STANLEY JONES, 53 Marlborough-road, Holloway, London.—July 28, m. and e. Wood Green.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London, E.—July 28-28, m. Pimlico Pier, e. Tottenham. August 4, Camberwell; 11, Westminster; 18, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 25, m. Clerkenwell, a. Victoria Park.

T. THURLOW, 350 Old Ford-road, E.—August 4, Kingsland. Sept. 15, e. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Now Ready, 12 pages, price 1d., by post 1½d., The

AUGUST NUMBER

OF

THE LITERARY GUIDE,

Containing a four-column "Literary Chat" with

GEORGE WILLIAM FOOTE.

Also Reviews of recent Rationalist Publications, Jottings, Gossip, etc.

Order with your "Freethinker."

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

CHARLES WATTS'S WORKS.

THE TEACHINGS OF SECULARISM COMPARED WITH ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

SECULARISM: IS IT FOUNDED ON REASON, AND IS IT SUFFICIENT TO MEET THE WANTS OF MANKIND? Debate between the Editor of the Evening Mail (Halifax, N.S.) and Charles Watts. With Prefatory Letters by G. J. Holyoake and Colonel R. G. Ingersoll, and an Introduction by Helen H. Gardener. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

A REPLY TO FATHER LAMBERT'S "TACTICS OF INFIDELS." 6d., by post 7d.

SCIENCE AND THE BIBLE. 4d., by post 5d.

CHRISTIANITY: ITS ORIGIN, NATURE, AND INFLUENCE. 4d., by post 5d.

WAS CHRIST A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL REFORMER? 4d., by post 5d.

AGNOSTICISM AND CHRISTIAN THEISM: WHICH IS THE MORE REASONABLE? 3d., by post 4d.

THE NATURAL AND THE SUPERNATURAL; OR, BELIEF AND KNOWLEDGE. 3d., by post 4d.

SECULARISM: DESTRUCTIVE AND CONSTRUCTIVE. 3d., by post 4d.

HAPPINESS IN HELL AND MISERY IN HEAVEN. 3d., by post 4d.

THE SUPERSTITION OF THE CHRISTIAN SUNDAY. A Plea for Liberty and Justice. 3d., by post 4d.

BIBLE MORALITY: Its Teachings Shown to be Contradictory and Defective as an Ethical Guide. 3d., by post 3½d.

SAINTS AND SINNERS: WHICH? 3d., by post 4d.

EVOLUTION AND SPECIAL CREATION. 3d., by post 4d.

IS THERE A LIFE BEYOND THE GRAVE? Reply to Dr. R. B. Westbrook. 3d., by post 4d.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILISATION. Why Christianity is Still Professed. 3d., by post 4d.

WHY DO RIGHT? A Secularist's Answer. 3d., by post 4d.

THEOLOGICAL PRESUMPTION. An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. R. F. Burns, of Halifax, N.S. 2d., by post 2½d.

EDUCATION: TRUE AND FALSE. 2d., by post 2½d.

SECULARISM: ITS RELATION TO THE SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF THE DAY. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD; OR, QUESTIONS FOR THEISTS. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE BIBLE UP TO DATE. 2d., by post 2½d.

ROBERT FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."

W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."

Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question, Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumours and Wens, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 8s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 3d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 3d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

"." In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

64 pp., price 3d., by post 4d.,

THE

HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE.

WITH A

FULL AND TRUE ACCOUNT

OF

"THE LEEDS ORGIES."

EDITED, WITH INTRODUCTION,

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchisedek
S'w'elp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Snatching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

LOOK AT THIS!
TALK OF THIS!
ACT ON THIS!
IMMEDIATELY.

You never saw such Goods at such a Price.

10,000 YDS. OF
TROUSERINGS

In every conceivable Color and Design in the very Finest Cloths.

THESE MUST BE CLEARED AT ONCE,

And if the readers of the Freethinker could all see them at this moment I could

CLEAR THE LOT IN THREE MINUTES.

NOTE THESE THREE THINGS:

1st	In one week we have taken over 200 orders for these Goods.
2nd	We ask for one trial only. If you are not satisfied, we will return your money in full and allow you to keep the goods.
3rd	The Two Worlds, July 19, 1895, says: "Read Mr. Gott's advertisements on the cover at the back. He makes you very liberal offers, and, judging from our experience and the testimony of friends, he is a man of his word."

LOSE NO FURTHER TIME,

But send in your order, and give full particulars about the Color and Style of Cloth you prefer.

PRICES.

Trousers to Measure 9s. per pair.
Three Pairs Trousers to Measure for 25s. 6d.
Six Pairs Trousers to Measure for 48s.
One Trousers' Length for 5s. 6d.
Three Trousers' Lengths for 15s.
Six Trousers' Lengths for 27s.

TROUSERS.

INCHES

A, Round Waist over Trousers .....
B, Round Seat.....
E to D, Inside Leg Seam.....
F to G, Full Length of Trousers.....
H, Round Thigh .....
I, Round Knee.....
J, Round Bottom .....
Please say Lined or Unlined.....
(Lined 6d. extra.)
Side or Cross Pockets.....

800 DRESS LENGTHS

AT BARELY HALF PRICE.

Three Dress Lengths for 21s.,

INCLUDING

HABIT CLOTHS, TWEEDS, CASHMERE, FIGURES, SERGES, DIAGONALS, DARK, LIGHT, AND MEDIUM SHADES.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 31. SUNDAY, AUGUST 4, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE BIBLE AND LOCAL VETO.

IN our recent article on "Harcourt's Tumble" we adverted to the wretched hypocrisy of men who were not teetotalers themselves trying to force other people to be teetotalers, and of rich men with well-stocked wine-cellars trying to make it difficult for a poor man to obtain a glass of beer. One of our readers questioned whether Sir William Harcourt was "a drinker (not a drunkard)," as we stated him to be. We replied that we had no personal acquaintance with the fat Knight of Malwood, and therefore relied on public sources of information. Since then we have seen a strong corroboration of our statement. In the London Star for Monday, July 29, there appeared an article on "Beer and Democracy," by Mr. R. Wallace, the witty M.P. for Edinburgh, containing the following passage: "I once heard it stated of the late Ministry in their hearing, and not contradicted, that there was only one teetotaler among them, and that was not Sir William Harcourt." Now that settles the question, as far as we are concerned; unless a direct denial is forthcoming from the member for Derby—no, not Derby; it's somewhere else now—himself.

It is not our intention, in this article, to discuss teetotalism and moderate drinking. We have good friends on both sides. But we detest the teetotaler who wants to convert people to his way of thinking, or at least to his way of practice, by the strong arm of the law; just as we despise the moderate drinker who lets himself be taken for a teetotaler when the "great drink question" arises in public. No man ought to do, and do habitually, what he is ashamed of; and no man ought to make his own tastes, or even his own principles, a yoke for the necks of his neighbors. We are not concerned, at present, with the chemistry or physiology of stimulants; if we were, we should have a good deal to say about tea and coffee. We are merely standing up for honesty and liberty.

Some people will ask what this has to do with the Local Veto Bill. They will innocently inquire if the liquor traffic does not need some sort of regulation. Certainly it does. So does driving a vehicle through the public streets. Sir William Harcourt's Bill contained a provision, so to speak, for no vehicles at all; that is, it had a prohibition clause, by which two thousand out of three thousand people could banish drink altogether from their district, while nothing less than two thousand out of three thousand could ever bring it back again. In other words—to put it more concretely—ten people could say to four "You sha'n't drink beer," and then if nine wanted to drink it the other five could stop them from doing so until the day of judgment.

Such nonsense is too absurd for confutation. Yet it had the support of the Nonconformist Conscience—which has not turned out, after all, to be the winning horse in the Great National Steeplechase.

The fact is, the men of God spoil everything they put their hands to. They are taught fictions and not facts, then they mount pulpits and preach ridiculous doctrines, and their whole mode of life is a nurse of fantasticality. Is it any wonder, therefore, that they make an infernal mess when they meddle with practical affairs? They overdo everything, because they don't understand nature or human nature. Instead of recognising man as an improving animal, they look upon him as a fallen angel, and they are always trying to whip him back into paradise.

Look at the policy of the Christian Church in regard to illicit intercourse between the sexes. Ever since the days of Constantine it has been trying to suppress fornication by penalties, which were once of the severest description. And what has been the result? Not a diminution, but an aggravation of the evil. Wherever the clergy were most active the evil became most pronounced. This is why Scotland shows the largest percentage of illegitimate children.

Now let us turn to Temperance. At the beginning of the Temperance movement its bitterest opponents were the ministers of religion. They denounced teetotalers as fanatics who were wise above what was written. But when the movement became strong in spite of them, they began to patronise it, and now they are its "only true friends." Teetotalism, in fact, is almost an article of the Nonconformist creed; and it is to be forced, if possible, upon "the world," in spite of "the flesh and the devil."

The Christian Church is like a rusty old weathercock. It resists the wind till people laugh at it, and at last it lurches right round, when it is still more ridiculous.

Could anything be more ridiculous than an attempt by Christian ministers to make moderate drinking a crime. They preach from the Bible; they say it is the word of God; they maintain a law which renders criticism of it an offence punishable with imprisonment. Yet this very book abounds with passages in praise of drinking; indeed, in a certain sense, it might be called the drunkard's textbook.

There are, we believe, only two "prohibition" passages in the Bible, and they are not of general application. The first occurs in Leviticus x. 8, 9:—

> "And the Lord spake unto Aaron, saying, Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: it shall be a statute for ever through your generations."

This merely means that the priests were to be perfectly sober, beyond all shadow of doubt, when officiating at divine service; and the very fact that they were forbidden to drink on this occasion proves that they were free to drink on other occasions.

The next passage occurs in Numbers vi. 2–4. It simply relates to those who took vows as Nazarites, and who were forbidden, but only during the period of their separation—that is, while their vows were operative—to drink wine or strong drink. They were even forbidden to drink vinegar made of wine, or of any alcoholic liquor, nor were they to eat grapes, whether moist or dried.

Nothing of a general character can be deduced from such special instances. On the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the main body of the Jews were allowed to indulge in stimulating beverages. Take this passage from Deuteronomy xiv. 26:—

> "And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink."

Christian teetotalers are fond of citing this text from Proverbs (xx. 1):—

> "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

But at the utmost this can only be regarded as a warning against immoderate drinking. The very same book of Proverbs (xxxi. 6, 7) positively recommends boozing to a certain class of persons, who must have been pretty numerous then, as they have been ever since.

Digitized by Google

> "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more."

Such a text shows the silliness—if not the hypocrisy—of the contention that Bible wines were non-intoxicating. Strong drink means intoxicating drink. And how much pure, unfermented juice of the grape would a man have to drink before he forgot his poverty or ceased to remember his misery? Would he not get the diarrhœa before he obtained any mental relief?

The book of Proverbs, according to the orthodox theory, was written by Solomon, the wisest man that ever lived. The same authorship is assigned to Ecclesiastes, in which (ix. 7) we read:—

> "Go thy way, eat they bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart."

Surely the wine referred to in this passage was a stimulant, and not a mere allayer of thirst.

The "wise king" is also said (wrongly enough) to have written the Song of Solomon, which is really an amatory poem, without the slightest theological allusion, except in the heads of pedantic divines, who "soil with inky fingers the hem of the garment of love." And in the Canticles (iv. 10) we read:—

> "How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse! how much better is thy love than wine!"

The "sacred" poet, in a vein of passionate hyperbolism, resorts to the most splendid comparison, and the utmost stretch of his fancy reaches to wine, which is still less sweet than the love of his imaginary heroine. Here again the wine must have been something more generous than a cupful of crude grape-juice. It must have been something commensurate with the flush of amorous emotion.

G. W. FOOTE.

(To be concluded.)

IS CHRISTIANITY USEFUL?

THE publican cannot be expected to like the teetotaler, nor the butcher the vegetarian. Yet they do not usually vilify the characters of those who refuse to partake of their wares. But with the professional sky-pilots unbelievers are always a bad lot, wicked-hearted as well as wrong-headed. Sometimes it is our vile principles which occasion our wicked lives, and sometimes it is our sinful lives which lead to our bad principles. The priests claim a moral monopoly, and assert that, without them and their religion, the world would go to the bad. We do not believe it. Kindness, long-suffering, forgiveness, self-sacrifice, and all other virtues claimed as pre-eminently Christian, existed long before Christ, and would continue to exist though the belief in Christ were as extinct as the belief in Osiris. They have nothing to do with belief in the Trinity, Incarnation, or the Atonement. These virtues neither came in with Christianity, nor will they go out with it.

To us it is amusing to hear "solemnly-constituted impostors," who are sworn to defend dogmas they do not dare to preach, and who certainly contribute their quota to the criminal population, dilating upon the pernicious consequences of the views of such men as Helvetius, Bentham, Shelley, Clifford, Darwin, and Huxley. But there are numbers who, seeing that religion now identifies itself with morality, fear that the decay of the one must be accompanied by the dissolution of the other, and who accordingly maintain Christianity, not because they know it to be true, but because they fancy it is useful. To such it is necessary to make clear that, in opposing what we believe to be the errors of the Christian religion, we stand for intellectual truth and honesty, and in no way undermine the morality that is of real worth to society, and which is no less valuable because we esteem it to be a growth of earth, and not a gift of heaven; founded on the secure foundation of human needs, and not on the quicksand of the arbitrary will of an irresponsible personal God.

It is the fear of trusting natural morality which does mischief. Men palter with truth, and pretend to believe that they believe because they fancy danger lies in facing the facts; whereas it lies in shirking them. It is this dread of imaginary issues which keeps the old impostures in their places; and the hypocrites and time-servers, who fancy they must conform to the prejudices, absurdities, and even falsehoods and dishonesties around them, help to obscure the natural foundations of morality.

It is the palterers with conviction—the dishonest pretenders to piety—who put forward such a paltry and contemptible estimate of human nature as that it would sink to every kind of baseness without their creeds. "Virtue," said Rama, the hero of the Hindu epic, the Ramayana, "is a service which man owes to himself, and though there were no heaven, nor any God to rule the world, it were not less the binding law of life." The simple truth is, that all that is of worth in the old religions may be, and is, retained by Secularists. It is goodness which ennobles life, and goodness has no necessary connection with godliness whatever.

We do not antagonise aught that is good in religion. We rejoice to see that the Churches are being compelled to subordinate their creeds to conduct, and the vain worship of God to the much-needed service of man. Whatever piece of work is done for the betterment of humanity, be it by Turk, Jew, Sandemanian, or Salvationist, has our hearty applause, and even when we do not approve of their methods we can give religionists credit for good intentions. From their essential methods we utterly dissent. We hold with Jesus that no man can serve two masters, and that whatever is given to God is taken from the world. To us Christianity, with its doctrine of reliance upon God, its belief in devils, its miracles, its absurd heaven and atrocious hell, is a belief unsuited to a scientific age and unworthy of a cultured people. In our view it is Christianity which stands in the way of manly life. It teaches other-worldliness. Jesus said: "Every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life" (Matthew xix. 29). It teaches intolerance and the damnation of unbelievers. Its doctrine of atonement through the blood of an innocent person attracts the idle, ignorant, and selfish, and its teaching of salvation by death-bed repentance places a premium on crime. It offers a short and easy method to escape, not sin, but its supposed consequences.

But Christianity to-day is much mitigated, and, indeed, little better than a hypocritical pretence. No one thinks of regulating his every-day life and business by it. Society, while nominally Christian, is practically Secularist. Trust in God gives place to attention to material conditions, work is superseding prayer, science displacing theology. We ask that the facts shall be frankly acknowledged. There is, in our experience, no salvation in prayer or reliance on supernatural aid. It is to science, and not to Christianity, that we must look for aid to grapple with the difficulties which beset us, and which are lost sight of in a vain attempt to discover the secrets of the hereafter.

J. M. WHEELER.

THE DECLINE OF PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

IT has been frequently remarked that superstition dies hard, and that some persons never know when they are defeated. This is evidently true in connection with the orthodox superstition, and those who are its unfortunate victims. Despite the fact that, except in a very few isolated instances, practical Christianity no longer obtains, many of its professors still cling to the delusion that the "spirit of Christ" is an active factor in modern life. As a matter of fact, in no section of society are the teachings of Christ found to be in active operation. Wilberforce, in his Practical View, writes: "The title of Christian implies no more than a sort of formal general assent to Christianity in the gross, and a degree of morality in practice little, if at all, superior to that for which we look in a good Deist, Mussulman, or Hindu." The Christian Commonwealth also observes: "Real Christianity has not ruled the world. It is disregarded in all the relations of life."

When we speak of Christianity we do not refer simply to its ethical features, although most of these are ignored in the Christian community, but we include its doctrinal teachings. It is these which constitute the distinctive character of the orthodox faith. The morality of the New Testament, whether it be valuable or otherwise, does not belong exclusively to Christianity. It existed before the time when Christ is supposed to have lived, and the better parts of it are now practised by those who have no faith, either in him or his system. It is certain doctrines that have been associated with his name (such as the Fall of Man, Original Sin, the Atonement, and the emulation of the character of Jesus) that differentiate Christianity from other systems. And it is in reference to these very features that we recognise the decline of Christianity. The leading intellects of the present time do not regard these doctrines in the same light as those earlier professors of Christianity did, who composed the Prayer Book of the Church of England and the Westminster "Confession of Faith."

Digitized by Google

Some defenders of Christianity attach great importance to what they term "the continuity of the Christian faith." But we find no proof of such continuity in the records of ecclesiastical history. From these sources we learn that Christianity has at different times appeared in various forms, according to the education and the general conditions of the period. First there was "primitive Christianity," which, we are told, meant worshipping God and endeavoring to emulate Christ, irrespective of creeds and dogmas. By and bye this form of Christianity gave way to the age of ceremonies, the worshipping of images, and the introduction of formularies which supplanted the primitive purity of the new faith. In course of time the ceremonies were changed, and the formularies altered to suit the miraculous period and the doctrine of implicit belief. The pious Gregory, in his History of the Christian Church (vol. i., p. 379), says: "Let it be remembered that Christianity (in cent. iii.) no longer retained the same form it had assumed in the primitive Church; the substance had been lost in pursuing the shadow." In the progress of time the miraculous notions had to give way to the belief in what is termed the "spirit of Christ," and to the reception of doctrines modified by the "higher criticism," and interpreted by the enlightened thought of the latter part of the nineteenth century.

During this variety of changes, diversified, indeed, have been the doctrines professed—such as the divinity of the Virgin Mary, purgatory, infant damnation, the personality of the Devil, the existence of hell and its material fire, verbal inspiration of the Bible, predestination, and special providence. These doctrines are now mostly given up, or their exposition considerably changed, by the principal leaders of Christianity. The general lines of departure from pre-existing forms are associated with the rise and formation of the Latin, the Greek, and the Reformed or Protestant Churches, followed by the establishment of Nonconformity and Unitarianism. Even the views supposed to have been held of the nature and attributes of God—of the birth, mission, and death of Christ—have not escaped the law of change and modification which has always governed the Church. The only "continuity" has been in the retention of the name of Christian, and the existence of a number of conflicting Churches based upon varied forms of belief in Christ.

A similar change has taken place in modern days in the mode of advocating and defending orthodox Christianity. The controversies once prevalent as to images, saints, the Pope, the Trinity, prayer, miracles, prophecy, and verbal inspiration are seldom heard of now. The line of defence adopted by Paley, Watson, Wardlaw, Butler, and Pearson is now superseded by a mode of advocacy the very antithesis to that adopted in former times. The views which were held in the early ages as to the teachings of the New Testament are now practically endorsed only by Quakers, Moravians, and the "Peculiar People," and even by them only partially. But the members of these sects are comparatively so few that they cannot be said to represent the modern Christian Church. Where, at the present time, can clergymen or ministers be found who will defend in public debate such questions as the character of the Christian Deity, as given in the Old Testament, the existence of the Devil, the Trinity, the infallibility of the Bible, and the doctrine of endless torments? These subjects are preached upon from the pulpit, but they are seldom discussed upon the platform. Even the so-called Christian Evidence Society in London, with all its wealth and boasted influence, refuses to put forward a representative to defend Christianity in public controversy. Why is this? One would suppose, if the Christian faith were built upon a rock, that no amount of criticism could prevail against it. If Christian advocates really thought their religion invulnerable, why should they hesitate to submit it to hostile criticism?

The fact is, the old mode of expounding the claims of Christianity, and of defending its positions, has proved inadequate to meet the reasoning requirements of the present time. The rapid progress of general education and scientific knowledge has compelled Christian exponents to abandon their former strongholds, and to seek safer shelter than their divine pretensions afforded them. Freethought has proved a more trustworthy monitor than theological beliefs. In this age of reason and fearless inquiry, instead of boldly making an effort to defend "the faith which was once delivered to the saints," its expounders ignore many of its once-cherished features, while the small portion of the original article which they still profess belief in is retained by explaining away its true meaning, or by pruning it down to suit modern exigencies.

It must not be supposed that we consider that Christianity is destitute of all truth. In our opinion, no system emanating from man is entirely erroneous. Truth, however, is peculiar to no one faith; but, unfortunately, when it is allied with theology it is always accompanied by that which is erroneous. We desire to apply the eclectic principle to Christianity, in the same manner as it is applied to other religions. By so doing, the good and useful that it contains will be separated from the bad and the useless; the noble will be retained for the service of man, while the ignoble will be discarded as being detrimental to his welfare. The present age is pre-eminently Secularistic, and orthodoxy cannot withstand its intellectual force. Other systems have had to be extirpated by the sword, or have been proscribed by the State; but Christian orthodoxy is declining from its own inherent weakness—its inability to withstand the test of modern thought. Of course, it is not here meant that the whole of Christianity will disappear. It will be its errors, its creeds, and its dogmas that will fade before man's cultivated intellect; but its truths, like all verities, will remain and become allied with systems more practicable, and with principles more in accordance with the requirements of an advanced civilisation.

CHARLES WATTS.

GIVE THE DEVIL HIS DUE.

SATAN is probably the most calumniated person in the world. Everybody puts his own misdoings on that universal scapegoat, and then drives him into the wilderness. We wonder that, since Nero, Henry VIII., and Judas Iscariot have been whitewashed, no generous person has come forward to the rescue of Old Nick. The Devil's advocate would have a very good case. Milton, when he set out to assert eternal Providence and justify the ways of God to man, was nevertheless forced to justify the ways of Satan, who is the real hero of Paradise Lost, and in his high-minded rebelliousness represents some of the grand spirit of the English Republican, John Milton himself, who may be suspected of thus covertly protesting against divine despotism, as he openly did against human tyranny.

All the worst things said against the Devil by the religious really redound to his credit. He is said to have tempted Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit. But, had she not done so, a pair of ignorant fools would have remained in Paradise, and we should never have been born. We are told that he is the author of pleasure. He invented all kinds of dances, and laid the corner-stone of all the theatres and music-halls. It is he who gives us Sunday excursions and all kinds of freedom. Satan is the liberator and the emancipator, and to his enterprise and spirit we owe such freedom and pleasure as we enjoy. In representing the principles of doubt, individuality, criticism, and the breaking of conventional chains, Satan has been the great public benefactor.

Satan has been most vilely abused, and without cause. He is called in the New Testament "the father of lies," and "a liar from the beginning"; but honesty must return the verdict of "Not proven." If he was, as the author of Revelation makes out, identical with the serpent of Eden, it appears from the story that he told our first parents the simple truth. They did not die when they ate the fruit, but lived to a ripe old age. It was the other fellow who was a liar from the beginning. As but for Eve's transgression there would have been no culture or civilisation, the Devil is entitled to our gratitude for bringing it about. He was the first advocate of woman's rights, and introduced the sex to the means of education.

Digitized by Google

Then Satan is said to have made poor old Job boil over, but he did no more than the Lord permitted him to do—indeed, put poor old Job into his hands to do; and the story shows that Satan had sized up Job quite correctly, and the Lord made a mistake when he backed his constancy against the adversary.

Then Satan is represented as tempting Jesus Christ. But he did not tempt him to turn water into wine for drunken folks, or to curse inoffensive fig-trees, or destroy other people's pigs. Jesus had been anticipating Tanner and Succi by fasting, and the Devil made the sensible suggestion that he should display his divinity by turning stones into bread. To show his divinity was the very occasion of his coming to earth, and Satan deserves thanks for his assistance. Jesus at this time lost a magnificent opportunity of converting the Devil.

The defence of Old Nick might be elaborated into a volume. Nearly all the accusations against him stultify themselves. They say "lazy as the Devil," and at the same time admit his wondrous activity. What the enemies of Satan have denounced him for is really his glory. They have, as has been pointed out, unwittingly carved him out a great reputation as the champion of personal liberty and the purveyor of manifold terrestrial delights.

UNCLE BENJAMIN.

ANGLO-ISRAEL.

"Was not Israel a derision unto thee? Was he found among thieves?"—Jeremiah xlviii. 27.

THIS is another phase of religious madness—the outcome of Bible reading. A Mr. Edward Hine has conceived the brilliant idea that the lost ten tribes of Israel, spoken of in the Bible as spiritually lost, are to be found somewhere; and the result is a crazy pamphlet, in which E. Hine states that the English are the lost tribes. He twists the most absurd Biblical quotations, gathered pell mell, to his own conceit, and defies contradiction. The crass ignorance of the man becomes patent to everyone who knows that ethnology and philology alone can decide the question which E. Hine wisely leaves out as stultifying his so-called proofs, of which he adduces forty-seven. Un embarras de richesses. Max O'Rell has found another irrefutable proof*:—

No. 48.—"Behold, my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty" (Isaiah lxv. 13).

I continue:—

No. 49.—"And I will tread down the people in mine anger, and make them drunk in my fury" (Isaiah lxiii. 6).

No. 50.—"Drink ye; and be drunken, and spue and fall, and rise no more" (Jeremiah xxv. 27).

No. 51.—Noah set the example of drunkenness (Genesis ix. 20-31). The English are the drunken nation par excellence.†

No. 52.—"Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more" (Proverbs xxxi. 7).

No. 53.—The children of Israel despoiled the Egyptians and other nations. We despoil Indians, Africans, and Maories; ergo, we must be Israel (Exodus xi. 2, xii. 35, 36; Numbers xxvi. 52-56, xxxi. 7-19; Deuteronomy and elsewhere).

No. 54.—The children of Israel worshipped the golden calf; so do we to a man; ergo, we must be Israel (Exodus xxxii. 8).

No. 55.—"I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel, but I will utterly take them away. But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God" (Hosea i. 6, 7). The Jews rank highest as regards morality, the English lowest—vide criminal statistics; ergo, we must be Israel.

No. 56.—The children of Israel committed adultery with the daughters of Moab, etc. (Numbers xxv. 1, etc.); we commit adultery with the daughters of all nations—besides our own; ergo, we must be Israel.

* John Bull and His Island.

† Zechariah ix. 15; Lamentations iv. 21.

I trust Mr. E. Hine and his followers will duly appreciate these well-merited compliments, drawn from the sacred volume. "The words of the Lord are pure words" (Proverbs xxx. 5; Psalm xii. 6). So are mine.

CHARLES KROLL LAPORTE.

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (June 29).

AT last in Scotland, wonderful Scotland! the land of poetry and romance, where religion and whisky flow in equal quantities; where orthodoxy displays its most gloomy forms, and genius pours forth its sweetest gifts to mankind. My first point is Glasgow, and this city in itself is one of the greatest productions of modern times. The modern spirit is here displayed in superb achievement. In 1700 Glasgow was scarcely more than a village; now it has over 700,000 population, and is growing rapidly. It began with the tobacco and the sugar trade, thence branched into shipbuilding and manufactures, and has become the second city in the British empire, although it still finds a strong competitor in Liverpool. What has contributed most to the extraordinary growth of Glasgow is the river Clyde. This is perhaps the most remarkable river in the world, seeing that man himself has scooped it out and given it its majestical flow. Where once was a tiny stream that one could cross over afoot on a summer's day, now sweeps a deep course, twenty-four feet deep, upon which the largest ships of the world can float. No wonder the Glasgonian is proud of his river. It beats creation. An American, "once on a time," travelling along its tide and admiring its varied scenery, remarked that it wasn't much of a river after all; that there were far bigger ones in America. "But," answered the Glasgonian, "who made your rivers?" "God, I suppose," said the other. "Well," said the indomitable Scotsman, "God didn't make this river. We made it ourselves, and you can't show a river like this in all America." This is true. The river Clyde is unique in its pride and glory. God had nothing at all to do with it. While he was "resting" man was putting in his best licks, and creating a mighty and beautiful stream. And he has to keep at it; hundreds of barges and men are at work daily fighting the sea, keeping the depths clear and preserving the banks. Every stone is kept in its place. There is one thing, however, about the river Clyde that I can't recommend. It smells awful. The sewage of the city pours into it, and it is dirty and black, as if it flowed through Hades itself. Of course, there is no escape from this at present, but efforts are being made to disinfect the stream, and make it as clean and non-perfumed as it is useful. As a matter of fact, however, the problem is a very difficult one, for the city must disgorge itself, and there is no other receptacle. But they who made the river will certainly some time know how to purify it. Seeing they don't trust in God, there are hopes of success.

I arrive at Glasgow Friday evening, June 7; and am met at the station by Mr. Gilmour, Mr. Forrester, and other Liberal friends of Glasgow. The day following, Saturday, is a wonderful day, full of resplendent and incomparable views from beginning to end. No wonder that Scotland bourgeons into poetry and romance when nature extends in such scenes of grandeur and loveliness. Under the guidance of Mr. Gilmour and Mr. Black, I journey from Glasgow to Inverary. Mr. Black is a descendant of one of the Highland clans, and knows all about this legendary country. He has lived in it and is impregnated with its lurid and luminous history, and he could tell us many a tale as we swept along.

I leave Glasgow at 7.20 in the morning in the steamer "Lord of the Isles." On either side the vast city looms and pours its smoke, and the tramp of industry is heard. Then broad fields open on the view, and far away the lofty mountains. We see the building of great ships. A thousand hammers ring forth upon the air. Ships are built here for all parts of the world, of every fashion and size. Some are of enormous bulk. We pass the greatest war cruiser now on the waters, "The Terrible," of about 15,000 tons. It looks like a leviathan, indeed, as it stretches along the wharf, massive like a mountain, yet able to skim the deep like a bird.

We glide slowly along at first, by Govan, then Renfrew, one of the oldest burghs in Scotland, from which the Prince of Wales takes the title of Baron of Renfrew; by Ellerslie House, at one time the abode of William Wallace; and Dunglass, the termination of the old Roman wall. Here, also, is the obelisk erected to the memory of Henry Bell, who was the first to apply steam power to water navigation. I must confess that I always thought that Fulton was ahead of the world, but it seems that he was not. America must yield the palm to Scotland. Bell launched his steamer, "Comet," three horse-power, on the Clyde in 1812.

Digitized by Google

Dumbarton Castle now comes in view, a height of three hundred feet above the water—a picturesque and historic spot. It is said that the Devil flung this mighty precipice after St. Patrick when he set sail for Ireland. There is a fort on it at present, and a few pieces of artillery and some ancient weapons, among them formerly the two-handed sword of Wallace. After Dumbarton Castle we behold afar the peak of Ben Lomond, and then Cardross Castle appears, where King Robert Bruce spent a few happy and peaceful days. Keeping on our course by Port Glasgow and Greenock, we arrive at Dunoon. This is one of the most ancient settlements in the kingdom, and there are evidences of a Roman encampment here. On Castle Hill are the ruins of an old castle. We here take the coaches for a trip via Loch Eck. We travel along the shores of Holy Loch and the banks of the river Echaig, into the steep-sided glens of the Ben More range. Through the immense mountain scenery, unfolding miles away, we wind along to Loch Eck, a lovely sheet of water extending through the picturesque hills for seven miles. Here we take a boat and, with a merry company, sweep over its sparkling length. A glee company happen to be on board, and they sing while we dash onward amidst the enlivening prospects. We reach the head of the loch, where we again take coaches for Loch Fyne. From secluded scenes and rugged heights we ride among well-cultivated farms, where modern improvements are seen. Near this route can be traced the line of ancient "duns," or forts, where it is told that the last stand was made against the tide of Roman conquest. At Loch Fyne we again go aboard the "Lord of the Isles" and voyage to Inverary, the ancient capital town of Argyllshire. The castle of the Duke of Argyll is here, and there is only one street in the town. It has not a very flourishing appearance. The castle grounds, however, are very attractive. There are several objects of interest, among them a cross said to have been carried from Iona, the old parish church, etc. From Inverary we make our return voyage by the Kyles of Bute. It is impossible to describe all that I witness on this tour. The Highlands of Scotland have their own peculiar beauty. They are not like the hills of Wales. The hills of Wales are like vast billows, sweeping away in majestic altitude; while the hills of Scotland are like breakers, sharp, precipitous, separate, each peak presenting a different aspect in its varying outline against the sky. The waters seem to flow in innumerable channels. They glitter in every direction; now they flow in a narrow channel, then broaden to a vast river; then spread out like a lake or sea, surrounded by every variety of landscape. The heights are mostly barren. Only sheep can find anything to eat there. At their base, however, are elegant farms and farm-houses. Everything presents a clean and thrifty appearance. Wherever there is a chance for a green thing to grow, it grows. Little bits of cultivated soil gleam like jewels amidst the grey spaces. The mountains have a spick-and-span look, as if somebody swept and dusted them every morning. There is no "careless desolation" about them, as in our own country. They have a habitable look even in their very bareness. All these varying shores have now become summer resorts. Villages are numerous, fine hotels and residences. The people of Glasgow take their "outing" in these splendid scenes. I catch a glimpse of the loch where Bradlaugh used to fish. He was very fond of fishing. It was a relief from toil and care. He would stick to it all day long, rain or shine. The fishermen still remember him as a wonderful man, genial, strong, ready, with a voice like a lion, and an arm like Wallace. With these hills and shining waters his memory will remain.

All the afternoon we speed along these radiant shores. A thousand objects attract the view, the adornments of art and the enchantments of nature. The shapes and dreams of the past possess us while the future unfolds its dancing colors. I can scarcely realise that Scotland's heights look down on me, freighted with centuries of mingling life and death. In the golden evening hour we plough the busy Clyde, and the great city presents another aspect from that of the brilliant and sunny morn, with the banners of twilight floating over it. The twilights here are wonderfully long and beautiful. Not until ten o'clock or later do the golden hues fade away from the horizon, and when they do disappear from the dim vision already the far-off faint lights of morn appear. Crowds are thronging the streets as we plunge again into the metropolis. It is Saturday night, and all is gay and festive, preparatory, I suppose, to the "holy Sabbath." They have the habit here, as in the towns of England, and in London, some parts of it, of walking in the middle of the streets—the sidewalks are so thronged. I have not noted the like in any American city, not even in the narrow thoroughfares of Boston, where it would be a convenience. Here the crowds fill street and all; and I have got into the habit myself now of "keeping to the middle of the road."

Well, Sunday comes, a real Scottish Sunday, or Sabbath, and I have the pleasure of speaking to three fine audiences of Glasgow Liberals. In the evening, especially, there is an excellent attendance. I have a warm greeting, and I thoroughly enjoy the occasion. Mr. W. G. Unkles takes the chair in the morning, and Mr. J. P. Gilmour in the afternoon and evening. In Scotland, as in England, I find an intense desire to hear Ingersoll. He would have an immense audience in Glasgow. Millions of copies of his lectures have been sold throughout these isles. No name evokes such enthusiasm as that of Ingersoll. The land of Burns would give him a royal welcome. The Glasgow Liberals believe in the good old Scottish doctrine of "the perseverance of the saints." They don't give up. They have kept the flag flying for many a year. They have splendid material, and are a power in the community. Of course Glasgow is a great church city, and the orthodox apparently rule. But still there is much of advanced thought even among the churches, especially in the Free Church. There are two main Presbyterian churches in Scotland, the Free Church and the Established Church. The Established Church will undoubtedly some day go, as it is now going in Wales. If left to the people of Scotland, it would be disestablished at once. But the clergy of the Church of England are in the way, for they see that if the Established Church of Scotland goes, although Presbyterian, the logic of events will make the Church of England go likewise. Some of the rigid orthodox have been endeavoring to expel Professor Drummond from the Free Church. But it wouldn't do, notwithstanding the glaring fact that Professor Drummond has knocked the story of Adam and Eve higher than a kite. But the wise ones in the Church have concluded to stand it.

I enjoyed Sunday afternoon the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. A. Forrester, who are staunch Liberals, and who have supported the cause for many years. The family are all Liberals, and I am indebted to them for many kindnesses.

Mr. George Gibson came over from Belfast, Ireland, to attend the lectures. I was in hopes to do some lecturing in Ireland, but probably shall not have the opportunity. There is a small society in Belfast, where lectures have been given by Foote, Forder, etc.; but it is found pretty difficult to keep the movement at the front. However, our friends don't propose to stop work. There are brave Liberals in Ireland, notwithstanding the black shadow of the cross.

I have not finished with Glasgow yet, for I shall return there after my lecture at Edinburgh, June 16, and visit the birthplace of Burns.

I leave Glasgow on Monday, June 10, for Aberdeen, in the north of Scotland. I have a lovely day's ride, and in four hours and a half reach my destination. Aberdeen is a magnificent city of nearly 150,000 population. It is called "The Granite City." The Aberdonians think it the best and handsomest city in the world. I don't blame them. It struck me at first sight as one of the most massive and beautiful of cities. It is built entirely of granite, so far as I can see; no wood or brick anywhere. The stone is not gloomy, but of bright colors, and it presents to the eye not only solidity, but brilliance. I lectured here last night to a full house, and had a lovely time, a glorious British cheer, and fair play. I shall have a good story to tell in my next of Aberdeen, of Dundee, of Edinburgh, and of Abbotsford and Melrose, haunted by the great Wizard of the North, the story-teller of the ages, who, next to Shakespeare and Homer, has given the past its most wondrous illuminations.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

BIBLES FOR CRIMINALS.

WE quote the following item of news from the Boston Daily Globe of the 18th inst.: "D. L. Moody is making an effort to place a Bible in the hands of each of the 750,000 criminals in the country. Mr. Moody is energetic, and he generally succeeds in what he undertakes."

We have no doubt that Mr. Moody thinks that he is about to confer a great blessing upon these 750,000 unfortunate criminals by placing in the hands of each of them a copy of the so-called "Word of God."

Whatever may be said of the wisdom or the folly of his proposed action, we think that all must give him credit for having good intentions; and we presume that his course will be quite generally commended as a disinterested effort to reform the criminals of the country. But we fail to discover how these unfortunate people are to be benefited by the perusal of a book which justifies and sanctions various crimes and vices, some of which have been committed in obedience to the express commands of Almighty God, if the book contains a true and reliable record of that period of the world's history which it professes to cover. In proof of this statement, we have only to cite the following verses from the book in question, as we do not wish to soil our pages by quoting them: Matthew i. 16-20; Exodus iii. 21, 22; 2 Kings x. 11-30; 1 Samuel xvi. 1, 2; Numbers xxxi. 17, 18. These are but a few of the many passages which might be quoted to show the grossly immoral teachings of the Holy Scriptures; and yet such is the character of the book which Mr. Moody proposes to present to the convicts in the various prisons throughout the land with a view to reforming them and converting them to Christianity. We are utterly unable to comprehend how these convicts are to be in any manner benefited by the perusal of such literature as that to which we have referred; but, on the contrary, we are certain that it will have precisely the opposite effect upon them, if any. Besides, Mr. Moody seems to assume that most, if not all, of the inmates of our prisons are ignorant of the Bible, and have fallen into crime because of that ignorance. If he were well acquainted with the prison statistics of the United States, he would know that almost all of the criminals now confined in these institutions are religious people, and that the number of avowed Freethinkers therein is exceedingly small. This fact would appear to indicate that Christianity has utterly failed to prevent crime; and, if so, how can it improve the moral character of these convicts? Experience teaches that some other remedy than this ought to be applied to the disease which now afflicts society, and that for the Bible some other book should be substituted. Of course, Mr. Moody has the right to squander his vast fortune in any manner in which he chooses to do so; but we will take the liberty to suggest to him that he can, and ought to, use his money to much better advantage.—Boston Investigator.

Digitized by Google

GOODNESS KNOWS.

Robed in gown of raven hue;
Snow-white linen; manner prim;
Dreamy eyes of heavenly blue;—
All the girls were mashed on him—
Spectacles with golden rim
Perched upon his Grecian nose;
Hair brushed carefully and trim—
Where his wits were goodness knows!

Every Sabbath day he came,
And he, lisping, meandered through
Platitudes both limp and lame,
Lacking aye a trace of new,
Nothing but unsavory stew
Cooked before by other beaus,
Who had made the same dish do—
Where his wits were goodness knows!

In each nicely-cushioned pew
Would be found some well-fed dame,
Or some squire whose eyelids drew
Close in sleep, as if the aim
Of the preacher was for fame
As a bringer of repose
To the tired-out, wearied frame—
Where their wits were goodness knows.

Envoy.

Both were frauds, to give them due;
Both were playing at a game:
One was prating for a screw;
Tother slept and earned a name
As a good and, I suppose,
Godly person—goodness knows!

The Gaberlunzie.

ACID DROPS.

Colonel Ingersoll was once involved in controversy with a Chicago editor who libelled Thomas Paine. When the editor found he could not prove his statements he tried to back out of the trouble by inviting the Colonel to dinner. "Sir," said Ingersoll, "I would as soon dine with Ezekiel." What sort of dinner that would be the reader may find out by consulting Holy Writ.

Colonel Ingersoll has had, if possible, a still worse invitation. "Come and join the Methodists, Robert," says the Rev. C. C. McCabe. We look forward with interest to the Colonel's reply.

It appears that the worthy McCabe was passing through a town where the Colonel was to lecture against the Bible, and seeing the posters on the walls (of course they are flaming posters in the Methodist Times account) he went to the office of a local newspaper and wrote a letter to the Freethought lecturer. It is a funny letter, and worthy of a Methodist.

"While you have been lecturing against the Bible," says the worthy McCabe, "the Methodists have built ten thousand new churches in this country." Have they? We venture to doubt it. Ten thousand is a very large number. Still, we are open to conviction. All we want is proof.

Colonel Ingersoll is told that he "has not overthrown the humblest altar upon the farthest frontiers of this Republic." Perhaps not; but he has changed the character of the worship at them. After all, a religion does not consist in buildings; it consists in the beliefs and sentiments of its professors; and Ingersoll has wrought a mighty alteration in that respect—which is really what he has aimed at doing.

"We are praying for your conversion," says the worthy McCabe. Let him pray. It is an innocent amusement. But why does he pray for Ingersoll's conversion? If the Colonel's lectures are so impotent against Christianity, it is a waste of time to trouble about him. Altogether, it does not seem that logic is the strong point of this praying Methodist.

"Take your Bible," exclaims McCabe. Well, that is just what Ingersoll is doing. He is taking the Bible round the United States and showing the people what it is, and those who hear him will probably smile at McCabe's hysterics. No doubt they will wonder why he does not answer Ingersoll, instead of telling him that there are a lot of Methodists about. Ingersoll knows it. That is one of the reasons why he is on the war-path.

"General" Booth's "shelter" in Blackfriars-road has come under the notice of the Health Committee. Dr. Waldo, the medical officer of health for Southwark, obtained a warrant to inspect the premises, but he was refused admission and met by forcible resistance. He was only admitted on threatening to seek the aid of the police. He found the place greatly overcrowded. It is asserted that several cases of small-pox have been traced to this "shelter."

Another Salvation Army "shelter" in Whitechapel has had to be closed. It is said to have been the originating centre of the recent serious epidemic of small-pox in the locality.

C. W. Freemantle, of the Charity Organisation Society, writes to the Times that between July 15 and 26 seventeen persons suffering from small-pox were admitted into the Whitechapel Infirmary, who state that they have been recently inmates of Salvation Army shelters, which, the C.O.S., urge, are "not only exercising an injurious effect upon the character of the population, but are centres of infectious disease." The members of the Board of Works for the Whitechapel district ask for a Bill to place the S.A. shelters under the provisions of the Common Lodging House Acts.

The Irish Weekly Independent (July 27) gives a cartoon exhibiting figures of Religion and Patriotism prostrate and torn by a monster labelled "Clericalism." The reports of the elections at Cork, Kildare, South Clare, Meath, Galway, Wicklow, North Mayo, Roscommon, and Sligo show that every species of priestly prompting and intimidation was used against the Parnellites. "This is not a political, but a religious, fight," said the Canon of Cork. Under the circumstances, the anti-clerical party did remarkably well.

At the church of Kill, county Meath, Father McDonnell, who took a prominent part in the Meath election in 1892, the proceedings of which afterwards formed the subject of a petition, went so far as to recommend from the altar that all should vote for Mr. Jordan. Hereupon a Mr. Larkin rose and said: "We will have no politics. Give us the Gospel of the day!" and somebody in the church called out: "Hurrah for Parnell."

The Rev. David Russell, of the Congregational Church, Maritzburg, received a call from Cape Town, and means to go, although his congregation unanimously resolves that his going would be disastrous to the Church. He says that the matter was determined by the will of God, but the amount of the call has not been specified.

One of the most extraordinary swindles on record has been unearthed in Russia. A rascal has been selling the peasants cheap tickets to the planet Jupiter, where he assured them of free land and a living without work. In packing up to leave, the peasants threw away their valued images of the saints, as the swindler assured them that the saints all lived in Jupiter, and there would be met face to face. This is a good deal like the Christian scheme of promising post-mortem felicity in return for good earthly positions and perquisites.

A striking instance, by the way, of one law for the rich and another for the poor is the application of the law against fortune-telling. If a gipsy promises a servant-girl a rich husband in return for having her hand crossed with silver, she stands a good chance of a fortnight in prison; but "Chiro the palmist" can read the hands of rich ladies in Bond-street with impunity, and priests of all faiths can get worldly possessions left to their church by threats of hell or purgatory.

Digitized by Google

The police in Manchester have arrested a Spiritist mejum, one Miss Smith, on the charge of fortune-telling by the professed aid of spirits. We do not know the merits of the case, but the local Spiritists hold that it means raid on their propaganda, and have formed a defence committee.

Borderland takes up the question of alleged spirit photography and "The 'Cyprian Priestess' Mystery," carefully avoiding the suggestion of "fraud," which to some minds, even of Spiritists, seems the only adequate one. A Mr. Glendinning published a book entitled The Veil Lifted, giving as frontispiece a spirit photograph obtained through the mediumship of Mr. David Duguid. It represented a beautiful female head, and purports to be the portrait of a girl who, centuries ago, was dedicated to the service of the temple of Venus in Cyprus.

This spirit photograph is proved to be a mere reproduction of the face of a female figure in a picture entitled "Night," by a German artist. Not only is the face the same, but also the disposition of the drapery, shadows, etc. How is it explained? Mr. Glendinning is ominously silent, and so is the "mejum" whose good faith is in question. An Edinburgh writer, Mr. Antonio, who calls himself "Edina," the credulous author of many cock-and-bull spiritist stories, excuses the "mejum" from defending himself on the ground that he is a poor unlettered mechanic. Our sub. met the same "mejum" at Glasgow over fifteen years ago, at séances held at the house of Mr. Bowman, photographer, of Jamaica-street, with whom the medium was an assistant and toucher-up of photographs. He used at that time to offer vile daubs, said to be by the spirits of Ruysdael, Jan Steen, or Turner, at prices ridiculously low if by these masters, and ridiculously high if by himself. Some semblance of a natural scene passed for a Dutch master, but mere dabs of paint or chalk sufficed for a Turner. It was through this same medium that were obtained the Revelations of Hafed, Prince of Persia, who lived at the time of Jesus Christ, and who talked and made Jesus talk in the Scotch dialect, and even copy sentences from Cassell's History.

The "mejum" gives no explanation, nor does the spirit of the Cyprian priestess; but Mr. Stead's "Julia" comes to the rescue. "Julia" dwells in the spirit-world, and tells us how it happened. It seems that when spirits want to appear to mortals "it is necessary for them to prepare what I may call a mould, by which they can impress themselves upon the photographic plate, or make themselves visible in a materialisation séance." Those who are satisfied that this explains the shadows being the same, and the medium sometimes calling his figure "Lily," sometimes "Marion," and sometimes the Cyprian priestess, should have no difficulty in swallowing the Gospel stories.

If Mr. Stead would tell us through whom he obtained this communication from "Julia" or her spirit, it might serve to unveil the mystery. There is nothing that so much assists a "mejum's" development as comparing notes with other "mejums." Examining tombstones or registers of deaths is not in it compared with this source of occult information, and when one "mejum" goes wrong a friend in the fraternity can always find an explanation.

In Light, for July 27, Captain G. W. Walrond, of Hamilton, Canada, who claims to be a "psychic lecturer and clairvoyant," is convicted of gross word-for-word plagiarism from the Rev. J. Page Hopps, whose ideas are given as Captain Walrond's own. This appears on p. 351 of Light, and on p. 360 we read that the Spiritualists' International Corresponding Society is represented in Canada by Captain G. W. Walrond, 198 Locke-street, Hamilton, Ontario. We suppose there will be some occult explanation of the plagiarism, similar to that of Mahatma Koot Hoomi having copied from Professor H. Kiddle. It is probably a case of telepathy or thought transference.

A Yankee humorist said that the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock, but some Americans began to think it would have been better if Plymouth Rock had landed on the Pilgrim Fathers.

American Puritanism is, if anything, a shade worse than English Puritanism. It seems to suffer from a chronic pruriency. Somehow or other, it is always thinking of "the flesh." It is afflicted with a furious hatred of the human form, and is bent on reducing men, and especially women, to mere bundles of clothing. Every part of their anatomy must be concealed. We shall soon hear that every person must wear gloves on his hands and a veil over his face. Even in the hottest weather, poor, perspiring human beings (to borrow a phrase of Bismarck's) will have to "stew in their own juice."

One hardly expected to read of a bad outburst of this spirit in such a city as Chicago. But you never know where to expect the "purity" craze; it crops up in unexpected places. And just now in Chicago it is "going a buster." The City Aldermen have had a solemn meeting on the great knickerbocker question, and have drawn up a new sumptuary law, which every free and independent citizen is bound to obey. Cyclists are strictly forbidden to expose an inch of stocking; they must not even wear knickerbockers; their costume must be baggy from the ankles, and their jackets must come right up to the throat. And to make the law complete, as well as impartial, it is to apply to men as well as to women.

Such is personal liberty in a leading city of the great American Republic, the land of the spread eagle, the home of freedom, etc. George Washington fought for this, and Abraham Lincoln died for it; but, after all, was it really worth doing? Well, we won't answer the question. We leave it open to discussion.

The Outlook says: "It is unfortunate that the hottest debates in the Christian Church take place on the most unimportant topics." But in theology, where nothing is known and all is speculative, all topics are equally important and unimportant. Eternal Salvation may depend upon a single misinterpretation of a letter in God's divine revelation. The Outlook has got sufficiently to the secular standpoint to see that the topics upon which Christians have usually quarrelled are of no real importance, but it would probably scout the idea that the health of a child is of more importance than the being of a God. Some day it may be seen that the so-called fundamentals of theology are of no more importance than the dogmas now discarded by liberal Christians of the type represented by the Outlook.

A correspondent of the Daily News, dating from Dunkirk, states that the belief in witchcraft still prevails in French Flanders. Some witches are reputed to enjoy the faculty of changing their outward appearance at will, and a certain old woman, who died but a few years ago, was stated to have occasionally transformed herself into a black cat. It happens, not unfrequently, that the victim of a spell appeals to the priest, and begs him to intercede and exorcise the possessing demon, as the faithful followers of Christ were given power to cast out devils.

In the poorer classes the women, when speaking of someone whose behavior they consider "uncanny," say "Il est possédé" (He is possessed). The influence of the "evil eye" is also firmly believed in, and, moreover, the fishwives have their "lucky customers." In Scotland, fishermen have a strong belief in lucky persons, and it is worthy of note that in our common expression, "He was seized by fever," we retain a survival of the old belief that disease was the work of evil spirits.

It appears from Millar's Fife: Pictorial and Historical that in Carnock parish, in the seventeenth century, one Agnes Fluckart was hailed before the "sessione" for carrying "ane can of water" on the Sabbath, and the poor creature, kneeling before the elders, "craves God's pardon," and shows "evident signes and tokens of her true and unfeigned repentance." Andrewe Andersone gets into trouble for going to the mill on the holy Sawbath, and "likewise James Stirkie for hanging a dog" upon that day—another day would not have mattered. Scotland, however, does not stand where it did on the matter of the Sawbath. The bicycle has made a vast difference within the last dozen years, and boating and yatching on the Clyde no longer excite universal comment and horror. Indeed, the company which first runs Sunday steamers from Greenock to Rothesay may occasion some outcry, but will certainly do good business.

Four children of a farm laborer at Rayleigh, who belongs to the "Peculiar People," have died within the last three months. No doctor was called in, but the children were anointed with oil and prayed over, as directed in the epistle of St. James. The jury gave their opinion that, had a doctor been called in in the earlier stages, the lives of at least two of the children would have been saved. James says that the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the "Peculiar People" are those who believe him.

The mental power exhibited by some men in old age has been cited as proof that "the soul does not age with the body." Dr. Balfour has, however, recently shown that there are physiological reasons why the normal brain remains vigorous to the last, "because its nutrition is specially provided for." The arteries which supply the brain retain their elasticity, while the others give way.

A Nonconformist protests against "Beer and Bible" being assigned as the causes of Liberal defeat. Priests and publicans, he thinks, would more nearly hit the mark.

Digitized by Google

Mr. C. C. Moore, editor of the Lexington Blue Grass Blade, an organ which combines the advocacy of Freethought with that of prohibition of the liquor traffic, states that there are in Lexington 275 saloon keepers, and not one of them is an infidel. The majority are Catholics.

God's mercies are abundant. Cholera has broken out with violence in Russia, and, as usual, is spreading westward. In the province nearest the Austrian frontier ninety-three cases and twenty-five deaths took place in one day. By landslips in Brux Bohemian over 2,000 have been left homeless.

Father J. S. Vaughan's declaration, that "men have no duties towards the brute creation," has created some consternation among humane Catholics like Dr. Berdoe.

James Harwood points out in the Inquirer that the teaching profession is largely closed to Unitarians, and that the great charitable foundations are equally sectarian. He gives an instance of a girl who was kept out of King Edward School on the ground that she attended a Unitarian Sunday-school.

The editors of El Liberal, Zacatecas, Mexico, have been excommunicated. The culprits are Freethinkers, whose crime consisted in not hiding their light under a bushel.

The English Churchman says: "The Rev. Arthur Stapylton Barnes, who has at last openly joined the Church of Rome, was promoted by the Bishop of Ely after publishing a book, The Ceremonial of the Altar, containing the full Mass doctrine of Rome, including prayers for 'Our Pope.'"

Some of the High Church Ritualists have, or profess to have, doubts as to the validity of Anglican orders—that is to say, whether they are in the true line of apostolical succession, with the descent of the Holy Ghost conferred upon them by their bishops' fingers. To stifle their doubts there are two secret societies, one called the "Order of Corporate Reunion," and the other the "Order of the Redeemer." There are Roman priests in these societies who will, for a consideration, confer the afflatus without asking applicants to go over openly to Rome.

Only two Roman Catholics have been returned for England, and one of them is somewhat shady. They are Lord Edward Talbot and T. P. O'Connor. The Catholics, except in the Scotland Division of Liverpool, have generally thrown in their lot with the Conservative party, in the hope of getting something out of the public purse for the support of their schools.

Pierre Loti, whose new book, La Galilée, is appearing as a feuilleton in the Paris Figaro, wonders that so much attention is given to Jerusalem, while "the mysterious Capernaum, Christ's own city," is so little noticed. But he assigns the reason himself. The site of Capernaum, like most Palestinian sites, is very doubtful.

Rev. Alan Grace, who stole articles from a Strand restaurant, wrote a pathetic letter to the magistrate, who remanded him with a view to his discharge under the First Offenders Act. His friends gave him a fine character, but it turns out that he has been twice suspended, and he is now doing six months.

In the shocking charge against a Bournemouth magistrate a book of prayers in the handwriting of the accused forms a material part of the evidence. The Southern Echo says: "Probably in no court in the world has such a mixture of religion, filth, and poetry been read together." But then the Bible is used in every court, and is not that a mixture that may be similarly described?

A curious advertisement appears in the Literary World. The party advertising requires books on schoolboy life of a religious character, and also medical books of a very peculiar kind. The combination is, perhaps, not so strange as it may appear at first sight.

The Conservative victories have been satisfactorily explained by the Rev. T. E. Cleworth, who declares they "are in answer to prayer. The archbishops and the bishops have prayed that their churches may be defended, and God has answered their prayers." Some sceptics may still think that the victory would have not been so pronounced if the Church had not had the alliance of the publicans.

We are glad to know what the Methodist Times regards as wisdom. "John Bright said very wisely," it remarks, "that you cannot drive half-a-dozen omnibuses abreast through Temple Bar." The statement was true enough, but where is the great wisdom? It is also true that you cannot put a quart of ale into a pint pot, or drive a camel through the eye of a needle. But nobody outside a gospel-shop ever thought these observations particularly wise.

We have recently chronicled some bad accidents in Germany and in America to trains loaded with pilgrims, and we have now to chronicle another in France. A train of twenty-four carriages, packed with pilgrims, returning from St. Anne d'Auray, left the rails near St. Brieuc. Most of the carriages were piled on one another and completely wrecked, six or eight being reduced to splinters. Twelve persons were killed on the spot, and fifty had to be taken to the hospital.

What a curious commentary on the faith principles of the Church! People go on pilgrimage to gain divine protection, yet "Providence" allows them to be smashed up as though they were blaspheming infidels.

Mrs. H. M. Walker, of Headingley, has obtained £300 damages and costs against Mr. J. Fowler Greig for seducing her daughter. The parties first met at the Congregational Chapel.

Alfred Braithwaite Emanuel was found guilty at the Central Criminal Court of obtaining money by false pretences. Although he had been previously convicted, he appealed for mercy on the ground that "there was another judgment to come," and whatever punishment he went short of in this world would be made up to him in the next. The Common Serjeant, however, was deaf to Emanuel's supplication, and gave him eighteen months.

Miss Bradford, of Great College-street, Westminster, engaged Elizabeth Brown as a Church of England servant—whatever that may be. Elizabeth, however, did not go to church, but to the Salvation Army. Perhaps she found it easier to talk to a "captain" than to a curate. Anyhow there was a quarrel over this point at Great College-street, and Elizabeth had to go. Afterwards she went to the County Court to get her wages. Such is the harmonious influence of religion, especially on female minds!

The priests of Quebec have announced that hereafter they will not give the last sacrament to one who was attended during his illness by a Protestant physician. This may lead to their bestowing extreme unction more frequently, for the Catholic physicians do not stand highest in their profession.

Something like a providential judgment is reported from Double Springs, Alabama, where the Rev. Greenleaf Lee, a Baptist minister, when in his pulpit, worked himself up into a fury on the subject of God's judgments against the wicked, and dwelt on the torments of hell. He concluded with the words, "There shall be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth," and then fell to the floor, and in a few moments was a corpse. Sensible people will say he overwrought his nervous system, and possibly ruptured a vessel of the heart; but as this explanation would not be admitted in the case of an excited unbeliever, it is open to the universalist to see in this case "God's warning against dishonoring him by preaching the doctrine of hell fire."

The Girl's Own Paper gives prominence to a Guild of Scripture Reading and Study. It is stated that the course will occupy three years and three months. Evidently the girls are to study the Bible pretty thoroughly. We hope they will use an expurgated edition.

Good old Leo XIII. has organised an Anti-Masonic Congress as a counterblast to the demonstration convoked by Signor Lemmi, Grand Master of the Italian Freemasons, for September 20, to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the taking of Rome by the Italian troops. The Masons have a definite fact to celebrate, and the Anti-Masonic Union, started by the Pope's nephew, but initiated by the Pope himself, can only express its antagonism.

The Freeman's Journal states on "good authority" that the Conservative Government will bring in a measure to establish and endow a Catholic University in Ireland. This is in agreement with the views expressed some time ago in a magazine article by Mr. Balfour. Both the Church of England and the Catholic Church will have to be paid their price, and the Conservatives will pay it willingly. Our only consolation is, that the further endowment of religion will help to strengthen the Radical demand for religious equality.

Bishop Westcott was dining at a colliery-owner's near Durham. His host was profuse in addressing him as "My lord." The youngest at the table called out: "Papa, give God some more pie."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, August 4, Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street (near Grey's monument), Newcastle-on-Tyne:—11, "Secularism and the New Parliament"; 3, "How the Bible Stands Now?" 7, "Did Jesus Christ Ever Live?"

August 11, 18, and 25, St. James's Hall, London.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. CHARLES WATTS'S ENGAGEMENTS.—August 4, Camberwell; 11, Camberwell; 18 and 25, Milton Hall, London.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

FRIEND.—Seeley's book to hand. Thanks.

PERPLEXED (Liverpool).—If you are bent on "accounting for nature," you have a big job on hand. Your funeral will take place before it is completed. Atheism, as we understand it, does not undertake that impossible task.

A BIRMINGHAM gentleman, who spells support "surport," and other words just as elegantly, is anxious to have a debate with Mr. Foote. Mr. Foote does not share his anxiety.

S. R. SIMMONDS.—Your order handed to Mr. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C., to whom all orders for literature should be sent direct.

W. CASELL points out that the texts, 1 Timothy iv 1-4 and 1 Cor. x. 25, are opposed to vegetarianism, while Acts x. 13 may be interpreted symbolically.

W. H. PACEY.—Certainly no one can compel you to have the Christian superstition taught to your children at Sunday-school.

J. T. wishes to know in what collection of hymns appears a couplet attributed to Dr. Isaac Watts—

> This infant is the mighty God
> Come to be suckled and adored.

We should think the only chance of finding it is to go to the earliest edition.

A. W. STAVENS.—Thanks for the cuttings, etc.

J. G. BARTRAM.—Mr. Foote regrets his inability to join the Newcastle Branch's excursion on Monday. Very important business necessitates his return to London.

G. F. B. (Maritzburgh, Natal).—Thanks for paper.

C. WRIGHT.—In Bible times servants were slaves.

G. WARD.—We regret that the unofficial announcement for Finsbury Park was inserted instead of your own, and will be more careful in future.

G. S.—(1) A talent of gold has been variously estimated as worth from £5,475 to £7,280, and a talent of silver from £450 to £187 10s. Probably the latter is meant in Matthew xxv. A silver shekel is estimated as worth about 2s. 7d. The difference in value between gold and silver in ancient times varied; but the estimates of David's wealth in 1 Chronicles xxii. 14 and xxix. 4-7, and the statement of 1 Kings ix. 20 that silver was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon, are probably pure "brag." (2) The word "Samos" is not given in our Concordance.

LIVERPOOL.—Members of the committee are earnestly appealed to to attend the meeting this (August 4) evening, with a view to making arrangements for carrying on the propagandist work during the winter.

A. J. WHITE.—Better let Miss Vance have them for distribution. Thanks.

A. B. MOSS.—We are very sorry to hear of your wife's dangerous illness, but we hope she will soon recover. It is a hard life in this world at the best, and without sympathy it would be intolerable to most of us.

H. JONES.—Sorry to hear the Blackburn Branch is enrolling few fresh members. We hope all our readers in the locality will join, and thus bring about the union which is strength.

J. BROWN (Manchester).—Alas! there is too much truth in your letter. We are on the watch.

J. H. WIPER.—The subject is hardly worth more of our space. Certainly the row at Mr. Foote's lecture in Sunderland was disgraceful; but we do not care to spend time in discussing who was most to blame, though we believe the fellow Powell was chiefly responsible for the ill-temper displayed.

J. G. DIBSON.—Thanks for your cordial letter. Mr. Foote will be happy to pay Stockton a visit. The whole district should be thoroughly well worked. Branches alone and unaided are not equal to the task of doing justice to our cause. Mr. Foote cannot help seeing this, and he intends to organise a lecturing scheme himself, by which our principles may be far more extensively propagated. The subject will be dealt with at length in a week or two. Meanwhile, you may rely upon it that Stockton will not be neglected.

J. RITCHIE.—Thanks. See "Sugar Plums."

R. DOWDING, Mayfield Villa, Gloster-road, Walthamstow, will be glad to distribute any Freethought literature that may be sent him for the purpose. This correspondent says he personally interviewed Mr. Pollen, the Radical candidate, who said he did not believe that anyone should be allowed to publish pamphlets ridiculing his religion. Poor man!

W. REID.—See paragraph. Thanks.

W. J. VAUGHAN.—No offence, certainly. Why should there be? Without reckoning fish, cats are quite as honorable as the average parson, and rather better tempered with the "kids." Cats never put cats into prison for a difference of opinion; cats never burnt cats for the glory and honor of God.

G. CROOKSON.—A rare bird indeed! See paragraph.

J. MACGLYNN, president, Independent Literary Federation, 50 Mill-road-street, Calton, Glasgow, will supply Secularists on application with leaflets exposing the "Controversial Methods" of a certain foul-mouthed Christian-Evidencer who has lately been darkening their city.

R. CHAPMAN notifies that the South Shields Branch has no meetings to-day (August 4), in consequence of Mr Foote's lectures at Newcastle.

E. H.—(1) Don't you see that faith in the two connections has different meanings? Faith, in the religious sense, is a special faculty, or its operation; while faith, in the secular sense, is only belief founded on knowledge. Religious people say that we have faith that the sun will rise to-morrow. But that faith is based upon long experience and an acquaintance with the laws of astronomy. When they have faith that they will go to heaven, for instance, it is faith without any personal experience, or any sort of appeal to a natural law supported by general experience. (2) We cannot yet answer this question, though we hope to shortly.

F. S.—You may find something about Adam's first wife, Lilith, in Baring Gould's Old Testament Legends and Characters.

J. T. CARPENDALE.—Glad to hear the Bradford Branch is carrying on an active open-air campaign. Mr. Foote will offer you an early date shortly. He has lectured in the Oddfellows' Hall before.

W. PACE.—See paragraph. Mr. Foote is in excellent health; so are Messrs. Watts and Wheeler.

MR. PUTNAM stated in his "News and Notes," and it was reprinted in the Freethinker, that Mr. W. H. Lever, of Port Sunlight, the Radical candidate at Birkenhead, was a Freethinker and a supporter of the late Charles Bradlaugh. Mr. Lever's attention having been called to this, he states that he is and always has been a Congregationalist, and that he was never a supporter of Mr. Bradlaugh, who "maintained himself by his lectures." Of course Mr. Putnam did not use the word "supporter" in that sense; on the other point he was apparently misinformed.

J. M. R.—(1) Licensing laws of course involve a certain control, and it is reasonable that the control should be local; but the Local Veto Bill had a prohibition clause. (2) Please to hear that you derive "inspiration" from the Freethinker. (3) An Index would only be useful if printed separately for binding. We do not know whether there would be any general demand for it.

J. SCHOFIELD.—Thanks for report of Ben Tillett's speech, though it is too purely political for comment in our columns.

PAPERS RECEIVED.—Newcastle Evening Chronicle—Echo—Light—Western Figaro—Two Worlds—Progressive Thinker—Open Court—Ironclad Age—Glasgow Weekly Herald—Accrington Observer—New York Public Opinion—Truthseeker—Der Arme Teufel—Freidenker—Torch—Times of Natal—Diamond Fields Advertiser—Irish Weekly Independent—Isle of Man Times—Crescent—Secular Thought—Boston Investigator—Twentieth Century.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

CORRESPONDENCE should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

IT being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SUGAR PLUMS.

MR. FOOTE'S lecture on "The Bible and Local Veto" drew a large audience (in spite of the rain) to Milton Hall on Sunday evening. Judging from the laughter and applause, the lecture was highly appreciated. Some questions were asked at the close, but no one offered opposition. The chair was efficiently occupied by Mr. James Rowney, who urged his auditors to do their utmost to make Mr. Foote's course of lectures at St. James's Hall a thorough success.

London Freethinkers should do their utmost to render Mr. Foote's lectures at St. James's Hall a thorough success.

Digitized by Google

Full particulars of these meetings will be found in our advertising columns. Friends who can display a poster or circulate neat handbills are earnestly requested to communicate with Miss Vance at 28 Stonecutter-street. She will also be glad to hear from known friends who are willing to take tickets and try to dispose of them amongst their acquaintances.

Mr. Foote lectures at Newcastle-on-Tyne to-day (August 4), when he will formally open the new hall taken by the Branch in the heart of the city. His subjects are attractive, and no doubt the hall will be crowded. Mr. Foote will be happy to see as many as possible of his Tyneside friends on this occasion, as it is a considerable time since he last visited the district.

After the evening lecture the Newcastle Branch will hold its adjourned annual meeting of members, for the election of officers, etc. Mr. Foote will be present, and all members are requested to attend. On Monday (Bank Holiday) the Branch takes its annual excursion to Morpeth. The train leaves Central Station at 10.15. Gentlemen's tickets, 3s.; ladies' tickets, 2s.

Mr. Charles Watts is delivering three Sunday evening lectures at the Camberwell Secular Hall. He had an excellent audience last Sunday, when he dealt with the question, "Does Death End All?" A correspondent speaks very highly of Mr. Watts's discourse, and says the South London friends are looking forward to two further treats.

Mr. S. P. Putnam was not lecturing on Sunday, so he took a trip to Canterbury, and saw the old town and the older cathedral. His last lecture before leaving England will be delivered in London on the first Sunday in September. Mr. Foote will see to the organisation of this meeting, as he did on the occasion of the first meeting at the Hall of Science. He will also take the chair as before.

Acting on Mr. Foote's instructions, Miss Vance has engaged a room at the Holborn Restaurant for a farewell dinner in honor of Mr. Putnam a few days before he sets sail from Southampton. The tickets for this function are four shillings each. Mr. Foote will take the chair, and amongst those present will be Mr. Watts and probably Mr. George Anderson. Applications for tickets should be made to Miss Vance as early as possible.

Mr. William Heaford occupies the Milton Hall platform this evening (August 4), and speaks upon "The Problem of Evil." Much nonsense has been uttered on this subject, but Mr. Heaford will not add to the quantity of it. What he says is sure to be sensible. We hope he will have a good meeting and some good discussion. The admission at Milton Hall is free, a collection being taken to defray expenses. We are not allowed to charge at the doors. Freethinkers, at any rate, should therefore put into the plate as much as they would have paid elsewhere for their seats.

Mr. C. Cohen has visited Blackburn for a few days, and his lectures have produced a very favorable impression in the town. The Branch hopes to have him at Blackburn again for a few weeks, when it is hoped the local organisation of Freethought will be materially strengthened.

Mr. Cohen has also visited Stockton-on-Tees. His audiences were not very large, but they improved as he went along, and the Branch believes that a great deal of good will accrue if the effort is followed up.

The Literary Guide (Watts & Co.) for August contains No. VII. of "Literary Chats" by Mr. F. J. Gould. This particular chat is with the President of the National Secular Society. Mr. Gould paid Mr. Foote a visit in his library, and he tells the reader about the books he saw there. The article is written in an interesting style.

The Failsworth Secular Sunday-school took its annual outing on Saturday, July 27. The teachers and scholars visited Hebden Bridge and the Hardcastle Crags, one of the most picturesque bits of scenery in the north of England. Musical selections were rendered by the Sowerby Bridge brass band. Altogether the excursion was most enjoyable.

The Metaphysical Magazine, the July number of which we receive from 503 Fifth Avenue, New York, is a sort of American Borderland; but, instead of being dominated by Stead's "Julia," it has a number of signed articles by contributors of various opinions. The writers are able, though of a mystical cast. Mr. C. S. Wake, the author of The Evolution of Morality, opens with a paper on "The Power of Concentration," which he regards as the secret of strength and of hypnotic power. Charles Johnston writes on "The Message of India." Dr. Elizabeth Hotchkiss offers a psychological study of "La Svengali," a character in Du Maurier's Trilby; and Dr. Brodbeck, of the Advisory Council of the World's Parliament of Religions, writes on "The Ideal of Universities." The Metaphysical Magazine is conducted by L. E. Whipple, and is stated to be "Devoted to Occult, Philosophic, and Scientific Research." If it would confine itself to the latter departments, it might do a useful work; but, in our experience, Occultism leads to cant no less than to charlatanry.

In Cairo not only is University education entirely free, but the students, numbering 10,000 a year, are also supplied with free meals. Yet Christians talk of the backwardness of Moslems, while the fact is that to them and to the Jews they owe the beginnings of European education.

The Ironclad Age says: "Paine and Wesley both came from England to America. Wesley labored to give us a creed, Paine to give us a country."

In Open Court, of Chicago, Dr. F. L. Oswald writes on Huxley as "The British Diagoras," and alludes to the practical character of his labors. He says: "He calls attention to the enormous amount of time, labor, and parchment which the scholastic visionaries of the Middle Ages wasted on purely fatuous topics. He mentions theologians who quarrelled like bull-dogs about the gala-day dress of the Holy Virgin, and the comparative speed of winged demons and heavenly messengers. He enumerates scores of theosophical problems that have been argued with battle-axes, though a vestige of common sense should have recognised them as more unprofitable than a dispute about the age of the man in the moon."

Public Opinion, of New York (July 18), devotes three columns to extracts from American papers on "Professor Huxley and Religion." The New York Evening Post says his greatest work was in the promotion of intellectual honesty. The Critic says: "When a few years have passed and the dust of recent struggles has been laid, the history of modern progress will be more clearly discerned. It will then become evident that our century has been the era of what Huxley emphatically styled a 'New Reformation,' in which he has been one of the most efficient leaders."

The New York Catholic Freeman's Journal speaks of him as a protagonist of the modern anti-Christian school of Darwinians. It says: "We have used the phrase, 'anti-Christian school,' in reference to these men designedly; for, though they did not attack Christianity with the directness and bitterness of Voltaire, Paine, and others of that class, they yet attacked it indirectly and insidiously; and, if their theories were once accepted as truths, the result would be the same—the overthrow of the Christian religion."

The Outlook, in an article on Huxley, says: "His ethical standards are noble, and part of his hostility to institutional religion is due to his conviction that orthodoxy gives the sanction of the Church and the Bible to low and false ethical ideals. As Mr. Morley in literature, so Mr. Huxley in science, represents with great ability, with absolute candor, and, we believe, with perfect sincerity of conviction, that modern humanitarianism which would divorce morals from religion and retain the former without the latter. In our judgment, the divorce is impossible—the moral life is the religious spirit applied to daily conduct. But we are quite willing to see the attempt made, and we recognise the sincerity and earnestness of the endeavor."

Dr. Heber Newton's heresy, that Christ was not physical, but only spiritual, whatever that may mean, is still exciting much controversy in New York. The Sun of that city very sensibly says: "We can only believe in the resurrection because we believe in revelation. It is a dogma, not a scientific demonstration. It must be given up altogether as beyond the reach of human knowledge, or it must be accepted on faith, as the miracle of the incarnation, equally opposed to all science, must be accepted. If God himself has not told men of the resurrection, they are absolutely and hopelessly in the dark regarding it. They cannot construct any reasonable theory of it. One man's opinion on the subject is as good as another's, for nobody's is worth anything." A daily newspaper could not be expected to go much further in the admission that the whole story is baseless.

Public Opinion, of New York, recognises the Freethinker as an independent organ of opinion, and quotes from our columns on the question of Herbert Spencer's Agnosticism.

As we expected, Mr. W. H. Burr, of Washington, the persistent advocate of the claims of Paine to be "Junius," shouts Hallelujah over the newly-discovered letters of Junius. He declares "the sentiments expressed in the letter on priestcraft are diametrically opposed to those of Philip Francis, and in entire accord with those of Thomas Paine."

Digitized by Google

Mr. J. E. Ellis has been returned for Rushcliffe. He promised to support the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. The Conservative candidate did not answer the questions put to him on this subject. Dr. Farquharson, member for West Aberdeenshire, said he would most certainly vote for the repeal of the Blasphemy Laws.

Mr. Ashton, the new member for South Bedfordshire, satisfactorily answered all our "Questions for Candidates," after an interview with Mr. William Rudd, of Luton, one of the sturdiest Freethinkers in that locality. Mr. Ashton's answers were given in writing.

Mr. George Crookson, of Hoyland Common, near Barnsley, submitted our "Questions for Candidates" to Mr. F. S. Hatchard, a candidate in his division. This gentleman must have hatched very hard indeed, if we may judge by his reply. He says that Secular Societies are "not kept without legal security," that "Legacies left to Secular Societies are not withheld," that "Freethought is not a crime under existing laws," and that "You can bequeath what you like to Secular Societies under existing laws." Mr. Hatchard is either very ignorant (on this subject) or very—something else. We let him make his own selection.

Lord Morpeth and Sir James Joicey, in the Chester-le-street division, were both in favor of abolishing the Blasphemy Laws. The former was returned by a large majority.

THE HONORARIUM TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

It will be remembered that at the last Conference of the National Secular Society a letter was read from Mr. George Anderson, suggesting that its President "should be recouped for his loss of time and money in serving the party's interests." Accordingly, the Conference appointed a Committee, consisting of Mr. George Anderson, Mr. Charles Watts, Mr. Robert Forder, and Mr. George Ward, to consider the best plan to be adopted for carrying out the suggestion. The Committee met and drew up a circular, which probably most of the readers of the Freethinker have seen.

This Committee unanimously passed the following resolution, proposed by Mr. George Anderson, and seconded by Mr. George Ward: "That the sum to be paid the President of the N.S.S. for this year be £100, to be confirmed, augmented, or diminished each year by vote of the Conference."

By this resolution it was the desire of the Committee to carry out the object, for which it had been appointed by the congress of delegates, in the most satisfactory manner both as to terms and amount, leaving the Society to act yearly in future as circumstances might dictate.

It is to be hoped that what has been done will meet with the approval of the Secular party, and that its members will subscribe the required amount as promptly as possible.

CHARLES WATTS.

[Subscriptions can be sent to Miss Vance, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C., or paid to any member of the Committee.]

Subscriptions Received:—

Already acknowledged, £47 9s. 6d.

Per R. Forder: Mr. Waller, 5s.; J. Thackray, 2s. 6d.; B. Thackray, 2s. 6d.; G. L. Mackenzie, 2s. 6d.; W. W. Roberts, 5s.; G. F. Wenborn, 10s.; A Materialist, 5s.

Per Miss Vance: F. J. and G. Brady, £1; W. H. Stevens, £1 1s.; C. Shepherd, 2s.; G. H., 2s. 6d.; W. Johnson, 5s.; G. W., 2s.; C. B., 10s.; A. F., 2s. 6d.; A. Anderson, 5s.; Mrs. Penny, 5s.; H. Price, 2s. 6d.; H. S. Ashford, 3s. 6d.; W. S., 10s. 6d.; W. H. Morrish, £1 1s.

Per Mr. Watts: S. A. Gimson, £1; D. Baker, £1 1s.; R. Bulman, 5s.

Per Mr. Foote: G. R., £3; E. Truelove, £2.

A thief, who was tried on a charge of having stolen eight Bibles, valued at twenty-five shillings, had the impudence to tell the magistrate that he stole the books "to start a Sunday-school."

ANIMALS' RIGHTS.

THOUGH the general public is only now beginning to recognise that the lower animals, like human beings, have rights, the subject is one which has attracted the attention of many thinking minds. Thus, Emeritus Professor F. W. Newman, in a published letter, has said: "Evidently the reason why it is wicked to torture a man is not because he has an immortal soul, but because he has a highly sensitive body; and so has every vertebrate animal, especially the warm blooded. If we have no moral right to torture a man, neither have we a moral right to torture a dog." And again: "We have to add to our morals a new chapter on the Rights of Animals. Men who teach to trample them down are teachers of hard-heartedness, and are real enemies of mankind, while they undertake to promote human welfare."

Professor Youatt, one of the greatest of English veterinarians, and an exceptionally distinguished humanitarian, says, in his introduction to his work on The Obligation and Extent of Humanity to Brutes, Principally Considered with Reference to the Domestic Animals: ". . . . the claims of the lower animals to humane treatment, or at least to exemption from abuse, are as good as any that man can urge upon man. Although less intelligent and not immortal, they are susceptible to pain; but because they cannot remonstrate nor associate with their fellows in defence of their rights, our best theologians and philosophers have not condescended to plead their cause, or even to make mention of them, although, as just asserted, they have as much right to protection from ill-usage as the best of their masters have. Nay, the matter has been carried further than this. At no very distant period the right of wantonly torturing the inferior animals, as caprice or passion dictated, was unblushingly claimed; and it was asserted that the prevention of this was an interference with the rights and liberties of man."

Sir Arthur Helps, in his Talks About Animals and their Masters, quotes a remarkable passage, applying the principle of natural law to the rights of animals, from the works of that great writer of jurisprudence, Jeremy Bentham, who says: "The day may come when the rest of the animal creation may acquire those rights which never could have been withheld from them but by the hand of tyranny. It may come one day to be recognised that the number of legs, the villosity of the skin, or the termination of the os sacrum, are reasons insufficient for abandoning a sensitive being to the caprice of the tormentor. What else is it that should trace the inseparable line? Is it the faculty of reason, or, perhaps, the faculty of discourse? But a full-grown horse or dog is, beyond comparison, a more rational as well as a more conversable animal than an infant of a day or a week, or even a month old. But suppose the case were otherwise, what could it avail? The question is not, Can they reason? nor, Can they speak? but, Can they suffer?"

In the sense that men have rights, animals have rights (though in a smaller degree) which should be respected; justice requires it. Justice is due to all human beings; this being so, "how is it possible to evade the admission that we are bound also to act justly towards the races below us?" asks Porphyry, one of the finest humanitarian philosophers of the Roman Empire, who, along with Seneca and Plutarch, taught humanity on the broadest principle of universal benevolence.

JOSEPH COLLINSON.

Pious Unveracity.

The great body of men affecting the name of good and pious have unconsciously abnegated the sacred privilege and duty of acting or speaking the truth, and fancy that it is not truth that is to be acted, but that an amalgam of truth and falsity is the safe thing. In parliament and pulpit, in book and speech, in whatever spiritual thing men have to commune of or to do together, this is the rule they have lapsed into, this is the pass they have arrived at. We have to report that Human Speech is not true! that it is false to a degree never witnessed in this world till lately.—Thomas Carlyle.

Obituary.

DR. ROBERT LEWINS, who has recently died at the age of seventy-eight, was chiefly known as the advocate of Hylo-Idealism, and the introducer of Miss Constance Naden to the reading world. He had served in the army as medical surgeon-in-chief, in the Crimean War and in India, and was the author of many contributions to philosophy.

Pointing to another world will never stop vice among us; shedding light over this world can alone help us.—Whitman.

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

Renie, by James Prior, is the pathetic story of an illegitimate child, who discovers her father in the person of the Rev. C. Millar, a popular Nonconformist sky-pilot. Her claim for recognition is refused, and the girl is led to believe her mother also desires to thrust her away. She dies of starvation, and her father is preaching to a wrapt congregation of heaven—"leading them down the golden street, like a beatific cicerone. . . . I see it! I see it! the Pearl of Cities! My eye is rich with its glory—" "Down from that pulpit, Clarence Millar! Down from that pulpit!" It was his wife's voice. She had found her daughter just too late. The story is sufficiently life-like to make some think it may be founded on fact.

* * *

Nature in Arcadia, by H. K. Swann (Swann & Co., 2 Bouverie-street, E.C.), is a description of Nova Scotia, dedicated to H. D. Thoreau. It possesses some of the characteristics of that author, Mr. Swann evidently being a keen student and lover of nature as well as an authority on one of nature's beautiful products—birds.

* * *

Mr. H. T. Finck, in Lotos Times in Japan, eulogises the heathen Jap. The crimes which in Christian lands have necessitated the establishment of Societies for the Protection of Children from Cruelty do not exist in Japan. There are no such societies in "the England of the East." It was Sir Rutherford Alcock who said that Japan was "the paradise of babies." We are also told that, unlike Christian nations, the Japanese have no need to establish Societies for the Protection of Animals. "The Japanese pray for the souls of their horses and cows."

* * *

Augusta Klein, in her description of scenes in India, entitled Among the Gods, mentions a visit to the tooth of Buddha. This tooth has suffered strange vicissitudes of fortune since it left Gautama's jaws, if it ever saw them. Concealed in the hair of the pious Princess of Kalinga, it arrived in Ceylon at the beginning of the third century of our era. Captured in 1315 by the Malabars, borne away to India, and thence recovered, it eventually fell into the hands of a Portuguese archbishop of Goa, who in 1560 pounded the same in a mortar, and burnt the dust thereof. From all which vicissitudes it miraculously recovered itself, to repose at length in the peaceful splendors of its illustrious Kandyan home.

* * *

Sheikh Abdullah Quilliam, of Liverpool, announces in the Crescent that his new work, Studies in Islam, is now in the press, and will shortly be published at the price of half-a-crown.

* * *

M. Théodore Reinach, himself a Jew, has published in French the texts of Greek and Roman authors relative to Judaism. The texts clearly show that anti-Semitism is no new thing. God's chosen race, by their exclusiveness, seem to have drawn upon themselves the odium of nearly all who knew them. A curious charge brought by several authors was, that they were really worshippers of Sabazius, a form of Dionysius or Bacchus. Their Sabbath and Feast of Tabernacles may have led to this, and the strange charge of ass-worship may have been connected therewith.

* * *

The Edinburgh Review, noticing Mr. Balfour's book, says: "The main outcome of The Foundations of Belief is the glorification of authority at the expense of reason."

* * *

A translation of Beyschlag's New Testament Theology forms the latest volume of T. T. Clark's Foreign Theological Library. Dr. Beyschlag holds to a sort of Conservative Unitarian standpoint, rejecting inspiration and toning down supernaturalism.

* * *

In the Catholic Month there is an article on "The Origin and Development of the Vatican Library," by Mr. W. Hone. He says the credit of being the real founder belongs to Nicholas V. (1448-1453), at whose death the number of volumes was 1,160, of which about 350 were Greek Mss. If Christians would reflect upon this admission that at Rome there was no great library, even for the Popes, until the fifteenth century, it might prove an eye-opener.

* * *

Mr. Putnam says that Ingersoll's poem on Robert Burns is kept in a case at the cottage near Ayr, with the inscription, "By an unknown American admirer." It will probably soon be known after this who the admirer is, and his tribute will be allowed to be one worthy of the great Scotch poet.

The Daily News, reviewing Mr. H. Somers Somerset's Land of the Muskeg, says that in the immense area of the Hudson's Bay territory the rival Catholic and Protestant missionaries seek to capture each other's converts rather than to convert the heathen Indians. Between the Anglican and the Romanist it is a game of pull-devil-pull-baker for the perplexed red man's soul. The Anglicans, giving more doles, generally get the pull in the winter-time; but in the summer the Indians revert to Catholicism, which has been longer established there.

* * *

Mr. Somerset tells the Cree Indians' legend of a universal deluge, in which the Wanderer builds a big canoe and takes in many kinds of animals. After he had been on the water many days, he got a young beaver to dive down to see if the water was still deep, or if the flood were abating. But the little animal was afraid to dive too deep, and returned, saying that he saw nothing but water and no land. Then the "Wanderer" was angry, for he knew that the little beaver had not done his best, therefore he cursed him, saying, "Cursed shalt thou be; thou shalt never grow, nor thy tail grow, but thou shalt only imitate the beavers." And this was the first musk-rat. Then he sent a big beaver, and he swam and reached the bottom, and brought a little earth up with him to the side of the canoe, and there he died. So the "Wanderer" took the grains of earth and blew upon them, and the world arose and was dry. And he blessed the beavers, and said that they should always try to dam the streams and stop them running, lest they might again flood the whole earth. That touch about the musk-rat would alone be enough to upset any theory about borrowing from Semitic legend.

* * *

In Sir Edwin Arnold's Tenth Muse, and Other Poems, there is "The Story of the Snake," from the Mahabharata. It well illustrates the Hindu fatalistic doctrine of Karma. A snake kills a boy, and is reproached. The snake lays the blame on Death, and Death on Kâla, the god of gods. But Kâla speaks, and declares that neither the snake, death, nor he is to blame. The boy killed himself.

> The Karma of this child did kill this child;
> No other cause was there that brought its end:
> Of Karma he did die. That which he wrought
> In many lives ere this, led hereunto > Implicitly.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> For will makes deeds,
> And deeds make Karma, and the Karma makes
> The outcoming. As when ye press the clay
> This way and that, and see it harden, so
> Men for themselves shape Fate. Shadow and light
> Are not more surely tied each unto each
> Than man to Karma, and to Karma man;
> Therefore perceive and ponder. Therefore know
> Not I, nor Mrityu, nor the Snake, nor she,
> The Brahman mother, brought this death about;
> The child did bring it: it was his doing, his,
> Fixed from the flowing past, inevitable.

Science and Theology.

Theology of the old stamp, so far from encouraging us to love nature, teaches us that it is under a curse. It teaches us to look upon the animal creation with shuddering disgust; upon the whole race of man, outside our narrow sect, as delivered over to the Devil; and upon the laws of nature at large as a temporary mechanism, in which we have been caught, but from which we are to anticipate a joyful deliverance. It is science, not theology, which has changed all this; it is the Atheists, Infidels, and Rationalists, as they are kindly called, who have taught us to take fresh interest in our poor fellow denizens of the world, and not to despise them because Almighty benevolence could not be expected to admit them to heaven. To the same teaching we owe the recognition of the noble aspirations embodied in every form of religion, and the destruction of the ancient monopoly of divine influences; and it is science again that has taught us to accommodate ourselves to the laws in which we are placed, instead of fruitlessly struggling against them, and invoking miraculous interference to conquer them.—Leslie Stephen's "Freethinking and Plain Speaking," pp. 353-4.

MR. PUTNAM'S ENGAGEMENTS.

August 11, Failsworth; 18, Leicester; 25, Liverpool.

Mr. Putnam will return to New York on Sept. 7, therefore friends who have not engaged him should communicate with Mr. Watts at once. Societies near any of the above towns requiring week-night lectures should arrange for Mr. Putnam to visit them when he is in their district on the Sunday.

Digitized by Google

A KIRK MANAGER'S ESCAPADE.

An episode occurred the other Sunday, in the United Presbyterian Church here, which gave greater entertainment to the congregation than either the maunderings of the minister anent heaven and hell, or the melodious warblings of the choir as to Moab being their wash-pot, and Edom the most convenient place to cast their shoes; while, as an object-lesson showing the remarkable power of the gospel in keeping men sober and of good report, it stands as one of the brightest and most unique upon their records. This particular Sabbath there appeared at the kirk door one of the leading managers arrayed in the tall, but necessary lum', hat, full of the Spirit, and worship written doggedly on his visage. In vain did the plate-watchers coax him to return home; inside the kirk he would go—his maker had need of him; and inside he went, stalking steadily up the aisle. Seating himself, he threw his head forward, leaning upon the book-board, lum' hat still on; and, before the shocked congregation could count six, he was locked in the arms of Morpheus. Immediately began the most frightful stertorous snores that ever emanated from a human nostril. The audience smiled, smiles became convulsive, smothered, choking laughter; in vain did the Rev. Mr. Leitch (the minister of that other religion called the Free Kirk, who happened to be officiating on this occasion) endeavor to bawl the sleeper down. Louder and louder grew the sound. The worshippers could have been tied with straws at thus witnessing the unequal match, till at last the man of God lost his Christian patience, and, in most un-Christian tones, roared out: "Stop that man." Methinks, if the delinquent had looked up, he might have proudly replied: "Man! Ca' ye me a man; I'm no' a man, I'm a manager of the Kirk!" However, at last a mild individual rose, and, touching the somnolent one, told him he was disturbing the people. I cannot exactly vouch what the reply was, but the Glasgow Evening News had a short paragraph in which it stated he testily yelped out: "Whaur's the fire? whaur's the fire?"

I may add that the erring gent has been seen at the worshipping business since, quite awake, so that "all's well that ends well."

S. C.

"THE" BOOK.

Oh, Blessed Book! Oh, Glorious Book!
Seeking to save our souls alive;
Why is it that our reason's glow
To stifle ever thou dost strive?

In thee, Oh Book of mystery vague,
We place implicit confidence;
With boundless faith absorb thy love,
And never ask for evidence.

'Tis said thou'rt written by the God
That guided Israel of old;
So if we ne'er let doubt creep in
We're sure to bring up "in the fold."

Oh, Book! thou'rt truly Godlike in
Thy wisdom and thy purity:
Which may explain why, of thee, much
Is best left in obscurity.

Thy contents point the inference
That he who's called thy author, Book!
In morals and in knowledge must
Up to the human being look.

This being so, we then declare
This earth has had enough of thee.
Hie thee hence! Thou art not fit
To be in our society.

Then, without thee, the throbbing heart
Of all humanity shall burn
With love of Truth, and Science grand,
And swift the wheel of Progress turn.

Our minds shall never crystallise:
Each opening thought shall welcome find.
All hail the day that ushers in
The Heaven of Reason for mankind.

THOR.

The divorce between Church and State should be absolute.—Garfield.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A RADICAL PROGRAM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I know yours is not a political paper, and that you seek rather to mould ideas than to model institutions. But at the present time, when everyone is talking politics, we Freethinkers might look round and see if the Liberal discomfiture cannot be made to subserve the interests of Freethought. I think it can. Let us point out to Liberals that the Church is practically united against them. Let us urge them to go for the Church. There is no more crying injustice than the absence of religious equality. Not only the Welsh and Scotch, but the English Church must be disestablished and disendowed before religious equality is won, and the attack should now be made, not on the outworks, but on the citadel. With this would be associated the beginning of reform of the Lords, by relieving bishops from their temporal duties in the Upper Chamber. A stout propaganda against the Church would attack the Conservatives on their weakest side, and if Sir William Harcourt is not the man to take it up I hope that John Morley or Mr. Asquith will. A propaganda for religious equality should be started, which will not rest until all churches are equal, blasphemy laws and Sunday laws are abolished, and theology is banished from the domain of politics.

PERKIN WARBECK.

PROFANE JOKES.

Sunday-school Teacher—"Can any boy tell me about Good Friday?" Little Boy—"He was the felly what done work for Crusoe."

Rev. Dr. Scowler—"What a large number of young men you have in your congregation. Do you always have so many?" Rev. Dr. Howler—"Oh, no. Last Sunday evening I announced that to-night I would preach a special sermon to young women."

"Suppose, Bobbie, that another boy should strike your right cheek," asked the Sunday-school teacher, "what would you do?" "Give him the other cheek to strike," said Bobbie. "That's right," said the teacher. "Yes," said Bobbie, "and if he struck that, I'd wallop him!"

"Beg pardon, sir," said the passenger in the skull cap, tired of the monotony of the journey, and desirous of scraping an acquaintance with the man in the next seat, "are you travelling for some house?" "No, sir," replied the other. "I am not in business. I am a Universalist preacher." "Shake!" rejoined the man in the skull cap, heartily. "I'm an agent for a fire-extinguisher myself."

Olive F. Gumby, in the New York Post, says: "Visiting in North Carolina some years ago, I was urged by a colored attendant to go to a camp-meeting near by to hear an 'edication' (educated) preacher. I went; and this was part of the sermon I heard: 'De Bible is a wery ole book, my brederin, a wery ole book. It neber was fixed no sich fashion as it is now een de old days. It used to be print on rolls what could be mash up een a mighty leetle size. Saint Paul, he lub de Gospel dat much till he swallow one ob dem rolls. Dat make de scribe certify dat de word of God was een him.'"

He reports another preacher who, with his eyes fixed upon the ceiling, appealed strongly to the Lord to appear before the wayward sinners, who would not hearken to the word and come forward to the mourner's bench. "Come down, Lord! Come down!" shrieked the preacher in an agony of entreaty; "we's a-'pendin' on you to come right now and convict dese hardened hearts. Come right down t'rough de roof; we'll pay for every plank you bus' off."

Theological Humility.

Theology crushes us into nothingness by placing us in the presence of the Infinite God, and then compensates us by making us divine ourselves. Man is a mere worm, but he can, by priestly magic, bring God to earth; he is hopelessly ignorant, but, set on a throne and properly manipulated, he becomes an infallible vice-god; he is a helpless creature, and yet this creature can define, with more than scientific accuracy, the precise nature of his inconceivable Creator; he grovels on the ground as a miserable sinner, and stands up to declare that he is the channel of divine inspiration; all his wisdom is ignorance, but he has written one book of which every line is perfect; and, meanwhile, that which one man singles out as the divine element is to another the diabolical, so strangely dim is our vision, and so imperceptible is the difference between the infinite and the infinitesimal.—Leslie Stephen.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

MILTON HALL (Hawley-crescent, 89 Kentish Town-road): 7, musical selections; 7.30, W. Heaford, "The Problem of Evil."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 8.30, social gathering. Tuesday, at 8.30, dance. Thursday, at 8, committee.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, Charles Watts will lecture.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "Is the Jerusalem Star Inspired?"

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, A. B. Moss will lecture.

CAMBERWELL GREEN: Tuesday, at 8, a lecture.

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.30, a lecture.

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, C. Cohen will lecture. Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, a lecture.

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11, a lecture; 3.15, a lecture.

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE (Middlesex side): 7, a lecture. Thursday at 8, a lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, a lecture; 3.30, a lecture. Wednesday, at 8, a lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, E. Calvert, "Is the Old Testament a True Record of Events?"

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, a lecture.

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, T. Thurlow will lecture.

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, a lecture.

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, a lecture.

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, a lecture.

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 3, a lecture.

TOTTENHAM GREEN: 3.30, a lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15 and 3.15, C. Cohen will lecture.

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, A. Lewis will lecture; 7, a lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. Cohen will lecture.

COUNTRY.

BLACKBURN: 3, business meeting at secretary's house.

DERBY (Pollicott's Dining Rooms, Market-place): 6.45, a reading.

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, C. Doeg, "Genesis." Committee meeting after lecture.

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, T. Barlow, "The White Slaves of England and their Emancipation."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, G. W. Foote, "Secularism and the New Parliament"; 3, "How Stands the Bible Now?" 7, "Did Jesus Christ Ever Live?" 8, adjourned annual meeting for election of officers. Monday, Aug. 5, Excursion to Morpeth, from Central Station at 10.15.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, select entertainment.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, business meeting—important.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BRISTOL (Eastville Park, Lower End): 7, W. Treasure, "Christianity and Society."

CHATHAM (corner of the New Brompton-road, High-street): 11.15, A. Guest, "Bible Tragedy and Comedy"; 7, "Recipes for Happiness."

DERBY (Market-place): 11, Mr. Briggs will lecture.

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London.—August 4, m. and a. Victoria Park, e. Deptford; 6, Camberwell; 8, Wood Green; 11, m. and a. Victoria Park, e. Edmonton; 15, Wood Green; 18, m. and a. Finsbury Park; 22, Wood Green; 25, Manchester.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London, E.—August 4, Camberwell; 11, Westminster; 18, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 25, m. Clerkenwell, a. Victoria Park.

T. THURLOW, 350 Old Ford-road, E.—August 4, Kingsland. Sept. 15, e. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 7s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."

W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."

Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Now Ready, 12 pages, price 1d., by post 1½d., The

AUGUST NUMBER

OF

THE LITERARY GUIDE,

Containing a four-column "Literary Chat" with

GEORGE WILLIAM FOOTE.

Also Reviews of recent Rationalist Publications, Jottings, Gossip, etc.

☞ Order with your "Freethinker." ☜

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

CHARLES WATTS'S WORKS.

THE TEACHINGS OF SECULARISM COMPARED WITH ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

SECULARISM: IS IT FOUNDED ON REASON, AND IS IT SUFFICIENT TO MEET THE WANTS OF MANKIND? Debate between the Editor of the Evening Mail (Halifax, N.S.) and Charles Watts. With Prefatory Letters by G. J. Holyoake and Colonel R. G. Ingersoll, and an Introduction by Helen H. Gardener. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

A REPLY TO FATHER LAMBERT'S "TACTICS OF INFIDELS." 6d., by post 7d.

SCIENCE AND THE BIBLE. 4d., by post 5d.

CHRISTIANITY: ITS ORIGIN, NATURE, AND INFLUENCE. 4d., by post 5d.

WAS CHRIST A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL REFORMER? 4d., by post 5d.

AGNOSTICISM AND CHRISTIAN THEISM: WHICH IS THE MORE REASONABLE? 3d., by post 4d.

THE NATURAL AND THE SUPERNATURAL; OR, BELIEF AND KNOWLEDGE. 3d., by post 4d.

SECULARISM: DESTRUCTIVE AND CONSTRUCTIVE. 3d., by post 4d.

HAPPINESS IN HELL AND MISERY IN HEAVEN. 3d., by post 4d.

THE SUPERSTITION OF THE CHRISTIAN SUNDAY. A Plea for Liberty and Justice. 3d., by post 4d.

BIBLE MORALITY: Its Teachings Shown to be Contradictory and Defective as an Ethical Guide. 3d., by post 3½d.

SAINTS AND SINNERS: WHICH? 3d., by post 4d.

EVOLUTION AND SPECIAL CREATION. 3d., by post 4d.

IS THERE A LIFE BEYOND THE GRAVE? Reply to Dr. R. B. Westbrook. 3d., by post 4d.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILISATION. Why Christianity is Still Professed. 3d., by post 4d.

WHY DO RIGHT? A Secularist's Answer. 3d., by post 4d.

THEOLOGICAL PRESUMPTION. An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. R. F. Burns, of Halifax, N.S. 2d., by post 2½d.

EDUCATION: TRUE AND FALSE. 2d., by post 2½d.

SECULARISM: ITS RELATION TO THE SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF THE DAY. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD; OR, QUESTIONS FOR THEISTS. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE BIBLE UP TO DATE. 2d., by post 2½d.

ROBERT FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

Price Twopence,

Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

A Demonstration of the Biblical Doctrine of Devils, suitable for circulation among Christians.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout: Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Lids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 3d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 3d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 3d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 2s. 2d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 81. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN RED INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d. and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

THREE LECTURES

BY

MR. G. W. FOOTE

(President of the National Secular Society)

AT

ST. JAMES'S HALL

(BANQUETING HALL), PICCADILLY, LONDON, W.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 11TH—
"The Use and Abuse of the Bible."

SUNDAY, AUGUST 18TH—
"George Meredith: Writer and Teacher."

SUNDAY, AUGUST 25TH—
"Religion in the Light of Science."

CHAIR TAKEN AT 7.30 P.M.

ADMISSION BY TICKET ONLY.

Tickets 1s., 2s., & 5s. Course Tickets 1s. 6d. & 3s.

Obtainable at Tree's Ticket Office, Piccadilly; and at 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchisedek
S'welp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Snitching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Handsomely bound in cloth, post free 7s. 6d.,

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF

FREETHINKERS OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

"The Dictionary has involved enormous labor, and the compiler deserves the thanks of the Freethought party."—National Reformer.

"The work will be of the greatest value."—Freethought.

"At last we have the long-wanted means of silencing those Christians who are continually inquiring for our great men, asserting that all great men have been on the side of Christianity."—Truthseeker (New York).

"The most important Freethought work published this year."—De Dageraad (Amsterdam).

"A good and useful work that was much needed."—Commonweal.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

LOOK AT THIS!
TALK OF THIS!
ACT ON THIS!
IMMEDIATELY.

You never saw such Goods at such a Price.

10,000 YDS. OF TROUSERINGS

In every conceivable Color and Design in the very Finest Cloths.

THESE MUST BE CLEARED AT ONCE,

And if the readers of the Freethinker could all see them at this moment I could

CLEAR THE LOT IN THREE MINUTES.

NOTE THESE THREE THINGS:

1st	In one week we have taken over 200 orders for these Goods.
2nd	We ask for one trial only. If you are not satisfied, we will return your money in full and allow you to keep the goods.
3rd	The Two Worlds, July 19, 1895, says: "Read Mr. Gott's advertisements on the cover at the back. He makes you very liberal offers, and, judging from our experience and the testimony of friends, he is a man of his word."

LOSE NO FURTHER TIME,

But send in your order, and give full particulars about the Color and Style of Cloth you prefer.

PRICES.

Trousers to Measure 9s. per pair.
Three Pairs Trousers to Measure for 25s. 6d.
Six Pairs Trousers to Measure for 48s.
One Trousers' Length for 5s. 6d.
Three Trousers' Lengths for 15s.
Six Trousers' Lengths for 27s.

TROUSERS.

INCHES

A, Round Waist over Trousers .....
B, Round Seat.....
E to D, Inside Leg Seam .....
F to G, Full Length of Trousers.....
H, Round Thigh .....
I, Round Knee.....
J, Round Bottom .....
Please say Lined or Unlined.....
(Lined 6d. extra.)
Side or Cross Pockets.....

800 DRESS LENGTHS
AT BARELY HALF PRICE.
Three Dress Lengths for 21s.,

INCLUDING

HABIT CLOTHS, TWEEDS, CASHMERE, FIGURES, SERGES, DIAGONALS, DARK, LIGHT, AND MEDIUM SHADES.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—NO. 32. SUNDAY, AUGUST 11, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE BIBLE AND LOCAL VETO.

(Concluded from page 488.)

DAVID himself, the man after God's own heart—if he wrote the Psalms—pays a tribute to drinking. He speaks of "Wine that maketh glad the heart of man" (civ. 15). But the Psalmist is eclipsed by the writer of Judges, who celebrates "wine which cheereth God and man" (ix. 13). Wine which cheereth God! What a glow there must be in that liquor! Jehovah liked it, and insisted on having it sound and full-bodied.

> "In the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord for a drink offering" (Numbers xxviii. 7).

Before leaving the Old Testament, we must refer to a striking passage in Amos. After bewailing the captivity of Israel, the prophet looks forward to her restoration. He depicts an ultimate state of peace, plenty, and happiness. But it is not a teetotaler's paradise. "The mountains," he exclaims, "shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt." He continues:—

> "I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof" (ix. 14).

Under the restoration every Jew was to sit under his own fig-tree; but, at least in the opinion of Amos, he would have something better than cold water to sip as he enjoyed the shade of his broad fig-leaves. And as Amos was an "inspired" writer—certainly as much so as any other contributor to Holy Writ—we may conclude that the God of the Bible in no way favors teetotalism.

Let us now turn to the New Testament, and begin with Paul. The great Apostle always enjoins sobriety, but never teetotalism. Even when he specifies the proper characteristics of a bishop, he merely says "not given to wine" (1 Timothy iii. 3)—which of course refers to excessive drinking. No one would say that a man was "given to wine" who drank a glass or two at dinner.

In another epistle the becoming way of life is laid down for "aged" men and women. The men should be "sober," and the women "not given to much wine" (1 Titus ii. 2, 3). This is a reprehension of excess, and also a permission of moderate drinking. Indeed, in the first epistle to Timothy the Apostle distinctly prescribes the use of a stimulant.

> "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities" (v. 23).

It has been suggested that Timothy's wine was for external application; it was to be rubbed in; Paul was recommending an embrocation. But this suggestion is too facetious. The author of it was a sly dog, who wanted to throw ridicule on teetotalism or the Bible, or perhaps on both.

Jesus Christ was no more a teetotaler than Paul. There is no evidence that he ever drank water when there was anything better going. His enemies twitted him with being no Nazarite, and provoked him to the following exclamation:—

> "For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil. The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners" (Matt. xi. 18, 19; Luke vii. 33, 34).

One of the miracles of Jesus Christ was turning water into wine. After his baptism, according to Matthew, he fasted forty days in the wilderness; but three days after his baptism, according to John, he was at a marriage in Cana of Galilee. The company, on this occasion, was numerous or thirsty, or else the host was too poor, or too economical, to provide a requisite quantity of liquor. At any rate, they soon "wanted wine," and Jesus Christ manufactured about seventy-five gallons for them. It was generously done. They had plenty, and it was first-class. The chairman of the function was loud in his praises of the "fresh tap."

> "When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was: (but the servants which drew the water knew;) the governor of the feast called the bridegroom, and saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now" (John ii. 9, 10).

It is a natural inference from this passage that the folk at that marriage feast were "well on" before the miraculous wine was passed round the table. The little speech of the "ruler of the feast" is admirable. His accents are those of a seasoned old toper, who knew the ways of the world on such occasions. He had seen dinners and suppers open with good liquor, and poor stuff introduced when the guests were fuddled and incapable of discrimination. Of course he could discriminate, but what was one amongst so many? On this occasion, however, he was agreeably surprised. The wine positively improved just at the point where his experience led him to expect deterioration, and he thought it only an act of justice to make a flattering speech to the bridegroom.

According to John, this was "the beginning" of Jesus Christ's miracles. His very first performance was turning water into wine to keep a spree going. And the wine was not poor and thin, but good strong tipple, with excellent body and flavor. It will not do, therefore, to champion teetotalism, or even temperance, on Gospel principles. Jesus Christ would not be eligible as a member of any Christian Temperance Society.

The last supper that Jesus took with his apostles was seasoned with wine. Theology says that the bread symbolised his body, and the wine his blood. Protestants take the holy communion in both forms. Catholics are only allowed to eat the body of Christ in the form of a consecrated wafer. The priests, however, both eat his body and drink his blood. For the best part of two thousand years, therefore, Christians have used intoxicating liquor in the eucharist. It is only of late years—in fact, since the Temperance movement became important—that an attempt has been made to substitute a more innocent beverage. Here and there the attempt has been successful, but in the vast majority of churches and chapels the wine used is one that you might get drunk upon if you took a sufficient quantity.

Now this is not teetotalism. It is not even temperance. There can be little doubt that many Christians struggling against the lust for drink have had their appetites whetted at the communion table. Where all must drink out of the same cup the beverage should be adapted to the weakest and those possessed of the least self-control. On such an occasion it would be well to remember the counsel of Paul:—

> "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Romans xiv. 21).

Digitized by Google

If a meat-eater and a vegetarian must dine together on one dish, the dish must consist of vegetables; for the meat-eater can take them, while the vegetarian cannot take meat. In the same way, if a strong man and a weak man have to drink together, the strong one should remember his brother's weakness. It is a damnable sin to offer strong drink to all alike; to those who are safe in their self-control, and to those who are in peril through their frailty. Yet this is what the Churches have done, this is what they still do. And it is these very Churches that pretend to be the truest friends of temperance. The minister uncorks the port-wine bottle on a Sunday morning, and pours out the sanguine fluid to the devotees, whether men, women, or young people only just confirmed. In the evening he preaches a rousing sermon against drink, as the greatest curse of the nation, and alleges that the remedy is only to be found in the principles of Christianity.

Mohammedanism does not go to work in this way. Christians often speak of Mohammed as a hypocrite and an impostor. But there was no hypocrisy in his attitude towards drinking. He prohibited it altogether. Mohammedanism is a teetotal religion, and Christianity is not. How the son of the Ameer of Afghanistan must smile at the humbug of Christianity! Being a strict Mohammedan, he drinks nothing intoxicating; and here in England, the most Christian country of the European world, where they subscribe for missionaries to convert the poor Mohammedans and other "heathen," people calling themselves Christians, who would regard it as a deadly insult to be called unbelievers, go about reeling drunk—stinking, helpless, and quarrelsome.

It is a curious thing that some of the most famous drinks in Christendom were introduced to the world by the Church. This fact was boasted the other day by an American doctor, who is also an orthodox Christian. He indicated it as one of the things for which we ought to feel grateful. One liqueur is manufactured by the monks of Chartreuse, and another by a monastery of Benedictines. There is even a much-prized drink called (in Latin) the Tears of Christ. Surely this is a climax. To say anything after it would be superfluous. We therefore leave the Christian teetotalers with the Bible in one hand, and a glass of the Tears of Christ in the other, haranguing the world on the glories of Temperance.

G. W. FOOTE.

LESLIE STEPHEN ON THOMAS PAINE.

In Mr. Leslie Stephen's brilliant History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century he was guilty of a gross attack upon the memory of Paine. Oblivious of the obvious fact that a shortening of the Christian name often represents a term of endearment, as in the case of Colonel Ingersoll, who is familiarly known as "Pagan Bob," he declared that "good Englishmen expressed their disgust for the irreverent infidel by calling him 'Tom,' and the name still warns all men that its proprietor does not deserve even posthumous civility." This was specially bad from a critic who had gone far greater lengths in heresy than Paine ever approached, and induced a suspicion that he not only spoke "without due caution," but that he was anxious to curry favor with the orthodox by throwing abuse on a general scapegoat. Mr. Stephen was fairly called over the coals at the time, and we are content to let bygones be bygones.

In devoting twenty columns* to the life of Paine, in the last published volume of the Dictionary of National Biography (vol. lv.), Mr. Stephen has, if not made reparation for his abuse, at least treated his subject with the civility befitting the standard work which he himself at first edited, and has availed himself of the materials brought forward by Mr. Moncure D. Conway in his excellent and now standard Life of Thomas Paine, though, perhaps, not quite as much as might be desired. The notice of Paine is indeed somewhat sketchy and inadequate; but then Mr. Stephen had a vast deal of matter to boil down into reasonable compass, and in this he has succeeded as only a practised literary man could do.

* Paley has only eleven columns.

On the question of Paine's character Mr. Stephen remarks: "Paine was more or less 'ostracised' by society during his last stay in America. Political and theological antipathies were strong, and Paine, as at once the assailant of Washington and the federalists and the author of the Age of Reason, was hated by one party, while the other was shy of claiming his support. It has also been said that his conduct was morally offensive, and charges against him have been accepted without due caution. His antagonist Cheetham made them prominent in a life published in 1809. He accused Paine of having seduced Madame Bonneville, of habitual drunkenness, and of disgustingly filthy habits. The charges were supported by a letter to Paine from Carver, with whom Paine had lodged. Madame Bonneville immediately sued Cheetham for slander. Cheetham made some attempt to support his case with the help of Carver, but Carver retracted the charges; it completely broke down, and the jury at once found Cheetham guilty. Cheetham was sentenced to the modest fine of $150. The judge, said to be a federalist, observed in mitigation that his book 'served the cause of religion.' It is very intelligible that Madame Bonneville's position should have suggested scandal, but all the evidence goes to show that it was groundless. Paine's innumerable enemies never accused him of sexual immorality, and in that respect his life seems to have been blameless. The special charges of drunkenness made by Cheetham and Carver are discredited by the proof of their character; Carver's letter to Paine was written or dictated by Cheetham, and seems to have been part of an attempt to extort money. Carver afterwards confessed that he had lied as to drink."

Another point on which Christian calumny fastened was an alleged awful death-bed, Paine in this sharing the common fate of noted infidels, who are popularly supposed either to recant or suffer horribly when they come to die. All Mr. Stephen thinks necessary to say is that "various stories calculated to show that Paine repented of his opinions on his death-bed were obviously pious fictions meant to 'serve the cause of religion.'"

"Paine," says Mr. Stephen, "deserves whatever credit is due to absolute devotion to a creed believed by himself to be demonstrably true and beneficial. He showed undeniable courage, and is free from any suspicion of mercenary motives." He incidentally mentions that his pamphlets were published at prices too low to be remunerative, and remarks that his "singular power of clear, vigorous exposition made him unequalled as a pamphleteer in revolutionary times, when compromise was an absurdity. He also showed great shrewdness and independence of thought in his criticism of the Bible."

Mr. Stephen's concluding words are: "His substantial merits will be differently judged according to his reader's estimate of the value of the doctrines of abstract rights and à priori deism with which he sympathised. There can be only one opinion as to his power of expressing his doctrines in a form suitable 'for the use of the poor.'"

Inadequate, indeed, this must seem to those acquainted with the services of Paine as a pioneer in all modern reform. Mr. Conway justly remarks of Paine, that he was the first to speak for the independence of the United States; the first to urge extension of the principles of independence to the enslaved negro; the first to arraign monarchy, and to point out the danger of its survival in presidency; the first to advocate international arbitration; the first to suggest more rational ideas of marriage and divorce; the first to plead for animals; the first to demand justice for women. He would have received general applause had he not incurred theological odium by his attack on Bibliolatry. He attacked the forces of oppression in their stronghold—that of religion. It is to Paine, and to those who upheld his writings, that we are largely indebted for such measure of liberty in political and religious criticism as we enjoy. Mr. Stephen ought to know that Paine's services would outweigh a host of faults, and entitle him to something more than "posthumous civility."

J. M. Wheeler.

So late as in the year 1674 the clergy in Convocation insisted on a right to tax themselves, and this right was recognised by the Commons.—Lord Camden, "Parl. Hist.," vol. xvi., p. 169.

Digitized by Google

THE VALUE OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

I HAVE been asked by "a constant reader of the Freethinker," who, through lack of leisure and access to necessary authorities, has not the opportunity of investigating the question of the modern criticism of the history of the Bible, to give a plain and popular explanation of what is known by the term "Higher Criticism." I readily comply with the request, and shall endeavor to show that this criticism completely destroys the old orthodox theory of the authorship and trustworthiness of the Biblical records.

The difference between the bold, rough-and-ready, but exceedingly effective criticism of Thomas Paine, and others of his day, and that of more modern critics of the Bible, consists not so much in its nature as in its style, and in the fact that much of it at the present time comes from avowed Christians. The Age of Reason, as a successful and vigorous attack upon Bible idolatry, will probably never be surpassed, and, although many attempts have been made to reply to it, the positions Paine took up therein against the dogma of Bible infallibility have never been refuted. The "Higher Criticism" may be regarded as a refined and scholarly confirmation of the trenchant work of Paine. Of course we welcome the new style, because it is not only "up to date," but it adds to the successful results of Freethought propaganda.

The authors of the books upon the Higher Criticism are not specially concerned with such aspects of the Bible as ordinary inquirers upon the subject are. The criticism is chiefly devoted to such questions as when, where, and by whom the Bible was written; while it has been discovered that, whatever value the Bible might otherwise possess, its history is doubtful, its contents contradictory, its chronology confusing, and many of its statements erroneous. Moreover, this criticism has clearly shown that the Pentateuch, now called the Hexateuch—for the book of Joshua is added to the first five books—was not written by Moses, nor, in fact, till hundreds of years after his death; that hardly any of the Psalms were written by David, but are the production of a much later age; that many so-called prophecies were given after the events described, and that the greater part of those hitherto supposed to predict the coming of a Messiah had no possible reference to Christ; that the book of Isaiah owes its origin to two different men, who did not live at the same time; that a large portion of the book of Daniel is not authentic; and that the inerrancy (this is the new word employed for truthfulness) of the Bible can no longer be maintained. In a word, it has made clear that the old and long-cherished notion that the book is the "infallible word of God" is thoroughly erroneous.

This criticism is valuable not only because it exposes the fallacy of the orthodox position as to the certitude of the "sacred writings," but for the reason that it shows the very doubtful character of the basis of Christianity. The Old Testament, as the Rev. Dr. Giles observes, "is a volume of the highest value to Christians, because its contents are essential to the existence of our own creed." If, therefore, the Jewish writings are proved to be untrustworthy, the faith based upon them is proportionately uncertain in its foundation. Dr. Giles distinctly says that "Christianity and Judaism are inseparably united; neither can exist without the other. . . . . The doctrinal parts of the Christian scheme, and all that gives to it the character of a divine revelation, become destitute of meaning until they are explained by the antecedents of the Jewish scriptures concerning the temptation of Eve, the fall of Adam, and his ejection from Paradise" (Hebrew Records, Introduction, pp. 18 and 19). Let us now see what the Higher Criticism has to say upon the authorship of some of the books and of the general contents of the Old Testament.

It may be here remarked that the various books of which the Old Testament is composed were not always in the separate form in which they now appear. When, however, the division took place is not known, but Bishop Tomline writes: "The beginnings of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy are very abrupt, and plainly show that these books were formerly joined to Genesis." The first question to which modern criticism has been directed is, Who wrote the Pentateuch? Until recently the general opinion was that Moses was its author; and the same notion still obtains in orthodox circles. Even Dean Milman, in his History of the Jews, while admitting that many deductions may be made in consequence of alterations, additions, interpolations, errors in transcribing, etc., states that in the first five books of the Bible we have substantially the writings of Moses. The same view is expressed by many of the bishops and clergy when they address Sunday-school children, or when they preach from their pulpits, where discussion is not permitted. It does not raise those "spiritual guides" in our estimation as honest men to know that they thus mislead the young and also uninformed adults. The "lights of the Church" ought to know that the Higher Criticism, even when conducted by scholars of their own faith, has proved beyond all reasonable doubt that no evidence exists that Moses wrote the books which bear his name. On the contrary, as stated in the second edition of a work recently written by nine eminent Congregational M.A.'s, entitled Faith and Criticism, "we have no data to enable us to name, with any degree of probability, the authors of the Pentateuch, or of any other historical book, except the original Ezra and Nehemiah." Spinoza says: "Of the authors, or, if you please, writers, of many of the books [of the Old Testament] we either know almost nothing, or we entertain grave doubts as to the correctness with which the several books are ascribed to the parties whose names they bear. Then we neither know upon what occasion, nor at what time, those books were indited, the writers of which are unknown to us" (quoted by C. Bradlaugh, in his book, The Bible: What it Is, p. 56). Peyrere also wrote: "God suffered the autographs to perish, and only very imperfect copies to come down to us" (ibid).

This criticism has also shown that the Greek version, which is thought by some to give the clearest idea of the Hebrew scriptures, is enveloped in doubt and uncertainty. This version is termed the Septuagint, but the Rev. Dr. Irons observes: "No one knows who made it. It appears to be a growth of at least two generations; and, as might be expected, the style is not the same throughout" (The Bible and its Interpreters, p. 27). The Pentateuch was supposed by some to have been translated into Greek about 270 years before Christ, by seventy or seventy-two Jews who were shut up in separate cells, without communication with each other. But Hartwell Horne says that the learned men of his time were agreed that this story was "fictitious." Still, be the Septuagint what it may, it affords no evidence that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, which Bishop Colenso admitted could "not have been written in the age of Moses or for some time afterwards." In this opinion Sharpe agrees, for he says of Genesis: "We have no account of when this first of the Hebrew books was written, or by whom. It has been called one of the books of Moses, and some part of it may have been written by that great lawgiver and leader of Israelites. But it is the work of various authors and of various ages" (quoted by C. Bradlaugh in The Bible: What it Is, p. 57). Canon Driver rejects Ezra's account of how he was inspired to write the lost Bible, and also the Jewish account of who did write it. The Canon alleges that "no external evidence worthy of credit exists" as to the age and authorship of the Bible; that the writers of the historical books were compilers, not original authors; that Isaiah was not the writer of several chapters ascribed to him, for they were written by "another prophet writing towards the close of the Babylonian captivity"; that the Song of Solomon was a dream, and the book of Job a dramatic poem; that we have no authentic tradition respecting the authorship of the Psalms, many of which were written much later than the time of either David or Solomon; and that the book of Daniel was written not earlier than 300 B.C., and probably 167-168 B.C.

Further, it is admitted that the Hebrew Bible, as we have it now, is written in a character which was quite unknown to Moses and the prophets, and that in the style throughout there is a uniformity only to be explained, as the Jews themselves explain it, by the fact that at some time all the books underwent revision and redaction. And, again, the Hebrew Bible, as we have it, is written with certain Masoretic points, without which it could not be read with certainty, and those cannot be traced back beyond the seventh century of our era, before which time it was read in accordance with a merely traditional sense, termed the "Masora." The issue, then, of the Higher Criticism upon this point is, not that we can tell who the authors of the Bible really were, but that we may fairly conclude that many of the books were not written by the men whose names are now appended to them.

Digitized by Google

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

BALAAM AND HIS ASS.

THERE is in Numbers xxii. the highly edifying story of Balaam and his she-ass.

Balaam was a prophet; that is, a medium. He speaks of himself as the "man who had his eyes shut"; and that when he fell down in ecstasy he had his eyes opened. He alone heard the ass talk. Neither his servants nor the Moabite princes who accompanied him at the time saw the angel.

All this goes to prove that Balaam was hypnotised, and his companions were not. Bible critics declare that "dreams and visions were the ordinary methods by which God made himself known to the prophets." That is, being inducted into the trance state, and then delivering themselves of inspired literature, like this asinine effusion, was called "God making himself known to the prophets." Thus the architect of the universe is made to dance attendance on this wizard as if the welfare of all the world was at stake; when, in fact, nothing was to be considered but whether or no Balaam should do some big swearing for cash in hand. As it promised to be very interesting as a business venture, Balaam did not care to undertake the job until he consulted his partner. So, when Balak's agents approached him he put them off until morning for his answer. In the meantime he telephoned God:—

"Hello! Central!"

"Well, what do you want?"

"Give me God."

"Who is this?"

"It is me, Balaam."

"Well, what do you want now?"

"Please to come down here; I want to get your opinion concerning a big job of cussing."

"All right. Be down in a jiffy." [Comes down.]

God—"What men are these with thee?"

[You see, reader, God, who is omniscient and omnipresent, had to come down unto Balaam, and had to inquire of him like the commonest mortal.]

Balaam—"Some princes that King Balak has sent to me, soliciting my cussing services for a consideration."

G.—"Whom do they want you to curse?"

B.—"They want me to cuss the Israelites."

G.—"Don't you go. I forbid you to do the job."

Then Balaam told the committee to go back home; the cursing aforesaid could not be done at any price. However, Balak persisted, and sent more messengers and more money. The king had plenty of cash, plenty of men, and plenty of war material; but he had made up his mind to "cuss 'em out," and nothing else would satisfy him.

Well, the telephone was again appealed to, and God visited Balaam this time after night; but, being worn out, we suppose, by their incessant interruptions, changed his mind and told Balaam to go, but that he would wire him as to the cursing.

Strange to relate, however, no sooner had Balaam saddled his ass and started on his journey than God changed his mind again; got himself into a towering rage, and sent an angel, armed with a drawn sword, after Balaam, with strict orders to kill him on the spot, which the said angel surely would have done if the ass had not had better use of her legs than the angel had of the weapon. The angel evidently was an awkward swordsman. Peradventure, his wings were somewhat in the way. Or, perhaps, he was out of practice.

Another remarkable feature is, that notwithstanding Balaam was a medium and a prophet, and the boss cusser of the universe, he did not have "spirit" enough about him to "recognise the spiritual" angel that was trying to kill him, nor sense enough to keep from cudgeling the ass for saving his worthless life. This is point blank proof that there is no such thing as "spirit recognising the spiritual," unless you are biologised. Here was a spirit chasing this fellow Balaam "up and down the road" with a flaming sword in his hand, and the ass dodging the licks, first to one side and then to the other side, squeezing Balaam's foot; and yet this greatest of spiritual mediums was as oblivious as an oyster as to what was going on right under his very nose.

Still another curious thing about this silly story is, from the twenty-second verse the word "God" is dropped, and the name "Lord" is used to the end of the chapter.

The angel made three diabolical attempts to assassinate the prophet, but in each of which he was frustrated by the agility of the ass. The angel attacked Balaam in the wide road. The ass dodged. The angel fluttered ahead to a very narrow spot in the road, sailed in on either side, and made another desperate lunge with his sword at the head of Balaam; but the ass hugged one of the walls so close that the murderous blow fell short, and the only harm done was that Balaam's foot was slightly damaged. Then the angel spread his wings and sailed to another part of the highway, which was so narrow that the dodging trick, a la barre, could not work; but again the beast outwitted the angel by falling flat down under Balaam.

For my part, I would have squandered more wealth to have seen that donkey-angel scrimmage than for a season ticket to a circus. But no spectators were allowed. The prophet, his two servants, and the Moabite princes were each and all as ignorant of this spirit manifestation as if they had been a thousand miles away. The ass alone saw the angel. Its spirit recognised the spiritual. At this juncture of affairs—that is, after three signal failures of God's authorised and inspired agent—the Lord interfered and opened the mouth of the ass, in order that the following divinely important dialogue might take place. Balaam, it seems, got tired of this continual dodging and falling about of the ass, and began to do some whacking.

Ass—"What have I done to thee that thou hast smitten me these three times?"

Balaam—"Because thou hast mocked me. I would there was a sword in my hand, for now I would kill thee."

Ass—"Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? Was I ever wont to do so unto thee?"

Balaam—"Nay."

How sublime it all is, and how spiritual! That is, how like it is to all the heavenly literature of the present age and every age.

Is it not a little remarkable that a man like Balaam, who had such a national reputation for cursing, did not use some cuss words to his ass? I am not in favor of profanity, but must acknowledge that, if my ass was to fall down with me on a level road, I would do some tall swearing. I suppose cursing was a matter of business with Balaam, and he did not propose to fritter away his capital out there in the country, when there was no free silver in sight.

Here is some conversation which Balaam had with the angel. The Lord opened Balaam's eyes; that is, he inducted him into a trance state, just as he had a moment before hypnotised the ass.

As soon as Balaam saw the angel, but especially when he caught a glimpse of his big sword, he fell flat. All these second sighters in the Bible fall flat. It is the stock manœuvre. Peter fell flat; Paul fell flat; Balaam fell flat; the ass fell flat.

Angel—"Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times?"

[It appears to me this was an idiotic interrogatory for the angel to ask, he (the angel) knowing well why the prophet had whacked the animal; but of such stupidities is the kingdom of heaven!]

Balaam—"I have sinned. . . . . If it displeases thee, I will get me back again."

Angel—"Go with the men."

So Balaam went with the messengers of Balak.

Recapitulation: First, God says, "Don't go." Second, God says, "Go." Third, angel says, "Don't go." Fourth, angel says, "Go."

Great is the mystery of godliness—i.e., besotted are the ways of superstition. That is, drivelling imbecility is called mystery; and lunatic raving with meaningless words is denominated godliness.

Interrogatory—"Why did the angel hypnotise the ass?"

This question is for the Sunday-schools. If the donkey had not been spiritually developed for that occasion, she would not have dodged, and Balaam would have been decapitated. For the life of me, there is no aspect in which this divine yarn can be seen that will allow it one particle of sense or decency from start to finish. Is it any wonder that the great Bishop Colenso, of the Church of England, should have denounced the entire Pentateuch as a fable, and Moses as a myth, after finding it crammed with such nonsense as this? The marvel is that rational beings, in this enlightened age, can have their reason so blinded by fear, so diseased by hope, so restricted by inconceivable dogmas, so warped by a mere rattle of theological terms, so poisoned by the self-appointed emissaries of an imaginary

Digitized by Google

. . . . Tom Noddy,
All mind and no body,

as to pretend to regard these absurdities as anything more than "such stuff as dreams are made of." PERSIUS.

—Independent Pulpit.

BROTHER PRINCE.

THE Americans have an abundant crop of Messiahs. There is Messiah Thomas Lake Harris, who, for a while, kept Laurence Oliphant under his thumb, and who, his devoted followers believe, will never die, but is rejuvenated, having the breath of God within him. There is Messiah Teed ("Koresh"), who holds the world is concave, and who is going to bring about a heaven upon earth, when no one will value gold and silver, and the Koreshans will possess all property. Then there is Christ Schweinfurth, who has set up, near Rockford, a heaven which is hardly distinguishable from a harem. Several women, too, have set up in the Messiah business.

In England we have had of late only one Messiah—namely, Brother Prince, the founder of the Agapemone, or Abode of Love, at Charlinch; and, owing to the paucity of his followers, he has attracted little attention. He is, if still living and unrejuvenated, now pretty old, having contracted matrimony in 1842, and been in the Messiah line ever since the following year. There are a few followers who assemble in the neighborhood of Stamford Hill, London, and the establishment at Charlinch is still maintained. Brother Prince was very religious from early youth. He held Theism as it should be held—as the very guidance of his life. If about to take a walk on a wet day, he would not carry an umbrella without first praying to God for guidance. He soon came to see that he was under special providence, and that all he did and said, and all he omitted to say and do, was, as he desired it to be, by express direction of the Holy Ghost.

The Holy Ghost having taken him in hand, he, of course, became a preacher. At Adullam Chapel, in Brighton, the ladies flocked to hear the young orator who was so powerful in prayer. One—a daughter of a wealthy clergyman in Ipswich—as I have said, he married in 1842. About three years later the strangeness of his views led to a rumpus, and he was compelled to leave Brighton. But he obtained a second curacy at Charlinch, a little village five miles from Bridgewater, and not readily accessible from anywhere else; and here he was followed by some of his Brighton admirers, and has stayed ever since. There was a good deal of money, whether his own or that of his followers, used in setting up the Agapemone, or Abode of Love, which was all under the direction of the Holy Spirit, of which Brother Prince was the living incarnation. The Holy Spirit developed most epicurean tendencies. The apartments were luxurious; flowers and singing birds abounded; Turkey carpets were on the floors, costly pianos and harps in the rooms; the windows were of stained glass, and, as the inmates were chiefly ladies, "'twas like a little heaven below." At one time the inmates of the Agapemone were about 160, of whom five were clergymen, who usually can appreciate a good thing when they meet it.

At this stage of his career Brother Prince always appeared to the Gentiles in almost royal state. He rode in a handsome carriage-and-four, with postillions, and was always preceded by a horseman, and followed by two others in white liveries and a couple of bloodhounds; and in this style he was in the habit of going to preach in the villages of the neighborhood. But troubles came. Wives entered the holy building without their husbands' consent; and once, when a wealthy farmer joined the Agapemone, his wife and two daughters fled to France.

Brother Prince, too, had a revelation from the Holy Ghost to "sanctify the flesh," and the way in which he did this—by taking up a young country girl—occasioned misunderstanding. In the Voices, which he published, and in which he explained his mission to the world, he very naively related the proceedings of the Messiah with the maiden. He says:—

> "He did not even consult, or in any way make known His intention to, the flesh He took [the girl]; in taking of it He left it no choice of its own; He took it in free grace—flesh that knew not God, and was ignorant of Him [Prince]; He took it in love, not because it loved Him, for it did not, but because it pleased Him to set His love upon it; and though He took it in absolute power and authority, without consulting its pleasure, or even giving it a choice, yet He took it in love, for, having taken it, the manner of His life with it was such as flesh could not but know and appreciate and love."

As the outward and visible sign of this inward and spiritual grace was that a girl rode about with Brother Prince in his carriage, there was considerable dissatisfaction among the women at the Agapemone, and the institution began to decline. Many left. One, who got over the high walls, is reported to have been hunted with bloodhounds. The women were watched with the utmost jealousy, and allowed to have no communication whatever with the outer world. Whenever they went out they were attended by an escort of male disciples, and were under as careful a surveillance as the inmates of a gaol or a lunatic asylum. Quarrels also took place about the women, and about money. The Agapemone was shorn of its splendor, but Brother Prince has lived on, a striking example of the real inwardness of religious love, and of what can be done in England in the name of religion. LUCIANUS.

SOME THEOLOGICAL MYSTERIES EXPLAINED.

OLIVE F. GUNDY reports the following in the New York Post, as portion of an actual discourse by the colored Rev. Zebra Hampton:—

"Moses take de son of man out of de bull-rush and put him on a tall brass pole; and while was a-gwine up a scorripin bite him. De scorripin sting neber hurt him much, do, knae he was pure een heart. De pure een heart shall see no evil, bless God! God tole Pharo to let de chil'un of Egypt go, and he wouldn't. Den God sen' down frogs and dey git een Pharo mouf and een his bread-tray, and 'sturb him turrible. Den Moses cum, when Pharo warn't a-lookin', and tole off de chil'un of Egypt wid manna, same like de farmer tole off a string ob hog wid corn. It take dem tree whole long days to git to de promis lan'. Den, fust t'ing, dey git hungry and want some water. Den de Lord he ride out on de heaven and holler to Moses to smote de stone (dat's a rock, my brederin, an or'nary rock), and, arter de stone been smote, dey all come to see, and God holler to Moses to smote her ag'in, and den all dem chil'un of Egypt come over, dry shoddy. Arter dat God tuk and tole Moses to strike de plum trees, and 'nough plums come down for forty thousand folks to eat and git 'nough.

"When Pharo 'scuvered dat de chil'un was gone, he gethered together his inimies and went arter dem, and when de day of judgment comes, my brederin, de Christians will be standin' about in squads of two and three, like blackbirds on a hill, and it jest make me smile to ponderate on it. Yes, my brederin! When Gabriel blow'd his horn he axed God if dat were loud enough, and God say, 'No, blow her louder dan seven claps of thunder to skeer de sinner, and blow her low and calm so as not to 'sturb my people.' Oh! my beloved! It don't make no differ wedder you die een de woods, or out een de field layin' to de hoe-handle; de ship of Zion will come to you wherever you is, and de trees will ben' to let her pass. My brederin! Dis yere fire we know een dis worl' is hot, but hell-fire kin burn dis fire to ashes. Brudder Hawkins will please lead us in prayer."

MR. PUTNAM'S ENGAGEMENTS.

August 11, Failsworth; 18, Leicester; 25, Liverpool.

Mr. Putnam will return to New York on Sept. 7, therefore friends who have not engaged him should communicate with Mr. Watts at once. Societies near any of the above towns requiring week-night lectures should arrange for Mr. Putnam to visit them when he is in their district on the Sunday.

Digitized by Google

THOUGHTS, WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Religion is the poetry of unpoetic souls.

The fear of the law is the beginning of wisdom.

The greater the miracle, the greater fool is he who believes it.

Some people make vows for the mere sake of breaking them.

The fool who said in his heart "there is no God" must have been a wise fool.

One tear shed in the cause of humanity is better than a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

Life is at times so miserable that we are compelled to laugh in order to disguise our sadness.

It is a slight, and not a deep, study of philosophy that leads back to religion.

Parsons are like finger-boards—always showing the right way to other people, but never going themselves.

Noah was the grandest old boozer the world ever saw; he drank God's health for something like 350 years.

The victims of fanaticism are so numerous that a bridge to heaven could be built with their bones.

The history of Christianity will have to be written with blood.

It is easy to preach morality, but very difficult to live up to it.

Hypocrisy is about the best effort some people can make to become virtuous.

The more proofs the Christians bring forward for the evidence of their creed, the less inclined I feel to believe them.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes' nightmare: to dream he has been condemned to translate The Atheist Shoemaker into double Dutch.

Man proposes and—woman disposes; especially if she is your wife and keeps the "oof."

When the Lord feels bored, he sends for a couple of Freethinkers to tickle his fancy with their profanities.

If the dead did communicate with the living, Voltaire would have sent us long ago a parody on heaven.

"Marriages are not made in heaven." What a consolation this must be to the bigamist, and to those who have been plagued with bitter mothers-in-law.

A splendid narcotic and cure for insomnia: Hervey's Meditations Among the Tombs and Warton's Death-bed Scenes.

When I read Feuchtersleben's celebrated work, Dietetic of the Soul, it made upon me the impression of a book on therapeutics written by a quack.

A Christian never becomes liberal-minded until he begins to grow sceptical about the truths of his religion.

An overdose of religion either cures a man's fanaticism or sends him straight to the lunatic asylum.

The man who refuses to argue about his belief does so from fear of discovering his belief to be a false one.

A man's creed is generally given to him; he seldom chooses it. With the Freethinker it is different: he examines all religions, and rejects them for their lack of evidence.

The present crusade against vice is a sure sign that we are growing more immoral every day.

Dialogue.

Pious Mother—"Charley, you wicked boy, I never heard you say your prayers last night." Master Charley (an embryo Freethinker)—"How could you, Ma? I said them in the deaf and dumb language!"

The greatest miracle-monger was Santo Tomas de Aquino. This gentleman converted in one day ten thousand heathens upon an uninhabited island!

It was his first sermon, and his nervousness was so intense that he read—"and immediately the cock wept, and Peter went out and crew bitterly."

I was nearly in heaven once. I was being taken on a cloud by two beautiful female angels, when, unfortunately, I sneezed and fell—out of bed!

Holy water is not so good as ordinary water, for you cannot drink it or use it for washing the family linen.

The Earthly Triplets.

Faith.—To pretend to believe what you do not understand.

Hope.—A rope too short to let yourself down safely, or to hang yourself with.

Charity.—This wonderful little thing begins at home, and now-a-days stops there too.

"Come, Holy Ghost," the preacher was exclaiming, his hands extended heavenwards; "come, Holy Ghost, send down those beams"—when suddenly the roof fell in, and a beam smote the preacher in the eye. Let us pray.

The following question in arithmetic was once put to a candidate for honors: "If one apple produced the ruin of the whole human race, how many such apples would it take to make a barrel of cider?" As there was no stretcher handy, they brought the candidate home on a shutter.

The world is a large cornfield, in which God is the scarecrow and the men are the birds. Those birds which, while eating, keep their eye on the scarecrow, these are the Christians; and those birds which, after eating of the corn unconcerned, perch themselves upon the scarecrow—need I say that these are the Freethinkers?

F. Malibran.

ACID DROPS.

There has been quite a riot of death among the Peculiar People lately. They appear to congregate in a certain part of East London, and Mr. C. A. Lewis, the coroner who has to hold inquests over their unhappy bantlings, is loud in condemnation of their stupid inhumanity. If they had a sick jackass, he says, they would call in a veterinary doctor, but they will not call in a pill-and-bolus doctor for their sick children. Coroner Lewis calls for an alteration of the law, so that these misguided fathers and mothers may be punished for letting their offspring die without medical assistance.

Well, now, we have a word for Coroner Lewis. Is he a Christian? Does he use the New Testament as a swearing-block in his court? Does he believe that volume to be the Word of God? If he does, is it honest on his part to inveigh against the Peculiar People? They simply act upon what he professes. Nothing is clearer than the "divine" injunction which they obey when they oil the sick and call in the elders to pray over them. Of course it may be a very primitive form of medical treatment, but it is in accordance with the Bible.

What a curious condition the law will be in if Coroner Lewis should bring about his desired alteration. People will then be liable to imprisonment for denying the truth of the Bible, and also liable to imprisonment for believing it—or at least for acting on the belief.

The Church organs are rubbing their hands over the prospect of getting public money for their privately-managed schools. As Montesquieu remarks, "L'Eglise a toujours peur ainsi." Others, however, will note that, if the State can be used to take public money to support the Church, it can also be used to take the Church endowments to support the people.

The Firm Foundation asks: "Who shall eat the Lord's supper?" If the Lord is hungry and can pay for his supper, let him eat it himself. If he does not want it, then let some one of his many starving followers eat it.

The increased strictness of the Sunday closing of saloons in New York is leading to the formation of numerous clubs to promote social intercourse and dispense supplies of all kinds. The recent revelations in the police department have shown that the law was only enforced against the poor who could not pay blackmail; and the respectable citizens are determined to have this altered. Mayor Strong has spoken in favor of the Sunday closing law being modified.

The town of Baird, Texas, has been struck with a tornado which killed several persons, among them Mitchell Mayes, the son of the Rev. J. Mayes, pastor of the Baptist Church.

At Chattanooga there is a sect of Seventh-Day Adventists, who adhere to the Bible teaching of keeping holy the seventh day. This riles their fellow Christians, and ten of them have been prosecuted for laboring on Constantine's venerable "Day of the Sun." They were honest, respectable citizens, and the judge, in passing sentence, paid a high compliment to the good character of the prisoners, and expressed regret that the law compelled him to impose a fine on them. The accused made no defence, and elected to go to prison and suffer the extreme penalty of the law rather than pay their fines. Such is Christian toleration in the free and independent United States of America.

The American Sentinel, alluding to the case of Seventh-Day Adventists, says: "On the one side is the express command of Jehovah to keep the seventh day holy, and opposed to it is the injunction of secular legislators to keep the first day holy. That is the difficulty in which the Seventh Day-Adventists find themselves, and, as we said they obey the voice of God rather than the voice of man,

Digitized by Google

And in this age of boasted civilisation they are punished for acting up to their religious convictions! They are fined and imprisoned for conforming to a command of Jehovah, which a State law seeks to nullify."

The American Sentinel says that the Methodists have been foremost in these prosecutions. The spectacle of one sect of Christians persecuting another sect for its adherence to the teachings of the Bible ought to remind Americans that the founders of the Republic believed in universal toleration, and would have set their faces against the proceedings of the zealots who demand God in the Constitution, and who mean thereby that they shall have power to make others conform to their notions.

"General" Booth, before leaving for foreign parts, spoke at the Moravian Chapel in Fetter-lane in connection with the opening of a new "shelter," and in doing so he declared that the charges recently made against his "dosser" establishments "were entirely without foundation." Entirely is good! But the "General" was never short of what Cobbett used to call "face."

Dr. Waldo, the medical officer of health for Southwark, has been giving the Vestry some interesting figures about the Salvation Army shelters. In prison cells each adult is allowed 800 cubic feet of space, in military barracks 600, and in workhouses 300 feet. Keepers of common lodging-houses in London are compelled to allow 341 cubic feet. But at the Salvation Army shelter in Blackfriars-road there was only 90 cubic feet for each individual. Dr. Waldo declared that such a shelter was apt to become a hotbed of infection, and was a danger to the community that called for drastic action on the part of the Government.

There was a fuss made in the Jockey Club some time ago when someone named a horse Cockcrow out of Peter; but on the Continent, M. Wirz, of the Geneva Consul d'Etat, complains that stallions and racehorses are monopolising the names of all the saints, and "that it cannot but be a grievance to devout minds" to hear, for example, that St. Paul is suffering from spavin, or that the Nazarene, one of a sect who might drink nothing stronger than water, has been guilty of the strange solecism of straining his hock. But this is not the worst of baptismal eccentricities, for M. Nonnier denounces Anarchists and Socialists who will persist in civilly registering their children as Beelzebub, Lucifer, and Satan.

The Wesleyan Conference, assembled in the name of the Lord at Plymouth, and full of his holy spirit, obtained by many long and earnest prayers, has solemnly settled the great woman question. The men have closed the doors against the women, who are to remember that their duty, according to the great Apostle of the Gentiles, is to "learn in silence," and that, whether they learn or not, they must at least be silent, and give themselves a chance of acquiring a little knowledge.

The trouble arose in this way. At the last Wesleyan Conference a lady presented herself as a delegate. She was young, and perhaps good-looking, and some of the younger and more inflammable ministers would as soon sit near a petticoat as near another pair of trousers. But the older fellows were alarmed, and as the President would not decide the point himself, a special committee was appointed to consider the matter and report to the next Conference. Well, the committee considered and reported, and by a small majority it was in favor of admitting lady delegates. It coated the pill, however, by observing that in all probability very few ladies would be elected. The Conference, however, has refused to swallow the pill. By a majority of 187 to 169 it has resolved that women shall not be admitted. They may attend and decorate the chapel with their summer bonnets, and smile adoringly upon the lords of creation around them, but they must not speak or vote.

This decision is perfectly natural. In the first place, the men are in possession, and they don't mean to go snacks with the women if they can help it. In the next place, the Wesleyans are Bible Christians, and the Bible says that man got on very well until woman came and played the devil with him. The Wesleyan Adam doesn't intend to be deceived by the Wesleyan Eve. He was made for God, and she was made for him, and she must get behind him when he is on the Lord's business.

The funny thing is, though, that the original Adam, when the Lord appeared in Eden after that apple luncheon, got behind Eve, and whined, "She made me do it." The fellow hid himself behind his wife's petticoats; or, rather, he would have done so, only she had no wardrobe then—not even as much as an opera-bouffe ballet-dancer—nay, not even a fig-leaf in a hat-box.

Secularists can afford to smile at these Wesleyans. The pulpits are always declaring that the Bible is woman's best friend, whereas it is her worst enemy. Not being bound by the Bible, or corrupted by its influence, Secularists do not recognise the problem which has been agitating the Wesleyans. They never discussed whether women should be admitted to their Conferences. It never occurred to them that women had any less right there than men.

Slatin Pasha, having escaped from the Mahdists, attended the recent Geographical Congress in London, and gave an account of his captivity. In conclusion he said: "My thanks are due to God, whose protecting hand has led me safely through all the perils behind me"—whereat there was loud applause. Slatin Pasha did not explain why the protecting hand of God did nothing for him until human beings, including some faithful Arabs, came to his assistance; nor did he explain why the protecting hand of God did not prevent the murder of Gordon and the outrage of European women.

A telegram from Shanghai reports that ten British subjects were killed at Ku-cheng. The Rev. R. W. Stewart, Mrs. Stewart, and one child were burnt in the house. The massacre appears to have been done by a fanatical sect known as "Vegetarians." Only a little while ago the Rev. R. W. Stewart, who has now lost his life, wrote that their numbers had rapidly increased. He said: "Very disquieting rumors reached us. The converts urged me to organise them and procure arms. Of course I would not do this, and showed them how futile any such proceeding would be. The day arrived, an enormous meeting was held, but no injury was done. It was the 19th of the month; from early dawn that day a belt of prayer was encircling the earth for the Fo-kien Mission—prayer uttered by the thousands, from New Zealand round to Canada, who use the C.M.S. cycle of prayer." The belt of prayer does not appear to have proved efficacious.

In one of the Rev. R. W. Stewart's last letters from China he wrote: "Hezekiah's God is ours. One angel slew 185,000 men; so, with the Lord of Hosts of Angels on our side, there is nought to fear." The facts show how men can delude themselves with old superstitions and phrases.

"Clericus" furnishes some more particulars of remarkable church collections. He says: "At the church at which I am curate (diocese of St. Alban's), which holds 1,000 people, the collection at our Sunday afternoon services during May resulted as follows: May 12, 0d.; May 19, 3d.; May 26, 1d.; and during June, at our 7.30, Wednesday evening, services, we collected: June 5, 6d.; June 12, 3d.; June 19, 1s. 2d.; and June 26, 10d."—Tit-Bits.

The Catholic Times of July 26 says: "Speaking at the distribution of prizes to the Sunday-school children at St. Anthony's, Forest-gate, on Wednesday, Father Laurence, O.S.F., traced the depravity of the child-murderer to the godless education of the School Board." This is cheek. The School Boards teach not only Theism, but the Bible. Probably it would not be difficult to trace brutality to the teachings of the Bible.

According to a telegram received from Adelaide, Australasia, Infelix is shortly to be subjected to another "divine visitation." The Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, U.S.A., is expected to reach these shores late this month or early in August. He comes, it is said, by invitation of some of the Y.M.C.A.'s, who doubtless realise the necessity for doing something to revive orthodoxy, and hope for good results from the Boston Bombastes Furioso. Come along, Cook, there isn't quite so much cash current as when last you came here, but the supply of gobemouches and claqueurs has not yet run out. By the way, Joseph, we have still a copy of that article by Dr. Fiske on "Theological Charlatanism," which appeared in the North American Review of March, 1881. Have you forgotten it?—Harbinger of Light (July; Melbourne).

Mr. Cunninghame Graham writes characteristically in the Glasgow Evening News, under the heading of "Vox Populi, Vox Dei." He hits out right and left, and some of his blows fall upon pious gentlemen who have been wooing constituencies in Scotland. For instance, it appears that the new member for North-East Lanark is reported to have said that "his Master, Christ, called him forth" to the battle; and Mr. Graham conjures up a picture of "the worthy gentleman—no doubt as poor as ever was his Master—putting on his shiny hat, his long frock coat, and his elastic-sided boots" to enter the arena. "Take again," says Mr. Graham, "the pious editor who gave the seat in Greenock to the Unionists. One would have thought to read his speeches that he was a knight seeking the Holy Grail, and not a common carpet-bagger from Middlesex in search of notoriety." We suppose this is a hit at the late "Christian Socialist" editor of the Daily Chronicle.

Digitized by Google

Harry Alfred Long, the modest infidel-slayer of Glasgow, writes to the local Herald that his "soul drinks in gladness." We should imagine that his body had drunk in something stronger. He rejoices that the London Hall of Science has become a Salvation barracks. Harry Alfred Long seems to have access to supernatural sources of information. His natural knowledge was never very great, and we presume he has found out that it requires supplementing. He has made a bad blunder this time, but we hope he will try again. Some day or other, by the aid of inspiration, he may say something really accurate.

Isabella Shiach, a domestic servant, suffered from piety, tuberculosis, peritonitis, and an ulcerated stomach. The four killed her, and she is now supposed to be with the Lord. She would not have a doctor, as she believed in faith-healing. "Have as much faith as you like," said the Brixton coroner, "but you must use the proper means provided." He did not say by whom. The Lord has provided faith as the proper cure of disease. Coroners recommend doctors, but the Lord was very angry with a certain king we read of in the Bible because he "sought after" physicians when he was ill.

After duly wrestling in prayer, weeping for a season, and petitioning the throne of grace for wisdom which they should have acquired at a woman's school, the members of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church resolved that they would exclude from the ministry all students of the Union Theological Seminary, where the enlightened Dr. Briggs is a professor. The young men who have provided themselves with a stock of Calvinistic theology, modified by the Higher Criticism which proves it to be a humbug, and who now find the way to the Presbyterian pulpit too narrow for their load, are in a fix something like Robinson Crusoe's when he had finished his boat and discovered that there was a hill between him and the ocean. Still, Dr. Briggs's pupils do not necessarily have to launch their craft in Presbyterian waters, for the sea of Rationalism is a big one, and its waves come pretty near to the foundations of the Union Theological Seminary. This way, boys! —Truthseeker.

The following cynical item is from the New York Sun: "Captain Moore, of the 'Mary Gibbs,' is home from a voyage to Africa with a cargo of rum and missionaries from Boston. He called at thirteen ports to unload rum, which was received with wild enthusiasm. At the thirteenth port the missionaries went ashore uninvited."

The London correspondent of the New York Times seeks to minimise the barbarity displayed in the case of witch burning in Tipperary by the remark that faith in witchcraft is very general among men in all parts of Great Britain where there have been no modern movements of population. Only five years ago an aged woman in Suffolk was openly charged with fatally bewitching her grandchild by its parents, who were greatly surprised to find that she could not be punished for it.

The editor of the Two Worlds, and other Spiritists, came forward to the defence of Margaret Hartley and Emma Smith, who were charged at the Manchester Police-court with fortune-telling. One of the witnesses for the defence volunteered, amid laughter, to give the Court a spirit message from her deceased son, and a Professor Ross, a hypnotist, said that those who attended séances were not "customers" or "patients," but investigators. Hartley was committed to prison for three months with hard labor, and Smith fined £5 and costs, or in default one month. The Spiritists preferred to pay the fine and costs rather than move the case to a higher court, which seems to indicate misgivings either of their own cause or of the law as it stands.

We do not see why there should be special laws against fortune-telling while religion is established to teach our fortunes in another world; and we have often adverted to the unfair way in which these laws are administered against poor gipsies, while the palmists, who live on the upper classes, are untouched. But if the Spiritists really credit the bonâ fides of Miss Smith and Mrs. Hartley—and by calling for a defence fund it would seem so—they surely ought not to allow the one to be fined and the other imprisoned without appealing to a higher court.

The Rev. Heber Newton holds that Christ appeared to his disciples after death in a spiritual form. He does not explain why a spirit wanted to eat fish and honeycomb. Now comes ex-Rev. Stopford Brooke and explains the matter by hypnotism. It seems that Jesus really was dead, only he had power to mesmerise his followers into the belief that he was still living. "They were swept out of the ordinary physical condition into an extraordinary one—that in which mental impressions are naturally translated into apparently sensible forms." This condition is known to modern physicians as lunacy.

Archdeacon Eyton says in the Guardian: "It is impossible to escape from the conviction that the practical alliance between the drink trade and the Church is, in all its issues and consequences, the most immoral thing of our day."

The Wesleyan Conference did one sensible thing. They resolved "that there should be no increased grant of public funds, either from the local rates or from the Imperial taxes, to denominational schools, unless that increased grant is accompanied by adequate and representative public management."

Mark Gibson, a local preacher at Steeple Barton, near Hanbury, committed suicide last week by blowing out his brains with a revolver. He was treasurer of a friendly society.

Lucius Ernest Cheyse, a religious maniac at the Essex Lunatic Asylum, Claybury, contrived to hang himself with a piece of string. The usual verdict was returned.

The Annual Report of the Education Department for 1894-5 shows, among other things, that the amount raised during 1894 in subscriptions for every child in voluntary schools was only 6s. 6d., a less sum than in any year since Mr. Forster's Education Act was passed. Denominationalists now obtain a practical immunity from outside control by paying just about one-sixth of the cost of the education given in their schools. The immense bulk of the cost is already defrayed from the public purse, and they are clamoring for more money to keep up the religious character of their schools. Surely it is time others clamored for a larger measure of supervision by the State.

At the California Universalist Convention a Mr. John D. Gaylord, of Pasadena, read a paper written with great force and ability, in the course of which he expressed the thought that the miraculous must be discarded, and the historic Christ rejected in teaching the young. The paper aroused much opposition, but one of the ministers, a Dr Conger, allowed that every man's Christ differed from every other man's. There are Christs many as well as "gods many and lords many."

Still another new sect, which in many respects resembles the Stundists, has been discovered by the Russian police in the district of the Kuban. For example, these new sectarians condemn the use of holy pictures and images, believe in adult baptism, and preach neighborly love as their leading tenet. But, besides all this, they accuse the orthodox clergy of certain gross abuses, and this has led to the summary banishment to Siberia, by "administrative order," of all the leading members of their congregation. How they love one another!

Floods, loss of life, and damaged crops are reported from Northumberland and Durham. According to the Old Testament, every calamity came from Jahveh in punishment for some wrong done or some duty neglected. The Rabbis went so far as to say that even the prick of a pin was the return of some sin; and Jesus said not a sparrow fell to the ground without his Father's direction. But they fall all the same.

The Crescent (July 31) reports "Shocking Outrages by Christians upon Muslims. Two True Believers Murdered for Making Wozoo." It appears that an Afghan Muslim in Western Australia, named Nur Mahomet, who wished to say his prayers, commenced by washing his feet in a dam of water. This offended two fanatical Christians named Knowles and Hatfield, who proceeded to abuse and maltreat the pious Mussulman. Other Muslims interfered, with the result that two were shot. The men were tried, but were acquitted by their fellow religionists of any intention to murder, and were set free. The Crescent says: "This is not in Armenia, it is in Australia. The son of the Ameer is at present the honored guest of England. While he is being fêted in England his brethren in the faith are being murdered by English people in Australia!"

Prophet Baxter has for the last thirty years been getting himself ready, or rather getting other people ready, for the end of the world. But the great event hasn't occurred yet, and the poor old globe seems likely to outlast all the idiots and impostors of millennialism. Indeed, the Rev. Edmund Ledger, who is a man of God like Baxter, but also Gresham Lecturer on Astronomy, in an article in the Nineteenth Century calculates that life will last on this planet for another ten million years. This is a dreadfully short space of time to the conceited religionists who regard themselves as the centre and final cause of the whole universe. Nevertheless, it is a pretty long spell to those who are genuinely interested in the fortunes of the human race. A man who can't do a good stroke of work to-day because the result will not last—say a million years, must be an insufferable prig.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, August 11, St. James's Hall (Banqueting Hall), Piccadilly, W.: 7.30, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible."

August 18, and 25, St. James's Hall, London.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—August 11, Camberwell; 18 and 25, Milton Hall, London. September 8, Sheffield. October 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

Mr. and Mrs. Holmes.—Accept our best wishes.

J. Jones.—Pleased to hear you "like the Freethinker very much." See "Sugar Plums."

Johnson.—Thanks, but the enclosure is rather behind date. Before the elections is like before the deluge.

T. Clark.—(1) Your verse is meritorious. That might go without saying. But the subject is too personal. (2) Glad to hear you have obtained us four fresh subscribers, though sorry you cannot find a newsagent daring enough to show the Freethinker in his window. (3) No doubt some lecturers might be arranged for at Streatham, but some friends on the spot would have to co-operate. Can you tell us what halls are available?

J. G. Bartram.—The Newcastle Branch and yourself have our best wishes. The new hall should be a rallying centre for the many Freethinkers in the district. We hope to hear good accounts of your progress during the winter.

J. M. R. (Glasgow).—Pleased to hear you think the Freethinker improves. It is a pity, as you say, that this journal is not read more extensively outside the actual ranks of Freethought. To some extent, however, the remedy is in the hands of our present readers, who might circulate the Freethinker by lending it to their friends and acquaintances whenever they see a favorable opportunity of introducing it. Thanks for the joke.

C. B. (Burmah).—Thanks for copies of the Rangoon Times. We are pleased to notice how Freethought is kept to the front.

Cicero in Defence of Cluentius.—Received with thanks.

J. C. Richards.—See "Acid Drops" and elsewhere in this column. You are quite right in saying that the influence of Secularism is not to be measured by its actual organisation. It is a permeating force even in the Churches themselves, to say nothing of the masses outside them.

E. James.—Thanks for cuttings.

Forward.—Your suggestion looks good enough, but it would not be necessary for the legatees to act; the trustees or executors might do so, and probably would. Thanks for cuttings.

A. Lievre.—We should have made the statement more definite. What we meant was that Scotland has the highest percentage of illegitimate children of any part of the United Kingdom.

H. Foster.—Glad to hear you think Mr. Foote's lectures at St. James's Hall "a step in the right direction." If you come up from Lincolnshire, be sure to introduce yourself after the lecture. We fear you will not be able to obtain tickets so late as 7 o'clock on Saturday night at Stonecutter-street, but you could obtain them at Tree's office, though it would make assurance doubly sure if you obtained them beforehand.

Geo. H.—Harry Alfred Long is an absurd person, and famous for inaccuracy. It is news to us that the Hall of Science is turned into a Salvation Army barracks. Evidently we must go to Scotland to learn what is really going on in London.

S. A. B. (Edinburgh).—There is not a word of truth in it. See reply to G. H. and "Acid Drops." Lectures are delivered in Edinburgh occasionally. Mr. Putnam was there a few weeks ago. Still, the propaganda of Secularism ought to be more active in the capital of Scotland.

Papers Received.—Crescent—Harbinger of Light—Two Worlds—Light—Progressive Thinker—Birmingham Argus—Rangoon Times—Homœopathic Review—Liberty—Liberator—Twentieth Century—Boston Investigator—Western Figaro—Truthseeker—Secular Thought—Freidenker—Der Arme Teufel—Newcastle Chronicle—Oxford Times—The New Unity—New York Public Opinion.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

SPECIAL.

The President of the American Secular Union has been in this country three months, and his sojourn amongst us is drawing to a close. Before he departs we must give him a farewell reception in the metropolis. His last lecture will be delivered in London on Sunday, September 1. On that occasion I shall take the chair. Three days later, on Wednesday, September 4, a farewell dinner to Mr. Putnam will take place at the Holborn Restaurant. I shall take the chair again on that occasion, and I expect to be supported by Mr. Charles Watts, Mr. George Anderson, and other well-known Freethinkers. The tickets for this function are four shillings each, and are now on sale.

Let me now call attention to the course of three Sunday evening lectures I am delivering at St. James's Hall. Everybody says this is a step in the right direction. But it is a costly experiment, and I appeal to my London friends to make the meetings real demonstrations. I promise, on my part, that the lectures shall be as good as I can make them. West London friends, in especial, should bestir themselves in this matter.

We are not allowed to charge less than a shilling for admission to St. James's Hall, nor can we take money at the doors. Single and course tickets can be obtained at Tree's Ticket Office, at 28 Stonecutter-street, and of any London Branch secretary. Arrangements have been also made for their sale by Mr. Haines, 212 Mile End-road, E.; Mr. Munton, 6 Uxbridge-road, W.; Mr. George Ward, 91 Mildmay-park, N., and Mr. Miller, 76 Holloway-road, N. Late comers, who have failed to obtain tickets, will find Miss Vance outside the Hall in Piccadilly, who will inform them where tickets can be procured. G. W. Foote.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote opened the new hall of the Newcastle Branch on Sunday. Unfortunately it rained spitefully all day, and the morning and afternoon audiences were seriously affected, although the hall was filled in the evening with a most appreciative and enthusiastic meeting. At the close of the afternoon lecture Mr. Foote performed the ceremony of "naming" two babes. He was rather hampered by the smallness of the platform, but the ceremony seemed pleasing to the audience, and not the least so to the ladies. After the evening lecture Mr. Foote was present at the adjourned members' meeting, at which a committee was appointed to attend to the arrangements for the debate in October between Mr. Charles Watts and the Rev. A. J. Waldron. Mr. Mitchell, president; Mr. Foreman, treasurer; and Mr. Bartram, secretary, were unanimously re-elected. During the past year 75 lectures have been delivered under the Branch's auspices, 34 of which have been given out of doors, chiefly by Mr. Cohen and Mr. Mitchell. The year opened with a small deficit, which has been turned into a slight balance on the right side, after an expenditure of more than £100.

Mr. Charles Watts had another excellent audience at the Secular Hall, Camberwell, last Sunday evening. His lecture on "Trust in God a Delusion" was enthusiastically received. We are glad to hear that several new members were enrolled after the lecture. Mr. Watts speaks again from the same platform this Sunday evening, August 11.

Our American visitor, Mr. S. P. Putnam, attends to-day (August 11) the Annual Services of the Failsworth Secular Sunday-school, and delivers two addresses on "The Bible and Modern Thought" and "Freethought and Morality." Hymns and choruses will be sung by the choir, assisted by the Failsworth String Band. The schools have just been thoroughly redecorated, and it is hoped that there will be a bumping attendance and a magnificent collection.

Although Mr. Symes won his law case, he had to serve fourteen days' imprisonment for "contempt of court," for writing upon it in the Liberator while the case was sub judice, though the issue of the case proved that his remarks were justified, besides being written under provocation. We are pleased to note that Mr. Symes had visits from friends every day, books, writing materials, etc., and that the Liberator did not suffer by his absence. A banquet was given him upon his release, and a cheque presented, which we hope may in some measure recoup him for his many troubles.

Joseph said he hoped he had seen the end of his troubles. The Sydney Bulletin says it "sincerely hopes he hasn't, for Australia can't spare the combative old Atheist, who is, in his way, almost as obstinate as the bigots he attacks, but whose career is such a monument of industry and talent, used with single-purposed sincerity, that one glows in contemplating it. For some twenty years now, in season and out of season, with good taste, bad taste, and no taste at all, Jos. Symes has been doing every day of his life three men's work, with tongue and pen, to spread the truth as he knows it, the light as he sees it. He has fought continuously against calumny and misrepresentation; the defection of friends and the attacks of open and secret enemies; private affliction and public scorn; frowns, pity, and laughter."

Digitized by Google

The S. B. continues: "He has been poorer than Job all the time, his Liberator is hardly ever out of the valley of the shadow of death, and just now he badly wants £50 to pay rent and taxes, and give him a fresh start. Such a man can only reach the end of his troubles in two ways. One is to stop struggling and float with the conventional stream. The other way is that painted in the magnificent close of the magnificent Beauchamp's Career, when the great Lord Romfrey stands thundering on the beach to direct the search for the body of the drowned Radical, whose life has been so pathetically fruitless, so grandly unsuccessful. Perhaps the end of Jos. Symes' troubles may come when a long, loose-jointed corpse, with grizzled hair and furrowed face, is found floating on the peaceful bosom of the Yarra, to receive as guerdon and epitaph the title which Heine chose for himself —'A Soldier in the Liberation-War of Humanity.'"

Mr. A. B. Moss, at a meeting of the Camberwell Vestry, entered his protest against favors shown to religious bodies. Other members of the Vestry shared his opinion, and it was voted by 26 to 19 that the trustees or owners should pay for the paving in front of their chapels. But as 7 members took no part in the division the resolution was declared "not carried." Mr. Moss says he will demand exemption for the Secular Hall in New Church-street.

Mr. Clifford J. Cory, Liberal member for South Monmouthshire, in reply to a constituent who sent him our "Questions for Candidates," wrote: "I am decidedly in favor of the fullest extension of civil and religious liberty. I think all the other questions are answered by my reply to the first one."

The editor of a widely-circulated and influential English paper in India writes: "It is a pity the Freethinker is not better known in India. There would be thousands of Secularists added to the ranks among all classes, more especially the educated Hindoo, who, having learnt too much to accept the childish traditions of his own faith, refuses also to accept the superstitions of Christianity. Has Mr. Foote never thought of visiting India?" Mr. Foote has thought about it, but he gets busier and busier in England, and sees very little prospect of a foreign tour, at least in the immediate future.

The Independent Pulpit for July reprints Mr. Wheeler's article on "A Jolly Japanese Religion"; Mr. J. P. Richardson writes on "A Parson's Talking Shop"; C. L. Edwards criticises the Decalogue in his paper on "Moses as a Legislator"; Dr. Smythe writes instructively on "The Mound Builders"; and both Mr. J. D. Shaw and his son carry on controversy with the Blue Grass Blade on the subject of prohibition.

A little-known Freethinker, noted rather for his Socialism than his Freethought, finds place in the new volume of the Dictionary of National Biography. William Pare (1805–1873) was one of those disciples of Robert Owen who were active in every movement in the direction of progress. He worked for parliamentary, religious, and social reform, advocated labor exchanges, and founded the first Birmingham Co-operative Society. From 1842 to '44 he was acting governor of Owen's community at Queenwood, Hampshire. He became Owen's literary executor, and by his own will he left his books, papers, pictures, and £50 to any institute or trust founded on the model of an Owen institute suggested by him. We do not know what became of this bequest.

Another heretic mentioned in the Dictionary of National Biography is George van Parris, a German or Flemish surgeon, who settled in London and became naturalised October 29, 1550. He seems to have been a Unitarian. At any rate, the London Dutch Church excommunicated him, and he was tried for denial of the divinity of Christ. His judges included Cranmer, Ridley, and Coverdale; the latter, it is said, acted as interpreter. "He appears," says the Dictionary, "to have been a man of upright life, and some efforts were made to secure a pardon for him. He was, however, burnt on April 25, 1551, in Smithfield." We do not know if our friend Mr. Touzeau Parris claims any descent from this martyred heretic.

Under the title of "A Famous Abduction," the Sheffield Weekly Telegraph for August 3 reproduces from the Secular Almanack the story of "The Abducted Female Infidel," Mrs. Rachel Fanny Antonia Dashwood Lee, as related by Mr. J. M. Wheeler. It, however, omits the most interesting particulars, those connected with the trial at Oxford in 1804 and the stoppage of the case owing to the lady's disbelief in Christianity.

Secular Thought (July 20) gives a portrait of a young and promising Freethought lecturer, Mr. Franklin Steiner, of Des Moines, Illinois, who has lectured with acceptance both throughout the United States and in Canada, where he is expected to attend the next Secular Convention at Toronto, in September.

The following number of Secular Thought makes good use of the Freethinker, reprinting Mr. Wheeler's article on "Rome in England," and Mr. J. A. Richardson's "Jeu d'Esprit" on "The Jew's Conversion." Mr. J. S. Ellis, the editor, writes on "A Clerical Curiosity," the Rev. A. Osborne, D.D., of Summerside, Prince Edward's Island, who is one of the old school of divines now nearly extinct.

One of the Fables by the late R. L. Stevenson, in Longman's Magazine, is short, pointed and secular in its application. "The Penitent" is its title:—"A man met a lad weeping. 'What do you weep for?' he asked. 'I am weeping for my sins,' said the lad. 'You must have little to do,' said the man. The next day they met again. Once more the lad was weeping. 'Why do you weep now?' asked the man. 'I am weeping because I have nothing to eat,' said the lad. 'I thought it would come to that,' said the man."

S. F. Benson writes on "The Legend of Paul and Thecla" in the Boston Investigator, contending that the story is a solar myth. He says: "The splendors of summer, symbolised by the sign Virgo of the Zodiac, following the sun in the drama of the year, would give us, when framed in the setting of Christian asceticism, the story of Paul and Thecla, or of Christ and the Magdalene Mary."

Professor Edward D. Cope, of the University of Pennsylvania, has planned a chain of eleven successive links, which, he claims, joins man to the earliest vertebrate. His chain begins with a creature similar to the amphioxus of the Mediterranean; the fish developed from this peculiar animal was modified to a salamander-like form. Then follow, in succession, the theromerous reptiles of the closing period of the carboniferous age and the paleozoic era; the protodonta, closely allied to the carnivorous reptiles; the pantotheria, similar to opossums; the credonta, carnivorous animals of the lower eocene period; the condylarthra; the pseudo or false lemur, which is allied to both the monkey and the fox; the anthropoid ape, which Professor Cope calls the immediate progenitor of man; and, finally, man himself.

On Sunday, August 11, the Chatham Branch of the N.S.S. take their annual excursion, going by coach to Stockbury Valley. They start from Luton Arches at 9.30. Tickets may be obtained from the committee.

SELF-RELIANCE.

THROW o'er thy God, O man!
Be dignified and true:
Stand thou apart, and aye
Dare to be with the few.

Give Truth the foremost place,
And let thy reason guide
Thee through the changing scenes
Of Earth, so much decried.

We know no other life;
Then make the most of this:
Waste no time seeking for
A mythic future bliss.

Shoulder to shoulder stand
With those whose aim is Right;
Scorn thou to lag behind:
E'er in the vanguard fight.

Then, when Death's shadows come,
With calm, unflinching mien
Right grandly shalt thou glide
Forth into the Unseen.

THOS.

A youngster, looking at the stars, said: "If those big bright nails, papa, were to come out, with what a thump God Almighty would come down!"

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (July 13).

ABERDEEN, Scotland, is a rich and comfortable place. Orthodoxy enjoys itself here. It is in the swim. But it is no bad place for a Freethinker. With a moderate fortune and a complacent mind, one can take life as pleasantly in this northern metropolis as anywhere on the globe. Aberdeen granite is celebrated for its beauty. It has a lightsome look, and as there is no smoke at Aberdeen, the stone always has a charming and cleanly appearance. The city has many noble structures, colleges, universities, hotels, etc. The church buildings are very elegant and massive. The Salvation Army warriors are in their pride and glory here. They are erecting a splendid fort of granite, and they certainly put on style, and begin to vie in magnificence with the more ancient ecclesiastical powers. They will eventually be at the height of fashion, no doubt.

Dr. Mortimer, of Turiff, was present at the lectures. He has for many years been an outspoken Freethinker in an orthodox community. It was a pleasure to meet one who has so bravely stood by his colors. On Tuesday afternoon he gave me a drive over Aberdeen in company with his son, William Mortimer, and his brother, Mr. D. A. Mortimer. I thus had an opportunity to see the renowned buildings of the city, the cathedral, King's College, and the Marischol College, also the old stone bride, Victoria Bridge, the park, harbor, etc. We visited old Aberdeen, which has, indeed, the aspect of moss-grown centuries. The modern Aberdeen is built between the rivers Don and Dee, and along its shores sweeps the great German Ocean.

On Wednesday I had a delightful drive with James Maitland, William Calder, James Greig, Robert Leith, and others, to Castle Mar, past Balmoral, the Queen's Highland residence, a magnificent palace in the heart of the mountains. We first take train for Ballater, forty miles out, and then a coach eighteen miles to Braemar. The Grampian Hills along this route stretch away in majestic amplitude, and valleys smile in summer glory, while above the vast woodlands are the still snow-capped peaks. I did not expect to behold such a contrast—against the splendor of summer the gleaming masses of winter's array. Along the towering Lochnagar, which Byron celebrates, dark and massive, and other lofty steeps, the white banners unfurl, while near around the glorious flowers and grass adorn the warm bosom of earth. The battle of summer and winter is still carried on among these Highlands, with blending and beautiful columns, as if somehow it were a lover's quarrel, and the seasons did not wish to part with one another. Thus in the chambers of the Highlands they mix in gentle warfare with delightful contrariety.

It is both sunshine and rain along the route. The rain is what they call in this country a "Scotch mist." It makes the journey only more enchanting, for over the peaks the clouds roll off, and a burst of sunshine contrasts with the dark environments, touching the mist with gold, so that the prospects were ever-varying, and the clouds seemed like castles in the air. Anon a brilliant rainbow would span the way, decorating the wooded heights with effulgent hues. One hung from the mountain right over Balmoral Castle as we passed along, ornamenting it as never before; and the Queen, with all her untold wealth, could not have given it such a lovely embellishment, nor could she have enjoyed its lustre any more than we strangers did, for our ownership was as legitimate as hers. I never saw a rainbow so close before. It seemed to drop some of its jewels at our very feet as it arched over our onward path.

Castle Mar is an old, old castle, built in 1483, and many a conflict has surged about its lofty walls. It is now occupied only by one old man, who takes care of it—a curious old man, contented in his loneliness amidst this decaying grandeur, and yet a jolly old soul, especially when the mountain-dew is sparkling. He says he wouldn't be married for all the world. He doesn't want a woman around. He can take care of himself, and be perfectly independent within the walls of this solitary structure. I wandered all over this somewhat ghostly relic of the past, that looks sad and riven against the bloom of to-day. From dungeon to battlement I looked over the desolate apartments, and strange figures and scenes haunted the inquiring mind. Around the castle in the sunny grass were beautiful wild flowers, which I gathered in remembrance of this charming and melancholy spot, thrilled with the romance of so many changing ages. We took our lunch here, on the greensward, and modern politics and progress mingled their flashes with the shadowy turrets that overhung our joyous "round-table."

We then walked to Braemar, a mile away, a handsome town on the side of the mountain among the ranks of trees. It is 1,100 feet above Aberdeen, and is quite a summer resort for invalids in pursuit of pure air. The prospects extending from this lofty hamlet are varied and delightful; the hills and vales, the elegant residences; the river, or mountain brook rather, at this place; the wide meadows, the cattle and sheep, the sky above with its silver or golden clouds, and the deep blue of the immensities beyond. Through this pomp we return while the sun hastes to its setting and the long twilight begins, and at nine o'clock Aberdeen again presents itself. I was pleased to meet at this time Mr. Charles Watt Daniel, and to spend with him the remainder of the evening in the company of Mr. Mann, of the Grand Royal Hotel. Both these friends are staunch Liberals, and their companionship was one of the most entertaining of my experiences.

James Maitland, William Calder, and Mr. Harkis are among the pioneer forces of Freethought in Aberdeen. They did their level best to make the lectures a success, and to enable the Pilgrim to see the best that was to be seen in this part of Scotland. Mr. Harkis presided at the first meeting and Mr. Maitland at the second, and the audiences on both evenings gave me a cheery welcome. There was some kind of a discussion after the lectures, but it did not amount to much, for the reason that no salient points were discussed, and the defenders of the faith ran off into individual idiosyncrasies that had no bearing upon the general question. It is pretty difficult to keep the Christians to parliamentary rules. Aberdeen friends have enriched the campaign with one of the most enjoyable of my experiences.

Dundee is next on the list, somewhat larger than Aberdeen, having, I understand, about 160,000 inhabitants. It has not the brilliant appearance of Aberdeen, for the stone of which it is built is of a darker hue, and the smoke of factories hangs over it. I am welcomed to the hospitable home of William McLean, who lives, and has his home and workshop, on an eminence in the suburbs of the city, and from them a fine view can be obtained of the surrounding country. Mr. McLean and Mr. D. F. Gloak meet me at the station, and the moment I strike their company I know I am in good hands. The audiences at Dundee are not so large as those at Aberdeen, but they are appreciative, and heartily welcome the American visitor. Mr. Gloak presides the first evening, and Mr. Sturton the second evening. A rambling discussion occurs after the lectures, but I found it pretty difficult to get hold of the ideas presented. They were cloudy and far-fetched. Indeed, I could hardly discover if there were any ideas at all, the words being so voluminous and the sentences involved. However, one genial critic I did understand—Mr. Scott, who is a Swedenborgian, and made some very sensible observations, in harmony with the general matter of my lecture, though from a different point of view, but with entirely friendly feeling, all of which is acceptable to the comprehensive Freethinker. Altogether, I enjoyed the lectures at Dundee. I liked the people I met, and am sure that, at another time, I shall have a much larger attendance. The summer weather is not favorable for good audiences. People like to be outdoors and enjoy the fresh air and beautiful scenery, and it takes quite a motive power to get them inside of four walls.

Dundee has many attractions. Among the chief are the Tay river and the Tay Bridge. The Tay is a broad, magnificent river nearly two miles wide as it flows by Dundee. The bridge over this river is the longest bridge in the world—about two miles. It is a massive structure, built for the centuries, to defy wind and tide. The piers of the old bridge are still to be seen, a melancholy remembrance. The old bridge was itself a great feat of engineering, but it was too narrow, and the railroad directors too economical; and one bright, moonlight night, when the wind was blowing a perfect gale, just as the train rolled on, the structure toppled over, and all on board were plunged into the river with the crashing timbers. Not one was saved. The new bridge is broader, with more massive piers, and a like accident will never occur. On Friday morning, with Mr. McLean and Mr. Gloak, I took the train over the bridge to East Newton, one of the elegant suburbs of Dundee, across the river, where it costs money to live. The views up and down the river as we crossed the mighty bridge were splendid in their variety, the waters spreading like a lake, the bonnie banks and braes, the far hills, blue and towering in the summer sky, while the clouds swept overhead. In the afternoon, with my two comrades and Mr. Cameron, we secured a "machine" and travelled into the ample country, climbing vast hills and beholding wide expanses. In this country they call a carriage or wagon a "machine," a new name to me. I didn't hear it in England, so I guess it is pure Scotch. At any rate, the "machine" did good service, and we went on a wide rambling excursion all the afternoon. We rose hundreds of feet above the river Tay, whose spreading waters seemed to be rolling from the heart of the mountains that lifted their massive fronts along the horizon. We travelled through forest glades, by great fields of green and yellow, a million buttercups besprinkling the grass. We pass by ancient houses, thatched cottages, the stately Insane Asylum appearing like a palace on a majestic height, and the school-house where the happy children shouted after our retreating machine, and the schoolmaster of Goldsmith's pages looked after us with dazed expression, and it may be "with words of learned length and thundering sound." It was a delightful drive. It seemed as if we were riding in a balloon, so lofty were some of the hills that we ascended. When the horse dashed along with extra liveliness, it seemed as if the "machine" had wings like one of the old dragons. At length we came to a most ancient church. Nobody knows how old it is. There is a tower in Dundee which dates, they say, from the seventh century, and perhaps the church does the same. Near the door is still inserted the old iron circlet which they once put around the neck of the rogue and heretic, and there he must endure the scoffs of the pious church-goers. Inside there is a dusky and mediæval appearance, with paintings on the wall, the stone altar, etc. I placed my name on the book—for no more can the old church crush the Infidel. The sunlight of to-day is triumphant, and over the almost forgotten graves are blooming the blue and golden flowers.

Digitized by Google

We have a mighty good appetite when we return to Dundee, and Mrs. McLean spreads for us the hospitable table. After the lecture that evening we have a jolly company at Mr. McLean's house, and I have a right good experience of Scottish life, such as we see glowing in the pages of Burns. The Scotch are a happy people, or else they never could have produced the poetry of this glorious bard.

It strikes one at first that the Scotch must be a solemn people, seeing they take so readily to Calvinism in their religious proclivities. But Calvinism is offset by whisky. I don't wonder the Scotch drink whisky. Any man who believes in the doctrines of Calvin must drink whisky in order to make life endurable. It is noticeable that, as Calvinism disappears, so does the much drinking of whisky. The Scotch are a temperate people so far as I can see, and there is a strong movement in favor of teetotalism. Many of our Freethought friends are disposed that way.

I am trying to learn the Scotch language, but I havn't got the hang of it yet. It takes a practised ear. The real old Scotch songs were sung at our last gathering, and they have a humor, a pathos, and a musical ring that are charming. The heart of Scotland beats to the rhythms of nature. Her dark religion cannot destroy the joys of human fellowship. "Auld Lang Syne" closed an evening of song and cheer; and long live the remembrance of this happy occasion! Scotland is Bonnie Scotland, and no mistake; and Calvinism has forever lost its grip. The heather blooms upon its loneliest crags, and so will reason and Freethought make glorious its humblest cottage.

Farewell to Dundee; and now Edinburgh, a great, busy, tumultuous, magnificent city, is about me, and it seems like a dream that I am in this historic place. Whose heart has not glowed at the name of Edinburgh? I arrived yesterday, Saturday. I was met at the station by Mr. John F. Dewar. The first thing I saw as I stepped forth from the station was the vast and famous castle on the hill. There is nothing in the world like it for magnificence and grandeur. Around its base are the public gardens, beautiful to behold. I saw, also, the marvellous monument to Sir Walter Scott, perhaps the most truly artistic and sublime monument ever erected to human genius. The first thing I did after tea was to mount one of the circular tramways and ride all over the great city with Mr. Dewar and others. Edinburgh is built on seven hills, and the views from its exalted streets are extensive and superb, like what we see in San Francisco. I am reminded somewhat of San Francisco as I climb these splendid hills, although Edinburgh has not the luminous appearance of the city of the Golden Gate. There is a deal of ancient solemnity about this capital of Scotland. However, I have caught but glimpses of it so far. I lecture to-day, Sunday, June 16, afternoon and evening, and, after a season of sight-seeing, I shall have more to write. I must pencil these notes at odd chances, for I have to spend most of the day looking about, and photographing on my brain the many and glorious pictures of this memorable land.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

(4) Display, or get displayed, one of our contents-sheets, which are of a convenient size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will send them on application.

(5) Distribute some of our cheap tracts in your walks abroad, at public meetings, or among the audiences around street-corner preachers.

(6) Get your newsagent to exhibit the Freethinker in the window

A MAGNIFICENT CITY.

