shall be cast down, and the valleys filled up, that Israel My people may return in safety." With these events in course of fulfilment, the time for the restoration of the land cannot be far off.

We are told, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled;" and "The holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months." According to Mr. Dimbleby's computation, which I rather, though not absolutely, adhere to, those forty-two months, or 1,260 days, expire in the Spring of 1898. Therefore, the Turkish possession of the holy places may be expected to terminate about that time. But it does not follow, according to my idea, that Turkey as a whole will collapse; that may be spread over a long period of years. But the Jewish "seven times" of punishment expire in the year 1928; and it is a remarkable fact, that the time from the Creation until 1928 is bisected by the date at which Nathan the prophet promised to David that his throne would last for ever. I infer from that that the year 1928 will see the uniting of the two peoples, Judah and Israel, as one nation under one king in the land.

Troublous times are, undoubtedly, near at hand to bring about the alteration which we anticipate. But while the isolation of England, and the jealousy of other nations regarding her, are prominent phases of the present time, we will do well to remember, as I said before, that "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper."

To my mind, if there is one lesson to be learned more than another by the study of British-Israelism, it is the lesson of our believing and trusting in God. "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper." Therefore, the one great advantage of the spread of this truth is that it will relieve a great many people of a lot of political anxiety, and strengthen their faith in God on personal grounds. Those who do not realise our Israelitish origin will be deprived of the great pleasure and blessing of believing this.

I pray God that the time may not be far distant when the clergy, "the shepherds of Israel," following the example of their worthy brother on this platform, may preach with no uncertain voice that Lost Israel is found in the British nation. (Applause.) Then shall we all realise, both clergy and people, that truly God has been loving unto Israel. (Loud and prolonged applause.)

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN, M.P., ON OUR EMPIRE. . . "I devoutly wish and pray that we may, that the two great Anglo-Saxon nations may, go forward in continual peace and amity. Even without the United States the Empire of the Queen is an Empire such as the world has never seen, and which may satisfy the wildest ambition, and yet day by day it constantly grows, almost against our will—certainly without conscious action on our part; day by day our responsibilities and our obligations increase. But I confess that for myself I do not regret this manifest destiny of a great governing and colonising race. (Cheers). I believe that the people of this country will rise to a conception of their great task, and that they will maintain intact the heritage which was won for them by their forefathers, and that the honour and the interests of the Empire are safe in their hands."

WE are glad to announce that Mr. Joseph Bradley's valuable papers on "God's Promises to Abraham: to what extent have they been Fulfilled?" will be published in pamphlet form in the course of a few days.

THE EVANGELIZATION OF THE WHOLE WORLD.

In a late issue we alluded to "the best and easiest way to identify the Israel of God," and found that it was to discover the nation of modern times which has the God-given sign bestowed upon it of being "a blessing to all nations." Find a nation we said, fulfilling that destiny in very truth and thereby Israel is discovered. The fact that such a nation is discovered, and that nation our own, is established by the testimony of the Church Missionary Society in a leaflet issued by that body shortly before April 12th, 1896. It calls on all Christian Missionary Churches, but especially on those of our own people, to preach the Gospel to all nations, "because we who know the fact, that the Son of God came into the world to save men from sin," "are the very people who ought to tell those who do not know it." This we look on as a clear corroboration of Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20, that "the Lord hath shown," and is showing "His words, His statutes and judgments unto Israel," the British, "but hath not dealt so with any nation besides." The leaflet, too, points out distinctly to our race, that it is our special duty to carry the Gospel and preach it to all nations, and evangelize the whole world! We quote the leaflet below, because it is very important that our readers should see that the chief spiritual blessing which the inhabitants of the world were to receive from Israel, according to Isa. xxvii. 6 and Matt. xxviii. 18—20, is just that one which the Church Missionary Society, writing to British Christians of the present day, urges them to confer upon the nations by telling them of "the overwhelming fact," that "the Son of God came into the world to save sinners." This is a direct admission "blindly" made by the Church Missionary Society's Committee, but not less valuable on that account, that this our nation is Israel. The leaflet is to the following effect :—

"The Three Years' Enterprise.—What is it?

"1. What is this 'Enterprise'?

"The 'Three Years' Enterprise' is an effort to enlist more interest, sympathy, prayer, liberality, personal service, in a greater enterprise.

"2. What is the Greater Enterprise?

"The greater enterprise is the greatest of all enterprises, the enterprise in which, above all others, the whole Church of Christ ought to be engaged—the evangelisation of the world.

"3. Why the greatest? Why above all others?

"(1) Because our common sense tells us so. If it is true that the Son of God came into the world to save men from sin, it is obvious that all men ought to know such an overwhelming fact.

"(2) Because we who know the fact are the very people who ought to tell those who do not know it.

"(3) Because, after nearly nineteen centuries since the event occurred, at least one-half the population of the world have not yet heard of it.

"(4) Because to tell the world of the fact was Christ's farewell commission to His Church. This commission is recorded in every one of the five records of His farewell words spoken after His resurrection (Matt. xxviii. 18—20; Mark xvi. 15; Luke xxiv. 46, 47; John xx. 21; Acts i. 8). Of no other command of Christ can this be said. This one stands alone, with absolutely unique authority and solemnity.

"(5) Because the world must be evangelized—(not converted, but the Gospel proclaimed everywhere)—before the Second Advent (Matt. xxiv. 14).

"4. Why limit such an enterprise to three years?

"It is not so limited. It is to be prosecuted every year, every month, every day, until the end comes. Whatever is done for it in the three years should be done for it still in after years, or for whatever time, long or short, may elapse before the end.

"5. What then is the meaning of the three years?

"The Church Missionary Society has existed for ninety-seven years, In three years more it will have completed its first century. Such a period should be marked by special effort and prayer in behalf of the work in which it is engaged.

"6. Why date the three years from April 12th?

"Because on April 12th, 1799, the Church Missionary Society was established at a small meeting of godly clergymen and laymen in London. That day is therefore the Society's birthday; and on April 12th, 1899, will be the hundreth anniversary.

"7. What does the Church Missionary Society propose for the three years?

"(1) Review.—A comprehensive review of the Society's position and methods, particularly in the mission-field, with a view to the detection of weak points, the correction of errors, the application of the experiences of one Mission to the circumstances of another, the more effective distribution of forces, the inauguration of fresh plans.

"(2) Advance.—A large increase in the Society's evangelistic forces, (a) to strengthen and consolidate its Missions, (b) to develop and extend its operations, (c) to arouse the Christian converts to more active evangelistic effort themselves. To this end—(1) More missionaries; (2) More means for their maintenance.

"8. Who is to carry out these proposals?

"(1) The 'Review' will be the work of the Church Missionary Society Committee, the Missionaries, and other experts.

"(2) The 'Advance' shall be the work of all. Efforts will be made to interest in it (a) the clergy, (b) laymen of all classes, (c) school-boys, (d) women and girls of all classes, (e) children.

"2. What steps is the Society taking to promote this advance?

"(1) Members of the committee and others will visit large provincial towns and other centres, to confer with friends, to explain and commend the enterprise, to make and receive suggestions regarding it, and to address such meetings as may be arranged.

"(2) Special measures will be taken to reach the different classes. Laymen will go to the business men, young men to the boys, women to the women and girls, &c. Booklets and leaflets suitable for each and all will be issued.

"(3) A monthly letter giving the freshest news from the Missions, and regarding the three years' enterprise, will be issued, and sent free to all clerical or other friends who can make definite use of it for reading at prayer-meetings and other public or parochial or social gatherings, or even from the pulpit. In connexion with this, a register of prayer-meetings, whether missionary or general, is to be formed.

"(4) Offers of service for the mission-field, always invited and always welcome, will be called for with fresh urgency; and it is earnestly hoped that the Lord will enable His Church to give Him a worthy centenary contribution of living witnesses for Christ.

"(5) Freewill offerings in connexion with the three years' enterprise will be devoted to the maintenance of the Missionaries sent out in the three years. (a) Special contributions for this object are invited. (b) It is suggested that every friend who desires to help should 'put by him in store' some extra offering every Sunday, in accordance with 1 Cor. xvi. 2. (c) Individual friends, or families, or congregations, or Missionary Unions and the like, are invited to undertake the support of individual missionaries.

"Towards the end of the three years, the Society will put forth a list of special objects to which other thank-offerings can be appropriated.

"(6) The committee, desiring that not the Church Missionary Society only, but all Societies and Missions that preach Christ to the non-Christian world, should share in the advance,—and remembering that other great Societies will be celebrating their centenaries or bi-centenaries in the next three or four years,—are addressing all the Bishops of the Anglican Communion, and the heads of other Churches, Societies, and Missions, on the subject, not of the expansion of the Church Missionary Society, much less of its glorification, but of the evangelization of the world.