FOR many years religionists have boomed Jerusalem as the greatest city of ancient times, and Palestine as a kingdom superior in importance to all other countries of the globe. We now know that Palestine is a mountainous region, with arable land not superior to Vermont; that the holy city, because of its hilly surroundings and deep valleys, never exceeded one mile in length and three-fourths of a mile in breadth; that good statisticians, taking the most populous cities as guides, are of the opinion that its greatest population was never greater than 30,000; that, in fact, it probably never held more than 15,000 permanent residents at any one time; that they were without commerce, the arts, learning, and scarcely civilisation; that the story of Solomon's temple is almost unquestionably fabulous, as no traces of such a structure can be found, though diligent search has been made for it; that the ancient inhabitants lived in small, low-roofed huts; that the streets were narrow alley-ways, not wide enough for two of our modern carriages to pass without colliding; that filth was everywhere, and the odors disgusting in the extreme. The smells arising from the valley of Himmon, always reeking with decaying bodies, where "the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched," made the whole city, in summer-time, pestilential.

Well, now, that was the city and country where God dwelt (Psalm cxxxv. 31); his throne was there (Jer. iii. 17); and there, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, was to be his judgment seat (Joel iii. 12); and there he shall roar and shake the heavens and the earth (Joel iii. 16).

Honor bright, good reader, do you wonder at the scepticism there is in the world when the people are told of the gigantic wars waged against that city; of the vast multitudes, reaching into millions, who were slaughtered by the armies of Titus, else were led away into slavery?

The Greeks knew the Jews as temple robbers. Did they not, as such, steal a description of the temple at Tyre, and credit it to Solomon? We know the Tyrians had a magnificent temple which was dedicated to the worship of Baal. Was not that temple made to do double duty—in real service at Tyre, and imaginary service at Jerusalem?

A recent visitor to Jerusalem does not glorify the modern city. He says: "It has no clubs, no bar-rooms, no beer-gardens, no concert-halls, no theatres, no lecture-rooms, no place of amusement of any kind, no street bands, no wandering minstrels, no wealthy or upper classes, no mayor, no alderman, no newspapers, no printing-presses, no book-stores—except one outside the walls for the sale of Bibles—no cheerfulness, no life. No one sings, no one dances, no one laughs in Jerusalem. Even the children do not play."

It is to be hoped that the New Jerusalem, which is to come down from heaven, will not be a duplicate of either the ancient or modern city.—Progressive Thinker.

HELL.

THE Boston Sunday Globe had, some little time back, a symposium on the subject of hell, in which various men of God aired their speculations. The straightest words on the subject came from Mr. Ernest Mendum, of the good old Boston Investigator, who wrote as under:—

"Hell is a figment of the brain. It is located in the diseased and perverted imaginations of human beings. It is the dreadful nightmare from the overloaded stomach of an ancient savage masquerading as a reality in the nineteenth century. It is a scourge used to frighten the weak-minded and children of all ages into paying tribute to theological mountebanks. Without it churches and lunatic asylums, though escaping taxation, could never flourish. It is the great tithe collector that levies tribute on cowards for the benefit of ministers and priests.

"Hell is of little consequence to the average man now-a-days, except to swear by, and this is the most honorable office to which it has ever been elected. Savages, in the barbarous past, might be excused a belief in this horrible, brain-destroying fiction; but one is unable to respect the mind which, having access to the ordinary sources of information to-day, still holds any fealty to a belief in that misty, boiling, sulphurous pit of Calvin, Knox, and Edwards.

"Modern intellectual fire companies have 'turned the hose of common sense' against the Devil and his dominion, with such good effect that the poor gentleman's abode has been changed into a green garden, where the shades of Voltaire, Paine, Hume, and Volney now rest on 'beds of asphodel' beneath the verdant foliage of the trees in Sheol, instead of sweating and groaning in the seething caldron of hell.

"Hell has been the greatest curse the world has ever known. Let it forever pass to that realm of superstition and darkness from which it was evolved to craze, to trouble, and to agonise the human race."

Digitized by Google

POWER.

WATCHING the never-ending shocks
Of the ever-restless sea,
Dashing against the dauntless rocks
With its wild and tireless glee.

Watching the earth-worm's winding path
Through the slowly yielding soil,
Aiding the earth to growth and math
By its dark and silent toil.

Watching the wanton zig-zag flight
Of the pollen'd flirting bee,
Whisp'ring to all the blossoms bright
That its roving eye can see.

Watching the printer's busy toil,
As he sets the deathless type,
Planting a tree in living soil,
With its fruit that's always ripe.

Wond'ring, as all these things I see,
If the wit of man can say
Whether the sea, worm, man, or bee
O'er the earth holds greatest sway.

G. L. MACKENZIE.

MEMS. FROM OLD BOOKS.

FATHER GARASSE, who in his Doctrine Curieuse des Beaux Esprits has some abominable lies about Vanini, Luther, Buchanan, and Theophile, gives a good story of a Jew who maintained that the sin for which the Jews were suffering was that so many of them had believed Christ to be God.

Another good thing in Garasse is his saying that women ought not to read the Bible, "for," says he, "the Bible makes ministers' daughters so liable to be debauched!"

Bayle (sub. Castalion) says of Garasse: "I cannot sufficiently wonder at the impudence of this calumniator." Yet should it be remembered of this intolerant bigot that during a plague he obtained permission to attend the sick at Poictiers, where he caught the infection and died in 1631. Besides his Doctrine Curieuse (Against the Freethinkers), he wrote Elixir Calvinisticum (Against the Calvinists).

Bayle (sub. Aaron) relates that, in a French Bible printed by Antoine Bonnemere in 1566, the fables have been inserted into the text about the golden calf (Exodus xxxii.), about the beards becoming gilt of those who drank the infusion of the calf, and of the Israelites spitting upon Hur when he refused to make gods for them, till they smothered him.

Lerinus Torrentus, Bishop of Antwerp, wrote a hymn to the pious memory of Balthazar Gerard, the assassin of William the Silent.

Bayle, in his Pensées sur la Comète (p. 356), mentions a man burnt for Atheism at Paris, 1573, who taught that cleanliness was the only essential religion. He had as many shirts as there were days in the year, and sent them to be washed at a fountain in Flanders, famous for the purity of its waters and for bleaching linen.

Darwinism appears in the Talmud. At any rate, it is there reported that God originally made Adam with a tail, and he cut it off because he looked better without it. (See Bartolocci's Bibliotheca Rabbinica.) Some say Lilith was made from Adam's tail.

Several of the Talmudical doctors held that the Messiah had come. Rabbi Hillel said Hezekiah was the man, others said Nehemiah, others Zorobabel, and yet others Cyrus.

Southey, in his Common-Place Book (2nd series, p. 389), speaking of the saints, says: "Even stupidity was curable. There was a canon, by name Martin, in the Monastery of St. Isidore, excellently pious, but an incorrigible blockhead. In vain he puzzled himself to learn, till the saint appeared to him in a dream, and made him eat a book. He awoke a learned man, and wrote good Latin. It was certainly a sure way of making him digest knowledge." Perhaps this was how Galilean fishermen got their learning. John relates how, when retired from the fish business to Patmos, he ate a little book which an angel gave him (Rev. x. 10).

BIBLIOMANIAC.

Joseph in Egypt.

The tombs of ancient Egypt have given to us not only a religious literature of the first order, but they have preserved the papyri containing many of the most interesting novels read or heard recited by the ancients in the palmy days of ancient Egypt. The earliest stories are mostly of a fabulous and marvellous kind; those, however, of a later date are more solid in nature, and have often historical facts for their basis. Let us take, for example, the tale of the two brothers, written probably for Seti I., about B.C. 1366, when he was Crown Prince. In this story, which forms a wonderful analogy to that of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, we have a novel, a romance of the first order. It appears that the novel centres around the persons of two brothers, named Bata and Anpu. The latter has a house and a wife, and the former lives with his brother as a kind of companion. One day Anpu sends Bata to get some corn out of a bin, and, on his arrival at the house, finds his brother's wife at her toilet. He asks her to get the required grain, but, instead of doing so, the wife makes suggestions similar to those made to Joseph by Potiphar's wife. Bata, however, refuses to listen, and, getting the corn himself, goes away. The wife, now fearing that one brother would tell the other, pretends as though she had suffered violence, and, when her husband comes home, accuses Bata of misconduct. Anpu now goes in search of his brother, and, finding him, threatens to murder him. The story goes on to say that at the death of Bata his heart was placed in the sycamore tree, which, on being cut down and the heart mixed with blood, Bata comes to life again. On examining the papyrus containing this romance, one cannot but be struck with the similarity between the Biblical story and the romance of the papyrus. —London "Echo," August 1.

PROFANE JOKES.

"In what condition was Job at the end of his life?" asked a Sunday-school teacher. "Dead," answered the quiet-looking boy.

The Rev. McSneeshin cannot do without his Taddy. He always takes a pinch before commencing his sermon, and his favorite text is, "My soul cleaveth unto the dust."

A visitor to the Duke of York, seeing a violin on the table, asked if his Royal Highness played, like his uncle, the Duke of Edinburgh. "Not much," said the attendant, "only such simple airs as God save his Grandmother."

Sunday-school Teacher (to farmer's boy)—"Why did the shepherd leave the ninety and nine sheep in the wilderness and go after the one that was lost?" Johnny (with eager confidence)—"Please, miss, 'cause it was the prize ram."

"What is heaven's number?" said a little New York girl to her mother one day last week. "What do you mean, dear?" was the reply. "Heaven's telephone number. I dess want to ring up Dod and ask him to please send some other kind of weather. I'm tired of this," added the little maid.

Every night when she said "Now I lay me" she supplemented it with "God bless papa and mamma," and on through the rest of the family. One evening last week she added: "Please remember brother 'specially, 'cause to-morrow's his birthday, an', Lord, don't forget me next month."

Mrs. Gray—"Was your prayer-meeting good last night?" Mrs. Green—"Rather uninteresting. None of the men who spoke had ever done anything very bad." Mrs. Gray—"But wasn't Mr. Graybeard there?" Mrs. Green—"Oh, yes; but you don't expect he'd confess any of his real crimes, do you?" Mrs. Gray—"Well, he might run a risk of being arrested."

Widow Blueberry—"Yes, I kin never be too thankful that my poor John was baptised afore he died." Enoch—"He was a Baptist, was he not?" Widow B.—"Yes. He was immersed in the river in the afternoon, an' that very same night he died of newmony on the lungs from ketchin' cold. It was awful sudden; but, as I said, I kin never be too thankful that he was baptised afore his death."

"Six days shalt thou labor." This is given as a law of God, promulgated on Mount Sinai. It is of equal authority with "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Whoever heard a preacher declare that a man would be damned for not laboring six days? These servants of God repudiate the entire law. They do not labor themselves on week days, neither do they keep holy God's Sabbath. They change the day and then prosecute the Seventh-Day Adventists, who keep the whole commandment—work six days, including the first, and rest on the seventh.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

ST. JAMES'S HALL (Banqueting Hall), Piccadilly: 7.30, G. W. Foote, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 8.30, social gathering. Tuesday, at 8.30, dance.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, Charles Watts, "Christianity: its Birth, Reign, and Death."

EAST LONDON (Swaby's Coffee House, 103 Mile End-road): 8, J. Fagan, "The Life of a Poor Scholar."

MILTON HALL (Hawley-crescent, 89 Kentish Town-road): 7, musical selections; 7.30, a lecture.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, A. Guest, "Atheist or Theist: which is the Fool?"

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, a lecture.

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.30, F. Haslam, "Secularism and Social Problems." Members' general meeting after lecture.

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, Stanley Jones will lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, C. Cohen will lecture.

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11.15, H. Courtney will lecture; 8.15, A. Guest, "The Infinite."

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE (Middlesex side): 7, W. Heaford, "Prayer." Thursday, at 8.30, F. Haslam, "The Life and Times of Voltaire."

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, W. Heaford, "Religious Consolations"; 3.30, "Theism Examined." Wednesday, at 8, St. John will lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, a lecture.

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, W. J. Ramsey will lecture.

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, Stanley Jones will lecture.

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, a lecture.

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "God so Loved the World."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, A. B. Moss, "Behold how the Gods Vanish."

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 8, S. R. Thompson will lecture.

TOTTENHAM GREEN: 3.30, a lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15 and 3.15, C. Cohen will lecture.

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, S. E. Easton, "Creeds and Dogmas"; 7, "How Christianity became Strong." Thursday, at 8, C. Cohen will lecture.

COUNTRY.

FAILSWORTH SECULAR SUNDAY-SCHOOL (Pole-lane): 2.30, S. P. Putnam, "The Bible and Modern Thought"; 6.30, "Freethought and Morality."

IPSWICH (Mr. Bishop's, "The G. E. R.," Commercial-road): 7.30, members' meeting—all should attend.

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, Tontine Society; 7, Arthur Peterson, "Some Considerations between God and Men."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, R. C. Phillips, "The True Living Wage."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, R. Mitchell, "A Rationalist's View of Christ."

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, "The Universe and its Processes: A Criticism of Dr. Dallinger's Fernley Lecture of 1887," by a Local Gentleman.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, D. B. Bon, "A Liberal Program."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BRADFORD (Open Market, James-street): 6.30, J. G. Fisher, "What Good is Sunday?"

BRISTOL (Eastville Park, Lower End): 7, J. Kenst, "Is Christianity True?"

DERBY (Market-place): 11, Mr. Briggs will lecture.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Quayside): 11, Carl Aarstad will lecture.

SUNDERLAND (The Green, Ryhope): 11, The Secretary, "The Teaching of Jesus."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London.—August 11, m. and a. Victoria Park, e. Edmonton; 15, Wood Green; 18, m. and a. Finsbury Park; 22, Wood Green; 25, Manchester.

STANLEY JONES, 58 Marlborough-road, Holloway, London.—Aug. 11, m. Kingsland, a. Deptford; 18, m. Finsbury Park; 22, Hammersmith; 25, m. Pimlico Pier, e. Kilburn; 28, Hyde Park.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London, E.—August 11, Westminster; 18, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 25, m. Clerkenwell, a. Victoria Park.

T. THURLOW, 350 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 15, e. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

THREE LECTURES
BY
MR. G. W. FOOTE
(President of the National Secular Society)
AT
ST. JAMES'S HALL
(BANQUETING HALL), PICCADILLY, W.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 11TH—
"The Use and Abuse of the Bible."

SUNDAY, AUGUST 18TH—
"George Meredith: Writer and Teacher."

SUNDAY, AUGUST 25TH—
"Religion in the Light of Science."

CHAIR TAKEN AT 7.30 P.M.

ADMISSION BY TICKET ONLY.

Tickets 1s., 2s., & 5s. Course Tickets 1s. 6d. & 3s.

Obtainable at Tree's Ticket Office, Piccadilly; and at 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Mockery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."
W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."
Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumours and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 2d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 2d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 2d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 9s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell
No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 2s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 8d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture
ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

READ WHAT THEY SAY OF US!

"THE TWO WORLDS," July 10, 1895, says: "Read Mr. Gott's adverts. on the cover. He makes you very liberal offers, and judging from our experience, and the testimony of friends, he is a man of his word."

"THE LYCEUM BANNER," for July, says: "If it is not too hot to think about clothing, just read Mr. Gott's advertisement on the back page of the cover this month. What Mr. Gott has not got in the way of suitings, dress goods and such like, is difficult to say, so large and various is his stock. Try him. The BANNER man has, and he advises you to do so as well. Among Mr. Gott's stock-in-trade is business honesty. It's a good article, but somewhat scarce at times, in some cases."

J. DYER (Guildford)—"The Trousers safely to hand yesterday. They are a good fit. I am more than satisfied with them. They are really extraordinarily good value."

W. OLIVER (London)—"Thanks for patterns. I shall take them to the shop and see if I can get you some orders. I think they are nice and good in value."

H. REX (Abertillery)—"I will give you an order soon. My son used to travel with such goods, and he considers yours splendid quality at the price."

J. G. BROWN (Aldwinckle)—"Goods received. Give every satisfaction. I will show them to my friends, and must thank you for attending to all my instructions."

J. UMPLEBY (Blackburn)—"The Trousers answer well."

JOHN JONES (Coventry)—"Trousers arrived. Good fit. Nicely made. I am satisfied and very much pleased with them."

ANNUAL SUMMER SALE.

We have a large quantity of odd Suit Lengths, in Black and Indigo Serges, Grey, Brown, and Fawn Mixtures and Checks. These are worth from 45s. to 55s. Suits made to Measure. During Sale our price will be

FULL SUIT TO MEASURE, 35/- TROUSERS, 9/-

These are marvellous value, and if you buy to stock it will pay you well in the end.

SELF-MEASUREMENT FORM.

LOUNGE COAT.	INCHES	TROUSERS.	INCHES	VEST.	INCHES	Remarks on Figure.
Length of Waist		Round Waist over Trousers		Centre of Back to Opening		Stooping, Upright, or Extra Upright
Full Length of Coat		Round Seat		Centre of Back to Full Length		Sloping, Very Sloping, Square or Very Square Shoulders
Half Width of Back		Inside Leg Seam		Round Chest over Vest		Hollow Waist or not
Centre of Back to Elbow		Full Length of Trousers		Round Waist over Vest		Corpulent or not
Centre of Back to Full Length of Sleeve		Round Thigh		Please say if Vest is to have Collar, or not		Short or Long Neck
Round Chest, close to armpits, over vest, NOT COAT		Round Knee				Full or Narrow Chest
Round Waist, over Vest		Round Bottom				Height
		Please say Lined or Unlined				Age ..... Occupation
		Side or Cross Pockets				These particulars help us very much in fitting.
		Fly or Full Fall

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 33. SUNDAY, AUGUST 18, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

A REVOLUTION.

BEFORE the meeting of parliament is a favourite time for journalistic sensations. On a former occasion of this kind the Daily Chronicle started a discussion on "Is Christianity Played Out?" During the past week or so it has found room for another discussion, which was started by "An Unknown Quantity," under the heading of "Is it a Revolution?" As this writer was allowed two columns of the largest type, it is to be presumed that his letter was regarded as of considerable importance. His style is lucid enough, but his drift is rather obscure. Apparently—but we speak under correction—he wishes to congratulate English society on its passing through a beneficent revolution, which will bring it back to healthier views of human existence. The great sex problem, for instance, has been overdone, and sexual discussions are ceasing to command their former exaggerated attention. Levity and frivolity have run their career, and society promises to become more solid and serious.

All this is very edifying, and particularly so when we look into the writer's account of the origin of the levity and frivolity from which society is advancing.

> "Many men living can remember the time when the Agnostic was popularly imagined as a drunken, foul-mouthed tinker. But ere long it appeared that the Agnostic had been imagined wrongly, and was in reality a man of culture, a man of science, or a lady novelist. Disbelief was no longer socially ostracised. On the contrary, young people in drawing-rooms were almost morbidly anxious to tell you that they had lost their faith, and were unreasonably sanguine in their hope that the fact would interest you. I do not want to overstate the case, but I think it will be generally allowed that the great barriers of religion were at that time much weakened and broken down. What followed? Not the outbreak of crime that some expected, for the recruits of Agnosticism were not from the criminal classes. Not the rigid life by rule of reason that others had foretold—for the two primary instincts go for something. A spirit of restlessness followed, a spirit of inquiry, a hatred of fixed forms and traditional ideas. One thing after another was tried; nothing was too new, too wild, too extravagant. Reverence decreased. In the birthplace of this spirit of unrest something was done to keep reverence, and Positivists worshipped nothing in particular in a little place off Fetter-lane. But in spite of such efforts the general feeling of reverence did decrease. For the slavish feeling of fear that also decreased neither orthodox nor unorthodox are likely to feel any regret. The extravagance and levity which have been so noticeable among us may be traced, perhaps, in part to this weakening of the barriers of religion."

Now, if the writer means—and what else can he mean?—that disbelief led up naturally to Oscar Wilde, we beg to tell him that he completely misunderstands his subject. Oscar Wilde was never, we believe, an Agnostic. He represented absolutely nothing but himself. In literature or art he was merely an idiosyncrasy. The representative unbelievers have been men and women of great seriousness of mind and character. Who can associate frivolity with the names of Buckle, George Eliot, Mill, Clifford, Darwin, Huxley, and Spencer? Was there anything frivolous about the sayings and doings of Charles Bradlaugh? His personal appearance indicated intense earnestness. He was not "An Unknown Quantity." He was a great public force—a daring champion of unpopular ideas; and his courage and self-sacrifice brought him to an untimely grave.

It is good of this writer to admit that Agnosticism was not recruited from the criminal classes. But is it not precisely those classes amongst whom Christianity boasts its sublimest conquests? You are quite uninteresting in Christian circles if you have always been just and honorable. The son who stays at home, does his work, and looks after his father's business, is a commonplace character; but the prodigal son, who fools away his time with drunkards and harlots, is a great attraction. Christianity rejoices over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety-nine just persons who need no repentance. Go to the Devil first, if you want to make a first-rate Christian afterwards.

The Chronicle writer speaks pompously of "the barriers of religion." One would think they are the only real defences of morality and clean living, whereas many of the dirtiest and most villainous characters in history have been conspicuously pious. And what is the use of mouthing the word "reverence," as though it were of definite and unalterable value? Surely the value of reverence depends upon the worth of what is reverenced. And why this cheap sneer at Positivism? It requires neither valor nor wit to indulge in such a recreation. Positivism may be ever so wrong intellectually; that is a point which we need not discuss at present; but it certainly holds aloft an ideal which is far more rigorous than the ideal of Christianity. To say that the Positivists "worshipped nothing in particular" is sheer inanity affecting smartness. They worshipped Humanity. An abstraction, you will say; but what more is any god in the world's pantheon, even the god of Theism or the very god of the Daily Chronicle?

It seems to us that this "Unknown Quantity" must have moved among the virtuosi. He states that disbelief ceased to be socially ostracised: surely he refers to chatter about disbelief rather than to disbelief itself, the affectation rather than the reality. Social ostracism still continues for those who take any open and active part in the propagation of "infidelity," just as the law, which allows a certain individual freedom of thinking, interposes all sorts of obstacles the moment you set about advocating Freethought in a public way, and especially if you do so in concert with others of the same persuasion.

These very reasons, even if there were no others, render it extremely improbable that disbelief should lead to "extravagance and levity." When a man finds the world against him, not for any crime or vice on his part, but because he has honestly thought for himself, he is in danger of becoming too serious. It is fortunate, indeed, if he does not become a Pessimist. On the whole, therefore, the "breaking down of the barriers of religion" seems to us the very best guarantee of that beneficent revolution which the Chronicle writer is proclaiming.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

MISSIONS IN CHINA.

THE massacre of Christians—one man, nine women, and a baby—at Kucheng has caused a thrill of horror throughout the land, and, what may prove more useful, has excited discussion on the utility of missions, and their political relations, in China. Mr. Eugene Stock, the editorial secretary of the Church Missionary Society, has himself, in a long letter to the papers, met a question, which should be solved, not in the hot blood of indignation, but in the calm light of reason. He says:—

> "I speak the mind of hundreds of missionaries when I say that they have no personal desire for anything in the nature of vengeance, even for such terrible outrages as we now deplore. But Great Britain cannot in China pass lightly over the murder of British subjects who have a right to be there. The British Government will, I doubt not, take all measures in this case that are right and necessary, especially with a view to the future protection of British residents; but the last thing we desire is that the Gospel should be carried into China at the point of the bayonet."

If Mr. Stock means that every effort should be made to bring the criminals to justice, we concur. Lord Salisbury has promptly demanded this, and it has been as promptly conceded by the Emperor of China. But Mr. Stock makes the demand, "missionaries must be protected." Does he mean they should be followed and protected by gunboats and soldiers? That is simply impossible. China will feel the results of her disastrous war with Japan for many years to come. Rebellion has been fomented, fanaticism fanned to a flame; disbanded soldiers rove the provinces, ready for any mischief; secret societies abound. These "Vegetarians" are twelve thousand strong. They are well armed and organised, and are able to withstand the Chinese troops. According to Mr. Waters, who has been British Consul at Foochow, and who has had thirty years' experience of China, they are no roughs, but abstemious and "peaceful, praiseworthy, and well-conducted people. They never drank or smoked, and were, in fact, something like a Band of Hope in England." We shall see presently that they have special causes of hatred against the "foreign devils," who, they believe, bring opium, war, and immorality in their train.

The missionary should know that he risks his life. If prepared to take all risks on himself, we might admire his zeal, even while lamenting it is not zeal according to knowledge. But this is just what he does not care to do. He claims the privileges of the Civis Romanus, and expects his country to back him in every difficulty. As a politician once said in the House: "Every missionary wants a gunboat at his back!" Worse, he insists on having his womankind with him, though he knows they are regarded by the Celestials as only the members of a harem. Young girls, fresh from home and school, are sent into the interior of a disturbed country, believing in the efficacy of prayer, and relying on the protection of a God who does nothing. The imprudence, nay, the cruelty, of those who urge girls to embark on such a career for the salvation of their souls is nothing short of scandalous. Mr. Eugene Stock says: "But what if women claim a right to a share in spiritual warfare?" He tells us "the men and women of the missionary committee dare not refuse to accept, and even to call for, such invaluable offers of service." Is this reason or fanaticism? Because some young girls, with inflamed religious feelings, and ignorant or oblivious of the condition of things in China, claim to share in spiritual warfare, do the men and women who stop at home, and the editorial secretary, who lives by sending others out, "dare not refuse them," but even call for others? Would Mr. Stock gave a free head to his own daughter if she wanted to go? Mr. Eugene Stock reminds us that the spread of Christianity has been "attained at the cost of many precious lives." It has, indeed. Those who know the real history of Christian missions know that it has not, however, usually been the lives of the missionaries. Christianity has been spread by the sword quite as truly as ever was Islam.

There is, it is said, monumental evidence that Christianity was preached in China before the seventh century. What has been the upshot of a thousand years, more or less, of missionary work? The missionaries have made themselves and their creed so abhorred that they are constantly in danger of outrages. The opposition to Christianity in China comes from the educated classes. It is said this is because Christianity tends to weaken their authority. But there are numerous other reasons, as anyone who has read the paper by Wong Ching Foo in the North American Review, entitled "Why I am a Heathen,"* will know. Wong Ching Foo says he retreated "shudderingly from a belief in a merciless God who had long foreordained most of the helpless human race to an eternal hell. To preach such a doctrine to intelligent heathen would only raise in their minds doubts as to my sanity, if they did not believe I was lying." The common expression used of missionaries by the shrewd Chinese is "Lie-preaching devils." Li-Hung-Chang, the Prime Minister, said to the Rev. Gilbert Reid, of the Presbyterian North China Mission, as he records in the Forum of June, 1893: "Well, you needn't come back to China; you had better reform the American people, so that they will treat our Chinese laborers a little better." In California these have often been stoned, mobbed, and murdered by fanatical Christians. In violation of the treaty of 1869, the United States has passed Chinese Exclusion Acts, designed "to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States." When they see their own countrymen persecuted and excluded abroad, can it be wondered the Chinese desire the white men to return to their own country? They cannot understand that holy avidity for the salvation of souls which is accompanied with the introduction of opium, rum, and rifles. They cannot appreciate the gospel of Jesus Christ and gunboats. The Rev. George Smith (Visit to the Consular Cities of China, p. 54) records that they thus express themselves: "Perhaps this doctrine may be very good, but we wish that you would first try it on the English themselves, for they are wicked men. When this doctrine has made them better, then come and speak to us."

Mr. Alexander Michie, in his work on Missionaries in China, notes that the recognition of Christian missions was forced on China. He says (pp. 5 and 6): "Toleration of Christian missionaries, extorted by force from China, placed Christians on a different platform from the other foreign religions, Mohammedanism and Buddhism, to which China of its own notion extended complete toleration. Christianity is therefore inseparably associated with the humiliation of the empire—a calamity which is yet fresh in the memory of the living generation."

The sole ground on which toleration was claimed for Christianity was that it taught men to be virtuous, and the Chinese, says Mr. Michie, "have some difficulty in recognising in the actual Christianity of real life the innocent disguise which theoretical Christianity was made to wear when presented to them at the point of the bayonet." Chinese society is founded on filial duty. When they hear that in the Bible there are such injunctions as to hate father and mother for the sake of Christ (Luke xiv. 26), and to let the dead bury the dead, they are astonished at any such creed claiming to be divine. Mr. Michie says (p. 67):—

> "It so happens that, impure as the Chinese imagination may be, the whole body of their classical literature does not contain a single passage which needs to be slurred over or explained away, and which may not be read in its full natural sense by youth or maiden. And to people nurtured on a literature so immaculate in these respects there are things in the Bible which are calculated to create a prejudice against its teachings, even in well-disposed minds."

Mr. R. S. Gundry, writing in the Fortnightly Review on "Missions in China," gives his testimony against the indiscriminate distribution of the Bible. He observes that the Chinese are apt to be offended at the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter. The proceedings of Ruth are open to question, and Samuel's treatment of Agag looks rather barbarous. Mr. Michie mentions that missionary tracts are coarsely illustrated by such scenes as Jonah being swallowed by the great fish, and Jael in the act of driving her tent-peg through the temples of her sleeping guest. The story of the Incarnation, which lies at the very foundation of Christianity, offends the sensitive heathen Chinee.

Mr. Michie's book is a valuable one, and in the following passage he throws some light upon the present massacre coming at the hands of the Vegetarians. He says (p. 57):—

> "Societies, whose bond of union is abstinence from flesh, alcohol, opium, tobacco, and impurity, and whose members are held strictly to their rules, are under the ban of the missionaries. They always pronounce such

* Reprinted in the Freethinker, August 28 to September 25, 1887.

Digitized by Google

> kind of abstinence 'idolatry,' a verdict always ready to hand, which saves troublesome examination. One practice, which seems to be most obnoxious to the missionaries of certain sections, is Vegetarianism, which is rather common in China. This, it appears, is one of the subtlest wiles of the Devil to make the Chinese simulate goodness, even before the arrival of the missionaries, and accordingly the victims of this deadly delusion must be saved from their vegetarian diet at least, if not entirely from the vegetarian superstition. A single breach of the vow is all that is required to destroy the accumulated merit of half a lifetime, and the missionaries naively relate the snares they set for these pseudo-virtuous people to entrap them into transgression. The breaking of an egg, innocent as it looks, is sometimes the means blessed to this end; and we read of wily old converts laying earnest siege to new inquirers in order that, by some means, they may be seduced into eating pork in their company—a sort of equivalent of 'taking the shilling.'"

Those who wish to drive the Chinese out of America and Australia always complain of their immorality. We need not, then, be surprised that similar charges are made by the Chinese against Europeans, who are believed to introduce alcohol, opium, and impurity in their train. The missionary, if earnest, is as fanatical as the Chinese, and goes into danger as blindly. If a humbug, he lives, as according to the Hong-Kong Daily Telegraph most of them do live, in luxury and with a retinue of servants such as he could never hope to have at home. In either case he incurs the ill-will of the native, and he should do so at his own risk.

J. M. WHEELER.

THE VALUE OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

(Concluded from page 500.)

WHEN Christians put forward the Bible as being the very word of God, all-sufficient for revelation of himself and salvation of us, we naturally ask first for its credentials. When, where, and how did God give it to mankind? We, of course, should have thought that, in vouchsafing this unique document, on which the eternal destiny of our race is said to depend, he would have taken care to do so in such a manner that its origin and its communication by himself would be quite beyond dispute; as, for instance, by delivering it to the earliest men in a form which, being imperishable, should ever be preserved by the human family as the absolute and invariable standard by which all copies and versions could be tested, just as we, in our endeavors at accuracy, have ordained and preserved standards of measure and weight. And surely it would have been easy for God the omnipotent to distinguish this original standard by such a supernatural character as would make all future men who referred to it recognise, without doubt, that it was of him and from him. But we soon find that his ways are indeed not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts. No such standard exists, because no such standard was ever given by him; except it is stated in the case of the Ten Commandments, which he himself, it is said, wrote on two tables of stone, and of which he made a duplicate when Moses had shattered the original; this second copy being preserved in the ark of the Covenant, which was afterwards conserved in the most holy place of the temple of Solomon (2 Chron. v. 10).

Certainly the many alterations which portions of the Bible have undergone do not evince any special care, either upon the part of God or man, to preserve what was originally written. The Rev. E. Myers, in his Bible and Theology, says that "no people could have been less careful of their sacred writings than the Jews." Modern criticism is most emphatic in its verdict against the notion that the writings of the Bible have maintained their original form. The Rev. Dr. Samuel Davidson, who occupies a front position amongst English Biblical scholars, in his Canon of the Bible writes: "As to Ezra's treatment of the Pentateuch, or his specific mode of redaction, we are left for the most part to conjecture. Yet it is safe to affirm that he added—making new precepts and practices either in place of, or beside, older ones. Some things he removed as unsuited to the altered circumstances of the people; others he modified" (p. 25). "The scribes who began with Ezra, seeing how he acted, would naturally follow his example, not hesitating to revise the text in substance as well as form. They did not refrain from changing what had been written, or from inserting fresh matter" (ibid, p. 34).

In referring to the New Testament, Dr. Davidson observes: "The exact principles that guided the formation of a canon in the earliest centuries cannot be discovered. Strictly speaking, there were none. Definite grounds for the reception or rejection of books were not apprehended . . . . If it be asked whether all the New Testament writings proceeded from the authors whose names they bear, criticism cannot reply in the affirmative" (ibid, p. 153). Thus Dean Alford was quite justified in writing in his book, How to Study the New Testament: "These Gospels, so important to the Church, have not come to us in one undisputed form. We have no authorised copy of them in their original language, so that we may know in what precise words they were originally written. The authorities from which we derive their sacred text are various ancient copies written by hand on parchment. Of the Gospels there are more than five hundred of these manuscripts of various ages, from the fourth century after Christ to the fifteenth, when printing superseded manual writing for publication of books. Of these five hundred, and more, no two are in all points alike: probably in no two of the more ancient can even a few consecutive verses be found in which all the words agree. . . . . It is not a word more than the truth to say that it [the New Testament] abounds with errors and inadequate renderings. . . . . A formidable list of passages might be given in which our version either has confessedly misrendered the original, or has followed a form of the text now well known not to have been the original form" (pp. 18–21, 22).

The Higher Criticism is valuable, inasmuch as it shows how fallacious the old orthodox ideas of inspiration were. It is no longer contended that the "inspired book" is perfect, for Canon Gore says "it is of the essence of the Old Testament to be imperfect" (Lux Mundi, p. 274). He quotes Professor Cheyne, who, speaking of certain Bible narratives, "protests against the supposition that they are true to fact" (ibid, p. 288). Now, if the Bible be "imperfect," and its narratives not "true to fact," as these Christian writers allege, what becomes of the orthodox claim that the Scriptural records are trustworthy? Truly Freethought investigation has borne its practical and useful results. The Bible has, indeed, failed to successfully withstand the attacks of the Age of Reason.

This criticism has, moreover, shown that the allegation that the Church of Rome has preserved the Bible intact is the very opposite of fact. The Rev. Dr. Irons asks: "Did she in truth, from the first, prize and preserve in some ark of safety the autographs of apostles, of evangelists, or make diligent search after the authentic manuscripts of the prophets?" "The earliest Christian writers," continues the Doctor, "strikingly exhibit that neither the Roman nor any other Church had critically or authoritatively, in any sense, settled the grave question as to what books should be admitted, or inquired at all, so far as it appears, for authentic copies. . . . If, then, any may be thanked for the Canon of the New Testament, it is the Church of Alexandria; but not even in that literary communion have we any attempt made to preserve or ascertain the originals of the Gospels or Epistles. . . . And what has been the condition of the Sacred Word since the third century (for all questions as to the correction of the text slept for at least a hundred years after Origen)? An uncritical Septuagint, and an uncritical Greek Testament in the Greek Churches; the common Syriac Version of the third century in the Oriental Churches; half-a-dozen different versions in the different African communions; the Vulgate in the West: these in some way sufficed the Christian world for many ages. With some of these—the Septuagint, the Peschito, the Syriac, and the Egyptian—the Roman Church had nothing to do. As far as we know, she never thought of examining them. If that was her duty, she was entirely unfaithful to it. . . . Such, then, are the facts bearing on the claim of the Church of Rome to rule over Scripture, and to subordinate it to herself. She did nothing to the Canon for 400 years; nothing, except by individual and much-neglected and opposed doctors, for 500 more; nothing authoritative till the sixteenth century; nothing satisfactory to herself even then; nothing to settle by authority either the Hebrew or Greek text, till this hour. Any claim on her part to paramount authority over the Written Word is contrary to every fact of history" (The Bible and its Interpreters, pp. 49, 50, 52, and 59).

Digitized by Google

As to the Biblical chronology, modern criticism has clearly brought to light the fact that it is thoroughly erroneous. The pyramids, temples, and tombs of Egypt, dating back five thousand years, with their inscriptions, their dynastic records, their pictures, and other works of art, prove that that country must have been populous, maturely organised, skilled in many arts and handicrafts, at a period when, according to the book of Genesis, humankind consisted of but a few families. Samuel Laing, in his Human Origins, says: "It is quite impossible that, if man and all animal life were created about 4,000 years B.C., and were then all destroyed save the few pairs saved in Noah's Ark, and made a fresh start from a single centre some 1,500 years later, there can be any truth in Darwin's theory of evolution. We know for a certainty, from the concurrent testimony of all history, and from Egyptian monuments, that the different races of men and animals were in existence five thousand years ago as they are at the present day; and that no fresh creations or marked changes of type have taken place during that period"(p. 6). The same writer also remarks: "The chronology from Abraham to Moses is hopelessly confused" (ibid, p. 241). Equally incorrect are the dates given of the birth and death of Jesus, and of many other events narrated in the New Testament.

The Higher Criticism is also valuable because it strikes a severe blow at Bible idolatry, substituting reasonable examination for the blind acceptance of traditional literature. It is this criticism which has destroyed the belief that whatever is found in the Bible should be accepted irrespective of its nature and tendency. More and more it is being recognised that all books, to be of practical service, should be our servants, not our masters. Let us, therefore, disencumber ourselves of all faith in a supposed supernatural revelation, and see what we can do with the revelation of nature as expressed in the living world of which we are a part, and expressed, likewise, more or less clearly, with more or less of human perversion, in the works of the men who came before us, among which the books bound up as the Bible have their due place. Surely nothing can be clearer to the unprejudiced judgment than the fact that we can never read and interpret anything aright, be it work of man or work of nature, while we in any sense count it fetish. CHARLES WATTS.

A USELESS GOD.

I DO not often agree with Roman Catholics. When I do our unanimity is wonderful. Yet I find myself in accordance with a part of the Defence of Prayer, by Father Barry, who, in the August Nineteenth Century, replies to Mr. Norman Pearson's sketch of a religion destitute of prayer, grace, miracles, and faith, as the religion of the future. Dr. Barry says such a religion is not worth having. I say ditto. The fact is, Theists have so attenuated their faith that it is neither worth blessing nor banning. Their central dogma made a big splash at one time, but, by broad spreading, it has dispersed to nought. God retires so rapidly at every advance of science that one cannot now get even the glimpse which Moses got in the clift of the rock. What does Humanity want with a God who sits apart where sounds of human sorrow never mount to mar his "sacred, everlasting calm"? Such a God will never have real worship. He is not worth his salt, and shall have no pinch of incense from me. A God who does nothing, as Dr. Barry says, is no God. Does the universe require a figure-head which sails with the ship, but cannot steer it? We have no use even for a Constitutional Deity, who reigns but does not govern, and has virtually abdicated in favor of natural laws. The once Absolute Monarchy, which never administers justice or listens to petition, is represented by a vacant throne, which might as well be removed, to make way for the Republic of Man. Nietzsche proclaims that God is dead. He died out of compassion for sufferings he neither could relieve nor cure. Who shall say Nietzsche nay? If God never shows himself, he may be, as Elijah said of Baal, asleep, or peradventure on a journey. At any rate, if he has no interest in my concerns, certainly I have none in his. What is God, what are gods, to us, if there is no eye to pity distress, no arm to save from disaster? Without this your God is but a word, excellent for priests to conjure with. The only God humanity can really care for is a special Providence—one who guards and guides his children, who never appeal to him in vain. Is there such a God? For the metaphysical figment offered us by Neo-Theists is not even worth swearing by. The best description I have seen of the Immaterial Entity of the metaphysicians is the following: "Take a box 12 feet by 12, exhaust the air, and then tell your friends you have 144 feet of solid deity." A God in the form of a wafer to put on your tongue is better than that; though a square meal is better than either.

Now, Catholics have a live God, who can make himself into a wafer, and puts in a miraculous appearance occasionally, just to show he has not burst like a bubble, and evaporated into thin air. Such a God is not as good as the old gods, who did everything; but he is certainly better than Carlyle's Deity, who "does nothing."

I agree, too, with Dr. Barry that, once admit a God, it is no use objecting to miracles. Swallow a deity, and you can swallow anything. Once open your gullet wide enough to gulp an Infinite Person who created all out of nothing, and you need not pause to strain out transubstantiation. Admit the big Magician in the skies, and you need not shy at any magic on earth. The more the better, for the less excuse will there be for scepticism.

Well, then, Dr. Barry, I concede your premises. If there be such a God as you proclaim, miracles are possible, prayer can be answered. But where is the evidence of such a God? I have seen no miracles. My prayers have not been answered. You trot me back to the lives of the saints; no first-hand testimony, but the lying legends of your Church. I smell a rat. Your corporation could never exist, and live without work, but for this belief in a God, who gives you your power, and can be approached through your ceremonies. All theological success depends upon telling people there is One—or More—who cares for them, that prayer will be answered, that every hair of our heads is numbered, and not a sparrow falls to the ground without our heavenly Father's knowledge. But I notice that the sparrows fall all the same. Mr. Pearson says "natural causation prevails universally"; but he does not like to utter the inference I draw, that Theism is a worthless delusion.

Dr. Barry, instead of trotting out the sort of God I want, gives me a string of words about a spiritual world holding in its grasp the world of "natural causation," playing upon it as an instrument, guiding its powers to ends which of themselves they could not attain, etc. Hypotheses non fingo. Where is the evidence? Produce your God, and I will be ready to swallow all the rest, even down to Father Barry's power to create the Creator out of dough. UNCLE BENJAMIN.

BEGINNINGS OF SCIENTIFIC INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE.

AT the base of the vast structure of the older Scriptural interpretation were certain ideas regarding the first five books of the Old Testament. It was taken for granted that they had been dictated by the Almighty to Moses about fifteen hundred years before our era; that some parts of them, indeed, had been written by the corporeal finger of Jehovah; and that all parts gave, not merely his thoughts, but his exact phraseology. It was also held, virtually, by the universal Church that, while every narrative or statement in these books is a precise statement of historical or scientific fact, yet that the entire text contains vast hidden meanings. Such was the rule; the exceptions made by a few interpreters here and there only confirmed it. Even the indifference of St. Jerome to the doctrine of Mosaic authorship did not prevent its ripening into a dogma.

The book of Genesis was universally held to be an account, not only divinely comprehensive, but miraculously exact, of the creation and of the beginnings of life on the earth; an account to which all discoveries in every branch of science must, under pains and penalties, be made to conform. In English-speaking lands this has lasted until our own time. The most eminent living English biologist has recently told us how, in every path of natural science he has, at some stage in his career, come across a barrier labelled "No thoroughfare.—Moses." A favorite subject of theological eloquence was the perfection of the Pentateuch, and especially of Genesis, not only as a record of the past, but as a revelation of the future.

Digitized by Google

About the middle of the twelfth century came, so far as the world now knows, the first gainsayer of this general theory. Then it was that Aben Ezra, the greatest Biblical scholar of the Middle Ages, ventured very discreetly to call attention to certain points in the Pentateuch incompatible with the belief that the whole of it had been written by Moses, and handed down in its original form. His opinion was based upon the well-known texts which have turned all really eminent Biblical scholars in the nineteenth century from the old view by showing the Mosaic authorship of the five books in their present form to be clearly disproved by the books themselves. But Aben Ezra had evidently no aspirations for martyrdom; he fathered the idea upon a rabbi of a previous generation, and, having veiled his statement in an enigma, added the caution, "Let him who understands hold his tongue."

For about four centuries the learned world followed the prudent rabbi's advice, and then two noted scholars—one of them a Protestant, the other a Catholic—revived his idea. Carlstadt was, for this and other troublesome ideas, suppressed with the applause of the Protestant Church, and the book of Maes was placed by the older Church on the Index. The new truth appeared but dimly here and there until the middle of the next century, when Hobbes in his Leviathan, and La Peyrère in his Preadamites, took it up and developed it still further. The result came speedily. Hobbes, for this and other sins, was put under the ban, even by the political party which sorely needed him, and was regarded generally as an outcast; while La Peyrère, for this and other heresies, was thrown into prison by the Grand Vicar of Mechlin, and kept there until he fully retracted; his book was refuted by seven theologians within a year after its appearance, and within a generation thirty-six elaborate answers to it had appeared. The Parliament of Paris ordered it to be burned by the hangman.

In 1670 came an utterance vastly more important, by a man far greater than any of these—the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus of Spinoza. Reverently but firmly he went much more deeply into the subject. Suggesting new arguments and recasting the old, he summed up with judicial fairness, and showed that Moses could not have been the author of the Pentateuch in the form then existing; that there had been glosses and revisions; that the biblical books had grown up as a literature; that, though great truths are to be found in them, and they are to be regarded as a divine revelation, the old claims of inerrancy for them cannot be maintained; that in studying them men had been misled by mistaking human conceptions for divine meanings; that, while prophets have been inspired, the prophetic faculty has not been the dowry of the Jewish people alone; that to look for exact knowledge of natural and spiritual phenomena in the sacred books is an utter mistake; and that the narratives of the Old and New Testaments, while they surpass those of profane history, differ among themselves not only in literary merit, but in the value of the doctrines they inculcate. As to the authorship of the Pentateuch, he arrived at the conclusion that it was written long after Moses, but that Moses may have written some books from which it was compiled. Spinoza then went on to throw light into some other books of the Old and New Testaments, and added two general statements which have proved exceedingly serviceable; for they contain the germs of all modern broad churchmanship, and the first of them gave the formula which was destined in our own time to save to the Anglican Church a large number of her noblest sons. This was that "sacred Scripture contains the Word of God, and in so far as it contains it is incorruptible"; the second was that "error in speculative doctrine is not impious."

Spinoza was, for this work, and for the earlier expression of some of the opinions it contained, abhorred as a heretic both by Jews and Christians: from the synagogue he was cut off by a public curse, and in the Church he was regarded as in some sort a forerunner of Antichrist. But the ideas of Spinoza at last secured recognition. They had sunk deeply into the hearts and minds of various leaders of thought, and, most important of all, into the heart and mind of Lessing; he brought them to bear in his treatise on the Education of the World, as well as in his drama, Nathan the Wise, and both these works have spoken with power to every generation since.

—Popular Science Monthly. ANDREW D. WHITE.

IN THE BEGINNING.

"ONCE on a time," in a certain locality—
And the date will be doubted by few—
A singular God with a spice of plurality,
The changeless, unknowable, well-known totality
Of fatuous wisdom and holy rascality,
Thought he'd like to have something to do.

Prior to "once on a time," this divinity
Had spontaneously managed to grow,
In some part of space, or at least its vicinity,
From "nothing to speak of," to three of the Trinity—
A firm in which many perceive an affinity
To a "sort of something," you know.

Tired of his somewhat protracted passivity,
He determined to work, for a change;
But just as a boulder bounds down a declivity,
He, novice-like, bustled with heedless activity,
And evidenced all a beginner's proclivity
For experiments foolish and strange.

God had been living in total obscurity,
So the first thing he made was the light;
For, though in the dark he could see through futurity,
He wanted a light to construct with security,
And give to his figures such outlines of purity
As would meet with approval at sight.

Oddly he fancied, with godly fatuity,
That he'd fixed the round earth as a plane—
Subjacent, and almost in close contiguity
To stars and such trifles of twinkling tenuity—
Upholding the firmament's wheeling circuity,
As the scriptures so clearly maintain.

Soon he exhausted, despite their variety,
His designs for bone, muscle, and blood;
But just ere he stopped through fatigue and satiety,
Stark naked he posed, with the gravest sobriety
(Remember, 'twas prior to sin and propriety),
And produced his own image in mud.

God, with his breath, gave the statue vitality—
Which resembled himself "to a tee"—
And called it a man; therefore, God, in reality,
Is manlike, has muscles, bones, lungs, personality,
Blood, whiskers, and toe-nails—in short, animality,
As displayed by us all—"he and she."

Life he created with wild prodigality,
On the basis of struggle and strife,
Whence spring, in their noxious but needful vitality,
The pestilent virtues that breed "nationality"
From personal, family, tribal brutality,
The destructive preservers of life.

God, in a week, with malign ingenuity,
Made a mess of sublunar affairs,
Got weary, relapsed into former vacuity,
Abandoned the badly-made world to fortuity,
And left the poor tenants of earth's incongruity
To attend to the needful repairs.

Such is the story of earth and its genesis,
As narrated to Jews by a ghost,
Which parsons (whose chief occupation lawn-tennis is)
Tell all to believe, under horrible menaces,
And threat'nings of hell—and you know what a den it is—
So believe it, ye cripples!—or roast!

G. L. MACKENZIE.

Digitized by Google

ACID DROPS.

Hudson, the man who brutally murdered his wife and children, and buried their bodies on Helmsley moor, was executed on Tuesday morning. He slept well until six o'clock, and then dressed and had breakfast, after which he spent some time with the chaplain. We presume he was ready for heaven when Billington appeared to do the hanging.

Here is a curious corroboration of a point in our recent articles on "The Bible and Local Veto." The Independent Order of Rechabites has just held its thirty-sixth Conference at Brighton. Considerable discussion arose on the rule allowing the use of wine in the Holy Communion. It was proposed to expunge this rule, but the Conference decided to retain it. The Rechabites, therefore, are teetotalers everywhere except at the Communion table. They break their pledge every time they drink the blood of Christ.

Chinese Missions were the subject of a recent article in the Pall Mall Gazette, apropos of Dr. G. E. Morrison's book, "An Australian in China." It appears that the mission in Tongchuan was opened in 1891, and the results are "not discouraging." But very little encourages the missionaries, for, although the attitude of the Chinese is one of "perfect friendliness," not a single native has been baptised up to date. In Yunnan City a missionary has been laboring for six years, but "he has no male converts, though there are two promising nibblers who are waiting for the first vacancy to become adherents." There was a convert, a poor coolie, but he had to be expelled for stealing. In the whole province there are eighteen Protestant missionaries, and sometimes twenty-three; and in eight years they have converted eleven Chinese. That is, it takes two missionaries eight years to turn one heathen Chinee into a nominal Christian.

We say nominal Christian; for what is the character of these "converts"? This is what the Pall Mall says: "Money is poured out on them (the missions) like water; and the net result to date has been the 'conversion' of a handful of mission cooks and nurse-girls, foundlings dropped into the missionary compound and kept so long as they believe; loafers in search of missionary food, dipsomaniacs, and beggars, 'Rice-Christians,' and a promising assortment of ingenious thieves waiting for the first opportunity to loot."

In reply to the Archbishop of Canterbury's call at Croydon for rescue of Christians from the persecution of Mohammedans, "Sadek" writes a long letter in the Croydon Advertiser. He says that the cry of the heart-broken, degraded women, the woes of the drunkard's homes, and the bitter wail of the starving poor and of the unemployed, that rise unceasingly over the whole area of "Western civilisation," are things unknown in Islam.

In the last letter received from the Rev. R. W. Stewart, the martyred missionary, he speaks of "the many incidents which showed us that the hand of God was controlling everything." Pity the hand of God did not control the "Vegetarians," who, we suppose, were allowed to be under the control of the Devil.

Here, too, is Mr. Gladstone saying that, "by the help of God," the Turks must be taught to render justice to the Armenians. Would it not be better if the help of God came in to prevent the injustice and brutalities which rouse the indignation of Mr. Gladstone?

While there is all this talk about Chinese massacres let it be noted that at Sligo, on August 11, two Christian Protestant preachers were set upon by a Christian Roman Catholic mob, and it took two hundred men of the Royal Irish Constabulary to preserve them from the fury of the mob. Intolerance and fanaticism are not confined to the "Vegetarians."

The St. James's Gazette, writing of the Chinese massacres, says: "Experience has amply proved that, where Buddhism or Mohammedanism has passed, Christianity makes no real way." This is the most notable fact in connection with missions. Christianity succeeds against savage races, whom it exterminates. But civilised faiths like Islamism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Confucianism, and Judaism, it assails in vain. The fact sufficiently stamps its real place among the religions of the world.

Dr. G. E. Morrison, F.G.S., in An Australian in China, says the missionaries show no results commensurate with the cost in human energy and in money. He says: "There are 1,511 Protestant missionaries, who have gathered into the fold last year (1893) 3,127 Chinese—not all of whom, it is feared, are genuine Christians—at a cost of £350,000, a sum equal to the combined incomes of the ten chief London hospitals."

At the present rate, it will take, to convert a population of 386 millions, just 123,441 years, at a cost of £43,204,350,000.

These missionaries, according to their own account, are employed in doing what?—in sending the heathen to hell wholesale. Here is what one of them says, as reported by Dr. Morrison: "Those Chinese who have never heard the Gospel will be judged by the Almighty as he thinks fit"—a contention which does not admit of dispute—"but those Chinese who have heard the Christian doctrine and still steel their hearts against it will assuredly go to hell." This is exactly what the Chinese do, so the missionaries are an agency for making hell certain.

Mr. Curzon, in his Problems of the Far East, refers to the difficulties arising from "the constantly-increasing employment of women, and particularly unmarried women, by the missionary bodies." He says: "Only last year, at the remote inland town of Kuei-hwa-cheng, a friend of mine encountered a missionary community, consisting of one male and of twenty Swedish girls. The propaganda of the latter consisted in parading the streets and singing hymns to the strumming of tambourines and guitars. The Society that had committed the outrage of sending out these innocent girls only allowed them 200 dollars, or £27 10s. a-year apiece for board, lodging, and clothing. As a consequence, they were destitute of the smallest comforts, and could not even perform their toilette without the impertinent eyes of Chinamen being directed upon them through the paper screens."

The Missionary Flad, a German, writing from Abyssinia, says that King Menelik, who claims to be a direct descendant of David and Solomon, intends, after having conquered the Italians, to set forth to Jerusalem to free the Holy City. He asks the help of Russia, and promises rich booty to his soldiers. He thinks he will do this as easily as he carried out a raid lately against the Gallas, killing the men and making slaves of the women and children, after the approved fashion of his ancestors. King Menelik is a Christian, and offers a strong proof of how invariably Christianity carries civilisation in its train.

Although ablutions form an integral part of the Moslem religion, it often happens that cleanliness comes into conflict with godliness on the crowded pilgrimages to Mecca. Among the pilgrims from India cholera often spreads, and they are believed to be a means of its propagation westward. The pilgrimage, it is believed, opens the gate of Paradise. It often opens the gate of death. If they die whilst in the performance of the religious haj, they consider themselves most lucky, and believe the special favor of God has descended upon them in consequence of their visiting the Holy Place.

But in some cases they do not reach Mecca. The Daily News says: "The survivors of one shipload last year, after suffering horrible privations for forty days on the quarantine island, were obliged to go back to India without making the pilgrimage, and this is not a very uncommon occurrence."

Pilgrimages are so popular because they satisfy the desire for change, and minister to the atavism of a nomadic state when those wandering in search of pasture for their flocks nevertheless liked to return to the graves of their forefathers or the scenes of the exploits of heroes. It is a curious fact brought out by William Simpson in his pamphlet on The Worship of Death, that all the old temples are built on tombs, and pilgrimages paid everywhere to the shrines of the dead.

The Father Guardian of Pantasaph Monastery finds a drawback to the revival of Catholic pilgrimages. He says: "Branches from the pine trees, ferns and flowers from Calvary and the gardens, stones chipped from the seats devoutly smashed to make relics, all are carried in triumph away." He announced that all such relics can be of no service to their purloiners unless they also anoint them with honey taken from the beehives.

Prosecutions of Seventh-Day Adventists continue in the States. In Mississippi, Colorado, Georgia, and Tennessee members of the sect who have persisted in obeying the Bible, and observing the seventh instead of the first day of the week, have been arrested, fined, and imprisoned, and a colony of them at Calverton, Maryland, has now been pounced on by their fellow Christians. The persecutions, as usual, result in the spread of the principles of the sect.

Father Enright, a Catholic priest, asks: "What right have the Protestant Churches to keep Sunday? None whatever. You say it is to obey the commandment, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.' But Sunday is not the Sabbath according to the Bible and the record of time."

Digitized by Google

This is indisputable. Yet Protestant ministers have prosecuted the Seventh-Day Adventists, who keep the Bible injunction to observe the seventh day, and also the injunction, "six days shalt thou work," for working on the day not commanded in the Bible; and the Christian State of Tennessee has now ten men imprisoned for this clerical "crime."

In the August number of the goody-goody paper, Afloat and Ashore, which Miss Weston gets up for the delectation and reformation of sailors, a sermon by Dr. Parkhurst on "Atheism and Anarchy" is inserted. Dr. Parkhurst has discovered a league between Atheism and Anarchy, and laments that "we still go on hanging the Anarchist, and saying little or nothing about Atheism and the Atheist." Probably he would give Atheists a short shrift and a long drop. But what is the secret? Anarchists attack the State, which can well take care of itself; but Atheists undermine the authority of the men of God, who levy heavy contributions on this world, on the pretence of piloting to a better one. Naturally the men of God think any prejudice useful to excite against those who would destroy their authority.

Count Leo Tolstoi, says the Daily News, on the last occasion that he was summoned to sit upon a jury, declined to be sworn, and was mulcted in a fine of five hundred roubles. Christian governments all the world over punish those who consistently follow the plainest teachings of Jesus.

Stories of Jowett still continue to circulate. One relates that Farrar was once complaining of getting only £300 from Cassell's for his Life of Christ. "Three hundred golden sovereigns," said Jowett; "why, the other fellow only got thirty shillings!"

An Ohio preacher tells his congregation that "Chicago is the nearest approach to hell that we have upon this earth." This is about correct, since the aldermen have taken to making sumptuary laws; but, should any Chicago congregation extend a call to the Ohio preacher, at an increased salary, the haste with which he would go to the terrestrial hell would mitigate, to an extent, the superstitious horror of the credulous Buckeyes.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes preached at St. James's Hall on Sunday. For the first time in their lives he and Mr. Foote were discoursing in different parts of the same building. Mr. Foote was in the thick of hard work on the following Tuesday, while Mr. Hughes was off with Mrs. Hughes to Grindelwald for four or five weeks. Gospel-grinding is a more comfortable occupation than preaching Freethought.

"An amusing incident," according to the Methodist Times occurred at the recent Wesleyan Conference. Two ministers in the Liberal Club lavatory put on each other's coats, and it was some time before they discovered their mistake. "These little episodes," it is said, "give zest to Conference life." How dull must Conference life be if it derives zest from such trivialities!

The principal speaker who opposed the admission of women to the Wesleyan Conference was the Rev. W. L. Watkinson. This gentleman is the author of a ridiculous book on Scepticism and Character, in which he endeavors to expose the domestic transgressions and unhappiness of renowned Freethinkers. Mr. Watkinson was facetious about women delegates. He spoke as a man to men, where the women couldn't answer him. But the cream of his speech was the discovery of a new argument against the participation of the other sex in public affairs. Some people might say that women were not good enough for Conference work; Mr. Watkinson, however, contended that they were too good. Their "delicate goodness and serene wisdom" unfitted them for the "strife" of such an assembly. How pretty! And how hypocritical! It must be a very silly woman who could feel flattered by such a dubious compliment.

The Wesleyan Conference devoted a part of one sitting to Lord's Day Observance. The committee's report on this subject, which seems to have been unanimously accepted, expressed delight at the refusal of the late Liberal Government to do anything towards opening the national museums and galleries on Sundays. It also rejoiced at the withdrawal of Lord Hobhouse's Bill in the House of Lords. Glad reference was made to several towns which had shut up all places of culture and put down boating on the Lord's Day. Finally, the Conference warned Methodists all over the country against the action of Sunday Societies, and called upon them to do their utmost in "defence of the Holy Day"—in other words, to keep it as the exclusive property of the men of God.

It is amusing to see the Churches slowly and reluctantly adjusting themselves to modern progress. We have already referred to the Wesleyan Conference voting against the admission of lady delegates, although the respectably large minority promises in the near future to be transformed into a majority. We have now to draw attention to the solemn consideration of the telephone and the electric light by the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars in Rome. They instinctively hate scientific improvements, besides knowing that a display of the conquests of Science throws Theology into the shade. It is not surprising, therefore, that their decision is a most laughable compromise. The telephone may be introduced in a religious house, such as a convent, but it must only be used on "grave occasions." The electric light may also be used in churches, but only to illuminate the building generally. In all ceremonies of worship, whenever a light is prescribed by the liturgy, candles must be employed. Good old candles! Why not stick them in hollow turnips, and thus secure the requisite dim religious light?

The funny man on the American Catholic Review says of Huxley: "He is no longer an Agnostic; he knows now that the Christian revelation is true, and that the Catholic Church is the kingdom of God on earth. But that knowledge may have come too late to profit him." This is worth preserving as a sample of Christian humor and good feeling.

The Sydney Morning Herald says: "Our inquiries show that, whereas the Churches—except in two instances—were only one quarter filled, the theatres were in nearly every instance thronged to their fullest holding capacity." It concedes that the influence of the Church is declining, while that of the stage is increasing. It might have added that the Church largely holds its own by adopting histrionic methods and becoming a cheap entertainment.

George Müller, of the Bristol Orphanages, claims to have received, on an average, £21,000 a year in answer to prayer. Brother George never begs, and fancies he lives by faith. But he advertises the fact largely, and we fancy the advertisements are more efficacious than prayer.

Nothing like enterprise. A Jaffa hotel-keeper booms his business by appearing in tableaux vivants as David slaying Goliath. The giant having been disposed of, the lady lecturer announces to the audience: "If you want to go to Palestine, Mr. —— will conduct you; here is his address."

Dr. Davidson says that he only goes from the bishopric of Rochester to that of Winchester because he is ordered by his medical attendant to get an easier billet. But the people of the Winchester diocese say they need as hard a worker as does Rochester, especially as he is paid a great deal more. But this question of cash, of course, did not influence Dr. Davidson, who had the luck to marry an archbishop's daughter.

In connection with Dr. Davidson taking up his abode as the Bishop of Winchester at Farnam Castle, it is said that the late bishop, Dr. Thorold, spent close on £10,000 on improving and furnishing the castle. A tenth of the sum would have maintained all the apostles for the whole of their lives.

Miss Müller sends the following to the Bombay Times: "I wish to inform friends in India that I am leaving the Theosophical Society. I have a vital reason for resigning. Further, I regret to say that I do not esteem the opinions of the leaders of the Society, and find myself unable to respect their methods of work."

Mr. Price Hughes has a Sunday show at St. James's Hall. Besides the oratory, there is the attraction of a brass band and a big choir. But, of course, this is not an "entertainment." If it were given in connection with a Secular lecture, it would be an entertainment! And the men who keep up this hypocritical law, entirely for their own advantage as public caterers, give themselves the most grotesque airs of moral superiority.

Says the Bishop of Salford (R.C.): "We have 278 religions in existence, every one appealing to the Scriptures, and declaring that they were founded on Holy Writ." He wanted to know what was the good of a revelation if, in its interpretations, we are placed at the mercy of every private judgment. Thus the Church sees, in the break-up of bibliolatry, an opportunity of once more asserting its own claims.

Edward Peacock, F.S.A., writing in the Tablet (August 10), says witchcraft is still a vital belief among large sections of the people. He says: "My own personal knowledge of a great part of two large counties, and information from trustworthy people dwelling in widely-separated places, justifies me in saying that the belief in witchcraft is still as firm a fixture in the rural mind as ever it was." What else can be expected when the only pabulum offered the rural mind is that in the old book, which says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live"!

Digitized by Google

Talmage says the first gateway to hell is impure literature. Why does he not get the Bible expurgated?

In the Academy for August 10 Mr. F. P. Badham gives some reasons for thinking that the first two chapters in Matthew were prior to Mark, as was held by Strauss. Alluding to the opening verse, he says: "An evangelist writing for Gentiles might well change 'Book of generation' into 'Gospel,' but the reverse process is inconceivable." He contends that the second Gospel has a distinctive style, which, had it been infiltrated into Matthew, would have shown there. The duplication of demoniacs at Gadara and two blind men at Jericho is, says Mr. Badham, corrected in Mark; but may it not have been that when Mark said "one," Matthew said "two," to make the miracles look bigger?

The Daily News reports that "instructions have been received by the Governor of Vladivostock to expel all Jews resident in that far Eastern entrepot. No time of grace is allowed to the expelled beyond such short periods as are necessary for winding up their business affairs and disposing of their immovable property and household chattels. There are several hundred Jews in Vladivostock, all of whom will be now compelled to return to their native domiciles in European Russia."

A church at Quakerstown, Pennsylvania, has been struck by lightning, and twenty of the congregation seriously injured. Divine Providence has also been manifesting itself in Russia in sunstrokes and cholera. In the districts around Odessa prayers for rain are daily offered, both in the churches and in the fields. No rain has fallen there for nearly six weeks.

Moody, the revivalist, says: "If you throw over Jonah and the whale, you throw over the doctrine of the Resurrection." For this the Congregationalist reproves him. But does not Jesus endorse it by saying, "As Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matthew xii. 40)?

The Rev. Joe Cook got stopped by Minister Wills, at Honolulu, in the midst of a red-hot party speech, and walked out at once, with his clerical chin in the air. The San Francisco News Letter says: "The lesson will do him good. On his voyage to Australia he will be less inclined than usual to go out every night with his oil-can before retiring, to see if any of the bearings of the universe need attending to. Brother Cook is a very confident, loquacious, and impudent person; but in justice it ought to be admitted that twenty years of preaching in Boston without contradiction is partly responsible for his unpleasant traits."

Talmage's gospel-shop has several times been destroyed by fire. The last time was in 1893. On that occasion his wife received a great shock, which brought on nervous trouble, from which she has just died at Danville Sanitarium. It does not appear that Talmage is a particular favorite of Providence. Had these calamities happened to an infidel, they would have been "judgments."

A Madras paper gives a shocking account of the death of a woman in the jaws of a crocodile. The reptile went under water with its prey, but rose again in order to make its meal. It was then shot at, and the woman's body was recovered. "The swagger had evidently dragged her away by the arm, for that limb was fearfully shattered, and all but torn off. The face bore a terribly agonised expression, the teeth were clenched and the features set, in a look of absolute horror." We commend this to the attention of believers in Providence. It is difficult to see the wisdom and benevolence of making crocodiles to eat women.

A Catholic, writing from the Playgoers' Club, addresses us in this fashion: "No doubt you will curse me for troubling you with a letter, but I am cheeky enough to think that your article is not quite fair. I may be wrong—I generally am—but you're not right."

We really have no desire to curse the gentleman. He has a perfect right to think us mistaken, and a perfect right to say so. At the same time we do not share his opinion. He says it is not a fact that "the last supper that Jesus took with his apostles was seasoned with wine." Well, the word wine does not occur in the text, but "fruit of the vine" does; as it was passed round in a cup, and was therefore a liquid, it was just what we called it.

This Catholic gentleman sends us a little New Testament, in order that we may consult it and see that he is right. We beg to assure him that we have seen the volume before. Sending the Bible, or any part of it, to a Freethought writer is like sending coals to Newcastle.

One of our readers at Greenwich has received a begging letter on behalf of "the New Church at Heck," near Snaith, Yorkshire. Parson Bryan enclosed a directed envelope and a postage stamp for a donation. As our reader did not wish to keep the postage stamp, he sent the reverend gentleman a copy of the Freethinker in his own envelope. We don't know whether there was any weeping and wailing at Heck, but we dare say there was some gnashing of teeth.

Dr. Donald Macleod, speaking in connection with a fancy bazaar at Rothesay, said that Scotland was drifting too much into pure voluntaryism. Seat-letting was all very well, but it made the Church the property of the seat-holdings. What he proposed was "increased endowments." Quite so. The churches have always found that they flourished best on dead men's money. Yet they refuse to let Secular Societies receive endowments or hold any sort of property.

Professor Monier Williams suggests a fresh explanation of the "missionary massacres" in China. He thinks the Vegetarians are a band of fanatical Buddhists who regard flesh-eating as a crime. Professor Williams says he has met with the same bitter feeling against meat-eaters in his travels in India. If this explanation is correct, the murdered missionaries have paid the penalty of their New Testament principle of "kill and eat."

Rev. Robert Meares, minister of the second Presbyterian Church, Cookstown, County Tyrone, has been arrested on a charge of criminally assaulting Bridget M'Conaghy, a young domestic servant. Of course the reverend gentleman may be able to establish his innocence. If he does not, it will be bad for the Bible. Men of God are likely to feel the promptings of what they call "the flesh" if they happen to read the story of King David and his peculiar warming-pan.

ALL DAYS HOLY.

Every day, from the rosy babyhood of dawn till wrinkled and weary it falls forever asleep in the soft arms of the night, is a sacred day, if around its busy hours has twined a garland of kindly thoughts; if it wears on its still breast the white lily of one loving deed. The flowers of kindness shall never fade. In every day of the world's to-morrow that will dawn and die, they will shed their subtile sweetness in some sorrowing soul. The day on which we have overcome some fault made by habit dear; the day on which we have ascended even one rung of the ladder of progress; the day on which we have been happy, when the birds of joy and peace have sung in our hearts; when our spirits, like thistle-down, have waved through the corridors of our being; the one on which we have sorrowed and suffered and grown strong through suffering; the days free from envy, selfishness, slander, revenge, and hate; the one filled with high-born thoughts, duties performed, aspiration and inspiration; when the horizon of universal life, reflecting our own hearts, seems to be already glowing with the roses of universal love; when the spirit, slipping from its carnal chains, forgetting the limitations of being, floats on the waves of infinite possibilities—are sacred days. They are living jewels set in the golden band of time; they are luminous, shining with human exaltation, and reflecting images of the divine. Should not all days be sacred? Time is so precious that every ticking minute and shining hour is a priceless gem, to be rimmed by us with the gold of constant endeavor and profound meditation, brightened by wholesome recreation and needful rest.—Bertha J. French.

London Secular Federation.

Miss A. Brown, Secretary, begs to acknowledge:—Mr. John Samson, 10s. 6d.; West London Branch, 10s.; Tottenham Branch, 5s. 6d.

Obituary.

Frederick Engels, who died on August 5, at the age of 74, was chiefly known as a Socialist and co-worker with Karl Marx. He was, however, a Freethinker. His cremation at Woking, on Saturday, was conducted without religious ceremony, speeches being delivered by friends and followers, in German, English, and French.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, August 18, St. James's Hall (Banqueting Hall), Piccadilly, W.: 7.30, "George Meredith: Writer and Teacher."

August 25, St. James's Hall, London.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—August 18, Milton Hall, London; 25, Milton Hall, London. September 8, Sheffield. October 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

J. M. R.—Always glad to receive useful cuttings.

J. J. R.—Your little paper is sensible, but hardly well enough written for publication.

A. Hindley.—Glad to hear you are so pleased with our articles on "The Bible and Local Veto." We are reprinting the Bible Temperance part of the articles, revised and amplified, as a pamphlet for general circulation. Our promised articles on Free Trade in Drink will be published at the earliest opportunity.

W. Fleming.—Thanks for cuttings.

H. B.—Mr. Wheeler returns thanks for the paper, which will be utilised.

C. W.—You will find an account of the early American Freethinkers in Mr. Wheeler's Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers. Among them were Ethan Allen (Oracle of Reason), Elihu Palmer (Principles of Nature), Abner Kneeland (Review of Evidences of Christianity), J. S. Hittell (Evidences Against Christianity), D. M. Bennett (The Gods, etc.).

President's Fund.—Per Miss Vance: Well-Wisher, 3s.; M. Du Bois, 5s.; C. H., 1s.; C. Pottage, junr., 5s.; S. Alward, 5s.; E. Belcher, 5s.; C. Thomas, 5s.; John Trueman £1; J. Leiper, 5s.; T. Campbell, 3s.; Miss Hodgson, 3s.; Mr. and Mrs. Samson, £1; F. Martineux, 5s.; T. Batchelor, 5s.; Mrs. E. Norton, 5s.; W. F., 2s. 6d. Per C. Watts: W. Bailey, £1; J. Umpleby, 10s.

E. D. H. Daly.—Thanks for cuttings.

R. S. Pengelly.—Much obliged.

R. M. P.—Mr. Putnam cannot visit every place during his present sojourn. His time is mapped out until his departure for America. We fear he will have to postpone a visit to Thetford—Thomas Paine's birthplace—until he comes to England again.

W. Treadwell.—Your verse is all right, but Harcourt isn't worth any more of our space.

R. Gardner.—Christian Evidence journals are never able to maintain themselves. They are always subventioned or kept alive by egotists or fanatics. We have never known one that was really worthy of existence. But this is regrettable. We should like to see a journal conducted by a sincere and reasonably polite Christian, with the object of maintaining Christianity against the intellectual attacks of Secularism. It might be worth our while to reply to such an organ; but we never have replied, and we never mean to reply, to the gutter organs of what passes in this country as Christian Evidence. Principles are worth discussing; mere personalities are only contemptible.

Inquirer.—See Mr. Foote's Infidel Death-Beds. Byron was certainly not a Christian, in any honest sense of the designation, nor was Keats, and Shelley was a professed Atheist. It is a piece of orthodox impudence to claim the greatest poets as "all Christians." Shakespeare himself was clearly an unbeliever in the cardinal doctrines, not only of Christianity, but of Natural Theology—as it is paradoxically called.

R. Trenchard.—Dr. Martineau does not believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ. He does not even call himself a Unitarian. He has written some trenchant criticism of the Christian documents.

Miss Vance will be near the Regent-street entrance to St. James's Hall this evening (August 18) to inform late comers who happen to be without tickets where they can obtain them.

J. Umpleby (Blackburn), one of the N.S.S. vice-presidents, and a veteran of the Old Guard of Freethought, in sending through Mr. Watts a subscription to the President's Honorarium Fund, writes: "I am surprised that out of the 5,000,000 people in London there are not sufficient Progressives to afford him a bishop's salary. Mr. Foote's work is more severe and deserving than Canterbury's."

Papers Received.—New York Public Opinion—Isle of Man Times—Birmingham Argus—Secular Thought—Freidenker—Boston Investigator—Referee—Morning—Fur Unsere Jugend—De Dagsraad—Der Arme Teufel—Freedom—Liberty—Sheffield Weekly Telegraph—Nineteenth Century—Rangoon Times—New York Sun—Blue Grass Blade—Philosophical Journal—Times of Natal—Two Worlds—Light—Progressive Thinker—Liberator.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 6d.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SPECIAL.

I intended to write at some length under this heading, but I am detained at the Law Courts, and must defer writing until next week. In the next issue of the Freethinker I shall have to make a statement of considerable importance, and an announcement as to the future affairs of our party organisation.

G. W. FOOTE.

THE CHARACTERISTICS OF HUXLEY.

The Fortnightly Review for August has four papers on Professor Huxley. The first, by the Hon. G. C. Brodrick, Warden of Merton College, Oxford, gives "Some Personal Characteristics"; the second, by Professor E. B. Tylor, considers him "as anthropologist"; the third, by "A Student of Science," "as biologist"; and the last, by W. L. Courtney, "as philosopher."

The Merton Warden gives some interesting particulars of Professor Huxley's last appearance at Oxford. He remarks that the beauty of his character consisted in being perfectly natural. "He possessed in a high degree that rare but open secret to which General Gordon owed so much of his marvellous influence; he was always himself, the same to young and to old, to rich and to poor, to men and to women; and had his lot been cast, like Gordon's in Asia or in Africa, he would doubtless have been the same to Orientals as to Europeans. He was frank because he was fearless; he inspired confidence because he was evidently a true-hearted man; his native self-respect was set off by a respectful manner towards others; his intolerance of sophistry sometimes betrayed him into undue vehemence in controversial writing, but there was no pettiness in his odium scientificum, and a pure love of truth shone through all his most trenchant diatribes, political or theological."

The contribution by Dr. E. B. Tylor is especially interesting. He notices how theologians discredited anthropology as "a study leading to unauthorised views as to the place of man in the universe," and dwells on Huxley's services, mentioning in particular the meeting of the British Association at Exeter in 1869. Close upon the end of his life Huxley did his best to promote the scheme for making anthropology at Oxford an examination subject for Honors Degree in Natural Science. Writing to Dr. Tylor, he said: "If I know anything about the matter, anthropology is good as knowledge and good as discipline." But Convocation thought he did not "know anything about the matter," and threw out the proposed statute.

The "Student of Science," writing on Huxley "as biologist," endorses the remark of Ernst Haeckel, that "he was one of the few investigators who had thoroughly mastered the whole range of biology."

Mr. W. L. Courtney occupies the longest space in considering Huxley "as philosopher." The essay is not very satisfactory. He shows that he repudiated both the titles, Materialist and Spiritualist, and he tries to make out that because he set the ethical progress of man against the cosmic process, which "has no sort of relation to moral ends," he was something more than an Agnostic. But since the cosmic process, on the Theistic hypothesis, represents the method and work of God, he was here pitting man against God, and might even be described by the Theist as an Anti-Theist.

Digitized by Google

SUGAR PLUMS.

The St. James's Hall experiment promises to be a complete success. The Banqueting Room was very nearly full on Sunday evening, people being seated even on the orchestra platform. Of course there were many familiar faces present, but there was a considerable contingent of strangers, including a respectable sprinkling of ladies. Mr. James Rowney occupied the chair, and neatly introduced the lecturer. Mr. Foote was received with great enthusiasm, and his address on "The Use and Abuse of the Bible" was followed with the closest attention, and frequently punctuated with applause, which rose to an ovation at the finish. A few questions were asked, and a good-looking, smiling Hindoo made an attempt at opposition. A polite and reasonably-spoken minister said that he had listened to the lecture with much admiration and a good deal of sympathy; but he wanted to know whether the old Bible, with all its disadvantages, should not be kept in the schools until the better Bible of Humanity, which Mr. Foote referred to, was actually forthcoming. After the lecturer's reply to this question the meeting dispersed amidst a lot of handshaking and congratulations.

Friends going to St. James's Hall this evening (August 18) will please go to the Regent-street entrance, which has been specially opened for our convenience. The staircase at that entrance leads straight up to the Banqueting Hall. Some of our friends, last Sunday evening, went into the main Piccadilly entrance, and found themselves in Mr. Price Hughes's meeting. The look of disgust on the faces of the Methodist officials, when tickets for Mr. Foote's lecture were presented, may be left to imagination.

This evening's lecture (August 18) is on "George Meredith: Writer and Teacher." It will be very different from the lecture, with lavish selections, which Mr. Foote gave at the Hall of Science some months ago. It has been advertised in literary organs, and will probably attract a good number of outsiders. Freethinkers also should find this lecture particularly interesting. In the first place, it is something out of the common; in the next place, its subject, Mr. George Meredith, is the greatest living English novelist, a fine poet, a most brilliant wit, and a Freethinker and Humanitarian in the loftiest sense of the words.

The secretary of the Failsworth Secular Schools reports that, notwithstanding the heavy rains on Sunday, Mr. Putnam's lectures were a complete success, the school being full both afternoon and evening. Mr. Sydney A. Gimson made an excellent chairman, and friends attended from all parts. The collection amounted to over £15. During the last year over £50 has been spent on the school in repairs and decorations, and it is the intention, as soon as funds will permit, to enlarge the building, it having become too small to carry on the affairs of the school to the satisfaction of the committee.

Mr. Putnam lectures at Leicester to-day (August 18). One lecture only—in the evening. Local Freethinkers will have to hear him then, or not at all, so of course the hall will be crowded.

The farewell dinner to Mr. Putnam will take place at the Holborn Restaurant on Wednesday, September 4, a day or two before he sets sail from Southampton. The tickets (4s.) are now on sale, and can be obtained at 28 Stonecutter-street, or of any Branch secretary. Mr. Foote presides at this function, and hopes to meet a large number of London "saints." It will be their last opportunity, for some time at least, of doing honor to the President of the American Secular Union.

Mr. Putnam's last lecture before leaving will be delivered in London on Sunday, September 1. Miss Vance is making arrangements for it, under Mr. Foote's instructions, and due announcement will appear in our next issue.

Mr. Charles Watts gave his third and last lecture (for the present) at the Secular Hall, Camberwell, last Sunday evening. The audience was large and very enthusiastic.

This evening, Sunday, August 18, Mr. Watts lectures at Milton Hall, when, by request, he will speak upon the question: "Does Death End All?"

Mr. Cohen lectures for the Battersea Branch this Sunday evening at the Park Gates. As this is Mr. Cohen's first appearance in South-west London this season, he should have a very large audience. If wet, the lecture will be in the hall.

Mr. A. Prusser Chanter, a member of the N.S.S., was returned as a representative of Godalming Parish on the Guildford Board of Guardians. He has taken the place of a local Tory brewer.

Miss May Collins, a Freethinking girl of nineteen, is carrying on a discussion on the truth of the Christian religion, in the Blue Grass Blade, of Kentucky, with the Rev. President J. A. Williams, one of the best theologians of that State. To her contention, that the matter of the Gospels was involved in obscurity, he replied by saying it would be very unwise to decline to receive Euclid's mathematics because there were uncertainties about his life. To this Miss Collins replied that the mathematics of Euclid demonstrate their own truth, so it makes no difference whether any such man as Euclid ever lived. But the very foundation of the Christian religion requires that Jesus should have lived, and as the teachings attributed to Jesus do not demonstrate their own truth, like those attributed to Euclid, it is of fundamental importance that such a man as Jesus should have lived in order to establish the truth of what is attributed to him. The discussion is not ended, but as far as it has gone Miss Collins takes the biscuit.

"Theological Pessimism" is the title of Mr. Frederic Harrison's reply to Mr. W. H. Mallock, in the Nineteenth Century, and the Positivist certainly makes some good hits. Mr. Harrison repudiates the title "Optimist," and says: "If any religion is to be styled 'the creed of Optimism,' it is not the religion of Humanity; it is rather Neo-Christianity, or Neo-Catholicism, according to which not a hair of our heads can fall without the loving care and forethought of an Almighty Creator; all is for our real and ultimate good, even if it seems painful now; Virgins, saints, and at least two Persons of a Blessed Trinity are constantly at work to guide, protect, and inspire us; and, however vile or sinful we may be in life (hell being now practically abolished), we shall all live again in transcendent and infinite bliss."

Mr. Harrison, too, makes a good retort on the theologians, who, with Mr. Balfour, wail over the helplessness of man, the visionary nature of his so-called knowledge, and the infinitesimal littleness of his earthly abode. He says: "It is strange! For it is considerations like these which, I should think, were the despair of theologians. It is Divine Omnipotence, not Humanity, which has to answer this dilemma. Did God make us in His image, after His likeness, and yet we are such worthless, vile brutes! Did He, then, die for us wretched mites on this microscopic mote of dust, and all, as you theologians say, for nothing! It is very wonderful! And all this, you say, is to prove the infinite goodness of Almighty Wisdom! Such is Theological Optimism and its message of great joy to man." Well may Mr. Harrison say that "Scientific Optimism seems to me, on the whole, a more cheerful, as well as a more sensible, creed than the theological pessimism of Neo-Christianity."

Mr. H. Brockhouse sends a very sensible letter to the Birmingham Daily Argus on the subject of voluntary schools being supported from the public purse. He points out that this is opposed to fair play and common sense: "1st—Because Board schools are under the direct control of the people, but 'voluntary' schools are governed by small self-elected cliques not amenable to anyone, and public control must go with public taxation. 2nd—Because it is the duty of the State to supply secular education, and of religious denominations to supply religious teaching, each in their proper sphere and time. Secular education is a public duty, but religious education is a private matter, resting with the individual parent or guardian. 3rd—Because, if the schools of powerful bodies as the Established Church, Wesleyans, or Catholics, are supported by the public purse, you do an injustice to members of minor bodies, or no religious body, who should have the same rights as a Catholic or Wesleyan. 4th—Because the so-called voluntary schools are not truly voluntary, but supported almost entirely, even now, out of the Imperial Exchequer."

The prosecution of Freethinkers for blasphemy in Sweden has not resulted as the fetish men wish. One of them, the venerable A. Wilberg, of Stockholm, long a Baptist missionary, writes: "Never before has infidelity so daringly attacked the Bible, even in our own country, as at the present time. It is our duty to raise our voice of warning, especially to the young, not to suffer themselves to be carried away by the flood of infidelity that like a deluge sweeps over so many nations of our world."

The British Museum has acquired some valuable Gibbon documents, including the great historian's journal from 1762 to 1764, an account of his journey in Switzerland in the autumn of 1755, two journals of his tour in Italy in 1763-4, and his remarks upon Juvenal after finishing the perusal of the "Satires." It is to be hoped that steps will be taken to make these documents accessible to the reading public.

Digitized by Google

THE CHINESE MASSACRE; OR, CHRISTIAN FORGIVENESS.

"A Conference between officials of the C.M.S. and the Foreign Office was held on Monday, and instructions were at once telegraphed to Sir Nicolas O'Conor, Ambassador at Pekin, to demand a military escort for him to attend the scene of the massacre to hold an inquiry; and, further, demanding an Imperial decree ordering capital punishment for the offenders, and the issue of stringent orders for the protection of all British missionaries now in China."—Christian World, August 8, 1895.

"'Conclusion of Armenian Petition Entrusted to Dr. Dillon. Is European sympathy destined to take the form of a cross upon our graves?'—Mr. Gladstone has answered this last despairing question, and his answer will, we hope, rouse the Christian world. To think otherwise would be sheer infidelity, the denial of all moral power to the religion of Jesus."—Ibid.

Words like these are always significant to the Freethinker, and should be suggestive to all Christians not steeped in prejudice. These occasions form our opportunity for plainly exposing the ignorance and deception of orthodoxy. We take Christians on their ground of appealing to the "Word of God" as their authority, attested, as they say, by the "Spirit." By the way, this spirit must be very vague in its teaching when we notice that Christianity is divided and subdivided to such a great extent, even exhibiting this lack of unity in its foreign missions. However, as some of us know, to our cost, Christians are unanimous on one question—the persecution of "infidels," and here they are Turks and Chinese. Shade of Jesus! It seems incredible that the above quotations should coexist with the Sermon on the Mount. It is evident that in this boasted enlightened age those professing discipleship to the Nazarene are either dupes or hypocrites in excelsis. What do they mean when praying "as we forgive them that trespass against us"? Can any intelligent reader of the New Testament conceive of Jesus attending a "conference" between the Roman officials and his disciples, and "instructions" being at once sent to have Herod put to death for the murder of John the Baptist; or Peter taking part in a similar affair and "demanding" Herod's life for the murder of James? Candidly, though, is it too much to ask (assuming these persons ever lived) whether they would not if they could? Times have changed! But this is not a question for a Christian to ask. She or he is bound by "belief" to obey the "word of God."

Presuming all Christians possess knowledge of the existence of the Sermon on the Mount and its corollaries scattered in the Gospels, we have only too good reason for believing the majority are unaware of its character in detail. The "men of God," except a very small minority, evade the matter. As far as we are aware, with the exception of Tolstoi the Russian, this minority "explains" the teaching away. It is far from our intention to vindicate these ultra-altruistic teachings of Jesus, but we plead strongly for honesty and justice. Those calling themselves Christians should act up to the profession, or candidly admit their inability and resign. Instead of which, they dub as "infidels" those who are honest enough to renounce allegiance to this impossible religion. We are also eager to express horror at the massacre and outrages, and to sympathise with survivors and friends; but at the same time it is only just to express our strong disapproval of orthodox "heathen missions." Their history shows plainly that the intrusion of an incomprehensible and absurd religious system, combined with a lamentable inaptitude to reconciliation with immemorial and proper manners and customs, has naturally resulted in disaster. How would "Christian England" like bands of foreigners insinuating their (to us) out-of-place notions and practices? The experience of the Moslem establishment in Liverpool is sufficient answer.

It is only fair to notice the letter of a Mr. Lloyd, missionary, in the Daily News of the same date, who deprecates the idea of reprisal. This is admirable from a New Testament standpoint; but why does not Mr. Lloyd carry the protest to its logical conclusion and sever his connection (with its individual responsibility) with a party which violates an essential of duty, and whose existence well-nigh destroys all sense of truth in this and other countries? He would then be at liberty to tackle the other essentials of New Testament Christianity, and, seeing the utter impossibility of their performance, would inevitably renounce the profession.

Our contemporary may smile at the difficulty raised, and refer us to the long list of "worthies and divines" who have "satisfactorily explained" the Sermon on the Mount. We answer, such tricking, dodging, and evasion don't go down with a Freethinker in these days. The teaching is there, and it is the Christian's simple duty to obey.

"Sheer infidelity" consists of contradiction to the letter and spirit of this teaching; and, since we know it cannot be practised, Christianity does not exist; therefore, to talk of its moral power is absurd. Whatever of moral power may be connected with British civilisation seems ineffective when dealing with crime at home and abroad; and secular "providence," in the shape of "military escort, official inquiry, capital punishment, etc.," is relied on, to the practical exclusion of him who is declared to have said: "Lo, I am with you alway."

We hope the time is not far distant when thoughtless, superficially-minded persons will be compelled, by the spread of Freethought, to look this matter in the face, and have the choice of deliberate hypocrisy or renunciation of an impossible religion.

Jos. G. Briggs.

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (July 20).

How much I have to write about this week—Edinburgh, Abbotsford, Melrose, Glasgow, Ayr, Loch Katrine, and Loch Lomond. What a procession passes through the mind, majestic, beautiful, fairylike, that cannot vanish from the halls of memory, and glorifying this wonderful human life of ours.

For grandeur I do think the city of Edinburgh wears the palm; it is lovely, it is ancient, it is romantic; and other cities are so likewise; but where, in the heart of a vast metropolis, is beheld such a mighty castle towering on such a mighty hill? Two hundred trains rattle by it every day. The foliaged valley glitters beneath, edged by the busiest thoroughfare of the city, Princess-street. The Castle seems like some giant of the past, huge and battered, reclining with a kind of imperious disdain of the new life that surges at the feet of its dead empire, an enormous relic of the embattled ages.

On Monday morning, June 17, in company with Mr. Brown, president of the Secular Society of Edinburgh, and Mr. Dewar, Jr., I climb the precipitous eminence. As I enter the parade-ground the Highland regiment is at drill, with the music of the bagpipes. The costume is picturesque, and the marching ranks present an animated spectacle, with a dash of old-time war emblazonry. I enter the frowning portals, and wander through the halls, chambers, passage, and dungeons of this memorable stronghold. I look upon the kings' regalia, the swords and armor of celebrated warriors, the great gun built in 1486—a ragged-looking monster compared with the polished and gorgeous emissaries of death we now manufacture—and the tattered banner, in whose silken folds were once the fall and rise of kingdoms.

Time will not permit the enumeration of the hundreds of mementos that adorn this grim sentinel of the ages. From the castle I take my way to Holyrood Palace, at the other end of the long, descending street called High-street and Canongate. I pass St. Giles Cathedral, where John Knox preached, and the house in which he lived, gloomy as his own religion. I did not care to go in and view the remembrances of his fanatical career; I have no love for the theological termagant, who, if he had been a woman, would no doubt have enjoyed the Puritanic ducking-stool. Holyrood, however, is a poetic place, witnessing in its decaying grandeur to the tragedies of kings and queens. Especially is the brilliant and sorrowful life of Mary mingled with these palatial remnants. The bare walls of the old abbey are all that is now left of that structure in which the beautiful queen was married to the unworthy Darnley, whence began those cruel misfortunes which, crushing to death, have lifted her name into the immortal romance of history, where love and pity forget error and weakness. The dark and terrible crimes of those tumultuous days have left their record athwart the walls and floors of Holyrood, and we traverse the footsteps of royal murder and conspiracy. In the sunlight of to-day float the dim tapestries that might have drank the blood and tears of centuries ago. Near by the palace is Arthur's Seat, a promontory-like hill, whence is a specious view of the city, and the vast surrounding country, now glistening in summer's green and flowery pomp.

In the afternoon, with Mr. Brown and Mr. Dewar, I visit the Forth Bridge. This is the largest and tallest bridge in the world. It is a mile in length; with three mighty arches it spans the waters. It looks like a triple mountain in its symmetrical and massive sublimity. It is built for the ages. It cannot be blown down by any wind that these regions can produce. The enormous blast that tumbled over the Tay Bridge would not shake this an inch. It would require an earthquake to dissolve its stupendous frame. Its iron arms might hold a million tons in their clasp. We sail around the bridge and enjoy a full view of its piers, buttresses, and columns that defy the most furious storm. The view from the top of the bridge, which lifts its arches 150 feet above the water, is extensive and varied. The broad Forth is lined on both sides with wooded and mountainous shores gleaming near and far in the golden sunlight. We return by stage to Edinburgh, and along the route see new and attractive pictures of the city and its suburbs.

Digitized by Google

Tuesday unfolds a wondrous treasure house, Abbotsford, and Melrose. Melrose is forty miles by rail from Edinburgh. At the station the stage is ready for Abbotsford, about three miles away. We travel through a lovely country, the river Tweed glancing upon our vision with the same radiance that enchanted the poet's soul when he lived and loved on its gentle banks. Dismounting from the stage, we plunge down through a walled pathway into the delightful valley where the Wizard Scott built his picturesque home according to the fancies of his exuberant genius. We see the very walls he looked upon, the books he read, the window whence he saw, while at his task, the shining meadow and river; the chair he sat in, the desk over which wandered his marvellous pen, the little room in which he found rest at midnight's hour, the pipes he smoked as dreamland hovered about him, and the many treasures he had gathered, illustrious with memories of the past. The noble face of the poet—no canvas and marble declare the intellectual wealth of his gifted brain. How that brain teemed with the wonders of the world—a colossal power making rich forever the pathway of man. And Melrose, fair Melrose, I did not see it in the "pale moonlight," but in the soft and gorgeous summer afternoon; for clouds were in the sky, and a mellow lustre fell from the sun, and clothed the old abbey with a tender radiance; and the scenes all around harmonised with the melancholy beauty of the ruins. A graveyard is about the Abbey, beautiful with blue and golden flowers and a carpet of grass. I walked among these grey sepulchres, beside the grey walls of the shattered and mossy temple, plucking the flowers just bursting into bloom. The majestic past for the time possessed my being, and the dead centuries became alive and their glory thrilled my heart. I am glad, however, that I did not live when this old abbey was in its prime. I am glad that I have the privilege of looking upon its ruins, and wondering what its history might have been in the forgotten ages. I have photographed its picture in my mind, and its sad and sweet desolation becomes an intellectual joy.

I return to Edinburgh and pass the night at the home of Mr. J. F. Dewar, naturalist. He enjoys rural felicity if any one does. He lives in a farmhouse, old and solid as the hills almost, and surrounded with gardens, green fields, and beautiful trees. Birds of various plumage are gathered here, and other species of life interesting to the student of nature. It is a delightful place for dreams and reveries, away from the busy multitude. In the evening we enjoy the music of the violin and the piano and the melody of favorite Scottish songs. Mr. Dewar has for years been a staunch supporter of Freethought in Edinburgh, and at the last National Conference he was elected vice-president of the National Secular Society in recognition of his eminent services. As a naturalist and man of science he has no use for the supernatural. I enjoyed the campaign at Edinburgh. There is a fine society here; the audiences are good. The hall is well filled in the evening. Mr. Brown presides at the afternoon lecture, and Dr. Crawford at the evening lecture. Dr. Crawford himself takes the platform occasionally and speaks a word for reform, although occupied with the cares of a busy profession. He is associated with the great medical colleges of Edinburgh. The Secular Society has much local talent. J. M. Wheeler, Mr. Robertson, and others of renown in the Freethought ranks, began their work in this city. Edinburgh is the seat of learning. Over five thousand students are at its university. It might well be called the modern Athens. It is an ideal place for study and philosophy. Here is the tomb of David Hume, and his spirit still reigns in the schools, and even in the churches. With the charm of the past, Edinburgh has still the inquiring mind. The warm welcome I have received here, the many beautiful and grand scenes I have witnessed, make Edinburgh a memorable experience in this summer's journey.

On Wednesday, June 19, I take the train early for Glasgow, for now the Pilgrim would wend his way to one of the sweetest spots in all of Bonnie Scotland—the birthplace of Robert Burns. I met at Glasgow James McGlashan, president of the Glasgow Society, and Mr. Leiper, and they are my companions for this day's journey. Ayr is about forty miles' journey from Glasgow, on the Firth of Clyde. It is now quite a prosperous and fashionable resort, and has but little of the simplicity and rural quietness of Burns's time. The old landmarks are almost covered up. Tam o' Shanter's Inn still abides, but it has a brusque and modern appearance. At the Plough Inn is the drinking-cup of Souter Johnnie, and some of the furniture of the cottage where the poet was born. They used to allow strangers, and especially Americans, to drink out of that famous cup, the source of so much happiness to Souter Johnnie; but now it is put under lock and key. It is too valuable to be handed promiscuously about. We can only take a look at it, and dream of its sparkling glory in the dim past. The birthplace of the poet is about three miles from the city—a low, long cottage. The poet was born in a little square corner of what I suppose was the kitchen. There seems hardly room enough in that bed for a woman to give birth to a child, but so it was that Scotland's greatest genius saw the light of day, and not much light at that, for there are only two windows in the room, one in front and a very small one in the rear, close by the bed. So the little fellow did not look upon a world of very great promise as he opened his eyes and the tragedy of existence began, mingled with flowers of love and flashes of wit and humor that will cheer to the end of time. In another room, which was perhaps the best room, or parlor, are relics and treasures of the poet's changeful life, his letters, manuscript of "Tam o' Shanter," etc. Among these, on a newspaper cutting, was "A Stranger's Tribute to Robert Burns," and signed "An American." To my surprise and delight, these verses, thus treasured in the poet's own home, were the beautiful stanzas written, I believe, in this very house, by Ingersoll—the sweetest tribute ever given to Burns from a kindred heart and genius. But it struck me as wonderfully incongruous that these noble lines should be "The Tribute of a Stranger." I was wondering if those who placed the lines here really know who wrote them, and were a bit afraid of the magic word, Ingersoll; or did they select them for their simple beauty, without any reference to the greatness of the author? It certainly, in this latter case, would show a fine appreciation of a poem that flows like a fountain from the pen of America's most renowned representative. Burns and Ingersoll! how much alike they are in their broad and universal manliness, in their open-hearted recognition of whatever is good and beautiful in the humblest lot. He who loves the poet of Scotland must love the gifted singer of America, who breaks into melody beneath this lowly roof.

From the cottage we wander to Kirk Alloway, where the witches danced, and we stand by the window through which Tam o' Shanter looked and watched the show, while Old Nick played his liveliest tunes. Then we traversed the road along which Maggie did her level best. We loitered on the arch of the "old brig," where Maggie saved everything except her tail. An enthusiastic Scotchman was reciting the poem as we arrived, and the whole picture was placed vividly before the mind. We could see Tam as he whirled the corner and rushed down the road. We could see Maggie as she made that tremendous jump and won immortal fame. Beneath flowed the beautiful river, the river Doon, which Burns has so often celebrated in his songs. Dreamily we watched its limpid course; the green banks, the rose, the woodbine, and the trees glittering in the sunlight. At the monument are the marvellously life-like statues of Tam o' Shanter, Souter Johnnie, and Nance, and it seemed as if we could hear the very music of their laughter and see the humorous light dancing in their eyes.

Returning to Ayr in the afternoon, we went to the shore, where there are beautiful prospects of the Firth of Clyde, the Arran mountains beyond, etc. In the evening we are in Glasgow. With Mr. McGlashan I take a long ride through the city on a tram-car, and view some of Glasgow's most fashionable streets, its elegant residences, the Botanic gardens, the cathedral, the university, the tall chimneys, etc. There is much magnificence about Glasgow, notwithstanding its smoky atmosphere. The Great Western-road is especially attractive, with its noble mansions and lovely gardens. It extends straight as an arrow for many miles.

Thursday, June 20, is another eventful day. The weather is brilliant indeed; clouds and sunshine mingle in glorious array, and add to the attractiveness of each. The Trossachs tour is on this day's program, and it is crowded with romance from beginning to end. The splendor of Scott's poetry is over all this region, and we seem to be travelling through enchanted land. I take the train from Glasgow to Callender. Here I mount the stage for the Trossachs. We pass by the foot of Ben Ledi. On our left is Collantogle Ford, where Roderick Dhu was wounded unto death. Then the sparkling Loch Vennachar spreads before us; and beyond that is the Brig of Turk, and Lock Achray, and towering wild and grand is Ben Venue. Then we plunge into the Trossachs' rugged glen, and, coming forth, Loch Katrine dances on the view. We leave the coaches, and are soon on the bosom of the waters, and the great blue mountains appear, the grey hills, Ben Ann, Ellen's Isle, etc. I am reading the "Lady of the Lake" as the boat moves along the wondrous scenes. I see the very rock where the huntsman's gallant steed breathed his last. I see the precipice which the bold knight ascended, the silver strand where the lady found her prophetic guest. Each glowing line reminds of the brilliant world through which I am passing. The poet's genius glorifies the vast expanse. From Loch Katrine we take stage to Loch Lomond. Ben Vorlich and its companions lift their massive walls before our path, and we seem to be dashing into their rocky chambers. But from their base flows Loch Lomond, and on its fair bosom we pursue our journey. Ben Lomond rears its majestic crest, and crowns the vast and splendid scenery. It is afternoon now, and the golden color is shining along the changing heights and the fields and the valleys. It is a marvellous picture, infinite in variety.

Digitized by Google

From Loch Lomond we take train to Glasgow, and arrive at eight o'clock. Mr. James Baxter meets me, and we visit South Side Park, the Langside monument, on the spot where the troops of Queen Mary were defeated, and Camp Hill, upon which are some remains of the ancient Roman intrenchments. From this place there is a magnificent view of Glasgow. For miles around we behold the populous city.

I must thank Mr. McGlashan and other Glasgow friends for their generosity and hospitality. Mr. Leiper has presented me with some beautiful views of Scotland, which he has taken in his many travels as a matter of pleasure and art, and these will remind me of the beauty and glory of Scotland. My whole visit has been one of constant delight. The people are sociable and cultivated. They are patriotic, and may well be proud of what Scotland has done in the history of the world, in philosophy, in literature, and in Freethought. Scotland is progressive. She is not bound to ancient creeds. Her stores of romance do not chain her to the past. Her splendid mountains, her beautiful lakes, her fair fields, her shining shores, crowded with memories of heroic ancestry, are busy also with the life of to-day and resplendent with the triumphs of man's noblest genius.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

BOOK CHAT.

In a certain literary circle the knighting of Sir Walter Besant was being discussed, and by some disapproved. "Knight!" broke in a vehement Freethinker, "he ought to have been made a lord at the least." "Why?" was asked. "Why, for creating Valentine Eldridge in Children of Gibeon. The Lord God Almighty, with all eternity to work in, has not yet succeeded in creating half so good a woman."

* * *

Humanity, the organ of the Humanitarian League, for August opens with a biographical notice of Francis William Newman, who has reached the patriarchal age of ninety. This is followed by an excellent article on "Humane Nomenclature," by Howard Williams. Walter Lewin contributes a thoughtful article on "The Making of Criminals," which ought to be read by every magistrate in the kingdom.

* * *

Light Through the Crannies: Parables and Teachings from the Other Side, by Emily E. Reader (London: H. A. Copley, Canning Town, E.; 6d.), is evidently written by a highly imaginative lady, who describes life in other planets and on the plains of Hades as glibly as John on Patmos did the New Jerusalem. There is a Christian air about the book, and yet its teaching is not belief in the atonement, but working out good or evil deeds through metempsychosis.

* * *

In Leslie Stephen's account of Paley, in the Dictionary of National Biography, he says: "Paley advised his pupils, if they should have to preach every Sunday, 'to make one sermon and steal five.' He apparently acted upon this principle. His son, in publishing some posthumous sermons, says that only one is 'stolen,' but adds that three are said to be founded on sermons by Fleetwood; and a correspondent of Notes and Queries states that another is slightly altered from a sermon by Bishop Porteus." The famous author of Natural Theology and Evidence of Christianity said himself, "We could not afford to keep a conscience."

* * *

Judging from extracts, Pierre Lotî's Jerusalem is a very French and very sentimental performance. The plain, ugly facts about "the golden city" are veiled in much fine phraseology. The average Frenchman peeps out in what he says of Bethlehem. "The beauty and costumes of the women are the special charm of the place." Of one of these women, "in the calm and pretty attitude of the Madonnas," he says: "Now one would say that the Virgin Mary in person is coming towards us with the infant Jesus in her arms." The book should help the French pilgrimages to the Holy Land, but we guess the pilgrims will come back disappointed, not having viewed the scenes through the roseate pince nez of M. Lotî.

* * *

Mr. Stead deserves all credit for bringing out The Penny Poets, and we hope the sale will recoup his enterprise. But his last issue, "Robert Burns," cannot be commended, save on the ground that to have any snatch of such a poet is worth the money. It purports only to be "Selected Poems and Songs," so we were prepared to find it open with "The Cotter's Saturday Night," and omit the characteristic "Holy Willie's Prayer." The editor was justified in omitting what was not to his taste, but not in altering words in what he did select, as he has done in more than one instance. To put "middle" for "midden" is over-fastidious in one who explains "houghmagandie" by "fornication," and d——d only calls attention to the fact that the word should be spelled damned. The first verse of "Afton Water," too, is divided wrongly. Mr. Stead calls this "The Masterpiece Library." The office boy, with scissors and paste, might achieve a better masterpiece.

ONE WORLD AT A TIME.

ONE world at a time is all we can carry,
All we can manage or hold;
Then why should we seek, while on earth we tarry,
More worlds than one to enfold?

One world at a time, with all its rare graces,
Sweet as a vision of love;
Its glorious showing of wonderful places,
Fairer than any above.

Beams on our sight in its clear placid glory,
A gem in white splendor set;
Its pages record a beautiful story,
Which learned, we ne'er can forget;

A story of joy and a story of peace,
Bound in a volume sublime;
Where joys grow larger and sorrows decrease,
In one great world at a time.

No tongue hath counted the years that are given
To dolorous fancies and sighs;
Or told how wearily mortals have striven,
On wings immortal to rise;

To soar far away to some fanciful land,
In some rare and roseate clime,
Forgetting that man can reasonably stand
In but one world at a time.

One world at a time—although it hath sorrows,
And fond hearts burdened with grief;
Yet hath its seasons of joyous to-morrows,
Bright with the buds of relief.

One world at a time—and its exquisite grace
Flowers and unfolds in the sun,
While in her dear bosom we readily trace
The text and the words, "Well done."

Well done for us all if we would but hasten
To catch its wisdom and weal,
Its infinite strength upon which to fasten
All that is lovely and real.

One world at a time—'tis all we can carry,
All we really can hold;
Then let us try, while within it we tarry,
Our lives by its truths to mould.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

PROFANE JOKES.

"What made Samson weak?" asked the Sunday-school teacher. "A home-made hair cut," promptly replied a boy in the front row.

"Do you think woman will ever successfully fill the pulpit?" "I see no reason why she should not. It ought to be easy with the sleeves she wears."

Mary had a little hen
With feathers white as snow.
The preacher paid a visit: then
The chicken had to go.

Bright Boy—"Ma, you know the Prayer Book says Jesus Christ descended into hell?" Mother—"Yes." Bright Boy—"Well, our rector this morning read about Jesus saying to the thief on the cross, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.'" Mother—"Well, what do you want to know?" Bright Boy—"I want to know how in hell the two could meet in paradise."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

ST. JAMES'S HALL (Banqueting Hall), Piccadilly: 7.30, G. W. Foote, "George Meredith: Writer and Teacher."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): Monday, at 8, musical and dramatic entertainment.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7, Conversazione.

MILTON HALL (Hawley-crescent, 89 Kentish Town-road): 7, musical selections; 7.30, Charles Watts, "Does Death End All?"

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, F. Haslam, "Beautiful Bible Stories"; 7, C. Cohen will lecture.

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, St. John, "Religion and Morality."

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.30, Stanley Jones, "Our Lord, Jesus Christ."

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, C. James will lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, S. B. Thompson, "Slavery." (Collection for Benevolent Fund.)

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11.15, C. Cohen, "Jesus as a Teacher"; 3.15, "Is Belief in God Reasonable?" (Collection for London Secular Federation.)

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE (Middlesex side): 7, A. B. Moss, "Antidotes to Superstition." Thursday, at 8.30, Stanley Jones will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, A. B. Moss, "Christianity and Evolution"; 3.30, "God and Evolution." Wednesday, at 8, F. Haslam will lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, H. Courtney, "Belief and Conduct."

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, S. E. Easton, "Where will you Spend Eternity?"

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, a lecture.

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, F. A. Davies, "Christianity and Slavery."

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, F. Haslam, "The Life and Teachings of Buddha."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, W. Heaford, "Rome, Reason, and Revelation."

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 3, S. E. Easton will lecture.

TOTTENHAM GREEN: 3.30, a lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15, S. B. Thompson will lecture; 3.15, W. Heaford will lecture.

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "Christ's Fables"; 7, S. B. Thompson, "The Bible and Total Abstinence." Thursday, at 8, C. Cohen will lecture.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM BRANCH (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, Gymnasium class; 7, club and social meeting.

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school; 7, L. Keen will lecture.

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, Mr. Hammond, "Metamorphoses of Christianity."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, E. G. Taylor, "Private Ownership of Land a Social Wrong."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 3, members' monthly meeting; 7, J. L. White, M.Sc., "Bible Science."

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, Lecture or reading—see Saturday's local paper.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King street): 7, adjourned discussion on "A Liberal Program."

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (82 Dovecote-street): 6.30, business meeting.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BRISTOL (Eastville Park, Lower End): 7, J. Watts Treasure, "Christianity and Society."

DERBY (Market-place): 11, Mr. Briggs will lecture.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Quayside): 11, R. Mitchell, "The Atonement."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London.—August 18, m and a. Finsbury Park, e. Battersea; 22, Wood Green; 25, Manchester.

STANLEY JONES, 58 Marlborough-road, Holloway, London.—Aug. 18, m. Finsbury Park; 22, Hammersmith; 25, m. Pimlico Pier, e. Kilburn; 28, Hyde Park.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Croydon-road, Rotherhithe, London, E.—August 18, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 25, m. Clerkenwell, a. Victoria Park.

T. THURLOW, 350 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 15, e. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

LECTURES
BY
MR. G. W. FOOTE
(President of the National Secular Society)
AT
ST. JAMES'S HALL
(BANQUETING HALL), PICCADILLY, W.
Entrances—Regent-street and Piccadilly.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 18TH—
"George Meredith: Writer and Teacher."

SUNDAY, AUGUST 25TH—
"Religion in the Light of Science."

CHAIR TAKEN AT 7.30 P.M.

ADMISSION BY TICKET ONLY.
Tickets 1s., 2s., & 5s. Course Tickets 1s. 6d. & 3s.
Obtainable at Tree's Ticket Office, Piccadilly; and at 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d. post free,
THE GRAND OLD BOOK.
A REPLY TO THE GRAND OLD MAN.
BY
G. W. FOOTE.
An Exhaustive Answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture."

CONTENTS:—Preface—Preliminary View—The Creation Story—The Fall of Man—The Psalms—The Mosaic Legislation—Corroborations of Scripture—Gladstone and Huxley—Modern Scepticism.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."
MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.
Edited by JOHN GRANGE.
Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"
TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.
Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.
Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.
Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.
Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

COALS! COALS! COALS!
MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.
R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."
W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."
Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."
Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.
The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.
Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.
Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.
The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.
London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5l. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Salt as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

"In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr. Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Acudall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr Palfrey's Powder, 1s 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchisedek
S'w'elp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Handsomely bound in cloth, post free 7s. 6d.,

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF

FREETHINKERS OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

"The Dictionary has involved enormous labor, and the compiler deserves the thanks of the Freethought party."—National Reformer.

"The work will be of the greatest value."—Freethought.

"At last we have the long-wanted means of silencing those Christians who are continually inquiring for our great men, asserting that all great men have been on the side of Christianity."—Truthseeker (New York).

"The most important Freethought work published this year."—De Dageraad (Amsterdam).

"A good and useful work that was much needed."—Commonweal.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 132 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

READ WHAT THEY SAY OF US!

"THE TWO WORLDS," July 19, 1895, says: "Read Mr. Gott's adverts. on the cover. He makes you very liberal offers, and judging from our experience, and the testimony of friends, he is a man of his word."

"THE LYCEUM BANNER," for July, says: "If it is not too hot to think about clothing, just read Mr. Gott's advertisement on the back page of the cover this month. What Mr. Gott has not got in the way of suitings, dress goods and such like, is difficult to say, so large and various is his stock. Try him. The BANNER man has, and he advises you to do so as well. Among Mr. Gott's stock-in-trade is business honesty. It's a good article, but somewhat scarce at times, in some cases."

J. DYER (Guildford)—"The Trousers safely to hand yesterday. They are a good fit. I am more than satisfied with them. They are really extraordinarily good value."

W. OLIVER (London)—"Thanks for patterns. I shall take them to the shop and see if I can get you some orders. I think they are nice and good in value."

H. REX (Abertillery)—"I will give you an order soon. My son used to travel with such goods, and he considers yours splendid quality at the price."

J. G. BROWN (Aldwinckle)—"Goods received. Give every satisfaction. I will show them to my friends, and must thank you for attending to all my instructions."

J. UMPLEBY (Blackburn)—"The Trousers answer well."

JOHN JONES (Coventry)—"Trousers arrived. Good fit. Nicely made. I am satisfied and very much pleased with them."

ANNUAL SUMMER SALE.

We have a large quantity of odd Suit Lengths, in Black and Indigo Serges, Grey, Brown, and Fawn Mixtures and Checks. These are worth from 45s. to 55s. Suits made to Measure. During Sale our price will be

FULL SUIT TO MEASURE, 35/- TROUSERS, 9/-

These are marvellous value, and if you buy to stock it will pay you well in the end.

SELF-MEASUREMENT FORM.

LOUNGE COAT.	INCHES	TROUSERS.	INCHES	VEST.	INCHES	Remarks on Figure.
Length of Waist		Round Waist over Trousers		Centre of Back to Opening		Stooping, Upright, or Extra Upright
Full Length of Coat		Round Seat		Centre of Back to Full Length		Sloping, Very Sloping, Square or Very Square Shoulders
Half Width of Back		Inside Leg Seam		Round Chest over Vest		Hollow Waist or not
Centre of Back to Elbow		Full Length of Trousers		Round Waist over Vest		Corpulent or not
Centre of Back to Full Length of Sleeve		Round Thigh		Please say if Vest is to have Collar, or not		Short or Long Neck
Round Chest, close to armpits, over vest, NOT COAT		Round Knee				Full or Narrow Chest
Round Waist, over Vest		Round Bottom				Height
		Please say Lined or Unlined				Age ..... Occupation
		Side or Cross Pockets				These particulars help us very much in fitting.
		Fly or Full Fall

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 34. SUNDAY, AUGUST 25, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S LATEST STATEMENTS.

Now that Professor Huxley has unfortunately been taken by death from the battle-ground of controversial contention, it may be of service to note his latest expressions of opinion upon topics with which his name has been more or less associated for nearly the last half century. It is to us gratifying to know that he did not reserve the final statement of his views for the last hours of his life, but that he made it in 1894, when he was in comparatively good health, and in possession of his mental vigor. From this statement, which appears in the ninth volume of his Collected Essays, we learn, without doubt, what his matured ideas were upon many of the most important subjects which agitate the advanced minds of modern times. His public career was a grand specimen of moral and intellectual consistency, and his death was a noble example of a peaceful resignation to "nature's stern decree." When the hour arrived for his final parting from those he loved, he had no misgivings, no anxiety as to any future life; that faith in honesty of purpose, in sincerity of profession, and in integrity of conduct, which was the charm of his useful life, adequately sustained him upon entering the portals of the "great unknown." As he lived, so he died, an Agnostic, leaving behind treasures of thought that can be utilised in the endeavor to solve some of the problems of human existence.

Professor Huxley was regarded as an authority, upon the side of Freethought, in reference to several disputed points, and no doubt his writings will still be frequently quoted in debate against orthodox conclusions. It will therefore be useful to bring to the notice of our readers his latest declarations as to the position he occupied towards some existing theological theories. In the last volume of his Collected Essays he makes allusions to what he had repeatedly urged in various publications which he had issued during the previous forty years. "If I may speak of the objects I have had more or less definitely in view since I began the ascent of my hillock," he says, "they are briefly these: To promote the increase of natural knowledge, and to forward the application of scientific methods of investigation to all the problems of life to the best of my ability, in the conviction, which has grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength, that there is no alleviation for the sufferings of mankind except veracity of thought and of action, and the resolute facing of the world as it is."

In reference to the present state of nature, he describes it as fleeting—"merely the last of the series of changes which the earth's surface has undergone in the course of the millions of years of its existence." He points out that "the trail of the most ancient life remains hidden, or has become obliterated." Now, the scientific opinion here expressed is quite opposed to the orthodox notion that the earth is only a little over six thousand years old, and that the origin and path of life have been revealed by God. To speak of the earth having been in existence millions of years, as Huxley did, may be scientifically correct, but it flatly contradicts the account given in Genesis. The Bible writer might have thought that he had discovered the "trail" of primitive life; time, however, has shown that he was mistaken. The one fact bearing upon this subject in which there is reason for believing is, that "at some period in the history of the earth, far more remote than any of which organic remains have been discovered, they would merge in those low groups in which the boundaries between animal and vegetable life became effaced."

The Professor states very clearly his views upon the theory of Evolution. He did not regard it as an explanation of the cosmic process, but rather as a method of nature's operations, and he adds, "evolution excludes creation, and all other kinds of supernatural intervention"; and it "no less excludes that of chance." Moreover, his opinion was that scientific knowledge tends to support the belief that the principle of evolution applies to all existing things—not merely to plants and animal life, but to the solar system. Terrestrial life, he urged, exhibits "the tendency to vary, the causes of which have yet to be ascertained." Undoubtedly, to his mind, the theory of evolution was reasonable, while that of sudden creation, or the shaping by supernatural power, was contrary to our present knowledge. This testimony in favor of evolution is the more valuable, because it comes from one of the most competent judges upon the subject that the world has produced. He says: "I do not know that anyone has taken more pains than I have, during the last thirty years, to insist upon the doctrine, so much reviled in the early part of that period, that man, physical, intellectual, and moral, is as much a product of nature, as purely a product of the cosmic process, as the humblest weed." The changes observed in animals and plants, he thought, must not be attributed only to selection and the struggle for existence. "In discussions on these topics it is often strangely forgotten that the essential conditions of the modification, or evolution, of living things are variation and hereditary transmission." As an illustration of this, he instances that "the wild kale becomes a cabbage, or the wild Viola tricolor a prize pansy."

His views upon the Population Question deserve serious attention, for, in our opinion, whatever tends to throw light upon this all-important subject is of practical value to suffering humanity. The question really deals with what Huxley aptly calls "the serpent that enters every Eden." He points out that, in the struggle for existence, "the survival of the fittest" may be of the lowest, as well as of the highest, forms. "The fittest" are those best adapted to changed conditions, and as such they will survive. He maintains that, so long as man naturally increases without restraint, the struggle for existence will go on; and, in his opinion, no social organisation has ever been devised that will meet the difficulty. This is not our view, for it appears to us that the trouble is not so much in discovering a plan to check over-population as in inducing the masses to act upon it. This is the real difficulty, and we agree with Huxley that "it is the true riddle of the Sphinx, and every nation which does not solve it will, sooner or later, be devoured by the monster itself has generated. Judging from an ethical standard, nothing can be less satisfactory than the position in which we find ourselves."

True to his Agnostic principles, he refuses to dogmatise upon either Materialism or Spiritualism. He repudiates the popular exposition of both. Still, as we understand his philosophy, it is thoroughly Materialistic in its basis. He holds it "quite correct to say that material changes are the result of psychical phenomena." Further, he professes to have no knowledge of anything beyond or apart from the material universe. As to whether consciousness can exist apart from matter and force, he writes: "As Kant said on a like occasion, if anybody can answer that question, he is just the man I want to see. If he says consciousness cannot exist except in relation of cause and effect with certain organic molecules, I must ask how he knows that; and if he says it can, I must put the same question." We may remark, in passing, that in our judgment the two cases are not analogous, inasmuch as we have undoubted experience that consciousness does exist in connection with organic molecules, while we have no evidence that it can be found without them.

Digitized by Google

The Professor maintains that the bickerings of theology about things of which nothing is known are the prime cause of that "scepticism which is the Nemesis of meddling with the unknowable." "Orthodoxy," he says, "is the Bourbon of the world of thought. It learns not, neither can it forget; and, though at present bewildered and afraid to move, it is as willing as ever to insist that the first chapter of Genesis contains the beginning and end of sound science, and to visit with such petty thunderbolts as its half-paralysed hands can hurl those who refuse to degrade nature to the level of primitive Judaism." Finally, he submits that the safety of morality does not depend on Christian inheritance, for, "if the Stoics and the Jews revoked their bequests, the moral property of Christianity would realise very little." He was a firm believer in "that fixed order of nature which sends social disorganisation upon the track of immorality, as surely as it sends physical disease after physical trespasses."

As to the future of mankind, he held that evolution does not lead to any final state of permanent bliss; but he was no misanthrope; he saw no limit to intelligence, investigation, and combined effort, in modifying the conditions of existence, and even the nature of man himself. In trying to solve the problems of life he advises that we should take the good which falls in our way and bear the evil with stout hearts, while endeavoring to diminish it. "So far, we all may strive in one faith towards one hope:—

> It may be that the gulphs will wash us down,
> It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,
> . . . . . but something ere the end,
> Some work of noble note may yet be done."

CHARLES WATTS.

BURNING THE BIBLE.

THERE is a common myth that Freethinkers burn their Bibles, and desire all others to do so. I have never come across such a case, or even read of an authenticated instance; though it may possibly have happened when, at the French Revolution, churches were desecrated and bells taken for cannon by infuriated mobs. I have found English Freethinkers well acquainted with the book, and anxious to enlighten others as to the real contents of a volume far more reverenced than read. But Freethought works have often been put under the ban of the Church, and burnt at the hands of the public hangman. Nay, their authors have sometimes shared the same fate. The Church has burnt rival Bibles wholesale. In Spain, Cardinal Ximenes had every copy of the Koran that could be procured taken from their owners and the libraries, and destroyed. Five thousand are said to have been burnt in one holocaust. But this was outdone by the collection and burning at Cremona of twelve thousand copies of the Talmud. At this period, be it remembered, the Moslems and Jews were the chief cultivators of literature.

The attempts of the oldest and greatest of the Christian Churches to suppress the circulation of the Bible is matter of history. In the twelfth century Pope Innocent III. prohibited the reading of the Bible in the common tongue. The Council of Toulouse (1229) forbade the reading of the Bible in any vernacular language, and decreed that no layman should have in his possession any of the books of the Old or New Testament. The Council of Terragona orders that any priest or layman, who possesses a translation of the Bible and does not surrender it within eight days to be burnt, shall be deemed a heretic. The famous Council of Trent affirmed that no Bible should be held or read except by priests, and this canon remains unrepealed. This Council condemned wholesale the works of the most notorious heretics, i.e. reformers. In 1557 Paul IV. published at Rome the first official Index Librorum Prohibitorum. His Index includes all Bibles in modern languages, enumerating forty-eight editions chiefly printed in countries still under the jurisdiction of the Church.

I have recently come across a pamphlet, entitled The Trial and Conviction of a Franciscan Monk at Mayo Spring Assizes, 1852, for Burning and Blaspheming the Holy Scriptures; with Observations on the Fact, and the Defence Made for It, by the Rev. P. M'Loskey, A.B., Curate of Castlebar (Dublin: George Herbert; 1852). I shall not trouble much about the reverend gentleman's observations on "this horrible transaction"; but the trial itself is, for several reasons, of interest to Freethinkers, and, I think, has not yet been noticed in any of the publications on the law, and legal aspects, of blasphemy.

The Franciscan monk in question is given in this report as "John Syngian, alias Brother John." His real name was John St. John. The case came before the Ballinrobe Petty Sessions, March 1, 1852. The charge was that the defendant, "on the 23rd of November last, at Cappaduff, did burn a copy of the New Testament, and did, at the same time and place, profanely scoff at the Holy Scriptures." It was thought that the prosecution was under what the late Sir James Fitzjames Stephen called the "ferocious statute" of 9 and 10 William III.; but, as in all other cases of blasphemy, the common law was relied upon, as this statute demands, among other matters, that information should be made within four days of the offence. The counsel for the complainant relied on 1 Hawkins, c. 5, Nunn and Walsh, 445, to show the monk had committed an offence at common law. Callaghan McCarthy swore that he saw two monks at the bridge of Cappaduff, and one of them in the act of burning the New Testament. When he asked whether he was burning the Word of God, he said it was not the Word of God, but the Word of the Devil, and he would burn every one he could lay hold of. J. Sheridan, in corroboration, described the monk's putting the covers back to back, holding the open leaves over the fire. "The monk said it was the Devil's Book—a damnable and heretical book; said he would burn thousands of them if he could get them." The Rev. Hamilton Townsend, rector of Ballyovey, also testified to the fact. "He said it was the Devil's Book—Luther's book—damnable and heretical, and that he would burn every one he could get." The monk was sent to trial. "For some time after the excitement was very great, and Protestant clergymen were very grossly insulted in the streets."

The monk was brought up at the Mayo Assizes on March 6, before Baron Lefroy. The proceedings awakened vast interest and excitement. The indictment set out that, not having the fear of God before his eyes, but contriving and intending to scandalise and vilify the true Protestant religion as by law established within these realms, and to blaspheme the Holy Gospel of God and of our Lord and Savor Jesus Christ, did, etc., to the great dishonor of Almighty God, and in contempt of the Protestant religion, etc. Mr. Keogh, Q.C., defended, and severely cross-examined the witnesses on many points, such as the differences between the Authorised and the Douay versions. He elicited that the Rev. Mr. Townsend said that the Church of Rome was damnable and idolatrous. This was after the traverser said the Bible was the Devil's Book. This clergyman was asked: "Do you, sir, believe that it is a Christian thing to go amongst a Catholic people and tell them that their religion is idolatrous and damnable?" He fenced with the question a good bit. Mr. Keogh said: "Now, sir, if you were to remain at that table until you were made a bishop of, I will make you answer my question." And at last he did answer: "I do believe it." Mr. Keogh: "Then go down, sir."

Mr. Keogh, Q.C. (afterwards, I expect, Judge Keogh), made a spirited defence, which was frequently applauded. He attacked the Church Missionaries and Bible Societies, who, he said, "clubbed their money together to prosecute this man." His client believed the Authorised Version to be a spurious version, etc. "You will not send the traverser to gaol for burning what in his conscience he believed was not the word of God, while other men return to their homes to enjoy the honors and emoluments conferred upon them for doing that which, if it be not a violation of human law, is undoubtedly a breach of that law which is above all human statutes, and by which you and I shall be tried at the bar of judgment," etc. He appealed to them to heal the breach between Protestants and Catholics by showing justice in mercy to one who conscientiously differed from them in belief. It was evidently a rousing speech, eliciting a loud burst of applause. But Baron Lefroy told the jury they must stick to law and fact, and they returned a verdict of Guilty. The prosecuting counsel said the Crown did not wish to press for punishment, the object being to put a stop to such acts; and his lordship sentenced the prisoner to give bail, himself in £20, and two sureties in £10 each, to keep the peace for seven years, and to come up for judgment when called upon, getting ten days' notice.

Digitized by Google

And so the majesty of the Protestant fetish book was vindicated, and thus ended the case of Bible burning in Mayo.

J. M. WHEELER.

TOLSTOI AND THE GOSPELS.

TOLSTOI, though a Christolater, is not a Bibliolater, or worshipper of the letter of the Bible. In his preface to his annotations on the Gospels he says: "In the civilised world to-day there is no people except our Russian people who, thanks to the censor, are able to ignore the labors of historical criticism during the last century, and to retain the ingenuous belief that the gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke were written exactly as they are, each one separately and entirely by the author to whom they are attributed. The reader must not forget that such an opinion is based on an ignorance of all the labors of science, and possesses to-day about the same value that the opinion held in the last century possessed, according to which the sun revolved about the earth. The reader must not forget that the Synoptic Gospels in their present form are the fruits of a long evolution, of an indefinite series of additions and omissions; that they are the product of the imagination of millions of different men, and not at all the product of the Holy Spirit, which might have spoken by the voices of the evangelists. The reader must not forget that the Gospels in their present form are in no wise the testimony of the Apostles and the immediate disciples of Jesus; that such an assertion is a fiction which will not only not stand against criticism, but is based on nothing, unless on the desire of pious souls that it might be so.

"During the centuries the Gospels have been collected, purged, enlarged, explained. The most ancient manuscripts that we have date from the fourth century, are written without spaces between the words, and without punctuation—in such a way, indeed, that, even directly after the fourth and fifth century, they were the object of the most divergent interpretations, and gave rise to variations of which about 50,000 are counted. The reader ought to have these things present in his mind in order to avoid the opinion, which is so popular with us, that the Gospels came down to us in their present form from the Holy Spirit."

Going so far, it is a wonder that Tolstoi does not go further, and admit we have no historical certainty about Christ; but, instead of this, he proceeds to evolve a Christ out of his own inner consciousness, like the German philosopher who thus evolved the camel.

ADVENTURES OF A PARABLE.

IT has long been suspected that the New Testament parables migrated from further east, and some close ones have been found in the Buddhist books, for Gautama Buddha spoke in parables to enlighten the wise, and not for the ignoble reason ascribed to Jesus. "That seeing they may see and not perceive, and hearing they may hear and not understand, lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them" (Mark iv. 12). In Mr. A. Lillie's little book on The Influence of Buddhism on Primitive Christianity he gives (pp. 70–76) Buddha's parables of the Prodigal Son, the Woman at the Well, and the Blazing Mansion.

Mr. Moncure D. Conway, in the Open Court, of Chicago (July 25), writes on the Parable of the Talents, which, he says, is believed by Professor Jacobi to have originated in India. In volume xlv. of The Sacred Books of the East, devoted to Jain Scriptures, the Professor translates the Uttarâdhyana, which contains a parable of the Three Merchants. Of this Mr. Virchand Gandhi, the representative of Jainism at the Chicago Parliament of Religions, made for Mr. Conway a more careful translation, as follows:—

> "Three merchants set out on their travels, each with his capital. One of them gained much; the second returned with his [original] capital; the third returned, having lost his capital.
>
> "The capital is human life, the gain its perfection. Losing that capital, man must be born the denizen of a degraded world, a brute animal. There are two paths the evil man must tread—physical degradation, moral misery. For the slave of lust forfeits both outer and inner life: having forfeited these, he must suffer those two conditions of unhappiness; and it will be difficult for him to attain an upward course for a long time. He who returns with his capital unincreased is born again, an unimproved man. Those who, through exercise of various virtues, become religious householders are the twice-born men; for all beings reap the fruit of their actions. But he who increased his capital is to be compared to one who practises eminent virtues. The excellent man attains with joy the state of the most perfect beings in the universe."

Such is the Jain parable, and, as Jainism is older than Buddhism, which is older than Christianity by five hundred years, it was pretty certainly uttered before our era. The next trace of it is in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the earliest Christian Gospel of which we have any record. The exact words are lost, but the substance is preserved by Eusebius (Theophania):—

> "The Gospel which comes to us in Hebrew characters has directed the threat, not against the hider [of his talent], but against the abandoned liver. For it has included three servants, one which devoured the substance with harlots and flute-women, and one which multiplied, and one which hid the talent: then that one was accepted, one only blamed, and one shut up in prison."

"There is here evidence that in one, and," says Mr. Conway, "I have no doubt, the earliest, use of the parable by Jesus it contained a feature of the Prodigal Son." In this earliest Christian, or Essene, version the Prodigal was not welcomed home again, but imprisoned. This (says Mr. Conway, whose article we follow and condense) continues the moral lesson of the Jain parable. But when we next meet the story it is strangely altered. This is in Matthew xxv., where neither of the three servants has lost the money entrusted to him; punishment is awarded to the servant who was given least, and who merely kept that without increasing it. The ethical significance of the Hindu and Hebrew versions, which applied the parable to personal conduct, is in Matthew detached by the curious order that the one talent shall be taken from him who did not multiply it, and given to him who, with five times as much capital, had doubled it. But the servant with two talents had also doubled them, and why was the larger capitalist favored? It is no explanation to say: "For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath." Why? This version of the parable diverts it from equitable human affairs, and the only thing it seems to fit is the issue between the Jewish and the Gentile converts. Matthew was written in the interest of the Jewish Christians, who claimed supremacy in the coming Messianic dominion. They were the servant given five talents, the Gentile converts, not being under the Abrahamic covenant, receiving only two; while the unconverted Gentiles, who were given one talent, in being offered the Gospel, but did not improve their opportunity, must be cast into outer darkness. This unimproved talent is transferred to the Jewish Christians, because they added acceptance of the Messiah to the advantage of being the chosen people. That the Matthew version was aiming at something of this controversial kind is confirmed by the fact that the parable is here connected with descriptions of the coming of Christ to judge and rule the world. These notions and issues belong to a time long after the death of Jesus, and he could not have spoken any such parable as that recorded in Matthew.

In Luke, written in the interest of Gentile Christians, the parable presents another remarkable change. Here we find human equality; each servant is entrusted with the same sum—one mina. One increases it by ten, and rules ten cities; another by five, and rules five cities; while the third, who hid his mina, simply loses it. Here also the unincreased money is given to the servant who had earned ten, but in this case there is no unfairness: this one had received no more than the others, and had shown twice as much industry as the servant who, with the same capital, had earned only five minas. In Luke the Gentile Christian reminds the Jewish that if he receives more it must not be by favoritism, as the version in Matthew implies, but by larger service: the tribal Jahveh has given way, under the influence of the Roman Empire, to a wider conception.

Digitized by Google

It is noticeable that in the three Christian versions given above the number of traders in the Hindu parable persists—three. In Luke the parable sets out with ten servants, perhaps a relic of some version of the Ten Virgins which immediately precedes it in Matthew; but only three are called to account. The accounts of the parable are manifestly discrepant, but Mr. Conway seems to think that the real Jesus did in some form use this ancient Oriental parable of the Three Merchants, and that the real version lies between—that is, the Gospel according to the Hebrews and that according to Luke. We prefer to believe that it was the utterance of no particular man, but has gone through many hands, being redacted in the interest of various doctrines. If the real Jesus be discoverable at all, it is far more probable he was the narrow Jew, who said he was but sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, rather than like the travelled Paul, who had imbibed some of the principles of Roman civilisation.

SOME LITTLE-KNOWN FREETHINKERS.—XI.

John Stewart.

John Stewart, commonly known as "Walking Stewart," and in his own day characterised as "Philosopher Stewart," has been several times written about, yet remains very little known. De Quincey consecrated an article to his memory, but dwelt rather upon his eccentricities and exploits than his opinions. It is, of course, chiefly as a Freethinker that he is here considered. Of Scotch origin, though born in London in 1749, John Stewart possessed characteristic Scotch hardihood, restless energy, and independence. Educated at Harrow and the Charterhouse, at the age of sixteen he entered the service of the East India Company, and went out to Madras. Disappointed of advancement, in two years, he quitted this employment, writing to the directors that "he was born for nobler pursuits than to be a copier of invoices and bills of lading to a company of grocers, haberdashers, and cheesemongers." Smitten with what Leslie Stephen ventures to call "the characteristic passion of the wise and good—the passion for walking," which perhaps is mainly atavism from a nomadic state, he went on foot all over Hindostan "to become acquainted with the customs, laws, languages, and temperament of the inhabitants." He entered the service of Hyder Aly, first as interpreter, and afterwards as military officer, rising to the rank of general. He was wounded in battle, and applied for leave of absence to consult a surgeon at one of the European settlements. The request was acceded to by Hyder, after some hesitation; but his escort had orders to kill him, which design Stewart penetrating, he made his escape, seizing a favorable moment to plunge into a river and swim across. His swiftness of foot enabled him to outstrip his pursuers. He subsequently entered the service of the Nawaub of Arcot, became his private secretary, and eventually Prime Minister. He was not paid at the time, but many years after, when the East India Company liquidated the Nawaub's debts, he received £10,000 for his services. He walked from India through Persia, Armenia, and Turkey, to Europe. Crossing the Persian Gulf, a storm arose, and the crew were for casting him overboard like Jonah, but he persuaded them to compromise by immuring him in a hencoop, and suspending him at the yard-arm till the storm abated. He had many adventures, and gave his testimony that, in all countries, it was safer to travel unarmed. To the credit of human nature, he relates that whenever he made people understand that he trusted them they showed no disposition to do him injury. He travelled on foot through Germany, Italy, France, and Spain, settling for a while in Paris. Having walked through England, Scotland, and Ireland, he crossed the Atlantic in 1791, and perambulated the United States and Canada.

When he came into his fortune, he settled down in Cockspur-street, Pall Mall, that he might be "in the full tide of existence," and gave private Sunday evening concerts. Among his personal friends and acquaintances were the Freethinkers, Thomas Paine, Clio Rickman, William Godwin, and Robert Owen.

Hogg, in his Life of Percy Bysshe Shelley (ii., 328), mentions the famous "Walking Stewart" as "a tall, hard-featured, middle-aged man, impatiently forcing his way through the crowd that commonly impedes the passage across Westminster Bridge," and says "his chief delight was to walk at the rate of five miles an hour, straight on end, as long as it was light. In the evening he sought literary and scientific conversation, and the commerce of wits." Hogg gives what is probably a highly-colored anecdote concerning his parties. He says: "He complained to William Godwin: 'You, and the other great wits of the day, seldom come to my evening parties, and I know why you do not come. It is because you are afraid that the good things which you say will be lost; but, I assure you, you are mistaken. Not a single word will be thrown away; nothing will be lost. I have taken effectual precautions to prevent it. I have engaged twelve eminent shorthand writers; they are placed behind screens in different parts of the room very judiciously posted. They take down whatever they hear, and report it to myself; nothing can escape them. So fear not; not a word will be lost; talk your best!'"

A more veracious account is given in The Reminiscences of Alaric Watts, who describes him as an ascetic epicure. He was a vegetarian, eschewing, like the Brahmins, meat and intoxicants, yet concerning himself with the delectation of his guests. Watts says: "One of his most cherished friends was Robert Owen, of New Lanark, who was always welcomed with great cordiality, and was a general favorite with the younger guests. His manners exhibited the beau ideal of bonhomie, genial to all, and to the young most kind and paternal." Stewart in 1803 gave "Lectures on the Human Mind and the Study of Man," and he wrote numerous books expounding his philosophic views. They had strange-sounding titles, such as The Sophisometer, The Poesis of Social Life, The Revelation of Nature, The Revolution of Reason, The Book of Intellectual Life, and Opus Maximum. The books were as strange. A solitary thinker wandering among many nations, Stewart had acquired a thought and language of his own. As De Quincey remarks: "Potentially, he was a great man." But he lacked power of popular exposition and expression.

De Quincey, who was much struck with the eloquence of his conversation, lays his finger on a damning fault of his writings, in saying "he was everlastingly metaphysicising against metaphysics." A few quotations may illustrate both his views and his style. "With what weakness is it asserted that matter is inert, while each atom proves to the contrary! Where do we discover matter destitute of power? Is it in the minute particles of the virulent poisons? or is it in the atoms of inflammable air buried in the earth, which precipitates whole cities into ruins? And where is the particle that does not possess electrical power, chemical affinity, and gravity? And this partial power, multiplied and combined with organic power, is the great energy of nature—the great whole of power in its component parts." Speaking of man, he says: "Man is formed of particles of matter, organised so as to resemble a corded instrument of music of five strings, which correspond with the five senses. The intellectual faculties hold the bow and play, and the passions form the stops upon the handle of the instrument; and if just tones are produced, simultaneously or successively, their harmony or melody forms what is called an agreeable tune or air, or well-being and happiness, of which man himself possesses consciousness; and in this power he is superior to, and differs from, the inanimate instrument." He advocated what he called "the philosophy of Materialism" and the "perfectibility of human nature." De Quincey says: "Like the late Mr. Shelley, he had a fine vague enthusiasm, and lofty aspirations in connection with human nature generally and its hopes; and, like him, he strove to give steadiness, a uniform direction, and an intelligible purpose to these feelings, by fitting to them a scheme of philosophical opinions."

Alaric Watts (ii., 282) gives the following account of his opinions: "His theory seemed to involve the rejection not only of revealed, but also of natural, religion, truly so-called. Kind-hearted and benevolent to the highest degree, it was his whim to ascribe his sympathies for his race to feelings of mere selfishness. He supposed that there was a continual transmutation of constituent atoms between all bodies brought within the sphere of reciprocal influence, and that the process was regular and invariable. He denied that there was any manifestation of intelligence in the structure of the globe, or of the bodies on its surface, and disclaimed wholly any belief in the existence of a superintending deity." De Quincey said in Tait's Magazine, though he did not reprint the observation in book form: "In fact, he was as deliberate and resolute an Atheist as can ever have existed; but for all that, and although wishing, for his own sake, that he had been a more religious man, or at least had felt a greater reverence for such subjects, and a closer sympathy with that which for so vast a majority of the human race must ever constitute their sole consolation under sorrow and calamity, still I could not close my eyes to the many evidences which his writings and his conversation afforded of a true grandeur of mind, and of a calm Spinozistic state of contemplative reverie."

Amid his eccentricities, both of thought and diction, are many good things. He said with Spinoza: "To think is to identify ourselves with nature." He was himself a thinker, at times original and deep, but without method. He insisted that the mind should be regarded, "not as a sack of science, but as an instrument of sense." Travel and observation he preferred to books and knowledge. He says: "The most important action of my life was to meducate myself and wipe away the evil propensities and erudite nonsense of school instruction. I soon discovered that the maxims of virtue would avail little against the tutored dispositions of violence, fraud, cruelty, falsehood, and superstitious insanity." He thought that most minds carried over-much sail with too slim a rudder. So he says: "The human mind should be taught to think before it is taught to know, and the rudder of reason should be fixed before the mind is launched into the ocean of life." Virtue and vice, he said, are synonymous with wisdom and folly. Christianity he calls a more ridiculous system of superstition than the Pagan Pantheon. "This Christian superstition," he continues, "brought on the long period of the dark ages, which now exists in defiance of all the progress of science, and the intercourse of civilised government in commerce, literature, and travels." He says: "All appeal to supernatural or universal power is downright insanity. Man can profit only in an appeal to the intelligible and communicative powers of reason in his own species." "Intellectual discernment," he says, "would avoid the excess of wealth, which always produces corresponding poverty, and often the most frightful evils. It would seek to deduce good from evil, so to modify war that it may become the means of peace, coercion that it may become the means of liberty, and civil government that its power may become the means of national prosperity in reconciling public interest with private good."

Digitized by Google

Sometimes he shows a touch of wit, as when he says the Irish Catholics have "only Father Murphy's supper in the clouds to allure them." His travels gave him a good opinion of his own countrymen. He disputes their being phlegmatic, and says "an Englishman would buy a house before a foreigner would finish the bargain of an egg." He divided society into seven classes—viz., savage, pastoral, agrestic, scientific, confederate, and perfectible life. He advocated missions to the lower classes from the superior ones, "not to teach them, as has been the practice, the silly doctrines of mythology and metaphysics, to make fools of them, but practical secular education in useful arts and sciences." He notes how the offer of a reward for a chimney-sweeping invention did away with the cruelty of children sweeping chimneys, which religion was unable to effect. "Religion," he remarks, "demands implicit assent to all propositions upon pain of punishment, which disposes the mind to indolence of examination, ignorance, and a breach of probity." "Reflection, rising superior to the narrow confines of religious creeds and mythological dogmas, and comprehending the vast circle of nature's laws relative to man, discovers the end of his being to be the improvement of the mundane system in time and futurity."

De Quincey, who knew him well, says: "He was a man of very extraordinary genius. He has generally been treated by those who have spoken of him in print as a madman. But this is a mistake, and must have been founded chiefly on the titles of his books. He was a man of fervid mind, and of sublime aspirations; but he was no madman, or, if he was, then I say that it is so far desirable to be a madman." De Quincey describes his countenance as striking, and as expressing "the union of benignity with philosophic habits of thought." In describing his own characteristics, Stewart, in his Opus Maximum, says: "I have learnt to pity, and not to resent, the passions of others; and when to an angry or illiberal observation I reply with complacent language, it is but marking my own superiority of moral temperament, and showing that I am not to be infected with moral as with physical contagion. A philosopher may catch the small-pox from a conversant, but if he catches his passions, he must be a fool." Stewart died February 20, 1822, and left by his will a thousand pounds to Edinburgh University, which he esteemed the most liberal institution of the kind. His works remain a curious, ill-shapen, rugged mass of unrefined ore, whence, with much smelting, precious metal can still be obtained.

J. M. WHEELER.

Ideas of God.

As Hume says, truly enough, it is a mere fallacy, because two people use the same name for things, the ideas of which are mutually exclusive, to rank such opposite opinions under the same denomination. If the Jew says that the Deity is absolute unity, and that it is sheer blasphemy to say that he ever became incarnate in the person of a man; and if the Trinitarian says that the Deity is numerically three, as well as numerically one, and that it is sheer blasphemy to say that he did not so become incarnate, it is obvious enough that each must be logically held to deny the existence of the other's Deity.—Professor Huxley, "Hume," p. 160.

FRENCH VIEWS OF ENGLISH RELIGION.

MAX O'RELL and his opinions on John Bull and his Island are pretty well known; but as it is always well to see ourselves as others see us, we comply with the suggestion of a friend across the Atlantic to reprint some passages exhibiting his views of John Bull's religion.

"Those agents of the Bible Society, with their tracts, are terrible bores. You meet with them in omnibuses, in trains, in the streets, everywhere. With a hypocritical smile they beg you to accept a tract. Your best plan, if you would quickly have done with them, is to accept the piece of paper, put it in your pocket, and say, 'Thank you.' I met with one once who made quite a dead set at me.

"'Sir,' he began, 'God commands every man to repent.'

"'I thank you for reminding me, but I had not forgotten it,' I said.

"'Ah! sir, you are a foreigner; seek salvation, save your soul, whilst you are in this country.'

"'Have you the keys of Paradise, then?' I asked him; 'and is that your calling to bother people in this manner? Leave me alone.'

"'Sir, believe me, all men are sinners. David himself was one.'

"'I agree with you,' I exclaimed.

"'Yes; but he repented.'

"'There was room for repentance.'

"'The repentance should make us forget the crime.'

"'Exactly. But why, then, do you hang your criminals?' I added, for I was beginning to be amused at the turn the conversation had taken.

"'Because, by executing them, whilst they are in a state of repentance, we send them to Paradise. If we set them at liberty, they would return to a state of sin.'

"'Now, tell me,' said I to him, 'for you seem to be an intelligent man, would you receive in your house, at your table, with your good wife and children, a man who had caused the death of another in order to make love more easily to his wife, but who had afterwards repented? Would you not welcome more warmly one who had never had occasion to repent of such crimes as those of David?'

"'Ah!' he replied, 'your levity is out of place. Laugh at me, if you like; we shall see in the end who will be on the laughing side. We shall meet again on the Last Day.' After giving me this appointment he left me, with a look more jeering than Christian, I am sorry to say."

A little further on he observes:—

"Among the other Sunday heroes, the street preachers must not be forgotten. They are generally conceited workmen, who, having received from Heaven a mission to go and convert their fellow-creatures, relate their experience of life to the public; how they were once nothing but miserable sinners, how they have seen the error of their ways and become converted, and how easy it is for others to do likewise. They take up their stand in some open place, in parties of five or six, accompanied by one or two old maids. Here, more than anywhere, old maids offer to God that which they have had no chance of giving to men—a pure and loving heart. A circle is formed, and a monotonous hymn sung; this is to attract the passers-by. One of the party steps forward, takes off his hat, collects his thoughts in it, and commences his discourse. The theme never varies. 'My dear friends, death is at hand: are you prepared to meet it?' A crowd soon gathers round, silent and respectful. It is not a religious silence, but a simple mark of that boundless respect which is entertained in England for the liberty of meeting. The men smoke their pipes and listen; it is the only distraction to be had on Sundays, so they avail themselves of it. They do not pray, but, on the other hand, neither do they mock. The sermons are dull twaddle, and generally full of personal experiences. 'My dear friends,' said one of these street evangelists, 'I am happy to be able to say that I am saved; that I am now on my way to heaven. A month ago I could not have said this; I was the slave of the Devil.' Indeed, it was easy to see he was telling the truth, for le diable ne en met avait maryne ses exploits."

HUXLEY AND POSITIVISM.—In the interest of scientific clearness I object to say that I have a soul, when I mean all the while that my organism has certain mental functions which, like the rest, are dependent upon its molecular composition, and come to an end when I die; and I object still more to affirm that I look to a future life when all that I mean is that the influence of my sayings and doings will be more or less felt by a number of people after the physical components of that organism are scattered to the four winds. —T. H. Huxley.

Digitized by Google

THE LATTER-DAY SAINT.

I'm a Protestant high-croaker, wearing broadcloth and white choker,
And each Sabbath-day I pound the pulpit well;
You ought to hear me howling, bull-bellowing, and yowling,
While I'm sending all the sinners' souls to hell.

The Creation and the Flood, holy Jesus and lamb's blood,
Is the lingo that I din into their ears;
And if that won't keep them civil, then I soon trot out the Devil:
It's the way all parsons play upon their fears.

Blessed Jesus, hear me pray; oh, take my sins away,
And souse me with the Holy Ghost and fire;
Snatch me up to Kingdom-come, by the power of Jumbo-jum;
Let me join the blessed tantra-raring choir.

I'm a sanctimonious duffer, a hocus-pocus bluffer,
A ranting, roaring cock-a-doodle doo;
In a fisticuffing bout I can knock the Devil out—
I'm an ordained, very Rev'rend Bugaboo.

I live on cake and pie that the willing fools supply—
They don't know that I'm a consecrated fake;
So, sinners, bow the knee, and hand your cash to me,
Or I'll chuck you all into the burning lake.

—Ironclad Age. ANNA K.

ACID DROPS.

ACCORDING to the Bible, the mother of all mankind, Mrs. Eve, was presented to her husband in a state of complete nudity, and as Mr. Adam was in the same condition there was nothing to shock his modesty. When they took to eating apples—whatever that may mean; and all sorts of dirty conjectures have been hazarded—they became ashamed of their nakedness and commenced tailoring. Ever since the men have been very much concerned about the women's clothing. They are even now kicking up a fuss about their riding bicycles in a rational dress. They have been doing it, of all places, in Paris, and a rumor got abroad that the Prefect of Police intended to issue an order prohibiting women from wearing masculine attire within the fortifications. But the professors of the great teaching institutions have begged that the order may not be made operative in the Latin Quarter. They declare that since the ladies dropped their coquettish costumes, and took to wearing knickerbockers, they have lost all charm for the students, who are now attending to their classes with unwonted assiduity. This should be an eye-opener to the Philistine busybodies.

Lady cyclists are numerous in Paris, and many of them adopt the rational dress, which gives great offence in clerical circles. A Church dignitary tells an editor of Gil Blas that he is determined to refuse every sacrament to women coming to ask it in a lady cyclist's dress. "This," says the Paris correspondent of the Daily News, "is serious news for cycle manufacturers, but they must not despair. Priests are now forbidden to go on cycles through their parishes, not that the bishops think it wrong to do so, but it may shock strait-laced Catholics, and set Freethinkers laughing."

The priests may preach as much as they like, but they will never affect female fashions. They will no more put down knickerbockers than they put down low bodices. Molière satirised the priesthood in making Tartuffe pay such attention to bare bosoms. The clergy were constantly exclaiming, "Hide, oh hide, those hills of snow." Probably the poor wretches knew their own weakness.

Mr. Lewis Morris contributed a poem on "Armenia" to Monday's Daily News. It contains two good lines—both borrowed; one from Milton and Wordsworth, the other from Isaiah. The rest is the poet's own, and it strikes us as rather wooden. Mr. Morris is nothing if not pious, yet he puts the following questions without answering them:—

> What? Has God's thought forgot
> His people's woes? Doth His averted ear
> No more their cries of hopeless anguish hear
> The wail for precious lives, which now are not?
> Shall not the all-seeing Eye
> Look downward from the dumb, unheeding sky,
> And with a glance confound the might of Ill?

Mr. Morris's "God" is apparently too lazy to exert himself. A single "glance," it seems, would suffice to settle the Turk, but "the one above" doesn't even wink.

Really the Star should be more careful. It reprinted the concluding lines of Mr. Lewis Morris's poem, and gave the author's name as "Mr. William Morris." Fancy the Atheist and Socialist poet—who is a poet—writing stuff like this:—

> Arise, oh puissant Christendom, be strong!
> God's voice within you calls, the voice of Fate!

Calling upon a "puissant" thing to "be strong" is a sad tautology; and how can a voice be at the same time God's and Fate's? One or the other, Mr. Lewis Morris, if you please. It can't be both.

Christianity is a glorious religion, and oh how it loves liberty! Over at Boston, the hub of the universe, a Mr. W. T. Curtis, who advocates "The New Brotherhood" on "infidel" lines, applied to the mayor for a permit to speak on Boston Common, where religious orators hold forth to crowds of people. The permit being denied him—or rather no notice being taken of his application—Mr. Curtis went without one, and was arrested, fined, and sent to gaol. And now for the opposite side of the picture. "Eight honest and reputable citizens of Ithea County, Tennessee," says the Boston Globe, "are now working side by side with convicts in a chain-gang on the public highway." They believe the seventh day of the week to be the Lord's Day, and accordingly they go quietly about their business on the first day. That is their crime. Which shows that ordinary Christianity is perfectly impartial in its intolerance. It smites as hard as it can all who differ from it. Believe or be damned! And the damnation is always kept handy.

A curious case was lately brought before the Bristol magistrates, sitting at Lawford's Gate Police-court. An old man, an inmate of the workhouse, was charged with being "disorderly." When they inquired what the disorderly conduct consisted of, the Master replied that he had refused to attend church on Sundays, and preferred stopping quietly in his ward. Some years ago this old man would, doubtless, have received a dose of hard labor for this heinous crime, but in this broad and tolerant age he fared better, for the magistrates declined to punish him. In a leaderette on the subject the Bristol Daily Press says: "As the old man seems to be well behaved, and to be in earnest in dissenting from the teaching of the Church, public opinion will uphold the latitudinarianism of the bench."

Profanity is spreading. At the annual dinner of the Omar Khayyam Club, to which we have previously referred, Mr. Harry Cust provoked much mirth by his quips, amongst which was a parody of a much-quoted verse in one of Mr. Davidson's "Ballads":—

> She cares not for her broken vow,
> Though God himself come down to slate her;
> She's mother-in-law to the North Pole now,
> And maiden aunt to the Equator.

Some of the Nonconformist papers are complaining that the P.S.A. movement, while designed to aid the churches, is really crippling them. Each is trying to outdo the other in attractive services, and the soloists have cast the men of God and their blessed Gospel into the background.

We never heard of the East London Protestant Youths' Mission before, but its Report has reached us for the year 1894-5. Its operations appear to be carried on at Salisbury Hall, Old Ford-road. It was assisted in its infancy by a Bethnal Green clergyman, whom we suspect to have been the late Brewin Grant. He is described as "the ablest advocate and defender of our common Christianity against infidel attacks and perversions." It is added that he "completely vanquished Atheism in his lifetime and closed up infidel halls," but it is not stated where he achieved these remarkable successes. We should like to know the name and position of one (only one) infidel hall that was closed by Brewin Grant. We heard him speak several times, and he was the worst clown we ever listened to. Thrusting out his tongue, and putting his finger to his nose, were his wittiest ebullitions.

A writer in the Lindsey and Lincolnshire Star rejoices over the recent closing of the London Hall of Science. He pretends to know a great deal, but he speaks from an abundant ignorance. For instance, he says that the Hall was used after the lectures on Sunday evenings as a boxing saloon! He also states that "before he died Mr. Bradlaugh dropped Biblical criticism for politics," whereas the very last lecture he delivered was anti-theological, as was the course of lectures he had arranged to deliver at the Hall of Science in February, the month following his death.

Messrs. Foote and Watts are allowed to be "good speakers,' with "an impressive manner," but "their occupation is gone." The writer is really "too previous." He fancies that Secularism begins and ends with the Hall of Science. As a matter of fact, there were more people, and at much higher prices, listening to Mr. Foote at St. James's Hall last Sunday evening than there would have been at this time of the year in the Hall of Science. Mr. Watts was also lecturing in London the very same evening, at Milton Hall; and another Secular congregation was assembled at Camberwell.

Digitized by Google

Grant Wilson, who was hanged for murder at Vicksburg, was afterwards restored to animation. It appears that he owed his escape from death to a throat disease which had produced a bony growth in the windpipe. His case is attracting much attention in scientific circles. He states that he had no sensation whatever after the drop, and that he remained in a perfectly unconscious state until he was wakened in the coffin. Asked whether he had any visions or dreams, he replied that he had none whatever. It would be difficult to imagine a more conclusive demonstration that the "soul" is no more than the functioning of the brain. Had the man been left in his coffin and buried, he would in all probability have never regained consciousness. For all practical purposes his "soul" was settled by the hangman's noose. It came back again when science restored his organic activities.

In Burmah some seventy thousand cattle have been lost through a plague. God said: "The cattle on a thousand hills are mine"; but he takes precious little care of some of them.

The following curious advertisement appeared in the Daily News of August 17: "'The Gods of Homer,' their worship to be restored. There is a deep longing and yearning for a religion which is really beautiful and true. Co-operation requested. Write Julian, 31 Lavender-street, Brighton." Perhaps "Julian" is identical with the person whom we called attention to some time ago as proposing to restore "the religion of Hellas." He might as well try to bring back the mastadon. What people want is, not to restore the old gods, but to get rid of all traces of them on the life of to-day.

Ecclesiastical Market: Closing prices. From Saturday's Times (advertising columns): "Advowsons.—Purchase before the rise in prices that will assuredly result from the destruction of the Disestablishment party." It is a pity, as an evening contemporary observes, that the prices of the cure of souls cannot be quoted on 'Change like the brewery shares.

John Walker, a painter, aged forty-two, described by Mr. Denman, a London magistrate, as "a canting, hypocritical, professional beggar," on being arrested for soliciting alms in a public thoroughfare, exclaimed: "I shall trust in the Almighty; he will see me through." John Walker is doing a month's hard labor, and we presume the Almighty is seeing him through it.

A little fellow, giving evidence before the Coroner as to the drowning of a boy in the Regent's Canal, said he didn't know where he would go to if he told lies; whereupon the Coroner asked him, "Do you know where hell is?" The little fellow said "No," and the Coroner was surprised at such ignorance. For our part, we should like the Coroner to impart his own knowledge—for such it must be—to the world. The situation of hell has been much discussed, but has never been decided. We are all agog, therefore, to get the straight tip from that Coroner.

The Methodist Times (Mr. Price Hughes's paper) hopes the Lord's Day Observance Committee of the Wesleyans will go on the war path against Sunday Societies and other associations that desecrate the Sabbath. Our pious contemporary takes the position that religious bodies are the only ones that have any right to charge for admission to their meetings, and that it is blatant impudence for non-religious bodies to demand the same privilege. Churches and chapels are holy. Let secular halls be taught their inferiority—if needful by pains and penalties. Such is the fair play of Methodists who talk so "blatantly"—to use their own word—about the grand principle of religious liberty.

Robert Heseltine Hudson, who brutally murdered his wife on the Yorkshire Moors, left a letter to his family in which he said: "I can only hope to meet you all in heaven, where I trust we shall all meet soon or late, to the glory of God, and through His Son Jesus Christ." He wound up this letter with the following verse from a hymn:—

> The pains of death are past,
> Labor and sorrow cease,
> And life's long warfare closed at last,
> My soul has found its peace.

Hudson will find congenial company in the "mansions of the blest," where there is more joy over one repenting sinner than over a hundred just persons who need no repentance.

The Progressive Thinker says: "Statistics show a terrible increase of insanity all over the country. A joint meeting of the trustees of insane asylums, just held in Kalamazoo, Michigan, revealed the fact that in Michigan alone there were 4,352 in insane asylums, and that the cost of maintaining them had increased during the last few years from $100,000 per annum to $380,000. When we remember the most fruitful cause of insanity is religious excitement, and the fear of an endless hell, either for themselves or loved ones, we feel more zealous than ever in combating a system responsible for such cruel results."

The Rev. John Whitehead, of Allghany, has been preaching against the New Woman, and in favor of the sumptuary law of Chicago. He took for his text Deuteronomy xxii. 5: "The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garments; for all that do so are an abomination unto the Lord thy God." If this man of God knew the history of the ideas which underlie his own fetish book, he would know that this text was directed against a religious rite in which the sexes changed garments at a festival. He should know, too, that it is priests who to this day dress in petticoats, and with feminine emblems. The New Woman may not know this, but she has generally got beyond caring for laws enacted for a Semitic tribe emerging from barbarism, when both sexes wore very similar robes, if they wore anything.

The Rev. S. Baring Gould, at a recent meeting of the Folk Lore Society, reported as to certain superstitions still prevailing in Devonshire. He knew a certain Dartmoor farmer who, having sickness among his cattle, sacrificed a sheep, and burnt it on the moor above his farm as an offering to the pixies. Of course this is very sad; but is it any sadder than offering up a human sacrifice (say Jesus Christ) to save people from sins?

As luck would have it, that farmer's cattle at once recovered, and did well afterwards, whereas the world did not recover after the sacrifice of J. C., nor has it recovered yet. After all, the pixies seem more business-like than Jehovah.

Catholic Dublin is following the example of Protestant Glasgow. The authorities of the Irish capital have removed some pictures from shop windows as indecent. The said pictures were engravings of Sir Frederic Leighton's "Psyche." It will be news to artists that the President of the Royal Academy is a painter of indecent pictures. For our part, we think his "Psyche" quite as decent as a naked Jesus on a cross, and ever so much more beautiful.

The New York Tribune says: "A wealthy Birmingham man, who made most of his fortune manufacturing idols for the people in India to use in worship, is going to give a handsome sum of money, after his death, to help the missionaries in India make war against idol worship."

It is always interesting to come across a fossil representing the survival of a common form now almost extinct. Such a fossil is the Rev. Dr. Henson, of Elgin, who is reported in Public Opinion (N.Y.) as saying: "By the fall of Adam man became sensual and devilish. Human nature became depraved by being deprived. We are children of Adam, and not children of God, by nature. We are nothing like the creature God created in his own image. The doctrine of the fatherhood of God is a devilish lie, and its outcome is Universalism pure and simple." This is good sound doctrine, and more logical than that of the modernisers who offer us all treacle and no brimstone.

The Rev. Dr. W. H. Brooks, the scholarly pastor of one of the largest negro churches in Washington, declared from the platform of the rally of Christian Endeavorers that negroes had been officially notified that they are not welcome at the meetings of the Baptist Young People's Union.

Professor W. de Witt Hyde says: "The old view of the person of Christ sees his divinity chiefly in consequence of the miraculous foretelling of his coming, his miraculous resurrection. The new view sees his divinity chiefly in the profoundness of his insight into spiritual truth." We should hardly think this profound insight was shown in ascribing diseases to the agency of evil spirits.

"Turn the other cheek" is not the philosophy of the Rev. Freeman Dudley, rector of Kilcel, County Down. Finding a burglar in the house, the man of God seized a chair and knocked the intruder down, and detained him until the police arrived. The man was Herbert Stone, of Derbyshire. He had come all that way to be floored by a parson. Evidently a born fool.

This story is related of Tolstoi. Seeing a police officer take an individual into custody the other day, he at once walked up and said: "Can you read?" "Certainly, sir," the officer replied. "Have you read the Scriptures?" "Yes, sir." "Then you forget that they command us to resist not evil, and to love our neighbors as ourselves." The myrmidon of the law, taken aback for a moment, stared at the Count; but, recovering himself quickly, asked: "And, pray, can you read?" "Yes." "Have you read the police regulations?" "No." "Then read them."

Digitized by Google

Canon Harper is dead. We do not know his present residence. Preaching in York Minster, on June 10, 1877, this man of God remarked that "the Bible and Beer, taken rightly, were the Lord's. The Beer would not do without the Bible, and the Bible would not do fully and perfectly without the Beer." Perhaps in his present abode the reverend gentleman would find a glass of beer a great relief.

The Tory Government is not true to its best friends, the Church party. The Queen's Speech ended without the usual invocation of the Almighty. Perhaps the Premier thought it impossible for Omnipotence itself to bless his party with wisdom.

Among recent items in an American paper was the following: "Talmage has lost his wife, and has bought an English bull-terrier for £100." He is a fortunate man to have so much money to pay for a dog.

Canon Ryle says it is a great mistake not to acknowledge that the Bible is primarily a human book. Put "totally" for "primarily," and we agree with him. But does he think that, if people generally looked on it as "primarily" a human book, they would subscribe to send thousands of copies yearly to the heathen? No. It is because they are taught that it is the infallible Word of God, the one only divine revelation to man, that they support the fetish book and the fetish preachers. Once let them see it is indeed the words of men, and barbarous men at that, and the occupation of Bible societies and of canons, and other Church dignitaries, will be in danger.

August 24 is remembered in France as the anniversary of the day in 1572 when the evidences of Christianity were most strikingly displayed. It fell on a Sunday, and on that day sixty thousand evidencers, all with white crosses on their garments, and with the palpable evidences in their hands, submitted them to all heretics, men, women, and children, in Paris. "Mass or Massacre" were the terms offered to heretic nobles, but the common people only got the latter. For three days slaughter went on in Paris, and for above a week it was followed in the provinces by the imprisonment, massacre, and pillage of the Huguenots. The power of religion has been undeniably displayed on some occasions.

Referring to the scramble for New Testaments at the table of the House of Commons, the Morning Leader writes: "We are glad that nowadays this oath-taking ceremony is allowed to proceed without any of the pseudo-religious agitation which some years ago raged round the name of Mr. Bradlaugh. A man may now affirm if he likes, none daring to make him afraid. This, we fear, does not necessarily imply that the members of to-day are better than those of ten or twelve years ago. The reason is that there is now no opportunity of making political capital out of so-called religion. Mock piety no longer means votes in the House, no longer embarrasses a Government, and therefore it is no longer paraded."

The Morning Leader might have added that it was Charles Bradlaugh who carried the Bill enabling members to affirm instead of swearing, though very few avail themselves of the privilege.

The controversy on Missions continues in the Morning. The Rev. J. D. Mullins tries to minimise the damaging statements in Dr. Morrison's book. One of the naivest letters is from "An Earnest Christian," who writes: "I showed the letter of W. C. Wickham, which appeared in your issue of August 12, to a sceptical friend of mine. He staggered me by declaring that the passage was an impudent interpolation, and that none of the oldest manuscripts, including the Codex Alexandrinus in our British Museum, contained it. He went further, and said that all the concluding verses of the last chapter of Mark—nine, I think—were interpolations. I am familiar with the ingenious arguments of our sceptical friends who say 'that, as no good God could possibly damn any nation for not believing in a religion they had never heard of, it would be better that they should be allowed to remain in ignorance of its existence,' and, as I am a regular subscriber to missionary funds, I should like the truth about the passage in Mark to which I have referred. I do not believe the Christian Church would deceive its followers."

To this the editor of the Morning appends the note: "Biblical critics think it not unlikely that 'editorial insertions and alterations' have been made throughout the whole of the narrative of Mark. The portion, Mark xvi. 9–20, in which occurs the verse quoted by 'An Earnest Christian,' is confessedly of late origin." So that it appears the Church has deceived its followers.

Henry Bullard, a Salvationist, has been fined forty shillings and costs for riding down a lady at the corner of a street in the City of London. He will probably be in less haste over "General" Booth's business in future.

Dr. Waldo, of Southwark, has gone the length of summoning the captain of the Salvation Army shelter at Blackfriars-road. Dr. Waldo, who had to obtain a large force of police to gain entrance to the building, which was persistently refused, despite a magistrate's warrant, said he found it in a fœtid, ill-ventilated, and dangerous condition. Some 1,028 men were in the place where there was only cubic air space for 401. In one room he found 501 men where the cubical space only admitted 150.

Booth says the S.A. can supply China with missionaries. We pity the missionaries, but still more we pity the Chinese.

People do not usually relish having their bubbles pricked, and we notice that the editor of the Open Court, which was formerly "devoted to the reconciliation of religion and science," and is now "devoted to the Religion of Science," gives much space to the "misconceptions" of "Corvinus," who took the trouble to show him that he mixed oil and water, and put the oil on top. Dr. Carus gives up all that gave life to the old religions, but persists in retaining their catch names. He insists that "the reality of God is an undeniable fact"; but then God is not a person distinct from the universe, but a principle. Dr. Carus is still half deep in metaphysical mud, and does not appreciate the efforts of "Corvinus" to help him out.

The Bishop of Liverpool is a theologian of the good old sort, now nearly extinct. He says the Bible is "the only test of right and wrong." This claim for the fetish book, which sanctions slavery, polygamy, and persecution, is almost out of date. Bishop Ryle presumably cares nothing for the claims of reason or conscience.

The parsons are agitated at the uses of the bicycle for obtaining Sunday freedom. Several ministerial conferences have denounced the ungodly practice of taking exercise on Sunday. It is praiseworthy to use the muscles to walk to church, but to ride from church is altogether abominable. There is nothing like leather.

There is a rare illustration of "Providence" in the following, which is, after all, but a published episode in the great unwritten history of human misery. Dr. Wynn Westcott, the Hackney coroner, recently held an inquest on the body of Marion Starck, aged 47, the wife of an engineer, of Weston-place, Mare-street. Her husband had long been out of work, and for twelve months she had worked hard at boot machining to support herself and him. One day, about noon, she was found sitting in her chair at her machine in front of her work, quite dead. Stitch, stitch, stitch! work, work, work! till at last the tired-out body could stand it no longer, and refused to second the poor woman's heroic will. She is buried, and in time she will be forgotten; and the great world will rush on in completion of its destiny; and priests will live by preaching the benevolence of God, whose tender mercies are over all his works.

Professor Baird states that a pike in the Imperial Aquarium, St. Petersburg, is about 400 years old. Other fishes in the same aquarium are over 200 years old. Only think of it! "Providence" kills off Bradlaugh at fifty-eight, and keeps a pike going for four centuries. Wonderful wisdom! Wonderful beneficence!

Obituary.

MR. HANS JOHNSON, a well-known and respected member of the South Shields Branch of the N.S.S., was buried at Harton on Sunday, August 18. The local Daily Gazette says: "By his own and his widow's request his remains received a Secular interment. In the unavoidable absence of the president of the local society, Mr. R. Chapman, secretary, read impressively the beautiful service of Austin Holyoake. There was a large attendance of relatives, friends, and members of the Secular Society at the graveside."

MR. A. B. MOSS's friends throughout the country will be sorry to hear that he has just suffered a painful bereavement in the death of his wife from pneumonia. The deceased lady was herself a Freethinker, and some years ago a contributor to Freethought journals; but the cares of a young family diverted her energies in other directions. Mr. Moss is left with three motherless children. We tender him our deepest sympathy in his hour of trial.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, August 25, St. James's Hall (Banqueting Hall), Piccadilly, W.: 7.30, "Religion in the Light of Science."

September 8, Glasgow; 15, South Shields.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—August 25, Milton Hall, Hawley-crescent, London, N. October 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

F. L. Wilson.—We read your letter as stating that you would not see any reference in the Freethinker; otherwise we should have said that the letter was rather out of our line.

T. Dunbar writes: "I disagree with your statement that the St. James's Banqueting Hall was nearly full, for I was pleased to notice it was near full. I was present myself with my wife, and a Christian friend whom I had induced to accompany us. My wife and I were delighted with your masterly lecture. My Christian friend was surprised at its high moral tone, his idea being that Atheists were a low class.....I congratulate you on your opening-up of West London."

J. Partridge.—We wish the Birmingham Branch all success in its new venture. Mr. Foote will pay you a visit as early as possible.

Joseph Hill.—Thanks for distributing copies of the Freethinker during the Chatham picnic.

President's Fund.—Amount acknowledged, £68 8s. Per R. Forder: A. George, 1s.; F. Voisey, 2s. 3d.; J. Slater, 2s.; W. Stewart, 1s.; A Silent Worker, 10s.; W. H. Harrap, 10s.; G. G. Ross, £1; W. Barks, 2s. 6d. Per Miss Vance: C. Smith, 3s. 6d.; W. Tipper, 2s. 6d.; J. Yates, 2s. 6d. The donation acknowledged last week to C. Thomas, 5s., should have been £1.

G. Crudgas.—(1) We believe there are Church of England curates receiving less than £100 a year. (2) Perhaps Dr. Wallace's Darwinism is the best single book, but the price is 7s. 6d. Dr. Aveling's Darwin Made Easy, published by Mr. Forder, price 1s., is an admirable summary.—This correspondent writes: "I got through to Newcastle the other Sunday to hear you lecture for the first time in my life, and I must say that, with all the trouble, the walk of eleven miles each way, and the drenching we got, I never enjoyed anything better than your lectures, and I only wish I could hear you a little oftener."

A. W. Staveri.—A paragraph was already in type on the subjects. Thanks all the same.

Papers Received.—Truthseeker—Secular Thought—Freedom—Church Reformer—Torch—Liberty—Der Arme Teufel—Isle of Man Times—Freidenker—Fur Unsere Jugend—Crescent—Two Worlds—Islamic World—Progressive Thinker—Shields Daily Gazette—Brighton Observer—Referee—Morning—Post—Boston Investigator—Twentieth Century—New York Public Opinion—Glasgow Herald—Lindsey and Lincolnshire Star.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, [illegible]d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

[illegible]hinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing [illegible]t free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, [illegible]alf Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 6d.

[illegible]ry to Post-office regulations to announce on the [illegible]the subscription is due, subscribers will receive a colored wrapper when their subscription ow to Help Us.

to take a few copies of the Freethinker and [illegible], guaranteeing to take the copies that [illegible]/ (or more), and circulate it among your [illegible]

Freethinker now and then in the train, the [illegible]us.

layed, one of our contents-sheets, which are [illegible]size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will [illegible]plication.

SPECIAL.

The Hall of Science and Other Matters.

In the Freethinker of June 2 I made a long statement with respect to the London Hall of Science. Everything of importance was disclosed, and the shareholders in particular and the Secular party in general were put in possession of the facts of the case up to date. In the June 23 issue I wrote that my appeal for £600 had not been adequately responded to, and I added that, if the requisite amount were not made up within the next few days, "I must let the matter drop, for this is the last appeal I can make upon the present basis."

Since then I have been silent, though not inactive. The situation was an awkward one, and I was obliged to consider it all round. Evidently the party was not prepared—either through unwillingness or inability—to find the money required to clear off the mortgage; and I asked myself this question: "If it takes so much time and trouble to raise a few hundred pounds for this preliminary object, what prospect is there of raising the few thousands that will afterwards be necessary to rebuild the premises as an Institute worthy of our movement and of the memory of Charles Bradlaugh?"

It was terribly galling to reflect that thousands of pounds were being lost to our movement meanwhile, owing to the infamous laws which deprive Secularism of the commonest rights of citizenship. I had taken great pains, and incurred some expense, over several projected wills in the interest of our cause, one of which would have brought us a considerable bequest; but the testator in this case either procrastinated too long, or was unable to overcome his apprehensions; at any rate, he died rather suddenly, and his property went into alien hands.

Such facts as these were in my mind when I wrote as follows in the Freethinker of June 16:—

> "The bigoted Christian law is the secret of all our difficulties. We have lost thousands of pounds during the brief term of my presidency, and we shall go on losing until the law is altered. Meanwhile, we may dodge the law, but we have no real security; for even if property itself is secure, we have no guarantee that it will not be alienated from its original purpose. Mr. Joseph Symes built a hall at Melbourne, and other people are in possession. He denounces them as tricksters and thieves—as they are from a moral point of view—but they laugh at him, for the law is on their side. Yes, we shall never do great things, as an organisation, until property can be dedicated to, and held in trust for, our special objects—that is, until we enjoy the advantages of endowment like other bodies."

Reluctantly, but decisively, I am driven to the opinion that, until the law is altered, it will be best to aim no more at the acquisition of property. Building after building has been entirely alienated, while others are but rarely used for the purposes that governed their erection.

I will now return to the point at which I left off on June 2. Owing to the unsatisfactory nature of our negotiations with Mr. Smith, and the financial embarrassments entailed upon us by the failure of the Club, we were unable to meet our liabilities or to enter upon fresh operations that might have enabled us to meet them. Obviously we could not build on what might soon prove to be a quicksand. The landlord had already distrained for rent, but a part of the furniture had been purchased at the public auction, and this was used to accommodate the Sunday evening meetings until June 24, when a fresh distraint might have been levied. The furniture, therefore, had to be removed; and this was the reason why the place was closed and the lectures were transferred to Milton Hall.

As it was essential that we should retain possession, if anything was to be done with Mr. Smith, I kept a caretaker on the premises day and night. Some curious visitors (I will not mention them) attempted to get in, but the caretaker understood his instructions to admit no one but myself or Miss Vance.

Mr. R. O. Smith, who had tried to frighten the Club committee, by a perfectly illegal notice, into handing him the keys of the building, demanded possession of the Directors when the hall was closed. He repeated his demand, but of course it was unsuccessful. The landlord then sued Mr. Smith and the Hall Society jointly for the rent due to Midsummer. This brought matters to a crisis. Accordingly, I instructed our solicitor to write to Mr. Smith's solicitor, asking whether he was willing to reopen negotiations on the old lines. A reply came to the effect (it was the old story!) that Mr. Smith was in a position just then to consider a cash offer, though it was impossible to say how long he might be in that position, as "other negotiations were pending"—that is, he had been trying to sell the premises to other parties. Our solicitor then offered £525 in cash and £75 in shares, the transaction to be completed within a month from the date of acceptance.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile the landlord had obtained a judgment, and, in spite of our solicitor's representations, had presented a petition in bankruptcy against the Hall Society; which petition I instructed our solicitor to oppose.

Mr. Smith's answer, through his solicitor, arrived after this bankruptcy petition was presented. It was certainly a curiosity. He agreed to take the £525 in one month, but he made three stipulations. He has all through been strong on stipulations, and he must have known that they were fatal to any real contract. The stipulations in this instance were (1) that we should pay him down the sum of £25 for the trouble and expense he had been put to; (2) that his brother's fifty shares, on which £25 was owing, should be transferred to him as fully paid; (3) that we should pay the landlord's entire claim, a part of which (the insurance) was quite prospective. Our solicitor replied (1) that we declined to pay Mr. Smith £25, as we were not aware of his having incurred any such expense on our account, and if he had it was not to be compared with the monstrous expense he had put us to by his vacillation; (2) that the amount due on his brother's shares was an asset, and could not be dealt with by the Directors in view of the bankruptcy petition; (3) that if the negotiation were carried through with Mr. Smith the landlord's claim would of course be satisfied. Mr. Smith's solicitor replied that his client would not in any way alter his terms.

Mr. Smith must have thought himself very clever or us very foolish. We were to find some £150—which he knew we had not—entirely for his relief, on the mere chance of the contract being carried through; and behind him was the sub-mortgagee, who might at the last moment decline to honor Mr. Smith's bargain and release his security.

A few days afterwards Mr. Smith was seized with a peculiar desire. For many months he had not attended a Directors' meeting, just as he had ceased to attend the N.S.S. Executive meetings. But all at once he wanted to see his fellow members of the Board. Instead of saying so, however, to the Chairman or the Secretary, he went to work after the fashion of Polonius. Finding a rule to the effect that three Directors might instruct the Secretary to call a meeting of the Board, he signed such an order himself, got his brother to sign it too, and procured another signature to complete the trinity. But the conditions of the rule were not properly complied with, after all, and the order was merely a piece of waste-paper. However, I had a meeting convened on other grounds. Mr. Smith attended, but as by this time he was a litigant against the Society I declined to let him take part in the business, though we would listen to anything he had to say as vendor and mortgagee. Mr. Smith then told us the object of his visit; he requested us to give him immediate possession of the hall. I produced a writ, with which he had just served us, to recover possession; and asked him what he meant by going to law first and approaching us in "a friendly way" afterwards! In the course of the conversation, he was good enough to say that if he had £1,400 of our money, and his premises back again, he would still be a much injured man.

The landlord's solicitors agreed to a month's postponement of the bankruptcy petition, if I would deposit a certain sum as security for the costs of such action. I deposited the money to gain the time, but we were sold at the last minute. Something happened, at which I can give a shrewd guess, to make the landlord's solicitor unfriendly, and the winding-up order was made absolute.

Mr. Smith attended the Directors' meeting at the Official Receiver's office, and brought with him his solicitor, being evidently afraid to trust himself alone. I objected to this person's presence, as he represented Mr. Smith, not as a Director, but as a litigant against the Society. The Official Receiver, however, overruled my objection—wrongly as I think. Mr. Smith and his solicitor were there to serve the mortgagee's interest, and their conduct provoked my friend Mr. Watts to a display of manly indignation.

A special meeting of the N.S.S. Executive was held last Monday evening. Mr. Smith attended—the first time for many months—and posed as an unfortunate and injured man. A stranger would have imagined that we had £1,400 of his money, instead of his having £1,400 of ours. With amazing fortitude he told the Executive that what he sold was well worth £3,000, after all that had been said and done. Thereupon I asked him: "Do you mean, then, that when you consented to take £2,000 in full discharge of your claim, you were actuated by a spontaneous motive of benevolence?" Mr. Smith's fortitude—to give it the mildest name—did not desert him. He answered: "Yes." And the Executive laughed.

Unfortunately there is a record on this matter which Mr. Smith has never attempted to contradict. I refer to the Freethinker of March 24, in which I made a statement under the heading of "The Hall of Science." It will there be seen that Mr. Smith did not act spontaneously, but under pressure. It was the state of the premises, disclosed by two builders' surveys, which excited Mr. Smith's "benevolence." He told the Board (I quote from the aforesaid statement) that "the report was as much a surprise to him as to the other Directors." I have only to add that the survey which resulted in the most damaging report was made in Mr. Smith's presence.

It is impossible to deny Mr. Smith's contention that he is only exercising his legal rights. But did not Shylock say "I stand here for law"? Morally, he has betrayed his party throughout these negotiations. Without resigning as a Director, he considered his own interest exclusively; and by his own admission his interest only amounted to £525, while ours amounted to £1,400. Perhaps I ought to have said as much at the Conference, but I thought it best to leave the door open for a possible settlement.

I see now that Mr. Smith has condescended to approach us from time to time as his negotiations with other parties proved abortive. I have been on the heels of one or two of these "benevolent" efforts, and several persons (so well are secrets kept!) know with whom he is now negotiating for the sale of his lease.

For the present, I have only to say that I have warned the Official Receiver against giving up possession of the Hall to Mr. Smith, or even to the landlord who is now claiming entrance, no doubt in Mr. Smith's interest. Whatever may be the value of our interest in the lease, it must be conserved to the Society. When the shareholders' meeting is held the whole matter can be definitely decided. Meanwhile the N.S.S. Executive, by special vote, leaves its interest entirely in my hands. Altogether, my position is, and for many months has been, one of great trouble and anxiety. I have done my best, and I cheerfully submit to the candid judgment of the party—now and in the future.

Some little time must still elapse before I deal with the money actually sent in, and which I promised to return. I will explain that in due course. Meanwhile, those who have trusted me so long will doubtless trust me a little longer. Some of the donors told me not to return their money, but to use it for other purposes; and perhaps there are others who would wish their donations used for a fresh enterprise.

As the Executive is not ready to face the labor and risk, I have launched out myself. I take the entire responsibility of the Milton Hall meetings and the St. James's Hall meetings; and it is my intention to arrange for other West-End lectures during the winter. I have also engaged the fine, large Foresters' Hall, in Clerkenwell-road, not very far from the Hall of Science, for thirteen Sunday evenings; beginning with the first Sunday in September, when Mr. Putnam will deliver his farewell lecture. Unfortunately we cannot charge for admission, but we shall get over this difficulty in some way. I hardly need say, however, that I shall require some support in these enterprises. It seems probable at present, that all the surplus on my lectures will be absorbed in making up the deficiency on others. It is a point of honor with me to pay the other lecturers, whether I can get paid or not.

Practically, the whole burden of our special lecturing organisation will for some time rest upon me. It is true duty of the President to act in grave emergencies, when the direct influence of one man is more effective than that of numbers. The Executive has been apprised of my policy in this matter, and is ready to give me every possible support. The Committee appointed by the Conference on Mr. Cohen's motion met on Tuesday evening, and, after a conversation with me, resolved to adjourn sine die, so that I might have a perfectly free hand in this enterprise.

Digitized by Google

Until our party organisation is stronger and more perfect, I am confident that a committee in any one place cannot control, or even wisely assist, our propaganda throughout the country. One who visits all districts and understands their conditions and necessities; one who also occupies a position of much influence; such an one may do something to bring a little order out of chaos, and afterwards the Society may be able to take the matter under its collective management and responsibility.