"10. How can you—how can I—take a personal part in the three years' enterprise?

(1) By fervent and frequent prayer.—A card is being issued, to stand always on a shelf or table, or to hang on the wall, "Please pray daily for the three years' enterprise." Prayers are being issued, for use at family worship and otherwise. Special subjects for prayer will be notified from time to time. But the one great topic for prayer is—a further outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all the people of God, that they may yield themselves and all they have to the Lord's service, that those whom He calls may be fitted for Missionary service and enabled to go forth, and that those who do not go may be willing to deny themselves for the support of those who do go.

"(2) By personal service.—Let each one ask, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?'—whether in the foreign field myself, or in pleading at home the cause of the foreign field. May not I form one of the centenary contribution of living witnesses for Christ?

"(3) By fresh and special freewill offerings.—Let there be self-sacrificing giving, systematic giving, joyful giving; for the Lord Jesus Himself said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

"11. In what spirit should we approach this Centenary period, and the close of the Nineteenth Century?

"(1) With deepest thankfulness, for all the goodness of the Lord to this and other Societies and Missions in the past hundred years; for the noble men and women He has sent forth into the field; for the tens of thousands of souls He has brought to Himself by their means.

"(2) Yet with deepest self-abasement on account of the inadequacy of our efforts, and of the neglect by the Church as a whole of her Lord's great command; and especially that each one of us, individually, has done so little, thought so little, prayed so little, for the evangelization of the world.

"12. How may the hundredth year, which will be the Society's Second Jubilee, and the Centenary Commemoration at its close, be made more joyful?

"This will largely depend upon the way we use the three years. Let every one of us so work and pray now, that when the second jubilee year, and the centenary day, come round, and the committee report (a) what has actually been done in the way of review and revision of our work at home and abroad, (b) what success has attended our efforts to influence all classes of the Christian public, (c) how many missionaries have been added to our forces, (d) how much has been given for their support, (e) what thank-offerings have been made to other special objects, or to the general missionary work, there may be abundant cause for the most fervent thanksgiving.

"To this end there must be individual work. When a regiment gets the word of command to 'march,' every individual soldier has to step out. If one remains standing still, the line is broken. Let each reader of this paper say now, quietly, humbly, resolutely, 'I will not be that one; I will go forward.'

"And there must be united work. The soldiers must keep step. Let our motto be, 'With one mind striving together.'

"'The God of heaven, He will prosper us; therefore we His servants will arise and build.'"

RANDOM SHAFTS.

THE Signal and Gospel Union Gazette is an organ of the Baxterian school, its Gospel being largely leavened with predictions of England's approaching doom. There was a time when the Gospel meant "Good news," and when a "Christian herald" was a messenger of joy. But the Gospel doled out by papers like the Signal is evidently designed to drive British citizens crazy, so it is fortunate that the average British citizen values the imposture at its proper worth. In this Signal for April 8th, there is an article from the trembling pen of one William A. Dickinson, whose mind must either have been unhinged to begin with, or deranged by the sanguinary tales of Mr. and Mrs. Baxter. Mr. Dickinson has no doubt whatever that Great Britain is fated to pass through terrible sufferings, for he has had dreams on the subject, and mysteriously hints that he has had more than dreams. "During the past two or three years the Lord has shown me in various ways that there will be an invasion of England by France and Russia in the latter part of the year 1897," which will "try the mettle of the nation" and result in disaster. But he does not expect the war to occur during the life of Queen Victoria, and we may therefore look for her Majesty's early decease.

Not only has Mr. Dickinson been personally favoured with visions, but many of his acquaintances have received a similar honour, although they would perhaps decline the honour with thanks if they had their choice. As to himself: "On one occasion I dreamed that I had to fly into a wood from the invaders of my country; apparently a wood near the town of Bromley, where I live. I seemed to be accompanied into the wood by a friend, to whom I remarked, 'The invaders are said to have landed on our shores 600,000 men, and we have only 200,000 to meet them.' Within the last few months several friends of mine in Bromley have had remarkable dreams. Last summer my present landlady had one in which she thought she was running in and out of deserted houses in Bromley, trying to hide herself from the soldiers."

Further, a "Christian friend recently dreamed that great posters were affixed to the walls warning people of a coming great war in England in 1897, and to save their property and lives in the coming struggle. A tradesman in this town of Bromley told me that a few months ago he also had a dream of the coming invasion, and thought he had to fly for his life;" in addition to which his (Mr. Dickinson's) sister-in-law has had a dream in which she was being chased by troops—presumably French or Russian. From this it would appear that the inhabitants of Bromley are principally engaged in running away, and if any reliance can be placed on these revelations, England cannot place much reliance on the inhabitants of Bromley.

But, we are asked, "Is not all this in accordance with the prophecy of Joel ii. 28, concerning the last days? 'I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh, and your old men shall dream dreams and your young men shall see visions.'" I think not. The promise of dreams is to old men; the promise of visions is to young men; and neither Mr. Dickinson's sister-in-law nor his present landlady can be properly described as men. Besides which, if the chapter is carefully scanned it will be found that this prediction affects the literal children of Israel. Consequently these astounding manifestations show that the residents of Bromley, and, inferentially, the people of the whole land, are Hebrews, in which case we have no connection with the ten toes, and nothing to fear from any hostile alliance. The fact that Bromley is "on the main road from Dover and Sevenoaks to London," may have a good deal to do with the prevalence of dreams in that neighbourhood, but in spite of this unpleasant proximity to the future scene of carnage I can assure Mr. Dickinson that if he will eschew Signal literature, and peruse the BANNER instead, his midnight apparitions will cease. I would suggest the same remedy for his landlady, and feel confident that a course of Identity reading will prove a complete cure for the Bromley fever.

As far back as ever I can go, Mr. Baxter has been appointing Antichrists, arranging ten-toed confederacies, and fixing dates for the destruction of the British Empire. What is the matter with the British Empire that he and his dupes are so bent on cutting it up? Its cardinal fault seems to be that its enormous size, wealth, and influence are inconsistent with a toe of the prophetic image. If, then, the condition of the Empire is altogether incompatible with the theory of its being a "toe," the natural conclusion would be that it is not a toe. But this will not do for Mr. Baxter, and he is determined that it shall most certainly resemble a toe, even if he has to break into pieces God's chief instrument for the regeneration of the world. Hence the stocks of war and invasion, defeat and disruption, which have formed his capital for at least a quarter of a century, and which are put forward as "fulfilments of prophecy," but are really required to repair the defects in his erratic interpretation of Daniel's image.

In the dim and distant past I can remember a gentleman of Mr. Dickinson's type lamenting that the country surrounding both of us would soon be covered with slain, but nothing worse than smiling parks and dignified terraces have taken possession of the ground. Since that period it would be hard to say how often Mr. Baxter's prognostications have been falsified or how often his fallibility has been publicly exposed. But the latest instance happened a month or so ago, and was related thus in a London daily. Mr. Baxter was holding forth at Southampton, and "at the first lecture a Mr. Worrall appeared and reminded the prophet that ten years ago he had appeared in the town and told a similar tale of woe, and on a challenge being given he had promised to pay £100 to the Royal South Hants Infirmary."

"Now," continued Mr. Worrall, "I want £100 for the infirmary on account of unfulfilled prophecies. The prophet Baxter called for evidence that he had made the promise, and Mr. Worrall said he would produce it the following evening. True to his word, Mr. Worrall appeared with a copy of a Southampton paper recording the fact, but the prophet was absent, and his substitute said that he had gone to Bournemouth on business. Mr. Worrall unkindly declared that the prophet had run away." After twenty or thirty years of this it is surprising that these alarmist views are able to obtain a solitary believer. And if there is another circumstance still more surprising, it is the unabashed manner in which Mr. Baxter corrects his dates, changes his antichrists, and faces the people with his old, old story. It is not merely astonishing but disgraceful. At first he might fairly be regarded as a sincere though mistaken expositor, but that has become impossible, and to unsettle the minds of men and women for gain is an offence against the common welfare.

LECTURES IN ENGLAND.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—This week's BANNER contains a digest of the Annual Report of the British-Israel Association, in which it is said that only 20 lectures and drawing-room meetings had been held in England during the year. Of course I understand that this refers to lectures given under the direct auspices of the British-Israel Association; and no doubt the majority of BANNER readers will also understand that. But there may be some, or many, who will conclude from this statement that 20 is the sum total of Identity meetings in England for the twelve months, and I do not think it would be good for either our friends or our opponents to form such an opinion. It is, perhaps, impossible to estimate the number of lectures in England, but Mr. Marchant alone has delivered a host, and from the Tweed to the Don—to go no further South—meetings take place continually throughout the season. Consequently it seems to me that for the sake of the public there should be a word or so in the reports to indicate that the operations of the British-Israel Association do not cover the entire field as far as England is concerned.

I am, dear sir, your faithfully,

J. G. TAYLOR

Newcastle, May 22nd, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR SIR,—In ruminating upon the subject of the return and reoccupation of the land, a somewhat peculiar aspect of the case has occurred to me. It is this—the re-occupation must be entered into by the whole of the people of Israel. We believers constantly affirm that the people of Judah and Israel must become united before such an event can take place. Now it is very strongly urged that Judah must seek and recognise her brethren of the Ten Tribes ere they can reach that "no more two nations" state so anxiously awaited; but what about Manasseh, our brethren the "great people" of the United States of America? May it not be equally necessary that they too should renew their allegiance to Israel's sovereign in order that the whole people should become one nation? I think the stick of Israel and his companions would lack somewhat of breadth or length were Manasseh left out of the number of companions. A strong offensive and defensive alliance between England and the United States of America has been talked about frequently, but, as yet, unofficially; such an object is a worthy aim, and were it brought into effect would do more toward consolidation of the British Empire than anything beside the federation of the colonies with the mother country. Just imagine the immense power such an amalgamation would produce! Truly if it were brought about, Israel would have a mighty Empire in population alone, and at the present time, it would be over 400,000,000! Yours truly, J. W. B.

Digitized by Google

Opunake, N.Z., March 6, 1896.

To the Editor of the "Banner of Israel."

DEAR PHILO-ISRAEL,—The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes (chief editor of the Methodist Times) is a strong Liberal. He freely indulges often in denouncing the acts and deeds of our present Government. At a great meeting in London, held recently, on the Armenian Question, Mr. Hughes said, "He considered Lord Salisbury and the Government were responsible for the 60,000 martyrs. If they had the courage of a mouse they need not fear the other Powers. Oh for a few days of Oliver Cromwell! for nations ought to die as murderers. The British Government have twice (said he) used their power to preserve and keep the Sultan on his throne, and allowed him to murder 60,000 innocent men, women, and children."

"All English Governments are degraded in the eyes of the civilised world by their persistence in holding Egypt in the teeth of repeated promises that our occupation of that country should be temporary. Come to some agreement (said he) with the great Powers respecting Egypt—that is, to give up Egypt. Then we might take the blood-stained Sultan, he added, by the throat."

Sir,—We all deplore the state of things in Armenia, but with Mr. Hughes' strong language I do not agree, though like him I belong to the Wesleyan Methodists. I am not disappointed that he did not allow the following letter to appear in the Methodist Times, sent by me to that paper:—

"Sir,—I read in the Methodist Times (April 2nd), the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes' remarks on Armenia. He appears to think that Lord Salisbury and the British Government are responsible for the 60,000 martyrs there, and that they ought to give up Egypt, and then take the Sultan of Turkey by the throat. I believe God's omniscient eye saw from the beginning this great loss of life, and that He will bring down His vengeance upon Turkey at the time appointed, and no nation or company of nations is able to pull down, or prop Turkey up beyond 'God's appointed time.'

"Christ referred to the breaking up of Turkey in St. Luke xxi. 24, when He said, 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down of (Turkey) the Gentiles until the time of (Turkey) the Gentiles be fulfilled.'

"St. Paul also referred to the breaking up of Turkey, when he said in Romans xi. 25, 'Blindness in part is happened to (the British) Israel, until the fulness of (Turkey) the Gentiles be come in.'

"The time of Turkey's reign is given in Rev. xi. 23: 'For it is given unto (Turkey) the Gentiles, and the holy city (Jerusalem) shall they tread under foot forty-two months=1,260 years.' Also Rev. xiii. 5, 'Power is given unto (Turkey) the beast to continue forty-two months=1,260 years.' Daniel vii. 25, 26, refers to the same time: 'And he (Turkey) shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his (Turkey's) hand, until a time and times and the dividing of time' (1,260 years). 'But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his (kingdom) dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end.' Also Dan. xii. 7 refers to the same time: 'It shall be given (to Turkey) for a time, times and an half' = 1,260 years. If the Turkish Empire and the Sultan are to reign until God's appointed time (1,260 years), Lord Salisbury and the British Government cannot break it up or prop it up, beyond the time appointed. I believe the time is near, even at the doors, and the British nation, no doubt, will be God's battle-axe to break it up. They will then have power and courage given from God, not only the courage of a mouse, but that of a lion, assisted by 'all the young lions thereof.' 'And I will lay My vengeance upon Edom (Turkey), by the hand of My people Israel (Britain), and they shall do in Edom (Turkey) according to Mine anger, and according to My fury' (Ezek. xxv. 14).

"Will the British continue in Egypt? I believe they will! It is not what man says, but what God wills. The British went there to deliver the poor in that nation from great oppression; sent, I believe, by Jehovah Himself. Read Isa. xix. 20—25. We are told in this chapter that the Egyptians 'will cry unto the Lord because of oppression, and the Lord will send them a saviour, and a great one, and this saviour, and great one will first smite Egypt, and then heal it.' The British smote Egypt first, and now are healing it, as stated in Isaiah.

"'In that day' (after having smitten and healed) 'Israel will be the third with Egypt, even a blessing in the midst of the land, whom the Lord of hosts shall bless.' If Great Britain be Israel, 'a blessing in the midst of the land' of Egypt, I am not surprised they continue there after repeated promises to leave. Men may promise, and nations envy us, and be offended; but when God says, 'Stop in the land' and blesses them, no Powers in the world combined can send Israel (Great Britain) out of Egypt. They are the saviours, the great one; God's Word (the Bible) says nothing in reference to our leaving Egypt. It appears they are to continue in the land to be a blessing. Charge not, then, the British Government because they continue in Egypt. I believe it is God's will they should remain! Do not fight against Him."

BRITAIN'S INTEREST IN THE EAST.

ON Monday evening an address was given in the Town Hall, Bromley, by the Rev. W. M. H. Milner, M.A., upon the above mentioned subject. The chair was taken by Mr. H. H. Pain, and was supported by Mr. R. A. Whytlaw. The first portion of the rev. gentleman's discourse dealt with the British advance in the Soudan, the Italian disaster in Abyssinia, the Franco-Russian alliance, and also contained some hints from Obadiah on the collapse of Turkey. The lecturer dealt with the political aspects of these occurrences, and gave his views, deduced from Daniel and Ezekiel, as to the final spread of the British Empire, identifying the British nation with the Lost House of Israel. In the second section of the address, Mr. Milner gave some substantial reasons for believing that the promised land was Britain's by right. He pointed to the spread of British rule over land and sea, and to British success in Africa. There was no other nation either that had befriended Armenia to the extent England had, and there was no other nation which observed the Sabbath as the English nation did. There was nothing to show that it was Sunday in Paris, or even in Germany, where the Emperor had tried to get Sunday observed as in England, but he was unsuccessful. He discredited the statement that the English language was derived from the German, and contended that it was much more the other way round. England had to recognise the terrible responsibility which rested upon her, for she had a great power to exercise for good or ill, which no other nation had before her. He did not mean by this that they should have racial pride, which was only a snare. A vote of thanks to the Rev. W. M. H. Milner was proposed by Mr. H. H. Pain and seconded by Mr. R. A. Whytlaw, and a collection was taken as the audience left.—From The Bromley Chronicle.

AT the Royal Military Tournament now being held at the Royal Agricultural Hall, London, till June 11th, are to be seen representatives of most of our Indian and Colonial regiments, who have been sent to this country to take part in this exhibition of the Imperial Army. To witness this tournament is an education, and will enable those who see this display to form some idea of the splendid body of well-drilled troops that India and the Colonies can now supply, should occasion arise, to assist in the protection of our Great and Imperial Empire.

"THE EMPRESS OF AFRICA."