With respect to the provinces, what I have in my mind may be illustrated by my arrangement with Mr. Charles Watts—whose sympathy and loyal support in all recent troubles I take this opportunity of acknowledging. I have authorised him to form week-night engagements when he goes to the Tyneside and to Scotland in October. The local friends can take a hall and throw it open free; their own subscriptions and the collection should defray the local expenses; and I will pay the lecturer out of whatever funds are at my disposal. I shall do the same with Mr. Cohen, and in time, I hope, with other lecturers. The accounts will be kept for me by Miss Vance, who is working so ably and well over these London enterprises; and in due course a financial statement will be sent to all subscribers. It is not my intention to be vexed and worried by the free and independent "criticism" of persons who do nothing and give nothing.

This is a big undertaking, but I shall do my best to carry it through, and there is no possibility of losing anything, unless I lose it myself. Every penny I receive will be spent on Freethought propaganda; or, to borrow a Christian phrase, and give it a higher meaning, in the salvation of souls. The time has evidently not arrived for what some call a "constructive" policy, nor can it arrive until the Blasphemy Laws are abolished. The great work immediately before us is propaganda, and I appeal to our party to assist me in carrying this on with vigor, thoroughness, and success.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote's second lecture at St. James's Hall, on "George Meredith: Writer and Teacher," drew a still larger audience than the first. Seating accommodation had been provided for nearly a hundred more persons, and, in spite of the tropical weather, the Banqueting Hall was crowded. An unusual number of strangers were present, and the summer costumes of many ladies gave a certain brightness to the assembly. For an hour and a half, notwithstanding the heat, the attention of the close-packed meeting was thoroughly rivetted, and the applause at the finish was loud and continuous. Mr. James Rowney once more made a capital chairman.

This evening (August 25) Mr. Foote delivers the last of this course of lectures at St. James's Hall, his subject being "Religion in the Light of Science." Probably the Freethinkers will make a special effort to render this meeting a splendid success, even beyond that of its predecessors. They should seize the opportunity of bringing their more orthodox friends to hear the President of the National Secular Society.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured last Sunday evening at Milton Hall. He will occupy the same platform this Sunday evening, August 25, taking for his subject "Christian Evidences: Their Utter Fallacy."

Mr. Sydney A. Gimson informs us that the Leicester Secularists had a good time with Mr. Putnam on Sunday. In the afternoon over a hundred friends met our American visitor at tea in the Secular Hall. After the repast and some music, Mr. Putnam addressed the assembly in a brief but earnest and eloquent speech. The lecture in the evening drew a capital audience, and all were delighted with the way in which Mr. Putnam dealt with the subject of "Christianity and Woman." Leicester Secularists will keep very pleasant recollections of Mr. Putnam's visit.

Mr. Putnam's last lecture before sailing for America will be delivered in London next Sunday (September 1). Full details will appear in our next issue. Meanwhile we beg all our London friends to remember the date, with a view to rallying round our American visitor on the last occasion (for the present) of his addressing a public meeting in the old country.

The farewell dinner to Mr. Putnam will take place at the Holborn Restaurant on the following Wednesday (September 4). The tickets are four shillings each, and are now on sale at 28 Stonecutter-street, as well as by the London Branch secretaries. Mr. Foote will preside at this function, and will be supported by Messrs. Charles Watts, George Anderson, R. Forder, J. M. Wheeler, and other well-known Freethinkers. All who intend to be present should secure tickets by Monday, September 2, at the latest.

The Birmingham Branch has engaged the Alexandra Hall in Hope-street for the winter's operations. The inaugural assembly takes place to-day (August 25). It will be of a social character. Tea will be served at five o'clock, and followed by an entertainment. The tickets are ninepence each, and can be obtained from Mr. Partridge, 65 Cato-street. Messrs. Snell, Armfield, and Cohen are announced to lecture during September.

Mr. Symes, in the Melbourne Liberator, noticing the case of witch-burning in Ireland, says: "Mr. Wheeler, of the Freethinker, sends us a capital pamphlet upon this incident, and dealing with Bible witchcraft. It cannot be out of place for us to furnish a few facts now the subject is before the public, and to show how fully the Bible is to blame for the witchcraft horrors the Churches inflicted when the Churches had their own way, and when there was little science, truth, common sense, or humanity to check the diabolical influence of Theology—the most murderous madness ever known."

The cyclone at Cherry Hill, New Jersey, which killed several people and destroyed much property, elicited from the Rev. Mr. Duryee, pastor of the church there, the opinion that the cyclone was one of God's ingenious methods of chastening his beloved. A German Freethinker, whose barn had been spoilt, exclaimed, "Humbug," and the Freethinkers of New Jersey obtained the use of his barn on Sunday, August 4, to discuss the "Causes of Cyclones." G. Macdonald, who was present, writes an interesting account of the demonstration in the Truthseeker.

Forty-three members of the House of Commons affirmed instead of taking the oath. There were plenty of Testaments knocking about for all who chose the fetish form.

Professor Banks, in a speech at the Wesleyan Conference at Plymouth, differed from some of his brethren, who thought Sacerdotalism the great religious evil of the age. The chief danger of these days, he said, was scepticism. According to the report in the Methodist Times—"He believed we underrated the force of scepticism which was spreading over all classes of society. Going up and down the Leeds district, he was constantly meeting the sons and daughters of their own people who had given up all profession of religion, and who disclaimed any desire to worship, and said that they could do without the life of the church altogether. They saw the effect of that spirit in many directions—in literature, in fiction, and in the dreadful notions of morality which were disseminated by brilliant writers, and which were extensively read by their young people." We presume the "dreadful notions of morality" are no more than the freer and nobler views of love and marriage. Old-fashioned people think it dreadful when women learn that, while they may be born to love man, they are not born to obey him.

Supposing the Christian God to exist, it would be impossible for human ingenuity to invent anything more blasphemous towards him than an ordinary church, not to mention the Popish and Anglican Churches. The light in which these sects exhibit God is the worst conceivable. The world is bad enough; the Church millions of times worse. To me, if I felt any doubt on the subject, if my Atheism ever felt shaky, the existence of the Church would soon satisfy me. A God that could endure the sight of this world must be a contemptible thing; a God that could endure the Church and its so-called worship, its greed, imposture, pretence, and unutterable cruelty, would be transcendently more contemptible than could be conceived. The Church perpetrates all its foolery and crimes in the name of God! If God lives, the priests must have driven him stark mad centuries ago.—Joseph Symes.

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (July 27).

FROM the romance of the North—its mountains and lakes, the spirit of Burns and Scott, the flowers and the heather—I come to the enormous city of Manchester, which seems to represent everything that is practical—facts, facts, facts—industry, commerce, machinery, cotton—pounds, shillings, and pence. I enjoyed the contrast. It added piquancy to this wonderful journey of human life. There is romance and poetry in Manchester mills if we could only get at them, if we only had the myriad-minded vision.

I suppose that the goods of Manchester are sent to every quarter of the globe. Manchester, like London, is an original centre of business. It is a fountain-head. It is not a reflex or a dependency. If London were swept out of existence, Manchester would not feel the shock. She would still go on her way rejoicing. Manchester really claims to be as large a congregation of the world's traffic as London itself. She will not yield the palm to Glasgow as the second city in the empire. Manchester proper contains about 650,000 people, and Glasgow proper nearly 800,000. As a matter of fact, however, the Manchesterites claim Salford, since only a narrow stream runs between the cities; the business is all one; and a stranger can't tell whether he is in Manchester or Salford, so intimately are the two cities combined; and Salford has a population of 250,000, which makes the population of the "living whole" of this immense metropolis 900,000. Furthermore, it is stated that within a radius of ten miles of Manchester Exchange is a population as large as that of London itself—that is, taking a space of ground in Lancashire as large as that of total London, it contains an equal number of people. Whether these statements are exaggerations or not, they tend to give some idea of the enormous and multiplied activities of this mighty city. Vast and amazing are the channels of life that flow and intermingle. Crowds flock from every point of the compass. The Manchester Exchange is the largest in the world. On Tuesdays and Fridays 6,000 people throng there simply to do business, and the transactions run up into millions. It is a picture to look upon, that changing multitude on the vast floor of this tall building, the surges of which, we might say, are felt to the uttermost corners of the earth. Looking through the huge thick glass plates of surrounding rooms and corridors, you can scarcely hear a sound of that living sea. You would think that nothing was going on. They simply seem to be walking, talking, laughing, and having a good time. Nevertheless, more business is transacted on this one spot than upon any other spot of the same size on the globe, London and New York not excepted, for the time being. When one strikes Manchester he feels the "thrill of life," as when he strikes Chicago, or any other big place; he knows that something is going on. He feels an electricity in the air, which only numbers and world-wide movements can give.

The Ship Canal, about forty miles in length, I believe, is a wonderful achievement, and adds greatly to the commercial facilities of Manchester, since goods can now be shipped directly to all parts of the world. The canal cost $80,000,000. In the nature of things it can't be a paying investment for many years to come. It requires vast traffic to pay the interest of such an amount of money as the canal cost. But Manchester, after all, is a prophetic and exuberant city, notwithstanding its purely business nature. It is no Gadgrind. It has boundless faith in the future and the glory of its canal, which will no doubt some day bear a thousand ships upon its bosom. I admire the magnificent energy of a people who will bank $80,000,000 on the possibilities of to-morrow. There is a poetic grandeur in the creation of such a splendid pathway of commerce.

I enjoy the comfortable hospitality of William Westwell, who lives in the suburbs of Manchester, in a quiet retreat, where no throb of business ever disturbs the calm and beautiful atmosphere. There are flowers and grass and trees to charm the eye, and lovely roads over which to drive, and fair prospects in every direction. There is the splendid horse, Robert, and the faithful dog, Wallace, and in the morning and the evening air we enjoy the delightful sceneries with the swift motion and music of the flying wheel. Elegant villas and residences adorn the country, which is rich with groves and luscious hayfields, in some of which the harvest is already filling the air with sweet perfumes and the laborers cheerily sing. At Bolton I saw two of the finest draught-horses, I believe, in the world; one was valued at £1,000, and the other at £800. They seemed almost strong enough to draw an earthquake, and make no fuss about it. England surpasses America in draught-horses, although the latter may produce the more lively and handsome trotters. But when it comes to work, England attends to business. There are draught-horses in Manchester that will each pull five tons easily. It seems merely child's play as they place their enormous hoofs on the ground and swing along almost like a planet.

The Secular Society of Manchester is in a flourishing condition. It has strong elements, and fine local talent. It has a hall of its own, which was once a chapel. There is a moral in this, and rather opposes the notion that Christianity is taking the lead of Secularism, for here is a church actually transformed into a Secular hall.

The first time Mr. Foote lectured here the baptismal font was in front, as yet unremoved—a relic of the past fronting the glory of the future. There were no haunting spirits of orthodoxy about, however, as I spoke within these four walls. The building was thoroughly regenerated and prepared for the service of humanity. I had fine audiences, and cheerful English enthusiasm. The evening attendance was especially large. In every way I have enjoyed the Manchester campaign. I have met numerous friends. All give hearty welcome to the American visitor, and make him feel entirely at home. It is an inspiring thought that in such a great centre of the world's business our flag is kept flying. Such earnest workers as Mr. and Mrs. Pegg, and others, insure the continued success of our cause. Mr. E. G. Taylor, author of Shall Thought be Fettered in England?—a most excellent pamphlet—presided at the morning and evening meetings, and Mr. Hurd at the afternoon. Quite a number of friends were present from Failsworth, a bright centre of Freethought work, where I expect to be August 11, and of which I shall have a good story to tell, for a really splendid constructive enterprise has been carried on here of great interest to all advanced thinkers. I cannot name all I met at Manchester, but I must thank them one and all for their kindness and generous support.

With Mr. Westwell and Mr. Robert Ainsworth I visited the Exchange, the Municipal buildings, the Art gallery, St. James's Hall, Belle-Vue, and other places of interest and enjoyment. Belle-Vue is one of the old and celebrated curiosities of cosmopolitan Manchester. Excursions from all over the kingdom come here for a day's outing. There are large zoological gardens, extensive lakes, upon which steamboats are plying, concert hall, and a band of music, and at present a huge panorama of Port Arthur—a wonderful affair, giving a most vivid impression of that place. In the evening there is a magnificent display of fireworks, the "Storming of Port Arthur," reproduced in a grandeur and brilliancy which is indescribable. Belle-Vue was started over fifty years ago by one man in a very small way, and has grown to its present colossal proportions as a place of varied amusement and instruction by the energetic genius of the founder and his sons. The railroad company has offered, I understand, £250,000 for the place, but the proprietors refuse to dispose of it for that or any other sum. It is their pride and glory to make this the best thing of its kind in the kingdom.

St. James's is one of the largest halls in the world, capable of holding 8,000 people. Westwell once held a big auction of goods in this place, and sold in one day merchandise to the value of £27,000. I think this is one of the largest business transactions on record.

On Sunday evening I was pleased to meet, at the home of Mr. Westwell, Mr. Karsa, a Mohammedan gentleman, who was present at the evening lecture. I was gratified to find that advanced believers in the Koran are, upon the broad and universal platform of Freethought, cordial[illegible] in touch with science, progressive philosophy, and radical literature.

My visit at Manchester was one of great stimulation. In this hive of human industry there were still music and poetry, hope and encouragement.

On Monday I reach Derby, where I give a lecture in the evening at the Athenæum Hall. This is quite full. I have already mentioned Derby. The debate was held here between Foote and Lee. I gave a review of that debate, entitling my lecture "Man and the Universe." I presented the salient features of both sides of the debate, which debate certainly has resulted in great good to Secularism. I could see that Mr. Foote's argument had lodged in many an intelligent mind, and that the community was not so densely orthodox as in days gone by. There has been a hard fight at this point. The Sabbatarians endeavored to enforce the old pious laws, and for a time succeeded; but public sentiment is now pronounced against them, and the principles of Freethought are prevailing. The only notable thing about the debate after the lecture was that a woman took part in it, in a very courteous and gentle manner. I could not make out what her position really was, but it seemed more like Swedenborgianism than anything else. It was a vague and indefinite defence of Theism, but not by any means on the orthodox lines. I see that very few are disposed to defend "Christian" Theism. It is Theism pure and simple upon which they rely.

Mr. Henry McGuinness presided at my lecture. I find he is an old army comrade, and fought beneath the Stars and Stripes. I am glad that, on a larger and grander field, we are contending for universal freedom. At his home, after the lecture, with Mr. Whitney and other Secular friends, we had a delightful sociable time, and closed with singing "Auld Lang Syne." Derby is quite a contrast to Manchester, with its tremendous bustle. But I shall not forget the former's rural and stately beauty, its appearance of comfort and wealth, its growing light of Freethought, its cheerful companionship, and splendid band of earnest reformers.

Digitized by Google

Nottingham is next on my route, and I lecture here Tuesday, June 25, to a fair audience. There is a very large Liberal element in Nottingham, but somehow or other it is rather indifferent to distinctive Freethought work, and much of it is absorbed in the Socialistic and Independent Labor party. The purely Secular movement is not what it should be in its own field, but there are sturdy supporters here, and I do not think there will be any ultimate failure, for there are those who know that Freethought is the vital spirit of reform, and must be maintained at all hazards. In times of real stress and battle Nottingham has always been a great rallying place, and there is no doubt that, if anything special should occur, Nottingham would fill its quota. At present it is a kind of reserve corps.

I remain until Saturday at Nottingham, and have a good rest at the home of Mr. James Stapleton, president of the Nottingham Secular Society. Mr. Snell, one of the best speakers and workers in the English advance movement, introduced me at the lecture, and made a very interesting address of welcome, in which he stated that in a certain way Nottingham was the hub of the universe; and that is about so. The New England Pilgrim movement started from near Nottingham. Nottingham Castle dates back to the time of the Britons, and then, as for Nottingham lace, there is nothing like it in the wide world, and the Nottingham girls adorn themselves like queens with the chief productions of their ancient and majestic city. Lace manufacture in its present wonderful skill and variety originated here. This is the only place where they can make the machines, which are indeed like "a thing of life." My friend, Mr. Parrott, who owns one of them, took me to view its marvellous evolutions. I can no more explain them than I can explain the universe. There is an infinity of movement, all prearranged so that at one stroke it seems as if a million fingers were set at work to deftly weave the gorgeous fabric. Fifty-two yards of the finest lace, of any pattern desired, are made on one of these machines every half hour. You might watch the mechanism all day long, and yet not penetrate its mystery. Only in Nottingham can the genius of man produce these superb, tireless creatures that labor day and night with the force of a human intelligence and fill the world with beauty.

Passing from these miracles of modern progress, we take our way to Nottingham Castle, in whose dim recesses the "dark backward and abysm of time" is quaintly revealed. Mrs. Stapleton and my artist freind, Mr. Story, are my companions. Mr. Story has painted some of the pictures now hanging on the walls, and is well up in the history of this famous castle. Of course, only here and there do we find remnants of the original structure, which was built nobody knows when. Some say that the citadel on this rock was reared about the time of King David of scriptural memory—a thousand years before Christ. Others go back only to the ancient Romans and Britons, but there is no doubt that this great rock which towers above the city has been a battlemented fortress in one shape or another for many centuries. At present the main structure is a castellated mansion of comparatively modern date, having itself suffered mutilation in the days of Chartist reform; but still to be seen is Mortimer's Hole, where the wicked earl courted the amorous queen, to be finally detected and executed at Tyburn. There is also the "New Jerusalem," where beer is still vended to the thirsty wayfarer, and which was furnished centuries ago from the same place to the holy crusaders; hence its name. In the mansion as it now stands are the art gallery and museum, and one can spend a whole day viewing the treasures of this unique and memorable castle. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

A MIRACLE AT LOURDES.

On the eve of the great annual pilgrimage of the faithful from Paris to Lourdes it is unfortunate for the credit of this famous shrine that the Assize Court of the Seine should have had to convict, of a series of remarkable impostures, one of those professing to have been "cured" by the waters of the holy spring. The pious portion of the career of Pierre Delanoy, who yesterday received a sentence of four years' imprisonment with hard labor, does certainly afford a rebellious and a stiff-necked generation a pretext for scoffing at the miracles alleged to be performed at Lourdes. After a successful career of fraud as a sham paralytic, it occurred to Delanoy to trade upon the credulity of the Church. Accordingly he repaired to Lourdes in the season in the character of a cripple hobbling on crutches. He was dipped in the holy well at the spot where the Virgin Mary is supposed to have been seen by the ecstatic Bernadette, and, marvel of marvels! he rose from the water cured, and at once threw away his sticks. Great was the joy among the poor pilgrims seeking relief from their maladies; for here was one of their number, and not the least afflicted, confessedly made whole. The local clergy allowed themselves to be imposed upon. They took Delanoy up, starred him as a living proof of the miraculous qualities of the holy spring, and finally installed him as a keeper of a home for invalids. This last was an honor which the impostor had not counted upon. He was not averse to being fêted as an example of the Divine mercy, and to living at free quarters. But the duties imposed upon him by his new office proved irksome. At all events, he fell from grace, stole all the money in the "home" that he could lay hands upon, and disappeared. Such a thorough-paced scoundrel was bound to be heard of again, and he was. He turned up in Paris as a sham lunatic. This time, however, the medical authorities upon whom he had previously imposed as a pretended sufferer from locomotor ataxy were too many for him. His dossier was compiled for a number of years, covering his experiences at Lourdes, and society has at length scored its first success against one of the most accomplished impostors of the day.

The ingenuity with which Delanoy has deceived medical experts at different times in his career is remarkable, and there is just that amount of excuse for the clergy, whose zeal to present an authentic miracle so sadly outran their discretion. But the case shows how necessary it is to be careful in accepting stories of the miraculous at Lourdes or elsewhere, however well attested by persons acting in all good faith. If Delanoy had only been a less incorrigible rogue than he really was, if he could have contented himself with the position he had won in the esteem of the faithful, there could not have been a more authentic miracle than his. For he had been through the hands of medical experts who had pronounced him to be suffering from one of the most hopeless of nervous disorders. The real miracle in the case is that this arch impostor should at length have been exposed. It is a case of the pitcher going too often to the well.—"Morning," Aug. 14.

The Ascent of Man.

Either man was created and placed in the Garden of Eden something less than six thousand years ago, as narrated in Genesis, or he was not. If the statement made in Genesis is not true, or if man did not fall in consequence of the transgression of a law of God, then the whole scheme of Christianity, as promulgated by Churchmen, is false; for, if there was no fall, there was no need of redemption, no vicarious sacrifice, no atonement, no Savior, no death on the cross to placate the anger of the Almighty Father.

If man did not fall, but has been advancing from age to age, ever increasing in knowledge and goodness, then it is false to attempt his elevation by the methods of the Church. He must be lifted up by education, not by somebody's death.

Every trace of pre-historic man, the rough stone axe, the arrow-head of flint, the rude tracing of aboriginal artists, the resurrected cities and monuments, show that man has come up from a savage condition, advancing step by step, as does the child in its growth and development, until he has attained his present enlightenment. Instead of a fall, it is, then, in truth, an ascension, and it is an insult to his intelligence to intimate the need of an intermediate to restore him to a condition he never occupied.—Progressive Thinker.

PROFANE JOKES.

Teacher—"What is a miracle?" Boy—"Please, sir, it's a thing that happens in America."

A boy was reading from an old-fashioned primer, in which the letter "s" in the body of a word was printed very much like the letter "f." He read the sentence, "Solomon was the wifest man that ever lived." "True, my boy, true," said his father, who was listening; "he had a thousand of 'em."

During a recent vacancy in a Highland parish church a preacher was urgently required one Sunday. The local teacher telegraphed to a minister in Oban as follows—"Mr. M'Nab, Oban. Can you supply us on Sunday?" The following reply came: "Can supply you any day except Sunday." There were two M'Nabs in Oban, one of whom was a fishmonger, and to him the message went.

"Why, deacon, what are you looking for?" asked Golightly, as he observed the deacon examining his wood-pile the other evening. "Well, I'm just examining this last load of wood to see if it is all right. You see, I bought it from Brother Brown yesterday, and in prayer-meeting to-night he called himself so many kinds of a miserable sinner, that I thought it just possible it was the quality of this load of wood that was weighing on his mind."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

ST. JAMES'S HALL (Banqueting Hall), Piccadilly: 7.30, G. W. Foote, "Religion in the Light of Science."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 8, select entertainment and dance. Tuesday, 8.30, social gathering.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7, a lecture.

MILTON HALL (Hawley-crescent, 89 Kentish Town-road): 7, musical selections; 7.30, Charles Watts, "Christian Evidences: their Utter Fallacy."

WESTMINSTER BRANCH: 9, Excursion by brake from Old Pimlico Pier to Epping Forest. Tickets (3s.) can be had of Secretary, J. Borrell, 6 Possonby-place, Westminster.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, J. B. Coppock, F.C.S., "Animal Development."

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, C. James, "The Decay of Christianity."

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.30, A. B. Moss, "The Gospel of Evolution."

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, a lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, W. J. Ramsey, "The Garden of Eden."

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11.15 and 3.15, St. John will lecture.

HAMMERSMITH BROADWAY (Middlesex side): 7, Lucretius Keen, "Free Will a Delusion." Thursday, at 8.30, W. J. Ramsey will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, Lucretius Keen, "Free Will a Delusion"; 3.30, "The Four Gospels." Wednesday, at 8, Stanley Jones will lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, E. Calvert, "The Soul."

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, Stanley Jones will lecture.

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, S. E. Easton will lecture.

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, a lecture.

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, F. Haslam, "The Life and Teachings of Buddha."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, Stanley Jones, "Christianity Critically Examined."

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 3, a lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15, a lecture; 3.15, A. B. Moss will lecture.

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "He that Believeth"; C. James, "The Philosophy of Atheism." Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM BRANCH (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, Gymnasium class; 5, tea; 7, entertainment.

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, S. P. Putnam, "Freethought in America"; 3, "Freethought and Morality"; 7, "Christianity and Secularism."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 11, C. Cohen, "The Political Ethics of Herbert Spencer"; 6.30, "Does God Exist?"

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, Mrs. Thornton Smith, "The Land for the People"; 3, "The Population Question"; 7, "The Gospel of Freethought."

PLYMOUTH (Democratic Club, Whimple-street): 7, annual meeting.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 11, W. Heaford, "An Hour with the Devil"; 3, "The Futility of Prayer"; 7, "The Doom of the Gods." The morning lecture, weather permitting, will be near the Monolith.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BRISTOL (Eastville Park, Lower End): 7, a lecture.

BRADFORD (Open Market, James-street): 6.30, A. W. Oxley, "Inconsistencies of the Pulpit."

DERBY (Market-place): 11, Mr. Briggs will lecture.

MANCHESTER (Stephenson-square): 3, C. Cohen—see Friday's Evening News for subject.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Market-place): 11, Hall Nicholson, "Christianity and Slavery"; 3, "Christian and Secular Morality."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London.—August 25, Manchester.

STANLEY JONES, 53 Marlborough-road, Holloway, London.—Aug. 25, m. Pimlico Pier, a. Kilburn; 28, Hyde Park. Sept. 1, m. Kingsland, a. Finsbury Park; 8, m. Camberwell, a. Hyde Park, e. Camberwell; 15, m. Finsbury, e. Edmonton; 22, m. Kingsland, e. Deptford; 25, Hyde Park; 26, Hammersmith; 29, m. Victoria Park, a. Finsbury Park, e. Kilburn.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Croydon-road, Rotherhithe, London, E.—August 25, m. Clerkenwell, a. Victoria Park.

T. THURLOW, 250 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 15, e. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 16 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 4s.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

A CHAPTER FROM

Strauss's Original "Life of Jesus."

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

G. W. FOOTE.

(A Most Thorough Analysis and Exposure of the Gospel Story by a Master Hand.)

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Freedom Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."

W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."

Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 2d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 2d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 2d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell
No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 3d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Handsomely bound in cloth, post free 7s. 6d.,

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY
OF
FREETHINKERS OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.
BY
J. M. WHEELER.

"The Dictionary has involved enormous labor, and the compiler deserves the thanks of the Freethought party."—National Reformer.

"The work will be of the greatest value."—Freethought.

"At last we have the long-wanted means of silencing those Christians who are continually inquiring for our great men, asserting that all great men have been on the side of Christianity."—Truthseeker (New York).

"The most important Freethought work published this year."—De Dageraad (Amsterdam).

"A good and useful work that was much needed."—Commonweal.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Digitized by Google

SALE. SALE.

NOW FOR ANOTHER HOWLING GALE OF BUSINESS.

Black or Navy Serge Suit Length, Pure Wool	15s.
Check or Mixture Suit Length, Pure Wool	15s.
Three Pure Wool Trousers Lengths, Splendid Qualities ...	15s.
Black, Navy, or Brown Melton Overcoat Length	15s.
1 Lady's and 1 Gent's Silver-mounted Umbrellas (best covers)	15s.
A Bundle of Dress Remnants (20 yds., double width) ...	15s.
Two Pure Wool Dress Lengths	15s.

One Shilling must be added to cover carriage on each parcel.

MONEY REFUNDED IF THE INVESTMENT IS NOT SATISFACTORY.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

A LECTURE

BY

MR. G. W. FOOTE

(President of the National Secular Society)

AT

ST. JAMES'S HALL

(BANQUETING HALL), PICCADILLY, W.

Entrances—Regent-street and Piccadilly.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 25TH—

"RELIGION IN THE LIGHT OF SCIENCE."

CHAIR TAKEN AT 7.30 P.M.

ADMISSION BY TICKET ONLY.

Tickets 1s., 2s., & 5s.

Obtainable at Tree's Ticket Office, Piccadilly; and at 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 35. SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

BLOOD FOR BLOOD.

THE "missionary outrages" in China still figure on newspaper placards. Some disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus are almost foaming with rage at the obstinacy of the Chinese officials and the inactivity of the British government. Methodists, in particular, are calling loudly for a more vigorous policy. Vengeance, of course, belongs to the Lord; nevertheless it is sweet to his devotees. Blood for blood is the natural craving of the old savage, who is still lusty under the thin disguise of religion.

With curious inconsistency—or rather with inconsistency that would be curious in other people—these irate Christians rejoice over the fact that their murdered missionaries have gone to glory. They are now treading the golden streets of the new Jerusalem, drinking the water of the river of life, basking in the smiles of the Lamb, and loafing around the great white throne. Suffering can never touch them again; they are happy—oh, so happy!—for ever and ever, yea and a day after that. Why, then, all these tears? Why all these cries for vengeance, or, as they euphemistically style it, satisfaction? Christians should really be grateful to the Chinese "murderers." Preaching to the Chinese, indeed, ought to supersede suicide as a quick emigration route to heaven. If the Almighty has set his canon against self-slaughter—which, by the way, he has not done in the Bible—there is no law against holding out your throat for his enemies to make incision; and while you secure a prompt passage to heaven you have the added delight of knowing that one of the Lord's enemies has involved himself in the guilt of murder, and is thus booked in all probability for the opposite establishment. The ice cream dissolving on your palate will be all the sweeter as you think of his roast sulphur.

This may be objected to as the blasphemous jocosity of a hardened sceptic. Very well then, let us appeal to Scripture. In the lauded Sermon on the Mount we find a most apposite beatitude:—

> "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven, for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you."

The missionaries in China have been reviled and persecuted, and they have their reward in heaven. What more do they want? They have earned the supreme blessing. Yet their friends over here are not exceeding glad; they are in a passion of anger; and they display the utter hollowness and hypocrisy of Christian profession when brought to the test of its own standards.

In that same Sermon on the Mount we find another pertinent text:—

> "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you."

Is this the attitude of Christians towards the Chinese? Nothing of the kind. Let the truth be told after all these centuries of hard experience. The mild and merciful texts of the Bible are only used by Christians to fling at opponents, and are without the slightest influence on their personal lives or national policies.

Let the missionaries go to China if they will, or to any other part of the globe. Where they go is their own business, as long as they take the risk themselves. But when they clamor for protection, we have a right to see whether they deserve it. If they go into the mission-field in the spirit of martyrdom, we shall respect their motives, however we may suspect their wisdom. But they cannot enjoy the double privilege of martyrdom and citizenship. Let them make their choice. If their attack on the heathen has to be supported by gunboats, it is obvious that their enterprise is not "spiritual." They must be enrolled as ordinary traders.

The fact is, the missionaries are not invited, and are not welcome. They force themselves upon the heathen. And in doing so they expect—and when possible exact—a tolerance which they would never exhibit themselves. Just imagine what would happen if the Chinese sent missionaries to England! Brutal attacks have been made at Liverpool upon a little body of Mohammedans, who do not go out into the streets to proselytise, but confine themselves to their own mosque. And it must be remembered that nearly a hundred million Mohammedans are subjects of the British Empire! Nay, we need not take such an extreme illustration. Christians here, in the United Kingdom, brutally ill-treat each other. Take the following newspaper report of an occurrence in Ireland on Sunday, August 25:—

> "On the street preachers making their reappearance at Sligo yesterday they were beset by a large and violent crowd, and, despite the efforts of a hundred police, they were assaulted with stones, rotten eggs, and filth, so that in a short time time their clothes were completely spoiled. Several policemen were struck by stones, but not seriously injured. After three-quarters of an hour the missionaries were escorted to their lodgings by the police."

Rotten eggs and ordure show contempt, stones show hatred, and bloodshed shows the spirit of murder. Only withdraw the police, and dead bodies would strew the ground.

Suppose the preachers at Sligo were foreigners, with strange dress and manners; suppose they spoke in ridiculous broken English, and at the same time gave themselves airs of immense superiority; suppose they told the people that they would all go to hell unless they accepted the preachers' creed, whether they understood it or not; and suppose they broadly hinted that they had powerful friends in the country they came from, who might come with warships and big guns if the people did not behave themselves. Does any man in his right senses imagine that this would not incense the people terribly, and that some of the most fierce and fanatical would not be provoked to deeds of violence?

> Oh wad some pow'r the giftie gie us
> To see oursels as ithers see us!

Christianity is the most intolerant religion that ever disgraced the earth. It has shed oceans of blood, and it still persecutes wherever it has the power. What right has such a religion to make such a fuss about the consumption (as Gibbon would call it) of a few missionaries? And when the consumption occurs in China, where Christian England has forced a big opium trade in spite of the protests of the Chinese government, the howling of the Christians is enough to shake the world with laughter.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

VIRGIN BIRTHS.*

THE history of the evolution of human ideas has yet to be written. The material is being collected by the anthropologist from every quarter of savage life. The folk-lorist is gathering it from the olden sagas, the ballads and stories of the peasantry, and the fairy tales of childhood; and, as the history unfolds itself, it becomes a romance of greater interest than Robinson Crusoe, for it tracks the path of mankind from helpless savagery to the triumphs of civilisation. Among the débris of this long, toilsome, and devious path is a curious superstition, enshrined in many a story and exalted in man's highest religion. It is the story of virgin birth. To this myth Mr. Hartland, who, by his Science of Fairy Tales, has already displayed his competence, devotes a study which shows in how thorough a way a little section of anthropology is now being investigated.

As the nucleus of his theme, Mr. Hartland takes the classical Legend of Perseus, as Mr. Frazer took up The Golden Bough. Mr. Hartland has the advantage in his subject. Mr. Frazer had only the killing of the god and his resurrection, or survival; but he brought such wide knowledge of archaic faiths that his work marks an epoch. In the story of Perseus Mr. Hartland has not only the virgin birth, but the fight with the dragon, and the rescue of the captive woman. He has not yet completed this portion of his task, but, if followed up as the first part of the story, it will be extremely interesting.

Mr. Hartland has gone the right way to work. He has formed a vast collection. He has given a simple classification. He illustrates the supernatural birth, in fairy tale and saga, by all sorts of superstitious customs in regard to the nature of life, pregnancy, and sterility, taking us back to the time when the solution of the problem of generation was simply the transformation of life, and beyond this he leaves us to form our own deductions.

My interest here is with the development of the Christian myth, which is no singular revelation, but the descendant of a long line of similar stories. The virgin births of Osiris, Horus, Buddha, and other sun and culture heroes, have long been pointed out by men like Dupuis, Higgins, and Bonwick. Dr. Waitz long since said in his Introduction to Anthropology, part ii., sec. 3, p. 373:—

> "The reception of human individuals among the gods becomes particularly important in relation to their teachings, which we find in every mythology. They are either considered as incarnations of a god or as the sons of the highest god, born of a human mother or a virgin, and miraculously conceived. They become then the mediators between gods and men, and the benefactors of the latter as the founders of a new religion, the inventors of important arts, the founders of agriculture and social order, and the promoters of civilisation. Squier gives as examples Buddha in India, Fohi in China, Zoroaster in Persia, Osiris in Egypt, Odin in Scandinavia, etc. In the New World belong to this category Quetzalcoatl in Mexico; Manco Capac in Peru, the founder of Cuzco, sent by the sun; analogous heroes we find among the Muyscas in Yucatan, in Nicaragua, and even among the Natchez; Hiawatha among the Iroquois, the founder of their confederacy; Manabozho among the Algonquins; Tamoi among the Guarayos."

Dr. Waitz mentions that miraculous conception is related of Fohi, Codom, Archer, Huitzilipochtli, etc. These and other instances will be found cited in Mr. Foote's tract on "The Virgin Mother" in Bible Romances.

Mr. Andrew Lang, in his Myth, Ritual, and Religion (ii., 22), says of Heitsi Eibib, a Hottentot prophet: "By another account he was born of a virgin, who tasted a certain kind of grass. This legend is of wonderfully wide diffusion among savage and semi-civilised races." Now Mr. Hartland has collected an immense number of such instances, and comparing them with the fairy tales and customs of peasantry and savages enables us to trace their development. To all interested in the study of folk-lore and the early history of mankind, the facts gathered are of great interest. I should like to dilate upon them, but the same matter is dealt with in my Footsteps of the Past, and I must here confine myself to Mr. Hartland's references to Christianity. At p. 103 he says:—

> "The mystery taught by the creeds of the Church, however, is believed to be something apart from all the other beliefs of the world, something altogether above them, alike in its evidence and its consequences. Christians in thus thinking overlook the fact that to the believer in any religion its evidences are undeniable and its claims are supreme. The fact is that the incident in question is part and parcel of many other religions than the Christian, and is also gravely accepted among what we may call the secular and quasi-historical traditions of tribes in various parts of the Old and New World. Beyond this, as we shall see in another chapter, pregnancy is held actually producible by means analogous to those described in the legends, means outside the ordinary operations of nature. Into the bearing of these facts on the dogma of the Supernatural Birth of Jesus Christ, or on the historical evidence on which that dogma rests, it is not my purpose to inquire. This is a question of apologetics, not of folk-lore."

Dealing with the legends of impregnation by an unusual part of the body, Mr. Hartland remarks that in the Middle Ages a similar idea was current respecting the conception of Jesus Christ, though he does not mention that it finds place in the Sepher Toldoth Jeshu.* He says (p. 131):—

> "Sometimes painters represented the Holy Ghost as entering his mother at her ear in the shape of a dove. In the Church of the Magdalen at Aix, in Provence, is a picture of the Annunciation attributed to Albert Dürer, wherein waves of glory descend from God the Father, and in the midst of them a microscopic babe floats down upon the Virgin. During the fifteenth century the opinion seems to have been common that Our Lord entered already completely formed into the Virgin's womb—an opinion which orthodox theologians, in their perfect acquaintance with the divine arrangements, were able summarily to pronounce heretical. But a remarkable parallel to the story of Buddha's conception is presented by a picture of Fra Filippo Lippi, painted for Cosmo de' Medici, and now in the National Gallery. The Virgin is seated in a chair with her Book of Hours in her hand, and the angel Gabriel bows before her. Above is a right hand surrounded with clouds. A dove, cast from the hand amid circling floods of glory, is making for the Virgin's navel, which it is about to enter; while she, bending forward, curiously surveys it. The picture is well worth studying, not merely for its exquisite grace, coloring, and finish, as one of the masterpieces of Tuscan art in the earlier half of the fifteenth century, but also as an exposition of the ideas which were prevalent at that time under the sanction of the Church, and for the purpose of comparing them with Buddhist legends and other stories of supernatural birth, such as we are now considering. Mohammedan tradition ascribes the miraculous conception by the Virgin to Gabriel's having opened the bosom of her shift and breathed upon her womb."

Mr. Hartland has not noticed that in the curious Livre de vaillant Perseus (Paris, 1572) the virgin birth from Danæ, and the slaying of the serpent by Perseus, are directly identified with Mary and the Savior of the world. But probably we shall get that in his next volume. Mr. Hartland knows his subject so well that I am surprised to find no mention of the profound work of Gerald Massey on Natural Genesis, which, I take leave to say, is not to be dismissed unstudied, whether one agrees with his conclusions or not.

It is curious that, almost simultaneously with Mr. Hartland's work, there appears Le Folk-lore Dans les Deux Mondes, by Count Hyacinthe de Charencey (Paris: C. Klincksieck), in which a long chapter, entitled "Lucina sine Concubito," is devoted to stories of supernatural birth, which are illustrated from all parts of the world. Count Charencey's earlier work is in the list of authorities, but not this. A more notable omission is that of reference to Theodor Waitz's Anthropologie der Naturvölker. The anthropologist, of all men, must not forget the labors of his predecessors. But these are not grave faults. What one man esteems another thinks not worth mentioning. For his pains in collection and his skill in exposition Mr. Hartland deserves the praise of every student of that great eye-opener, comparative mythology.

J. M. WHEELER.

Two little children looking at the moon one evening, the younger asked—"Is the moon God's wife?" Older Child (patronisingly)—"No, you silly child; God is a bachelor."

---

* The Legend of Perseus: A Study of Tradition in Story, Custom, and Belief. By Edwin Sidney Hartland, F.S.A. Vol. I., "The Supernatural Birth." (London: D. Nutt.) 7s. 6d.

* See The Jewish Life of Christ, edited by G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler, p. 19.

Digitized by Google

THE GOSPELS AND DRAMATIC LITERATURE.

CANON GORE, in Lux Mundi, states that modern criticism asks us to regard certain books of the Old Testament "as dramatic compositions worked up on a basis of history." On reading this statement, the question occurred to us, May not the Gospels be considered also as dramatic literature based on the traditions of Palestine? Of course the ordinary orthodox believer may consider that to attempt to connect the drama with alleged sacred writings is very reprehensible. We would, however, remind Christians that the origin of the drama of India is attributed to a sage who was inspired by Brahma, that in Greece it originated in the national religion, and that the performances were given in what were termed the sacred places. History informs us that, for a long period after the Norman Conquest, dramatic performances took place in the churches at certain Christian festivals. In the Middle Ages the Church imitated the Roman dramatists, and enacted, in Christian "places of worship," plays founded on the incidents of the Old and New Testaments, the performers being Churchmen. About the time of the Reformation the drama was the medium selected for the purpose of exposing the vices of the Roman Catholic clergy, and checking their ecclesiastical power. At the present day, in some countries, plays are performed that are based upon Scriptural incidents. And the dramatic element is now retained in the mass that is performed in Roman Catholic cathedrals, and also in certain ceremonies gone through by the High Church Protestant party.

The orthodox view of the Gospels is, that they are the productions of supernatural inspiration, having no parallel in the history of literature. This view of the unique character of the Gospels is persistently maintained by certain Christian sects, despite the fact that eminent Bible scholars and Christian teachers acknowledge that the date of their origin is uncertain, that their authorship is unknown, and that their teachings are doubtful and contradictory. We admit that, if the claim of their divine origin and unique nature could be demonstrated, they would be something more than mere dramatic compositions. But, notwithstanding repeated efforts, this claim has not been proved. The once-cherished idea, that the New Testament is verbally accurate in the sense of its being infallible, is now abandoned. It was found that in the production of such a work clerk-like precision and freedom from the possibility of error would have been necessary; but this was not the case with the Gospels, which were evidently written by fallible men, who held most erroneous ideas upon even the ordinary affairs of daily life, and who committed palpable mistakes in history, in science, and in morals. It is obvious that one historical error, one contradiction, or different versions of the same event, are sufficient to dispose of the theory of inspired infallibility. But when these incongruities are multiplied by the hundreds, as they can be in the Gospels, it is folly to suppose that these so-called sacred writings are aught else but ordinary productions of writers who were far from being infallible.

Moreover, as other books were found that contained statements as wonderful and as inexplicable as any recorded in the Gospels, the claim for the unique character of the latter can no longer be consistently sustained. If it be asked, Will not the objections here made against alleged divinely-inspired books equally apply if the books are regarded as dramas? the answer would be no, inasmuch as the elements which orthodox believers claim as being essential to establish the divine origin and nature of the Gospels are not required in acknowledged human works, however lofty they may be in conception, or brilliant in execution. The finest work in all literature is only called "divine" in a conventional sense—such as we mean when we speak of Shakespeare as "the divine William." The expression is not intended to refer to a power above nature, but to a superior genius in nature. Books that were once called "divine" lost, as time rolled on, the distinctive character originally assigned to them. It is conceded by many writers of Christian apologetics to-day that the Gospels are but human productions, and therefore any speculation as to their origin, character, and purpose is legitimate. Although this may be granted by the intelligent few, there are many others who will not accept our contention without questioning its correctness. They will, no doubt, consider that the consequences of agreeing with us would destroy their old faith in Bible veracity. It may be an advantage, therefore, to refer to instances of the marvellous found in books which are not claimed to be more than human.

In "Plutarch's Lives," which may be readily consulted in the English language, wonderful events are recorded of a far more imposing character than anything found in the Gospels. We are not here concerned as to the causes assigned, or the explanation given, of such marvellous events. They may be ascribed to God, the devil, magic, a perverted imagination, or to any other agency. In any case, it would not affect the position here taken. Our object is to show that incidents which appeared to many to be of a "supernatural" character have occurred in all ages and among all nations; and, therefore, they were by no means limited to the Gospel writers. In a later age than either that of Plutarch or of the writers of the Gospels, "supernatural" characters have appeared, surrounded by all the embellishments supplied by the master-mind of "the immortal Shakespeare," who depicts all kinds of heroes, and makes them illustrate in their sayings and doings the various phases of actual life. He presents truths with dramatic accessories; why may not the same principle be applied to the incidents which are said to have taken place in Palestine? We hope to show that the Gospels furnish just the materials suitable for the application of such a principle. In all superstitions there is, probably, some element of truth; but that is no reason why we should believe all the absurdities associated with grains of fact.

If we admire a drama, it is not necessary that we should regard all its characters as being historical. For instance, Shakespeare gives us a noble picture of Roman life in his play of Julius Cæsar, but some persons will not agree with him that Brutus "was the noblest Roman of them all." His action, according to the play, involved the death of one of his most illustrious countrymen, and ultimately he killed himself. Now, whatever opinion may be entertained as to the accuracy and morality of these acts as recorded, the dramatic halo of the play is not destroyed. In like manner, because we discover in the Gospels much that is evidently untrue and opposed to ethical science, we need not necessarily allege that the whole of the narratives are false. It is quite possible that the writers of these Gospels drew upon their imaginations and invested Christ with fictitious qualities, and gave a "supernatural" color to events in his life, as authors of dramatic literature did before, and have done since, with their heroes. Read as mere dramas, much in the Gospels can be understood that otherwise would appear to us quite inexplicable.

A striking parallel exists between the criticism of the history of the Gospels and the study of the authorship of Shakespeare's plays. The question as to when, where, and by whom these Gospels were written has been discussed again and again. Disputes have also been frequent as to their true meaning. The early career of their hero, and his domestic associations, have been subjected to disputation. Similar controversies have taken place as to the writings of Shakespeare. Such questions as, Was he the author of the plays that bear his name? were the originals of his characters his own creations? and what was the meaning of his language? have all been subjects of controversy. The history of his early life, and of his family relations, has been freely discussed. It may be asked what bearing these points have upon the Gospels? Simply this: that, instead of the Gospels being unique in their nature and history, as they are thought to be by orthodox believers, it is easy to show that in many respects the marvellous features in their narratives have an approximate parallel in Shakespeare's literature. Of course it is not intended to compare, intellectually, Christ with Shakespeare, for no such comparison could be made. "The Bard of Avon," in mental capacity, in sublimity of thought, in genius of conception, in grandeur of expression, and in practical useful teaching, towers mountains high above the "Reformer of Judea."

If it be true that Jesus achieved a high position despite his humble birth and lack of early education, it is also true that Shakespeare, having to encounter similar drawbacks, gained a much higher position, and gave to mankind a legacy of intellectual worth, unequalled by anything found in the New Testament, or in any other literature in the world. What could be more extraordinary than the success of Shakespeare in the path of true greatness? He was born of illiterate parents, he was self-educated, and he appeared amidst a galaxy of mental geniuses and brilliant wits; and yet he outshone them all in intellectual glory. It might be said, to use a form of speech known to theologians, "Never man wrote like this man." Truly, he was "not of one age, but for all time."

Digitized by Google

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

WOMAN AND THE CHURCH.

ONE of the most common claims of the Christian Church is that the present improved condition of woman in our country is owing to its influence and its teachings. It is often asserted by the clergy that her high development and her position of honor and influence to-day are due to the Christian religion. This, like most of the proud boasting in which they are accustomed to indulge, has little or no foundation in fact. So far as our knowledge extends, there is absolutely no evidence that Christianity has been of any benefit to woman; but, on the contrary, we think that it can be shown that, for whatever progress she has made, she is in no wise indebted to the Church. It is a matter of common knowledge that in her efforts to secure her political rights she has always encountered its persistent opposition; and, with few exceptions, the advocates of this great reform have been found in the Rationalistic ranks. The eminent women who have been the leaders in the movement for the enfranchisement of their sex, such as Mary Wollstonecraft, Frances Wright, Ernestine L. Rose, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Helen H. Gardener, and Susan H. Wixon, have never held allegiance to the Church, but, on the contrary, have always been pronounced Freethinkers; and whatever progress woman has made in this direction has been in spite of the most bitter opposition from Christian theologians.

This is not strange when it is remembered that the book on which their theology is based nowhere recognises woman as the equal of man, but, on the contrary, regards her as his soulless slave. What can be more degrading than the teachings of St. Paul in regard to woman; such, for instance, as the following?—

> "Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law.
> "And if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church" (1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35).
> "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord.
> "For the husband is head of his wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church; and he is the savior of the body.
> "Therefore, as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything" (Ephesians v. 22, 23, 24).
> "Let the women learn in silence with all subjection.
> "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence.
> "For Adam was first formed, then Eve" (1 Timothy ii. 11, 12, 13).

With what reason can it be claimed that such commands as these have an elevating influence upon the female sex? If they were rigidly enforced to-day as they were in the early history of the Church, no woman would ever be allowed to speak in a public religious meeting, but would be compelled to remain silent; and if she has acquired any liberty in this respect, she has done so in opposition to the teachings of the Church, and not because of them. According to both Christ and Moses, a husband had the right to divorce his wife at any time, but the poor wife had no redress for her wrongs. How, then, can a religion, which permits or sanctions such gross injustice as this, be of any benefit to women? Had it not been for Christianity, we believe that the women of the United States would long since have been enfranchised, and would to-day be enjoying not only equal political rights and privileges with her brothers, but also equal opportunities in the struggle of life; and it is our profound conviction that they will never possess the rights to which they are justly entitled until the Christian religion, and all other forms of supernaturalism, are utterly destroyed.

—Boston Investigator.

FROM DARKNESS UNTO DARKNESS.

A CERTAIN king, grown old and feeling death drawing nigh, became uneasy about his soul.

He walked feebly amidst the flowers and statuary and glistening fountains in his pleasurance, but found therein no more delight. He sat in his great chambers of carven rare woods and many-colored marble and wrought gold, while musicians of wondrous skill played, and maidens, beautiful exceedingly, danced to him; but unto him came no joy.

"All these things are become as the foolish playthings of children unto me," he cried, "for I am come near the grave, and am sick from fear of what cometh."

And he gathered about him all the men of his kingdom reputed wise.

And he said unto them: "O ye wise ones! I am soon to leave this world of brief vanities. Whither goeth I, and how then shall it fare with my soul?"

The wisest of the wise answered: "Out of the grave cometh no voice, O King."

"Say you then," cried the King, "that thy wisdom teaches ye nought concerning these things?"

"The grave is jealous of her secrets, O King," answered the wisest. "Who of the living can say of them, This I know?"

And the King was yet more troubled and afraid.

And there came unto the King one day a woman deep bent with the burden of her years.

"O, King!" she cried unto him, "why troublest thou about thy soul?"

"Thou, too, art near death," said the King; "hast thou no trouble nor any fear? The grave is a place of dread surmises; the wisest even cannot say 'It is well.'"

The old woman answered nothing, but lit a waxen taper.

"It lives," she said.

The taper burned with a steady light and clear, until it was almost consumed; then it flickered.

"It dies," she said.

The taper was consumed and the light vanished.

"It is dead," she said. "Whither goeth the light, O King?"

The King sat awhile in silence, deep in meditation. Then answered he: "From nowhere, whence it came. From darkness unto darkness. It was not; it became; it is not."

"Thou hast said all, O King," said the old woman; "for that which was not, can I regret? For that which cannot be why should I trouble, why be afraid? Let the taper be a parable unto you, O King!"

The woman departed; and the King died, fearing nothing.

HARRY H.

CONSOLATION; OR, RUM AND RELIGION.

THE drunkard feels a "sinking,"
Which he tries to cure by drinking,
But the soothing-seeming antidote is vain;
The "sinking" prompts to drinking,
But the drinking caused the "sinking";
Yes, the cherished consolation is the bane!

The Christian feels a "sinking,"
Which he treats with mental drinking,
But the Bible-seeming antidote is vain;
The "sinking" prompts to drinking,
But the "drinking" caused the "sinking":
Yes, the cherished consolation is the bane!

G. L. MACKENZIE.

Keep Church and State forever separate.—Ulysses Grant.

Digitized by Google

CHRISTIAN INFIDELITY.

The word "infidel" undergoes a strange transformation from its original signification when applied by professors of any religion to those who differ from them in belief. Etymologically its meaning is "unfaithful," and in that sense it is always used in speaking of secular affairs. To charge infidelity upon husband and wife, upon parent or child, upon citizen or friend, as such, is not to attribute to any of these an absence of belief in their obligations, but a violation of known duty. In religion this is changed, and he is called an infidel whose ideas concerning God and futurity are not in unison with those of the pious speaker.

In the primary and natural sense of the word, infidelity is a contemptible meanness and a detestable crime. In its theological application it becomes a virtue and an honorable distinction. According to their own definition, we will accept this title from our Christian friends with thankful acknowledgment. The cap fits exactly. We will put it on and wear it with becoming pride. In return we will present our believing brother with a cap which we think will fit equally well.

Believing friend, what a terrible infidel you are! We will not say you do not believe as you profess, because, although your favorite book says "all men are liars," and you agree with that sentiment in a general way, we know that you are painfully sensitive when a particular application of it is made to yourself, and we do not wish to wound your feelings if we can avoid it. We will stifle the misgiving which will sometimes, in spite of our human charity, arise within us, and admit that you believe all that you say you do. We will not charge you with infidelity to Noah's ark or Jonah's whale. We sympathise with the weariness which you must feel on hearing those tales of ancient mariners referred to with merciless frequency. Besides, you probably accept those tales only in their "esoteric" meaning, and as that, for aught we know to the contrary, may mean that there was no Noah, no ark, no Jonah, and no whale, there may not be much difference between us on these points. But, at least, you believe that the Sermon on the Mount is good sound teaching, the very essence of pure and undefiled Christianity, and that New Testament morality is good for mankind. Then, Christian, whatever may be your station in life, whatever your occupation, whatever your intellectual capacity, whatever your moral character, you are, we repeat, a terrible infidel, for you daily and hourly live your infidelity. You believe that the poor are blessed. If you are wealthy, you strive to add to your riches, or, at least, to retain your grasp on all that you possess. You take pride in adorning your persons, your dwellings, and your churches; in surrounding yourself with the evidences of your opulence, and in dishonoring your supposed master by the most flagrant violations of the principles you say were his. The elegant temple of worship, the stained window, the jewelled mitre, the richly carved altar, the luxuriantly cushioned pews, are all costly professions of infidelity to the manger and the cross in which you believe. You believe that your great teacher said, "Sell all thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven"; and, infidel to his teaching that you are, you sell the very life blood, the bone, nerve, muscle, sinew, brain, of the poor, that you may add to the treasure on earth, of which you already possess more than your just share.

If you are poor in this world's goods, we do not wish to speak severely, for poverty and Christianity together are two terrible burdens to carry. Still, if you make an attempt to lighten me of these burdens, if you ask for a fair wage for a fair day's work, if you take one thought for to-morrow's needs, or endeavor to provide for the future of your family, you are acting wisely and doing your duty as a man, but are a living infidel to the religion in which you believe.

If you occupy a pulpit, if you write "Rev." before your name, and, perhaps, "D.D." after it; if you call yourself a Christian clergyman, and claim to be a teacher of the Gospel, under whom the laity should sit and submissively learn, you are the most outrageous infidel of all, for you demand respect and distinction for belonging to a class described by your own high authority as "whited sepulchres" without, but "within full of dead men's bones and all manner of corruption." The dead bones of dogmas slain by the sword of reason long, long ago, the fetid corruption of superstition and hypocrisy, are within you, and when you speak it is that which is within that proceedeth out of the mouth. The priestly caste is the same here to-day as it was in Judea two thousand years ago, as it always has been in every land and at all times—the representative of the dead past crushing the living present. Whether the infernal tortures you most dread are to be found in a lake of fire and brimstone, in agonies of conscience, or in the just execration of mankind, you who, from your untaxed pulpits, would stop the wheels of human progress and bid freedom succumb to tyranny, answer this question, as pointedly addressed to you as it could at any time have been to your predecessors, the sacerdotal infidels of ages gone: "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?"

Christian infidel, your kind of infidelity is bad for your moral nature. If Christianity is good to believe, it must be good to practise. If you think it is true, honestly try to live accordingly. If you find that impossible, confess that it is an impracticable system, and try another. Cease to be an infidel in fact, and accept the name gracefully. It is sure to be applied to you if you practise fidelity to your own reason. It will not hurt you. It is an honorable distinction.

In conclusion, I will give two definitions of the word, perhaps as a specimen of what might be done in the way of a much-needed "Dictionary of Exoteric and Esoteric Meanings." Infidel—Exoteric: Unfaithful, false, treacherous, deceitful, one who fails in the fulfilment of obligations. Esoteric: One who is faithful to the principle of truth, declining to profess religious belief which he does not possess.

E. J. Bowtell.

—Boston Investigator.

THE BIBLE.

The very strangest facts in the world are perhaps seen in the life of religious people. Mohammedans believe most ardently that the Koran is of supernatural origin; the Hindoos believe the same of their holy books, as do Buddhists and certain others; and Jews and Christians believe the Bible to be a book of unity and of divine origin. Even educated laymen will still talk to you as if doubt or disbelief of the origin and authority of the Bible had never been heard of; just as, when I was in New Zealand, a young popish barrister spoke to me devoutly, reverently, believingly of the miracle of St. Januarius' blood—the transparent, impudent trick perpetrated at Naples yearly! I see no difference worth naming between the man who believes the Bible and him I have just named. Each can give his paltry reasons for his belief; and the reasons of the one are quite as good as those of the other—quite. Early bias decides the faith of each and all believers. There is nothing else in it. No free and unprejudiced man could believe the Bible to be anything above human, or anything to boast of at that. No unbiased man ever believed the Naples miracle-trick, or any other miracle. Scholars must write and speak for many a year yet before human ignorance and prejudice drop the Bible. Of course, we know its fate well enough. The Bible is a doomed book, which by-and-bye will no more be reverenced than other antiquities, or than other things which have played a noted part in the world's affairs, for good or ill. Dr. Wildboer has recently published Origins of the Canon of the New Testament, which the Westminster Review thinks finally disposes of the traditional theory of the supernatural origin and unity of the Old Testament. People, in other respects rational enough, will still believe in the book, for logic plays no part in most people's faith. They were trained in a certain course, and they stick to it, no matter how ridiculous. But we Freethinkers must lose no opportunity of turning the Bible into ridicule, for so long as it rules it cheats, and the cheat perverts the world and produces much mischief. Let us carry on the fight.

Joseph Symes.

Digitized by Google

IN AND OUT OF CHURCH.

Dogma dealer, talking treason,
Spurning truth, perverting reason
In and out of folly's season
Year by year.

Oh, a plague on all the twaddle
In your hum-drum niddle-noddle,
Mammon's law-paid molly-coddle,
Limp with fear.

Is there "sin" in worldly leaven?
Yet there's not one day in seven
When you fail to sell your gammon—
All for pelf.

"Heaven to let" to paying lodger;
Ah, you canting devil-dodger,
Damn not us who spurn your Mammon—
Damn yourself!

If I've done some bad behaving,
And I don't deserve the saving,
Then 'tis honor bids the braving
Of my dues.

Pilot souls to your sky places
Who are full of Sunday graces,
And with sweat from poor men's faces
Pay for pews.

Call the purse-proud from their blisses,
Call the fashionable misses
From "advisers'" holy kisses—
Call and call.

Call the people's sly mind-shapers,
Call the kings of daily papers,
Cutting "law and order" capers—
One and all.

Here's my Lord Archbishop, mind you,
Paid to gorge himself and blind you,
Till your very self can't find you
Anywhere.

Simple Jesus! See the old 'un!
Why, his dinner-plates are golden!
May the sight our hearts embolden
In our prayer.

Ah, dismiss them with a "blessing,"
All intoning and confessing;
Never more our souls distressing
With their cant.

Help to silence priestly mumble,
Help the Mammon-temples tumble,
Freedom's banner o'er the jumble
Firm to plant.

Come, dear toilers, stained and weary,
Come and help the world grow cheery,
Come from out your prison dreary—
Built by greed.

You who labor heavy laden,
Slaving mother, trampled maiden,
Ever preached to, ever preyed on,
In your need,

Let your winters grow no colder,
Rise at last and dare be bolder,
Setting shoulder firm to shoulder
For a thrust!

Yokes be eased, and burdens lighter,
As the great Hope warms the fighter,
And the broad New Day grows brighter
And more just.

L. S. Bevington.

The Delight of the Gods.

Sacrifice, under its varied forms, in its manifold conceptions—sacrifice is the fundamental doctrine of religion. "Slay! slay!" This word of the bishop who massacred Béziers might have been inscribed upon the pediment of certain edifices, which have less deserved the name of temples than of slaughter-houses. The flesh of men, the meat of beasts—for these the appetite of the gods has been insatiable. —Elie Réclus, "Primitive Folk," p. 304.

ACID DROPS.

Matilda Perz is a Mexican washerwoman, inhabiting the town of Anahuac. Of course she owns a collection of flat irons. She kept them in a basket, together with a little image of the Virgin. One night—it was the seventeenth of June—Matilda was astonished to see a light issue from the basket. Examination proved that the flat irons were innocent; it was the image of the Virgin that had taken to illuminating. Being placed on the wall, this wonderful image was visited by a multitude of sick people, who were all healed. This beats Lourdes hollow. Evidently the American continent, even in the matter of miracles, doesn't mean to be beaten by "effete Europe."

After the recent exposure of Lourdes miracles, through the confession of the impostor, Delanoy, it is not surprising that the priests should try to drown the voice of criticism by shouting "More miracles! More miracles!" Father Bailly, Superior of the Pères de la Croix, who organised the new pilgrimage to the Sacred Grotto, assures an interviewer that this year's miracles are extremely numerous. Telegrams announcing cases of healing pour in daily. Hundreds of cripples have thrown away their crutches. Poor fools! They'll want them again very soon.

Twenty-five thousand pilgrims have visited Lourdes during August. Think of it! In the land of Voltaire! Is it not absurd to say that the work of "destructive" Freethought is completed? So far as the masses are concerned, science has only spread a thin veneer of common sense over their coarse credulity.

The recent revelations of the prize Lourdes miracle seem to have little effect on the minds of the Catholic sick, who of course are kept in ignorance by their priests. Trains full of the sick and dying have poured into Lourdes during the past few weeks. "Their wretched occupants," says a correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, "are lying helplessly about the railway station clamoring to be carried to the sacred grotto."

The New York World (August 5) has the following: "Macon, Ga., August 4.—'He has come to see me, and I know he forgives me now,' said old Mrs. Nobles this morning, who is under sentence of death for the murder of her husband. She had helped to put him out of the way because, as she said, he 'pestered' her. She says the old man came to her bed-side last night, and together they discussed their children. 'We didn't say nothin' about the killin', but I jes' know he forgives me, or he wouldn't hev cum.' It is generally believed that she will escape the gallows, as the sentiment here against hanging a woman is very strong. She is very illiterate, the lowest type of the 'cracker.'" Persons of Mrs. Nobles' type usually do see ghosts, and ghost-worship lies at the bottom of all religion.

The believer in prayer who some time ago suggested that the occasion for floods was the many petitions for rain, now attempts an explanation of cyclones. So many people are at once praying for those at sea, who are going in opposite directions, that the Almighty, to oblige them all, sends the winds in a circular direction. We have advised the believer to communicate his views to the meteorological office.

In connection with the Church of St. Raphael, where the marriage between Hélène de France and the Duke of Aosta took place, there is a story not generally known. It was built with the moneys of a converted Jew named Raphael. Just after the building was completed, Raphael had a dream that he would die within a week after the consecration of the place of worship. As a matter of course he endeavored to delay the consecration by fair and unfair means, until a priest, with the help of a licensed victualler from the neighborhood, who procured a bottle of absolutely pure wine, consecrated the edifice. Then he told Raphael, who took to his bed and died three days afterwards!

Thirty-nine Christian congregations in Japan claim to be self-supporting, and, as they pay for themselves, desire native teachers, without outside rule, from Europeans. The home missionary societies do not see it. They have a shrewd suspicion that Christianity, left to the Japanese themselves, may take new and surprising developments.

According to the religious papers, the missionaries lately killed in China have attained to the glory of martyrdom, and are presumably enjoying most excellent positions in heaven. But, somehow or other, there is no gratitude shown towards the Chinese who have conferred these benefits upon them. The British Government is called upon to adopt a more "vigorous" policy, and we all know what that means—bullying, gun-boats, big guns, and wholesale slaughter, ending up with wholesale theft.

Digitized by Google

It is really time to tell these missionaries that they have a perfect right to go to China, if they can; and a perfect right to get killed there, if they must; but no right whatever to demand assistance or protection except from the Lord; and if he chooses to let them be slaughtered, let them be duly thankful for his kindness in calling them to paradise, instead of screaming for vengeance and somebody's blood.

"Christ has commanded us to preach the Gospel to every creature." So says the Methodist Times. Very well then; let the missionaries preach it, and let Mr. Price Hughes join them; but let them also look to Christ, whose commands they are obeying, to take care of them while under service. It is certainly a strange thing to see a British redcoat, with a rifle and a hundred cartridges, helping the Lord Jesus to protect his employees.

William Ferguson, aged twenty-six, appeared before the Glasgow Sheriff on a charge of stealing butter and tobacco. He said he was glad to find himself there, as his apprehension had brought him to the feet of Jesus. The Sheriff gave him six months to study the feet of Jesus thoroughly.

The steeple of Croyland Abbey, one of the oldest in the kingdom, has been struck by lightning. The rector appeals for £1,880 for repairs.

A number of deaths by lightning are reported as occurring during the recent storms. Doubtless such phenomena contributed to the superstition of the past, and perhaps some of the judgments of God which we read of in the Old Testament may have happened in this way.

At Quakertown, Pa., lightning struck the Methodist church, killing one young lady and melting her gold watch into a solid mass. The pastor, the Rev. L. F. Bowman, had most of his clothing literally torn from his body, and all down his face, chest, and the whole front part of his body the lightning made a frightful burn. Seventeen others were stunned, and lay in heaps on the floor. The church was turned into a hospital, and a miracle of Providence was discovered in that the 600 pound bell had not fallen to crush the congregation. "He is a rum un, is Providence," as the rustic remarked.

The New York World reports that at Bay City, Michigan, "James Burgess, in a fit of despondency over inability to get work, prayed publicly and privately for death. His prayer not being answered, he tried to starve himself to death; but the starving process became tiresome. As a last resort he tried to brain himself with a hatchet. His head was badly cut, but the doctors think he will recover."

Strong-minded Freethinkers have often been a bit plagued with the sentimental piety of relatives. When a Freethinker is dying and cannot help himself, these well-meaning impertinents sometimes bring in a member of the Black Army to mumble a little nonsense and depart full of cake and sherry. Sometimes they print sloppy verse on mourning cards, and sometimes they carve imbecilities on tombstones.

Professor Huxley was apparently allowed to die in peace, but his relatives gave the great Agnostic a Christian funeral; and, according to the New Age, they have engraved the following lines upon the stone which marks his grave:—

> And if there be no meeting past the grave;
> If all is darkness, silence, yet 'tis rest.
> Be not afraid, ye waiting hearts that weep,
> For God still "giveth his beloved sleep,"
> And if an endless sleep He wills—so best.

These are not the sentiments which were expressed in Huxley's writings. He never prated about "God," nor spelt his pronouns with capitals. This is the unconscious betrayal of piety speaking through the dead Agnostic's lips.

One of the strangest coffins ever told of is that for which the British war department is said to be responsible. The story is that a workman engaged in casting metal for the manufacture of ordnance at the Woolwich Arsenal lost his balance and fell into a cauldron containing twelve tons of molten steel. The metal was at white heat, and the man was utterly consumed in less time than it takes to tell of it. The war department authorities held a conference, and decided not to profane the dead by using the metal in the manufacture of ordnance, and the mass of metal was actually buried, and a Church of England clergyman read the service for the dead over it.

The General of the Order of the Brothers of Charity went from Rome to Erlau to inspect the convent there. While the General was examining the books, a maid-servant entered the room with some refreshments. Female servants are against the rule in convents of this Order, and the General immediately dismissed the Prior and confiscated all his private property.

Belief in possession by devils is not yet extinct. A writer in the Tablet (August 24), speaking of the Luciferans, says: "A far worse case is that of Phineas Walder, who died in London some years ago. He succeeded in getting his daughter, Sophia, so completely possessed by a demon that she is now in hopes that Antichrist may be her great grandson." The curious thing is that Sophia is not in a lunatic asylum. According to the writer, she "generally is either in America or on the Continent, not in London."

Harry Alfred Long is going on to fresh conquests. After apprising the Scottish people of what is unknown in London—namely, that the Hall of Science has been turned into a Salvation Army barracks—he got into a debate with that unutterable blackguard who started the filthy libel which we ran down a few months ago in a court of justice. Long and Powell met in the City Hall to show how Christians love one another. Here is one incident of the encounter, described in the Daily Mail: "Shouting and bawling were engaged in. A large number of those present got up on their seats and hurled threats and epithets at the principals and the chairman." By and by there was something like a free fight, and the police entered to restore order. And the whole blessed lot were Christians!

The clericals have put out three schemes for getting more public money for their schools. (1) That of the archbishops and bishops, asking that funds shall be provided by the Education Department. (2) The scheme of the National Society that the State should fix the teaching staff and pay the teachers in all schools, and (3) a scheme of paying for voluntary schools out of the rates. The Times calls on them to coalesce their schemes, but as plunder is the object of them all, we sincerely hope that, while the thieves fall out, honest folks will keep their own.

The English Churchman says that the Church at Stratford-on-Avon "appears to be more of a Shakespeare Show House" than the House of God. It would not have so many visitors were it otherwise.

The Difesa is the official organ of the Roman Catholic Church in Venice. This paper contributes towards peace on earth and goodwill among men by declaring that, "besides being perjurers, forgers, thieves, and swindlers, the Jews are also assassins for religious purposes." Mrs. Robertson, the wife of the author of Fra Paolo Sarpi, who records this, and much else in the same strain, remarks: "In England such articles would have no effect on the public mind, save to despise both writer and publisher; but in Venice, where there are, unfortunately, too many 'clerically' disposed families, the effect has been to close a number of doors against Jews seeking employment, and to render the life of those who hold places and offices almost unbearable."

W. J. H. Traynor, the President of the American Protective Association, writes in the North American Review on the menace of Romanism. He points out that all good Catholics hold that the Pontiff is delegated with supreme temporal power from a divine source, and that this claim is not put forward in America simply because the civil law is in blank opposition to ecclesiastical law. He claims that the A. P. A. keeps the Catholic Church in check. Pius IX. thundered anathemas and bulls at all liberty whatsoever. Leo XIII. and his lieutenants in the United States approach the same end wrapped in the mantle of American liberty, and with speech softened by the oil of diplomacy. All Papal policy is directed to one end—an end that outlives all popes; and, when Leo goes the way of all flesh, will be followed with the relentlessness of a sleuthhound by his successor. This end is the restoration of the temporal power, the bringing of the whole world to the foot of the Church, the exaltation of the Holy Father into the Sovereign Pontiff.

A gentleman in Shakespeare remarks that the Devil can cite Scripture for his purpose. You can prove almost anything from the Bible, if you only go the right way to work. Its contents are so vast and various that you can find a text to countenance nearly every craze that arises in the addled brains of superstition. Take the following illustration. One of the Messianic texts, according to Christians, is this: "He keepeth all his bones; not one of them is broken." This is said to refer by anticipation to Jesus Christ. The two thieves who were crucified with him are related to have had their legs broken by the Roman soldiers, but J. C. was spared this outrage, as it was thought that he was dead already.

But now come the Peculiar People, whose peculiarity is that they try to act upon what they consider the Bible means. One of them has just told an East-end coroner that Peculiar People never break an arm or a leg; if they do, it proves they are not Peculiar People. Being asked for a reason, the "Peculiar" elder, who was giving evidence at the inquest, cited this very text about keeping his bones. Any strong fellow with a big iron bar could demonstrate on the legs of all the Peculiar People that there was not a Peculiar Person amongst them.

Digitized by Google

These Peculiar People preserve some old superstitions. The early Christians believed their bones were the seeds of the resurrection, and hence objected to cremation. Bastian tells us that the natives of Bamba say their great Fetish dwells in the bush, where he cannot be seen by anyone. When he dies the priest carefully collects all his bones, so that he may preserve and nourish them that they may revive again when they acquire new flesh and blood. The legend of Jesus escaping the practice usual with criminals is founded on this superstition.

In their doctrine of oiling and laying on of hands, the "Peculiars" also maintain the express injunctions of St. James. Yet the bishops who lay their hands on the heads of all the priests they ordain, saying, "Receive the Holy Ghost," doubtless deride the superstition of the Peculiar People, who are not quite so anxious to escape from kingdom come as themselves.

A new Messiah has sprung up in New Mexico. His name is Francis Schlader. Like the old one, he has spread his fame by his mighty deeds. A string of people follow him, praying to touch the hem of his garment. Blind, deaf, and halt are led or carried to him; women with tiny babes bring them to him to be healed of ailments real or imaginary; old, middle-aged, young, ignorant, and educated Mexicans, Americans of the highest standing in the community, visit him at the lowly homes he most frequents, or in the homes of the rich and prominent, in which he is a welcome guest. One prominent and wealthy citizen has promised to build a church to Schlader if his wife be cured of an affliction. Schlader must look out. He may get too popular, and then perhaps he will be run in by the authorities, if not served like his prototype.

How does this Messiah work his miracles? They follow from his appearance. He is a native of Alsace and Lorraine, and is said to bear a remarkable resemblance to the pictures of J.C., and arranges his hair in a similar manner. This is all the secret. The result is he is followed about by devotees praying him to heal them, and many declare they are healed. Great is the power of faith, as the advertisers of pills well know. It may carry a colocynth concoctor to fortune, as, in the old days, it turned a successful medicine man into a god.

More than one fetish man in Africa, and fakir in India, has gone far on the road to godhead by knowing the occult properties of croton oil. He writes a prescription therein or smears the paper, tells the patient to swallow the charm, and, when it operates, the patient declares, "Here is an exorcisor of demons worthy to rank with the gods."

The Methodists of Colorado are a little ahead of those at home, and have voted in favor of admitting women as lay delegates to the General Conference. Whether the women or the Church will gain by the change is a question.

Mrs. Gregory, who obtained a decree nisi for a divorce on the ground of the cruelty and adultery of her husband, a Manchester clergyman, has had the decree made absolute.

The most Christian and Catholic Emperor of Austria does not want any real disciples of Jesus in his dominions. Dr. Bela Skarpan was serving his second half year at the garrison of Kashan, and six weeks before the termination of the time wrote a letter to the Commander, declaring himself as a disciple of Count Tolstoi, and that his principles now forbade him to serve any longer in the army. It was at first believed that Skarpan was disturbed in intellect, and the matter was treated as if nothing had taken place, But the Doctor persisting, he was placed under arrest, examined as a lunatic, and, finally, sentenced to the loss of his rank, to three months' strict imprisonment, to serve all the lost serving time, and to the loss of his medical diploma. He cannot practise in the Austro-Hungarian kingdom, or in any other State in alliance with that kingdom.

Dr. Griffith John, of the English mission in China, says: "The opium trade has been forced by Christian England upon the Chinese, and that in direct opposition to the moral convictions of the nation as well as the honest and long-continued resistance of the Chinese Government." This must be pleasant reading to English Christians who send missionaries to convert the heathen Chinese. "The Chinese," says Dr. John, "call us 'devils,' and when I think of this unprincipled and destructive trade I cease to wonder at it." Well, "the devils" are Bible-readers and true-blue Christians.

The aim of the new Curates' Movement is, we are told, to bring about these two reforms: (1) The entire abolition of the present system of patronage in the Church of England; and (2) the abrogation of all the existing distinctions between incumbents and curates by the substitution therefor of parochial colleges of priests. If, says the Rev. Dr. Thackeray (Greenwich), these reforms can be obtained within the Church without the necessity of Disestablishment, well and good. If not, then some amongst us will know that that policy, to which we are at present disinclined, will not be without its very valuable compensations.—Daily News.

The Spiritists of the Manchester district had a meeting in regard to the recent conviction of Miss Smith and Mrs. Hankey for professing to tell fortunes. They did not resolve to carry the case to a higher court, leaving the suspicion that there is something shady in the case; but they petitioned Mr. Balfour, "as a recognised friend of psychical research," to repeal the obnoxious enactment by which the convictions were obtained. They also submitted a memorial to the Home Secretary for an inquiry on behalf of Miss Smith, making no mention of her co-defendant. The meeting also passed a resolution, necessary for its own credit, denouncing those who practised mediumship for purposes of gain.

By the Act of George IV., chap. 83, sec. 4, every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive or impose on any of Her Majesty's subjects, is punishable as a rogue and vagabond; and liable, on conviction, to commitment by one Justice for not exceeding fourteen days, or by two Justices in petty sessional court for not exceeding three calendar months. The words "or otherwise" were, in the Slade case, construed to cover pretence to hold communication with the spirits of the dead, the Act being interpreted by the light of 9 George II., chap. 5, which repealed the Acts against witchcraft, while making its pretences a felony. The penalty of three months' imprisonment with hard labor was given in the case of Slade.

The practice of astrology, for the purposes of gain, is an offence against the statute, and even the offering by advertisement in newspapers to cast nativities and answer astrological questions, and pretending by circular letter, in return for certain remuneration, to furnish a description of the person, liability to disease, marriage, occupation most suitable, etc., by the position of the planets at nativity, without proof that anybody has been told anything, has been regarded as ample legal evidence of a pretence to tell fortunes.

We are totally averse to any attempt to stamp out old faiths or new by legal penalties. Every form of opinion and practice should have a fair field and no favor, unless it is a manifest breach of the peace or incitement to crime. No one is obliged to pay mediums or astrologers, any more than to consult a phrenologist or physician; and it is always the poor ones, who in some cases manifest very interesting survivals of ancient faiths, who are dropped upon. It is time this Vagabond Act was repealed. Obtaining wealth by false representations of another world is too old a game, and one too consecrated in high places, to die out by any other force than that of education.

A writer in the English Churchman on "Are Missions a Mistake?" says that Christ's commands, for which he cited the Apocryphal Mark xv. 15, are addressed, like the claptrap sermons of devil dodgers, "to men only." Therefore missionary women had no business in China.

Sixteen thousand deaths from cholera are reported from Japan. Of course, the Christian God cannot be expected to look after heathens.

Thaddeus McCarthy, Bishop of Cork, 1490–1492, has had his cultus confirmed by the Roman Congregation of Rites. His funeral is said to have been marked by miracles, and there are plenty of priests who hope to get some good out of the old bishop yet.

The Journal of Education gives the following among actual children's answers:—Q.—Give a proof of the earth being round. A.—It says in the Bible, "World without end." Q.—What happened to the Israelites after they ate the quails? A.—They had indigestion. Q.—On what occasion did our Lord use the words, "With God all things are possible"? A.—To the woman who had seven husbands. Q.—How many Apostles were there? A.—Thirteen. St. Matthew tells the names of twelve, and St. John gives us the name of the other one—"Verily," that Jesus used to talk to so much.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

September 8, Glasgow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—Sept. 1, Plymouth; 22, Sheffield. October 6 and 13, Foresters' Hall, London; 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh. November 17, Liverpool.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

J. M. R. (Glasgow).—Thanks for the enclosures. Scotland is still much darkened by Christian superstition, but the light of Freethought is gradually spreading.

W. Bennett.—You may well have knowledge enough to be a Freethinker—as it is evident you have—without having acquired the art of writing good verse. The composition of poetry does not come by nature, like eating and drinking; it comes by close study and long and careful practice. Take our advice and stick to prose.

London Secular Federation.—Miss A. Brown, hon. sec., begs to acknowledge 13s. 6d. from Finsbury Park Branch, and requests that all communications, for the present, be addressed to her at 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

G. H. Rush.—We have handed your letter to Mr. Forder, who attends to all orders for literature. Mrs. Besant's Law of Population has been withdrawn from circulation. She is no longer a Malthusian.

J. Seddon.—See paragraph. We hope Mr. Cohen's labors in Manchester will be crowned with success.

A. J. H.—Mr. Armstrong's letters may deserve all your praise, but we cannot adopt your opinion without seeing for ourselves. Why not send us the correspondence?

W. T. Griffiths.—We have no right to reprint the lady's article, much as we might like to. Glad to hear you are so pleased with Mr. Foote's success at St. James's Hall.

Stanley Jones, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, N., is wishful to obtain lecturing engagements during the winter in London. He is booked up to the end of September. Metropolitan Branch secretaries will perhaps note, and communicate early with Mr. Jones.

J. G. Bartram (Newcastle).—Sorry to hear Mrs. Thornton Smith disappointed you on Sunday. It is a serious matter when a hall and advertising have to be paid for. We hope there is a satisfactory explanation.

C. S. Dodd.—The circulation of Mr. Engström's pamphlet will do us no harm; quite the contrary. Mr. Foote is now making fresh country engagements, and will offer Liverpool a date.

J. P. Gilmour.—Sorry the Glasgow Evening News published such a slanderous statement without inserting your correction. Long and Powell are a curious couple. Strange fruits of Christianity after nearly two thousand years' culture.

J. Morrison.—Cuttings are always welcome.

A. G. Levett.—Received with thanks.

W. Agnew.—Mr. Foote has many pamphlets to publish as soon as he gets rid of his present worries. His presidential duties, by preoccupying his time and attention, have been a serious hindrance to his literary work.

Enquirer.—We have not compared any of the English translations of Renan with the French originals. No edition of the Vie de Jesus is valuable unless it be the thirteenth or a later one. Renan's preface to the thirteenth edition shows a great advance on the path of heterodoxy. In particular, he gives up the Johannine authorship of the fourth gospel entirely. The book itself, apart from that preface, has very little value except as a literary composition. It is not history, but elegant religious fiction.

Papers Received.—Glasgow Evening Citizen—Port Elizabeth Telegraph—Crescent—Open Court—Christchurch Times—Two Worlds—Progressive Thinker—Boston Investigator—Morning—Truthseeker—New York Public Opinion—Isle of Man Times—Hackney and Kingsland Gazette—Freidenker—Fur Unsere Jugend—Twentieth Century—Diamond Fields Advertiser.

Parents who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SPECIAL.

My experiment at St. James's Hall has been a striking success. For the time of the year the audiences have been simply wonderful. One of the most gratifying features has been the attendance of many strangers, including a considerable proportion of ladies. As soon as I am free to do so, which I hope will be shortly, I intend to organise another course of lectures in the West-end of London, either at St. James's Hall again, or in a still larger hall in the immediate vicinity.

For the present our Sunday evening meetings will be held in the fine, large Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, within three minutes' walk of Aldersgate-street Station. Cars from the East-end, and from Holborn and Bloomsbury, pass the door. The first lecture will be delivered this evening (September 1) by Mr. S. P. Putnam, his subject being "Colonel Ingersoll and American Freethought." This is Mr. Putnam's last appearance on a public platform during his present visit to England, and there should be a large gathering of London Freethinkers. I take the chair myself on this occasion.

I have engaged the Foresters' Hall for thirteen Sundays at my own risk, undertaking to pay everything, including the lecturers' fees. We cannot take money at the doors, but tickets are printed as for the St. James's Hall lectures, only at a lower figure. The prices are one shilling, sixpence, and threepence. Friends can purchase tickets, which bear no particular date, and use them at any time, giving one up to the attendant when they choose to come. They are obtainable at 28 Stonecutter-street. Friends who come to the hall unprovided with a ticket will find Miss Vance outside, and she will inform them where tickets can be procured.

One friend who had sent a cheque for the Hall of Science fund not only desires me to keep it, but has sent a further cheque for the same purpose. I shall be glad to hear from others as to whether I can use all or any part of their donations, or even of money that was intended for shares—which is, of course, otherwise returnable. I have undertaken a heavy responsibility. Time and energy I am ready to give, but others should help me financially.

The rank and file of our party ought to do something. They may be able to give little, but that little should not be withheld. I propose to open a "Shilling Fund" the first week in October. My readers who desire to see the torch of Freethought carried over London and the provinces should send me during that week postal orders for one or more shillings. At least a thousand ought to subscribe in this way, and if they do so they will be investing a trifle, most practically, in the propagation of their principles. And what is the value of a man's principles if he will not back them up with a shilling?

G. W. FOOTE.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote's experiment at St. James's Hall came to a most successful close on Sunday evening, when another splendid audience assembled at his lecture on "Religion in the Light of Science." Many ladies were again present, and a considerable number of strangers. The lecture lasted nearly an hour and a half, and the meeting was keenly responsive to the end. Mr. James Rowney presided again. He is an excellent chairman, and has been very active in promoting the success of this venture. The little discussion which followed was hardly worth a mention.

Plenty of handshaking went on before the meeting entirely dispersed. It was generally agreed that the "attack on the West-End" should be continued. Mr. Foote was asked what he meant to do next. He replied that he intended to organise more lectures during the winter, either at St. James's Hall or at some other hall in the neighborhood of Piccadilly. "The sooner the better" was the general cry.

Last Sunday evening Mr. Charles Watts lectured at Milton Hall to an enthusiastic audience. To-day (Sunday, September 1) Mr. Watts lectures three times in the Co-operative Hall, Plymouth.

Digitized by Google

Mr. S. P. Putnam has been amongst us for four months. He has had a good time, as the Yankees say; and if money is far from plentiful, he has experienced no lack of hospitality. Wherever he has gone the "saints" have endeavored to make his visit interesting and enjoyable. He has thus seen more of Great Britain in four months than many visitors contrive to see in a year. At the same time he has made acquaintance with the Freethought party in this country, and he will be able to tell his own party in America something of our spirit and methods.

Mr. Putnam's first lecture was delivered in London. His last lecture will also be delivered there, and Mr. Foote will take the chair, as he did on the previous occasion. The subject of the lecture will be "Colonel Ingersoll and American Freethought." London Freethinkers should make a big rally this evening (September 1). The meeting will be the first in the fine, large Foresters' Hall (Clerkenwell-road), which Mr. Foote has engaged for thirteen Sundays.

The farewell dinner to Mr. Putnam takes place on the following Wednesday (September 4) at the Holborn Restaurant. The tickets are four shillings each, and can be obtained at 28 Stonecutter-street. Mr. Foote will preside, and will be supported by Messrs. Charles Watts, George Anderson, G. J. Holyoake, J. M. Wheeler, R. Forder, and other leading Secularists. Those who intend to "assist" (as the French say) at this function should obtain tickets by Monday, otherwise a hitch may occur in the arrangements. The Holborn Restaurant people must be informed on Tuesday how many they should provide for. There is sure to be a good dinner, some brief if not good speeches, and some cheerful music to season the whole entertainment. All that is wanted is a good company—that is to say, good people and plenty of them.

The Universal Republic (Portland, Oregon), in its August number, says: "The Freethinker, published in London, England, stands at the head of the list of Freethought journals. It is ably edited. It teaches the Brotherhood of Man, in place of the creeds and dogmas taught by the Christian world."

We do not think it necessary always to return a compliment, even to a lady. But we may say why we appreciate this one. The World's Advance Thought and the Universal Republic are two monthly journals in one. They are each of eight pages, mostly written by the editor, who sets up the matter in type, carries formes to the press, prints, and publishes the paper. The editor is a woman, Lucy A. Mallory. She lives mainly on biscuits, cheese, and raisins, and devotes her surplus to feeding and educating other people's children. When we heard this from a vegetarian paper we sent her a copy of our own.

The August 5 number of the New York World, sent us by Mr. L. Levine, is quite a Freethought number. It gives long extracts from John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Jefferson, and others on Liberty. The enforcement of Sunday laws is opening eyes in America to the natural alliance between religion and tyranny.

One would expect a Christchurch paper to be very ecclesiastical. But the Christchurch Times is anything but that, and has an excellent article on "Agnosticism" in its issue for August 23. It deals mainly with the views of Professor Huxley, of whom it says: "The truth never had a more fearless and noble champion." "Huxley," it adds, "has taught us that philosophy is, after all, only a purified form of common sense. We must all learn to say we 'don't know.' Like the mongoose of Kipling's delightful tale, the human race should have for its motto 'Run and find out'; but we must consent to be Agnostics until our inquiries are satisfied, instead of jumping rashly at the conclusions we happen to deem convenient or comforting."

The members of the Westminster Branch had their annual excursion by brake to Epping Forest last Sunday. The weather was all that could be desired. After a delightful ramble through the forest the party all sat down to tea at "The Robin Hood." All expressed themselves as having spent a most enjoyable day. Large quantities of old Freethinkers were distributed on the down journey.

Mr. C. Cohen is conducting a week's Freethought Mission at Manchester. Sunday mornings and evenings he lectures in the Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, All Saints. Saturday evening (August 31) at 6.30 he delivers an open-air lecture in Stevenson-square, and on the following Tuesday (September 3) another near the Labor Hall, Gorton. The latter is a new station, and we hope the local Freethinkers will rally to Mr. Cohen's support there.

We are pleased to notice that the case of the Seventh-Day Adventists, who are in prison in America because they obey the Bible injunction to work six days and rest on the seventh, is to be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States. If it does nothing else, it will serve as an eye-opener to the hypocrisy of the Sabbatarians.

It is gratifying to see a paper like the Glasgow Herald allowing space to a correspondent like "Neuron," who argues powerfully against the existence of "soul" or "spirit" independently of the body. The same paper inserts a letter from "Essayist" chaffing the ministers who let ladies read essays before Bible classes, and asking them why they don't stick to the inspired teaching of St. Paul, who said: "Let the women learn in silence with all subjection, but I suffer not a woman to teach." Good old Paul! Cock-a-doodle-doo!

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (July 27 and August 3).

FRIDAY is a brilliant day in the annals of the Secular Pilgrim. I visit Newstead Abbey, the home of Lord Byron. Mr. Stapleton and Mr. Parrott are with me on this trip. Newstead Abbey is only about eight miles from Nottingham. It was in Nottingham that Byron lay in state. I was pointed to the very room, in an ancient building, where he thus lay. An immense procession followed the funeral cortège to Hucknall Church, where the poet was buried with sixty of his ancestors. There is nothing more beautiful in any land than Newstead Abbey. It is now owned by Mr. W. F. Webb, a friend of Livingstone, and himself a renowned traveller and hunter. He must possess great wealth, for the Abbey is kept in a most noble and attractive condition. It is approached from the station by a wide gravelled road, through green fields and beauteous groves. We pass over the river, alongside a dashing cataract which flows from the lake above. The Abbey is of the loveliest architecture of the Middle Ages. It is grace itself, and indicates the wonderful poetic feeling of that awakening time, a dawn gemmed with a thousand stars. Only the front arches of the church itself remain, with the windows and the portal, giving a weird, faint picture of immemorial years. The habitable part still endures, in which are hundreds of relics of the poet and his ancestors; the rooms where kings have visited and slept; portraits of beauties and heroes; swords and helmets; and the table where Byron wrote his immortal verse, in which there was more concentrated energy of genius than in any other poetry of his time, and which was ablaze with revolutionary thoughts. We see the surroundings that nurtured the mental life of the fitful bard; the ruins of the past and the beauties of nature; the fields and groves and waters; the Annesley Hills, where brooded the spirit of his fatal love. We can imagine the poet amidst these variable scenes, so many pictures of which abide in his glowing melodies. Newstead Abbey is rich with treasures, and the gloomy history of man is here recorded, together with its most marvellous romance and illustrious genius. Here is the oak which Byron planted, and which, once on the point of dying, now flourishes green and beautiful. Here is the tree on which he carved his own and his sister's name when he bade farewell forever to Newstead Abbey; and here is the monument to his dog, who possessed all the virtues without the vices of man. About the Abbey are extensive and magnificent gardens, in which are flowers of all hues, spreading along the wanderer's path with oriental luxuriance.

From Newstead Abbey we go to Hucknall, a colliery town, smoky and dirty, and busy with marketing; an uncouth place, it seemed to me, for the ashes of the immortal bard. The church is a solemn but not very imposing structure. A melancholy graveyard spread around it. No one of distinction is buried here. Within are the immortal dead. The bones of Byron lie beneath the stone floor. We read the inscription, and muse in the shadow of the grey walls. An unpretentious mansion of the dead is this—a gloomy place to quench the fires of the human mind that flame to the stars, then sink to earth. All this, and nothing more! was the refrain that rolled through my mind as I gazed upon the dim relics of the dead. No voice can utter anything more. The darkness abides while we love and honor the heroic spirit. Byron perished in the glorious effort to win liberty for Greece; and more than this, be it spoken to his undying praise, Byron's maiden speech in the House of Lords was for the defence of the Nottinghamshire workmen, among whom he then lived, against the death penalty which the aristocrats were endeavoring to inflict upon those poverty-stricken men who in their blind wrath, destroyed some machinery, thus putting the rights of wealth above the rights of humanity. Against this Byron protested with all the ardor of his soul and the eloquence of his tongue.

Digitized by Google

Besides the memory of Lord Byron in Nottingham, there is the house where Henry Kirke White was born; and also, in the process of demolition, the birthplace of Phillip James Bailey, who, half a century ago, at the age of twenty-two, wrote "Festus," a most extraordinary and brilliant poem, and, although living to this day, he has not again penned a line worthy of preservation. There is also a house on one of the main streets, still standing and used for a hotel, in the same shape it was in 1400, years before the discovery of America. For over 400 years no alteration has been made in its appearance.

On Saturday morning Mr. J. R. Anderson accompanied me to the university, which is a notable and flourishing institution. It has over 1,700 students. It has a machinery and engineering department connected, so that the student can have a practical and industrial education if he wishes. It has also a very valuable museum.

Mr. Anderson is a prominent citizen, a member of the Common Council, and a pronounced Freethinker. Among other friends here are Mr. and Mrs. Marriott, formerly of America. Mr. Marriott was in the army under the Stars and Stripes. I had also the pleasure of meeting Mr. Amos Waters, a busy contributor to many literary periodicals, and a philosophical Freethinker. He is known on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr. Jackson, Mr. Murray, Mr. and Mrs. Burton, with others, are friends that added to the pleasure of my stay in Nottingham. I had a varied and entertaining visit, which, while restful, was animated and instructive. I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Stapleton and the little children for their cordiality and goodwill, and the enjoyment of a happy home, and I heartily reciprocate the wish of my host that I shall see Nottingham again before I surrender the ghost.

On Saturday afternoon, June 29, I leave Nottingham for Sheffield. I am accompanied by Mr. Snell, who, I hope, will sometime visit me in America. He would like Yankeeland, I am sure, for a change. And the Freethinkers of our country would find in him a bright and brave champion.

The first impression one gets of Sheffield, as he rolls through on the railroad train, is that of a smoky, dingy manufacturing city, where it is impossible for anything like beauty to flourish. I was told when I came to Sheffield that there was nothing to see, only long rows of tenement houses and vast and gloomy buildings, lighted with the glare of furnace fires, in which a thousand busy hands sharpen cutlery for the world. But, as a matter of fact, Sheffield is a handsome city, when you travel out of the smoke to the surrounding hills. There are five valleys in Sheffield, and five meandering streams here unite into the river Don. Quite a variety, therefore, appears in Sheffield. It is not a monotonous manufacturing place, where only smoke and steam fill the air, and nothing is heard but the rumble and roar of myriad machineries. From the crowded valleys where the vast business of the city is transacted, and where indeed the blue light of heaven is often shut out by the murky clouds that encircle the heart of the fiery metropolis, from these steaming and rushing centres of activity you come upon ample hills, beautiful green fields stretch away, groves and gardens glitter, and nature puts on her most alluring robe; and as you wander over these hills you advance into magnificent prospects, and no scenery in the world can surpass the loveliness and grandeur of what greets you in the vicinity of Sheffield. Somehow or other, Ruskin seemed to see the point, and he placed here one of the most charming, instructive, and valuable museums to be found anywhere. It is worth crossing the Atlantic just to view these wonderful treasures. And why did Ruskin place these priceless exhibitions of nature and art alongside the rush and bustle and dirt of Sheffield? Why not at Oxford or other quiet town with educational and artistic associations? Ruskin himself supplied the answer. He said that ironwork was a necessary art; that the cutler's art at its best, as manifested in Sheffield, is "unsurpassable by that of any living nation," and also "because Sheffield is within easy reach of beautiful natural scenery."

The Sheffield Corporation, not unmindful of the honor bestowed upon the city by Mr. Ruskin, purchased Meersbrook Hall for the home of the museum—a beautiful estate with old trees, and walls gay with roses and clematis, and in summer the haunt of blackbirds, thrushes, and rooks. It is in perfect accordance with the glories of the museum, which, though small, contains the most precious wealth of nature and of art. One could spend days in these little rooms, and yet ever find something new and entrancing to study and muse over. Every picture and cast on the walls, every book and print in the library, every stone in the mineralogical gallery, is selected for a special purpose, and in its own peculiar department each is the best that could be procured. The object of Mr. Ruskin was to educate the people in art. The mineral room simply astonishes one with its crystal splendors. There are "precious stones," from sapphires to diamonds, and from topazes to emeralds and opals. There is a unique example of a pale-blue form of topaz from the Ural mountains, associated with smoky quartz and mica. Perhaps there is nothing like it in the world. The iridescence of the opal is amazing, and you wonder that in the heart of nature, in "the dark unfathomed caves," such glorious hues could flash and flame. As you look into these beautiful crystals there seem to be opening upon you depths of color shining far away in ever-changing lustres while you pass from point to point and gaze into the resplendent chambers. I know of no place where more wealth of natural beauty is revealed.

The books are ancient—going back to 1100—and they display the exquisite art of those old days, and indicate with what a religious fervor the printers must have labored. These books are enriched with miniatures, scroll-work, and ornamental borders. Here are also many of the original drawings of Turner; a painting of the front of St. Mark's, which it took the artist three years to complete, and many of the works of ancient Italian masters which cannot be found even in their own land. I was surprised to find such a wonderful display, amidst such beautiful surroundings, near the grimy machineries of toil. It shows that Ruskin had some deep insight into the heart of man, and that he saw the latent poetry and romance of human toil; that where man labors, even in dust and darkness, there are the possibilities of noblest things. One might spend days in Ruskin's museum and find instruction, for, though the collection is not imposing, yet it is infinitely suggestive, and leads one into a thousand pathways of thought and investigation.

Sheffield is not simply a hive of industry—a black mass of manufacturing facilities; it is a city with noble and magnificent surroundings, and whichever way you journey a wide and splendid country appears. Sherwood Forest, now no more, except in patches, once waved its endless branches from this vicinity to Nottingham. A cultivated land takes the place of the "boundless contiguity of shade." The harvest field shines, and the elegant dwelling. I only have the opportunity to enjoy one drive, and that is to Chatsworth Hall, the home of the Duke of Devonshire. This is about twelve miles from Sheffield. On Monday we set forth, a somewhat cloudy day, but now and then the sunshine burst forth in brilliant glory, and all the distant heights catch the changing lustre, and a scene of enchanting variety is presented. We travel over immense hills. There are no sharp ascents here. It is mostly like a vast table land, teeming with harvest, while yet the moorlands offer a bare and solitary appearance, so that we see nature in majestic contrast. The scene on every side is ample. As we roll alongside Froggatt Edge, one of the most lovely and stupendous landscapes in the world unfolds from the valley beneath to the mountainous horizon. Embosomed in the valley, hundreds of feet below your flying vehicle, is a charming ancient village, over which hovers the atmosphere of golden romance. The valley, rich with fields and groves, opens and spreads away in gorgeous loveliness, while the shining river Derwent, celebrated in song, like a ribbon, ornaments the long-extending prospect. Above the valley stretch the vast hills in sombre columns, edged with wild precipitous rocks and dusky forest. On the side whence we view this resplendent panorama the walls seem to go sheer down to the valley itself. Almost from our very feet and the banks of the luminous river, swells above and beyond the village, that hangs like a jewel on the scene, the enormous height, whose verdant fields sink into desolate spaces.

From this attractive point we sweep on to the great hall, around which are so many memories of the past. Passing through the delightful park, where the deer are grazing, we see Queen Mary's Bower, a lovely island, and yet a prison for the imperious queen, where her heart must have poured itself out in useless lamentations. Here she could enjoy the sunshine and the flowers, look upon the bright, blue sky, but round about her rolled the relentless waters, and there was no escape. Beautiful were the scenes she gazed upon in her captivity—the great hall, in the midst of massive foliage, where royalty was wont to spend its hours of luxury. Within its spacious rooms are some of the finest pictures and statues in England, rare china and porcelain and treasures of the olden time. The garden attached is a marvellous profusion of riches, pomp of color, with fountains and glades and cataracts in the gloom of wood and steep. The hot-house is the largest in the kingdom. It has taken the painters three years to re-decorate the roof and sides. It shines with tropical splendor. Alas for the fortunes of the day! just as we left this luxurious abode, to see new curiosities, a sudden shower descended upon our troop, and we were obliged to find refuge wherever we could, for the stately footman had forbidden the use of umbrellas while in these palatial regions, and so we had to dive under the bushes, and it was a somewhat disconsolate scene for about ten minutes, the rain pouring in torrents. Well, we were repaid for the momentary discomfort. After the shower the sun came out more gorgeously than ever, and the afternoon was simply superb. Everything was fresh and glittering. We visit the church and churchyard, where is buried Lord Frederick Cavendish, who was murdered at Phœnix Park. It is a quiet place, surrounded with a model village. If one might find, outwardly, a paradise on earth, it would be on this spot, where everything seems so harmonious. All the dwelling-houses have a supreme aspect of utility and elegance. But I suppose I should get tired of such a comfortable existence in about a day's time, and should want to fly off to the turmoil of London. There is such a thing as life flowing along so smoothly that death would be welcomed as a change. However, these placid scenes remain in the memory with a charming and romantic perspective, and we dream of these mild resting-places when "life's fitful fever" is over. Amidst the glory of the descending sun we return homeward, climbing great hills and plunging into deep valleys, with the moon in queenly lustre along the radiant heavens, and then the innumerable lights of Sheffield, as we drive into its smoky and resounding realms, and one more beautiful picture is added to the gallery of memory.

Digitized by Google

S. P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

BOOK CHAT.

THE Psychic Mirror, which is sent to us from J. Thomas, 10 Sefton-street, Longsight, Manchester, is a curious publication. It deals in the occult, and its assertions are sufficiently startling. The writer says (we quote verbatim et literatim): "My first point is, that there are, at this day, Ten thousand men—Androginous—now on this earth, who have not tasted death, who live the life immortal, in bodies that have never seen corruption!" After this we are not surprised to read of the common lime tree: "My soul perceives a hallowed mystery about this tree, which renders it uneque" (sic). Certainly the Psychic Mirror is "uneque."

* * *

Gems of Thought, by Jos. M. Wade (H. A. Copley, Canning Town, E.; 2d.), is another strange production. It takes as its motto: "Believe nothing, accept nothing because another says it is true. Follow no one. Do not accept what I write; but you will either search all things, the inner consciousness being the judge, or you will remain in occult darkness." This is a pure gem, so we must give another as a touchstone of the writer's quality: "There is no more relationship between a mother and her son than there is between her and a Hottentot; we come direct from mother earth." We have never doubted that there were minds around us in the animistic stage ready to receive Theosophy, any more than we doubt that others are in the stage of fetishism, prepared to believe in spells and amulets. Indeed, all religion is but a survival of these old-world faiths.

* * *

Passages of the Bible Chosen for their Literary Beauty and Interest, by J. G. Frazer, is notable on account of the author, whose Golden Bough shows he is in a position to understand the underlying superstition of Jewish literature. The interest of the book is increased by Mr. Frazer's erudite notes, giving numerous references to parallel stories and passages found in ancient and modern literature, and illustrating some Hebrew legends and customs from the folk-lore of other peoples.

* * *

The Bookman announces that a biography of the late Professor W. Robertson Smith, author of The Religion of the Semites, has been undertaken by one of his most intimate friends.

* * *

The Academy (August 24), noticing under the head of "Regeneration" the new edition of Max Nordau's Conventional Lies, says the book "seems to be well worth reading," and mentions that the reader should remember that it has been published for some ten years, in order to do it the full justice which it deserves.

* * *

The Hamilton Advertiser mentions Mr. David Dall, of Motherwell, as having in the press a work on The Mistakes of the Bible. If he goes into his subject fully, we should say it would make a considerable volume.

Sunday Amusements.

The only ground on which restrictions on Sunday amusements can be defended, must be that they are religiously wrong—a motive of legislation which can never be too earnestly protested against. "Deorum injuriæ Diis curæ." It remains to be proved that society, or any of its officers, holds a commission from on high to avenge any supposed offence to Omnipotence which is not also a wrong to our fellow creatures. The notion that it is one man's duty that another should be religious was the foundation of all the religious persecutions ever perpetrated, and if admitted would fully justify them.—J. S. Mill "On Liberty."

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?

THE gaols, penitentiaries, and asylums are full to overflowing in all Christian countries, and the great majority of their inmates profess belief in the Christian religion. The questions might probably be asked: Why so much godlessness in that which claims to be Christian? Where is the divinity of a religion that does not save its members from a hell of mental chaos here, and what warrant have they, therefore, that it can save them from hell hereafter? It is plain that Christianity has not substantiated its claim to divinity.

Christians think that they are sanctified and holy because they have avowed "Christ and him crucified," and attend church regularly, and observe its ordinances. It never strikes them that the ignorance of their preachers in joining together lust-and-sin-cursed people in the bonds of wedlock, for a fee, is responsible for many of the existing evils; and that the superstitious and incomprehensible dogmas inculcated by them, which keep the people from thinking for themselves, and realising their responsibility for everything they think and do, are largely responsible for the remaining evils. The intelligence and judgment of the age have advanced too far for people to be satisfied with the ignorant claim that a God or Devil outside of man shapes the destinies of the individual and the world.

The claims of orthodoxy have, in these latter days, been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Its power henceforth must wane, for the Light of Truth has judged its claims and found them wanting.

—World's Advance Thought. LUCY A. MALLORY.

A Chinese View of Christian Missions.

A Washington telegram states that Mr. Moy, one of the secretaries of the Chinese Legation, in an interview with a reporter respecting recent events in China, said: "While we have no statistics available, I believe, and so does the minister, that there are few, if any, converts to Christianity among the higher class of Chinese. Our religion is that of Confucius, and that is good enough for us. No decent Chinaman will have anything to do with the missions. The missionaries cannot talk the language, and none of the better people of China speak English. Only criminals have learned it whom the missionaries have engaged as interpreters. There are only two ways to get converts in China. One way is to hire them, and then they are converts as long as they are paid; the other way is the kidnapping of children. The hiring of converts is an expensive business, but the missions are well supplied with money, and hire and kidnap, and show the results. The interpreter will find a girl whose parents are poor. He persuades the child to visit the mission, and then tells the missionary she desires to be a Christian. He is unable to talk to her, but keeps her secluded, and the interpreter bullies her. She practically becomes the latter's slave, and remains so until he sells her, perhaps for a vile life outside. This is the reason for the belief among the Chinese that the missions kidnap the children."—Dalziel.

Children and Early Faiths.

The following actual conversation, recorded when it took place (August 20, 1895), may possibly throw some light upon the faiths of early man. At any rate, I think it worth preserving. Scene—Atop a tramcar; a starry night. Dramatis Personæ—A boy nearly six years old and a child-like lady. Boy (after looking at the stars)—"Who keeps all the world?" Lady—"What do you mean?" Boy—"There must be a man to look after it." Lady—"It must be a pretty big man." Boy—"Who looked after the world before we came here? If papa kept the world, he'd have lots of money." (He looked pleased, as if he thought "I should share.") Lady—"Yes." Boy—"How many measures would measure to the stars?" Lady—"I'm sure I don't know. They are very, very far off." Boy—"If I had all the measures in the world, could I measure to the stars?" The lady said she did not know, and the conversation changed to mundane matters, much to the regret of the lady's husband, who is not the boy's father, but who is anxious to know if he will turn out a theologian or a philosopher. He seems to be getting through the theological stage early.—J. M. W.

They are slaves who will not choose
Hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truth they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

—James Russell Lowell.

Digitized by Google

CORRESPONDENCE.

"ANANIAS AGAIN."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—A correspondent forwards me a copy of the Freethinker of June 30, headed "Ananias Again," in which Mr. Hugh Price Hughes is violently attacked. The paragraph professes to be taken from the Liberator. There is an error here which I cannot explain, but I shall be obliged if you will allow me to inform your readers that the paragraph in question never appeared in the paper of which I am editor. Thanking you in advance for making the correction,

HOWARD EVANS (Editor of the Liberator).

[There is more than one Liberator in the world. The paper we quoted from is edited by Mr. Joseph Symes at Melbourne, and is well known—at least by name—to most of our readers.—EDITOR, Freethinker.]

WHERE IS GOD?

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In May, 1882, I had a brush with the leading Anglo-Israelites, whose operations I designated as a swindle. They were then raising money by subscription in order to dig for the Ark of the Covenant in the potato fields at Tara, Ireland. The Ark may be there with old Yaveh inside (qui sait), for God is everywhere. At any rate, thirteen years have elapsed, but all the digging has produced neither God nor Ark, which is more than passing strange. I summed up the whole thing in a few words, which were reproduced in British Israel and Judah's Prophetic Messenger. "Bamboozling the residuum of society and dragging money out of the pockets of the silliest of silly yokels." Dr. C. Hodson Rugg, of 1 Grove-road, St. John's Wood, gave me the following terrible warning: "One can imagine what the shrieks from his sufferings will be when the horrible abyss opens out and engulphs him (Laporte) in the realms of Pluto. Further comment is unnecessary, more than to pray that such a character as Charles Kroll Laporte may be brought to repentance; if not, prevented from infusing his malignant venom in the blood of truth" (sic).

CHARLES KROLL LAPORTE.

Christian Results.

After nearly two thousand years of Christian teaching and discipline, how much nearer are we to that ideal life which Christian leading was to bring us to? What must we think of the sentiment implied in the saying of a glorified prince, repeated by a popular emperor, lauding "blood and iron—a remedy which never fails?" . . . . How much moralisation can we trace in the contrast between the practice of savages whose maxim in their inter-tribal feuds is "Life for Life," and the practice of Christian nations who in their dealings with weak peoples take as their maxim "For one life many lives"? Towards the foretold state, when swords shall be beaten into ploughshares, how much have we progressed, now that there exist bigger armies than ever existed before? And where are the indications of increased brotherly love in the doings of Christian nations in Africa, where, like hungry dogs round a carcase, they tear out piece after piece, pausing only to snarl and snap at one another?—Herbert Spencer.

An account of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius, given by Mr. T. C. Owens, an eye-witness, in the English Churchman (August 22), cites an incident that has not always been mentioned: "About a score of women, 'saints,' so called 'cousins,' taken from the fishwomen of Naples, who pretend to trace their genealogy from the saint, and who are considered as having his blood flowing in their veins, assembled at the high altar rails and occupied themselves in loud cries and entreaties. By degrees they became very vociferous, calling furiously on the saint in tones of anger and despair."

Some specimens translated from the Italian by a Neapolitan are given as illustrations of these primitive prayers: "'Champion of Christ, you are a pretty saint; make your blood melt.' 'You yellow-faced rascal, why don't you make your blood melt?' 'You yellow-faced scoundrel, how spiteful you are!' 'What is the use of my having prayed to you all my life, if you don't make your blood melt?' 'I'll never pray to you again if you won't make your blood melt.'"

A Little Omission.

What! the legislators of the Indians, Egyptians, Babylonians, Greeks, and Romans all taught the immortality of the soul, which we find in twenty places even in Homer, and yet the pretended Moses does not speak of it. Not a single word is said of it, either in the Jewish Decalogue or in the Pentateuch. It became necessary for commentators, who were either very ignorant or more inclined to knavery than folly, to twist some passages of Job, who was not a Jew, in order to make it believed by men more ignorant than themselves that Job had spoken of a future life, because he said: "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God" (Job xix. 25). What connection is there, I pray you, between a sick man who is suffering, but hopes to be cured, and the immortality of the soul, hell, and paradise? If Warburton had contented himself with proving that the Jewish law did not mention a future life, he would have rendered a very great service. But, by the most incomprehensible madness, he wished to have it believed that the stupidity of the Pentateuch was a proof of its divinity, and his excessive pride supported this chimera with the most intolerant insolence.

What! the innumerable number of citizens that have been injured, excommunicated, reduced to beggary, killed, and their bodies cast on the highway; the number of princes dethroned and assassinated, has not yet opened men's eyes! And when we do open them, we perceive that this fatal idol is not yet demolished!

But what shall we substitute in its place, say you? What? A ferocious animal has sucked the blood of my relatives. I tell you to rid yourselves of this beast, and you ask me what you shall put in its place! Is it you that put this question to me? Then you are a hundred times more odious than the Pagan pontiffs, who permitted themselves to enjoy tranquility among their ceremonies and sacrifices, who did not attempt to enslave the mind by dogmas, who never disputed the powers of the magistrates, and who introduced no discord among mankind. You have the face to ask what you must substitute in the place of your fables? I answer you, "God, truth, virtue, laws, rewards and punishments." Preach probity, and do not preach dogmas; be the priests of God, and not the priests of a man.—Voltaire.

PROFANE JOKES.

A Rev. Dr., introducing a brother reverend to his congregation, said: "Our brother will now address you on 'Hell,' and it affords me pleasure to say he is full of his subject."

"Did you enjoy the services at church to-day?" "Very little. The music wasn't a bit catchy, and there were no clever lines in the sermon. The minister threw in a little bright business, however, and that saved the entertainment from being utterly stupid."

A Scotch wife, whose man had recently died, was urged by her minister to dry her tears and reconcile herself to the loss. "You know," said the minister, "that we must all die, even Christ had to die when he took upon himself our mortal flesh." "Dae ye tell me," said she in dismay, "that Christ's deid. I never knew that till the now." "Dear me," said the minister, "to think that in the nineteenth century it would be possible to meet with such ignorance." "You see," said she, apologetically, "John was aye that hard that he would never spend a ha'penny on on evening paper, and a body never had the chance o' kenning wha wis deid."

On Missionary Ground.

Good Lady—"Now, little boy; who made you?"

First Kinky-headed Boy (with a charming, toothy smile)—"Dunno'm."

Lady—"God made you, child."

First Boy—"Yes'm."

Lady (to Second Boy)—"Who was the meekest man?"

Second Boy—"Dunno'm."

Lady—"Why, Moses! Moses was the meekest man. You must really try to remember Moses, for I shall ask you again."

Second Boy—"Yes'm."

Lady (to Third Boy)—"Who was the strongest man?"

Third Boy—"Dunno'm."

Lady—"Why, I told you last Sunday! Samson! Samson!"

Third Boy—"Yes'm."

Lady (recapitulating)—"Now, tell me who made you?"

Second Boy—"Moses."

Lady (in despair)—"Oh, no! no!"

Second Boy—"Yes'm, Moses did make me. Dat ar boy what Gord made, he done gone to get er drink."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

Forresters' Hall (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, S. P. Putnam, Colonel Ingersoll and American Freethought."

Battersea Secular Hall (back of Battersea Park Station): 8, social gathering for members and friends.

Camberwell (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7, J. Rowney, "Prophecy."

Islington (19 Alwyne-road): 3.15, members' quarterly meeting.

West Ham Secular Ethical Society (61 West Ham-lane): 7, Stephen H. Alison, "Darwinism and Design."

Open-Air Propaganda.

Battersea Park Gates: 11.30, A. G. Hertzfeld will lecture.

Camberwell (Station-road): 11.30, James Rowney, "Waldron's Blunders."

Clerkenwell Green: 11.30, S. E. Easton, "How Christianity Became Strong."

Deptford Broadway: 6.30, a lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

Edmonton (corner of Angel-road): 7, A. B. Moss, "Hereafter."

Finsbury Park (near the band-stand): 11.15, W. Heaford, "The Doctrine of Prayer"; 3.15, Stanley Jones, "Christianity and Civilisation."

Hammersmith Bridge (Middlesex side): 7, W. J. Ramsey will lecture. Thursday, at 8.30, St. John will lecture.

Hyde Park (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30, W. J. Ramsey will lecture. Wednesday, at 8, S. E. Easton will lecture.

Islington (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, St. John will lecture.

Kilburn (corner of Victoria-road): 7, F. Haslam, "How I Became a Secularist."

Kingsland (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, Stanley Jones, "Christianity Critically Examined."

Lambeth (Kennington Park): 3.30, E. Pack will lecture.

Mile End Waste: 11.30, R. Forder, "Religion and Progress."

Old Pimlico Pier: 11.30, F. Haslam, "Life and Times of Voltaire."

Regent's Park (near Gloucester Gate): 8, W. Heaford, "Christianity or Secularism—Which?"

Victoria Park (near the fountain): 11.15, S. R. Thompson will lecture; 3.15, Mr. Vining will lecture.

Wood Green (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, A. B. Moss, "Design and Natural Selection"; 7, S. R. Thompson will lecture. Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

Birmingham (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, H. Snell, "Was Christ a Socialist?" 7, "The Gospel of Freethought."

Blackburn: 3, business meeting at secretary's house.

Chatham Secular Hall (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school.

Derby (Pullicott's Dining Rooms, Market-place): 6.45, H. McGuinness, "The Unemployed."

Liverpool (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, Sam Reeves (Fabian), "What Capital Is, and What Capital Is Not."

Manchester Secular Hall (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 11, C. Cohen, "The Great French Revolution—Part I., The Night"; 6.30, "An Hour with the Devil."

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, George Selkirk, "The Bible against Itself."

Plymouth (Co-operative Hall, Frankfort-street): 11, Charles Watts, "Trust in God a Delusion"; 3, "Christianity: its Birth, Rise, and Death"; 7, "Does Death End All?—with Special Reference to the Fallacy of Theosophy."

Sheffield Secular Society (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, select entertainment.

South Shields (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King street): 7, business meeting.

Stockton-on-Tees (53 Dovecote-street): 3, important meeting.

Open-Air Propaganda.

Bradford (Open Market, James-street): 6.30, John Grange, "Can Christ Save Us?"

Bristol (Eastville Park, Lower End): 7, a lecture.

Chatham (corner of the New Brompton-road, High-street): 11.15, C. James, "The Decay of Christianity"; 7, "God at the Bar of Humanity."

Derby (Market-place): 11, Mr. Briggs will lecture.

Manchester (Stephenson-square): 3, C. Cohen will lecture.

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Quayside): 11, R. Mitchell will lecture.

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. Cohen, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London.—Sept. 1, 8, and 15, Manchester; 22 and 29, Birmingham.

Stanley Jones, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London, N.—Sept. 1, m. Kingsland, a. Finsbury Park; 8, m. Camberwell, a. Hyde Park, e. Camberwell; 15, m. Finsbury, e. Edmonton; 22, m. Kingsland, e. Deptford; 25, Hyde Park; 29, Hammersmith; 29, m. Victoria Park, a. Finsbury Park, e. Kilburn.

Arthur B. Moss, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London, E.—Sept. 1, m. Wood Green, e. Tottenham; 8, Westminster; 15, Mile End; 22, Camberwell; 29, Westminster. October 6, Camberwell; 20, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

T. Thurlow, 250 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 8, m. Kingsland, e. Edmonton; 15, e. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 29, e. Edmonton.

WANTED, LADY HELP; also to teach child of seven in Freethinker's family. Quiet country house; servant kept. State age, salary, and references. Mrs. Oswald Dawson, Harman Villa, Scarcroft, near Leeds.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

A CHAPTER FROM

Strauss's Original "Life of Jesus."

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

G. W. FOOTE.

(A Most Thorough Analysis and Exposure of the Gospel Story by a Master Hand.)

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

A Demonstration of the Biblical Doctrine of Devils, suitable for circulation among Christians.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."

W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."

Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goître, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 9s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 22, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. FULLER, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 8s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

64 pp., price 3d., by post 4d.,

THE

HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE.

WITH A

FULL AND TRUE ACCOUNT

OF

"THE LEEDS ORGIES."

EDITED, WITH INTRODUCTION,

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Pantasias. 8d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SALE. SALE.

NOW FOR ANOTHER HOWLING GALE OF BUSINESS.

Black or Navy Serge Suit Length, Pure Wool	15s.
Check or Mixture Suit Length, Pure Wool	15s.
Three Pure Wool Trousers Lengths, Splendid Qualities ...	15s.
Black, Navy, or Brown Melton Overcoat Length	15s.
1 Lady's and 1 Gent's Silver-mounted Umbrellas (best covers)	15s.
A Bundle of Dress Remnants (20 yds., double width) ...	15s.
Two Pure Wool Dress Lengths	15s.

One Shilling must be added to cover carriage on each parcel.

MONEY REFUNDED IF THE INVESTMENT IS NOT SATISFACTORY.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS :—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchizedek
S'welp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Fœtilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clothed Both
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Du-ling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 132 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 36. SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

CORONERS AND ATHEISTS.

ENGLISHMEN are constantly told that they ought to obey the laws, as the laws are of their own making; not directly, but through their representatives in parliament. They are also told that they should cheerfully, or at least resignedly, obey even bad laws, while agitating or waiting for their improvement. We are reminded that Englishmen have always been a law-abiding people, and we are exhorted to maintain our ancient reputation. All which, of course, is extremely edifying. But what if those who administer the law violate it themselves, even in its very administration? Does not that bring it into the grossest possible contempt? Common people may sin in ignorance or inattention, but those who are appointed to preside over courts of justice cannot plead such an excuse. They are presumed to know the law, and if they do not they are unfit for their offices.

Sometimes, however, the law is deliberately violated by its administrators. Many such cases have arisen under the Oaths Act, which Charles Bradlaugh succeeded in carrying through the House of Commons, and which was promptly agreed to by the House of Lords. According to this Act, every person who was previously required to take an oath, as witness, juror, legislator, or officer of state, is now entitled to make an affirmation instead, by simply declaring that he has no religious belief, or that the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief. It is not competent for a judge or counsel to make any sort of inquisition. The person's declaration entitles him to the privilege of the statute. He is not bound to add another word, and the court is bound to let him affirm. Such is the law. But judges who take their religious prejudices into court have a way of defying it. A common practice is to order a juryman, who says he has no religious belief, to stand down; another juryman is taken in his place, and he is told to wait, as he "may be wanted"—the judge all the while being perfectly resolved that he shall not be wanted, at least as an actual juryman. The trick is a contemptible one, and would never be successful if it were not for the absurd and perfectly unconstitutional power exercised by the superior judges under the practice of "contempt of court." Kings and queens must knuckle under to Habeas Corpus, but not so the superior judges. In a fit of temper they can send a man to gaol, and keep him there as long as they please. It is a monstrous survival of the violent old times, when it had a kind of justification. Courts of justice are no longer in any danger, such as that of a prince slapping a judge's face on the bench; and it is simply infamous that a legal officer, however exalted, should be able to accuse a man, try him, and sentence him, all at once—especially when the offence is one against the judge's own "dignity."

Some day or other we hope to have an opportunity of publicly exposing this disreputable trick. It will require a little tact and self-possession, but it is really necessary that someone should have the courage to tell a bigoted judge that if he does not let a man serve as a juryman he has no right to keep him in court as a spectator.

Coroners have not the same power as the superior judges, but they are sometimes as bigoted, and just as apt to be insolent. Witness the following report which appeared in the London newspapers on Saturday evening, August 31:—

> "As the jury were about to be sworn in prior to an inquiry before Mr. Wynne E. Baxter, at the Mile-end Vestry Hall to-day, one of the men summoned avowed that he was a Freethinker. The Christians and Hebrews then took the oath, and the officer said to the Coroner: 'This gentleman is an Atheist.' The Coroner: 'Well, we must find him some place of honor. I should think that corner would do (pointing to a corner away from the jury). You won't feel contaminated by the rest of us now, I should think.' (Laughter.) A Juror: 'I should think not.' The Freethinker made no answer, but smiled. At the termination of the inquiry, in which the isolated one took no part, the Coroner expressed his usual thanks to the jury for their services, and, turning to the Freethinker, said: 'And much obliged to you for your attendance.' (Laughter.) The Freethinker (banteringly): 'You are quite welcome.' (More laughter as the jury left the court.)"

The only gentleman in the company seems to have been the Atheist. Probably he did not know how illegally he was being treated; still he must have known that he was being treated badly; but he kept his temper, and smiled at the cads who were so proud in the consciousness of their numerical superiority. Most likely he reflected that it was the way of religionists to prate of charity on Sunday, and to be malicious every other day in the week. Christians and Hebrews combined against the "infidel." They were ready, on occasion, to quarrel with each other over their gods; but here was a thorough-going wretch with no god at all; so they agreed to "let him have it," just to show that "God is love."

Coroner Baxter played the leading clown in this sorry farce. "You won't feel contaminated by the rest of us" was doubtless meant as a splendid witticism; anyhow it provoked an outburst of laughter. But, after all, it was lucky for the Atheist that the joke was put in that way. A couple of hundred years ago it would have taken another turn. He would then have contaminated them, instead of their contaminating him, and they would have made a big fire and burnt the contamination out of him. Yes, sarcasm does not bite as deep as the flames of the stake.

All the while that Coroner Baxter was pouring out the small beer of his wit he was openly flouting the law of England. It was his duty to administer the affirmation to that Atheist, and to let him serve as a juror. And when the jury was empanelled he had no more authority over that Atheist than he had over any man in the street. The Atheist could have walked out of court, and knocked down anybody who tried to stop him.

Should this article meet the eye of that Atheist juryman, we hope he will communicate with us immediately. If he does so, we will have an affidavit prepared, which he can sign; and we will then see whether any Member of Parliament has the courage to raise the matter by question in the House of Commons. If not, we will lay the matter before the Home Secretary or the Lord Chancellor. It is simply intolerable that Atheists should be the victims of gratuitous outrage in courts of justice. The law is the law, whether Christians like it or not; and it is high time that they were compelled to recognise the fact.

The incident we have been criticising is a very significant one. It shows that Christianity is essentially a religion of insult and outrage to all who differ from it. Even when the law is made fairer, by the herculean efforts of a great Freethinker, the devotees of Christianity take advantage of their numbers and persecute unbelievers in every way their malignity can suggest. And the moral is, that all we have to do with Christianity is to exterminate it.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

CURIOUS RELIGIOUS SURVIVALS.

THE recent case of the Peculiar People, in which an elder declared that the Peculiars could not have a bone broken, or, if they did, they would cease to be Peculiars, instances how deeply some superstitions are embedded beneath the thin veneer of modern civilisation. The superstition in question the elder defended by referring to the Christian fetish book: "A bone of him shall not be broken" (John xix. 36). This saying is founded on the fact that the passover lamb must not have its bones broken (Exodus xii. 46), and this on the earlier fact that the human sacrifice for which the lamb was a substitute was thought to join his totem kindred if the bones were unbroken. Bastian tells us that the natives of Bamba say their fetish dwells in the bush invisible. When he dies the priest collects his bones, so that he may preserve and nourish them that they may revive again when they acquire new flesh and blood. Thus, when a man touched the bones of Elisha, "he revived, and stood up on his feet" (2 Kings xiii. 21); and Ezekiel saw a valley full of dry bones come to life (xxxvii.).

Such bone superstitions might, to-day, be as harmless as wrapping a tooth in salt or carefully burning it—relics of the old faith in sympathetic magic, which held that persons could be affected by getting hold of any article pertaining to them; though the belief would be inconvenient if put to a practical test. Not so innocuous is the Bible-grounded superstition that the only thing to do for a sick person is to send for an elder to lay on hands, anoint with oil, and "the prayer of faith shall save the sick" (James v. 15). The laying on of hands takes us back to the time when this was thought to communicate life, as with Eskimo tribes: and the bishop who lays on his hands and says "Receive the Holy Ghost," and the archbishop who uses holy oil at a coronation, may ridicule and punish Peculiar People, who keep up in ordinary life the very superstitions they themselves reserve for special high and holy occasions.

The case of witch-burning this year in Ireland is another survival of a belief once common, and which, as I show in my pamphlet on Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible, saturates the pages of the "sacred" scriptures. It is only the outcrop of a delusion fostered for ages by medicine-men and priests that they might have the advantage of selling their charms and relics as a specific against witchcraft and possession by devils.

Curious survivals of this same superstition continually turn up in mention of a sect of devil-worshippers—Luciferans—found in Catholic countries. Only a short time ago a lady in Paris brought a criminal action for libel against the Revue Anti-Diabolique, a publication regularly issued for the purpose of combating the literal Devil and all his works. The lady was accused by this periodical of having stolen consecrated vessels from different churches for the purpose of using them in "the black art" at a place of Devil-worship near the Rue Cadet. She obtained a verdict, and the editor was punished.

As such cases are continually referred to in Catholic papers as the result of the spread of Atheism, I have taken some pains to unearth the facts about them. The truth is that such vessels are occasionally stolen, and more often wished for, by women. Why? The priests declare they are holy, and must not be touched. They are taboo, like the tree of knowledge of good and evil. More, they contain the god—the very blood, bones, and divinity, with miraculous powers, especially, in the old belief, of removing sterility; for which, by the way, far dirtier emblems have been offered by Catholic priests.

The thieves said to be devil worshippers, and who do have their secret rites, are never unbelievers. They believe too much, or they would never concern themselves about consecrated vessels. They, in fact, retain beliefs which the priests have given up.

Now, good Christian, answer me this: Who are the real devil-worshippers—the poor woman, who, swayed between two faiths, imperils her soul to get a few drops of the holy oil that will bring her love, offspring, and affection; or the Christian priests, who, in the name of their blood-requiring God, have hounded such poor wretches (whom they have kept in ignorance) to death by myriads, under the imputation of witchcraft, because they have practised the rites of the old religion?

A yet darker, deeper strata of superstition is unearthed in the accusation continually brought against the Jews that they steal children, and stab or crucify them, to celebrate their Passover. This very year the Difesa, the leading Catholic paper in Venice, specially blessed by the Pope and commended to the faithful, has had a series of articles inciting hatred against the Jews as "religious assassins." Now, nothing is more certain than that, if the Jews ever had any such custom, it is in blank opposition to the Torah, to which their lives are conformed. In my essay on the Passover, in Bible Studies, I have ventured to suggest that that institution really was a substitutionary offering for a more ancient and horrible rite of human sacrifice. But this substitution is made by all peoples when they pass out of the hunting into the pastoral stage, though recrudescences of such customs may occasionally survive in mania. But the Jews, as a race, were civilised long prior to the Christian nations, and cases of human sacrifice are frequently brought home to the latter. But in no single instance have they been proved against modern Jews, whose exclusiveness and secrecy of their religious rites have alone continued the old accusation, that has cost them myriads of lives and long ages of persecution at Christian hands.

It is only about a dozen years ago since a superstitious Bible believer named Freeman, in Pocasset, Massachusetts, thought he heard a divine call to imitate Abraham and offer up his only child, a young girl. He called his neighbors together, read the Bible to them, talked with them freely on the subject, and afterwards killed the girl with a carving-knife. But for our lunatic asylums we should hear more of such cases of religious survival. Christianity perpetuates the belief in the efficacy of blood, and in its central doctrine of the Atonement represents God as an old Shylock who will have his pound of flesh.

Quite recently Russia sent a story of a farmer selling his wife, who was in a delicate condition, to a band of robbers. The purchasers bought her because of a superstition that blood taken from the veins of a woman in that condition renders thieves invisible. Here the underlying savage idea is that expressed in the Bible, that "the blood is the life"—the blood which goes to form the hidden new life being supposed of special magical efficacy.

Most curious of all the superstitions is that of self-crucifixion. Not long ago a case cropped up in Hungary where a man took most elaborate pains to crucify himself, and carried out his object. In a recent article I gave a description from Mr. Lummis, an eye-witness, of how the Penitent Brothers of Mexico every Good Friday have an actual flesh-and-blood crucifixion of one of their order, who is selected by lot to bear the sins corporate. In his presidential address before the Folk-Lore Society this year, Mr. Edward Clodd mentions a survival in the Abruzzi mountains of South Italy, where the young men draw lots who shall die for Christ, and the victim is secretly killed. The notions upon which this depends will be found detailed in my new book, Footsteps of the Past.

Such instances of outbreak of old superstitions—and I have not given a tithe of those that have come under my own notice—indicate that the scientific civilisation of which we boast is, after all, only a young plant, sometimes growing on a thin top soil, while a little below the surface lie rank weeds of superstition—scotched, but not killed, and ready to grow again could they find fitting opportunity.

Superstitions are not harmless. I have heard it often said: "Well, even if it is not true, why not leave it alone? Where's the harm in believing it?" But there is harm. All falsity shuts out some truth, and carries wrong in its train. Every grain of supernaturalism in a faith means less devotion to the needs of man and the duties of this world. Ecrasez l'infâme! J. M. WHEELER.

Gospel and Creed.

Our Creed, called by the Papists Credo, which was attributed to the apostles, though evidently fabricated more than four hundred years after these apostles, acquaints us that, before Jesus ascended into heaven, he went on a tour into hell. You will remark that not a single word is said about this journey in the Gospels, and yet it is one of the principle articles of the Christian faith. We cannot be Christians if we do not believe that Jesus descended into hell.—Voltaire.

Digitized by Google

THE GOSPELS AND DRAMATIC LITERATURE.

(Concluded from page 548.)

CHRISTIANS allege that, if the character of Christ is not real, the Gospels lose all their value. Probably this may be so if we look upon them as historical narratives; but such is not the case if we regard them as dramatic literature. Suppose it could be proved beyond all doubt that the character of Hamlet never existed outside the brain of Shakespeare, that would not destroy the sublime conception given us of the "Prince of Denmark," or lessen the philosophic beauty the conception presents to our minds. If we grant that the Dane is only a fictitious character, the profound wisdom of the following advice remains:—

> This above all: to thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Shall we persist in being impervious to the immense delight which is evoked in most persons on reading the Tempest, unless we are assured that Prospero was intended as a delineation of Shakespeare himself, or that Ariel ever existed? The excellence of poetic genius consists in so clothing imagination that its truths shall appear to us as palpable as the various phenomena by which we are surrounded. As the great Master himself declares in A Midsummer Night's Dream:—

> The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
> Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
> And as imagination bodies forth
> The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
> Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
> A local habitation and a name.

Is it not possible that the Gospels are pictures of human life, founded on fact and fancy, as most dramatic literature really is? The Gospels exist, and that they are not strictly historical records is clear; it seems, therefore, to us feasible to assign to them a place in dramatic literature. Heretical critics may object to our view, and urge that they are an invention by the priests for the purpose of deceiving the weak and the credulous. But it would be doing no violence to accepted history to have a preference for another interpretation of their presence amongst us. Can we not reasonably admit that the priests have used the Gospels for purposes of deception, without being compelled to grant that they were originated for that purpose? There are two objections to the theory that the Gospels were "an invention" of any particular period. In the first place, it prevents us from applying to the Gospels the law of evolution, which is perceptible in most literature; and, secondly, it implies a conspiracy among the writers, of which we find no evidence. Besides, the four Gospels are not precisely alike in their style, and the authors do not all say the same thing. Each writer tells his story in his own way, and introduces into his narrative features not to be found in the others. It is not at all improbable that they all had an original, like it is thought Shakespeare had, to work upon—some ancient gospels containing the plot which they used for the drama of the Cross. There appears to us ample evidence to justify the belief in the common origin of all literature—namely, the mind of man. To this we think there is no exception, either in the Bible or elsewhere. There was nothing miraculous in the appearance of a collection of Christian literature nearly two thousand years ago, any more than there was in the advent of the literature that adorned the age of Augustus or that of Elizabeth.

It is a curious fact that in all ages endeavors have been made to find some hidden meaning in literature. The Bible has been by some interpreted as an allegory, the key to which, it is said, has been discovered by some man of genius. In the case of the writings of Shakespeare, it is thought that indications are given of many of the inventions of a later age. As the Bible is the fountain from which all Christian sects derive what their members call "the waters of life and the everlasting truth," so Coleridge describes the writings of Shakespeare as "the well of English undefiled." And from this well all classes of men have drawn water to fertilise their brains and enrich their minds, in order that they may give to the world treasures of wisdom and legacies of noble thoughts. It seems as if the spirit of great writers had access to minds inferior to their own in power of conception and expression, and that they developed and utilised the germs therein discovered. Especially was this so of him who found "tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything."

There is quite sufficient material in the Gospels for dramatic treatment. We have the story of a carpenter's son, born amidst angelic salutations, performing wonderful acts in his youth, proclaiming the gospel of poverty, and denouncing the arrogance and affluence of the rich. He rebels against the Government, casts out, in a forcible manner, the money changers from the temple, and drives, as a king, in a most dramatic fashion into Jerusalem. He is arrested, tried, convicted, sentenced to death, and crucified upon the cross. At his death "the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, and the rocks rent. And the graves were opened, and many of the bodies of the saints which slept arose." After all this he appears to his friends, here and there, like Banquo's ghost, and ultimately he is "carried up into the heaven." Associated with him was the multitude, who cried: "Hosanna to the Son of David." He also had with him two prominent characters who were essential to the drama—Judas and Peter; he was betrayed by the first, and denied by the second. Now, we submit that in this story ample material for a most exciting drama is supplied, which, if properly stage-mounted and acted by able artists, would doubtless prove a "draw" at the Adelphi, or at other theatres where melodrama is patronised.

Our view, that the Gospels are dramatic literature, may be objected to on account of their supposed lack of real imaginative and comical elements. But the force of this objection depends upon the way the contents of the Gospels are looked at. An orthodox believer may not see the imaginative in the most marvellous incidents of what he deems divine literature, any more than he may regard them as being of a comic character. To other persons, however, who are not influenced by theology, the movements of the "star in the east," the songs of the angels, the descent of the dove, and the Devil taking Christ up into a high mountain and showing him all the kingdoms of the world, will appear very imaginative; while Jesus riding into Jerusalem on a colt and an ass at the same time, and the sending of thousands of devils into swine, causing them to rush madly into the sea, seem to us quite enough to furnish the comic element for any one drama.

Students of ecclesiastical history will be aware of the fact that three different interpretations have been given by theologians to the story told of Christ in the four Gospels. Briefly they are these: That Jesus was only a man, that he was God, and that he was both God and man. Each of these views has been defended with fervor, eloquence, and scholarship. We are not at all concerned at present as to which of the three interpretations is the correct one, or if either one accords with fact. Certain it is that all cannot be true, and no one has, so far as we are aware, tried to prove them so. All that has been attempted is to defend each separately.

The reader who has carefully followed us in the two articles upon this subject will see that our aim has been to show that, from a dramatic standpoint, each view could be maintained. We formed the idea here expressed upon this subject through studying the elements that are necessary to dramatic literature, and by comparing them with the incidents of the Gospels. The contention we have put forward must stand or fall by an appeal to that literature, and by comparing it with the Gospel narratives. If others fail to accept our conclusion, we ask them to state their reasons for rejecting it. In the words of Milton, we say: "Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do ingloriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple: who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?"

CHARLES WATTS.

Let us all seek truth as if none of us had possession of it. The opinions which to this day have governed the earth, produced by chance, disseminated in obscurity, admitted without discussion, credited from a love of novelty and imitation, have, in a manner, clandestinely usurped their empire.—Volney.

Digitized by Google

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS.

It is exceedingly necessary that a clear and definite statement of the position which the Secularist takes up in reference to Bible teaching in public schools should be made. At the last School Board election both parties fought for maintaining the Bible as an instruction book for the children. There was really no difference of principle between them. And as, therefore, the attention of the public was centred on a fictitious quarrel, the real factors in the question were ignored.

The Secularist, then, takes his stand on the principle, accepted in other matters by the Nonconformists, that the State has no concern with religious beliefs, and has certainly no right to apply public funds to the purpose of maintaining specific religious beliefs. That principle, it seems to me, is just. To ask or to expect persons to subscribe to the teaching of opinions they do not hold is in the very highest degree unjust. Of course I am not discussing now the legal right to tax for the purpose of teaching religion. It may be alleged that people often are taxed to carry on a war they disapprove of. Quite so. The majority, of course, have the legal right to do whatsoever they choose. But we are discussing the matter from the ethical point of view, and if we can convince the majority that they are acting unjustly and unwisely, then our object is achieved. The majority can alter the system.

As to the injustice, then, I think it is plain. The State contains people of various beliefs. To use the money of all, therefore, to teach the beliefs of one section is not right. Christians would object to being taxed in order that other persons' children should, say, be taught Mohammedanism or Buddhism. They would object, and rightly object, to be taxed so that the children of others should be taught Secularism. But many of them cannot yet understand—or do not pretend to understand—why Mohammedans and Buddhists and Secularists should object to pay for teaching their children Christianity.

It will be said, perhaps, that they do not teach dogmatic Christianity in the schools. They only teach a Christianity so watered down that no one can object. The fact, however, is that they teach just so much as the various Christian sects can agree on. They teach as much dogma as they can, consistent with the religious truce which obtains between the rival sects of Christians. But it is too much for the non-Christian. Is not the teaching of the existence of a god a dogma on which all are not agreed? Is not the teaching of the inspiration of the Bible a dogma? Is not the story of the "creation" a dogma? If children are taught these as true, they are given dogmatic teaching; if they are taught that they are exploded fables, there is an infringement of the legitimate rights of Christians. The only equitable way, therefore, out of the dilemma is not to teach or deal with them at all.

The injustice, then, of Bible teaching is easily seen. But another, and as important a, reason why the Secularist desires the exclusion of the Bible from the schools is because it is unwise to put it into the hands of children.

Let us examine, for a moment, the claims which even the fair-minded Christian—and, indeed, sometimes the non-Christian—puts forward for the use of the Bible. In the first place, then, it is claimed that—even waiving the question of its inspiration—the Bible is par excellence the moral text-book for men. Even a Rationalist like the late Professor Huxley has spoken of the "vast residuum of moral beauty and grandeur" in the Bible, when you eliminate everything that "it is not desirable for children to occupy themselves with." Well, of course, really the remark is capable of various interpretations. When you take away from a book all that is "not desirable," presumably the remainder is desirable. But whether in the case of the Bible this remnant is truly described as "vast" is exceedingly questionable. Professor Huxley did not detail the items of "moral beauty" referred to. But of course that the Bible does contain some moral, and even beautiful, teaching in places, is not to be gainsaid. So, however, do nine out of every ten books in any literature. Thomas Hardy's Tess—at least, it seems to me—contains a "vast residuum" of moral teaching, and needed warning and useful and guiding pictures of life. But who would propose to put the book into the hands of children, and teach it them chapter by chapter at the public expense? When an exceptional claim is made, an exceptional case is required. And anyone who sanely looks into the matter will agree, I think, that that exceptional case can hardly be made out on behalf of the collection of Hebrew writings called the Bible. It is certainly not more moral than many books that could be named; it is considerably less moral and humanising than, say, Marcus Aurelius, or our own Shakespeare. No one would propose to put Shakespeare, wholesale and unabridged, into the hands of children; much of it they would not understand, some of it—a very much smaller percentage than that in the Bible—would be, perhaps, "coarse," though "coarse" is not quite the word to use. It would prematurely introduce them to experiences and facts of life and the world not necessary or needful yet. But what can be said of teaching the Bible wholesale? Beside the Bible the works of Shakespeare are simply not to be named. To say they are more beautiful and more moral, a greater culture-force, is, after all, to pay a very poor compliment to the immortal poet who wrote his name in music unsurpassable on the hearts of every succeeding generation of men. Really one is tempted to say that, if Jehovah took the trouble to inspire Leviticus or Numbers, and left Shakespeare to produce Hamlet without any such assistance, the guidance of Jehovah—at any rate, in matters literary—would seem to be a dreadful affliction. But to return to the Bible, it seems to me no case has been shown on behalf of its surpassing excellence as a moral text-book.

Then as to its value as a scientific text-book—well, that is nil. The Bible, from a scientific point of view, is perhaps the most false and ignorant book which could be put into the hands of any child learning the rudiments of science. And even the "new Christian," who is always "reconciling" the Bible and science, must admit this. Even allowing for the moment that his harmonising is conclusive, he will concede, if he is at all fair, that some of it is considerably involved, and could hardly be comprehended by children without very great effort. It appears to me that, even from the Christian point of view, it would be much better not to have to explain to children that in the "Word of God" "days" does not mean "days," and "waters" does not mean "waters," and "fruit" is not actually to be taken to imply what we mean by "fruit." It would seem even better tactics to wait till the child had grown up before presenting to him a book involving these niceties of interpretation. And, mark, you must interpret it for the children somehow. If you teach it to them and let them innocently imagine that the thing is to be taken literally, that "days" does actually mean days, don't you see that you are putting a nice rod in pickle to be used against you when the child grows up and finds out the truth? One would imagine, therefore, that from the religious standpoint, if the religionist really believed in these tortuous explanations, very grave reasons would present themselves for not teaching the Bible to children.

As has well been said: "Children are habitually encouraged in the love of war, and in the spirit of cruelty, by the prevailing ferocity of the Old Testament, and by the general representation of the Hebrew God as a blood-thirsty and malignant being." "Children are taught by the Bible to regard murderous intolerance as a divinely-ordained virtue." And, in fact, the net outcome we know of Bible-teaching in the past has been to cultivate bigotry, persecution, and ignorance. Certainly it has not been to produce a race of freedom-loving, scientific, clear-headed people. The typical man who was Bible-fed in youth is generally a narrow-minded and rather intolerant person. This is not a one-sided or exaggerated statement. Let any fair-minded investigator look round for a man really saturated with Biblical teaching, and, in nine cases out of ten, he will find an ignorant thinker, a stickler for petty forms and a mere letter of things when it suits; in short, a fundamentally insincere type of mind.

But as to Bible teaching in public schools, there is no case. And it should not be forgotten that the burden of proof lies on the defenders of the book. It is for them to show why this special book should be taught with public money; they must produce the proofs logically then. But, of course, as the Bible is being taught, really it is necessary for those who object to make their voices heard. To sum up, then, the Bible is objected to because it is the text-book of one particular section of religionists; because it makes claims which large sections of the nation cannot allow; because, in short, it is not such a book as can be universally acceptable. And, furthermore, it is specifically objected to because of its unscientific, unhistorical, unethical teaching, in many parts. And, lastly, because much better books can be found. We have produced scientific manuals for children that no teacher would set aside in favor of Genesis. We have history books more profitable for the study of children than the records of a rather uncultured tribe, whose importance in the world's story has been scandalously exaggerated. Surely there can be had, too, if necessary, ethical text-books containing superior lessons, say, than the commands to Moses to butcher wholesale the Midianites, or any of the filthy and blood-reeking stories that abound in the book which is declared to be the sheet-anchor of morality. Besides, why should we perpetually delve in the past for our ethics? As a writer in the Free Review some months ago admirably asked: "Is it an understood thing that moral authority is the peculiar appanage of antiquity?" Surely we could get a modern manual containing the best teaching on the duties and rights of life suitable for children in the schools, on which all sane people could agree, if really it be considered necessary at all to teach morals by precept. But that we should use for the training of children a "book" which, apart from its associations as the sacred book of one particular religion, has really rationally nothing to recommend it, is a proposition which can only be maintained by religionists, heedless of the real justice of the case. Those people really do not care how their religion is propagated so that it be propagated, and will gladly take the Atheist's money to teach their own children the wickedness of Atheism. The best commentary on the character of the Bible as an ethical text-book is the ethics of its most ardent devotees.

Digitized by Google

FREDERICK RYAN.

THE CHURCH THE SOURCE OF IMMORALITY.

THE Church is the great source of immorality. Its doctrine that woman was made for man, secondary and inferior to him, and that she brought sin into the world, is the origin of all injustice to woman, and the prolific source of pauperism, insanity, prostitution, and crime. Class legislation for woman, laws of the State inimical to her, were first doctrines of the Church. Even where Church and State are not united, it is impossible for any peculiar religious teaching to prevail without its influencing legislation. From the time the earliest Christian council convened, Church canons began to affect the civil law. Under the old common law of England the husband was obliged at death to leave his wife one-third of his property, and was permitted to will her as much more as he pleased. As soon as the Christian religion became dominant in Great Britain, a husband was forbidden to will his wife more than one-third, and could leave her as much less as he pleased.

In olden Egypt, in Rome, and other ancient civilisations, the wife possessed right of person; this right was destroyed wherever Christianity became the ruling religion. As in slavery, the child ever follows the condition of the mother. So, under Christianity, the mother, possessing no right to her own person, has none to her child; and in but four States of the Union has this gross perversion of natural right been overthrown by statute. So true it is that the legislation of the State conforms to the teachings of the Church.

It is of no avail for woman longer to petition the State for a redress of grievances without at the same time proving the Church in the wrong. Wherever the much-praised old common law, as manipulated by the Church, exists, unchanged by statute, woman's inferior position is maintained by the State, and the last half of the nineteenth century is still disgraced by class legislation making woman a victim of the diabolical morality taught through the ages by the Church.

The fact that the wife possesses no legal right to her own person; does not retain her own name in marriage, but ever, as in slavery, takes that of her master, changing name as she changes husband; possesses no legal control over the home or the earnings of the marital firm; has no right to her own child, which can be bound out or willed away without her consent, even before its birth, is due to Church teaching that woman was made for man, is secondary and inferior to him, her condition one of subordination to him, that she brought sin into the world and thus drove him from Paradise. This theory, affirmed by the Church as of divine origin, has frightened thousands from an investigation of its truthfulness, and thus a system of falsehood has been perpetuated to the destruction of women and injury of the world. This falsehood has kept woman enslaved; it has robbed her of the most primitive right of womanly self-ownership; it has not alone affected actions, but also thought, and, while making woman amenable to the will of man, has annihilated his sense of justice.

"Here, wolf, take thy lamb!" a marriage-form prevalent in some parts of Russia, could with propriety be used over Christendom.

While Church teaching has instituted a degrading form of mental slavery bearing most heavily upon women, it has also destroyed the moral sense of both sexes in every country, creating a class of professional outcasts, demanded by man as a sacrifice to his baser passions, and declared a necessity for the safety of wives and daughters.

Aware that ignorance is bondage, and that superstitious belief is ever united therewith, the Church has strenuously opposed woman's efforts for freedom and enlarged opportunities in life.

Broader educational facilities, new forms of industry, better pay for work, more humane laws, wider religious liberty—each in turn have met with bitter opposition from the Church. Unsparing ridicule, false teaching as to divine displeasure, have been the style of opposition. To think for herself has ever been deemed the greatest sin for woman. Even Luther said: "No gown or garment so ill becomes a woman as that she shall be wise."

Robbed of herself, the mother of humanity has bred the world full of woe and crime. As a slave-mother cannot give birth to pure-souled children, we wonder not at the low ebb of morality in Christian lands. To drink, to gamble, to lie, to steal, is part of every human being's proclivity who looks to slave parentage. Robbed of all that makes life worth the living, woman has unwittingly revenged herself upon Church and State. With every generation new forms of fraud arise, and each census shows an increase of alms-houses, insane asylums, brothels, and prisons, all directly traceable to that teaching of the Church which has made woman but a supplementary part of creation, looking to man for headship and law.

Original sin is an original lie, yet one is sometimes tempted to believe in its existence, not with individuals, but as part of the Church itself; its teachings have sapped the probity of the universe. No sin so great as the teaching which, first robbing the individual of self-right, has turned the current of human life into a channel which perforce creates criminal classes of every grade. Of all has the Church been guilty.

And now that woman's growing rebellion against self-constituted male authority is everywhere apparent, the Church, perceiving danger to its continued existence, plans to give woman constant employment within its ranks. Church societies of every form make increasing demands upon her time and thought. "Home duties," an olden scarecrow, is no longer held aloft. "Work if you will, but work for us," is now the Church cry. Organise! Keep together! Do not lose yourself from the ranks!

For a time this plan will succeed, but it is merely a phase of woman's evolution. The responsibilities thrust upon her are fitting her for fuller freedom. She is fast learning to think for herself. With free thought for woman, the Church, that great source of immorality, crumbles to the dust, the State and the family are purified, and the world built anew.

MATILDA J. GAGE.

—Twentieth Century.

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

(4) Display, or get displayed, one of our contents-sheets, which are of a convenient size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will send them on application.

(5) Distribute some of our cheap tracts in your walks abroad, at public meetings, or among the audiences around street corner preachers.

Digitized by Google

THE DESIGN ARGUMENT.

NOTHING could have come by chance, it is said, and, therefore, it is inferred that this universe must have been created by a God.

Let us view this famous argument for a moment. God is something or nothing. To say he is nothing is to say there is no God. If he is something, he is not merely a property or a quality, but an existence per se—an entity, a substance, whether material or immaterial is unimportant. If he is a substance, a material or spiritual being, there must be order, harmony, and adaptation, or fitness, in his divine nature to enable him to perceive, to reflect, to design, and to execute his plans. If Deity does not reason, does not cogitate, but perceives truth without the labor of investigation and contrivance, he must still possess an adaptation or fitness thus to perceive, as well as to execute his design.

To say that God is without order, harmony, and adaptation, or fitness, is to say that he is a mere chaos—worse than that imaginary chaos which theologians tell us would result if divine agency were withdrawn from the universe. If a being, without order, harmony, and adaptation, or a divine chaos, can create an orderly universe, then there is no consistency in saying that unintelligent matter could not have produced the objects which we behold. If order, harmony, and adaptation do exist in the divine mind (or in the substance which produces thought, power, and purpose in the divine mind), they must be eternal; for that which constitutes the essential nature of a God must be the eternal basis of his being. If the order, harmony, and adaptation in God are co-existent with him, and are eternal, they must be independent of design; for that which never began to exist could not have been produced, and does not therefore admit of design.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

ACID DROPS.

EMPEROR WILLIAM of Germany is a pious gentleman, who fully believes that he rules by divine authority. His wife is as pious as himself, and perhaps even more so. She has built several new churches in Berlin, and we dare say she is sorry that she cannot compel the people to attend them. Her latest addition to the empty gospel-shops of her capital is a Memorial to the Emperor William, which has cost five million marks. It was opened with great pomp by the young emperor himself on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Sedan. Religion and Militarism are thus beautifully associated. Everybody can see how true it is that Christianity is a religion of peace and goodwill. Meanwhile the relations between Germany and France are considerably strained, and the French ambassador at Berlin is taking a holiday until the blood-and-thunder celebrations there are concluded.

Mdlle. Lebrauchu claims to be a heroine of Zola's Lourdes. She also claims to have been just miraculously cured of consumption. Zola replies that the characters of his novel are purely imaginary. With respect to the lady's recovery he says: "I was at the bureau when she entered screaming that she was cured. But I had never seen her ill. What proof have I that she was ever consumptive? Indeed, if I should see all the sick recover their health, I would not even then believe in a miracle."

A ghastly sight was seen a few days ago in the Thames. A woman's body was floating near Blackfriars Bridge, and two little children were bound round her waist. A steamboat was seen to pass slowly over them, and the corpses did not reappear.

"God's in his heaven, All's right with the world." Thus sang the optimistic poet. But that drowned mother, and those two drowned children, tell a different tale. Who knows the awful tragedy that was behind that plunge into the dark-watered Thames? Human beings need not always die to find out hell.

The progress towards Church unity which is being made in this day and generation is admirably illustrated by the Pan-American Religious Congress at Toronto. The Catholics agree that everything would be all right if the church-going people would acknowledge the Pope's authority; Bishop Gilbert declares that all the churches would do better if they acknowledged the historic episcopate. A Jewish rabbi present advocated Judaism as the panacea. It was pretty much the same at the Parliament of Religions. Volney, in his Ruins of Empires, imagined such congresses, to point out the moral that there can be no unity on fictions, but only on facts. It is something, however, that the clericals can now keep the peace when they meet.

The good old Bible preachers used to stick to the doings of the Lord with Moses and the prophets, and their congregations had little more concern with the secular problems of the world than was expressed in the prayer of the man who retired with the magnanimous appeal to the Deity: "God bless me and my wife, our John and his wife, us four and no more, for Christ's sake, Amen." But a change has been forced upon them, and on Trades Congress Sunday at Cardiff there was a special importation of Christian Socialists and others, who preached on the relations of religion to social questions in eleven Christian churches. As brother Jasper said: "The world do move."

Mr. E. L. Garbett, who published a pamphlet on Hurley's Ferocity, has a fling at the late Dean Alford in the Weekly Times and Echo (Sept. 1). It seems he sent the Dean his interpretation of the number of the beast. But, when Alford issued a new edition of his annotated New Testament, he repeated verbatim all that he had said in 1861 upon this 666 riddle. Whereupon, says good Christian Mr. Garbett, his statements "became wilfully mendacious. Possibly, not wilfully on his (Alford's) part, but on his inspirer's part. Moreover, their tendency is to make the Holy Ghost appear a fool. Now, my contention is that the same power who once proved Ananias and Sapphira liars dead was pleased, for your information on the 12th of January, 1871, to strike Henry Alford dead in his devilish lies." We look on Mr. E. L. Garbett as an interesting relic of old times, a survival of the degree of intelligence which originated, and made people believe, such stories as that of the murder of Ananias and Sapphira by the Holy Ghost.

In darkest Africa, although not far from where British authority is supposed to hold sway, there recently existed a society of cannibals who called themselves by the pleasant title of "human leopards," dressing in the skins of the wild beast whose name they borrowed, and which they evidently exceeded in ferocity. Their mode of operation was to secrete themselves in the bush near the native villages, and pounce down on any unwary straggler. The victims were afterwards killed and eaten. One of this murderous gang had formerly, it is stated, been a Sunday-school teacher at Sierra Leone, which would tend to show that in some cases at all events the Christianising influence of African Missions does not penetrate far beneath the surface. The "Society" has, happily, now been broken up, several of the miscreants having been hanged. It is strange to reflect that in this nineteenth century such horrible practices should have been possible.—Birmingham Daily Mail.

The New York Evening Post says that "the romance of missions has worn out. We have come down to the hard, matter-of-fact conditions of heathen life, at home and abroad; we have seen that printing Bibles, and singing hymns, and distributing tracts, and preaching sermons, have very little effect upon the enormous aggregate of heathenism, prejudiced in ignorance or conceited in learning, upon which our missionary enthusiasm has been spent." The next step should be to see that the only missions needed are secular ones to teach the best methods of work in the world.

The New York World, also writing on missions, deprecates "the apostles of all the false religions of the world" having been invited to the Parliament of Religions at Chicago. It says: "Returning home, these represented Christianity to be a failure in the countries they had visited, and in one case, we believe, missionaries were sent to America to convert our benighted people." It considers this, too, a cause of the falling off in subscriptions which the American missionary societies lament.

M. Trouve, the well-known electrician of Paris, has brought out a tiny telephone no larger than a franc piece, and, in conjunction with Rostoff, the "wizard," has applied it to clairvoyance. The telephones attached to the ears of the blindfolded performer are hidden by a wig, and connected by fine wires, also invisible, to a transmitter behind a screen. A confederate behind the screen, who can see and hear all that passes, prompts him by means of the telephone. Such an instrument, in old days, would have made a god out of a conjurer, and would have been acclaimed, like Elijah's petroleum trick on Mount Carmel.

At the Birmingham Balloon Society, Mr. Lewis Appleton gave an address on missionary enterprise in China, and a resolution of indignation at the recent massacres was moved. Mr. Maxim moved as an amendment: "That this meeting regrets exceedingly that English and American missionaries will persist in going to China and attacking the ancient and highly developed and orthodox religion of the Chinese." The amendment was seconded by Captain Lemon. There being a tie, the chairman gave his casting vote for the amendment.

Digitized by Google

They are actually trying to form a Curates' Union, and there is considerable talk of it in the papers. The Freethinker does not pose as an oracle, but in January, 1890, Mr. G. Standring, who is not, so far as we are aware, a prophet, or the son of a prophet, wrote a humorous article in our columns, entitled "The Curates' Union." Can some pale young curate have picked the grains of wheat out of his chaff, and, with prayer, fasting, benediction, and holy water, have ripened the good seed?

From Southampton the following paragraph is sent to the London daily press: "The Borough police have recovered the crucifix and image alleged to have been stolen from St. Joseph's Roman Catholic church by an Irishwoman, named Mary Ann Lahee. When arrested, Lahee admitted taking the things to bless her house, but stated that she did not know what had become of the crucifix. The police will give it up to Canon Scannel on his return from his trip to the Continent." This confirms the contention in Mr. Wheeler's article this week, that the sacred vessels and fetishes are not stolen from churches by any sect of devil-worshippers, but by poor women, in whom the Church has inculcated a superstitious reverence for such articles.

Parson Bowman, who was struck down with others by the lightning at the door of his church at Quakertown, New Jersey, says: "When I got up there was but one person standing, and, curiously enough, he was not a Christian." Probably he was the only person who was not afraid of the Devil, for to this useful scapegoat the accident is attributed.

Bishop Turner (colored?), of the American Methodist Episcopal Church, has some new ideas in ethnology. He has been three times to Africa, and has discovered that Adam and Eve were black; that they lived not 6,000, but 150,000, years ago, and that King Solomon was "a full-blooded negro." We do not know about the much-married sultan's negritude, but expect that the bishop is right in describing him as full-blooded.

Godfrey Higgins, early in the century, when ethnology was in its infancy, put forward the view that man was originally black, and found in the black Madonna and Child in the crypt at Chartres Cathedral a confirmation of the idea that the earliest Christ was a sable one.

They have the temperance question in a funny form in Hungary. The Minister of Finance has asked the Minister of Worship whether priests may make their congregation swear in church to abstain from spirits. Some priest in the south of Hungary did this, and the local publicans sent a protest to the Finance Minister, as they cannot fulfil their contracts to pay so much tax.

There was a circus at Montpelier, Bristol. It was acquired by the Salvation Army and turned into a barracks. On Sunday morning it was burnt down. We presume this was an "act of God." Unfortunately a number of cottages were burnt down also, and the cottagers rendered homeless. It is dangerous to be near when Jahveh is destroying one of his own buildings.

According to the religious press, Khama, the famous Christian chief of the Bamangwato tribe, is coming to London. The Rev. J. D. Hepburn, who writes Twenty Years in Khama's Country, describes him as a good Christian and teetotaler, who deposed his heathen father, and burnt his brother's house down because he gave native beer to a stranger. These gentlemen must not be judged exactly according to European standards.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the author of the "Athei-t Shoemaker," is a very reckless person. He is constantly starting some canard, which he always alleges some "good authority" for. A few months ago he published the startling information that "Nunquam" of the Clarion had been captured by the High Church party. "Nunquam" chaffed him unmercifully, and it turned out that all the ground Mr. Hughes had for his startling announcement was the fact that Mr. Blatchford had dined with three High Church parsons. In last week's Methodist Times Mr. Hughes came out with the following: "We have just learned, on what seems unquestionable authority, that Mr. Chamberlain has been seriously considering the possibility of introducing into this country the military Conscription as an agency by which he can get money to float his scheme for Old Age Pensions." It is difficult to conceive anything more ridiculous, yet Mr. Hughes took it seriously, and made it the subject of nine long paragraphs.

This Price Hughes bubble was pricked on Monday morning, when the newspapers published Mr. Chamberlain's letter in reply to a correspondent who inquired as to the authenticity of the Conscription announcement. Mr. Chamberlain's letter is brief and pointed. His private secretary writes: "I am directed by Mr. Chamberlain to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th inst., and to say that the statement in the Methodist Times, to which you call his attention, is absolutely untrue. Mr. Chamberlain advises the writer to call upon the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes to state what is the 'unquestionable authority' on which he has given currency to this falsehood."

We know enough of Mr. Hughes to feel pretty confident that he will not give an answer to this pertinent question. He has a habit of ringing bells and running round the corner.

Customs vary as much as religion. The Crescent quotes the following about the Shahzada, and, as Mr. Quilliam, the editor, was in attendance upon the young prince, we suppose he endorses what is said: "Nasr-Ullah Khan, on his side, looks upon the English as a people lost to all sense of decency, without religion, morality, or hope for heaven. The sight of their women with faces, necks, and arms exposed shocked him unutterably. Nasr-Ullah is a good young man, and when he looked upon the sea of shameless exposure at Lady Tweedmouth's reception he could hardly believe he was in a place where he ought to be. He very naturally administered a rebuke to Lady Lansdowne, and would not permit her to touch his arm."

Cardinal Moran boasts that the Catholic missions have in Corea over 20,000 converts, while the Methodist congregations have only 177 members. We cannot check his figures, but there is no doubt that the Roman superstition more readily accommodates itself to various forms of Paganism than does the Protestant superstition.

In Japan, Cardinal Moran says there are 50,000 Catholics and 35,000 Protestants. In China he boasts of a million, while the Protestants are put at 33,000. Mr. Michie reckons them at over 37,000. The Rev. Dr. Williamson, a veteran Scotch missionary, said: "Something must be done. In our present divided state we shall never Christianise China, never!"

In Africa, out of a population approaching two hundred millions, the Catholics claim 600,000, the Protestants 101,212, and these are questioned. Dr. Ingham, Protestant Bishop of Sierra Leone, in his recent work, Sierra Leone After a Hundred Years (1894), refers to the unblushing immorality that prevails, and adds: "Is it a wonder that kings and chiefs around Sierra Leone, instead of wishing their people to come and see how well we do things, dread for them to come to this colony on account of the danger to their morals!" Cardinal Moran quotes a German traveller as writing of the Methodist missionaries: "How can ex-machine greasers or ex-cobblers preach a faith they do not understand? They are a disgrace to civilisation."

In India the Catholic missionaries boast of over 1,620,000, the Protestants 559,661, half of whom were Europeans or of European descent. The total number of communicants was only 182,722. The Baptists, says Cardinal Moran, show a falling off of more than thirteen per cent. The Church of Scotland had declined from 3,683 to 2,970, and unspecified Christians had decreased from 20,216 to 7,078. In Tinnevelly, where Christian missions had so much success among the devil-worshipping Shanars in the decennium from 1881 to 1891, Protestants decreased eight per cent., while the Catholic increase is registered at twenty-two per cent.

The Jewish Chronicle mentions a curious theory of the cranks who are always searching for remains of the ten tribes of Israel. According to a book entitled Palingenesia, published at Erlangen twenty-seven years ago, it is a mistake to imagine that the drama of the early books of the Pentateuch was enacted in Western Asia and Eastern Africa. It all took place in America. Eden was somewhere in the Eastern Pacific; Noah lived in Cuba; Nimrod was an American prince; and Sodom and Gomorrah were not far from Chicago. Furthermore, there was an American Assyria where the Antilles now peep out from the sea, and an American Egypt in the highlands of the Andes. The scene of the Exodus was Behring's Straits, where the Israelites trekked across the ice into Siberia. All this nonsense arises from not seeing that the Jews were once in a similar stage of development to that now found among savage nations, and that, consequently, these nations must have manners and customs similar to those recorded of the old children of Israel.

Judge Chalmers contends in the Law Quarterly Review that there is so much petty perjury that it would be better if the oath were abolished for simple affirmation, and all witnesses warned of the human punishment meted out for giving false evidence.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Paul Taylor declined at the North London Police-court yesterday to avail himself of the First Offenders' Act in the case of a clerk who had stolen a bicycle. It was said that the accused had asked to be allowed to try a bicycle advertised for sale, and then, riding away on it, never returned. He had been a popular member of the Church of England Young Men's Society, whose assistant secretary now offered to become responsible for him. The magistrate, however, passed sentence of a month's hard labor.—Daily News (August 30).

Mr. Sarat Chandra Das Mitra, who has travelled widely in Northern India and Tibet, has written a paper dealing with North Indian folk-lore concerning thieves and robbers. All these, it seems, have their own particular goddesses, whom they worship in the belief that success or failure in their thieving expeditions depends on the favors and frowns of these female deities. To this end they offer sweets, cereals, and sometimes animal sacrifices, and in the old days human ones, before starting.

A member of the Westminster Branch of the National Secular Society (Mr. Worster), who has unfortunately been lying ill for some time, has a next-door neighbor who is also on the sick list. The latter is a Christian, and a pious lady in the vicinity sent him a basin of nice mutton broth; but the messenger made a mistake and took it to the wrong house. The Atheist consumed the broth and sent his thanks to the lady, who was horrified to learn that she had unwittingly ministered to the wants of an "infidel." Her indignation was quite amusing, and furnished the sick Atheist with a little medicinal laughter, which was almost better than the mutton broth.

A special correspondent of the Daily News (August 30) says that comparatively few persons are aware how little Churchmen really pay for the enormous influence their educational position gives them. Out of every £2 paid for a child in a voluntary school, the country provides all but about six or seven shillings. Church voluntary contributions provide about three and sixpence in the pound, and it is by no means certain that the whole of what little money they have voluntarily contributed should all be accredited to elementary education.

It gives the following instances:—"For many years there appeared on the balance-sheet of a voluntary school the sum of £32 for cleaning, etc. The man to whom the pound a week was paid had not been on the school premises for two years, and his whole time was occupied as vicar's odd man and sexton."

"The rectory of a certain parish needs repairs, but the low state of the ecclesiastical funds does not permit that this shall be done. A happy thought occurs to the rector. 'The schoolmaster shall occupy the rectory for a time, and we will call it the schoolhouse. Out of the funds provided for the school I will, as school manager, repair the rectory, entering it in the accounts as repairs to the schoolhouse.' This plan has been carried out, and nearly £200 has been expended on the repairs of property which belongs to the rector of the parish for the time being."

Cases in which the Church has got its work done free by foisting duties upon the school teacher supported by Government grants are exceedingly common. A letter addressed to the principal of a training college, asking for a student to act as schoolmaster, is cited. It says "he must be able to play the harmonium, and will be expected to do so on Sundays twice a day, to lead the choir, and also to act as clerk. He will be expected to train the church choir one night in each week. The aforesaid is part of his duty as well as keeping the school, and no extra salary is given for it." In other words, the duties of clerk, choirmaster, etc., are paid for out of funds which ought to be devoted solely to educational purposes. And these thieves are clamoring for more public money!

One of the funniest documents we have read for a while is the address of the Dean of Norwich at the anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He declared that "the nerve of the Ascension Evangel is the great principle that every human being is entitled to know the mind of God in his own language." If we presumed to think that every human being was entitled to know the mind of God direct from God himself, probably he would think we had a nerve like the Ascension Evangel.

The Dean went on to say that the various tribes of men were not to have each a distinct evangel suited to their respective capacities, but all were to have the Bible which Jesus received, which the holy apostles were commissioned to write, and which the authority of the Church had stamped. Well, we never heard that Jesus received the New Testament, or commissioned anybody to write it. The only thing in which the Dean is correct is the authority of the Church, and that has been stamped with a vengeance against all opposition.

The Dean of Norwich said that antiquarian researches had thrown light on our Scriptures and ecclesiastical history. They have indeed. Says he: "They have diluted the strong statements that are made in the interests of a narrow and dwarfing ecclesiasticism; they have blasted, as I believe, the unwholesome pretensions and the superstitions of an Italian sacerdotalism. But there is one thing these discoveries and manuscripts have not done. They have not caused us to withdraw one single article from the creeds of the Church." Doubtless the Dean has substantial reasons for not withdrawing even the article which declares that "works done before the grace of Christ are not pleasant to God, but have the nature of sin." But some people who have done a little antiquarian research fancy that it demonstrates the savage superstructure of the Dean's entire faith.

The Dean says: "We are asked now, however, to think of the first chapters of Genesis as mythical; but I cannot accept as mythical what Christ regarded as fact." We suppose he follows Jesus also in believing in possession by devils. It is a comforting belief when you know that devils never enter deans.

The Dean concluded with an exhortation to diffuse the Bible: "Circulate it broadcast from one end of the world to the other. Let no soul for whom Christ died moan out his life knowing nothing of the God who made him, nothing of the God who loved him, nothing of Jesus Christ who shed his precious blood for him, nothing of the Holy Ghost who comforts and who enlightens, and who educates and who inspires, invigorates, radiates, and blesses him; nothing of the means of grace, nothing of the hope of glory." So Christians are to take all the trouble about the precious Trinity which they have never taken for themselves, although, as the Dean set out by saying, "every human being is entitled to know the mind of God in his own language."

Bishop Tugwell, of West Africa, says that the gin trade is demoralising the natives. It is pointed out to him that the gin is introduced by the Christians, and that the best remedy is the spread of Mohammedanism, with its strong influence in favor of abstinence. The Governor of Lagos avers that the Mohammedan negro is a much cleaner, soberer, and more dignified and self-respecting person than the Christian negro, who adds the white man's vices to his own, and wipes them all out in the blood of Jesus.

David, or somebody else for him, said in his haste that all men were liars (Psalm cxvi. 11). We often find pious people giving evidence that the Psalmist was not so very hasty. Here, for instance, is a story from Middletown, New York, about Hiram Hornback, who ran from home, spent his cash in riotous living, and, like others who have run that course, returned penitent, when sunk in poverty. The story given in the New York Sun, August 11, says: "Shortly after Hiram's arrival a terrific thunderstorm passed over the farm, and lightning struck and killed a calf in the barn yard. From there the same bolt entered an open window of the house, hit the family Bible lying on the parlor centre table, and opened it at the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke, leaving a black mark opposite the twenty-third verse, which reads, 'And bring hither the fatted calf and kill it: and let us eat and be merry.'" This is worthy of "Dod Grile."

Dr. Susan R. Pray, who went as a medical missionary to Foo Chun, gives the following explanation of the outrage. She says a strong native party is making an effort to overthrow the present Chinese dynasty, and, in attempting to make it appear that the outbreak against Christians is really the fault of the government, hopes to make the latter so unpopular with foreign powers that none of them will interfere in its possible downfall.

Paul Kruger, the President of the Transvaal, often takes to the pulpit. The Port Elizabeth Telegraph says: "Preaching on Sunday week, the President undertook to explain the doctrine of the Trinity—a subject which, the speaker went on to say, the Holy Book did not throw much light upon. With that aptitude for simile which forms one of the most striking features of his honor's public utterances, the preacher likened the Triune Deity to a candle. 'There is the fat, the wick, and the flame—three in one; and if the explanation is not sufficient,' continued Mr. Kruger, 'anyone who wishes may come and speak to me at the conclusion of the service!' Possibly the President may be able to find some other means of converting them.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, Sept. 8, Brunswick Hall, Brunswick-street, Glasgow: 11.30, "Freethought in Robert Burns"; 2.30, "Religion in the Light of Science"; 6.30, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible."

Sept. 15, South Shields; 22 and 29, Foresters' Hall, London.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—Sept. 8 and 15, Foresters' Hall; 22, Sheffield. October 6 and 13, Foresters' Hall; 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 18, North Shields; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. November 17, Liverpool.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

Louis Levine (Charleston).—Many thanks. We shall use some of your well-chosen extracts. You are doing capital work. Hearty greetings.

Mr. G. L. Mackenzie points out that in "Rum and Religion," p. 548, "soothing-seeming antidote" should be "soothing seeming-antidote"; and "Bible-seeming antidote" should be "Bible seeming-antidote"—the idea being that the antidote is only seeming. Sorry we did not send proof. Hearty greetings.

L. W. Balk writes: "With regard to the £4 that I have paid towards eight shares for the Hall of Science, I beg that you will apply the money at your discretion towards any purpose for the furtherance of our principles; and I should prefer the application of the same to the fund for your personal benefit, for I feel it my duty to at least help keep the man alive who keeps our party alive."

R. E. Holding.—Glad to hear you are so pleased with the success of our experiment at St. James's Hall. We have ventured to write a "Sugar Plum" on the Indicator article, which we hope you will not find displeasing.

H. Snell.—See paragraph. We should like to see you busier in the lecture-field.

W. Cabell.—We had seen it and written a paragraph upon it already. Thanks all the same, though, for your kind attention.

T. Hinton (Manchester).—There must be some mistake. John Heywood could hardly have refused to supply your newsagent with the Freethinker. He, or rather the firm, has supplied the trade ever since our first issue, and continues to have a regular account with our publisher. Will you see your newsagent again on the matter? We thank you for your efforts to promote our circulation, and are pleased to hear that you enjoy Mr. Cohen's lectures.

J. Burrell.—We have dealt with Coroner Baxter in our leader. See paragraph for the other matter.

J. Keast.—See paragraph. Will the large Shepherds' Hall be available for Secular lectures this winter?

President's Fund.—Per R. Forder: H. Sesemann, £2; E. L., £1; C. Deane, 4s.; H. A., 2s. 6d. Per Miss Vance, collected by E. Finder (Leicester): A Friend, 10s.; Another, 2s.; One More, 1s.; A. Hunter, 2s.; C. Rell, 1s.; T. Allen, 1s.; — Bailey, 1s.; — Hopkins, 1s.; — Woodford, 1s.; Alpha, 1s. R. Webster, 4s. Per R. Cameron (Glasgow): Hugh J. Duncan, £1; Duncan Sinclair, 10s.; Robert Smellie, 5s.; A Friend, 5s.; Daniel Fyfe Sandback, 5s.; Samuel Roger, 5s.; Thomas Reid, 5s.; Another Friend, 5s.

A. T. Barnard.—Shall appear.

A. J. H.—Mr. W. Armstrong's letter in the Hackney Gazette is a very good one. Such correspondence is of great service to Freethought.

Papers Received.—Halifax Labor News—Post—Secular Thought—Belfast Northern Whig—Portsmouth Times—Truthseeker—Boston Investigator—New York World—Progressive Thinker—American Sentinel—Isle of Man Times—Liberty—Esoteric—South Wales Echo—Freedom—Blue Grass Blade—Twentieth Century—Public Opinion—Two Worlds—Manchester Evening Mail—Hackney and Kingsland Gazette.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SPECIAL.

Readers of the Freethinker are requested to remember that the first week in October is "Shilling Week." During that week all who desire to aid, however modestly, in the active propaganda of Freethought during the winter, should send me one or more shillings. Every subscription will be acknowledged. I have to add that lecturing engagements, under the scheme I outlined a fortnight ago, are already being formed by Mr. Charles Watts and Mr. C. Cohen; and that the services of other lecturers will be utilised as soon as possible.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote lectures to-day (September 8) at Glasgow. On the following Sunday he lectures at South Shields. During the interval he hopes to take a little holiday.

The accounts of the St. James's Hall venture are nearly made up. There are only a few tickets still unaccounted for. It was a costly experiment, the rent alone being five guineas per night, and the advertising in proportion. Happily, however, there was no loss. Four or five pounds will remain on the right side of the balance-sheet. But this and more has been lost at Milton Hall, where "free admission" was compulsory, and Mr. Foote is responsible for the deficit.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured three times in Plymouth last Sunday. In the afternoon the Rev. A. J. Waldron attended, and a very pleasant and interesting debate took place between the rev. gentleman and Mr. Watts.

Mr. S. P. Putnam delivered his farewell lecture at the Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening. Considering the wonderful weather, and the difficulty in organising for a fresh meeting-place, there was a very gratifying attendance. Mr. Foote took the chair, and made a brief speech in introducing the lecturer. Mr. Putnam was accorded a most enthusiastic reception. He was in first-rate form, and his discourse was both instructive and entertaining. It was followed with close attention and evident pleasure. At the close our American visitor had quite an ovation, the audience cheering lustily and unanimously, many rising to their feet, the men waving hats and the ladies handkerchiefs. Mr. Foote wound up the proceedings with a farewell to the lecturer in the name of the Freethinkers of England. This elicited another outburst of applause, and the meeting came to an ideal conclusion, with plenty of hearty handshaking and fervent good-speeds.

Our next issue will contain an account of the farewell dinner to Mr. Putnam at the Holborn Restaurant.

Foresters' Hall is a fine one, and will hold a large number of people. As the weather gets cooler, and the long evenings draw in, we hope to see it filled from floor to ceiling. Mr. Charles Watts lectures there this evening (September 8), his subject being one of burning interest—"Missions to the Heathen." Mr. Watts occupies the platform again on the following Sunday, after which Mr. Foote takes two Sunday evenings. Mr. C. Cohen will lecture at the Foresters' Hall on an early Sunday, probably in October. We hope our London friends will do their utmost to bring their Christian friends to these meetings.

Mr. Putnam has seen something of English seaside life in the height of the season. For a couple of days last week, in company with Messrs. Foote and Watts, he enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. Munns, of the Terrace Hotel, Margate. Mr. Munns is a veteran Freethinker, and remembers Charles Bradlaugh when he was a boy-lecturer.

The Halifax Labor News contains an account of an interview with one of the old guard in that town, Mr. Thomas Riley, Chartist and Freethinker, who has carried on business as bookseller and newsagent for many years.

Goldwin Smith was always a sort of half-and-half evolutionist; yet, in an article on "Guesses at the Riddle of Existence," in the current North American Review, he shows he is not prepared to follow Mr. Kidd, Mr. Balfour, or Professor Drummond, each of whom he criticises from a rational standpoint. Professor Smith takes up a practical point when he challenges Mr. Balfour to provide us with some analysis of authority, and some test by which genuine authority may be distinguished from ancient and venerable imposture. As it it, Mr. Balfour fails to present any such criterion, nor is it easy to determine what is his view of belief in miracles.

Digitized by Google

Professor Smith concludes that there can be no hope of laying new foundations for a rational theology in any direction excepting that of the study of the universe and of humanity as manifestations of the supreme power. The study, moreover, must be pursued in that spirit of thorough-going intellectual honesty whereof Huxley was an illustrious example. If revelation is lost to us, manifestation remains; and great manifestations appear to be opening to our view. The sum of it all is that Agnosticism is right if it is a counsel of honesty, but not if a counsel of despair.

The West London Indicator devotes a eulogistic column to "The Queen's Park Naturalist"—Mr. R. E. Holding, a brother of the artist who chiselled the marble bust of Bradlaugh in the Manchester Secular Hall. Mr. Holding is a splendid draughtsman, and has illustrated biological works by Dr. Sutton, Professor Romanes, Dr. Seebohm, and other famous writers. He has recently completed a series of pictures of Indian animals, under the direction of the Indian Education Council, for use in British India. He has now in hand a fine series of school pictures to meet the recently issued code as to object-lesson teaching in natural science. This work will be published shortly by Messrs. Gill and Sons. The Indicator remarks: "But for his Secular proclivities, he would undoubtedly have now occupied an honorable seat [on a local body], yet it is to his training in a large Secular and Science School that Mr. Holding attributes his present position." He gives a good deal of time gratuitously to the local schools, but when he was proposed as a member of the Board of School Managers the local parsons swamped the meeting and kept him out. What a blessed thing is Christianity! How just! How tolerant! How benign!

Herbert Spencer opens the New York Popular Science Monthly with the fourth of his papers on "Professional Institutions," in which he show that the functions of the orator, poet, actor, and dramatist are all developed from the acts of the primitive tribesman in welcoming his victoriously-returning chief. Andrew D. White, writing on "The Continued Growth of Scientific Interpretation," describes the battle by which reason conquered tradition in English theology. Gustave Le Bon discusses "The Work of Ideas in Human Evolution," showing their immense power in the form of traditions and their tremendous force when newly accepted.

The American Unitarians established at Tokio, Japan, a "Senshin Sakuin," or "School for Advanced Learning." The school shows signs of becoming a Freethought seminary, the graduates reading papers on such subjects as "Japanese Ancestor Worship," "Occidental and Oriental Ethics." The superintendent of the school, Mr. McCauley, is a broad-minded man, and says a student is there afforded an opportunity to know and study every known creed. He is left free to judge as to the faith he requires. No question of orthodoxy is raised. He will find good in all. With crystallised Truth in his hand he selects or rejects.

The Bristol Branch concluded its open-air meetings in Eastville-park on Sunday, the final lecture being delivered by Mr. Dorne, a Hebrew gentleman, who formerly opposed the Secularists in Finsbury Park, London. Mr. Keast, the secretary, has labored hard at this enterprise, and has been well supported by Mr. Bracey, the treasurer. Several ladies have assisted; in fact, they seem to have taken more interest in the work than the men. To-day (Sept. 8) the Branch has its last country ramble. On the first Sunday in October it begins its winter's work in the Shepherds' Hall.

Freethinkers in North London will be interested to learn that a tea and garden party has been arranged for Sunday, September 15, by the Islington and Finsbury Park Branches, to take place at The Nook, 19 Alwyne-road, Canonbury, the residence of the secretary of the Islington Branch, Mr. A. Guest. Given fine weather, this should be a very enjoyable reunion. The situation is very pretty—a charming spot on the banks of the New River. The garden will be illuminated, and an entertainment will follow the tea, which will be served at 5.30. The tickets are one shilling, and may be obtained of branch secretaries. The proceeds will go to the funds of the Islington and Finsbury Park Branches. A meeting of members of the two branches respecting above will be held at Mr. Ward's, 91 Mildmay-park, Newington Green, on Monday, September 9, at 8 p.m.

Mr. Harry Snell writes:—"The Birmingham friends are to be congratulated on the promising start they have made at the neat little hall in Hope-street. In spite of the tropical weather of last Sunday, two good audiences assembled. I was much cheered to meet again the old veterans, Daniel Baker, C. C. Cattell, and J. Ridgway, all of whom are armed cap-à-pie to do battle against the common foe. I pointed out that September 1 was an auspicious day. We were assembled as a rational shooting party to bag the partridges of the Church. There is a fund of unused energy in Birmingham that needs manipulating, and it seems to me that all that is needed to insure success is the energy of the recruiting sergeant. The capital of the Midlands should be, as it used to be, the centre of the great work in the Midland counties. I shall be both surprised and disappointed if this venture does not result in a real forward movement. What is most essential is that comrades should not look back, but go full steam ahead."

CHRISTIANITY AND BUDDHISM IN JAPAN.

In the Open Court, of Chicago (August 5), Captain C. Pfoundes, who has long been in Japan, and is a duly initiated member of the most important Buddhist sects of that country, has some observations on Christianity and Buddhism in Japan. He says that the missionaries are mainly successful in destructive criticism levelled against the old faiths, but which the Japanese have the nous to turn equally against the Christians. He remarks: "Real converts are rarely met with, while perverts to materialism, scepticism, and irreligion are many—not quite the chicks the missionaries desire to hatch. During the present century very large sums have been expended annually in Asia, as well as elsewhere, in mission work, and a great many more or less competent and enthusiastic men and women from Europe and America have devoted their lives to the work of proselytising. Others enter upon the work with less noble and more mercenary motives. Of late years much of the money and material hitherto devoted to the Pacific Islands, etc., has been diverted to Asia. Japan and other countries, having a civilisation, religion, and literature of their own, are receiving much attention, to the neglect of other lands where none of these good things exist. The needs of those 'nearer home' have been ignored, whilst those afar off are courted and petted. Foreign missionaries in Asia, in Japan, for instance, are now very numerous, and representatives from nearly every civilised nation and of nearly all the numerous Christian sects are competing keenly for converts. The inducements held out to the young of both sexes are too attractive, the temptation is too strong, especially to the indigent classes, to be resisted. The opportunities for obtaining an education, which is in itself a sure high-road to lucrative employment, attract the young Japanese, especially the scions of old feudal retainers, who still cling to the traditions of superior birth, and whose pride makes them unwilling to learn a trade or to keep a shop, and whose ambition is official employment, military or civil, as school-teachers, interpreters, or clerks. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if the mission schools are crowded with pupils, and if more applicants than can be accommodated wait outside. Of the pupils, however, it is an admitted fact that but a tithe really become sincere converts, though many, for the time being, profess to believe. A constant weeding out of the less zealous and suspected pupils makes room for others; and those so turned adrift become the most active and bitter opponents of the introduction of the alien creed."

Captain Pfoundes points out that the doctrine of salvation through blood is a barbaric stumbling-block to all educated Buddhists. He says, too, "Puritanism will never get a footing in the Far East." He declares that the Christian missionaries are making a bid for popularity by loudly applauding the warlike spirit lately aroused, and he asks: "Do these missionary people hope, and really expect, to benefit by the defeat of the Chinese government, that they are so ready to go out of their way, and, instead of being men of peace, turn their coats inside out and assume the Jingo character? Whilst the Christian clergy expend much time and energy on polemics, in attacking not only Buddhism, Hinduism, Mohammedanism, etc., but also in controversy among themselves, the Buddhist bonze of each sect attends to his own duties, and, with rare exceptions, is on friendly terms with the bonzes of other sects, as well as with those of his own. It is all too true, and more the pity it is that it is so, that the converts (nominal) to Christianity are largely natives whose conduct is such that by the general opinion of foreign residents such converts are not the most desirable to employ."

Digitized by Google

Captain Pfoundes draws a distinction between the comparatively useless work of the missionary abroad and that of the poor curate at home. He says: "Personal observation of the relative position of the missionary abroad and the worker at home (say the curate of an East-end parish, of such a district as, unfortunately, may be found in any large city in Europe, America, or the Colonies) enables a comparison to be drawn. The missionary, invariably well housed, and, with few exceptions, well paid, duties light, away from irksome observation and criticism, and with ample leisure for study and recreation. Such conditions of life are infinitely superior to those of the poor curate, ill paid and overworked, neither too well clothed nor too well fed, working amongst the lowest of his race, amidst constantly harrowing scenes, squalor, want, wretchedness of the most abject kind, where indescribable filth accumulates, and sickness, contagions, and infections abound. The missionary and his family, sent out at great expense, maintained for years whilst gaining experience and learning the vernacular, and finally, frequently just when he may begin to be useful, returning to his native land, and dropping into a 'fat' living, a good income, and comfortable home, with congenial surroundings. The poor curate, too often an early victim to the life led during his apprenticeship, as a worker in slums. And of the two which has been the most useful? Is it really not a matter for public consideration, this misdirection of means and work?"

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker"
(August 3).

I ENJOYED my work in Sheffield. There are sturdy workers here. Mr. Nelson, Mr. Lill, and others too numerous to mention, gathered on this old-time battle field. There was a noble delegation from Barnsley. They walked in, a distance of about sixteen miles. I was presented by these comrades with a photograph of the soldiers at this point, while on campaign duty—Mr. and Mrs. Addy, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Dyson, who occupies the lecturer's desk, and is one of our busy workers; Harry Addy, young, but ready to do his duty; Mr. Wombwell, and Mr. and Mrs. Wadmore. I thank these friends for their handsome gift. We all had tea together at the hall in the afternoon, and this enabled me to make acquaintance with the Freethinkers of Sheffield and vicinity, and it was a most enjoyable occasion. I gave three lectures that day—morning, afternoon, and evening. The attendance was fair, considering that we are the frontier force; and the enthusiastic welcome was cheering to the heart of the Pilgrim. I was glad to greet new friends from near and far, and to place their names and features upon the tablets of memory; but if I began to enumerate I should not know where to end, for the friends of our cause rally by the score. Sheffield Secularism will continue to hold the fort for many years to come, as it has already held the fort for half a century.

Yes, Sheffield has, I think, the oldest Freethought hall in England, and perhaps in the world. It was built over fifty years ago, especially for Secular and reform purposes, and it has been kept to the original aim through many changing fortunes. I felt that it was an honor to speak in a building so consecrated by human genius. Owen, Holyoake, Bradlaugh, Annie Besant in her palmy days, Foote, Watts, and many other stalwart defenders of liberty, have spoken from the platform. Therefore, we might say that here in this time-worn building is the oldest battle-ground of English Secularism, an unpretentious building, but mighty in the thoughts that have glowed and thundered within its walls. Sheffield gives a priceless inheritance to the struggle of to-day from the dark yet glorious fields of the past.

I had the great pleasure, while staying at Sheffield, of enjoying the hospitality of American friends, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Matthewson, formerly of Philadelphia. They have been in England for over twenty years, but they were born beneath the Stars and Stripes, and have not lost the love of native land. They gave me a delightful welcome, and the hours sped merrily along, the glories of England mingling with reminiscences of the great Republic of the West—not that we love England less, but that we love America more, because in America we were born, and the homeliest spot is rich and beautiful because in it we first saw the light of day, the tenderness of human love mingling with the wonder and delight of nature. Mr. Matthewson is a true-blue, go-ahead American citizen. He is an inventor and a business man, and he has built a great factory in Sheffield, and his trade extends to all the world. We are constantly learning something new, and the "sand-blast" is something new to me. And it is a wonderful power. Remarkable it is that human ingenuity never discovered what sand could do until within a few years. General B. C. Tilghman is the original inventor, and Mr. Matthewson has added many patents, so that now the "sand-blast" has become a marvellous instrumentality. It is not only a worker, but an artist. It can produce in glass the most beautiful results, and the whirling sand-particles become as cunning as the human hand. They chisel with wondrous rapidity, a million of them working in harmonious combinations.

Professor Tyndall has eloquently described the "sand-blast," and it is worthy of note, so beautiful and so extraordinary is the process. Professor Tyndall says: "The Sphinx of Egypt is nearly covered up by the sand of the desert. The neck of the Sphinx is partly cut across by the eroding action of the fine sand blown against it. This action of sand has recently been turned to extraordinary account in the United States. When in Boston I was taken by Mr. Josiah Quincy to see the action of the 'sand-blast.' A kind of hopper containing fine silicious sand was connected with a reservoir of compressed air. The hopper ended in a long slit, from whence the sand was blown. A plate-glass was placed beneath this slit, and caused to pass slowly under it. It came out perfectly depolished, with a bright, opalescent glimmer, such as could be produced only by the most careful grinding. But this was not all. By protecting certain portions of the glass and exposing others, figures and traceries of any required form could be etched upon the glass." Perhaps from this brief description one can catch some idea of the variable potency of the "sand-blast." For ages it had been working away upon the Sphinx, upon the stones of the desert, and yet no one had ever utilised this "sand-power" until the invention and patents of General Tilghman and Mr. Matthewson, and now it is world-wide in its uses. All the files of Sheffield are sharpened by the "sand-blast." Glass is polished by it, and all kinds of figures, the most beautiful possible, can be cut in glass. Also tombstones are engraved by the same process. What was once done by hand is now done by the "sand-blast." The sand can cut into the hardest substances, for it is the concentrated energy of millions of particles of sand that does the work. Sand is also used for cleaning purposes. It is better than water. The fine sand, whirling from a tube, will knock the dirt out in no time. It will clean a building as no human hand could possibly do. It will thus be seen what a manifold power has been developed by the skill and perseverance of Mr. Matthewson, whose inventions must certainly take a front rank with the glories of modern industry. Mr. Frederick Matthewson, his son, is also devoted to this important enterprise. Miss Charlotte Matthewson, the daughter, is a member of the Royal College of Music, an honor which but few comparatively attain; and she is an exquisite player upon the violin, attesting the genius of woman and her capacity to do anything that man can do, give her a chance. So, mingling with the arts and industry of Sheffield, were the delights of music. I visited also the gallery and museum in the park, and here are many valuable paintings, also curiosities for the scientific. Near Sheffield is Queen Mary's Tower, where she was for some time incarcerated by the Earl of Shrewsbury. On the last night of my stay, Wednesday, I went to hear a lecture on new developments of steam power, and here I learned something I did not know before about steam. I suppose that engineers will understand me when I write of "superheating steam." That was a new phrase to me. In this, however, is one of the gigantic problems of the age. Its solution means a vast increase of steam energy. To roughly suggest, it is this: Ordinary steam, or "wet steam," as it is called, when it enters the cylinder is condensed more or less into water, and thus much of its power is lost. The problem is to "superheat" the steam—that is, to make "wet steam" "dry steam," so that when it enters the cylinder it will not become water at all, but remain steam and do the work of steam. It is claimed by the lecturer, Professor Ripper, one of the most experienced engineers of England, that this problem has been solved, and that from 25 to 50 per cent. of steam energy is saved. If this is so, then there is to be a new and wonderful evolution of engine and steam power, and Sheffield has the honor of its initiation in this country.

It will be seen, by what I have tried to tell, what a varied experience I had at Sheffield; what contrasts I met with in this metropolis of iron; that alongside its smoke and dirt are glittering expanses of art and poetry, and it is well worth a visit of many days. It has a population of about 350,000. I hope I shall see it again, and my Freethought friends also, who have treated me so generously.

From Sheffield, on Thursday afternoon, July 4, without any accompaniment of patriotic fire-crackers or cannon, I take my way to York, to famous York, which indeed has a solidity of ancientness about it that is truly magnificent and somewhat appalling. Here is the old wall of the Romans and the gateways, etc. Mr. William Johnson, who came from York to Sheffield to attend the lectures, met me at the station, and the first thing we did was to take a walk around the old city on the lofty stone battlements that had witnessed many a fierce and bloody encounter. York is now a railroad town with railroad shops. Two hundred trains pass every day. It has a population of 60,000. The largest part of the city is now outside the walls. The river Ouse runs through its centre. At the end of the southern wall are the Castle and Clifford's Tower, in the latter of which two thousand Jews were once slain. We visit the municipal buildings, and also the ruins of St. Mary's Abbey and the ancient hospital near by. These are interesting ruins, dating back several hundred years. The Abbey was destroyed by Cromwell. It was once a stately building, as large, apparently, as the present cathedral. There are many things to be seen in York. There are old-fashioned buildings still standing. There are still the narrow streets and over-hanging walls, so that from the second story one could almost shake hands with his neighbor across the way as he leans forward from his chamber window. I enjoy perambulating the streets of this quaint city, traversing its walls, looking at its great cathedral, and watching the moonlight and the shadows on the river and the parks, and the masses of people as they throng the central avenues. Friday morning I visit the cathedral. This is the largest Gothic cathedral in England, and said to be the largest this side the Alps. It is larger than Westminster Abbey or St. St. Paul's. It is an immense and imposing structure. It has two great towers in front, with a vast central tower 213 feet in height. Its entire length from east to west is 524 feet; its extreme breadth, north to south, 250 feet. We wander through the vast spaces of this temple, which has stood for centuries. The present structure was begun in 1070. But below in the crypt can be seen the remains of ancient walls which go back to the seventh century. The window at the east end is considered the largest illuminated window in the world. It is seventy-six feet in length and thirty-three feet in width, and wonderfully illuminated. It is impossible to convey an idea of its radiant splendor. After traversing the depths of this great cathedral, and looking upon the graves of warriors and kings and bishops; after looking at its marvellous walls and windows upon which so much labor has been expended at a penny a day, we climb the massive tower itself, 65 feet in breadth, and with 273 steps from the bottom to the top. An extensive view is presented from this lofty station.

Digitized by Google

The country about York for miles away is level. The city lies at our feet, the quaint old houses standing among those of modern style. The vast roof of the cathedral itself extends a hundred feet beneath. It was a place for imagination to revel in the greatness of the past and the wonder of the future. Other places of interest are the Bootham Bar, with Norman tower erected about the end of the thirteenth century; the Manor House, once a royal residence; the Lendal Bridge, whence can be seen a long sweep of the winding Ouse; the Mansion House, the walls of which are ornamented with historical portraits of great value; the Guildhall, dating from 1446, with its beautiful colored windows; the Theatre Royal, erected in 1765, over the site of St. Peter's church—a great improvement. It is said that Constantine the Great was born in York. Not much credit that to the city. He was also invested here by the Roman legions with the imperial purple.

I thoroughly enjoyed my few hours' visit at York. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson gave me a hearty English welcome. Two of their sons are now in America, and expect to make that country their home; and so my friends have a fellow feeling for those who come from the Western shores, seeing that they have given their quota to the population of the great Republic. Mr. Johnson was once an earnest Christian, and wrote a pamphlet in support of the faith; but he is now a thorough Liberal, and always ready to do his share of pioneer work. Mrs. Johnson is a born Freethinker, and has never passed through the clouds of superstition. I shall not forget the hospitality of these friends in this ancient cathedral city, which is one of the most superb monuments of a religious and barbaric past, combined with the splendor and industry of the nineteenth century. Within a stone's throw of the cathedral rolls the railway locomotive and flames the electric light. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

CALUMNY is the homage which dogmatism has ever paid to conscience. Even in the periods when the guilt of heresy was universally believed, the spirit of intolerance was only sustained by the diffusion of countless libels against the misbeliever, and by the systematic concealment of his virtues. How sedulously theologians at that time labored in this task; how unscrupulously they maligned and blackened every leading opponent of their views; how eagerly they fanned the flame of sectarian animosity; how uniformly they prohibited those whom they could influence from studying the writings or frequenting the society of men of different opinions from their own, is well known to all who are acquainted with ecclesiastical history.—W. E. H. Lecky.

THE HEATHEN IN HIS BLINDNESS.

MR. W. E. CURTIS, the correspondent of the Chicago Record in Japan, reports an interesting conversation with a Buddhist priest. The heathen said: "No one can understand or appreciate Buddhism without serious study, any more than any other religion. I understand that the comparative study of religions has been introduced into some of the theological schools of your country, which is a wise thing; and I hope your teachers will adopt such text-books as do justice to the Buddhists. The comparison of religions is necessary for a man to understand and appreciate his own."

Evidently this heathen needs the enlightenment of the blessed gospel, which proclaims there is no salvation in any other name than that of Jesus Christ. He went on to say there was much he could admire in Christianity and the character ascribed to Christ. "His teachings," he said, "do not conflict with those of Buddha. You will find a very striking similarity in their teachings. Buddha preceded Christ by five hundred years, and if Christ was not familiar with his writings—it is entirely possible that he may have been—there is a most remarkable parallel in their lives, the channels of their thought, and their code of morals."

This vile sinner could not understand the holy doctrine of salvation from all sins through the atoning merits of the precious lamb of God. He said: "I do not understand your doctrine of the atonement. I never could understand it. It does not seem logical. I cannot see how the blood of one man can, as you say, wash away the sins of multitudes of millions of others who have the same intelligence and the same opportunities to practise good morals and live sinless lives, but have neglected to do so. What is the use of a man trying to be good if the blood of Christ is sufficient to save him from the penalty of his sins? All he has to do is to be as wicked as he likes up to a certain period, when the termination of his life is approaching, then repent of his evil ways and accept what has cost him nothing. It does not seem fair to those who have lived correct lives and done great good at the cost of years of labor and suffering and self-denial to have some rascally fellow share the same blessings, just because Christ was crucified. Still, that is one of the many points of theology upon which Christians differ, and I may be pardoned for not understanding it."

The pretence of politeness in this canting rejector of the central doctrine of Christianity must be insufferable to the real Christian, imbued with the true spirit of the holy gospel: "Have not fellowship with unbelievers, but those mine enemies who would not that I should reign over them bring them hither and slay them before me."

This godless wretch went on to palliate idolatry. First he said: "Nor do we worship idols. Your missionaries have misrepresented Buddhism in this respect ever since they first saw our form of worship. The image is nothing of itself—a block of wood or an ordinary stone would answer the same purpose—but it is a symbol of an invisible being, sometimes beautiful and sometimes rude, according to the art and intelligence of the man who makes it. It represents the object of our worship, just like your cross and the image of Christ and the Virgin Mary." Afterwards he observed: "The African savage who worships a fetish is inspired by the same motive, and is just as sincere as the Pope when he says mass in Peter's. The only difference is in the degree of civilisation acquired by the worshipper. Your own Church was once in the same condition in regard to intelligence as the Buddhist believers are now. Perhaps it was worse than we ever were, because our priests have always taught peace and love, while millions of innocent persons have been sacrificed in supporting theological controversies in the Christian Church. I believe a long and bloody war was once fought to decide whether the sign of the cross should be made with three fingers or two, and, if I am not mistaken, the good Puritans who settled your own country believed in witchcraft, and not many years ago were burning people who were supposed to be possessed of the Devil."

The wicked Buddhist further said that Buddhists who visited Christian lands were compelled to report that "there is no such folly and wickedness and degradation in Tokio or in any of our other cities as they would find in London and Paris, New York and Chicago; and when the statistics of poverty and crime were compared, I am very sure the Emperor would be convinced that Buddhism was better suited to the warfare of Japan." Evidently this vile heathen wants his own people to go their own way to the everlasting bonfire. LUCIANUS.

A gentleman gave a party in honor of a celebrated missionary lately returned from his field of work. The ladies appeared in very decollete dresses, and as the host feared the style might shock his reverence he apologised to him for it, saying that fashion demanded it. "Oh, I don't mind it at all," replied the missionary; "I've been ten years among the savages!"

Digitized by Google

THE SALVATION ARMY AND MR. HOLYOAKE.

We have received the following letters for insertion :—

Sir,—Please excuse the liberty I am taking in writing to you, but we (the Salvation Army), being £12 in debt, are making a special effort to raise this amount, but, in consequence of the poverty of our own people, we are appealing to a few outside friends in the hope that they will assist us in this effort.

If you will do so, we will esteem it a very great favor.—I am, yours faithfully, W. A. Munro, Captain.

70 Cowper-street, West Brighton, August 10, 1895.

G. J. Holyoake, Esq.

Dear Captain Munro,—You are aware I am not much your way of thinking, and wish your addresses were more in favor of the improvement of this world. A man has no claim to admission to another world unless he has improved the secular condition of this. Your bands do make piety a little more cheerful in the streets than it used to be. But, if honest opinion in which I do not concur needs help to maintain itself, I am willing to aid it as far as I have means, and enclose 2s. 6d. If every one who differs from you as much as I do sends you but a similar sum, you will soon be out of your difficulty.—Yours faithfully,

Here and hereafter, if it can be so arranged,

G. J. Holyoake.

Eastern Lodge, Brighton, August 12, 1895.

—Brighton Herald.

THE DEMISE OF DEITY.

God's dead! Serenely man beginneth life anew,
Free from the fears that once did dominate his mind:
The ghosts from out the lonely night are vanished;
No evil spirit now shrieks in the stormy wind.

The planets in their orbits swing, needing no power
To guide their courses through the brightly star-gemmed field;
On man and beast, e'en as of yore, the sun's rays shine;
Yet none a deity conceive and homage yield.

O'er all the universe law now hath sceptred sway;
Naught can escape the reign of iron consequence.
For all we know, cause and effect account in full,
And thus we banish mystery, cant, and vile pretence.

Laud to the heroes who this great millennium gave,
Bringing us forth from out the night of priestly creed.
Sing of the conflict our sires did wage for the Truth;
Steadfastly, likewise, we will the battle-front lead.

Thor.

THE UNPARDONABLE SIN.

It is not often that we have occasion to feel grateful to the clergy. For some reason or other, their attitude and their conduct, as a general thing, inspire us with emotions of a far different nature; and we have little cause for anything but censure in so far as they are concerned. But now all of this is changed; and we think that our readers will unite with us in henceforth blessing the name of T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., for the great boon which he has conferred upon the human race. He has solved the riddle, he has settled the vexed question, which has driven many people into infidelity or into the insane asylum. No more do poor servant girls nor hypochondriac men need to worry and to wax lunatic over the great puzzle of the unpardonable sin. Dr. Talmage has set our minds forever at rest on this subject by explaining in a recent sermon that the unpardonable sin, the commitment of which doomed forever the evil-doer to a hopeless, eternal hell, is a sin against Mr. Holy Ghost, which consists in "the ascribing of the works of the Spirit to the agency of the Devil in the time of the Apostles." How deep is our gratitude to this man for this profound information, which will forever still the anguish of trembling souls! Murderers, thieves, assassins of lives and reputation; thugs, human brutes, burglars, and the most terrible human fiends who have ever disgraced the name of man, thanks to Brother Talmage, are now all right. They can go on in his work, assured of their final well-being, provided that they have not "ascribed to the Devil the work of the Spirit in the time of the Apostles." How wonderful! What feelings of gratitude should pulsate in the criminal breast at this, the greatest discovery of this wonderful age. Henceforth, he who fails to commit this unpardonable sin can rest easy in his criminal career. Even Talmage himself is safe.—Boston Investigator.

PROGRESS IN SPITE OF LAW.

Legislation should be an aid to knowledge. It exceeds its mission when it attempts to suppress it. Take the statute of William III., of Great Britain, which made it unlawful to deny the truth of the Christian religion, or the divine authority of the Scriptures, and punished offenders with fines and imprisonment. Here investigation is prohibited by Act of Parliament. That body chanced to be controlled by a majority who inherited their religious views; who had made no investigation for themselves, and, in all probability, they had neither education nor capability for the task. They enacted a law prohibiting other men from giving their conclusions after critical research.

No unaided mind is capable of investigating all subjects. Many men, by long study, assisted by the labor of others particularly adapted by genius and learning, may reach a given conclusion; but, if obnoxious to the Christian religion, or the heavenly paternity of the Bible, imprisonment must follow if a man announces his convictions.

The older American States passed similar laws to those of Great Britain to suppress inquiry. Their origin can be traced to the priest, who lacked ability to defend his creed by logic, so he enlisted legislation in his service.

The world owes its advancement to the law-breakers; to those who defied laws and prison-bars, and told the truth, regardless of consequences. To them is due the honor of lifting humanity somewhat out of the rut of ignorance and superstition, and the hope of final success is contingent on their continued disregard of prohibitory legislation to entail ignorance on the race.—Progressive Thinker.

Scientific Materialism.

We have come to consider life as the sound of a harp, of which death will cruelly break the cord. Then, in order that it may subsist, metaphysics are obliged to grow more and more subtle. The soul ceases to be an ethereal image of a real body, a shadow; it becomes the verbal entity of metaphysicians, a nothing so impalpable and inconceivable that every strong and free mind refuses to believe in it. The human being then knows that his poor personality is but a passing existence, since it springs from the ephemeral grouping of indestructible atoms, which the shock of death will one day disperse. From this moment man is really a man; the field of his activity becomes heightened and smaller in extent; he brings his dreams of happiness and his aspirations of retributive justice down from heaven on to the earth; he knows in what direction he ought to aspire, and he manfully resigns himself to that which is inevitable. —Dr. Charles Letourneau, "Sociology Based upon Ethnography," book iii., chap. xv., p. 273.

PROFANE JOKES.

Minister (to Sunday-school class)—"Yes, all you little children are made of dust. Now, what am I made of?" Class—"Mud."

Clergyman (severely to small boy fishing on the Sabbath)—"My lad, do you want to go to hell?" Small Boy—"What! in the summer? Don't yer think it's warm enough here?"

Minister—"And so you say your little prayer every night before you go to bed? That's right. And now, tell me, why do you do that?" Little Ethel—"Because mamma says she'll spank me if I don't."

A little girl in the art gallery, after studying a "Magdalen" represented weeping, suddenly exclaimed: "Mamma, I know why Mrs. Magdalen is crying. She wants Mr. Magdalen to buy her some more clothes."

Sunday-school Teacher (who has been explaining the blessings of Christianity)—"What is it, now, that binds us together and makes us better than we are by nature?" Girl—"Please, miss, it is our stays."

Of course, old Mother Eve was ne'er
Behind the footlights seen;
But the act that made her famous
Was a sort of serpentine.

The Sunday-school teacher had been expounding the International lesson, and, to see if the youngsters understood it, asked: "Well, now, tell me why we are commanded to gird up our loins?" "To keep up our breeches, sir," was the first answer.

Host—"Oh, don't go to bed just yet, captain. We shall have prayers as soon as the parson returns." Captain—"Thanks very much; but I had enough of his prayers to-day when I happened to trip him into the pond. He prayed for my soul to go to hell, and I don't suppose it will be any more effective if he now prays for it to go to heaven."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Charles Watts, "Missions to the Heathen."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 8, select entertainment for benefit of Branch. Thursday, at 8, important members' meeting; ex-members and friends invited at 9.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, Stanley Jones, "The Doctrine of Evolution."

CLUB AND INSTITUTE BUILDINGS (Clerkenwell-road): Thursday, Sept. 5, at 8, Executive meeting.

EAST LONDON (Swaby's Coffee House, 103 Mile End-road): 8, W. C. Lyons, "Christianity's Debt to Paganism."

ISLINGTON AND FINSBURY PARK BRANCHES: Monday, at 8, meeting at Mr. Ward's, 91 Mildmay-park, to arrange for garden party.

WEST LONDON BRANCH ("Sun in Splendor," Portobello-road, Notting Hill Gate): Tuesday, at 8.30, business meeting.

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, G. C. H. Carter, "Atheism and Ethics."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, Mrs. Thornton Smith, "The Gospel of Freethought."

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, Stanley Jones, "The Bible and Science."

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.15, F. Haslam, "Beautiful Bible Stories."

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, a lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, T. Thurlow, "Good and Evil in the Bible."

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11.15, C. James, "Now is the Accepted Time"; 3.15, "Come to Jesus."

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE (Middlesex side): 7, St. John will lecture. Thursday, at 8.30, S. E. Easton will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, St. John will lecture; 3.30, Stanley Jones will lecture. Wednesday, at 8, St. John will lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "Immortality."

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, W. J. Ramsey will lecture.

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, T. Thurlow will lecture.

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, a lecture.

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, W. Heaford, "Prayer."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, A. B. Moss, "The Bible and Evolution."

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 3, W. J. Ramsey will lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15, a lecture; 3.15, Robert Forder, "The Jesus of the Gospels."

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, S. E. Easton, "Where Will You Spend Eternity?" 7, "The Advance of Freethought." Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, Gymnasium Class; 7, S. Armfield, "Questioning the Christian Creed."

BRISTOL: 9.30, meet at Arley Chapel for ramble to Axnt.

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school.

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 11.30, G. W. Foote, "Freethought in Robert Burns"; 2.30, "Religion in the Light of Science"; 6.30, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible."

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, Tontine Society; 7, Ernest Newman will lecture.

MANCHESTER LABOR HALL (Grey-street, Hyde-road): Saturday, Sept. 7, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "Christianity the Enemy of Progress."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 11, C. Cohen, "The French Revolution—Part II., The Dawn"; 6.30, "What Think Ye of Christ?"

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, Torrens Parris, "Some Bible Symbols: their Origin and Meaning"; 3, "Man: Whence he Comes and How"; 7, "The Certainties of Religion Worthless."

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 3, H. Snell, "How Man has Grown"; 7, "The Story of the Sceptics of the French Revolution." Tea at 5.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King street): 7, business meeting.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BARNSLEY (May Day Green): 11, David Nicoll, "Some Remedies for Poverty"; 6.30, "Freethought and the Bible."

BRISTOL (Eastville Park, Lower End): 7, a lecture.

DERBY (Market-place): 11, Mr. Briggs will lecture.

MANCHESTER (Stephenson-square): 3, C. Cohen, "Missionaries." Open Space, Choriton-road, Brooks' Bar: Tuesday, at 8, C. Cohen, "Is Christianity True?"

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—Sept. 8 and 15, Manchester; 22 and 29, Birmingham.

STANLEY JONES, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London, N.—Sept. 8, m. Camberwell, a. Hyde Park, e. Camberwell; 15, m. Finsbury, e. Edmonton; 22, m. Kingsland, e. Deptford; 25, Hyde Park; 26, Hammersmith; 29, m. Victoria Park, a. Finsbury Park, e. Kilburn.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Croydon-road, Rotherhithe, London, S.E.—Sept. 8, m. Westminster; 15, Mile End; 22, Camberwell; 29, Westminster. October 6, Camberwell; 20, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

T. THURLOW, 356 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 8, m. Kingsland, e. Edmonton; 15, e. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 29, e. Edmonton.

OFFERS Wanted for 120 copies of the National Reformer, dated 1860-1863; 21 copies of the Reasoner, dated 1854; and other old Freethought pamphlets from 1850. Levi Wood, Darley-street, Bolton.

64 pp., price 3d., by post 4d.,

THE

HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE.

WITH A

FULL AND TRUE ACCOUNT

OF

"THE LEEDS ORGIES."

EDITED, WITH INTRODUCTION,

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

A CHAPTER FROM

Strauss's Original "Life of Jesus."

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

G. W. FOOTE.

(A Most Thorough Analysis and Exposure of the Gospel Story by a Master Hand.)

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

A Demonstration of the Biblical Doctrine of Devils, suitable for circulation among Christians.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying good Parlor Coal, suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."
W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."
Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR OUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 3d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 3d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 3d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 3s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIKVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 2s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 8d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SALE. SALE.

NOW FOR ANOTHER HOWLING GALE OF BUSINESS.

Black or Navy Serge Suit Length (Pure Wool) 15s.

Check or Mixture Suit Length (Pure Wool) ... 15s.

3 Pure Wool Trouser Lengths (Splendid Qualities) ... ... 15s.

Black, Navy, or Brown Melton Overcoat Length ... ... 15s.

1 Lady's and 1 Gent's Silver-mounted Umbrella (Best Covers)... ... ... 15s.

A Bundle of Dress Remnants (20 yds., double width)... ... ... 15s.

2 Pure Wool Dress Lengths ... ... 15s.

1s. must be added to cover carriage on each Parcel.

"BRUNO" CLOTH

FOR LADIES' WINTER DRESSES.

SEND FOR PATTERNS.

We have got the New Colors ready in this Cloth for coming Autumn and Winter, and, as a special inducement to get ladies to buy early and make the cloth known, we offer the "Bruno" Cloth at 9s. 6d. per Dress Length till the end of September; after then the price will be 10s. 6d.

MONEY REFUNDED IF THE INVESTMENT IS NOT SATISFACTORY.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Handsomely bound in cloth, post free 7s. 6d.,

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF

FREETHINKERS OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

"The Dictionary has involved enormous labor, and the compiler deserves the thanks of the Freethought party."—National Reformer.

"The work will be of the greatest value."—Freethought.

"At last we have the long-wanted means of silencing those Christians who are continually inquiring for our great men, asserting that all great men have been on the side of Christianity."—Truthseeker (New York).

"The most important Freethought work published this year."—De Dageraad (Amsterdam).

"A good and useful work that was much needed."—Commonweal.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 132 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—NO. 37. SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

MR. PUTNAM'S FAREWELL.

EARLY in May I went down to Southampton with Mr. Charles Watts to meet Mr. S. P. Putnam, the President of the American Secular Union, who had come over from the great Western Republic to see this little isle set in the silver sea, and to salute his Freethought comrades in the land which produced Thomas Paine and Charles Bradlaugh. On the first Sunday in May I took the chair at Mr. Putnam's first lecture; on the first Sunday in September I took the chair at his last lecture. During the intervening four months he had "done" England and Scotland as few Americans have the opportunity of "doing" it in such a brief time. He had visited most of our principal cities, from Plymouth to Aberdeen; he had seen a great deal of our finest landscapes; and he had inspected many places of ancient historic interest, from a crumbling old Durham church to the stately fane of Westminster, where lie the ashes of old kings and warriors, and men of light and leading, whose names sparkle for ever like jewels on the forefinger of time. He had lectured to enthusiastic meetings of Freethinkers, and had everywhere been received with the most generous hospitality. And everywhere he had made friends by his geniality, good-fellowship, and racy Yankee humor. And when the last few days of his stay with us arrived, it was but fitting that we should entertain him, as Britishers love to entertain their friends, at a good dinner; not the paltry dish of herbs which Solomon thought better than a beefsteak with wrangling, but a real square meal, ample and satisfactory, such as might prompt a man to say—

> "Not e'en the gods upon the past have power,
> And what has been has been, and I have had my hour."

Well, the dinner to Mr. Putnam came off on Wednesday, September 4, at the Holborn Restaurant. The repast was, of course, all that could be desired. There is nothing shabby at that establishment. And the company was representative. Naturally, most of them were Londoners, but a few were up from the country. Mr. Gilbespie came from Newcastle, and Mr. Sidney Gimson from Leicester. Mr. G. J. Holyoake, the veteran, came up from Brighton. But he was not the only veteran present. There was Mr. Edward Truelove, a hero and a martyr of free speech, born in the same year as Mr. Gladstone. There was also Mr. George Anderson, a rare mixture of shrewdness and benevolence, whose memory goes back to the days of Robert Owen. He loved and admired Charles Bradlaugh, but he is broad-minded enough to continue his support to the movement under new conditions. Mr. Charles Watts belongs to a younger generation, though time is thinning his locks and sprinkling them with grey, without quenching his eloquence or dulling his fire in debate. Mr. Touzeau Parris was there, with his well-stored mind, his ready tongue, and his sagacity enlivened with smiles. Mr. Robert Forder, the faithful old secretary of the National Secular Society; Miss Vance, his new and energetic colleague; Mr. A. B. Moss and Mr. W. Heaford, who have fought so long and gallantly in the open-air lecture-field; Mr. James Rowney, who is winning laurels in the same warfare; and last, but not least, my dear old friend and co-worker, Mr. J. M. Wheeler: all these and scores of others met around the festive board, which was graced by the presence of well-dressed, smiling ladies, who were brave enough to be Freethinkers. Mr. Putnam sat on my right, looking plumper and jollier, if that were possible, than when he landed on the shores of old England.

After the dinner came the speech-making. My own address as chairman was, I trust, suitable to the occasion. Mr. Holyoake followed in a speech marked by felicitous diction, and containing a highly-finished eulogy of Colonel Ingersoll, as well as a handsome tribute to Mr. Putnam. Mr. Sydney Gimson, who spoke for the provinces, was bright and telling. He also hoped that Colonel Ingersoll would come over to England, but, whether he came or not, the Freethinkers of this country had learnt to admire and love Mr. Putnam for his own sake, and did not merely regard him as a John the Baptist to a Jesus Christ. Mr. Parris was wise and witty. His brief speech bristled with good points. Mr. Watts finished the flow of English eloquence with characteristic dignity, and then Mr. Putnam rose to respond to the toast of his health. The whole company rose with him and cheered him to the echo. It was impossible for flesh and blood to be unmoved at such a greeting. Mr. Putnam was visibly affected, but his platform training served him in good stead, and he launched out into a really brilliant speech, abounding in humor, pathos, and nervous eloquence. When he sat down the applause was worth hearing. I only wish it could have been heard by our comrades in America.

Some music on the piano, a few capital songs, and an inimitably-rendered satirical reading by Mrs. Charles Watts, added to the general enjoyment. Finally, there came an impromptu addition to the official program. Mr. George Anderson proposed the health of the President of the National Secular Society, in a generous little speech, which was heartily applauded. After the President's response, the company broke up with "Auld Lang Syne." Then came a lot of handshaking; in fact, it must have made Mr. Putnam sore for several days.

Mr. Watts and I spent Friday evening with Mr. Putnam, and the next day Mr. Watts saw him off at Waterloo Station, I having to travel to Scotland.

Thus ends a most interesting episode in the recent history of the Freethought movement in England. Mr. Putnam has returned to the land of his birth, but he has made an indelible impression upon the Freethinkers of England. They like his eloquence, and they love his personality. He carries with him their unanimous good-wishes. They hope he will live long to lead the army of Freethought in America, and they also hope he will come over again to old England. Whenever he comes he will find a host of eager hands stretched out in glad welcome.

G. W. FOOTE.

After four months' sojourn amongst us, Mr. Putnam sailed on Saturday last for New York, in the s.s. "Paris." With other friends I saw our friend off from Waterloo Station at 9.40. Mr. Foote, having to start for Glasgow, could not be at the station. At 12.30 I received the following telegram:—"On board 'Paris.' Good-bye. Freethought always.—S. P. PUTNAM."

I am sure the readers of the Freethinker will wish our American visitor a safe and pleasant voyage. During his stay with us he has made many friends, who will be glad to give him another welcome to old England.

CHARLES WATTS.

Digitized by Google

HUTTON ON HUXLEY.

THE article on Professor Huxley, by Richard Holt Hutton, editor of the Spectator, in the September Forum, seems to me remarkably like the dirge set up by the donkey over the dead lion. He was a mighty lion, but he never would listen to the donkey's reasons, and when he encountered the donkey's brethren he only tore them to pieces. Huxley, says Mr. Hutton, "was undoubtedly a man of genius. But I doubt whether his speculative genius was as great as his genius for debate, for exposition, for attack and defence," and so on. Hutton met Huxley at the Metaphysical Society, and he says: "I shall never forget the dismay with which many of us heard his paper on the question, 'Has the frog a soul, and of what nature is that soul, supposing it to exist?'" He pointed out that, if the frog has a soul at all, it must have two souls, for, if the spinal cord is divided, both parts exhibit the same kinds of purpose and action, though they do not co-operate. Mr. Hutton says: "I need hardly say that the discussion on this paper was not very 'nutritive.'" Probably this was because the donkeys could not be expected to see the lion's drift.

Worse follows, for Mr. Hutton says: "The real object of Huxley's paper was to bewilder"; whereby Mr. Hutton writes his own name as fully as ever Dogberry wished his to be written. Huxley's object, as a fool who was not an opponent might see, was to induce the members of the Metaphysical Society to think; to just consider the difficulties of their soul-theory in relation to a man with a broken spine, or a frog with a divided one. But they were sunk too deep in metaphysical mud to do aught but squirm, bewildered.

Mr. Hutton says:—

> "I remember another paper of his which was, I think, much less successful, as in it he travelled a good way beyond the region where he was master of his ground. It was a paper, conceived in a very reverent and even tender spirit, stating his views very frankly, though with great delicacy, on the miracle of the Resurrection. His object was to show, and undoubtedly he did show, that the disciples of Christ had, and could have had, no physiological evidence that what we now mean by death had ever taken place in the body of our Lord at all."

As Mr. Hutton tells us afterwards that Huxley rejected the supposition that Jesus recovered in an ordinary way, and died a natural death after all, we doubt if he saw Huxley's real drift, which, I take it, was not to bewilder, but to suggest to the metaphysicians that they were dealing with a myth.

Mr. Hutton goes on to say:—

> "I do not suppose that any one—even if he held, as I do, that the Gospel of John is not less trustworthy, or is even more trustworthy, in its account of the historical facts [!] than any of the Synoptic Gospels—would deny this. It is perfectly evident that, if the supposition, that our Lord never died at the time when he was believed by the Church to have died, were otherwise tenable, we neither have, nor could have, any proof that death in the physiological sense had really taken place, since at that period the physiological evidences of death, as we now understand them, were not formulated at all. But what Professor Huxley entirely ignored was the impossibility of the supposition that our Lord could have recovered consciousness and the power of movement in the maimed and wounded condition in which the crucifixion had left Him, without his intimate friends and followers knowing perfectly well that He was corporeally, at the time of His so-called resurrection, a mere resuscitated and helpless invalid, and that, if He subsequently lived, for a number of days or weeks, or months or years, on this earth, and then died, the stress which they laid on His resurrection was a mere fraud—a conviction that would have put a final end to all that enthusiasm of faith on which the spread of His gospel wholly depended."

Mr. Hutton apparently still cannot see that the object of Huxley's paper was to show the metaphysicians that they receive the central mystery of their faith on evidence which no one would think worthy of the name in scientific discussion. He regards it as "written to seize an opportunity for a very eloquent apology for the incredulity of men of science." I should say it probably proved this and something more.

Mr. Hutton says he could never understand the reverence Professor Huxley expressed, and certainly felt, for Jesus of Nazareth. It would have been strange had it been otherwise. Mr. Hutton asks: "Did Jesus Christ ever conceive the duty of scepticism as to the love and guardianship of God? And how, then, could Professor Huxley reverence so profoundly the man who taught the creed most opposed to his own, that 'scepticism is the highest of duties, blind faith the unpardonable sin'?"

Is it so hard, then, to see that a person might be the ideal of a bygone age and a bygone condition of society without, therefore, being suitable as an ideal of our own? But if a Freethinker says a word for Jesus as a man, he is rushed upon to ask, How, then, can he deny that he was God and turned devils into pigs?

J. M. WHEELER.

CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES NOT UNIQUE.

IN dealing with the principles of any system it is necessary to consider their probable value as guides in human life. It is assumed on behalf of Christianity that its moral principles are unique, and that they harmonise with progressive knowledge. This is the leading position taken by modern exponents of the alleged evidences for the ethical claims of Christianity. Now, we submit that such claims are mere assumptions, and that, in any case, both cannot be logically maintained, inasmuch as whatever harmonises with progressive knowledge must have something in common with it, and cannot therefore be unique. Besides, before it is proved that Christian principles are unique, it must be shown they are unlike all others. But this is not so with the ethical principles of the New Testament, for no scholar questions, for a moment, the similitude existing between the teachings of Buddha, for instance, and those ascribed to Christ. Max Müller remarks: "Between the language of Buddha and his disciples and the language of Christ and his apostles there are strange coincidences. Even some of the Buddhist legends and parables sound as if taken from the New Testament, though we know that many of them existed before the beginning of the Christian era" (Science of Religion, p. 113). Professor Beal observes: "The points of agreement between the two are remarkable. All the evidence we have goes to prove that the teachings of Buddha were known in the East centuries before Christ" (History of Buddhism). It may also be mentioned that the claims now set up on behalf of Christ are very similar to those which were urged in the interest of Buddha. Self-assertion ("I am the Light of the world"), self-assumption ("unequalled in perfection"), being "without sin," the possession of purity, and great personal influence are features ascribed to Buddha as well as to Christ. The belief in the originality of the Gospel precepts has long been abandoned, even by Christian writers. Jesus himself acknowledges that the doctrines of "love to God and love to man" are the compendium of the ten commandments, which existed long before his time.

The great consolidating power which is said to be peculiar to Christianity is "love for Christ." But surely love for the originator of a system is by no means a unique feature of the Christian faith; for the weight of personal influence has been visible in all the founders of the great religions of the world. Here, however, a most important question arises: Does conduct, which is the result of personal attachment, indicate the highest form of morality? We think not; for the ignorant and the savage may have great veneration for their religious heroes, and yet do nothing themselves to promote the general welfare. In our opinion, the really moral man is he who follows truth for its own sake, and pursues a moral course because it tends to his own good and also to that of others. The welfare of man is a nobler motive for good actions than love for Christ. This latter incentive is too frequently fostered through a selfish desire for mere personal reward in some imaginary future life. Conduct based upon the intelligent perception of right and justice may, and does, vary from that which is prompted by devotion to either Buddha, Christ, Mohammed, or Joseph Smith. The moral value of the motive which springs from indiscriminate veneration for any religious leader may be estimated by its results. In the case of Jesus it has, in innumerable instances, led to narrow-mindedness, bigotry, fanaticism, the subjection of the intellect, and a relinquishment of manliness and self-reliance. Of course there are many exceptions to these evil results of hero-worship; but the history of Christian theology affords ample proof that an impassioned love for the name of Jesus has allured millions of devotees from the path of rationality, and placed them in the vortex of uncontrolled enthusiasm. It was so with the fanaticism of the seven crusades, the cruelties of the Inquisition, the persecutions of the Star Chamber, the slaughter of Protestants in Paris in the fifteenth century; and it is so to-day in a lesser degree, as shown by the fanatical spirit of the members of the Salvation Army, and other Christian sects of low intellectual calibre.

Digitized by Google

Another favorite claim that is put forward to prove that Christianity is unique is the teaching that God is one. But this idea did not originate with Jesus, for it was the view entertained by the Jews long prior to the Christian era. Besides, the supposed followers of Christ profess to recognise in God three divisions—the Creator, the Redeemer, and the Comforter, or, as the Prayer Book of the Church of England puts it, "The Father uncreate, the Son uncreate, and the Holy Ghost uncreate." It is true attempts are made to reduce these three to one, but it is sought to be done only with the aid of a kind of arithmetic that is peculiar to theology, and which would not be accepted in any elementary educational institution of the country. Still, this does not divest Christianity of Dualism, for God and the Devil yet remain, and the Evil One has by far the greater influence in the world, while his abode is more easily found and more extensively patronised than the home of the "most high" (Matthew vii. 13, 14). It is further asserted, as a virtue of the Christian conception of God, that it assimilates fresh elements from the discoveries of astronomy and biology. If this be so, the conception of God must have been very different after the discoveries of Copernicus and Darwin to what it was before. One of those conceptions must, therefore, have been wrong; and it may be fairly asked why God allowed a false conception of him to obtain through lack of materials by which a correct one could be formed?

Finally, we are confronted with the following query: How can we account for the youthful, unlettered Jesus having such profound views of God? Our answer is: Whatever views Christ entertained of God—profound or otherwise—he found existing in his time. Then we are told that he outstripped all the productions of the great philosophic geniuses of the ancient world. This is an assertion destitute of proof. In fact, judging from the New Testament, he did nothing of the kind, for much that he is credited with teaching is inferior to many of the inculcations of the old philosophers. The morality of Christ, as J. S. Mill observes, "is, in many important points, incomplete and one-sided, and unless ideas and feelings, not sanctioned by it, had contributed to the formation of European life and character, human affairs would have been in a worse condition than they now are" (Liberty, p. 29).

It is worthy of note that most of the ancient philosophers put morality upon the right basis, which is its relation to man, not to God; they made its incentive good results in this life, not hope of reward or fear of punishment in another state of existence. Granted that their morality did not become universal, neither did the ethics taught by Christ. Ancient morality was effectual among those who regulated their lives by it; what more could be expected? We learn from the Gospels that the teaching of Jesus had little or no effect upon his family, his fellow villagers, or his nation. It failed to induce his relatives to believe in him; it did not inspire his beloved disciple, Peter, to tell the truth, any more than it won to his belief those who crucified him. It is easy to say that the morality of Christ rapidly influenced all minds; but it has never done so, and even to-day the great majority of the human family are still not affected by it, while most of those who profess to accept it practically ignore its influence.

The fact is, with all the drawbacks of Pagan morality, it broke down the power of Grecian mythology, just as Secular morality is now refining many of the teachings, and destroying much of the superstition, of Christianity. There is no doubt, in our mind, that Christian England is indebted to Pagan Rome and classic Greece for much of the morality, culture, and heroism which give the prestige to modern society. As Dr. Temple, the present Bishop of London, writes in his Essay on the Education of the World: "To Rome we owe the forms of local government which in England have saved liberty and elsewhere mitigated despotism. . . . . It is in the history of Rome rather than in the Bible that we find our models of precepts of political duty, and especially of the duty of patriotism. . . . . To the Greeks we owe the corrective which conscience needs to borrow from nature."

CHARLES WATTS.

EUSEBIUS AND THE GOSPELS.

THE seventeenth chapter of the second book of Ecclesiastical History, attributed to Eusebius, gives an account of the ascetics of Egypt, known as the Therapeutæ. Whether these were identical with the Essenes of Palestine or Buddhists from India has excited a deal of controversy, into which I shall not here enter. What I wish to point out is that, according to this, the first-known Church history—the sacred ancient writings of these Therapeutæ—were the very Gospels. This testimony is sought to be obscured in the translation of Eusebius given in Bohn's Ecclesiastical Library. This translation is by the Rev. C. F. Cruse, D.D., and was originally published in six volumes.

The passage in question reads, according to this worthy divine:—

> "But it is highly probable that the ancient commentaries which he [Philo, who was a cotemporary with Christ] says they [the Therapeutæ] have, are the very Gospels and writings of the apostles," etc.

I italicise the words which bring out the dishonesty of the translation. Let us turn to the latest translation—still done by men of God, the eminent divines, G. H. Wace and Dr. Philip Schaff (Oxford, 1890)—and we read:—

> "But it is very probable that the works of the ancients, which he says they had, were the Gospels and writings of the apostles," etc.

Again I italicise the words noting the contrast of tense. If, however, we wish to get at the correct meaning in English, we must go back to the time when only the ministers, and not the common, vulgar populace, were expected to read books of Church history. Thus we read in the translation by Meredith Hammer (London, 1619), p. 28:—

> "It is also very likely that the Commentaries which he reported to have been among them were the Gospels and other works of the apostles, and certain expositions of the ancient prophets, such as partly that epistle unto the Hebrews, and also the epistle of Paul."

But, to get the real gist of this important passage, we cannot do better than go back to the first folio translation published at Cambridge in 1603. Here we read (and the passage must be given in full):—

> "They have writings of some ancient persons who have been heretofore famous leaders of their sect, and have left many monuments of their learning which consist in dark and secret expressions, which they use as original expressions, do imitate thereby the course of study. These certainly seem to be the words of such a man as had heard some one of our religion expounding the Holy Scriptures, and it is very likely that the writings of those ancient persons, which he says they had, were the Gospels and writings of the apostles, and certain expositions of the ancient prophets, of which sort many are contained both in other gospels of Paul and also in that written to the Hebrews."

The meaning, despite the old style of construction, is plain. It is very likely that what Philo called the ancient writings of the Therapeutæ were the Gospels, etc. This meaning has been sought to be obscured by translators, who saw the damaging consequences of such admissions. I am not a Greek or Latin scholar, but a friend has submitted the foregoing versions to several scholars, who agree that the Cambridge translation of 1603 is best. What does Professor Edwin Johnson say?

LUCIANUS.

A poor Highlander, near his end, asked the minister, in the midst of his consolations, whether there would be any whisky in heaven. "Oh no, Donald," was the reply, "there will be no occasion for that." "Ca'sion or no 'casion," persisted Donald, "'twad be but decent to hae it on the table."

Digitized by Google

THE SHADOW OF THE TEMPLE.

A PRIESTLY RULER, weary for a while of ceremonial, the tasks and fret of his daily life, rode one day alone far beyond the city walls.

Until he came at last to a green place far from the habitations of men, and sat him down amidst trees near by a brook of clear, swift-running water. No sound could he hear but the little noise of the waters, the wind in the trees, and the piping of mateing-birds.

And in a little while a great peace came into his soul, and he was rested in spirit.

A great cloud came sublimely out of the West. It was whiter in the sun than drifted snow, and its mighty approach was like the coming of the chariot of the Eternal.

"Glory to God," cried the Priestly Ruler.

Soon there came unto his ears the soft sound of a lute, and a strong voice singing—the voice of a young man singing of love and the joy of life.

The Priestly Ruler arose, frowning, and went towards the place whence the music was coming. And through the lacing leaves and branches he beheld a young man and woman reclining upon a bank soft with moss and young grass. And they were very beautiful. Adorned were they with field-flowers and leaves twined about their garments, and in their flowing hair were flowers, saffron and crimson and gold, the fresh leaf of the vine, and the poppy—the poppy red as blood. The young man was luting and singing, and his voice was filled with the very joy of song. He sang of this world only, of the earth and things earthly; most of all he sang of love. And the young woman was looking into the face of the singer, and in her eyes was the light of a great love.

The Priestly Ruler was angered that they praised the earth and the joys of earth, and remembered not God nor the things of God. And he broke into upon them, crying: "O children of sorrow, cease thy vain glorying of the things that pass. Know ye not God—that the day of his wrath draweth nigh? Life is brief and all uncertain; cease, therefore, thy sinful dalliance, and haste to make thy peace with him."

The lovers stood and listened amazed. The young woman, suddenly afraid, clung to her lover, saying: "O beloved."

Her lover put his arm around her, and drew her to him and soothed her, saying: "Beloved, be not afraid."

And he turned unto the Priestly Ruler, crying: "Who art thou who seest evil in love, need of repentance in joy, daring so rudely thus to break in upon us?"

"I am a Ruler, and a Priest of God," answered he.

"Then begone! back to thy altar, thy chanting, thy incense, for we are not of thy world," answered the young man. "We are children of earth, and it suffices us."

"What of to-morrow? Will the earth endure for ever?" replied the Priestly Ruler. "O fools! Ye are bartering the opulence of eternity for the bitter-sweet pleasures niggardly given in life's scant time."

"Nay, tell not thine ancient tale, priest," said the young man. "We are of those who have heard and have not believed. Life is still ours, the earth is still ours; no shadow of the temple dims for us the manifold glories of the world; no sinister creed is ours to make the sweet unclean. We have no gods, no priests. You say we are fools. We would fain be wise; we would have both wisdom and courage—wisdom to live aright, courage to face unflinchingly whatsoever befalleth us. We want neither thy God nor thy priestly wisdom. For where the priest is there are sorrow, vain guessing, and futile strife. Aye! and the very name of 'God' calls out of the past a vision of blood and agony. What sayest, my beloved?"

"Thou hast spoken my thoughts, beloved," answered the young woman; then gently, but unafraid, she said: "O, sir priest, it is but simple truth that the dear earth is ours but a very little while, and that there is much sin and sorrow in the world. My lover and I cannot always fill the sunny hours with luting and with song. Troubles we have, bitter thoughts and grievous discontentments. But should we, then, be always sorry because we are sometimes sad? Should we close our eyes against the dawn because soon the night cometh? Nay! but the knowledge of the sure-coming night constraineth us to gather in our daytime all we can that this our earth yields for our joy. Should we mourn the speeding time? Nay! for each season hath its peculiar joy, and we speed into the evening of life even in the present, without vain regret for the inevitably past. Now is with us the season of youth, of youthful love, and of hopeful work. And, sir priest, we are very happy, my love and I."

The three stood awhile in silence, the Priestly Ruler viewing with eyes of angry reproach the flower-decked worldlings; they, with clasped hands, looking with quiet disdain at the sombre priest.

"So be it," said the Priestly Ruler, and turned and silently went his way. As he rode citywards he heard faintly, and ever fainter growing, the sound of luting and of song.

"They have their day," said he musingly.

At the setting of the sun the Priestly Ruler sat upon a parapet of his palace overlooking the city. And the temple of his God was betwixt him and the sun; and over the city was the shadow of the temple. And the city was silent; no sound of lute or song came thence to his ears. But out from the temple swelled the great sound of chanting—of people and priests chanting—supplicants at the feet of God.

And the Priestly Ruler arose, saying deeply unto himself: "Even so!—there is no hope for earth in the shadow of the temple; and the fear of God drieth up the wells of earthly joy."

HARRY H.

A LANTERN WITHOUT THE CANDLE.

IT seems rather surprising that, in all the veering away from theology which we have witnessed in our time, men, otherwise sceptical enough, should still profess faith in Jesus. They have given up his divinity, but still cling to his name, or the former half of it, as to that of a most extraordinary man. To my thinking, a greater fallacy or superstition never possessed men. To give up Christ, the son of God, and stick to Jesus, the son of Mary, seems to me to be an evidence of imbecility or excessive sentiment, in which reason plays no part at all. Jesus without the Christ is a lantern without the candle, and a poor lantern too. If Jesus was the Christ, God's anointed, the Son of God, and God himself, there is some slight modicum of sense in respect shown to him. But if Jesus was a mere man, Jew or Gentile, there is nothing in that fact to call out our reverence or to lead us to worship him.

Of course, those who so excessively crack Jesus up say they do so because of his wonderful character; but, in sober truth, the boasted character of Jesus is all the invention of his worshippers, and especially of those who have made money out of puffing him. Nor is that all; the boasted character of Jesus was concocted and put upon him or attributed to him, as the son of God, or while he was too exalted to be regarded in any other light than that of divinity. In a word, if the Churches had from the first treated and regarded Jesus as a mere man, as the Unitarians do, he never would have had any character to boast of, for there are no materials out of which to weave it. This is literally true. Why, "Paul" was far more prominent as a man than Jesus ever was. There is no ground of comparison between them. And if you take any one of the prominent martyrs mentioned in Christianity, you will find a character transcendently more striking than that of Jesus. Ignatius, Polycarp, Andrew, Peter, St. Simeon Stylites, the hermit Anthony, and a dozen others, showed self-denial far superior to anything Jesus exhibited. And this must be clear to all who are unprejudiced enough to examine for themselves.

I, of course, do not regard any of those names as representing a real man; but we have to discuss character in fiction as in real life. Shakespeare's characters, for example, are quite as much distinguished from each other, and must be regarded as quite as moral, immoral, great, little, and middling, as real men and women. So must it be with Jesus and his followers. And it seems to me unquestionable that Jesus has been, and is, completely eclipsed by many of those who have followed him. That is, unless you throw into his scale the element of Godhead, he is outweighed immensely by many a character in Church story.

Digitized by Google

Consequently, to take away the divinity of Christ, or rather of Jesus, is really to logically fling him up altogether. For the elements of greatness are entirely wanting. Whoever sketched him relied for effect upon his divinity, and nothing else. Take, as an illustration, pictured saints, such as we see them in Christian art; there they appear with their saintly insignia. But just obliterate the nimbus or the ring of glory over or around the saint's head, and he appears as ordinary a being as you could well imagine. The painter relies upon the trappings of divinity for all the effect he would produce upon the spectator. So with Jesus—the writers depend upon the marvellous, the impossible, for effect. And Jesus, once reduced to mere manhood, is no better than a sucked orange. That is the logic of the position taken up by the Unitarians and by others in the present day. Jesus is all or nothing. Let them have their choice. He is the impossible or the contemptible, like a pope without his infallibility or a priest minus his "reverence," or a rose destitute of color and scent. They may strive while they may, but they must make Jesus everything or nothing at all.

—Liberator. J. SYMES.

HUXLEY'S POSITION.

"The world is poorer by the death of Huxley; but the greatest must pass, sooner or later, from the stage of existence, and, as they pass, the lesson of their lives comes out with great distinctness. Of Huxley we may truly say that he enriched the life of our time by his thought and by his example, and that the forces which to-day make for progress in the world are better organised for victory, and move forward with steadier hope, through the help and inspiration which he afforded."—W. J. Youmans, in "Popular Science Monthly," August, 1895.

WHEN I reached intellectual maturity, and began to ask myself whether I was an Atheist, a Theist or a Pantheist, a Materialist or an Idealist, a Christian or a Freethinker, I found that the more I learned and reflected the less ready was the answer, until at last I came to the conclusion that I had neither art nor part with these denominations except the last. The one thing in which the most of these good people agreed was the one thing on which I differed from them. They were quite sure they had attained a certain "gnosis," had more or less solved the problem of existence; while I was quite sure I had not, and had a pretty strong conviction that the problem was insoluble. So I took thought, and invented what I conceived to be the appropriate title of Agnostic. It came into my head as suggestively antithetic to the Gnostic of Church history, who professed to know so much about the very things of which I was ignorant.

To my observation, human nature has not sensibly changed during the last thirty years. I doubt not that there are truths as plainly obvious and as generally denied, as those contained in Man's Place in Nature, now awaiting enunciation. If there is a young man of the present generation who has taken as much trouble as I did to assure himself that they are truths, let him come out with them, without troubling his head about the barking of the dogs of St. Ernulphus. Veritas prævalebit—some day; and, even if she does not prevail in his time, he himself will be all the better and the wiser for having tried to help her. And let him recollect that such great reward is full payment for all his labor and pains.

We are daily, and by rough discipline, taught to attach a greater and greater responsibility to the utterance of the momentous words, "I believe." The man of science who commits himself to even one statement which turns out to be devoid of good foundation loses somewhat of his reputation among his fellows; and, if he be guilty of the same error often, he loses not only his intellectual, but his moral, standard amongst them.

Suppose it were perfectly certain that the life and fortune of every one of us would, one day or other, depend upon his winning or losing a game of chess. Don't you think that we should all consider it to be a primary duty to learn at least the names and the moves of the pieces; to have a notion of a gambit, and a keen eye for all the means of giving and getting out of check? Do you not think that we should look with a disapprobation amounting to scorn upon the father who allowed his son, or the State which allowed its members, to grow up without knowing a pawn from a knight? Yet it is a very plain and elementary truth that the life, the fortune, and the happiness of every one of us, and, more or less, of those who are connected with us, do depend upon our knowing something of the rules of a game infinitely more difficult and complicated than chess. It is a game which has been played for untold ages, every man or woman of us being one of the two players in a game of his or her own. The chess-board is the world, the pieces are the phenomena of the universe, the rules of the game are what we call the laws of nature. The player on the other side is hidden from us. We know that his play is always fair, just, and patient. But also we know, to our cost, that he never overlooks a mistake, or makes the smallest allowance for ignorance. To the man who plays well the highest stakes are paid, with that sort of overflowing generosity with which the strong shows delight in strength. And one who plays ill is checkmated—without haste, but without remorse. My metaphor will remind some of you of the famous picture in which Retzsch has depicted Satan playing at chess with man for his soul. Substitute for the mocking fiend in that picture a calm, strong angel who is playing for love, as we say, and would rather lose than win—and I should accept it as an image of human life. Well, what I mean by Education is learning the rules of this mighty game.

THE HYPOCRISY OF THE WELSH PRESS.

IN the July number of the Welsh Pioneer, a small monthly devoted to the cause of religious freedom and inquiry, "Delta" says, in his "Notes by the Way":—"Welsh editors are always considerate—and consistent; especially those reverend editor-proprietors who are so callous to the just and fair claims of the producers that they think nothing of pocketing with one hand big payments for quack advertisements in the guise of news, while with the other they do all in their power to grind down to the utmost farthing the already underpaid 'devils' who set them up in type. The vernacular newspapers of the Principality, all of which represent some aspect of religious sectarianism, are invariably produced by boy-labor, or at best by 'men' for boys' wages. Yet these papers, week after week, contain notes and leading articles ostensibly written for the benefit of the toilers, and they are the loudest in their demands for the passing of measures tending to improve the condition of the working classes. Is it not high time that this miserable hypocrisy should be exposed?" We think it is.

In another note "Delta" says:—"I understand that Principal T. C. Edwards's Davies Lecture is to be published with the least possible delay. Some 'striking passages'—vide Welsh press—of the lecture were read at a meeting in connection with the C. M. Assembly, and, judging from what has already transpired of it, I should imagine that this lecture is a chef d'œuvre of mystical composition. To give one or two choice specimens of the 'striking' points: 'The idea of trinity in God arising from the idea of love'—I am translating literally from a Welsh report—'y dryeh fehlel am ddrindod (sic) yn. Nuw yn cedi o'r dryeh fehlel am gariad?' 'The special characteristic of the Second Person in the Trinity is that he is a divine model of a man, in two views: (1) that, although co-eternal with the Father, yet he emanates from the Father; (2) that, although he is in his nature co-equal with the Father, yet he is subordinate to the Father.' The report before me contains a long list of similar apparently illogical and self-contradictory propositions concerning that which, at least to all ordinary men, is absolutely unknowable. But Dr. Edwards is no ordinary man; therefore his utterances may demand attention, and yet prove nonsensical when subjected to analysis, although his followers regard them as infallible oracles."

An origin of nature is inconceivable; the existence of nature is evident. The manifestations of nature can be observed; the ultimate causes of these manifestations are yet untraced. The students of a "First Cause" have as yet announced no indisputable result. The theological alchemists have been at work in the laboratories of the churches for ages; they are engaged in their incantations and compoundings still. Every seventh day the crucibles are held over the fires of a hundred thousand altars, but the Philosopher's Stone of Creation has not yet been produced.—G. J. Holyoake, Preface to "Trial of Theism."

Digitized by Google

THE SALVATION OF GOD; OR, A NARROW SQUEAK.

THE notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith threw the Bible in the fire!
What a very dreadful act;
What a truly awful fact—
The BIBLE mind; not Shakespeare,
Or some scientific pest,
But God's own Word—nay, God himself,
For elsewhere God's non est.
O why doth woman ever thus
Defy the pow'rs that be?
Is it because no female sits
Upon the Trinitee?

The pit and stalls were thunderstruck,
The boxes held their breath;
The gallery went pale with fear,
And waited sudden death.
The orchestra were mute, and all
Their instruments were dumb;
The call-boy dropped upon his knees
And prayed to kingdom-come.
In short, for one appalling moment all the house was sunk
In abject, breathless, craven, hopeless, knock-kneed, palsied funk.

Thus Mrs. Ebbsmith flung God's revelation to the flames,
Unnerving male playgoers, and prostrating pious dames.
But ah! she turns! and, shrieking, hauls
God's Word from out the fire,
And saves herself post-mortem squalls
From omni-potent ire.
Down came the curtain midst a storm of violent applause,
Grotesquely reminiscent of vociferous "he-haws."

Oh, Mrs. Ebbsmith, how could you such profanation offer?
You know, of course, that burning books is joy to every scoffer;
That Atheists have bloodshot eyes, dishevelled hair, and long nails;
Grim squints and rudimentary horns, and even sometimes prong-tails.
Your mother, doubtless, taught you so when you were a mere baby;
She told you Thomas Paine was vicious, and believed it, may be.
Your infant mind was oft engaged in learning how a horrid,
Unbridled wretch, named Voltaire, died and went to regions torrid.
You often listened awe-struck to some squalid death-bed story,
And hoped that when you died you'd go to pantomimic glory.
At Sunday-school you learnt, by heart, some lame lugubrious sonnets;
Or went with ma to church when she required to see the bonnets.
And now these moral crutches you would wantonly abandon,
Although without them you have not a moral leg to stand on.
Thank goodness, just in time, you snatched the brand from out the burning;
And let us pray that, contrite, to the fold you are returning.
For where are justice, love, and honor, save in God's anointed?
And where are purity and truth, except as God appointed?
In his own Word, the Book of Books, cram full of holy writing—
Espousing lies, and lust, and filth, and red with blood and fighting.
'Tis meet that gentle woman should admire this volume gory;
Well might you burn your hands to save the Whale and Jonah story.
That sun and moon stood still for Joshua no one would credit,
Were it not in the Bible, proving God himself hath said it.
'Tis of the first importance that these wonders astronomical
Should be preserved along with other marvels anatomical:
As witness: Balaam's ass, which talked with eloquence pathetic;
And Jonah's whale, whose throat enlarged to fit with things prophetic;
Four-headed fowls, a talking serpent, armor-plated locust,
Are Bible truths, on which all good believers' eyes are focussed.
Gentle Jesus curse'd a fig-tree, for the cogent reason
That it obstinately bore no figs at the wrong season.
Time after time the men of God betrayed their morbid morals;
But Abram, Lot, and David now enjoy their well-earned laurels.
To cheer themselves at woman's cost these worthies faltered never;
Their names should surely be enshrined in woman's heart for ever.
Ezekiel, chapter four, describes—but stay! the "Rock of Ages"
At this point gets too dirty for our Editor's clean pages.
Oh, Mrs. Ebbsmith, how could you, for Thespian notoriety,
Have set your heart 'gainst all that's good, with female contrariety?
Reflect, ere deadly sceptic words you utter from the forum;
Let Balaam's ass and Jonah's whale restore you to decorum.

C. D.

ACID DROPS.

THE Methodist Times devotes an article to the Moral of the General Election, and finds that the main opposition to Liberalism was furnished by the Liquor Trade and the Established Church. The parsons are referred to as marching to the polling-booth "with a hiccuping drunkard on one arm and a sporting tipster on the other." How beautiful and kind! And only to think that the editor of the Methodist Times is a gentleman who cannot bear strong language—when applied to himself.

This precious article describes the Book of Revelation as "the true key to human history." Bishop South understood it better when he said that the subject of prophecy, to which it belongs, generally finds a man cracked or leaves him so. We do not feel called upon to say which alternative is applicable to Mr. Hughes.

But just fancy a man at large, at the end of the nineteenth century, finding the key to human history in St. John's Nightmare. Methodism and madness sure are nearly allied, at least in historical criticism. Gibbon and Comte and Buckle and Mommsen, and other masters of the philosophy of history, spend years on years in elucidating the past of mankind. But it is all a waste of time, for in comes Mr. Hugh Price Hughes, the greatest philosopher of all, with a little dream-book in his hand, and exclaims: "Here is what you have all sought and missed. The secret of human history is the woman sitting on the scarlet-coloured beast, with seven heads and ten horns." How true is the old text about truth being hidden from wise men and revealed to babes and sucklings!

Professor Slater, in the Methodist Times, plays for a moment the part of a candid friend to his own side. He tells a story of a woman in a London court who was worried by tract distributors. "Away with you!" she exclaimed; "it is only eleven o'clock, and I have had five religions at me already."

Another writer in the same journal says that Dr. Lunn has "transformed Switzerland." This sudden announcement made us tremble. Had he rolled out the Alps and filled up the Lakes? But we were soon reassured. Switzerland stands where it did. Dr. Lunn has "transformed" it in this way: his "Reunion Conferences" have brought over a lot of pious picnicers, so that during the summer months Switzerland "literally swarms with Methodists." Ah well! Switzerland will survive that. The Alps will lift their snowy summits to the sun long after the last Methodist is dead and buried and forgotten.

We have not quite done with the Methodist Times. It actually condescends at last to notice the death of Professor Huxley. A paragraph on the subject is written by the Rev. W. Spiers, who deals out science to the readers of that journal. He remarks that Huxley denied the possibility of revelation (which he didn't), and "hence was able to treat Biblical narratives with mirthful irreverence." We presume this refers to the bedevilled Gadarene swine. Poor Huxley! Being a plain man of science, he could not get up any reverence for that pig story, and now he suffers the fate of the scorner.

Huxley met a good many pigs on earth—some of them in clerical attire. Since his death he has (of course!) met many devils in Hades. (We were going to write Hell, but that word sounds too much like swearing.) And by this time he probably understands that devils and pigs can easily lodge together.

"Happily," says the Rev. W. Spiers, "the race of scientists who regard it as their duty to attack the Christian faith is becoming extinct." Suppose this were true, might it not be because Christianity is becoming extinct? Science has killed the Christianity of fifty years ago, and why should men of science slay the slain?

Mr. Price Hughes gives his "unquestionable authority" for the startling statement that Mr. Chamberlain was bent on introducing the military conscription in this country in order (by some recondite means) to find the wherewithal for his Old Age Pensions scheme. This "unquestionable authority" turns out to be a nameless speaker at the Grindelwald Conference. Mr. Hughes had better have stood upon his dignity and kept silent. Is he not a gentleman entitled to be believed upon his word? Is it not enough to declare, "Thus saith Mr. Price Hughes"?

Digitized by Google

Ananias, according to the Independent, backed out of his charge by putting it on to the late Dr. Dale, and connecting it thus: "We need scarcely add that Dr. Dale was greatly under the influence of Mr. Chamberlain." To this "J. G. R.," one of the editorial staff of the Independent, says: "I knew Dr. Dale, perhaps, as well as one man could know another, and I can only meet this assertion with an emphatic denial." So Ananias, who only got the challenge from Mr. Chamberlain, now gets the lie direct.

The latest feature of modern invention, says the Twentieth Century, was the substitution of a phonograph at a recent funeral in place of a clergyman. The instrument on this occasion gave out prayer, an address, and the hymn, which did not seem to repel the religious sentiment of the mourners, but was rather received with much fervor. This substitution of the machine for the clergyman will be cheap, effective, and just likely to suit the wants of a go-ahead materialistic age.

The Two Worlds (Sept. 6) gives prominence, under the heading "Spirit Identity," to "The Case of Thomas Paine," who, it seems, wrote "in a round, school-boy hand," through a "mejum," to the writer "Elina," whose knowledge of Paine before getting the "message" was "that he was said to be an Atheist, and had written a notorious book, the Age of Reason, which I had never read." He might have added, "and which age I have not yet reached." After giving some facts about Paine's life that can be found in any biographical dictionary, the message concluded: "I suffered, dear lassie, from poverty, and died a poor man." Paine had a grant of three thousand dollars and a large house and farm of more than three hundred acres, where he died in comfortable circumstances, leaving money by will to Mme. Bonneville and others. We fear the spirit is a mendacious one—a Diakka, as A. J. Davis called them. Possibly the Diakka got hold of a copy of the British Workman, in which a story something like this appeared many years ago.

There is one way of looking at the outrages committed against the missionaries in China which, perhaps, has not suggested itself to many. It is this: that while the Chinese are ignorant of their future condition they are not responsible, and, consequently, their chances of salvation are good; but when the missionaries go there the desire to kill them seems to be one which the heathen cannot resist, and they are, therefore, guilty of murder. Can the missionaries be said to be entirely guiltless in the matter? Had they turned their attention to fields nearer home, which need cultivation far more than those of China, results might be different.—Twentieth Century.

A story which comes from Ispahan, Persia, illustrates how the Christian missionaries draw on themselves the ill-will and odium of those among whom they dwell. At Julfa, near Ispahan, the head of the English mission is a Mr. Tisdall. About a month ago Mr. Tisdall took home to his house a young woman, the wife of a peasant, who, he said, had become a convert to the Christian faith. Her relatives, finding where she was, asked that she should be given up, but this the missionary refused to do, with the result that an angry demonstration of hostile feeling was stirred up. A large crowd of Mohammedans gathered round the mission-house, and it was only by the interference of the Prince Governor, the Shah's son, who heard of the disturbance, that violence was not resorted to. The Prince requested the missionary to give up the woman, but he persisted in his fatuous line of conduct and refused, even though the British Agent asked him to give up the woman to her husband. The people were exasperated, and, but for the British Agent's prompt action in ordering the woman's removal, the most deplorable results might have been expected.

The Straits Times (Singapore) looks with little favor on the missionaries, and, in an article on the murders in China, points out that they wilfully defy the warnings given, and accept the precarious conditions of existence which they know must follow their temerity. It surmises that the result will be that "a dozen or two of natives will be executed, and it will be rare perspicuity and unexampled 'cuteness, to say nothing of honesty, on the part of the local officials if the majority of these victims are not entirely innocent of the missionaries' blood." It hints that the Chinese authorities may be rather pleased at the opportunity of getting rid of a few objectionable men.

The Rev. Mr. Donehoo, a Presbyterian pastor of Pittsburg, who has had much experience of the Chinese in America, says: "I have never yet found one who gave evidence of thorough conversion to Christianity, though I have known a large number who have been in our Sabbath schools, and a few who have professed conversion." On this the New York Sun remarks: "The inference from this statement is that, if the evangelisation of the Chinamen is so hopeless here, where they are surrounded by the influences of Christian civilisation, it must be still more hopeless in China itself."

The priests in Hungary are so afraid of the law permitting civil marriage, that they assemble their parishioners in the churches and make them swear, before the cross, that they will never take part in a civil marriage, nor allow their children to do so; and they even declare the civil marriage is no better than concubinage. And all this pother is just because the good priests don't like the prospect of losing their fees.

A committee of the Romewards-wending English Church Union has given its opinion that marriage without the priest's blessing is, ecclesiastically, no marriage at all, and startled Church circles by declaring that civil marriages were an offence against Church discipline. Parties who had incurred censure by entering into such marriages ought, according to the committee, to obtain absolution before being admitted to communion. The further ceremonies of the ring and the joining of hands ought to occur, and the benediction be given. The report staggered even the council of the Union, as throwing doubt on the validity of the civil contract. The matter was again referred to the committee, who now report that they did not mean to suggest the necessity for a religious renewal of the marriage contract, but only a solemn acknowledgment in face of the Church by the parties who had contracted civil marriages. Some of these gentry would like to take us back to the time when the priest always claimed the first kiss from the bride, or to the yet earlier custom of which that was only a relic

In the current number of the English Historical Review the Rev. Nicholas Pocock illustrates "The Conditions of Morals and Religious Belief in the Reign of Edward VI." The laxity of morals is shown by the proclamation of April 24, 1548, against such as putting away one wife, marrying another, or keeping two wives at once. "Some taught that this was lawful for the husband, and some went the length of advocating the same license for the wife."

The Association for Promoting the Unity of Christendom—i.e., return to Rome—of which Athelstan Riley, Esq., is Master and President, had prayers put up for their purposes last Sunday in two dozen London churches and over fifty provincial ones. Mr. Riley, however, is too cute to depend solely on the power of prayer.

Christian Reunionists on another tack have been having another nice picnic Reunion at Grindelwald. The ministers all agree that, if the laity defray the expenses of these little excursions, they form the best guarantee of Christian Reunion.

Cardinal Vaughan has also been discoursing on Reunion at the Roman Catholic Conference at Bristol. He says he does not expect a national act of submission will be the means chosen by Providence to bring the English people to Rome, for they are, individually and collectively, marked by a singular independence of character. But he does look forward to wholesale individual conversions, and meantime urged upon his hearers constant prayer. Romanists, Anglicans, and Methodists may pray as long and as loud as they please. Their prayers will only be an incentive to Freethinkers to work.

The National Total Abstinence Society, of New York, has made a protest to Monseignor Satolli, the Papal delegate, against the maintenance by the Benedictine monks at St. Vincent's Abbey, Philadelphia, of a brewery established there by the monks, who, we suppose, distil there their famous Benedictine, for the service of the Lord and the Benedicts. It is believed that the monks will sell their property as soon as an opportunity presents itself.

Mr. H. P. Hughes is reported as proposing, as a basis of agreement with the Church of England on the school question, the teaching of the Athanasian Creed. Once stultify the minds of children with the three-in-one puzzle, and that will suit all parties who want to live on their credulity.

It seems that there is a Russian Lourdes in the Crimea, which is visited by thousands of pilgrims. The water from the healing spring is drank and bathed in by young and old. Such shrines probably preserve remnants of old well and grotto worship.

Zion's Watch Tower says: "The term 'infidel' will probably soon die out; it is being replaced by 'higher critic,' 'doctor of divinity,' etc." Of course the pious organ laments this state of things, but facts are thrusting themselves before the eyes even of the bigots and myopes.

Digitized by Google

The Blue Grass Blade, alluding to a lightning-struck church, remarks that the Bible says if you ask God to give you bread he will not give you a stone, and if you ask for a fish he will not give you a serpent; but right here, just as plain as you can see anything, you see that you can ask God to give you a blessing and he gives you a streak of lightning. "What fools these mortals be!"

Some self-styled National Reformers in the United States seek to put God into the Constitution, and have asked Roman Catholics to aid them in overthrowing the "atheistical" Constitution of the United States, and in building one that should recognise Jesus Christ as the Sovereign Ruler of the United States. Of course the Catholics are willing to help, but when they have got the control they have in South America, these National Reformers will have no one to blame but themselves if the Roman Catholics attempt to compel them to bow down to a bread-god sovereign as they are now doing with Protestants in Ecuador.

Church and Stage have never loved each other. The clergy have always dreaded the more popular entertainment of their rivals. William Law, the author of the Divine Call, wrote a long tract on the Absolute Unlawfulness of Stage Plays, and Jeremy Collier lashed the playwrights with his big clerical whip. Nowadays, however, a change has come over the scene. There is actually a Church and Stage Guild, and the lion and the lamb (we don't know which is which) are going to lie down together. Parsons are even getting up theatrical entertainments to raise the wind. One is advertised to take place in the Parsonage Music Room, Southbourne. Of the two farces on the bill, one is called "Popping the Question," and as there are "family tickets to admit seven" the young people will be able to learn how it is done.

We should like to have the opinion of Jesus Christ and the Twelve Apostles on "Popping the Question" as an adjunct to Evangelicalism. But

> John P. Robinson, he > Says they didn't know everything down in Judee.

The Vegetarians of China, who were responsible for the murder of Christians, are, according to Dr. von Hesse Wartegg, a secret society, whose object is, China for the Chinese. They therefore aim, not only at the expulsion of foreigners, but of the old Mantchu dynasty. The pigtail being the symbol of Mantchu domination, they go about with scissors, and have despoiled thousands of this much-prized ornament. They are allowed only a life-interest in their property, which passes to the order at their death, so that the heads of the society have immense wealth at their disposal.

Mahmond Essad, a judge at Smyrna, translates and publishes in the Islamic World what purports to be "The Decree of the Prophet [Mohammed] granting toleration and protection to a Christian Monastery in Syria." This document takes these Christian monks under Mohammed's protection. It says: "If one of their priests or travellers pass through a plain, go over the mountain, find himself in a chapel, pass through an arid plain or desert of sand, through villages or cultivated plains—in a word, in every place whatsoever in which they may find themselves, I and my disciples are there to help and protect them, and take them out of all difficulties, because they are my people and protected by me. I dispense them from all taxes that are imposed on my other non-Muslim subjects, and allow none to molest them." Now, what was the return of good Christian monks for this enlightened tolerance? They preached the Crusades, which led to the loss of myriads of lives in a vain attempt to rescue a mythical sepulchre out of the hands of the Muslim.

Pious lies that would hardly thrive in a place where the facts can be known, yet spring up like toadstools in places where they may not so easily be cut down. Thus the African Critic reports that, at Alieval North, an ignorant bigot writes protesting against the admission of certain works into the local library. Darwin is one of his bugbears. He says: "Anyone would have thought that we had heard the last of him and his bad teaching; he was known to disbelieve in the origin of the universe, and died wretchedly after a long life in his bed." That in the present day people can be found to write, and editors to publish, such wretched stuff should be a sufficient warning as to the character of the calumnies circulated about the old Freethinkers.

The London Echo recently had a choice correspondence on the subject of "Where is Heaven?" opened by "Polyglott." Batches of letters proved there was a deal of interest in the subject. But its ventilation was a little unsettling, and in fact raised hell—vide the question, "Where is Hell?" A little bird tells us that just as they were getting in full blast a peremptory order came from Mr. Passmore Edwards to print no more. It is said the stoppage was due to a couple of men of God, in whom a holy horror had been excited by the breadth of treatment accorded by the writers.

For some years past the Echo has done something towards acting up to its mottoes, "Be just and fear not," and "Hear all sides"; and when topics have turned up in which the masses take but little concern, heretical sentiments have been accorded a fair hearing. But a request for information as to the whereabouts of heaven led to all sorts of speculations; the funny thing being that nobody thought of asking the clergy their information upon the question, and the general drift of the answers indicated that heaven had followed hell, upon which latter place Lord Westbury and Dean Farrar contributed to put the extinguisher.

Sometimes a church notice will reveal more than is intended. This was the case with one brought before our attention. It read:—

> "Morning Service—Evidences of a God.
> Evening Service—None."

In Allendale Churchyard there is an epitaph on the five sons and five daughters of one John Clark. This a correspondent sends us because it "has cured many of infidelity." Here it is:—

> Bold Infidelity, turn pale and die;
> Beneath this stone ten infants lie.
> Say, are they lost or saved?
> If Death's by sin, they sinned, for they are here.
> If Heaven's by works, in Heaven they can't appear.
> Reason, ah! how depraved.
> Revere the Bible's sacred page—the knot's untied:
> They died, for Adam sinned; they live, for Jesus died.

If his religion had taught John Clark to avoid having ten children, all of whom died in infancy, it might have been better for him than either throwing blame on Adam or seeking consolation from Jesus.

At Chiaramonte Gulfi, in Sicily, a shepherd of the name of Riggio Sebastiano is giving some trouble to the authorities by trying to found a sect, both religious and political, among the ignorant people around him. This man, who can read and write, calls himself the Messiah, and preaches Mormonism and a division of the land. A band of men and women have gathered about him from the neighboring districts. The Archbishop of Syracuse, Monsignor la Vecchia, has excommunicated both this soi-disant Messiah and his followers; but it is said that they do not care, and only laugh at the intended punishment.—Daily News.

Another serious religious riot has occurred in India, between Hindus and Moslems, the latter of whom declared they would rather die than allow an idolatrous Hindu bullock-procession to pass. 'Tis religion that can give sweetest pleasure while we live. 'Tis religion can supply solid comfort when we die.

According to the Wimbledon News, Mr. Clarke, the gentleman who debated some little time ago with Mr. Rowney, has been given notice to quit his tenancy of the "Hope" Coffee Palace, which he has made successful in a commercial sense, because he has "insufficiently attended to the spiritual and philanthropic needs of the institution." The W. N. asks, Would the landlord have preferred that Mr. Clarke should attend solely to philanthropy? "We trow not, as in that case where would his rent have come from?"

Three times within the past week has the German Emperor called on his faithful subjects to resist "unpatriotic enemies of the divine system of order in the world," by which he means the Socialists, or any who question his right to rule as he pleases. These outbursts seem to betray a sense of weakness.

Keir Hardie has not met with a very flattering reception at Chicago. He attended the weekly meeting of Methodist ministers, and was invited to address the audience. He took occasion to denounce the execution of the Chicago Anarchists, eulogising the latter as the pioneers of the new religion. This tirade elicited a storm of disapproval, and half-a-dozen preachers, springing to their feet at the same time, denounced the speech and the speaker in scathing terms. Mr. Hardie was compelled to abandon the floor, and left the hall in high dudgeon.

PRIESTS.—To make a kingdom flourish, there should be the fewest priests and the most artisans possible. The ignorance and barbarism of our forefathers, far from being any rule for us, ought rather to be an admonition to us, to do what they would do, if they were in our place, with our improved light.—Voltaire.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sept. 22 and 29, Foresters' Hall, London.

October 6, Wood Green.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—September 15, Foresters' Hall, London; 22, Sheffield; 29, Camberwell. October 6, Foresters' Hall, London; 13, Foresters' Hall; 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 18, North Shields; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. November 17, Liverpool.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

President's Honorarium Fund.—Per Mr. Foote: Mr. Williamson (Glasgow), £2; T. Watson, 5s.

President's Propaganda Fund.—Collected at Mr. Foote's lecture at Glasgow, £1 1s.

Mr. Foote is absent from London, and beyond the reach of work and worry. Correspondents must excuse him until his return.

Harry H.—Pleased to hear from you.

A. J. H.—Surely there are not several Hackney Gazettes in Hackney. We omitted the "Kingsland" for the sake of brevity.

Qui.—See paragraph. We believe Mr. Auberon Herbert is a Freethinker.

J. Easton.—Thanks. See "Acid Drops."

H. W. Ley.—All Freethinkers should claim to affirm. As you mention, Dr. Danford Thomas, and, indeed, the other London coroners, with the exception of Baxter, accord gentlemanly treatment to all who prefer this method.

E. G. Taylor.—The text which Mr. J. B. Wise, of Kansas, was prosecuted for sending on a postcard to the Rev. Mr. Venom was Isaiah xxxvi. 12. The same words occur in 2 Kings xviii. 27; but we believe Mr. Wise gave the reference to Isaiah.

Th. Fellner.—Thanks.

Mason.—Freemasonry has been denounced by various Papal Bulls—Pio Nono, in an allocution, Sept. 25, 1865, anathematised it, and Leo XIII., in his Humanum Genus, of April 20, 1884, and his Encyclical of October 15, 1890, warned the faithful against the order. Yet the Jesuits have not only joined but founded lodges.

Papers Received.—Remarks—Daylight—Southwark Recorder—Two Worlds—Wimbledon News—Islamic World—South Place Magazine—New York Public Opinion—Isle of Man Times—Freidenker—Fur Unsere Jugend—Freedom—Lucifer—Liberty—Universal Republic—World's Advance Thought—Crescent—Echo—African Critic—Birmingham Daily Mail—Hackney and Kingsland Gazette—Progressive Thinker—Northampton Daily Reporter—Western Daily Press—Leek Times—Leek Post.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SPECIAL.

Readers of the Freethinker are requested to remember that the first week in October is "Shilling Week." During that week all who desire to aid, however modestly, in the active propaganda of Freethought during the winter, should send me one or more shillings. Every subscription will be acknowledged. I have to add that lecturing engagements, under the scheme I outlined a fortnight ago, are already being formed by Mr. Charles Watts and Mr. C. Cohen; and that the services of other lecturers will be utilised as soon as possible.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote opened the "winter session" of the Glasgow Branch on Sunday. There were three capital audiences in spite of the fine weather, many ladies being present, which is a sign of the progress of Freethought in Glasgow. In the evening a collection was taken for Mr. Foote's lecture-scheme. Mr. Gilmour, who presided, expressed a belief that the scheme promised to be of great utility in the propagation of Secularism. We are happy to learn that the Glasgow Branch is well and strong, with a large and growing membership.

The last N.S.S. Executive meeting, held on Thursday, September 5, unanimously passed a resolution approving of the President's new lecture-scheme, and promising him not only a free hand, but all possible support, in his enterprise. We commend this to the attention of our readers in view of the appeal headed "Special" in this week's Freethinker.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured last Sunday evening in the Foresters' Hall, London. The exceedingly fine weather prevented a very large audience. Mr. James Rowney presided. The lecturer's indictment of "Missions to the Heathen" met with enthusiastic applause. This Sunday evening, September 15, Mr. Watts again occupies the same platform, taking for his subject: "Secularism in Modern Thought."

The 20th of September will be celebrated in Rome, throughout Italy, and wherever Italians congregate, as the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entry of Italian troops into Rome. We do not prophesy, but we doubt if all the Popes's asses and all the Pope's men will ever undo the work of the past quarter of a century.

The International Congress of Freethinkers open on Sunday, September 22, at the Loge des Amis Philanthropes, 10 Rue du Persil, at 10 a.m., and continues three days, after which there will be a banquet. We understand that Messrs. Forder and Ward are going, and Mr. Foote is also endeavoring to arrange for further official representation of the N.S.S. If pressure of business does not prevent, he will endeavor to attend personally.

The September South Place Magazine reports, too briefly, a discourse by Mr. Conway on Charles Bradlaugh. He remarked: "With the exception of Paine, probably no man was ever subjected to more pious falsehoods than Bradlaugh, or more hated." Mr. Conway intimated that he would give a further study of Mr. Bradlaugh at some future time, and we hope he will not forget to carry this out as speedily as possible.

A project is afoot for a Thomas Paine Exhibition, to be held next December at South-place Chapel. Those with any interesting relics of the man, or the times in their relation to him, might put themselves in communication with Mr. Conway.

Mr. Grant Allen contributed a capital article on "The New Heterodoxy" to the Westminster Gazette (Sept. 7). Mr. Allen points out that archæologists are showing "that Christianity was not in any sense a new religion—that every one of its principal beliefs and stories, its root ideas, existed in the East, and often elsewhere, from time immemorial."

The Southwark Recorder mentions, with much sympathy, the recent severe loss sustained by Mr. A. B. Moss. It says: "A few years ago, when less tolerance in theological matters was prevalent among us, a number of people looked askance at Mr. Moss's determined advocacy of Freethought and opinion in relation to every subject dealt with by the human intellect. But now his position is better understood as a thoroughly honest and worthy one, and, besides, Mr. Moss has for years been one of our most popular entertainers as reciter, actor, and playwright. Furthermore, he has written several clever books and pamphlets, has lectured and debated in all parts of the country with considerable success, and is now doing good work on the Camberwell Vestry."

Ernst Haeckel writes in the Fortnightly Review on "Thomas Huxley and Karl Vogt," comparing the work of these two great zoologists and advocates of evolution. He concludes by observing that, "as long as Darwin lives as a reformer in the history of biology, so long will Huxley be celebrated as one of his most faithful friends and most successful fellow workers."

Mrs. J. A. Heavisides Simpson writes in the Westminster Review on "Thomas Henry Huxley in his Relations to Science, Education, and Sunday Observance." She says:

Digitized by Google

"His Elementary Physiology is a book worth its weight in gold to women, and might well lead to a memorial from women in the shape of an institution where physiology would be taught as a necessary part of the education of responsible beings." She recalls how, when in 1866 Huxley ectured at the old St. Martin's Hall on a Sunday, the Lord's Day Observance Society indicted the proprietor for keeping a disorderly house. The case led to the foundation of the Sunday Lecture Society in 1869, Professor Huxley presiding at the first meeting at the Freemasons' Tavern; and Mrs. Simpson cites at length a fine speech on the Sunday question delivered by Professor Huxley in 1877.

THE REV. W. W. HOWARD AGAIN.

SINCE Mr. Foote's absence from town I have received copies of the Leek Times (September 7), and also of the Leek Post (September 7), in both of which the Rev. W. W. Howard challenges Mr. Foote to debate "the question of mental phenomena, I bringing forward the soul theory, and he the materialistic theory." I notice, however, that Mr. Howard assumes that he can state his adversary's position, and what he ought to defend; and he states it in a way that I, for one, would not endorse. But my purpose is not controversy with the Rev. W. W. Howard, but simply to let those interested know that Mr. Foote will not this week see these bold but belated challenges sent to the local newspapers. When he sees them, on his return, he will doubtless deal with them as they deserve. J. M. WHEELER.

EXTRACTS FROM HERBERT SPENCER'S WRITINGS.

"To sum up Mr. Spencer's position, he writes for mankind at large, not for powers or principalities, for courts or for coteries. If his labors bring him the honor of his fellow-men, that is the highest reward he craves; to honors as commonly understood he is indifferent. He is the 'Great Commoner' of philosophy, and without the aid of titles sways the thought of the world more potently than any other man of this generation."—William Jay Youmans.

THE profoundest of all infidelity is the fear lest the truth be bad.

Precepts often heard and little regarded lose by repetition the small influence they had.—"The Study of Sociology," chapter xv.

Every man has freedom to do all that he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man.—"Social Statics," First Principle.

What is science? To see the absurdity of the prejudice against it, we need only remark that science is simply a higher development of common knowledge; and that, if science is repudiated, all knowledge must be repudiated along with it.—"First Principles," sec. 5.

Necessary and eternal as are its truths, all science concerns all mankind for all time. Equally at present and in the remotest future must it be of incalculable importance for the regulation of their conduct that men should understand the science of life, physical, mental, and social; and that they should understand all other science as a key to the science of life.—"Education," chapter i.

Table-talk proves that nine out of ten people read what amuses them rather than what instructs them; and proves, also, that the last thing they read is something which tells them disagreeable truths or dispels groundless hopes. That popular education results in an extensive reading of publications which foster pleasant illusions, rather than of those which insist on hard realities, is beyond question.—"The Man v. the State," The Coming Slavery.

To the mass of people nothing is so costly as thought. The fact that, taking the world over, ninety-nine people out of a hundred accept the creed to which they were born exemplifies their mental attitude towards things at large. Nearly all of them pursue mechanically the routine to which they have been accustomed, and are not only blind to its defects, but will not recognise them as defects when they are pointed out. And the reluctance to think which they show everywhere else is shown in their dealings with children.—"The Principles of Ethics," sec. 435.

This law of organic progress [evolution] is the law of all progress. Whether it be in the development of the earth, in the development of life upon its surface, in the development of society, of government, of manufactures, of commerce, of language, literature, science, art, this same evolution of the simple into the complex, through a process of continuous differentiation, holds throughout.—"First Principles." —Selected by Louis Levine.

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (August 10).

CHESTER-LE-STREET is about the oldest town in the North of England. It dates back to the time of the Britons. Its church is over a thousand years old—the oldest but one in the United Kingdom. I visited it immediately on my arrival, Saturday, July 6, with Mr. Thomas Birtley and other Freethought friends. It is indeed a venerable institution, and the air of the centuries is brooding about it. Here are the graves of mighty warriors. Here are their stone effigies, ranged alongside the walls of the church in everlasting silence. The trump of Gabriel will never arouse them. The ancient records of the church are a somewhat curious sign of the times. One man burned out of house and home received the munificent sum of one shilling and sixpence to help him out of his difficulties. This, however, might count more than at the present day, seeing that the daily wage of a laborer was only one penny. But in the same record it is also stated that the parson received one pound and six shillings for the purchase of a new umbrella. It seems that an umbrella was far more valuable than the whole possessions of the ordinary farmer. Those were queer times indeed, when saints were innumerable, and rags also. Chester-le-Street is the mother both of Durham and Newcastle. It was about 635 that the Episcopal See was established which afterwards was transferred to Durham. In 883 the cathedral building was founded at Chester-le-Street, in which were placed the sacred remains of St. Cuthbert. In 995 these remains were miraculously "deposited where the Cathedral of Durham" now stands, and the ecclesiastical glory and wealth of Chester-le-Street forever departed.

Chester-le-Street has a wonderful record of saintly holiness. Godric lived in Finchdale Priory on the river Wear, and practised unheard-of austerities. He wore an iron shirt next to his skin night and day, and is said to have worn out three; he mingled ashes with the flour from which he made his bread, and, lest it should be then too good, kept it three or four months before he ventured to eat it. In winter, as well as in summer, he passed whole nights up to his chin in water at his devotions. He was haunted by beautiful damsels, and so visited by evil concupiscence that he cured himself by rolling naked among thorns and briars. His body grew ulcerated, but to increase his pain he poured salt into his wounds. He finally was admitted into the calendar of saints. I should say that these old monks were fools, if it were not that, as the result of their renown for holiness, the monasteries became enormously rich. I think there was a method in the madness of these ulcerated saints. If they did not get the heavenly crown, they surely received from credulous votaries the gold and silver and precious stones of this earth, and I shouldn't wonder if they repaid themselves amply in secret for their austerities in public.

At any rate, they have left behind churches and cathedrals which even to-day reveal the pomp and splendor of ancient worship; that humanity was crushed in order to give God the glory.

After visiting the church, dim and vague with memories of the superstitious past, I direct my footsteps with my comrades across the green fields to old Lumley Castle, towering magnificently among the groves beyond the river Wear. Over this we ferry in old-fashioned style, and, for the time being, with the moldering and majestic building in the distance, the meadows and forests around the quiet, meandering stream, over whose glassy tide we softly sweep, it seemed as if the nineteenth century melted into the lands of dreams, and the reality of the knightly ages was in the very atmosphere we breathed, and the verdant scenes in which the smoke and noise of industry have not yet prevailed. A grand old building is Lumley Castle, partially inhabited at present, but filled with the dust of ages, with wide, desolate rooms, in which once was heard the tramp of armed soldiery. We stood on the top of the towers whence the archers hurled their deadly weapons. We peered into the gloom of the prison cell, and the awful dungeon; we saw the great kitchen and the enormous fireplace by which hundreds of troops could be fed; we viewed the remnants of ancient nobility mingled with the elegance of modern art. The Lumleys were a famous fighting race. They were with William the Conqueror, and among his most trusted councillors and defenders. They have left a brilliant record of devotion and daring in the annals of royalty. They belonged entirely to the old régime, and never had an idea of progress. The castle is a memorial of the past, glittering in melancholy grandeur amidst the festivities of to-day; a place where the traveller from the New World will ponder over the beauty and the sadness of the past; its wild strifes and awful crimes; its gloomy faith, mingled with brave and careless song; its reckless ardor that dashed into the lists of death without a thought save of honor and glory. Beautiful fell the sunshine on this old castle—on its mighty walls and towers; beautiful around it spread the vast and undulating country, with dark green forests and radiant fields; the river Wear shining along in wavering expanses; the city, a thousand years old, glimmering on the indistinct horizon, while the church-spire, hoary with time, attracts the dreamy view. It was a picture where past and present might mingle in poetic charm, and from the darkness and struggle of the one be seen emerging the bloom and brilliancy of the other.

Digitized by Google

I find a stalwart Freethought company at Chester-le-Street. I lecture at Pelton, about three miles away, for the accommodation of friends at other points. On the whole there is a fair attendance, and I am glad to meet so many ardent comrades. I name a little child, Anna Ellen Lowther, and I am sure, from the brightness of her eyes and the cunning beauty of her smile, that she will ever be on the roll of Freethought. On behalf of parents and friends of universal humanity, I welcomed the little one into the glorious comradeship of truth, of liberty, of justice, of human work and progress. I think it well to thus enroll our children's names on the banners of our marching columns.

I enjoyed Chester-le-Street. There were the freshness and the cordiality of the new, with the suggestive and moving associations of the old. Where kings and priests once ruled, the forces of Freethought now prevail. It was a contrast which, in the thoughtful mind, awakes a train of thrilling emotions.

I thank the Freethinkers of Chester-le-Street and vicinity for their generous support. In every way my visit to this most ancient spot was a delightful one. I could not have been treated better had I been St. Cuthbert himself.

Newcastle-on-Tyne is my Sunday's camping-ground. Here is a great centre of industry, shipping, coal, factories, etc. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, although a celebrated town, it had only 3,000 inhabitants. Now it has over 200,000. And these figures do not express the real growth of this country, which is the heart of the North of England, for practically there is a great city here of one million of people, with Newcastle, Gateshead, Tynemouth, South Shields, etc. This is one of the oldest civilised and inhabited portions of the kingdom. In the year 80 Agricola, the Roman general, built a fort on the present site of Newcastle, and here also passed the stupendous wall built by the Emperor Severus from the Irish Sea to the German Ocean. About three miles from Newcastle yet remains a curious fragment of Severus's wall. It is about nine feet in breadth. An apple-tree grows out of the middle of it. From Roman times onward, Newcastle has been connected with the battles and struggles of Danes and Saxons, Scots and English, the houses of York and Lancaster, etc. At Jarrow lived and died the venerable Bede, the best historian of his time. The castle was built during the reign of William the Conqueror. It was at times a royal residence. Afterwards, amidst changing fortunes, it was a place of refuge for thieves and vagabonds flying from justice. It is now the rag fair of the town, a more useful institution as such than when the abode of kings.

Newcastle presents many objects of interest, both in what it has been on the roll of history, and what it is to-day in the world of industry. It has a large radical and Freethought element. John Morley was the representative of this place, and he is well known for his non-Christian opinions, and they do not seem to trouble him politically. The liberal churchman will give him his vote. I find an excellent organisation of Secularists at Newcastle. They are active and hard-working, and cultivate the spirit of comradeship. On Friday evening, before the lecture, we had a social gathering for the purpose of getting acquainted. Mr. Bartram, secretary, Mr. W. Gilhespie, Mr. Carl Aarstad, Mr. Thomas Forman, Mr. Peacock, and others, were gathered together. There was a speech of welcome by Mr. Peacock, a response by the American visitor, songs and recitations, and the cheerful circle of an English high tea. It was a very pleasant introduction to the campaign labors. I give three lectures on Sunday, July 7, to good audiences. The weather was so fine that people would rather walk in the park, or wander by the sea-shore, than attend church, chapel, or lecture. They are beginning to enjoy the Sunday here in a somewhat continental way, and the ancient gloom is disappearing. I was satisfied with the result. Those who do identify themselves with the movement in Newcastle are sturdy in their support. They are jovial companions. On Monday I went over to South Shields, where I met some of the Secularists of this flourishing point. Mr. Peacock, the president of the society, Mr. George White, Mr. Sanderson, of Jarrow, Mr. William Gilhespie, etc., are gathered around the festive table. Afterwards we walked to the pier, from which, in the illuminated evening, is presented one of the most beautiful sights on the coast of England. The pier runs out one mile into the sea, and over it at times the waves break in giant fury. Here are the life-boat stations. Thousands have been saved from the stormy ocean. The two piers at South Shields and Tynemouth form an immense breakwater, and where once there was only danger to the tossing ship is now a secure harbor. One would hardly think as he walked along the placid shore where multitudes of people are flocking, where boats are plying, and waves roll softly over the wide beach on which hundreds of children romp, while the sea spreads afar like a mirror, and the banks of the Tyne glow resplendent like fairy halls—one would hardly think that the tempestuous ocean might rush in with ten thousand battalions and shake these colossal piers to their foundation, and thunder to the very streets of the city. But such is sometimes the vast velocity and terror of this now smiling expanse. Man, however, does not lose his courage or his skill, and battles victoriously with the elements. I understand that the modern life-boat, which plunges defiantly into the very jaws of death, and cannot be engulfed, but always comes right side up amidst the most whirling billows, was first invented at Newcastle. The impetuous bravery of the old Norse kings abides on the river Tyne, and the hero goes forth to combat the storm-god with joyous enthusiasm, not to destroy now, but to save.

The North of England makes a noble record for the Freethought campaign; and the time was all too short that I could spend in this varied metropolis, with its progressive spirit, its vast industries, its beautiful surroundings, its thrilling and splendid historic associations. In no part of England can one better observe the evolutions of the human race, its struggle for existence, and the survival of the fittest.

On Tuesday, July 9, I am again in London, after an absence of about five weeks. I spend Wednesday evening with Mr. and Mrs. Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Gilmour, of Glasgow, and J. M. Wheeler, at the home of Charles Watts, where among congenial spirits, the life of London flows with the progress of the world. Watts is pre-eminently sociable. He does not reserve all his vivacity for the platform. He believes in good comradeship. And, indeed, we could not stand the tug of war, endure the battle with injustice and wrong, unless at times we did gather about the camp fire, throw our weapons off, and enjoy the pleasures of the hour with mental stimulation and happy impulse. Mr. and Mrs. Watts have the kindly art of making the fireside light genial to both friend and stranger. Old-time experiences in America come flashing along, while new fields open before. I was pleased to meet our brilliant representative in the North, Mr. Gilmour, who is one of our best-equipped men, a thorough student, and a facile and suggestive lecturer. He keeps things on the move, and Freethought in his hands will never lack a successful defender.

On Thursday, with Mrs. Watts and Mrs. Foote, and Mr. and Mrs. Gilmour, I visit for the first time the wonderful gloom of Westminster Abbey. Here is the buried majesty of the ages. Here are the tombs of kings and queens, of the "illustrious obscure," and of poets and philosophers who have given glory to the universal world. Here for hours one can wander among beautiful and solemn chapels, the sunbeams falling from windows of marvellous hues upon the white faces of the dead shining in statuesque glory; the gorgeous tombs, clothed with imperial regalia; the marble slab, silent over the ashes of immortal genius; along the old parliament house, small and barren, within whose walls once rolled and surged an imperious host, and the green sward contrasting with the desolation of decay. To the eye of imagination, the portals of the centuries seem to open; the dust awakes, and a multitudinous procession appears. The old minster appears to melt, and its "frozen music" becomes an abounding melody of life. The poetry, the art, the romance, the gallantry and splendor of a thousand years fill the venerable aisles, and the great city is forgotten in the thronging shadows of this overarching sepulchre, enriched with the pathos and sublimity of the dead generations.

Friday I had the pleasure of dining again at Simpson's, with Watts, Foote, Forder, and Mr. George Anderson. This time Mr. Anderson gives the Pilgrim a beautiful golden compass, so that wheresoever he may travel—on top of the Andes, or on Greenland's icy shores, or India's coral strand, or, it may be, Siberia's darksome plains—he will have, not the word of God, but the beautiful finger of nature, the unerring needle that is ever constant to the glorious shining star, to guide him to liberty and truth. I thank my friend for this magnet of nature—more faithful than any saint, more accurate than any Bible, more subtle than any god, more enduring than any church—that, ever pointing to the sparkling reality, is a thousand times greater blessing to humanity than a million golden crosses.

Digitized by Google

One would scarcely think that, among the crowding masses of London, one would ever meet by chance a friend from America. One might roam for a hundred years in these streets, and never come across another's track. But it happened that almost the first thing that Dr. Darrow, of Fargo, and Mr. Morton, of Minneapolis, did was to meet the Pilgrim on the Strand, one of the great thoroughfares of London. I couldn't recognise my transatlantic friends at first, it seemed so wildly improbable that anybody from Dakota or Minnesota would be in London. But so it was. I rallied to the occasion, and America for the moment was in the ascendant, and we hardly realised that we were on the oriental side of the "great herring-pond." We joined forces for the time being, and beheld the wonders of the Palace, and the delightfully-horrible wax-works of Madame Tussaud. It being a supreme necessity for all foreigners, especially Americans, to see these wax-works, we proceeded to do the business at the earliest moment. The exhibition is really no better than a ten-cent show in Chicago, except in the extent and the awful realism of its exhibits. There is quite a gorgeous display of the kings and queens of history, the great warriors, the successful statesmen; but to my mind the most interesting wax statue in the whole collection was that of Madame Tussaud herself—a little bit of a woman, but apparently full of grit and extraordinary energy; and it certainly must have taken an immense amount of enthusiasm and persistency to have gotten together a collection like this—the most varied and grotesque collection to be seen on the planet, especially the "Chamber of Horrors"—what a lurid fascination in these uncouth displays! Here is the identical trunk that held the murdered body, the identical knife that did the bloody deed, the identical dress worn by the victim, and so on to the end of the thrilling chapter. It was a relief to finish the round of this infernal curiosity shop.

Saturday I journey to Bristol. I am welcomed to the hospitable home of Dr. and Mrs. Stevens, and the days of work and entertainment pass delightfully along. The Doctor is an earnest Freethinker, and it would be a great help to our cause if a few more like him would stand in the ranks. He questioned the parliamentary candidates of his district as to their position in regard to the "Blasphemy Laws," by which the Secularists of England are at present outlawed. The Liberal candidate expressed himself as distinctly in favor of their repeal, but Michael Hicks Beach, the Conservative candidate, said that, while the law in its present form was a little old-fashioned, yet he was in favor of a blasphemy law of some kind. He was also opposed to the opening of museums, etc., on the "Sabbath," and expressed a great horror of the "continental Sunday." I think this is about the general position of the Tory party, and if that party wins, there is but little hope of the repeal of the "Blasphemy Laws," although it must be admitted, even by the Conservative, that these laws are an outrage on human rights. The parliamentary election is at present occupying the attention of the community to the exclusion of almost everything else; and so, for the time being, the Freethought audiences are not so large as they might otherwise be.

I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Stevens for their kind attention to the American visitor. I must record the smiles and beauty of the little baby—five months old—Dorothy Winifred, who contributed much to the enjoyment of the occasion, and who will, no doubt, ever illuminate the path of Freethought, if the laws of heredity prevail and the promise of a happy birth. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

IRRELIGION is the end towards which we are hastening. After all, why should not humanity do without dogmas? Speculation will replace religion. Among the most advanced nations dogmas are already decreasing; by inward toil the incrustations of thought are bruised and destroyed. In France we are already for the most part without religion; the man of the world believes no more than the scholar; he has his small fund of ideas more or less simple or profound, on which he lives without feeling the want of addressing himself to the priest. In Germany the work of decomposition of dogmas is also very advanced. In England it only commences, but it goes fast. Christianity seems everywhere to be followed by Freethinking. With Buddhism and Hinduism it is the same. In India the majority of intelligent men are Freethinkers; in China there is no national religion. Yes, it will be a long time yet, but religion is passing away, and we can already imagine the time when Europe will be quite without it.—Ernest Renan.

BOOK CHAT.

WE have received from the Esoteric Publishing Co, Applegate, California, a copy of the Esoteric. Out of curiosity, we wasted some time over it, and it afforded insight into the lamentable credulity, superstition, and lack of real education which can lead people to write and read such a jumble of words without ideas as is displayed in this organ of Christian Theosophy.

* * *

Macmillan & Co. have published The Sexes Compared, and Other Essays, by Dr. Eduard von Hartmann, the German Pessimist. The New Woman is not likely to relish Dr. Hartmann. He defends the double standard in morals, and thinks that, "if we listened to the woman emancipationists, and deprived men of all their privileges in state and society, in law and morality, we should inaugurate a period of female rule unparalleled in history." Then what would become of poor, defenceless man? Probably the New Woman will think he is pretty safe while so much of the elementary savage shows beneath the surface of the cultured German doctor.

* * *

A penny Life of Thomas Burt, M.P., by George Jacob Holyoake, has been published by Walter Scott, Limited. It was written for an American volume on the Burt family, issued at Springfield, Mass., who claim kinship with Thomas Burt, and is the fullest biography of him yet published.

* * *

The Humboldt Publishing Company issue this month The Theory of Human Progression, by Patrick Edward Dove. This work was written nearly half a century ago, and to it Henry George is said to have been indebted for his many ideas in his Progress and Poverty. Alexander Harvey, who edits the book, prefaces it with a life of the author and a mention of the circumstances that led to its suppression.

* * *

Patrick Edward Dove's book was praised by Sir William Hamilton and Thomas Carlyle. Charles Sumner had it stereotyped in America. Its main principle is that progress is conditioned by the acquisition of true knowledge. It maintains the doctrine of liberty and equality, and argues that rent ought to belong to a nation. Henry George praised it at a public meeting at Glasgow (North British Daily Mail, December 19, 1884). But Dove was of Mill's school, a strong Individualist and opposed to Socialism. Dove was at one time editor of the Commonwealth at Glasgow, and edited the Imperial Dictionary of Biography. He died in 1873.

* * *

M. Zola's novel of Rome is to be translated into English by Mr. E. A. Vizetelly, son of the publisher who was imprisoned for selling Zola's works.

* * *

The Hon. Lionel Tollemache, who writes an heretical work, privately issued, entitled Stones of Stumbling, is issuing a personal memoir of Dr. Benjamin Jowett, which Mr. Edward Arnold will publish.

* * *

The new Coleridge work which Mr. William Heinemann announces will be ready before the end of October. Coleridge was in the habit of keeping note-books, in which he chronicled table-talk and wrote finished prose. These note-books have remained unpublished in the hands of the Coleridge family until now, when Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge has prepared a volume of extracts. The title selected for it, "Anima Poetæ," represents the spirit of the book, as reflecting the poet's mind on various matters at various times. A Coleridge index, which should be very useful, is to be given at the end.

* * *

Frederic Harrison has, in the September Forum, a very discriminating study of "George Eliot's Place in Literature."

* * *

Mr. Heinemann will shortly publish the memoirs and correspondence of Ernest Renan, with a prefatory memoir of his beloved sister Henriette, to whom his Vie de Jésus was dedicated.

* * *

We read that The Life and Letters of Thomas H. Huxley, edited by his son, is soon to be published by Macmillan and Co.

If the intellect and judgment of mankind ought to be cultivated, a thing which Protestants at least do not deny, on what can these faculties be more appropriately exercised by any one than on the things which concern him so much that it is now considered necessary for him to hold opinions on them? If the cultivation of the understanding consists in one thing more than in another, it is surely in learning the grounds of one's own opinions.—J. S. Mill, "On Liberty."

Digitized by Google

A LATE POPE AND ETERNAL REST.

POPE (arriving at the gate of heaven)—Ah! now for my well-earned rest—eternal rest. (Sighs heavily, and taps gently at the gate.)

PETER—Who is there?

POPE—The Pope.

PETER (opening gate, refers to a voluminous pocket-book)—Yes, let me see; the Father wishes to speak to you—the first door on the right, marked "private."

(POPE follows the corridor and knocks as instructed.)

THE FATHER—Who's there?

POPE—It is I, the Pope, your most merciful majesty.

THE FATHER (from within)—Oh, ah! my son would like to see you—the next door on the right.

(The POPE moves with dignity, and knocks as directed by the FATHER.)

J. C. (opening same)—Who might you be?

POPE—The Pope, Lord.

J. C.—Oh, yes! the Holy Ghost wants particularly to have a word with you. Ring next door.

(The POPE gathers up his shroud, and rings with some trepidation.)

HOLY GHOST—Who's there?

POPE—It is I, the Pope, most holy spirit, seeking admission to eternal rest. (The door opens.)

A VOICE—Come in.

(The POPE enters.)

HOLY GHOST—Oh! so you are the Pope; you are the man who has spread all those tales about me and the Virgin Mary! (Calls lowdly for Attendants.)

POPE—No, no; I—I only—

(Enter Attendants.)

HOLY GHOST (to Attendants)—To Hell with this man—the Island in the Lake.

(Exit POPE and Attendants down the lift; the POPE shrieking vociferously.)

ARTHUR T. BARNARD.

JEHOVAH'S MEMORY DEFECTIVE.

A GLARING falsehood occurs in Exodus vi. 2, 3: "And God spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am the Lord: And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name Jehovah (i.e., Yaveh) was I not known to them." This assertion of the Bible God is easily disproved, although the word "Jehovah" has been carefully concealed by the pious translators.

Genesis iv. 26: "Then began men to call upon the name of Yaveh."

Genesis xiv. 22: "And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto Yaveh, the most high God."

Genesis xv. 2: "And Abram said, Adonai Yaveh (rendered Lord God), what wilt thou give me?"

The word "Yaveh" (Jehovah) occurs also in Genesis ii. 4, 7, 8, 9, 15, 18, 19, 21, 22—Yaveh Elohim. In Genesis iii. 1, 8, Yaveh Elohim; but prominently in Genesis xiii. 4: "Unto the place of the altar which he had made there at first, and there Abram called on the name of Yaveh Elohim." There, between Bethel and Hai, Abram called (preached) the ominous name, Yaveh!

Yaveh, the Bible God, has a bad memory, to say the least of it. The Holy Ghost who inspired (?) the writers of the old Book clearly shows himself—infallible. Apres tout the Devil is not the father of lies.

CHARLES KROLL LAPORTE.

The wail of the curate is very pathetic. There are only 14,000 livings for some 24,000 clergy, and the incumbents of the livings protest they are little better off than the curates, omitting the fact that they are not liable to lose their situations as they get old. We confess our sympathy is not so very deep with those who find it hard to live on some £150 a year. The more they wail, the more likely sensible parents will be to educate their sons for a more honest business.

The British Museum authorities, having the fear of men of God like the Rev. Dr. Kinns and the Rev. Dr. Kitchin before their eyes, used to be very chary about dating any of their antiquities before the time of Adam. Even the Christy collection of prehistoric stone implements, etc., went without any sign of their vast antiquity. But this is breaking down. In the Official Guide we read of a "King of Babylonia, B.C. 4200," or 196 years before the creation of Adam, though on the case we read, "about B.C. 4000." Then we have the Egyptian sepulchre of Khufu-Ankh, a tomb having the Ankh cross as a sign of life, dated B.C. 3733; and the photo of the "Step Pyramid" appears as "built, probably, by Atta, King of Egypt, about B.C. 4300."

CREEDS.

LONG years I've spent in study over creeds;
Perplexed by questions deep beyond reply;
Now tempted to affirm, now to deny;
Sad, paralysing influence on good deeds.

What joy to follow where calm nature leads!
And roam in woods or fields which round us lie;
To gather flowers, or behold the sky;
And thence invoke that peace the spirit needs.

All nature speaks to man with tranquil voice;
He, too, her child, is nurtured on her breast;
She shows, full oft, for him a smiling face.
But not alone for him. The fields rejoice;
Birds sing, sun shines, vexed ocean sinks to rest,
Bright stars roll on in the vast sea of space.

—Open Court. E. EMERSON.

Was Not David Mistaken?

Either David was not a close observer, else the age in which he lived was very different from that of to-day, provided he always told the truth. He said: "I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

Fearing some critic would insist the word rendered "righteous" was not properly translated, we consulted the revised edition of the Holy Book, also the Jewish translation, and the Catholic. The latter substitutes the word "just"; but this is a synonym with "righteous" which is used in the other authorities. We determined to consult the commentators, who, the reader is aware, assume to know everything about Bible characters, as well as God; so we turned to Scott, who is an old standby. To our delight, we found he affirms our statement, using these words: "The Psalmist had never, during a long course of observation, known an instance of the kind." The conclusion is irresistible: all that vast array of unfortunates who find themselves seemingly forsaken by God and man, who are infirm with age, or are crippled with disease, who are destitute of the needs of life, and subsist by the hospitality of the charitable, wrung from them by importunate begging, are neither righteous of themselves nor descendants of just parents. We are right sorry to learn this, for it is a crushing blow at the poor and destitute, and, if properly understood and fully believed, it will operate severely to their prejudice.

—Progressive Thinker.

PROFANE JOKES.

Teacher—"What is man?" Boy—"Dust." "What is woman?" "Sawdust."

Teacher (to class)—"Who was the first man?" Little Boy—"Adam." Teacher—"Right. Now, who was the first woman?" Little Boy—"His mother."

Bobby—"Mamma, do the streets of heaven flow with milk and honey?" Mother—"So the Bible says, dear." Bobby—"And is that why the angels have wings, 'cause the walking's so bad?"

Teacher (to little boys)—"What is the shape of the world?" Little Boys—"Don't know, sir." "Well, what is the shape of my snuff-box?" "Square, sir." "No, no; I don't mean that one, I mean the one I use on Sundays." "Round, sir." "Now, then; what is the shape of the world?" "Square on week-days, and round on Sundays."

Hostess (to little six-year-old visitor at dinner)—"Why don't you ask a blessing at your house, Tommy? Don't you thank the Lord for what you eat?" Tommy—"No, ma'am; we don't have to. We pay for what we get." [Tommy was a philosopher. The habit of thanking the Lord for a meal naturally arose when a man had to go out and hunt for one before he got it.]

WHAT I must do is all that concerns me, not what the people think. This rule, equally arduous in actual and in intellectual life, may serve for the whole distinction between greatness and meanness. It is the harder, because you will always find those who think they know what is your duty better than you know it. It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.

—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell road, E.C.): 7.30, Charles Watts, "Secularism in Modern Thought."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, Robert Shaw, "Some Facts about the Bible." Tuesday, at 8, social for members and friends.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, a lecture.

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, Open discussion—"Neo-Malthusianism."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, F. Haslam, "Who was Jesus Christ—God, Man, or Myth?"

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, St. John will lecture.

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.15, Stanley Jones, "Does Christianity Support Slavery?"

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, C. James will lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, Stanley Jones, "Our Lord Jesus Christ."

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11.15, G. Standring, "What is the New Testament?" 3.15, St. John will lecture.

HAMMERSMITH BROADWAY (Middlesex side): 7, W. Heaford, "The Doom of the Gods." Thursday, at 8.30, F. Haslam, "Mohammed and his Koran."

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, W. Heaford, "The Sermon on the Mount"; 3.30, "An Hour with the Devil." Wednesday, at 8, F. Haslam will lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, A. Guest, "The Origin of the New Testament."

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, T. Thurlow, "Why I am Not a Christian."

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, S. E. Easton, "Where will You Spend Eternity?"

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, Mrs. Thornton Smith, "The Meaning of Secularism."

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, A. B. Moss, "Fire-dowers of Superstition."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "The Garden of Eden."

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 3.30, S. E. Easton will lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15, a lecture; 3.15, S. R. Thompson, "Is there a Life Beyond the Grave?"

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, C. James will lecture; 7, W. J. Ramsey will lecture. Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, Gymnasium Class; 7, Concert.

BLACKBURN: C. Cohen will lecture on Sept. 17, 18, 19, and 20.

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school; 7, J. B. Coppock, F.C.S., "A Chemical Lecture, with Experiments."

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, J. Roberts, "Reason Only."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 11, C. Cohen, "The Great French Revolution—Part III., Daybreak"; 6.30, "The Holy Bible."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, R. Mitchell will lecture.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, W. Dyson, "Professor Huxley from a Freethought Standpoint."

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King street): 7, business meeting.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BRADFORD (Open Market, James street): 6.30, H. Smith, "The Higher Criticism."

CHATHAM (corner of the New Brompton-road, High-street): 11.15, J. B. Coppock, "Matter and Force."

DERBY (Market-place): 11, Mr. Biggs will lecture.

MANCHESTER (Stephenson-square): 3, C. Cohen, "Belief and Conduct."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Quayside): 11, a lecture.

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—Sept. 15, Manchester; 17 to 20, Blackburn; 22 and 29, Birmingham.

STANLEY JONES, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London, N.—Sept. 15, m. Finsbury, e. Edmonton; 22, m. Kingsland, e. Deptford; 25, Hyde Park; 26, Hammersmith; 29, m. Victoria Park, a. Finsbury Park, e. Kilburn.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Croydon-road, Rotherhithe, London, S.E.—Sept. 15, Mile End; 22, Camberwell; 29, Westminster. October 6, Camberwell; 20, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

T. THURLOW, 350 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 15, a. Kilburn; 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 29, e. Edmonton.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 8d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 3d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

A CHAPTER FROM

Strauss's Original "Life of Jesus."

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

G. W. FOOTE.

(A Most Thorough Analysis and Exposure of the Gospel Story by a Master Hand.)

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumours and Worts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Gastric Mucous, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 3d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 3d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 3d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 3s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,
TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendell" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell
No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

THE LEGITIMATION LEAGUE.

Neither law nor custom gives its sanction to the duel, and neither may be said to countenance pugilism, even in its milder forms.

The day when married people will no longer be left to fight it out is dawning with a momentum unparalleled in any previous period since the meeting of the first Divorce Bill.

Much of prejudice, and that by no means founded solely on what has been termed the Indeterminate Co-efficient of Supernaturalism, has abated itself with what is either the show or the substance of reason, in counteracting the forces which seek to dispel the gloom.

The day of emancipation is doubtless distant, and little hope of accelerating the dawn lies down the devious path of legislative endeavor.

Whilst each for himself or herself must weigh the personal damage—the ostracism of society, the detriment in business, and any other considerations of like character—all must realise that the line to be pursued is that which has led all other pioneers in history to attain their ends, the line of active or passive rebellion against the laws and customs of the time.

No active defiance of law is involved in dispensing with the seal of State sanction which is withheld from all who rebel against the slavery of marriage. Though their alliances are illicit, they are not illegal; and their children, though illegitimate, suffer injuries unjustifiable by legislation, which few would rate as momentous save where the entail of property is concerned.

The really grave difficulties are encountered in the conflict with custom, and here, as ever, the multiplication of offenders will soften the austerity of the condemnation.

Those wishful to forward the cause, and willing to live together without the bond of State wedlock, are invited to register their alliances before the Notifying Clerk of the Legitimation League, and to acknowledge their children born out of wedlock.

It is not essential that consent be given for the public advertising of these alliances, but as the registers will be open for inspection by any member of the League, or by any persons on payment of a fee (whether or not such persons may be presumed to have a direct interest in ascertaining the information therein contained), the League covenants with every registering party that the latter will not seek to make it responsible for any injury arising from unauthorised and indiscriminate publication.

Those who wish to advertise their alliances, and to publicly acknowledge their children, through the medium of the Legitimation League, must give consent in writing to the Honorary Secretary:—Oswald Dawson, Harman Villa, Scarcroft, nr. Leeds.

In preparation—The Big Sinister and Licit Love, the First Bi-nnial Proceedings of the Legitimation League, 1s.; The Bases of Civilisation, by J. C. Spence (cheap edition), 4d.; Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs, by Oswald Dawson, 6d.

THE LEGITIMATION LEAGUE.

We, William F. Dunton and Emma M. A. Dunton, formerly Emma M. A. Briggs, of 60 North street, Sloane-street, London, S.W., having since the 12th of November, 1892, lived together as Mr. and Mrs. Dunton, and being now so styled and commonly known, hereby give notice of our alliance.

We hereby also acknowledge the parentage of Millicent Louisa Dunton, born the 4th of February, 1894, and announce our determination to similarly regard as acknowledged children any future issue of our union.

We consent to the publication of this notice in such manner as the Honorary Secretary of the Legitimation League shall see fit.

Read by us this 19th day of July, 1895, and signed before Arthur Cornwell, Notifying Clerk to the Legitimation League.

W. F. DUNTON.
EMMA M. A. DUNTON.

Witnessed by OSWALD DAWSON, Harman Villa, Scarcroft, near Leeds.
" ARTHUR CORNWELL, Albion Walk Chambers, Leeds.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SALE. SALE.

NOW FOR ANOTHER HOWLING GALE OF BUSINESS.

Black or Navy Serge Suit Length (Pure Wool) 15s.

Check or Mixture Suit Length (Pure Wool) ... 15s.

3 Pure Wool Trouser Lengths (Splendid Qualities) ... ... 15s.

Black, Navy, or Brown Melton Overcoat Length ... ... 15s.

1 Lady's and 1 Gent's Silver-mounted Umbrella (Best Covers)... ... ... 15s.

A Bundle of Dress Remnants (20 yds., double width)... ... ... 15s.

2 Pure Wool Dress Lengths ... ... 15s.

1s. must be added to cover carriage on each Parcel.

"BRUNO" CLOTH

FOR LADIES' WINTER DRESSES.

SEND FOR PATTERNS.

We have got the New Colors ready in this Cloth for coming Autumn and Winter, and, as a special inducement to get ladies to buy early and make the cloth known, we offer the "Bruno" Cloth at 9s. 6d. per Dress Length till the end of September; after then the price will be 10s. 6d.

MONEY REFUNDED IF THE INVESTMENT IS NOT SATISFACTORY.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

64 pp., price 3d., by post 4d.,

THE

HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE.

WITH A

FULL AND TRUE ACCOUNT

OF

"THE LEEDS ORGIES."

EDITED, WITH INTRODUCTION,

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

"A Letter to Lord Ellenborough"

OCCASIONED BY THE SENTENCE WHICH HE PASSED ON

MR. D. I. EATON,

AS PUBLISHER OF

THE THIRD PART OF PAINE'S "AGE OF REASON."

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

A Demonstration of the Biblical Doctrine of Devils, suitable for circulation among Christians.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchisedek
S'w'elp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 38. SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE CHRISTIAN HAPPY FAMILY.

CHRISTIANS were united only once in the whole course of their history, and alas! that single instance is recorded in a very doubtful document. We read in the Acts of the Apostles that soon after the disappearance of Jesus Christ his followers were "of one heart and of one soul." We venture to doubt the statement, but let it pass for what it is worth, and perhaps a trifle over. Once in nineteen hundred years the Christians were a happy family. It was just at the start, before they got into fighting fettle. Ever since they have been the champion disputants and quarrelers of this planet. Like some low organism, the early Church split up into a vast variety of sects, which were afterwards called heresies. In the fourth century the Church obtained the support of the imperial power, and then its bosses decided that they would stop this division. Persuasion had failed, so they tried force, and that succeeded. The heretics—that is, people with an itch for following their own opinions—were weeded out by exile, imprisonment, and death. By this means the Church secured a most admirable unity. People all thought alike because all who thought for themselves were exterminated.

This "peace of the Church" was artificial. It could not last for ever. The spirit of variety was bound to assert itself again, and it did so with a vengeance when the Reformation burst upon Europe. There was never a more delightful time for religious anarchists. Every conceivable fad had its innings. It was worse than the procession of heresies which Flaubert passes before the vision of Saint Antony. Some were communists, some were polygamists, some held women in common, and the Adamites took to walking the streets stark naked. Martin Luther was frightened by the spirit he had raised. He called upon the civil power to exterminate heresy with the sword, and the same policy was pursued by John Calvin, the long-nosed, bilious Pope of Geneva.

Protestantism appealed to the right of private judgment. That is an excellent thing in secular matters. Investigate and discuss, and by-and-bye you will come to an agreement. Certain things get settled in time, and are then taken for granted. They are fresh starting-points on the road of progress. But this is because there are facts to go upon; plain, durable, and unalterable facts. There are no facts, however, in religion. It is all fancy. And the more people discuss the farther they will be apart.

Catholic controversialists pointed out to the Protestant champions that unity would be for ever destroyed if people were allowed an open Bible and the right of private judgment. They remarked that the Bible was a big book, written originally in what to the people of Europe is an unknown tongue; that its contents are of various value; that its history, legend, poetry, parable, doctrine, and ethic, are all mixed up together; that it requires to be studied with knowledge and judgment, and that one man is not sufficient for the task of deciding what it teaches; that the inspiration of the Bible is one thing, and the inspiration of its readers quite another thing; and that there will be as many opinions as there are men, unless the living inspired Church interprets the dead inspired Book.

All this is unanswerable, and the history of Protestantism is a demonstration of its truth. We have hundreds of Christian sects in England alone, some of them with vile, outlandish names; and all of them base their peculiarities upon the Bible. What the Bible really means will never be settled until the God who inspired it condescends to tell us. Some of us, meanwhile, can afford to wait.

The existing division of Christendom is felt by many to be a scandal. Infidelity raises its bold head at home, and exclaims, "Go to, you Christians are all quarrelling over what none of you understand." And the heathen abroad, who are all going to hell unless the missionaries can keep them out of it, are told that Christianity means this, that, and the other, until they are ready to cry, "What the devil does it mean?"

This sad condition of things has touched the hearts of a number of Christian ministers. They want to bring about Christian unity; at the same time they want an excuse for a holiday; so they foregather at Grindelwald, where they spend most of their time in carnal recreation, and devote the rest to discussing the happy-family question. Every day they see a fresh principle of unity, but the next day it vanishes. If only the Christian sects would give way to each other a bit! If they would drop the points on which they differ, and unite on their points of agreement! What a happy family they would be! Yes, and if the sky falls we shall have plenty of larks without shooting them.

The Pope himself is anxious to bring about the unity of Christendom, and Cardinal Vaughan explains how it is to be managed. All the Protestant sects, including the rich, proud Church of England, are to fall into the arms of Rome. There will then be one Church, just as there was one serpent when Aaron's rod had swallowed the rods of the Egyptians. But the serpent-swallowing trick is not as easy in fact as it is in fiction. The Pope may lick them all over, but he will never get them down. Some of them swear they will swallow him, and look at him with hungry eyes and stringy features.

Freethinkers smile at this dream of Christian unity. The unity of Christendom will be brought about by the dissolution of Christianity. The Churches will be forced to work together for social purposes, as the secular principle prevails over the theological principle in modern civilisation. But this means their gradual destruction as Churches. Catholic will not swallow Protestant, nor Protestant swallow Catholic. Secularism is swallowing them both.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

THE ATONEMENT.

"Ce Dieu qui fait mourir Dieu pour apaiser Dieu."
—La Hontan.

The present age is characterised by its researches into the past. We are, as Bacon remarked, really the antiques, and in searching into antiquity we trace the infancy of our race. Far back in the childhood of the world, and extending largely over its area still, is theft. The sugar is taken before given. Wives, cattle, and lands are got by capture before purchase. So the doctrine of purchase may be said to distinguish barbarism from savagery, as the doctrine of mutual help distinguishes civilisation from barbarism. The spirit of barter is typically represented by the Jews. "Blood for blood" was the motto of all their tribe. Every family had a "blood-avenger," whose duty it was to avenge wrong, raise up seed to a kinsman, and so redress the balance. Thus the avenger became the redeemer, as the word is translated in Job xix. 25.

The idea of substitution came early. "Take this victim instead of killing me, or this offering of food instead of hurting me," lies at the bottom of all sacrifice. With the early Jews, as with all tribes in a savage state, the notion of substitution was powerfully aided by another idea found in all tribal communities, that of joint responsibility. Achan stole, but not he only was punished, but his sons and his daughters, his oxen, asses, and sheep, were stoned and burnt with him (Joshua vii. 24). In the late Deuteronomic law (xxi.) we see a remnant of this. If a man was found killed, all within the city—or village rather—nearest, were to take an heifer, kill it, and wash their hands over it, saying: "Our hands have not shed this blood." Being jointly responsible, one victim made satisfaction for the rest. How deeply the idea of substitution lay in the Jewish faith may be instanced by the story of a ram being substituted for Isaac, when Abraham, like a true fanatic, was going to offer up his only son as a burnt-offering, because he heard a voice from the Lord. Another striking instance was placing their sins on the head of a scapegoat, and then sending him out to the wilderness.

Religion always preserves survival of ideas and customs which have otherwise ceased to influence the daily life of mankind. It is this which makes its study so interesting to the archæologist. Just as the word "host" tells us of an enemy that might be slaughtered, just as the bishop's apron and gaiters tell us of a time when the priest was the slaughterer; so the doctrine of the Atonement, of imputed wrath, and salvation through the blood of an innocent person, tell us of a savage time of joint tribal responsibility. God acts in a way common in savage life, but scouted by all civilised law. The judge who insisted that the utmost penalty of the law should be exacted, and who was satisfied with the life of an innocent man, would now be considered worthy of a lunatic asylum.

The old conception of God is that of a slaveholder who can do as he likes with his own. The idea being built upon that of departed chieftains, men of war who delighted in battle and the blood of their enemies, this powerful spirit must have blood. Human sacrifices were evidently once required in Judaism, but when, with the domestication of animals, the pastoral takes the place of the hunting stage, animals are offered instead of human life. With the advance of civilisation God's share ever tends to become less. Instead of flesh and blood he gets an offering of bread and wine. Instead of receiving the first fruits and tithes of all, he, or his minister—and these two are one—only gets a threepenny bit on Sunday. In Jehovah's Temple at Jerusalem a bullock and a lamb were hacked to pieces every morning, and a lamb every evening. Doubtless the partiality of priests for roast meat helped the superstition.

The most solemn day of the year to Jews is Yom Kippur, the day of Atonement. On this day they cleared off their old sins by putting them on Azazel, the scapegoat. In modern times, at least on the Continent, they kill a cock, saying: "This is my substitute. This is my commutation. This is my atonement. This cock goeth to death, but may I be gathered and entered into a long and happy life and into peace."

The Christian doctrine of the Atonement is just such another farce. God kills God to appease God. He is the author of evil, and needs another evil before he will forgive evil. If the Scapegoat son is a noble Curtius who dies for his people, the Father is a brutal Shylock who will have his pound of flesh, and does not care where he gets it from. If Jesus was a man, we may indeed pity him if killed, and admire him if he desired his death to be a blessing to others. But as man he could not atone; as God he could not die. If he was God, his sacrifice was like the "alarming sacrifices" advertised at bogus sales. When he died on Friday he knew very well he would rise again on Sunday. If in Adam we did not all fall, there was even no need of such a sorry redemption, redeeming us from nothing. For what is Jesus supposed to save us from? From the curse of Adam, death, disease, the pains of child-birth? Or is it from the oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely, the pangs of despised love, the law's delay, the insolence of office, and the spurns that patient merit from the unworthy takes? No. He is supposed to save us from sin and its consequences. Is it so? The world's history proves far otherwise. It is those who have relied on Jesus and his blood who have done the most to hinder the world's progress.

The doctrine of the Atonement involves a double subterfuge. It makes God regard Christ, the sacrifice, as the sinner, which he was not. It makes him regard the sinner as freed from the guilt of sin, which he is not. This divine "Plan of Salvation" is false and immoral on either side. It is as absurd as it is atrocious, for the man God who comes from heaven on purpose to die cries out upon the cross, "My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"

The gospel of the Atonement is a rotten gospel, corrupting all manhood and self-reliance. By absolving the believing sinner it places a premium on crime. "Jesus paid it all" is hardly a Protestant improvement on the Catholic doctrine of indulgences, which at least made people pay something for the privilege of sinning. The doctrine is fundamentally untrue. The murderer may go to heaven, but the consequences of his crime remain on earth. What is needed is not repentance, but right conduct. There is no undoing the past.

> The moving finger writes; and having writ
> Moves on: nor all your piety nor wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out one word of it.

When men realise that, with every thought, word, and action, they are moulding their own characters and that of their descendants, there will be a more powerful inducement to the vigilant, patient, painstaking, daily and hourly cultivation of the moral side of our nature than in the belief in all the dogmas or the recitation of all the creeds of Christianity.

J. M. Wheeler.

MORAL ASPECTS OF THE CREATION AND FLOOD STORIES.

The Bible stories of the Creation and the Flood have been frequently criticised from a scientific and historical point of view, with the result that no proof has been discovered that they have any foundation in fact. It is not, however, from the standpoint of either science or history that we intend here to deal with these stories; but we shall endeavor rather to ascertain whether or not they have any moral aspects. The value of fiction is considerably deteriorated if it lacks ethical features in its various delineations. The accounts, therefore, in Genesis of a creation and a universal flood can have no claim upon our belief if they are opposed to our moral sense. Of course we regard the stories as being merely repetitions of ancient myths, altered or modified in some respects to suit the Hebrew mind.

The Bible alleges that the creation and flood were events fraught with good purposes, hence the book says (Genesis i. 31): "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." Canon Gore writes "that everything [connected with the creation] is in its essence good, as the product of the good God; that man, besides sharing the physical nature of all creation, has a special relation to God" (Lux Mundi, p. 287). Now, what is meant by the term "very good"? Learned expositors of Christian ethics tell us that the quality called "good" can be properly applied only to acts that are purposely performed to achieve a noble, just, and useful end. The question, then, is, if God "created the heavens and the earth, and all that therein is," did he intend them to be "very good"? Judging from the theological theory of the origin of evil, we should think not, for his plan of creation led to consequences of the most disastrous kind. We are told that every tree and every herb were given for food to every existing creature (v. 30), while science assures us that the consumption of some herbs would have proved fatal to animal life. Moreover, besides poisonous fruits and herbs, God made "very good" animals, with the power and propensity to torture and devour each other. Thus we arrive at the fact, from which there is no escape, that among the "very good" acts ascribed to God were those of providing agencies for the infliction of pain and the destruction of life. This may be Bible morality, but it is the very opposite of Secular ethics.

Digitized by Google

Again, where is the moral aspect of the declaration that man was "very good," when, on the first occasion his nature was tested, he proved, according to orthodoxy, to be very bad. The general aspect of the circumstances connected with this alleged act of creation is the antithesis of moral. There was, it is said, a tree which was capable of supplying to man a "knowledge of good and evil," and yet he was told "thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest of it thou shalt surely die." That God's command was not heeded, and that he was in error as to the results of the eating, can in no way alter the fact that the prohibition of the acquirement of knowledge was not a moral act. How could man, who was suddenly brought into this world, succeed without knowing good from evil? This story of creation represents God as a despot, who attempted to organise a system of government that would have kept people in a state of ignorance and made them subordinate to his rule. The story also gives encouragement to the perpetuation of delusions which cannot be said to be useful to mankind. To mention morality as being associated with such an event is worse than folly; it is an entire misapplication of language. It is clear, according to the story, that to the serpent we are indebted for the introduction of knowledge into the world; he appears to have been wiser than God, for he told the woman that she and her colleague would not die through partaking of the forbidden fruit, but, on the contrary, he said "your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods knowing good and evil" (Genesis iii. 5). The serpent evidently was right, for after the woman and her husband had eaten of the fruit "the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew they were naked." Thus modesty was awakened within them, "and they sewed fig-leaves together and made themselves aprons."

Fortunately, the serpent entirely upset God's arrangements, for he exclaimed: "Behold, the man is become as one of us to know good and evil" (Genesis iii. 22). The centre of the fabled Garden of Eden was not only sacred, but the tree of knowledge, which grew there, was of an esoteric character, and there is no doubt that throughout all ages the Church has applied this story to its own purposes. For, whenever it has had the power in the past, it has done its best to prevent both the acquirement and the diffusion of knowledge; and even to-day many of its clergy and ministers condemn those who seek any knowledge that is at variance with the ipse dixit of the Church. What more humiliating picture is presented in history than Galileo dressed in sackcloth, doing penance before a set of bigoted judges, who were as much alarmed in case the eyes of the people should be opened as their God is said to have been in the primitive garden? Secular knowledge is dangerous to the pretensions of the Church, and it appears to be as much dreaded by many of its officials as dynamite is in the courts of despots.

But to return to the story of the creation. If we accept the orthodox theory of it, then we must arrive at the conclusion that what the effect of God's acts upon the destiny of the human race would be was known by him before he performed them. To speak of the morality of a deception that was planned and carried out for a purpose is, to say the least, paradoxical. The notion that Eve and Adam yielded of their own "free will" is farcical in the extreme. If the Bible be true, God had so planned the affair that they could not have acted differently to what they did. He caused a tree to grow that was "pleasant to the eyes"; he allowed the woman to have the desire for the fruit and to eat it, likewise to induce the man to do the same; and he created a serpent, "more subtile than any beast of the field," and then permitted him to do what God must have known would produce the moral ruin of the human race. The following questions may be here fairly urged:—(1) Did God intend the forbidden fruit to be eaten by Eve? If yes, she ought not to have been punished for eating it; if, on the other hand, he did not intend her to eat it, it was immoral upon his part to make her the victim of circumstances which he knew would be too potent for her to withstand. (2) Who created the serpent? Did God? Then he was responsible, whereas if he did not create the serpent he (God) was not the creator of "every living creature." (3) How could Eve, before the acquired knowledge, know that the tree was "to be desired to make one wise"? This would have been putting the effect before the cause. But, according to the New Testament, the plan was arranged "before the foundation of the world" (Ephesians i. 4–7; 1 Peter i. 19, 20).

There is certainly no moral aspect in a story that represents a God whom we are all told to emulate as deliberately implanting in the hearts of his creatures those springs of evil whose natural and inevitable predestined and preordained fruit he afterwards chastises with all the rigor of his rule. He placed them in a paradise, where everything is described as being calculated to please the eye, cheer the heart, and enrich the mind, only to make the pangs and sufferings of the desert, into which they were afterwards driven, the more painful and severe. He creates within them the instinct of love and the holy feelings of conjugal and paternal relation, only to inflict the immediate keenness of the giving birth to a murderer and a fratricide; and the still further sorrow of the reflection that the parents are to be the progenitors of myriads of human beings, each one of whom shall be the inheritor of their curse, and from the seed of whom it shall never depart, even after the most painful and protracted probation. With a cruelty that is more ingenious, if possible, than all the rest, the very woman whom God sends as a helpmeet and a solace to man is made the cause of all his woe, the curse of the world, the introducer of evil, and the desecrator of the earth. "Better, far better," Adam might have said to God, "had it been that you kept me spiritless and unintelligent as the lowest and most despised of the brute creation than to have endowed me with rational curiosity and an inquiring mind, which, in combination with the allurements of the companion you gave me and the temptations with which you surrounded me, have been the cause of my moral degradation and physical suffering." Where is the morality upon the part of a God of infinite power who, instead of making his children recipients of happiness and comfort, concocted a plan which he knew would incur for them misery and woe?

The Bible story of creation is a sad record of blundering absurdity and injustice. For ourselves, judging from a human standpoint, and a knowledge of the physical, mental, and moral requirements of our nature, we think that God, if he created the world at all, should have made it the abode of general and real happiness, and have surrounded all his creatures with a sufficiency to supply their every want, and an opportunity to enjoy the blessings of existence; but we find that in many instances it is a place of oppression, where the weak have to yield to the strong, and where many have often to endure privations and cruel acts of persecution and injustice. He should have filled the minds of all men with the loftiest feelings, the sweetest contemplations, and the sublimest aspirations; but in many minds we discover that which is foul, atrocious, and revolting. He should have stamped upon the features of every human being the impression of dignity, comfort, and hope; but, alas! we recognise that upon the features of too many of his creatures are the indelible marks of sorrow, suffering, and despair. Finally, he should have made the giving birth to children the most beauteous and unalloyed incident in the drama of life, instead of allowing it to be accompanied as it is with pains and risks, which form one of the greatest and most inscrutable mysteries of nature.

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

Minister (in his sermon)—"The Lord reigns." Deacon (waking up)—"And my thunderin' old umberill is at home!"

Digitized by Google

A PORTABLE DEITY.

After all, it seems that Ireland is not the singularly unfortunate country we have always taken it to be. In spite of the natural propensity for whisky and shillalahs, and the apparently harsh treatment the people have received from nature and the English government, the inhabitants of the Emerald Isle have much to be thankful for, inasmuch as they receive blessings and live under circumstances which nations more favored in other respects would covet. For have not the Irish a priesthood, and do not the Romish fathers-in-God nourish the souls of their children to the utter neglect of their secular well-being? If the words of the Rev. M. M'Polin, Roman Catholic priest of Newry, are to be believed, we shall be surprised if in the future we hear anything of the sufferings or wrongs of our western neighbors; for the holy father has declared that through the blessed agency of the one and only Church the people can have God carried right into their homes, practically, in a wicker basket or a Gladstone bag.

For fear that any readers should suspect that a deviation was being made from the veracity which characterises all articles in this journal, an explanation may be here deemed desirable. The Irish News of a recent date reported a sermon delivered by the above-mentioned priest at the funeral of a brother laborer in the Lord's vineyard, in which this remarkable and interesting information occurs. Not unnaturally, the reverend father seized the occasion to eloquently dilate on the exalted value and dignity of the priesthood, and it was the dignity and power of this esteemed order and the disclosure of the exact relations of Irish priests with the heavenly king, which led him to speak with such religious fervor. The dignity of the priesthood, he declared, surpassed the powers and the dignities of kings and earthly rulers, whose domain only extended to temporal goods and the bodies of men, whereas the dignities and powers of the priesthood extended to spiritual goods and the souls of men, in which respect the preacher claimed advantage for the latter, though, had there been a sceptical auditor, he might have hazarded the opinion that nine people out of ten prefer the possession of the powers and dignities of kings and earthly rulers to those of the clerical parasites of society. And then the reverend father proceeded to emphasise the indispensability of his own profession, presumably soliciting the pecuniary support of his hearers in aid of the fortunate successor of the deceased priest. Without the priesthood, he asserted, men could make no offering to God worthy of his acceptance; but by means of the priesthood there was offered to him a sacrifice infinitely greater than if all men, by dying for God, thus offered him the sacrifice of their lives. For our own part, we entirely fail to see the purport of the argument, unless its validity consists in the intention to create the idea that the deity has preference for incense-burning by priests over a general sacrifice of human life, in which case we would readily concede that for once the almighty had displayed a particle of that infinite wisdom with which he is so much credited. Anyhow, the contention hardly establishes a staple reason for the maintenance of an idle class at the expense of the already impoverished, viewed in the light that seniority should be given to present-world welfare.

But now there are exhibited evidences of the spirituality of the priesthood, proofs that its attributes partake of the divine substance—if there is such a substance to partake of—and that its members are not as other men are, being one with the Father, and therefore considerably removed above the angels and archangels. "So great is the power of the priest over the real body of Jesus Christ that, when he pronounces the words of consecration in the Mass, the Incarnate Word obeys his voice and comes into his hands under the sacramental species." "But that is merely nothing to what we can do," we can imagine the worthy father adding, sotto voce. The conjurer's tricks, with his "Hey! Presto! and begone," fall into complete insignificance placed by the side of the sacramental performances of the skilled artiste of the Mass. The Rev. M'Polin went on to describe the following unparalleled feat of prestigiation, carefully prefacing the narration with a comparison to an incident, itself remarkable enough, but which was to be outdone by what followed: "We are struck with wonder when we read in the Scripture that God obeyed the voice of Joshua and made the sun stand still in the heavens; but it is immeasurably more wonderful that God, in obedience to the voice of the priest, descends on the altar, and, after descending there, remains entirely at his disposal, either to be shut up in the tabernacle, or carried about from place to place to be made the spiritual food and support of the sick and dying."

To an unprejudiced mind there must be something really fascinating in the possession of such an accommodating deity. Of course, the idea is not entirely new; but it is rarely that this particular doctrine is expressed in such explicit language. Certain of the High Church party in the Church of England are believers in "the real presence" on the altar; but whether they follow their Roman Catholic friends so far as to make their Almighty a portable deity we would not care to express ourselves definitely. God, according to this Irish priest, is easily prevailed upon by Catholic fathers. He can be brought down on the altar, and there dispensed at the sweet will of the priest; he can be shut up in the chapel cupboard, or placed in the priest's portmanteau for a journey round the parish. The ancient Israelites with their God in a box have been surpassed by Irish priests with God in their coat-tail pockets. Father M'Polin says that, after descending on the altar, God "remains entirely at his (the priest's) disposal." We tremble to think what might become of the holy spirit were its caretaker rendered joyful by Paddy's popular fluid, or what would happen were it to reach sceptical hands or fall in the possession of an indifferent world? God in the possession, and at the sole disposal, of an Irish priest is an event pregnant with alarming possibilities, which, though inviting, it were best not to dwell upon. But surely, if the Irish are so favored by the ruler of all the universe, they have little to complain of, and no more should be heard in the future of their sufferings and manifold misfortunes.

Evidently the object of Father M'Polin was to convince his hearers that the priests are the exalted of men, above the angels, and occasionally in priority to the deity himself; for his further remarks were in the nature of showing how only alone can the priests deliver sinners from hell, and make them worthy of Paradise, changing them from the slaves of Satan into the children of God. Such powers the angels themselves have never received from God, and on this account the father declared that the priests were even venerated by angels. Feared by men, venerated by angels, and obeyed by God, Catholic clericals must certainly be an enviable body of men, whose dignity and power eclipse those of kings and earthly rulers. "Even St. Michael, the archangel," according to Father M'Polin, "when he comes to a dying soul who invokes his aid, can chase away the devils; but he cannot free that soul from the chains of sin until a priest comes to absolve him. The priests are therefore, in relation to the faithful, the dispensers of the divine graces, the ministers and companions of God, the pillars of the Church as it were, and the door-keepers of heaven." If the latter clause be correct, Peter has evidently been deposed, or he has been made to share his old office with the ministers of the Romish Church. If it be true, Protestants, after all, will be debarred the everlasting joys, and their protestations of salvation and surety of heavenly bliss will avail them nothing when they find themselves outside the gates with the great crowd of unbelievers and scoffers. Father M'Polin may be right. He may bring God down on the altar every Sunday, and convey him from house to house during the week; there is more likelihood of the deity secreting himself in old crusted port than remaining in other abodes marked out as his dwelling places by thousands of Christians. Whether this be so or not, the deliverance of the rev. father is to be welcomed, as the ludicrous nature of religious tenets, when so divested of the halo of mystery and deception, will be more likely to open the eyes of the Irish people to the false and superstitious pretences of the priesthood.

F. Wilson.

Taboo.

To the mystery of revealed religion belongs Taboo, which might be defined as a silencing of the brain by the feelings—that is, by the will. It is a not-speaking-of, a not-thinking-of, a not-inquiring-into, the thing felt. So is intense and helpless reverence for the uttermost absurdities fostered; so does it grow up and remain.—J. O'Neill, "The Night of the Gods," p. 6.

Digitized by Google

A PRAYER TEST.

The efficacy of prayer has lately undergone a crucial test in Dallas, Tex., and the residual calx is found to be wind. As related by Dr. George S. Lincoln, president of the Dallas Freethinkers' Association, the circumstances were that Mrs. S. J. Sweeney, president of the Dallas Women's Christian Temperance Association, attended a meeting of the local Freethought Society, and requested the name of the speaker in order that she might pray for his conversion. The name was given her, together with that of the secretary, the conditions being, according to Dr. Lincoln's account, that, if neither was converted within three months, Mrs. Sweeney should admit that there was either no God or no force in prayer. Mrs. Sweeney's version of the terms is that, if neither was "touched" inside of the specified time, then she was to allow them (the speaker and the secretary) to make the denial. The difference between admitting anything and allowing another to admit it is not conspicuous; but, as Mrs. Sweeney seems to think it vital, her amendment may be agreed to. The main point is that, in answer to her prayers, something was to happen inside of the three months beginning on June 4, the date of the meeting.

This interesting incident, which attained general publicity through the newspapers, came to the notice of the Rev. Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, who at once put himself in epistolary communication with Mrs. Sweeney, in order to find out what she had been doing. Her reply makes him very weary, for it confirms the report as given by Dr. Lincoln, with the exception, before noted, that she never agreed to surrender her faith in God, whether he paid any attention to her prayers or not. It would naturally be supposed that faith like this, in a sceptical age, must command the admiration of every believer; but Dr. Buckley fails to enthuse. While admitting that Mrs. Sweeney's moral courage may be commended, he regards the presence of Christians at Infidel meetings as of "doubtful propriety," and Mrs. Sweeney's indiscretion in being there at all is, on the whole, about as serious as the offence of appearing in bloomers. He says further that professional lecturers against Christianity are not worthy of reply. Perchance he means not susceptible of reply, but "worthy" is the euphemism he employs. "Moreover," continues the editor of the Advocate, "no positive promise can be found in the Bible that God will convert such persons in answer to prayer. On the contrary, it is explicitly stated that there are some for whom no prayer will avail." Again: "Others are described as 'past feeling,' whom it is impossible to renew unto repentance, as having committed sins that cannot be forgiven either in this world or the world to come." Let the speaker and secretary reflect on that, and then listen: "Brazen, fierce, profane opponents of all religion, as well as those who make it a subject of buffoonery, may be prayed for indeed; but they, their writings, and their speeches should be avoided as one would shun an infected district." Finally: "An excellent biblical prescription for dealing with such persons, when one finds himself unexpectedly in their presence, is this: 'Go from the presence of a foolish man, when thou perceivest not in him the lips of knowledge.' The presence of Christian people in such places invariably makes capital for the blasphemer."

If Dr. Buckley had put his closing proposition first, the rest of his objections to Mrs. Sweeney's attending the meeting of the Dallas Freethinkers would not have needed to be written. The presence of Christian persons does, of course, make capital for the Freethought lecturer. That is why they are so cordially invited to attend. If you listen to a Christian person outside a Freethought gathering, especially in a pulpit or at an experience meeting, you will have to either doubt his word, or believe that he is simply in pain through his inability to meet and confound some denier of God and prayer. You know he is bluffing, but to call him is to call a policeman. When the Christian person enters a Freethought assemblage he leaves his power of arrest outside, and faces the audience on equal terms. His belief not being capable of either demonstration or convincing argument, he becomes capital, or at least raw material, for the "blasphemer." Dr. Buckley knows how worthless ordinary religious statements become the minute they are denied and proof called for. He sees with impatience that Mrs. Sweeney has taken the promises of God altogether too seriously, as though their fulfilment was to be expected, and hence the rebuke. Such a thing as her prayers being answered in this instance does not enter his head. In fact, he has a firm grasp on the truth that prayers are never answered, and ten days before the expiration of the time allotted to the test he writes in perfect confidence that God will pay no attention to Mrs. Sweeney's petition. A man of more faith might have hedged along towards the first of September; but while any chance remained that accident could bring about the result prayed for he would not have volunteered an explanation of the failure.

An event like the conversion of Mrs. Sweeney to unbelief through the non-success of her prayers is not to be looked for. She can never have had any reason for believing in prayer, and can therefore have no less. But, whether or not in this crisis she loses faith in God, it would be altogether surprising if she did not withdraw whatever confidence she may have reposed in the Rev. Dr. Buckley.

—Truthseeker. GEORGE MACDONALD.

IRISH NOTES.

In Irish politics the event of the past few weeks has been Mr. Healy's defeat. In South Kerry he played for a large stake, and he has lost. Moreover, he has shown his opponents his hand, without gaining the slightest point as a compensation. It is difficult, however, to know whether Mr. Healy's revolt betokens anything more than an ambition to figure as a leader on Mr. Healy's part.

Mr. Healy has made large bids for priestly influence. His organ in Dublin is the Irish Catholic, the name of which is sufficient to indicate its character. And there was some talk, a month or so ago, of Mr. Healy becoming the leader of a clerical party in Irish politics. But it would seem that in Kerry the priests were pretty evenly divided, and exchanged compliments in the most approved manner. On the whole, however, the preponderance of clerical influence is on Mr. Healy's side.

The Freeman's Journal had some comments on the British Association last week which are peculiarly in keeping with the simulated piety of that organ. "More and more," it says, "the evidences of design and order in nature are being borne in on scientific men who too readily took up the Atheistic hypothesis of exaggerated Darwinism. Evolution, as understood in an anti-Christian sense, has now, it may be said, no defenders."

What "exaggerated Darwinism" might be, who "took up" with it, why exaggerated Darwinism is Atheistic and the unexaggerated article Christian—all these are questions which the Freeman scribe doubtless would be at a loss to answer. The fact is, he probably knows as much about the hypothesis of Darwinism—whether exaggerated or otherwise—as he does about the archæological remains of Timbuctoo. It is, however, merely part of the evil of journalism that men must write pompous pronouncements on matters of which they are largely ignorant, and write down to the bias of the majority of their readers.

Mr. Tom Mann delivered a lecture in Dublin on Wednesday on "Trade Unionism and Socialism." Questioned at the close as to what relation clericalism had to Socialism, he is reported to have replied that "Socialists were only concerned with economic problems, and on theological matters every Socialist held whatever opinion he liked." Of course it would certainly be foolish for Socialists to tackle a number of questions at once. But if Mr. Mann or any number of Socialists imagine that the question of clericalism can be permanently shelved, they will be very sadly disappointed. It is a question which lies at the root of all reforms, and must, sooner or later, be faced by every reformer.

The Irish Catholic reports the sixteenth celebration of the anniversary of the Knock "apparitions." The Church, for a week previous to the annual celebration, is the theatre of religious gymnastics of various kinds, all for the glory of God and the material prosperity of—somebody else. The Catholic says that, "in spectacular display, in scenic effect, in devotional fervor, in all that wins the eye and moves the heart," this year's anniversary was remarkable. Evidently they are past-masters in the art of bamboozling at Knock, and they are also keen observers of human nature. "Spectacular display" and "scenic effect"—that is how the thing is done. Clever clerics of Knock!

Digitized by Google

F. R.

ACID DROPS.

THE Methodist Times has made a great discovery, on the nothing-like-leather principle. It appears that the Methodist schools, "unlike the Anglican and Roman Catholic schools, are in no sense sectarian; they are the very ideal of public elementary schools." Further on in the same article, Nonconformists are called upon to "present a united front to the intolerance of Clericalism and to the intolerance of Secularism." The intolerance of Secularism is distinctly good. We particularly like it. Secularists object to being taxed for the support of any sort of religious teaching, and such an objection is, of course, the height of intolerance. An unbeliever who won't pay for the religious education of his neighbor's children is a bigot of the first water.

Mr. Price Hughes, the editor of the Methodist Times, is enjoying a holiday at Grindelwald, where a number of well-to-do Christians have an annual picnic under the pretence of discussing the Union of Christendom. At one of these Conferences, quite recently, Mr. Hughes made a new proposal as to the future of National Education in England. The Church of England might free its schools from denominational bias, and on the other hand the Nonconformists might sanction the teaching of the Apostles' Creed in the Board schools. This would settle the whole matter, and outsiders might be told to go to the Devil—or, as Mr. Hughes puts it, to avail themselves of the conscience clause.

The Christian World ridicules Mr. Hughes's proposal, and laughs at the idea that he represents the Free Churches. Nay, more, it plainly confesses that the Apostles' Creed is a fraud, its apostolic authority being "based upon a silly legend."

Canon Scott Holland, according to a Westminster Gazette reviewer, calls Mr. Hughes's proposal "fatuous," even as regards Churchmen. He also smiles at Mr. Hughes's lofty disdain of outsiders. "Even supposing," says Canon Holland, "that it were wise or just to rule out the poor Unitarians and Agnostics, and others, they are too many to rule out. In fact, they would not be ruled out. It is, to say the very, very least, fatuous to suppose it for a single moment."

The New York Sun says that, while the religious bodies are making great claims of progress, it is nevertheless a fact that "church after church is going under." Mentioning that "the Church of the Annunciation, situated in West Fourteenth-street, on one of the leading thoroughfares of the city, has been sold, and the proceeds of the sale have been devoted to educational purposes," it gives several other instances, and cites a Baptist minister as saying: "It is almost a daily occurrence to see our churches leaving the place where God's work should be carried on for a place less effective, but more fashionable." The millionaire, continues the Sun, worships in a stately temple on Madison-avenue, while his clerks bow the knee in a modest prayer-house in First-Avenue. Such is Christian brotherhood in the nineteenth century.

As the snows on the Rhotang Pass melted, the fragments of the dead body of a man were found against the north wall of the refuge on the Lahoul side of the Pass. As he had been there all the winter, little was left save bones, rags, and a drinking-cup. He had evidently (thinks a Bombay contemporary) come there to die, as he had built two low stone walls some three feet apart, and then lain down to die with his head against the north wall of the refuge. This showed him to have been a "Khampu" or Spiti man, as the prevalent belief in Spiti is that the higher the elevation they die at the greater their chance of getting to a better world. They do not seem to hold the Buddhist doctrines of transmigration, absorption, and annihilation, but rather to look forward to a somewhat materialistic heaven, which seems to be situate in the air immediately above the Kailas mountain, with a vestibule or entry on top of the Kailas itself.—Daily News.

A book, full of learning, has lately been written by a Japanese scholar, Mr. John O'Neill, which tends to show that the superstition here referred to was at one time a very general one, of which he finds traces in the building of high towers, the erection of poles, and such stories as "Jack and the Beanstalk." The sky, to early man, may have really seemed more accessible than to us, and the legend of the Tower of Babel may have had some foundation in fact. The men who thought God had to come down to see what men were up to may well have thought, also, that they could scale to heaven.

Canon Duckworth has made an addition to the Spectator's anecdotes of "absent-mindedness." It relates to a clergyman of his acquaintance who, having been presented to an important living, preached his first sermon from the words, "All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers." He was surprised and distressed when the churchwardens afterwards hinted to him that his choice of a text had been a little hard upon his predecessors.

We wonder what the Jews thought of Jesus calling Moses and the prophets "thieves and robbers," or of his saying, "A greater than Solomon is here." If truths, they were probably unpalatable ones. But such sayings certainly look more like the ascription of his followers than the actual utterances of any sane man.

The earthquake in Honduras resulted in the loss of many lives, 363 bodies having already been recovered, though the full extent of the disaster is unknown. A church tower in Yetapan crashed down, carrying with it the roofs of three houses. Nine persons were killed in this accident, and eighteen others were injured. The flames set fire to many buildings, and on the mountain side numbers of grazing cattle were engulfed by the lava, which continued flowing to lower ground in immense streams. The people rushed madly through the streets, praying and crying, and many were rendered frantic by their efforts to escape from the molten lava.

By an avalanche which fell upon the hamlet of Spittalmette, in the canton of Berne, at least ten persons have lost their lives, besides about 200 head of cattle. Divine Providence, as usual, is conspicuous by its absence.

There has been a rapid increase of cholera in the government of Volkhnia (Russia), and the deaths are now stated to be about 250 a day. Part of the neighboring government of Podolia is also seriously infected. From Tiflis it is reported that the epidemic has broken out at Erzeroum, and stringent precautions are being adopted on the Caucasian frontier to prevent the infection being imported into that province.

The use of phonographed prayers at funerals has led an American genius to invent an electric automaton clergyman, who, by a dynamo under the pulpit, will read, pray, intone psalms, and preach with the true nasal intonation. He says that, once he gets his machine in full play, the men of God may retire.

The Shepherd's Voice defends the extermination of the Canaanites, and other Bible atrocities, on the ground that God can do as he likes with his own. It says: "That any live for any length of time is of the grace of God. Now, unquestionably, God has what we may call a legal right to execute this sentence of death. He may do it, too, in different ways. He may send sickness; he may send storms or earthquakes; he may delegate authority to men to execute it. But whichever way the sentence is executed it is righteous." The Shepherd's Voice is remarkably like that of a wolf, and its God hardly to be distinguished from a devil.

The Papacy to-day is before all things prudent. M. Ribot having imposed a tax on the religious orders in France, which accumulate vast property from "the dead hand," and then wish all the burdens of property to rest on the living, the clericals represent this as a persecution of religion, and some religious bodies have tried to arouse popular sympathy by allowing their property to be sold up, rather than voluntarily pay the tax. The Pope was appealed to as to whether they should resist or submit. Cardinal Rampolla replied that it is a matter of prudence. He will not say it is their duty to obey the State or to resist, but tells them to do what they think best, knowing, of course, they will rather pay their taxes than have their wealthy properties sold up.

A remarkable tragedy has occurred at Friedheim, in Germany, the victim being the Catholic priest, Herr Wodda. After reading mass as usual in his church, he ascended the pulpit, but whilst delivering a sermon suddenly became unwell. Members of the congregation rushed forward and carried him from the pulpit; but before medical aid could arrive Herr Wodda had died, exclaiming, "I am poisoned." It is surmised that the wine used at the celebration of the mass was poisoned, and all the church utensils have been seized for examination by the police. There is, however, no clue to the perpetrator of the crime.

Digitized by Google

Another burial dispute! The Rev. T. Wood, rector of Grimoldby, near South Lincolnshire, refused to allow of the interment of a parishioner, who owned a grave in the churchyard, because her friends desired a Nonconformist to conduct the service. The burial was, however, carried out, despite the prohibition of the man of God.

At Houghton, Huntingdonshire, on Rogation Tuesday, the villagers observe the old custom of beating the bounds and placing a man head downwards in the boundary holes. They then gravely tap him three times with the shovel, "earth fastening" him as a witness to this part of the boundary line. In days gone by the parish priest used to officiate. Psalms were sung, and much good to the crops was expected to result. Now the proceedings wind up at the local temple—the inn on the village green, where solemn beer communion is taken.

The Rev. W. Hind, vicar of All Saint's, Highgate, is charged with indecently assaulting little girls, aged ten and twelve, whom he invited to the vicarage. The father first applied to the court, and the application was taken in camera, and no process was granted. Then the matter was taken up by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the Rev. J. Badenoch, of St. Augustine's, Highgate, attending. Again one of the magistrates suggested it should be heard in private, but this did not meet the approval of the court, and a summons is to be issued. Of course, as Mr. Bodkin observed, the Rev. W. Hind may have a perfect answer to the charge; but, if so, they have not acted as his friends who have put every obstacle in the way of this perfect answer being made known.

According to Mr. Sims, brigands are not yet extinct in Spain, though they are exceedingly courteous, refined, and truly pious. Lately a band of brigands stopped a train, "raised their hats" to the passengers, and invited them to part with their property. Thus spoke the leader of the band: "Ladies and Gentlemen,—Please deliver up your money and valuables of every description. We do not wish to put you to the indignity of a search, but shall rely upon your honor. But as soon as you tell us you have given up everything we shall search one passenger of each class. If upon either we find a single coin or a single valuable, we shall shoot one passenger in each compartment. Ladies and gentlemen, do not hurry yourselves. Our time is yours." Of course the passengers immediately evince the most absorbing interest in each other's personal affairs; the goods change hands, and the robbers, as they say goodbye, raise their hats and pray that "we may all meet again in God's big parlor." Doubtless they feel like Artemus Ward towards the Red Indian, who, after thieving from him, said: "We shall meet in the happy hunting-grounds." "If we do," said Artemus, "there will be a fight."

An amusing discussion on the Apostles' Creed went on last week in the Daily News. A Mid-Herts minister wondered "if the Free Church theologians at the Grindelwald Conference are able themselves to recite that well-known but most shocking sentence in the Apostles' Creed—viz., 'He descended into hell.' I have understood that in the Free Church Colleges and Churches, where 'the Liturgy' is used, there is a reverent omission of the said un-Scriptural impiety"; and he thinks Nonconformists will hesitate long before they compel Board-school children to utter what is shuddered at as almost a blasphemy.

Thereupon he was told on the one hand that hell was only "Hades," and then that the visit of Christ there is clearly taught in the New Testament (1 Peter iii. 18-20). To this the minister replies that the original authors of the Creed really meant "Hell," and not "Hades," and that they were as blissfully ignorant that "Hades" meant "Sheol," and not "Gehenna," as they were that "Hell" means a place into which English tailors throw shreds or printers broken type. He adds that "the very words, 'Apostles' Creed,' contain a most undesirable 'suggestio falsi' to instil into the minds of the young. Even the Persians taught their children the love of 'truth.'" Of course the ascription of the nonsensical creed to the apostles is a pure fabrication. But those who want to impose it on children do not care a pin for that.

Owing to the long-continued drought, the New South Wales Government ordered Sunday, September 15, to be observed as a day of humiliation and prayer for rain. The wise men of the government ought to take warning by Queensland. They put up prayers for rain there, and got the floods at the wrong time, so that they had to solemnly petition the Almighty to stop it.

The newspapers of April, 1837, reported an interesting incident at a Paris theatre. "Some nights since," says the account, "at a moment when one of the actors at the theatre of the Porte St. Martin, Paris, said to another in the piece, 'Now you have nothing more to do than to recommend yourself to God,' someone amongst the audience cried out: 'There is no such being.' A violent tumult arose; cries of 'Turn out the Atheist!' 'Turn out the impious wretch!' were heard from all sides. The whole house was in an uproar until the author of the confusion had been removed from the box."

A superintendent of a Church Sunday-school writes to the Daily News: "I have been a Church Sunday-school teacher in various schools in the South of London and in the North of England for over twenty-five years, and I have no hesitation in saying that the average Sunday-school lesson of the average Sunday-school teacher is a perfect farce. I have been to clerical meetings where the clergy have made great fun of their teachers and their teaching, and it has made my blood boil when I have heard such contemptuous remarks made about them; for, after all, it is the clergy's fault that it is so. In the various schools that I have taught I have never found a single clergyman who has taken any practical interest in his own schools." He says it is because they know that Sunday-school teaching is unsatisfactory that they want the trained teachers of Board and Voluntary schools, who are paid by the State, to do the work their own Sunday-school teachers ought to do.

A Jewish gentleman summoned on a coroner's jury at Wood Green claimed exemption on the ground that he was a cohen, or of priestly cast, and a dead body was taboo to him (see Leviticus xi.). The coroner was evidently not well up in Jewish law, for he asked what a cohen was, and did not remind the cohen that there was a system by which he could be purified. He, however, said it was no valid claim for exemption, though, as he had sufficient jurymen without the cohen, he, on this occasion, dispensed with his services.

Touching a corpse was taboo among Greeks, Romans, Hindus, Parsees, and Phœnicians. Mr. Frazer says: "Those who have defiled themselves by touching a dead body are regarded by the Maoris as in a very dangerous state, and are sedulously shunned and isolated." Doubtless the belief that death was something which could communicate itself, as disease was seen to do, lay at the root of this Bible-enshrined superstition.

Another juryman, summoned at the Bethnal Green Vestry Hall, sent a letter saying that from conscientious reasons he could not serve, "being opposed to the government of force." It added: "I must now commit myself to Him who judges righteously." Dr. W. Westcott, the coroner, said that if the writer did not attend the next inquest he was summoned to he would be fined forty shillings.

The Church Patronage Gazette is a monthly journal established for the sale of presentation to livings and advowsons. It consists of forty pages, and shows what an extensive traffic in the cure of souls is carried on in the Church.

The Rev. R. R. Dolling, the Broad High Churchman, of St. Agatha's, Portsmouth, has been giving his views on the election of the new bishop of Winchester. He points out what a farce the election is. The Dean and Chapter are given leave to elect their bishop, but are told by the Crown whom they must elect. Then they retire to a room, and pray to God the Holy Ghost to direct them as to whom they shall appoint, knowing they must elect the Crown's nomination. Mr. Dolling doesn't like this farce, and points out that the cleric so appointed may be nominated by a person who is not even nominally a Christian. Well, there is an easy remedy if only the clericals will accept it. Let the Church be entirely separate from the State, and dependent on the voluntary offerings of Church people. There can be no objection then to letting the Dean and the Chapter and the Holy Ghost combine to elect as bishops whomsoever they please. But what Churchmen want is State endowment without State control.

In the case of the American barrister, charged with blackmailing, it transpired that the son of the Rev. F. Williams, himself educated for the Church, seduced a young girl in the vestry of his father's church. After this became known it appears that he went abroad, as it was thought, though he would not do for the English Church, he would do for the colonies.

Father Wilson, of St. Joseph's, is a priest who, while himself donning a feminine garb, objects to women assuming bicycle bloomers. He said it was not becoming to a young woman, according to his idea of a woman, and in the course of his remarks further said that the woman members of his congregation who preferred to wear the bicycle costume spoken of would not be recognised by him on the street, and that those who knew him and spoke to him would be ignored. Evidently all milliners and outfitters should be put under priestly regulation.

The Daily Telegraph gives currency to a report that the

Digitized by Google

Papacy will pay over a sum of £200,000,000 to the Italian Government as the purchase price of a tract of Roman territory, to be made over to the Papacy in perpetuity. Money may do much, but it will hardly restore the prestige of the Papacy till it can buy the Eternal City outright.

At the Roman Catholic Congress it was frankly admitted that the Board schools are eating the Voluntary schools up, and, although the Catholic ones are managed very economically, they are confronted with an annual deficit. No wonder they are exerting themselves to dip their hands into the pockets of the general rate and taxpayers.

Attempts to give a novel pseudo scientific explanation to old superstitions are sometimes very amusing. Here, for instance, is Dr. Jane Elizabeth Hotchkiss writing in the Metaphysical Magazine that "prayer, especially before retiring to sleep, may be regarded, psychologically, as an excellent means for decomposing the muscular tension and inducing a complete relaxation of the nervous system." So prayer should be retained, not because you expect anyone to answer your prayers, but because it makes a cheaper nightcap than whisky toddy. We wonder if, when Dr. Jane Elizabeth gets a husband, she will convert him to this psychological view of prayer.

George Macdonald, of the Truthseeker, does not think much of Mr. Keir Hardie. He says: "Personally, he is commonplace; intellectually, considerably less. In addition to being sentimentally pious, the Socialist ex-member of Parliament is inordinately vain. Nordau would call him an egomaniac. Exhibiting his miner's cap to an audience, he related that this same piece of headgear had created consternation in the House of Commons, the members pretending, says he, that they objected to the cap; but, he adds, sententiously, 'It was not the cap they were afraid of, but the head inside of it.' Of such timber is Mr. Keir Hardie, apostle of Socialism and Jesus Christ."

The Rev. W. E. Broadhurst, late Methodist preacher of Arkansas City, Kan., has fallen a victim to the wiles of Satan. He has been convicted of improper conduct with one of the pious sisters, and has finally confessed the crime in these words, published in a local paper: "It is due to the public that I make this confession. I am a fallen preacher, after twenty-one years of acceptable work in the Methodist Episcopal Church. I have resisted thousands of temptations, but was caught at last. My sin is such that I make no defence."

Brother Broadhurst hints at a capital defence. Thousands of the sisters have vainly tried to lead him from the paths of virtue, and for twenty-one years he would not be enticed. Jesus Christ was only tempted of the Devil for forty days, and after that angels ministered unto him. But poor Brother Broadhurst has been tempted all this time by devils in the shape of angels of light. He was "caught at last." Can Brother Broadhurst mean that at last he was found out?

At the Festival of the Three Choirs, Wesley's splendid hymn, "I wish to tune my quivering lyre," was adequately rendered yesterday. The singer was not the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes.—Globe.

The American eagle of freedom must surely be moulting, judging by the following paragraph from the New York Truthseeker: "Last Sunday, in this city, the fashionable clubs were wide open, and the hotels and leading cafés were selling all kinds of drinks, while the saloons in the tenement districts were tightly closed and a man was held for trial for selling five cents' worth of ice to a girl from a tenement house; another for selling three cents' worth of writing paper to a policeman; and still another for showing a policeman, at the latter's earnest solicitation, a pair of rubber shoes."

By a telegram from Macon, Ga., lovers of "civil and religious liberty" may learn that forty citizens of that place have been arrested for the crime of selling dry goods, groceries, meat, and bread on the day of the week that some of their fellow men have corrected God by declaring "holy." In Tennessee a little while ago a considerable number of persons, guilty of the same offence, were working in the public street, each with a ball and chain attached to his mortal part.

The barber shops are closed in Brooklyn to-day, and the soda fountains are forbidden to play in New York. Now, if we can have the street-cars stopped, the "L" trains suspended, and the holes in the slot machines stuffed up, we may get back to somewhere near the standard of the good old New England days, when the Yankee farmer used to throw his cider barrel out of the cellar if he caught it working on Sunday.—New York Recorder.

The Chicago Presbytery has improved on the practice of their Savior. He made some 150 gallons of wine for guests who had well drunk already. They have ordered that his communion must be celebrated only with unfermented wine, at all the churches within their jurisdiction.

But (says the Progressive Thinker) the proposition carries a lie on its face, which should be next remedied. Wine is the fermented juice of the grape. It is not wine until it is fermented. To that time, it is simply the juice of the grape, known in commerce as "must," from the Latin mustum. It was wine, and a very superior article, according to the statement of the governor of the feast, which Jesus made at Cana, and it was wine which was metamorphosed into his blood, which did service at the last supper. Churchmen now see the tendency of forming a drinking appetite by tampering with prayer-made "blood of Christ," out of spirit-proof wine, so they are improving on the teaching of "our Lord" by a non-intoxicating substitute. It is well.

Eight honest, conscientious Seventh-day Adventists of Rhea County, Tenn., have been condemned to serve terms of from twenty-five to ninety days in the county gaol at Dayton, Tenn., for the offence of doing common labor on Sunday—labor which disturbed no other person's private or public devotion. It has also been decided to work these honest men in the chain-gang, and by the time this reaches our readers this will doubtless be accomplished.—American Sentinel.

The case of a married couple in Youngstown, Ohio, warns husbands with believing wives that they had perhaps best go to church occasionally, although they may have to violate their inclinations in order to do so. A Mrs. Minnear, of that city, requested her husband on a recent Sabbath morn to accompany her to the house of prayer and worship, but found him obdurate in that respect. She went alone, and, returning only to find that he had retired for the night, she touched a match to his bed, and had made good progress towards cremating him when he awoke and put out the fire.

The couple appeared in court the next morning, where Mrs. Minnear alleged the refusal of her husband to attend church, and the man, apologising for harsh words used towards his wife, said that "the idea of being burned up made him a trifle angry." I take it that, if there were more women with Mrs. Minnear's stern austerity of purpose, and who would rather see their husbands warmed up here than in the great hereafter, there would be a better attendance at some churches. The inhumanity of man concentred all in self, and woman's devotion touched and made tenderer by the gospel of Jesus Christ, are constantly receiving fresh and striking illustrations.—G. Macdonald, in "Truthseeker."

A disciple paper, the Christian Standard, contains the remark, in the form of a complaint, that "nine-tenths of our young people, if asked why they were disciples, could not give an intelligent reason for the faith they profess." This growler does not seem to know when things are well enough and to be let alone. As many Bible readers testify, it is quite possible for investigators to inadvertently disprove the very thing they set out to demonstrate, and there is danger that, if the young people went to searching for a reason for being disciples or members of any other sect, they would discover that there wasn't any.—Truthseeker.

"Religion's Unusual Effect" is the head that the World puts on a dispatch from Pine Bluff, Arkansas, telling how Jesse Isborg, a negro, became crazed by religion at a revival meeting, prayed all night, and in the morning shot his landlady at the breakfast table, mortally wounding her, and finished his career by blowing out his own brains. Why did the World put such a misleading head on the dispatch? What is there "unusual" in the spectacle of a man driven crazy by religion?

The Nonconformist and Independent warns its readers that any reunion with the Church is likely to be the reunion of the lion with the lamb inside. It says: "To credit them with a desire for reconciliation is to fall into a grievous error. Alike as to Church and school we shall be wise to proceed on the assumption that by reunion ecclesiastical authorities simply mean Nonconformist surrender."

A. Le Lievre, who, we believe, is a curate, states in the London Echo that Mr. Foote was imprisoned for publishing "obscene caricatures." This is the common slander of Christian Evidence advocates. There was not a word about "obscenity" in Mr. Foote's indictment, which simply charged him with "bringing the Holy Scripture and the Christian Religion into disbelief and contempt." We might waste a good many epithets on A. Le Lievre, but we are content with saying that he is a Christian.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, September 22, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, E.C.: 7.30, "Bible or No Bible in the Schools."

September 29, Foresters' Hall, London.

October 6, Wood Green.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. CHARLES WATTS'S ENGAGEMENTS.—Sept. 22, Sheffield; 29, Camberwell. October 6 and 13, Foresters' Hall; 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 18, North Shields; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. November 17, Liverpool.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

MISS VANCE has just returned from a much-needed holiday. During her absence N.S.S. correspondence has had to stand over, but she is now clearing off arrears.

C. GRAHAM (Egypt).—We are glad you like the Freethinker, and thank you for your endeavors to circulate it abroad.

F. H. HART points out that the Hon. Lionel Tollemache's Stones of Stumbling, originally issued privately, is now advertised regularly in the Journal of Education, as well as the companion volume, Safe Studies. We cordially agree with you that both are most interesting books.

A. ANDERSON.—Thanks for the mark of confidence.

W. H. ABBOTT wishes his cheque for the late special Hall of Science appeal to go to Mr. Foote's new lecture-scheme.

W. BENNETT.—Thanks. We note your wishes in the matter.

JOHN HOLCOMBE, the Freethinking juryman who was insulted and illegally treated by Coroner Wynne E. Baxter at the Mile-end Vestry Hall, writes us under date of September 13. He states that he did not know he was being illegally treated, and that he did not want to say anything which would have gratified the coroner, who evidently wished to turn him out of the court. We are in communication with Mr. Holcombe, and we hope to carry the matter further.

J. KEAST.—Thanks for note re Shepherds' Hall. Sorry it is not available for Sunday lectures.

J. SIDDON.—See "Sugar Plums." Glad to hear of Mr. Cohen's success.

JOHN TANNER (Liverpool).—Delighted to hear from you. Mr. James Read's letter in the Mercury, with regard to the Oaths Act and the action of Coroner Baxter, is calculated to be of considerable service to the cause of justice.

T. HOPKINS.—The subscription shall be used as desired.

E. DAVIES.—Price Hughes is caught again, as you say; and there is no Freethinker to defend him this time.

C. HEATON.—Your subscription will be transferred to the "President's Fund." Thanks for your kind note.

T. SEABLE.—The Rev. A. J. Waldron debated with Mr. Foote on the Resurrection. It was at New Brompton in April. Mr. Charles Watts, who was present, wrote an account of it in the Freethinker. We know nothing about Mr. Waldron's "winning his spurs" on that occasion. We did not see any such articles knocking about, but the Western Morning News writer was not there, and is perhaps better informed.