THE Argus of Melbourne, dated February 17th last, published an extraordinary sermon by the Rev. D. Clement Scott on "Modern Missionary Methods." Speaking of Blantyre in South Africa, where he had laboured as a missionary, he said:—

Blantyre had been made an object-lesson in industries and in politics and in native results; he hoped she would become an object-lesson in philosophy, in theology, in Christian ethics to the united Church, which he described as slowly opening her wearied eyes upon her new daughter. His aim in Blantyre was to create a native civilisation instinct with Christian life, and build up a native Church able to take an intelligent part in the progress of civilsation in that great land. For that reason the mission was an industrial one. The natives were taught building, carpentry, printing, gardening, coffee-planting, laundry work, cattle rearing, dairy work, brick-making, wood-carving, architecture; the deacons were taught philosophy, science, politics, and Greek. Africa, in spite of the slave trade, had not been killed, and, with such help as the missions could give, was inhabitable. She was worth the expenditure laid out upon her; had stored up in her memory, not the formulas of history, but the resultant life of long experience. She was a nineteenth century product, able to take in and use and give out all that civilisation had to give her. Interest in this could not interfere with any other interest, any more than family love hindered love and loyalty to Queen and country. He desired that the Queen should be not only Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Mother of the Federated Colonies, Empress of India, but Empress of Africa as well, and, through the unity and inspiring of a Church united in this great work, Defensor Fidei in a way hitherto unparalled.

Mr. Scott quite expresses as an aspiration what we believe to be a certainty—namely, that in the future—sooner or later, we know not which—the Queen's dominions "will cover the earth as the waters also cover the sea." Just as we write matters are looking rather dark in Africa; for, independently of the trouble in the Transvaal, which is not yet settled, we have the Dervishes to deal with in the Soudan, where they are going to make a supreme effort to recover Suakim, Sinkat, and Tokar; besides the very serious native insurrection in the Matabele regions, where Dr. Jameson's unhappy raid has brought on consequences he little anticipated. There a state of things not unlike the Indian Mutiny has arisen, which will demand all our military strength to put down. Meanwhile, the miserable trial of Dr. Jameson and his brave, but mistaken, misguided band, is dragging its slow length along in London, and will occupy months before the end of it can be reached. What further information the Government here expects to obtain from it, we hardly can realise. The facts are well known; and the motive for "the raid" has been stated over and over again. It remains only "to punish" the unfortunate raiders, according to the expectation of President Krüger. What measure of punishment will satisfy him we do not know; and it seems rather a new thing to punish our own people in order to please foreign statesmen. It surely is apparent, that by disgrace and public dismissal from honourable employment, Dr. Jameson and his lieutenants have been heavily visited by the Government of this land already. What more does the case call for? To add to the trouble he has suffered no doubt Dr. Jameson has upon his conscience the fact that the present native insurrection was directly caused by his terrible defeat in the foolish armed invasion of a foreign territory, which was at peace with his Sovereign the Queen. The public interest in the trial is almost exhausted already, and before the Matabele rebellion has been put down, no one will feel, we believe, the faintest interest in the decision of the Court which is to try the issues.

Meanwhile, we anticipate that the troubles in the Chartered Company's domains are destined to work out events relating to our national destinies as yet hidden from our eyes. It may be that the large force of all arms which must speedily be collected in the Chartered Company's territories will serve by and by to bring it home to President Krüger's mind that the British must have the upper hand as the paramount Power in South Africa at last; and that it will be far better for him and the Boers to live at peace with us than to bring on a state of war and the final subjugation of the Boers as its deplorable but necessary issue.

It is a comfort to know that the Lord has all our matters in hand, and will guide us safely out of our many present difficulties, because we are His people, His chosen. Already as we write there are symptoms that the disturbance is rapidly cooling down in more directions than one. The Germans may not detest us less, but they are anxious to show that after all they did not wish to interfere in the affairs of the Transvaal. Venezuela is not heard of much now, and there are signs that the brethren in Manassehland are willing to forget their rash movement, which they assure us never contemplated war.

The Matabele rebellion, it seems, is confined to one or two spots only, and is well in hand. There is a sad loss of life in solitary stations, where the natives had the upper hand, as in the Indian Mutinies. The loss of British, or Dutch adults, has reached already at least 200 by murder, pure and simple. But it is hoped that the tide is turning, and with reinforcements hurrying to the scene, the crisis should soon be passed without help from "home." There is no doubt that the British Queen is already the owner of the largest portion of Africa. There is no desire on her part, or that of her British subjects, that she should become the Empress of the whole of Africa. But we believe that what has happened in India, in Canada, and in Australasia will happen also in the great Dark Continent, and that, in spite of their wishes, the children of Israel will be called on finally to assume the reins of government over the whole Continent, and give down-trodden Africa good government and civilistion founded on the Gospel and the Bible as part of the inheritance already promised to them by gift of God—namely, "the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven." To the Lord be all the praise, who is leading our blind nation in Person, according to His promise in Isa. xlii. 16, R.V.!

CONSTANTINOPLE A "BURNING MOUNTAIN."

SIR ARTHUR COTTON'S remarkable letter published on page 204, on May 6th last, regarding the probable fate of Constantinople, has brought the Rev. J. McIntosh, of Sacriston, Durham, forward to remind us that he has always held the view expressed by Sir Arthur. He adds that on p. 72 of last year's BANNER, he distinctly showed that Constantinople is destined to become "a burning mountain." "My own opinion," he says, "is that both Rome and Constantinople (new Rome) will be overthrown together and that the Beast and the False Prophet will come to an end together."

Mr. McIntosh's words, on p. 71, were these: "Some of your readers may recall to mind the articles written in 1876, showing that Britain must have the Straits of the Bosphorus. This acquisition to our Gates looks more probable now than ever. At the same time we come to the conclusion that Constantinople will not fall into the hands of any Power, but that it will be utterly destroyed by fire, and that some tremendous shock, either of earthquake, or volcanic action, will hurl it to the ground, while Britain will take possession of the water-way as her Inheritance. 'They shall possess the Bosphorus' (Obed. 20). It is well known that among the Turks a very small number belong to the ruling or Moslem (Moslem may possible be derived from Hebrew, signifying 'ruling') part of the nation. The great majority are called the Rayas, or Flock, who are chiefly members of the Greek Church. When, therefore, the Moslem Turk is destroyed in 'the City of Strength,' the Rayas, or Flock, will join themselves to Britain, and place themselves under the protection of her wings, against the ravages of the northern colossal bear, which now seeks a pretext to lay hands on the much coveted water-way that he may make the Black Sea a Russian lake."

In regard to Mr. McIntosh, and Sir Arthur Cotton's views as to the future of Constantinople, views that many others share (L. P. for instance), we are not aware that even if the town and promontory on which "the Strong City" is built be destroyed by fire and rendered uninhabitable by man, that that fact could militate against our conception of "the Gates" of the world. The Straits would still constitute the Gate of the Russian house, and the Czar would endeavour to occupy them with some fortified place on the southern shores of the Bosphorus or the Dardanelles. That narrow sea is the true "Gate" which we believe would constitute the one which Russia wants, but which God has promised to Israel, to force Russia to seek an outlet to the Mediterranean through the Holy Land and Egypt, where a partial success, we know, is to be followed by the final destruction of Russia as an empire, at the hands of the Lord God Himself.

However that may be, we hope our readers will turn to and peruse the Rev. Mr. McIntosh's article on pp. 70—72 of the BANNER of 1895, vol. xix., entitled "Edom shall be a Possession." Sir Arthur Cotton clearly had forgotten or perhaps never read the article in question, which, like all the writings of our reverend friend of Sacriston, Durham, is a thoughtful anticipation of coming events which probably is not far from the truth. There is danger, no doubt, in predicting from prophecy. But the events which will lead to the final collapse of Turkish-Edom are close at hand, even at the doors; and we think the reverent treatment of the subject by one so capable as our correspondent in Durham must be as profitable to the reader as it is interesting.

One of the Rev. J. McIntosh's articles, to be found on p. 471 of vol. xiii. of the BANNER, attracted attention in 1889, when it was written; but we fear has been overlooked and forgotten now. We think we do service to the cause of British-Israel by reproducing it. It is entitled, "Let My Name (Jacob and Israel), Be Named on Them" (Ephraim and Manasseh). (Gen. xlviii. 16). By the Rev. J. McIntosh, Vicar of Sacriston, Durham:—

"As the British people have been conclusively shown to be the descendants of Jacob, or Israel of the Ten-Tribed kingdom, it may be proper to consider whether we can trace the fulfilment in our race of all the prophecies relating to such a people.

"The history, character and dwelling-place of this people are strikingly in harmony with Holy Scripture. No one who will take the trouble to compare our history with what is foretold of Israel, and consider our character, as a Christian, philanthropic, liberty-loving, commercial, brave, colonising, and fruitful people, but will be led to acknowledge our right to claim an interest in the promises to Israel.

"We possess all the marks of Israel. But it may be asked, Have we got the name? Yes, in this we satisfy the requirement as perfectly as in any other. We bear the name of our father Jacob and Israel in so many ways that it admits of no dispute. Ecclesiastically, we acknowledge in the Coronation service that we are Israel. 'In the third Collect for Good Friday, we claim to be the 'Remnant of the true Israelites.' In our Liturgy we acknowledge ourselves as God's people, yea, His chosen people. Privileges these, which only Israel could truly claim!

"But we are possessors of another name, which leaves no doubt as to Our Identity with the sons of Jacob. It has been shown how that ecclesiastically we claim to be Israel, and now we will furnish evidence to prove we are called by the name of Jacob. It is well known that our CORONATION STONE is called 'Jacob's Stone.' We have also the ENSIGN of the House of Israel in our Union Jack, Jack being an abbreviation of Jacobus or Jacob.

"But is there any other way by which we may be recognised as the sons of Jacob? Yes, we have the name of JACOB stamped upon our Empire indelibly, in possessing the extremities or ends of the earth—Jacob signifying the end, extremity, extreme or utmost parts. Thus are we Jacob in a way that cannot be contradicted, nor misunderstood, seeing we have the geographical stamp of Jacob.

"The name of Jacob is also deeply written upon our character, as the Supplanter. Who is it that supplants others? who makes the desolate cities of the Gentiles to be inhabited? who succeeds other nations? Who has supplanted France, Portugal, Spain, Holland, &c., in the possession of the islands and coasts of the earth?

"Truly we are rightly named Jacob, in that we have supplanted so many nations.

"We have, moreover, the name of Jacob in its proper and ordinary way. We are known to the Continental nations as Jacob. What is the name of our Court? never mind how the name first arose, we need not stay to speak of that. How is it that the name of Jacob adheres to us, and fixes itself upon us in so many ways? Our Court is known as that of St. James, but James is the equivalent of Jacob, and when the name James is translated into the language of the continental nations, we are known as possessing Jacob's Court. Hence the followers of the Pretender were called Jacobites.

"Here then we are fulfilling another promise of Scripture identity.

"We have the Court, the Palace, the Ensign, the Coronation Stone, the Character (Supplanter) and the Stamp of Jacob. Surely there is perfect agreement here! How wonderful it all appears, that we should possess so many marks of Jacob, and yet never see them! Let us, then, fellow-heirs, rejoice in Him who is the God of Israel, and who ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth."

We reproduce the above because, as Mr. McIntosh observes in a recent letter to us, "the article has staggered many unbelievers;" and because from observation it is clear that "the mere statement of a new truth, once made, does not take with the people or produce any effect, unless it be placed before them again and again." We are much in favour of the scriptural principle of "again and again," and think it will be wise to unearth some other of Mr. McIntosh's lucid articles, and present them again to our readers who may have forgotten them, in the rush and hurry of modern times.

SIR HERCULES ROBINSON has arrived, and is staying at the Albemarle Hotel. He hopes to return to South Africa in three months. Lieut. Sloff, grandson of President Kruger, and other Dutch and British witnesses in the Jameson case, have also arrived.

"EPHRAIM HATH MADE MANY ALTARS TO SIN."

THE words of Hosea viii. 11 have at the present time a very solemn warning to convey to our Church and nation. "Because Ephraim hath multiplied altars to sin, altars have been unto him to sin" (R.V.) The verse points to a radical defect in Ephraim's conduct and character, from the earliest times to the present, showing a desire to sacrifice to God for the pardon of sin in a way contrary to the commandment and prescription of His laws, statutes, and judgments, presumptuously offering strange fire to the Lord, and pleading for acceptance in a way He has forbidden. His altars were many, and they tended to sin; therefore, his besetting sin should ever be in the direction of the sacrifice required for the atonement for sin, the altar being not God's, founded on the precious blood of Jesus only, but on all sorts of forbidden altars, the propitiation being not the body and blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, but some other unlawful substitute, the prayers of so-called saints, of the so-called "Mother of God," of works of supererogation, self-torture, and penances of human device, and the like.

At the present moment the churches of our land are occupied, to a large extent, by clergy who boast of their High Church views, which point not uncertainly towards those of the Church of Rome. These views supported by their ritual are foreign to the articles, homilies, and formularies of the Church of England, and lead their professors straight, in many cases, to the Church of Rome. The Cambridge Chronicle has lately the plain assertion of a convert from Ritualism to Rome, "that he thankfully endorses the assertion that Ritualism is the highway to Rome." Within the last few months this writer admits that he and six of his friends had been brought, through the "imitation" of Catholicism, to its "reality." Two of the number were "Anglican" clergymen of the most advanced type. "They learnt to see" (he added) "their inconsistency in holding the whole cycle of Roman doctrines whilst repudiating the very authority by which these doctrines were promulgated!" The Church of Rome is thus acknowledged by this "pervert" to that Church as the authority which alone has the power to promulgate the doctrines.

The subject of "the altar for sin" is the one chiefly in point here, and the seven who plunged from Ritualism into Rome lately have, in this case, on their own showing, amply proved the matter at issue to-day—namely, that as Ephraim is ever ready to make "many altars to sin," so now altars are, as predicted, at this period of the Church's history also, "unto him to sin." The tendency is, in short, directly towards idolatry—the cultus of the Virgin, the unauthorised prayers for the dead, the invocation of saints (so-called), and, in fact, towards all those departures from the faith, as described in the New Testament, in the direction of the errors of Rome, which our national Church and the nation of Israel to which it belongs, cast off at the era of the Reformation.

We would urge all our readers, and all who know this nation to be Israel, to depart from these men, as regards fellowship in worship. Its tendency is dishonouring to our King and Redeemer. It robs His atonement of its value, adds to it as if it were insufficient in the sight of God, and throws contempt on the articles of the Church, which its clergy were at their ordination sworn to uphold. Our country parishes, as well as the bulk of our children, are becoming saturated with Roman doctrine, and this, of course, constitutes a real danger and spiritual peril to those who thus relax their hold on the saving doctrines of the gospels and epistles of our New Testament, and give heed to seductions of teaching that our nation shed its blood largely 300 years ago to renounce for ever.

The declension is sadly apparent throughout this land, in India, and in the Colonies, and would lead one to despair of our Church and nation, were it not for our national hopes as British-Israelites, and for the promises of God to Israel His people, that while the rebels shall be purged out, the nation itself shall by His grace survive, repent, and be restored, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord. In Ezek. xx. 37, 38, R.V., we have words which those who are tampering with idolatry in our Church should carefully ponder, as they relate to times prior to the restoration of Israel and Judah to their own land (vers. 41, 42). The passage is this: "I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant; and I will purge out, from among you, the rebels, and them that transgress against Me; I will bring them forth out of the land where they sojourn, but they shall not enter into the land of Israel; and ye shall know that I am the Lord." No doubt this great evil is to come upon us as a people in order that the Lord may meet and destroy it at His coming. But it is ours to entreat the Lord that while He is dealing in judgment with the great sorceress He will spare His people who have sinned, and pardon and restore them. His then shall be all the praise, and all the glory; but to us, and to our children, all the blessing and the benefit.

THE JEWISH QUESTION.

An article with the above title appeared in the Jewish Intelligencer of April, 1896, and will be interesting to our readers. It shows how in Jewish circles and in the accredited organ of one of our highly honoured evangelical societies, it is taken as a settled thing that the restoration of the Jews alone will be the fulfilment of the prophecies respecting the re-occupation of Palestine by the Israelites; that Palestine will be theirs; and that "the nation" which is to occupy the Holy Land is the nation of the Jews, soon to be constituted such. Not a thought is given to the restoration of Ephraim or the Ten Tribes with the Jews, or of such passages as Jer. iii. 18; Isa. xviii. 1—7; Hosea i. 10, 11; Ezek. xxxvi. and xxxvii.; Zech. x. 6—12; Micah v. 7, 8; besides others pointing to the existence now of Israel as well as Judah, and the certainty that both must go back to the land together, as God is true. How totally different the plan of man is, the reader may discern for himself by the following:—

"THE JEWISH QUESTION.

"The 'Eastern Question' is once more troubling the peace of the world, having been brought to its present crisis by the terrible atrocities inflicted upon Armenians in the Ottoman Empire. The very existence of Turkey, as a European power, seems to be at stake. The traditional policy of England has been to uphold the Turkish Empire, but there is, we should imagine, but little disposition to do so any longer. As the First Lord of the Treasury said a few weeks ago—Turkey has used up a valuable asset, namely, the goodwill of the English people. Turkey would probably fall to-morrow, if the Great Powers could only look without uneasiness on what would emerge from the ruins.