YACHTSMAN.—Thanks for cheque for one guinea in aid of the Foresters' Hall enterprise. The former donation shall be utilised as you direct.

W. C. STUART.—You are prompt as well as generous with your "Shilling Week" subscription, which shall be acknowledged in the published list.

J. E. A.—Mr. Waldron discusses with Mr. Watts in October at Newcastle. His views on Secularism will then be stated in the presence of a most competent opponent. Thanks for your trouble in the matter.

T. E. M.—Mr. Foote will be happy to visit Belfast if the Branch is prepared to make the local arrangements. We dare say the place needs stirring up. Your subscription will be acknowledged in next week's list.

G. FITZ-GERALD.—Thanks for your kind expressions and good wishes. There is no need to take counsel's opinion on the Oaths Act. We have Mr. Bradlaugh's careful statement to guide us, and no counsel could improve on his directions. You will see that we may have an opportunity of carrying the recent case farther.

L. G. (Leicester).—The Huxley epitaph is said to have been written by Mrs. Huxley. It was never "Huxley's Motto," as the reverend gentleman calls it.

W. J. GAINES.—The time of the first introduction of Christianity in England is much controverted. Mosheim and Jortin were both Protestants. On the whole, both are trustworthy, though of course not infallible.

H. JONES (Shrewsbury).—Pleased to hear you were treated courteously by the local coroner. It is gratifying to learn that a letter in one of your newspapers brought about a change in his former line of practice.

THE official address of the Battersea Branch is 4 Corunna-place, Stewart's-road, Battersea, where all communications should be addressed.

J. ROE (Bradley Green).—Mr. Watts has shown us your letter. It is not illegal to let a hall for lectures on Sunday. It might become illegal, when there is a charge for admission, if the lecture is followed by discussion. But that question is arguable, and has not been decided. The recent Leeds case, which was fought very badly, has frightened the proprietors and lessees of halls in all parts of the kingdom.

J. RICHARDSON.—Received. Shall appear.

H. ORGAN.—Many thanks for the box of flowers, which will please the lady you intend them for. Thanks also for your bright and encouraging letter.

E. P. PEACOCK (Chicago).—Glad to see the American Secular Union is actively opposing the Sabbatarian bigots. We will keep an eye on the paper you mention.

THE President of the National Secular Society is collecting evidence against a person who is privately circulating the vilest libels upon him. Meanwhile the President warns the London friends against this person's artifices.

PAPERS RECEIVED.—Free Life—Joyful News—Two Worlds—Sun—Melbourne Herald—Standard—Echo—Glasgow Weekly Herald—Liberty—Lucifer—Strait Times—Daily Chronicle—Morning—Melbourne Argus—Irish Life—Crescent—Boston Investigator—Islamic World—Referee—Secular Thought—Isle of Man Times—Twentieth Century—New York Public Opinion—Ironclad Age—Blue Grass Blade—Metaphysical Magazine.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

CORRESPONDENCE should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

IT being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SPECIAL.

READERS of the Freethinker are requested to remember that the first week in October is "Shilling Week." During that week all who desire to aid, however modestly, in the active propaganda of Freethought during the winter, should send me one or more shillings. Every subscription will be acknowledged. I have to add that lecturing engagements, under the scheme I outlined a few weeks ago, are already being formed by Mr. Charles Watts and Mr. C. Cohen; and that the services of other lecturers will be utilised as soon as possible.

The last Executive meeting of the National Secular Society unanimously voted a resolution, expressing warm approval of my lecture-scheme, and promising me not only a free hand, but all possible support, in my enterprise.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUGAR PLUMS.

MR. FOOTE is back in London all the better for a brief holiday after his Glasgow lectures. This evening (September 22) he lectures at the Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, E.C., his subject being "Bible or No Bible in the Schools," with special reference to Dr. John Clifford's recent argument for its retention.

So many difficulties have arisen that Mr. Foote has resolved to discontinue the sale of tickets for meetings at the Foresters' Hall. London friends will please note that the admission is now free. It is expected, however, that a silver collection will be contributed by persons occupying seats in the body of the hall, and a copper collection by those in the gallery.

Digitized by Google

Last Sunday evening Mr. Charles Watts lectured in the Foresters' Hall, London. The audience was evidently very pleased with the exposition given of "Secularism in Modern Thought." The various points were received with much cheering, and, on Mr. Watts resuming his seat, he had quite an ovation. Mr. John Grange, from Bradford, was present.

To-day (Sunday, September 22) Mr. Watts lectures three times in the Hall of Science, Rockingham-street, Sheffield. We hope our Yorkshire friends will rally in full force.

Mr. Charles Watts has issued his trenchant remarks on Discreditable Tactics of Christian Disputants in the form of a penny pamphlet. All interested in Mr. Watts's debate with the Rev. Dr. A. Jamieson (with whom it chiefly deals), and especially those in the neighborhood of the rev. gentleman, should give the pamphlet as wide a circulation as possible.

Mr. Wheeler has in the press a volume entitled Footsteps of the Past. This title was taken from a former volume, the entire stock of which was destroyed by fire. The work has been entirely re-written, and will deal with the groundwork of all religious ideas, tracing their development from the rudest savage notions to their expression in Christian doctrine and ritual. A large number of rare works have been consulted in this compilation, and Mr. Wheeler confidently states that Footsteps of the Past will be an eye-opener. The price to subscribers in advance will be 2s. 6d. for a volume of two hundred pages, but when the book is issued to the trade it will be 3s. Mr. Foote will contribute an Introduction.

Mr. Joseph Seddon, secretary of the Manchester Branch, writes: "Mr. Cohen's month's mission in Manchester came to a successful close on Sunday last. Open-air lectures in various parts of the town have been delivered to large crowds of people, notably in Stevenson-square and Chorlton-road, where some little opposition was met with. The lectures in the hall, too, have been well attended, and I think the result of the month's working will be found to have been not only a success from a propaganda point of view, but from a financial one also. The course of three lectures on 'The Great French Revolution' was particularly admired, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Cohen will have them printed at an early date. During his stay amongst us Mr. Cohen has made many friends, and the only cause for regret is that he was not engaged for a longer period."

Mr. Heaford pays his first lecturing visit to Newcastle this Sunday, and occupies the platform at Northumberland Hall, morning, afternoon, and evening. Friends in the district will do well to attend and take a taste of his quality.

A most enjoyable gathering of the members of the Islington and Finsbury Park Branches, to the number of nearly a hundred, took place last Sunday in the extensive grounds of Mr. Guest, at the Nook, Canonbury. A capital tea was provided on the lawn, Mr. R. O. Smith kindly furnishing tables and chairs. An entertainment followed, to which Mr. and Mrs. Guest, Mr. Ward, Mrs. Wheeler, and many others contributed. Dance and song were kept up in the illuminated grounds till a late hour, to the entertainment of a numerous auditory on the other bank of the New River. The reunion led to the discussion of some plans for winter work in the North of London.

The attempts of H. P. Hughes to curry favor with the Church will only lead more genuine Nonconformists to fall back on the independent position that the State has nothing to do with the teaching of religion. The Daily News of September 11 says: "We are, and always have been, in favor of confining to secular subjects the instruction of children in schools which the State supports. Such a law would, in our opinion, meet the ends of justice and serve the cause of religion. It would be just, because rates and taxes are paid by people of all religions and people of none. It would be, in the highest sense, religious, because it would separate from the formal routine of school life truths and sentiments which need to be handled with peculiar delicacy and reverence."

John Morley is engaged in writing a history of the present century. It is a stupendous undertaking, and has occupied his spare time for several years.

Irish Life, noticing Mr. Gladstone's preface to An American People's Bible History, says: "But why insist upon the inspired accuracy of the text? If Moses did the best he could for the Jews in accounting for our existence, what is gained by insisting on the inspired accuracy of the account, which is now made to clash with natural laws and natural data? Why insist that Moses, a learned man, who was giving his erstwhile enslaved and semi-barbarous fellows a feasible account of their existence, was necessarily directly inspired? Who will insist that, when Moses propounded the laws of slavery, of people who were to be slaves to the Jews, with the prelude—'Thus said the Lord'—that he was inspired to propound the mind of the Almighty in the matter of slave-making?"

"A man," continues Irish Life, "need not be inspired to write history. No one who undertakes now, or has ever undertaken, to write an account of St. Patrick and his sermons is supposed to be inspired. No one claims that Shakespeare and Tennyson were inspired, and yet they were philosopher and poet of far greater excellence, and purer lives, than either David or Solomon. A poet need not necessarily be inspired, as we know from our own Davis, and from the glorious crowd of British poets, ending with Tennyson, to write the most profound verse, and it is very doubtful if Solomon might not have learned a great deal from Shakespeare as a philosopher and poet."

The Liberal party in Mexico are seeking to enforce the laws framed by President Juarez to control the privileges of the clergy. They propose to suppress secret convents. The late revolution in Ecuador was largely a revolt against the domination of the Romish Church. Convents were thrown open, and such of the nuns as desired liberty were allowed to depart. A number of priests were forced to fly.

Colonel Ingersoll has begun his winter campaign against ignorance and superstition. He has a new lecture entitled "The Foundations of Faith." Ingersoll spoke in Atlantic City, N.J., August 4, on "The Holy Bible"; on August 8, 9, 10, and 11, at Burlington, Vt. It seems he held a kind of "protracted meeting" there. He lectured on August 16, 17, and 18, at Lake Pleasant, Mass. On September 7 he attended a reunion of his old regiment, the Eleventh Illinois Cavalry; on October 6 he is to give his new lecture in Boston. "The Lord permitting," the Colonel proposes to shake up the dry bones of orthodoxy this season.

MR. HOWARD'S CHALLENGE.

On returning to London I find two Leek papers awaiting me, containing letters by the Rev. W. W. Howard. I also read the judicious reference to them written in my absence by Mr. Wheeler. Mr. Howard gives an account of the failure of negotiations for debates between him and myself at Spennymoor and Liverpool. No doubt he means to be fair, but he manages to be very inaccurate. In each case, while I accepted Mr. Howard's proposition, as a matter in which he had a right to satisfy himself, he or his committee insisted on editing my proposition, which of course I declined to let them do. Personally, I do not see that a proposition is necessary. It is generally admitted that man has a body; the point in dispute is whether man has a soul. I am willing to debate that point with Mr. Howard at our mutual convenience. It is idle for him to "challenge" me. I am not a prize-fighter. I neither issue challenges nor accept them. Still, I am open to listen to a courteous invitation to public discussion; and if Mr. Howard really desires me to meet him I have no doubt that we can come to some arrangement. Why not discuss the plain question, "Has Man a Soul?" That could be done without my having to brush off tickets, such as "Materialist," which Mr. Howard is fond of trying to fasten upon me. I invite him to "end all quibbling"—to use his own urbane language—and to say definitely (1) whether he will discuss the aforesaid plain question, or (2) what proposition he wishes to maintain in debate with respect to what he calls "the phenomena of mind." I will then tell him, as I have done before, what proposition I will maintain in respect to those phenomena. But I must warn him that he wastes his time in telling me what I ought to maintain. It would be impertinent on my part if I adopted that attitude towards him.

G. W. FOOTE.

Obituary.

We notice in our American exchanges the deaths of two veteran Freethinkers. Jeremiah Hacker, of Vineland, New Jersey, at one time editor of a Freethought paper, the Pleasure Boat, and who reached the age of ninety-four, was buried without any religious rites. On his wife's tombstone was inscribed the query, "Where is God?" and on his own, "The angry, wrathful Bible God is a myth." Professor James H. Cook, of Columbus, Kansas, was also one who worked well for Freethought in the days of yore. He had reached the age of seventy-six, and was cremated without religious ceremony.

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (August 17).

PLYMOUTH is the great naval station of England. Here are the warships, the docks, and the great machine shops, in which about 5,000 people are employed. There are three municipalities which go to make up what might be termed Plymouth—Plymouth itself, Devonport, and Stonehouse. Stonehouse lies wedged in, as it were, between Plymouth and Devonport. These are in the county of Devonshire, and hence the name of Devonport for a part of the city. The total of this threefold metropolis is 200,000. It has advanced wonderfully since the time of Drake, who sailed forth from this harbor and conquered the Spanish Armada, and decided the fortunes of Protestant England. It is also illustrious as the point whence our Pilgrim Fathers tempted the chances of the unknown sea. I stood upon the very spot where they prayed for the protection of heaven and started on their momentous voyage. On the very stones at my feet are engraved the memorials of this one success amidst a thousand failures. I have much more kindly feeling for the Pilgrim Fathers than for the Boston Puritans. As a matter of history, we must distinguish between the Pilgrims and the Puritans. The Puritans came afterwards, and settled mainly at Boston. The annals of Cape Cod are not so dark and terrible as those of Boston. The Pilgrims were rather kindly in their religious disposition, and exhibited a tolerant spirit; and therefore I am able to render homage to the Pilgrims, while detesting the Puritans and their infamous despotism. Had the Pilgrims been the ruling power in New England history, I do not think we should read its pages now with such blushes of shame and indignation. I cannot believe that those who suffered so much for religious liberty would have ever been so treasonable to its principles as were the severe and cruel Puritans. I will not honor the Puritans. I will hate them with every fibre of my being, unworthy as they were of the leadership of America. Let not the dishonor of the Puritans fall upon the brave and noble Pilgrims. It was not Plymouth, it was Boston, that cursed New England for two hundred years with the reign of a barren and bloody theology.

Hence, as a Freethinker, I was glad to stand upon this historic spot, whence England gave its best life to America.

I enjoyed Plymouth and its surroundings. Here is one of the most beautiful portions of England. The sea views are grand and variable; the bays, the sound, the channel, and the vast, far ocean itself. The landscapes are equally magnificent—the hills stretching away in immense magnitude, fold upon fold, with fields and groves and fair dwellings to the distant horizon. I find a stalwart company of Liberals at Plymouth, who keep the flag flying rain or shine. I am entertained at the hospitable home of Mr. R. S. Smith, who, for many years, has been one of the leading citizens, both at Plymouth and Devonport. He was a staunch supporter of Bradlaugh, and here was the field of some of Bradlaugh's greatest combats and victories. In the early part of his career a warrant was issued for his arrest as a blasphemer while on the point of addressing an audience, but the police-officer was altogether too previous, and laid his hands on Bradlaugh when he had uttered only the customary expression, "Ladies and gentlemen." As this could not be construed into "blasphemy" by any court of justice, an action for "false imprisonment" was open, which Bradlaugh, of course, pushed with his usual legal acumen and success. Determined, however, to utter his sentiments in spite of police and church power, he secured a boat and stood out a little from land, and thundered his speech to vast crowds of people, while the officers of the law stood helplessly by; for it so happened that not Plymouth, but Saltash, by some ancient arrangement, had jurisdiction of the waters to within a few feet of the Devonshire shore, and hence Bradlaugh could not be arrested without a warrant from Saltash. The spirit created by Bradlaugh is prevailing in this community to-day. I gave two lectures on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, July 16 and 17. The weather was somewhat stormy, but I had fair audiences nevertheless. The reception was enthusiastic at both places, for America and England came together where, for the time being, in 1620 the ancestry of both separated for the sake of liberty; and liberty has triumphed, and the two countries are more united than ever, still carrying on the great battle for human rights. At Plymouth I lectured at the Co-operative Hall, a very handsome hall in a beautiful and commodious building. The working people have carried co-operation in England to a wonderful extent and business success. This co-operative society at Plymouth started only a few years ago with seven members and a few pounds capital. It has now a membership of 14,000, and does a business of hundreds of thousands of pounds yearly, and has a big bank account, and money enough to erect one of the most magnificent structures in Plymouth. It borrows money at five per cent. and loans at four per cent., the object of which apparently uncommercial transaction is to give the working man a good chance to invest his money if he has any, and, if not, to borrow at reasonable rates; and the difference in interest is made up by the profits of the trade on the funds invested. Mr. Goodenough is one of the original members of this Association, and has done more for its progress than any other. He is a staunch Freethinker, one of the first to take a stand with Bradlaugh and Holyoake, both for Freethought and co-operation.

With my host, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Pearce, a young friend, of Plymouth, I take a voyage over to Saltash, along the harbor of Devonport, which is alive with craft of almost every kind. But that which principally attracts my attention are the enormous three-deckers. These used to be the crack war vessels of the British navy. It was on one of these three deckers that Nelson went thundering against the enemy. They are no longer of any service, magnificent as they appear. They are now used as training ships. Saltash is a quaint old town, low buildings and narrow, steep streets. It was a climb to get to the top of them, but the open country was lovely, although it was raining at the time. We could see the misty ocean, the various shores, and Mount Edgecombe splendidly towering amidst the clouds and sunshine alternating. We travelled to an ancient monastery, entered the little church, and saw a cowled monk kneel before the crucifix and utter his pater noster and count his beads. How any man could be such a fool in this the nineteenth century I could not understand. It does convince one of the enormous foolishness of the human race to see such an institution as the Church of Rome, with its ten thousand monks and melancholy nuns, flourish and increase. What reward is there for its votaries except a bare and miserable life like that of the poor devotee I looked upon with pity and contempt!

In contrast with the monastery is the huge railroad bridge from Devonshire side to Cornwall, built by Brunell, 150 feet high, a tubular suspension bridge capable of bearing 1,000,000 tons. It is a brilliant triumph of engineering skill, and as we look upon its stupendous framework, so massive and so graceful and so useful, we recover our faith in human nature and its splendid possibilities. Rome must fail, and reason triumph.

Thursday, after the lectures, I had quite a day for sight-seeing with Mr. Smith. First we visited the government shops, where the machines cut iron as if it were wood, the knife going straight through the ponderous masses with irresistible keenness. In these vast shops are built the modern war vessels, the tower ships, the torpedo boats, etc. We are permitted to enter some of these tremendous enginries, and to see how the superb and destructive instruments work, so that no floating timber whatever can resist them, only solid iron and steel. In the afternoon I set sail from the Barbican, which the "Mayflower" touched with her keel, and, landing on the other side of the harbor, am met by Mr. Couch with his carriage, and together we take a drive over the Devonshire hills, where the famous cows roam that give eighteen quarts of milk per day. This is the finest country in the world for cows, the south of England, pleasant and comfortable, with the Gulf stream to keep it warm in winter.

We drive through many winding ways, up the hills, and reach Stadden heights; and here certainly is one of the most beautiful, extensive, and varied views to be seen anywhere on the globe. Before us is the great city itself, with its ten thousand dwellings, its fort, Eddystone light-house, Plymouth Hoe, the hotels, wharves, etc. To the right are Dartmoor and its vast ranges, whence comes the river Plym, which gives the name to the city, the mouth of the Plym. To the left are the vast sheets of water, the port of Devon, by the side of wooded Edgecombe, the outer harbor and the breakwater, which it took thirty years to construct. Beyond the breakwater the English Channel appears, sweeping into bays along the far-circling shores; and in the misty distance rolls the Atlantic itself. And all these shining liquid surfaces are covered with hundreds of ships, fishing-smacks, boats, steamers, sailing-vessels, ponderous ironclads, and magnificent floating palaces, that are voyaging to Australia and America. Fifty miles seaward and fifty miles landward the prospects crowd upon the view. It is not simply the magnitude, but the infinite variety, that attracts. The grandeur and vastness of nature are realised, with the art and glory of man himself. At one moment we can imagine ourselves in absolute isolation, and in the next we are enchanted with the elegance of civilisation.

The old Eddystone Lighthouse was rebuilt and placed upon a public square. I visited this and climbed to the top, and enjoyed the splendid outlook. I also wandered around the old port which held out against the king in Cromwell's time. I looked upon the statue of Sir Francis Drake, one of the mighty sea-gods, or "sea-dogs," of English history, the man of valor and genius, who did more than all the winds of heaven, or a thousand deities, to smash the Spanish Armada and save English soil from foreign foot.

I cannot describe all that I experience at Devonport and Plymouth. They are places of historic association and living beauty. I like the comrades here. Mr. Berry, Mr.

Digitized by Google

James Couch, Mr. Pascor, Mr. Pearce, etc., all are ardent supporters of Freethought and willing to do their share. I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Smith for their generous entertainment. I leave Plymouth with delightful memories. It was the home of Mr. Foote in the days of his youth; and certainly Plymouth is a good place to cultivate the burning thought, and fit one for the arena of freedom.

After Plymouth is Birmingham, great, busy, massive Birmingham; a well-built city. Some say it is the best governed city in the world. However, it costs something. The rates are one shilling and sixpence to the pound. No Yankee could stand that. Birmingham is what you might call an all-round city. It has no specialty like Manchester, Liverpool, or Sheffield. It manufactures almost everything. There is an air of universality about it. It is a ponderous, prodigious combination of all sorts of industrial matters. I like it, and enjoyed my stay to the utmost. There was plenty of life about it. I felt that I was in the heart of a great commonwealth, in the midst of intelligent and go-ahead people. I know, of course, that Birmingham is not right on the political question. It has gone Conservative. But what is politics to business? Politics is on the surface, and there is not so much difference between the parties after all. We will let politics go, and study Birmingham from a business and social point of view; and I must say that, notwithstanding the prognostications of some of my Liberal friends, I have a great deal of faith in Birmingham. It has a population of 500,000. It is always on the increase. It has a vast and splendid country about it. It must ever be the centre of an immense business community. It has a basis of solid and permanent prosperity. Looking at it from a general standpoint, as a traveller and citizen of the world, I must admire Birmingham.

And the Freethinkers here are of the right sort. I never had a better time in my life. I arrived on Friday evening, July 19. I am met at the station by Mr. Taylor, president of the society, Mr. Partridge, secretary, and Mr. Ridgway, an old Freethinker, who has the look and bearing of Bradlaugh himself, and has really been taken for Bradlaugh at times. Mr. H. Lees Sumner, of Shirley, near Birmingham, is also at hand. My first welcome is a most cordial one. I am invited for the time being to accept the hospitality of Mr. Sumner, which I do, and we take an omnibus for Shirley, which is about six miles off; and I thoroughly enjoy the evening ride through the busy and amply-lighted streets of Birmingham into the quiet of the suburbs and the wide prospects of the expanding country. After the stage ride we have a walk through the woods and rural darkness to the bright and shining fireside of my friend, who, in the midst of his intense activities, enjoys the felicity of green fields and secluded gardens. He likes a good long walk after his day's work. I was indeed delighted to be so far out in the country, and revel in almost absolute repose. I was warmly welcomed by Mrs. Sumner; and the little baby, only five weeks old, did not seem to be at all afraid of the Pilgrim. I could rest to my heart's content in this genial home, and did so. I let the sun rise high on Saturday morn before I buckled on the harness. It was somewhat showery, and the masses of cloud hung along the horizon; but the blue sky was not altogether conquered, and dashes of sunlight checkered the scene. I was again on the top of the stage with four horses in front, and the chariot rolled along firmly with the best whip in the country to guide the mettlesome steeds, who seemed to delight in the freshness of the atmosphere and the occasional thunder and lightning.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Ananias.

Mr. Hugh Price Hughes has made his bed, and he must now lie upon it. "A Wesleyan Trustee" pertinently observes in the Times: "As a member of the Wesleyan denomination, I beg to say—and I think most Wesleyans, of whatever party, aware of facts will agree with me—that the Rev. H. P. Hughes's treatment, in your issue of August 11, of Mr. Chamberlain's denial of the charge concerning 'conscription' comes far short of what the case requires. His letter seems an attempt to hide his gross unfairness behind the bugbear of the conscription; but I do not fancy he will succeed. The case against him is too transparent. Two motives obviously suggest themselves: (1) political spite, (2) an advertisement. As Mr. Hughes in his paper is fond, without authority, of speaking as if he were the mouthpiece of Methodism, I would ask outsiders to take his statements until proved representative as only his own. Only on September 10, in your columns, the Rev. Dr. Rigg had flatly to contradict a statement of Mr. Hughes at Grindelwald concerning both Dr. Rigg and the educational policy of Methodism. One so eager to find a common basis for 'Christian' education in our national Board schools should not shrink from boldly acknowledging and apologising for a wrong such as he has done to Mr. Chamberlain. The Wesleyan people have a claim that he will thus do what he can to retrieve his honor."

WHAT PRICE HUGHES?

WISHES are seldom fulfilled with the cheering rapidity which we have just experienced. In a paragraph in "Men and Matters" yesterday, commenting upon the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's statement that it was Mr. W. Pigot-Wood who first connected Mr. Chamberlain with conscription, we said: "We should like now to hear from Mr. Pigot-Wood." No sooner said than done. For in to-day's Times a straightforward letter appears over that gentleman's signature, in which once and for all the career of the idle and mischievous story is terminated. The incident is so instructive that we are tempted to recapitulate. At one of the sittings in the beautiful Swiss valley of Grindelwald, which, of a truth, Providence did not create as a meeting-house for hurried religionists, a discussion was held on old-age pensions. Among the speakers was Mr. W. Pigot-Wood, who made some more or less sensible remarks on the subject, saying, among other things, that he was confident that the scheme which he advocated would, being based upon the principle of self-help as opposed to State-help, receive the careful consideration of Mr. Chamberlain. No word, you observe, of conscription. In the next number of the Methodist Times the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes stated that he had it on very high authority that Mr. Chamberlain was seriously considering the question of introducing conscription into this country. The absurdity of the thing was almost beneath notice, but as the Methodist Times numbers a multitude of readers, not all of whom are thinking persons, its reverend editor was challenged. He, therefore, again repeated the charge, and affirmed that his authority was a speaker at the Grindelwald Conference. "What speaker?" was the next question. "Mr. Pigot-Wood," replies Mr. Hugh Price Hughes. "No," asserts Mr. Pigot-Wood, in this morning's Times, "nothing of the kind." That Mr. Hugh Price Hughes deliberately said the thing that was not, we hesitate to say; but that, in showing such haste to publish fiction and such reluctance to investigate fact, he grossly abuses his position as editor and leader, no one can deny.—Globe.

THE WIDOW'S DEATH-BED.

"In the resurrection, therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them, for the seven had her to wife?"—MARK XII. 23.

THE widow lay on her dying bed,
With candles at foot and candles at head,
And feebly turned to the priest and said:
"Father, good father, my soul to-night,
In an hour, perchance, takes its last long flight;
In an hour, perchance, I shall stand in the light
Of the great white throne, borne down with affright—
For the weight of my sins is crushing me quite;
But deeper than this is my present care,
Deeper the depth of my dark despair,
For my greatest trouble is how I shall fare
When I meet with my various husbands there.
For each of the seven—or was it eight?—
I promised to meet at the great gold gate.
Each, as the death-mist dimmed his eye,
Each, as his soul was about to fly,
With gasping sigh that was half a cry,
Said to me, "Sweetest, you and I
Must part, but 'tis only to meet on high'—
Or some such conventional bathos as this;
And then, with a lingering, ultimate kiss,
They successively started for heavenly bliss.
But, father, the thought that oppresses my soul
Is what will occur when I reach the goal,
And find eight cherubs, in white robes, wait
My coming, at old St. Peter's gate?
Will they, in the shocked archangel's sight,
Disgrace themselves by a stand-up fight?
And if they don't, but agree to share
My charms, will celestial society stare
And turn up its nose? And, oh, need I fear
The unmarried seraphim's maidenly sneer?
And if I flirt with each and all,
Will respectable angels refuse to call?
Will the inner circle around the throne
Begin to talk in a spiteful tone
Of fast young minxes, and purse their lips,
And gather their skirts round sanctified hips,
When we meet to drink water of life in sips?
Will——" here came a cough, a smothering sigh,
A moan—and the lady had gone to try.

—Lucifer.

J. W. DINSDALE.

Minister—"What is a hypocrite?" Boy (mournfully)—"A sky-pilot'."

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

Books Fatal to their Authors (E. Stock, 1895) is the attractive title of a volume of the Book Lover's Library contributed by the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield, M.A., F.S.A., Rector of Barkham. In his preface Mr. Ditchfield refers to his indebtedness to Bayle, Isaac Disraeli, Peignot, etc., but curiously he does not mention the English work, Books Condemned to be Burnt, by J. A. Farrer, nor Mr. A. Hart's Index of the Works Prohibited in England. Nonetheless, Mr. Ditchfield has compiled a book which is at once erudite and readable, and deserves praise for his industry, if not his impartiality, in setting forth his materials.

* * *

Mr. Ditchfield at the outset has to mention that "by far the larger number of fatal books deal with these subjects of Theology and Religion." "Liberty of conscience," says the writer, "was a thing unknown in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and while we prize that liberty as a priceless possession, we can but admire the constancy and courage of those who lived in less happy days. We are not concerned now in condemning or defending their opinions or their beliefs, but we may at least praise their boldness and mourn their fate."

* * *

After this we should hardly have expected to find that the next chapter is entitled "Fanatics and Freethinkers." Why these are lumped together, and Servetus ranked as a theologian, while Toland, Woolston, and Biddle are ranked among "Fanatics and Freethinkers," and Bruno, Diderot, and Vanini classed under Science and Philosophy, is, we suppose, to be explained from the author's clerical standpoint.

* * *

This comes out peculiarly in what he says of Diderot, and still more in his remarks on Vanini. He says of the latter: "Not content with his Christian name, Lucilio, he assumed the grandiloquent and high-sounding cognomen of Julius Cesar, wishing to attach to himself some of the glory of the illustrious founder of the Roman Empire." Had Mr. Ditchfield consulted Signor Palumbo's Life of Giulio Cesare Vanini, he might have discovered that Vanini went by his baptismal name; and, anyway, a gentleman of Mr. Ditchfield's learning should know that the name was not uncommon in that age. Really, a Christian minister might pause before sneering at an Atheist, even if the sneer be justified, when he remembers that Christians burnt him for his opinions. Mr. Ditchfield is also wrong in insinuating that Vanini was burnt by the Inquisition. It was not the Inquisition, but the Parliament of Toulouse, which was responsible.

* * *

If Mr. Ditchfield had consulted Mr. Wheeler's Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers, he might have found many other cases of books fatal to their authors. Among names omitted there are, for instance, taking Englishmen only, Paul Best, Dr. William Coward, Colonel John Fry, Charles Blount, Peter Annet, George Houston, and Robert Taylor.

* * *

We do not like to leave a work like that of Mr. Ditchfield's in a fault finding spirit, and we must say that, notwithstanding some obvious defects, we regard it as an acquisition. Despite a light and almost jocular tone which pervades the work, the writer is evidently full of sympathy with the calamities of authors, and he concludes his book with expressing a hope that some day we may see a Literary College, where those who have borne the burden and heat of the day may rest secure from all anxieties and worldly worries when the evening shadows of life fall around.

* * *

Messrs. Methuen & Co. will publish next month Mrs. W. K. Clifford's A Flash of Summer, to which she has given the second title of "The Story of a Simple Woman's Life."

* * *

The editor of Blackie's Home and School Library has selected for the latest volume of the series Harriet Martineau's Feats on the Fiord. Though written many years ago, it is a story of perennial interest, and should find numerous admirers among the many thousands who have in recent times explored the land of the midnight sun. Norwegian life and character are vividly portrayed by Miss Martineau, who had the rare gift of describing with a graphic pen everything as she found it. Miss Martineau was one of the ablest of women Freethinkers, and, though her Freethought does not appear in this work, she touched nothing she did not adorn.

A little girl of four years, who was staying with an aunt, was made to eat something she did not like; and, on being told to give thanks for it, the child folded her hands and said, "Thank God it's over."

ABRAHAM AND EPHRAIM.

He sermonised industriously in his didactic way,
And moralised momentously with Ephraim every day,
And taught by tale and proverb and by every good device
The virtuousness of virtue and the viciousness of vice.

His hortatory homilies, intended to impress
The rightfulness of righteousness, the sin of sinfulness,
Were ever hurled at Ephraim throughout the whole year long,
That he might rightly comprehend the wrongfulness of wrong.

"A youth can grow up virtuous, if we but pay the price;
If we but saturate his soul with showers of advice;
If we instil," said Abraham, "perpetual truth in him—"
And so in truth perpetually he soaked young Ephraim.

The youth absorbed a sermon, every morning ere he ate,
On the awful reprobation of the awful reprobate;
And he swallowed moral theses that were meant to edify,
And he masticated maxims with his gingerbread and pie.

And 'twixt breakfast time and dinner the iniquity of sin
Was taught to him industriously and patiently rubbed in;
The turpidness of turpitude was duly analysed,
And the evil of depravity was loudly advertised.

And then, right after dinner, the enormity of crime
And the wrong of immorality was preached till supper time;
Then Abraham would sermonise through all the evening hours,
And drench young Ephraim's consciousness in moralistic showers.

Thus through cumulative precept did old Abraham desire
Accumulative virtue should young Ephraim acquire;
He taught him virtue endlessly, and waited long to see
How superlatively virtuous young Ephraim would be.

The maxim-goaded Ephraim found righteousness a bore,
For salve is but an irritant when jammed into a sore;
Even bread is innutritious if you resolutely cram
An indiscriminate bakery down the bursting diaphragm.

Thus by hortatory homilies did Abraham impress
The wrongfulness of righteousness, the good of sinfulness;
And taught by tale and proverb, and by every good device,
The viciousness of virtue and the virtuousness of vice.

Hence, Ephraim lived a reckless life and died a felon's death,
But gave this vindication with his latest dying breath:
"I have been sermonised to death; I die, to speak precise,
An unprotected victim of perpetual advice."

—Boston Globe. SAM WALTER FOSS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—With respect to the Rev. W. W. Howard's "challenge" in last week's Freethinker, I have to state that the terms therein set forth are identical with those put forward by that gentleman in Liverpool nearly two years ago. By Mr. Foote's instructions, I informed him that Mr. Foote declined to label himself "Materialist," or to allow Mr. Howard to state his position for him. Consequently Mr. Howard knows full well that his present challenge would not be accepted. Probably that is the reason he throws it out. Mr. Howard has published a pamphlet at 3d. on the subject. If he charges for the blunders it contains, it is very cheap; if for its reliable information, then it is about the dearest threepennyworth I know of.

CHARLES DOEG.

Bishop—"Do you think it is right to partake of this hash on Friday?" Low Church Clergyman—"Entirely orthodox; it is composed of the thirty-nine articles."

St. Peter—"What have you got in that grip, young man?" New arrival—"Oh, I thought I would come prepared for anything, so I just brought an asbestos suit along."

Willy Wiggins—"Will you please tell me where the text was dis morning?" The Pastor—"Why, certainly, my little man. The second chapter of John, the fourth verse. I am pleased to know that one so young is so anxious to remember my text." Willy Wiggins—"Yes; I played hookey from church dis morning, and dad allers asks me der text, to see whedder I was dere or not."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, G. W. Foote, "Bible or No Bible in the Schools."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, Lantern Lecture by L. Hewitt. Tuesday, at 8, social for members and friends. Thursday, at 8, business meeting.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, C. James will lecture.

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, F. J. Gould, "William Blake, the Poet."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, F. A. Davies, "The Whitewashing of Jesus."

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, A. B. Moss, "A New Age of Reason."

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.15, S. E. Easton, "Bible Celebrities."

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, Stanley Jones will lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, S. R. Thompson, "Is the Bible True?" Monday, at 8, debate between Messrs. Jones and Williams on "The Creation."

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11.15, E. Calvert, "Does the Bible Sanction Slavery, and is it Woman's Friend?" 3.15, "The Soul."

HAMMERSMITH BROADWAY (Middlesex side): 7, T. Thurlow, "Scepticism: Is it Criminal?" Thursday, at 8.30, Stanley Jones will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, T. Thurlow. "The Bible and Science": 3.30, "Did Jesus Rise from the Dead?" Wednesday, at 8, Stanley Jones will lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, A. Guest, "The Two Adams."

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, S. E. Easton will lecture.

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, Stanley Jones will lecture.

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, a lecture.

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "Christ's Fables."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, a lecture.

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 3, S. R. Thompson will lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15, St. John will lecture; 3, S. R. Thompson will lecture.

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, C. James, "The Philosophy of Atheism"; 7, a lecture. Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, C. Cohen, "The French Revolution—Part I."; 7, "Is it Reasonable to Believe in God?"

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion class—G. Faulkner. "Holy Moses"; 6.30, soirée in commemoration of the anniversary of Charles Bradlaugh's birthday.

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school.

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, Tontine Society; 7, J. Roberts, "Reason Only."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): See Friday's Evening News.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, W. Heaford, "God and the Problem of Evil"; 3, "The Futility of Prayer"; 7, "A Better Creed than Christianity."

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 11, Charles Watts, "The Revolution of Modern Thought"; 3, "The Gospels as Dramatic Literature"; 7, "Christian Evidences: A Theological Fallacy." Tea at 5.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King street): 7, a reading.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, important meeting.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BRADFORD (Open Market, James-street): 6.30, A. W. Oxley, "Jehovah and the Brotherhood of Man."

BIRMINGHAM: Monday, at 8, C. Cohen will lecture at the Five Ways; Wednesday, at the Bull Ring; Saturday, at Smithfield Market.

DERBY (Market-place): 10.45, Mr. Briggs, "The 'Christian' Socialism Delusion."

SOUTH SHIELDS (Market Place): 3, W. Cook, "Morality from a Freethought Standpoint."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—September 22, Birmingham.

STANLEY JONES, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London, N.—Sept. 22, m. Kingsland, e. Deptford; 25, Hyde Park; 26, Hammersmith; 29, m. Victoria Park, a. Finsbury Park, e. Kilburn.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London, S.E.—Sept. 22, Camberwell; 29, Westminster. October 6, Camberwell; 20, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

T. THURLOW, 350 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 22, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith; 29, e. Edmonton.

Just published, price 1d., by post 1½d.,

DISCREDITABLE TACTICS OF CHRISTIAN DISPUTANTS.

BY CHARLES WATTS.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

64 pp., price 3d., by post 4d.,

THE

HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE.

WITH A

FULL AND TRUE ACCOUNT

OF

"THE LEEDS ORGIES."

EDITED, WITH INTRODUCTION,

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Handsomely bound in cloth, post free 7s. 6d.,

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

OF

FREETHINKERS OF ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY

J. M. WHEELER.

"The Dictionary has involved enormous labor, and the compiler deserves the thanks of the Freethought party."—National Reformer.

"The work will be of the greatest value."—Freethought.

"At last we have the long-wanted means of silencing those Christians who are continually inquiring for our great men, asserting that all great men have been on the side of Christianity."—Truthseeker (New York).

"The most important Freethought work published this year."—De Dageraad (Amsterdam).

"A good and useful work that was much needed."—Commonweal.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

FOR SALE, Cheap.—A number of Freethought Works by Bradlaugh, Foote, Moss, etc. Also bound volumes of the National Reformer, etc. Send for list to Alpha, Freethinker office.

APARTMENTS to Let for a Single Gentleman. Terms moderate. Situated in North-west London. Near the "Brecknock Arms." Address, W. J., care of 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Mockery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

A CHAPTER FROM

Strauss's Original "Life of Jesus."

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

G. W. FOOTE.

(A Most Thorough Analysis and Exposure of the Gospel Story by a Master Hand.)

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

196 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 33, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendell" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 3d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Price Twopence,

Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

A Demonstration of the Biblical Doctrine of Devils, suitable for circulation among Christians.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments.

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

Digitized by Google

BRUNO CLOTH

FOR LADIES' WINTER DRESSES.

This Cloth has been our leading Winter Dress Material for four years. Thousands of ladies have tried it, and, so far as we know, everybody has been satisfied. One lady last winter sold thirty-five Dress Lengths among her friends.

IN ALL THE FASHIONABLE SHADES.
PLAIN COLORS.

Price—

9s. 6d. per Dress Length

till the end of September, as an advertisement. After that date, 10s. 6d. per dress length.

LOT 11

CONTAINS

1 pair of All-Wool Blankets
1 pair of Bed Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-cloth.

In spite of wool having gone up very much in price, we sell at the old figure,

21/-

CARRIAGE PAID.

THINK OF THE COLD WEATHER AND THINK OF LOT 11.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.
DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.
THE GODS. 6d.
REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.
ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.
CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 8d.
ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 8d.
ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.
PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.
HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.
ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.
TRUE RELIGION. 2d.
THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.
LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.
IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.
LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.
GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.
FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
THE DYING CREED. 2d.
THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.
THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.
ART AND MORALITY. 2d.
DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.
THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.
SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.
SKULLS. 2d.
THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.
LIVE TOPICS. 1d.
MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.
REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.
REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.
CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.
CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumours and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free 1½d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 2d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 3d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 3s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 39. SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

BLIND BELIEF.

CARDINAL MANNING was a bitter opponent of Charles Bradlaugh, who had committed the unpardonable crime of thinking for himself, and of thinking to considerable purpose. When the Atheist member for Northampton was endeavoring to take the seat to which he had an indisputable right in the House of Commons, and from which he was debarred by the mere brute force of a temporary majority of law-breakers, Cardinal Manning wrote the most passionate articles against him in one of the leading monthlies. The red-hatted Romanist implored the House of Commons not to admit an Atheist. He predicted something like national ruin if a notorious "infidel" were allowed to sit with "the gentlemen of England." The Cardinal, in fact, simply foamed with rage at the bare idea of an Atheist being entitled—even in this world—to the common rights of citizenship. In the end, however, the Cardinal had to digest the venom of his spleen as he could, for Charles Bradlaugh took his seat and filled it with great distinction.

Cardinal Manning was succeeded at Westminster by Cardinal Vaughan, who was previously Bishop of Salford. It was this gentleman, we believe, who, on the death of Darwin, rather rejoiced to think that the great evolutionist was "burning in hell." Such a bigot is capable of anything in the way of intolerance. If he had his way, the population of hell would soon be increased by the addition of every independent thinker on this planet.

"His Eminence," as they call this underling of the "Servant of the servants of God" at Rome, recently paid a visit to Formby, where he preached a special sermon at High Mass in the Church of Our Lady. His text was taken from the Romish edition of the Epistle to the Hebrews: "My just man liveth by faith." His first comment was an explanation of "just." What the world regards as a just man was not necessarily a just man in the eyes of God. "A man might be temperate, pure, just, and pay his lawful debts," he observed, "yet that man might be eternally lost." Men could only be saved by faith—which is evidently a very different thing from temperance, purity, justice, and honor. These are only "natural virtues," and without "supernatural virtues," which are born of faith, they lead us straight to the bottomless pit, which we shall find cram-full of people who were guilty of the one horrid and unpardonable crime of being unable to believe the teachings of Cardinal Vaughan. No doubt it was some such idea that prompted the judgment of the gentleman who was asked which of the two great places of future residence he preferred, and who replied: "Heaven for climate, and Hell for company."

This "faith" being so very precious—especially to the Church which lives upon it—ought certainly to be guarded with iron-clad shutters. Accordingly, the Cardinal told the faithful that, however wide they might open their mouths, they should take care to shut their eyes, or they might see things to give them "the headache called thought in the brain." Perhaps we had better give the Cardinal's own words, as reported in the Southport Visitor:—

> "He had heard many non-Catholic friends and some Catholics say: 'Why should I not read books written by Rationalists and Agnostics, and articles in various reviews written by men who professed to be perfectly hostile to the Catholic religion and to revelation? Why should I not read the works of Huxley, of Spencer, and of many others who might be named? They are written in the public journals of the country, and are found on the tables of nearly all educated men. Surely, if my faith is true, I can easily afford to read whatever may be written by the hand of man. Is my faith so feeble that it may not be exposed to the Rationalistic arguments and the Agnostic literature of the day?' This was an extremely fallacious argument. Why should they treat the virtue of faith in a way in which they would not dare to treat other virtues, say those of honesty and chastity? Would a merchant not at once suspect, and soon get rid of, a clerk who, while professing that his honesty remained perfect as proved by his record, yet persisted, as a new departure, in consorting with swindlers, gamblers, or pickpockets, just because he said their ways interested or pleased him? In the same way, would not parents remonstrate with, and feel poignant grief concerning, a daughter who, while declaring her intention to continue in the chastity to which she had been educated, resolved to pass her leisure in the company of so-called 'gay' companions of both sexes? The honesty of the clerk and the chastity of the daughter would each suffer under such habits and temptations, and so there was danger for the faith of those who permitted themselves to be entangled with the arguments and the doubts of the Rationalist or the Agnostic. It was all very well if, in the course of their duty, some of them were called upon to examine the writings of the Rationalist or the Agnostic in order to refute them; in that case God would protect their faith, but, otherwise, they would probably find themselves in a net from which extrication was well nigh impossible. They would begin by giving up this doctrine or that, until their faith might depart entirely, and, perhaps, never to be regained."

Practically, the Cardinal places Freethinkers in the same category with swindlers, gamblers, and pickpockets; which is the natural result of crying down charity and crying up faith. Practically, too, he admits the contention of the great Cardinal Newman, that faith can never withstand the solvent power of reason, and that the only way to save it is to keep it from all contact with its enemy. So far we thank him for his candor. It is a warning to all outsiders, that if they once become Catholics they must forswear the use of their reason for ever afterwards.

The rest of the Cardinal's argument is founded on the assumption that an inclination to reason on matters of religion is a kind of disease. He argues with people not to exercise their intelligence. He reasons against reason. He stimulates them to remain quiescent. He implores them to think of the evils of thinking. In short, he renounces his own principles in the very act of commending them; and thus, on his own showing, he was playing the fool from the beginning to the end of his sermon.

Perhaps the Cardinal reckons himself among those who are "called upon" to examine the writings of Agnostics, but his faith is under divine protection! We should rather put it in this way. A layman, who supports the Church, might have his eyes opened by Freethought literature; and that is a deadly danger. But a priest, who lives on the Church, is not likely to "blow the gaff," whatever he discovers.

Cardinal Vaughan's "disease" argument is a relic of the old "gangrene" theory, by which his Church justified the extermination of heretics, the burning of whom was only the amputation of a rotten member in the interest of the remainder of the body. Thus the language of faith is always the language of persecution. Those who trample on reason will also trample on humanity.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

HOLY KISSING.

"Salute one another with an holy kiss."—ROMANS xvi. 16.

"His kissing is as full of sanctity as the touch of holy bread."—SHAKESPEARE, As You Like It (iii. 4).

"Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss.
Her lips suck forth my soul!"
—MARLOW, The Tragical History of Dr. Faustus (last scene).

"'Tis certain," said Dick Steele of kissing, "Nature was its author, and that it began with the first courtship." But this is incorrect. 'Tis certain that to many human tribes kissing is unknown. Instead of saying "kiss me," they say "smell me," and this, doubtless, represents an earlier form of salutation. The kiss is much later than the dance. It is still unknown among many races, and may be called conventional. I am not sure that it does not develop from sucking, licking, smelling, and spitting. Some nations yet smell and rub noses, like horses, in salutations; and, where two Frenchmen will run and kiss each other, two Central Africans will deliberately spit, by way of friendly greeting. Dr. Tylor says: "The idea of the kiss being an instinctive gesture is negatived by its being unknown over half the world, where the prevailing salute is that by smelling or sniffing, which belongs to Polynesians, Malays, Burmese, and other Indo-Chinese, Mongols, etc., extending thence to the Eskimo, and westward to Lapland, where Linnæus saw relatives saluting by putting their noses together."

The kiss is the salute by tasting, and it has to be taught to children. Preyer, in his excellent book, The Mind of the Child, states that, at first, they are averse to, and even fearful of, the performance. However this may be, it is certain that Europeans speedily take to it as though to the manner born.

Osculations were far more common in the good old times than at present. The custom which most delighted Erasmus, when in England, was that the girls all kissed him. When ceasing to be performed, some of these ceremonies leave their trace in language. Thus both Austrians and Spaniards say, "I kiss your hands," as a polite term for returning thanks. John Bunyan was a very different man from Erasmus, and in his Grace Abounding he says: "The common salutation of women I abhor; it is odious to me in whosoever I see it." And to those who defended it as the holy kiss he pertinently asked "Why they did salute the most handsome, and let the ill-favored go?"

Sugar plums and sweets for perfuming the breath were formerly called "kissing-comfits." Falstaff alludes to them in The Merry Wives of Windsor. When embracing Mrs. Ford, he exclaims: "Let it thunder to the tune of green sleeves, hail kissing-comfits, and snow eringoes."

It was an ancient custom to throw kisses towards the images of the gods, and towards the sun and moon (see 1 Kings xix. 18; Hosea xiii. 2). Job says he was never guilty of this last lovely rite of nature-worship. It would, in his eyes, have been an iniquity "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness. And my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand" (xxxi. 27).

The early Christians kept kissing as a sign of fellowship. "Greet all the brethren with an holy kiss," says Paul (1 Thess. v. 26). But Christians now-a-days no more think of conforming to this than to Christ's injunction to wash the feet of their fellow disciples.

Kissing in church, at marriage, was formerly part of the service itself, as appears from a Sarum missal. Thus Petruchio, in Taming of the Shrew (iii. 2),

Took the bride about the neck,
And kissed her lips with such a clamorous smack
That, at the parting, all the church did echo.

The parson used to claim the first kiss. "Please, sir," said a yokel who objected to "maimed rites," "ye've no kissed Molly." Sometimes brides have been known to take the initiative. This is a relic of a still earlier rite, that of the jus primæ noctes, and this again of polyandry. It's a long way off, too remote to be dangerous, but one who has traced the evolution of kissing along "footsteps of the past" will hardly permit a parson or a groomsman to kiss his bride. It calls up too many horrible reminiscences. In the sixteenth century balls were usually opened with a kissing dance. It was called "a brawl," and, like many other dances, really represented old rites of a day when gesture was the only means of transmitting knowledge. The brawl got broken up, and only relics can be found in children's games.

The Catholic Church, which preserves so many interesting relics of old superstitions, has many kissing ceremonies. Thus in the rite of High Mass the altar is kissed ten times, and nine times in Low Mass, the ten being a masculine, and the nine a feminine, symbol. In China the person admitted to the presence of the celestial emperor prostrates himself nine times, each time beating his head against the ground.

The kiss of peace was given by all communicants in the early ages of the Church, but it led to so many scandals that Pope Innocent III. abolished the rite, and to-day the priest kisses a metal plate known as pax, or peace, which is handed down to all the acolytes in turn. Those who will may trace in this a resemblance to Indian rites of the Sákti Puja, as performed by the ancient left-handed worshippers. When the Pope administers the Holy Communion, the partakers kiss the fisherman's ring before receiving it. Bishop's rings are also kissed at the rites of confirmation, when the girl receives her first communion. When cardinals receive from the Pope sashes or palm-leaves, they kiss his hands, and the priest kisses the palm branch as he passes it on. The aspersor of the holy water is also kissed. At grand masses the faithful used to kiss the hand of the priest when he brought the sacred wafer. Now they kiss the paten, but the deacon kisses the hand of the priest whenever he receives anything from him.

The emperor, Caligula, roused the spirit of free Romans by requiring the kissing of the foot. This, everyone knows, is done continually to the Pope. Of course the toe is not now kissed, but an embroidered cross on the slipper. But why is the cross there? Suppose it placed in the still less reverential part indicated by Rabelais. The kissing of the toe was an old rite paid to the Roman Pontifex Maximus, and in that capacity Julius Cæsar held out his foot to Pompeius Pænus to kiss in a slipper embroidered with gold. This, too, was the practice of the Arch Druid in Gaul.

The Persian kings in this, like the present Pope, only accorded the privilege of kissing their feet to highly-privileged persons. In the East the kiss of homage is usually given on the hands, sometimes on the knees. In Greece, in classic times, it was customary to kiss the hand, breast, or knee of a superior.

In Theophile Gautier's Constantinople of To-day there is an account of the ceremony of kissing the Sultan's toe, an honor which is reserved for the vizier, ministers, and certain privileged pashas. This act of homage is performed with the utmost solemnity, being, in fact, the recognition of the Caliph as God's vicegerent—the Shadow of Allah on earth.

Probably the most disgusting ceremony of fetish-kissing still extant in Europe is that of kissing, in courts of justice, the holy book, whose greasy covers have been thumbed and bealobbered by all the lowest rascals. Those with self-respect usually open the book at a clean page, if possible, and pretend to kiss it. There is a well-known dodge of intending perjurers to kiss their thumbs instead, there being a popular superstition that if kissing the actual book can be avoided the false witness escapes the risk of incurring the charge of perjury.

J. M. WHEELER.

MORAL ASPECTS OF THE CREATION AND FLOOD STORIES.

(Concluded from page 595.)

THE second chapter of Genesis informs us that God made Eve without endowing her with a knowledge of good and evil, the same as he had previously done with man. But she was more curious than Adam, and apparently went in search of what was necessary for the improvement of herself and her posterity. The serpent, beyond doubt, showed his good taste in making her the medium of introducing knowledge into the world. The superiority of some women's perceptive powers over those of many men is a well-known fact in the history of our race. Eve at once saw what was "good and pleasant," and, in spite of God's prohibition, she was not to be deprived of such a blessing as the tree of knowledge afforded. Thus, while God made the "mother of us all," it was left to the "evil one" to bring her intellectual powers into useful activity. This certainly was the noblest act recorded in this creation myth.

Digitized by Google

But we fail to see the moral aspect of a story which states as "God's truth" that woman was made from the rib of a man. The writer overlooked the fact that some day the anatomist would expose the fallacy of the allegation that God took from Adam "one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof." Had this been true, it is only reasonable to expect that the supposed descendants of Adam would either have one rib less than the daughters of Eve, or that some anatomical indication would have remained showing that a rib had gone. This, however, is not the case, for the number of ribs is the same in man and in woman, each having twelve on either side of the sternum, or breast-bone; and in the male body there is no evidence that it ever had less in number than it now possesses. It has been said that probably God had an extra rib, with which he replaced the one he had taken away. If this were so, it would make the story still more absurd, for in that case God might have made the woman from the spare rib, and thus have saved Adam from undergoing a surgical operation. But this delusion is on a par with the statement that man was made from "the dust of the ground," which chemists have shown to be untrue; and that the world was created in six days, which geologists flatly contradict. For ages these stories were believed to be true, but the facts of science have proved that they belong to the realm of theological fiction.

Of course scientific men may have sometimes been in error in their speculations, but no mistakes in the investigations of science can affect the lack of morality in the story of the creation. It comes to us, not as a guess at truth or as an approximate explanation of events, but as a record of verities given under the influence of "Divine inspiration." It surely cannot be moral to teach as positive truth that which is manifestly false. The pretension that this creation story is based upon fact can only be attributed to gross ignorance or to wilful fraud; and those Christians to-day who seek to perpetuate the error, when it has been amply demonstrated to be such, deserve the severest condemnation. It is a violation of ethical duty, and an unjustifiable attempt to deceive those who are, unfortunately, credulous and ignorant enough to believe the fictitious account.

The story of the Flood is equally false, and quite as destitute of moral aspects, as that of the creation. It presents a sad culmination of the first act in the God-created tragedy. The story is that God made man pure, and that he not only gave him the special advantage of divine superintendence, but subsequently he afforded him the "edification" of the preaching of Noah, who is described as being "perfect in his generation," although "he drank of the wine and was drunken," and when found by "Ham, the father of Canaan," in an immodest condition, he (Noah) exclaimed: "Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren." Evidently sobriety, decency, and justice were not necessary features of a perfect man in the days of Noah. Still, notwithstanding the precautions which the Hebrew narrative says God took to prevent mankind from degenerating, the race became so bad that the Lord repented "that he had made man, and it grieved him at his heart." It is stated that God is infinite in power, wisdom, and goodness; yet he either could not, or would not, devise a plan of reformation for the human race, but, instead, he resolved upon wholesale destruction, and drowned them all except one family. This was a terrible resolve, opposed alike to ethical justice and to every feeling of benevolence. No being with a spark of humanity in his nature would be guilty of voluntarily exposing millions of creatures—men, women, and children—to the agonies and struggles of a watery grave. Surely an omnipotent God could have found other means to correct the work of his own hands without bringing "a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven." Besides, as a remedy and a warning, the cold-water process proved a failure, for the people are reported as having been no better after the deluge than they were before it. What can be said of the God who was the chief actor in such a great calamity—an event so fearfully cruel and so revolting that one "cannot think of it without horror, nor contemplate it without dismay"? How can we reconcile the drowning of a whole world with the principle of goodness and morality? Suppose that the wickedness of man was great upon the earth, was that any reason for destroying every chance of repentance upon their part? What should we say of an earthly despot who acted in a like manner? The cruelty and supreme wickedness of the action thus attributed to God has never been paralleled, or even approached, by the greatest monster the world has yet seen; and on the part of infinite power the action must partake of the character of the actor, and become infinite in its immorality. Because some men were wicked, was it therefore just to overwhelm in a common destruction the son with the sire, the little child who had not yet learned to do wrong with those who were alleged to be the real offenders?

The mere act of destroying "all flesh wherein is the breath of life" is immoral, by whomsoever it is performed. In the Bible story of the flood it was not a case of accidental drowning, or an unexpected downpour of rain, greater in magnitude than had ever before been experienced; it was a deliberately planned act of divine vengeance upon nearly all the unfortunate creatures who were then living. And what is the assigned reason for this inhuman slaughter? Simply that the people were no better than their God-made nature allowed them to be. If God's work did not prove to be as good as he expected, whose fault was that? Not man's, for St. Paul says: "Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor? What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endureth with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction?" (Romans ix.). But what of the lower animals? Was "every imagination of the thoughts" of their hearts "evil continually"? It appears that the only cause of their punishment was that they were found in bad company, and, therefore, they had to pay the penalty for being in that condition of life in which it had pleased God to place them. If in the days of Noah there had existed a society "for the prevention of cruelty to animals," its officials would have had just grounds for taking action against—well, someone. Truly the Lord "moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

The moral weakness involved in these stories of the creation and the flood is indeed great. They both present aspects opposed to reason and to the teachings of ethical science. Here we have an "immutable" God who repents, an "omniscient" God who is grieved, an "omnipotent" God who did not prevent an evil, and an "all-good" God who punished young and old, innocent and guilty, without any discrimination. Finally, we have the "great father of all" taking offence at the conduct of his own children, who were brought up under his own guidance and control, and, instead of tenderly and lovingly correcting their errors, drowning them as if they were so many vermin. If men to-day were no better than the Bible God is represented to be, we should have no faith in the service of humanity. We hope, however, that the growth of morality, based upon an enlightened view of man and of nature, will ere long entirely destroy the belief in such a God. And when the day arrives that this hope shall be realised, an unmixed blessing will be secured by the human family. Then moral men will no longer tolerate immoral gods.

CHARLES WATTS.

CASTING OUT DEVILS IN IRELAND.

ANYONE who knows what the Irish peasantry were, and are, was not surprised at the witch-burning atrocity which shocked the civilised world this year. The Catholic Irish, and indeed almost all the inhabitants of the Sacred Isles, are sunk in the most abject superstitions, and only want opportunity to revive the worst atrocities of the Middle Ages. Take the following case, which lies well within the present century: In 1820 much interest was excited in Catholic countries by the alleged miracles of Prince Hohenlohe, Bishop of Sardica. "In England a Miss O'Connor, a nun, had been cured of a swelling in her arms by the spiritual assistance of the prince, and some enthusiastic women in Ireland believed that they were relieved by a similar process. One young lady was restored to her speech, having been previously dumb; and another literally took up her bed and walked."

Digitized by Google

It occurred to the Rev. John Carroll, parish priest of Forth, in the County of Wexford, to rival the Episcopal prince. Carroll was a man of striking appearance and much intelligence. His error was that he believed his Bible, and wished to follow its teachings, which few Christians, happily for themselves and others, attempt to do. He read in Mark xvi. 17: "These signs shall follow them that believe. In my name shall they cast out devils." And he considered it his duty to obey the command. "He argued with subtlety upon wrong (!) premises, and his applications of various passages in the holy writings were ingenious, however mistaken. It was in vain that he was told that the power of Satan to possess himself of human bodies ceased with the revelation of Christian truth" (a doctrine certainly not consistent with Church History or Scripture). "He appealed to the Acts of the Apostles, and to incidents subsequent to the death of our Savior, to establish his favorite speculation." A medical man, with whom he was intimate, resorted to sedative medicines to avert the progress of what he considered incipient insanity; though why Carroll should be considered insane for following the example and commands of Jesus, "whose he was and whom he served," is hard to understand.

One Sunday, after performing Mass, he suddenly announced that he was endowed with miraculous powers, and demanded of the congregation whether anyone knew of a possessed person on whom he could test his powers. He was informed that a laborer named Neill was confined to bed, and, "being convinced that he was possessed by an evil spirit, proceeded to effect the removal of the enemy." Followed by a large crowd, he went to the sufferer's cottage, "which he had no sooner entered than he precipitated himself upon the sick man." . . . A severe pommelling was the process of exorcism, which he regarded as most effectual. After a long struggle he declared that he had secured the evil spirit, and would plunge him into the Red Sea; but, as that water was not handy, the reverend gentleman, looking, as one witness expressed it, "as if he held the devil by the tail," marched "with a measured pace and a mysterious aspect" to a bridge over the river Staney, where he buried the captive demon as Christ buried the possessed pigs in the Sea of Galilee.

Neill, however, like Mary Magdalene, had seven more devils, whom Carroll proposed to exorcise by similar means. "The operation was accordingly repeated with such success that Neill (who perhaps was more lazy than ill), after much strenuous expostulation, leaped out of his bed and declared that he was quite well." This success encouraged Carroll to perform other acts of mercy. "A poor woman happened to pass along the road, whom he had no sooner observed than he knocked her down and proceeded to exorcise her, to such good effect that one of the spectators cried out for the people to make way, 'as he saw the devil coming out.'" His next miracle, however, put a stop to his career as a thaumaturgus for ever. An unfortunate child in the neighborhood, named Sinnott, suffered from fits, which Carroll, like the founder of Christianity (Mark ix. 20), attributed to a devil. Followed by a crowd of admirers, he went to the cabin, and entered the room where the little girl was lying. He called for a tub of water, threw salt into it, and inverted it over the child, uttering the prayer: "Bury him (i.e., the devil), Jesus, in the depth of the Red Sea." The monster then danced on the bottom of the tub, while the wretched victim shrieked, "Mammy, mammy, save me"; and all the people, including the child's father, "knelt down and prayed." The natural result was that the little girl, whose throat was crushed by the edge of the tub, soon died. "Why did you not interfere to save your child's life?" was asked of Sinnott at the trial. "I thought," said the wretched fanatic, "that, even if his reverence killed her, he would bring her to life again." But stay—was not this the faith of Abraham "accounting that God was able to raise" (his child) "up, even from the dead"! (Hebrews xi. 17). Sinnott was a true "child of Abraham," and a good Christian after all.

Carroll was tried for murder at the Wexford Assizes on August 24, 1824, and acquitted on the ground of insanity. Of course, this meant his incarceration for life in a criminal lunatic asylum. It is hard to see why Carroll was more insane than Jesus, who on one occasion nearly killed a boy by his incantations (Mark ix. 24); or than Peter, who struck two persons dead (Acts v.); or than Paul, who deprived a man of his sight (xiii. 11); but the Irish priest was unlucky in his environment.

The above narrative, contained in The Newgate Calendar, vol. iv., p. 378, etc., might have seemed incredible a year ago; but we have since seen a poor epileptic woman roasted to death by her husband in the presence of her father, relatives, and neighbors, in the same island, in conformity with the teaching of the same atrocious religion, which is still professed, though not practised, in all its enormities, in most civilised lands. We can only say with the Roman poet,

Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum, with the comment that the most atrocious "religio"—the "religio" of the Inquisition, whose victims numbered millions—was yet to appear when Lucretius wrote. Well does Bacon remark: "The poet, when he beheld the act of Agamemnon that could endure the sacrificing of his own daughter, exclaimed [as above]. What would he have said had he known of the massacre in France (St. Bartholomew's, or the powder treason of England)? He would have been seven times more epicure and atheist than he was" (Essay on Unity in Religion).

JAMES RICHARDSON.

SONS OF GOD.

"And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose."—GENESIS vi. 1, 2.

DEARLY-BELOVED BRETHREN,—Several important inquiries are suggested by the profound text of Scripture which I have taken for the theme of my discourse. In the first place, who were the sons of God? How came it to pass that a bachelor deity had sons? Presuming they were sons by adoption, were they men or angels? Various learned theologians have given their views on these momentous questions, and, before passing my own judgment, these may be briefly adverted to.

The old Samaritan version of Genesis, supported by the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, represents the sons of God as really earthly high-born men, who took mates from women of the lower classes. It will be noticed the sons chose, leaving no choice to the daughters; the females were fair, but the males decidedly unfair. This view, which is powerfully supported by the fact that ancient chieftains and kings arrogated to themselves the title of God, is stigmatised as rank heresy by the bulk of theologians, who, in the good old days when angels were generally believed in, thought it nothing strange that they should take wives from among the children of men. The book of Enoch (which Jude appeals to as by the seventh from Adam), Philo, Josephus, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and other early Christian fathers, say this is what happened. And among moderns Franz Delitzsch and August Dillman hold that no better explanation can be found. Dillman finds in the narrative a reminder of heathen mythology, and holds that the account has been drawn from ancient legends of the giants being half gods and half men. Do not the Sacred Scriptures declare there were giants in those days? Athenagoras (cxxiv.) says that the angels "fell into impure love of virgins, and were subjugated by the flesh"; while Justin (2 Apol. v.) declares they "were captivated by love of women, and begat children who are those that are called demons." It is rather curious that, whenever the angels did descend to earth to visit women, their visits were always followed by the birth of children, as in the case of Sarai, Manoah, and the Virgin Mary. It is true that Jesus says that in heaven there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage. But this is all the more reason they should marry when they visit earth, just as men of God do many things in Paris they could not think of in their own parishes. The sons of God, in other places of Scripture, are usually taken as meaning angels. The Bible angels, be it noted, were all male ones, though the only angels extant now-a-days are feminine. Jude, too, in his sixth verse, speaks of "angels who kept not their own principality, but left their proper habitation," which seems to glance at this legend in Genesis.

Digitized by Google

To settle the parlous question, whether these persons of divine taste for the daughters of men were themselves men or angels, there have been further controversies with regard to the offspring of the alliance. We have seen that, according to the early Christian father, Justin Martyr, they were demons; according to the Authorised Version, they were giants; and according to the Revised Version they were the Nephilim. Now, scholars trace the word "Nephilim" to the Hebrew nephal, which means a fallen, sinful being, analogous to nephel, which means an abortion or miscarriage. The Nephilim are also called Gibborim or Titans. The narrative goes on to state that the wickedness of man was great; so perhaps it was a case of miscegenation, in which, according to some doctors, all the bad points of both races come out in the offspring. Josephus says "the tradition is that these men did what resembled the acts of those the Greeks called Titans." Lenormant is more inclined to see the counterpart of the Hebrew myth in the Greek stories of the heroes, demi-gods, born of the love of a god for a mortal woman.

So much, dearly-beloved brethren, for the men of erudition, unenlightened, I fear, by the divine spirit, and relying rather on worldly learning than on the inspiration which comes from prayer and faith. To the man of God who has an understanding of things divine, our text presents no difficulty. Both parties are right, and both wrong. The sons of God are men, and they are angels too. They are the godly, divinely-appointed messengers or angels to men, and specially to women, whether known as priests, parsons, ministers, clericals, sky-pilots, black-beetles, parasites, or men of God, who in all ages have shown a partiality for the daughters of men, and mate with whomsoever they choose, quite irrespective of the choice of the female, who, however, is generally quite content to receive a visitation from the divine being. The sons of God were the Levites or priestly caste, who took tithes of all, and who have never been content with a tithe of the women; but when they see the daughters of men that they are fair, take them wives of all that they choose. They were, indeed, the Beni Elohim, for they were actually born to the Kadeshim, or holy women who visited the temples to be visited by the gods, and thus were they literally, not metaphorically, the sons of the gods, and, like chips of the old block, they followed the bad customs of their ancestry. Such, at least, is the interpretation granted to me after much prayer and pious meditation, and I believe it will commend itself to those acquainted with the sacred mysteries of the men of God in all ages.

UNCLE BENJAMIN.

EARLY CHRISTIAN LEGENDS.

No grosser forgeries or more shameless prevarications have ever mystified the miracle gulls of this distracted planet than the Christian Evidence juggleries of the Patristic era.

> There are liars that lie for the fun of the thing,
> And liars that lie for a fee;

but they are eclipsed, very far eclipsed, by the Mendax in majorem Christi Gloriam, the professional liar for Jesus' sake.

"The fathers," says Lecky, "laid it down as a distinct proposition that pious frauds are justifiable, and even laudable; Paganism was to be combated, and therefore prophesies of Christ by Orpheus and the Sibyls were forged, lying wonders were multiplied, and ceaseless calumnies poured upon those who, like Julian, opposed the Church. This tendency triumphed wherever the supreme importance of these dogmas was held. Generation after generation it became more universal, till the very sense of truth and the very love of truth were blotted out from the minds of men."

Yet the prevaricators of the Middle Ages must have been past-masters of their art, indeed, if they could surpass the Chef-Menteurs of the early Christian era, the very era that evolved the "synoptic gospels" among a chimera brood of only slightly more preposterous spook-stories and biographies of the virgin-born anti-Naturalist. Nearly every larger colony of Christian converts had a legend manufactory of its own; hosts of distinction-greedy or vision-crazed fanatics vied in composing biographies of incredible saints and "acts" of imaginary apostles; there were eleven different "Acts of Barnabas," four crazy "Acts of St. John," numerous, different, and mutually contradictory Acts of St. Philip, of Peter and Paul, of St. Andreas and St. Bartholomew. There were seven supplementary Apocalypses (besides that of "Apocalyptic Jack," as a friend of mine calls the fever-patient of Patmos), there were Gospels of St. Thomas, a Gospel of St. James, a "Protevangelium of St. James," and countless biographies of St. Joseph and the Holy Virgin, most of them written in a style which the author of The Arabian Nights Entertainments would have eschewed as too extravagant, even for the purposes of plausible fiction. Some of these vagaries were, indeed, at once suppressed, as too apt to provoke the ridicule of the unconverted; but Professor Griesbach admits that the still extant MSS. of that sort contain not less than 76,842 variations—seventy-six thousand eight hundred and forty-two more or less irreconcilable passages. Griesbach and Baur agree that in the controversies of the second century no appeal is made to the apostolic originals of the "New Testament" Scriptures, and it is more than probable that the "gospels" which eventually obtained canonical authority had the same origin as the four "Acts of St. John," and were merely selected on account of the slightly less shocking extravagance of their miracle absurdities. The rest were gradually eliminated from the catalogues of theological literature, though not from the private libraries of miracle gluttons; and it is a suggestive fact that the name of the "Apocrypha" or "concealed" gospels was derived from the circumstance of their having been hidden from the sight of converts that had not yet quite escaped from the restraints of reason.

F. L. OSWALD.

A HINDU ON MISSIONS.

BABU K. CHAKRAVARTI, of Calcutta, India, has a word to say on Christian missions in his country: "The cases of conversion are becoming less and less every year, as the natives are understanding the worth of their own religion and the motive of the missionaries for advocating conversion. A case of conversion is looked upon as a calamity; a calamity to the members of the family from which a member is thus separated forever, and a calamity to the individual converted, who suddenly thinks himself free to eat, drink, and live as he pleases. I doubt very much if the converts improve any, socially or spiritually. They are obliged to marry among converts or very low classes, and thus degenerate very fast."

He says that, although the Hindus are poor, there are never such cases of starvation as among Christians. "In India one word only, 'atithi,' is sufficient for one to find temporary shelter and food in a fellow-man's house. The word is so much respected that, if there be not sufficient food in the house for the inmates and the stranger, the food there is is shared with him. Then, you see, there are numerous temples all over India where devotees and poor people find every day food and shelter. Our temples are not only places of worship, meditation, and prayer, but they are places where daily the poor are fed. We have no workhouses for the poor; no poor laws. Think what a national calamity it would be to introduce the Western system of living and religion, etc., in India. As regards Christian religion, I beg I may be permitted to say as I think, that it is a part of the ancient Hindu religion, enjoining love for mankind and forgiveness. Our religion, so to speak, is the complete religion. It not only improves morals, but developes the powers of the soul and inculcates love for mankind, spirits, and the spirit-world and God. It teaches how the body should be trained to ward off disease, and how temptations are to be withstood. If a tree is to be judged by its fruits, then Hindu religion is the best."

A JEWISH ADMISSION.—The patriarchal age of the Hebrews corresponds with the heroic age in Greece. As they are presented to us in Genesis, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and Jacob's twelve sons are not historical personages, but legendary heroes.—C. G. Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures on "The Origin and Growth of Religion as Illustrated by the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews," p. 11; 1892.

Digitized by Google

ACID DROPS.

SABBATARIANISM is being carried to a monstrous length by the bigots of America. Justice Cornell, in New York, has just decided that it is illegal for any private person to have a guest to dinner on Sundays with wine on the table. Any such person, he held, was liable to be arrested and punished under a section of the Excise Law forbidding the giving away or selling of liquor on that day. It seems almost incredible that such a tyrannical law can exist in a "free" country. Yet it is said that the police are going to enforce it by a system of spies on private households.

The principle of this vile interference with personal freedom is of course religious. At this rate the very name of religion will soon stink in the nostrils of every person who values individual freedom. That is one compensation, anyhow.

While the Sabbatarians are invading the privacy of households in this fashion, another set of pietists are waging war against the "rational" dress for lady bicyclists. Brother James Catlin, a popular preacher in New Jersey, is crying "Woe!" to the ladies who commit the "abomination" of wearing bags and knickerbockers when wheeling. He says it is a direct contravention of the teaching of the Bible, and refers to the fifth verse of the twenty-fifth of Deuteronomy, where men and women are forbidden to wear each other's toggery.

What "cheek" some men have, especially when they get religion into them. If women told men what they should wear, the men would call them impudent hussies; and what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Women will never be able to live their own lives, free from male tyranny, until the Bible is swept away as a divine revelation.

It is amusing to read the Methodist Times article on why women should serve the Church as well as men. First of all, it makes the ingenious admission that the idea of the equality of the sexes only "dawned on the Christian Church" in the middle of the present century. In other words, the "infidels" were first in the field with this idea; and it only "dawned" on the Christian Church when it had made considerable headway. Could there be a better illustration of the truth that religion follows, and never leads, the progress of civilisation?

How was it that the Christian Church took eighteen hundred years to begin getting right on this subject? Well, in this way. "Christianity," says the Methodist Times man, "does not attempt to come into any unnecessary or premature collision with the existing customs and prejudices of society." Therefore it said nothing against male predominance, but just let the essential principles of Jesus Christ work themselves out, and that took nearly two thousand years. Dear, dear! What a frightfully slow thing this Christianity is!

Christianity is opposed to slavery, says the Methodist Times man, but "the New Testament does not say that in so many words." In fact, it seems to say the very opposite; and the writer admits that many persons still living can remember when "thousands of Methodist preachers in America argued that Christianity was in favor of slavery." Yes, and they did so with the Bible in their hands, and their arguments were unanswerable. The Methodist writer does not attempt to answer them. He talks like a Jesuit about "the reserve of Scripture on that subject." Reserve, indeed! Why the New Testament itself says, "slaves obey your owners."

Similarly, with respect to women, Paul says, "I suffer not a woman to teach." He also declared that "the husband is the head of the wife." Any candid reader would take this to mean that the husband is the wife's "boss," and that is how the Christian Church and the Christian law have always taken it. But in these days of female emancipation the "boss" text must be twisted into meaning something very different; so, in defiance of the English language and common sense, the Methodist Times man asserts that the man's being the "head" of the woman just means that they are both equal. Merely this, and nothing more.

Erasmus complained that people in his time treated the Bible like a nose of wax. What would he say if he were living now? A Christian in a corner will make the Bible mean anything, even the exact opposite of what it says.

The following is from an article on "Scientific Treatment of Crime" in the Pall Mall Gazette of September 20: "Among the least argumentative but most interesting organic features that lie immediately beneath the organic criminal's tendency to crime is his love of, and tendency towards, religion. Ferri, an Italian expert, had not found, throughout a lifetime spent in prison work, a single murderer who was not religious. In converse with Deeming, the champion murderer of this decade, I found him possessed of the staunchest moral convictions, and prepared at a moment's notice to fight for his creed. The prison walls of England are scratched with a literature as pathetic as anything in our language. A criminal is a plebeian in society, and painfully conscious of his moral nakedness; and the first impulse of the naked is to hide himself, and the Rock of Ages offers the best shelter. Given a capacity for hearing—the rarest of gifts—there can be no cry that rises from a tired earth more sad than the 'We have erred and strayed from Thy ways' that lifts itself abashed each Sunday from prison chapels."

Owing to the Coombes' murder, there is an outcry against "Penny Dreadfuls," although the Judge, who looked through some of them, said they had not the remotest connection with the lad's crime. We see it stated in the newspapers that a pious member of Parliament, belonging to the legal profession, is going to introduce a Bill to check the circulation of such publications. "The line suggested," we see, "is an extension of the law as to blasphemous and indecent literature." This looks like a covert attack on the freedom of the press. In so far as it is aimed at Freethought literature, it will meet with our exposure and opposition. It appears to us that the "Penny Dreadful" parts of the Bible should be excised from the copies placed in the hands of the children in our public schools.

Messrs. Macmillan are publishing The Modern Reader's Bible. It appears that the Holy Ghost has not given proper attention to the printing of his, her, or its book, and Dr. Richard Moulton is going to see to the matter. We hope he will succeed in making the Holy Ghost intelligible.

Rev. Dr. Balgarnie, according to the Sun, is crusading against the nursery toy known as Noah's Ark. He thinks it is frequently the beginning of Atheism and infidelity. The "kids" compare the number and size of the animals with the dimensions of the ark; then they read Ingersoll, and go from bad to worse. The Sun says the reverend gentleman need not worry. But why not? Shall a toy send a child to hell? Perish the thought. Better burn it on the kitchen fire than let the "kids" burn for ever and ever in Old Nick's furnace.

The Baillie, of Glasgow (September 18), says: "Clergymen seem to be at their wits' end to know what to do to get their members to attend church. They have tried a revised version, have changed the hours of worship, introduced instrumental music, and some have added swimming clubs and football; but all to no purpose. Perhaps in their present mood they might sympathise with the Viennese movement to get rid of the Sabbath altogether, if only the Sustenation Fund were guaranteed." And this in godly Scotland! Ma conscience!

The Sentinel, of Washington, opposing the Sunday closing laws, says: "Our challenge to any minister, or any other person, to cite from the Bible a single word from the lips of Christ in favor of prohibition, and what the 'Christian citizens' blasphemously call 'the Christian Sunday,' remains still unanswered. If Christ should come among us now, how he would make those 'Christians' howl! How they would denounce him as a Sabbath breaker and wine bibber! How the name of Christ is being abused! And they all call themselves followers of Christ!"

The Spiritist Two Worlds declares: "We have never met with a spirit, who went away a rational, truth-loving individual, who, when he came back, declared that he had found Jesus, that his sins were forgiven, or that he had found in the spirit world that Christianity was true. We have held intercourse with many spirits who confess they were sadly misled, and have become disillusioned. They went away firmly believing that their sins were forgiven, that Jesus Christ would receive them, that he had 'atoned' for them, and they were going to dwell with God and the angels forever; they believed it; they waited 'on the other side' for the Judgment Day, they hoped, and prayed, and praised—and waited. Then came doubt, suspicion that they had been trained to believe a lie; gradually doubt and fear became a terrible certainty, and the process of 'breaking the fetters' had to be undergone." It would seem to be, on the Spiritists' own showing, best to be undeceived on this side the river Jordan.

A number of materialising "mejums" at Cassadaga camp have been exposed. One Donovan bolted after getting a lot of money from a wealthy lady for spirit pictures, the real painter of which owned up. Mrs. Aber, alias Jackman, and Hugh R. Moore also had to levant, leaving behind them masks, a dummy baby, luminous paint, and other evidence of their tricks.

Digitized by Google

The Pueblo Chieftain says: "Within the cheerless walls of the city jail lies the materialised spirit of a being from the world beyond; at least, quite a number of people paid fifty cents each last night to see 'Dr.' H. H. Grabendike step forth from a cabinet at his materialising séance in Gold Dust block at D. and Union-avenue, clad in a flowing robe of cheese-cloth, in the rôle of a spirit, appearing for his own benefit, at the gain to him of one dollar for every two spectators. From the spirit embodiment he has fallen to a common prisoner, with a charge of obtaining money under false pretences."

F. W. Harrod, one of the Peculiar People, writes a long letter to the Weekly Times and Echo in defence of his sect. The "bone" belief, he says, is "a great mystery," but it is explained because the Peculiar People are members of Christ's body, "of his flesh and of his bones" (Eph. v. 30). Mr. Harrod defends not having doctors on scriptural grounds. 'The wrong of seeking after and trusting to the arm of flesh is shown us by Asa (2 Chronicles xvi. 12; Jeremiah xvii. 5). Asa sought not to the Lord, but to the physician, and he slept with his fathers; for the Lord said, Cursed be the man that trusteth in man. Those who trusted in Christ found a perfect cure." But he admits "there is a sickness unto death when prayers will be of no avail, for it is appointed unto men once to die."

After all, the Peculiar People are genuine believers. Moreover, Mr. Harrod assures us their forty-eight elders do not, from the highest to the lowest, receive one penny pay for preaching, all working six days for the support of the body, and devoting the Sabbath entirely to the worship of God. They are true Bible believers: while the people who condemn them pretend to beliefs which their lives show are pretences merely.

"Benjamin Bobbin," who writes the leading article in Joyful News, is probably a bit of a wag. Instance the following: "I am glad that Matthew has told us about the angel coming to tell Joseph that his sweetheart was as pure as he was, and that he had nought to lose by looking after her, and being to her as a husband. You see, he did as he was told, and took her with him when he started to Bethlehem. If only all good folk were as teachable as Joseph was, what a Church we should have." And this, which is almost as good, on the necessity for the eternal God having a portion cut off his person: "It would never have done for Jesus not to be circumcised. He would not have been allowed to enter the temple, and when he grew up no one would have listened to his teaching."

There is nothing the old women of the churches and chapels are prouder of than their efforts to promote decency by supplying the heathen inhabitants of torrid climes with coats and trousers by day, and blankets by night. The missionaries dilate on the benefits of civilisation, and traders follow them up. Yet Dr. Pritchard says these same coats, trousers, blankets, etc., are a sure but certain agency for the extinction of their wearers. They dress up in these proud garments for church or for procession, sit or walk perspiring in them, and when they get home throw them off in relief and lie in the cool breezes. Next they come to the missionary for medicine for a cough, unknown in their semi-nude state, and presently pulmonary disease has a hold on these victims of Christian civilisation. Thus does Providence, through the agency of missionary pennies, subtly work for the extirpation of the heathen.

The story of Christian aggression upon heathens, could it ever be written from the standpoint of the heathen, is nothing less than atrocious. The horrors enacted by Cortes in Mexico, and Pizarro in Peru, have been paralleled in the treatment of the natives of Africa and Australasia, and in every case the pretence of aggression has been the desire to spread the blessed gospel of peace.

Dr. W. E. Griffis says: "The Buddhist missionaries [to Japan] were not satisfied to bring in their train art, medicine, science, and improvements of all sorts, but they themselves became personal leaders in the work of civilising the country. They found out the necessity of better roads, and were largely instrumental in having them made. They dug wells, established ferries, and built bridges. They opened lines of communication; they stimulated traffic and the exchange of merchandise; they created the commerce between Japan and China, and they acted as peacemakers and mediators in the wars between the Japanese and Koreans." The Christian missionaries, on the other hand, brought strife; and, while the Buddhists were received with open arms, the Christians were expelled in the seventeenth century on account of their political intrigues.

The Rev. John McNeill, the Scotch Talmage, has fallen foul of Tennyson. He does not like his lines about honest doubt, or that other verse of his about "an infant crying in the night, and with no language but a cry"; which, said the man of God, a great many squeamish folk quoted oftener than they quoted any text in the Bible. "I used to think that was very fine poetry," he continued, "until I became a married man and had some experience of the baby's voice—(laughter)—and then I wanted some morning to meet Tennyson." These splendid witticisms were greeted with much laughter.

The Scotch Talmage does not like "honest doubt." He preached at Stockwell Free Chapel from the text: "But Thomas, one of the twelve called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came." "Where in all the world could the fellow be? Ask yourself: Where is your Thomas? why is he not beside you? He is sitting at home in West Pollokshields reading his book. Think of the flimsy excuse for not coming to the place where Jesus is to reveal himself in resurrection brightness and gladness." We should fancy Thomas was much better occupied than in listening to the balderdash of the Rev. John McNeill, which, by the way, is well replied to in a letter to the Glasgow Evening News, signed "Doubter."

The Rev. Lindsay Young, of Portsmouth, is shocked to think that some clergymen actually go to the theatre. He has been still more shocked at the "awful sight" of little girls dancing in the street round a barrel-organ. Evidently the reverend gentleman is far too good for this world. Let us hope he will go to a better one before he is shocked into utter insanity. It would be to his advantage, and perhaps to other people's.

The British Association has been incidentally discussing missionaries. Professor Haddon actually referred to "those characteristic British exports, Beer and Bible." He thought it was quite right to extend our markets, but he thought we ought to do so "honestly, and not under the pretence of advancing religion and morality." Dr. H. O. Forbes did not want to depreciate the value of missionary enterprise, but he thought the "actual religious change" which took place in the missionaries' converts was "extremely small." This gentleman hit the nail clean upon the head.

"Thirsty Grindelwald" is the headline given to the following paragraph in the Westminster Gazette: "There seem to be at least two unregenerates attending the Grindelwald Conference. Professor Story, of Glasgow, writes from there to the Scotsman: 'I am content with the position, and grateful for the hospitality of Dr. Lunn, though the reason why I and others should travel from Scotland to this Swiss valley to discuss a reunion which we might have as well discussed at home has not yet revealed itself to my mind. Possibly it may be clear to Dr. Lindsay, of the Free, and Dr. Oliver, of the U. P. Kirk, who are here on the same errand. With one of these excellent gentlemen I have already reached a point of perfect sympathy in our common condemnation of the unkindness and impolicy of the managers of the Swiss hotels in keeping no beer on tap, and charging a franc and a half for a bottle which holds no more of a refresher than you can get—just as good—in a beer garden for twenty centimes.'"

How funny it is, to be sure, to read of a projected railway from Acre to Damascus, by way of the Plain of Jezreel, and across the Jordan through the Land of Bashan—where the famous Bible bulls used to roar. Had there been railways in that part of the world in ancient times, the Jews would not have given us a Bible stuffed with ridiculous miracles, nor would the Christian religion have stood a ghost of a chance of imposing upon the world.

Another singular choir strike is reported from Cossington, Leicestershire. The church choir had practised a processional hymn, and were about to begin it when the vicar vetoed the project. The choir thereupon struck, divested themselves of their surplices, and took their seats with the congregation, only a solitary chorister entering the choir stalls. The musical element is beginning to discover that it is the most attractive factor in church services, and it presumes accordingly.

The Rev. Walter Hind, who is charged with indecently assaulting little girls in the vicarage of All Saints, Highgate, is not the vicar thereof, who is the Rev. Edgar Smith, but merely the locum tenens put in charge of the parish while the vicar enjoys a holiday.

The Muslims of Bombay have petitioned the Government against enforced medical inspection before making the Hadj or pilgrimage to Mecca. They are entirely in favor of the other sanitary measures provided in the new Bill.

The Portsmouth Evening News devotes a paragraph to "Tom Paine," with special regard to the exhibition of Paine relics which is being organised by Mr. Moncure D. Conway. But why "Tom"? Surely it is high time to drop this vulgarity. The editor of the Evening News would hardly like us to call him Jack Brymer.

Digitized by Google

Our Portsmouth contemporary quotes some doggerel about Paine which has been resuscitated by that organ of "blood and culture," the Globe:—

> Tom Paine for the Devil is surely a match:
> In leaving Old England he cheated Jack Ketch;
> And then, to the wonder of all the beholders,
> He marched out of life with his head on his shoulders.

It is satisfactory to know that Paine was a match for the Devil, who is reputed to be marvellously clever. The Christians are not a match for the Devil. They are always begging God to deliver them from Old Nick. Paine was able to deliver himself.

With respect to the hanging which Paine escaped by fleeing to France, it is well to emphasise the fact that, if Jack Ketch had operated on Paine, it would have been for no crime. His sole offence was the authorship of the Rights of Man, which is now admitted to be one of the most important contributions to political philosophy.

By far the largest part of the cost of all the Voluntary schools in the kingdom is paid by the State. There were nearly two millions and a half of children in average attendance last year. The cost of each of these children was £1 18s. 2½d., and of this thirty-eight shillings 10s. 1d. came from the fee grant and 18s. 2d. from the annual examination grant. Here is £1 8s. 3d. direct from the State. The subscriptions come to 6s. 6d., and the children's pence, endowments, and other receipts make up the rest of the cost. These are averages taken over the whole of England.—Daily News.

The schools which thus derive five-sixths of their revenue from the State are not under public management. They are built and kept up for denominational purposes. The subscribers who contribute one-sixth of the cost have the whole control, and the public, who give five-sixths, have no part in the management. And now a further dip into the public purse is asked. Surely the time is approaching when a demand will be made for further public control of these falsely-entitled Voluntary schools.

Dr. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate (New York), has the honor to lead the way with a Christian lie about Huxley. He puts it tentatively, but no doubt it will soon reach the dignity of a full-grown assertion. His words are: "Huxley, it is said, wished, a few days before his death, to be buried with the service of the Church of England." Who said this, Dr. Buckley, before you, and how comes it to be said in New York when it is not said in England?

Mr. W. Allen, M.P., presiding over a meeting of the Primitive Methodists at Newcastle, urged them to stick to every word and letter of the old book, which he swallows in toto from Genesis to Revelation. He observed: "He did not think there was anything he believed in so firmly as in the Bible. He was one of those who believed that the spirit of God influenced the men who wrote the Holy Scriptures; that it influenced them to pen them word by word, passage by passage. He reminded them of the words in the last chapter of Revelation: 'If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book; and if any man shall take away from the words of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life,' and said he believed that no pledge given by Jehovah to the human race would be more strictly carried out to the letter than that one, for there could be nothing so bad for Christianity—no day could be so dark for the Christian Church—as that day when her faith in the Scriptures became shaken.

During the past century the London Missionary Society has received no less than £5,618,123 in subscriptions and legacies. Yet the Bishop of Rochester has stated that South London is no longer Christian.

"Uncle Benjamin" writes on the "Sons of God," and M. Claremont Ganneau has suggested that Kadesh Ruach, the holy spirit that brooded over the water, was originally a feminine consort of deity, while St. Anna is addressed in a Catholic hymn as "grandmother of the eternal God." Yet another relation is turned up by a correspondent of the Spectator, who cites the following as an inscription in the parish church of St. Helier, Jersey: "To the glory of God, and in memory of George Frederick de Carteret his cousin, who perished by drowning, and lies interred in the Cathedral Church, Galway, Ireland, this window is given by Edward Charles Malet de Carteret, Seigneur de St. Ouen, A.D. MCCCLXVII."

According to the Liberator, more than three-fifths of the members of the new House of Commons are members of the Church of England—which is a bad prospect for Disestablishment. The Methodists, who crowed so much before the elections, have thirty-eight members all told. There are thirty-four Presbyterians, twenty-three Congregationalists, three Baptists, six Quakers, eleven Unitarians, and seven Jews. The number of Freethinkers is not stated, but there are known to be several, though they may object to be ticketed.

Napoleon's religion was the subject of a recent article in our columns by Mr. J. M. Wheeler, who pointed out that this extraordinary man had no particular religious belief of his own. A corroboration of this view appears in the Daily Chronicle review of Napoleon's Last Voyages. During his voyage to St. Helena the great victor-victim talked a good deal with the English chaplain, but "he did not at all impress Mr. Glover that he had any religious sympathies." "Every religion," Mr. Glover said, "is alike to him, and did I believe there existed such a being as an Atheist, I should say Buonaparte is that being."

After this it is amusing to read the vaporings of Mr. Alfred Thomas, M.P., in a chapel at Pontypridd. This gentleman—for we suppose he passes as such in Wales—said he believed with Mr. Gladstone that infidelity would be very little heard of by the end of the present century. Infidelity, however, would not die out altogether, for "as long as there were fools on earth infidelity would remain." Mr. Thomas, therefore, regards "infidels" as "fools." We know one or two of these "fools" who would give him an awful dressing on any public platform where he had the courage to maintain his "wisdom" in debate.

Joseph Hutchinson, a Belfast dyer, was dying for the last time, preparatory to his funeral; and in this extremity he bethought him that it would be nice to have in a priest, who might administer the last sacraments, and give him a good send off to the beautiful land above. But the landlord of the house wherein he lodged was a rabid Orangeman, who rushed in while the priest was performing, and tried to argue the matter with a poker. Finally, the priest had to be escorted home by the police, and Joseph Hutchinson died almost in the midst of the rumpus. This story will enable everyone to see the blessings of religion. There is nothing like it for bringing peace and comfort to the dying.

Religion is a source of harmony and goodwill at Vienna just now. A Christian killed a poor old inoffensive Jew in a public street, and the heroic action was loudly applauded by a large meeting of the hero's fellow religionists.

Christianity professes to be a spiritual agency, but when a Christian man of God takes up the subject of social reform the very first thing he does is to send for the policeman. At Grimsby, for instance, the Nonconformist Ministers' Association is "deeply impressed with the great extent to which gambling evidently prevails in the town." So far so good. But what remedy do these Nonconformist ministers apply to the evil? Their proper business is to preach against it and show its immorality. That is slow work, however, and troublesome work too; for a very good subscriber to the chapel funds may be guilty of making a bet now and then, and it would hardly do to rebuke him too pointedly. So the Nonconformist ministers "urge upon the Council to put into force its powers to suppress this vice." Which is all very well, in its way; but if the police are to look after morality, what are the ministers paid for?

Rabbi Schindler, of Boston, was recently asked if Jonah was really swallowed by a whale. "Ah," said the rabbi, with his agreeable accent, "I don't know anything about Chonah, and I don't know anything about the whale—it's all the same as Drilby—it's a noffel."

Helen Williams edits a spiritist journal, called Freedom, at Boston. On one side it has a quotation from R. W. Emerson; on the other, one from Helen Williams. No doubt the spirit of Emerson has called to thank her for the honor conferred.

Patrick Gleeson, a clergyman, aged forty-six, and therefore old enough to know better, was charged at the Lambeth Police Court with being found drunk and incapable in Atlantic-road, Brixton. The policeman found him lying helplessly in the road with his face cut. In consideration of the cut (probably) the magistrate ordered him to pay the doctor's fee. This case was reported on Monday. On Tuesday another London clergyman was charged with indecent conduct, and committed for trial.

The London rectors attended the meeting called to form a Curates' Union. The Rev. C. E. Curtis, of St. Paul's, Haggerston, and the Rev. T. W. Goodman, of St. Mary's, Haggerston, strongly denounced the proposal, and supported an amendment to that effect. The proposal was outvoted. This is a good deal like employers deciding that employees have no right to combine. But it is thought that the milk-sop curate will stand anything.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, September 29, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, E.C.: 7.30, "Clinging to Christ."

October 6, Wood Green.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—September 29, Camberwell. October 6 and 13, Foresters' Hall, London; 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 18, North Shields; 20, Glasgow; 22 and 23, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. November 17, Liverpool.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

J. Martin.—Professor Fiske's reply to Joseph Cook was republished in pamphlet form a dozen years ago. Perhaps you can obtain a copy from Mr. Forder.

Le Diable.—Will be acknowledged next week.

R. Wilson.—Thanks. See paragraph.

H. J. Barker.—You are early with "Shilling Week" subscription. Acknowledgment next week. Glad to have your warm approval. Tell your veteran friend that we have nothing to do with Sir William Harcourt as a Liberal leader. We complain that he lied about us most basely in the House of Commons. Surely your veteran friend does not think the reproof of a liar is worse than his lie.

London Branch Secretaries must send us their Lecture Notices for next week's number.

W. Gilmour.—Inserted.

J. Wood.—See "Sugar Plums."

H. Thompson.—Thanks for report of Cardinal Vaughan's sermon, which we have made the subject of our first leader. Thanks also for the sight of your friend's interesting letter. Glad to hear you both appreciate "the good the Freethinker is doing."

G. J. Warren.—We are obliged to you for your trouble in the matter, which is having our best attention.

R. Green.—Your letter is most encouraging. We were happy to see you and your daughter at Mr. Putnam's farewell lecture. Your donation is transferred to the Special Lecture Fund.

H. Snell.—Sorry to have missed you during your brief visit to London. Hope to see you before long.

J. M.—Thanks. Acknowledgment next week in full list of subscriptions.

H. W. Jones.—Much pleased to hear of the success of Mr. Cohen's lectures at Blackburn. We hope his next visit in December will be still more encouraging. Mr. Foote will be happy to lecture for you on a Sunday if you can secure a decent hall. He is in good health, and feels no impairment of what you call his "old fighting form."

W. Strassheim.—(1) The South Shields engagement was cancelled, and the announcement removed from the Freethinker. We are sorry that the alteration was not noticed by some Newcastle friends, but no engagement was broken, as you appear to imagine. (2) Glad to hear that Mr. Parris made such a good impression. (3) We cannot advise you to invite the other person you mention to lecture at Newcastle. (4) Thanks for cutting.

Pyrites.—The poem shall appear. Mr. Foote will be glad to hear from the Belfast Branch—or, if the Branch prefers inaction, from any individual members—what hall is available for Freethought lectures on a Sunday.

Hugh Lloyd.—Your order is handed to Mr. Forder for execution. See "Acid Drops" re cutting.

A. Lemaire.—Pleased to hear you have been introduced to the Freethinker. Perhaps if you continue to read it you may see reason to change your opinions. Whether the Bible does or does not teach the doctrine of Atonement is properly a question for Christians to settle amongst themselves. We attack the doctrine because it holds the field, and you admit that we have "ably shown its fallacy and injustice."

T. E. Perkins reminds us that there was a case of bigoted intolerance on the part of Coroner Baxter in 1890, in connection with an inquest on the body of Mrs. Simson. Coroner Baxter was censured in the public press, a special leaderette appearing in the Daily Chronicle.

J. Hudson.—Thanks. See paragraph.

A. J. Marriott.—See our comment. It behoves us to be always vigilant.

C. Drane.—Always pleased to hear from you.

W. Wiggins.—Glad to hear you have derived so much profit from reading the Freethinker. Thanks for the cutting.

G. Hardie.—Surely you mistake us. We have no quarrel with Mr. Keir Hardie as a Socialist. Our complaint is, that he constantly mixes up his peculiar Christianity with labor questions. It would be reckoned ill taste if a Secularist labor leader were always introducing his Freethought on social and political platforms. Is it not equal ill taste on the part of Mr. Keir Hardie to be always introducing his religion? We are sorry to hurt anyone's "feelings," but public men are necessarily open to public criticism. With respect to George Macdonald's opinion of Keir Hardie, it was quoted in the Freethinker simply as an item of news. We neither approved nor condemned.

R. S. Pengelly.—Pleased at any time to receive your cuttings.

J. M. R. (Glasgow).—We think you have argued the question ably. You must expect the devices and evasions you complain of if you discuss with Christians. Mr. Foote is seeing through the press a large pamphlet on Bear and Bible. It will be published in a week or so, and will probably be of considerable assistance to controversialists like yourself.

J. B.—Your subscription will be acknowledged next week. See "Acid Drops."

Papers Received.—Baillie—Glasgow Evening News—New York Public Opinion—Post—Staffordshire Sentinel—Glasgow Weekly Herald—Crescent—Freidenker—Der Arme Teufel—Progressive Thinker—Open Court—Daily News—Two Worlds—Torch—Echo—Glasgow Evening Citizen—Isle of Man Times—Manx Sun—Introduction—Kirkintilloch Herald—Truthseeker—Liberator—Melbourne Herald—Dublin Saturday Herald—Secular Thought—Chicago Chronicle—Cumberauld Press.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

SHILLING WEEK.

With the unanimous concurrence of the National Secular Society's Executive, I am taking personal charge of the organisation of our party's special propaganda. It is my intention to utilise the services of our best lecturers for the spread of our principles, not only in London, but in all parts of the country. Week-night lectures, under my scheme, are already being arranged for by Messrs. Watts and Cohen. The local Freethinkers will bear the local expenses of such lectures, with the assistance of a collection; and I will undertake to pay the lecturer. Sunday lectures, in special localities, where the cause is still weak, will be arranged for on the same conditions, or otherwise, if the resources placed at my disposal are adequate.

I believe it is possible through this scheme, if it is properly supported, to carry Freethought into every fair-sized town in Great Britain, and perhaps into some of the principal towns in Ireland.

Already I have taken the full financial responsibility of the lectures at Milton Hall, St. James's Hall, and the Foresters' Hall, in London; and I propose to organise similar propagandist efforts in other parts of our mighty metropolis, whose five millions of people offer a splendid field for Freethought missionary enterprise.

Wherever it is possible I intend to work this scheme in conjunction with the N.S.S. Branches. But in a few large towns I have my eye upon, if the Branches do not wake up, I shall have to engage halls and arrange for lectures independently.

This scheme is a bold one, and its only chance of success, in the present condition of affairs, lies in the personal supervision and control which I am prepared to give it.

To raise the means for carrying it into effect, I appeal to the thousands of readers of the Freethinker, whether they are members of the National Secular Society or not. Three-fourths of them can do something, and a percentage of them can do a good deal. I ask them all to do their very best.

The first week in October is set aside as "Shilling Week." During that period I ask all who desire to aid in sending the torch of Freethought into the cities and towns of this kingdom, to forward me one or more shillings. Every shilling I receive will be acknowledged in the Freethinker.

We have seen nearly a hundred thousand shillings obtained for a popular cricketer. Surely a few thousand shillings can be raised for Freethought.

The Salvation Army has just had its "Self-Denial Week." Last year it raised nearly £50,000 in this way. Our party is not as large as the Salvation Army, but it is by no means insignificant, and I hope it will make this "Shilling Week" a satisfactory success.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

SUGAR PLUMS.

A CAPITAL audience assembled in the Foresters' Hall last Sunday evening, when Mr. Foote lectured on "Bible or No Bible in the Public Schools." His address was closely followed and applauded with marked enthusiasm. This evening (September 29) Mr. Foote lectures again from the same platform, his subject being "Clinging to Christ."

Admission tickets for the Foresters' Hall meetings are no longer necessary. The admission now is entirely free to all parts of the house, but a silver collection is expected in the body of the hall and a copper collection in the gallery. Freethinkers should do their utmost to induce their more orthodox friends to attend these meetings. We should like to see the hall, which is a large one, packed from floor to ceiling on the occasion of Mr. Foote's second lecture, and, if possible, afterwards.

Mr. Watts lectures at Camberwell this evening (Sept. 29) on "The Bible and Civilisation." This is the last occasion for some time that South London friends will have an opportunity of hearing our eloquent colleague.

The London Echo has made ample amends for inserting a letter by A. Le Lievre, in which Mr. Foote was stated to have been imprisoned for obscenity. Mr. J. M. Wheeler was so indignant at this detestable falsehood that he paid a visit to the Echo office with a copy of Mr. Foote's trial in his hand. Other correspondents protested against the slander, particularly Mr. F. Jackson, to whose letter the Echo appended the following note:—"It is only right to say that Mr. A. Le Lievre's statement that Mr. Foote 'had twelve months' imprisonment for publishing obscene caricatures' was false and calumnious, and that Mr. A. Le Lievre has forfeited his claim to again occupy our space."

The Wood Green Branch has engaged the Masonic Hall in High-street for a course of four Sunday evening lectures. Mr. Foote has consented to give the opening address on October 6, his subject being "Life, Death, and After." Money cannot be taken at the door, and therefore the tickets—which are a shilling, sixpence, and threepence—should be secured beforehand. They can be obtained of Mr. John Wood, 71 Gladstone-avenue, Wood Green, N. Mr. Foote is to be followed by Messrs. Parris and Forder.

Mr. F. Thompson, one of the best of our Wood Green workers, desires to have his child named by Mr. Foote on this occasion. This ceremony is always interesting to ladies, and there should be a good attendance of the fair sex that evening.

The Annual Convention of the Canadian Secular Union was held at Toronto on September 7 and 8. Captain R. C. Adams, the retiring president, was unable to be present, but sent a capital address. Mr. Allen Pringle was elected president, Mr. J. S. Ellis secretary, and Mr. A. Earsman treasurer. Among the resolutions passed by the Convention was the following: "Resolved, 'That this Union desires to place on record its high appreciation of the grand efforts being made in England by Mr. G. W. Foote and Mr. Charles Watts to further the cause of freedom of opinion and freedom of speech, and trusts the Freethinkers and Secularists of England will amply sustain them in their work.'"

It was also resolved to issue propagandist literature to influence the French Canadians. There is a French translation of the Age of Reason, and the works of Ingersoll are also to be translated into French.

We hope the best efforts of our Canadian brethren will be given to sustaining Secular Thought. Under the able editorship of Mr. J. S. Ellis it is maintaining a gallant fight. To us Secular Thought is a weekly sign that Secularism in Canada commands the support of intelligent and devoted men, of whose co-operation in Freethought work we are proud.

Members and friends should attend the Battersea Branch quarterly tea and soirée to-day (Sunday, September 29). Tickets are sixpence each, and can be obtained at the hall or at the outdoor meeting. Ex-members and strangers are particularly invited.

The Newcastle Evening News comments on the fact that England gets into a fever over Mohammedan outrages on Christians, but takes no notice of Christian outrages on Mohammedans. "Islam," the writer says, "has been from the beginning, and is still, incomparably less disposed to persecution than has been Christianity." He continues: "His greatest enemies allow that the Turk has never been a religious persecutor. When the Turks invaded Asia Minor and Europe they left with few exceptions the Christians in full possession of their worship, their priests, their monasteries, and their churches, and that, too, at a time when, in the name of Christ, Papal bulls ordered the massacre of heretics, and when the Reformers in certain parts of Europe were thirsting for the blood of the Mother Church, and calling on the populace to pull down the rookeries (Catholic churches) that the rooks might follow. Even now, when Protestant processions are forbidden in Catholic France, Catholic processions may circulate without let or hindrance through Constantinople. On such occasions the streets of Pera and Galata are hung with white, and Turkish soldiers present arms on the raising of the Host."

WHAT NOBODY KNOWS.

WHERE or when Christianity began.
Who was Jesus Christ, or when he lived.
Who wrote the Gospels, or any other part of the New Testament.
What the New Testament is—whether all that is in it ought to be there, or whether all that is out should be excluded.
Who made the New Testament.
When the New Testament was put together.
Where the New Testament was put together.
Who the Apostles were.
What became of Gabriel the angel.
What became of Joseph, Mary's easy-going spouse.
What became of Mary.
What became of Jesus.
What became of the shepherds that visited Christ's cradle.
What became of the "wise men" who came from the east.
What became of the star that misguided them.
What became of the dove that descended upon Jesus.
What became of the Holy Ghost who visited Mary.
What became of the Devil who tempted Jesus.
What became of the multitudes of devils who were expelled by Jesus and his agents.
What became of Simon the Cyrenian.
What became of Mary Magdalen and the other Mary, and the rest of the women who figure so prominently in the Gospels.
What became of Lazarus, and of others who rose at the time of Christ's resurrection.
How those devils fared which entered the pigs and frightened them into the sea, where they were drowned.
Who founded the Church of Rome, or who were the first bishops of it.
What the first Christians believed.
What the first Christians thought of Jesus.
Whether the first Christians had a Jesus or a Christ.
Whether a Christ gave rise to the sect, or the name of the sect suggested the supposed Christ as its founder.
What became of Pontius Pilate.
What became of Caiaphas or Annas.
What became of Joseph of Arimathæa.
What became of the seventy disciples Jesus sent out, etc.
What became of the five hundred persons who are said to have seen Jesus after his resurrection.
What became of any one of all the multitudes Jesus fed, cured, etc.
Why none of those benefited by Jesus ever took the trouble to preach his gospel and advertise his healing power.
Why none of them turned up to speak a word for him at his trial.
Who compiled the creeds.
Who compiled the old litanies, liturgies, chants, etc.
Who or what God was.
What the trinity in unity was.
What became of God or the trinity, etc.
Where to find such a mass of useless, lying, imbecile literary rubbish as in the Bible and religious books.

I have just flung the above together as they occurred to me with my pen in hand. Arrangement and elaboration are unnecessary. Let the reader turn each clause into a question; and there is no man in the world that can give any reasonable answer.

Had they ever been answered satisfactorily, I never should have required to put them, for they would have received such answers as would content all honest inquirers many centuries ago.

I renounced Christianity because it had no evidences and was manifestly untrue. I am now twenty-two or twenty-three years older, and I find the leading scholars in the Churches are now pretty much of my opinion, although the sentiments of many will revolt from what I say.

That doesn't matter. We Freethinkers have conquered their intellect; their emotions will follow.

JOSEPH SYMES.

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (August 17).

SATURDAY afternoon I visit some of the notable places of Birmingham—the library, art gallery, the Bull Ring, the market, the Arcades, the town hall, etc. In the evening I call upon Mr. Daniel Baker, who for years has been one of the main supporters of Freethought in Birmingham, and has given much of his wealth to aid the work, especially when Mr. Watts labored here, with much success, amidst many discouragements, keeping the cause vigorously at the front. Mr. Baker is over eighty years old now, but the "sweep of years" does not destroy his hope for humanity, nor his devotion to truth. I was pleased, too, to meet his daughter. His wife is now upon a sick bed. Also here, for the first time, I met George Jacob Holyoake, who for sixty years has been a Freethought agitator. He is over eighty years of age, but the intellectual fire is not diminished. He is keen, alert, ready to lend a hand. To lend a hand has, in fact, been one of the great purposes of his life. Perhaps no man understands better than does Mr. Holyoake the science of co-operation, not as a religionist, but as a man of the world. In youth he suffered martyrdom on account of his outspoken Atheism, and he stands firmly to-day by the principles he then enunciated. He does not indulge in any sentimentalities of religion. He does not believe in them. He makes no compromise with Christianity. He has done what he could to prevent the priest from assuming the mastership of the co-operative movement. And he has succeeded. So far as I can discover, the religious element has been kept out of this co-operative movement in England much more than in America. The curse of labor reform in our country is, that priests are allowed to run it. Mr. Holyoake saw this danger, and guarded against it over forty years ago. In all his associations with the reform party he has not denied his Atheism. I should judge that Mr. Holyoake was a good deal like our Horace Seaver. He has the gift of pertinacity and of resoluteness. If he makes up his mind to a thing, he stands by it, and all the opposition in the world would not induce him to change. If he makes up his mind to live to be a hundred years old, I guess he will do it. He came to Birmingham on purpose to be present and preside at my lectures, which afforded me great gratification, for, knowing Mr. Holyoake by reputation for so many years, I desired to see him face to face, and to stand together with him in the ranks of Freethought.

The friends at Birmingham did the best they could; but it rained on Sunday, and the audiences were not large. It cleared off somewhat in the evening, so that at the closing lecture there was nearly a hall full. I gave three lectures. Mr. Holyoake presided at the morning meeting. He said that, as Birmingham was his native place, he wanted to meet the representative of American Freethought and give him a welcome to Birmingham. The short address of Mr. Holyoake was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and it was certainly a stimulation to my own effort; and if it did storm outside, there was sunshine within. I lectured on "The Bible and Modern Thought." In the afternoon Mr. Ridgway presided. I gave my lecture on "Christ and the Nineteenth Century." The method of the lecture was to accept the validity of the orthodox record, the four gospels, and then to discover what value, if any, Jesus was to the nineteenth century. I demonstrated from the record that Jesus was ignorant, superstitious, fanatical, immoral, and utterly unworthy of the intellectual respect of the present times. Of course my Christian critics after the debate quoted Mill and Renan. I answered that neither Mill nor Renan was an authority in Freethought, and that on this point I considered them entirely unhistoric and unscientific. It is nonsense for any man to-day to talk of the commanding excellence of Jesus. It is false whoever utters it, be he Renan, or Mill, or any of the most illustrious of Freethinkers. The moral excellence of Jesus is one of the humbugs of the ages, and ought to be demolished with all the force of truth and intellectual sincerity. One man tried to come at me with the miracle of the resurrection, and wanted to know what became of the body of Jesus after it disappeared from the tomb. I answered that the body of Jesus, whatever became of it, had nothing to do with the question at issue, which was the moral character of Jesus as given in the gospels, which I had demonstrated, according to the gospels themselves, to be valueless and opposed to the progress of to-day. My opponent sat down. He could not stand up for the Jesus of the gospels; only for an imaginary Jesus. There is not a Christian to-day who obeys, or tries to obey, the teachings of Jesus. The discussion was somewhat animated. In the evening I lectured on "Christianity and Woman." There was some debate after this, wandering, as usual, all over the universe, and scarcely touching the points I made. One critic inquired if I did not think that Miss Willard and Lady Somerset were doing a great deal for the temperance cause. I answered, "No; that they rather had injured the rational temperance movement by their foolish and tyrannical methods; that the true method of temperance was science and education, and not coercion and sentimental gush. Of all methods of temperance that of prohibition is the most orthodox, despotic, and unsuccessful."

Mr. Holyoake closed the evening with a short address; and really, as my friends say, he was never in better form. He was animated by the occasion, and the audience responded to his keen thrusts with hearty appreciation. A vote of thanks was given him by the audience.

On the platform also with Mr. Holyoake was another veteran and well-known Freethinker, Mr. Charles C. Cattell, a broad-browed man, grey with years, who looks as if he could strike many a strong blow for mental emancipation. I was glad to meet one whose writings I had read with so much profit—writings clear, logical, and to the point. There is a young and vigorous element at Birmingham, but it is seldom that four such veterans gather on one occasion as George Jacob Holyoake, Charles C. Cattell, Daniel Baker, and Joseph H. Ridgway. All honor to those who have made it easier for our footsteps to press forward in the thorny pathway of reform. After the lecture a few of us met at the house of Mr. C. H. Cattell, and enjoyed a social union for an hour or so. Mrs. C. H. Cattell is the daughter of Charles Watts, as is also Mrs. Courtis, who was present. We all wished that Charles Watts was with us on this occasion, with President Taylor and other jovial spirits.

Thus the campaign at Birmingham closed with brightness and cheer. I have made friends whom I shall remember always. Among the workers here, besides those already mentioned, are Robert Meredith, David Thomas Bullows, S. Armfield (who made the pilgrim welcome to his home), W. T. Pitt, J. H. Bridges, Mr. Steptoe, Mr. J. Terry, etc. Mrs. Armfield and Miss Lilly Pitt are also active in the ranks, with other ladies who are not afraid to be counted as Freethinkers. There have been many ups and downs for the cause at Birmingham, but there is still a good chance of winning the day, despite apathy, boycott, and various other things too numerous to mention that are always in the path of reform. In a city like Birmingham, where so many elements are in play, and where there are so many quasi-reforms and half-movements, the straight-out and pioneer rank cannot always advance. There will be drawbacks, but while the veterans pass off the stage I am sure that youth will take their place with undiminished fire, and with wider advantages for action.

With Birmingham comes Shakespeare, for Stratford-on-Avon is only a few miles distant, and with choice friends I spend a whole day in that land of poesy, and a thousand thoughts throng into my mind.

Shakespeare's day! What a day it was—of joy, of roses, of bloom and splendor; a day when man and nature blend in perfect poesy. The home of Shakespeare, the river Avon, the green fields, the beautiful church, the embowering groves, the thousand flowers, make a world of delight; the past and the present mingling in glory and romance. What memories illuminate the brain at the magic word "Shakespeare"! What a long procession moves athwart the mind; what pomp, what variety, what passion, what power! And here is the land of his birth. Here he gathered the treasures of nature, here he caught the music of the birds and plucked the flowers, here he felt the flame of love and the grand ambition of youth, and here, after the triumphs of an eventful life, he found the repose of death. How the heart thrills and the imagination kindles at Stratford-on-Avon! Scott, Burns, Byron, and then Shakespeare, who comprehends them all in the amplitude of his genius, and enriches them and us so that poetry and art hereafter are a common heritage, like the earth and sun and sky.

I did not come a solitary pilgrim to this memorable shrine. Not simply the dead, but the living world itself, was round about my pathway, as variable as the pages of Shakespeare himself, and the comedy of life softened and glorified its tragedy. Like Chaucer's company, we found as much wisdom in play as in labor itself, and certainly no one can appreciate Shakespeare who does not see the joy of life as well as its shadows.

I must describe the companions of my delightful journey, who added the lustre of Freethought to the reminiscences of the poetic past.

Robert Taylor is the captain of the Birmingham host, and, after being twenty-three years in the military service of his country, is fully capable for the position. He has travelled over a good part of the Old World, and expects eventually to see the New. He is a jolly story-teller. He has gathered his materials from many a camp-fire and curious adventure, and there is not a subject he cannot illuminate with some telling anecdote. James Partridge, the secretary, is a quiet and persevering man, and does the hard and silent work without which there is no public success. W. T. Pitt, the treasurer, has the knack of paying all the bills, which makes the passage of life a free-and-easy one to the Secular Pilgrim. Joseph H. Ridgway, vice-president of the Society, I have already referred to as a stalwart veteran. Mr. Stephen Armfield was ordained to preach the gospel according to Methodism, but found in Freethought and hard work a better field for humanity and truth. David Thomas Bullows is the singer of our party, who puts the music in where it does the most good, and adds to the festivity and romance of the occasion; and Charles Henry Cattell joins us with Freddie Cattell, the grandson of Charles Watts, so that my famous American co-worker has the dignity of a grandsire, which, of course, he carries with vigorous ease. This was a typical English party, proud of their own land, yet cosmopolitan in spirit, literary, poetical, musical, historical, anecdotal, reminiscent, and prophetic; so there was plenty of Promethean fire all along the way.

Digitized by Google

We left Birmingham at 9.40 in the morning, and it was about 11 o'clock a.m. when we rolled into the station at Stratford-on-Avon. Stratford has a population of about 10,000. It is one of the cleanest and handsomest towns in England at the present time. It looks like a parlor. It has quite an aspect of modern magnificence. The old parts of the town are not apparent without a searching look. Ignatius Donnelly, the anti-Shakespearean critic, says that Stratford was a "dirty little town." I can see no evidence of this. All towns were dirty three centuries ago to what they are now. London was simply horrible. Stratford was no worse than its neighbors. It was evidently a town of some importance, the centre of business for an extensive agricultural country, where crowds would gather on market days, and a bright boy would have a chance to see a vast deal of human nature. It was not a country place that Shakespeare lived in, but a bustling trading-point, which would afford much stimulation and knowledge to a youthful genius. Donnelly is very much out of the way when he calls Stratford a "dirty little town" in order to belittle Shakespeare. At the time in which Shakespeare lived Stratford might be called a leading provincial town, and of this town Shakespeare's father was the chief magistrate, and must have been a man of energy and ability. Stratford was not a stagnant village. Shakespeare was born amidst active and superior elements of English life.

The first thing to attract our attention was the handsome American monument, which is gratifying as the expression of our national feeling for England's greatest bard. They say that more Americans visit Stratford every year than Englishmen. It appears that every American tourist makes it a point to see Shakespeare's birthplace without fail.

But I cannot linger at the monument. It is too modern. I want to get back to the old times—to the very hearthstone of Shakespeare; and here, in a little while, I stand beneath the very roof under which he was born. The big old-fashioned fireplace is before me. The iron dogs are gone, but the very stones are there where the fire glowed, and on the side are the stone seats under the chimney, where, I suppose, little Willie must have sat when the embers were low and it was cold. At any rate, I sat myself down on these snug stone seats where Shakespeare might have toasted his shins. This was in the kitchen with its stone floor. Overhead is the room where Shakespeare was born; not much of a room now, but more royal than the court of any prince. I should think about a million names were scribbled all over the walls and the window-panes; among them, by careful observation, might be discerned Scott's, Byron's, Carlyle's, Dickens's, Thackeray's, etc.; but it is almost impossible to distinguish. In another room opposite is a portrait of Shakespeare, probably the finest extant. To my mind, it is certainly a veritable portrait, and conveys a noble impression of the poet. This portrait was discovered a few years ago among some old relics. It had a thick, heavy beard upon it. It was found, however, that this beard did not belong to the original picture, and, being carefully cleaned off, a new face appears—the face of Shakespeare himself. It is constantly guarded, being framed in a fireproof iron safe, which is locked every night. It is a priceless treasure. I do not like the ordinary pictures of Shakespeare. They convey no impression of genius or character. One might think Shakespeare was only a comfortable burgher, looking at these pictures. It is a heavy, unintellectual face that confronts us, in which there seems to be no fine play of wit and cheer. But in this portrait now hung upon the walls of Shakespeare's home, and of which I believe there is no copy elsewhere, we see the real man, as described by Ben Jonson—"honest, brave, open, free, gentle, and witty." Here we see the lips that the muses might have kissed; the eyes where genius makes the world luminous, and the dome-like forehead. In connection with this portrait I am reminded of the Kesselstadt mask, which I think is the most wonderful and pathetic expression of Shakespeare's face ever given. Here we see the grandeur, the delicacy, the subtlety, the mobility of the poet-genius. Thus in the shadow of death, rather than in the fleshly lineaments of life, are revealed the depths and intensities of Shakespeare's inner being.

I cannot describe the many relics and curiosities, pictures, books, manuscripts, etc., now gathered within the poet's birthplace. Amidst the mingling rain and sunshine we journey to Shottery, about three miles from Shakespeare's early home. Here, on a bit of rising ground, is Ann Hathaway's cottage, surrounded by an old garden, in which are many of the Shakespearean flowers. The cottage has been divided into three portions. The central portion is a fairly large room, with quaint chimney corner. There is an old settle with high back, and the window, under which Shakespeare might have done his courting in the "good old days." Upstairs is a beautiful carved bedstead, which shows the care and workmanship lavished on furniture in the Middle Ages. This bedstead existed in the Hathaway house before the time of our poet. An old woman has charge of the house, a descendant of the Hathaways. She is eighty-three years old, and is a sprightly and chipper old lady. She can talk the day long. She is full of the old days, of her great-great-grandfather, and great-great-grandaunt, etc. It was a pleasure to listen to her traditions. I liked the cottage and its surroundings. The modern look has not yet appeared as in bustling Stratford. The glamor of the old days is almost undisturbed. The garden has an ancient flavor. The flowers are in wild profusion, and we are permitted the blessed privilege of plucking a few. At Shakespeare's birthplace there is a garden in which are blooming, it is said, all the flowers spoken of in Shakespeare's drama; but the guardians will not allow one even to stroll through it, and not a petal is to be had for love or money. They are not so strict at Ann Hathaway's cottage, and you can roam around to your heart's content, and dream of the lovers of the "golden time."

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

CHRISTIAN WOMEN IN CHINA.

MR. A. A. HERBERTZ, who was formerly a member of the American mission at Shanghai, writes to the Melbourne Herald as under:—

"One feature of the Inland Mission, in contradistinction to the other missions, is the number of single women they employ. These they dress in Chinese costume, and send them out in the streets to 'preach' or visit from house to house wherever they can gain admittance. This is utterly opposed to all Chinese notions of etiquette, or even decency. Native ladies never perambulate the streets; they must go in sedan chairs, and attract as little attention as possible. There are other causes that give color to false impressions. In the first place, the ladies have no husbands—which the native cannot account for on moral grounds. They live in the house of a married man, and the native distrusts that. They are averse to foreign missionaries of any sort, but when, in addition, the missionaries trample on all their notions of propriety, this feeling becomes intensified. Again, if young women missionaries make babies and young children their special field of work (as it seems some of these young ladies did), then the gravest suspicions are aroused in the minds of all respectable Chinese.

"It is sad to think that these young ladies who have fallen before the fury of an excited mob might have escaped their terrible death had they used ordinary common prudence, for coming events had certainly cast their shadows before them, and it was evident that trouble was brewing for some time previous. It was plainly Mr. Stewart's duty to have sent the women and children into Foochow weeks before the riot commenced—even if his desire for a martyr's death prompted him to remain himself."

Voltaire.

It is fashionable to say that he was not profound. This is because he was not stupid. In the presence of absurdity he laughed, and was called irreverent. He thought God would not damn even a priest forever; this was regarded as blasphemy. He endeavored to prevent Christians from murdering each other, and did what he could to civilise the disciples of Christ. Had he founded a sect, obtained control of some country, and burned a few heretics at slow fires, he would have won the admiration, respect, and love of the Christian world. Had he only pretended to believe all the fables of antiquity, had he mumbled Latin prayers, counted beads, crossed himself, devoured now and then the flesh of God, and carried fagots to the feet of Philosophy in the name of Christ, he might have been in heaven this moment, enjoying the sight of the damned.—Ingersoll.

The Episcopal Church at Canterville, Ct., was an object of displeasure to Almighty God, so on the 30th ult. he hurled one of his thunderbolts at the belfry, and knocked it into smithereens. The world is governed by special providence, if we can trust the Bible and the preachers, but Providence is unselfishly regardless of its own.

Digitized by Google

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

The Executive meeting was held on Thursday, September 5, at the Club and Institute Buildings, Holborn, W.C.; the President in the chair. Those present were Messrs. C. Watts, S. P. Putnam, T. Parris, H. J. Stace, J. N. Zwibel, F. Wood, S. Jones, E. W. Quay, G. Ward, S. Hartmann, J. Samson, E. Bater, J. M. Wheeler, S. R. Thompson, T. Gorniot, J. Potter, A. B. Moss, W. Heaford.

Minutes of previous meeting were read and confirmed.

Cash statement received.

The President gave an outline of his Lecture Scheme, and informed the meeting that he had, upon his own responsibility, arranged for courses of lectures at Milton Hall and St. James's Hall, and recently at the Foresters' Hall. Mr. Charles Watts moved, and Mr. John Samson seconded: "That this Executive cordially approves the action of the President in the matter of his Lecture Scheme, and promises him not only a free hand, but the utmost possible support in his enterprise." Carried unanimously.

The forthcoming Conference at Brussels was discussed, and the President was asked to make the necessary arrangements for the Society to be represented.

The meeting then closed.

At the previous meeting of the Executive the following ladies and gentlemen were elected to serve on Committees for the year:—

Organisation Committee: Messrs. R. Forder, T. Gorniot, C. Watts, E. Bater, G. J. Warren, S. Hartmann, and G. Ward.

Benevolent Fund: R. Forder, Mrs. Standring, Thornton Smith, Annie Brown, Miss Robins, G. J. Warren, Victor Roger, S. Hartmann, G. Burton.

Committee for Examining Lecturers: Messrs. J. Samson, J. M. Wheeler, V. Roger.

Finance Committee: E. W. Quay and J. N. Zwibel.

E. M. Vance, Assistant Secretary.

THE LONDON SECULAR FEDERATION.

The monthly meeting of the Federation was held at the Club and Institute Rooms on September 5; Miss E. M. Vance in the chair. Present: Messrs. G. Ward, F. Schaller, W. G. Renn, M. Loafer, C. Durrant, S. R. Thompson, J. M. Wheeler, and the Secretary.

The minutes of previous meeting were read and confirmed, and the Annual Excursion was reported to have yielded a profit of £4 18s.

A grant was made to the Lambeth Branch, and the meeting adjourned.

The Secretary wishes to call the attention of branch secretaries to the fact that only two branches have yet forwarded their Annual Collection.

Annie Brown, Hon. Sec

GLASGOW SECULARISM.

One of the best and most effective replies to the cry that Secularism is decaying in Glasgow was the large turn-out at the Soirée and Concert held by the Glasgow Branch of the N.S.S. on Sunday evening last, in commemoration of Mr. Bradlaugh's birthday. The hall at 110 Brunswick-street was practically filled with the members and their friends; indeed, a pleasing feature in this respect was the large number of ladies present.

After a nice cup of tea, the chairman, Mr. Gentles, gave a short address on the benefits of such social gatherings. This was followed by a cornet solo by Mr. W. Turnbull, and a song by Miss Taylor. Mr. W. Gilmour then addressed the gathering, dealing with some of the more stirring episodes of Mr. Bradlaugh's career. Another cornet solo was rendered, and songs were tastefully sung by Messrs. Allison, Bolesworth, Gilmour, and Miss King, which led to the delivery of a short, pithy speech by our old friend, Mr. Brown, who congratulated the Branch on the success of the gathering.

After awarding a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman, a most enjoyable evening was brought to a close by the audience singing "Auld Lang Syne." A word of praise is due to Mr. Welsh for his admirable accompaniments on the piano.

Unscrupulous men who try to save Christianity from the responsibility of having encouraged the "peculiar institution" of slavery insist on retaining the word "servants," as it is now found in the King James canonic translation; but all competent Greek scholars know that its Greek equivalent is Doulos, which means slaves.—Blue Grass Blade.

CORRESPONDENCE.

UNSPEAKABLE TEXTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—At one of Mr. C. Cohen's Sunday afternoon lectures in Stevenson-square, Manchester, two or three weeks ago, he observed that there were certain passages in the Holy Bible of such an immoral character that no one would be allowed to read them before a mixed public assembly. A Christian opponent, however—J. Howarth, 17 Thomas-street, City, Manchester—who, evidently, is but slightly acquainted (as is the case with so many other Christians) with the contents of this book, undertook to read any passages which Mr. Cohen might select. As chairman of this meeting, I considered it my duty to inform the chief constable of the facts of the case, and accordingly I enclosed a considerable number of very delicate texts, including 2 Kings xviii. 27 and its duplicate Isaiah xxxvi. 12, for sending which, on a post-card, to the Rev. Mr. Venum, you will no doubt remember, Mr. J. H. Wise, of Kansas, was prosecuted; and I further intimated that, if Mr. Howarth should be allowed in presence of the police to read these passages in public (Stevenson-square), I should claim an equal right to be allowed to have them printed and circulated.

The chief constable, as usual, simply acknowledged the receipt of my letter. Mr. Howarth was informed by me of these proceedings, and when the time arrived (last Sunday, September 15, as agreed upon) for the ceremony of reading the said texts—the police were present—the said Mr. J. Howarth backed out of it by the flimsy excuse that he must read them from our platform. Of course, we would not allow him to retail his Biblical filth from a Secular platform—we have a little more self-respect than that—and thus render us, perhaps, indirectly responsible; but I informed him, in presence of the public and the police, that he must provide himself with a stand. This he apparently would not do, and so the matter ended in a fiasco.

The said Mr. J. Howarth had the hardihood to state that we actually had invited him to read the texts from our platform. This is an audacious falsehood, and is on a par with his courageous funking.

It surely is a pitiable spectacle when a Christian dare not read passages from his Holy Bible for fear of the police, and of a public prosecution for uttering obscene language!

E. G. Taylor.

A Branded Sheep.

A man, upon whom religion had left its mark ineffaceably, was observed at Ellis Island recently, says the New York World. He was one of a number of French immigrants brought before the commissioner for examination.

He was a tall, handsome young man; a skilled iron worker. Attraction was drawn to his personal appearance by the fact that he wore his thick hair brushed down over his forehead to his very eyebrows.

When he was asked by the commissioner the reason for this extraordinary coiffure, the French youth looked embarrassed for a moment, and then replied that he wore his hair in this manner to hide the mark on his brow.

"What is the mark?" was asked.

He tossed his hair back and exhibited a skilfully executed piece of tattooing, which, on examination, proved to be a text from the Bible, done in minute but perfect letters. It was in French, and read: "Dieu est mon Berger, je n'aurais besoin de rein"—"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want."

He stated that the tattooing was done at the request of a cranky aunt when he was a twelve-year-old boy.

A Sermon by the Rev. Mr. Literal.

Brethren and Sisters: I take for my text, on this beautiful Sunday morning, a few verses from the last chapter of Mark—"Go ye into the world and preach the gospel to every creature. . . . . And they that believe shall cast out devils . . . . . and do many wonderful works. And these signs shall follow them that believe. . . . . They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them."

Now, brethren and sisters, let us show our belief by doing these things. You, sister Jones, will please take a respectable dose of strychnine upon your arrival home; you, brother Smith, will at once go to the gardens and take therefrom a poisonous snake, wrap it twice around thy neck, and behold it shall not harm thee. Brother Brown will jump into the middle of the river on his way home, and refuse all aid except that which shall be sent him by the Holy Ghost.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, G. W. Foote, "Clinging to Christ."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 5.30, tea, entertainment, and dance. Tuesday, at 8, social gathering. Thursday, at 8, annual general meeting.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, Charles Watts, "The Bible and Civilisation."

FINSBURY PARK BRANCH (91 Mildmay-park): Tuesday, at 8, adjourned meeting.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "Good Old Providence."

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, C. James, "Come to Jesus."

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.30, a lecture.

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, C. James will lecture. Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

EDMONTON (corner of Angel-road): 7, T. Thurlow, "The Religion of Jesus."

FINSBURY PARK (near the band-stand): 11.15, George Standring, "Progress of Freethought"; 3.15, Stanley Jones, "Christianity and Humanity."

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE (Middlesex side): 7, Lucretius Keen, "From Darkness to Light." Thursday, at 8.30, a lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30, debate between Messrs. Terry (C.E.S.) and Lucretius Keen, "Has Man a Soul?" 3.30, L. Keen, "The Hen and the Egg." Wednesday, at 8, a lecture.

ISLINGTON (Prebend-street, Packington-street): 11.30, H. Courtney, "What is Secularism?"

KILBURN (corner of Victoria-road): 7, Stanley Jones will lecture.

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, a lecture.

LAMBETH (Kennington Park): 3.30, a lecture.

MILE END WASTE: 11.30, S. R. Thompson, "Slavery."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, A. B. Moss, "The Glory of Freethought."

REGENT'S PARK (near Gloucester Gate): 3, a lecture.

VICTORIA PARK (near the fountain): 11.15, Stanley Jones will lecture; 3.15, R. Forder will lecture. (Collection on behalf of London Secular Federation.)

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, S. E. Easton, "Prayer"; 7, "Adam, the Fall, and the Atonement." Thursday, at 8, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, C. Cohen, "The French Revolution—Part II., The Dawn"; 7, "Scepticism: Its Meaning and its Value."

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school.

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 11.30, W. Heaford, "The Plain Truth about the Bible"; 2.30, "The Doom of the Gods"; 6.30, "Is Christianity Consistent with Socialism?"

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, L. Small, B.Sc., "Religion and the Emotions."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): Closed for decoration.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 3, members' monthly meeting and election of new secretary; 7, debate between Messrs. M. Lynn and R. Mitchell, "Is Divine Providence a Myth?"

PLYMOUTH (Democratic Club, Whimple-street): 7, a meeting.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): Members' and friends' trip to Grimsby and Cleethorpes. Meet in front of Victoria Station at 8.30; train starts at 8.45.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, a reading.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, Mr. Yates will read a paper on "Mohammed and Christ."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BIRMINGHAM: Monday, at 8, C. Cohen will lecture at the Five Ways; Wednesday, at 8, at the Bull Ring; Saturday, at 8, at Smithfield Market.

DERBY (Market-place): 10.45, W. Dyson, "Christian Want of Evidence"; 6.30, "Antidotes to Superstition."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Quayside): 11, Carl Aarstad.

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—September 29, Birmingham.

STANLEY JONES, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London, N.—Sept. 29 m. Victoria Park, a. Finsbury Park, e. Kilburn. October 6, Battersea.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London, S.E.—Sept. 29, Westminster. October 6, Camberwell; 20, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

TOTHEAT PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—October 6, Leicester; 13 and 20, Wood Green; 27, Foresters' Hall.

T. THURLOW, 250 Old Ford-road, E.—Sept. 29, e. Edmonton.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

A Demonstration of the Biblical Doctrine of Devils, suitable for circulation among Christians.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

APARTMENTS to Let for a Single Gentleman. Terms moderate. Situated in North-west London. Near the "Brecknock Arms." Address, W. J., care of 28 Stonecutter-street, London E.C.

Digitized by Google

Just published, price 1d., by post 1½d.,

DISCREDITABLE TACTICS OF CHRISTIAN DISPUTANTS.

BY CHARLES WATTS.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

A CHAPTER FROM

Strauss's Original "Life of Jesus."

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

G. W. FOOTE.

(A Most Thorough Analysis and Exposure of the Gospel Story by a Master Hand.)

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. FULLER, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

"The Clacton Tea-Table,"

TOWN HALL BUILDINGS, CLACTON-ON-SEA.

Specialité—1s. ORDINARY, 12.30 to 3.

Tea fresh for every customer. Furnished Apartments

Also "Brunswick Confectionery," Pier Avenue.

Proprietor, H. FOYSTER.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 8d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BRUNO CLOTH

FOR LADIES' WINTER DRESSES.

This Cloth has been our leading Winter Dress Material for four years. Thousands of ladies have tried it, and, so far as we know, everybody has been satisfied. One lady last winter sold thirty-five Dress Lengths among her friends.

IN ALL THE FASHIONABLE SHADES.
PLAIN COLORS.

Price—

9s. 6d. per Dress Length

till the end of September, as an advertisement. After that date, 10s. 6d. per dress length.

LOT 11

CONTAINS

1 pair of All-Wool Blankets
1 pair of Bed Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-cloth.

In spite of wool having gone up very much in price, we sell at the old figure,

21/-

CARRIAGE PAID.

THINK OF THE COLD WEATHER AND THINK OF LOT 11.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

NOW READY, CHEAP EDITION OF

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A RECORD OF HIS LIFE AND WORK.

By his Daughter, HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. With an Account of his Parliamentary Struggle, his Politics, and his Teachings, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, price 7s.

A. & H. Bradlaugh Bonner, 1 and 2 Took's-court, Cursitor-street, E.C.

MASONIC HALL, HIGH STREET, WOOD GREEN, N.
(Adjoining Nightingale Hotel.)

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY, WOOD GREEN BRANCH.

A COURSE OF LECTURES

Under the auspices of the above, to be delivered on the following dates at 7.30 p.m.:—

Sunday, October 6—MR. G. W. FOOTE, "Life, Death, and After."
Sunday, October 13—MR. TOUZEAU PARRIS, "The Certainties of Religion Worthless."
Sunday, October 20—MR. TOUZEAU PARRIS, "Some Bible Symbols, their Origin and Meaning."
Sunday, October 27—MR. R. FORDER, "Who is the Devil? What is the Devil? and Where is the Devil?"

ADMISSION BY TICKET ONLY. To be obtained of John Wood, Secretary, 71 Gladstone-avenue, Wood Green.

Tickets, 6d. Reserved Seats, 1s.
Course Tickets for Last Three Lectures, 1s. 6d. and 1s.

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying Good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."
W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."
Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Incrustation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 8s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 40. SUNDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

COLLAR THE KIDS.

RELIGION is the greediest thing in the world. There is no satisfying its avarice for privilege, power, or wealth. In gratifying this passion it has committed every crime, and resorted to every infamy.

Religion is also the most hypocritical thing in the world. It always wears a mask. Its designs are always covered with a pretence of virtue. It robs man for his advantage, oppresses him for his benefit, and tortures him for his welfare. And whenever it is found out in some exceptional wickedness, it acts like Macbeth to the ghost of Banquo: "Never shake thy gory locks at me! Thou canst not say I did it."

Like every other abstraction, religion must be incarnatad to be effective. Principles and politics only exist in human beings. The incarnation of religion is in priests. This is their generic name. They may assume all sorts of special designations, according to the system or sect they belong to; but they are all one in essential character; their object being to rule their fellow men with the rod of mystery, and to exploit them materially by spiritual pretences.

These priests, these men of God, these mystery-mongers, these wonder-merchants, these traders in supernatural secrets, these holy tipsters, these fortune-tellers of kingdom-come, have the impudence to declare that their business is the most natural as well as the most important. They assert that man is a religious animal, though they are all occupied in making him so. They affirm that there is a necessary demand for what they supply, though they are always occupied in making or retaining customers. They cannot let us alone for five minutes. They dare not trust to free-trade and an open market. They obtain laws for their special protection; they have thousands of shops maintained by public capital, and thousands of other shops exempted from all taxation; they get into parliament and say prayers; they nobble the hospitals, the workhouses, and even the lunatic asylums; they station one of their long firm in every regiment and in every ship of the line; they almost command the universities, and they have also laid their hands upon the public schools.

This proves that religion is not entirely natural. It is very largely, if not altogether, artificial. Religion, indeed, is like the old medicine. The doctor's bottles were at once a fascinating mystery and the secret of health and longevity. But all that is changing. Hygiene is taking the place of medicine. We give fair-play to man's natural powers, instead of dosing him with questionable aids in the midst of bad conditions. And if we only give morality and common sense an honest chance, there will be no call for spiritual nostrums.

The Churches do not admit that such a state of things can ever exist, but they feel it is approaching, and this accounts for their desperate efforts to keep, and if possible confirm, their hold upon the education of children. Unless they can instil their doctrines into the minds of the young, they know perfectly well that their business is doomed. Early education decides the religion of the overwhelming majority of people on this planet. Whether they are Mohammedans, Jews, Buddhists, Brahmists, Christians, or what not, depends upon the geographical accident of their birth and training. We are all naturally men and women, but as religionists we are all (or nearly all) manufactured specialities.

We must expect the Churches to fight for their hold on our national education. They are impelled to do so by the instinct of self-preservation. Yet it is easy to show that their action is quite at variance with their doctrines. Who pretends, for instance, that the deity of Jesus Christ, or his miraculous birth of a Virgin Mother, is defensible on grounds of reason? What argument could ever prove an obvious man to be a disguised god? What discussion, what multiplicity of statement, could ever prove that a child, who had a mother, had no father? Such propositions can only be accepted on grounds of faith, by which we believe for reasons which are not reasonable. And how does faith act? Solely under the grace and influence of God. If he does not move us to believe, we cannot believe. But the Churches will not leave the children in God's hands. They preach faith, but in practice they rely upon authority. It is as clear as daylight that church pews are filled from school benches. The child is father of the man; if they capture the child they have the man for certain. Consequently their motto, in a possibly rude but certainly forcible alliteration, is "Collar the Kids."

Happily the Churches are divided, and herein lies the best hope of Freethought. Mr. Price Hughes admits that "the great majority of the English people are utterly sick of the ecclesiastical strife which accompanies every School Board election." He therefore proposes that Church and Dissent should arrange a compromise. Let all the voluntary schools—which are only voluntary in name—be handed over to a universal School Board system; let the Apostles' Creed be taught as well as the Bible; and let all Christian denominations unite in staving off—if possible for ever—that accursed Secular Education which would make children too sensible to be religious, and thus overwhelm all Churches in a common destruction.

Mr. Hughes launched this beautiful proposal at Grindelwald, at a serene distance from "the passing squabbles and partisan difficulties of the hour." How delightful! But alas! proposals have to be carried out in the midst of those squabbles and difficulties. A Frenchman may admit a German to be a good fellow at a distance; but not if he meets him with a rifle in his hands. Christian harmony, too, seems possible at a Grindelwald picnic; but it looks very different at home, where Church meets Church, and comes the tug of war. Mr. Hughes's proposal has elicited no sympathy. Everybody is against it. Nonconformists declare they will never, never, never admit the Apostles' Creed in the schools; while the Church of England party smile at the idea of giving up their schools, and inquire whether Mr. Hughes perceives any green in their optics. Cardinal Vaughan is so far from being ready to give up the Catholic schools that he actually proposes, in a letter to the Times, that they should be supported to the same extent as the Board schools, only out of imperial taxation; a proposal to which Mr. Hughes is warmly opposed, and which he promises to resist to the bitter end.

What a happy family they are, and how pleasant it is for Freethinkers to note that their unanimity is so wonderful! We hope this sort of Christian unity will continue and increase. The more certain people quarrel the more certain other people come by their own. In the end the children will escape from the clutches of the priests. The very "squabbles" of the Churches are hastening the triumph of Secular Education. "To this complexion they must come at last."

Digitized by Google

A word in conclusion about the Bible, which stays in the schools until it is kicked out. Mr. Hughes wants it "reverently used as the Word of God"—Jonah and the whale, and Lot and his daughters, and all. He does not want it explained away by Rationalists, nor used as a text-book of ethics while its supernatural sanctions are ignored or denied, nor "regarded simply as a literary classic, and degraded to the level of Shakespeare." Fancy degrading the Bible to the level of Shakespeare! It would be as easy to degrade Mr. Hughes to the level of Shelley.

G. W. FOOTE.

THE DECLINE OF FAITH.

Mr. Frederic Harrison thinks that we are passing through a period of reaction—intellectual, social, and religious, as well as political. If so, I should say it is but as the momentary withdrawal of waves, which apparently are running out even during an incoming tide. It is not by any glance at the publications of a single year, or the results of any Parliamentary election, that such a question can be determined, but by an extended survey of what has been in the past as well as of what is now.

The historical student, however much of a progressive he may be, will regard with little apprehension the alleged signs of reaction. Those with privileges to protect and power to lose are always more vigorous and coherent as danger approaches. Those who expect that a long-established and wealthy corporation like the Church is going to succumb, or allow any of its branches to be cut off, without a struggle, are doubtless living as much in a fool's paradise as those who think that, because a Conservative Government is in office, therefore Church Disestablishment is adjourned to the Greek Kalends. No one, it has been said, witnesses the death of a religion. It is a long drawn-out process of transformation under the pressure of new ideas. Yet no one who looks around can fail to see that such a process is continually going on to-day. The old religious ideas, as formulated in creeds, no longer occupy the place they held in the past. They are much less alluded to, and always with modifications and new interpretations.

A certain Nonconformist minister, who puts himself very much in evidence, recently proposed to unite Christians—at any rate, enough to continue combined control over infantile minds—on the basis of the Apostles' Creed. But there is hardly a minister of any education, either among Nonconformists or Anglicans, who fails to see that such a compromise would be disastrous. The Apostles' Creed is too palpable a forgery, and its doctrines of the virgin birth and the descent into hell too evidently mythical, for it ever to be made the basis of a new Christian defence. The men of God know that their interests rather lie in indefiniteness than in any creed, however simple and however generally professed it may be.

If astrology were as heavily endowed as is the teaching of Christianity, if its root ideas were inculcated in infancy, if all that ran counter to it were discountenanced by law, and all opposition tabooed as unsettling the very foundations of society, it would doubtless command a large number of satisfied believers. But a slight acquaintance with history suffices to show that the influence of interested professors is not what it was. There is more free inquiry, and less readiness to accept on authority, than ever before. Moreover, the clergy are steadily declining in public esteem. There are now so many more honorable and lucrative professions that only the old-fashioned, or those with command of livings, ever think of putting their sons to the black business, which was once so highly reverenced, but which now endangers its occupants being suspected of being either dull or dishonest. The Church only gets the inferior brains, and its system of training them is not calculated to develop ability—at least, as compared with the other professions.

The Rev. H. R. Haweis, in the current number of the Contemporary Review, bewails the social and intellectual decline of the Episcopal clergy. He says: "The inaudible mumbler, the sporting 'Dodo' curate, the lifeless drone, the weakling parasites who take orders, some for social position, others to fill family livings, and many because they could not get sixpence a day in any other profession—these, of course, must be put aside as malignant, if not incurable, sores; no doubt they all help greatly to reduce the tone of the Established Church, but they are no new social evils. The real crux is rather to be found in the sort of thing the clergy are trained or even expected to preach, and the sort of thing the people decline any longer to listen to." Mr. Haweis certainly is not dull, but seeking to lead the clergy to preach Broad Church doctrine, while they subscribe to creeds drawn up in a totally different spirit, is certainly of questionable honesty.

One need not go back to the historic evidences of the ages of faith, when demons, angels, spirits, witches, and ghosts were as common as blackberries; one has only to read the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, or the Westminster Confession of Faith, and compare the doctrines there taught with those actually preached in the churches, to see that "the world do move," that supernaturalism is slowly evaporating, and that religion is gradually being superseded by ethics. No doubt the progress is slow, and its main hindrances are the existence of a class interested in the maintenance and propagation of supernaturalism, and the inheritance of wealthy endowments upon which they are sustained. But a class which is intellectually dull or morally blunt cannot permanently retain ascendancy over an educated people. Their very struggles and quarrels to keep their ground by imposing on the susceptible minds of the children will in time be thwarted by the efforts of independent parents counteracting their baneful teachings. Logic works slowly, but it does work. Teach children to think for themselves, and to exercise their reason upon all they are taught, and the dogmas intended to stultify their intellects will lose their power. Until the power of the clericals is broken, it behoves all Freethinkers to nullify their influence as far as possible.

J. M. Wheeler.

THE NATURE AND ORIGIN OF MIND.

There is no question in reference to which greater differences of opinion exist between Freethinkers and Christians than upon the subject of the nature and origin of the human mind. Orthodox believers regard the mind as a special entity in man, which uses the brain as an instrument for obtaining and imparting knowledge. Freethinkers, on the other hand, accept the word "mind" simply as indicating the intellectual part of our physical organisation, and they consider that its nature and power of manifestation depend upon the condition of that organisation. In my examination of these two opposing views of mind I shall purposely avoid all metaphysical conundrums, and confine myself to my own observations and deductions therefrom.

The definitions of mind that have been given by prominent writers do not, as a rule, assist the student much in the study of this question. Bain, in his Mental Science, tells us that the only account of mind strictly admissible in a scientific sense, "which must stand for a definition," is that which specifies the properties of such functions as "feeling, will or volition, thought or intellect, through which all our experience, as well objective as subjective, is built up." In a similar way, Hume writes that mind is "nothing but a heap or collection of different perceptions united together by certain relations." Hamilton says it is "that which thinks, feels, wills, desires," etc. Many writers allege that the intelligence manifested by man is different in kind, as well as in degree, from that of all other manifestations of intelligence. But very aptly Darwin remarks: "Spiritual powers cannot be compared or classed by the naturalist; but he may endeavor to show, as I have done, that the mental faculties of man and the lower animals do not differ in kind, although immensely in degree" (Descent of Man, p. 147). Further, as this eminent naturalist observes, "a difference in degree, however great, does not justify us in placing man in a distinct kingdom, as will perhaps be best illustrated by comparing the mental powers of two insects—namely, a coccus, or scale-insect, and an ant, which undoubtedly belong to the same class. The difference is here greater than, though of a somewhat different kind from, that between man and the highest mammal. . . . . On the whole, the difference in mental power between an ant and a coccus is immense; yet no one has ever dreamed of placing these insects in distinct classes, much less in distinct kingdoms" (ibid).

Digitized by Google

Metaphysicians have claimed that man, besides being able to perceive sensible objects, can also perceive abstract qualities of them; and that sensation is not like a physical nervous movement: thought and sentiment cannot be studied by the senses. Now, such language as this appears to me to be misleading, and destitute of any practical meaning. How could a man have what he calls metaphysical notions except through his senses? Before he can accept the so-called Intuitive Philosophy he is compelled to use his senses in studying its character. The conception of a circle or a triangle is derived through the sense of sight or touch. All ideal conceptions are the result of an appeal to our senses. I cannot understand how man can have an endowment entirely different from that of those animals with which it is admitted, anatomically, he is in every particular identical. It is not even disputed that mind and brain are either directly or indirectly connected, and that the quantity and complexity of the brain are in some way concerned in the degree of mind manifested. But can anyone reasonably suppose these to be two separate substances, having the power to act and to react on each other, and yet to possess no properties in common? Wherever we discover mental phenomena, we find it associated with functional activity of bodily organs. To say that man has two substances, the one spiritual and the other material, is only an assertion; and before such a claim can gain my assent each must be defined, and equal evidence must be adduced for the existence of the one as for the other.

It would be interesting to learn what mental qualities man exhibits that are not to be found in some degree in the lowest savage, or in the highest type of animal below him. The question is not how much better man can think and reason than an orang, any more than it is how superior intellectually a philosopher is to a ploughman, or a sane to an insane person. The real point to be considered is: Have we more evidence to believe that the thinking principle is located in brain matter than that it is the result of some spiritual entity, which exists apart from the brain, but that employs it as a medium for its manifestation? It is a fact, demonstrated beyond all reasonable doubt, that the brain varies in different races of mankind in quantity, complexity, and symmetry, to a greater extent than between the lowest man and the highest ape; and the lowest type of the ape varies as much in brain formation from the highest as these do from man. There is ample evidence in support of these statements. For instance, a drawing of the brain of an orang and of that of man reveals an identity as closely resembling each other as the one known to exist between the anatomical structures of their bodies. But while the human brain differs enormously in size and complexity, man has no rational thought if his brain be below a certain point. Many creatures with less brain than man possess manifest great intelligence. They exhibit indications of having the power of designing and of purposing, which are the very features that are claimed to prove the superior qualifications of the human species. Darwin, in his Descent of Man, already referred to, mentions that the ants do most of the things that are done by man. They "certainly communicate information to each other; several unite for the same work, or for games of play. They recognise their fellow-ants after months of absence, and feel sympathy for each other. They build great edifices, keep them clean, close the doors in the evening, and post sentries. They make roads as well as tunnels under rivers, and temporary bridges over them by clinging together. They collect food for the community, and when an object too large for entrance is brought to the nest they enlarge the door, and afterwards build it up again" (p. 147). Darwin also points out that their cerebral ganglia are of extraordinary size compared with the less intelligent beetles, and yet they are "not so large as the quarter of a pin's head. Under this point of view, the brain of an ant is one of the most marvellous atoms of matter in the world, perhaps more so than the brain of a man" (p. 54). Huxley also says that "no impartial judge can doubt that the roots, as it were, of those great faculties which confer on man his immeasurable superiority above all other animate things are traceable far down into the animal world."

Even those who hold the "spiritual" origin and nature of mind recognise that activity is one of its most important elements. How, then, can they conceive a time when it began to act, or when nothing existed upon which it could act? The eternal existence of both matter and "spirit" is therefore essential to make their idea at all intelligible. Universal matter must stand in a similar relation to an eternal mind that operates through it as brain does to the supposed soul. In fact, we can get no conception of "spirit" apart from matter, although the immaterialist would have us believe that the one preceded the other. Of course, every mind that is allied with a body manifests life and feeling; but these manifestations of themselves do not constitute what I regard as mind. Mind, to me, implies a succession of states of consciousness that have a beginning and an end. As we know it, the mind is the subject of growth, as is clearly perceptible in its development in a child. Associated with the senses is the power of thought, and all discrimination, comparison, judgment, however inefficiently performed, I consider to be absolutely impossible in the absence of the senses. Moreover, according to general experience, whatever tends to impair these senses always injures proportionately the power of thought.

The distinguishing feature of living matter, called protoplasm, is that it has capacity for organisation; but why this is so is at present unknown to us. Now I am not aware of any reason for denying to the organised form of protoplasm, called brain, the capacity to think, although we may not be in a position to prove how the process is carried on. Where is the necessity to go outside nature for an explanation of the one more than for the other? It is equally as self-evident, to my mind, that some organised matter thinks as that some formless, structureless matter becomes organised. To me there appears no doubt as to either; and to take the opposite view, that of an alleged "spiritual" nature of mind, is to encounter difficulties which seem to the unprejudiced investigator insurmountable. For instance, what is the so-called "spiritual"? What are its properties, and how is it to be differentiated from the material? Has it ever been known to act apart from matter? If so, when and where? If mind be an entity not depending for its operations upon matter, why does it not manifest itself apart from the organised body? If, on the other hand, it depends upon the human organisation for its working power, it cannot be an independent entity.

After much careful thought, the conclusion at which I arrive as to the nature of mind is, that it is not an existence per se, but a descriptive term relating to the intellectual part of animal organisation; that its potency is regulated according to the position in which it is found in living organisation, and the quantity and quality of the brain; and, finally, that, when such organisation ceases to exist, the mind (not its influence) ceases also. If we are desirous of accepting the theory upon this subject about which there appears to be the least difficulty, it will be, in my opinion, that of the Monist. This theory recognises both mental and material phenomena as realities, but not as independent of each other. Mind thus becomes a property of organised forms, the same as life is. We also obtain a conception of that which lives and that which thinks in one and the same being—Man.

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

The Good Old Times.

In the History of England during the Reign of George the Third, by J. G. Phillimore, he cites the following (p. 261) in illustration of the low state of morals of the period: "The Rev. Mr. Patten was, during many years, curate of Whitstable, at a very small stipend, and used every Sunday to travel in a butcher's cart, to do duty at another church. Whitstable, lying close to the sea, is very aguish, so that, had he been dismissed, it would have been very difficult for the Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the living belonged, to have provided another curate at the same low rate. This he knew well, and, presuming upon it, was a great plague to every new primate. He kept a mistress publicly, and had that esteem for punch that, when his sermons were too long, someone, showing him a lemon, might at any time cause him to bring his discourse to an abrupt conclusion, that he might be at liberty to adjourn to the public-house."

Digitized by Google

THUGS.

Worship of, or belief in, the supernatural often leads people to strange actions. Sometimes the religious spirit is manifested by complete abnegation of self, and a pious resignation to what is termed fate; at others faith in the unseen bursts forth in fierce fanaticism and perpetual frenzy; while frequently the measure of a person's piety is determined by the degree of his insanity. In the history of all religions there can be found recorded slaughters and assassinations authorised in the interests of deities or creeds. The shedding of blood, according to the Christian gospels, was necessary for the forgiveness of sins and the propitiation of God, and one of the greatest disadvantages that has accrued from this idea has evolved in the belief of many Christian propagandists—as evidenced by their deeds—that the continued shedding of human blood is necessary for the appeasement of the Almighty. A similar doctrine is present in religions other than the Christian, one of the most notable instances being in that of the Indian Thugs. About sixty years ago the Edinburgh Review contained an account of the peculiar religious observances of this society, taken from official documents, the publishing of which details caused considerable surprise and sensation, and led to the adoption of measures for the suppression of what these people considered their religious duties. Indian Thugs were nothing less than a band of robbers and murderers, whose ramifications existed throughout the whole country by means of a secret association. Murders were committed not solely for the desire of plunder—though this unquestionably influenced their actions to a degree—but from a sense of religious obligation. The Thugs believed in the existence of a god, practically an evil spirit—as is the Christian deity at bottom, if the contents of the Old Testament and the doctrine of salvation are to be credited—who, they conceived, could only be propitiated by blood, or, rather, the sacrifice of human life, as the Thugs were careful to avoid the actual shedding of blood, which was contrary to their creed. He who had committed the greatest number of murders was the most respected, being even reverenced and exalted to a position similar to that of a priest. In perpetrating these crimes they were diligent to avoid being betrayed into anything like remorse or pity, as this would lose them caste.

When they were young these Thugs served an apprenticeship to assassination. Almost as soon as they were able to wield their limbs with vigor they were inured to the sight of death, so that all sensation of fright or fear should be removed from their minds, and taught how to use the implements of murder. Having been given the best education possible in accordance with the means of their parents, the children were turned out into the world to plunder and assassinate for god and themselves. The way in which these superstitious criminals allured and dispatched their victims was very cunning and peculiar. They wandered over the country in parties numbering from ten to thirty in all sorts of disguises, and whenever they chanced to overtake or to meet a party of travellers, whom they considered they could overpower, they fell in with them as friends, sought their confidences, relieved their labors, and at the first suitable spot prevailed upon them to rest and partake of their hospitality. A meal was then prepared, and a time spent in conviviality. When the travellers were afterwards reposing from the fatigues of the day they were set upon and strangled one by one; graves were dug to receive their bodies with a "consecrated spade," and the marauders then proceeded to search for other game. By such means as these thirty or more people have been known to have been killed at one time; and the most remarkable feature of these occurrences was that the marauders were very seldom discovered by the authorities, so dexterous were they in the performance of their holy duties. The proceedings of the association were ultimately checked by the determined action of Lord William Bentinck, who had a few dozen of the assassinators hanged, by way of an example to the rest.

Those who prate of the utility of belief in deity can, in this instance of savage murderers being prompted by religious motives, perceive something which ill fits in with their theory. It only requires contemplation, together with those incidents in the history of the Christian Church relating to massacres of heretics for the glory of God, to convince the sturdiest adherent of "safe-side" morality that belief in the supernatural has more often than otherwise exercised a baneful influence over the lives and actions of men. "What won't a man do for his God?" Ay, and what crimes won't a man use his God to shelter?

F. W.

THE CONSPICUOUS ABSENCE OF GOD.

The S.S. "Iona," bound for London, moving steadily o'er the dark and sombre sea, an hour after midnight on September 16, was about to become the theatre of a catastrophe, a tragedy, and a deed of heroism. The navigators at their several posts saw naught of danger. The mighty engines, obedient to human genius, throbbed and oscillated with a certain soothing periodicity which had doubtless helped to lull to sleep the unsuspecting passengers. All seemed well; but a sudden peril leaped like a fiend upon the unwarned ship, and, fiend-like, chose the weakest for its victims—the sleeping women. One of the first to awake was Edith Ledenham, the stewardess, who was seen hurrying round the sleeping-berths, awakening the sleepers. Afterwards she went on deck and gave the alarm. Finally, she rushed through the flames "to rescue a little girl who had been placed in her charge"; and the ship's officer, who related the ghastly search for the lost, said: "The last we found was the stewardess. She was clasping the hand of the dead child."

Where was "Almighty God" during these events? Where was the "Creator of Heaven and Earth," who "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son," etc.? Where was this Almighty God whose power is over all his works, and the dinning of whose name into our ears provides thousands of clergymen with sleek, cosy livings, while millions groan and perish from agencies of distress and destruction not yet under human control? Where was "Almighty God" when the screams of the frightened women rang across the heedless ocean, without so much as an echo in response?

Picture that little girl roused from her sleep by the deadly crackle of the blazing cabin; imagine the pallid cheeks, the trembling, noiseless lips, the little arms upraised with a child's instinctive gesture for help, and then think of the eye of "Almighty God" surveying the scene unmoved; the almighty arm inert; the almighty will imperturbed!

But what God Almighty could not or would not do was dared and done by the young stewardess. The helpless child was not to look for succor quite in vain. Edith Ledenham was safe outside the burning cabin when she thought of the little girl inside, and flew to the rescue. Alas! Edith Ledenham was not "almighty." Had she been so, she would of course have stopped that fire before a life had been lost. She was only a poor working girl, and by the time she reached her little charge the heat and smoke had overcome them both, and the charred remains of the heroine were found "clasping the hand of the dead child."

Edith Ledenham is dead, but the Pope and the Archbishop of Canterbury still live, and all the parsons will continue to preach doctrines and dogmas which, in the lurid light of the "Iona" fire, are as wicked and detestable as they are absurd and contemptible. These priests would say—they could not help themselves—that, unless Edith Ledenham had been "born again," "washed in the blood of Christ crucified," and other allegorical foolery, her soul is consigned to the bottomless pit, in the fire that is never quenched. If this be so, who would not choose to suffer beside her rather than spend eternity in the company of the almighty fiend, who will use his infinite power to punish a lack of deference to himself, but will not use it to protect an innocent child in danger?

And what have you gentlemen of theology to say? To Mr. Gladstone we are often referred as to a man of pure motive and intellectual perspicacity, who is also a true believer. Probably he would meet the question with circumlocutionary phrases about the "impenetrability of the holy mystery," etc. Price Hughes! what would he say? "It is all for some good purpose, and God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to——."

Faugh! There are times when we can laugh at this feebleness and fatuity; but beside the biers of the "Iona" victims we can only fling such folly back into the stupid mouths that utter it, and, drying our tears, invigorated by the example of Edith Ledenham's noble chivalry, renew our assault upon the senseless superstition that makes muddle-headed mountebanks of men, and throws a chilling and benumbing apathy over the grand human instinct of resistance to cruelty and wrong. C. DEANE.

Digitized by Google

SEE THE GREAT MEN WHO BELIEVE IN CHRIST!

A YOUNG man, not much overdone with faith, said to me, about a fortnight ago: "What puzzles me is that so many great men believe in Christianity." He was not satisfied that they were right; but their faith seemed to throw some discredit upon his own unbelief; or, at least, he could get no support for his unbelief from their faith.

I think I represent his position correctly, but shall be pleased to rectify any mistake, should this fall into his hands.

To myself this argument—if I must so call it—has always appeared extremely weak and pointless; even in my religious days I never used it much, if at all, for I very soon perceived its weakness.

Still, the weakness of even an old and ridiculous argument is worthy of new exposure, so long as it deceives any rational being. I think that is the point which should decide whether we, as Freethinkers, ought or ought not to attack an error or an argument. An argument which really has ceased to deceive may well enough be treated with indifference; but the very weakest that could be used should be an object of attack, so long as it has power to impose upon sensible people. An argument is nothing of importance except in its effects. It is its practical part which should decide us to attack its theoretical, and to expose in it whatsoever is calculated to mislead.

Now, if it were true, as it is not, that Christianity was the only religion which learned, great, and able men favored, I confess there would be much in that fact to impress me, if it did not convince. I should feel bound, on becoming acquainted with that fact, to re-examine my position, and to sift what are called the evidences of Christianity again, with all the thoroughness I could employ.

If I found the Christians the best and most enlightened people, and that the more enlightened they were the firmer was their faith in Christianity; and if I found Jews, Mohammedans, Hindus, Buddhists, and all other Pagans or non-Christians ignorant, unreasonable, intellectually dull, and more full of faith in their creeds as they were the more ignorant, I confess this would create in me a suspicion that there must be in Christianity something better and more logical than other creeds could claim, and something worthy of my respectful re-examination.

If, further, I found the Romish Church destitute of all brilliancy and intellectual greatness, while the Protestant Churches completely eclipsed it in this respect, I confess I should feel it possible that Christianity, as embodied in Protestantism, must be the most logical religion to be found.

If further investigation showed me that in the Christian society no bribes were offered in favor of the popular creed, no intimidation employed to defend it; that every man and woman was perfectly free to think and say what to themselves seemed best about any and every religion, and that no sort of persecution or disability ever followed unbelief or the open declaration of unbelief, I should be compelled to admit that this religion, so just, so fair, so liberal in its spirit, must have some truth in it, and be worthy of full and complete re-investigation.

Such is a view of a case which might have been possible, had things in general been very different from what they ever were. Let us, therefore, turn to the actual state of the world, now and from time immemorial.

(1) In ancient Judea, as amongst modern Jews, the most intelligent persons, the most respectable people, were and are orthodox Jews. You do not find, and you do not pretend to find, that the Jews who become the most intelligent and great leave their old creed and embrace Christianity. I presume that even the most presumptuous parson or priest will not venture to say that the Jews cannot equal the Christians in intellectual power. If only the ignorant remained Jews and the intellectual gravitated to the Christian Churches, I think the Christians would not hide the fact from any false notions of modesty.

Probably no Christian would argue that, inasmuch as the greatest of Jews remained Jews and behaved as orthodox Jews are required to behave, therefore all of us should turn Jews.

(2) The ancient Greeks could boast of intellectual giants who probably have never been surpassed in genius and mental power. They were our teachers. Where is the man to-day who, with no more advantages than they had, could have taught better than they taught? How many of to-day will be heard of two thousand years after their death, as scores are in the history of ancient Greece?

And yet there was not so much as one Jew or one Christian amongst those ancient Greeks! And the Greeks never became Christian until conquest and worldly self-interest and a broken spirit (in the un-Christian sense) made them so.

Must I adopt the Grecian mythology because Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Peisistratus, Aristophanes, Demosthenes, Hipparchus, Euclid, and many other intellectual giants, belonged to that old Pagan Church, as I may call it? The Christian will say "No!" and so do I.

I am not a Socrates, not a Plato, not a Sophocles, not a Euclid; but, however inferior in intellect, I know many things which were impossible for them to know; and I know the absurdities of their mythology, although they do not seem to have perceived anything wrong about it.

Similar remarks will apply to Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, India, China, to ancient Rome, and to the nations where Mohammedanism has prevailed. Go where you may, in ancient or modern times, you find the greatest men, as a rule, of precisely the same religious opinions as their most ignorant contemporaries. No matter how often a nation may change its religion, the great are always pretty much the same as the rest, and about as orthodox.

The social sentiment dominates and enslaves all but rebels and reformers—sometimes both are one, by the way. And we find in every case the great are as much dominated by the general sentiment as any of their fellows. Manners, customs, and early prejudice sway the most free and liberal of us for life. No man ever flung off all those shackles; nor is it desirable; for his countrymen would hound him to death for doing so. I can speak for myself, and say that, although in theology, in religion, I am absolutely emancipated from the prejudices of early life, in social matters every honest sentiment sways, binds, dominates me as powerfully as ever. Much as I have been and am persecuted, deeply as I deplore the madness of the people, I have never lost an atom of my respect for mankind; nor has my desire to better them in the least diminished.

I know the power of prejudice, the almightiness of sentiment; and I also know that no Christian, however great, has any better or more logical reason for clinging to his creed than Jews and Pagans have for clinging to theirs, than the veriest savages have for holding fast the notions they regard as sacred. Habit, custom, prejudice, early training, the social and domestic sentiments, fully account for every case of the kind.

Note that the greatest of the Greeks never wrote a great book in defence or commendation of religion—nothing at all which could induce an intelligent man now to worship Zeus, Hera, Apollo, etc. All that pious poets and others wrote of those divinities fails to draw out our worship.

The greatest Jew has written nothing that draws the Christians over to his views; even the Old Testament is a complete failure in that respect, in spite of its constant use in Christian churches. The Christians are equally powerless to convert the Jews.

Of the Catholics and Protestants the same truth holds. Here and there a stray sheep passes from one fold to the other; but the vast majority on both sides live, act, believe, according to the early bias they receive, and there is an end of it.

Let me add one word more. No great man ever wrote a great and convincing book in favor of Christianity. Copernicus, Tycho Brahé, Kepler, Galileo, Bacon, Shakespeare, Newton, Halley, Descartes, Huyghens, Laplace, Herschel—none of them wrote anything in favor of Christianity which satisfied even the Christians who came after them, although some of them were ardent believers.

Digitized by Google

David Brewster, Michael Faraday, and the present Professors Stokes and Dawson were or are ardent Christians. What figure did they or do they cut in regard to Christianity? There is nothing from the pen of any of them on religion that is worth perusal.

If great men who are Christians wrote better on that subject than much inferior men, I should be impressed with the fact. But I will venture to say that the greater the man the more worthless will be whatever he is induced to write in defence of his religion. If this is not so, it is in the power of the believer to overwhelm me with facts to the contrary.

JOS. SYMES.

—Liberator.

THEISM.

As lowland folk, with ceaseless care, engage
To curb and dike the hungry sea,
A war with all the universe we wage:
All sleepless it; all wakeful we.

If we personify this loveless force—
Eternal, merciless, and blind—
We make a god's malignity its source,
Or stultify the human mind.

The universe is hard enough to fight,
Without capricious will behind
To circumvent, with diabolic spite,
The wisest schemes of humankind.

The god-idea fills the world with strife,
And makes the worst as good as best;
Its morbid dreams of extra-mundane life
Rob life of joy, and death of rest.

Can God be trusted, in a future life,
To change his ways and make us blest?
He's changeless; then, as now, will woes be rife,
And all that's bad be "all for best."

The present life, in which 'tis all for best"—
Though pain commences with our breath—
Is quite enough, so, thanks! we'd rather rest
In nothingness or endless death.

G. L. MACKENZIE.

CHURCH METHODS.

"GEORGIA has a quiet, harmless Seventh-Day believer in the chain-gang for a year for working on Sunday."

The above news item betrays to-day the methods which have been employed throughout the entire history of the Church to extend its power. Professing to serve the Prince of Peace, it has stopped at no crime which could be made to advance its interests. Now its purpose is to suppress those who recognise the teachings of God through Moses as paramount to an edict of Constantine; hence all the machinery of governments, which they have forced into their service in defiance of constitutional law, is evoked and set in action to put them down.

Synods and ecclesiastical councils declare that opposition to Sunday observance must be suppressed. State laws are enacted under whip and spur of the Church, when the prisons are filled with devout worshippers, whose only crime is disrespect for what they esteem man-made holy days.

Not only in Tennessee and Georgia, but in our own Illinois, the devil of persecution is incarnated, and is carrying on his despicable work. Four Adventists of Decker township, Richland county, were lately arrested and tried for violating the Sunday laws, and were each fined $1 and costs, amounting to over $100.

All these outrages against humanity for opinion's sake find their parallel in mediæval times; yet Protestants want the world to hold Catholicism only responsible for them. The spirit of persecution is always rampant in those countries where the Church holds sway, without regard to the sect in power.—Progressive Thinker.

Customer (in book store)—"I would like to get some good books on Faith." Clerk—"Sorry, sir, but our rule is to sell nothing to strangers except for cash."

ACID DROPS.

MANY years ago we met a blind clergyman in the train going from London to Leicester. He was armed with a sheaf of papers, including the Athenæum. We got into conversation with him, and found he was an American on a visit to England. He had seen Carlyle in London, and was going to preach the next day (Sunday) at Leicester. We chatted with him about papers and books and authors, and he seemed delighted. Of course he had not the remotest idea of our identity. His name was Milburn.

We presume it was the same Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind chaplain of the United States Congress, who is now on another visit to England, and has been interviewed by the Westminster Gazette. As there is a salary attached to the post, we are glad it has fallen to the lot of a blind man, for we have an unspeakable pity for all who are so afflicted.

The chaplain's duty is to open the sittings of Congress with prayer. He never exceeds five minutes, which is kind both to Congress and the Almighty. But his prayers do not seem to be answered. Colonel Ingersoll says that clergymen ask the Almighty to do impossible things. Only the other day, said "Bob," I heard the chaplain ask God to give Congress wisdom.

The mayor of Avignon wishes to make the old palace of the Popes there into a museum of antiquities, and has obtained permission from the Town Council to do so.

The French Catholics are afraid that, if they resist the tax on religious property, they will strengthen the hands of those who propose to suppress the Budget des Cultes, and, after some bluster, have decided to give up a sprat rather than risk catching no more mackerel.

The Roman Catholic Tablet, of course, considers the rejoicings at Rome, on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entrance of the Italian troops, as "insulting to the august Head of the Church," and among the insulting manifestations mentions "the illumination of the British Embassy." It is satisfactory to read, however, that "the Pope has shown himself wonderfully calm."

The Tablet (September 28) places side by side two paragraphs—one stating that the Rev. P. F. Gleeson, D.D., priest of the Church of Rome, has been received by Canon Duckworth, acting on behalf of the Bishop of London, into the Church of England. The other states that Rev. Patrick Francis Gleeson was charged at Lambeth with being drunk. He was helplessly intoxicated, and was lying in the road with his face cut. Perhaps he had been celebrating his conversion.

Cardinal Vaughan's statement that there are many Anglicans prepared to recognise in the Pope not only a primacy of honor, but a spiritual supremacy, has excited a lot of controversy in the Times and other papers, and has led to the mention that there are several secret societies among clericals who are prepared to do anything and everything to restore England once more to Rome.

The Pope says it is impossible to speak of conciliation with Italy until all the rights of the Church are restored. The Vatican organs take seriously the project to buy Rome for the Papacy. The Tribuna, the leading Liberal organ, ironically asks what England would say if the Irish in America proposed to buy Ireland.

It is a sad spectacle to see a clergyman in a Revision Court objecting to poor men as voters because they had received parish relief. Such a spectacle was recently witnessed at Westerham. The Rev. F. H. Jones, rector of the parish, attended to do the dirty work of Tory election agents. Several voters were struck off the list on his evidence. At last the Liberal agent insisted upon the production of the Relieving Officer's certificate. This, however, was not forthcoming; and the Revising Barrister asked the parson whether he might not be mistaken with respect to the two persons in question. The man of God was "positive the persons had had parish relief," but it turned out at the adjournment that he was positively wrong. Naturally the Revising Barrister expressed strong disapproval of Parson Jones's conduct; his remarks, he said, would have been stronger if the reverend gentleman had been present to hear them.

How meek and mild and forgiving our adherents of the religion of peace and goodwill always are. Here is the Daily News saying the Turks are treating Armenians "as Christian Europe cannot allow fellow-Christians to be treated. Lord Salisbury, backed by a unanimous public opinion, has sent an ultimatum to China to avenge the deaths of fellow-Christians. Unless Abdul Hamid makes up his mind quickly, the next ultimatum must go to Constantinople." Not much turning the other cheek about the organ of the Nonconformist conscience.

Digitized by Google

A landslip in Arabia has resulted in the loss of one hundred lives. They were only Muslims, and perhaps the displeasure of the Lord was upon them. If they had not sinned themselves, they had, at least, inherited the sin of Adam. He doeth all things well.

At St. Katherine's Church, Neath, at morning and evening services, a large portion of the congregation and the whole of the choir took their departure when the preacher entered the pulpit, this action being intended as a protest against the suspension of the Rev. J. T. Hoskin, the curate. On the previous Sunday that gentleman had stated that he would not preach again, as the Archdeacon had insulted him.

There has been a scene at the Blackburn School Board, where Mr. Cooper, a Nonconformist member, accused the Church party of attempting to proselytise the children of Nonconformist parents by the aid of public funds. It was reported that the Nonconformists attacked the Church of England from motives of jealousy, and stormy scenes ensued. The more church and chapel quarrel over religious education, the sooner sensible people will see that the State and public funds should be used to promote secular education only.

Christianity finds it easier to exterminate and supplant Pagans than to convert them. Even in America, where the aborigines have had nearly four hundred years of Christian religion and Christian rum, with Bibles, brandy, and the Holy Ghost thrown in, it is stated that only twelve per cent. of the Indian population are church members, and their membership would be uncertain but for blankets and other subsidies.

In the town of South Framingham, Mass., during a heavy thunderstorm, two elderly ladies of the Roman Catholic faith became so frightened at the idiosyncrasies of the elements that they fell upon their knees forthwith, and besought in prayer the protection of the Lord. They had scarcely thus manifested their trust in God and his goodness, and had not arisen from their knees, when a lightning-bolt knocked both insensible.

The New York Observer, a Presbyterian organ, laments that "the influence of Professor Huxley has been, and, we fear, will continue to be, pernicious to the cause of religion." How lamentable, too, that people continue to read the words of Huxley, while Candlish, Rutherford, Knox, Haliburton, and even Calvin, are neglected.

The Maories, whether they imbibed the belief from missionaries or not, used to prophesy the speedy coming of a millennium. The Hon. H. Meade, in his Ride through New Zealand, mentions that, "curiously enough, the prophet or leader of the last fanaticism, who foretold a millennium and a season of miraculous abundance of food and good things of all sorts, so close at hand and so bountiful that it was both useless and impious to go on planting or rearing stock, himself died of starvation in the woods whilst on a short journey." This prophet was evidently a more genuine believer than Prophet Baxter, who has well feathered his nest, yet refuses to leave any of his money to the poor on the day after that which he has predicted for the end of all things.

There is an honest boy at Coniston. He was found out in this way. A limelight lecture took place in aid of the Church Missionary Society, and the collection for the heathen included sweets, buttons, and other articles not particularly valued by missionaries. The next day the vicar visited the school, displayed before the boys the various non-negotiable articles found in the missionary box, and bade the scholars step forward and claim their gifts. Only one small boy responded. He pleaded guilty to a button. Let us hope his mother sewed it on again.

The Rev. Edward Oerton, vicar of Tebay, and a Justice of the Peace for Westmoreland, has been suspended for six months from the duties of his office for alleged improprieties with members of his congregation. It transpires that a private inquiry was held at Grange by the Bishop of Carlisle into the allegations made against Mr. Oerton, with the result stated. It is also said that Mr. Oerton has been discharged from the living of Tebay.

The Rev. Jonathan Crosland, late vicar of Kilham, Yorkshire, has been deprived of his living, and the Archbishop of York has taken away his orders. At Driffield an order was made against him by the magistrates for the maintenance of his late servant's child.

The latest statistics of India show that among the inhabitants of the country there is one convicted criminal to every 274 European Christians, to every 509 European Asiatics (the children of European fathers and native mothers), to every 709 native Christians, to every 1,361 Hindu Brahmans, and to every 3,787 Buddhists. Accordingly, as a matter of fact, European Christians furnish comparatively the greatest amount of criminals, and Buddhists the fewest.

To the Convention of the London Missionary Society a paper was sent over from Bangalore by the Rev. T. E. Slater, missionary to educated Hindus, on "Openings of Christian Work among Students and Educated Men in India." The writer said that since the days of Macaulay and Duff the British Government had nurtured two generations of university youths in India on the literature, philosophy, and science of the West, and also on the strong meat of English political ideas. So a powerful and rapidly-increasing educated class had been created. But, sad to say, of the tens of thousands who obtained an English education only a few became professing Christians. "Young India was impressed alike by Western truth and Western scepticism, and many souls were being wrecked on the rocks of rationalism, agnosticism, and intemperance." What a nice collocation! It is not the missionaries who introduce beer drinking. Oh, dear no. This comes from the Rationalists and Agnostics.

According to Science Siftings (September 28), Dr. Forbes Winslow, who states that "Jack the Ripper" is now in a lunatic asylum, says this notorious criminal was a medical student of good family, who studied hard and his mind gave way. He then "became a religious enthusiast, and attended early service every morning at St. Paul's. His religious fervor resulted in homicidal mania towards the women of the street, and impelled him to murder them." Such is the testimony of Dr. Forbes Winslow, who says the facts are known to the authorities.

Christian politics are occupying a large amount of public attention and newspaper space at present. The pressing question in ecclesiastical circles is the "star" system of preaching. The star system of dramatic acting is pretty familiar; provincial audiences ought to know anyhow, for the travelling companies that they see are generally composed of one "star" and a collection of "sticks." It is the same with the Christian Church, showing how close is its connection with the stage. Certain long-tongued cushion-thumpers are selected for their gift of the gab as special preachers, and they go up and down the country, practically giving entertainments, to call a spade a spade, by playing lingual gymnastics for the delectation of their auditors. The most successful "stars" are those who can best hide a grain of doctrine in a bushel of wind, and it would not be difficult to place the finger on a number of popular preachers who fill the bill to perfection.—Crescent.

A correspondence has been going on in the English Mechanic on the disagreeable topic of "Buried Alive." It is generally allowed that, owing to the laxity of death certificates, the danger is a real one, and that cremation would provide a remedy. The late Dr. H. Prater, a Freethinker and author of Letters to the American People, left directions in his will that a surgical incision should be made in his arm before burial.

"Bibulous" writes to the Glasgow Weekly Herald: "I wish one of our city ministers would preach a stirring sermon on the iniquity of putting bad corks in beer-bottles. I buy my liquors from one of the most conscientious merchants in the town. His beer, wine, whisky, and brandy are all that the most fastidious could desire; but the corks——. Not one in ten comes out whole. I am a mild-mannered man, seldom indulging in vituperation; but, after vainly trying for more than half-an-hour to take the cork out of a bottle of Bass in microscopic instalments, my temper fails, and then, as you imagine, my language is strong. Judging from my own experience, I should say that there is no more prolific source of profanity, and I ask the clergy to use their influence to stop such wholesale demoralisation."

The Blue Grass Blade chaffs Sister Frances Willard, of the W.T.C.U., on being one of the committee to bring out the Woman's Bible. Brother Moore says: "Sister Fannie, with whom I have done some little flirtation in Prohibition circles, will knock out that story about Jesus making wine, and about Noah getting on a high lonesome as soon as he could find a saloon after getting off the ark, but it would not seem fitting for her to want to swipe out those passages where Brother Paul advises against matrimony."

The Rev. Norman Macleod sees that cycles are breaking up the Scotch Sawbath, and he hopes the wheelmen will draw the line. He doesn't see any harm in a person riding a bicycle to church, but at the same time he doesn't approve of Sunday being used as a holiday for cycling.

Digitized by Google

We see from the Straits Times that an English magistrate, in charge at Pekan, in the Malay Peninsula, excited much indignation by ordering that the body of a Malay, who died of cholera, should be burnt. The Malays hold that cremation prevents the possibility of resurrection, and the magistrate guilty of such an outrage will never be forgiven.

Such mistakes often occur in dealing with other races, and people are surprised that they show such enmity to foreigners, forgetting that the foreigners often outrage their most cherished convictions. Some years ago the Bible Society sent a large cargo of Hindustani Bibles to India bound in leather. Of course no Hindu would as much as touch the volume, which on its very outside reminded them of the slaughter of the sacred cow.

The Society of Christian Endeavor has had an undoubted success in America, chiefly, it is suspected, because it leads to a deal of sweethearting and match-making. The movement is seen to be a secularising one under Christian pretences, and it is breaking down the old idea of feminine subordination in the Church. Under these circumstances it is vigorously denounced by the Rev. E. Brantly, in the Presbyterian Quarterly, as one of the cunning wiles of the Devil, which leads "further on towards Rationalism, Jacobinism, disintegration."

The Baptists of Portobello have Sunday salt-water baptisms of all converts; but the proceeding of plunging the elect over head and ears amid the tumbling waves always draws a large and derisive crowd, whose laughter and shouts, according to the newspaper reports, are "scarcely in keeping with the sacred performance." We are ardent believers in the efficacy of this kind of baptism, but prefer to dispense with the services of any officiating minister.

Reynolds's Newspaper, reviewing The Pilgrims and the Anglican Church, by W. Deverell, says of the Pagans: "They persecuted, but with a leniency that sinks into insignificance when the bloody horrors which have marked the track of Christianity are remembered."

The Rev. A. J. Waldron has been delivering a course of lectures at New Brompton. One of his subjects was "My Debate with Mr. Foote—a Retrospect." Surely this is a curious proceeding. It would be better to let the debate stand than to have it over again—in Mr. Foote's absence.