"Now this seems to a great many people to be in accordance with what has been written in God's Word. They see in the visible, though slow, decay of the Ottoman Empire the fulfilment of Rev. xvi. 12: 'The sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared;' and they anticipate a reversion of our Lord's prophecy, 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled.' The 'Jewish Question' is intimately bound up with the 'Eastern Question.' If the Turkish Empire goes to pieces, what is to become of Palestine? The Jews are a people de trop in every country where they dwell. They are not wanted anywhere; Russia does not want the Jews, that is quite evident; Austria does not want them, and in Austria the anti-Semites are likely to have their own way, and the boast of Dr. Lueger (see Standard, March 3) that he will make an end of the Polish-Jewish-Magyar Coalition, which is seeking to rule over Christian Austria, seems likely to be fulfilled. Germany does not want the Jews: it is doubtful whether any country wants them. Why not send them back to Palestine?

"This idea, which once upon a time was thought to be the dream of foolish Christian enthusiasts, bids fair to become a question of practical politics, and is being eagerly taken up by Jews themselves. 'Palestine for the Jews' is a cry being raised in more quarters than one. Aspirations for making the Jewish race into a nation are being heard on all sides. A remarkable sign of the times this!

"The Jewish Chronicle of January 17 contained a paper, the substance of a pamphlet, by Dr. Herzl, entitled a 'Solution of the Jewish Question,' in which is advocated the restoration of the Jewish State. The writer says this is 'an universal idea, old as the people, who never ceased to cherish it.' We take the liberty of giving a few quotations from this remarkable article—an article which the Jewish Chronicle itself declares to be 'one of the most astounding pronouncements ever put forward on the Jewish Question.'

"Dr. Herzl starts with a statement as to what this is:—

"'The Jewish Question still exists. It would be foolish to deny it. It exists wherever Jews live in perceptible numbers. Where it does not yet exist, it will be brought by Jews in the course of their migrations. We naturally move to those places where we are not persecuted, and there our presence soon produces persecution. This is true in every country, and will remain true even in those most highly civilised—France itself is no exception—till the Jewish Question finds a solution on a political basis. I believe that I understand anti-Semitism, which is in reality a highly complex movement. I consider it from a Jewish standpoint, yet without fear or hatred. I believe that I can see what elements there are in it of vulgar sport, of common trade jealousy, of inherited prejudice, of religious intolerance, and also of legitimate self-defence.'

"Then the writer goes on to shew that it is not the fault of the Jews that they cannot assimilate with the nations.

"'We are one people—one people. We have honestly striven everywhere to merge ourselves in the social life of surrounding communities, and to preserve only the faith of our fathers. It has not been permitted to us. In vain are we loyal patriots, in some places our loyalty running to extremes; in vain do we make the same sacrifices of life and property as our fellow-citizens; in vain do we strive to increase the fame of our native land in science and in art, or her wealth by trade and commerce. In countries where we have lived for centuries we are still cried down as strangers; and often by those whose ancestors were not yet domiciled in the land where Jews had already made experience of suffering. Yet, in spite of all, we are loyal subjects, loyal as the Huguenots, who were forced to emigrate. If we could only be left in peace. . . .'

"He then asks for a portion of the globe large enough for the requirements of the nation.

"'Shall we choose Argentina or Palestine? We will take what is given us and what is selected by Jewish public opinion. Argentina is one of the most fertile countries in the world, extends over a vast area, and has a sparse population. The Argentine Republic would derive considerable profit from the cession of a portion of its territory to us. The present infiltration of Jews has certainly produced some friction, and it would be necessary to enlighten the Republic on the intrinsic difference of our new movement.

"'Palestine is our ever-memorable historic home. The very name of Palestine would attract our people with a force of extraordinary potency. Supposing His Majesty the Sultan were to give us Palestine, we could in return pledge ourselves to regulate the whole finances of Turkey. There we should also form a portion of the rampart of Europe against Asia, an outpost of civilisation as opposed to barbarism. We should remain a neutral State in intimate connection with the whole of Europe, which would guarantee our continued existence.

"'The Sultan would be too badly advised to close with your offer at once; time would be your agent, and hasten the need of a change of owners. The Turk would fall. Judæa would be handed over to the Jews without price, and then the funds would be wanted alone for the development of the promised kingdom. The Arab police, and soldiers enough under good control, to keep order, would gladly become your servants, in fact all Arabs would rejoice at escape from the iniquitous rule of the Turk. The places desolated by bad government should be restored, aqueducts rebuilt, the land made fruitful, harbours constructed, new appliances used to develop riches, and all intelligent energy exercised, and this revivifying should be carried on to such perfection, that all other well ordered territories, grand with beautiful cities, should be in comparison the work of mere apprentice hands, while the principles of morals and of religion should be so perfected that previous systems should seem but the scattered pieces of a puzzle—put together at last to show the hitherto unguessed harmony of the pattern.'

"The Chronicle thus sums up the above:—

"'The transference of Palestine from the Turks to the Jews, by purchase or by gift, would not merely solve the Jewish Question, but satisfactorily dispose of a thorny political problem, to the manifest advantage of the world's peace. The Jewish State, thus revived, would be a model State. Palestine, of course, would be rescued from the slough of despond in which it has been held fast for so many centuries. The neglect and misrule which have wrought so much physical evil for the country would disappear. Good roads, plentiful water, effective cultivation of the soil, would "renew," as if by magic, "the face of the ground." But, beyond this, Jewish Statecraft would be an example for other nations to follow. Wise laws, even-handed justice, genuine freedom, perfect peace, would go to make Palestine an ideal land.'

"Whether Jews will take any action at the present juncture remains to be seen. Sir Samuel Montagu has given the following opinion:—

"'Assuredly matters do look as if they were tending towards such a position, that the Jews would, as if naturally, come into possession of Palestine. Are we not told, though, by one of the prophets, that the nations will fight round Jerusalem before the Jews possess the land? Perhaps that prophecy might be said to bear upon the crusades, but anyhow here we have ripening jealousies among the nations. To solve these would be a great service in itself, and further I believe that if a Jewish nation could be planted in Palestine the Jewish question in Russia would also be solved.

"'There are between six and seven million Jews in the world, and two millions of these I estimate might be relied upon to go to Palestine. This couple of millions would consist mostly of artisan Jews, and the greater proportion of the whole number would come from Poland and Russia.

"'Clearly no people could grow prosperous under the ways of the Turk as we know them. If he would be bought out, if the whole scheme could be shown to be at all practicable, then I don't doubt for a minute but that the means would be found. Supposing somebody were to come to me with the statement, "The scheme can be carried through," why, then, I should offer all the support I could.'"

THE LANGUAGE OF THE FUTURE.