We do not suppose that Mr. Macdonald, the editor of the New York Truthseeker, has been subtly bribing the editor of the Christian Reformer; but the latter gentleman is anxiously endeavoring to push the former into prominent notice. First he suggests that the Truthseeker comes within the provisions of the law against blasphemy. Then, not satisfied with this good advertisement, he writes: "We cannot understand why the post-office authorities of New York City, or the Society for the Suppression of Vice and Immorality, do not compel the publishers to change the character of the paper, or suppress it as an enemy of public morals and the nation's weal." The Christian Reformer is evidently actuated by the true Christian spirit, and we hope that Brother Macdonald duly appreciates its loving kindness. The prosecution of the late D. M. Bennett did a deal towards putting the Truthseeker on a firm basis, and the Christian Reformer, doubtless aware of this, is anxious to give it another lift by the means of that eminent protector of American morality, Anthony Comstock. Should the circulation of the Truthseeker shoot up wonderfully, we hope it will not forget how much it owes to the kind attentions of the Christian Reformer.

According to the Church Reformer, the Rev. George Brooks, Mr. Balfour's Bounty Brooks, the bankrupt, begging-letter writer, who keeps his horse and carriage, is the author of the attack on the Christian Social Union in the Church Quarterly Review. Was it for this he was rewarded by the author of A Defence of Philosophic Doubt?

The Rev. J. Carvell Williams, writing in the Daily News, says that the clergy often demand high fees for burying in vaults, on the plea that they grant a portion of their supposed freehold. But, legally, no such grant can be made, and Mr. Williams states that, "as a matter of fact, some of the clergy, knowing that this is the law, show their hatred of Nonconformist services in churchyards by refusing to allow the burials to take place in the family graves which are supposed to have been purchased by the deceased persons or their predecessors."

"Surely, Mr. Editor," continues Mr. Williams, "it is a pitiful thing that the ministry of the Established Church should be in any degree dependent for their maintenance on what are practically taxes levied on the burial of the dead, and which are sometimes illegally demanded also."

The Pope has been giving himself up to prayer and meditation. The only person to whom the Pontiff has thrown open the doors of his room of seclusion is Ugolini, the painter, who, in painting his portrait, has very discreetly avoided the reproduction of the Pope's distinct resemblance to Voltaire, one of his Holiness's bêtes noires. The German painter, Lenbach, having painted too faithful a portrait, "Questa è una volpe!" cried the Pope angrily, turning his back upon the picture and walking out of the room—"It is the portrait of a fox."

Dean Farrar, in the October Fortnightly Review, examines the "Asserted Growth of Roman Catholicism in England," and comes to exactly the conclusion anyone might have expected of him—that Romanism is becoming "more and more powerless, more and more verbal among the immense majority of the people, especially of the men," not only in England, but in the very countries in which it has "held for centuries an almost undisputed sway."

The rowdy fiasco at the curates' meeting will, it is hoped, hinder our spiritual pastors and masters from giving lessons on behavior to working men for some time to come. The Church Reformer says of the meeting: "Both sides ought to be thoroughly ashamed of themselves."

According to a paragraph in the London Star, the Gillingham School Board (near Chatham) has just voted on a proposal to rescind the teaching of the Apostles' Creed. The motion was lost by one vote, and that vote was cast by the Secularist member. We shall be glad to receive some account of this matter from Mr. Thompson.

Here is the Rev. Charles Harris writing to the Church Reformer (an organ which, under the conduct of the Rev. S. Headlam, has opposed the Blasphemy Laws) declaring that, "as Coke well puts it, Christianity is part and parcel of the law of England." The Rev. C. Harris is evidently unaware that Lord Chief-Justice Coleridge, in the trial of the editor of this paper, laid it down that that old dictum no longer held good, being invalidated by the admission of Jews to Parliament and to the highest offices in the land.

Mr. Gladstone has written and talked on many subjects, and it appears that he is now going to tackle the question of Immortality. It is said that he does not consider man to be intrinsically immortal, but immortalisable; that is, he may become immortal by availing himself of the redemption of Jesus Christ. What a pity it is that the question is still debateable after so much debate! Jehovah's revelation requires to be revealed, and Mr. Gladstone will try to explain it; but people are sure to wish that he would explain his explanation. Like the man in Punch, the world "gets no forrarder" in theology.

The British Army is becoming a very cosmopolitan body. It includes Protestants, Catholics, Jews, Mohammedans, Brahmists, Buddhists, and the Lord knows what besides. Lord Wolseley says that a friend of his, a colonel, has recently become a Jew, while another has become a Buddhist. We suppose they will all sit down with Abraham in the kingdom of heaven. But, of course, the non-religious soldiers—like Cæsar, Frederick the Great, Napoleon, Peterborough, and Garibaldi—will be excluded. Well, it will be a rather poor muster without them, from the military point of view.

Obituary.

Mr. Samuel Standring died in the Manchester Royal Infirmary on Friday afternoon, September 28. The funeral took place on Wednesday, the remains being incinerated in the local Crematorium. Messrs. Willock, of Manchester, and Howarth, of Rochdale, superintended the obsequies. A long and favorable notice of the deceased appeared in Saturday's Rochdale Observer. He was forty-two years of age. Mr. Standring was a man of active and enterprising character. In his lifetime he attempted many things, too often going beyond his strength, which he finally exhausted, beyond all hope of recovery.

Modern Persecution.—A man may be entirely uninjured in his body by the actions of his fellow men, and he may be entirely unimpeded in his movements by them, and he may yet be prevented from carrying on the activities needful for the maintenance of life.....No interference of this kind is possible without a breach of the law of equal freedom.—Herbert Spencer.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, October 6, Masonic Hall, High-street, Wood Green:—7.30, "Life, Death, and After."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. CHARLES WATTS'S ENGAGEMENTS.—October 6, Foresters' Hall, London; 13, Foresters' Hall; 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 18, North Shields; 20, Glasgow; 24 and 25, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. November 17, Liverpool; 24, Manchester.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

STANLEY JONES, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London, N., having been disappointed of a course of engagement in Scotland, desires to fill up his Sundays either in London or the country.

OLD DEVONIAN.—Pleased to have your good wishes.

G. HOLLOWAY sends his shilling, and hopes we shall get "ten thousand more." We should do so if our readers would all "rise to the occasion."

A. HAYNES.—Hope we have your initial right. Thanks for the Bromley paper. See paragraph.

G. ENNION.—A good joke, but it has already appeared in the Freethinker.

W. CLOSE.—We hope to give some more illustrations during the winter. Glad to hear you like Mr. Putnam's account of his experiences in this country. We note your hope that "the rank and file, more especially the 'passive' ones, will support you during Shilling Week, so that when the winter is passed they may look back with pride at having helped you and others to lift the dark cloud of superstition hanging all round."

E. G. TAYLOR.—Thanks for the copy of Mr. Storey's letter. It was only natural that orthodox bigots should oppose him, with every device of malignity, for introducing a Bill to give Freethinkers the same rights of citizenship as are enjoyed by Christians. We hope to get a report of the trial of his election petition. Anything you send us will be valued.

C. LEWIS.—The Cheshire Branch, one of the poorest, is the first in the field with its Shilling Week subscription. Mr. Foote hopes to visit Chester before Christmas.

MRS. BESANT, in sending four shillings, expresses "every good wish for the success of Mr. Foote's meritorious undertakings generally."

A BLACKPOOL FRIEND, in sending twenty shillings, writes: "Keep pushing on, but don't be discouraged if things do not go forward as quickly as you would like; Freethought is a plant of slow growth." We assure this friend that there is little fear of our being discouraged. It was said of one of the greatest of men, Oliver Cromwell, by an intimate acquaintance, that hope shone in him like a pillar of fire when it had almost gone out in others. In a humble way we aspire to emulate that mighty example.

HERALITE sends the result of "Self-denial to aid Freethought."

T. DUNBAR says: "I approve of your plan of propaganda, and hope all Freethinkers will consider it their duty to give according to their means." If they only do so, we will make Freethought propaganda "spin" during the coming winter.

C. K. DUMAS.—Mr. Edwards is quite right, in his Witness of Assyria (an excellent book), in saying that there is no evidence, except their own statements, that the Jews were ever in Egypt. Bishop Tomline's reference to the "shepherd people" is very misleading. There was a Shepherd Dynasty in Egypt at one time, but it was afterwards expelled. This has no connection whatever with the Bible story.

J. P. GILMOUR.—Glad to hear of Mr. Heaford's success at Glasgow. His abilities and accomplishments deserve a wider recognition, to say nothing of his zealous and modest character.

TOBY KING.—It was like you to send a shilling for every week in a year. We hope soon to have the pleasure of shaking hands with you again.

ALPHA.—Pleased to hear that, despite your physical infirmity and failing eyesight, you still enjoy your Freethinker.

W. A. NEWCOMBE.—As you say, the battle of Freethought is far from ended.

DANIEL BAKER, the Birmingham veteran, who sends his shillings for the new fund, says: "I hope there will be many of them. Glad to see you reported in such good health."

H. W. D., who sends fifteen shillings, says: "I hope you will receive at least a thousand more such sums, as I know there are many Freethinkers who could well afford it."

G. J. WILLIAMSON, subscribing, writes: "Though not a member of the N.S.S., I am a constant reader and admirer of your paper, and wish you every success."

E. W. W.—Thanks for cuttings.

H. A. CUMBER, subscribing to Shilling Week, writes: "I thought it would not be altogether absurd if I asked a few professedly Christian friends to subscribe, especially after Mr. Holyoake's contribution to the Salvation Army; but I am sorry to say I failed miserably." Of course!

R. VERNEY, who is "only a poor working girl," but takes "a keen interest in the Secular movement," sends her mite, and hopes Mr. Foote's scheme will be a great success.

C. D., sending ten shillings, hopes "a large number of readers of the Freethinker will respond liberally, as well as many outsiders."

N.S.S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges:—Tottenham Branch, 5s. 8d.; Bethnal Green Branch, 5s. 6d.; Barnsley Branch, 5s.; Parcel of clothing from Mrs. Mann.

H. S. W., in subscribing to Shilling Week, wishes that something could be done at Weymouth in the way of Freethought propaganda. There are several Freethinkers in the place, but on the whole it is the most bigoted in the south of England.

D. G. LINDSAY.—Thanks for Glasgow list of subscriptions.

E. RAE.—In June, 1877, the Secular Review and Secularist amalgamated. No. 1, vol. i., bears date June 9, 1877.

W. CARELL thinks that some of Mr. Symes's queries in our last issue were unhappy. For instance, "Why none of those benefited by Jesus took the trouble to preach his gospel or advertise his healing power." Our correspondent points to Mark vii. 36, which flatly contradicts this. Mr. Symes would probably reply that the statement is too general, and appears only in the Christian record, without any outside corroboration.

E. P.—Thanks for your subscription, which is acknowledged in list. No doubt boys might sell some copies of the Freethinker on Sunday mornings, but there are difficulties in the way. Their mothers interfere, or their employers object to "blasphemy" being associated with "proper" publications—such, for instance, as the pictorial ones that purvey nudity.

F. J. BOORMAN.—Surely there must be some mistake. We can hardly believe that Mr. Waldron could publicly speak of Colonel Ingersoll as a loud-mouthed orator and blasphemer, as an advocate of the doctrine that a man who tires of one wife should take another, and as one who cursed his mother's God and called her a fool for believing in the Bible. We hope Mr. Waldron will be able and willing to deny that he uttered such contemptible stuff. The other matters shall be looked into, and dealt with next week if possible.

PAPERS RECEIVED.—Rochdale Observer—Straits Times—Isle of Man Times—Look Times—Church Reformer—Le Peuple—Le Matin—Reynolds's Newspaper—Weekly Dispatch—Melbourne Age—The Literary Guide—English Mechanic—Two Worlds—Melbourne Standard—Progressive Thinker—Secular Thought—Open Court—Zoophilist—Boston Investigator—Truthseeker—Liberator—Der Arme Teufel—Freidenker.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker* will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

CORRESPONDENCE should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

IT being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SHILLING WEEK.

As we go to press on Wednesday, the Freethinker is practically completed on Tuesday evening. I am therefore only able to acknowledge, this week, the subscriptions that have reached me up to the end of the first day in October. Six more days remain to complete the first week, and I hope every one of them will bring me a large batch of letters with remittances.

The object of this subscription, as already stated, is to send good Freethought lecturers into all parts of the kingdom. With the unanimous concurrence of the National Secular Society's Executive, I am taking personal charge of this enterprise; and what I can do will depend on the means placed at my disposal.

It seems to me that such means should be adequate. There are scores of Freethinkers who could spare a pound, hundreds who could spare a few shillings, thousands who could spare one. If all who can do something, whatever it is, will only do it, we shall see the beginning of a new era in the propagation of Freethought.

As it happens, this is "Self-Denial Week" with the Salvation Army. "General" Booth's soldiers are denying themselves meat, tea, sugar, and all sorts of comforts and even necessaries. I do not ask my readers to go to that extreme. I only ask them, especially if they feel "saved" themselves, to assist in carrying salvation to others. Let them not wait for "a more favorable opportunity," but give what they can afford, however small it may be. There should be a glorious feeling of comradeship in the knowledge that now—at this very hour—other Freethinkers in other parts of the country are doing the very same thing. Though they cannot see each other, they know of each other's existence, being connected by the impalpable and invisible ties of common sympathy for a splendid cause. G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

J. B., 2s.; Le Diable, 2s. 6d.; H. J. Barter, 2s. 6d.; J. M., 2s. 6d.; W. Clegg, 1s.; W. C. Stuart, £1 1s.; Plymouth Friend, per H. J. B., 2s. 6d.; Mrs. Bezant, 4s.; A Friend, £1; C. Shepherd, 2s.; W. C. (Dorking), 10s. 6d.; W. Lamb, 4s.; Hemalite, 2s.; E. Calvert, 1s.; T. Dunbar, 1s. 6d.; A. Haynes, 1s.; Cheshire Branch of the N.S.S., 10s.; Old Devonian, 2s.; G. Holloway, 1s.; M. Christopher, 1s.; J. Eccles, 1s. 6d.; H. S. Woolley, 3s.; E. P., £1; Alpha, 1s.; J. Brierley, 1s.; W. A. Newcomb, 1s.; Daniel Baker, 5s.; Worker, 1s.; J. Garven, 1s.; H. W. D., 15s.; H. A. Cumber, 5s.; R. Verney, 2s.; C. D., 10s.; J. H. Williamson, 2s. 6d.; A. Firth, 2s.; W. W. Roberts, 2s.; C. J. Gask, 2s. 6d.; H. J. Thorp, 3s.; Victmount, 1s.

From Glasgow:—D. McFarlane, 1s.; J. Threlkeld, 1s.; W. Allbin, 1s.; T. Train, 2s.; W. Owen, 1s.; A. Young, 1s.; T. McCormack, 1s.; W. F., 2s.

Per Miss Vance:—H. Good, 2s.; W. Nash, 1s.; Mrs. Marsh, 1s.; J. Embleton, 2s.

Per R. Forder:—J. H. Begg, 1s. 9d.; W. L., 1s.; W. Palmer, 1s.; M. L., 1s.; S. H. Munns, 1s.; J. Munns, 1s.; Mrs. Small, 10s.; J. Edwards, 4s.; Toby King (1s. a week yearly), 52s.; F. T. R., 10s.; Four Britons, 4s.; W. Baxter, 1s.; H. Wallace, 1s.; T. Dunbar Harris, 20s.; W. J. Scottow, 2s. 6d.

SUGAR PLUMS.

In spite of the phenomenal weather, there was an improved audience at Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening, when Mr. Foote lectured on "Clinging to Christ." When the cold weather sets in the hall will no doubt be thoroughly crowded. Up to the present the collections have been really good. Mr. Foote's taking the personal responsibility of the venture seems to have appealed to the audience's generosity. One friend, on Sunday evening, dropped a sovereign in the collection plate. As for the lecture, it was received with most pronounced enthusiasm. Mr. James Rowney made, as usual, an excellent chairman.

Following his new plan, Mr. Foote lectures this evening (October 6) in the Masonic Hall, High-street, Wood-Green; a populous neighborhood on the northern heights of London. There has been a good deal of open-air Freethought propaganda in the district, and the enterprise of the Branch in starting indoor lectures ought to be crowned with success. Mr. Foote's lecture is on "Life, Death, and After." During the evening he will name a child of Mr. Thompson. Tickets of admission to this lecture (1s., 6d., and 3d.) can be obtained of Mr. John Wood, 71 Gladstone-avenue; or of Mr. S. R. Thompson, 35 Clyde-road, South Tottenham.

Mr. John Wood, secretary of the Wood Green Branch, will be outside the Masonic Hall at 7 o'clock, ready to inform non-holders of tickets where they can obtain them.

The Wood Green open-air meetings have been much disturbed lately. Christian rowdies have endeavored to break them up, and we hear that the police have looked on with indifference at obvious breaches of the peace. Mr. C. Cohen delivers a special lecture at Jolly Butchers' Hill next Thursday evening (October 10) at 8 o'clock, and we hope the local Freethinkers will rally around him on that occasion.

Notwithstanding the remarkable weather we have been having of late, Mr. Charles Watts had a capital audience at Camberwell last Sunday evening. His lecture on "The Bible and Civilisation" was most enthusiastically received, Mr. Watts being in his best form. We are glad to hear that new members are joining this promising Branch of the N.S.S.

This evening (Sunday, October 6) Mr. Watts occupies the platform at Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, E.C., when he will deliver his new lecture, "The Bible and Dramatic Literature." It is a good subject, and should draw a crowded audience.

We have received a welcome letter from Mr. S. P. Putnam, who arrived safe, sound, and jolly at New York, and is now busy in preparing for the Annual Convention of the American Secular Union. Mr. Putnam's passage was rather a stormy one, but he was not sea-sick; in fact, he came up—or rather went down—smiling every time the bell rang for meals. One big wave that washed the deck broke a clergyman's leg. No doubt it was intended for friend Putnam, but it missed its mark. Still, we are sorry for the clergyman, though he has got a good text for a new sermon on Providence.

The Leek Times reproduces Mr. Foote's leaderette on "Mr. Howard's Challenge" from the Freethinker, and we shall see what the reverend gentleman has to say in reply. It is charitable to pass over his long and wordy letter on Mr. Wheeler's brief note. We prefer to take Mr. Howard, if he will let us, on his manlier side. He concludes by expressing admiration for Mr. Foote's "great ability and earnestness." "Would," he says, "that all our preachers were as active in spreading the truth as he is in diffusing his unbelief. Surely he and men like him should put many of us to shame. We wish him nothing worse than that his distinguished abilities and untiring efforts should be spent in a worthy cause, and that he might achieve the success commensurate with the same." Mr. Howard will pardon Mr. Foote for thinking that the Freethought cause is "worthy" of his best service.

Professor Ernst Haeckel, contrasting Huxley and Carl Vogt, says that the former laid his foundations far deeper than Vogt had done. Vogt had a liking for laughing at philosophy generally, while Huxley gave it duly the highest place in the whole kingdom of science. As a Monistic philosopher and founder of the ape-theory, Huxley ranks higher than Vogt. Thomas Huxley belonged to that small number of far-seeing naturalists who, from the very beginning, saw the epoch-making import of Darwin's work of research carried on through fifty years, and who, with unselfish devotion, worked out the detailed application of his theories and aided their propagation. The pre-requisites for such work were not only an extensive and thorough knowledge in all fields of biology and a clear sagacity of judgment, but also that moral courage which, regardless of consequences, assails a "mountain of prejudices" many thousand years old, and seeks truth for its own sake.

The British Association having decided to visit Toronto in 1897, they will be invited to become the guests of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, which will probably hold its meeting at San Francisco.

On Monday, October 14, the Finsbury Branch of the N.S.S. have a dinner and entertainment in the large hall of the Eldorado Club, 30 East-street, City-road, E.C. The tickets, which for two shillings include Dinner, Concert, and Dance, can be obtained from the secretary, 21 Coburg-street, Clerkenwell, or at 28 Stonecutter-street.

Mr. Parris lectures in the Secular Hall, Humberstone Gate, Leicester, this Sunday, both morning and evening. His subjects, as usual, are interesting and important.

A commemorative tablet has been placed on the house at Potsdam in which Helmholtz was born. It is expected that the house at Ealing where Huxley first saw the light will be marked in a similar manner.

The National Congress of the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America will be held at New York on October 25 and 26. The Revival of Sunday Laws in New York should serve to consolidate the forces of Freethought.

In the Islamic World Sheikh Abdullah Quilliam contrasts the superstitious medicine of the seventeenth century with the long anterior science of the Arabs, much to the disadvantage of the former. Moulri Mohammad Aboul Ghani, B.A., M.D., also shows there is something to be said for Eastern polygamy—at any rate, when contrasted with Western prostitution.

Mr. Cohen has had fairly successful meetings during his three weeks' mission at Birmingham, especially at his open-air lectures. He winds up to-day (October 6), and we hope there will be a good attendance. Tea will be provided in the hall for visitors from a distance. We are glad to hear that Mr. Cohen's mission has brought the Branch several new members.

Mr. Frank Creswell is the new secretary of the Newcastle Branch, which augurs well for its future prosperity. Mr. J. G. Bartram, who has for some time conducted the Branch's business with zeal and ability, has had to resign in consequence of change of employment and removal from the city. It has been decided to resume the Sunday morning lectures on the quayside.

Digitized by Google

We hope the Newcastle friends will do their utmost to make a great success of the approaching debate between Mr. Charles Watts and the Rev. A. J. Waldron. A large hall is engaged, and we hope it will be crowded. Some local misunderstanding has existed, but this should not interfere with a serious interest. Mr. Foote appeals personally to all his friends in the district to make the debate widely known, and not only to attend themselves, but to bring as many as possible of their acquaintances.

The Bradford Branch will have a Tea and Dance on Tuesday evening (Oct. 8) in the Milton Rooms, Westgate. Tea on tables at 6.30. After the tea the dancing will proceed till eleven o'clock. Tickets are ninepence each, and can be obtained of Messrs. Gott, Sunderland, and J. T. Carpendale, secretary, 38 Acton-street. There ought to be a good muster.

A monument has been erected in Rome to the Liberal poet, Pietro Cossa. Cossa was expelled from a Jesuit college, being accused of heresy and Liberalism. He was afterwards exiled, and went to Peru. The scene at the ceremony was one of great enthusiasm.

The new issue of the Agnostic Annual, to be published on Monday, will contain a special article by Mr. Samuel Laing in reply to Mr. Balfour's Foundations of Belief. Mr. J. Allanson Picton contributes an article on "The Man, Christ Jesus: The Germ of the Christian Myth," which should be both important and interesting.

Mr. W. H. Pollock, who writes in Longman's Magazine on "Marseilles," says that many of the working classes are Athists, and do not wrap up their unbelief with such words as "Agnosticism." At the same time, he says, they never take any step of importance in civil life "without an elaborate and expensive church ceremony." Mr. Pollock appears to regard this as singular. He forgets that there are women as well as men in Marseilles, who have to be consulted about baptisms, marriages, and funerals.

The International Conference of Freethinkers, at Brussels, seems to have been well attended. Among speakers were MM. Fulpius, Robin, Schaere, Furnémont, and des Essarts. The ladies were well to the fore, including Frau Wilhelmi, Mlle. Verone, Mmes. Barberousse, Van Kol, etc. It was even proposed by one delegate that the government of the family should be matriarchale, children taking names from their mothers; but this was negatived in favor of the complete equality of the sexes. A proposition to make August 15 a festival of peace was also negatived. Messrs. Forder and Ward represented the National Secular Society.

Mr. W. Heaford is spending a part of his annual holiday on a lecturing tour in the north. He had three very successful meetings at Glasgow on Sunday. The evening lecture on "Is Christianity Consistent with Socialism?" gave rise to a protracted discussion, sustained principally by Anarchist opponents. Mr. Heaford is to hold a debate with Mr. M. Gass, who is retained by the Bridgeton Branch of the Independent Labor Party, on the question, "Do the Teachings of Jesus Christ Proclaim Socialism?"

The Failsworth Secular Sunday-school has arranged a String Band Concert, interspersed with songs, for this evening (Oct. 6). It begins at 6.30, and the admission is free, with a collection to defray expenses. Secular friends in the neighborhood, if they drop in, will spend an enjoyable evening.

Christian Science.

The following interesting reply was returned to a circular letter soliciting subscriptions to a certain medical journal (Pacific Drug Review):—"Fairbault, Minn., February 22nd, 1894.—Your copy of the ——— Journal come, and the letter to, askin me to send fifty cens and git it fur a yeer, I dont need no jurnals. When I git a tuff case, I go off inter sum secrit place and tell the lord all about it and wate for him to put inter my minde what ter do. That's bettern jurnals and skylopeds and such. If we hel more lord trustin doctors and less colleges weed fare better. The lord noes morn all the doctors, and if we go to him for noledge it ill be bettern jurnals naterally in the lord.—A CHRISTIAN DOCTER."—Dublin Journal of Medical Science.

MARRIAGE.—At the Registrar's Office, South Shields, Miss Adelaide Emily (Ada) Moir, of South Shields, to Frederick John Stockill, of Leeds. Miss Moir was one of the most useful members of the South Shields Branch.

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (August 24).

THERE is no evidence that the poet's married life was an unhappy one; that he ever ceased his affection for his wife, or that he went to London from any other motive than an honorable desire to better his condition and that of his family. There is no evidence that he ever stole the deer, or was arrested for any youthful escapade and had to run away. There is no doubt that Shakespeare was a manly youth, honest, straightforward, energetic, and handsome. He went to London to make a fortune. He probably had many good friends to help him, among them the actors who visited his native town and were cordially welcomed and sustained by Shakespeare's father, who was fond of dramatic entertainments. There is no evidence that Shakespeare went to London penniless, or that he was obliged to hold horses at the theatre doors for a scanty living. Shakespeare was a first-class business man, practical and sagacious, if he was a poet. I have no doubt he went to London with a good capital to start with and ample support. He was the kind of man to make friends and to keep them. Shakespeare became, for his time, a very wealthy man; and not by luck, but by foresight, labor, pluck, and perseverance.

From Ann Hathaway's cottage we drive to the church, a noble structure, which shows by its size and stateliness that Stratford must have been a town of note before Shakespeare's era. What a beautiful churchyard is here, the sunlight falling through the green arches upon the green grass and the solemn gravestones, even as when the poet mused and dreamed along the banks of the Avon. We enter the church and wander among the memorials of the dead. We stand by the tomb of Shakespeare. I can only express myself in the noble words of Washington Irving: "There are other monuments around, but the mind refuses to dwell on anything that is not connected with Shakespeare; his idea pervades the place, the whole pile seems to be his mausoleum. The feelings, no longer checked and thwarted by doubt, here indulge in perfect confidence. Other traces of him may be false or dubious, but here is palpable evidence and absolute certainty. As I trod the sounding pavement there was something intense and thrilling in the idea that in very truth the remains of Shakespeare were mouldering beneath my feet. It was a long time before I could prevail upon myself to leave the place, and as I passed through the churchyard I plucked a branch from one of the yew-trees, the only relic I have brought from Stratford."

As I was passing through the same churchyard I found the workmen cutting down an ancient yew-tree, of which I secured a branch, also some leaves and grass, and yellow buttercups and white daisies and a beautiful red rose, in whose fading splendors I shall ever see the glory of Stratford church.

From the churchyard we walk past the great Lucy Mill, built about two centuries ago, from under whose wheel the waters of the Avon swirl and dash away; thence we pass over a foot-bridge to the other side of the river; and here, for a half-hour or so, we remain under the stone bridge of the railway, for the rain is coming down in torrents. It was a picturesque scene; the old bridge, the mill and wheel, the church tower just beyond, glimpses of the village, a couple of fishermen on the banks, the prosperous Londoner, besides the yokel who does not seem to have changed since Shakespeare's time, and our own company trying to be as philosophical as possible. When there is a burst of sunshine we make a start over the meadows. The rain, however, has only stopped in order to make a more furious onset, which we meet just as we are half across. But the rain adds such a misty loveliness to the whole scene that I cannot but remain and enjoy it, even if I do get wet to the skin. The river is flowing along, and beyond it on the wooded bank looms the church in a veil of shining mist; and the trees seem to be dripping with a million diamonds, and the grass presents the freshness and cleanliness of an emerald floor, and the roofs of the houses glitter where the columns of rain are already marching off from the advancing sun.

All this journeying and sight-seeing does at last make us hungry, hungry as bears. We therefore betake ourselves to Swan's Nest Hotel. This used to be called "The Leg of Mutton," and the picture of the leg of mutton is still there. I like the title "Leg of Mutton." It is not so euphonious as the present name, but it is more suggestive to the hungry traveller. However, it is a jolly tavern, and we gather around the table and proceed to demolish about the best beefsteak I have ever tackled. As they say in Western parlance, it goes to the spot. If Shakespeare lived on such beefsteak as this, no wonder that he produced such glorious poetry. Beefsteak is much better than Bacon, I think, for Shakespeare poetry.

After the pleasant festivities of the table, we visit the Memorial Theatre, Library, and Picture Gallery. This pile of buildings will always be connected with the name of

Digitized by Google

Charles Fowler, who gave the grounds and worked energetically for its completion. Within is a large library devoted entirely to Shakespeare—his works printed in almost every language. In the last report is noted a donation of books in the Cingalese. In the picture gallery are portraits of actors and actresses in their great Shakespearean characters, and engravings and paintings of many of the famous scenes in the poet's plays. We climb the tower, whence there is a vast and beautiful view of the city and surrounding country. In April, the month of Shakespeare's birth, the theatre is open, and the best dramas of English literature are produced. There is generally a fortnight's festivities, and it is a wonderful occasion for the lovers of Shakespeare. From the building we pass forth into the gardens alongside the Avon, where one can sit for hours and watch the ever-changing prospect and the varying faces of people from all parts of the world, who come to see the memorials of England's greatest glory.

Thence I go to the grammar school where Shakespeare learned "a little Latin and less Greek." This school and the guild were in existence in the fourteenth century. The long room on the ground floor was the Guildhall. This hall is interesting from the fact that it was the scene of dramatic representation in the poet's youth. John Shakespeare, the poet's father, greatly encouraged the drama while mayor. This was when Willie was about five years old. Does it not seem probable that the child's imagination was fired by witnessing these performances? Here is the Latin school-room in which the poet received his classical education, and the very desk is shown at which he used to study. Shakespeare went to school until his fifteenth year, when reverses in his father's estate caused him to be taken out to work on the farm. Still he might have been fitted for the university while in school. The school dates from Edward VI., and the opportunities for instruction were quite favorable. At the time of Shakespeare's youth children were sent to the English schools at the age of five, and at seven they commenced the study of Latin, the regular course taking about ten years, so that boys usually left school for university studies at the age of fifteen. Among the books read were those of Æsop, Ovid, Virgil, Terence, Cicero, Horace, and Seneca. Shakespeare might have been familiar with all these authors when he left Avon. He had good opportunities for a classical education, much more than Ben Jonson gives him credit for. There is not a particle of classical scholarship displayed in Shakespeare's poems that he could not have acquired before he was fifteen years old.

From the grammar school we turn our steps to the New Place, where Shakespeare passed the last years of his life. Alas! the house where Shakespeare lived is gone; only the foundation is left. It was a clergyman who cut down Shakespeare's favorite mulberry-tree in the garden, and also demolished the house itself in 1759. He left Stratford immediately, amid the curses of the inhabitants. The New Place is, at present, a beautiful garden, with many lovely flowers and smooth greensward, and the old stump of the mulberry-tree, which still produces some leaves, and is now carefully guarded from the ravages of time and clergymen. I suppose the modern elegance of the place gives but little idea of what it was in Shakespeare's time, seeing that the building itself is obliterated; but here is the soil on which Shakespeare trod when he rested from his labors, and here was the serene ending of a most wonderful life. Shakespeare's mind was so full in all directions; it was in such exquisite harmony with nature and equipoise with all life, so calm and deep, that he needed no outward pomp for the expression of his genius, no palace, no "golden round," only the sweet felicity of flowers and grass and the summer's sky. The greatness of Shakespeare is shown in the placidity of his closing years.

Returning to "The Swan's Nest," we cross over the Avon by the old Clopton bridge. This is built of stone, and very old stone too. It was the work of Sir Hugh Clopton, Lord Mayor of London, in the reign of King Henry the Seventh. It is 376 yards in length, and has fourteen principal arches. It is even for to-day an admirable structure. The building of a bridge like this at so early a date shows the importance of Stratford. In 1643 the Queen of Charles the First, Henrietta Maria, having to stay in Stratford, chose New Place as her residence. She was entertained by Shakespeare's daughter for three weeks during these troublous times.

I did not have an opportunity to visit the cottage of Mary Arden at Wilmcote. Mary was the youngest daughter of Robert Arden, esquire of Warwickshire. Her marriage portion was fifty acres of arable land, six of meadow, and a right of commonage, which was considerable property for that age. Her father's family must have been cultivated and well-to-do. In 1557 she married John Shakespeare. In 1564 the poet was born.

Mary Arden must have been a beautiful woman, with good blood and good brain and a happy genius. From her motherhood came the crowning glory of the human race. In the temple of her body nature breathed its divinest melody, and the "miracle of birth" revealed its most wondrous joy.

The Shakespeare day is accelerating its close to the Secular Pilgrim. The golden sunlight is over all the beautiful city; over the broad meadows and winding stream; over the stately church and loveliness of the quiet graveyard; over the lowly birthplace, and the gardens and paths of immortal love; over the sweet cottages and the embowering roses; over the forests thrilling with romance like those of Arden itself; over the Memorial building, and the Fountain, and the bright dwellings where modern luxuriance seems to drop like a jewel into the misty past and melt in the mild radiance of antiquity. Beautiful scene! and in this enchanting hour of mingling day and night, the chambers of the brain all crowded with imageries of Shakespeare, and the heart filled with unutterable emotions as the voices of the ages seem to call in tenderest music—in this resplendent evening we glide over the bosom of the river Avon. We see the fishermen along the banks; the boys in bathing; the boats sweeping past; the dimpling waters whispering to the shores. There are the willows and the rushes; the leafy beds of osiers; the mossy stone steps; the little bird on its precarious perch swaying almost to the water as it poises to take flight again; the green meadows and blue hills in the dim distance; the cattle coming to drink, or standing in the shallow water; the hedgerows and the flowers reflected in the glassy depths; the buds of the water lily, and the tiny water-rat plunging in and leaving a bubble or two on the placid surface; tall poplars and elms that fringe the bank, and flowers—the flowers of Shakespeare. Think of them all—the daffodils, the violets, the primroses, the cowslips, the Mary-buds, the honey-suckle, the pansies, and columbine. Do we not hear the song?—

> When daisies pied, and violets blue,
> And lady-smocks all silver white,
> And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue
> Do paint the meadows with delight.

And so, with the rhythm of the poet vibrating in the mind, and the river flowing musically along as it flowed centuries ago, when

> Sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child,
> Warbled his native wood-notes wild,

dreamily we voyage the Avon, while the sunset light is flushed with the emerald hues of leaf and grass, dancing far as the eye can range to some Orphic harmony; and then our songs break forth, songs of native land, songs of freedom and of humanity; and from the opulent past, where man has blazoned his magnificent genius from nature's burning heat, we look into the future with hope born of a thousand years of toil, and in the splendor of Shakespeare's genius and the splendor of his native soil we see all life enriched, all work made glorious, and the thought and heart of man triumphant.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A CHINESE MANDARIN ON CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

MR. C. P. HODGES, who, despite his English name and birth, is a Mandarin of the Crystal Button and a leader of the Chinese in Australia, writes to the Melbourne Herald on the subject of the late outrages, which, he says, the Chinese of the colony unanimously regret. He points out that four hundred millions of people must not be considered responsible for the doings of some thousands of fanatics. He notes that in China the religion and the State are so bound together that Christianity in antagonising the one inevitably touches the other. The missionaries are, he says, subverters of the nation. He asks: "Suppose a society of Chinese males and their wives and some single women, all worthy persons, should essay in Melbourne to convert such as they could to the doctrines of Confucius. They obtain access, or, to more correctly illustrate the case, gently force themselves into people's houses and induce women to leave their homes, thus outraging a strong prejudice rooted by custom and education. For, according to Chinese usages, a woman cannot receive anything from the hand of a man unless he be husband or son, and then not in the presence of strangers, even in her own house. Straightway, as the proclamation of the Vegetarians set forth, there is discord; 'a man is set at variance with his father, and the daughter against the mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.' Carried to the extent thus, as in some places in China, what would be the result of such injudicious meddling here? Why, without an executive power able to protect them, all the violence of Kucheng would be enacted in Little Bourke-street."

Such a parallel he shows is insufficient, because Chinese politics and religion are built on filial piety. On the very threshold of the new faith the Chinese are asked to accept, they are told that a man must leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife. Their answer is: "They which commit such things are worthy of death." The sayings of Christ, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" "Let the dead bury the dead," and "Except a man hate father and mother he cannot be my disciple," seem to the Chinese subversive of the true foundations of society, and to take children away from their natural guardians to teach them such doctrines they regard as the height of impiety.

Digitized by Google

It is clear, from a published letter of one of the victims, that the question of the marriage of believers with unbelievers has been raised and settled adverse to family considerations. As the importance of succession rests on the side of the sons, so there are matters of only secondary importance affected by the disposal of the daughters, if indeed they can be deemed secondary. Any interference with the customs of this religious and domestic rite would arouse strong feelings of resentment. Mandarin Hodges says Europeans wish to force their way into China, oblivious that they thus force natives out. The unreasonable hostility to the Chinese in foreign lands is beginning to have effect. Millions of them have returned to China with one unvarying tale. The Christians treat them as enemies, while pretending that God has made of one blood all nations.

CHRIST.

THUS said the Christian's Christ: "To me
A better love shalt thou extend
Than that thou giv'st in full degree
To father, mother, friend."

Through the sweet love of wife and child,
The love that softens human need,
A man with God is reconciled
If God be God indeed.

But if through love so freely spent
He cannot reach God's love and grace,
Shall he not then be well content
With that which fills its place?

For greater love can none possess
Than that which goes by friendship's name;
The love of God must needs be less,
If it be not the same.

From the best passions of the heart,
From love most god-like and benign,
This Christ hath set himself apart,
And is no more divine.

He is as one who should remove
Man's faith by preaching faith abroad:
"Lo, I am love, who know not love;
God is not: I am God."

PYRITES.

PROFANE JOKES.

"What are you going to preach about to-morrow?" asked a minister's wife of her husband. "I am going to preach about female vanity." "You will have to select some other topic. I'm going to wear my new dress and hat."

Rev. Dr. Steenthly—"Yes, my beloved hearers, money is the root of all evil. And now a collection will be taken to make up the arrears in your pastor's salary. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver."

The new minister had arrived at Deacon Clover's house, and was to remain a few days. When the evening was far spent, the dominie was escorted to his bedroom by the deacon, who said, as he opened the door to the rather small apartment: "This, Dr. Fourthly, is the prophet's chamber." "Ah," replied the clergyman, as he surveyed its circumscribed dimensions, "it must have been one of the minor prophets."

It was the custom of a certain clergyman to point his sermons with either "Dearly beloved brethren," or "Now, my dear brothers," until one day a lady member of the congregation took exception to this, and asked him why he always preached to the gentlemen and never to the ladies. "My dear lady," said his reverence, "the one embraces the other." Lady—"But not in the church."

A Polish Jew was admitted to heaven for his piety, but, on entering, he took his seat in a corner and wept bitterly; so Jehovah asked him the cause of his despondency, to which he replied that, although he himself had scrupulously observed the law of Moses, yet he considered himself unworthy to sit with the righteous in heaven "on account of his unnatural son," who had become a Christian. "Is that all?" answered Jehovah. "Why, the very same thing happened to me."

BOOK CHAT.

The Structure and Authorship of the New Testament, by I. Panin (Grafton, Mass.), is an attempt to make out that the various writings received as canonical by the Christian Church, are really inspired by one mind, on account of certain arithmetical calculations discovered in them. Thus the author says: "The whole vocabulary of Matthew has 1656 words, or twenty-three seventy-twos, of which the first seventy-two is thus assigned to this genealogy." Wonderful! Mr. Panin founds his conclusions on the text of Westcott and Hort; but, if he had taken other texts, he would have had to make different calculations, and would doubtless have come to equally wonderful conclusions. Mr. Panin convinced himself by his method that Westcott and Hort are wrong in rejecting the last twelve verses of Mark, and the story of the woman taken in adultery. It seems to us his method is hardly sane, and his conclusions are valueless. We find that in his appendix, on page 67, he has to admit that a statement on page 42 "proves to be incorrect." We think Mr. Panin might do well to consult some friends before he issues further publications impugning the conclusions of the critics.

* * *

F. M. Holland has, in Open Court, a good sketch of Frances Wright, one of the pioneers of women's rights and Freethought in America. Mr. Holland says: "Her ablest book, published in 1822, and entitled A Few Days in Athens, is a complete vindication of the life and teachings of Epicurus against slanders not yet extinct. She shows how plainly he distinguished between pleasure and vice; her style is that of a novelist, and she draws a charming portrait of herself as one of the disciples of a philosopher who has been sadly misunderstood." The work is published by Mr. Forder, with an Introduction on the Epicurean Philosophy, and a sketch of the life of the authoress by J. M. Wheeler.

* * *

Mr. Holland thus concludes his estimate of Frances Wright: "Her influence in destroying intolerance and slavery, as well as in reforming education, was very great, and we can feel sure of the fulfilment of her generous wish, published in the Free Inquirer, on August 12, 1829: 'Let Death conquer my memory, and let the world preserve those principles which it is the object of my life to establish.'"

* * *

In the same number of Open Court is an interesting account of "Christening in Cyprus," supplied, from a private letter, by Mr. M. D. Conway. The infant in Cyprus is plunged naked three times, in the name of the Father, Son, and Ghost, into hot oil and water in a round copper which served as font. Then three locks of the baby's hair are cut off, with a new pair of scissors, in the name of the Trinity, and cast into the font. We suppose this is dispensed with in the case of a bald baby; or do they wait till the hair grows? This done, a cross with blue ribbon is put round its neck, and, the devils thus exorcised and propitiated, the child becomes a Christian.

* * *

It must not be supposed, from the advocacy by Sir Douglas Galton of the "meteorite hypothesis," that therefore the Nebular Hypothesis, first put forward by La Place and endorsed by Herschel and Herbert Spencer, is defunct. On the contrary, an elaborate defence of The Nebular Theory in Relation to Stellar, Solar, Planetary, Cometary, and Geological Phenomena, by William Ford Stanley, F.R.A.S., is this year published by Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, and Co.

* * *

Mr. R. Dobell, 77 Charing Cross-road, announces as in the press Gluck and the Opera by Ernest Newman, Human Documents by Arthur Lynch, and Like Stars That Fell by Geoffrey Mortimer.

* * *

Mind and Motion and Monism, the last work of the late George John Romanes, is announced by Longmans, Green, & Co.

* * *

The Open Court Publishing Co., of Chicago, announces for publication early in October a collection of popular sketches of the religious and secular history of Israel, by Professor C. H. Cornill, one of the foremost orthodox authorities on the Old Testament history in Europe; Post-Darwinian Questions, the second part of the late Professor George J. Romanes's Darwin and After Darwin; and The Primary Factors of Organic Evolution, by Professor E. D. Cope.

A lively discussion on the Biblical aspect of the Temperance question has been going on in the Kirkintilloch Herald. Such discussions do a great deal of good, and the contortions of the numerous advocates of Bible temperance are certainly amusing.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Charles Watts, "The Bible and Dramatic Literature."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, conclusion of debate between Stanley Jones and Cyrus Symons on "The Soul and Science." Tuesday, at 8, social gathering. Thursday, at 8, business meeting.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, Dr. A. A. Beale, "Health and its Morals."

PENTON HALL (81 Pentonville-road): 7, Joachim Kaspary, "Humanitarianism."

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, G. C. H. Carter, "The Moral Value of the Apostles' Creed."

WEST LONDON BRANCH ("Sun in Splendor," Portobello-road, Notting Hill Gate): Tuesday, at 8.30, business meeting.

WOOD GREEN (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, G. W. Foote, "Life, Death, and After."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, debate between Stanley Jones and Cyrus Symons (Unitarian) on "The Soul and Science"; 3, a lecture.

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, A. B. Moss, "Christianity and Evolution."

CLERKENWELL GREEN: 11.30, R. Forder will lecture. (Collection for L.S.F.)

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, a lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. James will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30, S. E. Easton will lecture.

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, F. Haslam, "The Jews on the March." (Annual collection for the Freethinkers' Benevolent Fund.)

WOOD GREEN (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, W. J. Ramsey will lecture. Thursday, at 8, C. Cohen, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, C. Cohen, "The French Revolution—Part III., Daybreak"; 3, "An Hour with the Devil"; 7, "What Think Ye of Christ?" At 5, Tea and social gathering.

BRISTOL (Shepherds' Hall, Old Market-street): 7, business meeting—election of secretary.

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school.

DERBY (Pollicott's Dining Rooms, Market place): 6.45, A paper.

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, Discussion class.—J. Cowie, "Tolstoi on the Church and State"; 6.30, Neuroo, "Bible Fictions and Malay Archipelago Facts."

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 11, Tousan Parris, "Some Bible Symbols: Their Origin and Meaning"; 6.30, "Man: Whence he Comes and How."

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, Quarterly meeting of Touline Society; 7, Ernest Newman, "The Re-union of Christendom."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, John Barlow, "The Great Revolution of 1903."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, R. Mitchell will lecture.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 3, A Competent Scientific Gentleman, "The Evidence for Evolution"; 7, "Animals and Plants: their Relationship" (with lantern illustrations).

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King street): 7, Captain W. B. Duncan, "The Globular Theory."

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, "Secularism."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

DERBY (Market-place): 10.45, W. Briggs, "Secularism and Monarchy."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Quayside): 11, R. Mitchell, "The Bible and Science."

SOUTH SHIELDS (Market Place): 3, T. Thompson, "A Rationalistic View of Historic Christianity."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—October 6 Birmingham; 13, Leicester; 20, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 23 and 24, Chester-le-Street; 27, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 28 and 29, Stockton-on-Tees; 31, Blackburn. November 1, Blackburn; 3, Sheffield; 4, 5, and 6, Barnsley; 10, Foresters' Hall, London; 17 and 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

STANLEY JONES, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London, N.—October 6 m. and e. Battersea; 7, Edmonton; 13, Pimlico Pier; 14, Edmonton; 20 and 27, King-land.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Cresdon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—October 6, Camberwell; 20, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

TOUSAN PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—October 6, Leicester; 13 and 20, Wood Green; 27, Foresters' Hall. November 3, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

Darwin Made Easy. By Dr. Edward B. Aveling, Fellow of the London University. This is the best popular exposition of Darwinism extant. Cloth, 1s.

Essays in Rationalism. By Charles Robert Newman (Atheist Brother of the late Cardinal Newman). With a Preface by George Jacob Holyoake, and a Biographical Sketch by J. M. Wheeler. 1s. 6d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

64 pp., price 3d., by post 4d.,

THE

HALL OF SCIENCE LIBEL CASE.

WITH A

FULL AND TRUE ACCOUNT

OF

"THE LEEDS ORGIES."

EDITED, WITH INTRODUCTION,

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchizedek
S'welp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 132 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

COALS! COALS! COALS!

MESSRS. FRANCIS E. WOOD & CO. are supplying Good Parlor Coal suitable for all purposes, at 16s. 6d. per Ton. Hot Kitchen Coal, 14s.

R. Forder says: "They are remarkably cheap and good."
W. J. Ramsey writes: "I am well satisfied with your Parlor Coal."
Miss Vance says: "They are excellent."

Orders to 206 York-road, King's Cross. Depôts all over London.

Price 1s., post free,

SATIRES AND PROFANITIES

BY

JAMES THOMSON (B.V.)

(Author of "The City of Dreadful Night").

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. POLLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN RED INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

MASONIC HALL, HIGH STREET, WOOD GREEN, N.

(Adjoining Nightingale Hotel.)

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY, WOOD GREEN BRANCH.

A COURSE OF LECTURES

Under the auspices of the above, to be delivered on the following dates at 7.30 p.m. :—

Sunday, October 6—MR. G. W. FOOTE, "Life, Death, and After."

Sunday, October 13—MR. TOUZEAU PARRIS, "The Certainties of Religion Worthless."

Sunday, October 20—MR. TOUZEAU PARRIS, "Some Bible Symbols, their Origin and Meaning."

Sunday, October 27—MR. R. FORDER, "Who is the Devil? What is the Devil? and Where is the Devil?"

ADMISSION BY TICKET ONLY. To be obtained of John Wood Secretary, 71 Gladstone-avenue, Wood Green.

Tickets, 6d. Reserved Seats, 1s.

Course Tickets for Last Three Lectures, 1s. 6d. and 1s.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 8d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BRUNO CLOTH

FOR LADIES' WINTER DRESSES.

This Cloth has been our leading Winter Dress Material for four years. Thousands of ladies have tried it, and, so far as we know, everybody has been satisfied. One lady last winter sold thirty-five Dress Lengths among her friends.

IN ALL THE FASHIONABLE SHADES.
PLAIN COLORS.

Price—

9s. 6d. per Dress Length

till the end of September, as an advertisement. After that date, 10s. 6d. per dress length.

LOT 11

CONTAINS

1 pair of All-Wool Blankets
1 pair of Bed Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-cloth.

In spite of wool having gone up very much in price, we sell at the old figure,

21/-

CARRIAGE PAID.

THINK OF THE COLD WEATHER AND THINK OF LOT 11.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

READY ON MONDAY. ORDER AT ONCE.

Price 6d., by post 7½d.,

The Agnostic Annual for 1896.

Balfour's "Foundations of Belief": An Agnostic Rejoinder. By S. Laing.
Agnosticism and its Equivalents. By Amos Waters.
The Man, Christ Jesus: The Germ of the Christian Myth. By J. Allanson Picton.
Psyche: A Poem. By W. Stewart Ross (Saladin).
Mind as Controlled by Matter. By Constance E. Plumptre.
The Faiths of Our Forefathers. By Charles Watts.
An Agnostic View of Theism and Monism. By R. Bithell, B.Sc., Ph.D.
The Old Testament Library. By F. J. Gould.
Immortality. By W. A. Leonard.
The Physiological Bias of Religious Leaders. By Furneaux Jordan, F.R.C.S.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

NOW READY, CHEAP EDITION OF

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A RECORD OF HIS LIFE AND WORK.

By his Daughter, HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. With an Account of his Parliamentary Struggle, his Politics, and his Teachings, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, price 7s.

A. & H. Bradlaugh Bonner, 1 and 2 Took's-court, Cursitor-street, E.C.

Just published, price 1d., by post 1½d.,

DISCREDITABLE TACTICS OF CHRISTIAN DISPUTANTS.

BY CHARLES WATTS.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order 1s 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worm, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sense and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 3d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.
THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 41. SUNDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE PARSONS' PALAVER.

THE Church Congress at Norwich opened with scenes which would be regarded as utterly disgraceful at any Secular assembly. A red-hot "Protestant" contingent shouted and howled at the High Church or "Catholic" party. The leader of the row seems to have been a ridiculous person, who is also a malignant fanatic. He appears to hate Catholicism and Freethought with an equal hatred. What he publishes about Catholics is no particular concern of ours, but we have no hesitation in saying that the pamphlet he publishes about Colonel Ingersoll is one of the vilest and most disgusting libels that were ever penned.

From the official program of the opening ceremonies, we see that the clergy who joined the procession to the cathedral were to walk "three abreast;" perhaps out of compliment to the Trinity. "They will wear cassock, surplice, hood, etc," the program says, "or, being Doctors of Divinity, their scarlet robes." A pretty lot of guys they must have looked at this end of the nineteenth century; it is no wonder that the profane multitude treated them with derision.

There is an "N.B." at the end of the program, stating that, "should the weather be unpropitious," the procession "will not move through the Close." What a "should" for the Church of England! Surely the clergy might beg fine weather of God Almighty for such a special occasion. It seems, however, that our rain-doctors are as much at the mercy of the weather as their customers. We therefore suggest that their prospectus should be amended. Let them clear out the farcical petitions "for rain" and for "fine weather" in their antiquated Prayer Book.

The Congress was welcomed by the Mayor and Corporation of Norwich. It was also welcomed by the local Nonconformists, one of whom—a man of God rejoicing in the great name of Shakespeare—was allowed to harangue the assembly. This gentleman talked about "reunion," which was also the principal theme of the subsequent address by the Bishop of Norwich. But "reunion" is only a word to bandy at religious entertainments. There is no chance of its ever being realised. Dr. Sheepshanks appreciated the "kindness" of the Pope's recent message to the people of England, but declared "the notion that the Christian world will ever pass under the domination of the Roman Pontiff" to be "nothing but the baseless dream of the religious partisan"—which is a hard slap in the face for the poor old Pope. Dr. Sheepshanks was more complimentary to the Nonconformists, who are drawing nearer to the Church, and many of whom "are not unwilling that their children should join in her communion." At the same time, there was "no prospect of organic union with any of the Nonconformist bodies." Not the slightest!

The multiplicity of sects means good business for the sky-pilots. If they all united in one Church, half of them would have to go into the ordinary labor market to obtain a living.

Naturally the Congress had its annual flirtation with Socialism. The Dean of Ely advocated Trade Unionism, which has fought all its worst battles, and does not require his patronage. It was not clergymen who rallied to the support of Trade Unionism in the evil old days, when it was outlawed and downtrodden; no, it was Atheists like Bradlaugh, and Positivists like Harrison and Beesly. If the Dean of Ely is very anxious to promote Trade Unionism, he might help to establish the Curates' Union, and destroy sweating and financial injustice generally within his own Church. Reformation, even more than charity, should begin at home.

The problem of the age, it appears, is to "bring democracy into close touch with Christianity." We have heard this before. As a text it produced a fine commentary at the last elections, when the parsons all over the country acted as Tory agents. Still, we dare say the Dean of Ely's problem" will become more and more important—to the Church. Haughty as they are, when they can afford to be so, there is a certain parasitism and sycophancy about all Churches. They never dare cross the great currents of the world. They must bow to "the powers that be," on pain of losing their wealth and privileges. They are perfectly impartial, because they are always serving their own interest. In Russia the Church fawns upon the Czar. He commands the legions and controls the money wrung from the people. In England the Church is ready to fawn upon the Democracy, because it sees that His Majesty the People is going to sit upon the throne, which has so long been occupied by kings and flanked by aristocrats. The clergy used to flatter the monarch as though he belonged to a different species from his subjects, and they are now getting ready to flatter the multitude. "Good night!" they say to the setting sun; and to the rising sun "Good day!" They crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning.

Saint Athelstan Riley, of the London School Board, was unable to be present, and his paper on Education was read for him. We always like to see this gentleman on the war path. He is an object-lesson in the bigotry, subterfuge, and equivocation, which naturally attend the policy o spending other people's money in propagating your own religion. We wish Mr. Riley life and health; and, as the Irish say, more power to his elbow! He is one of the best friends of Secular Education. Every time he opens his mouth, or puts pen to paper, he hastens the good day when the schoolmaster will no longer be required to play the jackal to the priest.

Up to our time of going to press the Church Congress has been deadly dull; and unless later meetings are more lively we shall not trouble our readers with further comments on its proceedings.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

SOME CHRISTIAN TRUTHS.

In his Notes on Christian Evidences, page 44, Mr. Bradlaugh says: "When William Lloyd Garrison, the Abolitionist, delivered his first anti-slavery address in Boston, Massachusetts, the only building he could obtain in which to speak, was the infidel hall owned by Abner Kneeland, the 'infidel' editor of the Boston Investigator, who had been sent to gaol for blasphemy. Every Christian sect had in turn refused Mr. Lloyd Garrison the use of the buildings they severally controlled."

When this passage was brought before a certain reverend lecturer, who has recently been pushing himself forward as a Christian Evidence-monger, he is reported to have declared that it was "a deliberate lie." It was a serious thing to give the lie to Charles Bradlaugh when he was alive, and I trust the reverend gentleman will be made to feel it is a serious thing still. At any rate, I am in the position to cast the lie back into his teeth. Asked for his authority, the lecturer referred to Oliver Johnson's book on Garrison and the Anti-Slavery movement. Johnson's book is entitled William Lloyd Garrison and His Times. He was editor of the Christian Soldier, and devotes a number of pages to showing that the charges of infidelity urged against Garrison by the anti-abolitionist party were false. But there is no denial, in the whole of the book, of the statement made by Mr. Bradlaugh, and that statement, I am sure, was well founded. At first I thought there was nothing whatever in Johnson which could even have suggested giving the lie to Mr. Bradlaugh. But I remembered he had been quoted before in an anti-infidel paper edited by another unscrupulous reverend divine. I accordingly looked up the first edition, and discovered that at page 79 he made the statement that "during the whole history of the movement, with the single exception of that noble woman, Ernestine L. Rose, I do not remember a single prominent speaker on our platform who could truthfully have been called an infidel." This has been made much of, though the writer saw fit to withdraw the statement. If the scrupulous individual in question will turn to the latest edition of Mr. Johnson's work, revised and enlarged, he will find that he totally omits any such statements. Up to page 74 the paging is alike in the two editions; but page 75 of the edition of 1882 omits all this passage, and goes on at page 81 of the edition of 1880. It will thus be seen that Mr. Johnson not only does not contradict Mr. Bradlaugh, but that he actually withdraws a misleading statement he had given currency to. As to Garrison's own views, Mr. Johnson says, page 363: "I am not aware that Mr. Garrison ever made any systematic statement of his religious opinions. His mind was too much absorbed in the application of moral principles to the conduct of life to permit him to pay much attention to the theological speculations which are so fascinating to many."

At page 66 Mr. Johnson says: "That in later years he held the views of the Bible common among Quakers and Unitarians is not denied; but this was long after the American clergy and churches had repudiated the anti-slavery movement. Indeed, it was this repudiation on their part that led him to the investigations which resulted in the modifications of his inherited views on this and some other points." But he contends Garrison was a Christian at the last no less than at the first; and in his lax sense this may be correct. It is merely a question of terminology. Mr. Matthew Arnold called himself a Christian and a member of the Church of England, while repudiating belief in miracles, or even in a personal God. The point I am interested in is only this: Did Charles Bradlaugh write down a deliberate lie?

I had the honor of knowing intimately "that noble woman, Ernestine L. Rose," as Oliver Johnson called her, and she has more than once assured me of that very fact which Charles Bradlaugh stated—viz., that Garrison (who, Mr. Johnson notices, lectured continually on Sunday) had to go to the infidel hall in order to ventilate his opinions. On the authority of my revered friend, I challenge disproof from the reverend lecturer.

Mr. Bradlaugh made another statement, also dealing with slavery, in the same Notes—viz., that William Wilberforce, in the House of Commons on February 18, 1796, contrasted the conduct, in the matter of slavery, of what was then called "Infidel France," with "Christian England." The same reverend lecturer is reported as saying that Wilberforce afterwards changed his opinion, and as giving the same book by Oliver Johnson as his authority. It happens that the only mention of Wilberforce in Johnson's book is in the following passage (p. 131): "It was while he was in England that Wilberforce died, and it was his sad privilege to participate in the obsequies of that great and good man, and to follow his remains to Westminster Abbey." It is most unlikely that Wilberforce ever repudiated anything he deliberately said before the House of Commons, and again I challenge the reverend lecturer for his authority.

Once more, the same particular man of God is reported as saying that Baur and Strauss altered their views. If they did, it was certainly not in the direction of orthodox Christianity. Here is what the Rev. P. Schaff's standard Religious Encyclopædia says of Baur: "He ruthlessly attacked the optimistic opinion of the Apostolic Church, and attempted to show that, so far from being peaceful, quiet, loving, and united, it was torn by opposing factions—the friends of Peter and those of Paul." So far from modifying these opinions, they are the most pronounced in his latest writings. This was also the case with Strauss. The heresy put forward in the first edition of Das Leben Jesu (1835) was much milder than that of the fourth edition (1840), and this in turn was supplanted by the popular edition of 1864; while in his last work, The Old Faith and the New, he emphatically proclaims that intellectual man is no longer Christian—calls Christ's resurrection "a world-historical humbug," and gives up Christian belief in immortality. In accordance with his will, he was buried without religious rites.

As the same reverend lecturer is reported to have said that Colonel Ingersoll is an advocate of free love, and that he fought for slavery (each statement the very antithesis of the truth), it may be wondered why I leave the even tenor of my way to take any notice of such a person. False coin may be sure of detection in the long run; but, as there is apparently a good deal circulated about the country by this individual, which obtains currency owing to his cloth, the surest plan is, when met with, to nail it down.

J. M. Wheeler.

THE NATURE AND ORIGIN OF MIND.

(Concluded from page 627.)

From what was stated in my article last week, it will be seen that in my opinion the mind represents the intellectual part of the living organism; that intelligence varies only in degree throughout the animal kingdom, and that its manifestations depend upon the character of the mental faculties wherever found. As Dr. Wigan remarks, in his Duality of the Mind: "The mind every anatomist knows to be a set of functions of the brain, differing only in number and degree from the intellect of animals. . . . . Can the mind, then, be a thing per se distinct and separate from the body? No more than the motion can exist independent of the watch; and all the arguments of theologians and metaphysicians on this subject are founded on the confusion of terms." Spencer, in his Elements of Psychology, says: "Though we commonly regard mental and bodily life as distinct, it needs only to ascend somewhat above the ordinary point of view to see that they are but subdivisions of life in general, and that no line of demarcation can be drawn between them otherwise than arbitrarily." More recently, Professor Graham, in his Creed of Science, referring to Bain's Mind and Body, points out "that thought is fully and adequately described as the function of the brain; that it is nothing more, and nothing other (for to regard it as a case of causation amounts to the same thing), is proved, according to physiologists, by abundant and increasing evidence" (p. 156).

These are my views, plainly stated, as to the nature of the human mind; and I am pleased to find that they are corroborated by the evidence of leading scientists, both of the past and of the present time. The opinions which I have here expressed, supported as they are, in the words of Professor Graham, "by abundant and increasing evidence," are thoroughly opposed to the notions entertained by orthodox Christians in reference to the nature of soul or mind. Too long has the absurd fallacy obtained that the human body possesses an ego which controls and regulates the thoughts and actions of the bodily organisation. More and more are unprejudiced thinkers recognising, with Professor Ribot, that "the ego is not an entity acting where it chooses or as it pleases; controlling the organs in its own way, and limiting its domain according to its own wish. On the contrary, it is a resultant even to such a degree that its domain is strictly determined by the anatomical connections with the brain, and that at one time it represents an entire body less an undivided part, and at another time the half of a body, and in parasitic monsters such a limited domain that it does not suffice to support life, and accordingly is expelled prematurely" (The Diseases of Personality, p. 45). It appears to me that man's ego consists in his entire self, the result of his organisation and the operation of his mental faculties.

Digitized by Google

There are two general and conflicting views entertained in reference to the origin of human intelligence. The one attributes it to natural causes; and the other regards it as having emanated from a God who is infinite in wisdom and power—the one great Cause of all existences. It is supposed that this Being has endowed the human race with mental faculties that differ in some respects both in kind and degree from those found in the lower animals. I share the former view, for the reason that there appears to me to be no evidence to justify the latter. Of course, how body or mind originated can only be inferred, inasmuch as, from the very nature of the case, neither could have been the subject of human observation. I object to the dogmatism of theologians, who positively assert that there can be no reasonable doubt that their view is the correct one. I allege that their contention has not been, and cannot be, verified by facts. Moreover, while refraining from putting forth any dogmatic statement as to the origin of life and mind, it seems to me evident that the cause assigned to either by theologians is bare assumption. Basing an opinion upon the known facts of nature, I prefer accepting the theory of natural origin and evolutionary process to that of special creation and endowment. My theory, at least, has probabilities in its favor, while that of the theologian is merely a speculation, opposed to the manifestation of all natural law of which we have any knowledge. Thus I say to my readers, in the words of the late Professor Huxley: "Choose your hypothesis; I have chosen mine"; and "I refuse to run the risk of insulting any sane man by supposing that he seriously holds such a notion" as that of special creation.

Accepting the theory of Evolution as affording the best explanation of the development of man and the whole of the animal kingdom, I believe that man has reached his present condition, physically and mentally, by a natural process, and that by the struggle for existence, and by natural selection, he has acquired the mental qualities he now possesses. This view of Evolution is to-day largely accepted by many professed Christians who formerly rejected it. Such persons, however, still maintain that, whatever may have taken place with regard to physical powers and bodily organs, it is clear that the higher intellectual faculties of man could not so have originated; that these, at least, must be the result of special creation, and must have been called into existence when human beings first appeared upon the stage of life by some supernatural power. They further urge that, even if it could be shown beyond doubt that the marvellously-constructed body of man, with its beautifully adjusted parts of bone and muscle, nerve and brain, skin and mucous membrane, had its origin in evolution, yet no light whatever would be thrown upon the source of the wondrous powers of judgment and memory, understanding and will, perception and conception. I fail to see that the assumption here involved has any basis in fact; for those very powers are found existing in the lower animals. Psychological investigation has clearly shown that perception is not peculiar to man, but that it exists wherever there are organs of sense, and these extend in some form or other to the lowest phase of animal life. Volition is also met with in all the higher animals; and memory may be observed in the dog, horse, elephant, cat, camel, and numerous other mammals. Even judgment, in the form of comparison, is often displayed by the domestic animals—the dog in particular. Dr. H. Bischoff, in his Essay on the Difference between Man and Brutes, writes: "It is impossible to deny the animals, qualitatively and quantitatively, as many mental faculties as we find in man. They possess consciousness; they feel, think, and judge; they possess a will which determines their actions and motions. Animals possess attachment; they are grateful, obedient, good-natured; and, again, false treacherous, disobedient, revengeful, jealous, etc. Their actions frequently evince deliberation and memory. It is in vain to derive such actions from so-called instinct, which unconsciously compels them so to act." Now, with a knowledge of these facts, is it not reasonable to conclude that psychical powers are as likely to have been evolved as bodily organs? If the mental powers of the lower animals have come by evolution, there is not a shadow of reason for supposing that those of man came in any other way; for, while Darwin says, "the difference between the mind of man and that of the highest ape is immense," he also remarks, "great as it is, it is certainly one of degree, and not of kind."

To those who persist in asserting that the lower animals differ fundamentally from man in the intelligence they exhibit, and that therefore they must possess mental faculties different from those of man in order to account for such difference, I reply that, upon the same principle, it would be equally as logical to allege that, inasmuch as the manifestations of intelligence by some animals resemble those of man, therefore the cause of each must be similar, which at once destroys the notion that there is any radical difference in the intellectual powers of man and of the animals below him. To argue that an immaterial and intelligent Being was necessary to give birth to material and thinking animals is only putting the question of origin a step backwards. It gives no explanation of the genesis of the assumed immaterial Being, or states how he became possessed of his intelligence. The same objection applies to the statement that "in the beginning" all parts of existence were "endowed" with properties and powers necessary for their becoming what they are. This assumption rests upon the error of supposing that each separate mode of existence had a special starting point from which they all proceeded.

Then we are told that reasoning from effects to causes enables us to formulate a starting point. But it does nothing of the kind, and such an attempt at argument is on a par with the method adopted by theologians, who argue from the scheme of redemption to the fall of man. They trace the first sinner to the family of Adam, and there they stop; but beyond that, according to the story, there are the garden, the trees, and the serpent, which were the very agencies that caused the deplorable event. Whence came these?

CHARLES WATTS.

MARY MAGDALENE AND THE VIRGIN MARY.

IN the Expositor for September, Professor J. Rendel Harris writes on "The Blessed Virgin in the Talmud," reiterating his nonsense about the Roman soldier Pandira being an anagram of Parthenos, a virgin, and trying to show that, because Mary is spoken of as Megaddela, a hair-dresser, therefore the mother of Jesus was identified with Mary Magdalene. Dr. Harris, of course, cannot allow the supposition that the Christians misinterpreted the Jewish story. Yet his facts strongly confirm this. He says: "The Syrian commentators are much exercised to explain why Mary Magdalene was so called; they did not apparently know of any town of Magdala to which to refer her." Magdala, like Nazareth, turned up afterwards in answer to the demand of pilgrims. But these commentators "speculated as to what tower (migdol) she could have been named after," for there are many legends of virgins, including Mary, being, like Danæ, enclosed in a tower. Bar Salibi says: "She was called Magdalene because she inhabited the tower of Astrat, or the tower of Shiloah; or from plaited, because her hair was plaited." From this Dr. Harris concludes: "Jesus, therefore, according to the Talmud, was the son of Mary Magdalene." Dr. Harris shows further "that so careful a student of the Scripture as Ephrem Syrus made the same confusion in his Commentary upon the Diatessaron."

Now, how came the Christian commentator to make such a slip as this? I surmise it was for the very same reason that made St. Epiphanius say that Jesus was the son of Jacob, surnamed Panthera, and John of Damascus maintain that Panthera was great-grandfather to Mary, and Barpanther her grandfather (see The Jewish Life of Christ, edited by G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler, p. vii.). They were, like Dr. Harris, trying to reconcile the Jewish traditions with the Christian myths (see The Historical Jesus and the Mythical Christ, by Gerald Massey). The obvious explanation of the Miriam who bore Jeshu to Pandira being called Magdela was that the profession of hair-plaiting was a cover for harlotry. Hence, although there is nothing about it in the Gospels, it has always been the tradition of the Church that Mary Magdalene was a harlot, and she is identified with the woman who was a sinner. But this very Christian tradition proves the priority of the Jewish tradition that Mary Magdela was the mother of Jesus ben Pandira. UNCLE BENJAMIN.

Digitized by Google

HUXLEY.

MR. GEORGE W. SMALLEY, the American correspondent of the Times, who had a long and intimate acquaintance with the late Professor Huxley, has a monograph, or perhaps we should call it a tribute, in the October number of Scribner, which is one of the best we have yet seen. Mr. Smalley declares Huxley to have been "one of the truest men who ever lived, one of the manliest, and, in all points, one of the noblest." "I believe," he adds, "I should say the same thing if I had never known him, or known him but slightly, for I have known also many of his friends and some of his enemies, and from no one of them did I ever hear a word questioning his loyalty or truthfulness of nature." Mr. Smalley thinks Huxley's advocacy of Darwinism hindered the appreciation of his own original work. He says:—

> "When Darwin published the Origin of Species, he was denounced from every orthodox pulpit in England as an infidel. That was in 1859, not two generations ago. Huxley, who had already made a name in science, took his stand at once by Darwin. He did not affirm—he was never much given to affirming anything except that two and two made four—that Darwin's hypothesis had been made out. It was enough for him that the theory of evolution, or of natural selection, as it was first announced, had the probabilities on its side. It explained the hitherto unexplained origin of species more satisfactorily than any preceding theory. It gave, to say the least, a rational and not a merely mythological account of things, and for Huxley the use of the reason was the first condition of an approach to the truth. Until a more rational theory, better supported by facts, should be advanced he stood by this, and was content to work, and that others should work, on the lines Darwin had laid down. Darwin and Darwinism held the field. They hold it still. Twenty-one years later Huxley delivered, at the Royal Institution in London, a lecture on the coming of age of the Darwinian theory. He had very little to alter or modify."

We shall give some further extracts from this article in our next number.

W. L. Garrison and Orthodoxy.

When the great lights of the American Church—Stuart, Hodge, Fisk, and others—boldly asserted that the Bible sanctioned slaveholding, he was naturally led to consider the question of the inspiration of that book, and its authority over the consciences of men. His investigations resulted in the conviction that on this subject also the Friends were substantially right; that the revelation of God in man was older and more authoritative than that inscribed upon any parchment, however ancient, or by whatever miracles authenticated; and that if, as Stuart and other professors of theology affirmed, the Bible sanctioned slavery, then the passages containing such sanction could not be from God, but must be from the Devil.—"William Lloyd Garrison and his Times," by O. Johnson, p. 304.

For a whole generation Mr. Garrison was denounced by the pro-slavery ministry and Church as an Infidel. It was so much easier to hurl that epithet at his head than to answer his arguments against slavery.—Ibid, p. 306.

Obituary.

MARTHA COLE died at West Cowes on Friday, October 4th, after a lingering and cruel illness, the intense pain of which was borne with the greatest heroism. She was an ardent admirer of the late Mr. Charles Bradlaugh.

GOD'S HOBBY.

THROUGHOUT his changeful mad career,
From zero to the present year,
  In raging wrath and meekness,
God showed, and shows, that all the time
He had, and has, for blood and crime
  A rather strongish weakness.

He filled the world with eager life
Foredoomed to live by deadly strife,
  And die in pain and sorrow;
And then—except a foolish few—
Through Hell's red night to roast and stew—
  A night without a morrow.

His motto is, as all must see:
"Do evil just that ill might be,
  Or else that good might follow";
A motto which we all detest,
And which, e'en Protestants protest,
  Beats Jesuits quite hollow.

The major factors of his plans
Were crimes, as seen by him that scans,
  With open mind, the Bible;
As "all's for best," God justifies
His means and methods: murder, lies—
  Or else the Book's a libel.

He couldn't e'en devise a plan
To save his wretched creature, man,
  Without a victim squealing:
And those whom Christ was killed to save
He "chastens" all, this side the grave,
  To show "there's no ill-feeling."

If God thought fit his Son to slay,
He might have planned a better way
  Than forcing man to do it;
He might have killed by bane, or beast,
And thus have saved the Jews, at least,
  From persecution through it.

But no, He dearly loved a crime,
And liked to see it ev'ry time;
  To him, 'twas sweet as honey:
Still, forcing man to do a sin,
In order sinlessness to win,
  Is rather—well, it's funny!

G. L. MACKENZIE.

Samson's Locks.

A story, which in some points resembles that of Samson, is told in the island of Nias, off the west coast of Sumatra. A certain chief, Lanbo Maros by name, was taken prisoner by his enemies and condemned to death. It was resolved to drown him; so they flung him into the sea, and kept him there for a while. But when they hauled him up by the rope he was quite alive. Next they tried him with cold steel, stabbing him in every part of the body; but he took no harm by it. Surely, they thought, fire will do the business. So they tied him to a stake, and set fire to it. But, though the wood was consumed, he was not even singed. Then they took counsel with his wife, and she revealed her husband's secret. On the middle of his head he had a hair as hard as copper wire, and with this hair his life was bound up. So they pulled out the hair, and immediately he gave up the ghost.—Frazer, "Passages from the Bible," p. 430.

IS THE WORLD INDEBTED TO THE BIBLE FOR MORALITY?—"The wisdom of the Egyptians" was summarised in various compends of proverbial philosophy. One of these—written centuries before the time of Moses—is termed by M. Chabas "the most ancient book of the world." In common with other papyri of a similar character, it inculcates the study of wisdom, the duty of honoring parents and superiors, of respecting property, of being charitable, peaceable, contented, humble, chaste, sober, truthful, and just.—The Rev. James Doble, D.D., "The Faiths of the World," pp. 175, 176; 1882.

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (August 31).

After my visit to Stratford-on-Avon a few Birmingham Freethought friends gathered at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Armfield for a farewell gathering, hoping that, as the age rolls on, we shall meet again and bivouac on the fields of time, and join forces for further struggle. Mr. Ridgway leads off with an address both of welcome and good-bye, and Mr. Armfield, Robert Taylor, Mr. Cattell, and others, add their hearty good wishes, while the American visitor responds to the best of his ability. It was a joyous occasion, after the inspiration of Shakespeare, to thus realise the universal genius and comradeship of Freethought.

The movement formerly carried on so strenuously by Mr. Watts in Birmingham is sure to make itself felt in future years. My faith is ever in the progress of humanity. After a swift journey, for they can go in England if they only try, I am again in London, and am refreshed with a chat on all the things that interest a Freethinker, from politics and religion to art and literature, with my friends, Foote and Watts. The next day, Thursday, July 25, I again meet my American friends, Dr. Darrow and Dr. Morton, and we put in the time at the Crystal Palace. I find that while I was on my tour my friends, in usual Yankee fashion, in a little over a week had visited Scotland, the North of England, and also Paris. I was rather astonished at the rapidity of their course, but, being busy, professional men, and obliged to return soon, they determined to enjoy as large a glimpse of Europe as possible, and they certainly made the most of every minute. The Crystal Palace is one of those places that the traveller must behold, for it contains a vast variety of interesting objects. In art, in science, in history, are displays that one could study for months. The varied riches of many countries are here. In the evening, especially, with the myriad lights, the animated crowds, the sparkling waters, the solemn and sprightly music of organ and stringed instrument, and, to wind up, the vast and brilliant rush of fireworks, where every sort of color and fiery particle blazes and sprinkles through the heavens, the Palace is like an enchantment, and, for the time being, we seem to be walking the mazes of romance. It is impossible to describe the thousand-and-one exhibitions that throng upon the view. After this visit to the Crystal Palace I have to say good-bye to Dr. Darrow. He leaves the following day for America.

On Friday Mr. J. M. Wheeler takes me to the Tower of London. What a sad history is unfolded here! The heart aches to think of it. How many a bright life has been quenched in these gloomy buildings. Here are the mighty armors of the olden time that once made men invincible. These cumbrous suits appear foolish now. It makes one thankful that he can wear a modern suit of clothes and snap his fingers at these doughty knights, who must have had a hard time of it travelling about in these stupendous habiliments. By the way, all these suits of armor here and elsewhere are very small, showing that the average height and size of man have increased since the Middle Ages. Once in a while you come across a suit that might do for a six-footer, but very seldom. The modern man, in strength, grace, skill, and virility, surpasses King Arthur and his famous knights. There is no question but that man to-day is nobler physically than he ever was before. Judging from the armor, the warriors of old were a rather poor lot; and as for the horses, they were "slow coaches" indeed. They could not go much above a jog trot, and the jousts of chivalry would be very tame affairs at the present time. The heaviest man was sure to win, merely because of his weight. In this old-time royal residence and prison-house I wander in the chapel built by William the Conqueror, where he himself worshipped. I stand in the dungeons where many a prisoner has pined in agony, and on the spot where the scaffold was erected for the execution of Anne Boleyn, Lady Jane Grey, and other illustrious victims. How cruel and barbarous those times appear whose shadow oppresses us to-day! I can never enter these ghostly buildings, with their record of crime, without a thrill of horror. I can but think of the awful injustice that has existed in the universe. And there seems no help for it. The strong arm has triumphed. History is a perpetual puzzle. God is always a vanishing point, while man is both good and evil, and makes and mars his own destiny. Somehow, out of the everlasting turmoil we have won the vantage ground. The terrific deeds of the past are no more. In them, however, we see the evolution of man and the annihilation of the deity.

Passing from these dark towers—a huge, strange relic in the bustle and glamor of to-day's civilisation, seeming like a great ship stranded on a foreign shore, a wreck of the ages, freighted with the wealth of kings, jewels and crowns, swords and regalia, and the glistening instruments of war—I walk to the Tower Bridge, which arches the Thames near by, in glorious contrast with the ancient palace of kings, a modern structure, built for the people, and not for a despot. It is the noblest bridge over the Thames, with massive towers. Between these swings the enormous drawbridge through which the great ships pass. The traffic over this bridge, as over London Bridge, is a marvel to those who first see London. One wonders where all the people and the teams and the crowded carriages come from, and would think that the great metropolis was pouring itself into this one highway. Still, if he went to London or Blackfriars Bridge, he would find the same vast mass of tidal business.

I must confess there is an occasional stupidity in the English mind that is quite exasperating. Here are the great towers of the bridge, which we are invited to climb to the extent of two hundred steps or more, with the expectation that, as we pass aloft from tower to tower, we shall have an extended view of the Thames and the city. Alas! you are doomed to a disgustful disappointment. Disgust is the only word that can express your feeling when you reach the top to find that you pass from one tower to the other through a closed archway. I was over the bridge before I knew it, and could scarcely believe that I was on the other side until I went back and looked through a few little crevices upon the broad stream beneath. It made me swear a prayer or two to think I had been so thoroughly deceived by the massive stupidity of Anglo-Saxon conservatism. If French or Greek genius had built this loftly highway, it would have been a light and airy structure, through which might be seen vast and glittering prospects of the river and the busy traffic. A noble panorama would have greeted one, instead of this dungeon-like path, through whose crevices you catch the sunlight while you stand on tip-toe, and wonder that the mind which built such a stupendous bridge should crown it with such a solid piece of folly. I say to every traveller, Do not climb the stairs of the Tower Bridge. You will be humbugged if you do. Walk over it, take a good look from the outside, see the great drawbridge rise and the stately ship pass through and the tide of traffic roll on again, and that is all that you can do. The splendid view from the top is shut out by an almost inconceivable blunder.

It is curious what you will see in London at times, a grotesque and yet romantic mingling of art and dilapidation. Just on the verge of Billingsgate—the dirtiest portion of London I guess—is St Mary's Church-on-the-Hill, a humble-looking edifice, with an air of desolation in the outward view that would make one think that the inside must be as gloomy as a grave. A change, however, passes over the vision as we enter, for within are perhaps the most exquisite and beautiful carvings in all England—a very gem of art in the slums of London. This church must have been on a favored and fashionable spot to be so nobly decorated, yet in process of time the débris of Billingsgate flowed around its site, and imprisoned its precious ornaments with the environments of poverty. This is an evidence of the vastness of London life and its perpetual changes, like those of the sea itself.

After these wanderings, Mr. Wheeler and myself sit down for dinner in the famous Crosby Hall. This is where Richard III. received the crown, and within it, in the dining-room and smoking-room, are memorials of the dim and dusty past, paintings, armors, carvings, etc. However, the ghost of the bloody Richard does not disturb our appetite. We eat heartily, and think that kings are no better than common clay, and a crown is a poor bauble compared with a healthy stomach.

Saturday is my busy day for mail, "News and Notes," etc., for America. But after these labors I wander over to King's Cross and meet my friend, Mr. G. W. Foote, and spend the evening with him and his family, with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Watts, and Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler, and others. It was delightful to sit out in the garden, on the green sward, with the flowers in perfume and bloom about you the trees making soft music, the rich sunlight glancing on roof and wall, and making a mellow radiance over the scene; while the children play, and the elders talk philosophy. It was a charming place for thought, for reverie, for imagination. It was one of those resting places for the mind, where we forget the strife of the world, the injustice and falsehoods, and the stern duties that must be met. We rejoice for the moment in the ideal life, and poetry touches our heart with its imperial sceptre; as Alexander Smith says, "It clothes us with kingdoms." Our host is not simply the sceptic, the reformer, the warrior, the iconoclast; he is a lover of poetry, in all its moods of glory and of song. Especially is he a student of the supreme and universal Shakespeare, through whose domains he has wandered many a joyous day, and gathered from wide experience the noblest fruitage of the immortal bard. So the evening passes, and music adds its marvel to the occasion, and the soul of Freethought touches the heights of human excellence. It flashes the promethean fire, the forethought of humanity, the glory of the future, the budding of beauty and delight, after the destruction of misery and the wrong.

I am indebted to Mr. Victor Charles Jackson, one of our young Freethought workers in London, for a delightful visit to Canterbury on Sunday, July 28, when I am for the first time free from the harness. Canterbury is an old and orthodox town. The spirit of the past broods over it. Its cathedral is one of the most ancient in England, and one of the most beautiful and impressive. It, indeed, charms the eye with its massive yet graceful glory. Its arched roof, its painted windows, its columned aisles, present a scene of sweet attraction, mingled though it may be with the superstitions of a dead age. Glorious music was pealing through the vast space as we entered. It was a solemn religious service preparatory to the installation of Dean Farrar, a somewhat advanced theologian, who has just been appointed to the place. I enjoyed the music; the singing was delightful. Some of the voices are the finest in England, for they take especial pains at this cathedral to secure first-rate musical ability; and certainly the music was in harmony with the magnificence of the cathedral. But the formalities of worship, the stiff, artificial ceremonies, the dry prayers, and still drier preaching, did not conduce at all to elevation of mind. They were like a bitter pill which we had to swallow in order to get the real good of the occasion, which was simply in the masterful effects produced by the genius of man in the decorations of the building, in the superb and unmatched beauties of the windows, that flushed with soft yet splendid effulgence that must charm the imagination which delights in color, however critical the mind, and in the waves of music that flowed on and on as if the cathedral itself were a fountain of melody, and all its beautiful forms and hues were melting into ethereal joy and splendor.

Digitized by Google

In the afternoon, in fortunate conjunction with a party of American visitors, and by the courtesy of Mr. Jackson, I had the pleasure of viewing the cathedral under the guidance of Canon Holland, who is a most cultivated gentleman, and who has made a faithful study of the cathedral and its wonderful history. This was the place where Thomas à Becket was murdered. The canon described the scene with dramatic felicity, so that a vivid picture was presented of the theatre of the crime. We could see the crowding monks, the heroic prelate, and the relentless knights. We saw the very spot where the stubborn priest received his death wound; where he fell and poured out his life blood upon the pavement. Beneath, in the crypt of the cathedral, we saw the tomb of Becket, and the place where the king, in penance for the murder, received three hundred and twenty stripes upon his bare back. The canon remarked, with a somewhat subtle smile, that here was a case in which the value of penance was displayed, for before the king received the stripes he was defeated on every hand; but when he went forth from the cathedral after the penance he was greeted with news of victory after victory. He was a lucky king without doubt. As usual, God was on the side of the heaviest battalions, penance or no penance, and the twinkle in the canon's eye meant as much; but I am afraid he didn't apply his logic to the whole case of Christianity.

We saw the tomb of Edward, the Black Prince, and the armor he wore in battle, and the tomb of the king and queen, Henry and Eleanor. I must express my thanks to Canon Holland for his genial politeness, and for the wealth of scholarly information which he furnished of the great cathedral and its centuries of existence.

After visiting the cathedral, we wandered to St. Martin's, which is said to be the oldest church building in the land. It is, indeed, an antique structure, and looks as if it might have floated down from the flood. It is situated in the midst of an old cemetery, where wild grasses and flowers flourish over the graves. Services are going on as we approach, and soft and solemn music fills the air. It is said that this was originally a temple of the Druids, built 100 A.D. It afterwards became a place of Roman worship, and then a Christian church in 370 A.D. This is the legend. Whatever may be the facts, the "corridors of time" stretch far away to the foundation-stones of this quaint little church, and we need not dispute the story as it is given.

Canterbury is also famous as the place where David Copperfield lived, and I think that David will be remembered as long as St. Thomas à Becket, and with much more delightful associations. David Copperfield is, to a certain extent, an autobiography of Dickens, and on that account is intensely interesting, as also are Canterbury and its surroundings, connected with the genius of the great story-teller, who has so much of the wonderful exuberance of Shakespeare. Mr. Jackson, who is an enthusiastic student of Dickens, pointed out the house where Agnes used to sit sewing by the window, and where Uriah Heep used to look forth with his cunning eyes; and also the tavern where Micawber gave his farewell gorgeous banquet, for which he never paid the bill; and there was the butcher's shop, etc. All these things, associated with the immortal story, gave to ancient Canterbury the brilliant light of modern humanity and glorious romance. I shall not forget my excursion to this venerable place, and must thank Mr. Jackson for his kindness and generosity.

On Monday I have to write "News and Notes" again, but find a pleasant relief after these literary labors in a social reunion at the home of Miss Edith M. Vance and Miss Annie Brown. Our women friends do not fear to put on the harness and work for reform, notwithstanding danger and ostracism. Since I have arrived in England, in many places in the field work there has been bitter opposition, and, but for the protection of policemen, there would have been bloodshed and riot. The cruel nature of the Christian religion is thus exposed. In these emergencies we find that woman does not lack in courage and devotion.

On Tuesday, July 30, I sail with Dr. Morton down the Thames to Greenwich, and visit its museum and hospital and observatory. The voyage along the river is one of constant animation, so varied are the scenes, the vessels, the bridges, the shores, etc. The great hospital at Greenwich extends magnificently on the sight as we approach. In the museum and gallery are the portraits and relics of Nelson, and the melancholy remains of the Arctic expedition under the gallant Franklin. Time forbids a further description.

In the evening, with Mr. Jackson, I visit the India Exhibition, where the great wheel, three hundred feet high, rolls around, and where there is a most brilliant exhibition of oriental life, its trade, its skill, its art, its wild and luxuriant animal world; its temples of worship, its thousand gods. It was a resplendent scene, ten thousand blazing torches, ten thousand people, bands playing by the dozen almost, beautiful gardens, cascades and flowing waters. One need not travel to India to see its vivid and superb variety of human genius.

On Wednesday evening I went with Dr. Morton to the magnificent Royal Aquarium, where music and the drama add their charms to a display of curiosities from every age and clime. I also visit, with Dr. Morton, the "Old Curiosity Shop" of Dickens. It is still standing in the heart of London, a little, crooked building, with old books and papers for sale, pictures of Dickens, relics, etc.

On Thursday, with my genial and learned friend Wheeler, who is interested in all that pertains to literature, we visited Chelsea, the home of Carlyle, and the house where he used to live and work, and the garden where he used to smoke and muse. Carlyle has been a great influence in this century, a kind of thunderbolt of reform and sincerity. He was tremendously in earnest, and, although he believed in God, he found fault with him also, and muttered: "He does nothing, he is asleep." Though Carlyle could not waken the deity, he did waken man, and set him to thinking and doing. Carlyle was a rugged old fellow, but he wielded the hammer of Thor and made the sparks fly. I plucked some jasmine planted by the wife in the garden. In this case I honor the woman more than the man. She was equally heroic, equally genuine; a woman of fine devotion and splendid nobility of character. I honor Carlyle, but Jane was the better man of the two, and deserves a more shining crown.

On Thursday evening I end my week's London experience at the home of Charles Albert Watts, the son of Charles Watts, who is engaged in scientific and Freethought publishing business, is editor of the Literary Guide, etc. Around his hospitable table are Mrs. Watts, his wife, the twin children, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Watts, who can rejoice in seeing grandchildren gather about them. How old we are getting to be; yet no one would know it by our looks, only by our children, who grow up so fast about our pathway. We spend a delightful evening, and are loth to part when train time arrives; but we cannot afford to be "left"—we must keep up with time and tide.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

ACID DROPS.

MRS. CHANT is in America, trading on the notoriety she gained by her crusade against the Empire Music Hall, the license of which has just been restored without restriction, at least so far as the recommendation of the Licensing Committee is concerned. Mr. Price Hughes, however, is still here to save London from outrage. Last Sunday afternoon he had a meeting of Good Templars in St. James's Hall, and asked them if, in their name, he might send a message to the Chairman of the London County Council, requesting it to overrule its Licensing Committee's decision. Of course the meeting said Yes. No doubt this highly impartial opinion will have great weight with the County Council.

MAX NORDAU'S Paradoxes has long been known to Freethinkers in England through the American translation. A new translation is now issued in London by Heinemann, and the Methodist Times says it "will find many readers." In another part of the same paper we notice that "infidelity in this country has had its day." Our pious contemporary is evidently ignorant of Max Nordau's irreligious opinions.

Considering that "infidelity" has had its day in England, it is curious that Mr. Price Hughes is imploring the Dissenters to join the Church of England in opposition to Secular Education. He begs them not to "make themselves the cats'-paws of agnostic journalists," and warns them against letting the School Board system be "worked in the interests of infidels and agnostics." We have had our own day, but somehow it is not night with us, and Mr. Hughes knows it.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Hughes is one of the loosest writers and speakers in this country. He refers to the "millions of workmen" who have received the Salvation Army preachers with open arms. How many millions of workmen does he think there are in England?

The Church Times protests against the heretical proposals of the Women's Total Abstinence Union for the use of "unfermented wine in the eucharist." It says: "A liquor that is not fermented is not wine, and without wine the original command to do this cannot be obeyed." The question is fully dealt with in Mr. Foote's new pamphlet on The Bible and Beer.

A writer who has travelled in China comments in the Melbourne Argus on the folly of letting young Christian women go about preaching in that country. To go unattended in the way they do is only practised by the lowest class of Chinese women, with whom they are thus naturally confounded. What, he asks, is the sense of "sending ladies out at all? If only for pity's sake, and in the cause of humanity, this system of luring inexperienced girls to die in agony and horror amid the yellow savages of China ought to be at once put an end to."

Dr. Griffith John, of Hankow, a well-known missionary, also strongly objects to female missionaries going about in strange districts, sometimes accompanied by male evangelists. This presents a picture to the eyes of the Chinese which is not calculated to heighten their respect. "I think," he says, "the women are of very great service as nurses and teachers, and they should only, I think, work from thoroughly organised centres, and under every possible safeguard."

It appears that in China, wherever there is a Christian mission established, Chinese parents are afraid of letting their children go out, lest they should be kidnapped by the foreign devils. At Cheng-tu, where the massacre took place, a placard was issued warning parents to keep their children within doors. However false and erroneous such a notion may be, no one can wonder that where it exists there must be a feeling of enmity and hatred against the foreign devils, "the followers of the cha Jesus."

The Church Missionary Society is sending more ladies out to China to take the place of the martyred ones, who are supposed to have a safe seat in glory. We very much question if these ladies know the real state of native feeling; and, should further massacres result, the pious parties who induce these ladies to thus devote their lives to martyrdom are really accessories before the fact.

Cardinal Gibbons, a Yankee red-hatted priest, has been to Rome. Unfortunately he did not stop there. He has returned to the United States, where he informs the people that the Pope "believes fully" in the custom of opening Congress with prayer. Of course he does. We know that without asking. Who ever heard of a butcher running down beef?

There is a good deal of sham liberty in "free and independent" America. A wretched fellow called Comstock, secretary of the Vice Society (as old Cobbett used to call the original body in England), pretty well decides on his own hand what literature shall pass through the United States mails. It now appears that the Postmaster-General of Canada has prohibited the transmission of our gallant contemporary, the New York Truthseeker. By a stroke of his pen he stops the circulation of this paper in the whole Dominion, and there is absolutely no appeal against his decision. It is really astonishing that "free" people should hire a man to carry their letters, and let the fellow dictate what they shall read. Yet so it is, and they submit to it like a lot of sheep—all but the Freethinkers.

The Christian Reformer calls for the suppression of the Truthseeker. This is to "induce" its readers to "seek something more wholesome." The Truthseeker remarks that "The prescription is a very simple one, but it is not new." Of course not. It is as old as the first rogue who joined the first fool to hunt down the first honest man.

The revival of the curfew in many parts of the country is an indication of the stern way we are now making towards mediævalism. A curfew is a bell rung at candle-lighting. If, after the prescribed hour, a child under the age of consent is detected in the act of being upon the public street, by or in default of its parents' permission, a fine of one hundred dollars, more or less, is incurred. The custom, of course, has its origin in the hen-roost, though its present adherents are insensible of that fact. They take a hint from Mohammed, who prayed that the mountain might come to him, but, learning that that natural object was sedentary in its habits, he went to the mountain. The clergy, who are the volunteer herders of the populace, seeing that a penitentiary cannot at present be erected in every town without exceeding the legal indebtedness, have started in with the material at hand, and propose to make every child's home its own jail. Parents are honored by appointment as assistant jailers over the fruit of their loins. It is superfluous to inquire, Whither are we drifting? We are hell-bent for Puritanism.—George Macdonald, in "Truthseeker" (N.Y.).

High Church and Low Church are likely to have some nice squabbles during the Church Congress at Norwich. Father Ignatius intends to be present, and the Protestant Alliance will muster in force to disseminate anti-Catholic literature.

The Church Times declares that the Board school system, as at present practised, "is nothing more or less than the endowment of Dissent." There is a simple remedy—secular education only to be paid for out of public funds. Until this remedy is adopted there will always be squabbling as to the character of religious teaching, and teachers who should be employed in teaching what they know, instead of what they believe, will be jealously watched lest they lead the children in the direction of their own beliefs.

Some of the School Board Reports are somewhat misleading. Thus from Lenham, Kent, they report: "Nothing doctrinal is taught." Yet in another column we read that all divisions learn the Apostles' Creed. If that venerable forgery is not "doctrinal," what is?

According to the Tablet, the Archbishop of Santiago, in Chili, has pronounced an interdict upon two Atheistic journals "which had distinguished themselves by their blasphemies and scandalous attacks upon the Church, and excommunicated all connected therewith, including sellers and readers." The Tablet seems to recognise that all this may be laughed at, for it adds, most impressively, as the climax, that "The two leading banks have stopped their advertisements."

Sir Richard Church, who was Commander-in-Chief of the Greek forces during the War of Independence, afterwards accepted a commission from King Ferdinand to put down the brigands who infested and terrorised the kingdom of Naples. "Worst of all," the Westminster Gazette says, "were the Decisi, under Ciro Annichiarico, a bloodthirsty priest who generally prefaced a crime by a mass, and at his execution confessed to sixty or seventy murders." Quite a King David! The man after God's own heart always twanged his harp when he was bent on an extra-special crime.

Under the heading, "Shocking Case of Depravity," the South Australian Register (August 27) reports the arrest, at Oakleigh, Melbourne, of the Rev. James Frank Gannaway, who has filled various Congregational pulpits in England and Victoria, for getting children by his own daughter. He is an elderly man, and is said to have six children, who are his grandchildren also.

At the sensational trial of a Sunday-school teacher for murdering a girl in a chapel at San Francisco, an incident was the infliction upon the secretary of the Y.M.C.A. of a fine of 250 dollars for having told a juryman that the people would hang him if they did not hang Durrant, the accused.

An order of half-a-crown a week has been made on the Rev. Jonathan Crossland, late vicar of Kilham, near Driffield, for the purpose of maintaining the illegitimate child of a girl of sixteen, who was in his service.

The monks of Athos rigidly exclude all female creatures, including animals, from their domains. Yet travellers complain of fleas. Why do they not excommunicate feminine fleas, as the bishops of old solemnly excommunicated locusts and other vermin?

Bowen, in his work on Mount Athos, mentions a superstition that any women who presumed to land on the holy peninsula have always been struck dead for their impiety. One of the monks asked him, "What sort of human creatures are women?" He answered, "Have you never seen a woman?" "when he assured me he had only seen his mother, and that he had forgotten even her appearance." These monks do not make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake; but perhaps it would be just as well if they did.

A straw showing the way the wind is blowing in America on the New Woman question is the announcement that the Catholic University of Washington, this month opens its doors to women. They will not receive degrees, but will be brought under priestly training, and receive such higher education as the Church has to offer. It is satisfactory to see the Church, which is built on the necks of women, obliged to give them a little more opportunity, for fear lest they drift where education of a non-priestly character may be obtained.

Digitized by Google

An American Catholic magazine, Self-Culture, has the impudence to write: "Had Thomas Paine's mind been clear in his last moments, he would undoubtedly have died in the communion of the Catholic Church." Now, it happens that Paine's mind was clear in his last moments, and he deliberately rejected the offices of all men of God. If there was one faith more than another which he disliked, it was the set of priestly institutions and superstitions called Catholic.

Benton Ridge, Ohio, has recently suffered from a furious revival of religion, and one of the converts is building a large tank, which he will fill with water, so that another convert can show the depth of his faith by attempting to walk upon its surface. He is likely, incidentally, to show the depth of water.

Christian civilisation wants a little toning up (or perhaps toning down) in some parts of America. Monday's papers reported a horrible lynching incident at Cole City, Tennessee. A negro, alleged to have assaulted a white girl, was dragged from the jail by a furious mob. The father of the girl then mutilated him in an unspeakable manner, after which another man pounded the joints of his fingers until his hands were reduced to a jelly. The poor wretch was then shot in different parts of the body, and his corpse was burnt to ashes.

Sunday before the Church Congress at Norwich was taken advantage of by the local Bishop, who addressed a meeting in the Agricultural Hall on Christian Socialism. "It would seem," says the Daily News correspondent, "that he expected the audience would largely consist of working men; but there did not seem to be many of that class present." We should think not, indeed! Working men are not fond of listening to harangues on "Labor" by rich dignitaries of a purse-proud Church.

The Wesleyan Missionary Committee having decided to stop the supplies for South African Missions, the churches over there have appointed a week of self-denial throughout the entire body, in order to make up the deficiency.

In 1852 it is believed there were about 150 native Christians, but it is doubtful if there were one hundred Muslims, in the whole of Lagos. To-day there are at least twelve thousand followers of Islam, with fifty Mosques. Christianity, in the same period, although State-aided and recognised, and protected by treaty rights, can only boast of twenty-eight churches and chapels of all denominations, and about five thousand nominal followers. With these striking figures before them, Christians continually declare that Islam is only promoted by the sword, and cannot succeed when opposed by Christianity.—Crescent.

Actual investigation shows that more outrages are committed by Americans upon Chinese than by the latter upon the former. It is also clearly shown that, while the Americans have no decent excuse for their barbarities, the Chinese generally act under great provocation. Yet these facts will not deter the newspapers from claiming all the virtues for the Americans, and condemning the Chinese as inhuman fiends unfit to live.

The Rev. H. T. Chapman, of Leeds, addressing the congregation of the Orchard Chapel at Preston, reproved them hotly for using their handkerchiefs as fans, and said that cooling themselves made it all the hotter for him. He perspired in the pulpit, but that was nothing to what some will have to undergo hereafter.

Matthew Arnold said that God was usually conceived as a magnified non-natural man, and Herbert Spencer holds that all gods are the ghosts of ancestral chiefs. This may be too summary an account of the deities, but it is borne out by what missionary Taylor reports of the Kaffirs. When told about God, they asked how many wives he kept. A chief's status was determined by the amount of luxuries he could afford; and when they heard that God had but one son and no wife, they thought he was not much of a sovereign.

Polygamy has always proved a trouble to the missionaries. Jesus said nothing about it, while the heathen read in their Bibles how Abraham, Jacob, David, Solomon, and other favorites of God, practised it. If the missionary insists on all the wives being put away except the first, this usually means that the polygamist is left with the oldest, while the others are cast adrift. One Central African is said to have qualified himself for baptism by eating up all his wives save the one permitted by the messenger of Christ.

Herbert Burrows, who is currently credited with converting Mrs. Besant to Theosophy, has left the Theosophical Society, and, in doing so, writes a letter to the papers, in which he says: "The recent disclosures of fraud which have split the Society led me to further investigations, impossible before, which have thoroughly convinced me that for years deception in the Society has been rampant, deception to which Madame Blavatsky was sometimes a party." Mr. Burrows adds that he leaves the Society because "as it exists I believe it to be a standing danger to honesty and truth, and a perpetual open door to superstition, delusion, and fraud." The curious thing is that Mr. Burrows, who, according to a famous inscription by H. P. B., was "my friend in a former incarnation," has been so long in finding this out.

Our Ritualistic churches now go in much for Harvest Thanksgivings, and turn their altars into the resemblance of a greengrocer's shop. All this is an attempted modification of the old Pagan rites of harvest time. One of the most significant of these was the custom kept up by Catholics on Lammas (i.e., Loaf-mass) day, of celebrating the sacrament with bread made from the last cut sheaf of the newly-taken harvest, in which the corn-spirit, or old John Barleycorn of the song, was supposed to have entered, and which found its way into the safe receptacle of the stomachs of those who partook of the Holy Sacrament.

Of course, the real inner meaning of the old spring and harvest festivals was that God (i.e., his priests) should have the first fruits of the sheep, cattle, and harvest. But with every advance of civilisation God's (i.e., his priests')-share gets less and less, and now, instead of taking tithes of all, he has to hand over the big pumpkins to the sexton.

A recent attempt has been made to back up the legends of Noah's flood, by referring to the evidences of some catastrophe which swept away palæolithic man and the great beasts of the palæolithic period. Assuming this to be correct, it is yet certain that the neolithic period lasted for an immense time after the palæolithic period; while the races which dwelt in Egypt, long prior to Noah, were not in a stone age, although doubtless they preserved remnants of it, but were acquainted with, and made utensils of bronze and copper.

It was found from the Parliamentary Returns on Religious Teaching in Board Schools that eight schools, despite the express terms of the Act under which they sit, taught the Church Catechism en bloc. Only fifty-seven dispense with religious teaching altogether, and of these only seven are in England, though sixty Welsh and nearly twenty English Board schools fight shy of Bible-teaching. Some of them open with a hymn.

Colonel Ingersoll's pocket was picked the other day in Missouri, whereat the Richmond State rejoices. "Go for him again, slick-finger!" exclaims this elegant representative of Christian piety. Once it was right to burn a Freethinker—now it is right to rob him. Even this is an improvement. If they only let the Atheist live, he will teach them to be honest.

There are still over ten thousand parishes in which there is no Board school, and where the inhabitants are forced to send their children to the Church schools. Of course, the Church people say there is the Conscience clause, which they well know is a fraud and a snare, leading to the persecution of the children withdrawn.

The men of God at Johannesburg, S.A., have a Ministers Association to protect their own monopolies. The said Association has brought an action against the lessees of the Theatre of Varieties and Empire, charging them with contravening the Sunday Act by having their houses open for Sunday Concerts. No doubt the L.D.R.A. would like to do something similar here.

Most church attendants now are women. They go to see and be seen, to get out once a week, and keep up with the latest styles of dress-fitting. The married men go occasionally to please their wives, and the young men to see the girls, while possibly a few old fogies go because they think God will damn them if they don't.—Independent Pulpit.

The corner-stone of a church was being laid at Lorain, Ohio. A thousand persons assembled on a platform to witness this function. Somehow the structure collapsed. Five persons were killed on the spot, eleven fatally injured, and many others hurt. Some were trampled to death in the panic. Such is the sustaining and elevating influence of the religion which conquers the fear of death.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

October 20, Foresters' Hall.

November 17, Leicester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—October 13, Foresters' Hall; 14, 15, 16, 17, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne with the Rev. A. J. Waldron; 18, North Shields; 20, Glasgow; 21, Paisley; 22, Cupar; 24 and 25, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. November 17, Liverpool; 24, Manchester.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

R. Dowding.—It is, as you say, a great victory at Walthamstow. Many thanks for your action in the matter.

W. Strassheim.—Mr. Foote will probably visit Newcastle again shortly. The matter you complain of shall be looked into. Thanks for your good wishes.

W. Walker hopes we shall have a New Year's Gift week after Christmas.

J. Hindle, a veteran Freethinker, writes: "Could you not extend the time to a Shilling Month Fund? I approve your method of propaganda, and wish ten thousand shillings may be sent you. The Freethought party could do this and more."

J. W. F.—We also wish your shilling were "a hundred times as much," but the deficiency might easily be made up by ninety-nine others sending a shilling each.

A. Stanley, subscribing to Shilling Week, says: "I wish you could extend your leading articles in the Freethinker; they are sweet, sweet, but far too short." The difficulty is that Mr. Foote has work enough for two or three people already. Besides, he has always aimed at putting "the cream of the matter" into his articles; and if the reader gets that, he need not trouble very much about the skim-milk left over.

W. B. Thompson.—Your communication is too long for insertion this week, as we are overcrowded with matter at present. We note your explanation of why you voted for once with the Church party on the Gillingham School Board. The Dissenters would not help you in any way to carry out their own boasted principle of "religious equality," so, having the odd vote that turned the scale, you left them at the tender mercy of the Church party, with its Apostles' Creed; telling them that, as the Conscience clause was good enough for the Secularists, it would have to be good enough for the Dissenters. We quite understand your action, and hope it will show Dissenters their folly and hypocrisy.

A. Staigen.—Thanks for your letter and the newspaper. See paragraph.

James Hart.—Glad to receive your appreciative and encouraging letter. Mr. Foote has for some time had his eye on Cardiff, Swansea, and South Wales generally, as a likely place for Freethought propaganda. Perhaps something could be done there this winter.

Humanitarian.—Would the lady inflict injury upon another mother's child because it was not baptised? If not, why should she think God (if such a being exist) is more cruel than herself? A child is passive at its baptism; knows nothing about it in fact. Would it not be monstrous, therefore, to punish it for not being baptised, when the omission is no fault of its own?

A. J. Newton.—Your money is transferred, as requested. It was the Queen's secretary who officially denied the truth of that story about her declaring the Bible to be the source of England's greatness. It is an imposition to hang that picture up in a Board school.

W. Cole.—Accept our sympathy.

T. Fisher.—The far east of London requires waking up, and we hope to do something there this winter. Freethinkers exist in West Ham, Walthamstow, etc., but they want uniting for a common effort. The passage you refer to is not to be found in the words given; but see Judges ii. 20-23.

A. F. Walter.—It is pleasant to receive a family subscription for Shilling Week. We like to see Freethought permeating the whole household.

W. Martin.—We think you may depend upon Mr. Gott as an honest tradesman, anxious to do justice to his customers as well as himself. The goods ordered for our own household have always given satisfaction.

E. Jennings.—Mr. Foote will be glad to pay Ipswich another visit. Lectures in such a place should for some time be of a decidedly militant character. It is no use tickling the surface of hard soil; it must be ploughed up.

J. Scott.—Pleased to hear from you. Did not know you had removed to Manchester.

Hugh Thomson.—Thanks for your kind letter and good wishes.

H. A. G.—Shall appear, with slight alterations.

W. Box.—Hope your wish that we may receive "many thousand shillings" will be realised.

W. A. Ansell.—Glad to know you appreciate our lecture scheme. It is pleasant to hear of the ex-local preacher newsagent, away down in Cornwall, exhibiting our contents-sheet and selling a dozen copies weekly. Our compliments to him.

R. Carroll.—Your letter to hand. It confirms our suspicions. We will write you on the subject in a few days.

D. G. Lindsay (Glasgow).—Both remittances received, and names acknowledged.

Joseph Taylor.—Convey our thanks to the Staleybridge subscribers.

F. P. Cooper.—Particulars of membership of N.S.S. forwarded. We hope you will see your way to join.

A. B. Moss.—It was good of you to subscribe, especially after your recent heavy domestic expenses. Hard workers like yourself ought not to be taxed financially in addition.

W. A. Jones.—Glad to hear you are so pleased with our "racy articles in the Freethinker."

J. Draper.—We thank you for obtaining us a new subscriber. Change of address notified to our publisher.

J. Hockin.—The second volume of the work you mention has been delayed by Mr. Foote's multifarious duties. We hope to publish it next year.

B. Waterhouse, who sends ten shillings from a little Kentish town, says of our scheme: "I think it is about the best way you can lay out money at present."

J. Kimberley.—Thanks. Will see, and if possible acknowledge next week.

W. F. Dobson.—Letters for insertion must be written on one side only of the paper. Your communication is, besides, too long and too impertinent.

W. H. Spivey.—Glad to hear the Huddersfield Branch is prepared for fresh active work, and hope you will be able to obtain a suitable hall for lectures.

A. Waymark.—(1) The statement in Was Jesus Insane? that his friends thought him mad, is supported by Mark iii. 21. (2) We cannot undertake to substantiate the statements of writers in the Clarion, who, we dare say, are well able to defend themselves.

W. Davies, who sends ten shillings, says: "Your Shilling Week is a move in the right direction."

G. A. K.—You point to a real drawback. Mr. Foote is bent on reducing this chaos to order. Easy-going muddlers will not like his action, but he is resolved to proceed.

T. Thelwall.—Pleased to have your "hearty sympathy" in our "efforts to spread Freethought." Mr. Wheeler's new volume will not deal with the God question in the way you desire; the essays in it will be mostly anthropological; but we believe you will find it both interesting and useful. Ecclesiastical history, especially up to the fourth century, is gangrened with fraud.

J. Proctor, who sends ten shillings, writes: "I hope you will get more this time than you did last Shilling Week, which was a disappointment to me, as I hoped you would get a thousand pounds at least."

E. D. H. Daly.—Amount divided as you suggest. Miss Vance will send you receipt for the N.S.S. subscription. Exceptionally glad to have your "best wishes and sincere admiration" for our "conduct as leader of the party."

C. H. Sheldon.—Mr. Foote will certainly visit York if a decent hall can be obtained.

H. Jones (Blackburn).—List received with thanks. Glad to hear you are sending Miss Vance the names of six new members.

T. Womersell.—(1) The Barnsley Branch, with its poor members, has done well. You have a right to "hope the rich will do better." (2) It is absurd to say that Hebrew was as easy without the vowel points as with them. Why then were the vowel points adopted? Professor Bruce says, in his Christian Apologetics, that the man who wrote the old Hebrew would have difficulty in understanding himself after a time long enough to allow of a lapse of memory.

J. Fulton, subscribing to Shilling Week, writes: "I am sorry to see the apathy that exists among well-to-do Freethinkers with regard to your heavy and useful work. I am doubly astonished that the very wealthy do not occasionally present you with a thousand or two out of their profusion."

F. Nelson (Sheffield) writes: "It is with great pleasure I support Self-Denial Week. I trust the funds raised thereby will enable you to carry on a vigorous propaganda. I think this is just what the Freethought movement requires. We want more 'push.'"

R. Johnson (Manchester) thinks Shilling Week should be quarterly or half-yearly, and says every Freethinker should give one shilling at least.

Papers Received.—Walthamstow Reporter—Freidenker—Post—Orcadian—Walthamstow Guardian—Blue Grass Blade—Referee—Crescent—Norwood Weekly Herald—Kaffrarian Watchman—Port Elizabeth Advertiser—Chatham and Rochester News—Scribner—Rochester and Chatham Standard—Two Worlds—Dublin Saturday Herald—New York Public Opinion—Secular Thought—Newcastle Chronicle—Progressive Thinker—Dundee Courier.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 6d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

Digitized by Google

SHILLING WEEK.

ACTING on the suggestion of a correspondent, I have resolved to do what I did on a previous occasion—namely, to keep this Fund open a little longer. This will give the laggards—and they are many—an opportunity of subscribing; and really it is better late than never.

The great majority of subscriptions, up to the present, are for small amounts. Of course more of these are wanted, as it is well to see "the rank and file" interested in the success of the movement. But those who can send larger amounts are requested to bestir themselves. Cheques are welcome, as well as Postal Orders.

My own share of this enterprise is simply work and loss. I have not taken a single penny for any lecture at Milton Hall, St. James's Hall, or Foresters' Hall; and I am personally responsible for the deficit.

A few facts will show, better than columns of abstraction, at what I am aiming.

Mr. Watts has formed extra engagements under my scheme during his approaching northern tour. He will visit York, Coupar, Perth, and Paisley. Mr. Cohen is also making a number of similar engagements. In each case I undertake to recompense the lecturer, leaving the Branches or committees to see to the purely local expenses, which can be met, or met partly, by collections.

Mr. Gott wrote to me a few days ago from Bradford, stating that the local friends at Bingley, Shipley, Stanningley, Farsley, Heckmondwike, Keighley, and Halifax, were too timid or indolent to move; but himself, Mr. Grange, and other Bradford friends, were willing to organise lectures by Mr. Cohen, and perhaps by Mr. Snell, in these places in November, if I would take the financial responsibility, which they would make as light as possible. I replied that I would, and said "Go on."

Mr. Heaford is just back from a lecturing tour in Scotland, and in this case I thought it right to promise assistance. I do not believe our party wants a good man to work hard and lose at the finish.

It is high time this matter were taken in hand, and I have stepped into the breach, as the President should. Our party wants a forward movement in every part of the country. It is no use mincing matters. I mean to advance, with those who will trust me and work with me. I will not be held back by critics and cavillers. Something must be done, and I will try to do it.

For the present, at least, I do not mean to be trammelled by committees. I want help, in money and in work; but I do not want people looking over my shoulders, and trying every minute to control my activities. Committees are never good at initiative; their time comes afterwards, when the enterprise has had a successful youth and has passed into a steady middle-age. Perhaps this enterprise will help to build up a strong party, with a strong organisation, capable of conducting its affairs successfully on purely democratic lines. Meanwhile the work must be done as it can be done. There is no alternative.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

A. J. Newton, 5s.; T. Fisher, 1s. 6d.; S. Fisher, 1s. 6d.; Gerty and Charlie, 1s.; C. S. A., 1s.; G. Nidd, 1s.; H. Varley, 2s. 6d.; R. Wasley, 1s.; E. Cottrell, 1s.; Mrs. Cottrell, 1s.; L. E. Fraser, 3s.; A. C. Varley, 1s.; F. Murray, 1s.; C. Groves, 1s.; J. Hart, 2s.; H. Leggett, 1s.; F. Warwick, 1s.; Castor, 2s.; J. T. Ives, 1s.; J. T., 1s.; F. D., 1s.; E. Birkbeck, 1s.; A. Aspinall, 1s.; T. Parkinson, 1s.; J. W. F., 1s.; T. Finden, 1s.; W. Sweetman, 2s.; D. Mitchell, 1s.; J. Baxter, 2s.; A. Stanley, 5s.; R. Dowding, 2s.; J. Primrose, 4s.; Mrs. Primrose, 2s.; R. Primrose, 2s.; W. Strassheim, 2s.; H. J. Savory, 1s.; W. Walker, 1s.; J. Hindle, 2s.; F. P. Cooper, 2s.; T. Holstead, 1s.; Miss Daniels, 1s.; G. Smith, 2s.; W. Collins, 1s.; Mrs. Hampson, 1s.; Annie Hampson, 1s.; Louie Hampson, 1s.; J. F. Hampson, 1s.; T. Robertson, 5s.; Leslie Spiers, 2s.; D. C., 2s.; German Atheist, 5s.; J. L. Scott, 2s.; J. and Mrs. Taylor, 3s.; T. Hartley, 1s.; J. Hall, 1s.; H. M. Ridgway, 10s.; G. F. Gloak, 2s.; John Waller, 2s. 6d.; S. Adamson, 1s.; A. McCrone, 1s.; G. F. Turnbull, 1s.; Mr. and Mrs. Turnbull, 2s.; A. McConnachie, 1s.; D. Baxter, 1s.; A. McW., 1s.; Mr. and Mrs. Ashworth, 2s.; Mr. and Mrs. Haworth, 2s.; Mr. and Mrs. Jones, 2s.; J. Titherington, 1s.; J. Harley, 1s.; C. K., 1s.; F. J. Harborne, 5s.; J. Proctor, 10s.; J Draper, 2s.; Thornton, 1s.; J. F., 2s.; Dred, 1s.; Mr. and Mrs. Terry, 2s.; Frank and Fred Terry, 2s.; A. B. Moss, 2s. 6d.; W. A. J., 1s.; T. P. H., 1s.; E. B., 1s.; Mrs. Pine, 1s.; Miss Pine, 1s.; C. Atkinson, 2s.; J. Hockin, 1s.; E. D. H. Daly, £1; C. H. Sheldon, 2s.; H. Lyon, 2s. 6d.; G. W. T., 1s.; M. Bywater, 1s.; W. Mann, 2s.; Minnie Mann, 2s.; Flora Mann, 1s.; J. Goodfellow, 2s. 6d.; H. Duncan, 1s.; R. Weightman, 1s.; J. Barry, 5s.; E. W. W., 2s.; G. Bledsall, 1s.; T. Wombwell, 1s.; J. Wadmore, 1s.; E. Wadmore, 1s.; Emma Wadmore, 1s.; T. Townsend, 1s.; H. Smallwood, 2s.; F. Creedy, 1s.; C. J. Pankhurst, 2s. 6d.; J. Savage, 2s. 6d.; H. Sanderson, 1s.; G. Harman, 1s.; W. Dyson, 1s.; E. G. H., 2s.; J. Lowther, 1s.; N. Richardson, 1s.; T. Hopkins, 1s.; G. Thwaites, 5s.; G. Thompson, 1s.; W. Elcoat, 1s.; J. Carter, 1s.; J. G. Dobson, 1s.; Alpha, 1s.; J. Terry, 1s.; J. H. R., 1s.; H. C., 2s. 6d.; W. H. Wood, 2s. 6d.; L. Lee, 2s.; J. P., 1s.; Cayford, 1s.; Quinney, 1s.; H. Barratt, 1s.; Devonshire, 1s.; A. G., 1s.; G. W. C., 1s.; C. Stafford, 1s.; T. H. Seymour, 5s.; Annie Fry, 3s.; R. Goodwin, 5s.; Thor, 2s. 6d.; Mrs. Walter, 1s.; A. F. Walter, 1s.; F. Walter, 1s.; E. Walter, 1s.; W. and S. Walter, 1s.; A. W. Cox, 1s; E. Jennings, 2s. 6d.; J. Morgan, 2s.; B. Waterhouse, 10s.; B. F. P., 2s.; A. H., 1s.; F. S., 1s.; E. K., 1s.; J. K., 1s.; W. K., 1s.; J. E., 1s.; G. A. B., 2s.; R. Couzens, 1s.; J. Bee, 1s.; J. Cherry, 2s. 6d.; W. Cliffe, 3s.; W. H. Spivey, 2s.; T. Whiteley, 1s.; H. S., 10s.; A. Corley, 5s.; T. Friend, 1s.; J. Goodfellow, 1s.; J. Dennis, 2s.; J. Ritchie, 3s.; J. Scott, 1s.; Three Macclesfield Friends, 3s.; J. Thomson, 1s.; Hugh Thomson, 1s.; Mrs. Thomson, 1s.; H. A. G., 2s.; W. C., 1s.; A. C., 1s.; E. Bater, 2s.; Mrs. Bater, 1s.; W. W. Box, 1s.; Mrs. Box, 1s.; A. M. Smith, 1s.; Fred, 1s.; G. Milford, 1s.; W. H. Munton, 1s.; J. Philip, 2s.; W. Argall, 2s.; J. Fish, 5s.; F. Bull, 5s.; J. Fulton, 5s.; W. B. Jevons, 5s.; J. Bevins, 2s. 6d.; D. Smith, 1s.; J. Sutcliffe, 1s.; F. Nelson, 5s. 6d.; Mrs. Nelson, 1s.; Eli Jagger, 10s.; J. Stitt, 1s.; Fizzy and Kelly, 2s.; R. Johnson, 5s.; T. E. M., 1s.; G. L. Mackenzie, 1s.; J. R. Adams, 1s.; J. Shipp, 1s.; Octogenarian, 1s.; W. Shaweross, 3s.; W. Davies, 10s.; C. W., 1s.; G. A. K., 2s.; T. Thelwall, 2s.

Per R. Forder:—M. Warren, 1s.; S. A. B., 1s.; J. Cruickshanks, 1s. 8d.; R. Stirton, 1s.; L. W. W., 1s.; A Middlesboro' Sailor, 2s.; J. Kelsey, 1s.; W. Cross, 1s.; C. J. Pottage, £1; Mr. Waymark, 1s.; W. Mullen, 2s.; A. Lewis, 2s. 6d.; Mr. and Mrs. Deane, 2s.; D. Jones, 1s.; W. Tipper, 2s.; J. W. Griffiths, 2s.; W. Hunt, 5s.; T. Thurlow, 2s.; J. Edwards (making 5s.), 1s.; T. Lorney, 1s.; E. Lawson, 2s. 6d.; T. S., 1s.; A. R., 1s.; T. L., 1s.; J. R., 1s.; R. P., 1s.; J. H. S., 1s.; H. Byshe, 2s.; Ulster Branch, 5s.; A. E., 1s.; J. E., 1s.; W. G., 1s.; J. Abbott, 1s.; A Grateful Admirer, 1s.; S. Soper, 2s. 6d.; J. and Miss J. Clarke, 2s. 6d.

Per Miss Vance:—A. W. Marks, 13s.; Mrs. Marks, 5s.; S. M. A., 2s.; W. H. Kemp, 1s.; Marie du Bois, 5s.; C. Heaton, 2s.; R. Gotthed, 2s. 6d.; J. Hargreaves, 1s.; T. Shore, 1s.; F. Wood, 2s. 6d.; Mr. Wilson, 5s.; G. Bowman, 5s.; C. Hippack, 2s.; D. Young, 1s.; R. Green, 2s.; E. Cruttenden, 1s.; W. Johnson, 4s. 2d.

Corrections:—W. F., 2s., in last issue, should have been 2s. 6d.; M. Christopher, 1s., should have been 2s.

SUGAR PLUMS.

THE course of indoor lectures organised by the Wood Green Branch opened most encouragingly on Sunday evening. The Masonic Hall was crowded, and Mr. Foote's lecture on "Life, Death, and After" was to all appearance very highly appreciated. There was a considerable sprinkling of ladies, who appeared to be much interested in the "naming" of a baby boy. Mr. Thompson's child, who was to have been named, was unfortunately indisposed; but Mr. and Mrs. Wood took advantage of the opportunity to have their child named instead. The little one acted in an exemplary manner. He was evidently occupied in making out who it was that held him, and before he settled the problem the ceremony was over.

Some courteous opposition was offered by "Captain" Potts, of the Salvation Army, who was answered in the same spirit. The chairman then invited the audience to come again on the three following Sundays to hear Mr. Tourney Parris and Mr. Robert Forder. We hope the invitation will be responded to, and that the present course of lectures will be the precursor of many more in that populous suburb of London.

Mr. Charles Watts had a good audience last Sunday evening at Foresters' Hall. His lecture on "The Bible and Dramatic Literature" was enthusiastically received. Miss Brown made an excellent "chairman." Mr. Watts again occupies the same platform this Sunday evening, October 13, when he will speak upon "Atheism and Christian Theism: Which is the More Reasonable?" Mr. Foote will preside, and he hopes to see a good audience on this occasion. Now that the admission is free, Freethinkers should try to fill the seats by bringing as many as possible of their friends and acquaintances.

Digitized by Google

To-morrow, Monday, October 14, Mr. Watts starts for a sixteen days' tour in the North of England and Scotland. The first four nights he debates with the Rev. A. J. Waldron in Ginnett's Amphitheatre, Newcastle-on-Tyne. We hope our friends in the North will muster in full force, and give our colleague a hearty support.

Mr. Cohen follows Mr. Parris at Leicester, and lectures this Sunday on the Theistic question. Mr. Gimson reports that the opening of the winter season by Mr. Parris was very successful. He say: "We expect an intellectual treat when Mr. Parris comes, and we always get it."

J. Partridge reports that Mr. Cohen's last lecture at Birmingham was the best attended of all, that he has won unstinted praise for his work in the town, that several new members have joined, and that several other accessions are expected.

The members of the Finsbury Park and Islington Branches are requested to attend an adjourned meeting at 91 Mildmay-park on Tuesday next, October 15, at 8 o'clock. Every member is invited to be present.

Mr. A. B. Moss is submitting the following motion to the Bermondsey Vestry: "That this Vestry do petition Parliament to amend the law which now exempts the places of worship of the Church of England as by law established from rates and other parochial charges."

Miss Vance is organising a dramatic performance at the Camberwell Secular Hall for Wednesday, November 13, in aid of the Lecture Scheme Fund. Mr. Charles Watts will be one of the performers, and Mr. Foote will attend and give a reading. Full particulars will appear next week.

The Camberwell Branch will have a Tea and social reunion on Sunday, October 20. These gatherings are always enjoyable, and are attended by friends from all parts of London. The Camberwell Science Classes, at the Secular Hall, reopen under the able conduct of Mr. Coppock on Friday next (Oct. 11). Chemistry at 8—teacher, Mr. W. J. Clark; Hygiene at 9—teacher, Mr. E. Watkins. The classes are all free, and are in connection with South Kensington.

Mr. Dowding, of Walthamstow, offered a weekly copy of the Freethinker to the local Public Library, and whoever drew up the report stated that it would not be accepted. The matter was, however, brought before the Library Committee by Councillor McSheedy, and an amendment declaring that Mr. Dowding's offer should be accepted was carried by 8 votes to 2, Councillors Cropley and Geary alone opposing.

Freethought has penetrated as far North as Orkney; indeed, a Shetlander, Mr. L. J. Nicholson, has published, in the South, a volume of Freethought poems. But in Orkney itself the Orcadian inserts a letter, signed "Brimstone Billy," making fun of that great prop of the churches, Satan himself, and, moreover, satirising the Bible references to his devilship.

The Aberdeen Journal can safely advocate free inquiry when pitching into Cardinal Vaughan. It says of his warnings against the works of Huxley and Spencer: "Any such cramping doctrine is wholly out of place to-day. We live in an age of inquiry and speculation. All our beliefs—scientific, philosophical, theological, and historical—are undergoing strict and careful scrutiny; and this spirit of investigation is not by any means the worst sign of the times. It is only the timid or the half-convinced that can fear an honest examination even of cherished beliefs."

In an article on "The Religion of the Undergraduate," in the October Nineteenth Century, the Rev. A. C. Deane says: "The writer has himself known more than one instance in which this ill-advised use of Paley's evidences by the University has done a great deal to overthrow the very faith which it was designed to strengthen."

Mr. Deane says that the prevalent attitude towards religion on the part of the university undergraduates is Agnosticism. "With sorrow and reluctance it must be confessed that the majority of Oxford and Cambridge undergraduates are without, or, at least, profess to be without, any religion at all"! Most horrible!

Clarence Waterer writes in the October Westminster Review on "The Dawn of the Trinity," pointing to the evidence of divine triads in Egypt long anterior to the rise of Christianity. He holds that the idea arose from the type of the ideal human family as father, mother, and offspring.

The New York Truthseeker of September 28 reproduces Mr. Foote's article on the farewell dinner to Mr. Putnam, and a portion of his article on the "Missionary Martyrs" in China. Mr. Putnam continues his "News and Notes," parts of which will reappear in our columns.

The Independent Pulpit, of Waco, Texas, reproduces Mr. Wheeler's article, "Is Christianity Useful?" Where Mr. Wheeler, however, uses the word "Freethinkers," the I. P. prints "Liberalists." We do not consider the American nomenclature an improvement.

Bible and Beer is the title of a large new pamphlet by Mr. Foote, which is now in the press and will be on sale next week. It is a thorough-going examination of Bible Temperance, dealing with Old and New Testament drinks, and showing the absurdity of the contention that Jesus Christ was a teetotaler, or that the wines recommended in Scripture were unfermented. The pamphlet also gives a brief, but sufficient, history of the drinking habits fostered by the Church, and shows how the religious bodies opposed the Temperance movement in its infancy. The pamphlet will, we believe, be not only interesting to the general reader, but of great service to Freethought propagandists in exposing the pretensions of Christianity.

Mr. Forder reports that the International Congress of Freethinkers at Brussels was a very successful gathering. The question of education was brought prominently to the fore, and it was hoped that by a union of Liberals the clerical party in Belgium will yet be defeated. The children's entertainment in one of the largest halls in the city was a great success, and a good collection was taken up for carrying on the work.

CHRISTIANITY AND WAR.

In speaking of the chief evils which afflict the human race we might adopt the phraseology used by the author of the Pauline epistles, and say: "Now remain these three—poverty, disease, and war; and the greatest of these is war." Not only is war the chief of these ills, but it is also a principal cause of the other two. The wealth wasted in senseless struggles of nation against nation and man against man would feed all the hungry and clothe all the naked on the globe. The wounds, exposure, and privation incident to military service, the brutal passions kept alive by indulgence in the spirit of combativeness—which is the survival in man of one trait of his former ancestor, the ferocious beast—and the neglect of home duties while the energies of a people and of their rulers have been consumed in planning the destruction of their neighbor, have been the fruitful parents of diseases. Vultures fatten on the rotten carcasses of the dead; vermin swarm where pestilential vapors poison the blood and filth engenders pestilence. Human vultures and human vermin thrive in times of war; but universal prosperity is only possible when first shall have been firmly established a condition of universal peace.

It is no wild Utopian dream that such a condition will at some future time be established. It should be already a recognised essential of civilisation. War is only possible where primitive barbarism is not yet wholly extinct. The evolution of humanity would have raised all but savage tribes above it, and perhaps might have had sufficient influence to instil even into those tribes a milder spirit and gentler practices, but for one opposing element, the worst foe mankind has ever known—Christianity.

"I came not to send peace upon earth, but a sword," is the one fulfilled prophecy of the New Testament Scriptures. All religions ever preached on earth have promulgated errors, and, more or less, have misled their votaries; but let us be just. All religions have not been equally cruel, bloody, and barbarous. All have not been equally tyrannical, equally given to the infliction of injustice and agony. The foulest monster of the number bears the symbol of a man dying the death of a tortured slave; and she flaunts it upon her banners as the mark of the beast by which she may be known.

Christianity did not originate in a stable at Bethlehem, in the companionship of a peaceful ox and an ass. It was not first promulgated by honest, however ignorant and deluded, fishermen. It was not first accepted by sincere investigators after truth, seeking knowledge by night or by day. Everyone who has examined the subject with any approach to unprejudiced criticism knows that these statements are entirely false. It was originated by men who desired through its means to retain or to increase their power over their fellow men. It was promulgated by a savage warrior and murderer who did not scruple to imbue his hands in the blood of his own kindred. It was accepted by those down whose throats it was thrust at the sword's point.

Digitized by Google

From the days of Constantine to this year E.M. 295, Christianity has been the more or less direct cause of all the wars which have devastated the world. Always has she been found on the side of the oppressors, though sometimes, for a brief season, wearing an ill-fitting mask of liberty. The missionary of Christ has always been to the heathen the pioneer of the soldier, the rum-seller, and the commercial robber. The silly and wicked war of some thirty years ago between England and Abyssinia would never have been but for the missionary. The present Chinese trouble, and whatever may result from it, spring from the same poisonous root before our eyes. If men and women will go to people whom they call heathen to induce them if they can to change a possibly bad enough religion for one certainly worse, by all means let them go, provided always that those heathens do not object to the impertinent intrusion, and that they go at their own expense. But if they attempt to raise money at home under pretence of converting those who never were converted and never will be, let them be considered as no better than other swindlers who endeavor to live at the cost of others. And if they get into trouble abroad, let no nation raise a finger in their defence, or send so much as a postal-card pleading their cause, under penalty of being adjudged a partner in their crime.

Let it be understood that the Christian missionary in heathen lands is there to make a better and easier living than he can make in his own country; and that, whether he knows it or not, he is usually the tool of the civilised Christian government, who, when he has succeeded in driving a long-suffering people to take measures to protect themselves against the annoyance of his presence, will step in, ostensibly to rescue him, but really to plunder the defenceless heathen, who are assumed to have no rights which Christians are bound to respect.

—Boston Investigator. E. J. BOWTELL.

EARLY FAITH.

PRIMITIVE man saw everywhere manifest a world of phenomena of which he was wholly ignorant, and concerning whose cause and purpose he could only imagine, guess, and speculate. And who has not been amazed at the facility with which ignorance accounts for and explains every mystery it encounters, as well as the dogmatic persistence of its belief and its ever-ready reason—because!

To primitive man, the earth appeared to be the most ponderous of all things, and he naturally guessed it was so. For a similar reason, he guessed it was flat and the great primal and central body around which the universe revolved. He guessed that the sky was only a little distance above; was a solid arch spanning the earth and separating it from heaven, where he fancied was the abode of the great Unknown. He guessed that the sun, moon, and stars were, as they appeared beneath the solid arch, trivial in size, and mere furnishings of the inconceivably great earth. He guessed the clouds to be the hiding place of the Deity; thunder his voice, and the lightning his messenger. He guessed that earthquakes, plagues, and famines were manifestations of his anger, while sunshine and plenty betokened his pleasure. He guessed that rain was capriciously poured from reservoirs above the sky. And thus ignorance guessed respecting the cause and purpose of every phenomenon it beheld or experienced.

With the great unknown power which man saw everywhere so mysteriously manifested, he very naturally came to associate not only his own origin, purpose, and destiny, but all the good he enjoyed and the evil he encountered. And how natural, led by his own conceit, that he should ultimately fashion it in his own image and enthrone it in the mysterious realms above as his God and the creator and ruler of the universe. Thus man it was who fashioned a creator in his own image, rather than a God so creating man.

If good came, the gods were propitious, and were rewarded with praise and sacrifice; if evil came, they were angry and resentful, and were besought with prayer and sacrifice. Thus, man came to alternate between belief and doubt, hope and fear, ever presenting the strange anomaly of being compelled by an inexorable necessity to supply his physical wants through the operation of natural law under the guidance of his own reason and experience, while at the same time he was led to importune heaven for every desired good.

As to which of these sources he was most indebted, although he had bewildering doubts, yet, fearing lest, through some mistake, offence should be given to and vengeance taken by the great unknown and higher power, he usually adopted what appeared the safer alternative of giving to it the benefit of all doubts, and according to it all praise and reward. Under such belief in, and dependence upon, an arbitrary and capricious God as the almighty controller and giver of all things, how natural that some plausible, crafty, aspiring leader should come forward and, under the pretence of being the specially appointed agent of this almighty God, usurp his accredited power, and in his name levy tribute, dispense favors, inflict judgments, and, through threats of his almighty vengeance upon the transgressor, compel unquestioning and slavish submission to his alleged heaven-directed decrees. D. T. AMES.

CHRIST.

II.

Is to have suffered, loved, and died
For sins of others, not our own,
Were to be crowned and deified,
Would Christ be God alone?

Red human blood has fed the rack,
The block, the cross, the writhing flame;
The tramp of martyrdom gives back
No thunder at his name.

Waited the world for light so long,
Through centuries of rayless light?
Came he to make wrong aught but wrong
Right different from right?

Came God to suffer life and death,
Through thirty bitter years to groan,
And all to tell with human breath
Half-truths already known?

Truth waxes clearer day by day;
But yesternight a truth was born,
Which died and rotted to make way
For newer truth this morn.

And Truth is old; since first the dawn
Of conscience made men pause and brood,
The human mind was strongly drawn
Upon some goal of good.

Spake Epicurus all in vain?
Epictetus or Sokrates?
Aurelius? Did this God maintain
A truth unknown to these?

Nay, where in all his mystic lore
Dwells there an inference so true
As that, two thousand years before,
The great Lucretius drew?

A dream inscrutable, sublime,
And welcomed as the truth to-day,
For aye invincible to time,
Corruption, or decay.

Yet one of all is called divine,
The meanliest-minded, smallest one;
While reason only will resign
That name to all or none.

From the best words this God could say
What niggard crops of good have grown:
Pure love and tenderness to-day
Are scarcely better known.

But for the evil that he spake,
The devils may account it well;
And envy him his power to make
The human heart a hell.

PYRITES.

A lady writes to a religious paper suggesting that a Sunday should be set apart to the advocacy of pure literature. Just fancy pure literature advocated with a text taken from the unexpurgated Bible. Some civet, good apothecary.

Christians sometimes take us to task for speaking lightly of their superstitions, yet they are given to such things themselves. Not long ago we read in a Methodist paper some reference to a Baptist preacher, whom it dubbed "The great apostle of the water god."—Independent Pulpit.

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

The second volume of Mr. Edwin Sidney Hartland's Legend of Perseus has just been issued by David Nutt. Mr. Wheeler, who noticed the first volume recently under the title of "Virgin Births," will shortly review this volume, which, in his opinion, is of high importance for the light it casts on the customs and beliefs of early man.

* * *

Planets and People is a quarterly journal of astrology, issued from Chicago, and illustrating how hard these old beliefs are in dying. As it, however, contemplates coming out as an annual in future, it hardly appears to thrive as well as its friends might desire.

* * *

Orthodoxy v. Evolution is the title of a printed lecture delivered by Daniel T. Ames before the Brooklyn Philosophical Society and the Manhattan Liberal Club. Mr. Ames is vigorous and convincing. He hits at orthodoxy straight from the shoulder, and we hope his pamphlet will have a good circulation.

* * *

A big book on The Life and Writings of Turgot, by W. Walker Stephens, has been published by Messrs. Longmans. Coming after Mr. Morley's monograph, it nevertheless gives much further information on that great statesman, who turned from the Church to politics.

* * *

Mr. George Meredith's new novel, The Amazing Marriage, will be published by Messrs. Archibald Constable & Co. in the course of the season.

* * *

A pamphlet on Old Age Pensions, issued at the Sunday Chronicle office, Manchester, gives a description of several schemes before the public. It should not be forgotten that the original purpose of tithes eminently suit them for appropriation to this object.

* * *

Those who delight in a spirited exposure of sophistry can be recommended to Reaction, a little fourpenny pamphlet by Karl Pearson, published by William Reeves, 185 Fleet-street, in his neat "Bijou Library." It is chiefly directed against the theological obscurantism of Mr. Balfour's Foundations of Belief, and the polemic is carried on in a pointed and vigorous style. Our statesman finds his cue in decrying reason; but Mr. Pearson points out that "the race of life is now to those who educate and foster thought—to the reasoners among the nations." "Was it," he asks, "Mr. Balfour's hydra-headed authority, habit-tradition-custom, which proved a better national fulcrum than reason when Japan met China? And when our modern statesmen term the reason anti-social, will they venture to recommend the policy of China to the inhabitants of Great Britain? Consciously or unconsciously, Mr. Balfour teaches this policy philosophically, and preaches it emotionally."

* * *

The Night of the Gods, by J. O'Neill, is a work of vast erudition, by an Oriental scholar, giving a new view of the symbols and mythologies of the past. Mr. O'Neill did not claim to have found the sole key thereof. On the contrary, he said there was a whole bunch. But he did find a new key in the worship of the heavens and the polestar as the most high, and the first volume of his work, all that is published, shows a scholar of wide reading and insight.

* * *

Mr. O'Neill died early in the present year, and his death has left his widow without funds for publishing the completion of his work, the first volume of which is got up in very handsome fashion. A committee, of whom it is only necessary to mention the names of Drs. Budge and Garnett and Professor R. K. Douglas, of the British Museum, have issued an appeal for donations or subscriptions for this purpose, in which they say: "We believe that the loss of half Mr. O'Neill's book would be a calamity, as it would deprive students of the use of a large portion of the unrivalled collection of Greek, Latin, Celtic, Hindu, Semite, Persian, Chinese, Japanese, and American-Indian mythology, astronomy, and symbolism, collected and focussed by a traveller and scholar so keen-eyed, discriminating, careful, and devoted as Mr. O'Neill. We are convinced that the preservation and transmission to posterity of these researches will, whether they agree with the author's conclusions or not, be permanently useful to all who wish to set before themselves and others a life-like picture of the hitherto obscure past."

* * *

In France or Germany such a work as The Night of the Gods, recommended by scholars of the eminence of the committee issuing this circular, would be printed out of national funds. But there is no endowment of research in England, and a scholar may starve, or his manuscripts be sold for butter-paper, unless he can pay for printing them himself, and trust to be found out by a public not too apt to quickly discern merit which runs out of the ordinary rut. We have a wealthy Association for the Advancement of Science, and flourishing Antiquarian, Anthropological, and Folk-Lore Societies; but none of them would think it within their province to publish a work of research into the religious beliefs of the past. So an appeal is made merely to individuals interested. The price of volume ii. to subscribers will be 18s., or £1 16s. for the complete work, which will, when completed, be raised to £2 12s. 6d. Subscriptions will be received by the publisher, Mr. D. Nutt, 270 Strand.

* * *

The Free Review for October, the first that has been sent to our office, appears under the editorship of Mr. G. A. Singer. The opening article is an outspoken and sensible one by "Cato" on "King Alcohol and Liberalism." The writer is in favour of Free Trade in drink, as more conducive to temperance than is our licensing system. "Democritus" contributes a bright article on "Ideal Husbands," showing that the group of ladies who have just been writing on the subject are rather poor empirics. Mr. J. M. Robertson's article on "Huxley and Agnosticism" is very unflattering, but it presents a view of Huxley and his work which is entitled to consideration in the midst of the general eulogy. Mr. Robertson always writes with knowledge and great ability, and for our part we quite share his dislike of the "Agnostic" ticket, especially when we hear of "reverent" Agnostics and even "Christian" Agnostics. Mr. Ernest Newman's article on "Amiel" is delightful reading. Other articles and items make up a very interesting number.

* * *

The Agnostic Annual for 1896 (Watts & Co.) opens with a capital criticism of Mr. Balfour's Foundations of Belief by the veteran Samuel Laing. Another important article is "The Man, Christ Jesus," by Mr. J. Allanson Picton. We call it important because it presents, in clear and eloquent language, what may be called the advanced Unitarian view of the Prophet of Nazareth. Mr. Picton is not scientific. He discards the miraculous, and then constructs a Jesus of his own out of arbitrary selections from the Gospel narrative. He imagines that "the time has gone by" for any doubt as to the historical existence of the man Jesus; but his references to Tacitus, Josephus, and the Mischna show that he has not mastered the subject. It is idle to speak of the famous Josephus passage as merely corrupted: as Warburton and Gibbon (two very different critics) said without hesitation, it is a rank forgery. On the whole, the "rationalists of the workshop and market," who have had "no opportunities of high mental training," may smile at Mr. Picton's loose argumentation. Constance Plumptre's article on "Mind as Controlled by Matter" is lucid and sensible. Our readers know what they may expect in Mr. Charles Watts's "Faiths of our Forefathers." Dr. Bithell writes as an Agnostic in the service of God on "Theism and Monism." Mr. F. J. Gould has an interesting and well-informed paper on "The Old Testament Library." The only fault we find with him is that he speaks too tenderly of the priestly imposition of the Books of Moses upon the Jews, and, through them, upon sixty generations of Christians.

PROFANE JOKES.

"Pa, can God do everything?" "Yes, my boy." "Can God ride a bicycle?"

First Boy—"My mother's got a new baby." Second Boy—"That must be our kid that died last week."

"Little boy, does your father fear the Lord?" asked the new pastor. "Yessir, I guess he does, 'cause he takes his gun whenever he goes out on Sunday."

Little Mamie read on her Sunday-school card: "God makes, preserves, and keeps us." Looking up suddenly, she said: "Mamma, what do you s'pose he does with 'em all?" "With what, my dear?" "Why, all those preserves."

Clergyman (to little boy)—"I suppose you say your prayers, my boy?" Boy—"Yes, sir." Clergyman—"Does your father say his?" Boy—"He doesn't have to; his father's dead."

Clergyman (dining with family)—"I noticed during the sermon you were very quiet, Tommy; a very good boy, indeed." Tommy—"Rather! 'Cos I was afraid of waking pa. Last Sunday, when I woke him up, he said he'd half kill me if I did it again."

Mankind has never groaned under the yoke of a more atrocious combination of moral, mental, and physical despotism than at the period when the Christian hierarchy had reached the zenith of its power.—Dr. F. L. Oswald, "The Bible Controversy."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

Foresters' Hall (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Charles Watts, "Atheism and Christian Theism: Which is the More Reasonable?"

Battersea Secular Hall (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, Mrs. Thornton Smith, "The Meaning of Secularism." Tuesday, at 8, social gathering.

Camberwell (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, Herbert Burrows, "Why Secularists Should be Socialists." Friday, at 8, reading class.

East London (Sealy's Coffee House, 103 Mile End-road): 8, J. T. Blanchard, "Secularism from a Matter-of-Fact Point of View."

Finsbury Branch: Monday, at 8.30, Dinner and entertainment in the large hall of the Eldorado Club, 28 East-road, E.C. Tickets from Mr. Forder.

Finsbury Park and Islington Branches: Tuesday, at 8, meeting of members at 91 Mildmay Park.

West Ham Secular Ethical Society (61 West Ham-lane): 7, G. Spiller, "The Need of a Science of Ethics."

West London Ethical Society (Princes' Hall, Piccadilly): 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "Genius and Sanity."

Wood Green (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, Touzeau Parris, "The Certainties of Religion Worthless."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

Battersea Park Gates: 11.30, St. John, "Christianity and Progress."

Camberwell (Station-road): 11.30, a lecture.

Deptford Broadway: 6.30, C. James, "Christianity as a Guide to Conduct." Thursday, at 8, C. James, "Morality in the Ages of Faith."

Hammersmith Bridge (Middlesex side): 7, W. Heaford, "The Christian's Faith, Hope, and Charity."

Hyde Park (near Marble Arch): 11.30, W. Heaford, "The Creed of an Unbeliever"; 3.30, "A Rational View of Religion."

Kingsland (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, S. E. Easton, "Some Old Tales Re-told."

Old Pinlico Pier: 11.30, Stanley Jones, "Christianity Critically Examined."

Wood Green (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, W. J. Ramsey will lecture.

COUNTRY.

Birmingham (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, W. J. Russell, "Never Spake Man Like This"; 7, John Watts, "The Causes of the Wreck of the Liberal Party."

Chatham Secular Hall (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 7, W. B. Thompson, "The Apostles' Creed—Why I Voted for its Retention."

Glasgow (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, Discussion class—J. Cassells, "The Unemployed Problem"; 6.30, W. King, "Thomas Paine, the Reformer."

Hull (St. George's Hall, Story-street): 7, Mr. Fryer, "Lessons from the Late General Election."

Leicester Secular Hall (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, C. Cohen, "Is the Belief in God Reasonable?"

Manchester Secular Hall (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, Mr. Cooke will start a discussion on "Old Age Pensions."

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, J. Selkirk, "Did Jesus Christ Rise from the Dead?"

Sheffield Secular Society (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 3, Members' quarterly meeting; 7, Mr. Axe, "Coral and Coral Islands." Tea at 5.

South Shields (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, a reading.

Stockton-on-Tees (82 Dovecote-street): 6.30, Mr. Scott will read a paper on "Vaccination."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. Cohen, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—October 13, Leicester; 20, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 23 and 24, Chester-le-Street; 27, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 28 and 29, Stockton-on-Tees; 31, Blackburn. November 1, Blackburn; 3, Sheffield; 4, 5, and 6, Barnsley; 10, Foresters' Hall, London; 17 and 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

Stanley Jones, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London.—October 13, Pimlico Pier; 14, Edmonton; 20 and 27, Kingsland.

Arthur B. Moss, 44 Croydon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—October 20, m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

Touzeau Parris, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—October 13 and 20, Wood Green; 27, Foresters' Hall. November 3, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

APARTMENTS to Let Unfurnished. Three Rooms, with kitchener. Very Cheap. Overlooking the Alexandra Palace. Write or call. B, 69 Western-road, Mayes-road, Wood Green, N.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

MASONIC HALL, HIGH STREET, WOOD GREEN, N.

(Adjoining Nightingale Hotel.)

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY, WOOD GREEN BRANCH.

A COURSE OF LECTURES

Under the auspices of the above, to be delivered on the following dates at 7.30 p.m.:—

Sunday, October 13—Mr. TOUZEAU PARRIS, "The Certainties of Religion Worthless."

Sunday, October 20—Mr. TOUZEAU PARRIS, "Some Bible Symbols, their Origin and Meaning."

Sunday, October 27—Mr. R. FORDER, "Who is the Devil? What is the Devil? and Where is the Devil?"

Admission by Ticket Only. To be obtained of John Wood, Secretary, 71 Gladstone-avenue, Wood Green.

Tickets, 6d. Reserved Seats, 1s.

Course Tickets for Last Three Lectures, 1s. 6d. and 1s.

Works by G. W. Foote.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series. 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Flowers of Freethought. Second Series. 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series. 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Is Socialism Sound? Four Nights' Public Debate with Annie Besant. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 2s.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 3d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 3d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Wens, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Sycosiris or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 2d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.

RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 2d.

DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 2d.

CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 2d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.

A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,

4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendell" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 2s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

NOW READY. ORDER AT ONCE.

Price 6d., by post 7½d.,

The Agnostic Annual for 1896.

Balfour's "Foundations of Belief": An Agnostic Rejoinder. By S. Laing.
Agnosticism and its Equivalents. By Amos Waters.
The Man, Christ Jesus: The Germ of the Christian Myth. By J. Allanson Picton.
Psyche: A Poem. By W. Stewart Ross (Saladin).
Mind as Controlled by Matter. By Constance E. Plumptre.
The Faiths of Our Forefathers. By Charles Watts.
An Agnostic View of Theism and Monism. By R. Bithell, B.Sc., Ph.D.
The Old Testament Library. By F. J. Gould.
Immortality. By W. A. Leonard.
The Physiological Bias of Religious Leaders. By Furneaux Jordan, F.R.C.S.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

NOW READY, CHEAP EDITION OF

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A RECORD OF HIS LIFE AND WORK.

By his Daughter, HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. With an Account of his Parliamentary Struggle, his Politics, and his Teachings, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, price 7s.

A. & H. Bradlaugh Bonner, 1 and 2 Took's-court, Cursitor-street, E.C.

Just published, price 1d., by post 1½d.,

DISCREDITABLE TACTICS OF CHRISTIAN DISPUTANTS.

BY CHARLES WATTS.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 132 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BRUNO CLOTH

FOR LADIES' WINTER DRESSES.

This Cloth has been our leading Winter Dress Material for four years. Thousands of ladies have tried it, and, so far as we know, everybody has been satisfied. One lady last winter sold thirty-five Dress Lengths among her friends.

IN ALL THE FASHIONABLE SHADES.
PLAIN COLORS.

Price—

9s. 6d. per Dress Length

till the end of September, as an advertisement. After that date, 10s. 6d. per dress length.

LOT 11

CONTAINS

1 pair of All-Wool Blankets
1 pair of Bed Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-cloth.

In spite of wool having gone up very much in price, we sell at the old figure,

21/-

CARRIAGE PAID.

THINK OF THE COLD WEATHER AND THINK OF LOT 11.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

THE BOOK FOR FREETHINKERS.

Unprecedentedly Cheap Edition.

Now Ready, 153 pp., paper covers, price 6d., by post 8½d.,

Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of this work is to give a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. It is intended specially for those who, taking an interest in liberal questions, have not leisure to study the large and learned books in which they are treated.

The Freethinker says:—

"The book may be heartily recommended. Simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information, this work is just the thing to put into the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

Secular Thought says:—

"In very truth, this book combines the directness and conciseness of 'The Age of Reason' with the splendid enthusiasm of the prophetic instinct of humanity seeing afar.....Line on line, and precept on precept, the author traverses the weakness of theological sanctions. The vivacious and competent pen never falters, and the superabundant vitality and healthy enthusiasm never fail. Mr. Wilson may be congratulated upon producing an epoch-making work. It is essentially a live book, and, what is more, possesses the solid qualities requisite for prolonged existence."

The Popular Science Monthly says:—

"An excellent work to put into the hands of the young who are beginning to think and seeking to learn how to think.....We hope this meritorious book will be widely circulated."

 There is only a limited number of the present marvellously cheap edition. To prevent disappointment, order at once.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-st., E.C.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 2d., by post 2½d.,

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE.

BY

DAVID HUME.

With an Historical and Critical Introduction by

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 42. SUNDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

SILLY SUNDAY.

THE Church Congress has continued its palaver at Norwich, and amongst other subjects it discussed Faith and Science. No sceptics were present to lend the debate liveliness; still, there were differences of opinion. The Rev. Professor Bonney was very outspoken with regard to the Bible. According to the Daily News report, he "could not deny that the increase of scientific knowledge had deprived parts of the earliest books of the Bible of the historical value which was generally attributed to them by our forefathers. The story of the creation in the Book of Genesis, unless we played fast and loose either with words or with science, could not be brought into harmony with what we had learned from geology. Its ethnological statements were imperfect, if not sometimes inaccurate. The stories of the Fall, of the Flood, and of the Tower of Babel, were incredible in their present form. Some historical elements might underlie many of the traditions in the first eleven chapters of that Book, but this we could not hope to recover." It was not to be expected that the reverend and right reverend gentlemen taking part in the discussion would endorse these statements, but they only "hinted" their dissent, and touched the subject very gingerly. No doubt they felt a certain relief when Professor Bonney resorted to the good old theory that, if the Genesis narratives were not historical, they were at least allegorical, and contained "spiritual truths of the highest importance." One of these truths is that God is the creator and ruler of all. Professor Bonney may well call it a "spiritual" truth, for it is certainly unknown to science, which refuses to entertain the idea of creation. It seems pretty clear, too, that if God rules all, his government is highly imperfect; for Church Congresses, and other annual conventions, are always suggesting improvements. As for the "innate depravity in the nature of man"—another "spiritual truth" enshrined in the allegories of Genesis—it is far more comforting to the clergy than it can ever be to the laity; for it leads straight to hell and damnation, on which the men of God trade, and which yield them such a splendid harvest of wealth, privilege, and comfort in this miserable vale of tears. Selden long ago observed that the clergy cry up original sin as quacks make their patients think themselves dreadfully ill. The worse they make us believe ourselves, the more we run after them to cure us.

Another subject discussed at the Church Congress was the poverty of the clergy. This does not refer to the curates, who have been talking about a Trade Union to raise their salaries. It only refers to the poorer incumbents, some of whom (sad to say!) only get twice the wages of a skilled artisan. To redress this terrible wrong the Dean of Norwich came forward with a gigantic proposal. Seven million people (laymen, of course) were to contribute one penny weekly; this would amount to £1,516,666 per annum; and by means of this stupendous Sustentation Fund the incomes of the poorer incumbents might be levelled up to £300 a year. Many clerical mouths must have watered at this delicious prospect. But will it ever be realised? Will not most of those seven million intended victims beg the rich clergy to begin the levelling operation themselves? A bishop's salary would cut up handsomely among a dozen or two of his poverty-stricken brethren; an archbishop's salary would provide the requisite addition for a hundred servants of the altar. There are also fat canons, deans, and archdeacons, who could stand a good deal of sweating. Let the seven, eight, or ten millions a year, absorbed by the Church, be equitably divided; and if any starving clergymen are still left, with less than £300 a year, the charitable public, and particularly those who subsist on less than £50 a year themselves, may be asked to contribute to the relief of clerical distress.

The professional spirit of the clergy at the Church Congress shone conspicuously in the talk (we cannot call it a discussion) about Sunday. Nearly every speaker called upon the government to uphold this pious institution. Relaxations in favor of entertainments, recreations, and even lectures, were sternly denounced. Let us have the day all to ourselves! was the cry of these clerical Protectionists, who are perfectly aware that they cannot stand against the competition of a free market. One of them quoted Chateaubriand, who said "No religion without worship, and no worship without Sunday." But it was hardly wise to shout this saying from the housetops. It is a public confession that religion would die without systematic inculcation and legal compulsion.

One of the speakers, a Mr. Chambers, vehemently attacked the Sunday Societies. Education on the Lord's Day was, in his opinion, just as bad as amusement. The time should be devoted to spiritual, not to intellectual objects; in other words, it is the day of faith, not the day of reason; and the clergy mean to keep reason out of it, by the aid of God and Lord Salisbury—especially Lord Salisbury, who has more power in England than all the gods of the pantheon.

Mr. Chambers was accurate in one instance. He warned the Church that, behind all the Sunday Societies and similar bodies, there was the army of sceptics and infidels, who were the real danger to all forms of faith. These people were restless and malignant. They knew that Christianity depended on the Sunday, and they meant to destroy the Sunday. Such is Mr. Chambers's view of the case, and he is both right and wrong. It is true that the Churches have a tremendous advantage in the law which allows them to monopolise the Sunday, and it is true that the sceptics and infidels mean to deprive them of that advantage. But it is not true that the sceptics and infidels mean to destroy the Sunday. Their object is not to destroy, but to fulfil. They want to destroy the sacredness of Sunday in order to restore its utility.

Sunday (that is, the sun's day) is far older than Christianity. It was borrowed by that religion from the pagans of the Roman empire. What was a day of release from toil, and of general festivity, the Church turned into a day of worship. When the Puritans came they intensified the worship and abolished the relics of festivity. They made it a day of gloom to men and women, and of terror to children. And we are still under the Puritan domination in England. For the great majority of the people who do not, and will not, go to church, Sunday is simply wasted. For this reason we call it Silly Sunday.

"What are all these people doing?" asked a French friend, who saw crowds of Englishmen loafing about the dull streets of London on a Sunday. We told him they were "Waiting for Monday." And the clergy want to keep them waiting till the day of judgment.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

DR. STARK MUNRO'S LETTERS.*

DR. CONAN DOYLE, who, by his Memoirs, and Adventures of, the now happily defunct Sherlock Holmes, his Micah Clarke, and The Refugees, has placed himself in the front rank of popular living novelists (not beside George Meredith or Thomas Hardy, but in a distinct niche of his own), has in this, his latest work, essayed a more ambitious task than that of mere story-telling He has sought to depict, roundly and squarely, if I may be permitted the Hibernicism, the life of a young medical man, when he is entering on a career. His hero is at that age when he becomes interesting to the fair sex; but he is forced by ties of family to put aside, for the time, those ideas of love and sex-union which form the leading theme of romances in all ages; and, alike from choice and necessity, works his way upward from the lowest rung of the ladder, till in the last letter we get a faint glimpse of him happily married, and on the road to social distinction. Mr. Herbert Spencer holds that all fiction is founded on biography. That seems the case with the present work. Dr. Doyle offers us no subtly-constructed plot, but, instead, those sudden changes of experience which often happen in real life, and which give force to the saying that it is always the unexpected which happens. This is not only illustrated throughout the book, but in the postscript, which those who must have poetical justice are warned not to read. Dr. Doyle's book differs also from contemporary novels in that, to develop his hero's confidences and confessions, he resorts to the epistolary form. In the old days, when postage was costly, long confidences were given in letters, and we are troubled, in reading Richardson's epistolary novels, with no such sense of incongruity as in the minute details with which Dr. Munro, even while in extreme poverty, favors his friend and old fellow student across the herring pond. Putting aside this criticism, or, rather, heartily accepting the form as necessary to the work of art as conceived by the artist, it will be seen to have its own merits. At any rate, I have read these discursive letters with as much interest as I should letters from a personal friend.

Dr. Doyle is of too fertile an imagination for anyone justly to ascribe to himself all the sentiments of his hero. He is, at least I suppose so, a person of mature age, and some of these sentiments are of immature cast, such, however, as we may suppose him to have possibly held in the years 1881–84, the date of the letters. We are so carried on by the vividness of the story that we feel as if the author was relating his personal thoughts and experiences. So evidently is his heart in his work that we shall not be surprised if Dr. Doyle is generally set down as an Agnostic, or, rather, a Deistic Secularist of the type of Dr. Stark Munro. This may be a mistake, for there is surely nothing out of the way in making a young man who has received a medical education a sceptic as to revealed religion, when the Rev. A. C. Deane tells us, in the current number of the Nineteenth Century, that the undergraduates at our universities are nearly all Agnostics. Nevertheless, it is a compliment to the author's vraisemblance and power of throwing himself into his characters that so many assume that the opinions of Dr. Stark Munro are those of Dr. Conan Doyle. Naturally, it is Dr. Stark Munro's Freethought with which I am here chiefly concerned. I do not care for didactic novels. Yet, apart from the right of any author to impress his own views and personality into his work, or to develop his characters in whatever way seems most natural to him, it appears to me that the reviewers who have wished this portion of the work omitted are in the wrong. For the evident purpose of the book is not simply to tell a story of struggle at the outset of a medical career, but to depict the life and character of a cultured young man at the period when he begins to meet the world, to think for himself, and feel his own feet. To leave out of sight his thoughts on problems of life and religion, his relations to his fellows and to nature around him, would be to present a mutilated picture, to make a young barbarian, not a well-educated youth of the nineteenth century.

Dr. Stark Munro is almost an aggressive Deist. A scientific training has shattered the cramping influences of orthodoxy, but he remains throughout a believer in the argument from design. His God is, like all gods, a magnified man; but he is a civilised one. He confesses he cannot understand Atheists; and he also admits he cannot reconcile cruelty with his own scheme. In his first letter he breaks out: "Can't I hear your grave voice saying 'Have faith!' Your conscience allows you to. Well, mine won't allow me. I see so clearly that faith is not a virtue, but a vice. It is a goat which has been herded with the sheep. If a man deliberately shut his physical eyes and refuse to use them, you would be as quick as anyone in seeing that it was immoral and a treason to nature. And yet you would counsel a man to shut that far more precious gift, the reason, and to refuse to use it in the most intimate question of life." "It is," he declares of reason in another letter, "more moral to use it and go wrong than to forego it and be right. It's only a little foot-rule, and I have to measure Mount Everest with it; but it's all I have, and I'll never give it up while there's breath between my lips." There is nothing novel in all this, but it is uttered with a vigor and earnestness calculated to impress the average type of novel reader. The volume throughout is sprinkled with outbursts of heresy and indignation against religious bigotry. Thus he says:—

> "When one considers what effect the perversion of the religious instinct has had during the history of the world; the bitter wars, Christian and Mohammedan, Catholic and Protestant; the persecutions, the torturings, the domestic hatreds, the petty spites, with all creeds equally blood-guilty, one cannot but be amazed that the concurrent voice of mankind has not placed bigotry at the very head of the deadly sins. It is surely a truism to say that neither small-pox nor the plague has brought the same misery upon mankind."

Again, and with equal vigor, he asserts:—

> "It isn't true that the laws of nature have been capriciously disturbed, that snakes have talked, that women have turned to salt, that rods have brought water out of rocks. You must in honesty confess that, if these things were presented to us when we were adults for the first time, we should smile at them. It isn't true that the Fountain of all common sense should punish a race for a venial offence committed by a person long since dead, and then should add to the crass injustice by heaping the whole retribution upon a single innocent scapegoat. Can you not see all the want of justice and logic, to say nothing of the want of mercy, involved in such a conception?"

When Dr. Munro first sets up in a very poor way as a practitioner on his own account, he is visited by a local curate; but, instead of seeking his self-interest by accepting his invitation to attend church, he falls into a lively disputation. The curate says: "You are a Unitarian, then; or rather, perhaps, a Deist?"

> "'You may label me as you like,' I answered (and by this time I fear that I had got my preaching stop fairly out); 'I don't pretend to know what truth is, for it is infinite, and I finite; but I know particularly well what it is not. It is not true that religion reached its acme nineteen hundred years ago, and that we are for ever to refer back to what was written and said in those days. No, sir; religion is a vital, living thing, still growing and working, capable of endless extension and development, like all other fields of thought..... Look at this!' I cried, rising and reading my Carlyle text. 'That comes from no Hebrew prophet, but from a ratepayer in Chelsea. He and Emerson are also among the prophets. The Almighty has not said His last say to the human race, and He can speak through a Scotchman or a New Englander as easily as through a Jew. The Bible, sir, is a book which comes out in instalments, and "To be continued," not "Finis," is written at the end of it.'"

To pick out the Freethought views of Dr. Stark Munro apart from their setting may be as unfair to the book as its desired mutilation by their excision. Yet it is worth while in the Freethinker to call attention to the kind of sentiments that can now-a-days be put into a popular work issued by one of the world's leading publishing firms, and which must be acknowledged to be entirely in keeping with the character sought to be expressed.

It would be unfair to quit the work without mention of its most distinctive character, Dr. Cullingworth, a study worthy of Dickens at his best. Only a close student of human nature (some will think only a medical man) would have ventured on that wonderful sketch of genius and insanity, soaring merit and sunken meanness. If taken

* The Stark Munro Letters, edited and arranged by A. Conan Doyle. (London: Longmans, Green, & Co.)

Digitized by Google

from some strange original, the picture of Dr. Cullingworth is still a marvellous piece of painting. If a purely imaginative creation, it is a triumph of art.

J. M. WHEELER.

THE BIBLE AND HUMAN PROGRESS.

UNTIL a comparatively recent date the Bible was regarded by its devotees as the precursor of all moral and intellectual progress; and its teachings were held to be indispensable to the advancement of the best interests of society. Fortunately, however, a healthy change has taken place in intelligent minds within the last few decades; and, although the emancipation from theological errors has not been so general as many of us desire, still, thanks to Secular and Freethought advocacy, the work of deliverance has gone heavily on, and it is at the present time making more rapid strides than it ever did.

Twenty years ago the belief in Biblical accuracy was far more extensive than it is now. About that time the late Professor Huxley, in his Lay Sermons, penned the following: "The myths of Paganism are as dead as Osiris or Zeus, and the man who should attempt to revive them in opposition to the knowledge of our time would be justly laughed to scorn; but the coeval imaginations current among the rude inhabitants of Palestine, recorded by writers whose very name and age are admitted by every scholar to be unknown, have unfortunately not yet shared their fate, but even at this day are regarded by nine-tenths of the civilised world as the authoritative standard of fact, and the criterion of the justice of scientific conclusions in all that relates to the origin of things, and, among them, of species. In this nineteenth century, as at the dawn of modern physical science, the cosmogony of the barbarous Hebrew is the incubus of the philosopher and the opprobrium of the orthodox. Who shall number the patient and earnest seekers after truth, from the days of Galileo until now, whose lives have been embittered and their good name blasted by the mistaken zeal of bibliolaters? Who shall tell the host of weaker men whose sense of truth has been destroyed in the effort to harmonise impossibilities—whose life has been wasted in the attempt to force the generous new wine of science into the old bottles of Judaism, compelled by the outcry of the same strong party? But it is true that, if philosophers have suffered, their cause has been amply avenged. Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science, as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules; and history records that, whenever science and orthodoxy have been fairly opposed, the latter has been forced to retire from the lists, bleeding and crushed if not annihilated, scotched if not slain."

Now, in order that the reader may be enabled to recognise the vast progress that has been made since the above words were written, it is only necessary to study those works upon science and advanced theology which have recently been published, and also to note the tone of feeling that has prevailed at the meetings of the British Association. At these assemblages views upon the Bible were readily accepted that twenty years ago would have been condemned as being too sceptical even for consideration. Now, Darwin is admitted to be a better authority in reference to the origin of man than Moses, and the law of evolution has entirely discredited the theory of special creation. And, be it remembered, this progress is the result of disbelieving Bible teachings.

Experience has taught us that in effecting human progress three things have been found to be absolutely essential—namely, knowledge, industry, and freedom. We have no doubt that civilisation is the result of the free and enlightened exercise of man's physical and mental powers. Everything that has contributed to the improvement of art, the increase of literature, the spread of science, and the expansion of liberty has been principally the outcome of the persistent labors of men and women who were free from the trammels of theology. Nothing is easier than to demonstrate that many of the teachings of the Bible are opposed to the essentials of all progress. In Genesis it is indicated emphatically that the acquirement of knowledge was a sin, that labor was inflicted as a punishment, that woman was made a slave to man, and that freedom was destroyed by the establishment of general slavery, initiated in those degrading words: "Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren" (Genesis ix. 25). There is no possibility of justice and refinement, of the development of human sympathy, friendship, and social happiness, where woman is entirely subjected to the will of man, and where one portion of the human family is forced to be in abject slavery to the other. These Bible-ordained conditions are in themselves quite sufficient to prevent the operation of all progressive ideas.

The position of woman in any country is an indication of the state of civilisation existing therein; and the fact that in those nations where the Bible has held sway the condition of woman has been menial and humiliatingly dependent shows that its teachings have not been conducive to her elevation and personal freedom and dignity. Sir Henry Maine, in chapter x. of his Ancient Law, gives a clear statement of the influence of canon law on the liberty of person and property that Roman women then enjoyed. Speaking of their freedom, he says: "Christianity tended from the very first to narrow this remarkable liberty. . . . . No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institution is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by middle Roman law." Lydia Maria Child, in her Progress of Religious Ideas, says: "How far the Romans had advanced beyond the Asiatic [Bible] ideas is indicated by the remark of Cato, who lived two hundred and thirty-two years B.C. He was accustomed to say: 'They who beat wives or children lay sacrilegious hands on the most sacred things in the world. For myself, I prefer the character of a good husband to that of a great senator.'" Renan, in his Apostles, observes: "Under the Roman law woman was becoming more and more her own mistress" (p. 245). Even Bosworth Smith, in his Mohammed and Mohammedanism, p. 243, writes: "It must be remembered also, what we are apt to forget, that it required not the sublime moral precepts of Christianity alone, but the influence of codes of Roman law, and the innate respect felt by Teutonic nations for the female sex, and centuries of civilisation also, to raise woman to her proper position in European countries." There can be no doubt that the incentive to woman's progress is not to be found in the Bible. Both in the Old and New Testaments her position is degrading. Many instances could be adduced in confirmation of this allegation, but two will suffice, which the reader will find recorded in Numbers v. 11-31 and Ephesians v. 22-24.

Equally cruel and unprogressive is the Bible doctrine of slavery. The enormity of this crime is made the more intense by the fact that, according to the Bible, it was imposed and regulated by God himself (see Leviticus xxv. 44-46; Exodus xxi. 2-4; 1 Timothy vi. 12; and Titus ii. 9). Bell, in his Life of Canning, on page 218, referring to the efforts of the Abolitionists, says: "The greatest stress of all was laid on the antiquity of slavery. This was a difficulty which paralysed many persons of tender conscience. They felt . . . . that slavery was cruel, that it blighted human beings, crushed the god-like part of them, and reduced them to the condition of the lower animals. But it was a sacred institution; it had flourished in the earliest ages; it had a Divine origin." It must not be overlooked that the most determined opposition to the abolition in America of this God-inflicted curse upon humanity came from Bible believers, who contended that, as it was a "divine" institution, any attempt to remove it was wrong, and ought not to be tolerated. Of course, this dislike to depart from religious customs, that were supposed to be based upon, or to accord with, God's will, has always been the great impediment to human progress. It was the tenacious adherence to Bible superstitions that for ages delayed the advancement of science and education, and hindered the recognition of the political and social rights of man. The Bible doctrine is that of "master and servant," not employer and employed; no delicacy of sentiment, no dignity of character, and no independence of action are allowed the servant, for he is to be subject to his master "with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward" (1 Peter ii. 18).

The progress that has been made from the old barbarous custom of inflicting the death penalty as a punishment has been achieved in direct opposition to Bible teachings. This brutal practice was based upon such Old Testament injunctions as: "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot," "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" (Exodus xxi. 24; Exodus xxii. 18), and death for blasphemy (Leviticus xxiv. 16). This was the spirit of revenge taught by God to his chosen people. No marvel that Christian exponents decline to defend the Old Testament, although it is said to be "God's Word." There never would have been much progress if men had continued to be guided by such cruel and savage methods as those enjoined by the Bible. One of the grandest triumphs of modern times has been the successful revolt of secularised humanity against Biblical barbarity.

Digitized by Google

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

THE WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY.

(JOHN VIII. 1–11.)

IF there is one gospel story which more than another is redolent of the divine aroma of love and forgiveness, and which on this account may be, erroneously, claimed as peculiarly Christian, it is the story of the woman taken in adultery, with its dramatic rebuke of Phariseeism and the sublime declaration of the teacher, "Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more." Yet nothing is more certain than that this story formed no part of the original gospel of John, but was foisted in by a later hand, when Christianity, which set out by declaring that Christ had but come to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, that he came not to destroy but to fulfil the law, no jot or tittle of which should pass away, had got far beyond the narrow confines of Judaism, and promised to become a world religion like Buddhism.

Even such orthodox scholars as Bishop Westcott and Dr. Hort, in their great edition of the New Testament, are constrained to reject this story. In this they only follow Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford, and Tregelles. It is entirely wanting in the two oldest manuscripts, the Sinaitic and the Vatican. It is also absent from Codex Regius, Codex Sangallensis, Codex Monacensis, and other ancient codices, etc. Of the MSS. which contain it more than sixty stigmatise it with marks of suspicion. It is wanting in the Old Latin, the Sahidic, the Gothic, the Ethiopic, the Syriac, and the best authorities of the Coptic and Armenian versions. The commentaries of Origen, Chrysostom, Tertullian, Cyril, Basil, and other early fathers know it not. Jerome, or the monks writing in his name, is the first to defend its genuineness; while to St. Augustine is attributed the supposition that it had been omitted for moral reasons, lest it should seem to allow sinning with impunity! The passage, together with the last verse of chapter vii., is manifestly an interpolation, and at verse 12 the broken report of the really unbroken discourse is resumed. Critics have also found that it is not in the style of the writer of the rest of John. But this is a matter for the Greek textual critic.

Of course a number of suggestions have been made to get over the difficulty of this narrative being a later concoction than the bulk of the gospel, that of St. Augustine being rather too dangerous for an age that has ceased to believe in a double doctrine. The favorite and most plausible suggestion is, that the story was handed down by tradition, and gradually worked its way into the text. If so, where did the tradition come from? What of the declaration of John's alleged revelation, that "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book"? Why is this tradition preserved, but that found, for instance, in Luke vi. of Codex Bezae rejected? May not the other stories and sayings of Jesus, found in the early fathers and in the Apocryphal Gospels, be equally authentic? There is no end to the questions that arise from a consideration of the spurious character of this story, and the most important of all is this: The person or persons who were capable of adding an elaborate moral story of this character to the gospel were also capable of doing a great deal more.

LUCIANUS.

An anthropomorphic God is the only God whom men can worship, and also the God whom modern thought finds it difficult to believe in.—J. Cotter Morison, "The Service of Man," p. 36; third edition.

ARCHÆOLOGY versus CRITICISM.

THE Rev. Professor Sayce is again upon the war-path. The well-known English advocate of the Higher Criticism Canon Cheyne, recently wrote an article in the Contemporary Review, in which he stated that the two persons who, under God, stimulated him to his studies of the Old Testament, and consequent adoption of his present views, were Professor Kuenen and Professor Sayce. Hence these tears. Mr. Sayce first says, in the present number of the Contemporary Review, that he has never changed his attitude towards criticism. To those conversant with the learned gentleman's writings this statement comes with something like a shock. A few years ago Professor Sayce wrote a little work entitled An Introduction to the Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, in which he pooh-poohed and condemned, without rhyme or reason, the whole of the critical objections to those three books. Last year he wrote another work, on The Higher Criticism, in which he embraced and endorsed the whole of these critical objections, without giving the slightest reason for adopting them. There may be consistent people in the world, but our author is not one of them.

Professor Sayce comes forward again as the champion of Moses. Writing was known and practised in the time of Moses; therefore Moses must have written the Pentateuch. We have all heard that statement before, from the lips of less eminent men; yet, somehow, it fails to carry conviction. Mr. Sayce seems to fancy that the "critics" are ignorant of the fact that writing was known and practised before the time ascribed to Samuel. It is difficult to see whence he got this notion, except from Christian Evidence literature; if he had read the writings of the "Higher Critics," he would have known differently. The Babylonian scribes were always very careful and conscientious in making the copies of their works; therefore, Mr. Sayce says it is impossible that the Jews can have made fraudulent use of an earlier literature. We are unable to see the force of this wonderful argument. It is certainly very creditable to the Babylonian scribes to find them so careful; but when we compare the book of Kings with the book of Chronicles, we sometimes wish that these accurate Babylonians had compiled the latter book, instead of leaving it to the tender mercies of Hebrew writers.

Professor Sayce tells us that "the story of the campaign of Chedorlaomer and his Babylonian allies against the Canaanitish princes has been fully confirmed, and now Mr. Pinches has found the name of Kudur-Lagamar or Chedorlaomer, as well as that of his ally Tadghal or Tidal." Of course Mr. Pinches has found the names of Chedorlaomer and Tidal. Every Assyriologist of note has done that, except Professor Sayce. Sir Henry Rawlinson, Professor Lenormant, Dr. Hommel, Dr. Delitzsch, Mr. St. Chad Boscawen, and others, have all "discovered" the kings of the fourteenth chapter of Genesis. The only trouble is that they have all "discovered" them differently, and we are still waiting for reliable "confirmation" of the campaign of Chedorlaomer.

Mr. Sayce also tells us that Mr. Pinches has discovered names of the Hebrew type on ancient cuneiform tablets. But there is nothing novel in this information. Mr. St. Chad Boscawen read a paper on this very subject before the Victoria Institute ten years ago; and the "Higher Critics" know all about it.

We are presented with the somewhat startling statement that Moses must have written the tenth chapter of Genesis, because "there we are told that Canaan was the brother of Mizraim, or Egypt. The assertion was strictly true as long as Canaan was a province of Egypt; when it ceased to be so the statement was not only true no longer, but was contrary to the daily experience and political beliefs of every inhabitant of Palestine." Palestine was never again united to Egypt, "except during the short space of years that followed the death of Josiah." The rev. professor's logic is like the grace of God—it passeth all human understanding. But he has told us repeatedly in his works that two of the names in Genesis x.—namely, Gomer and Madai—represent the Gimmerians, or Cimmerians, and the Medes, neither of whom was known to the Babylonians or the Jews before the year 820 B.C.; it is, therefore, for him to explain how Moses came to write of them six centuries before.

Professor Sayce totally fails to show that Archæology is any way jeopardises the position of the Higher Criticism, and he carefully refrains from touching the fact that the provisions of the Pentateuch are unknown to the historical books. That is the central point of criticism. When we find monarchs commended for their piety, even though they act in direct opposition to the "Law of Moses," it is pretty evident that neither king nor historian knew anything of that "Law." There is only one sentence in the article we can commend, and that for its sentiment, not its grammar.

Digitized by Google

"The same method and arguments which have made of the Pentateuch a later and untrustworthy compilation, whose divine origin and character are discernible only to the critics themselves, would, if applied to the Gospels, end in the same results." We gladly welcome the scholar of the Church who honestly admits that the Gospels will not stand criticism.

CHILPERIC.

BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

THE Rev. R. Spence Hardy, the famous Buddhist scholar, to whose industry we owe several valuable contributions to our knowledge of Buddhism, has written a book, The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists Compared with History and Science, in which he treats Buddhism with extraordinary injustice.

It is nothing but the spirit of injustice that alienates the sympathies of non-Christian people towards Christianity.

It is strange that Mr. Hardy's unfair statements are made with no apparent malice, but from a sheer habit which has been acquired through the notion of the exclusiveness of Christianity.

In making these critical remarks I do not wish to offend, but to call attention to a fault which can and should be avoided in the future.

Spence Hardy says in his book, The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists Compared with History and Science (pp. 138, 140): "The tales that are told about the acts performed by Buddha, and the wonders attendant on these acts, need only be stated in order to be rejected at once from the realm of reality and truth. . . . . These things are too absurd to require serious refutation."

Mr. Hardy forgets that many "tales told about the acts performed by Jesus, and the wonders attendant on the acts," too, need only be stated in order to be rejected at once from the realm of reality and truth. Mr. Hardy recognises the paganism of others, but he does not see that he himself is still entangled in pagan notions. What would Mr. Hardy say if a Buddhist was to write exactly the same book, only changing the word Christ into Buddha, and making other little changes of the same nature? Buddhists requested by a Christian missionary to believe literally in Christ's walking upon the water, or being bodily lifted up to heaven, are, as much as Spence Hardy, entitled to say: "These things are too absurd to require serious refutation." Mr. Hardy protests (p. 137): "I deny all that is said about the passing through the air of Buddha and his disciples, or of their being able to visit the Dêwa and Brahma worlds."

If history and science refute the miracles attributed in the later Buddhistic literature to Buddha, why not those attributed to Christ? And we must assume that Mr. Hardy does not deny that Christ descended to hell, and that he passed through the air when carried up to heaven in his ascension.

Mr. Hardy speaks of "the errors of Buddhism that are contrary to fact as taught by established and uncontroverted science" (p. 135); but he appears to reject science whenever it comes into collision with a literal interpretation of Christian doctrines. Buddhism is to him a fraud; Christianity a divine revelation.

In other passages Mr. Hardy refers to Buddha's tales in which Buddha speaks of his experiences in previous existences. He says (p. 153): "These facts are sufficient to convince every observant mind that what Buddha says about his past births, and those of others, is an imposition upon the credulity of mankind, without anything whatever to support it from fact."

Here Mr. Hardy's naiveté can only evoke our smiles. Buddhists are no more obliged to accept the Jataka tales as genuine history than our children are requested to believe the legends of saints, or Grimm's fairy tales. Christ said, "Before Abraham was I am," apparently meaning that he had existed aeons before his birth. There is a great similarity between the pre-existence of Christ and that of Buddha, especially when we consider the later doctrine of Amitâbha, the infinite light of Buddhahood which is omnipresent and eternal. While Christ claims to have existed before Abraham, he gives us no information about the fossil animals that have of late been found by geologists. Ingersoll speaks of Christ in the same way as Spence Hardy does of Buddha. He says: "If he truly was the son of God, he ought to have known the future; he ought to have told us something about the New World; he ought to have broken the bonds of slavery. Why did he not do it?" And Ingersoll concludes: "Because he was not the son of God. He was a man who knew nothing and understood nothing." When Ingersoll speaks in these terms, he is accused of flippancy; but Mr. Hardy's seriousness is not to be doubted.

What would Christians say of a Buddhist who, with the same logic, commenting on analogous Christian traditions, said of Christ what Mr. Hardy says of Buddha? Mr. Hardy says: "I have proved that Buddhism is not a revelation of truth; that its founder was an erring and imperfect teacher, and ignorant of many things that are now universally known; and that the claim to the exercise of omniscience made for him by his followers is an imposition and pretence. . . . . We can only regard Buddha as an impostor."

This is strong language, and I am sorry for Mr. Hardy that he has forgotten himself and all rules of justice and fairness in his missionary zeal.

Even Buddha's broadness in recognising the good wherever he found it is stigmatised by Mr. Hardy. He says (p. 215): "Buddha acknowledges that there are things excellent in other religions, and hence he did not persecute. He declares that even his opponents had a degree of wisdom and exercised a miraculous power. But this very indifference about error, as about everything else—this apparent candor and catholicity—is attended by an influence too often fatal to the best interests of those by whom it is professed."

Mr. Hardy condemns "this apparent candor and catholicity" as "indifference about error," and he adds (p. 216): "To be a Christian a man must regard Buddha as a false teacher."

Mr. Hardy, apparently intending to palliate his harsh remark, says: "I am here a controversialist, and not an expositor" (p. 206).

But even as a controversialist he should not lower himself by making unjust accusations. It is neither right nor wise; for the liberties which he takes must be granted to opponents; and if they refuse to use them, it is to their credit.

P. CARUS.

—Open Court.

MR. LE GALLIENNE'S CONFIDENCES.

THE author of The Religion of a Literary Man contributes to the New York Cosmopolitan for October an article on "The Greatness of Man." Mr. Le Gallienne writes so daintily, and takes his readers into his confidence with so frank and charming an air, that really it seems outrageously rude to say what we feel after reading him—that it is rather skimble-skamble stuff. He tells us:—

> "I was brought up, I rejoice to say, in the bosom of an orthodox Puritan family. I hope that that family rejoices too. I was led and driven to believe that man was everybody, and that God was somebody—and that, not merely the Sabbath, but the whole universe, was made for man; that the stars were his bedtime candles, and that the sun arose to ensure his catching the 8.37 of a morning."

On this belief he acted "for many years," which may account for an air of self-importance, which, however, got a check from "those terrible Muses, geology, astronomy, and, particularly, biology." These suggested: "Nature cares nothing about us, and her giant forces laugh at our fancies." After this rebuff to inflated vanity, our young thinker very properly reflects that man has done some noteworthy things after all.

> "No, we mustn't allow ourselves to be frightened by the mere size and weight of the universe, or be depressed

Digitized by Google

because our immediate genealogy is not considered aristocratic. Perhaps, after all, we are sons of God, and, as Mr. Meredith finely puts it, our life here may still be > '. . . a little holding

> To do a mighty service.'

And the more man sees himself forsaken by the universe, the more opportunity to vindicate his own greatness. Is there no kind heart beating through the scheme of things?—man's heart shall still be kind. Will the eternal silence make mock of his dreams and his idealisms, laugh coldly at 'the splendid purpose in his eyes'? Well, so be it. His dreams and idealisms are none the less noble things, and if the gods do thus make mock of mortal joy and pain, let us be grateful that we were born mere men. Moreover, he has one great answer to the universe—the answer of courage. He is still Prometheus, and there is no limit to what he can bear. Let the vultures of pain rend his heart as they will, he can still hiss 'coward' in the face of the Eternal."

After this explosive outburst we have the reflection: "Perhaps, after all, who knows—God is love, and his great purpose kind"; and we are told that man is "an animal by accident, a spirit by birthright": a characteristic utterance which shows we are dealing with a poet, and not a logician. But there is one good thing about Mr. Le Gallienne. Here, as elsewhere, he directs his readers to George Meredith, who is a poet, and a thinker too.

UNCLE BENJAMIN.

HUXLEY.

MR. SMALLEY says of Huxley's work: "What he did was to break down the ecclesiastical barrier between human reason and the exercise of it on some of those great questions which most nearly concern the human race. I do not mean that he alone did it, but that he was, on the whole, the foremost figure in that momentous struggle. The struggle is not yet over, but there is no longer much doubt on which side victory is to rest." Mr. Smalley gives his opinion that Mr. Gladstone, Ward, Dr. Wace, the Duke of Argyll, and all who attacked Huxley were worsted. Speaking of the debates at the Metaphysical Club, he says:—

> "Mr. Gladstone is a hardened disputant with a tough skin, but even he must have winced under Mr. Huxley's exposure of his controversial methods. On the point of orthodoxy, moreover, Mr. Gladstone is inflexible, or almost inflexible. If you are not a Churchman, you are in outer darkness. He does not follow scientific movements very carefully, but he knew very well what tremendous inroads Mr. Huxley was making upon ecclesiasticism, and he could not forgive him. One of Mr. Gladstone's most faithful henchmen once remarked that he thought it an act of presumption in a man who did not know Hebrew to discuss the Old Testament. What he really meant was that it was an act of presumption to crumple up Mr. Gladstone in a public debate."

Mr. Smalley mentions the friends who used to assemble at Huxley's London house—Tyndall, Spencer, Sir Henry S. Maine, Norman Lockyer, Alma Tadema, and others. He mentions that neither Tyndall nor Spencer smoked. "Mr. Huxley liked his pipe, and would never admit that tobacco in moderation would hurt anybody." But this was perhaps his one indulgence, for Mr. Smalley says:—

> "His life was almost ascetic. He never spared himself. Often and often have I known him leave the circle of family and friends, of which he was the life, very early in the evening and betake himself to his library; a room of which the only luxury was books. If remonstrated with, or appealed to for another half-hour, he would shake his head. There was something to be done. And it would be midnight or one or two o'clock before it was done, and then he was up at seven in the morning. I sometimes thought he had no higher happiness than work; perhaps nobody has. He would dine on a little soup and a bit of fish; more than that was a clog on his mind. 'The great secret,' he said, 'is to preserve the power of working continuously sixteen hours a day if need be. If you cannot do that, you may be caught out any time.'"

Kid—"Do you think we'll have a thunderstorm to-night?" Mother—"No." Kid—"Then I needn't say my prayers. I'm only afraid of thunder."

DO THE TEACHINGS OF JESUS PROCLAIM SOCIALISM?

THIS was the subject of a public debate on the 3rd inst., in the hall of the Bridgeton Branch of the Independent Labor Party, Howard-street, Glasgow, between Mr. William Heaford and M. M. Gass, the latter representing the Labor Party.

Mr. Gass argued that the commands of Jesus to love God above all, and our neighbour as ourself, which their promulgator declared to be the sum and substance of the law and the prophets, afford a subjective basis, which, with the Golden Rule, in the positive form in which Jesus alone expressed it, as an objective standard of conduct, constitute a code of principles the practical application of which must eventuate in Socialism. A reference to the doctrines of the prophets of Israel showed that, in Renan's words, the prophets were what we "would now call Socialists," inasmuch as they were Republicans and opposed to slavery and land monopoly. This was especially true of Isaiah, who forecast a state of society, which was exactly that aimed at by Socialism, when every citizen should enjoy in peace and security all the advantages due to him as the fruit of his own labor. The two petitions in the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread" and "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," were essentially Socialistic aspirations. A divine of the last century had proved how monstrously selfish it would be to ask for more than daily bread, by this reductio ad absurdum version of the clause, "Give us our daily bread, and give us superfluities to pamper our flesh and feed our vanity"; and the desire that God's will might be done on earth as it is in heaven means that love, which implies liberty, equality, and fraternity, may prevail below among men, as it does in the presence of God.

Mr. Heaford pointed out that the injunction to love God committed those who obeyed it to the worship of the sanguinary Jehovah of the Old Testament, and the hardly less sinister and vindictive God of the New, who consigned the mass of mankind to an everlasting hell. The prescription to love our neighbor as ourself was a counsel of perfection, and any serious attempt to carry it out would subvert the whole system of civilisation. Self-love is the beginning of wisdom in moral development; the source of the highest and truest altruism. The Golden Rule, even in its affirmative form, existed long before the time of Jesus; and as for the quotation from Isaiah, it was evident that the millennial felicity there portrayed was as much a poetical version as the well-known passage in Virgil concerning the return of the Golden Age. Besides, Isaiah represented this beatific state as a direct or special creation of God. Now, Socialism, as generally understood by its advocates, was a purely secular method of improving society by human or natural agency. They had been waiting in vain for nineteen hundred years for God to commence, and the certainty was that, if we left it to him, we might wait till the Greek Kalends. The prayer for daily bread was unnecessary if men worked for it. People only prayed for what was beyond their reach. One of the most serious defects in the doctrine of Jesus was the emphasis it laid on the value of prayer, whereas the practical Socialist echoed the old Latin aphorism, Laborare est orare. It was impossible to understand how God's will was to be done on earth as it is in heaven. Did it mean that, when the prayer was finally answered, earth would become a second heaven, where there would be neither marrying nor giving in marriage? In that event, what would become of the home and all its lovely associations? They had had a reference to the prophets, but none to the law. What were they to make of such facts as the sanction of slavery by the Mosaic code, and the brutal command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live"? Were these Socialistic institutions or practices?

In subsequent speeches Mr. Gass sought to make out that the law of Moses concerning slavery was really an anti-slavery statute, and to justify his ascription of Socialistic doctrine to Jesus.

In his closing speech Mr. Heaford searchingly reviewed the debate as a whole, and traced in graphic terms the pernicious influence of Christ's teaching and example on the history of the social well-being of mankind.

J. P. GILMOUR.

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

(4) Display, or get displayed, one of our contents-sheets, which are of a convenient size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will send them on application.

Digitized by Google

ACID DROPS.

The Baptist Union annual at Portsmouth would not have been complete without a "missionary day." One of the speakers on this occasion was the Rev. G. H. Pople, a missionary from the Congo, where some white men have lately been cooked and eaten, and pronounced too highly flavored with rum and tobacco. Mr. Pople said that "much of the cruelty which there prevailed was due to the belief in witchcraft; but gradually the superstitions were giving way before the blessed influences of Christianity." Mr. Pople forgot to add, however, that a witch was recently roasted to death in Ireland; a good deal nearer than the Congo. He also forgot to add that the Bible orders the murder of witches, and that Jesus Christ went about ejecting devils from human beings. But of course the acknowledgment of these facts would damp the ardor of subscribers, and what would then become of the missionaries? They would starve, which is nearly as bad as being eaten, and much worse than the mere off-chance of being cooked to make a Congo holiday.

Christian bigotry is always active and enterprising, and always trying to injure someone for the glory and honor of God. The Joyful News puffs the Silver Cord League, whose members pledge themselves not to deal with any grocer who sells beer, wine, or spirits. The cream of the joke is that most of these grocers must be Christians. We advise them to copy the holy wine texts from Mr. Foote's new Bible and Beer pamphlet, and hang them up in their shop windows. Wouldn't the Silver Cord League scream then!

The G. O. M. is still true to his ancient love of theology, and correspondents often draw him on this fascinating subject. The Rev. A. G. Prichard, of Denton, Norfolk, has heckled Mr. Gladstone on the "New Birth," and elicited a characteristic reply. The G. O. M. believes in "a renewing spiritual operation in an infant," and speaks of the grace of God, which is supposed to perform this operation, as "a germ developed or dormant, or arrested and frozen to death." Fancy the spirit of God frozen to death! Evidently the G. O. M. is a victim of metaphor, like all the theologians that have gone before him. He mistakes ideas for realities.

"Many children, in my opinion," says the G. O. M., "and some within my happy knowledge, grow up holy from the womb." This is no doubt inspired by dear little Dorothy Drew. Were it not for sweet child voices, and tender child hands, and the patter of child feet, Christianity with its "original sin" would have ended in madness and suicide. When an old man's brain swarms with pious maggots, the best medicine is the laughing light in two little rogueish eyes.

When Mr. Athelstan Riley got his obnoxious Circular issued to Board school teachers, it was promised that "the religious opinions of candidates will not in any way influence their appointments or promotion." Now Mr. Riley openly declares that he will do his utmost to prevent the promotion of any and every one of the teachers who protested against the Circular. This is a sample of the sort of faith always kept by bigots, who consider their duty towards their deity or their Church overrides all considerations of justice towards their fellow men.

The Conservative Times, Pall Mall Gazette, and St. James's Gazette concur in censuring this breach of trust, which, as an object lesson in the tactics of the clerical party, ought not to be forgotten.

Mr. Macnamara, the "Progressive," who is making such a dead set at Mr. Athelstan Riley on the London School Board, does not understand religious equality any more than the bigot he opposes. He advocates increased grants to the Voluntary schools, without public control, although he does so ostensibly in the interest of underpaid teachers. He is also in favor of keeping the Bible in the schools; and, in that case, the Secularists can only regard the squabble over how it shall be read and explained as the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. "A plague o' both your houses!"

Count Leo Tolstoi tells, in the New York World Monthly for October, how a peasant drafted for the military was confined, flogged, and otherwise tortured to death as a convict because, in obedience to Christ, he refused to take the customary oath. This under the most Christian Government of the Czar.

Tolstoi says: "The mortality in the convict battalions is very great—is abnormal. Since Burow, for instance, reigns supreme in Wordnessch, 340 bodies have been added to the battalion's private graveyard; men starved or beaten to death or driven insane or to suicide by the eternal fear of punishment by continuous hard work at small rations." The number of a convict battalion seldom exceeds 600. So it appears that three-fifths of the men have been most Christianly murdered.

The poor old Pope has issued a protest against the National celebrations of September 20. He would fain persuade the Italians that their rejoicings over having their capital were an insult to his old age, "led by a sect who are enemies of God"—i.e., the Freemasons. He will not, however, convince them that Rome was better off under Papal Rule, despite his prophecy of fresh perils and greater disasters. As long as Popes covet temporal power, the perils and disasters are likely to fall on the Church.

The Stepney Board of Guardians have, on the motion of Father Higley, adopted a curious method of dealing with the religious difficulty. They have decided that in future one foundling child out of every four chargeable to the Union shall be brought up as a Roman Catholic. So, after three parentless and religionless children have been put on the Protestant path to the everlasting bonfire, the next comer will have a chance of being included within the pale of salvation. Father Higley, who proposed this, had also to claim that the Catholics produced a full quarter of the foundling children. When will men learn that they have no more right to decide the religious views of children than to put them in iron cages!

If Londoners don't get saved, it is not for want of opportunity for learning the road from all sorts and conditions of men. A Hindu Yogi, Swami Vwekananda, who advertises himself as "connected with no society," is delivering lectures on "Vedanta Philosophy" at the Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, the price for admission to the stalls being five shillings.

The United Liberal Societies of New York made a big parade through the city as a demonstration against the Sunday Laws. It was computed that over 30,000 persons took part. But the Liberal Societies made a mistake by holding the parade on a Wednesday. If held on a Sunday, the demonstration would have been more effective, and, perhaps, more numerously attended.

M. T. Witt Talmage has issued a book on his travels, which he calls The Earth Girdled. A chief item appears to have been his visit to the Czar, who, he tells us, "worships God." The Czar seems to have known how to utilise the mountebank. The latter reports: "I said to the Emperor, 'I saw Moscow burn!' Somewhat startled, he said, 'What do you mean?' 'I saw it at sunset.' 'Oh,' he replied, smiling, 'I have often seen it in that blaze.'" This sort of talk let the Czar take Talmage's measure nicely, and he flattered the preacher, knowing that he in turn would celebrate his praises wherever he travelled.

Sir Hartley Williams, one of the Justices of Victoria, has been stirring up Melbourne orthodoxy by giving a discourse on "Religion, Dogma, and Theology," in which he advocated teaching morality apart from dogmas. A whole swarm of clericals have swept down on him, but only to show what pitiable obscurantists they are.

"The Sermon of the Week" in Monday's Daily Chronicle was by Mr. Price Hughes, who declared that "No man can argue himself into Christianity." This is a smack in the face for all the advocates of Christian Evidences. According to Mr. Hughes, you cannot know that Christ was God except "by the revelation of the Eternal Father." Why, then, is Mr. Hughes so anxious to have the deity of Christ taught to the children in Board schools? Why doesn't he leave it to "the Eternal Father"?

The "revelation of the Eternal Father" has made Mr. Hughes a most niggardly economist of truth. If ever we get that "revelation," we hope we shall take it in a milder form.

The Quarterly Review has the cheek to say: "Outside of Christendom what we behold is stagnation and decay." It, of course, implies that Christianity is the cause of movement and progress being found in Christendom. How, then, did it happen that stagnation and decay prevailed in Christendom for a thousand years, and still prevails in Abyssinia, where Christianity has existed for 1,400 years, without outside influences? If anything is certain, it is that the progressive movement in Europe came through Jews, Moslems, and Sceptics. To-day Japan is to the full more progressive than Spain, or than any other nation that can fairly be classed as distinctively Christian.

Professor Richard T. Ely, the author of a popular American book on Socialism, writes on "State Universities" in the October Cosmopolitan. He says: "One of the sad facts I am more and more compelled to face is that the great social, educational, and political reforms of our day receive little sympathy and increasing opposition from the churches as institutions. Institutionalism is getting squarely in God's way now, as it always has, although the number of individuals who see the needs and signs of the times is increasing. The hardest and wickedest obstacle in the path of progress is blind and dogged conservatism of the religious classes."

Digitized by Google

The Marquis of Lothian has a curious notion of what is meant by a denominational school. He is reported as saying, before the Church Council of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, that any school in which religious teaching was not given "might be held to be a denominational school, on the ground that it was just as emphatically placing the school in an exceptional position as if it were conducted as a denominational school." This brilliant logical tour de force of the noble Marquis was received with great applause by the assembled ministers, and, thus encouraged, he may now attempt to convince the Education Department.

According to F. Pommerol, they place in Auvergne a rude stone, instead of a cross, on the apex of house roofs and chimneys. This is an old custom descended from pre-Christian times, and is supposed to be an offering to the god of thunder and a talisman against lightning. At Rome, Jupiter Tonans was represented by a boulder. Thor had, as the symbol of thunder, his hammer, which made a pre-Christian cross.

The riots at Barcelona were, it appears, occasioned by the removal from the Chair of Natural History, at the University of Barcelona, of Professor Odon de Buen. The only reason for his removal is his pronounced Freethought. He was the delegate from Spain to the recent International Freethought Congress at Brussels. This seems to have been the immediate occasion of the persecution. The students resented so much the action of the authorities that they smashed the windows of the bishop who instigated it. If the clericals of Spain think they can keep out the doctrine of evolution by removing all the professors who teach it, they are probably mistaken. These miserable obscurantists are doing their worst to sink Spain into old barbarism.

Mr. Cluer (to the prisoner): "Have you any questions to ask?" Prisoner (incoherently): "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was made God. I come to avenge God." Mr. Cluer: "Oh! I see. You are remanded for medical examination."

Striking illustrations of Ritualistic teaching are given in the form of a leaflet issued by the Wesleyan book-store. The illustrations are pictures of instruments for self-torture now being sold in England for the use of Anglo-Catholics. For self-flagellation you may buy a "discipline" for 4s. 6d. or more, according to the number of knotted thongs; or you can get the same in knotted steel, with which you may drench your back with blood. "You can have a wristlet for 1s. 6d. or 2s. 6d., or an anklet for 10s. 6d., large enough to wrap round any part of your leg; or a cincture, which will enwrap your waist, for 16s. These are made of steel wire, and at the intersection of the links there are sharp-hooked steel-points for the tearing of your skin at every movement of wrist, or leg, or body." Hair shirts can also be had at various prices. The use of these articles is regularly enjoined in the confessional by Ritualist priests as a condition of absolution. Mr. Athelstan Riley is reported as recommending the hair shirts to Board-school teachers. The High Church Fakirs are on the right road. They advocate celibacy, and we hope soon to report that they earn the commendation of Christ on those who make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake.

Professor Sayce, whose article in the Contemporary Review is ably dealt with by the author of The Witness of Assyria in this issue, gave utterance to a lot of nonsense before the Church Congress. He crows over Professor Flinders Petrie finding a scarab with the name Jacob-el—which proves that Jacob was an old divinity if it proves anything—and over the same names being found in Babylonia; that is, he makes much of points which no one thinks of disputing, without furnishing an iota of evidence for the miraculous transactions which are disputed. When he finds monumental evidence that all the rivers of Egypt were turned into blood, he can crow as he pleases. Meanwhile he only makes himself ridiculous.

Mr. E. Sidney Hartland, author of the Legend of Perseus, has a column-long letter in the Times of October 14 on "The Sin-Eater in Wales." In his book Mr. Hartland indicates that the custom of sin-eating, the partaking of food off a corpse, comes down from times of cannibalism. Of course, there have been vehement denials of the custom, which was certified to by Aubrey, Moggridge, and others. Canon Silvan Evans and the Rev. T. Eynor Davies have been adduced as saying they did not know of any such custom—which is a good deal like the Irishman who offered to produce witnesses who would swear they did not see him do what he was accused of doing.

Mr. Hartland mentions that Miss Gertrude Hope saw the same ceremony performed at Market Drayton as recently as July 1, 1893. She says: "The minister who had lately come from Pembrokeshire remarked that he was sorry that Pagan custom was still observed. He had been able to put an end to it in the Pembrokeshire village where he had formerly been." Mr. Hartland also tells an anecdote of an inspector of schools who asked a clergyman concerning the superstitions of the place, when he was met by the dignified response: "Our people are not superstitious, I am glad to say." His inspection over, he asked the first-class: "Now, children, can you tell me of any place where there is a bogie, and of anyone who has seen one?" and instantly every hand was stretched out.

If any of our readers know of instances of clergymen having suppressed old customs or children's games, we shall be glad of authentic information, as we have reason to think that wherever the Pagan character of such observances is revealed by the folk-lorists it is suppressed as speedily as possible by the men of God.

A Queensland Democrat mentions in the Daily News that in that part of the world the Sunday Act of Charles II. is enforced against Chinamen who do gardening on Sundays. Christianity always was the most tolerant of faiths.

A press telegram from Cincinnati, a few days ago, says: "The customary Lord's Prayer in the Linwood, Ohio, school has been ordered to be stopped." A father took his child from school on account of this prayer, and notified the teacher, who consulted the attorney of the public schools. The latter replied that prayers had been eliminated from the schools, and that a State law forbade anything of a sectarian nature being taught in the public schools. Have we not a similar law in Illinois? Will not some lawyer be so kind as to advise us for publication, as we have inquiries on the subject?—Progressive Thinker.

The Dean of Norwich is very modest. He only wants a million a year raised for a National Sustentation Fund for poor incumbents. As for the curates, they can form a Union of their own and go on strike. The Church already takes from seven to ten millions, and if those at the bottom of the ladder want help they should look to the fat deans and bishops higher up.

Under the heading of "The World, the Flesh, and the Devil," Reynolds' Newspaper gives a list of men of God gone wrong. It is sad reading, especially for Christians.

Mr. Headlam has spent too much money on his Church Reformer and thinks of dropping it. Reforming the Church is a big undertaking; too big for anyone but Jesus Christ, if he would only come again, as he promised; and perhaps he would fail. On the whole we think he would.

Mr. F. Goodchild has compiled for the Outlook (N.Y.) a lot of statistics on "What Working-men Pay for Religion." It appears to be precious little in the United States, considerably less than what is spent for tobacco. In Great Britain it is far less than in America; in France still less; in Germany less still; and in Belgium least of all. America probably leads the way, because of the almost enforced contributions of the Irish, as it was found among glass-workers in the States that 68 per cent. of American families were said to contribute to the Church, while 84 per cent. of the Irish contributed. But the contribution throughout from working men is so small, in the highest instance not 1½ per cent. of the income, as to make it certain that religion is practically maintained by the wealthy classes, who doubtless believe that it subserves their interests.

Either J. C. or the Devil.

The Kurnai, aboriginal natives of Australia, had three mysterious gods—Brewin, Bullumdut, and Bankan. In Fison and Howitt's Kamilaroi and Kurnai (p. 255) the latter writes: "Being desirous of learning what Brewin, Bullumdut, and Bankan were supposed by the Kurnai to be, I questioned two of the most intelligent men. Both were Tatungolung—one a member of the Church of England, the other an intelligent savage and a scamp. I said: 'What is Brewin?' They consulted, and after a few minutes one of them said: 'We think that he is Jesus Christ.' I said: 'Well, I think you had better consult again; I do not think your Catechism teaches you that.' They then consulted somewhat longer, when he said: 'We have talked about it, and we think it must be the devil.'"

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, October 20, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, E.C.: 7.30, "The Holy Ghost."

October 27, Plymouth.

November 17, Leicester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—October 18, North Shields; 20, Glasgow; 21, Paisley; 22, Cupar; 24 and 25, Dundee; 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. Nov. 3, m. Newington Reform Club, e. Foresters' Hall; 17, Liverpool; 24, Manchester.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

R. S. W.—It would be difficult to provide for a Secular funeral in such a remote place, unless someone attended from Plymouth or Bristol.

A. Adams (Hull).—Notices should be sent to the editor.

T. Dobson.—We have not forgotten the promised articles. The Beer and Bible pamphlet is a good preliminary.

C. Johnson.—Thanks for papers. The joke has appeared in a slightly different form.

S. Feuerein.—Will give particulars of bishops' incomes and legacies at death next week.

R. Axelley.—We received no letter about the opposition to our placard. Kindly forward particulars.

H. Gadd.—Your subscription shall be transferred.

F. W. Swain.—Pleased to hear the Derby friends who subscribe "hope the day is not far distant when Mr. Foote's worth will be fully recognised." If people everywhere who think him worth anything would just send on the amount for Freethought propaganda, it would be doubly interesting. The other matters shall be attended to.

A. F. Walter.—Mr. Forder attends to your order. Thanks for your kind words.

T. W. Bundy, 86 Etta-street, Deptford, S.E., is the new secretary of the Lewisham and New Cross Branch. We should like to see some lecturing done in this district.

T. Millar.—Why not try to get a few of the Belfast friends together, and make inquiries about a hall for occasional special lectures?

A. B. Moss.—Sorry to hear of the fiasco. Put the notice down again, and keep your seconder in sight. Pleased to have your good wishes for our lecture scheme.

R. Dowding.—We have no covers for holding weekly copies of the Freethinker, or we would send one to the Walthamstow Library. We may see what can be done when we get a little time.

Peter.—The verse is in type.

John and James M'Glashan (Glasgow) transfer their £2 donation to the Hall fund to Shilling Week, and send another £1, with wishes for a good response to all our appeals. This is a practical way of wishing.

A Servant Girl sends a shilling, and wishes she could send more. The poor girl's mite should be a challenge to some of the wealthier friends.

H. Dines (Colchester).—Hope we have your name right. Will inquire about the other matter.

Delta, sending twenty shillings, writes: "You are so energetic and audacious (in a complimentary sense) that you are likely to awaken enthusiasm in others." He wishes the Agnostics amongst the aristocracy would come to our aid.

J. M. Jones.—Shall be transferred.

Donald Black.—Thanks. Glasgow has beaten other places hollow in the Shilling Week subscription. We shall bear it in mind if Glasgow ever wants a service from us.

J. Morton.—Transferred as desired.

H. Smith (Stanningley).—Glad to have your cheerful letter.

Joseph Close.—Thanks for your interesting letter. We like to hear of our readers sowing the seed of Freethought. Much can be done in courteous and kindly private conversation.

H. Brown.—Our compliments to the subscribing members of the Isle of Dogs Progressive Club.

Beelzebub.—Shall be attended to. Portsmouth will not be left out of our scheme. We have not Mr. Harding's address. Kindly ask him to communicate.

Painter sends a second £1 to Shilling Week, and hopes we have "now received at least 2,000 shillings." Not yet, but no doubt we shall before the end of the month.

T. Hibbott, subscribing, writes: "You deserve all the support and encouragement our party can give for your devotion and energy in the cause. Our party should rally together and close their ranks."

H. R.—We sympathise with you, but in the long run you may think yourself well rid of a young lady who would restrict your reading to her own narrow limits. It is always best to look upon the cheerful side, if you can; indeed, those who would live wholesome, useful lives should cultivate the habit of doing so.

A. S. Coleman.—The fund is not closed. You are quite in time. Hundreds of others are still behind, and we are giving them a chance.

W. Darton.—Hope to see you next Sunday at Plymouth.

H. Jones.—Correction made. You are quite right. It is always well to be accurate.

G. Brady, subscribing to Shilling Month—as it now is—hopes "the result will be a substantial sum which will enable us to attain the important object in view."

W. H. Morrish, our veteran Bristol friend, transfers £2 from the Hall fund to our lecturing scheme.

E. Shedley.—How can we answer the man's nonsense? If a Christian minister knows that most Secularists are bad men, he is like the rest of his species; their knowledge is always guesswork.

M. Christopher is "so pleased with our lecture scheme" that he sends us another subscription.

R. Joslin.—Pleased to hear that yourself and a few Edmonton friends would contribute £10 towards a guarantee fund if Colonel Ingersoll would only "come over and help us." We fancy, however, that the Colonel would need no other guarantee than his own popularity.

J. W. Gott writes: "The new scheme is one in which I can heartily work, because I feel sure we are going to get our money's worth."

F. Marsh.—Mr. Foote and all his household are quite well. Thanks for your wish that he "will have the best of health and live many years to uphold the noble cause of Freethought."

W. J. Gaines.—Glad to hear you induced your Christian friend to attend Mr. Foote's first lecture at St. James's Hall, and that he was "delighted." Keep pegging away, always courteously, at your orthodox acquaintances. Much good is done in this way. Freethinkers should all take a part in our propaganda, and not leave it entirely to our lecturers and journalists.

J. B.—Thanks for cuttings. Your subscription is not as large as your wish to help, but that is no fault of yours. If all subscribed what they could, we should be able to carry Freethought into every part of the kingdom.

Papers Received.—Oldham Standard—Oldham Chronicle—New York Public Opinion—New York World Monthly—Two Worlds—Monist—Liberator—Truthseeker—Oxford Times—Blue Grass Blade—Free Sunday Advocate—Melbourne Age—Cape Times——Melbourne Herald—Middlesex Chronicle—Orange Free State Express—Progressive Thinker—Secular Thought.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

SHILLING MONTH.

This fund will be kept open till the end of October. I am requested to do this by several correspondents, and it is only fair that all who might give should give, or at least have a full opportunity afforded them.

My lecture scheme has "caught on." Many of the oldest and best workers in the country see in it a real prospect of a "Forward Movement." I have had a number of applications for help in propagandist efforts from various parts of the country. They are really more numerous than I can deal with, but I shall do what I can. Everything depends on the means put at my disposal. I therefore appeal again to my readers. Hundreds of them, surely, are able to send something; scores of them, I know, are able to assist handsomely; and I want them to understand that I am waiting.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

(Where merely the name is given the amount is one shilling.)

J. D. Leggett, 2s. 6d.; J. Crabtree and two boys, 3s.; J. S.; A. F. Walter; Mrs. Walter; R. Ellis, 2s.; T. Millar; R. Shaw 2s.; R. Axelley; J. and J. Beale, 2s.; J. Close, 2s. 6d.; W. Bineham; A. E. Moore; W. Stevens, 6d.; L. Oaks; E. Middleton, 6d.; H. Brown; Painter, £1; T. Warwick, 2s.; T. Hibbott, 2s.; W. Akenhead; T. M. C.; C. R. W.; Pyrites; John and James M'Glashan, £3; J. Pruett, 5s.; A Servant Girl; E. Lyons; H. Dines, 2s. 6d.; T. Ollerenshaw, 2s.; G. W., 2s.; G. Wilkins; Delta, £1; Howforth, 5s.; W. H. Morrish, £2; M. Christopher, 2s.; W. Hopper, 5s.; M. Bell, £1; W. Davey, 2s.; Mrs. Harwood; Mr. and Mrs.

Digitized by Google

Yates, 2s.; Mr. Scott; A. Marks; R. Joslin, 10s.; J. W. Gott, 2s. 6d.; J. R., 2s.; J. M.; R.G.; A. R.; J. L.; G. W.; C.M.; W.H.; J. F.; D. B., 2s. 6d.; Southport, 2s.; Few Port Glasgow Friends, 5s. 6d.; F. Boorman; F. J. Boorman; G. Lucas, 2s. 6d.; P. Shapter; W. Deacon, 6d.; A Gospel Stater, 2s. 6d.; A. Weddle, 5s.; J. Morton, 5s.; H. Smith, 2s.; C. E. Hall, 2s. 6d.; T. Stead; R. and Mary Lowther, 2s.; W. S. M., 4s.; J. Ainsworth (Blackburn), 2s.; Mrs. and R. Bransby, 2s.; A. J. Lovell, 10s.; A. S. Webb; J. Tonkins, 2s.; Mrs. James; J. Hooper, 2s.; R. S. Smith, 2s.; Alchem, 5s.; R. Bulman, 2s. 6d.; C. J., 3s.; S. Bulman, 4s.; J. K., 2s.; F. Marsh, 4s.; A. A. Watts; H. Higgins; W. J. Gaines; C. R. Morgan; Friend; J. W. Phillips; G. Phillips; A. Phillips; H. Smith; John Grange, 5s.; J. B.; J. P. W.; H. Bounds, 2s.; A. S. Coleman, 5s.; J. S. and C. W.; O. M. L., 2s.; Mount Batten Friends, 5s.; W. Pearce, 2s.; G. Brady, 5s.; T. Dobson, 2s.; J. Umpleby, 5s.; W. O. and J. M., 5s.

Derby: Barker, Briggs, Fletcher, Ford, King, Martin, Whitney, Wright, Heritage, Swain, 10s.

Per Miss Vance.—A. Cross, 10s.; J. Worster; B. Dundas; W. B., 2s.; T. Lewis; J. Cole; J. Payne; R. Fountain, 4s.

Per R. Forder.—C. R.; H. L. Towers, 2s.; H. J., 2s. 6d.; Wm. M. (North Shields), 5s.; J. Hayes, 2s. 6d.; T. B., 2s.; A. J. Lorkin, 2s. 6d.; H. Gadd, 2s. 6d.; S. Newson, 2s.; J. A. R., 3s.; R. C. G.; Rhosddaite; A. G. Scopes (Ipswich), 2s.; H. Poulson, 5s.; F. W. D., 2s. 6d.; J. Radford; A. Radford; R. Radford; G. H.; Amygo, 2s.

Correction.—In the Blackburn list, J. Titherington, 1s., should have been 2s.

SUGAR PLUMS.

THE Sentinel, a North London paper published at Bowes Park, gives a fair report of Mr. Foote's recent lecture at Wood Green. Reference is made to the "naming" of the baby boy, Alec Wood, and it is admitted that Mr. Foote "spoke eloquently and movingly on the solemn responsibilities of parenthood." The lecture is described as "powerful and eloquent," but "spoiled here and there by cheap laughter-raising"—which, of course, only means that the lecture was less solemn than a sermon.

Another good report of this Wood Green meeting appears in the Pioneer, which says: "The hall was crowded by an attentive audience, who vigorously applauded many of the points made during the lecture." The writer of this report makes an excellent summary of the lecture in the space at his command.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured to an improved audience at Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening. His able and eloquent address on "Atheism and Christian Theism" was frequently and loudly applauded. Mr. Foote, who took the chair, appealed to the audience to fill the twelve hundred seats by bringing their friends and acquaintances to these meetings. A good collection was contributed towards the expenses.

Mr. Foote lectures at Foresters' Hall this evening (Oct. 20) on "The Holy Ghost." He will be followed by Mr. Touzeau Parris and Mr. C. Cohen.

Mr. Putnam concludes his "News and Notes" on his British tour in the Truthseeker of October 5, the latest to hand. Most of the article will be reprinted in due course in our columns. Meanwhile we may note that now Mr. Putnam is on the other side of the Atlantic he takes the first opportunity of thanking the President of the National Secular Society for his reception of the President of the American Secular Union. "I must thank Mr. Foote," he says, "for the thorough-going manner in which he has supported my labors in the field, and for his whole-souled greeting to me as a guest. He has been a comrade indeed, with chivalrous devotion to the cause." Mr. Putnam also thanks Mr. Watts for his "unstinted aid," and hopes to repay them both when they visit America.

Mr. Foote has written a special message on behalf of the Freethinkers of this country to the American Secular Convention, which will be held at New York the last week in October. This was done at Mr. Putnam's request.

Professor Goldwin Smith has spoken out on the action of the Postmaster-General of Canada in suppressing the circulation of the Truthseeker in the Dominion. In a letter to Mr. E. M. Macdonald he says: "Dear Sir,—You may be sure that you will always find me on the side of perfect freedom of opinion. Beliefs which cannot maintain themselves by argument in fair lists against all comers ought not to be maintained at all. In the number of the Truthseeker which you have sent me there is much to which believers in Christianity would object, as they would to many of the utterances of my late friends, Professors Huxley and Tyndall. But there is nothing, so far as I can see, to justify or excuse the exclusion of your journal from circulation.—Yours faithfully, GOLDWIN SMITH."

Mr. Joseph Symes, our gallant old colleague out at Melbourne, writes as follows in the last number of the Liberator to hand:—"The Freethinker has a note or two on my late imprisonment and other 'legal' experiences, and adds: 'Mr. Symes has apparently more than one man can do in Melbourne. Bigotry seems as rampant there as it is here, and even more so.' True. It is impossible for my English friends to even imagine the difficulties of my position here in Melbourne; and no words of mine could ever describe them. I am not insinuating that they have not worry and trouble enough, and much too much. But I am alone, and have been for eleven and a half years. Still, I am not dead. I have been robbed wholesale, insulted, outraged, and have still more lies told and whispered against me than any other man, and more utterly cowardly enemies, whose cowardice makes cowardice itself almost blush for them. True, I have much more than I can do; but I never was more able or willing to work, nor less disposed to show quarter to that horrid superstition under which all my foes more or less find shelter, encouragement, and incitement to crime, and assistance in it. Still, I drop my work when I can work no more; I yield to my enemies when they have really beaten me; but not till then. My fight has been long and fierce. It is a wonder I have any respect for the mass of mankind left in me; and a greater wonder still that that respect and hope for them does not seem to diminish. Perhaps this arises from the fact that all along my course, while rascality has seemed overwhelming, I have found the utmost goodness in a few persons. In every crisis I have experienced noble men and women have come forward with help and encouragement. To them I owe more than I can express, more than I can ever repay."

Mr. J. Morrison Davidson, whose last volume, Let There Be Light!, has been noticed in the British Weekly, sends a letter to that journal, in which he reaffirms his statement that nine-tenths of the clergy would be helpless in the grasp of a Foote or a Watts. "If I were a betting man," he says, "I should be prepared to take heavy odds that they would pass a far better examination in the writings of said scholars [Lightfoot, Harnack, Sanday, Ramsay, etc.] than five-sixths of the 'clergy of all denominations.' In a word, they 'master their briefs,' while the salaried advocates of Christianity but too often shamefully neglect theirs."

In the New Age (Oct. 10), edited by A. E. Fletcher, there is an article on "The Religion of Thomas Paine," in reply to the Christian Commonwealth. The writer rather patronisingly pats Paine on the back for being no Atheist. He says: "He was not an orthodox Christian certainly, but he was one who would have entirely agreed with Dean Milman when he said: 'Christianity has been tried for more than eighteen hundred years; perhaps it is time to try the religion of Jesus.'" This is a shade overdone, for one wonders, if this was exactly Paine's position, how it was that he still remains a stigmatised heretic, while Milman was a honored dignitary of the Church. The truth is, Paine led the van of heresy in his own day, and, were he living now, we should rather expect to find him with the Atheists than with the colorless Broad Churchmen of the type of Mr. Fletcher. The article gives several notable extracts from Paine, and concludes as follows: "Paine died under the ban of society and the Churches, when a little hypocrisy or even discreet silence might have secured him unbounded applause; but he was to the last inflexibly true to the highest he knew, and the best of us can do no more."

It appears from Renan's book on his sister, Henriette, that to her he owed the exquisite refinement of his style. She read all his proofs, and was a most fastidious critic. She, moreover, led the way in Freethought, and regretted the priestly leanings of her brother. He says: "I left St. Sulpice Seminary in 1845. Thanks to the liberal and earnest spirit which ruled over that institution, I had carried my philologic studies very far; my religious opinions were greatly shaken thereby. Here again Henriette was my support. She had outstripped me in this path; her Catholic beliefs had wholly disappeared, but she had always refrained from exerting any influence over me upon this subject. When I told her of the doubts which tormented me, and which made it my duty to abandon a career for which absolute faith was requisite, she was enchanted, and offered to smooth the difficult passage."

We are indebted to the Leek Times for the perfect courtesy and fairness it has shown in respect to the correspondence on the suggested "Foote and Howard Debate." Mr. Howard's letter in reply to our very plain statement in the Freethinker is to be charitably accounted for on the theory that he is laboring under a violent prejudice, which clouds his understanding. "Mr. Foote, one of the ablest platform debaters that ever lived," he says, "declines to discuss the question of man having a soul unless he can secure an unfair advantage to himself in the framing of the proposition to be debated." Really this is very astonishing. Mr. Foote asked Mr. Howard to frame the proposition he wished to maintain with respect to mental phenomena, and promised to frame his own proposition afterwards. Mr. Howard calls this securing an unfair advantage. In other words, Mr. Howard declines to debate unless he frames his own proposition and Mr. Foote's too; which is the very course we charged him with pursuing in former negotiations.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Howard wants Mr. Foote to champion the "brain theory," which is surely a rough way of expressing the scientific psychology of Lewes or Maudsley. Mr. Foote would be silly to let himself be saddled with such crudities. Nor will he call himself a Materialist or an Agnostic to please Mr. Howard, who would at once put his own construction on these terms, and cry "Behold the philosophy of Mr. Foote."

We invite Mr. Howard to drop his heroics and come to the point. Let him frame his proposition, as he is the "challenger," and Mr. Foote will then frame his. If the reverend gentleman then complains of any unfairness, the matter may be left to the adjudication of the editor of the Leek Times, whom we do not know from Adam; or to the adjudication of a committee of three persons at Leek, two of whom shall be nominated (if he pleases) by Mr. Howard himself.

Mr. Watts lectures three times at Glasgow to-day. Tea will be provided, between meetings, for friends from a distance, and before the evening lecture Mr. Watts will name the infant daughter of Mr. D. G. Lindsay, the secretary of the Branch. There will also be a collection for the Benevolent Fund at the close of each meeting.

The National Congress of French Freethinkers will be held on Friday, November 1, at the Salle de l'Harmonie, 96 Rue d'Angoulême, Paris. This, being the feast of All Souls, is a general holiday, and a suitable time for the Congress. Among the subjects to be discussed will be the relation of Freethought to Internationalism.

Lord Salisbury, like his nephew, Mr. Balfour, is an upholder of Christianity. His address to the British Association last year was a clever, but superficial, attack on Darwinism. Happily it is to be answered at length by Mr. Herbert Spencer, who is preparing his answer for the press. No doubt it will be as effective as the best of Mr. Spencer's previous efforts in controversy.

The Oldham Chronicle, referring to a Freethinker who claimed to affirm in the local Coroner's Court, remarks that "An individual having the courage to publicly confess that he has no religious belief is still somewhat of a rarity." It is satisfactory to learn that the Coroner administered the law, and at once allowed the Freethinker to make an affirmation.

It is notable that, while the Rev. A. C. Deane tells us in the Nineteenth Century that the young men of our universities are Agnostics, a discussion on the subject of Agnosticism is going on in the Oxford Times, to which H. Pash and W. Valliss contribute well-written letters on the Agnostic side.

The Finsbury Park and the Islington Branches, together with the old members of the Balls Pond Branch, have taken the Balls Pond Secular Hall, 36 Newington Green-road, to the end of the year 1896. There will be a meeting of members and friends on Sunday next at 8.30. On Wednesday, October 23, a Christian Evidence class will be inaugurated, the subject for consideration being the disputed passage in Josephus. Mr. Forder will open at 8.30. The first public lecture will be on Sunday, November 3, by Mr. Foote.

Secretaries of Branches of the National Secular Society are requested to send at once to Miss Vance all particulars which they desire to see inserted in the N.S.S. Almanack for 1896. Lecturers who desire their addresses inserted should forward them without delay.

WHAT humanity needs is not people who lead unsocial and wicked lives, and are very sorry when about to die; when, by the nature of the case, they can do no more harm nor good; but people who, at an early period, begin to render valuable service to the good cause, and continue rendering more valuable services as they advance in years.—J. Cotter Morison, "The Service of Man," p. 196; third edition.

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (September 21).

I HAVE the pleasure of another visit to Professor Edwin Johnson, and this time we take a stroll over Hampstead Heath. This park is nearly as large as Central Park, and consists of hill, forest, and lakes, which present a charming variety. In fact, on Hampstead Heath it seems more like being in the country than in any other place I have visited in London. The views are wilder and more secluded. The air of cultivation is not so apparent. The neighborhood is both ancient and rural. There is the old hotel, and the chair in which Queen Victoria sat when she was a young lady and was in danger of an accident from restive horses on the steep Hampstead hill; and in this chair she recovered her nerves and equanimity. Since then the chair has been held sacred, and the tavern preserves its aristocratic dilapidation. Of course the thirsty traveller takes a glass of beer at this historic spot. Farther on are "The Spaniards" connected with the Lord Gordon riots, as depicted in Barnaby Rudge. We pass by the grove of pines amidst whose melodious songs Keats used to wander in his poetic youth, and it is certainly a beautiful spot. One can see far off into the glowing country with its diversified sceneries, while opposite the busy city looms, and between are the pastures where blackberries used to grow and lovers still wander. Many a dream the poet might have had amidst these delicious and contrasting scenes. From one point on Hampstead Heath the city can be seen in almost its entire extent. This is one of the finest views that England can present. I shall still more remember the beauties of this place because, almost immediately after the visit, I came across the poem of James Thomson (B.V.), entitled "A Sunday at Hampstead Heath," also "A Sunday up the River." I did not know that Thomson was so great a poet until I read those fresh and vigorous idyls. He has the ring of Burns, and the airy spaces of Shakespeare. He brings nature right before you, and pours forth the genuine human heart. I had read his "City of the Dreadful Night," and, while it is a marvellous poem, I did not like it. It is a kind of abnormal production, a gloomy curiosity of literature. But the "Sunday on Hampstead Heath" is gloriously healthful and jubilant, and, to my mind, ranks Thomson in essential genius with the greatest singers of the day. My visit to Hampstead Heath made me realise better the fidelity of this bard to nature's opulent display.

Professor Johnson is a scholar and a philosopher, both of fine literary insight and extensive reading. We talked on all manner of subjects along Hampstead Heath, and among his books. He is rich in experiences of the remarkable men of this era. Like myself, he was compelled to give up his orthodox position and accept the perils of out-and-out heresy. He has been brave and true to his convictions. He has written a Radical novel, The Quest of Mr. East. I have not read it, but I have no doubt it is a suggestive work. It is not yet published. I hope, however, it will find its circle of readers. Professor Johnson has the pen of a felicitous writer.

On Friday I take my way to Leicester, and Leicester is indeed a handsome place. It has a population of 180,000. It is a large manufacturing point, but its atmosphere is clear of smoke. The chimneys must consume their own smoke. The city fathers enforce this rule. If a chimney pours forth too much smoke, there is a call at once for a halt of the columns, so that the city always presents a bright and clean appearance. Leicester is famous in the history of England. One of the ancient Earls of Leicester was the originator of the British Parliament. Here are remnants of the old Roman wall, and the Roman Fosse, or public highway, is now one of the elegant streets of the city. There is King Richard's Road, along which Richard the Third galloped to Bosworth Field, eight miles distant. At the bridge where he passed over is the inscription: "Near this spot are the remains of Richard the Third, the last of the Plantagenets." It is not known where his body was buried, if at all. Some say that it was thrown into the river and never recovered. I journey to Leicester on Friday in order to attend an "outing" of the employees of Mr. Sydney Gimson and Company, who have large manufacturing works at Leicester. Mr. Gimson is president of the Secular Society at Leicester, and is active in our cause. About four hundred men are employed at the company's works, and these, with their wives and sweethearts, made a rally of about six hundred excursionists. The British workers do not do anything by halves. They go in for a whole day of fun when they set about it, and enjoy themselves from morning till night. We start off at seven o'clock a.m. A special train of fifteen cars is chartered for the occasion. These are filled full; even the babies join in the festivities, and don't seem to get tired. Our destination is Skegness, a watering-place in Lincolnshire, about seventy miles off. On our way we pass through old Boston, the original of Massachusetts Boston. The Puritans came from here, and the Pilgrims from Plymouth. A grim sect were the Puritans, and armed with authority. Old Boston has something of the appearance of its namesake. You might imagine yourself in a part of the "Hub" as you roam its ancient streets. It used to be the third seaport in England, ranking after London and Bristol. London has maintained its supremacy, but the glory of Bristol and Boston has departed. Other cities have rushed to the front. The parish church at Boston is one of the largest in the kingdom—larger than any in New England, I think. It has a noble tower, which is called the "Stump," for, as you approach the city, especially in the evening, it has the appearance of a huge stump, rising above the surrounding dwellings. It is massive, and, as you view it nearer, beautiful in its structure. It is a notable landmark. Boston has a population now of about 15,000. It has some shipping and manufacturing business. The country around is level, and rich in agriculture.

Digitized by Google

We also pass by Belvoir Castle, pronounced "Beaver," the seat of the Duke of Rutland. It is, I understand, a French word, meaning "beautiful sight," and certainly there must be an extensive view from its lofty battlements. It is on a high hill clothed with forests, the highest elevation in the county, from which a vast and level expanse stretches, mostly of prosperous farms. The railroad extends through what are called the "fenlands," which were once swamps, incapable of cultivation, but have been drained, canals and huge pumps being used for this purpose, and now the landscape shines with harvest. Thousands of acres have thus been utilised. We reach Skegness about half-past nine, and to the music of the band we march to the pavilion, and the broad and shining beach, miles in length, over which the children rush with joyous excitement, and the older folks follow, equally interested in the ever-varying panorama of sea and shore. The children take off their shoes and stockings and paddle barefoot along the sands and incoming waters, and it is interesting to watch their manœuvres. They enjoy it with the recklessness of childhood. Some of the elders take to the bathing-machines, some to the boats, and some sail over the tide on the yacht or steamship. It is a chequered scene on every hand. A long pier stretches out into the ocean, upon which the band plays, and various entertainments attract for ten continuous hours. There is a "switchback," and although this was invented in America, and ran its course at the World's Fair, I had to come to Skegness in order to take my first ride, which was an exhilarating affair, something like coasting down hill. Various games are advertised, shooting the cocoa-nut, etc. The negro minstrels put in their fun, and altogether there is a wide and resounding effervescence of jollity. The tide is somewhat insidious along these sands, and creeps inward before one is aware, and the loiterer is shut off from the mainland by an ever-broadening stream; and the way people clamber over that watery barrier is somewhat amusing to those who are safe on the other side. At one o'clock sharp is the dinner hour, and we all gather promptly in the vast pavilion, and in true democratic fashion proceed to the consumption of a "good, square meal," with a pint of beer attached. The British workman has a good appetite, and eats vigorously, and when he gets through he proceeds at once to the open firmament of heaven, and takes a smoke. He does not wait to listen to speeches, as we do in America. Everybody, so far as I can see, is satisfied, sober, contented, and happy. The afternoon pursues its glorious march. The mists of morning disappear, the sky is almost cloudless, and the brilliant sea and the vast, level shores, glimmering into distant silver, make a resplendent picture. Out on the smooth water one can hear the music of the band, mellowed into wondrous harmony by the beaming distance, while a million waves break along the strand and join their voices to the sweeping melody. Even the donkeys seem to have an ear for music, and trot jubilantly along, with the little children shouting and laughing on their backs. The silvery afternoon slowly changes into golden twilight. More beautiful appears the ocean, now almost like a mirror. The sails are drooping, and the boats are lazily floating. The children are tired, but trudge sturdily onward. The crowd gathers at the station, and at 8.5 p.m. we start for home through the broad and glistening night. The earth hath its electric stars, answering to the stars above, as we thunder through the cities, villages, and fields. At eleven o'clock we arrive at Leicester, and of all the joyous crowd only one man is left behind to pay the penalty of too much "income-tax" on the brain. It was a regular British holiday, and I enjoyed every moment of the breezy entertainment. It was a delightful "water-sketch" of Merrie England.

The Gimson Company paid the expenses of this big picnic, the railroad fare of all the men, and provided the excellent dinner; and they did this with no patronising airs, but in the true spirit of liberty, fraternity, and equality. They are genuine men, and appreciate the manhood of the worker.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

The road to hell is paved with parsons.

CHRIST.

III

THE godhead robs the man of all
The greatness which he might possess,
For he was worthy, if at all,
In simple humanness.

And as his quiet life I scan
Through mists of falsehood, folly, fraud,
I think that may be great in man
Which were but low in God.

And woven through and through this life
What tales of swine are made for geese?
Dimmed legends once with beauty rife
In the clear mind of Greece.

What stories children to affright,
Of one of three, the third of one!
Such spectres haunt the skirts of night,
But vanish from the sun.

This person of the Trinity
Came forth his godhead to disown—
"Why callest thou me good?" said he,
"For God is good alone."

SUMMING UP.

I would do right from day to day,
Love good and hate the evil thing;
But I will strongly put away
This sensuous passioning.

And when for sorry faults I grieve,
And one, with smooth, insidious tones
Says, "Set thy heart to sleep—believe—
Rest softly—faith atones,"

Then doth my mind's unclouded eye
See from his lips the poison fall—
I will not stoop to listen, I;
But rather suffer all.

I follow Truth, before whose face
Nor God nor blackest hell hath might;
I would not win his love and grace
And lose her in the night.

PYRITES.

A Candid Archbishop.

On board the train going west I found Archbishop Langevin, of Manitoba, who very politely responded to my inquiries as to his opinions on the school question. He said that the complete secularisation of the schools would in no wise satisfy them, for what they objected to mainly was "godless schools." I asked him why, if Catholics were allowed separate schools, the same might not be demanded by Jews and Freethinkers, to whom Protestant religious exercises were objectionable. His reply was: "This is a Christian country, and Jews and Freethinkers should be allowed no rights for the propagation of their opinions. An Agnostic is worse than a murderer." I said: "Then, to be consistent, you would revive the Inquisition and exterminate unbelievers?" "Oh, no," he replied, "I would not go so far as that; a limit must be made somewhere." I thought to myself, the only limit is your weakness. This intolerant spirit would only be satisfied by the death of your enemies had you the same power as of yore. The only change that centuries have made in your Church is to lessen your ability for mischief, not your purpose.

After considerable discussion, I told the Archbishop that I was glad to hear his opinion of Agnostics, because I was an official representative of that school of thought, being President of the Canadian Secular Union. His purple robes rustled, the heavy gold chain around his neck gleamed, and, holding up his hand with its great amethyst ring, he exclaimed, "Oh, you dreadful man!" Then, recovering from his surprise and horror, he laughed heartily as he realised how aptly he had spoken. He agreed with me that we stood at the two logical extremes of religious thought; it must be Rome or Reason, authority or private judgment. Protestantism is an inconsistent compromise. Its 400 sects show that it has no rational basis for unity. The battle of the future is between the Romish Church and Freethought, and he and I represented the opposing principles. Still, we had a cordial parting, and he expressed himself as gratified with the conversation.—Captain R. C. Adams, in "Secular Thought" (Toronto)

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

In connection with Mr. Foote's new pamphlet on The Bible and Beer, it is interesting to note that Count Leo Tolstoi, who has strong claims to be considered the most Christian Christian, if not the only living Christian extant, in his Four Gospels Harmonised utterly rejects the story of turning water into wine at Cana. He considers it "most instructive as an example of the harm done by accepting the mere letter of the Bible story as inspired revelation. The main incident in itself presents nothing extraordinary or instructive, from whatever point of view we choose to consider it. If we look on it as a miracle, the miracle is meaningless; to consider it a mere trick were to insult Christ; as a picture of daily life the narrative possesses no value." Now we differ from Count Tolstoi in considering the narrative very instructive as to the solar and Bacchic elements underlying the Christian myth. If we adopted his principles of interpretation, we should have to strike out much from the teachings of Jesus, as well as "the false teaching of Paul" and "the ravings of the writer of the Apocalypse." We conceive the Count's method of reconstructing the Gospels by picking out what suits himself, as fundamentally wrong, unless they are taken as poetic romances and fiction. They claim to be historical documents, and must be judged as such. If they are not historical, but mythical, the attempt to construct a rationalised history from them is vain.

* * *

The works of Edward Carpenter on the marriage and sex questions, already noticed in these columns, have been translated into German, and are published by Max Spohr in Leipsic. They are Die Geschlechtsliebe, Die Homogene Liebe, Das Weib, and Die Ehe in der freier Gesellschaft.

* * *

The Monist for October opens with a paper on "The Darwinism of Darwin and the Post-Darwinian Schools." A more satisfactory article follows, on "Science and Faith," by Dr. Paul Topinard, the French anthropologist, who goes in thoroughly for evolution. Professor C. Lloyd-Morgan writes on "Naturalism," a reply to Mr. Balfour; Dr. Woods Hutchinson writes of Darwinism as "The Fifth Gospel"; Professor Lombroso treats of "Criminal Anthropology Applied to Pedagogy"; and G. Ferrero writes on "Arrested Mentation." Altogether this number of the Monist is a capital one.

* * *

Dr. F. H. Chase, of Cambridge, has put out a small book on the Syro-Latin Texts of the Gospels, in which he shows there is a remarkable coincidence of expressions and passages between the old Syrian and the Latin versions of the Gospels. The orthodox assume that the route was from Antioch to Rome; but it is just possible that it was the other way, and that, as the seat of empire went from Rome eastwards to Constantinople, so the Gospels may have travelled the same route.

* * *

D. Appleton & Co., New York, give in their list an account of a new book by Dr. Hoffman, of the Bureau of American Ethnology, on The Beginnings of Writing. Dr. Hoffman traces the steps in the development of writing from reminders, tied strings, notched sticks, and wampum belts, through picture writing to phonetic writing with an alphabet. He shows that the American Indians developed complicated systems of pictography; and some peoples of Mexico and Central America were passing from the use of ideograms to phonograms. The book is likely to prove an interesting supplement to Colonel Mallery's work on gesture language, and one equally important for the understanding of the evolution of mankind in the past.

* * *

La Légende du Messie, by Victor du Breuil, is a work announced by the French Freethought Federation, 7 Rue des Ecouffes, Paris. If a copy is sent for review, we shall be happy to notice it in these columns.

* * *

Mr. Augustus Henry Beesly has published a volume of Ballads and Other Verse (Longmans). One is entitled "An Agnostic's Apology." It ends thus:—

> Be that lot mine
> To know, save in the human, no divine;
> To hope, but not to pilot life by hope,
> And all man's future country past man's scope,
> As this world's liege to do to-day's work well,
> Unlured by heaven, undriven by dread of hell.

* * *

No. 18 of the Humanitarian League publications is The Dog: His Rights and Wrongs, by Edith Carington. The authoress writes in a plain, simple style, with good sense and good feeling. As we think quite unnecessarily, she starts with the assumption that dog and man have been made "by the same hand." The natural affinities which she brings out are equally facts, whatever view we take of their origin. Nor does it follow that dogs would be better treated, as we join with her in wishing they may be, if credited with souls. Belief that their fellow men were endowed with souls has not prevented men from torturing others, but rather led to additional torture of bodies for the sake of saving souls. It is equally true that kindness educes the best qualities in a dog or a man, whether we credit them with souls or not. Apart from these little differences, the publication is in every way a commendable one. It is remarkably cheap, for it gives sixty pages with eighteen illustrations for twopence. It should have a large circulation.

* * *

Diderot still excites interest in the world of thought, and we notice that the eminent firm of Felix Alcan advertise a new work on the life, works, and correspondence of this philosopher, written by A. Collignon.

* * *

In Kaffir Stories, an interesting little book, by Charles Scully, a good, and it is said true, tale is told of how a little chemistry averted war with Sololo, the chief of the Kwesa clan of Pondos, who refused to give up a murderer to the Government. By the aid of lycopodium powder, a piece of potassium, and a few "serpents' eggs," Teddy Morton gave the chief such an exhibition of parlor magic as to frighten him out of his wits and convince him that the gods were on the side of the white man.

China's Conversion.

There are 1,511 Protestant missionaries laboring in the Empire, and, estimating their results from the statistics of previous years as published in the Chinese Recorder, we find that they gathered last year (1893) into the fold 3,127 Chinese—not all of whom, it is feared, are genuine Christians—at a cost of £350,000, a sum equal to the combined incomes of the ten chief London hospitals.—Dr. G. E. Morrison, "An Australia in China," p. 5.

Hankow itself swarms with missionaries, "who are unhappily divided into so many sects that even a foreigner is bewildered by their number, let alone the heathen to whom they are accredited" (Medhurst). The Chinese "Rice Christians," those spurious Christians who become converted in return for being provided with rice, are just those who profit by these differences of opinion, and who, with timely lapses from grace, are said to succeed in being converted in turn by all the missions, from the Augustins to the Quakers.—Ibid, p. 6.

God and the Devil.

In the Christian system the Devil is a personage of the greatest importance. God is described as absolutely good, wise, and powerful; and unless he were counterbalanced by the Devil, it would be impossible to see where the innumerable and measureless evils, which predominate in the world, come from, if there were no Devil to account for them. And since the Rationalists have done away with the Devil, the damage on the other side has gone on growing, and is becoming more and more palpable, as might have been foreseen, and was foreseen, by the orthodox. The fact is, you cannot take away one pillar from a building without endangering it.—Schopenhauer.

PROFANE JOKES.

"I suppose you say your prayers, my little man?" "Yes, sir." "Does your father say his?" "He doesn't have to; his father's dead."

Sunday-school Teacher—"You knew your lesson perfectly this time, Tommy." Tommy—"Yes'm. Pa said he'd let me go fishing this afternoon if I didn't miss any of it."

"The Lord hath need of him" is the inscription on a gravestone in a Surrey churchyard. The passage in St. Mark unfortunately refers to the ass used to ride into Jerusalem.

Young Chip—"It will be eternal morning in heaven, won't it, pop?" Old Block—"The Bible says it will, my son." Young Chip—"Then what will you do about your afternoon snooze?"

A preacher asked a university don what he thought of his sermon. "I was disgusted. I heard in it what I hope never again to hear in a sermon." "Indeed! why, what was that?" "I heard—the clock strike twice."

University of Chicago Professor (lecturing): "Now, Arsinius was sent as a legate to Rome. He was an exceedingly wicked man, and was later excommunicated. On dying, soon after, he went (according to all belief) to hell. We shall see more of him hereafter."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

Foresters' Hall (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, G. W. Foote, "The Holy Ghost."

Balls Pond Secular Hall (36 Newington Green-road): 8.30, opening night; chairman, R. Forder.

Battersea Secular Hall (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, E. Penny, "The Struggle for Existence." Tuesday, at 8, dancing.

Camberwell (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road,): 5.30, tea and social. Friday, at 8, free science classes.

Penton Hall (61 Pentonville-road): 7, Joachim Kaspary, "Theology."

West London Ethical Society (Princes' Hall, Piccadilly): 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "Genius and Morality."

West Ham Secular Ethical Society (61 West Ham-lane): 7, W. Scott, "Matthew Arnold as Teacher."

Wood Green (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, Touzeau Parris, "Some Bible Symbols, their Origin and Meaning."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

Battersea Park Gates: 11.30, F. Haslam, "Bible Beauties."

Camberwell (Station-road): 11.30, a lecture.

Deptford Broadway: 6.30, C. James, "What Christianity has Done for Man." Thursday, at 8, C. James, "The Service of Man."

Finsbury Park (near the band-stand): 11.30, Lucretius Keen, "Has Man a Soul?"

Hammersmith Bridge (Middlesex side): 7, Arthur B. Moss will lecture.

Hyde Park (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30, A. B. Moss will lecture.

Kingsland (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, Stanley Jones, "Man, Ancient and Modern."

Wood Green (Jolly Butchers' Hill): 11.30, a lecture.

COUNTRY.

Birmingham (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, W. H. Whitney, "An Hour with Ingersoll"; 7, "An Impeachment of Christianity."

Bolton (Borough Chambers, Rashton-street): 6.30 J. Shufflebottom, "A Few Suggestions how to Improve the Position of the Bolton Secular Society."

Bradford (Temperance Hall, Leeds-road): 8, John M. Robertson, "The Rational Treatment of Criminals"; Oddfellows' Hall, at 7, "The Population Question."

Bristol (Shepherds' Hall, Old Market-street): 7, "The Re-union of Christendom, from a Secularistic Standpoint," by "Cognito."

Glasgow (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 11, Charles Watts, "The Revolution of Modern Thought"; 2.30, "The Bible and Dramatic Literature"; 6.30, "Christian Evidence: A Theological Fallacy."

Halifax (Mechanics' Hall): Monday, at 7.30, John M. Robertson, "The Future of Liberalism."

Leicester Secular Hall (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, musical and literary evening.

Liverpool (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, Tontine Society; 7, Mr. Hammond, "Our Earth's Place in the Universe."

Manchester Secular Hall (Rochdale-road, All Saints): 6.30, W. Simpson, "Which Way?—Voluntary Co-operation v. Compulsory Collectivism."

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, C. Cohen, "Charles Darwin"; 3, "The Holy Bible"; 7, "Scepticism: its Meaning and its Value."

Sheffield Secular Society (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 3, Ernest Evans, "Four Scientific Men who have Modified the Thought of Europe—Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and Pasteur"; 7, "Water, its Properties and Uses."

South Shields (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, W. Cook, "A Chapter from Spencer."

Stockton-on-Tees (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, important business meeting.

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. Cohen, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—October 20, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 23 and 24, Chester-le-Street; 27, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 28 and 29, Stockton-on-Tees; 31, Blackburn. November 1, Blackburn; 3, Sheffield; 4, 5, and 6, Barnsley; 10, Foresters' Hall, London; 17 and 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

Stanley Jones, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London—October 20 and 27, Kingsland.

Arthur B. Moss, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—October 20 m. and a. Hyde Park, e. Hammersmith.

Touzeau Parris, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—October 20, Wood Green; 27, Foresters' Hall. November 3, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

ADVERTISER, age 38, wants a Situation as Porter or Watchman. Good references. J. S., 36 Cross-street, West Ham-lane, Stratford, E.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

Some Mistakes of Moses. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 132 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

Defence of Freethought. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

The Gods. 6d.

Reply to Gladstone. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

Rome or Reason? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

Crimes against Criminals. 3d.

Oration on Walt Whitman. 3d.

Oration on Voltaire. 3d.

Abraham Lincoln. 3d.

Paine the Pioneer. 2d.

Humanity's Debt to Thomas Paine. 2d.

Ernest Renan and Jesus Christ. 2d.

True Religion. 2d.

The Three Philanthropists. 2d.

Love the Redeemer. 2d.

Is Suicide a Sin? 2d.

Last Words on Suicide. 2d.

God and the State. 2d.

Why am I an Agnostic? Part I. 2d.

Why am I an Agnostic? Part II. 2d.

Faith and Fact. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

God and Man. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

The Dying Creed. 2d.

The Limits of Toleration. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

The Household of Faith. 2d.

Art and Morality. 2d.

Do I Blaspheme? 2d.

The Clergy and Common Sense. 2d.

Social Salvation. 2d.

Marriage and Divorce. An Agnostic's View. 2d.

Skulls. 2d.

The Great Mistake. 1d.

Live Topics. 1d.

Myth and Miracle. 1d.

Real Blasphemy. 1d.

Repairing the Idols. 1d.

Christ and Miracles. 1d.

Creeds & Spirituality. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

MASONIC HALL, HIGH STREET, WOOD GREEN, N.

(Adjoining Nightingale Hotel.)

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY, WOOD GREEN BRANCH.

A COURSE OF LECTURES

Under the auspices of the above, to be delivered on the following dates at 7.30 p.m.:—

Sunday, October 20—Mr. TOUZEAU PARRIS, "Some Bible Symbols, their Origin and Meaning."

Sunday, October 27—Mr. R. FORDER, "Who is the Devil? What is the Devil? and Where is the Devil?"

Admission by Ticket Only. To be obtained of John Wood, Secretary, 71 Gladstone-avenue, Wood Green.

Tickets, 6d. Reserved Seats, 1s.

CAMBERWELL BRANCH OF THE N.S.S.,

61 New Church-road, Camberwell, S.E.

A DRAMATIC PERFORMANCE

(in aid of the Lecture Fund)

Will be given in the above hall on Wednesday, Nov. 13, at 8 p.m.

The program will include Dramatic Readings by Mr. G. W. Foote, Mr. Charles Watts, and other Prominent Members of the Society.

Tickets, 6d. and 1s., to be obtained from Mr. Forder or Miss Vance, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C., and all Branch Secretaries.

Price Twopence,

"A Letter to Lord Ellenborough"

Occasioned by the Sentence which he Passed on

MR. D. I. EATON,

As Publisher of

THE THIRD PART OF PAINE'S "AGE OF REASON."

By

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice to the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumours and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 6d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 3s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. FULLER, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendell" being speciously and possibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

NOW READY. ORDER AT ONCE.

Price 6d., by post 7½d.,

The Agnostic Annual for 1896.

Balfour's "Foundations of Belief": An Agnostic Rejoinder. By S. Laing.
Agnosticism and its Equivalents. By Amos Waters.
The Man, Christ Jesus: The Germ of the Christian Myth. By J. Allanson Picton.
Psyche: A Poem. By W. Stewart Ross (Saladin).
Mind as Controlled by Matter. By Constance E. Plumptre.
The Faiths of Our Forefathers. By Charles Watts.
An Agnostic View of Theism and Monism. By R. Bithell, B.Sc., Ph.D.
The Old Testament Library. By F. J. Gould.
Immortality. By W. A. Leonard.
The Physiological Bias of Religious Leaders. By Furneaux Jordan, F.R.C.S.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

NOW READY, CHEAP EDITION OF

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A RECORD OF HIS LIFE AND WORK.

By his Daughter, HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. With an Account of his Parliamentary Struggle, his Politics, and his Teachings, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, price 7s.

A. & H. Bradlaugh Bonner, 1 and 2 Took's-court, Cursitor-street, E.C.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Lessons Piety	Christianity & Slavery	Down Among the Dead Men
The Jewish Sabbath	Christ Up to Date	Smirching a Hero
God's Day	Secularism and Christianity	Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Professor Stokes on Immortality	Altar and Throne	Jehovah the Ripper
Paul Bert	Martin Luther	The Parson's Living Wage
Converting a Corpse	The Praise of Folly	Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Bradlaugh's Ghost	A Lost Soul	Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Christ and Brotherhood	Happy in Hell	Save the Bible!
The Sons of God	The Act of God	Forgive and Forget
Melchizedek	Keir Hardie on Christ	The Star of Bethlehem
Infidel Homes	Blessed be ye Poor	The Great Ghost
Are Atheists Cruel?	Converted Infidels	Atheism and the French Revolution
Are Atheists Wicked?	Mrs. Booth's Ghost	Pigottism
Rain Doctors	Talmage on the Bible	Jesus at the Derby
Pious Pustilities	Mrs. Besant on Death and After	Atheist Murderers
"Thus Saith the Lord"	The Poets and Liberal Theology	A Religion for Eunuchs
Believe or be Damned	Christianity and Labor	Rose-Water Religion
Christian Charity	Dueling
Religion and Money	An Easter Egg for Christians
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Just published, price 1d., by post 1½d.,

DISCREDITABLE TACTICS OF CHRISTIAN DISPUTANTS.

BY CHARLES WATTS.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

Price 3d., by post 2½d.,

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE.

BY

DAVID HUME.

With an Historical and Critical Introduction by

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A Record of his Life and Work, by his daughter, Hypatia Bradlaugh-Bonner.

TWENTY-ONE-SHILLING EDITION. CONTAINING TEN PORTRAITS.

One copy of the above will be presented to each of the Six Persons (not agents) sending us the largest amounts for Lot 11 and Bruno Cloth between October 20 and December 31, 1895, if the amounts exceed £5 from each person.

TWO OF THE CHEAPEST LINES ON EARTH

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the United Kingdom.

Lot 11
1 Pair All-Wool Blankets
1 Pair of Sheets
1 Quilt
1 Table-cloth
21s. Carriage Paid.

BRUNO CLOTH The most lasting and Fashionable Material for Ladies' Winter Dresses. In all the Plain Colors. 1/9 per yd. 50 in. wide.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 43. SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE BLACK ARMY.

AFTER my lecture at Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening a young gentleman rose to offer some opposition. While not wearing clerical attire, he had a very decided clerical accent, and I concluded that he had caught the twang in addressing Sunday-school children or in debating at Young Men's Christian Associations. Perhaps he has aspirations to the ministry, for one of his objections to my lecture was urged with much feeling. I had said that the ministers of all denominations were, for the most part, actuated by commonplace motives; that they went into pulpits as others go into law, or physic, or the army—for a living; and that their being called by the Holy Ghost was only the cant of their profession. My critic declared that I was wrong. He asserted that hundreds of them, perhaps thousands, entered their Churches, and engaged in the service of Christ, for purely disinterested reasons; that their great object was to save souls and fill heaven; that many of them were very poor, the average income of curates, for instance, being only £120 a year; and that some of them went abroad as missionaries to convert the heathen, facing all sorts of hardships, and carrying their lives in their hands. I cannot say that my critic put his case so tersely, but this is the substance of his objection; and I think it well to give an answer, once for all, to what I dare say is a very common argument.

Now at the outset I wish to make my own position clear, and to guard against misunderstanding. In the first place, I have nothing to do at present with the truth or falsity of Christianity; yet, at the same time, I am entitled to expect of its ministers a decent conformity to its teachings. In the next place, I do not assert that there are no ministers or missionaries who are earnest and sincere. Some of them, I have no doubt, would preach Christianity if it were poor, despised, and oppressed. These are men of principle and conviction; men with a passion for their calling; men who really believe that they are under God's orders to exhort and reprove a fallen, sinful world, and to point out the only way of eternal salvation. There are also some lawyers with a passion for law, some doctors with a passion for medicine, and some soldiers with a passion for military affairs; as I dare say there are men with a passion for almost every one of what are called the "humblest" employments. But these are the exceptions, and may be eliminated from a general survey. When we talk of any profession, as such, we have to go by the average; and I say that the average minister, like the average lawyer, doctor, soldier, tinker, tailor, or ploughman, is simply earning a subsistence for himself and his family; in short, that he preaches for a living. Simply this and nothing more.

Let us look at the number of these clerical gentlemen. There are some fifty thousand of them in England alone. Will any man in his senses affirm that the law of averages does not apply to this huge Black Army? Are they all heroes and enthusiasts? The very idea is an absurdity. Try them by any other test, and what is the result? They are average in stature, average in shape, average in looks, average in strength, average in intelligence. Why then, even on the most favorable estimate, should they not be average in character? Has not the Catholic Church always recognised this fact, and made its priests sink their little individualities in the greatness and splendor of the Church? Has it not found a compensation for the pettiness of its myriad agents in the magnificence of its organisation? Are not all its orders, wheel within wheel, from the Pope down to the poor bog-trotting Irish priest, a practical recognition of the hard truth that the men of God, like the masses of other men, are actuated by the fundamental motives of human nature?

Look next at the unfailing supply of these clerical gentlemen. Exceptional motives are liable to fluctuation, and are therefore unaccountable. Any one of twenty men who saw a sovereign lying at his feet would pick it up, but it would be hard to tell which of them would risk his life to save a fellow being's. The British army is filled by enlistment, and well filled, because poverty and misadventure drive thousands into taking "the Queen's shilling." But how full would it be if it depended upon the accession of men who yearn to fight and die for their country, turning from all other attractions to follow that stern ideal? And how full would the Black Army be if it were not recruited like the Red Army, under the forceful pressure of the necessities of existence? Year by year every vacancy is filled, and a waiting crowd is clamoring for admission. The supply always equals the demand, and goes beyond it, as it does in every other trade and profession. This phenomenon can only be explained by the ordinary laws of human action. Were the Churches manned by persons of exceptional—that is, incalculable—motive and character, there would be variations in the supply. Sometimes there would be a lull, and sometimes a feverish activity. But nothing of this sort ever occurs; the supply of ministers is as regular as the supply of carpenters or tailors, and must be subject to laws of the same generality.

This is quite consistent with the fact that aptitude, as well as accident, plays a part in determining a minister's career; but it also operates in the case of other professions, without implying any ethical consideration. A young man at one of the universities may have a taste for theology, as another has a taste for science or art or history or poetry. He may have a bent for public speaking, without the active, enterprising character which is requisite for successful oratory in politics; he may be fond of the social attentions which are paid to clergymen, especially by the female members of their congregations; or his temperament may be suited to the comparatively easy, unharassed life which is led by the general run of Christian ministers, who go to bed when they like, rise when they like, and adapt their duties to their convenience.

We will now consider the financial aspect of the question. It may be true that the average income of Church of England curates is only £120 a year. But before I recognise any hardship in this, I must be assured that they would earn more (I mean on the average) in the general labor market. I am not at all satisfied that the ordinary curate is gifted with more brains than the ordinary skilled artisan. He may talk better English, but that is an accident, and we all know that great nonsense may be couched in very elegant language. Being able to speak grammatically is no criterion of a man's ability to do anything serviceable to his fellow men, for which he may reasonably expect a fair remuneration. One's own experience, of course, is not everything; but I have met both curates and artisans, and I cannot say that the former showed any distinct superiority over the latter. Perhaps I shall be told that their superiority is ethical and spiritual; to which I reply that I am not discussing their character, but their capacity.

It must also be remembered that income is not the sole factor in determining employments; or we should not see so many clerks keeping up a respectable appearance on meagre salaries, while they might earn more in a rougher or more active occupation. A minister's life has certain advantages of personal comfort and social respectability. Nor is this all. His position is not precarious; he is not affected by commercial disasters and aberrations; his income is generally as certain, and as regular, as the succession of the seasons.

Digitized by Google

There is also the prospect to be considered. A curate's position is humble, and his income is "sadly limited," but a long vista of possibilities is before him—temporal as well as spiritual. He may become a vicar, a rector, a dean, an archdeacon, a canon, a bishop, even an archbishop. Who knows? Every one of Napoleon's soldiers fought with "a marshal's baton in his knapsack." Few of them could become marshals, but there was at least the chance, and the hope lured them to a hundred battlefields. And is not the "poor curate" under a similar inspiration? He also may climb the ladder of preferment, at the top of which shines resplendent, in the sunlight of glory, the golden prize of the great Archbishopric. G. W. FOOTE.

(To be concluded.)

HALLOWEEN.

THE importance of rites and customs in elucidating the beliefs of the past, thanks to the labors of anthropologists like E. B. Tylor, W. R. Smith, and J. G. Frazer, is beginning to receive recognition. The great nature festivals of Easter and Christmas remain, and their customs, though modified, sufficiently betray their origin. But those connected with All Hallowtide are rapidly dying out in Protestant countries, and will soon be known mainly by the West of Scotland customs celebrated in the poem of Burns. Yet the festival of All Souls has a distinct place in the history of the evolution of religious faith. Early man is much troubled with his ghost belief. Ghosts and gods—they are one and the same—are a confounded nuisance by their interference in human affairs, and very much of early religion consists of attempts, by sacrifices and spells, to cajole, propitiate, and cheat the ghosts or gods, and prevent them troubling their worshippers. Artful medicine men and priests contrived to get many of these spirits, saints, and gods adored with regular offerings, and with special days devoted to their service.

The month was known before the year, and it was an advance on the nightly worry of ghostly dreams, when the spirits of the dead were supposed to reside in the moon, and the new moon was celebrated with a festival. It was a still further advance when this festival in honor of the common ruck of ghosts, the poor wandering spirits who had no special day assigned them, became annual. The Eastern nations still set apart a day for the worship of ancestors. With the Coreans it is the 15th of the first month. But a general time was that of offering the first fruits of the harvest, which ceremony is called in many places "Feeding the Dead." The offering, instead of being daily, became annual at the harvest season. In Northern nations it was towards the end of October when the corn was gathered, beer was brewed, and the long, dark nights were coming. That was the time for the spirits to have their outing, and for the living to hope to pass over the winter well by propitiating the spirits. In Tooke's Russia (vol. i., p. 48) is an account of All Hallows among the Finns, which feast almost drives them out of their wits.

Dorman, in his Origin of Primitive Superstitions (p. 35), mentions that "Many of the savages of South America have a subterranean spirit-world, where the pursuits are the same as in life. The Zuñis had removed their spirit-world to a comfortable distance, where they would not be troubled with them daily; but they annually assembled on the top of a lofty mesa, and spent the entire day in communication with the spirits of the departed, who were supposed on that day to revisit that locality and hold converse with their friends and relatives, who carried them presents." This superstition, he says, is very similar to the custom of Roman Catholics on All-Souls Day. The Catholic custom of grave decorating on All Saints is one of the most deep-seated, and in Eastern Europe it is customary to light lamps and lanterns at the graves, to let the spirits see their way about. In Japan, also, on the day of the dead they light the tombs with colored lanterns and place on them food for the spirits. Next morning little vessels are sent out to sea, also provided with food, that the spirits may migrate to another clime. This giving of one day to the dead has something poetical, pathetic, and attractive about it; and the feast of All Saints is retained by Auguste Comte in the Positivist Calendar. With our Pagan ancestors the day of spirits was connected with the break-up of the season of fruitage and the coming of winter and desolation.

Flammarion says, in his Astronomical Myths, that the night of November 1 was to the Druids one full of mystery, in which they annually celebrated the reconstruction of the world. On this day the Druidess nuns had to pull down and rebuild the roof of their temple, as a symbol of the destruction and renovation of the earth. If any of these nuns happened to drop any of the materials for this new roof, they were pounced upon and torn to pieces by their companions, who were seized with a fanatic transport. It was also on this night that the Druids extinguished the sacred fire, and then all other fires were put out, and a primitive night reigned throughout the land. Then the phantoms of those who had died in the preceding year passed along to the West, and were carried away by boats to the judgment seat of the god of the dead.

Offerings of the fruits of the earth used to be laid out for the spirits, but these in time came to be used chiefly in divination, for it was thought that the eve of All Souls was the special time to call spirits from the vasty deep, to divine one's fortune, and to evoke the apparition of one's future husband or wife.

Burns has so happily described the Ayrshire superstitions and customs of Halloween that to his poem the reader must be directed. We will look at a few others, mostly taken from Hazlitt's edition of Brand's Antiquities. T. Bisset, D.D., minister of Logierait, Perthshire, says: "On the evening of October 31, O.S., a remarkable ceremony is observed. Heath, broom, and dressings of flax are tied upon a pole. This faggot is then kindled. One takes it upon his shoulders, and, running, bears it round the village. A crowd attends. When the first faggot is burnt out, a second is bound to the pole and kindled in the same manner. Numbers of these blazing faggots are often carried together, and, when the night is dark, they form a splendid illumination." The minister of Callander says: "On All Saints' Even they set up bonfires in every village. When the bonfire is consumed, the ashes are carefully collected into the form of a circle. There is a stone put in near the circumference for every person of the several families interested in the bonfire, and whatever stone is moved out of its place or injured next morning the person represented by that stone is devoted, or fey, and is supposed not to live twelve months from that day." The minister of Kirkmichael, in Perthshire, says: "The practice of lighting bonfires on the first night of winter, accompanied with various ceremonies, still prevails in this and the neighboring highland parishes. Formerly the Hallow Even fire, a relic of Druidism, was kindled in Buchan. Various magic ceremonies were then celebrated to counteract the influence of witches and demons, and to prognosticate to the young their success or disappointment in the matrimonial lottery. These being devoutly finished, the Hallow fire was kindled, and guarded by the male part of the family." This became rival families or clans would attempt to scatter the fire, and thus bring disaster on their enemies. "But now the Hallow fire, when kindled, is attended by children only; and the country girl, renouncing the rites of magic, endeavors to enchant her swain by the charms of dress and of industry."

In North Wales, upon All Saints' Eve, they made a great fire called Coel Coeth, and, when the fire is almost extinguished, every one throws a white stone into the ashes, having first marked it; then, having said their prayers, turning round the fire, they go to bed. In the morning they search out the stones, and, if any is found wanting, the owner is supposed to die before another All Saints' Eve. They also distributed Soul Cakes, on receiving which poor people pray God to bless the next crop of wheat. The poor used to say: "God have your Saul, teens and all." Seed cakes at All Hallows used to be common in Warwickshire. At Ripon, on the Eve of All Saints, the good women make a cake for every one in the family. Martin tells us that at St. Kilda they baked at this time "a large cake, in the form of a triangle, furrowed round, which was to be all eaten that night."

Digitized by Google

In Owen's account of the bards we read: "The autumnal fire is still kindled in North Wales on the eve of November 1, attended by many ceremonies, such as running through the fire and smoke, each casting a stone into the fire," etc. In the Gentleman's Magazine for 1784 it is stated that at Findern, in Derbyshire, the boys and girls go every year, on the evening of November 2, to the common, and light up small fires, which they call Tindles. The burning of guys on November 5 only represents a modified survival of an ancient practice.

Martin, speaking of the Isle of Lewis, says it was long before the minister could persuade the people to relinquish a practice they had of going by night on Hallowtide to the Church of St. Mulvay, whence one of their number went into the sea up to his waist, with a cup of ale brewed for the occasion with malt contributed by the inhabitants, and, pouring the liquid into the water, invoked the sea-god Shony, who was supposed to have an influence over the crops. They then returned to church, observed a moment's dead silence; then extinguished, at a given signal, the candle on the altar, and proceeded to the fields, where the rest of the night was spent in revelry. The Rev. M. Mac Phail, in his account of the Superstitions of the Lewis (Folk Lore, p. 165; June, 1895), says the invocation there was, "Shoni, Shoni! send us plenty of sea-ware this year, and we will give thee more ale next year." H. Arnot reports, in his Criminal Trials, that in the seventeenth century a poor woman was burnt, in the south of Scotland, on a charge of "blasphemy." She was alleged to have offered a cup of ale to the Devil.

It was an old custom in England at this time for poor persons and beggars to go a souling—that is, they begged money, and offered to pray for the souls of the donors and the departed. In The Two Gentlemen of Verona Shakespeare makes Speed speak of one puling "like a beggar at Hallowmass." Special soul cakes were made for the dead, and children used to sing a carol beginning:—

> Soul! soul! for a soul-cake;
> Pray, good mistress, for a soul cake—
> One for Peter, two for Paul,
> Three for Them that made us all.

In some parts—e.g., North Staffordshire—"souling," or begging for apples on the Eve of All Souls, is still a common custom. This custom, Miss Charlotte S. Burne, authoress of Shropshire Folk-Lore, says, was suddenly checked in her parish "by a new vicar forbidding it to the National School children" (Folk-Lore, September, 1890, p. 321). The men of God are usually violently opposed to any superstition save their own. Yet the getting of apples by children under pretence of souling is venial, compared with living on the labors of others by pretending to give salvation through the blood of a dead Jew.

J. M. WHEELER.

THE BIBLE AND HUMAN PROGRESS.

THERE are certain facts deserving of attention when the relation of the Bible to human progress is being considered. These are: (1) The place where it is supposed to have originated was not remarkable for a high state of philosophy, science, or general education. Literature, culture, and knowledge of nature, which are the characteristics of the present progressive age, were comparatively unknown where it is said most of the contents of the Bible were written. Albert Barnes, in his Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity (pp. 257–8), writes: "The Bible came from a land undistinguished for literature; a land not rich in classical associations; a land not distinguished for pushing its discoveries into the regions of science. Chaldea had its observatories, and the dwellers there looked out on the stars and gave them names; Egypt had its temples where the truths of science, as well as the precepts of religion, were committed to the sacred priesthood; Greece had academic groves, but Judea had neither. To such things the attention of the nation was never turned. We have all their literature, all their science, all their knowledge of art; and all this is in the Bible. Among the ancients they were regarded as a narrow-minded, a bigoted, a superstitious people." Now, here was an entire absence of the principal elements that have aided modern progress.

(2) The alleged period when the Bible was written was one of moral and mental darkness. The grandeur of Rome had subsided, the glories of Greece had departed, philosophy was at a discount, and the facts of science were unknown. Further, ethics were in their infancy, the government of the universe was misunderstood, and the true nature of man had not then been comprehended. The result is, that the teachings of the Bible are thoroughly unscientific, its philosophy is misleading, and, as John Stuart Mill has shown in his work, On Liberty, its morality is incomplete and defective. Moreover, Bible statements as to the origin of all things, the development of the human race, the manifestation of phenomena, the self power of man, and the value of intellectual acquirements, are all the very opposite to the lessons derived from a progressive and an enlightened age.

(3) The factors necessary to human progress existed before the Bible was known, and are now to be found in sections of the community where Biblical teachings are not accepted as an authority in mundane affairs. Greece, without the aid of the Bible, had reached a high state of culture, of intellectual sublimity, and of moral excellence. It is to the Greeks that historians trace the beginnings of our intellectual civilisation. As Max Müller observes: "Like their own goddess, Athenæ, the people of Athens seem to spring full-armed into the arena of history, and we look in vain to Egypt, Syria, and India for more than a few seeds that burst into such marvellous growth on the soil of Attica" (Science of Language). "To the Greeks," says the present Bishop of London, "we owe the corrective which conscience needs to borrow from nature." The same Christian writer admits that "it is in the history of Rome rather than in the Bible that we find our models of precepts of political duty, and especially of the duty of patriotism." With such facts as these given by Bible believers, how futile it is to contend that to its teachings we are indebted for the progress of the world.

(4) Professor Huxley, after showing that modern progress is the result of a knowledge and application of physical science, says: "She is teaching the world that the ultimate court of appeal is observation and experience, and not authority." The Bible, however, teaches the very opposite, for it rests upon authority, not upon observation and experience. Many of its teachings are certainly contrary to what we learn from the observed facts of nature and the lessons of experience. From these sources we find that the progress of the world has been an evolutionary process, and that things change for the better with increased experience and facilities. But the Bible alleges that at the "beginning" all things were perfect, and that God pronounced them to be "very good," although they proved to be far from good if the Bible theory be true. Now, we have no lack of evidence to show that the history of man has been one of progression, not retrogression.

The Bible teaches that the operations of nature depend upon the capricious will of God. If his children obeyed him and walked in his statutes, they were to have rain in "due season," and grass in their fields for their cattle; but if they did not hearken unto him he would "shut up the heaven that there be no rain," he would appoint terror over them and subject them to "consumption and the burning ague," and they were to eat the flesh of their sons and daughters (Lev. xxvi.; Deut. xi.; Psalm lxxviii.). There are no elements in these barbarous narratives that would tend to the progress of humanity. Besides, if it were once sincerely believed that the operations of nature were interfered with in consequence of belief or disbelief in theological figments, there would be no reliance upon the stability of natural law, and cause and effect would have no meaning. The belief in this very law has formed the basis of all progress; it is the fulcrum on which the lever rests that has caused the advancement from the ignorance of the past to the enlightenment of the present. This natural law is not recognised in the Bible, and therefore so far its teachings are not favorable to the progress of society. Men of science no longer inculcate the delusion that this world is governed by a supernatural will in opposition to the doctrine of fixed natural laws.

Progress cannot be secured, to any great extent, if the acquirement of knowledge is retarded; but the tendency of Bible teachings is to do this, and its believers have done their best to limit knowledge to the Bible and to writings which favored its inculcations. They have manifested a dread of secular instruction, and even God is reported as becoming alarmed at his first children knowing too much (Genesis iii. 22). Paul writes: "But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant" (Cor. xiv. 38). He also says: "But God hath chosen the foolish things of this world to confound the wise" (1 Cor. i. 27), which was a very foolish thing to do; and in the same chapter (verse 19) we read: "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent"—a poor encouragement, surely, for obtaining wisdom. The following command, said to be from God, is certainly not conducive to the spread of knowledge: "And he said, Go, and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes, lest they see with their eyes and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed. Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered: Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate" (Isaiah vi. 9, 10, 11).

Digitized by Google

Progressive ideas arise from mental activity, unfettered by fear and undismayed by the dread of penalties that might be inflicted for arriving at any other conclusion than a certain specified one. The tendency of Bible teaching is to inspire the mind with terror, which often prevents intellectual freedom. For instance, many portions of the book inculcate the notion that those persons shall be "put to death" who "hath spoken to turn you away from the Lord your God;" while, if even a mother, wife, or daughter seek to induce a man to serve other than the Jewish God, the Bible exclaims: "Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely kill him" (Deut. xiii. and xvii.). The same spirit of dread and restriction is taught in 2 Thessalonians (i. 7–9). It is also stated that all things are done at the command of this God. As the prophet says, "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?" (Amos iii. 7); "I form the light and create darkness, I make peace and create evil; I, the Lord, do all these things" (Isaiah xlv. 7). Such teaching, if sincerely believed, must make the intellect stagnant, man a helpless creature, and therefore progress impossible. To teach that human affairs are regulated by this supernatural being, and that they are dependent upon his vacillating will, is to promulgate the delusion that in the operations of nature there is no certainty.

The fact is, the candid and impartial mind arrives inductively and deductively at the conclusion that the advancement of useful knowledge, and its application for the removal of physical and mental evils, have been in proportionate ratio to the cessation of belief in Bible teachings. Less and less are men heeding the commands of revenge given in the Old Testament, or those of non-resistance found in the New. No practical attention is paid to Christ's supposed Sermon on the Mount; to his doctrine of prayer; to his utter disregard of this world, or to his assigned cause of physical diseases. Belief in the power of secular knowledge, and reliance upon the facts of science, have taken the place of the confidence which was once felt in the inculcations of the Bible; and the result is that we are at the present time progressing to a higher state of civilisation than has ever existed at any period during the Christian era. CHARLES WATTS.

HENRY GEORGE ON RELIGION AND THE STATE.

LIKE other political economists of the new school, Mr. Henry George has been guilty in his time of promulgating serious doctrinal errors, which, being fundamental in their nature, have largely prevented a fuller recognition of the truths he has assisted in disseminating. It seems inevitable that all original and great thinkers, though masters of the special subjects with which they deal, are unable to appreciate the essential features of other matters of no less vital importance for the public welfare. Henry George, however, has made amends for some of his superficialities by his outspoken advocacy of certain principles which many of the petted leaders of democracy to-day fight shy of, and will not have discussed except on narrow premises of their own. He has fearlessly combatted the popular notion that it is the duty of the State to concern itself with questions of faith; that one of the functions of government is the provision of theological instruction; and that the association of religion with authority is necessary for the well-being and morality of a community. In his volume on Social Problems Mr. George devotes a chapter to "The Functions of Government," under which heading he writes plainly and forcibly of the proper relations of the State, religion, and morality. This is one of his passages: "It is not the business of government to make men virtuous or religious, or to preserve the fool from the consequences of his folly. Government should be repressive no further than is necessary to secure liberty by protecting the equal rights of each from aggression on the part of others, and the moment governmental prohibitions extend beyond these lines they are in danger of defeating the very ends they were intended to serve." These are words of wisdom, which, though uttered by Secularists in many forms times out of number, are of special significance coming from the pen of an acknowledged Christian, whose desire is to reform the world, not only in the interests of man, but for the glory of God, who has, seemingly, so signally failed in his creative works and social arrangements. There are many people to-day who are being seduced by the sophistries of social saviors, and it is to these the words of warning must be taken. They must be urged to withdraw their trust from sycophantic leaders; they must be made to realise—which they are far from doing at present—that the alliance of the State and the Church is indefensible on grounds of justice and liberty, and that the interference on the part of a governing power with the private belief or unbeliefs of its subjects is a gross perversion of the rights of man.

Never was it needed so much as it is at present that the cardinal principle of religious liberty should be made known to the half-intelligent masses of electors who now wield the sceptre of legislative power. Education, so powerful in other respects, has done but little in developing healthy opinion on the proper place in society for religion, so blasting has been the effect of sectarian prejudice on minds otherwise free. The local and national business of the country being vested in representative bodies, which are now, more than ever, kept constantly in touch with the ideas of the governed, it follows that all legislative work must depend upon the bent of the popular mind. The system is one of many defects, and is open to many objections; but, so long as it exists, it is clear that no serious alteration can be made in the law until it is distinctly and definitely called for by a majority of the people. Beforetime the middle and poorer classes were not consulted as to the methods and manner of their government, the propertied and titled classes monopolising the instrument of management, during which period comparatively little concern was manifested with the enactments of controlling bodies only so far as the administration of existing laws, and the making of new, affected public safety and comfort. Protest by small communities in the State was practically useless; there were no means of voicing their grievances or giving effect to their desires. But now the Government is not an oligarchy. The giant growth of democracy has equalised men of all grades of society in respect of electoral power; the ploughman and the squire, the sweep and the lord, and the artisan and the capitalist sit on the same bench to order the destinies of the nation. Such authority, such power, such opportunity in the hands of the working classes have never been fully and freely utilised. It is said that when the American slaves were set at liberty many of them failed to realise their position; they were ignorant what to do, and sought to be taken back into bondage again. The attitude of the British working man since the gift of the franchise has been somewhat similar. Lethargic, ignorant, indifferent, prejudiced, and full of the spirit of servility, he has practically rejected the offer of his salvation, and spurned the means of exodus from the land of his oppression. Politicians may argue to the contrary, but it is almost indisputable that a large proportion of the electorate care little, and know less, of the many questions on which they vote. Hence it is that many monopolies, abuses, and privileges have not been removed, though the changed foundations on which the constitution rests would have led one to suppose that many peaceful revolutions would have long ere now been accomplished.

Digitized by Google

In respect of the question of the establishment of State Churches, and, bound up with that, the relations of the individual to religion and government, it is sad to confess the non-existence of much sound opinion in the public mind. True, there has been for some years past a vague kind of agitation for the disestablishment of the Church in Wales, carried on by the Nonconformist section of one of the political parties; and certain bold ones among their number have gone so far as to suggest a similar process for the State Church in England; but it is pretty plain that mere sectarian interests only have dictated such action. We do not know if it be disputed, but it is tolerably safe to assume that, were the opportunity presented any one of the dissenting bodies of instating itself in the position of the Established Church with its endowments and emoluments, it would not refuse the privilege, and continue to stand by the principle of non-governmental recognition of religion. The Nonconformist attitude on this question is solely prompted by motives of self-interest and jealousy. The Free Churches, enjoying the pecuniary and social advantages enjoyed by the Establishment, and perceiving no chance of grasping the perquisites of ascendency, adopt the only course open for them—that of championing the principle of self-supporting Churches free from State alliance, the advocacy of which admits the assertion of the blessings of their own unfettered position with the boastful exhibition of their liberty. Their policy is choicely indicated in the lines:—

> Well, while I am a beggar I will rail,
> And say, There is no sin but to be rich;
> And, being rich, my virtue then shall be
> To say, There is no vice but beggary.

Only they full well know that the latter possibility will never be realised.

Among the teachers and preachers of democracy, also, there are few who handle the question of the relation of government with private beliefs on its broadest merits. One or two could be mentioned, we believe, who recognise the injustice of State recognition of a creed in a country whose inhabitants are attached to numberless beliefs and some to none at all, and they have sometimes given articulate expression to their ideas in a more or less explicit kind of way. Public men, however, fear to jeopardise their reputations, for which they care far more than any cause they advocate; and, knowing that no section of the public is so intolerant and prejudiced as the religious class, they are exceedingly careful to refrain from wounding their susceptibilities. On the question of religious equality they are especially diligent in refraining from dealing with its fundamentals, contenting themselves with siding with half-hearted believers in the principle, whose only desire is to remove their own shackles, no matter how heavily similar impediments may press on other people. In the passage quoted above Henry George has spoken out fearlessly, and, though the words may have often been noticed before, it is not without benefit to emphasise his ideas on the subject, in view of the ominous silence of other writers. He indicates his knowledge of the essentials of liberty when he points out that governments become coercive and tyrannical when they infringe on the personal concerns of their subjects. It is not the business of government to make people religious, or to provide them with the means of ministering to their "spiritual needs." The propagation of creeds should be assisted only by their devotees, and not by grants from the national exchequer. Besides the immorality of robbing one man to pay for another man's priest, there is the danger that in the establishment of a religious system with vast powers and influences there may be created a movement in society subversive to the interests and safety of the constitution. A large priesthood, an extensive monopoly, a great organisation with civil powers and privileges, are liable to undermine the healthy life of a country, and sap a nation of her vigor. The records of history show what a disintegrating force is organised religion; it is, therefore, the duty of the State to guard against the recurrence of similar dangers. Henry George recognised the evil consequences of governmental patronage of sectarian creeds, and urged that "it is not the business of government to interfere with the views which anyone may hold of the Creator, or with the worship he may choose to pay him, so long as the exercise of these individual rights does not conflict with the equal liberty of others; and the result of governmental interference in this domain has been hypocrisy, corruption, persecutions, and religious war."

F. Wilson.

INFIDEL ABOLITIONISTS.

Whether William Lloyd Garrison was an "infidel" or not, it is certain that the orthodox Christian press of America stigmatised him as one, and that some of his most prominent colleagues were unbelievers in the divine authority of the Bible, which, in any full sense, he was also. Prominent among his friends and colleagues was Henry Clarke Wright. He wrote many abolitionist works, and was also author of The Errors of the Bible Demonstrated by the Truth of Nature. He also wrote The Living Present and the Dead Past.

Another prominent friend and colleague was Parker Pillsbury, who, though he became a Congregational minister, left the Church, which he found to be the bulwark of slavery. Wendell Phillips relates that the Faculty of Andover Theological Institution threatened Pillsbury that they would never recommend him to a parish unless he gave up speaking at anti-slavery meetings. In his Acts of the Anti-Slavery Apostles Pillsbury shows that "the apostles" were everywhere met by the opposition of the Churches. Pillsbury acted as editor of the Herald of Freedom, of the National Anti-Slavery Standard, and the Revolution. He became an out-and-out Freethinker, wrote Pious Frauds, and contributed to the Boston Investigator and the Freethinkers' Magazine.

Then there was Ernestine Louise Rose, who proudly called herself an Atheist, and wrote a Defence of Atheism. This eloquent and brave woman lectured, without fee, against slavery, not only in the North, but in the Southern States. She died as she had lived, a confirmed infidel. Her friend and colleague in Abolitionism, as in the Woman's Rights movement, and in Freethought, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, still lives. Before them Frances Wright had taught the same doctrines, and The Life of W. L. Garrison, by her sons, says: "Her attempted community, Shelby, co. Tennessee, in 1825, was a notable early anti-slavery enterprise." Harriet Martineau, who also became an Atheist, was one of the best upholders of the anti-slavery cause, both in England and America. Lucy Colman is another woman who has spent most of her life in promoting Freethought, the abolition of slavery, and woman's emancipation.

The first corresponding secretary of the American Anti-Slavery Society was Elizur Wright. He edited the Abolitionist and the Commonwealth. He was a firm and uncompromising Atheist, and a contributor to the Boston Investigator, Freethinkers' Magazine, etc. He promoted the Convention which organised the American Liberal (Freethought) League. He died in 1885, and his funeral oration was delivered by Colonel Ingersoll.

C. C. Burleigh, who was twice put in jail for selling anti-slavery books on Sunday, was, with Francis Jackson, C. K. Whipple, A. K. Foster, and Garrison, among the callers of the Anti-Sabbath Convention.

Emerson, Thoreau, Theodore Parker, Gerrit Smith, and La Roy Sunderland were all men of literary standing in the ranks of the Abolitionists, and all tainted with very pronounced heresy.

GARRISON AND THE BIBLE.

In the life of William Lloyd Garrison, by his sons, Wendell Phillips and Francis Jackson Garrison (vol. iii., p. 386), is given the following as the text of a resolution moved by Garrison at the Hartford Bible Convention, June 5, 1853:—

> "Resolved: That the doctrine of the American Church and priesthood, that the Bible is the Word of God; that whatever it contains was given by Divine inspiration; and that it is the only rule of faith and practice; is self-evidently absurd, exceedingly injurious both to the intellect and soul, highly pernicious in its application, and a stumbling-block in the way of human redemption."

In the eighteenth volume of his Liberator (p. 186, 1845)

Digitized by Google

Mr. Garrison reviewed the works of Thomas Paine, which he had then read for the first time. In the course of the review he said:—

> "To say that everything contained within the lids of the Bible is divinely inspired, and to insist upon the dogma as fundamentally important, is to give utterance to a bold fiction, and to require the suspension of the reasoning faculties. To say that everything in the Bible is to be believed simply because it is found in that volume is equally absurd and pernicious.....When the various books of the Bible were written, or by whom they were written, no man living can tell. This is purely a matter of conjecture; and as conjecture is not certainty, it ceases to be authoritative.....Truth is older than any parchment, and would still exist though a universal conflagration should consume all the books in the world."

GARRISON AND "INFIDELS."

SINCE writing my article on "Some Christian Truths" (Freethinker, Oct. 13, p. 642), I have found, full confirmation of what was told me by my friend, Ernestine L. Rose, and what is affirmed in Mr. Bradlaugh's Notes on Christian Evidences—viz., that William Lloyd Garrison had to resort to an "infidel" hall to deliver his anti-slavery lectures. The facts are given in the largest and best life of the great Abolitionist, entitled William Lloyd Garrison, 1805-1879; The Story of his Life. Told by his Children. (New York: The Century Co.; 1885.) On page 211 of the first volume appears the following:—

> "During the first fortnight after his arrival in Boston, Mr. Garrison vainly endeavored to procure, without cost, a place in which to deliver his lectures, and he finally sent this advertisement to the Courier: 'Wanted, for three evenings, a Hall or Meeting-house (the latter would be preferred) in which to vindicate the rights of TWO MILLIONS of American citizens who are now groaning in servile chains in this boasted land of liberty; and also to propose just, benevolent, and constitutional measures for their relief. As the addresses will be gratuitous, and as the cause is of public benefit, I cannot consent to remunerate any society for the use of its building. If this application fails, I propose to address the citizens of Boston in the open air on the Common.—William Lloyd Garrison, No. 30 Federal-street, October 11 1830.' This appeal was quickly answered, but not by any of the Christian ministers or churches of Boston. It was left for a society of avowed 'infidels' [Note.—Under the leadership of Abner Kneeland] to save the city from the shame of sealing its doors against the slaves' advocate, and to offer him their hall for his three lectures, although, as a body and individually, they had no personal acquaintance or sympathy with him, and no especial interest in his cause."

This is final and decisive. It may be well for Freethought advocates to keep this extract beside them in view of controversy. J. M. W.

"D.V." OR "GOD WILLING."

ON pious posters, years ago,
We always used to see,
For instance: "Mr. So-and-so
Will preach to-night (D.V.)."

And even yet, a few remain,
In 'ninety-five A.D.
Apparently possessed of brain,
Who use the sign "D.V."

These praying folk think God decides
Each hour, what things shall be,
And yet they count upon the tides
Without the sign "D.V."

They know the moon enough to know
It ne'er skylarking tries,
And that the tides will ebb and flow,
"D.V." or otherwise.

All thinkers know—if Christians don't—
"D.V." means this, or nil—
That things that won't be, merely won't;
And things that will be, will.

Of course, the implication is—
If God must first agree—
That all our acts are really his;
That he does all—not we.

All honest parsons must admit—
If honest ones there be—
That none can e'en a "weasand slit," Unless their "D." is "V."

If God is God, he's all in all,
And less he cannot be;
So thieves will steal, and cats will squall,
Next Tuesday week (D.V.).

But these are days of common sense,
So now we seldom see
Announcements in a future tense
Conditioned by "D.V."

The spirit of our Freethought day
Has forced the world to see
That now 'tis time to put away
The silly sign "D.V."

A few who cannot quite forsake
The pious sign "D.V."
Prefix an "O"; and thus they make
The symbol "O.D.V."

Thus godly signs and symbols fade,
With all they symbolise:
The priests' and parsons' stock-in-trade,
Which honest men despise.

And now, as Science proves her rules,
The Christian's forced to see
That faith in prayer's the faith of fools—
Amen! So let it be.

G. L. MACKENZIE.

ACID DROPS.

CHRISTIANITY is the religion of mercy—that is, to all who escape hell. It is also the religion of peace—that is, when the Christians leave off fighting. But they don't leave off frequently, or for long at a time; and the best of the joke is, that they generally bring in their religion to sanctify rapine and bloodshed. Let us take a couple of illustrations.

On Saturday last a big new English warship was launched at Chatham. It has all the latest improvements, and is thought to be the most destructive ship afloat. Its business is to send other ships to the bottom if required. But the advent of this terrible monster on the sea had to be attended with a religious ceremony. The dockyard chaplain read a portion of a psalm, and implored God's blessing on this magnificent specimen of man's malignant ingenuity.

On Sunday Te Deums were sung at Notre Dame in Paris, and at other churches in various parts of France. God Almighty was thanked for letting the French lick the Madagascese. It is difficult to see what right the French have in Madagascar at all. The island is a very long way from France, and ought to belong to its own inhabitants. However, the French think otherwise, and their priests think so too, and apparently the Lord is of the same opinion. Anyhow, he shows no indignation at being thanked for his share in the bloody business. N.B.—The last phrase is not swearing. It is a quotation from Macbeth.

The magistrates of Dundee have been severely denounced by certain ministers for licensing certain spirit vaults in Lindsay-street, said to be directly underneath a church. The proximity of the spirits above to the spirits below seems the occasion of the disturbance, but probably the church people are responsible for letting the basement for the purpose named.

Samuel Oldham Allan, of Lees-road, Oldham, was a Protestant who married a Catholic. On his death-bed she called in a priest, and he received extreme unction. This anointing from the holy one resulted in ructions. The friends quarrelled how he should be buried. There was a scuffle at the house, and the brothers forcibly removed the corpse to have it interred by a Church of England clergyman. But this person declined, having heard that the deceased died a Catholic and his widow wished him buried by a Catholic priest. A noisy crowd assembled and waited a long while, till at last a Catholic father was induced to perform the ceremony, and the women bore the bier in triumph to the grave, the widow having police protection from the cemetery to her home.

Digitized by Google

Another Church of England parson—the Rev. E. M. Phillips Treby, rector of Forrabury, Cornwall—has gone over to Rome. However, the clerical market is well stocked, and the vacancy will soon be filled.

Big salaries are not confined to the Established Church. Some of the Nonconformists make the best of this life while they are waiting for the next. "Why should men," asks the New Age, "be paid twelve hundred a year for holding out prospects of perdition to workers on twelve shillings a week?" We have asked that question ourselves, and we are glad to hear it echoed by Mr. Fletcher.

Mr. W. H. D. Rouse, in Folk-Lore, of June this year, gives "Notes from Syria," and mentions that "Women who wish for children tie a thread round a broken pillar (that which is popularly called the 'hanging pillar') in the Church of the Annunciation at Nazareth; and afterwards they wear it about their waists." It thus seems that a very primitive superstition remains in the native place of the Christian's deity.

An interesting review of Malay Sketches, by F. Swettenham, is given in the Saturday Review (October 19). It notices that witchcraft and possession by evil spirits is widely believed in by Malays, and says: "Of the origin of these spirits there is a legend, dating from a time before the teachings of Islam reached Malaya. When God purposed to make man, He took clay and fashioned it into a figure which He endowed with the spirit of life. But the spirit was too strong, and, the body being only clay, was rent into a thousand fragments, and scattered all over the world. These were the jin, hantu, and bdjang of the Malays."

"Then God made another figure, but this time he wrought iron into the clay, which made the body able to withstand the strain of the vital spark, and it became man. This legend is, no doubt, a survival of the ancient spirit worship of the Malays, as are many customs of the people which the Mohammedan priests dislike, but are often obliged to wink at for fear of unpopularity."

Christianity has never taken root in the Malay Peninsula. Mr. Swettenham tells a story of a Christian missionary who got hold of an earnest and truthful Malay, apparently a promising subject to begin upon. The missionary told him the story of the Immaculate Conception. The Malay listened to the end, showed great interest in the miraculous narrative of the Blessed Virgin; then he said: "If that had happened to my wife, I should have killed her."

The Presbyterian says that "Matthew Arnold, though not an orthodox believer in Christianity, was a great admirer of the Bible, and was the means of converting Charles Reade, the novelist, to Christianity. On one occasion he urged Mr. Reade to read the Bible through in an unprejudiced and candid spirit. The novelist did so, and was thereby led to accept the Gospel." This is a real orthodox Presbyterian whacker. Matthew Arnold rejected the supernatural element in the Bible, and Charles Reade was a believer all his days. Winwood Reade, his nephew, was a sceptic, and was never converted.

The Burgess Golf Club, Edinburgh, is agitated on the question of Sunday playing. Bailie Macpherson wants a bye-law to stop this horrid practice, but Councillor Cranston opposes the bye-law as a piece of despotism. A special meeting will be held to consider the matter. It is to be hoped that too much respect will not be paid to what is called "the feelings of the people of Scotland." For our part, we have no respect whatever for the "feelings" of people who want their own predilections to be a law to their neighbors. Both sides have "feelings," but apparently it is only those of the bigots that are to be consulted.

The German Emperor does not like to be stared at when he is communing with the King of Kings. He has issued the following extraordinary notice: "As soon as I enter church, every one is on the qui vive to look at me—a thing which annoys me extremely. I therefore desire that all shall abstain from this curiosity when I go on Sunday to hear Divine service. Those who desire to have a good view of me can do so every day when I take my walk in the Thiergarden, or drive in my carriage."

Cremations are spreading in New York, especially among the Germans, since Dr. Hartmann's scare about being buried alive. The cost of cremation is thirty-five dollars for an adult, which is less than that paid for a funeral. Indeed, it is claimed that cremation, with a handsome urn for the ashes and a niche for the urn, is altogether less costly than the price of a poor man's burial.

Mr. Diggle, ex-chairman of the London School Board, repeats that old fable about the Queen declaring that the Bible is the cause of England's greatness. Christian imagination is so active, and Christian veracity so feeble, that useful falsehoods pass current in spite of any amount of contradiction.

Henry Sherwood, an American Doctor of Divinity, is in trouble at Blackburn. He is charged with maliciously wounding a laborer, and has to give substantial bail on remand, himself in £100 and two sureties of £50 each.

God is no respecter of persons, and his storms are no respecters of places. Churches get knocked down like theatres, or rather more so. During the recent cyclone in Italy a church collapsed at Avellino, east of Naples, and several persons were killed and more injured.

"Dodo" of Reynolds' says he has received a letter from Mr. H. Sims, stating that if the Bible is to be believed the world is flat. "Everyone now knows," "Dodo" remarks, "that the Old Testament does teach that the world is flat. Perhaps, if Mr. Sims addresses, say, the Archbishop of Canterbury—in that dignitary's official, but not learned, capacity—he will discover why no State-Church parson believes the Bible in this respect."

The Rev. G. W. Elliott went to preach at a church at Aston, and during the anthem left the building and proceeded to a neighboring public-house. The congregation waited in vain for his return. He was charged with drunkenness at the Aston Police Court, and remanded to see if anything could be done for him.

A clerical correspondent, who is not ashamed to give his name and address, has sent to the Rev. Dr. Guinness Rogers the following letter. It refers to Dr. Rogers's recent address at the Congregational Union Assembly at Brighton, as reported in the Daily News: "Reverend Sir,—If, as is reported, you said that 'the English people did not love the Anglican priesthood,' you are a malignant liar. Royal David said, 'Liars shall be turned into hell.' I wish you joy of your journey and its end.—Yours in the faith,——."—Daily News.

Dr. Dawson Burns writes to the Daily News on the continued refusal of the British and Foreign Bible Society to print the Revised Version. He says: "Without entering upon a discussion of the comparative merits of the two versions, it is beyond denial that the Authorised Version contains many errors of great magnitude from which the Revised Version is free; and the persistent publication of myriads and millions of copies of the Authorised Version, with all its inaccuracies, to the exclusion of the Revised Version, is a procedure which has no parallel in the history of translated literature of any other kind."

Sworn statements by native princes witness to human sacrifices still being offered in Ashanti. When Kwassie Aframi, the King of Gyeso, died King Prempeh ordered six men to be sacrificed "to go along with him to the other world." The Dahomeyans had so strong a belief in immortality that they dispatched messengers to heaven, and if anything was forgotten another man was killed to take the postscript.

The Catholic Bishop of Nottingham was asked the plain question in the local Daily Express: "What will become at death of a man who, from birth to death, never heard of our Bible, never heard of either Papist or Protestant, or of Jesus Christ, and who lived a pure, honest, and industrious life?" The Bishop answered: "I say that the man who was 'only' pure, honest, and industrious would go to hell because he neglected to worship God by faith, hope, and charity, which are necessary for everlasting salvation, for 'without faith it is impossible to be pleasing to God' (Hebrew v. 3); and again (Hebrew iii.), 'We see that they could not enter in, because of unbelief'; and 'This is the first and greatest commandment: thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul.'"

This is good sound Catholic doctrine. All outside the Church will be damned. There is no salvation in any other name under heaven. This is the good old cry to frighten the sheep into the shearing fold. Hume well said the more tremendous the divinity, and the more mysterious his methods of salvation, the better for the priests, to whom the frightened and the foolish always look for guidance.

Digitized by Google

The Crescent reports from the Ceylon Independent that Mr. C. J. R. Le Masurier, a well-known member of the Ceylon Civil Service, has abjured Christianity, and on September 15 embraced the faith of Islam. He has taken the Moslem name of Abdul Hamid.

Ameer Ali, a Rationalist Moslem, who writes in the Nineteenth Century, makes the following point against orthodox Christianity: "The baptismal dogma is the best index to the charity of the Church of Christ. The orthodox Moslem believes that all children are born in Islam, and that they are perverted by education, so that if they die before they formally adopt any religion they go to heaven. The orthodox Christian believes that all children are born in original sin, and that if a child dies before it is baptised it is doomed to eternal perdition—the fate charitably assigned to heathens, Moslems, and Jews."

The Lutheran Witness shows its true Christian spirit in the following remarks on German Rationalism: "Just think of men like the famous—or rather infamous—Church historian, Harnack, in Berlin, who uses all his influence, not only to discredit parts of the Apostolic Creed, but to do away with it altogether. Think of Ritschlianism, which is subverting the system of Christian religion by denying all the cardinal doctrines of Christianity, as the doctrine of redemption and reconciliation as taught in the Scriptures, the doctrine of justification by grace through faith in Christ Jesus, etc. Think of the almost universal rejection of the doctrine of verbal inspiration, regarding which even the most prominent so-called orthodox-believing professors, who are looked upon as pillars in the Lutheran Church, declare that this doctrine as taught by the dogmaticians of our Church could not be accepted and adhered to any longer in the light of modern science." Think of the Lutheran Witness unable to do anything better than howl at heresy.

The tombstone of the person at Allendale, who inscribed it as a rebuke to infidelity that his wife had ten children all of whom died in birth, reminds a correspondent that the Rev. J. Eagles, in his essays, mentions that "A medical man told me that he was called upon to visit a woman who had been confined, and all of whose children had died. As he reached the door, a neighbor came out, saying: 'O, she's a blessed 'oman, a blessed 'oman.' 'What do you mean?' said he. 'She's a blessed 'oman, for she breeds angels for the Lord.'"

The writer of "Feminine Fancies" in the Wheeler, a cycling journal, speaks of marvellous trees alleged to have grown out of the grave of an Atheist at Aldenham, who said: "If there be an Almighty Power, then let trees grow out of my grave." Of course the legend grew up after the trees had grown. Such legends are numerous, and are easily accounted for. In ancient times it was customary to place seeds on graves as food offerings to the spirits of the dead. When the seeds grew, the plants coming from the grave were deemed to absorb the spirit beneath. Mr. Grant Allen holds that this was the origin of cultivation, that originally a corpse was supposed necessary for a crop, and this led to human sacrifices, for which animal sacrifices and consecrating fields were substituted.

Mrs. Hart, writing on Japanese women in the Saturday Review (Oct. 19), remarks: "Good manners and courtesy are the constant rule of life in Japan, so that brutal conduct and wife-beating, common upon Christian people, are unknown there." There are, however, serious drawbacks in Western eyes; for instance, the husband can return his wife to her family if unapproved. Since 1872, there has been a system of national education where boys and girls, rich and poor, are taught on the same benches.

A traveller in the Sahara was once informed by one of his savage escort that he had just killed a devil. It appeared that the devil was the traveller's watch, which the savage had found, and, hearing it tick, had concluded there was a devil inside. Accordingly he smashed it by hurling it against a tree (El Tounsy, Voyage au Ouaday, p. 538; Paris, 1851). How would Paley's famous argument from the watch have operated on this savage?

Mr. Didier says the negro in America is an habitual liar and thief. On this Judge Tourgee remarks: "Considering the fact that Southern white Christian civilisation had absolute control of the American negro for two hundred and fifty years, that there is nearly as much white as colored blood in his veins, and that it gave as an excuse for its acts the need of Christianising and civilising the blacks, this indictment of the result should be taken as conclusive evidence of the worthlessness of Southern methods, and a serious imputation on Southern Christianity."

The Rev. Francis Whaley Harper, M.A., canon of York, who died there recently, was eighty years old. In 1877 he preached a sermon in York Cathedral, in which the following passage occurred and became widely circulated, and caused much comment: "The spirit and the body were the Lord's, and the Bible and beer, taken rightly, were the Lord's too. The beer would not do without the Bible, and the Bible would not do fully and perfectly without the beer." It is therefore claimed that he is the author of the alliteration used in Mr. Foote's latest pamphlet. But it is probably older even than Canon Harper.

One of the most popular churches in New York announces every Saturday in the papers that "the entire service, including the sermon, is limited to one hour." The old-time "thirdly" business has become unpopular.

A humorous controversy is going on in Chicago between the Rev. Dr. Caufield (Universalist) and the Rev. Dr. Hensen (Baptist). Man of God No. 1 says "all human beings are children of God." Man of God No. 2 says the immense majority are children of the Devil, and follow the injunction, "Children, obey your parents."

Fifteen thousand pilgrims annually visit St. Baume, in Provence, not far from Marseilles, where Mary Magdalene is said to have spent the last thirty years of her life. The legend runs that Mary Magdalene came from Judæa in a small boat with Lazarus, Martha, the two Marys, and Salome. It is curious how many of the saints got to the West. Irenæus, the first bishop of Lyons, is said to have come from Asia Minor, and this is probably as true as that Mary Magdalene went to St. Baume.

The lessee of the Theatre of Varieties, Johannesburg, who was prosecuted by the Ministers' Union for contravening the Sunday law by giving a concert of other than sacred music, has been discharged with a caution.

The poor fellow Miers, who committed suicide in London, under the stress of neglect and starvation, left behind him a letter which can hardly be pleasant reading to a good many pious people. He disclosed his misery to rich men "pulling long faces at church and pocketing a good deal of money for religious work," but they told him to "Believe in Him" Sometimes they advised him to work for the Salvation Army. "How kind!" he exclaimed; "again, cheap Christianity. To join a Salvation Army refuge at my age, without knowing a trade, and in such a weak state of health." The poor fellow's landlady was good to him, but rather than be a burden to her any longer he ended it all, saying, "In my case suicide is no crime, but a necessity."

The Sunday Chronicle comments on the fact that the Sporting Chronicle has been excluded from the Priestman Institute at Ashton, though the meeting decided to order the Freethinker. The publisher of our Sunday contemporary is "glad" of this, because he "wouldn't like the Chronicle contaminated." But why on earth does he lose his temper in this fashion? We don't rail at luckier papers when the Freethinker is excluded from public institutions, as it is too frequently. We simply wait—as we must wait—till our countrymen grow more tolerant.

The Rev. W. W. Howard does not show a coming-on disposition. We are waiting to hear what he has to say in response to Mr. Foote's offer. Meanwhile we note that he is getting into hot water at home, and that a Leek layman, writing in the local Times, remarks that "It has been left to a sceptic—Mr. G. W. Foote—to remind us that prize-fighting does not come within the requirements of even the most versatile Christian minister."

The Hon. Waldegrave Leslie, at a meeting of the Council of the Scottish Episcopal Church, said he was afraid that a number of the young Presbyterian ministers did not believe in the Word of God. We fancy his fears are far from groundless.

The Sabbath Observance Association has remonstrated with Messrs. W. S. Brown & Sons, upholsterers, George-street, Edinburgh, for printing a testimonial dated June 23, 1895. That date was the Lord's Day. Gods and little fishes! what a keen eye for desecration is in the head of a Scotch Sabbatarian!

"Brother, the present's an era of questionings;
Nothing is taken for granted to-day;
Science and reason are probing the best o' things;
Truth is the guerdon they seek, and they say
Nothing is right because
Time out of mind it was.
Error is not the less gross that it's gray."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, October 27, Co-operative Hall, Plymouth: 11, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible"; 3, "Religion in the Light of Science"; 7, "Did Jesus Christ Ever Live?"

November 3, Balls Pond; 17, Leicester.

December 1, Bradford; 22, Manchester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—October 27, Edinburgh; 28, York. Nov. 3, m. Newington Reform Club, e. Foresters' Hall; 10, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 17, Liverpool; 24, Manchester.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

Admirer.—Mr. Foote hopes he may fulfil your wish to "wake them up at Plymouth."

A. Banks trusts the "laggards" will "prove many, and liberal in their subscriptions."

L. Kerr.—Announcements are inserted only when they come officially from Branches. Some rule is necessary, and this is ours.

J. M. R. (Glasgow).—The correspondence will do good. You have certainly had the best of it. In any future controversy you will find a lot of fresh useful matter in Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer pamphlet, which is cram-full of information.

A. S. (Glasgow).—Shall appear, but not with your name, which would make it too personal.

W. Bradburn wishes to know where the Freethinker can be obtained at Harrow, Middlesex. Can any reader oblige him with the information?

J. C. Grant thinks the Shilling Month appeal should be made periodically—say half-yearly—in order to afford an opportunity to many who, like himself, cannot give much at a time.

J. Richards.—Our best thanks to the Ryhope pitmen who subscribe to Shilling Month. We hope to see them all again before the winter is over.

E. D. H. Daly.—Thanks for cuttings.

T. Charlton.—We have not the least hope that Mr. Howard will debate with Mr. Foote. If he does, we shall be very agreeably disappointed. Cannot you get a good hall for Sunday lectures at Hanley? Mr. Foote has offered to come over since the Conference held in your town.

S. H. Hallifax.—Your deposit is transferred to Shilling Month. Thanks.

N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: Dr. Nichols, £1 1s.; C. M. M. Jacob, 10s.

W. S. Clough.—Thanks. Shall have attention shortly.

E. Smedley.—Thanks for cuttings.

S. Fisburn.—The Bishop of London gets £10,000 a year; Durham, £8,000; Winchester, £6,500; Bath and Wells, £5,000. Jackson, Bishop of London, left £72,000 by will; Barry, of Durham, £120,000; Sumner, of Winchester, £80,000; Auckland, of Bath and Wells, £120,000. So they contrived to save a little. Full particulars of the Bishops and their wealth will be found in the Secular Almanack for 1896.

T. Bintley.—Glad to hear you are going ahead at Chester-le-Street. We will write to Mr. Nicholson.

J. Dodds.—So you are "only a navvy," are you? Well, you may be perfectly certain you are a useful man. Don't say "only" again. A good many of your "betters" are "only" useless. Glad to know you would sooner miss your dinner than the Freethinker, but hope you will always have both.

Eppio.—We do not care to keep the fund open beyond October, though we shall acknowledge any subscriptions that dribble in, as they always do after date. The fund can be reopened in the new year.

A. Forrester.—A further list of subscriptions from Glasgow! You have done well. No doubt you regard Mr. Watts's week-night lectures under the new scheme as a proof that the President means business. The subscription of £1 4s. to the Benevolent Fund is handed to Miss Vance.

T. Hinton.—Richard Brothers was a well-known pious lunatic, though with a spice of the craftiness we find in Prophet Baxter. Thanks for the pamphlet, which shall be returned as you request.

R. Ward.—Best thanks to the Hanley friends for subscriptions and hope that we shall "raise a good round sum."

H. W.—We never heard of any Dr. Newell in connection with our movement.

G. Crookson.—Subscription received with your genial letter. Thanks for both.

J. Carpenter.—The Church must be very hard pressed when it puts up a man like Dr. Kinns, with an Archbishop in the chair, to defend Genesis in the name of Science. Kinns and Science! The two are never heard of together except in pious circles.

E. Pinder.—We shall see the Leicester friends face to face in a few weeks. Meanwhile, thanks.

D. Fyfe.—It is pleasant to find sympathy, and practical sympathy too, in such a remote part of Scotland. Our wish for your country is, that the spirit of Robert Burns may extinguish the spirit of John Knox

A. E. Aspinall.—Volney was, we believe, an Atheist. He is in the list of our Infidel Death-Beds.

A. Baxter.—Shall be attended to. You are misinformed as to Mr. Watts's position at the Finsbury School Board election. He did not promise to vote for free meals for children at the expense of the ratepayers. He distinctly refused to consider the question, as it was unpractical, the Board having no legal power to provide such meals, even if it wished to do so.

W. H. Stevens.—Thanks for your good wishes, which we know are sincere.

H. Lees Sumner.—Your letter is a real encouragement. There will always be cavillers. The great thing, as you say, is to go on with the work, and let it speak for itself.

J. Willey.—Yours is an interesting letter. With regard to the question, why so many sympathisers with Freethought do not avow their opinions, we can only say (1) that courage is not a common virtue, and (2) that Christian bigotry is very malignant.

W. H. Twyman.—Mr. Putnam would have been delighted to shake hands with you at Canterbury. Lecturing in your old city is, after all, worth thinking about; considering that you have a Marlowe memorial just in front of the cathedral.

Papers Received.—Johannesburg Star—Digger's News—Two Worlds—Glasgow Weekly Herald—Ipswich Star—Echo—Torch—Progressive Thinker—Londoner—Freethinkers' Magazine—Pioneer—Der Arbeiter Freund—Yiddish Worker's Friend—Liberty—Lloyd's Newspaper—Oldham Chronicle—Cape Times—Twentieth Century—Dundee Courier—Sunday Chronicle—Leek Times—Truthseeker—Chatham News.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SHILLING MONTH.

October has a week to run after the publication of this number of the Freethinker. During that brief period I earnestly invite all my readers who are able to subscribe, but have not yet done so, to forward me their donations. They may rest assured that the money they send will be spent usefully. My lecture scheme, so far as I can see, meets with universal approbation. Some of the lecturers have written to say that it bears the only present hope for a real forward movement. I am anxious to have Freethought propagated with vigor in all parts of the kingdom, and it shall be done if (mark the if) adequate means are placed at my disposal. Next week I will state how many persons have subscribed, and how much I have received.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

(Where merely the name is given the amount is one shilling.)

Admirer, 3s.; A. Banks, £1 1s.; No Name, 5s.; J. C. Grant, 5s.; G. Hutchinson; J. Richards; W. Metcalf; T. W. Wright; H. H.; J. H., 6d.; W. B.; G. Richardson; T. Richardson, 6d.; M. Hunter; S. B., 2s.; R. Richardson; F. L., 6d.; Eppio, 2s.; J. P. Gilmour, 2s. 6d.; A. Forrester, 2s. 6d.; Mr. Webster, 2s. 6d.; J. Ogilvey, 2s. 6d.; T. W., 2s.; J. Carmichel, 2s.; A. Campbell, 2s.; Mr. Sprout; C. D. Bell; R. Stewart; Alpha; G. Dodds and Three Friends, 4s.; F. Rogers, 5s.; S. H. Hallifax, 5s.; Spero, 5s.; G. Gledhill; T. Hinton; G. Dixon, 2s.; W. Lancaster; V. Page; Hanley Secular Club, 16s. 6d.; J. W., 2s.; W. J. S.; C. Crookson, £1; Luton: Dunmock, Rudd, Langridge, Webster; J. Proctor; R. Proctor; R. Sears; Mr. and Mrs. Crozier, 2s.; G. J. W., 2s.; A. Baxter, 5s.; A. R.; W. H. Stevens, 15s.; J. H.; H. Lees Sumner, 4s.; J. L., 4s.; J. Willey, 5s.; Poor but Loyal, 1s. 6d.; Few Leicester Friends, 7s.; W. S. M.; H. Witty; F. J., 2s. 6d.; J. O., 2s.; Friend, 2s.; W. Varley, 3s.; Three Bearsden Friends, 6s.; Smiley, 2s. 6d.; Sinclair, 2s. 6d.; Cameron; Friend; D. Fyfe; W. H. Twyman; O. N. W., 2s. 6d.

Per R. Forder.—J. Bowey, 2s.; W. H. Twyman; From Two Friends, 2s. 6d.; J. C. Banks; Mr. Buzzard; Miss

Digitized by Google

Buzzard; W. J. Cone, 2s.; A. Waymarks, 4s.; Crab, 2s.; W. Hooton (junior); E. Johnson; Lancaster; Jones; E. Bond; W. Sowdon; W. Linnett, 5s.; D., £1; W. Holroyd, 2s.; E. H.; W. Anderson; T. Hull, 2s.; O. Ford; R. Bretnal, 6d.; Mr. Dean, 6d.; F. O. Dean, 6d.; J. Dean, 6d.; W. Worsley; A. Gibson.

Per Miss Vance.—C. Smith, 2s.; R. E. Douglas, 6s.; J. Clark; T. Birtley; J. Phillips.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote lectures three times to-day (October 27) in the handsome new Co-operative Hall, Plymouth, where he hopes to meet all the local "saints," with others from the surrounding districts.

The audience at Foresters' Hall goes on improving. Mr. Foote had a capital meeting on Sunday last, and the collection was considerably ahead of all previous record. For the second time a sovereign was dropped in the box. The lecture on "The Holy Ghost" was frequently punctuated with laughter and applause. Mr. Heaford, who had been preaching the Gospel of Freethought out of doors, made an excellent chairman. In response to his appeal for discussion, a young gentleman, with a clerical accent, mounted the platform and spoke for ten minutes. He admitted that Christianity was all a matter of faith, and the more you reasoned about it the deeper you got in the mire of unbelief.

Mr. Touzeau Parris lectures at Foresters' Hall this evening (October 27) on "Some Bible Symbols, and their Meaning." We hope he will have a good meeting, for he is sure to be interesting and instructive. Mr. Watts lectures on the following Sunday, and after that Mr. Cohen.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured three times in Glasgow last Sunday. In the evening the hall was crowded in every part. Mr. Watts named a sweet little girl, "Mary Lindsay"; the ceremony was much appreciated by the large audience.

To-day, Sunday, October 27, Mr. Watts lectures twice in Edinburgh, and to-morrow, Monday, in York.

The Pioneer, of Wood Green, gives a good report of Mr. Parris's first lecture there, and speaks of him as "a gentleman whose sincerity and ability are bound to command respect."

Mr. Forder concludes the course of lectures at Wood Green this evening (October 27), dealing with the subject of "The Devil." Tickets can be obtained of J. Wood, 71 Gladstone-avenue.

Mr. C. Cohen had good meetings at Newcastle on Sunday, the best he has ever had in that city. He lectures again to-day (Oct. 27) to what we hope will be still larger audiences. Next week Mr. Cohen lectures at Stockton and Blackburn under Mr. Foote's new scheme. He will visit several other places, under the same scheme, this side of Christmas.

Mr. Thomas Birtley informs us that he is endeavoring to reorganise the Chester-le-Street Branch for active work during the winter. Meetings will be held at 7 Twert-street, adjoining the Co-operative Hall. Mr. Birtley's address is 7 Co-operative-street. We hope all the Freethinkers in the district will rally in support of this forward movement. Mr. Cohen is delivering two lectures at Chester-le-Street this week, under Mr. Foote's scheme, and his visit is expected to give the cause a fillip.

On Saturday the members of the Failsworth Sunday-schools have a dramatic entertainment, and on Sunday evening the quarterly meeting of teachers and scholars.

One of the most energetic members of the Battersea Branch met with an accident while at work, and will be unable to follow his employment for some months. The Branch gives him a benefit this Sunday evening, October 27, when there will be a musical and dramatic entertainment, followed by a dance. Tickets are sixpence each, and can be had at the outdoor meeting or at the Battersea Secular Hall.

The hall at Balls Pond, having been cleaned and decorated by Messrs. Ward, Guest, Jackson, and lady friends, was opened last Sunday. Mr. Forder presided, and addresses by Messrs. Calvert, Thurlow, and Rowney were interspersed with songs and music. Over sixty members joined the club, and the entertainment was followed by dancing.

Miss Vance is still waiting for some notices and particulars from secretaries and lecturers for insertion in the Almanack, part of which is in the printer's hands. Particulars should be sent without delay.

The world goes round, and the Churches have to go with it. Even the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has to keep moving, however reluctantly. One of its latest books is The Dawn of Civilisation, by Professor Maspero, who writes as follows on the antiquity of Egyptian civilisation: "The oldest monuments hitherto known scarcely transport us further than six thousand years, yet they are of an art so fine, so well determined in its main outlines, and reveal so ingeniously combined a system of administration, government, and religion, that we infer a long past of accumulated centuries behind them. It must always be difficult to estimate exactly the length of time needful for a race as gifted as were the ancient Egyptians to rise from barbarism to a high degree of culture. Nevertheless, I do not think that we shall be misled in granting them forty or fifty centuries wherein to bring so complicated an achievement to a successful issue, and in placing their first appearance at eight or ten thousand years before our era." Egyptian civilisation is thus allowed to be six thousand years older than Adam, who, according to the Bible, was the first man!

The Athenæum (October 19), in a review of M. Maspero's Dawn of Civilisation, remarks: "The people are not content to be led passively by the facts as they are found by experts. There is no knowing in what this might issue, perhaps in the slaughter of their convictions; so, in order that their 'convictions' may be soothed and strengthened, they require, like children at bedtime, to be told the same story over and over again. The result is that, in England at present, the teachers are far from being as strong, numerically and otherwise, as they should be in proportion to the monstrous regiment of the preachers." Our leading review also refers to "the temptation to blindfold Science, and then make her prophesy to ignorance and superstition." Surely the reviewer has been reading the works of Sayce, Drummond, or some other of the reconcilers of the new truths with the old myths.

Mr. John Skelton ("Shirley") has just published his recollections of, and correspondence with, a number of dead celebrities in literature and politics. One letter from Froude is very interesting. Referring to the doctrines of John Knox, he writes: "The horrible creed is not new. Thomas Aquinas says much the same. And, after all, if it is once allowed that God Almighty will torture poor devils for ever and ever for making mistakes on the nature of the Trinity, I don't see why any quantity of capricious horrors may not be equally true. Given the truth of what all English orthodox parsons profess to believe, and Hephzibah Jones may believe as much more in the same line as she pleases. Only I think our opinion ought to have been asked as to whether we would accept existence on such terms before we were sent into the world."

The first of a series of addresses on "The Rights of Men and the Rights of Animals" was given in the Memorial Hall, E.C., on October 15, by Mr. J. C. Kenworthy, the friend and disciple of Tolstoi. The title was: "The Humanitarian View—Social Conditions and the Treatment of Animals." Mrs. C. Mallet was in the chair. The lecturer showed that we must first consider the treatment of man by man, as the proper treatment of animals depends on human social conditions; and that under the present commercial morality, which permits of sweated labor, aggressive militarism, and an inhuman prison system, no real improvement in the condition of animals is possible. The next lecture will be by Mr. J. Oldfield, M.A., B.C.L., on "The Scientific View," on November 19, when Mrs. Massingberd, President of the Pioneer Club, will take the chair. The Rev. Canon Wilberforce, Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mr. G. W. Foote, and Rev. A. Lilley will take part in subsequent meetings.

Can any of our readers design a barrow, to be hand-driven, for selling Freethought literature in the streets of London? It would require to be light but capacious, and with means to protect the stock against rain. Communications to Mr. Forder, who desires such a vehicle.

Obituary.

We regret to notice the death, at an early age, of Katie Kehm Smith, one of the most promising of American lady Freethought lecturers, and secretary of the flourishing Oregon Secular Union.

Of all deceivers who have plagued the world, none are so deeply ruinous to human happiness as those impostors who pretend to lead men by a light above nature.—Logan Mitchell.

Digitized by Google.

INSPIRATION.

THE primary definition of inspiration is, "The act of inspiring, breathing in, infusing, and the like; inhalation; as the inspiration of the air into the lungs; opposed to expiration."

We read that at the creation God, after he had made Adam, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and he became a living soul. From this the Bible writers concluded that the soul, or spirit, of man was the air that filled his lungs, and as the breath left the body at death they spoke of it as the spirit leaving, or becoming separated from the body and returning to the God who gave it. So God, who was spoken of as a spirit, was supposed to be air or the wind. And when Christianity came to modify the monotheistic ideas of the Jews, the third person in the triune God became the Ghost, more particularly the wind in motion, or a gust of wind; and as these winds were caused by the heat of the sun—helios in the Greek, and hele in the Phœnician—the language of Palestine, it became the Hele Gust, corrupted into the Holy Ghost. All inspiration, therefore, came from that part of God that was called the Holy Ghost.

In the evolution of religious ideas inspiration came to mean something more than the inhaling of air into the lungs, and it was supposed that with the air some persons drew in some undefinable influence that enabled them to perform acts or things that were beyond the ability of the mass of common people to do. They spoke of the inspiration of the poet, the artist, the statesman, and the successful leader of armies. And in modern times—not earlier than the fifteenth century—Christians had formulated the doctrine of the plenary and verbal inspiration of the writers of the Bible, upon which to base the claim of the inerrant word of God for those writings.

This theory of the plenary inspiration of the Bible writers was an invention of the Protestants; Roman Catholics never took any stock in it. It is one of the necessities of any system of religion that it should have a standard of absolute truth, to which should be referred for settlement all questions of doctrine or church discipline. The Catholic made the Church itself its standard, and held that the decisions of its general councils and the decrees of the Pope constituted the infallible authority for the belief and doctrine of all Christians. As the Protestants repudiated the authority of the Church and the Pope, it became necessary to adopt some other standard that should be their authority for absolute truth; and so they invented this dogma of an inspiration that rendered all they wrote and said the infallible word of God, not subject to any change or contradiction, or even interpretation by the private judgment of individuals.

Of course, in the nature of things there can be no such thing as an infallible standard of absolute truth. Human reason is the only guide to truth; but even this, with the limitations of the human machine, in its not yet perfected stage of development, cannot be said to be infallible.

But, leaving now the Catholic claim to an infallible Church, let us inquire into the modern Protestant doctrine of an infallible Bible, made so by the inspiration of its writers.

In the first place, it should be noted that none of those writers claimed to be inspired. They wrote as modern novel writers do, for pay, for reputation, for fame, for influence in the community in which they lived; they wrote to suit the taste of the people for whom they wrote, and, as that was a taste for wonders and marvels, each writer strove to tell the biggest story, and he who succeeded in doing so became the most popular.

As time were away till the authors of these stories were dead and forgotten, under the influence of a priestly caste who monopolised all learning, these old mythical stories became history, and it was made a crime to doubt the actual truth of them; and thus they have come down to our time, developed by law, force, and religious terrors into the veritable words of God, through the modern doctrine of plenary inspiration.

But how can we know that the writers of these old stories were inspired? The stories themselves are incredible without convincing evidence of inspiration, and inspiration is incredible without proof of the truth of the stories. Even supposing the stories to be true, it does not prove that the authors of them were inspired; and if you prove that they were inspired, it does not follow that they told the truth. It is now proved that much of what is set forth in the Bible as the writing of inspired men is not true, and the latest dodge of Christian Bible worshippers is that the Bible was not intended to teach science, and that, as a matter of fact, the Bible writers were mistaken when they undertook to teach us anything which science has already disproved. That is good doctrine; but the trouble is that these Bible-mongers still keep up the war against science, upon matters that are particularly within the province of science, and hold to the scientific truth of the Bible as against science, until they are ignominiously driven out of it by the ever-rising tide of human intelligence.

How, then, are we to know whether a writer is inspired or not? If he is liable to make mistakes in matters of fact—as we see he is—how does his being inspired make him any more reliable? Are there any rules or marks by which we can recognise his inspiration? The question of the existence of God is a question of fact, and he may be mistaken about that. If it takes an inspired man to teach good, sound morals, still the question appeals to uninspired men to recognise the good morals, and the inspiration is useless and proves nothing. If an uninspired man knows the difference between good and bad morals, then there is no need of inspiration to teach it. And, in fact, morals were developed out of the needs of human society, and religion with its doctrine of inspiration knew nothing about it.

Suppose a man sits down to write a story, a psalm, or a creed, how is he to know whether he is inspired or not? There is no message to him direct conveying the information. He says to himself, I feel something that may be inspiration, or it may be the effect of indigestion. Nothing is so deceptive as feeling. If I am inspired, of course I must tell the truth. It is like testifying in court under oath. But then suppose I don't tell the truth, there is no perjury about it, and there is no court in the case to send me before the grand jury, or sentence me to the penitentiary. Besides, if I make what I write favorable to the clergy, they will pretend it is true whether or no, and the crowd of their devout and ignorant dupes will swallow it all as "gospel truth" anyhow. And that is just the kind of truth it will be.

But suppose the feeling I have does indicate inspiration, there is another question that bids me pause. What or who is it that inspires me? It may be God, or it may be the Devil; neither of them is in sight or hearing: how am I to tell which of them it is? If I look to the productions of most of the Bible writers, it would seem that they could have been inspired only by the Devil. But, again, what is the difference? Who knows which of the two is the better friend of man? It was the Devil who told the truth to the woman in the Garden of Eden, while God was trying to deceive her and her husband to prevent them from getting a taste of the best fruit in the garden.

With all these questions pending, without any possible solution, the thoughtful man must remain in doubt about the fact, the source, and the utility of inspiration. He will be safer to conclude that the whole doctrine is an invention of the priests for their own profit and advantage, and that it has no foundation but in fraud and duplicity.

Any man may say he is inspired, or priests may say it for him; but to prove it is entirely another thing. In ancient times, if a person was eccentric or crazy, he was supposed to be inspired; but whether he was inspired by a good spirit or a bad one was a question upon which men were divided. If his insanity took a religious form and his ravings suited the priests, then he was an inspired saint; otherwise he was sold to the Devil, and they burned him at the stake. In these more enlightened times Christians do not claim inspiration for any living case that may be investigated by scientific physicians, but only for the insane or fraudulent ones who lived and died so long ago that science cannot diagnose their cases.

—Independent Pulpit. J. P. RICHARDSON.

They are slaves who will not choose
Hatred, scoffing, and abuse,
Rather than in silence shrink
From the truth they needs must think;
They are slaves who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

—J. R. Lowell.

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (September 21).

I SUPPOSE right here I might give some of my impressions of the British working-man and his conditions. Of course, I have not had time to study the matter thoroughly, but I have learned many things. I used to think that the position of the working-man in this country was not much better than slavery, and the sooner he could emigrate to America and "go West," the better. As far as I can see, the position of the working-man here is fully as good as in America. He may not receive as much for his labor, but then it does not cost so much to live. Rents and clothing of all kinds are much less than in America. I can buy as good a suit of clothes here for $7 as I can for $15 in New York or Chicago. Shoes that cost $10 in America are only $5 here, and so on. You can get a shave for 3 cents in London that costs 10 cents in New York, and 25 cents in the Far West. Luxuries, however, are not much cheaper. Restaurant living in London is fully as expensive as in New York, Chicago, or San Francisco. They have a fashion here of charging for everything. You have the impression at first glance of the menu that you get your steak or chop at a less price than at home; but you have to pay extra for potatoes and other vegetables, for bread, butter, napkin, and also two or three pennies for attendance, so that by the time you finish you have paid even more than in New York. You cannot get a good meal in London short of fifty cents, and it is more often a dollar if you are extra hungry. I think, however, that the materials for home living throughout England are much cheaper than in America; and if you get into out-of-the-way places, off the line of travel and fashion, you are surprised at the abundance, goodness, and cheapness of the living.

I am therefore satisfied, from observation and the reports of those who should be well informed, that the working-man is pecuniarily as well off in England as in America.

The British working-man is intelligent and independent. To a certain extent he has won his rights. He is not by any means the "under dog." His power is respected. There is getting to be a good understanding between employer and employed. They are finding out that both are made of the same stuff; both are human beings, with the same interests and the same world to live in. The old feeling of antagonism and distrust is disappearing. Of course there are strikes, with more or less bigotry on one side, and selfishness on the other; but arbitration is generally resorted to, and justice prevails. Wrongs exist, but enlightenment and improvement are on the gain, and the rights of labor are more and more acknowledged. This mainly by voluntary co-operation, and not by any interference of the State.

The British workman takes things easier than the American. The American works faster; he will get more out of a machine, and, of course, gets greater wages. But, if he works faster, he also spends faster; and even if he takes a holiday he still "rustles" and hurries through his pleasure as if time were short. But the British workman will take his time. He doesn't hurry. He enjoys life as he goes along. He is tranquil. He makes the most of his holidays. He gets all out of them he can. He doesn't seem to make it a business to be happy, as the American does. He simply is happy with a jolly complacency. He makes no fuss about it. The workmen don't labor hard in England, so far as the factories are concerned. They have for holidays Sundays, half Saturdays, and generally half Wednesdays or Thursdays. They begin work at six in the morning, breakfast from eight to half-past, work from that time to one, dinner from one to two, and then quit work at five. It strikes me that this arrangement breaks up the monotony of labor better than the custom in America.

While much is yet to be accomplished, I feel that labor in England has made magnificent progress, and its vast results are not going into the hands of a few. Wealth is on the road to equitable distribution. The principle of co-operation, as I have before noted, has been developed with wonderful success in Great Britain. An International Co-operative Congress is now being held in London, whose sessions I have attended. At the meeting yesterday, when George Jacob Holyoake, the father of the co-operative movement in England, was introduced by the chairman as of "Great Britain and the world generally," it was stated that in Great Britain there were no less that 1,700 co-operative stores. Enrolled in the ranks are a million and a quarter of members, carrying on a trade of $250,000,000 a year, with a profit of $25,000,000 a year. About $200,000 were spent in education, and $40,000 in charities. I am glad to hear from Mr. Holyoake that from the beginning there has been no question of the full equality of woman. She has been a shareholder, and received profits, in the same way as man. There is a Woman's Guild connected with the movement for the education of woman, not only in domestic, but in social and universal life. While woman endears the home and also wields the "basket power"—that is, the marketing power—yet she is not simply for the home, but for all the world, side by side with man.

It must be noted that these vast results have been achieved by voluntary co-operation, not by State Socialism. The interference of the State in such matters would not only be useless, but injurious.

Sunday morning, with my host, Mr. Gimson, and his little son Humphrey, five years old, I wander over the stately Abbey Park of Leicester. The old ruined abbey is near by, though not in the park itself. In this abbey Cardinal Wolsey died, and, I believe, was buried. Only the walls are standing of the once grand structure. The sunshine flouts it, as fortune flouted the poor cardinal himself. The people of Leicester who do not attend church come to the park to enjoy the Sunday, and the young folks make love, and it presents quite a pastoral scene.

In the afternoon I make acquaintance with the Secular Society of Leicester. First of all we have a splendid sociable time. We gather around the tables, over one hundred of us in all. There is a delegation of eight good comrades from Derby, and another friend travels thirty miles on his bicycle to attend the first Freethought lecture of his life. Music adds its charms to the festal hour. Nobody says grace; but before we partake of the tea and bread and cake the orchestra pours forth its animating strains.

It is certainly a great pleasure to satisfy the hunger to "the Dorian mood of flutes and soft recorders." It adds to the conversational ability of the occasion, and we don't eat so fast. After the tables were pretty well cleared of the delicacies, and the tea, which "cheers, but not inebriates," had permeated the chambers of the brain, the chairman, in the name of the Secular Society, gave a warm and generous welcome to the American visitor, to which he responded with cordial goodwill. The party then adjourned to the club-rooms, reading-room, and library until half-past six o'clock, the hour for the evening service, at which I gave my lecture on "Christianity and Woman." The hall was filled. It was one of the best audiences that I have greeted in England. There was music by the choir, which was excellent every way. I was cheered by the animating surroundings of this Leicester campaign.

I have much to say of this Leicester Secular Society. It has a noble record, of small beginnings, of struggles, and of brilliant victory. The building in which the society now meets is about as large as the Paine Memorial Hall, Boston. It is a handsome structure on one of the best streets of Leicester, with ample accommodation for improvement and pleasure.

The origin of this society dates back to 1840. A Discussion Class was held in the Mechanics' Institution, originated and animated by George Bown, one of the advanced thinkers of that time. Among the young men who gathered about him was Josiah Gimson, the father of Sidney A. Gimson. The subjects brought forward in the class soon became the talk of the town. Afterwards a school was carried on during the week, with lectures on the Sunday. A library was also formed. The social and Secular views of progressive thinkers were discussed, and Leicester thus had the opportunity of listening to new thoughts. Out of this evolving institution, which, having no creed, readily adapted itself to circumstances, in May, 1873, was organised the Secular Hall Company, and the site of the present hall was purchased. In 1881 the hall was completed from designs of W. Larner Sugden, and opened on the first Sunday in March. A large number of notable Freethinkers were present from all parts of England. The property now pays an income of six per cent. on the investment. Secular, social, political, and religious advocates are welcome to its platform, provided they submit their views to criticism and debate. A long list of illustrious names adorns its record. Among them I must mention James Thomson (B.V.), who contributed a poetic address at the opening of the hall. I must quote a few lines, for they show the vigorous Atheism of the poet, whom I have already referred to as a genius of high order:—

> Lo, all the lands wherein our wandering race
> Have led their flocks, or fixed their dwelling-place,
> To till with patient toil the fruitful sod,
> Abound with altars to the Unknown God
> Or Gods, whom man created from of old,
> In his own image, one yet manifold,
> And ignorantly worshipped. We now dare,
> Taught by millenniums of barren prayer,
> Of mutual scorn and hate and bloody strife,
> With which these dreams have poisoned our poor life,
> To build our Temples on another plan,
> Devoting them to God's creator, Man;
> Not to Man's creature, God. And thus, indeed,
> All men and women, of whatever creed,
> We welcome gladly if they love their kind;
> No other valid test of worth we find,
> Who loveth not his brother at his side,
> How can he love a dim dream deified?

Another name must be added to this extraordinary list, that of Professor Huxley, who placed himself among the supporters of the society. An appeal being made for funds, he wrote, February 12, 1891: "Mr. Huxley encloses a small contribution to the special fund of the Leicester Secular Society in evidence of his full sympathy with the objects of the society."

Digitized by Google

To a request for permission to publish the above he replied: "You are quite at liberty to use my note, and I shall be glad if it is of any service.—I am, yours very faithfully, T. H. HUXLEY."

This record, it seems to me, places Huxley in square accord with the principles of Secularism.

The importance and far-reaching nature of the Leicester movement will thus be understood. In Leicester, as in Failsworth, we see that, give Secularism a fair field, it will show its true adaptation to humanity. It will satisfy, not perhaps a "believer," but anyone who is willing to accept the truth and do his duty.

In the hall are the portraits of Charles Bradlaugh, George Jacob Holyoake, and Josiah Gimson. The name and fame of the latter cannot be forgotten in the history of this society. He was one of its founders, and a most ardent and generous supporter. At his death, in 1883, he bequeathed, in maintenance of the institution, an income of one hundred pounds for ten years.

I am cordially entertained during my stay at Leicester by Mr. and Mrs. Sydney A. Gimson, and I must thank them for the delightful and instructive hours I spent in this beautiful city, where I had an opportunity to see so much of progressive English life. I cannot name all the Secular friends I met here. They are many. I shall not forget the generosity of their reception. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

WATTS-WALDRON DEBATE AT NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

DURING the last week Newcastle has had an intellectual treat. The long-talked-of debate between Mr. Charles Watts and Mr. H. J. Waldron took place on the evenings of Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, October 14 to 17, in Sinnett's Amphitheatre, Northumberland-road, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Unfortunately, the weather was far from what could be desired; the first two nights, especially, it seemed as if "all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened." Although there were great counter attractions during the week, such as races, a special preacher from Glasgow, and last, but not least, the world-renowned nightingale, Madame Patti, was giving a concert in the next building on the Monday evening—nevertheless, large numbers flocked each night to hear the discussion, many coming from Shields and other surrounding towns; and an admirer of Mr. Watts, who came all the way from York, was present every night. The audience, who were on the whole orderly, listened with great attention, and enthusiastically applauded the debaters whenever they thought a point had been scored. Judging from the applause, there seemed an equal number of Christians and Secularists, which is very gratifying.

Both disputants throughout were gentlemanly and earnest, frequently eloquent, and were absolutely free from personalities. Mr. Waldron, a lecturer for the Christian Evidence Society, London, is a fluent speaker, and probably a good preacher; but he is certainly not a good debater. He did not seem to grasp the points at issue, and to note the force and bearing of his opponent's arguments. He too often appealed to the feelings of his "followers of faith." Mr. Watts once remarked to the audience: "If warmth of feeling and appealing to the emotions constitute debate, then you have had it."

The subject for the first two nights was, "That Christian Theism is More Reasonable than Atheism," and the Christian gentleman's arguments were the one from design and "that philosophers like Herbert Spencer did not believe in Atheism." Mr. Watts said the latter proved nothing, as the philosophers he had mentioned did not believe in Christianity either. Mr. Watts had nothing to do with disproving the existence of "a god," but only of the "Christian God"; and from the Old and New Testaments he read about a dozen texts showing the imperfect character of that God—such as Ezekiel xx. 25 and xiv. 9; Proverbs xvi. 4; 1 Samuel xv. 3—and commented on the fact that from pulpits they would preach that God, though he had never yet found one who could defend him. Except saying that "the evil" mentioned in "Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord not know it?" meant punishment for sin, without defining the last word "sin," although requested—except this mere statement, and that there was not one Jew who would accept the anthropomorphic ideas of God, Mr. Waldron never attempted to deal with the texts, which, according to the Bible, were characteristic of the Christian God. Being asked what there was "unique" in Christianity, Mr. Waldron said "it was intellectual," upon which Mr. Watts, with a smile, complimented him upon his great modesty, and asked if men like Voltaire and Thomas Paine were void of intellect. Mr. Watts regretted that the subject had not been discussed. Mr. Waldron was the first person he had known to stand up to defend "Christian" Theism, and would probably be the last.

On the second and third nights the proposition was, "That Secularism is Superior to Christianity." Mr. Watts opened the debate by expounding the N.S.S. principles, and showing, in his masterly way, the necessity for Secularism: (1) Because Christianity had failed; (2) there were persons who absolutely could not believe Christianity; and (3) a rule was needed for all. "Christ," said Mr. Waldron, "was not a social reformer, but a social regenerator"—an expression which his followers frantically applauded; but, notwithstanding being afterwards twice asked if there could be regeneration without reform, no answer was forthcoming. Mr. Waldron commenced then to build up a man of straw, and urged that, according to Secularism, there could be no meaning in such words as "duty," "responsibility," and "morality," as Secularists did not believe in free will; but, while frank enough to admit (when pressed for an answer) that he himself did not believe in absolute free will, he carefully abstained from explaining where free will commenced, although asked to do so in every subsequent speech by Mr. Watts. Secularism, Mr. Waldron urged, was not a system at all, for it is based on ignorance, as Atheism teaches "I don't know." In his final speech Mr. Waldron showed himself much better than the creed he was defending, by saying: "If Secularism raises humanity, I will admit Secularism as equal to, nay, superior to, Christianity. I will judge by results." Mr. Watts, in replying to Atheism being ignorance, said: "Quite true, if you mean with regard to the supernatural; and in this we have an advantage over you: we know that we don't know, but you have that yet to learn."

Mr. Watts has shown how Secularism, if given fair play, would benefit humanity. One earnest Christian gentleman, after the debate, came up to Mr. Watts, expressing his admiration, and said: "Although not of your way of thinking, I admit you have given me something to think about."

CARL A. AALSTAD.

WAR!

I SEE marching armies, over vast continents;
Practising the use of weapons deadly;
Men full-prepared to take the life of brother-man:
Great, giant forces, lying dormant, waiting,
Want but a spark to spread destruction's flame.

Comrade-man! what seest thou?
Observe thou but the gorgeous uniforms;
The pomp and pride of seeming-glorious war?
Nay! look thou well beneath the surface;
Heed not nation-hatreds: Humanity is thy nation!
Thou the Altruist shouldst be.

See the consequence of war, the corse upon the field.
This man knew thee not! Wherefore was he slain?
Look again! at widows, orphans, sorrowful fathers and mothers:
They ask thee of the loved one: What wilt thou say?

Men, ye are comrades! Why allow your rulers
Thus to send you forth to take your brothers' lives?
Speak! true men! Speak trumpet-tongued!
Clasp hands and say, "We will not quarrel."
Pass ye the verdict—you are the masters—
War must cease! Enough of strife and carnage in the past:
No king shall now our friendship break. Henceforth we brothers are.

F. W. THORRINGTON.

The Early English Clergy.

In theory, of course, the clergy set up a standard of morals which was opposed to most of the worst faults of the age. But the theory was by no means in accordance with the practice. In reality, the priest took to money-getting and wenching, and was frequently rebuked by his superiors for his own ignorance. Priest became the rival of priest for tithes, bishop of king for worldly dignity.—L. O. Pike, "A History of Crime in England," i. 93.

The orthodox clergy, of course, maintained that the most suspicious form of study which lay people could undertake was that of divinity. The consequence was that the clerical party enlisted as far as they could every knightly prejudice on their side, and represented a thirst for knowledge as essentially unchivalrous. It was easy, too, to foster a belief that no one would know, or even wish to know, more than his neighbors, except through the influence of the Devil.—Ibid, p. 353.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Touzeau Parris, "Some Bible Symbols and their Meaning."

BRADLAUGH CLUB AND INSTITUTE (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): 8, social gathering and short addresses. Wednesday, at 8.30, open discussion on "Religious and Secular Education," to be opened by R. Forder.

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, special entertainment and dance. Tuesday, at 8, social gathering. Friday, at 8, special meeting of members.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, a lecture. Friday, at 8, free science classes.

PENTON HALL (81 Pentonville-road): 7, Joachim Kaspary, "Psychology."

WEST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Princes' Hall, Piccadilly): 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "The Philistine Conscience."

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, W. H. Smith, "The Persistency of Barbarism."

WOOD GREEN (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, Robert Forder, "Who is the Devil? What is the Devil? and Where is the Devil?" Business meeting at 71 Gladstone-avenue on Sunday morning at 11.30.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, W. J. Ramsey, "The Bible God."

CAMBERWELL (Station-road): 11.30, a lecture.

DEPTFORD BROADWAY: 6.30, a lecture.

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE (Middlesex side): 7, St. John will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30, St. John will lecture.

KINGSLAND (Ridley-road, near Dalston Junction): 11.30, Stanley Jones, "Primitive Culture."

OLD PIMLICO PIER: 11.30, S. E. Easton, "How Christianity became Strong."

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 7, select concert.

DERBY (Pollicott's Dining Rooms, Market-place): 6.45, G. Harper, a paper.

FAILSWORTH SECULAR SUNDAY-SCHOOL (Pole-lane): Saturday, October 26, at 6.30, drama, Belphegor; music by string band. Sunday, at 6.30, quarterly meeting of teachers and scholars.

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion—J. Paul, "The Single Tax"; 6.30, J. Cowie, "G. B. Shaw's 'A Degenerate's View of Nordau.'"

HULL (Cobden Hall, Storey-street): 7, Gustav Smith, "Different Forms of Slavery and Murder."

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 11, John M. Robertson, "Christianity and Slavery"; 6.30, "The Future of Liberalism."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rosholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, Ernest Evans, "Four Scientific Men who have Modified the Thought of Intellectual Europe."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, C. Cohen, "Darwinism and Democracy"; 3, "Gods and God-Makers"; 7, "What Think Ye of Christ?"

PLYMOUTH (Co-operative Hall): 11, G. W. Foote, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible"; 3, "Religion in the Light of Science"; 7, "Did Jesus Christ Ever Live?"

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, special musical evening.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, readings and music.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, the Secretary will read a paper on "Christian Evidences a Delusion." Tuesday, at the Borough Hall Dining Room, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "What Think Ye of Christ?" Wednesday, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "Scepticism, its Meaning and its Value."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Market Place): 3, R. Chapman, "Secularism: A Defence."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—October 27, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 28 and 29, Stockton-on-Tees; 31, Blackburn. Nov. 1, Blackburn; 3, Sheffield; 4, 5, and 6, Barnsley; 10, Foresters' Hall, London; 17 and 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

STANLEY JONES, 52 Davenant-road, Holloway, London—October 27, Kingsland.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Nov. 24, New Brompton. Dec. 22, Leicester.

TOUZEAU PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—October 27, Foresters' Hall. November 3, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

ADVERTISER, age 38, wants a Situation as Porter or Watchman. Good references. J. S., 86 Cross-street, West Ham-lane, Stratford, E.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.
DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.
THE GODS. 6d.
REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.
ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.
CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.
ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.
ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.
PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.
HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.
ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.
TRUE RELIGION. 2d.
THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.
LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.
IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.
LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.
GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.
FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
THE DYING CREED. 2d.
THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford 2d.
THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.
ART AND MORALITY. 2d.
DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.
THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.
SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.
SKULLS. 2d.
THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.
LIVE TOPICS. 1d.
MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.
REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.
REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.
CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.
CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.
Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.
Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.
The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Just published, price 1d., by post 1½d.,

DISCREDITABLE TACTICS OF CHRISTIAN DISPUTANTS.

BY CHARLES WATTS.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Diseases, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Diseases, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsey, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 9s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 8d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 22, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendell" being specionsly and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

THE BOOK FOR FREETHINKERS.

Unprecedentedly Cheap Edition.

Now Ready, 153 pp., paper covers, price 6d., by post 8½d.,

Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of this work is to give a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. It is intended specially for those who, taking an interest in liberal questions, have not leisure to study the large and learned books in which they are treated.

The Freethinker says:—

"The book may be heartily recommended. Simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information, this work is just the thing to put into the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

Secular Thought says:—

"In very truth, this book combines the directness and conciseness of 'The Age of Reason' with the splendid enthusiasm of the prophetic instinct of humanity seeing afar.....Line on line, and precept on precept, the author traverses the weakness of theological sanctions. The vivacious and competent pen never falters, and the superabundant vitality and healthy enthusiasm never fail. Mr. Wilson may be congratulated upon producing an epoch-making work. It is essentially a live book, and, what is more, possesses the solid qualities requisite for prolonged existence."

The Popular Science Monthly says:—

"An excellent work to put into the hands of the young who are beginning to think and seeking to learn how to think.....We hope this meritorious book will be widely circulated."

 There is only a limited number of the present marvellously cheap edition. To prevent disappointment, order at once.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-st., E.C.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Price 2d., by post 2½d.,

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE.

BY

DAVID HUME.

With an Historical and Critical Introduction by

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A Record of his Life and Work, by his daughter, Hypatia Bradlaugh-Bonner.

TWENTY-ONE-SHILLING EDITION. CONTAINING TEN PORTRAITS.

One copy of the above will be presented to each of the Six Persons (not agents) sending us the largest amounts for Lot 11 and Bruno Cloth between October 20 and December 31, 1895, if the amounts exceed £5 from each person.

TWO OF THE CHEAPEST LINES ON EARTH

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the United Kingdom.

Lot 11
- 1 Pair All-Wool Blankets
- 1 Pair of Sheets
- 1 Quilt
- 1 Table-cloth

21s. Carriage Paid.

BRUNO CLOTH The most lasting and Fashionable Material for Ladies' Winter Dresses. In all the Plain Colors. 1/9 per yd. 50 in. wide.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 44. SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE BLACK ARMY.

(Continued from page 674.)

THE clerical profession, like every other, has its prizes, and they are so graduated as to inspire hope in the least capable and sanguine. No doubt it is true that in the Church of England, particularly, a minister may wait long, or all his life, for preferment, unless he has influential friends or relatives. But this is a disadvantage which is common in every branch of industry. While, however, there are doctors with no patients, and barristers with no briefs, there are comparatively few ministers without occupation and salary. However small their income may be, they begin with something, which is solid and secure; whereas a doctor has often to spend years in seeking patients enough to keep him in bread and cheese, and a barrister to wait years for his first solicitor's cheque.

A complaint was made at the recent Church Congress that many incumbents were deplorably poor, and it was proposed that a gigantic national fund should be raised in order to level up the poorest to £300 a year. Now, I ask any man of candor and intelligence, who has seen anything of the average "poor" incumbent, to say whether he is really the equal, in energy and general ability, of the average man who occupies a post worth £300 in the commercial or professional world.

Probably the clergy would resent their ability being canvassed in this profane manner, but when they complain of their poverty they invite such treatment; in fact, it becomes inevitable.

Much as it may hurt their feelings, I will even go farther. I have already said that we have a right to expect from Christian ministers, as from all other men, a decent conformity to their own teachings. Now, if there is any teaching in the New Testament which is clear, explicit, and unmistakable, it is that wealth is a danger and poverty a blessing. According to the Sermon on the Mount, the "poor" are the first to inherit the kingdom of heaven; and according to the epistles of Saint Paul, every Christian should content himself with little, and only minister to the bare necessities of his "carnal" part during his earthly pilgrimage. I do not accept this teaching myself. I believe that man is a risen animal, not a fallen angel; and that our sensuous nature should have its rational gratification. But I am not a Christian, while the clergy are—at least by profession. They are bound to follow Jesus and Paul, or to confess themselves hypocrites. And if the teaching of Jesus and Paul should be followed by every ordinary Christian, how much more should it be followed by those who assume to exhort and reprove their brethren.

Apart altogether from the express teaching of the New Testament, there is something incongruous in the action of spiritual teachers, who would wean us from the material world, and who at the same time demand a fair share at least of all the good things of this life. It reminds one of the Cornish minister, whose sermon was interrupted by the news that a ship had run ashore. The wrecking instinct was strong in that congregation, and every man started for the door. They were arrested, however, by the stentorian voice of their pastor, who bade them take their seats before God; and then, casting off his ministerial robe, he exclaimed: "Let us start fair."

Considering the spiritual pretensions of the clergy, I smile when they complain that they are poor. That is precisely what they ought to be. It is their only honest condition. Every penny they expend on themselves, or their families, beyond what is necessary to support life, is a confession that their doctrines are absurd and impracticable, and that they are subsisting on false pretences. I am not at all sure that they are entitled to take any care of their bodies. If they had a proper supply of the faith, which they recommend to us, they might trust to God for a supply of their bodily wants, as Elijah did in the desert and the Jews in the wilderness.

Let us turn our attention now to the missionaries. It is popularly believed that these gentlemen are all animated by a burning zeal to spend and be spent in the cause of Christ; that they court hardship and danger in the spirit of martyrdom. But what is the real truth? It is beyond doubt, to anyone who has investigated the matter, that the great majority of missionaries have positions of ease and emolument. They are generally within reach of protection, and their salaries, though sometimes moderate if expended in England, are always sufficient to provide them with every comfort in the land of their labor, and generally to provide them with a retinue of servants which they could never hope to have in their native country. I have no hesitation in saying that the lot of the average missionary is an enviable one. If the statement be disputed, I will furnish conclusive evidence from the writings of travellers, and even from the reports of Missionary Societies.

It is of course undeniable that there have been missionaries who held their lives cheap, and faced hardship, peril, and death itself with unfaltering devotion. I honor such men, though I do not share their faith. Courage and conviction are always admirable, and a martyr's grave is holy ground. But every cause has had its heroes. A doctor in a hospital has been known to suck the poison of diphtheria from the throat of a strange child, and sacrifice his own life in the attempt to save another's. Large bodies of men will always yield a percentage of such noble spirits; and we may reverence the martyr missionary without throwing a false halo round the heads of all his profession.

Missionary Societies, in practice, are chiefly agents for relieving the congestion of the clerical labor market. It is better to send the superfluous men of God abroad than to let them stay at home, competing with their brethren and reducing the general rate of wages. Emigration is an advantage to those who go and to those who remain. And when this is understood by the British public, the missionary business will be seen in its true light. A few go converting the heathen for Christ, some from Christ and themselves, and more for themselves and Christ.

Digitized by Google

Of a piece with the chief motive of this missionary enterprise are the arts employed in raising its expenses. School children are cheated of buns and toffy to fill the mission-box with halfpence. Shameless begging goes on from door to door. False pictures are drawn of missionary heroism, and falser pictures of the moral darkness of the "heathen." It is perfectly certain that in many cases, whatever may be said of the "civilisation" of the heathen, and their scanty costume in hot climates, they are essentially more moral than the majority of the missionary's countrymen; more truthful, more honest, more sober, more tender to their children, and more respectful to their elders and parents.

G. W. FOOTE.

(To be concluded.)

THE ODIN RELIGION.

I HAVE, I think, made a discovery. I have found an article by Thomas Carlyle, unmentioned by any of his biographers. Mr. Richard Hearne Shepherd, who compiles a careful bibliography of Carlyle, does not mention the article. This fact, I confess, gave me pause. Had I found a mare's nest? I read the article again, and leave the question to the discerning reader acquainted with Carlyle. The article in question has first place in the October number of the Westminster Review, 1854. It takes the shape of a review of Simrock's Edda, Uhland's Myth of Thor, Grimm's Teutonic Mythology, etc., and is entitled "The Odin Religion." It sets out by saying:—

> "The English may be considered fortunate in their kindred. Across the Atlantic they have a remarkable family of cousins, of singular energy, and, perhaps, the most expanding, mobile, multiplying, 'go-ahead' human creatures that ever 'exploited' this terrestrial globe. Altogether modern, and with a History respectable, indeed, but of only two short chapters—Puritanism and Revolution—with no deep Past to allure the imagination or divide the attention, and with a Present as yet vague, undefined, and hardly more settled than the halt of the exploring traveller, whose night's rest is hurried and feverish with onward thoughts for to-morrow. Their keen faculties and energies are all set on 'progress'—working for times that are not, but will be—for a Future that is to 'beat all creation'—a Future, ambitious, vast as the imagination and appetites of man. Even Goethe, in a moment of despondency, almost envies America for its freedom from 'ruined castles,' useless remembrances, and vain disputes, which entangle old nations and trouble their hearts, when they ought to be strong for present action."

Then he turns to our other cousins, the Teutonic people, who "cultivate a loving piety for that rich and still fertile Past, from which the Americans have cut themselves loose altogether, and about which the English, with a distinct and proud history of their own, and busy withal with other things, without renouncing their share or interest in it, take less concern." A sketch is given of German history, afterwards much amplified in Frederick the Great, and then we are taken back to "their common belief, the Odin religion as we will call it." In a note he says: "It might be called English or Saxon with as much right as Scandinavian. It was the religion of the whole Teutonic race, and came—we know not whence."

Carlyle, as for the nonce I shall call the writer, recites the story from Bede of the old Saxon chief who compared the life of man to the bird flying in at one door and out at another—a passage afterwards used by Emerson in his essay on Immortality. "The sense of the Infinite was awake in that heart," he says—and this he thinks characteristic of Teutonic man; "but the supreme virtue of the free, vigorous, cheery Teutonic man was valor, action, positive, not negative, virtues; none but heroes entered Valhal; the nobodies went to the dull limbo of oblivion." This healthy strength, he declares, "is ever accompanied by a proportionate measure of tenderness and pity." And there is a third quality—"the feeling of wonder, the sense of the infinite, which lies at the base of all religion as well as of poetry."

> "The ancient Teutonic man, with his healthful, joyous strength and elasticity, roaming over sea and land in pursuit of manly adventure, knew no fear of death; neither was life mournful to him, or a mere burden to be endured for the sake of 'hereafter.' Life was for action, and the gods were propitious to the brave. Yet was his soul strangely affected by the ever-shifting, changing nature of things. The bright day is beautiful, and such a majestic luminary must certainly rule for ever; but a little while, and the gray twilight creeps on, enveloping the day as with a veil, and anon black mysterious night covers the earth. What has become of the day and its fiery ruler? And there is the glorious summer-season, clothing the hills with verdure, and inspiring all creatures with joy. Its heat has melted the icebergs, it is so strong; surely it must prevail? But the days grow shorter, and the leaves wither and fall, the hills turn gray and sad; black clouds come riding upon the back of the whirlwind, and lo! wild winter is uppermost again, and the kren Yötuns are busy destroying the fair handiwork of gods and men: where is Thor the Thunderer?—Life itself wastes and wanes; this arm, once so vigorous and all-powerful, has grown unsteady and helpless; Iduna, the beautiful maiden, bright as the blooming apple-tree, is old now, and shrunken, and her eyes are dim. Are we the same we were, or what are we?—These apprehensive feelings, inexpressible 'pre-sentiments' working as 'inner experiences' in the Teutonic soul from of old, had their important share in the building up of the Odin religion."

Then come descriptions of the tree Ygdrasil, the gods, and Yötuns, or giants, in which, incidentally, he compares the office of the original Pontifex, who, standing on the bridge which separated hostile armies, made peace between them, with "the present Pontiff with French bayonets keeping the peace for him upon his own bridge."

The account of the recovery of Thor's hammer is too long for quotation here. But every line shouts the name of its author, Thomas Carlyle, and makes me wonder if any Carlylean can have read the article without recognising the powerful voice. Fiery passion, prejudice, grim humor, and soft-melting humanity are mixed, as also in the oft-told story of the death of Balder the beautiful, encompassed by Loki, whom the reviewer declares is "not unlike Goethe's Mephistopheles, done in the rough." A characteristic touch is this. "The life of the gods, we said, is serene upon a ground of sadness." "The Greek gods have their combat behind them; it lasted but ten years, and got itself transacted once for all. Olympos has triumphed over Orthys, and the Jovites have ever after an easy, jolly life of it. Not so the Asen; no easy, idle life of mere graceful or graceless gallantries is theirs; chaos is ever threatening, and has to be kept out by unsleeping vigilance." Again he says:—

> "As a counterpart to the 'sons of God who saw the daughters of men that they were fair' we meet, in the later 'Heroic Sagas,' with cases of love adventures, and of union between the sons of men and those Valkyrie—daughters of the gods; unions not productive of serene happiness, but of happiness tinged with sorrow. The low chant of a sad, sweet melody makes itself heard amidst the clangour of steel and wild war-whoop of these heroic poems; death-valor and gentleness, devotion and revenge; the stout heart overcome by the force of irresistible attraction; immortal woman yearning for the love of mortal man, whose prowess is so divine; inexorable destiny over-ruling all."

The period of conflict between Odinism and Christianity extended over eight centuries, from the fourth to the eleventh. The writer of this article tells with gusto how "one Radbot, Frisian king, while already standing in the font to receive the sacrament of baptism, asked: 'Where are my ancestors?' 'In hell, of course,' answered the priest, impatiently. 'And yours?' 'In heaven,' was the reply. 'Then will I rather be with my brave forefathers than with you paltry Christians!' exclaimed the king, and leaped out of the font unbaptised." Motley, in his Rise of the Dutch Republic (Introd. v.), tells the same story; but instead of "paltry" has "little starveling band of Christians." The Westminster Reviewer also tells of the Frankish king, Chlodwig, who, when solicited by his Christian wife to confess Christ, answered with a sneer: "Your God is not even of divine descent; is a mere plebeian!" The reviewer evidently looks on the Odin religion as the more manly, and Christianity as the more womanly, faith.

Digitized by Google

> "And so the Odin religion went out, and the Bible came in. The ideals of the fathers became the horrors of the children. Venerable Bede, as we saw, called the old gods 'Devils'; and Scholasticus Adam etymologises Wuotan into Wütherich: 'Wodan, id est furor!' And thus, by unknown stages, the mighty Odin degenerated at last into a Wild-Huntsman of the Odenwald, an Opera-Guy of the Freischütz; while the once so graceful Freia bestrides a broomstick, and leads the chorus of witches on the Blocksberg! 'Das ist das Loos des Schönen hier auf Erden!' it cannot remain beautiful for ever, it becomes litter and an encumbrance when the virtue is gone out of it. Happy if the 'virtue' gets clothed in new beauty!
>
> "Yet is there one prophecy of the Volu-seeress which is being singularly fulfilled: Thor's offspring shall survive, 'Modi and Magni shall swing Mjollnir, and fight it out to the end.' The Hammer shall prevail. Thor, the subduer of chaotic forces, the pioneer of industry, he alone of all the Asen is still honored amongst us in a practical way. And the new generations, having lost the faculty (to the inexpressible regret of friend Simrock and others) for treating nature 'mythically,' have entered upon the task of treating her scientifically; which to its own extent is also—as the gods said of Balder's invulnerableness—'a great advantage;' and will be more so some day, when men, driven painfully and inch by inch out of their temporal nestling-places in the Partial, will learn to find rest in the Whole."

If this is not by Thomas Carlyle, I should much like to know who thus imitated, not only his style, but his inmost thoughts, and found the first place in the Westminster Review. It will be noticed that this helps to fill up the long period of silence between the publication of the Life of John Sterling (1851) and that of Frederick the Great (1858). It may be observed that all the volumes reviewed are German, and, when in Germany procuring material for the Frederick, Carlyle would doubtless be attracted by all bearing on the Odin religion, which he had lectured on in 1839, and which he reverted to in his Early Kings of Norway (1875).

J. M. Wheeler.

THE SECULAR AND CHRISTIAN STANDARDS OF MORALITY.

It is frequently asked by our Christian opponents: What is the standard of Secular morality—that is, to what do we appeal in order to decide the ethical character of human actions? We purpose answering this question, and to state wherein we think the Secular standard is superior to the one furnished by Christianity. It may avoid misunderstanding if we state that, in our opinion, no standard is, or can be, perfect, for in a progressive state of society perfection is not allied with humanity. Our duty is to carefully study whatever ethical tests are presented to us, and then to select the one which we consider accords with reason and the best interests of the community. If, therefore, flaws are discovered in the Secular standard, it would not be wise to reject it simply on that account. The only justification for its rejection would be the production of a superior one. Christians allege that their standard is higher and of greater excellence than ours. Let us see if this allegation is supported by fact; and, in order that a fair comparison may be made, we will first state what the Secular standard is.

The science of morality refers to human conduct, and to its influence upon mankind in general. An act which ennobles the individual, and has a tendency to benefit others, we term moral; actions of an opposite character and influence we regard as being immoral. Secularists, rejecting all appeals to theology, find in reason, experience, and utility the means whereby they discover truth and its value to humanity. Reason is the faculty by which we distinguish truth from error; experience includes the widest and best verified inductions of mankind, and utility is the test by which we estimate the worth of conduct in its power for good in general. As to what is good or moral, that must be determined by the demands and requirements of the community, who have to decide as to what is necessary to secure and preserve harmony, comfort, justice, and progress. Such demands and requirements may, of course, vary with the growth of enlightenment and the increase of the refinement of human feelings; but the nature of the test remains through all changes. By verified inductions we mean what is learnt from the discoveries of natural law, and obedience to that law is compliance with the legitimate condition of existence. Experience teaches that obedience to the highest natural law leads to virtue and happiness, while non-compliance therewith involves more or less pain, misery, and often crime. To urge that this view is "godless" in no way affects Nature, for in her operations she heeds neither blame nor remonstrance, any more than she rewards the pious or punishes the impious, except in accordance with the law of cause and effect.

Thus it will be seen that, from a Secular standpoint, we recognise universal law, not chance or supernatural providence. Morality with us really means living up to those natural laws which reason and experience have proved to be good and useful. From this method we have learnt that it is only by united exertion, self-reliance, and mutual confidence that improvement is obtained. Ethical conduct originates in, and grows out of, the relations of the members of the human family to each other. It should never be forgotten that Secular morality teaches what Confucius taught—namely, that we should do unto others what we desire that they should do unto us. There is undoubtedly in the cultured mind an instinctive desire to promote human happiness, or, as Bacon writes (On Goodness), "the inclination is imprinted deeply in the nature of man."

As to utility, that is a term much misrepresented by some Christian exponents, who limit its signification in a most unjustifiable manner. We do not employ the word as meaning that

> The value of a thing
> Is the money it will bring.

It is the quality of a person's actions to which utility is applied, and, despite all that is said against it, we believe that the ultimate test of conduct will be generally acknowledged to be its usefulness or otherwise in conducing to the well-being of society. Practically, it is so now in various phases of life. In science, politics, in the world of literature, and in the social sphere, the value of actions is estimated by their power to render service to man. By intelligent and unbiased minds a man is revered, not for his belief in theological dogmas, but rather for the assistance he has rendered in improving the world, and raising humanity from the low and degrading condition into which it has fallen under the influence of priestly rule and theological supremacy.

We object altogether to the erroneous notion that utility excludes poetry and art, which are, beyond doubt, prolific sources of joy and gladness, and are necessary to make the happiness of life complete. Whatever tends to add to the sunshine of existence is useful, and those persons who contribute to the happiness of life experience a gratification that must have a beneficial effect upon their lives. Utility destroys no element or principle in our nature that has a tendency to increase our physical and mental pleasure; on the contrary, the service of utility is like the quality of mercy—"it is twice blessed; it blesseth him that gives, and him that takes." In other words, the performance of good actions confers an advantage both upon the performer and also upon those who experience the benefit of those actions, for the intelligence and comfort of others are the best security for our own social peace. It will thus be seen that the improvement of others is not only good for them, but is the best self-defence against the possible injuries they might inflict upon us; and those who see their reward in the good effected are at the ideal standpoint, where the glory of humanity shines in its grandest splendor.

Probably no better definition of utility has been given than the one furnished by Bentham, who says: "By the principle of utility is meant that principle which approves or disapproves of every action whatever, according to the tendency which it appears to have to augment or diminish the happiness of the party whose interest is in question; or, what is the same thing in other words, to promote or oppose that happiness. I say of every action whatever, and, therefore, not only every action of a private individual, but of every measure of government." If it be asked, Who is to be the judge of the good or evil tendencies of an act? we answer: Who under Christian rule is supposed to judge in the framing of Acts of Parliament, which at least are intended to be on the side of virtue? As all society is involved, why, of course, society is the proper judge. The opponents of Secularism, however, exclaim: "Unless a man could foresee all the circumstances of an act, how could he tell whether it would be a moral one or not?" That is to say, that unless a man is infallible, how can he have any guide at all in his conduct? Men judge as to whether an act will be beneficial or prejudicial in character from experience of what has been the result of similar acts on previous occasions, also from reflection upon the circumstances in which it occurs. True, this rule is not infallible; but it is as perfect as man can attain to. It is also said: "Certain acts may be moral in one age, and immoral in another." Certainly! This, however, is not an objection exclusively to Utilitarianism, since it would apply with equal force to every class of ethics that has ever been propounded, that of Christianity not excepted. According to the Bible, many acts were performed in ancient times which were supposed then to be moral or beneficial; but to perform such acts to-day would be deemed very immoral.