THE Rev. A. Hastings Kelk, M.A., of Christ Church, Jerusalem, is now in this country for a short rest, and is employing his leisure time in addressing meetings interested in the work of "The London Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews," whose honoured missionary to that people, he is. In an address delivered at Clifton on May 30th during the Anniversary Meetings there, he had occasion to speak of the schools in Jerusalem for Jewish children; and the gist of his remarks was to the following effect:—The schools in Jerusalem are exceedingly well attended, and the Jews who resort there from all countries to reside, make no difficulties on the score of religion, taught by the Societies' missionaries. The matter is explained to them when the children are brought to the schools. When told that the best efforts of the teachers will be directed to instruct the boys and girls in the Christian religion, to love Christ, and to prepare them for baptism, the answer generally is, "that the parents were prepared to run that risk so long as the assurance would be given that no child would be baptised without the consent of the relatives who entrust them to the Missionary teachers. No difficulty is ever experienced in this respect by Mr. Kelk, who said that he always gave the promise requested and it had been faithfully kept, although as the result, Jewish children had often been removed by parents, when they saw reason to think that the teaching was taking effect, and the children after a long course of schooling were being drawn to Christ and desired baptism. There is one peculiarity about these schools, as Mr. Kelk described them, which we felt to be of interest to our readers; and it was this. The boys and girls come to Jerusalem or other cities in Palestine, accompanied by their parents, from all parts of the world. From Russia, Poland, Bulgaria, Spain, England, Portugal, North Africa, America, and even India and Australia they come, and speak diverse languages as representatives of all these distant parts of the earth. There is no language common to them all, which could be made the language of the schools; not even Hebrew, since few indeed understand that at all, among the children. This was a great difficulty at first, but after consideration it was thought best to introduce a language as the language of the school, which all might easily acquire, and so have access to a splendid literature and to advantages in other respects which no other existing language offers. This language was English! It is easily acquired by the children, added Mr. Kelk, and you find that boys or girls from distant parts after mixing with the older pupils in the Mission schools for three or four weeks are quite able in that time to ask for all they want in English, and after a few months study speak it as well as we do. They find it an easy language to acquire, and the consequence is that large numbers of Jews and Jewesses in Jerusalem are growing up to manhood and womanhood well versed in our language and able to spread it themselves throughout the East. We deem this a remarkable fact for the consideration of our clergy and others, who as yet see not Our Identity as we see it. Their reading must have often told them that philologists declare that in time English promises to be the lingua Franca of the world, and that the English tongue will prevail everywhere, as it is likely to do, according to Mr. Kelk, in Palestine and its capital (Jerusalem) especially. Where the language prevails, the race which uses that language (the Anglo-Saxon), is also likely to prevail in the world. The fact points to the identity of the British and American peoples with the remnant of Israel, to whom "the kingdom and dominion and greatness of the kindom under the whole heaven," is promised by the Lord Himself in Dan. vii. 27 (R.V.), as "the people of the saints of the Most High." That people He has "set high" above all the nations of the earth (Deut. xxviii. 1 and 13), as the possessors of the Gates, of the wealth, and dominion of the world; the trustees of the oracles of God, His chosen evangelists to all nations, and the owners of three great Empires. These are the Empire of the Colonies of Britain, of the Ocean Highways of the world, and of the Heathen Empire of the globe; such as we possess in India, Burmah, Africa, Australasia, and Canada. There is no other nation but our own so blessed; and in God's Word these blessings are promised in all these details to one race exclusively—namely, to the House of Israel, the Ten Tribes. Save our own, no other nation possesses any one of these gifts, and the conclusion to our mind is irresistible, that the British race is beyond doubt the remnant of Israel, the chosen of the Lord. No doubt the Rev. A. H. Kelk believes none of these things as they affect our own nation; but they are true notwithstanding. We had during the stay of Mr. Kelk in Clifton, an opportunity of judging what his views were as to the future restoration of the tribes to their own land. He preached on Ezek. xxxvii. 3, 4, "The vision of dry bones." While he repudiated the purely spiritual view of this passage as held by most of the clergy, he deemed that the whole vision had reference to the Jews, and while he believed that the Jews or Judah were to be accompanied in the return "by the other tribes" (he did not call them the ten); he seemed to think that the whole twelve would go back in unbelief and be rescued and converted by the appearance of the Lord in the crisis of the attack on them of one of the European Powers their enemy, which was the subject of chaps. xxxviii. and xxxix. of Ezekiel. We should imagine that the rev. missionary to Judah, is not far from our belief as to the Ten Tribes and their identity with the British people, could he only be led to see what is obvious to us from Hosea i. 10, that Israel is existing now as "a great and mighty" and very populous nation, of Christian character, being in fact known by all men as "the sons of the living God." That the restoration is to be that of Israel accompanied by Judah, is clear from Jer. iii. 18, which distinctly states the fact, that "the House of Judah shall walk to the House of Israel, and that they shall come together out of the land of the North to the land that the Lord has given for an inheritance unto their fathers." We must only hope that a careful study of the prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Zechariah, will lead the Rev. Mr. Kelk to see that a great Hebrew nation exists to-day besides the Jews, and tnat the restoration of the latter will be accompanied by that of the former.

Digitized by Google

THE MELBOURNE "AGE" NEWSPAPER ON LOYALTY TO THE EMPIRE.

We take the following from "The Age" newspaper of Melbourne. The leader is dated March 23rd, 1896, and is worth perusal by those who believe in the unity of the British Empire :—

"In his address to the students of the University on Saturday, Lord Brassey recognized a fact which is sometimes overlooked, that the colony is rapidly passing under the control of a new generation, born on Australian soil. The patriotism of the pioneers was necessarily divided between love of the land of their birth and affection for that of their adoption. For the colonial born, patriotism must necessarily have a different meaning, since it must be more concentrated on the country which gave them birth. Attachment to the mother land will naturally be weaker in the next generation than in the last, but it does not necessarily follow that a desire for severance will readily grow up. The causes for disaffection which led to the American Revolution do not exist in Australia to-day. As his Excellency reminded his hearers, the Australian colonies, so far as their internal affairs are concerned, are as free and independent as they would be under republican government. There is no claim in England to-day to tax the inhabitants of the colonies. These pay no tribute and no contribution to the Imperial diplomatic service, or even to the cost of the armed forces of the Empire. Yet the latter are of great service to the colonies, which, under their protection, can develop their resources in peace and safety, undisturbed by the bullying of arrogant naval officers of foreign Powers. We have but to remember the humiliations which have sometimes been heaped upon certain of the South American Republics to recognise the advantages of the Imperial connection. It is quite true that the United States entered upon its independent national life with a smaller population than the Australian colonies now contain, but the powers of other nations were proportionate. During the present century a great revolution has been worked in the political conditions of the nations. The tendency has been in the direction of great aggregations, and so persistently have the peoples of Europe travelled in that direction that there seems less and less room for small communities. Bismarck sought to bribe Louis Napoleon with a gift of Belgium, and it is so much a matter of course to look upon the ultimate acquisition of Holland by Germany that the latter is disposed to already assume a paternal attitude towards colonists of Dutch race.

"The day of small States is pretty well over, at least for the time, and while other European races are forming themselves into great empires it would be an insensate policy on the part of the British race to split up into a number of weak communities. Such a course would be specially disastrous to the colonies of Great Britain, for their territories are large and their populations comparatively small. It may be said that they would be as safe under the protection of the law of nations as were the small European States of the last century; but it must be remembered that the morality of Governments has fallen in the interim. Such action as that of Russia in kidnapping Prince Alexander of Bulgaria would have been impossible at a time when every great Power felt it incumbent upon it to justify its proceedings before the tribunal of European public opinion. A separatist feeling may be said to be non-existent here, chiefly for the reason that there is no inducement to its rise. The danger is, however, that a section of the Australian natives may let their patriotic aspirations take too local a form and be captivated by the thought of their country assuming the dignity of a Sovereign State. That should be counteracted by the consideration that pride of race is at least as respectable as love of country, and that to give up our share in the great destiny of the British people would be to surrender that of which we have most reason to be proud. Lord Brassey did well then, to warn the students, who, as the local custodians of the higher culture, are bound to exercise a powerful influence on national affairs in the future, against the conception of low ideals. Perhaps the best preventive of that misfortune is, as Lord Brassey says, a diligent course of reading in the best examples of English literature. A free dipping into that magnificent reservoir, which is the common heritage of the whole race, will not only raise the mind above narrow provincial conceptions, but will remind the Australian reader that not only is his affection due to the land of his birth, but that he is a citizen of yet a greater realm—of an Empire upon which the sun never sets."

"OTHERWISE."

VERY important, if not serious, issues are involved in the question: is "otherwise" the correct rendering of ἐπεί in Rom. xi. 22? In "The Covenant People" for April, 1896, Dr. Hanan contends that our "British-Israel Handbook" is right in changing this translation into "since."

As I am the plaintiff, and have submitted my objection to the Editors, the duty of replying devolves on me, unworthy as I am to meet so able and practised an advocate as Dr. Hanan. He has carefully sifted the question, and it is a ground of gratitude that his argument is not likely to derive greater strength from other hands. Now let me submit to public criticism my humble defence of the Authorized and Revised readings. In the first place, to my own mind, the question is already prejudged and ought to be allowed to rest. When the R.V. endorsed the A.V., the sentence of that eminent court of Greek scholars and theologians ought to be decisive and beyond appeal. However, an analysis of Dr. Hanan's challenge of their verdict may be useful, and may conduce to the greater confirmation of our English Bible as we happily possess it. To Dr. Hanan's reasons I raise five demurs:—

1. He lays great stress on numerical preponderance. Confessedly, ἐπεί signifies either "since" or "otherwise," according to its place in the context, and Dr. Hanan arranges twenty-two of the twenty-seven instances of its use in two classes (a) and (b), and interprets fifteen in one sense and seven in the other; but from (b) he first excludes all but two, because those two alone are rendered "otherwise" (thus regarding the word and not the meaning), and then, by an imputation of "colouring," reduces the two to one solitary instance, which he therefore repudiates for its solitude! All this process, to my comprehension, counts for nothing, because fifteen examples of one meaning cannot possibly rule and decide other meanings (whether seven or two) in another chapter and another line of reasoning; and number can carry no weight. The meaning of ἐπεί can only be derived from its context.

2. Dr. Hanan argues that St. Paul's words are not "hortatory" only, but "must be" regarded as "prophetic!" "By what compulsion must" they? I maintain that exhortation alone invests them with any significance; substitute "since" for "otherwise" in ver. 22, and I see neither warning nor prediction; only incoherence. Granted that St. Paul prophecies, one prophetic clause in a sentence (as in numbers, so in logic) does not make all the other clauses the same.

3. The thought of St. Paul consigning all wild grafts, and therein all Japhetic Churches, to the doom of excision, is inconceivable and contrary to the Gospel truth of fellow-citizenship in Christ.

4. This dogma, as it at present stands in our Handbook, is a bar to the reception of British-Israelism. Almost the whole British race adhere to the tradition of the Schools that they are of Japhetic descent, and when presented with evidence that they are Shemitic, often say: "See how you change the words of Holy Scripture to suit your argument!" Let us remove this stumbling-block.

5. And finally, outside our own proper field of enquiry, this dogma is fatal to a grand object and aim which is now filling the mind and heart of Christendom; viz., the Reunion of all Christian Churches into one Catholic Church as it existed in the first four centuries, and was formulated in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds; for, if it be true of every Gentile graft, that its sentence is sealed, and if "since thou also shalt be cut off" is the correct version, then Reunion becomes a dream.

Reader! Audi hanc alteram partem: to which I add no more than the devout prayer that the Editors of our Handbook may see their way, before another edition is called for, to expunge from its two pages (21 and 193) the words "since" and "destined" (which are needless to the argument, if not injurious), and to harmonize our British Handbook with our English Bible.

P.S.—I submit to Dr. Hanan one other little variation from his construction, that instead of ἐπεὶ καὶ, we should read καὶ σὺ, to convey the meaning "thou also," as in R.V. and A.V.—From the "Covenant People," May, 1896, p. 392.

"Tithes Commentary;—Bible on Money, Systematic and Proportionate Giving. Historic and Legal Facts according to God in British-Israel." By Henry Roe. Part I., price 1d., by post 1½d.

THIS is a quaint little treatise, very useful and necessary in its way, to teach men, and especially British-Israelites, the necessity of giving to the Lord of their means in the proportion which He prescribes and demands, namely, one-tenth of the whole. Our author puts the matter very clearly, and shows that while the whole earth and all it contains is God's, He is entitled to say when He entrusts some part of His treasures to each of us, to use for Him, that we shall give Him one-tenth while we use the nine-tenths ourselves.

"If God," he says, "offers you ten shillings, saying, 'Take nine shillings for your own will, and give the other shilling to My own work of saving the world,' will you rob God of that one shilling? If you do, where will God drive you? O let us now make restitution for the past and get saved."

We quote our author's Chapter II., as therein is the gist of the matter. In it he presents some of Our Identity points in a clear light, which cannot fail sooner or later to be important and comforting. In Chapter II. Mr. Roe deals with the subject thus:—

"CHAPTER II.—CAUSE AND FOUNDATION OF TITHES. ALL LAND, PROPERTY, AND MONEY BELONG TO GOD.

"Gen. i. 1. God created the heaven and the earth.

"Deut. viii. 17. And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth.

"18. But thou shalt remember the Lord thy God, for it is He that giveth thee power to get wealth; that He may establish His covenant which He sware unto thy fathers.

"Psa. xxiv. 1. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

"Psa. l. 10. For every beast of the forest is Mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills.

"11. And the wild beasts of the field are Mine.

"12. The world is Mine, and the fulness thereof.

"Hosea ii. 8. She did not know that I gave her the corn, and the wine, and the oil, and multiplied unto her silver and gold, which they used for Baal.

"9. Therefore will I take back.

"Haggai ii. 8. The silver is Mine, and the gold is Mine, saith the Lord of hosts.

COMMENTS:

"1. 'God created the heaven and the earth.' In the beginning was Good; and the Good was God; and God made all things. He was Mind, and Spirit, and Person. He made all things without a master; without borrowing; and without tools. So all things are His absolutely; and nothing is our own; but He lends a part on His own terms. Working-men, Unionists, and Socialists follow God in part when they claim a proportionate part of the profits of their work. How much greater their claim if they also created the materials, and tools, and premises. God states His terms in the Bible; and he that does not believe Him is an infidel, even when religious, as is so commonly the case; and you know that no infidel is saved.

"2. 'And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth.' Many are much worse than that; for they not only say in their heart, but also speak out openly before others, and so spread the disease of sin; saying, We have worked for all we have, so it is our own; and we will please ourselves whether we give anything or not. Once I had that disease, but the Word of God cured me. Have you got it?

"Just look into yonder field and see how that blind little mole is working hard for itself. How earnestly it digs, and scrapes all it can get into its own selfish paws! How it licks its coloured lips and says, I do so enjoy my own gettings! How it piles up a nice little heap of fresh soil as if it were gold! How proudly it tosses up its little nose, and says, I don't care a bit for any other mole, nor yet for the landlord, or keeper! Look! how the iron trap now catches it: and how the dog worries it! So God does with human moles.

"3. 'It is He that giveth thee power to get wealth.' I get wealth by my own hands! But the power in those hands is from God. I make money by my brain and mind! But the power of brain and mind is only as long as God wills. I save by getting interest! But, without the power of God, you would have neither capital nor interest. He gives you power to get wealth only a very short time. Soon the brain will stop; the hands will drop; and the mind will be gone! O where to? As we meet God He will ask, What did you do with the power I gave you to get wealth?

"4. 'That He may establish His covenant which He sware unto thy fathers.' What is that covenant? This is one part, Gen. xii. 3, 'In thee (Abram) shall all the families of the earth be blessed.' There is no if, no may, and no condition. It is unalterable. The wealth of Israel will do that both literally and spiritually. Look! how it is now doing it by empire; by arts and sciences; by trade and commerce; by churches and missions. Is my wealth doing this?

5. What is His covenant? It is His plan and promises, in a hundred varied parts; each beautiful as a single star; and all united as an architect's design, and one as the constellation in the heavens. Here are several stars among that hundred: Gen. xv. 18, 'In that day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates.' That means not merely a Protectorate, but the actual ownership, by Abram's seed of Cairo, Tel-el-Kebir, all shares of the Suez Canal, Aden, all Arabia, and all Palestine. Is not that a beautiful star? See the Union Jack on many of these points already. Look out for the Stars and Stripes soon joining that Union Jack at every point.

"6. Here is another: Gen. xxii. 17, 'Thy seed shall possess the Gate of His enemies.' That means that as the Russians are the enemy of Abraham's seed, and openly confess that Constantinople is the natural Gate to their empire, even so Abram's seed are going to take and keep Constantinople. That is the key to the Eastern Question. Is not that a beautiful star in the East to guide wise men, not to a stable, but to the throne?

"7. Here is another: Gen. xxxv. 10, 'Israel shall be thy name.' 11, 'A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee.' That means that Israel (always remember that the Jews are only a small part of Israel), are to have a Colonial Empire in natural descent from one man, all federated as one Company. Is not that a beautiful star? See how it shines always the whole of every twenty-four hours as the earth rolls round from Brisbane in Australia to the far west of Canada. Are these stars too high for some eyes? Let us look a little lower.

"8. Here is another: Isa. xlix. 25, 'I will save thy children.' Is not that a beautiful star? Will it be a grand work to save all the children? Can it be done without proportionate giving? Will it cost much? Ask George Muller, of Bristol, Dr. Barnardo, of London, and Treasurers of Sunday-schools. O never forget this, that the promise to 'save thy children' is a part of the same Will and Covenants, made to the same race of Abraham's seed, as the clause requiring a tenth of income for all God's work. If you reject a part of that Will, you reject it all. If you refuse your part respecting the tenth, then never pray for the other part which promises to save your own children. That's the way to be honest and manly as you call it. But face the results, and be ready when your trouble comes to hear this: Prov. i. 24, 'Because I have called, and ye refused;' 26, 'I also will laugh in the day of your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh;' 27, 'When your fear cometh as a storm, and your calamity cometh on as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish come upon you.' 28, 'Then shall they call upon Me, but I will not answer.' 'They shall seek Me diligently, but they shall not find Me.' 29, 'For that they hated knowledge.' This is a religious generation that hates knowledge on proportionate giving; and that loves only nice promises on receiving; as children like inappropriate sweetmeats, but dislike obedience. After four thousand years from Adam, Christ called the generation children. O God, when wilt Thou make a generation of men? Many preachers are holding behind them the gospel of giving; and holding before them the nice promises on receiving. Look how preachers and people are falling into the ditch that has no bottom!