Digitized by Google

To sum up the Secular position: With us the word "morality" indicates that state of society where happiness, justice, and virtue obtain. As it is improbable that all mankind will experience such a condition of society as this, we deem it both wise and useful to adopt that course of conduct which is calculated to confer such advantages upon the "greatest number." Reason, aided by experience and strengthened by wisdom and intellectual discipline, is our standard, and the usefulness of our actions in promoting the general welfare is our authority. Thus Reason tells us what to do, Experience shows why it should be done, and Utility is the test that either justifies or condemns the wisdom of our actions. CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

THREE BOGUS HEAVENLY WITNESSES.

"For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one."—1 JOHN v. 7.

WHEN Erasmus put out his first edition of the Greek New Testament, in 1516, he omitted the above verse, as wanting in all the Greek copies with which he was acquainted. He was called over the coals by the theologians, especially when his second edition (1519) also took no notice of the passage, and he rashly offered to insert the verse if any Greek manuscripts containing it were forthcoming. Of course he was obliged. Before his third edition was published a Greek MS. providentially turned up. Erasmus, a timid man, kept his word and inserted the text, though, if he looked at all into the matter, he must have suspected, and perhaps discovered, that the MS. was made to order; for, when critically examined, the manuscripts containing the text proved to be as bogus as the passage they were designed to support. The text has, however, been questioned ever since the time of Erasmus. Sir Isaac Newton riddled it pretty thoroughly, and Porson gave it the coup de grâce. Bishop Burgess, the Rev. F. Nolan, and some lesser fry have kept up the combat; but, since Porson's time, no competent scholar has come forward to defend it. One of the last of the orthodox fry is the Rev. H. T. Armfield, who puts on his title-page that he is "one of the contributors to Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities." Mr. Armfield is a good old Christian antiquity himself. He pleads in forma pauperis and ad misericordiam. The compilers of the Revised Version had the sense to omit the interpolation, without any comment, or even information that "here the Authorised Version has a passage on the Blessed Trinity." They slurred it over by putting the figures 7 and 8 to verse 8, so that a casual reader would be none the wiser for their omission. Dean Farrar, too, rejects the passage cavalierly. These things annoy Mr. Armfield, who points out that there are some little difficulties on the other side.

He notices, for example, that the passage appears in the famous Polyglott Complutensian version of Cardinal Ximines. Dr. Davidson says (Biblical Criticism, ii. 421) that its editors "took the passage, not from Greek MSS., but from the modern copies of the Vulgate, pseudo-Jerome, and Thomas Aquinas." But Rev. Mr. Armfield says: "That is, in plain English, they made it up. The Vulgate, Jerome, and Aquinas are all Latin works, and to say that the Complutensian editors took the Greek from them is to say that they made it up." This is a very serious charge, says he. It is, indeed. But there are serious grounds for making it. What manuscript authorities Cardinal Ximines and his editors had has never been ascertained; but there is a probably bogus story of their having got into the hands of a firework maker, who sent them up to heaven. These editors are said to have used MSS. in the Alcala Library, but the MSS. have never been produced. Be it noted they gave the Latin text the place of honor, and compared it to Jesus crucified between two thieves—the Greek and the Hebrew. How could they have ventured this if they had known and credited the legend of a Greek original? No; they followed their predecessors in "making it up."

Porson, in his Letters to Travis (Letter xii.), says: "In short, if this verse be really genuine, notwithstanding its absence from all the visible Greek MSS. except two, one of which awkwardly translates the verse from the Latin, and the other transcribes it from a printed book; notwithstanding its absence from all the versions except the Vulgate, and even from many of the best and oldest MSS. of the Vulgate; notwithstanding the deep and dead silence of all the Greek writers down to the thirteenth century; if, in spite of all these objections, it be still genuine, no part of Scripture whatsoever can be proved either spurious or genuine."

How, where, and when did it get into Greek? Who put it into Greek? Clearly it was manufactured—i.e., translated from the Latin. If this was done once, may it not have been done many times? Tischendorf held that the Latin version of Codex Beza, one of the earliest MSS. of the New Testament, was older than the Greek of the same codex; and Father Hardouin and the Rev. J. Black, the author of Paleoromaica, have even contended that throughout the Latin is the original—not, of course, that the Latin ascribed to Jerome is meant, but rather some Italic version, though it may be doubted if there is any codex that has not been doctored up and interpolated in accordance with the dominant views of the Church at the time of its production.

Among the authorities who give up as spurious the only verse in the Bible plainly teaching a Trinity may be mentioned Aldus, Bentley, Adam Clarke, Davidson, Farrar, Gibbon, Green, Griesbach, Grotius, Hort, Lardner, Leclerc, Luther, Marsh, Michaelis, Milton, Sir Isaac Newton, Porson, Priestley, Scrivener, Father Simon, Tischendorf, Westcott, Wetstein. To write the history of the controversy would fill a volume. If anyone supposes there was, therefore, much to say on both sides, he would be extremely mistaken. Against the verse have been all lay scholarship and whatever clerical honesty happened to exist. For it has been a cloud of interested witnesses fighting tooth and nail for a palpable forgery, because the exposure of this forgery also exposes the baseless character of all their pretences to be in the secrets of God and ministers of the Most High.

Of course the doctrine taught in the forgery is utter rot. If the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost bear record in heaven, they bear record in the very place where it is not wanted; and, if they are a trinity in the same sense as spirit, water, and blood on earth, then they are no more three in one than pepper, pork, and peas. But the bigger the nonsense, the better for the creed of those who say credo quia absurdum. Hume well remarks that the more mysterious and tremendous the divinity, and the more unaccountable the measures of acceptance required by him, the more necessary for men to abandon natural reason and submit to the guidance of the priests. This is the true explanation of the bogus three-in-one deity, salvation through lamb's blood, etc.

A more palpable forgery than this declaration of the Trinity was never foisted into any book. Such an interpolation could take place only when the masses were ignorant and all learning in the hands of an interested corporation. And does any innocent believe that this verse and the other passages omitted in the Revised Version, because the evidence is too strong against them, stand alone in being spurious? Let such an one, if such there be, remember that the men of God of all sects fought tooth and claw for the retention of the forgeries, and continue to ignore the Revised Version and to read to their congregations the Authorised Version, as though it were the inspired Word of God. Be sure that the duplicity which conceals and ignores the results of criticism as far as possible was prepared for the work of absolute deception in days when such deception could easily escape detection.

Digitized by Google

There have been some deliciously ingenious suggestions to account for the omission of the passage from all the Greek versions. Some lax scribe, it is supposed, noticed similar words further down, so skipped this important testimony to the blessed Trinity; and all the other copyists, being as little concerned for their three-headed deity, followed suit. Others have suggested that the wicked Arians got the manipulation of the manuscripts, and deliberately left out this confutation of their monotheism; and so it happened that in all their controversies the Greek fathers never mentioned this verse, though they mentioned those before and after it. When, to uphold the integrity of their fetish book, the sky-pilots resort to such shifts as these, they might as well inscribe Ichabod over the gates of the New Jerusalem.

LUCIANUS.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE Rev. Samuel Jones frequently illustrates his remarks with anecdotes more or less decent. Here is one that he gives on the authority of a commercial traveller On a visit home the drummer aforesaid found his little girl sitting on the floor playing with her kitten. While doing so she said: "Kittie, you are a sweet little thing; I love you, and I know who your mommer is. Old pussy is your mommer. But, kitty, I don't know who your popper is, for I never saw him. I expect your popper is a travelling man." Jones applies this story to Ingersoll, whose mother, he explains, is the earth, but whose father, he intimates, is that migratory individual who goes about seeking whom he may devour or seduce. But the application is not very close. I should suppose that even before he repeated the drummer's story for the first time the evangelist might have considered how appropriately the evolutionary ancestor of that anecdote could have been related of the Judean carpenter and joiner who held upon his knee the future lord and savior of the Reverend Samuel Jones.

The voice of the liar, who told the tale of paralysis superinduced by blasphemy at High Shoals, Ga., still echoes through the religious press. One James T. Lowe, doubtless a Methodist dominie, writes from Rehoboth to the Wesleyan organ at Atlanta that the tongue of Haguewood was paralysed while he was asleep, after denouncing the sermon of the day on his way home from church. Except that Haguewood's tongue was not paralysed while he was asleep, and that he had not denounced any sermon, Lowe's account may be true. The only really indisputable assertion of the religious and so-called secular press is that the paralysis, though Haguewood had been subject to it for years, was a "warning providence." I am candid enough to admit that nobody can disprove that any event is a "warning providence." Nevertheless, if there is an impartial God who attends to the Ananiases, why has not the perpetrator of this indecent assault on veracity been everlastingly belted with the club of his honest wrath?

They are holding an exposition at Atlanta just now for the display of the remarkable products of the adjacent back country, of which there should be no scarcity. Visitors from a distance would be interested in exhibits illustrating the latest methods of lynching; explaining improved systems of getting the drop on a political antagonist; exemplifying the proper way of conducting a camp-meeting or concealing a clandestine distillery; and showing at a glance how morality may be maintained and promoted by means of the rawhide and the revolver. The theology of the South, which, according to the New York Independent, is unsinged by the fire of the Higher Criticism, would also excite the curiosity, not only of all Northerners, but of the whole civilised world, including Japan, which is heathen. But the managers might secure all these attractions, and yet find their exposition incomplete as a local exhibit, unless somewhere—conspicuous among wonders, miracles, prodigies, marvels, monstrosities, spectacles, and astounding phenomena—the liar who started the Haguewood paralysis yarn was found in a group with the ministers, religious editors, and minor falsifiers of fact who have vouched for the fake in pulpit and press.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

—Truthseeker.

"WE BESEECH THEE TO HEAR US, GOOD LORD."

[More missionaries are on their way to China, where they are not wanted.]

"Go forth to all the world and preach
Jahveh's great and holy word!
And all its errors proudly teach—
Even at the point of sword."

Oh Lord, preserve our holy Church,
Which is now crumbling fast.
Lord, leave us not now in the lurch—
Preserve, as in the past.

Lord, be thy servant's trusty friend;
Preserve us, Lord, from want;
So we may prosper in the end,
We care not how we cant.

For of the earth we are the "salts"—
The medicine of life.
Keep us, O Lord, with all our faults,
From ills that are now rife.

Preserve, O Lord, our sacred cause,
Confound all who rebel;
And in thine anger do not pause
To send them all to—sheol.

Lord help us in our holy work
To do just what we please—
Whether 'tis to save the warlike Turk,
Or slay the weak Chinese.

We're doing all things for thy good
(The work as sweet as honey),
But we must have it understood
What we want most is Money!

Let's strike the iron while it's hot,
And boldly wield the sword,
And sacrifice the hostile lot
On altars of the Lord.

FRITZ P.

Cui Bono?

Of what use are all the clergy in the world? For over a thousand years they have pretended to teach truth and morality, and all that time have been killing or otherwise punishing honest men who dared to expose their shams. And now look at Christendom! There the gospel of peace has been preached by the quacks and impostors who have fomented more wars and murders than all other men, until Europe is smothered under the hugest military despotism ever known in ancient or modern times! Every Christian nation is incessantly on guard against its Christian neighbors, watching for an opportunity to steal lands and murder the people, or else ceaselessly on the alert to repel invasion from some pious neighbour. The clergy are the principal supporters of all this; they consecrate and sanctify the military preparations, although they well know that the people are crushed and starved, and rendered perpetually miserable, by the awful incubus.

And why all the militarism? Just to support such things as the Emperor of Germany, the clergy, the bishops, the aristocracy, and other useless shams. The poor people in France or Germany have no reason in the world for quarreling, except so far as they are egged on to it, like game-cocks, by the clergy and every titled humbug in the two countries. And that truth applies all round. There are laws in several countries against cock-fighting, &c.; but in no country is there a law or a gospel to prevent poor men from fighting for the amusement and enrichment of their owners. Oh! no! It is by human cock-fighting that rulers and the clergy flourish, confound them!—J. Symes, in "Liberator."

Force is no impelling god, no entity separate from the material substratum; it is inseparable from matter, is one of its eternal indwelling properties. A force unconnected with matter hovering loose over matter is an empty conception.—Moleschott.

Digitized by Google

ACID DROPS.

Dr. Bilsborrow, the Catholic Bishop of Salford, has been holding forth at Preston against the "lawlessness" of private judgment. Every man, he says, puts his own construction on the Bible, and the Church is thus "broken up into an incredible number of conflicting and clamoring sects." In his opinion, the non-Catholic people of this country are progressing "from the labyrinths of rationalism and agnosticism into the dread abyss of infidelity." How dreadful! We are all going to the devil unless we take tips from the priests. And the charge is—well, see the tariff. Dr. Bilsborrow reminds us of the ancient gentleman who went about crying that there was nothing like leather.

The Barnsley friends got Mr. Cohen to promise to give them a lecture under what they call our "excellent propagandist scheme." They applied for the use of the Miners' Institute for a lecture on "The Origin of Man." This application was considered by the Council of the Yorkshire Miners' Association. A Socialist supported it manfully, but it was bitterly opposed by Mr. Pickard, who had to withdraw some of his insulting observations, and by Mr. Cowey, who delivered a diatribe against Atheism, from the Methodist point of view, with special denunciation of "Bradlaugh, Foote, and Co." Mr. Cowey said he would rather see the Institute burnt to the ground than let an Atheist lecture in it. When the vote was taken there were 22 for the application and 138 against it. So much for the liberality and justice even of Trade Unionists and their leaders when they are inoculated with the virus of Christianity.

The American papers often show great enterprise, but they quite as often insert rubbish which would fail to find admission into any reputable English paper. An instance is offered by the Sunday New York World, which devotes eight columns to "The Gospel in Christ's Own Words." A worked-up description of the manuscript found by Mrs. Lewis at St. Catherine's Monastery, Sinai, three or four years ago, is given as if it were a fresh discovery, heralded with such exclamations as "Found at last," and such baseless assertions as that "Christ, as we know, was master of several languages; but it is certain that Syriac was the one he learned as an infant;" and that "It is known, for instance, that autograph letters of Christ were at one time in existence." We wonder the New York World allows itself to be gulled in this way.

Mr. W. T. Stead says that he has derived great advantage from the writings of James Russell Lowell. "In some of the critical moments of my life," he writes, "I found help such as I found in none other outside Carlyle's Cromwell and Holy Writ." Mr. Stead puts Carlyle before God Almighty.

The Rev. Seymour Ashwell, of Finmore Rectory, near Buckingham, forgot to lay not up for himself treasures on earth, where moth doth corrupt and thieves break through and steal. The result is that a burglar has eased him of watches, chains, rings, bracelets, brooches, etc., to the value of £100.

A little while ago a complaint was made to the Glasgow police that a man frequented a particular place at a certain hour, and indecently exposed himself to females passing. An inspector visited the place at the hour noted, and found a man there praying. The man was arrested, and identified by two witnesses as the culprit. He got thirty days' imprisonment. The fact that he was found praying was actually looked upon as evidence that he was a person likely to commit the indecent offence. Before the completion of the thirty days it was discovered that the wrong man had been arrested, the real culprit having again appeared. In the interests of justice, however, the discovery was suppressed, and the man who prayed completed his sentence. Moral.—When ye pray, don't stand at a corner like a lunatic or a street-preacher, but enter ye into your closet and pray in secret, and the Lord will give you the usual reward.

The practical worth of "Citizen Sunday" is very little, judging by the discourses reported in the newspapers. A nice specimen was that of the Rev. E. T. Hand, at St. John's, Walworth. He declared that "the horrid City of London, with all its wealth, poverty, and shame, was a dream, but the heavenly city was a reality." It is such nonsense as this that contrives to perpetuate the poverty, suffering, and shame of our big cities.

A movement, the original idea of which was, we believe, started by the late Laurence Oliphant, has been taken up by the Adventists to go to Palestine in a colony and there await the Lord's second coming. This, like the attempt to get the Jews back to Judea, is a religious work which has our warmest commendation. If we can do anything to hasten the day when the Adventists will emigrate from England, we shall be pleased.

Talmage is quite right. Those Atheists are always committing suicide. Colonel Nash, for instance, shot himself at Sandymount, near Dublin. In a letter left behind him he calls several times on God, and says, "I shall soon be in heaven." Evidently an Atheist, this!

Catholics and Protestants are still fighting at Sligo. Policemen keep them from sending each other to heaven. It is almost a pity the bobbies don't let them go. They would be better off, and so would other people.

Eusapia Palladino, the most renowned spirit medium in Europe, who deceived Lombroso, and converted Professor O. Lodge to occultism by pulling his hair in a dark room, has been bowled out at last. Her Continental celebrity and the reports of the Spookical Research Society got her invited to Cambridge. She imprudently accepted, though she declined an invitation from Mr. Maskelyne, the conjurer, who has a standing challenge to duplicate the work of the spirits.

Eusapia does her business in the dark, and makes one hand and one foot do duty for two. Dr. R. Hodgson, who was a chief agent in the exposure of Blavatsky's frauds in India, perceived the process in detail. She placed her feet, so that with the toe and heel of one foot she could make them believe each felt a distinct foot. The exposure appears in the November number of the Proceedings of the P.R.S. Professor Lodge and Mr. Myers agree that the Cambridge séances were fraudulent; but, of course, they cannot allow they were deceived when they trumpeted her supernormal powers on a former occasion.

Eusapia Palladino offers one more example of the ease with which an artful woman may dupe the most learned persons unused to their wicked ways. Florence Cook, in similar fashion, duped poor old Dr. Crookes. The editor of the Quarterly Journal of Science was as putty in the hands of the fair mejum. Dr. Hodgson was able to cope with Eusapia, because he had a previous experience with that arch-impostor, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky.

Mr. Maskelyne, on this subject, makes the observation that he "has found from experience that no class of men can be so readily deceived by simple trickery as scientists. Try as they may, they cannot bring their minds down to the level of the subject, and are as much at fault as though it were immeasurably above them." Being on the look out for trickery, he speedily discovered it, and the wily Eusapia declined all tests proposed by Mr. Maskelyne.

Mexico, as a nation, is still in debt, and with undeveloped resources. Yet, at a recent religious festival in Mexico City, a gold crown was provided for the Virgin at a cost of $40,000. The dress of the statue, it is said, contains diamonds and precious stones estimated to exceed in value $3,000,000. They may be wanted some day to redeem the nation's credit.

The Pope declined to see Methodist Pastor Lunn in his official capacity as President of the Grindelwald Conference, but expressed his willingness to see him in his private capacity as picnic-organiser. On receiving this gentle snub, Methodist Pastor Lunn retired from the Holy City, whither he had been delegated by the Grindelwald picnicers.

Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, who is by birth a Roman Catholic, has, despite the protests of his wife, and in violence of his marriage contract, allowed his infant son to be "converted" and rebaptised into the Greek Church, in order that he may be eligible as his successor on the throne. The religion of princes, and usually of priests too, is pretty much a matter of convenience and worldly advantage.

The Church Times is horrified that Westminster Abbey should be desecrated by a service in honor of Purcell, who was no saint or martyr, but only a musical composer. It is shocked that a concert, for which there will be half-guinea and five-shilling tickets, should be given in a sacred building, and says: "If this is not a traffic wholly unworthy of the Church, we do not know what is." But the Dean of Westminster can do as he pleases as to the purposes to which he employs the Abbey, as he inherits the rights of the old Benedictines. After admitting such heretics as Grote and Darwin within its sacred walls, a concert in honor of Purcell becomes trivial.

The Daily News Paris correspondent condemns the French Government because it insists that priests shall take their share of military duty like other men, and calls this "a piece of Freethought intolerance." He says nothing of the fact that the same rule is followed in pious Protestant Germany. Nor does he mention that in France the priests are State subsidised, and that, until the law in question was passed, thousands entered the priesthood simply to avoid the conscriptions.

Digitized by Google

A clerical writer in the Church Times has hit on a means for persons to establish popularity, and get a little cash in. It is to establish a goose club, offering better terms than the grocers. In the good old days the parsons only thought of fleecing the geese, but now they are thinking of providing geese for their parishioners.

The Crescent reports another outrage at the Liverpool Mosque. On Friday, the Moslem holy day, while the faithful were at prayers, some scoundrels stretched about ten yards of wire some eight inches above the topmost step, so as to trip over and precipitate down the steps the worshippers as they came out after dark. Fortunately the wire was discovered before anyone was injured, and the police are searching for evidence as to the perpetrators of the villainy.

Etchmiadzin, in Armenia, is the seat of the Catholicos or Patriarch of the Armenian Church, who is, however, understood to be really under the Czar as head of the Greek Church. When Captain Wilbraham was there the archbishop informed him that the cathedral "was built on the very spot where our Savior alighted upon earth when he descended from Heaven, in order to destroy the fire-worshippers." It contains a portion of Noah's ark, doubtless of equal authenticity.

We had not hitherto heard of this visit of Christ to Armenia. But we have received from E. Hampden Cook, M.A., the second edition of his work, The Christ has Come, the first edition of which we noticed some time ago. Mr. Cook gives a host of evidence from Jesus and his Apostles that he ought to have come in the first century, during the lifetime of his disciples. Mr. Cook thinks that he did so come, that we are now in the Millennium, and that there will be a third advent. Well, if Christ doesn't bring a better millennium than at his first or second advent, we cannot see much use in his coming again.

The Rev. Dr. Fulton rails in the Evangelist against the Chinese officials as "wretches, half civilised and wholly barbarian." It happens that, just before reading this, we had been perusing the published report of the negotiations for peace between Li-Hung-Chang and the Japanese Minister, Count Ito. Unlike negotiations between Christian nations, every word of their interviews has been published, and, moreover, translated into English. It reflects great credit on both sides. We doubt extremely if any living Christian statesman could have equalled the tact and urbanity, or have surpassed the patriotism, of Li-Hung-Chang, who, under most trying circumstances, and himself suffering from a severe wound, extracted the best terms possible from the Japanese conquerors. Suppose Buddhist missionaries were to sneer at our officials as half-civilised wretches; it would hardly help the spread of their faith.

To judge from the farewell sermon of the Rev. H. H. Henson, Barking must be in a very bad way, notwithstanding his seven years' ministrations there as vicar. In taking leave of the "degraded parish" and its "multitude of revolted souls," the reverend gentleman declared that the men of Barking had yielded to "the appeal of sensuality" until "the streets of that ancient Christian town had become as the highways of the City of the Plains." "The appeal of hatred," he continued, "the hatred of class against class, of rich against poor, of party against party, was loud and constant, and it prevailed.....No man trusted another; everywhere there was the reign of suspicion; and the backbiter and the falsehood-monger were supreme." Such is the Rev. Henson's opinion of his late parishioners. It would now be interesting to learn the parishioners' opinion of their late vicar.—Truth.

Ex-Rev. James Frank Gannaway, a retired Melbourne Congregational pastor, has received a sentence of seven years' imprisonment. Each year represents a child which he begot from his own daughter. The scoundrel attempted to shield himself by blaming his wife and daughter. He said in court that he was in God's hands. God had judged him, and he accepted His judgment. "May God help the jury to come to a righteous judgment." The God fake did not work, for, although the man of God denied the paternity of the children, the jury found him guilty after a few minutes' consideration.

When a handsome man visits the north-eastern portion of Tartary the inhabitants kill him because he is good-looking. They don't want his clothes or his money; they simply want his soul to remain among them. Christians need not laugh at this state of mind, for it was remarked at the last meeting of the British Association, in a discussion on Cannibalism, that the motives which induce a cannibal to eat the flesh and drink the blood of his enemy, in order that his spirit may be imbibed, underlie the ceremony of eating the god in the holy eucharist.

The Standard (Oct. 25) has the following choice anecdote of the aristocracy: "Lady Oxford was a pious woman, who, after a lifetime spent in a very worldly way, assured the Duchess of Buckingham, who was chattering about what 'her Lord' was doing in politics, 'that she knew no Lord but the Lord Jehovah.' 'Oh, dear!' was the innocent reply of the Duchess, a foreigner, 'who is that? I suppose it must be one of the new titles, for I never heard of him before.'"

It is asserted that fifty lives have been lost and several hundreds of persons injured by the recent storm in Italy. Such events both explain the origin of superstition and expose the folly of belief.

The Rev. J. Cromarty Smith has been railing against the "Kid-glove Christians" of the West-end of Glasgow. He says their churches are nothing but comfortable lounges. Look at the 200,000 non-churchgoers of once godly Glasgow. In the face of such a fact, could it be said that the members of the Church were doing their duty among the heathen? What would the Rev. J. Cromarty Smith say if he came South?

At Belfast the Rev. John James Brown, until recently rector of Portglenone, Antrim, has been remanded on a charge of threatening to murder Mr. Thomas Maguire, a Belfast solicitor, with whom he had had a dispute. A loaded revolver was found on the rev. gentleman.

The Daily News says: "Count Lippe, a canon of the Vienna Cathedral, has been entrusted with a delicate mission to Italy. He takes for the Virgin of Loretto a beautiful brocaded robe, which was offered by the Archduchess Maria Theresa, and to the Pope an embroidered purse containing one hundred thousand golden ducats, the gift of the Austrian nobility. It may be noted, says our Vienna correspondent, that whenever money is wanted for charitable purposes, for hospitals, or for the distressed poor in the winter, or after some shocking catastrophe, the names of Austrian noblemen and their wives are always missing from lists of subscriptions." Humanity is often in the inverse proportion to religion.

The Rev. W. Charles Lorsmore, of the New-road Congregational Church, has been eulogising the Bible, which, he says, is the text-book of democracy. He says: "The American Republic was built upon the Bible." What nonsense! The real founders of the Republic—Paine and Jefferson—had no belief in the supernatural claims of that volume. If they had followed the injunction, "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; the powers that be are ordained of God," there would have been no American Republic. It would be more correct to say the Bible is the charter of despotism. The men of God preach the claims of their fetish book because it helps to maintain reverence for them.

It is a fact deserving special notice that Hindus, though more numerous than others, commit less crime than other people, who vaunt that their religion is the only true religion, and that Hindus are heathens and robbers! The English Government should love those who thus show obedience in deeds. No doubt the jail officers may be displeased with Hindus, because they do not swell their departments.—The Harbinger, Lahore, India.

M. Raggonneau, a French scientist, it is said, has exposed the celebrated mango trick of Indian fakirs, who, he noticed, always embedded the seed in a particular soil. M. Raggonneau found out at last that this soil was obtained from ant-hills. As ants contain much formic acid, with which, of course, the soil of their habitations becomes charged, the soil itself, like the acid, has the power of quickly dissolving the integument about a seed, and of stimulating marvellously the growth of the germ within. Though the clever Frenchman was finally able to duplicate the mango trick, the most interesting thing about it all is that this discovery may be profitably applied to agriculture. M. Raggonneau has obtained an acid as strong as vinegar by infusing ants in boiling water, and with this acid has achieved a remarkable vegetable growth.

By an old German law women, who, in the time of Tacitus, took part in tribal councils, are prohibited from joining in any political society, and several members of women's rights associations have been arrested and fined for belonging to an unlawful society. The despotism and militarism of Germany are driving its most advanced spirits to other lands.

The Rev. John Batchelor, in The Ainu of Japan, says the Ainu are very religious, and tells how one, whom he took as gardener, when he asked him to improve the ground by digging in some manure, seriously replied: "What! will you, a clergyman and preacher of religion, so dishonor and insult the gods? Will not the gods give due increase without your attempting to force their hand or endeavoring to drive Nature?" The Ainu are logical believers in the supernatural; but the half-secularised Christians are so unreasonable as to tell people they must do everything for themselves, and then give all the thanks, praise, and glory to God, "that indolent Grand Turk" who, as Carlyle says, "does nothing."

Digitized by Google

At Montreal, Alderman McBride is proposing to abolish all tax exemptions except on hospitals. A great many French-Canadians are said to be favorable to the proposal, which would add about half a million dollars to the revenue of the city; but it is hardly likely that it will be carried. The clerical anaconda is not likely to loosen his hold upon poor Quebec.—Secular Thought.

The Guardian, in an article on "Mr. Riley and the School Board," advises the Church party "to wait until one of these protesting teachers was discovered to be giving religious instruction contrary to the spirit and terms of the Circular, and then put him on his trial." A London School Board teacher put on his trial for heresy would be a fine object lesson in the methods of the clerical party.

The Royal Seamen's and Marines' Orphan School very properly appeals for support to all sections of the community. The orphans, however, are trained in "the principles of the Church of England." Commander Wilcox has justly called attention to this, and, at the annual meeting of the subscribers, remarked that the statement made twelve months ago, that the money to found the institution had been left by two Nonconformists and one of no religion at all, remained uncontradicted, and until this vexed question of sectarianism was cleared up the institution would never, he contended, be properly supported.

The Canadians boast of being a free people, but they give their Postmaster-General the right to exclude any matter from the mails which he pleases. He need not specify any reason, and there is no appeal from his decision. Such power would spoil any average man, and we do not wonder that Postmaster Caron refuses even to specify what he considers objectionable in the pages of the Truthseeker, which he excludes from entry to the dominion. Canada is known as the Mecca of defaulting pious U.S. cashiers; but U.S. Freethought is, it appears, to be rigidly excluded.

The various churches in Cumberland, Md., recently devoted an afternoon and evening in praying the Lord for rain. In the light of present knowledge it does seem ridiculous to see men of brains asking for a reversal of the laws of nature to gratify their needs. The whole machinery of the universe is governed by fixed and changeless law. The rains are obedient to that law, and cannot be increased or diminished by any art of puny man. It was easy to write that the sun was arrested in its course by Joshua's prayer; but he is a very ignorant man who will believe the statement.—Progressive Thinker.

A peculiar incident of the drought is reported from Emmaville, New South Wales, where there are large numbers of Chinese fossickers, who were much retarded in their work by want of rain. They prayed to their joss for some time, and then, losing patience, chopped him up, burnt him, and installed a new joss. Almost immediately afterwards rain fell. The latest joss, accordingly, has been accorded a grand feast.

Salvationists also earned notoriety at Balmain by expressing their belief that Providence had answered their prayers for rain. Both men and women divested themselves of their boots and stockings, while the men, in addition, put off their hats and coats. They waded and splashed through the waterways and channels in the streets, exclaiming vociferously, "God has answered our prayers."

The Tablet (October 26) mentions a report that Princess Maud of Wales is to be betrothed to the Prince of Naples, but denies that Cardinal Vaughan has acted as intermediary, securing the consent of the Holy See on condition that any sons born of the marriage shall be brought up as Catholics. It says that Leo XIII. would be no party to an arrangement by which the faith of one sex would be secured by the sacrifice of those of the other. Really now! The Tablet well knows that such marriages are continually winked at by the Church. Moreover, it knows that Leo XIII. gave a special dispensation to the Duke d'Aosta to marry his own niece.

The clerical members of the London School Board can hardly claim to be civilised gentlemen. They carried, by a majority of 16 over 14 an amendment to the recommendation of the Home Secretary, that girls at industrial schools should not receive corporal punishment. It was proposed instead, by Mr. Athelstan Riley, that a deputation in favor of flogging the girls should wait on the Home Secretary, and this was carried despite the protests of Mrs. Maitland and Miss Davenport Hill. Mr. Cecil, who supported the amendment, quoted the rhyme:—

> Solomon said, in accents mild,
> "Spare the rod and spoil the child.
> Whether a boy, or whether a maid,
> Whack and wallop her," Solomon said.

He forgot to mention that Solomon's own children turned out badly.

The Bible belief in possession by devils still remains among lunatics. Dr. Forbes Winslow thus reports from his notes the case of a woman afflicted with this delusion: "Acute mania, says she is a witch and that the Devil is inside her, and that she has been sent by the Devil to earth, and that she is doomed to go to hell, and that the gates of heaven are closed to her. Raving constantly, and very wild in manner."

First Insane Asylum.

The preachers are boastful in their claim that the finest hospitals were Christian devices for relief of the unfortunate; but it is not true, save as regards insane asylums. We concede they were the originators of that kind of hospitals and that as early as the sixth century at Jerusalem. Gibbon, in his 37th chapter, says one was founded in that city for the reception of penitent monks, who lost their senses by their devotion to God. The principal use of this class of hospitals from that time to this has been to furnish retreats for those maddened by an excess of what is popularly called religion.

On page 587, 18th volume of the Encyclopedia Britannica, second column, it is stated that Asoka, an Indian prince, became a Buddhist about B.C. 263. "He then founded hospitals for men and beasts throughout his realm, planted places where nothing had grown before, and provided wells and grew trees along the roads for the refreshment of man and beast. Further, he caused his example in these things to be followed by his neighbors, whether southern or western."

Is there one Christian preacher in the wide world who will have the manliness to credit the following of Buddha with the invention of hospitals? And dare any of them tell the truth, that the followers of Jesus were the first who constructed insane asylums for the care of their own lunatics?—Progressive Thinker.

Christianity and Witchcraft.

The imported scepticism of such writers as Horace, the growth of the town, and, with it, the promise of a higher civilisation, were influences operating during the Roman occupation of Britain, which had, perhaps, some tendency to eradicate these superstitions. But we know from many passages in the Theodosian Code that in civilised Rome herself, after Rome had become Christian, it was thought right to torture and burn wizards and magicians.—L. O. Pike, "A History of Crime in England," i. 34.

Obituary.

We regret to record the decease of Mr. William Robinson, of Darlington Lodge, Warrington, in his seventy-sixth year. He died, as he had lived, a staunch Freethinker. Every week he gave away six copies of this journal, and cuttings from Freethought journals were often displayed in his window. He was humane and generous; not only the Freethought cause, but various charitable enterprises, being indebted to his munificence. The local Examiner, in recording his death, mentions that he was "well known as a militant Atheist." He was buried in Hartley Churchyard. The minister refused to have the coffin brought into the church, but said a few words at the graveside.

The painful duty has devolved upon me of recording the death of Franz Roos, who died on October 18, at Sunniside, Tow Law, Durham, at the age of seventy-five years. He was a member of the N.S.S. and a fearless friend of the Freethought cause, always attending the lectures of its advocates in the North. His remains were interred at Stanley Churchyard on Sunday, and, in accordance with his wish, without religious ceremony of any kind. He died with confidence in the principles which had guided him during the greater part of his life, and the large number of friends who followed the remains testified to the esteem in which he was held.—J. Robinson.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, November 3, Bradlaugh Club and Institute, 36 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.: 7, "Why I am an Atheist."

November 10, Birmingham; 17, Leicester.

December 1, Bradford; 22, Manchester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—November 3 (morning), Newington Reform Club; (evening), Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell; 10, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 17, Liverpool; 24, Manchester.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

C. S.—Glad to have your high appreciation of our Freethought work. On the other matter you are misinformed. Mr. Foote has not supported, but opposed, State Socialism. He has a great mistrust of wholesale theories, and holds that every social proposal should be considered on its merits, with a view to general utility. At the same time, he has every respect for the generous ardor of many Socialists, however he may, in some respects, think them mistaken. It is agitation that keeps the world from stagnating. Anything is better than hoggish indolence and blind acquiescence.

J. P. Gilmour.—Many thanks for your interesting letter. Glad to hear that Mr. Watts's visit to Paisley, under the new scheme, was such a success. We pass over the rumpus, as Mr. Watts is going to write a full account of his tour for our next issue. We have handed him your letter, which will no doubt be of assistance to him.

G. Clancy, 50 Back Wood-terrace, Primrose-hill, Huddersfield, is the new secretary of the local N.S.S. Branch, in place of W. H. Spivey resigned.

W. H. Spivey.—We hope Mr. Cohen's visit will stir you all up, and that other lectures will soon follow.

J. Hayes.—Which case is it, our reference to which is misleading? There are several on the cutting you enclose.

Mr. Forder has received a letter containing 2s. for pamphlets and 1s. for Shilling Week from Hamilton, but no name or address is given.

W. Dyson.—Mr. Foote will certainly pay Barnsley a visit if you can get a decent meeting-place. See "Acid Drops." The leaflet might be printed for two or three pounds, according to the number and quality of paper; say, twenty thousand. We are so indignant at the conduct of Messrs. Pickard and Cowey, that we will write the leaflet for you, if you will only send us the fullest particulars you can gather.

T. Clark.—It is all fudge. The Freethinker has always been supplied to the trade on sale or return. Newsagents should insist on the wholesale agent's supplying them in the same way. But bigotry is always interfering with our circulation. Thanks to you all the same.

G. Harding.—Thanks. Mr. Foote will write.

L. Levine.—Many thanks.

F. J. Boorman.—Your lecture notice was too late last week. You did not post it till Tuesday night, as the Chatham post-mark was "Oct. 23."

W. G. Unkles.—See "Acid Drops."

J. Robinson.—Compelled to shorten.

A. J. H.—Thanks.

T. Sykes.—See obituary. Coins must not be enclosed in letters. The Post Office charges double registration on delivery. We had to pay eightpence for your shilling, so can only credit you with fourpence.

E. Smedley.—(1) Both the disputants are trusting to fabulous records. This alone is certain—Christianity was introduced in England, and by the Catholic Church, for at that time there were no Protestants. (2) Pleased to hear you were "delighted" with our article on the Black Army. We agree with you that lectures lose half their value unless they lead to the perusal of Freethought literature.

W. D. Rolley.—£230 a year.

W. Simons asks us to request the local Freethinkers to meet to-day (Nov. 3) at 36, Newington Green-road, at 12, to initiate preparations for next season's open-air work.

J. Ratson.—Such letters in the local press are most useful.

H. Sharples.—Apply to Mr. Forder, 28, Stonecutter-street, London, E.C., for the papers you mention.

D. F. Gloak.—Pleased to have your opinion that Mr. Watts's lectures at Dundee and Cupar prove our lecture scheme to be "a splendid idea." See our answer to Mr. Gilmour.

B. Lee.—The Freethinker would have double its present circulation if it were not for the active opposition of bigots.

E. D. H. Daly.—Thanks for cuttings.

A. Cox.—Pleased to receive your encouraging letter.

W. Palmer.—The other sum is probably waiting to go in with the general list. But we will inquire.

A. W. Stavers.—Cuttings that may serve as material for a paragraph are always welcome.

C. Cohen.—We only received your letter on Tuesday, after returning from Devonshire. Send us your fresh address.

J. White.—We also wish your 5s. were £500. What is wanted is money. If a millionaire would find a few thousands a year, we would undertake to double, treble, quadruple the forces of Freethought.

W. W. Box.—Thanks for cutting.

Papers Received.—New York Sun—New York World—Morning—Dublin Evening Herald—Christian Herald—Echo—Isle of Man Times—Melbourne Standard—New York Public Opinion—Introduction—Calcutta Sunday Times—Liberator—Melbourne Age—Secular Thought—Torch—Leek Times—Lucifer—Sunday Companion—New York Times—Truthseeker—Kent Herald—Progressive Thinker—Friedenker—Der Arme Teufel—Twentieth Century—Two Worlds.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SHILLING MONTH.

As subscriptions still dribble in, and the month is not quite ended as we go to press, I will reserve till next week what I intend to say with respect to the number of persons who have subscribed, the amount of their donations, and what I may be enabled to do therewith between this and the new year.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

(Where merely the name is given the amount is one shilling.)

Macclesfield, 2s. 6d.: Steve Edmunds, 2s.; Whitby; Peal; Smith, 6d.; A. J. W.; Bristol Freethinker; F. J. Boorman; C. S., 2s. 6d.; A. J. W., 2s.; Two Plucked Brands, 2s.; M. A., 2s.; T. Sykes, 4d.; W. Crosland, £2; Servant Girl (second subscription); B. Lee, 1s. 6d.; R. Shaw, 2s. 6d.; W. Muir, 2s. 6d.; J. Walker, 2s. 6d.; E. Thorley; A. Cox, 5s.; R. Brookes, 5s.; C. Dryden; W. V., 2s.; E. Truelove, 2s. 6d.; W. Palmer; R. B. Harrison, 1s. 6d.; A. W. Stavers, 2s.; R. W. Stavers; A. Clacher, 5s.; J. Ritson, 2s. 6d.; H. Sharples; Two Jersey Agnostics, 2s. 6d.; J. S., 2s. 6d.; J. Goodanew; G. F. P.; N. P.; F. Pascoe, 3s.; H. Nicholson, 2s. 6d.; T. Elwen, 2s. 6d.; G. Biggs, 3s.; T. Waters, 2s.; J. White, 5s.; R. Crowther; T. Crossley; J. Clegg; Two Friends, 2s.; F. Thornett, 5s.; A. Anderson, 2s. 6d.; W. Scott, 5s.

Per C. Watts.—Paisley Friends, 9s. 6d.; Mr. Maclean, 5s.

Per Miss Vance.—F. Mason; Mrs. Hodgson, 2s.; W. Early; T. Campbell, 2s.; J. Orr; Mr. and Mrs. John Samson, 2s.; Mrs. Penny, 3s.

Per R. Forder.—Mr. Syrett, 5s.; B. L. Coleman, 10s.; Alpha; Tom Beach, 2s. 6d.; W. Snelling, 5s.; W. B. (Darlington), 2s. 6d.; G. P.; J. and Mrs. S., 2s.; T. Coram; F. Softley; A. C. Brown.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote delivered three lectures on Sunday in the Co-operative Hall, Plymouth. There were good audiences, though not up to Mr. Foote's general level. This was probably owing to the shortness of the public announcement and the sudden cold weather. Some discussion followed the morning and afternoon lectures, but none in the evening. In a chat with the Committee at the end of the day's work, Mr. Foote promised to arrange, if possible, for a week's Freethought mission in the district by Mr. Watts or Mr. Cohen, or perhaps by each of them. It is also on the cards that a debate may take place at Plymouth during the winter.

This evening (November 3) Mr. Foote delivers the inaugural lecture at the Balls Pond Secular Hall, his subject being "Why I am an Atheist." The Finsbury Park,

Digitized by Google

Balls Pond, and Islington Branches are co-operating for the purpose of keeping this hall open for Freethought propaganda, and it is at their request that the President gives the first public lecture there.

The Bradlaugh Club and Institute, as the Balls Pond Hall is now called, is 36 Newington Green-road, three minutes' walk from Mildmay Park Station (N. L. R.); omnibuses from Victoria to Stoke Newington pass the door; trams from Aldersgate-street within a minute's walk; trams from Moorgate to Manor House, viâ Green Lanes, within five minutes' walk.

Mr. Touzeau Parris lectured at the Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening to a very good audience, considering the unfavorable weather. He delivered a fine discourse, and was most warmly applauded. Mr. Watts (who is at the Newington Reform Club, S.E., in the morning) occupies the platform this evening, and will of course meet with a hearty welcome. The lecturer for the following Sunday evening is Mr. Cohen. We hope the London friends will give him the encouragement of a good meeting.

Mr. Watts is back in London after a fortnight in the North, where, in addition to other meetings, he has addressed some very successful ones under Mr. Foote's lecturing scheme. His final meeting was at York; nearly four hundred people attended, and contributed an excellent collection, which covered the considerable local expenses. Some of Mr. Watts's experiences, especially at Glasgow and Paisley, were rather exciting; but we will not go into details, as he intends to write at some length on his tour in our next issue.

Mr. Charles Watts had capital audiences at Edinburgh last Sunday. In the evening the hall was crowded, all standing-room being occupied. The audiences were most enthusiastic, and it was pleasing to see so many ladies present. An interesting debate took place after the evening lecture.

The Wood Green Branch has decided to continue its lectures in the Masonic Hall during the winter. They have been excellently reported in the local Pioneer. This Sunday evening Mr. Mawer, F.G.S., deals with the subject of "Evolution v. Creation," and it is hoped the attendance will be as good as heretofore.

The Sunday Times, of Calcutta, is decidedly Freethought in its character, and its issue for September 29 has a good article satirising the Bible account of creation, which it compares very unfavorably with that related by the Brahmins.

A life of Professor Huxley is being compiled by his son, Leonard Huxley. He requests any person with letters from Huxley to communicate with him at Charleston, Godalming.

A centenary in celebration of the birthday of Thomas Carlyle is to be held at his old residence, Cheyne-walk, Chelsea, which is being converted into a Carlyle Museum.

In John Stuart Blackie: A Biography, by Anna M. Stoddart, appears the following bit on Bradlaugh, done in Blackie's Carlylese:—"He made a notable exhibition. A terrible tearing assault against the book of Exodus and its anthropomorphic representations of the unseen God; eloquence powerful and fervid of the first order. Really a remarkable man, and, from his point of view, triumphant over those who hold by the infallibility of the record instead of the divinity of the dispensation. He made, incidentally, a profession of Atheism, which induced me to write him a long letter."

Mr. Foote's new pamphlet, Bible and Beer, is the subject of a leading article in the Weekly Times and Echo. "People of all opinions," our contemporary says, "may read it with profit," its author being "one of the few men amongst us who has proved the sincerity of his opinions by suffering for them." With regard to the main contention of the pamphlet, our contemporary expresses its agreement in the plainest language: "Mr. Foote is quite right in his contention that, at the first, the parsons of all denominations were among the bitterest opponents of the Temperance movement. When the Temperance men became stronger, the parsons began to patronise them, just as now-a-days they kindly patronise Socialists. There is not a word in the sermons or writings of any of the great Church or Nonconformist divines in favor of teetotalism—in fact, many of them recognised, as plainly as Mr. Foote does, that, with the exception of the special prohibitions in Leviticus x. 8, 9 and Numbers vi. 2-4, relating to the Aaronic priesthood and the Nazarites, and the caution in Proverbs xx. 1, the Biblical writers all praise and desire the moderate use of wines and strong drinks. Mr. Foote, of course, instances this as damaging to the Bible and to the Churches; but we are not sure that he does not give himself away now and again. It is, in our opinion, just possible that the Biblical writers and the earlier clergy knew a little more about human nature than the more rabid teetotalers; and that some of the more scrupulous successors of the former would have been better employed in combating the evils that lead to drunkenness than in capturing the Temperance organisations for their own purposes. Anyhow, we are in complete agreement with Mr. Foote when he says that it is to wise education began in childhood that we must mainly trust for the general amelioration of society in this and other matters. We quite believe that the picture of a drunkard's liver on the walls of a Board-school will produce a more permanent impression on children's minds than all the texts in the Bible, which have to be so 'explained' before they can be safely used."

The November number of the Literary Guide contains a very interesting "Literary Chat" with Miss Mathilde Blind, written by Mr. F. J. Gould. We are glad to note that Mr. Gould's leaflet on the need and value of ethical teaching in Board Schools, instead of Biblical instruction, is being extensively circulated.

From E. Salva, 7 Rue Saint-Nicaise, Rouen, who is a leading conférencier of that part of France, we receive a little packet of brochures. No. 1, a discourse on the soul, De l'Ame, has reached a third edition. The lecture concludes: "Nous n'avons nul besoin de nous croire immortels pour nous bien conduire; guidés par notre conscience, nous agissons en hommes libres, sans désir de récompense, sans crainte de châtiment." State and Church (L'Etat et l'Eglise) contends that the 300,000 clergy who are subsidised by the State are really the worst foes of the Republic. He compares the Church to the octopus or devil-fish, described by Victor Hugo in his Travailleur de la mer. It is vain to cut off a single tentacle; to escape its deadly clutches decapitation is necessary.

La Libre-Pensée et les Réligions, also by M. Salva, is a severe indictment of the Christian Church for its opposition to liberty, science, and progress. La Femme: ce qu'elle fut, ce qu'elle est, ce qu'elle devrait être, is a strong appeal for woman's emancipation from superstition, that she may take her place as the companion of man, the manageress of the home, and the instructress of children. All M. Salva's lectures are animated, elevated, and full of a warm sentiment of the solidarity of humanity.

The Echo is a paper that really does carry out its motto to "hear all sides," and very frequently Freethought views get ventilated in its columns. Its issue for October 26 has a capital letter on Christian temporising with truth, from the pen of Mr. G. L. Mackenzie, who, our readers know, can put his ideas pointedly, whether in prose or verse.

The English Mechanic, now in its sixty-second volume, is always well edited, and competent readers largely contribute to the interest and variety of its pages. "A Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society," by his acute criticisms, keeps the other contributors "up to date."

In Dr. Briggs's new volume on The Messiah of the Apostles he makes the following admission: "The author has done his best to turn away from the Christ of the theologians and of the creeds and of the Church, and see the Messiah as he is set forth in the writings of the Apostles. He has made every effort to see the Messiah as he appeared to each writer in each separate writing. The diversity is great. It is not always possible to combine the diverse representations in a higher unity. It would have been easy to construct what some call a logical system. But it would not have been possible to constrain all the material into such a system of deductive logic."

The Leek Times reproduces our last paragraphs on the Rev. W. W. Howard's "challenge" letters, and adds, with respect to Mr. Foote's offer: "If the above proposition, which we deem both fair and reasonable, does not lead to business, we shall decline sacrificing any more space on the subject." So shall we.

South London readers will remember the dramatic performance at the Camberwell Secular Hall on November 13, in aid of the new lecture scheme. Mr. Watts and Mr. Moss will take part, and Mr. Foote will give a reading.

THE WORLD'S NEED.

So many gods, so many creeds—
So many paths that wind and wind,
While just the art of being kind
Is all the sad world needs.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (September 28).

AGAIN upon the lovely ocean, and homeward bound. Again the shores sink from view, and again the mighty ship, plunging through the glistening billows, is for the time being the bounded world of humanity.

The past summer appears a dream floating before the mind's eye like a wondrous panorama. In the sunshine, beneath the boundless heavens, we muse and meditate, while with soft, continuous thunder through blue depths the huge vessel speeds with flying banners. It is beautiful, serene, rejoicing, all the shining expanse, while fresh winds give vigor and elasticity to the frame; while, as the sea itself, the mind sparkles with a thousand thoughts. Like a mirror, it reflects the gorgeous scene. This is pure happiness, a diamond-like existence, without burden, without care. An ocean voyage is poetry, music, romance. We are borne along whether we will or no, and abandon ourselves with inexpressible delight to the changing glory of wave and sky.

Farewell to England, to its ancient grandeur, its accumulated wealth of centuries, its blossom in to-day's life of a thousand years of toil. The "golden eloquence" of Shakespeare was never so deeply felt. The more we appreciate England, the better we understand all the world.

> This sceptred isle,
> This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
> This other Eden, demi-paradise,
> This fortress built by nature for herself
> Against infection and the hand of war,
> This happy breed of men, this little world,
> This precious stone set in the silver sea.

The last two weeks seemed to go like a flash. I can give only a glimpse of these crowded days. It was as if the hand of time was turning a kaleidoscope, and each moment presented a new picture.

I spent an evening with Edward Truelove, the oldest Freethinker in the world, I guess. He is in his eighty-fifth year. He is like a mountain, over whose face have passed the storms of conflict, but is now shining in rugged serenity. He has always shown great courage in the publication of radical books, and has suffered imprisonment therefor. He gave me many reminiscences of his extraordinary experiences, and I realised more than ever the savage nature of that Christian theology which still sways in the laws of England. The tortures of imprisonment are but little understood. It is a living death. Man is treated like a machine. Every right is violated. It is bad enough when criminals are thus treated; but what shall we say when those who are devoted to the improvement of mankind are compelled to endure this terrific ordeal? We cannot too highly honor those who, like Holyoake, Truelove, Bennett, and Foote, have conquered through these depths of solitary suffering. They have given to our time a noble realm, but at an awful cost, which we are sometimes apt to forget in the enjoyments of these happy days.

Mr. and Mrs. Truelove celebrated their golden wedding about five years ago. At their home at Hornsey they still give welcome to Freethought friends. In Mr. Truelove's library, gathered through many years from his book store, are rare Freethought publications, not to be found even in the British Museum. He has portraits of Godwin, Hetherington, Watson, etc. He has the table upon which Thomas Paine wrote the Rights of Man, which bears an inscription recording the fact, placed there by Clio Rickman, who owned the table when Mr. Truelove first saw it in his early manhood at Rickman's house. In after years, by strange coincidences, it came into Mr. Truelove's possession. Mr. Truelove also showed me a picture of Paine's iron bridge, the first iron bridge built on this planet, and which still arches the river at Sunderland. Many phases of the world's history flashed before me in my brief visit with this remarkable veteran, whose life has spanned so much of the nineteenth century.

Liverpool is my next lecturing field, August 25, and here I again receive a hearty Lancashire welcome. The hall is full in the evening, and, though the challenge for debate is given, no Christian opponents appear. They seem to be discouraged, or perhaps they will resort to guerilla warfare and attack the lecturer when he is far across the Atlantic. Liverpool has a varied and interesting Freethought element, which branches out in manifold directions—literature, science, politics, and philosophy. Mr. Ernest Newman has fine promise in the field of art and criticism, for he has the faculty of appreciation and the talent of expression. Mr. Laurence Small, Mr. Wollett, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Towers, Secretary Doeg, the Balfour brothers, etc., are generously equipped for the service. Liverpool is not an easy field. It demands work and expenditure. There are so many forces in play here that Freethought must watch and win its chance. All sorts of "isms" are on the move. Liverpool is more like Chicago than any other city I know of. It is comparatively modern, and there is no ancient flavor about it. It is a city of to-day. It has something of the rush and roar of Western life, and lacks the oriental ease of time-honored institutions. It has not even an old cathedral, but must build a new one. Liverpool, therefore, like Chicago, is open to all kinds of influences, tendencies, commotions, and reforms. It is not tied down. It has no deep roots into the mighty past, like London and Edinburgh. No knights, no castles, haunt the memories of Liverpool. She is pre-eminently the "child of the sea." From "watery Neptune" she derives her pomp and pride and circumstance.

Liverpool takes its name from the Welsh; the words, Lher pool, signifying "place of the pool." The Domesday Book does not contain the name of Liverpool. In King John's time it was only a fishing village. During the reign of King Edward the First it had only 800 inhabitants. In 1347, when levies were made by Edward III. upon London for 25 ships and 662 men, Bristol 22 ships and 608 men, Hull 16 ships and 466 men, for the war against France, Liverpool was required to furnish only one bark and six men. In Queen Elizabeth's time the place is described as "Her Majesty's poor decayed town of Liverpool." In 1634, when Charles I. made his levy of ship money, Liverpool was let off with £15, while Chester paid £100, and Bristol £1,000. The Liverpool of modern times began about 1738. In 1800 the population was 77,000; in 1868, 500,000; to-day, with the incorporation of surrounding municipalities, the "Greater Liverpool" will enroll a population of over one million. It will thus be seen that Liverpool is mainly a city of the nineteenth century, and, with its marvellous and widespread trade, possesses the characteristics of this teeming age, having much of the dash and energy and comprehensive spirit of the great cities of America. I find a good deal of the Yankee in this ocean-nurtured metropolis. Farewell to Liverpool. I hope to see again its spacious docks, its thousand flags, its villas and mansions, its handsome parks and gardens, its noble Mersey, and its brilliant Freethinkers, who will certainly keep these busy shores illuminated with reason and liberty.

Margate flows on the vision next—Margate by the sea, one of the "peculiar institutions" of England. We might say of it, "Age cannot wither, nor custom stale, its infinite variety." One would miss quite a picture of English out-door life if he did not go to Margate and its brilliant surroundings—Ramsgate, Broadstairs, etc. Broadstairs was one of the favorite abodes of Dickens, where he wrote Bleak House. It is certainly a lovely place for meditation and romance. I went down with Foote and Watts, and we surrendered ourselves to the beauty of sea and land, and roamed through realms of lively enchantment. The moment you strike Margate you are in the midst of a big crowd. It seems as if everybody was coming there. You wander to the beach, and it is covered with thousands of people. All sorts of shows are rampant—the minstrels, the shooting-galleries, the phrenological lecturer, the donkeys, etc. Hundreds of children with bare legs splash through the waters, digging holes in the sand, or building castles. The "machines" go in and out; the boats fly; the steamships roll, packed to the brim, and far away spreads the immensity of the ocean with its million flashing waves. It is a vast and animated scene. Everybody is happy, and abandons himself to the impulse of the moment. It is the fashion to do as you please. Nature smiles with exhilarating changefulness. The sunshine is gorgeous, and the houses and streets are bathed in splendor, and wherever you look there is the joy of untrammelled life. It does people good to come to these great, bright, beautiful shores and be "real folks," to be as outspoken and rollicking as the sea itself. It is health to the whole man, body and brain, this wild and wondrous motion of the waters; this glory of the heavens; this free, democratic, cheerful, luminous interminglings of all sorts and conditions of humanity on the broad level spaces of the spangled shores upon which the sea-god pours his brightest jewels.

Great coaches, with "four-in-hand," speed from Margate to Ramsgate, and it is a charming drive. For a while we leave the blue ocean behind. Green fields and groves, beautiful gardens and delightful homes, clothed with ivy and roses, expand upon the view. Then again the ocean appears as we dash down the declivity into the bustling town. Ramsgate, if anything, is more jubilant than Margate. At some portions of our way we can scarcely push along, so intricate is the multitude. We reach the immense pier, from which there is an extensive view of sea and shore. For miles the chalk cliffs stretch their battlements in white radiance. We see the cloudy lands of Dover, where King Lear once walked, and beyond, in the keen sunset, can sometimes be discerned the faint outlines of the hills of France. From the pier we journey to the lofty walls, where Hotel Granville fronts the main, one of the most beautiful hotels I have ever seen. It is more picturesque than most buildings of the kind. There is an element of poetry in its architecture. It has towers and turrets and spacious roofs. It is not all straight up and down, but there are curved lines and sunlit spaces, where, in ordinary hotels, are confinement and gloom. It is in harmony, I think, with its environments, the tall cliffs the vast sea, the glowing heights, shadowed by stately groves.

Digitized by Google

In the moonlight and starlight, through dim majestic pictures, we return to Margate, to Terrace Hotel, and Hearts of Oak Restaurant, which are along the Marine Drive. We receive a jolly welcome, for the landlord is S. H. Munns, an old-time Freethinker, side by side with Bradlaugh, and always ready to do his level best. Our appetite is good, and the dinner is delightful. After the dinner we sit upon the broad portico, with the sea before and the stars above, while below the crowds pace along the brilliant streets, and occasional music bursts athwart the electric lights, and the tide comes glistening in, until all the sandy spaces shine with lustrous waves. Amidst these bewitching surroundings, with nature and the human heart in magnetic attraction, we indulge in reminiscences of the past, of Bradlaugh's mighty battle, with whom my confrères had fought and won, and whose spirit still walks abroad, unchained by death, and burning in the thoughts of to-day and to-morrow. How wonderfully life expands when we thus look on the limitless sea and the limitless stars. It was a glorious night. I shall not forget its manifold scenes, its stars and waves, its circling lamps, its murmuring people, its joyous companionship, its music of hope, "ring out the old, ring in the new."

On the morrow we drive to Broadstairs, and thence walk along the margin of the sea to Ramsgate. It is beautiful, the tall cliffs for our pathway, the sea a hundred feet beneath, murmuring and glistening on miles of shore with faint melody, while like little fairies almost seem the people that wander up and down; and the great blue spreads beyond in immeasurable glory, while on the other side masses of green fields and golden harvests mingle with the dark splendor of groves. We pass around the magnificent estate of the noble Montefiore, the philanthropist who made all the world his country. It was a place where one's mind might be filled with great and beautiful ideas, so broad and universal is the aspect nature presents. It is enough to make us boys again, and when we come across a venerable man who might be Merlin or any other bearded vision of antiquity, whose only means of living was a cocoanut gallery, it behoved us, of course to try a hand. You pay a penny a shot. If you hit the cocoanut, the cocoanut is yours. If not, the old man is a penny ahead. Only one of us made out to hit the cocoanut, but it was good exercise, and made us breathe the atmosphere of youth. This is one of the favorite games along the seashore. From Ramsgate we pursue a roundabout course to Margate, where we again refresh the inner man at the Hearts of Oak Restaurant, bid farewell to our comrade and host, Mr. S. H. Munns, and his wife, and return to London, beneath the illuminations of the harvest moon.

On Saturday my good friend of Wales memory, Mr. Horatio Montefiore, takes me to another sea resort, Bognor. This is down towards Portsmouth. We ride through a beautiful country, great hills on either side crowned with bountiful forest, with here and there a castellated mansion; anon the noble structure of Arundel appears, and the vast cathedral built for the Catholic Church by the Duke of Norfolk; all amidst scenery of magnificent loveliness. It is wonderful how green the landscapes are in England at this season. It is like the freshness of springtime. The fields fairly glitter. There is nothing like it in America except in June. After June the sober brown, with harvest gold, begins to prevail. But in England it is still a brilliant green flashing against the dazzling harvest and "cloth of gold" of innumerable buttercups. They say that there is a still more brilliant green in Ireland. If so, it must be a fascinating land indeed, a jewel "set in the silver sea." These vivid colors seem almost like music as they strike the vision. If there is such a thing as a "symphony of colors," then England and Ireland are attuned to glorious melody, with these emerald hues at the gateways of summer and autumn. Bognor is not like Margate. It is a different picture of English life, quiet and attractive. There are no crowds here, no rush and turmoil. The broad sea is before you—the lovely beach, with two or three hundred people roaming leisurely along, and children at play. It is a pleasing scene if one wants perfect rest. It animates and soothes. At Margate you must be on the go; you must keep up with the procession. At Bognor you can float away in dreams; you can take things easy. There is just enough excitement to tingle the blood, while allowing you to sink away in delicious slumber. There is good companionship here. If one wants a bower of paradise, he will find it at Victoria Hotel, Mr. E. Lawford-Webb proprietor. You have the best of everything, with all the loveliness of country life about you, and, when you desire, the far-off glistening sea mingles with the radiance of tree and flower and grass. Mr. and Mrs. W. Taylor extend their hospitality to the American visitor, and the merry children also animate the circle. Lawn tennis adds its variable fortunes and dancing colors to the charm and music of the sea. I had a thoroughly enjoyable day. I have not found any of that "British reserve" yet. So far as my experience goes, the Britons are as open, generous, and hospitable as the typical Westerner himself. They will give you a good hearty handshake, and make you feel at home with frankness and joviality. The elegance of civilisation does not diminish the real humanity of the Briton. He has too much business with all the world to be a provincial. Those who do the work in England, who keep its commerce, trade, literature, science, on the move, are those who give the stranger a generous welcome. I must thank my friend Montefiore for a happy introduction to English good-fellowship, and for the enjoyment of noble sceneries. I hope America can sometime repay these delightful experiences.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

(To be continued.)

ADVANCE, HUMANITY!

OPPRESSION'S hateful powers! Why lighten now
The hand that, many centuries, has crushed
The manhood of our race? Kings, priests, and all
The tyrannous who have made might a law,
Treading fair right into the mire; have ye
Then recognised that to attempt to stem
The irresistible and boundless tide
Of human progress can but mean that, though
A transient halt is made in man's advance,
Yet, gath'ring strength e'en from the brief repulse,
The tital wave shall sweep thee from its path
Like feathers whirled before the cyclone's might?
Yea, priest, thou know'st the mind's emancipate
From superstitions thou hast striven hard
To shackle Freedom with. Thou seeketh now
That it shall be believed thy place is in
The van of Progress' army.
Hold no hope
That man will ever come again within
Thy baneful grasp. Thou and the monarchs whom
Thou hast maintained to have a right divine
T' enslave Humanity are doomed to pass
Away, and Man shall rise in brotherhood;
Shall achieve solidarity, and make
The planet radiant with glancing beams
Of love that shall pervade the universe.

F. W. THORRINGTON.

"There Goes an Atheist."

Such was the covert attack made by a Christian acquaintance of mine regarding one of whom I could repeat: "Yes there goes an Atheist, who, for fourteen years, has had a happy home, the father of a healthy, sturdy little girl, who promptly pays his rates and taxes, his butcher and baker, and, like the village blacksmith, can look 'the whole world in the face, for he owes not any man'; has had his name standing on the books of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary for many years as a subscriber, and to various charitable lists appends his signature most willingly." Now, let me show your readers the record of this Christian gentleman (my brother-in-law), who, since uttering the innuendo which heads this paper, has suddenly decamped, leaving his wife and three helpless children without a penny; leaving her the victim of a loathsome disease (one of the bairns showing the result of this); leaving his rates and taxes unpaid; his grocer, upholsterer, and milliner unpaid; his gas bill, his coal bill, his poor servants' wages bill, also unpaid. It now transpires he abused his wife and his weens; he starved them so that he could drink; but, to make amends for all these sins, he was a humble but earnest communicant in the late Reverend Robert Barclay's (Established) Church, Greenock.

A. S.

Jonah—A New Version.

The Rev. John Jasper has joined the army of Higher Critics, and deals thusly with the Jonah-whale story: "Dat country war a sea shoah, an' de hotels dey wuz named aftah de tings ob de sea. Dar wuz de 'Sailors' Pannikin,' de 'Main Brace Splicer,' de 'Seaman's Paradise,' an' so forth, et cetera, jes' as yo see 'em in Ratcliffe Highway; an' one ob 'em was called 'Daniel's Den,' an' anudder the 'Whale's Belly.' Den Jonah he kum along an' stayed right hyar in de 'Whale's belly' free days and free nights, when de landly she foun' out he didn't have no scrip in his purse, so she spewed him right out. An' she gib him such a awful boist, it sent him spinnin' right ober to Nineveh, hunnerds an' hunnerds o' miles away frum de sea. Dis beautiful history, dear bredren, am gib us to show us how, when we don't treat a man right kase he's pore, we may be kickin' an angel unawares. De deakins will now take up de collection.

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

A book which should be of interest is announced by the Chautauquan Century Press. It is entitled Some First Steps in Human Progress, and is by Frederick Starr, of the University of Chicago. The book deals with fire-making, food-getting, basketry, pottery, hunting, arts relating to plants, domestication, stone working, metal working, dress, habitation, travel, speech, folk-lore, sociology, and religion. If the Professor can afford to tell the truth about the first steps in religion, the work should be a valuable one.

* * *

A History of Slavery and Serfdom, by J. K. Ingalls, though only an enlargement and revision of the article on "Slavery" which Dr. Ingram contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica, deserves mention as filling up a gap remaining in English literature. The French have Wallon's Esclavage dans l'Antiquite and Larroque's Esclavage Chez les Nations Chretiennes. In Germany there is an elaborate section on Roman Slavery in Marquardt's Privatleben der Römer. Esther Copley's History of Slavery and its Abolition (1833) is a poor book, beginning: "I thank the goodness and the grace which on my birth have smiled and, made me in these Christian days a happy English child."

* * *

Volume vi. of the Christian Classics Series, published by the Religious Tract Society, is entitled The Writings of Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland. It ought to be entitled Selections Translated from Writings Attributed to Patrick, for Dr. C. H. H. Wright, the translator, admits that writings are included "which are of doubtful genuineness." We should say all are in this category. He also says he has omitted, as far as possible, "all matter which has been made the subject of religious controversy." In such a case it is likely that the deleted matter is most important. We wonder what Irish Catholics will think of the Protestant garb given to the banisher of snakes from Ireland.

* * *

Shakespeare's England, by William Winter, is the first of Macmillan's Miniature Series, got up in very neat fashion for the American market. It is an account, not of England in the time of Shakespeare, but of visits to England's historic haunts by an American, keenly touched with all the beauty of the past of the mother country. We heard an old English Freethinker remark that Mr. Putnam had told him more about England than he knew before, and certainly a perusal of this delightful little volume may lend fresh interest to our native land.

* * *

Mr. Alfred Kitson, the author of Outlines of Spiritualism (Hanging Heaton, Dewsbury, Yorks: 1s. 3d.), is the person who riled that good man Stead at the last Conference of Spiritists, by declaring that the education of children should discard the old teachings of Christianity. In the book before us, which is designed for the use of children's lyceums in particular, and Spiritualists in general, Mr. Kitson has pursued that plan with signal advantage. He is thus able to teach the doctrine of evolution instead of creation, of all-round development instead of restraint, the teachings of science concerning the past of this world and of man instead of the ancient myths, and to base ethics chiefly on secular relations. In its main features the book is decidedly rationalistic. Mr. Kitson insists on the necessity of depending on action, and the foolishness of dependence on belief. He gives useful information on the ill effects of past creeds, and on how the Bible, which he shows countenances Spiritism, was compiled. Yet must we state our opinion that Spiritism retains the germ of the mischiefs seen to arise in the old faiths.

* * *

Mr. Kitson's longest chapter is on "The Various Conception of Heaven and Hell of all Nations," in which there is much information concisely given. He does not, however, notice how many savage nations believe, like the Theosophists, in man having a multiplicity of spirits within him, nor does he mention that many of them hold that heaven is only for the chiefs and upper classes. If he consulted Mr. Tylor's work on Primitive Culture and Mr. Frazer's Golden Bough, he would perhaps better understand the genesis of these beliefs, and come to see that the revelations of Andrew Jackson Davis concerning the summerland must be put in the same category as the beliefs of the inhabitants of Tahiti.

* * *

Public Speaking and Debate: A Manual for Advocates and Agitators, by George Jacob Holyoake (Fisher Unwin), is a much-enlarged version of a work which was of considerable utility in its day, and the merits of which were testified to by Wendell Phillips, and appreciated by many English Freethinkers, as well as by Dr. Joseph Parker, to whom this new edition is dedicated. We have not compared the editions. The present should have the fruits of a riper experience, but it may be doubted if amplification was necessary. The more concise and direct hints and instructions for public advocacy are the better. Whether in speech-making or writing, phrase-mongering and rhetoric are, if used for their own sake, to be reprobated. All that can be taught may be put in brief compass. The Scotch doctor who said there were only two rules—(1) to say what you have to say in as few words as you can; and (2) when you've said it to hold your tongue—fairly superseded Blair and all the other rhetoricians. If he could only have taught his pupils to first think clearly before speaking at all, he would have been a perfect master. None the less, the youth who desires to become a public advocate and agitator cannot be recommended to a better book than this by Mr. Holyoake who gives abundant good advice and apt illustration.

Why Christianity is Accepted by Indian Aborigines.

If we analyse the views of most of the Oraon converts to Christianity, we shall, I think, be able to discern the influence of their Pagan doctrines and superstitions in the motives that first led them to become catechumens. The Supreme Being who does not protect them from the spite of malevolent spirits has, they are assured, the Christian under his special care. They consider that, in consequence of this guardianship, the witches and bhuts [devils] have no power over Christians, and it is, therefore, good for them to join that body. They are taught that for the salvation of Christians one great sacrifice has been made, and they see that those who are baptised do not, in fact, reduce their live-stock to propitiate the evil spirits. They grasp at the notion, and long afterwards, when they understand it better, the Atonement, the mystical washing away of sin by the blood of Christ, is the doctrine on which their simple minds most dwell.—Colonel Dalton, "Ethnology of Bengal," p. 257.

Scepticism.

If a man holding a belief which he was taught in childhood, or persuaded of afterwards, keeps down and pushes away any doubts which arise about it in his mind, purposely avoids the reading of books and the company of men that call in question or discuss it, and regards as impious those questions which cannot easily be asked without disturbing it; the life of that man is one long sin against mankind.

Inquiry into the evidence of a doctrine is not to be made once for all, and then taken as finally settled. It is never lawful to stifle a doubt; for either it can be honestly answered by means of the inquiry already made, or else it proves that the inquiry was not complete.

"But," says one, "I am a busy man; I have no time for the long course of study which would be necessary to make me in any degree a competent judge of certain questions, or even able to understand the nature of the arguments." Then he should have no time to believe.

No man's belief is in any case a private matter which concerns himself alone. Our words, our phrases, our forms and processes and modes of thought are common property fashioned and perfected from age to age; an heirloom, which every succeeding generation inherits as a precious deposit and a sacred trust, to be handed on to the next one, not unchanged, but enlarged and purified, with some clear marks of its proper handiwork. Into this, for good or ill, is woven every belief of every man who has speech of his fellows. An awful privilege, and awful responsibility, that we should help to create the world in which posterity will live.—Professor Clifford.

PROFANE JOKES.

Voltaire said of Mdlle. de Livry: "She was so beautiful that I raised my long, thin body, and stood before her like a point of admiration."

Teacher—"Can you tell me, Johnnie, why Satan goes about the earth like a roaring lion?" Johnnie—"'Cause he can't cut any ice in the place where he lives when he's at home."

Complaining Wife—"You are glad to see me ill. I think you would be delighted if I were dying." Husband—"Oh, no, my dear! I should only be pleased to think that you were going to heaven."

Mrs. Watts—"How is your girl?" Mrs. Patts—"Oh, she's a perfect heathen. I left her to straighten things up before the minister called, and she never even dusted the Bible."

Rev. Jones (to tramp who has asked for food)—"Here, my good man, is a piece of bread; but, remember, I don't give it for your sake, and I don't give it for my sake, but I give it for God's sake." Tramp—"Then for Christ's sake put a bit of butter on it."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

Forresters' Hall (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Charles Watts, "Theological Puzzles."

Bradlaugh Club and Institute (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Ponds, N.): 7, G. W. Foote, "Why I am an Atheist." Wednesday, at 8, adjourned debate on "Education in Board Schools."

Battersea Secular Hall (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, Robert Shaw, "The Soul Theory." Tuesday, at 8, social gathering.

Camberwell (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, J. T. Blanchard, "The Population Question and its Relation to Socialism." Friday, at 8, free science classes.

Finsbury Branch: 12, important members' meeting at St. John's Restaurant, 120 St. John-street, Clerkenwell.

Islington: 3.30, annual meeting, for election of officers, at the Bradlaugh Club and Institute, 36 Newington Green-road.

West London Ethical Society (Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street): 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "Debasing the Moral Currency."

West Ham Secular Ethical Society (61 West Ham-lane): 7, Miss Vallance, "The Old Faiths Grown More Wide."

Wood Green (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, W. Mawer, F.G.S., "Evolution v. Creation."

Open-Air Propaganda.

Battersea Park Gates: 11.30, H. Courtney, "What is Secularism?"

COUNTRY.

Birmingham (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 7, S. Armfield, "The Influence of Christianity on Civilisation."

Blackburn (Venetian Hall, Darwen-street): Thursday, October 31, C. Cohen, "Christianity and Slavery." Friday, Nov. 1, "Evolution v. Special Creation."

Bristol (Shepherds' Hall, Old Market-street): 7, select entertainment.

Chatham Secular Hall (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school; 7, C. James, "The Decay of Belief."

Failsworth Secular Sunday-school (Pole-lane): 6.30, Ernest Evans, "Life, from a Biological Point of View."

Glasgow (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion—T. Robertson, an Essay; 6.30, J. P. Gilmour, "God and his Christ for Camlachie."

Leicester Secular Hall (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, W. Heaford, "The Dream of Immortality."

Liverpool (Old Fellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, Tontine Society; 7, Ernest Newman, "The Origin and Development of Legends."

Manchester Secular Hall (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, Robert Law, F.G.S., "The History of Life on the Globe."

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, Touzeau Parris, "Some More Bible Symbols"; 3, "How we Obtain Knowledge"; 7, "Sin Against God an Impossibility."

Sheffield Secular Society (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 11, C. Cohen, "The Political Ethics of Herbert Spencer"; 3, "The Holy Bible"; 7, "What Think Ye of Christ?" Tea at 5.

South Shields (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, music and an address by W. Cook.

Open-Air Propaganda.

Barnsley (May Day Green): 11, Willie Dyson, "God's Inhumanity."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. Cohen, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—November 1, Blackburn; 3, Sheffield; 4, 5, and 6, Barnsley; 10, Foresters' Hall, London; 17 and 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

Arthur B. Moss, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Nov. 24, New Brompton. Dec. 22, Leicester.

Touzeau Parris, 83 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—November 3, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

50 VISITING CARDS FOR NOTHING.—To purchasers of our beautifully-tinted Note-paper and Envelopes. Your name and address artistically printed. Chaste tints and splendid paper. Send eighteen stamps, with name and address, to the Abbey Press, Nuneaton. Post free. No better bargain possible.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

Monthly, Price 1d.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

Freethought Publications.

By G. W. FOOTE.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series, 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. Second Series, 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series, 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 3d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 8d.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

Bible Handbook for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians. [Edited in conjunction with W. P. Ball.] Complete, paper covers, 1s. 4d.; superior edition, on superfine paper, bound in cloth, 2s.

Crimes of Christianity. Vol. I. [Written in conjunction with J. M. Wheeler.] Hundreds of exact references to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity. Cloth, gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

The Jewish Life of Christ. Being the Sepher Toldoth Jeshu, or Book of the Generation of Jesus. With an Historical Preface and Voluminous Notes by G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler. Paper covers, 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 1s.

Bible Studies. Essays on Phallic Worship and other Curious Rites and Customs. By J. M. Wheeler. Illustrated, superior paper, 2s. 6d.

Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers of All Ages and Nations. By J. M. Wheeler. Handsomely bound in cloth, 7s. 6d.

Darwin Made Easy. By Dr. Edward B. Aveling, Fellow of the London University. This is the best popular exposition of Darwinism extant. Cloth, 1s.

Essays in Rationalism. By Charles Robert Newman (Atheist Brother of the late Cardinal Newman). With a Preface by George Jacob Holyoake, and a Biographical Sketch by J. M. Wheeler. 1s. 6d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumors, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Wens, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsey, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 9s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell
No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 2s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Colonel Ingersoll's Great Lecture,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.
DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.
THE GODS. 6d.
REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.
ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.
CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.
ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.
ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.
PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.
HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.
ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.
TRUE RELIGION. 2d.
THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.
LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.
IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.
LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.
GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.
FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
THE DYING CREED. 2d.
THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford 2d.
THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.
ART AND MORALITY. 2d.
DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.
THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.
SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. An Agnostic's View. 2d.
SKULLS. 2d.
THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.
LIVE TOPICS. 1d.
MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.
REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.
REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.
CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.
CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

"A Letter to Lord Ellenborough"

OCCASIONED BY THE SENTENCE WHICH HE PASSED ON

MR. D. I. EATON,

AS PUBLISHER OF

THE THIRD PART OF PAINE'S "AGE OF REASON."

BY

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

CAMBERWELL BRANCH OF THE N.S.S.,
61 NEW CHURCH-ROAD, CAMBERWELL, S.E.

A DRAMATIC PERFORMANCE
(IN AID OF THE LECTURE FUND)

Will be given in the above hall on Wednesday, Nov. 13, at 8 p.m.
The program will include Dramatic Readings by Mr. G. W. FOOTE, Mr. CHARLES WATTS, and other Prominent Members of the Society.
Tickets, 6d. and 1s., to be obtained from Mr. Forder or Miss Vance 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C., and all Branch Secretaries.

Price 2d., by post 2½d.,

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE.

BY

DAVID HUME.

With an Historical and Critical Introduction by

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.
Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.
Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.
The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

VERY SPECIAL LINE OF GENTLEMEN'S

Scarboro' Mackintoshes.

25s. each.

In Black, Navy, Fawn, and Brown. Give Chest and Length Measures.

VERY SPECIAL LINE OF

Beaver Cloth,

FOR

LADIES' JACKETS.

5s. per yard, 54 in. wide.

In Plain Colors. Black, Brown, Navy, Fawn, Myrtle, Peacock.

Lot 11
- 1 Pair All-Wool Blankets
- 1 Pair of Sheets
- 1 Quilt
- 1 Table-cloth

21s. Carriage Paid.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the United Kingdom.

BRUNO CLOTH The most lasting and Fashionable Material for Ladies' Winter Dresses. In all the Plain Colors. 1/9 per yd. 50 in. wide.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A Record of his Life and Work, by his daughter, Hypatia Bradlaugh-Bonner.

TWENTY-ONE-SHILLING EDITION. CONTAINING TEN PORTRAITS.

One copy of the above will be presented to each of the Six Persons (not agents) sending us the largest amounts for Lot 11 and Bruno Cloth between October 20 and December 31, 1895, if the amounts exceed £5 from each person.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 45. SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE BLACK ARMY.

(Concluded from page 689.)

It is a common reply, on the part of its apologists, that the Black Army is too much judged by exceptional cases. In the Church of England, for instance, there are only two Archbishops, and less than three dozen Bishops; and what are these among the many thousand ministers of the Establishment? But what is the real value of this objection? Are not the plums few in every profession? How many physicians, how many Queen's Counsel, how many writers make their thousands a year? The number is just sufficient to keep the fire of hope alive in the breasts of the less fortunate; so that, after all, we find the same commercial law operating in the clerical profession, which operates in other departments of human activity.

The critic to whom I referred in my opening paragraph asserted, as though it were a fact of his own knowledge, that the Archbishop of Canterbury does not spend a penny of his £15,000 a year upon himself; that it is all expended upon his diocese, his own wants being supplied by his private income. I do not believe this; but if it be true, it proves nothing. One swallow does not make a summer, and an argument cannot be based on a glaring exception. It cannot be usual for Church dignitaries to subsist on private fortunes. Nor is my critic's suggestion in any way reconcilable with the fact that such immense sums of money have been left by so many Bishops during the present century. I take it that their estates, as disclosed by probate, were partially, if not wholly, built up by savings out of their episcopal revenues; and I say that their conduct in this respect is scandalous, when we consider that Bishops are constantly pleading to laymen on behalf of "the poor clergy," and that Jesus Christ told them to feed, and not to fleece, the flock committed to their charge.

Another objection of the Black Army's apologists is that the Church of England does not comprise the whole Christianity of the country, and that the Nonconformist ministers must be taken into account. None of these, it is said—not even the highest—is paid five thousand a year. I dare say not, but I think it probable that they take all they can get. Some of the luckiest Dissenting ministers in America have salaries running into four figures. Dr. Hall, of New York, is reported to be in enjoyment of £8,000 a year. Dr. Talmage took a very large salary at the Brooklyn Tabernacle, with freedom to make as much more as he could by writing and lecturing. When he visited England, and discoursed for Christian bodies, he never opened his mouth for less than £50 a night. Surely it is difficult to see anything but commercialism in such conditions of advocacy. The late Mr. Spurgeon was paid £1,200 a year, in addition to the revenue accruing from the extensive sale of his publications. Dr. Joseph Parker lives in a fine house and keeps his carriage. Even the salary of a provincial minister, like the Rev. A. J. Berry, of Wolverhampton, is far from despicable. This gentleman has publicly called me "a professional infidel." I reply that his salary exceeds the earnings of all the "infidel" lecturers in this country put together. Of course there are plenty of Nonconformist ministers with very small stipends, but are there not plenty of ill-paid doctors and barristers, and still more of journalists? The law of supply and demand operates in all professions. The clericals may not get as much as they desire, and indeed they were never heard to say they had enough; but they obtain all that is possible in the existing state of the market.

I may be told—in fact, I have been told—that the salary is not everything to the members of the Black Army. I never said it was. They have tastes and inclinations, like other men, and prefer to earn their living in that way. What tickles my risibility is the pretence that they are "moved by the Holy Ghost." They are really "called" by the motives which lead men into other professions. When a man already in holy orders receives a "call," in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is to a more lucrative or eligible situation. The farce which is gone through on such occasions is sickening. When a clergyman leaves a poor living for a richer one, he solemnly declares that he is directed thither by the third person of the Trinity. Every man of sense knows this to be a hypocritical falsehood. Nor is the case any better among Nonconformists. A minister is invited by a neighbouring or distant congregation; the stipend is higher, and the church more famous. He cannot give an immediate answer, for it would look too much like a mere business transaction. He says he will consider it, and consult the Lord, and pray to be told what he should do. Meanwhile he makes inquiries, the negotiations continue, and perhaps his old congregation makes him a tempting offer to remain. When he has thought the matter out and come to a decision, he finds that he has a clear call from the Holy Ghost; and when he preaches his farewell sermon, he does not say that he has accepted a better situation, but that he is going to a wider sphere of usefulness.

Many years ago a friend of mine was a member of a Congregational Church at Manchester. The minister was an attractive rhetorician, and was known to be contemplating a career in London. His congregation wished to retain him, and money was raised to purchase him a house. Subsequently a fresh bribe had to be put in his way. Another house was purchased for him, and a handsome cheque was presented to him in the vestry. The man of God pocketed the cheque with great complacency; but he could not tell the deputation whether he would stay with "his old church" or go to London. He would have to lay the matter before the Lord. A week later he said he had been told to go. But he did not return the cheque, and within another week the house was advertised "to be sold." My friend thought the church was sold too. It was a lesson to him for life. He has understood the Black Army ever since.

English history furnishes a colossal illustration of the worldly, mercenary motives of the Black Army. During the sixteenth century England was converted, reconverted, and converted back again; and it was all done with the high hand of temporal power. Henry the Eighth quarrelled with the Pope, repudiated his spiritual supremacy, and set up an independent Church. Under his successor this Church was made definitely Protestant. The reign of Edward the Sixth was a short one, but during that brief period the Prayer Book was drawn up and ordered to be used in all churches, under penalty of fine, imprisonment, banishment, and finally death. The Church officials declared that they were moved in this matter by the Holy Ghost. But soon after, when Mary came to the throne, they kicked out the Prayer Book, and declared that the Holy Ghost had nothing to do with it. Once more the English Church became Catholic, and the Protestant clergy turned right about face to keep their livings. Only a hundred and twenty, out of about thirteen thousand, had the honesty to stand by their convictions. Elizabeth succeeded Mary, the English Church went back to Protestantism, and the glorious Reformation was a standing proof of the ease with which the pulpit can be turned by those who have power over the bread-and-cheese of the clergy.

Digitized by Google

Let me conclude with a few words on the function of this Black Army. Our red-coats have to fight a visible, tangible enemy; they shoot, and they are shot at; they kill, and they are killed. Many who are not killed are wounded, and bear about them the scars of combat. But the Black Army fight an enemy who is intangible and invisible. They fight the Devil. This personage was once a grim reality, at least in the imagination of believers; but he has sunk into a comic figure, and is now laughed at as a bogey. Nevertheless, the Black Army survives. It is engaged in fighting "Sin." But what a ridiculous notion it is that sin can be put down by preaching. The Black Army should be disbanded, and the money it costs be expended on the secular improvement of the people. G. W. FOOTE.

FOLK-LORE RESEARCHES.*

UNDER the title of "Virgin Births," I wrote in the Freethinker of September 1st a brief and superficial notice of the first volume of Mr. E. Sidney Hartland's Legend of Perseus, dealing with "The Supernatural Birth." The opinion there given of its merits has been more than confirmed by the second volume, dealing with "The Life Token." When I say that I think the work worthy to be placed beside those of Dr. Tylor and Mr. Frazer, no higher expression of commendation is possible. Consciously or unconsciously, the anthropologists who deal with comparative folk-lore and mythology are exploding, by explaining, the Christian legends and superstitions, and the increasing attention given to these subjects is a gratifying sign to the Freethinker.

Mr. Hartland is a prince among folk-lorists. He has all the popular sagas, fairy tales, customs, and superstitions at his fingers' ends. He deals with them as a scientist, analysing, comparing, and drawing deductions from them. He not only notes folk-lore; he explains it. His knowledge is so extensive, his method so sound, and his judgment so good that, even where I fancy his interpretation may be defective, I should be chary of offering another as being any more certain. We are all perhaps a little too ready to fancy we can, like the palæontologist, reconstruct the past organism from a single bone. But sometimes what is taken for a wing further investigation shows to be a flipper. The highly cultured anthropologist usually errs because he cannot descend to the level of the people whose minds he interprets. Hence we have such an able man as Mr. Andrew Lang bamboozled by a trickster like Eusapia Paladino; and doubting whether such a custom as the droit du Seigneur ever did exist anywhere. If Mr. Lang would inquire in India, he would find that Kulin Brahmins have exercised this right within recent times. Mr. Hartland's remarks on the sin-eater have excited controversy in the Times. To find among civilised peoples instances of eating off the body of the dead, and to connect it with cannibalism, is sure to elicit repudiation from those whose local patriotism is affected. "Such things never occurred—at least, not in our country." I do not scruple to say that not only has Mr. Hartland maintained his point, but that to the student of human evolution the custom has as natural a place as has the hipparion between the anchitherium and the horse. So in former times has been challenged what I call "the nobly ridiculous custom of the couvade," the laying in of the man when the wife has a child, though there is abundant evidence of the custom in many parts of the world. It is just such peculiar fossils and transitional links that our author sees the value of to the student of human evolution, and his investigations of them are characterised by patient and thorough research.

Every page of The Legend of Perseus is full of apt illustrations. To the Freethinking evolutionist it may appear that Mr. Hartland gives a superabundance of evidence where a few select, concise instances might suffice to carry conviction. But it must be remembered that so rapidly are savage races being extirpated, so swiftly peasant lore and custom being obliterated, that it is most desirable that all bearing on human evolution shall be recorded ere it is too late. Moreover, the case presented does undoubtedly gain by the selection of a great variety of instances gathered over a wide area. Mr. Hartland well says: "Distance in space counts for naught where we are dealing with similar conditions of culture."

Mr. Hartland has, indeed, wandered far from the classical story of Perseus; but he has remained throughout close to those root ideas and institutions which have been of supreme importance in human evolution, and which to me alone give interest to the old legends. The titles of his chapters may indicate this. They are: The Life-token in Tale and Custom; Witchcraft, Sympathetic Magic; Witchcraft, Philtres, Preventive and Remedial Leechcraft; Sacred Wells and Trees; Totemism, The Blood Covenant, Customs Connected with Saliva; Funeral Rites; Marriage Rites; The Couvade, and other illustrations of the Strength of the Blood-tie.

In two of the subjects Mr. Hartland has taken up in this volume he has anticipated two chapters in my Footsteps of the Past—viz., on "Totemism" and "Sympathetic Magic." Both of us are indebted to Mr. Frazer's Golden Bough, and I frankly recognise my superior in Mr. Hartland as well as in Mr. Frazer. Mr. Hartland does not go quite as fully into the question of totemism as I do; but with the allied subject of animal worship he will have another opportunity of dealing, if he chooses, when treating of Perseus and the Dragon. The importance of animal worship, and allied belief in transformation into animals, is not even yet sufficiently allowed; while, if my contention, that totemism led to the domestication of animals, is correct, it was a chief factor in the transition from savagery to barbaric civilisation. The importance of "sympathetic magic," too, can scarcely be exaggerated. It lies, as I think, and as I have endeavored to show, at the very root of the Christian legends, as well as of the Christian sacraments, the real explanation of which may be gathered by careful readers of Mr. Hartland's work.

On several points Mr. Hartland is more orthodox than myself. When, for instance, he finds a close parallel to the story of Perseus told by an illiterate peasant woman in Tuscany, he is content to say "it may only date as a popular tale from the revived Paganism of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries." I hold that such Paganism was never dead—nay, Mr. C. G. Leland, in his Etruscan Roman Remains in Popular Tradition, proves it is living still, though in underground fashion, at the very seat and centre of Christendom. Le Livre du Valiant Perseus, 1572, shows that the Christian Church was then still accommodating its fables to the more ancient ones of Paganism. When the untrustworthy—nay, fraudulent—character of early Christian literature and ecclesiastical history is known, it will be seen that the true history of the suppression of Paganism and its amalgamation with Christianity has yet to be written, and it is writers like Mr. Hartland, Mr. Frazer, and Mr. Leland who are supplying the material.

Speaking of the custom of dropping pins into wells at Easter, Mr. Hartland says (p. 231): "The pins must have been intended, as elsewhere, to unite the thrower with the god. And the custom may accordingly be supposed to be a periodical union with the divinity, removed under Christian influences from the day of the Pagan festival (perhaps May day) to the nearest great feast day of the Church." I feel sure, if Mr. Hartland will look into it, he will find that Easter was quite as much a Pagan festival as May-day, the one celebrating the spring of vegetation, the other the bursting of blossoms. The determination of Easter by the moon is itself indicative of its pre-Christian antiquity. Mr. Hartland has been at great pains to determine the meaning of dropping pins in wells, fixing nails in trees, temples, and statues of the gods. I do not quarrel with his explanation. Yet is there much to be said for such customs, being rather reminders than processes effecting union. A nail knocked in fixes a thing. It may thus be allied to the later sealing of a bond, itself a survival of blood covenanting. I would suggest, too, the possibility that the employment of Brahmins as sin-eaters may be merely that a safe receptacle may be found in the holy bodies of these twice-born men, since there is a still deep-seated superstition

* The Grimm Library. The Legend of Perseus: A Study of Tradition in Story, Custom, and Belief. (London: David Nutt, Strand.) 1895.

Digitized by Google

in India that, if a person's body is eaten by a wild beast, he becomes transformed into the beast that eats him.

With the main conclusions of Mr. Hartland I am in entire agreement. Some of them are sufficiently disturbing to those brought up to believe that man was created perfect some six thousand years ago. If expressed by myself, they would probably be startling in their heresy; but Mr. Hartland has a happy knack of mildly suggesting heterodox conclusions. However, it is time that he was allowed to speak for himself, and next week I shall offer the reader several extracts from his remarkable work.

J. M. WHEELER.

(To be concluded.)

THE SECULAR AND CHRISTIAN STANDARDS OF MORALITY.

(Concluded from page 692.)

It will be obvious to those who understand our statement of the Secular standard of morality, as given in our article last week, that it is essentially different from the standard furnished by popular Christianity. Orthodox believers do not hesitate to disqualify man's reason and judgment in consequence of the alleged fall, which is said to have corrupted human nature, and rendered man powerless of himself even to "think anything," for it is "God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure" (2 Corinthians iii. 5; Phil. ii. 13). Even faith, which is the very basis of St. Paul's Christianity, cannot be secured by man's own effort, for "it is the gift of God" (Ephesians ii. 8). Here human effort, which is pre-eminently a Secular agency, is rendered null and void, as we are told that salvation depends upon the will of a supernatural power. Christ evidently thought this, hence he says: "No man can come unto me except it were given unto him of my father" (John vi. 65). If, as we contend, the formation of human character results from the laws of mind and the circumstances that bring them into play, faith in any supernatural power is not the force that moulds and regulates the conduct of man.

Much is said about the Golden Rule, "Do unto others," etc., as a factor in Christian morals; but the injunction is not peculiar to Christianity, and, moreover, it would be rendered of no effect if other portions of the New Testament were accepted and acted upon as a standard of conduct. Not only does Sir William Jones, in his tenth discourse before the Asiatic Society, say that he has seen the Golden Rule "word for word in the original of Confucius," but other Christian writers of more recent date have acknowledged that it did not originate with Jesus. The Rev. Dr. Matheson, in his lecture on The Religion of China (p. 83), states: "That Confucius is the author of this precept is undisputed, and, therefore, it is undisputable that Christianity has incorporated an article of Chinese morality." Dr. Grant also, in his Religions of the World, published last year, writes (p. 64): "Perhaps the most remarkable feature of his (Confucius's) moral code is the distinct enunciation of the Golden Rule. Professor Legge tells us that Confucius understood it in its positive and most comprehensive sense, as well as in its negative form, in which it is usually quoted in the classics." Thus, whatever value may be attached to this precept, it is clear that we are not indebted to Christianity for it, and it is no more a part of Christian morality than it is of Secular ethics.

But, unfortunately, in the Christian code of morals this injunction is opposed to many of the sayings ascribed to Jesus, and also to his conduct on several occasions. For instance, when Jesus says that he came to save only the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matthew xv. 24); "he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi); his command to his disciples to "go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not" (Matthew x. 5); "But he that denieth me before men shall be denied before the angels of God" (Luke xii. 9). Equally out of harmony with this precept was Christ's conduct in riding into Jerusalem on a colt and an ass that did not belong to him (Matthew xxi.), and his driving out of the temple the merchants with small cords (John ii. 15). It is impossible to reconcile these sayings and doings, upon the part of Christ, with the principle of the Golden Rule, which implies an equality of sympathy for all men.

The standard to which Christians appeal is the New Testament. This, however, would be only valuable as such if the book were free from contradictory teachings, and if its injunctions were practicable. But the very opposite is the fact, for both the Gospels and the Epistles are full of contradictions, which, as the Rev. Dr. Giles says, "cannot be reconciled; imperfections that would greatly detract from even admitted human compositions, and erroneous principles of morality that would have hardly found a place in the most incomplete systems of the philosophers of Greece and Rome" (Christian Records, preface, p. 7). In Matthew (xxv.) Christ taught the efficacy of secular work, and implied that this would secure "life eternal"; but in other parts of the New Testament he makes belief in him indispensable to salvation (Mark xvi. 16; John xiv. 6). St. Paul says God "will render to every man according to his deeds" (Romans ii. 6); but he also says man is saved. "By what law? of works? Nay, but by the law of faith.....man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law" (Romans iii. 27, 28). In the same chapter he recognises Christ and him crucified, and he adds that, "if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hath received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i. 9). The "gospel" here referred to was St. Paul's Gospel (Romans ii. 16; 2 Timothy ii. 8), which he received from no man, "but by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 12). Thus the only Gospel in which St. Paul enjoined belief was his own, and those who did not accept it were to be "accursed." No marvel that Professor Jowett remarks: "When we demand logical equivalents and similarity of circumstances, when we balance adverse statements, St. James and St. Paul, the New Testament with the Old, it will be hard to demonstrate from Scripture any complex system, either of doctrine or practice" (Essays and Reviews, cheap edition, p. 444).

Of what value are statements which are conflicting and uncertain? It is even doubtful, in the opinion of the late Professor Huxley, whether the Sermon on the Mount and the so-called Lord's Prayer were ever preached and prayed by Jesus. That the Christian standard is defective is further shown by the fact that few, if any, professed Christians make the slightest attempt to regulate their conduct by it. Its teachings as to the possession of devils, the mutilation of human bodies, and the punishment in hell fire are discarded, and its injunctions as to poverty, disregard of this world, prayer, and special providence are not believed. There is a rapidly increasing number of intelligent people who share the opinion of the late Bishop of Peterborough, who said: "It is not possible for the State to carry out all the precepts of Christ. A State that attempted to do so could not exist for a week. If there be any person who maintains the contrary, his proper place is in a lunatic asylum" (Fortnightly, January, 1890).

The Christian standard is not suited to a scientific and progressive age, inasmuch as it recognises none of the principal facts upon which the true theory of life and conduct is based. The law of cause and effect, uniform natural law, the facts of physiology and of psychology, are all ignored, and in many instances the very opposite of those teachings is inculcated by Jesus and his Apostles. According to this standard, everything is done under the direction of an Almighty God, who is supposed to rule the destiny of the human race. And even upon this subject the New Testament is not harmonious in its statements, for it would be extremely difficult to determine from this book what the ultimate destiny of the race is to be. It may be that God is "not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance" (2 Peter iii. 9), or that some were ordained to condemnation before of old (Jude 4; Thess. ii. 11, 12). It may be that all will be saved, or that only a few will be chosen (Matt. xxii. 14). It may be that man's destiny will be decided, as St. James says, by works, or, as St. Paul alleges, by faith, and not by works (Ephesians ii. 9).

Paley argues that virtue consists in obeying the will of God for the sake of everlasting happiness. But, as seen above, the Christian standard puts the question of future happiness as a very doubtful one. Besides, how are we to know what that will is? It is not to be learnt from the Bible, for therein are found many wills ascribed to God which are contradictory in their nature. Hardly any crime can be mentioned that is not attributed to the Christians' deity; how, then, can this book be consistently claimed to be a standard for human conduct? As Shakespeare says, "The Devil can cite Scripture for his purpose." If we ask Christians, who accept the Bible standard, for an incentive to good conduct, we are referred to the promise of an eternal future; if we desire to learn about fixed natural laws which regulate the universe, the Bible gives us no trustworthy information; and if we seek for principles that have been verified by experience, how few, indeed, shall we find in the teachings of Jesus.

Digitized by Google

In conclusion, we allege that the standard of Secularism is superior to that of Christianity, because (1) it belongs to man, of whom we know something—not to God, of whom we know nothing; (2) it pertains to the certainties of this life, not to the conjectures of some imaginary existence beyond the grave; (3) it involves practical work, not merely theoretical faith; (4) reason is the highest faculty we have, and without its exercise no sound conclusion can be arrived at; even Christians are bound to borrow our standard when they seek to decide upon the merits of their own; (5) experience, when allied with reason, is the greatest monitor we have to enable us to judge wisely as to the nature and influence of actions; and, finally, whatever is useful in the promotion of virtue must be moral. Our standard justifies the fact that truth, love, justice, and self-reliance are the emblems of a noble and cultivated humanity.

CHARLES WATTS.

A SERMON.

My text will be found in Matthew xi. 25, 26: "At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight."

It must not be supposed that the babes referred to in my text meant infants at the breast only; they were the babes in intellect, the men and women who had grown in bodily stature, but had developed nothing in the way of brains; they were the full-grown babes and sucklings, the mental imbeciles, who were ready to suck in any taffy that the Lord might give them, without ever asking a reason for it. If they had developed mentally as well as in stature, then they would be classed among the wise and prudent, and not fit subjects for the Lord's revelations, which were fitted so admirably to the capacity of babes.

Neither Jesus nor his father saw fit to give any reasons why these babes should be preferred over the wise and prudent as recipients of such an important matter as the revelation of God's will, except the "even so, Father, that it seemed good in thy sight"; but every person of common sense will have no difficulty in guessing at a better reason than that. The wise and prudent would be very apt to ask some questions that might be difficult for Jesus and his Father to answer. They would require some evidence that the revelation was true. They would want to put Jesus on the stand, and cross-examine him upon his authority to represent God in such an important matter; for God himself being absent—a witness in hiding—his testimony could not be had. Jesus knew that there were a great many weak spots in the evidence that the wise and prudent would be sure to detect, and, therefore, he thanked God that he had not submitted it to them. The babes—he had observed—always put everything that was offered to them into their mouths, without asking any questions.

The wise and prudent recognise the fact that God himself has never made any revelation to man. He has never spoken one word, either oral or written. He has never been seen, heard, or felt. At various times in the history of the world thousands of different men have come forward claiming that God has spoken to them and given them a revelation which they were to make known to men, at second hand; but God himself has never signed their credentials, and no one of them has ever produced a scrap of authority or a tittle of proof of the truth of his revelation. There is a remarkable unanimity in all of them in claiming that they must be believed by faith without evidence; and this is the reason why the weak and credulous "babes of grace" of all ages are preferred, as recipients of such revelations, over the wise and prudent.

Suppose some one or all of these revelations to be true, they are not revelations to us, but are only revelations to the persons to whom God spoke. To us they are only hearsay, and the confidence that we may have in their truth must depend upon a variety of circumstances. We must know something of the character of the person who claims to have received it, and it must be such as to convince us of his honesty and capacity for testing the phenomena that he calls a revelation. We must know that he is a reliable, truthful man, who would not tell a lie even though it would give him wealth, ease, power, and fame. He must be an intellectual man, in full possession of his normal faculties, so that he could not be mistaken in what he tells us. Do we know enough of any one of the pretenders to revelation to enable us to answer in the affirmative all these questions about him?

The revelation itself must be, in substance, something that is not incredible, something that does not contradict facts that are firmly established by universal experience and observation of the laws of Nature. It must be something worth knowing, and not merely a recital of the early and fabulous doings of a tribe of wandering barbarians who had not yet developed the capacity to distinguish truth from fiction. It must be something new, something that man could not find out for himself in any other way, and not merely a corroboration of old theories already fixed in the fancies of ignorant savages. Who can say that any revelation that has been offered to the world answers all these requirements?

To the wise and prudent it raises a strong presumption of fraud for any one person to come forward with a claim that he has been favoured above all other men with a revelation from God, which they are bound to accept without any evidence whatever except his saying so. It would be as easy for God to reveal himself and his will to every man, woman, and child in this earth of ours as it is to do it to one, and it would go far to establish his pretended character for goodness if he should do so. It is these pretended middle-men who claim to stand between God and man who make all the trouble and strife in the world. If they could be eliminated from our midst, and men and God allowed to settle their differences face to face, without any meddling by priests and religion-makers, there would be peace and goodwill to men, and to God too, and the babes would be allowed to develop into wise and prudent men and women, without any superstitious shackles to keep them down.

J. P. RICHARDSON.

—Independent Pulpit.

(To be concluded.)

MY TOUR IN THE NORTH.

On Monday, October 14, I started on a fortnight's tour in the north of England and Scotland. During that time I visited Newcastle-on-Tyne, North Shields, Glasgow, Paisley, Cupar, Dundee, Edinburgh, and York; held a four nights' debate, and delivered fourteen lectures.

My debate was with Mr. A. J. Waldron, who is the regular lecturer for the Christian Evidence Society. He is a young man of some promise, having a fair command of language, and throughout the discussion he was most gentlemanly. It is not for me to give any opinion as to the merits of the debate. We both did our best, and the audiences showed their appreciation by very heartily applauding our efforts. Public controversies, when properly conducted, are certainly useful in their results, inasmuch as they stimulate mental activity. A Christian gentleman remarked to me at the conclusion of my debate with Mr. Waldron: "I am not of your way of thinking, but you have certainly given me much to think about. I never saw the subjects you have dealt with in the light in which you have presented them. I must think over seriously what I have heard these four nights." As the principal object of all discussion should be to induce serious thought, Secular disputants ought to be exceedingly careful with whom they debate. Reputable Christian exponents, capable of public debating, are now few and far between. There are several what the Americans call "theological tramps" going throughout the provinces, seeking notoriety by endeavoring to discuss with Freethought representatives. To meet these, however, on the platform would be humiliating and an utter degradation of controversy. In vain do we look for the successors of such disputants as Dr. Harrison, Dr. McCann, and Dr. Sexton—gentlemen with whom I frequently discussed years ago. They understood the art of debate and the courtesy of conducting it. Upon whom has their mantle fallen? I know not.

Digitized by Google

My lectures were all well attended, most of the evening meetings being crowded. Under Mr. Foote's lecture scheme, I introduced Secularism into Cupar Fife, and held week-night meetings at North Shields, Paisley, and York. All these gatherings were very successful. This scheme I regard as the most important advance that has been made in Secular propagandism for many years. It has long been known that Christians object to pay to hear their system criticised; but, when admission is free to our week-night lectures, the experience of the past few weeks proves that they will attend and listen to what we have to say. This is what we require, and it is to be hoped that the impetus given to our advocacy by Mr. Foote's scheme will be supported by all who are in a position to render practical aid in the dissemination of Secular views. Now that the scheme is in full force, those who can afford to do so should at once subscribe to the fund, which, of course, is necessary to our success. Writing on October 31 in reference to my lecture at Paisley, Mr. Gilmour, of Glasgow, says: "You may take credit for bringing about the resurrection of the Paisley Branch, which is once more in action. It is evident that the lecture scheme is going to bear some good fruit." I have good reasons for believing that encouraging results similar to those which followed the lecture at Paisley will be seen in other places where the free lectures have been given. A whole winter of such work will be the most effectual means of spreading a knowledge of our principles in districts where hitherto they have been comparatively unknown. The President of the N.S.S. having devised and put into practice this excellent method, it devolves upon the members to do their duty by heartily co-operating to make it productive of lasting good.

On Sunday, November 17, I shall lecture in Liverpool, and on the following Sunday in Manchester. If friends in Bolton, Rochdale, Bury, Todmorden, or other places in the district, can arrange for a lecture on any evening between those two Sundays, I shall be pleased to visit them under Mr. Foote's scheme. The only expense which the local friends will have to bear is the hire of hall and advertising, and to meet this they can have a collection at the lecture. The admission must be free. I shall be glad to hear from the above towns immediately.

I must mention one unpleasant incident during my tour that occurred in connection with that contemptible "defender of the faith," Walton Powell, who sought to break up my meetings in Glasgow. I mention this, not that any importance is attached to the utterer of the filthy libel on the London Hall of Science, but to warn Freethinkers to take no notice of him, and, above all, not to attend his lectures. He is discarded by the Christian party, and those who wish to know his character and career should send to Mr. H. A. Long, Ingram-street, Glasgow, for a pamphlet written by a Christian, price one penny. Some of Powell's associates attended my afternoon lecture at Glasgow and publicly asked me to meet him in debate. Of course, I refused to have anything to do with such a person. A lively scene followed, which was renewed at night. What took place in the evening may be gathered from the following statement written by Mr. J. P. Gilmour, who was chairman of the evening meeting:—"Just as Mr. Watts had got well under weigh with his lecture Powell himself, with a gang of his ruffians, burst into the meeting; and the emissary of the afternoon commenced, 'In the afternoon a statement——' when the chairman ordered him to be silent or to withdraw from the meeting. This order was repeated three times without effect. Then, seeing that nothing short of summary action would meet the case, the chairman gave the order for the forcible expulsion of the disturbers. This was speedily effected without any serious trouble, although some of Powell's 'lambs' offered stubborn resistance, and Mr. Watts resumed his lecture amid echoes of Homeric combat from the stairs."

CHARLES WATTS.

If God made us in his own image, we have amply returned the compliment.—Fontenelle.

INSANITY AND INSPIRATION.

THE work of Dr. Nordau on Degeneration, and, still more, its criticism by Dr. Cesare Lombroso, raise the old question of insanity and genius. Nordau thinks it sufficient to find evidence of morbidity or neurotic temperament to set down such persons as Tolstoi, Wagner, Zola, and Ruskin as degenerate and, therefore, inferior. Lombroso goes even further in regarding genius as a form of degenerative neurosis, yet holds that when this neurosis takes original forms the diseased—that is, the abnormal—persons may really be superior to the rest of their fellows. Dr. Lombroso says:—

> "If Nordau picks to pieces in this fashion the works of the greatest men, it is natural that he should discover oddities and astounding slips. And thus we see how easy it is for him to demolish Wagner, Ibsen, and Zola in contrast with the bourgeois, because of that excess of originality, of morbidness, which neurosis creates in them. But this very craziness is a consequence and proof of their genius. Instead of suspecting that just because they were neurotic they were geniuses, Nordau concludes: 'They are insane; therefore they are not geniuses.' Thus on one side he wanders from the natural path of genius, and on the other he ends by sacrificing a large number of geniuses like Ibsen, Zola, etc., and pretends that they are inferior to normal men—the mediocre men whom he does not criticise. What Nordau ought to have done was to study the insanity of the geniuses singly, and to set it in relation to their works, so as to help us to interpret its most original characteristics and those which deviate most widely from the average, and to get the explanation of it.....
>
> "In Tolstoi's book there are certain strange, and even maddish, ideas; but among these what splendor of observation and profundity of thought! And even though the theory of love developed in The Kreutzer Sonata is, as Nordau says, a delirious theory, still, when you have deducted from the book all that extravagant philosophy, there remains a stupendous psychology of marriage, though it be a little too pessimistic. And while only the degenerate, and not normal man, regards love and conjugal life in this fashion, there is left, nevertheless, a marvellous picture, albeit of a morbid state."

Lombroso's view of men like Tolstoi seems to me applicable to the religious geniuses of the past. Most of them exhibited traits which now we must class with insanity. And yet they have been in many particulars elevated above their fellows, and even of service to them. The Hebrew prophets appear to have been the chief instruments in raising Judaism from a tribal fetishism to a national religion. Yet they were certainly a cranky lot. When Saul prophesied, he stripped off his clothes and lay down naked, whereupon they said: "Is Saul also among the prophets?" (1 Samuel xix. 24). Ezekiel laid siege to a tile, and Isaiah, the greatest genius of the lot, walked naked for three years (Isaiah xx. 3).

Jules Soury and Mr. Foote have made out a pretty good case from the Gospels for considering that Jesus was insane. His friends certainly considered so, and endeavored to restrain him (Mark iii. 21), while the Jews said of him: "He hath a devil, and is mad" (John x. 20). Paul tells the early Christians at Corinth that, if they use their dangerous gift of tongues, "Will they not say ye are mad?" (1 Cor. xiv. 23)—exactly what was said of the Irvingites.

Sprenger and Ireland both hold that Mohammed was subject to hallucinations. His love of solitude and fasting would contribute. He heard voices, had interviews with Gabriel, and went to the seventh heaven. When questioned as to his inspiration, he would say: "It affecteth me like the ringing of a bell, penetrating my very heart, and rending me, as it were, in pieces." Deutsch says: "Mohammed was epileptic." Epilepsy the Greeks called a sacred disease, and those affected are often regarded as inspired in the East.

Many of the saints of the Catholic Church, and those the best of them, were clearly insane. St. Dominic had a mania for flagellation. St. Francis, in accordance with his more amiable disease, preached to the birds, and even addressed the fishes as "little brothers and sisters." St. Simeon Stylites lived continually on the top of a pillar, and St. Eusebius carried a hundred and fifty pounds' weight of iron always on his person, and lived for three years in a dried-up well.

Glorious Joan of Arc. "What is to be thought of the poor shepherd girl," who "rose suddenly out of the gust, out of the safety, out of the religious inspiration, rooted in deep pastoral solitude, to a station in train of armies, and to the more perilous station at the right hand of kings"! She was an ecstatic, heard voices, saw lights. The voices of St. Catherine and St. Margaret were often in her ears. She went weeping to the stake, but maintained the reality of her revelations to the end, and was heard to invoke Michael and St. Catherine.

Digitized by Google

Swedenborg, too, tells in his diary that one night in London, after he had dined heavily, a mist spread before his eyes, and the floor of his room was covered with hideous reptiles, such as serpents, toads, and the like. He says: "I was astonished, having all my wits about me, and being perfectly conscious. The darkness attained its height, and then passed away. I now saw a man sitting in the corner of the chamber. As I had thought myself entirely alone, I was greatly frightened when he said to me: 'Eat not so much.' My sight again became dim; but when I recovered it I found myself in the room." The following night the same thing occurred. He says: "I was this time not at all alarmed. The man said: 'I am God; the Lord, the Creator, and Redeemer of the world. I have chosen thee to unfold to men the spiritual sense of the Holy Scripture.'" Enough! The ecstatics of genius were all insane. But this, it seems to me, is no reason why their utterances should not be taken on their own merits. For the insane of one generation are sometimes the teachers of another, while the mediocrities, who pride themselves on their sanity, might often more justly be noted for their imbecility. UNCLE BENJAMIN.

BIBLE BIRD-NESTING.

(Deuteronomy xxii. 6, 7.)

THE world is full of awful ills,
And quacks that claim to cure them;
It reels beneath the weight of pills,
And patients that endure them.
Shun quacks, and quickly quite quit questing
A cure from them, and go "a nesting"!

'Tis sad to think of those that die
Who well might still be living,
If only they had known what I,
In God's name, now am giving:
A cure that cannot fail in testing;
The cure is this: Just go "a nesting"!

Dishonest quacks profess to cure,
With cheap and simple simples,
A host of ills that men endure,
From broken legs to pimples;
But God, who never stoops to jesting,
Declares that all are cured by nesting!

In Deuteronomy "I Am"—
See chapter two-and-twenty—
Says: Rob a nest, but leave the dam,
And you shall live in plenty;
Your constitution shall be strengthened,
And all your life improved and lengthened.

So, steel your heart, and rob a nest,
And all your feelings smother;
Take eggs or young—'tis God's behest—
But mind you leave the mother;
And, if the changeless God's not lying,
You'll live beyond your time for dying!

This cure is only found, no doubt,
In spring, the nesting season;
At other times you go without—
Of course, that stands to reason—
But, while you wait till time of nesting,
Jehovah has a chance of resting.

G. L. MACKENZIE.

Everyone is born with a nose and five fingers, and no one born with a knowledge of God. This may be deplorable not, but it is certainly the human condition.—Voltaire.

ACID DROPS.

THE Bishop of Worcester, speaking at Birmingham on behalf of the Church Extension Society, noticed what magnificent collections were made on Hospital Sunday, and remarked that spiritual needs were greater than bodily needs. The Bishop of Coventry said ditto, and the moral was "More money for soul-saving." It is really astonishing what a lot of money is spent on this business. No one ever knew the clergy to have enough. And what have they to show for the vast expenditure? A doctor can produce the man whose life he saved in a hospital; can a clergyman produce a man whose soul he saved in a church? It is impossible to tell, before the day of judgment, whether any soul is saved or not; and the clergy ought to wait till then before they present their bill.

At Holy Trinity Church, Stratford-on-Avon, the solid part of the communion is served in wafers instead of bread, after the Catholic fashion. A much-respected lady member has protested, but the vicar is obstinate, and the lady has to go without "the body of Christ" or obtain it elsewhere. We offer her our condolence in this sad affliction.

The Free Church Association at Birmingham will not include the Unitarians. This is a monotheistic country, but it seems to be wrong to worship one god, after all. It is not respectable to have less gods than three, though it is damnation to have more than one. We give it up, and try the fifteen puzzle.

Mr. Andrew Lang, in his "Protest of a Spooko Folk-lorist," at the Folk-Lore Society (referred to in our issue for June 30), made much of Eusapia Paladino, and remarked: "Whatever causes these Eusapian phenomena probably caused some of the innumerable similar phenomena of which all folk-lore is full." Apparently, he thought these phenomena were ghostly, spiritual, or, as they prefer to say, psychical. But Mr. Maskelyne and Dr. Hodgson, who have seen Eusapia, say it is pure humbug and trickery. We believe they are far more competent judges than Mr. Lang or Mr. Lodge, and venture to think that humbug is at the bottom of "innumerable similar phenomena."

A good instance of how the old, old story gets doctored up in transition to another race is given in the Popular Science Monthly, by Abby L. Alger, from an old Penobscot Indian, who made the Lord God take a back seat compared to his own. God, he said, made Adam out of earth, but he did not make Gluskabe (the Indian God); Gluskabe made himself out of the dust kicked up at the creation of Adam. Then God consulted Gluskabe about making the rivers. He proposed that they should run up one side of the earth and down the other; but Gluskabe said, No, they must all run down one way. Then the Lord asked him if the ocean should lie still. No, he answered, it must rise and fall, or else it will grow stagnant. How about fire? asked God; shall it burn always? No, again said Gluskabe; and it seems fortunate that the Lord had him at his elbow during the work of creation, or things might have been even worse than they are.

One of our Manchester friends, Mr. William Westwell, was waited on by a deputation of the Armenian Committee, who wanted him to give a subscription. He forwarded them a cheque for one guinea, with a letter stating that he would have been happy to give more, but his own party were downtrodden in Christian England, and they had the first claim upon him. Mr. Westwell's cheque was returned, and he was told that his letter was "an insult." The only meaning we can attach to this is that it is a crime for Mohammedans to oppress Christians, but quite right for Christians to oppress Freethinkers. Somehow, if you scratch a Christian, you are pretty sure to find a bigot.

Mr. Athelstan Riley has undoubted leanings towards the clerical profession. Apropos of a recent debate at the School Board, he must have regretted his neglect to take holy orders if he read, among the ecclesiastical preferments last week, the appointment to the rectory of "Great Birch with Little Birch Essex."—Echo.

Alderman Wallond, of Maidstone, was a charitable man. According to a local paper, he gave financial aid every week to twenty aged persons, without inquiring into their creed or politics. But good men, like bad men, have to die; and when Alderman Wallond came to be buried the Vicar refused to allow the coffin to be taken into the church. It appears, however, that this act of bigotry was illegal, for the deceased had been baptised, though he was not a communicant. The Archbishop of Canterbury is stated to have admitted that Canon Dyke, the vicar, made a regrettable mistake. But a "mistake" of this kind is worse than a mistake. Charity should be strained, rather than formality, when people are standing with lacerated hearts over their dead. But when did such considerations enter the mind of a priest?

Digitized by Google

The Rev. Sydney Fleming, of St. James's, Croydon, is candid enough to state that he does not want people in his church who only put a paltry sum in the collection-plate. He says people can have no fear of the Lord unless they support his ministers.

Judge Tourgee says that, in the first eight months of the present year, there have been 140 cases of negro lynchings in the United States. Some of them were quite as atrocious as the recent roasting alive at a slow fire in Texas. We should think that the amount of zeal displayed by American missions to heathens might be better directed towards a mitigation of barbarism at home.

The prosecution of Seventh-Day Adventists in America has its counterpart in England. The International Tract Society is a body of Bible believers who hold that the commands given to Moses in respect to the Sabbath were never abrogated by Jesus, and that Sunday is as much a Church institution as the Mass. It publishes literature enforcing its views, and acts up to them by closing its place of business on Saturday and opening it on Sunday. Mr. Plowden, the Clerkenwell police magistrate, has fined the society £44 on fourteen summonses. These good Bible believers are thus in a fair way to be ruined and imprisoned by their adherence to the words of their fetish book. Verily we live in a Christian land.

The Birmingham Daily Argus is printing a correspondence on "Why Working Men do not Go to Church." Some say the men of God live too well, others that they think too much of themselves, others that they are too fond of calling everybody "infidel" who differs from them, others that they don't go in strongly enough for "Bible truth." The real truth is, that people have always had to be brimstoned and treacled into religion; and now that the brimstone is disappearing, the treacle alone is not efficacious.

W. Babbington gives his experience in the Birmingham Daily Argus. Till recently he was a Sunday-school teacher. He was struck by the contradictory accounts of the death of Judas in Matthew xxviii. and Acts i., and asked the minister what was the explanation. He was told it was a question such as an infidel only would ask. This led to further research, and the result that he cannot conscientiously take part in either church or chapel.

The Argus devotes a leading article to the case of a dreadful swindler called Hart, who has been sentenced to five years' penal servitude at the Birmingham Quarter Sessions. "Habitual swindler in his Birmingham business," it observes, "he was the pattern of religious virtue at Olton. He was a familiar figure in Olton parish church, where he worshipped with apparent fervor." Our contemporary adds, with keen sarcasm, that "he is not the only pious man who has fallen a victim to an uninvited scrutiny of his conduct where he did not think the application of his religious principles necessary."

Mr. Gladstone has curious notions of Providence. In his passionate letter to Madame de Novikoff, he speaks of "the wretched Sultan, whom God has given as a curse to mankind." If this be true, it should put an end to the Armenian agitation, or at least turn it into a fresh channel. God Almighty is the responsible party, and Lord Salisbury should send him a strongly-worded remonstrance. Meanwhile the "wretched Sultan"—on Mr. Gladstone's own principles—can justify himself by saying, "I am the curse of God."

St. Winifride's miraculous well has been doing such good business that the landlord—the Holywell Urban Council—has raised the rent. Even miracles, when they are regular, fall under the laws of political economy.

The Chief Constable of Walsall has made himself obnoxious throughout the town by a series of petty persecutions of tradespeople for keeping open their shops on Sunday. The local Free Press has a good article upon the subject, and, if other tradespeople follow the example of Mr. Card in refusing to give any undertaking that they will not continue to open, the police authorities will probably soon get tired of the publicity awarded to their pious zeal.

The Rev. H. Chapman is well known as a philanthropic clergyman in South London. Mr. Denman, the magistrate of Lambeth Police Court, however, does not approve of his Christian ways. He said Mr. Chapman took upon himself to write to the witnesses asking them to stop away in order that the case might lapse. It was an attempt to interfere with the course of justice, and anyone who reflected for a moment must see that it was a most improper thing to do. If any other case was brought to his notice of a clergyman or anyone else endeavoring to interfere with anyone coming to the court in the performance of their duties, he should feel it his duty to report all the facts to the Home Office.

A correspondent of the Daily News says that "General Gordon entertained a strange belief concerning the 'coco de mer' and the islands where it grows. The hero of Khartoum believed the islands to be the long-sought-for Garden of Eden, and the coco de mer the 'forbidden fruit' which caused the fall of Eve. The conviction had such hold on the gallant soldier that he attempted to prove by the chart of the island that the rivers of the Seychelles corresponded with those mentioned in the Bible."

The Local Government Board has notified to the Stepney Board of Guardians that they will not be justified in adopting the suggestion of Father Highley, that one foundling out of every four should be brought up as a Roman Catholic. The inference is that all children the religion of whose parents cannot be ascertained must be brought up in the tenets of the Church of England.

It is found that several children's games represent once solemn ceremonies and religious rites, and it is suspected that a usual course for effete institutions is to descend to children. Perhaps this may explain the crop of boy preachers that have recently sprung up in America. These are now said to be outdone and outshone by a girl preacher named Clarette Avery. Clarette is only ten years old, and has already brought many (chiefly darkies) to the feet of sweet Jesus.

Professor G. D. Herron, of Grinnel College, Iowa, says: "Our boasted liberties were not born in the faith of our Puritan fathers, but of the Atheism of France." However he may intend it, he is stating simple fact.

It was festival day in a certain small country church in Warwickshire, and the choir were indulging in the luxury of an anthem which they had been assiduously rehearsing for months past. A bold start was made, but, after riding rough-shod over piano and forte passages alike, the vocalists came to a sudden stoppage, and, the bewildered organ-blower forgetting his duties in the general discomfiture, there was an awkward pause for the space of half a minute. The clergyman, a man of resource, thereupon sought to engage the congregation in prayer, a move which the elderly and somewhat privileged clerk approved by remarking, sotto voce, "Aye, parson, let up pray, for I'm dommed if we can sing!"—Birmingham Daily Mail (October 26).

Captain Ayres says in the Cosmopolitan: "Russia still refuses to accept the Gregorian calendar, and has the satisfaction of being a dozen days ahead of the whole world, and is constantly increasing the lead. If the empire and its conservatism endure long enough, Russia's Christmas and our Fourth of July will occur on the same day. This is the most transcendent case of old fogyism I know."

The reason for the objection is, of course, that the people would be disturbed in the celebration of their religious festivals. Western Europe had got ten days out in its reckoning before the Pope sanctioned a reformation, and even after the Papal Bull was issued in 1582 the Protestant countries resisted what they called a papistical invention for more than a century, and when the change was adopted in England in 1752 some people thought they were being deprived of so many years of their lives. In the Secular Almanack for 1896 Mr. Wheeler has given an account of the various methods of time calculation, and of how they illustrate religion.

Messiahs are plentiful in America. The latest craze is about Francis Schlatter, an ex-shoemaker, whose portrait is given in The Illustrated American. He wears his hair long, parts it in the middle, and arranges it à la portraits of Jesus Christ. The resemblance at once turns him into a Faith Healer, and he goes about followed by crowds, some of whom look on him as a new incarnation.

The veracious Acts of the Apostles (xix. 11, 12) tell us "God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul: so that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them." Schlatter outdoes this. His mail reaches from three to five hundred letters per day. Handkerchiefs from all over the continent come to be blessed. These, Schlatter claims, will do what his touch will for those who have faith in the Master. Of course, many claim that they are cured. What drug or nostrum is there that cannot claim to have healed by faith?

The Rev. Myron Reed, of the Broadway Temple, Denver, acclaims Christ Schlatter as a confutation of Hume. But so many have confuted Hume without even taking the trouble to read him. The "miracles" said to have been performed at the tomb of the Abbé Paris, to the evidence for which Hume appealed to show the unscientific character of such testimony, were far more wonderful than the healings reported of the new Messiah.

Digitized by Google

The Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, of Atlanta, U.S.A., is scandalised by the wheelwomen. "Recently," said Mr. Hawthorne, "a great religious convention in an Eastern city concluded its exercises by a bicycle race on the streets between seven hundred men, women, and preachers. Could anything less than a personal devil have instigated such a performance?" It is so customary to give Satan the credit for all progress that we do not wonder at Luciferans declaring that he rather deserves to be worshipped than his divine antagonist.

The Dublin Evening Herald, in a leader commenting on the Bishop of Down's claim for a University, "exclusively Catholic," in Dublin, Belfast, Cork, and Galway, points out that four such provincial institutions would be more under the complete control of the bishops than a common university, and they would be likely to swamp the institutions which, without any State act, have maintained higher education.

On the coffin of Horace Thatcher, the gentleman's servant who jumped into a pond at Furze Hill, near Woking, were inscribed the words: "I heard the voice of Jesus saying, Come unto me and rest." The inference is that, when the poor boy heard the voice, he concluded to make for the pond.

Dr. J. A. Spurgeon, brother of the late C. H. Spurgeon, preaching lately in a Victoria-park chapel, said that there should be greater belief in pastors as messengers of God. Of course! That's what the pastors like. It flatters their importance. It also promotes their comfort. A man who comes on his own account (say) gets a penny; the man who comes on God's account gets twopence—a penny for himself and a penny for the Almighty.

The G. O. M. compliments a Scottish clergyman, named Baxter, on having demolished Wellhausen. This will gratify the Caledonian man of God, and it will amuse the great German critic. Mr. Gladstone wants to know how long Dr. Baxter's criticism of Wellhausen has been published, in order to see "whether he has had the opportunity of reply." Really this is too simple for anything. Wellhausen is not called upon to reply to everybody who likes to criticise him, and he has plenty of room for controversy at home without going for it all the way to Scotland.

While the G. O. M. is seeing his book on Bishop Butler through the press, it is well to note what a correspondent of the Daily News says about the effect of Butler on the late Charles Stewart Parnell. The great Irish leader remarked that he was inclined to be sceptical when they made him read Butler for his examination at Cambridge. It is worth mentioning, in this connection, that it was reading The Analogy which made James Mill an Atheist.

"United Prayer," says the English Churchman, "is the secret of successful resistance to the encroachments of Romanism and Infidelity." At the same time, it mentions that the Catholics are putting up prayers for the conversion of England. With Catholics at his right ear, and Protestants at his left, we should think Jehovah would have recourse to cotton-wool.

The Catholics want a lot from Lord Salisbury in return for very little help at the elections. A number of their papers are asking for a Catholic University in Ireland, Endowment of the Christian Brothers' Schools, and Mrs. Meynell as Poet Laureate. Beaconsfield used to say that, when a Catholic asked for tolerance, he meant supremacy.

At the Church of England Assembly at Melbourne the Rev. Dr. Torrance gave the following significant notice of motion: "That in order to minimise the existing evil of sweating amongst the clergy of this diocese—(laughter)—especially in the poorer country districts, it is imperative that a united effort be made to provide a living wage for the stipendiary servants of the Church, and to secure, as far as possible, regular and punctual payment of the same." Pity the poor sweated clergy.

All Saints' Church, Norfolk-square, was burnt down in the spring of 1893. A new church on the same spot has just been consecrated and opened for public worship. This time, perhaps, the "consecration" will be more efficacious.

Delightful old Dr. Kinns has been giving a series of lectures at York on "The Historical Accuracy of the Bible." He wound up with Daniel, which sufficiently illustrates his method. Daniel speaks of Babylonian history and of the capture of Babylon. Well, from Babylon itself we get accounts of its history and of its capture; therefore, all Daniel says must be true, including the story of himself in the den of lions and the three Jews unharmed in the furnace of fire.

From the Methodist Times we see that, since 1870, the Anglicans have doubled their schools, and the Catholics have quadrupled theirs, while the Methodists have been stationary. The annual grant to Church schools is £2,700,000, to Board schools £2,600,000, to Catholic schools £300,000, to Methodist schools £198,000. These figures enable every sensible man to understand why the Methodists want to regulate religious education in the Board schools.

"We can never forget," the Methodist Times says, "that the real leaders of the Socialist movement on the Continent are bitter and aggressive Atheists, equally opposed to Christian truth and to Christian morals." "Christian truth" is good, only it begs the question. Atheists call it "Christian falsehood." As for "Christian morals," the Atheist prefers the substantive without the adjective. Was it not Dr. Johnson who said that the adjective is always the enemy of the noun? It certainly is so in this case.

Mr. Grant Allen has done good work for Freethought and general progress, but we regret to see that he is becoming too self-conscious. "This is a Hill-top Novel," he says of a new book of his. "I propose in future," he continues, "to add the words 'A Hill-top Novel' to each one of my stories which I write on my own account, simply and solely for the sake of embodying force of my own opinion. Whenever, therefore, the words 'A Hill-top Novel' appear on the title-page of a book by me, the reader who cares for truth and righteousness may take it for granted that the book represents my own original thinking, good or bad." This reminds us of persons who have two standards of truth—one on oath, and one without it. In any case, the public have nothing to do with Mr. Grant Allen's motives in writing, whether it be to make money, or to satisfy himself, or to promote certain principles; and if Mr. Allen goes on talking so much about his motives, his novels will become sermons, which people will not read for the mere sake of truth and righteousness.

We put this question to Mr. Grant Allen: Can he imagine Shakespeare, or even Shelley or George Meredith, hanging out a notice: "Dear friends, listen to me now; I'm really in earnest this time; and you may always take me seriously when you see this announcement"?

Dr. Berdoe, the well-known Browningite, is stated to have been converted from Agnosticism to Christianity by a study of the poet. How amusing, when Browning declared that he was not a Christian himself! We have not read Dr. Berdoe's new book on Browning as a Christian teacher; but, judging from the review of it by "W. A." (William Archer?) in the Daily Chronicle, it is a very washy production.

How religion asserts itself when people are frightened! During the recent earthquake at Rome a rush was made for the churches, which were soon filled with excited crowds praying for mercy. It was an old Roman poet who said that fear was the first creator of gods. And he was right.

Considering that the Pope is God's vicegerent on earth, it is very curious that the earthquake—which, of course, was sent by Providence—gave the Vatican a good shaking, but did not disturb the palace of his enemy, the King of Italy.

The Pope, however, will find consolation in the large contributions that are flowing in to him from all parts of the Catholic world. Last year's receipts for the Propagation of the Faith amounted to more than six million lire, half of which came from France. To quote Shylock, it is a good round sum; enough to make the old man of the Vatican smile all over his face.

The parsons of Simon's Town, Cape Colony, wash their hands of paupers, and resolutely refuse to bury them without fee. The duty of burial falls on the resident magistrate. Of such are the kingdom of heaven!

Mr. Tom Hough, the leader of the Denaby Main surfacemen, who are out on strike, seems to have read the Bible at some time or other, but to retain a vague recollection of its contents. According to the Sheffield Independent, he referred to the strike of the Jews against Pharaoh, and said it was the biggest on record, as forty-two million bricklayers were engaged in it. Someone in the meeting exclaimed, "Oh"; but Mr. Hough replied, "Yes." We always thought that Bible arithmetic was comical; but Mr. Hough makes it still funnier. He would be an amusing Sunday-school teacher.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, November 10, Alexandra Hall, Hope-street, Sherlock-street, Birmingham: 11, "Religion in the Light of Science"; 3, "Life, Death, and After"; 7, "Did Jesus Christ Ever Live?"

November 17, Leicester.

December 1, Bradford; 22, Manchester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—November 10, Newcastle-on-Tyne; 11, Stockton-on-Tees; 17, Liverpool; 24, Manchester. December 1, Wood Green; 15 and 22, Foresters' Hall.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

D. Denton.—Freethinkers will get no more consideration from politicians than they can extort.

Consistency.—Mr. Foote will be happy to pay Hull another visit. Why are the local "saints" so quiet? If a hall cannot be obtained on the system of charging for admission, let us admit the people free. Anything is better than stagnation, and Mr. Foote is prepared to take all risks.

J. Fulton, in sending another subscription to Shilling Month, says: "I am sorry to see only small sums sent. No £10, £50, or £100. You have to depend on the comparatively poor."

W. R. Newton.—Transferred as desired. Thanks.

W. Hardiman.—We are obliged to you for your good wishes.

A. J. H.—See paragraph.

W. Wilson.—Colonel Ingersoll cannot punish his libellers in England. The pamphlet you refer to was written by a low-caste American, who is disowned by his co-religionists.

A. Willeby.—Thanks. See paragraph.

Unknown.—Dr. Kinns is simply farcical as a scientist championing the Bible. We have no space to waste upon him.

G. Crookson desires to correct our last week's paragraph on the Miners' Hall incident. The objection was to letting the place for Sunday lectures. It has been engaged for a week-night lecture by Mr. Cohen. The bigotry of the officials is bad enough, but not so bad as we represented.

W. Richards (Edmonton).—Mr. Foote is in receipt of your invitation—which may or may not be authorised—to attend a lecture by the Rev. Z. B. Woffendale in your locality, with a view to offering opposition; or, failing that, to send a representative. Mr. Foote replies (1) that he has more important business than running after Mr. Woffendale, and (2) that he has no authority to send a representative to that gentleman's meetings.

H. Cooke.—Thanks for cuttings. Glad to hear you are so pleased at the opportunity of hearing Mr. Foote again at Birmingham.

J. G. Dobson, Stockton-on-Tees, writes: "Mr. Cohen has lectured here under your new lecture scheme. Both his lectures were very highly appreciated. We have arranged with Mr. Watts to give us a lecture on November 11, also under your scheme."

C. Heaton.—The second part of the last chapter of Mark, beginning with the ninth verse, is marked in the Revised Version as not to be found in some of the oldest manuscripts. It does not appear in either the Vatican or the Sinaitic. It is omitted by Tischendorf.

L. Organ suggests that G. L. Mackenzie should be made Poet Laureate with an enlarged salary.

R. S. Johnson.—Pleased to know that the Northampton friends "admire" our "courage and determination to keep Freethought to the front." Mr. Foote will lecture in your town at an early date if you can secure him a good, or even passable, hall.

Minnie Many.—Thanks. See paragraph.

A. G. Levett.—It shall be reprinted in full next week. Too late for this week's issue.

C. Lacoq.—Something will be done at Cardiff shortly.

Papers Received.—Pioneer—Look Times—Post—Birmingham Daily Mail—Referee—Sheffield and Rotherham Independent—Cambria Daily Leader—Glasgow Herald—Freethought Ideal—Yorkshire Herald—Melbourne Argus—Truthseeker—Liberator—Birmingham Argus—Secular Thought—Freidenker—Belfast Evening Telegraph—Yorkshire Post—Fur Unsere Jugend—De Dageraad—Arbeiter's Freund—Der Arme Teufel—Open Court—Woking News—Dublin Evening Herald—Daily Telegraph.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SHILLING MONTH.

Shilling Month is now over, though a few subscriptions are still dribbling in, and will be duly acknowledged. I have received (roughly) about £90. This will enable me to push on with my lecture scheme, though it will not last long if operations are to be conducted with any vigor. I shall probably trouble my readers again in the new year. I will then state what has been done, and I hope the account will be satisfactory. Meanwhile, I may add that I have engaged St. James's Hall for another course of Sunday lectures in January, and that I am arranging for courses of week-night lectures in various parts of London.

G. W. FOOTE.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

(Where merely the name is given the amount is one shilling.)

T. Smith; R. Ogilvie; J. Barbour; C. B. Hyde, 2s. 6d.; W. Hardiman, 2s.; John Cuff, 5s.; W. H. Putz; C. Lecoq and Friends, 5s.; J. Unsworth; R. Richards, 4s.; J. Hawkey, 5s.; Three Friends, 2s.; M. Messer; R. S. Johnson; Garley; Minerva, 2s. 6d.; M. L. B.; J. S. Doig, 5s.; J. Walker, 5s.; J. M., 1s. 6d.; D. D., 10s.; L. Sisman, 5s.; Alpha's Friend; Consistency; J. Fulton, 5s.; S. Hartmann, 10s.; C. L. Daniel, 5s.; G. J. Holyoake, 3s.

Per Miss Vance:—G. Dickenson; S. Alward, 2s. 6d.

Per R. Forder:—J. Chamberlain, 2s.; "Edaw," 3s.; W. Tipper, 2s.; J. Denham; J. F. Finn, 10s.; G. F. Wenborn, 5s.; J. H. White; W. Macfarlane, 5s.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote delivered the inaugural lecture on Sunday evening for the Bradlaugh Club and Institute at Balls Pond, Mr. R. Forder occupying the chair. The hall, which is of moderate size, though large enough for the locality, has been tastefully decorated and comfortably seated. Prior to the lecture Mr. Foote "named" the baby girl of Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, of the Wood Green Branch. He also expressed a hope that Freethought propaganda would continue to be the first object with the new Club, and that the social element, which is always liable to overwhelm the rest, would be kept in its proper place as an accessory. Mr. Forder stated, on behalf of the promoters, that this was exactly the policy they intended to pursue. After the lecture there was some rather ridiculous opposition, which had to be taken as one of the penalties of free discussion. We understand that Mr. Parris follows Mr. Foote this evening (November 10).

Mr. Foote has not visited Birmingham since his last lecture in the Town Hall. To-day (November 10) he delivers three lectures in the Alexandra Hall, Hope-street, for the N.S.S. Branch, which is now domiciled there. Tea will be provided before the evening lecture for friends from a distance. Mr. Foote hopes to meet readers of the Freethinker from the surrounding districts.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured to a large audience last Sunday morning at the Newington Reform Club. In the evening he spoke to an enthusiastic gathering at Foresters' Hall. This Sunday, November 10, Mr. Watts lectures three times at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and to-morrow, Monday evening, at Stockton-on-Tees.

Mr. C. Cohen occupies the Foresters' Hall platform this evening (November 10). We hope he will have the encouragement of a good house, and that Mr. Foote, who is responsible for the expenses, will have the encouragement of a good collection.

It has been decided to publish the Secular Almanack, issued by the National Secular Society, at threepence. The issue for 1896 will be on sale soon after the date of this number of the Freethinker. The reduced price places it within the reach of all, and, as any profit goes to the society, we bespeak for it the patronage of our readers.

Digitized by Google

A few days ago, in conversation with Mr. George Anderson, we learnt that he had just been in communication with a friend he had lost sight of for more than forty years, and all through one of Mr. Putnam's letters in the Truthseeker. The friend in question saw a reference to George Anderson there, and said to himself, "Why, that must be my George Anderson." He wrote and discovered that it was, and now they are "Dear Georging" and "Dear Williaming" each other as though they had only parted yesterday. So strong is the friendship formed in the god-like time of youth.

Fifty years ago Mr. Anderson belonged to a Young Men's Society at Arbroath, and he converted nearly all the members to Freethought; though the Society degenerated when he left it, for when he returned some time afterwards he found them discussing whether an old maid or a young widow made the best wife.

It was at this period of his life that Mr. Anderson became acquainted with William Cant Sturoc, who visited America, settled down there, and so disappeared. The place of his settlement was Sunapee, in Sullivan county. He was admitted to the bar in 1855, and is now a respected citizen, widely known for intelligence and integrity, for liberal thought and a certain poetic gift which even law has not succeeded in suppressing. A portrait of him appeared in the Granite Monthly for December, 1893. The face is keen and intellectual, with geniality and humor about the eyes and mouth.

Mr. Anderson asked Mr. Sturoc whether the law over there was as badly against Freethought as it is here. Mr. Sturoc replies that there is no State law against selling tickets or charging a door-fee on Sunday, but municipal regulations have lately been enforced to put down Sunday theatricals and concerts. There are occasionally fanatical outbursts, encouraged by the clergy, against individual rights. Societies may take and hold property, but the intention of testators is sometimes frustrated by bigoted judges.

The Humanitarian League has just issued The Shadow of the Sword, by Mr. Foote, as No. 19 of its publications. The pamphlet has been revised and slightly enlarged. It remains to be seen whether the Press boycott against the President of the National Secular Society will be maintained in connection with this essay in favor of peace. In any case, it is to be presumed that the pamphlet will find fresh readers now that it is issued by the Humanitarian League.

The Weekly Times and Echo calls Mr. Foote's Shadow of the Sword "one of the most eloquent pleas for Peace" it has ever seen.

The Rev. W. W. Howard, we see, is occupying some of his leisure in lecturing on noses. It is an organ on which clericals should be excellent authorities, for the priests of all religions have been leading people by the nose from time immemorial. In the course of his lecture Mr. Howard figured as a champion of phrenology, which strikes us as rather curious on the part of one who is so anxious to establish the soul theory of mental phenomena. However that may be, we are glad to notice that Mr. Howard takes another step towards the proposed debate with Mr. Foote. He sends another letter to the Leek Times, in which he formulates the proposition he is prepared to maintain. It is as follows: "That the soul theory—and the soul theory only—can render a full and true account of the human mind and all its operations." Mr. Howard desires Mr. Foote to formulate a proposition implying some other theory. Mr. Foote is prepared to do this, but he is not prepared to include the word "full" as well as the word "true." An account may be true without being full—that is, if full means complete, as most people will understand it. Science has not said the last word on "the operations of the human mind," any more than it has said the last word on many other things that are purely natural. Mr. Howard seems to be very much on his guard, and Mr. Foote may as well follow the reverend gentleman's example. He will therefore go no farther than he is justified in doing by present-day science, for, not being a prophet, he is unable to anticipate the science of the future. Accordingly, he advances the following proposition to be maintained in debate: "That the phenomena of what is called the human mind are but an aspect of man's organic activities, and do not imply the presence of a second or spiritual entity." This is all that any philosophical "Materialist"—if that word must be used—is called upon to maintain. It is the only theory, in fact, which remains when the soul theory is demolished; and it is expressed in language, not of popular freedom, but of scientific exactitude

A recent answer in our "Correspondents'" column has caused disappointment amongst the members of the Lewisham and New Cross Branch. We remarked that "we should like to see some lecturing done here"; but it appears that the Branch has had a great many lectures delivered during the past year at Deptford, which we did not know was within the sphere of its operations. Of course, we are very sorry for the mistake. It is another proof that we are not infallible. The secretary informs us that the Branch is much indebted to Mr. James for his services as a lecturer. All concerned in the local work have had an uphill fight, but they are now enjoying a considerable measure of success.

The Pioneer, of North London, continues its excellent reports of "Secularism at Wood Green," devoting a column to Mr. Forder's lecture on the Devil.

Mr. Moncure D. Conway lectures at South Place Chapel this morning (November 10) on "The Centenary of Paine's Age of Reason." A hundred years have elapsed since the publication of the first part of that brilliant work. The author paid the penalty of being in advance of his time, but his revenge has come, for the Higher Criticism is only the Age of Reason writ large—and dull.

The Paine Exhibition at South Place Chapel will take place on December 2. It is likely that another one will follow at the Bradlaugh Institute, Balls Pond, on January 29, Paine's Birthday.

Mr. G. J. Holyoake, in sending his Shilling Month subscription, says that "a cold has delayed transmission." We are sorry to hear of the veteran's indisposition, and hope by this time he is thoroughly recovered.

Vamadeo Shastri, writing in the November Fortnightly on "Brahmanism and the Foundations of Belief," mentions that Christian missionaries in India always employ against the Brahman teaching and tradition those very arguments which Mr. Balfour terms rationalistic, "touching the absurdity of our worships and beliefs, the incredibility of our miraculous narrative, the want of authenticity of our scriptures, and so on." Sauce for the Hindu goose is sauce for the Christian gander. Vamadeo Shastri also shows that in India they have long had that supremacy of authority over reason for which Mr. Balfour argues, and, at the same time, are untrammelled by definite dogmatic creeds.

Walter F. Reid writes in the November Westminster Review on "Huxley as Evolutionist," and contends that Huxley was no instantaneous convert struck by the novelty of the theory, but accepted it as the only possible explanation of the facts, after full deliberation.

Placing the Passion Play, by Signor Giovani Bovio, on the Index has made it popular all over Italy. Miss Helen Zimmern, who reviews the play in the Zukunft, Berlin, thinks this opposition to modern passion plays is easy to explain. During the Middle Ages the stage was entirely under the supervision of the Church. To-day dramatists are free from the influence of the priests, whom the masses no longer follow as sheep follow their shepherd. The public notice and applaud scepticism, and the higher the ethical and artistic value of a play, the stronger becomes clerical opposition.

South London friends, and perhaps some North London ones too, will remember the entertainment next Wednesday evening (Nov. 13) in the Camberwell Secular Hall, New Church-road, Camberwell-road. It is in aid of the President's new lecture scheme. Mr. Charles Watts will give a selection from The Lady of Lyons, and Mr. Foote a reading from Shakespeare. Mr. A. B. Moss and Miss Annie Brown will take part, with others, in a domestic comedy; and Mr. Watts in a comedietta entitled The Morning Call. A Society Dance by Miss Harding and songs by Madame Kate Burgwitz will complete the program. The tickets, sixpence and one shilling each, can be obtained at 28 Stonecutter-street, or at the Secular Hall.

Miss Vance inquires if any member or friend has a lad of about 14 or 16 willing to assist with the bookstall on Sunday at Foresters' Hall.

The Plymouth Branch holds a special business meeting this evening (November 10th), at 7, in the Democratic Hall, Whimple Street. All members are requested to attend.

He who goes through a land and scatters blown roses may be tracked next day by their withered petals that strew the ground; but he who goes through it and scatters rose seed a hundred years after leaves behind a land full of fragrance and beauty for a monument, and as a heritage for all his children.—Theodore Parker.

Digitized by Google

MR. PUTNAM'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

Extracts from his Letters to the New York "Truthseeker" (October 5).

FROM Bognor, through the varying palaces of the moonlit night, I again return to London.

Sunday morning, September 1, dawns with cloudless sky. I drift in the morning sunshine over to the home of Foote, and take my last smoke in the garden where happy hours have passed. I have dinner with Mr. and Mrs. George Ward, and meet our veteran comrade, Tripp, of Brighton. In the afternoon I go to Finsbury Park, where Stanley Jones is wrestling with the Christians. He has a two hours' battle of it, but maintains the cause at every point. I take tea with Mr. and Mrs. Fleming, and then we make our way to Foresters' Hall, where I deliver my last lecture in England, "Ingersoll and Freethought," to a splendid audience—splendid in numbers, splendid in enthusiasm, splendid in its welcome to Mr. Foote as the representative of British Freethought, and to his co-worker from America. I must thank Mr. Foote for the thorough-going manner in which he has supported my labors in the field, and for his whole-souled greeting to me as a guest. He has been a comrade, indeed, with chivalrous devotion to the cause. Success has been the result, as witnessed by this great and applauding gathering. Mr. Foote is a man full of resources. If one opportunity fails, he seizes another. He has recently made a vigorous movement upon the West-End, at St. James's Hall. Bradlaugh, in his palmy days, made no effort upon this side of London. The importance of Mr. Foote's new departure is now conceded, and he has won fresh laurels in this campaign. He has met new faces and enlarged the sphere of Secular work, while abandoning no post. I believe the Freethought forces in London were never in better condition for advance, under this brave and cautious leader. I am sure that the series of lectures at Foresters' Hall will be a pronounced success. The enthusiastic conclusion of my own labors marks the beginning of a victorious winter's campaign. Mr. Watts lectures the next two Sundays, and he is a favorite with London audiences, as elsewhere, and always draws the full quota of our columns. I must thank him also for his unstinted aid. He arranged the whole course of my lectures in such a way that I could do the most work and see the best of the country. I could not have accomplished nearly as much without his cheerful assistance. I can only hope to repay the generosity of my British comrades when they come to see the grandeur and magnificence of America. Of course, while I admire the old country, with its vast accumulations of knowledge and art, I must still affirm that America beats the world, for in it is the immeasurable promise of the future. We may not have done much yet, but think of the mighty theatre, with mountains, rivers, lakes, and plains, in which millions of the human race will develop. Well, Foote and Watts must come to our shores, and I will show them a thing or two when they arrive. They shall have a warm welcome, and they shall be assured that the Freethinkers of America appreciate the work they have done as the representatives of our British brethren; and through them we will join heart and hand with all transatlantic comrades.

Monday, August 26, was also a day of pleasure, for I visited the far-famed Windsor Castle with Mr. Victor Jackson and the secretaries of the National Secular Society and the London Federation, Miss Edith M. Vance and Miss Annie Brown. The secretaries were formerly residents of Windsor; Miss Brown's father for nearly half a century has been employed in Windsor Castle itself; and so with these friends I had plenty of chance to see the glory of this magnificent structure, the largest royal residence in the world. I do not know whether we could have a Windsor Castle without royalty or not, but it is certainly a precious gift to the present generation, and may it endure when democracy shall triumph. Kings and queens have flourished here, and their day is gone; but not with them shall vanish the splendor of this imposing edifice. I cannot describe all I saw; I can give only glimpses. Of course I climbed the Round Tower, and was repaid for the somewhat difficult journey up the winding staircase. It was a memorable view that greeted the eye—the river Thames winding along, Eton College, the great forests, the deer and cattle, the vast fields, the city itself at my feet; the castle with its walls and turrets, its moat, its gateways, its pavilions and chapels, its assemblage of massive halls and chambers. Before me lay the accumulated result of the toils of many kings. It was a bright and beautiful picture, for little of tragedy is connected with Windsor Castle, "The muses' and the monarch's seat." It reminds one of gorgeous revelry, of the brightness and not the darkness of the past. After the tower we were guided into the State apartments, the Vandyck room, the Zuccarelli room, the Ante-room, the Grand Vestibule, the Waterloo Chamber, St. George's Hall, the Guard Chamber, and so forth. The paintings, statues, porcelains, curiosities that I looked upon, I cannot enumerate. It was a vast display, and I don't see that the queen can own it any more than the rest of us, for we certainly could enjoy all its beauty and draw lessons from its historic associations, its wonders of human ingenuity and power.

After we had visited the castle, and enjoyed an excellent repast purveyed by our good friend Victor Jackson, the same generous comrade secured a "trap," and we had a drive through the great park and to Runnymede. The "long walk," I believe, surpasses the world for grace and ornamentation. It is straight as an arrow for three miles—direct from the royal entrance of Windsor to the statue of George the Fourth. On either side are wide ranks of trees, and beyond these are open spaces of green fields, which, again, are hedged in by ampler forests. As we ascend towards the statue, the scenery broadens. Forest on forest appears; fields are added to fields; farther on are smooth pastures flecked with wandering herds; while the majestic castle, illumined by the setting sun, crowns the landscape with superb form. With soft, grassy banks, and bosom rippled by passing boats, the river flashes on our sight. The fair meadows of Runnymede stretch away where the shafts of sunset seem to glimmer on the armor of old barons. Quaint houses edge the road, with ivied walls and rose-embowered windows. Green hedges slip by us as we near the lighted streets, and the horse, spurred by thoughts of supper and guided by a skilful hand, gets on an extra move. It was a time when I could see Herne the hunter, and Falstaff, and the merry wives of Windsor, the oak in the moonlight with the fairies dancing about it, and the many-colored lanterns. Windsor is not simply the home of royalty. It is a palace of poetry, and its surroundings are replete with legend and romance. I must thank my friends for this day. Windsor Castle will not be forgotten, nor the companions associated with its entrancing scenes.

Tuesday is another day of notable experience. I visit Epping Forest and its vicinity, the greatest playground in the world, where for miles one may wander in sylvan solitudes. This forest is now preserved for the pleasure of the people. For centuries it was encroached upon by avaricious landlords; but, by Act of Parliament, hereafter its "contiguity of shade" will be untouched, and millions can roam in its bowers and drink the pure air of heaven—especially on Sundays. Such is the march of the people.

Forder takes me out, and we land at Aybridge, Essex. Mr. Moody meets us at the station, and takes us to White Hart Hotel, of which he is proprietor. We have a delightful welcome from both Mr. and Mrs. Moody, who are Freethinkers, and together we take a drive to King's Head, at Chigwell. This is an antique place, celebrated by Charles Dickens in Barnaby Rudge as the Maypole. Of it the novelist says: "Such a delicious old inn, opposite the churchyard; such an out-of-the-way rural place." It is to-day just as Dickens described it in Barnaby Rudge. He lived here himself when he wrote that great book. It is said that Queen Elizabeth lodged here. No one knows when it was built, but scarcely any change has overtaken the place in its structure. The walls, the rooms, the window-panes, are the same. It is a place for dim, sweet memories. The garden is especially lovely. It has all sorts of little nooks, bowers, flower beds, and grassy plots. No wonder Dickens loved this place, and fostered his genius with its exquisite surroundings. It is now kept by Tucker Bros., who warmly welcomed the Secular Pilgrim, having themselves been denizens of America. If within twelve miles of London one wishes to see real old English buildings and rural life, and enjoy the luxury of unruffled quietude, he must find his way to King's Head, Chigwell. It was to me a poetic revelation of "things that were."

White Hart Hotel is also an attractive caravansary. Mine host, Moody, is a provider of all good things, and believes in one world at a time. This is a favorite haunt of those who hunt and fish, and the little village is at times as crowded as the thoroughfares of London. My day at Aybridge was one of especial entertainment.

And now time rolls on to the farewell banquet. The Holborn is one of the most famous restaurants in London. It is a bright, handsome, cheery place. It has an air both of elegance and comfort. At the hour of dinner music fills its spacious halls. Flowers are seen on every side with tropical luxuriance. In the Holborn you have the "golden mean," art and beauty without depressing pomp or the restraint of rigid upholstery. No wonder that reformers love to congregate here, for they can have the good things of life, with brilliant surroundings, in a free-and-easy fashion. I hate some hotels. It seems a sacrifice of radical principle to enter their stiff and stately corridors. But the Holborn has a broad and wholesome look, inviting to the iconoclast, while he admires the beautiful.

So we gather here, and it was one of the happiest occasions of my life. The friends are numerous and widely representative of Freethought in England. George W. Foote presides over the festivities, with the Pilgrim on his right and the redoubtable Watts on his left. George Anderson, George Jacob Holyoake, Parris, Forder, Ward, Wheeler, Moss, Rowney, Mr. Gimson, of Leicester, Mr. Gilbespie, of Newcastle, Mr. Tripp, of Brighton, C. A. Watts

Digitized by Google

Edward Truelove, Mr. Heaford, and Victor Jackson are among those who brighten the circle. The ladies who grace the banquet are Mrs. Foote, Mrs. Watts, Miss Jessie Nowlan, Mrs. Charles A. Watts, Miss Vance, Miss Annie Brown, Mrs. Ward, Miss Robins, Mrs. Heaford, and Mrs. Wheeler. Mr. and Mrs. Sumner are present, and Mr. and Mrs. Moody, of Aybridge. I cannot enumerate the whole, because the names shine along somewhere towards a hundred, good and true friends, who link England and America in glorious comradery. From time immemorial eating together has been the symbol of companionship—a very sensible, solid, materialistic, and humanitarian custom, which will no doubt endure as long as man has a good appetite and a generous heart. We did full justice to the ancient and honorable régime, and the Holborn certainly did its part in the hospitable program with triumphant felicity, while we did the rest. However, we did not consume in silence. The play of fancy mingled with the satisfaction of the material frame. Then came the after-dinner speeches, upon whose sacred altar Mr. Foote offered himself as the first victim. No one could do it more gracefully, or with more genial effect. He brought us at once into the glow of fellowship by his eloquence and humor. He did not clothe the occasion with melancholy. He looked upon the bright side of the farewell hour. "We are simply going to different fields of labor," he said, "and the same flag floats over us all." Then was drank the health of the representative of American Freethought. This was responded to first of all by George Jacob Holyoake, who spoke good words for American Freethought, of Ingersoll and his coadjutors, whose work is followed with interest throughout Great Britain. Mr. Holyoake referred to the letters of the Pilgrim, which he declared displayed a luminous knowledge of the fields of labor through which he had passed. I was glad to find that I had hit the mark, and was, on the whole, a correct observer, for I considered it of the first importance to give a veritable picture of the British Isles. Mr. Holyoake was followed by Mr. Gimson and Mr. Parris, whose words were indeed pleasant for me to listen to; and then came Watts, who is always good, and on this occasion especially so, for he spoke out of the experiences of many years and many places. We had been together both in England and America, side by side with Ingersoll, with Bennett, with Macdonald, in the New World, and now with Foote and all our brave allies in the Old. Mr. Watts touched the deepest chords of the occasion and voiced its noblest meaning, and made a fitting and inspiring close to the splendid words which had been spoken in sympathy with the kindred people of America. I made response with heartfelt utterance to these fraternal greetings, and in behalf of America spoke the message of progress and universal brotherhood. "We need these occasions," I said, "in order to rejoice in hope and courage. We cannot work alone. We must work together. Liberty, science, and humanity are the words that blaze on our banners, and above is the noble motto of Paine, 'The world is my country.'"

The speeches were followed by a recitation from Mrs. Charles Watts, whose humorous descriptions of mankind and elevation of woman were received with many plaudits. We were delighted that the "weaker sex" had such a brilliant representative, who was able to hold her own with such sparkling wit, and thus added to the éclat of the banquet. Then music filled the air, and merry songs made glad the heart. Mr. George Anderson afterwards gave one of the best speeches of the evening. Mr. Anderson seldom speaks; he does the work; but when he does speak it is to the point. He referred to the arduous labors of Mr. Foote; the many difficulties that beset him; the magnanimous spirit in which he had met them; the bold methods to which he had resorted, and the success he had attained. He spoke of the necessity of standing loyally by Mr. Foote, in order that there might be unity and concentration in the Freethought ranks and victory for the cause. He proposed the health of President Foote, which was drank with ringing applause. Mr. Foote eloquently answered, affirming that he did not claim to be infallible, but that he did the best he could, and would continue to do so. He did not ask support for his individual opinions, but for the measures devised as chief of the party, whose sole purpose was the advancement of the cause. In these we must combine. The response given to Mr. Foote shows that he has the entire confidence of the party; that the heart of Freethought Britain is with him; and with Mr. Watts, Mr. Anderson, and hundreds of unflinching supporters, he will push forward the lines to assured victory.

We close with singing "Auld Lang Syne." I can sing that song myself, and therefore it was a unanimous melody. Everybody takes a hand in it, as well as a note. I join hands with Anderson on the final stanza, and this stanza is given with a vim that the bards of Scotland cannot surpass. What visions of the past, what glories of the future, are in this beautiful song, whose music is heard the world over, beside a thousand camp-fires and hearth-stones; on mountain, plain, and sea; in cottage and palace. After the song we still linger. This is the last time I shall see many friends. We shake hands and say good-bye. We know not what is before us, but we have a heart for any fate. It's no use to repine or trust in Providence. We trust in ourselves and hope for good fortune. There may be sundering oceans, but humanity bridges them all. The heart of man is mightier than time or space.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

HUXLEY ON MORALS.

ABOUT a year before his death, Professor Huxley wrote the following letter to a correspondent, who inquired his view of the relation of religions and moral:—

"Hodeslea, Staveley-road, Eastbourne, July 11, 1894.

"MY DEAR MR. CREELMAN,—'Ethics' I take to be the science of conduct, a statement of the rules the observance of which tends to the attainment of the objects which are termed ethical. I conceive ethics to be as much a science as navigation, and not unlike it in so far as it tells us how to steer through life.

"'Theology' professes to be a science which furnishes men with truths which have to be taken into account for the guidance of conduct, in addition to those which are attainable by observation and experiment in the realm of nature.

"I, for my part, repudiate the claims of theology to interfere, because I consider it to be a science based on unproved and often highly improbable assumptions. Most people mix up religion with theology, and conceive that the essence of religion is the worship of some theological hypothesis or other. They may be right or wrong, but what I mean by 'religion' is the devotion to an ideal based on intense sympathy with the course of conduct exemplified by that ideal.

"That to the attainment of which a man gives all his energies is the real object of his worship (whatever he may prefer to venerate), from him 'whose god is his belly' up to the purest lover of truth or of his kind.

"On this view no one is without a 'religion' of some sort, and there is no need of any special religious faculty.

"Thus every man's ethical ideal is a matter of feeling. His 'ethics,' as a science, simply tell him the best way of attaining his ideal, just as the ship-captain settles in his mind the port which he wishes to reach, and applies the rules of the science of navigation to get there.—I am, yours very sincerely, T. H. HUXLEY."

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

THE Monthly Executive Meeting was held at the Club and Institute Buildings on Thursday, October 31; the President in the chair. Present: Messrs. C. Watts, J. M. Wheeler, E. Truelove, T. Parris, A. B. Moss, W. Heaford, S. Hartmann, R. Forder, E. Bater, T. Gorniot, S. Jones, A. F. Taylor, J. N. Zwiebel, and the Secretary.

Minutes of previous meeting read and confirmed. Cash statement received.

A matter of grave importance, adjourned from last meeting for the attendance of a member who was alleged to have circulated scandalous reports in connection with the President, was then dealt with. After further inquiry, it was moved by Mr. J. M. Wheeler, and seconded by Mr. Charles Watts: "That Mr. James Anderson be declared no longer a member of the National Secular Society." Carried.

The Editors reported that the Society's Almanack was now in the press.

The President made a further statement with respect to the Hall of Science, and ultimately Mr. Watts moved, and Mr. Moss seconded: "That this Executive, after his action in regard to the Hall of Science, declines to sit any longer with Mr. R. O. Smith as a vice-president, and calls upon him to resign his membership of the Society." Carried unanimously.

The President again referred to his lecture scheme and the proposed operations for the winter. It was satisfactory to know that West-end halls could be engaged for Freethought lectures.

After other minor matters, the meeting closed.

E. M. VANCE, Assistant Secretary.

The Rev. T. A. Goodwin, D.D., contends, in Open Court, that "the Song of Song was probably founded upon some fact in the life of that lecherous king, Solomon; and that the headings of the chapters and the running titles in our common family Bibles are positively ludicrous." If so, why finds it place in an alleged revelation from the Most High?

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

The Free Review (Sonnenschein & Co.), edited by G. A. Singer, maintains its character as an able and interesting organ of advanced ideas. The articles that specially appeal to Freethinkers are a witty one by W. Roberts on "The Reunion of Christendom," another on "Belief and Truth," by D. H. Balfour, and the conclusion of Ernest Newman's brilliant paper on "Amiel." J. McGavin Sloan's article "On Meliorism" is as bright as it is sensible. "Marriage and Free Love" is discussed by F. Rockell and W. F. Dunton, who both seem to us to require a large dose of sobriety. Cato continues his thoughtful paper on "King Alcohol and Liberalism," and G. E. Macdonald, in "The Emperor's Bugbear," shows how social democracy is artificially stimulated by the repressive measures of Bismarck and the young Bombastes Furioso who took the reins of power from his hands.

* * *

What cranks contrive to get their volumes published! The funniest we have come across for a while is Mr. James Robert Smith, who, in a volume entitled Expository Thoughts on the Creation, undertakes the little task of reconciling Scripture and Science. It appears that, prior to the commencement of the first "day," two persons of the Trinity, by a "corporeal act," originated the five compound elements of nature—viz., aëriform vesicular matter, wind, watery vesicular matter, oleaginous vesicular matter, and salt. Then these "began moving and rotating." . . . . The air thickened into "unctuous vapour," and this into seas, whence were evolved zoophytes, molluscs, radiata, and eventually marine creatures (now extinct), which attained an immense size. Penguins, cranes, sparrows, and redpoles followed, and, as a wind-up, Adam was generated "solely by a female gorilla." Perhaps Mr. J. R. Smith is a subtle humorist. Anyway, we commend his volume to the attention of all anxious to reconcile the Bible with scientific belief.

* * *

The new volume (44) of The Dictionary of National Biography gives an extensive notice of Charles Henry Pearson, the pessimistic author of National Life and Character. It mentions his services to education in Australia, and says: "He was a firm supporter of secular education as established in the colony, thinking it the only means of securing perfect fairness towards all religious denominations." John Macleay Peacock, the verse-writer, is mentioned, but Mr. Walter Lewin, who writes the notice, does not say that his chief contributions were made to the National Reformer, nor does he indicate his Freethought opinions beyond the line, "In both politics and religion he was always radical." Miss Cooke gives an account of Reginald Peacock, the first sceptical bishop (1395–1460?), to which we shall probably return.

* * *

Dr. Rendel Harris, in the Expositor for November, returns to the question of "The Blessed Virgin in the Talmud." He is able to cite Dr. Neubauer as confirming his view and that of Laible, that Mary Magdela, the woman's hairdresser of the Talmud, is identified with Mary Magdalene, and also with Mary, the mother of Jesus. Dr. Harris says: "The confusion between the two Marys is very early in the Syrian Church." But he does not contemplate the possibility that it was the Christians who misinterpreted the Jewish story, for this might lead to the conclusion that the Jewish tradition about the birth of Jeshu, embodied in the Jewish Life of Christ, is older and better authenticated than the Christian tradition.

* *

Philo's Treatise about the Contemplative Life is critically edited by F. C. Conybeare, M.A. (Oxford Clarendon Press), who, in a lengthy and learned "Excursus on the Authorship," defends its genuineness against Lucius, Harnack, Graetz, etc. This is the work which led "Eusebius" to say that the Alexandrian Therapeutæ were Christians. Mr. Conybeare's excursus is of considerable importance to all students of the origins of Christianity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHURCHES AND VIVISECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—As evidence of the total disregard which the Roman Catholic Church has always shown for animals, I quote the following passage from an article on "The Lower Animals," in The Catholic Dictionary, by W. H. Addis and T. Arnold, 1884: "The brutes are made for man, who has the same right over them which he has over plants and stones. He may, according to the express permission of God given to Noe, kill them for his food; and if it is lawful to destroy them for food, and this without strict necessity, it must also be lawful to put them to death, or to inflict pain on them for any good and reasonable end; such as the promotion of man's knowledge, health, etc., or even for the purpose of recreation" (quoted in Animals' Rights, Appendix, p. 161; London: George Bell & Sons, 1893).

But that the Anglican Church and some of the Methodists are only a little less bad in this matter is shown by the subjoined extracts.

Jeremy Taylor, one of the "weightiest moralists of the Church of England," speaking of the prohibition of the Jews to eat the blood, says: "But even this very precept is, by all the world, taught to yield to necessity and to charity, and cruelty to beasts is innocent when it is charity to men; and, therefore, though we do not eat them, yet we cut living pigeons in halves, and apply them to the feet of men in fevers, and we rip the bellies of sheep, of horses, of oxen, to put into them the side of a paralytic" (Ductur Dubitantium, Rule of Conscience, book ii., chap. ii., rule 2).

Though it is a far cry from Jeremy Taylor to the Rev. Frank Ballard, he serves to show that the mediæval spirit of utter indifference to animal suffering survives even among the party of which he is a representative. This is what this modern B.Sc. has to say in an article on "The Anti-Vivisection Craze," as he is pleased to call the movement against scientific torture in the current number of the Young Man: "The question of the Son of Man as to how much a man is 'of more value than a sheep' seems to some of us to point definitely and tenderly in the direction in which the most humane modern science [vivisection] leads."

JOSEPH COLLINSON.

THE WATTS-WALDRON DEBATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

DEAR SIR,—In your issue of October 27 a report of the above debate, from the pen of Mr. Aarstad, appears on page 685. He justly claims that "Newcastle has had an intellectual treat," and that "both disputants throughout were gentlemanly and earnest, frequently eloquent, and were absolutely free from personalities." But when he describes Mr. Waldron as "certainly not a good debater," he bids farewell to fair and honest criticism. Surely Mr. Foote, the President of the N.S.S., would not condescend to debate with Mr. Waldron if Mr. Aarstad's criticism be fair. Surely Mr. Watts, with his thirty-five years' experience as a public debater, would not waste his fervid and eloquent sentences on Mr. Waldron if your correspondent's statement be correct. I claim to be on very intimate terms with many members of the Newcastle Branch of the N.S.S., and am certain that, had Mr. Aarstad submitted his report to Mr. Mitchell, president, Mr. Bartram, ex-secretary, or Mr. Cresswell, secretary, these gentlemen would have condemned that part of the criticism altogether. In fact, although differing from Mr. Waldron in many points, they speak very highly of him as a debater. Further, many of the leading Secularists have stated to me that the two disputants were well matched in many respects, and that Mr. Waldron was an opponent worthy of his steel. Forgive my attempt to defend the honor of Mr. Waldron as a debater, but I think it fair that the public should know that Mr. Aarstad's criticism of the debate was written on his own authority, and not as representing any corporate authority. I also think it would have been more graceful if Mr. Aarstad, as chairman of the debate committee, had taken counsel before giving his personal views to the world.

Since writing the above Mr. Waldron has had an interview with Mr. Aarstad to protest against the statement made that his speech was founded on "the argument from design." Mr. Aarstad admitted in the presence of two witnesses that he took no notes on the first night at all, so that he utterly disqualifies himself for giving a fair criticism upon the Theism v. Atheism debate. Again, Mr. Waldron offered to place his MSS. in the hands of any committee, and allow them to decide whether it be true or false, and to show that "the argument from design" occupied an infinitesimal part of Mr. Waldron's speech. In reference to the phrase, "not a good debater," Mr. Aarstad admits that he meant that Mr. Waldron is not as good a debater as some others he had heard, but that certainly he is a good debater. Then, why does he not say what he means, so that we may be able to believe on his authority that there are still better debaters, and, it may be, to accept his verdict as to who is the best?

JOHN WOOD, Sec. pro. tem. C.E.S.

"Yes, sah," said a darkey evangelist, "Ise preached on creation, justification, sanctification, salvation, and damnation, and I finds it only produces consternation and botheration." "Suppose, Uncle, you were to try a simple text, such as 'Thou shalt not steal'?" "Laud, sah, that would produce frigideration."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notices," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Chapman Cohen, Scepticism, its Meaning and its Value."

BRADLAUGH CLUB AND INSTITUTE (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Ponds, N.): 7, Touzeau Parris, "The Dogma of Original Sin." Wednesday, at 8, public discussion.

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, Stanley Jones, "Secularism and Social Problems."

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, C. James will lecture. Friday, at 8, free science classes.

EAST LONDON (Swaby's Coffee House, 103 Mile End-road): 8, J. P. Haines, "The Present State of the Vaccination Question."

SOUTH LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell New-road): 7, Dr. Stanton Coit, "Huxley's Soul."

WEST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street): 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "Historic Lies."

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, G. C. H. Carter, "The Anti-Malthusian Delusion."

WEST LONDON BRANCH N.S.S. ("Sun in Splendor," Portobello-road, Notting Hill Gate): Sunday, at 7.30, business meeting.

WOOD GREEN (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, R. Forder, "Science and Theology."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, St. John will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, G. W. Foote, "Religion in the Light of Science"; 3, "Life, Death, and After"; 7, "Did Jesus Christ Ever Live?" Tea at 5.

DERBY (Pollicott's Dining Rooms, Market-place): 6.45, W. H. Whitney, "Half an Hour with Ingersoll."

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion—T. Robertson, an Essay; 6.30, W. Reid, "The Labor Problem."

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 11, Moncure D. Conway, "Babeuf, and the Centenary of Socialism"; 6.30, "How Jesus Sank into the Tomb of Lazarus."

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, J. Roberts, "Judicial Evidence."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, 11, J. Bruce Glasier, "The Revolt of the Workers"; 3, "England as it Might be Under Socialism"; 6.30, "The Tragedy of Christianity."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, Charles Watts, "The God of the Bible: Who will Defend Him?" 3, "A Theological Puzzle: Free-will and Responsibility"; 7, "Secularism and Modern Thought."

PLYMOUTH (Democratic Club, Whimple-street): 7, a meeting.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, Mr. Axe, "The Glacial Period."

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, an address by D. Bon.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, Mr. Worth, "The Faults of Secularism." Monday, at the Borough Hall Dining-room, at 7.45, Charles Watts, "Secularism and Modern Thought."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—November 10, Foresters' Hall, London; 17 and 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Croydon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Nov. 24 New Brompton. Dec. 22, Leicester.

TOUZEAU PARRIS, 82 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—November 10, Balls Pond; 17 and 24, Wood Green. Dec. 1, Foresters' Hall; 8, Balls Pond; 29, Foresters' Hall.

CAMBERWELL BRANCH OF THE N.S.S.,

61 NEW CHURCH-ROAD, CAMBERWELL, S.E.

A DRAMATIC PERFORMANCE

(IN AID OF THE LECTURE FUND)

Will be given in the above hall on Wednesday, Nov. 13, at 8 p.m.

The program will include Dramatic Readings by Mr. G. W. FOOTE, Mr. CHARLES WATTS, and other Prominent Members of the Society.

Tickets, 6d. and 1s., to be obtained from Mr. Forder or Miss Vance, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C., and all Branch Secretaries.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

Darwin Made Easy. By Dr. Edward B. Aveling, Fellow of the London University. This is the best popular exposition of Darwinism extant. Cloth, 1s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worm, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saliva Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Fits and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.

RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 2d.

DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 2d.

CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 2d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,

4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 13 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free,

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, dual, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

---

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchizedek
S'w'elp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

"A Letter to Lord Ellenborough"

OCCASIONED BY THE SENTENCE WHICH HE PASSED ON

MR. D. I. EATON,

AS PUBLISHER OF

THE THIRD PART OF PAINE'S "AGE OF REASON,"

BY

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers of All Ages and Nations. By J. M. Wheeler. Handsomely bound in cloth, 7s. 6d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

VERY SPECIAL LINE OF GENTLEMEN'S

Scarboro' Mackintoshes.

25s. each.

In Black, Navy, Fawn, and Brown. Give Chest and Length Measures.

VERY SPECIAL LINE OF

Beaver Cloth,

FOR

LADIES' JACKETS.

5s. per yard, 54 in. wide.

In Plain Colors. Black, Brown, Navy, Fawn, Myrtle, Peacock.

Lot 11
- 1 Pair All-Wool Blankets
- 1 Pair of Sheets
- 1 Quilt
- 1 Table-cloth

21s. Carriage Paid.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the United Kingdom.

BRUNO CLOTH

The most lasting and Fashionable Material for Ladies' Winter Dresses. In all the Plain Colors. 1/9 per yd. 50 in. wide.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A Record of his Life and Work, by his daughter, Hypatia Bradlaugh-Bonner.

TWENTY-ONE-SHILLING EDITION. CONTAINING TEN PORTRAITS.

One copy of the above will be presented to each of the Six Persons (not agents) sending us the largest amounts for Lot 11 and Bruno Cloth between October 20 and December 31, 1895, if the amounts exceed £5 from each person.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4, UNION STREET, BRADFORD.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

NEW LEAFLETS.

Published by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Price 6d. per 100; post free 7d.

WHAT WAS CHRIST?
THE CHRISTIAN BUTTON-HOLER CORNERED. Dialogue.
CHRISTIAN DIFFICULTIES ANSWERED. Dialogue.
THE TRUTH ABOUT FOREIGN MISSIONS.
THE CONSOLATIONS OF RELIGION: A Story.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

50 VISITING CARDS FOR NOTHING.—To purchasers of our beautifully-tinted Note-paper and Envelopes. Your name and address artistically printed. Chaste tints and splendid paper. Send eighteen stamps, with name and address, to the Abbey Press, Nuneaton. Post free. No better bargain possible.

THE BOOK FOR FREETHINKERS.

Unprecedentedly Cheap Edition.

Now Ready, 153 pp., paper covers, price 6d., by post 8½d.

Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of this work is to give a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. It is intended specially for those who, taking an interest in liberal questions, have not leisure to study the large and learned books in which they are treated.

The Freethinker says:—

"The book may be heartily recommended. Simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information, this work is just the thing to put into the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

Secular Thought says:—

"In very truth, this book combines the directness and conciseness of 'The Age of Reason' with the splendid enthusiasm of the prophetic instinct of humanity seeing afar.....Line on line, and precept on precept, the author traverses the weakness of theological sanctions. The vivacious and competent pen never falters, and the superabundant vitality and healthy enthusiasm never fail. Mr. Wilson may be congratulated upon producing an epoch-making work. It is essentially a live book, and, what is more, possesses the solid qualities requisite for prolonged existence."

The Popular Science Monthly says:—

"An excellent work to put into the hands of the young who are beginning to think and seeking to learn how to think.....We hope this meritorious book will be widely circulated."

 There is only a limited number of the present marvellously cheap edition. To prevent disappointment, order at once.

London: Watts & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet St., E.C.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—NO. 46. SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

SUNDAY CLOSING.

CHRISTIAN Reunion is the dream of a few enthusiasts. It can never be realised except under the arbitrary dominion of the Catholic Church. But there is one form of union which the Churches will always join in—namely, a union of conspiracy against the liberties of the people.

We have lately been trying to show that the Black Army is a huge body of professional soul-savers, animated in the mass by ordinary trade-motives; their chief object being to secure wealth, privilege, and power for themselves. Now, if our diagnosis be a true one, it is only natural that these earth-seeking mystery-mongers should be always encroaching on the rights of the community. This has been their policy in all ages, and it is their policy still. They will never forsake it until it forsakes them; that is, they will play the old game for all it is worth, down to the very last card in their dirty hands.

There is one book which is favored by all divisions of the Black Army. It is the Bible. A Christian without the Bible is a fish without water. Accordingly, the Churches all agree to force the Bible into the hands of the children in our public schools. They are at loggerheads as to how the blessed book should be interpreted, for even revelation requires to be revealed; but they form a common ring against all outsiders. They unite at the circumference, however they are divided within the circle. Churchmen, Nonconformists, and Catholics are at one in opposing liberty and justice where their privileges are involved. There are many signs that, in face of a common danger, they are coming to a general agreement, in order to secure at least an equality of robbery to all sorts and conditions of clerical exploiters.

Another matter on which the Churches are coming to an agreement is the preservation of Sunday as a day for religious worship, and, if possible, for nothing else. They want the day all to themselves. When they take down their shutters they want to do business under a strict law of protection. No one must compete with them. If they cannot compel the people to come to the house of God, as they did in the good old times, they can at least give them the choice of church or nothing.

This is the governing idea of the Temperance Bill which has been formulated by the Church of England, and which is naturally supported by the Nonconformists, in spite of their fear and hatred of the Establishment. Dr. John Clifford, like a little pope, sends a circular letter to the newspapers, pointing out the merits of this Bill, and calling upon Dissenters to support it, if only on the ground that the Church party is in power, and that the Drink Traffic cannot be tackled without its assistance. The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes takes the same line in the Methodist Times. This gentleman rejoices over the prospect of closing every refreshment house in England on Sunday. The people will then have to get their refreshment at Methodist gospel-shops, or at similar establishments belonging to other firms. Methodism will not bag all the customers, but it will have its share in the scramble. Glorious opportunity! Yet a bitter taste comes into the mouth of the apostle of religious privilege. Perhaps the people will not stand the most drastic legislation! They may develop a will of their own and kick their tyrants into limbo. It is necessary, therefore, to treat them with some consideration; not on principle, but merely on grounds of prudence. Sunday closing is to be the law in England, as it is already the law in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales; but, alas, the Englishman is either drier, or has a cursed inclination to decide for himself whether he is thirsty, and a slight allowance must be made for his unfortunate temper. "In view of the fact," says the Methodist oracle, "that England is on this subject more degraded and servile [poor England!] than any other part of the United Kingdom, it might be necessary to tolerate the opening of public-houses, especially in large cities, for one hour at noon, and for one hour later in the day, where the inhabitants desired it."

One hour at noon! Just in time to give the people a drink going home from church. How thoughtful! It reminds us of the old row in Glasgow over the first proposal to run tram-cars on the Sabbath. The religious party found it necessary to come to a compromise, and it was decided that the cars should run in time to take people to kirk and take them home again.

The one hour later in the day should, of course, be immediately after evening service. Upon this point we hardly expect a serious difference of opinion. It is so eminently just and reasonable. And what is the use of legislating if you cannot put in a clause for your own convenience?

Perhaps the Church and Chapel men of God will kindly tell us why public-houses should be closed on Sunday. If drinking a glass of beer is wrong, it is wrong every day. It cannot be wrong on one day and right on another. Let the men of God try to be logical. We know it will be a severe strain on their intellects, but they should really make the attempt. Let them explain why they pitch upon Sunday as the day for interdicting what they permit on every other day in the week.

That publicans and their servants require a day of rest may be perfectly true; but why do the clergy espouse their grievance, and leave the rest of the overworked population to find their own remedy? It may be alleged that, Sunday being a day of leisure, the people have more opportunities for drinking, and that the occasion is favorable for giving them a lesson in sobriety. But this is sheer nonsense. Sunday drinking is not exceptionally heavy in England. The leisure which gives a chance of exercise and fresh air does not minister to intemperance; on the contrary, it produces a natural flow of good spirits, which does away with the craving for stimulants.

The men of God do not really care for sobriety. That is only their pretence. They have no wish to lift the people out of the slough of a dull and deadly Sunday, such as is now the opprobrium of our towns and cities. They clamor for the closing of public-houses, but they also oppose the opening of public museums, libraries, and art galleries. In this respect the Wesleyan Conference is at one with the Convocation of Canterbury. And this fact is absolutely decisive. It demonstrates the purely professional motives of these clerical reformers. Whether the indulgence be moral or immoral, elevating or degrading, they are equally opposed to it as trenching on their privileges. We tell them plainly, and without the slightest hesitation, that they are wretched and miserable hypocrites. They are fighting for religion under the mask of morality. They are animated by motives which they dare not confess. Their sole desire in this matter is to enforce the old order to "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." God never said that. The priests said it for him. And they say it still, and for the very same reason.

Digitized by Google

G. W. FOOTE.

FOLK-LORE RESEARCHES.—II.*

THE importance of the serious study of folk-lore—i.e., the traditional tales, games, sayings, customs, and superstitions of the peasantry—as an item of historical, pre-historical, and anthropological research, has only been discerned since the labors of the brothers Grimm in the early part of this century. The Folk-Lore Society, which has spread its name and its methods through Europe and America, itself only dates from 1878, when, thanks to the labors of Darwin, Tylor, Spencer, Huxley and others, the evolutionary methods of study had made their way to the front. Dr. Tylor, in particular, had shown the importance of collecting and comparing the survivals of archaic beliefs, customs, and traditions found among savages and the less advanced of civilised peoples. The work of collection is going on, though, perhaps, not as rapidly as might be desired, in view of the extension of civilisation, fast obliterating its own earlier stages. The task of interpretation needs a more thorough outfit. There have long been recorders of customs, tales, and traditions; but the person who shows their place in the evolution of human culture is more than a collector of relics of the unrecorded past. He is a scientist, dealing with one of the most intricate branches of anthropology, and needs a sound training in psychology and in archæology; familiarity with the workings of the human mind as well as with the records of the past.

What, then, are the results of folk-lore scientific research? They are nowhere more fully or more modestly set forth than in Mr. Hartland's volumes. Briefly, the study of folk-tales, customs, and traditional beliefs entirely confirms the evidence from other departments of anthropology, that man, instead of being the degenerate descendant of ancestors created perfect, has developed from a condition of utter savagery, in which imagination has a strong and reason a minor place, and all objects animate and even inanimate are endowed with life and personality. Early man is infantile in faith, and finds nothing incredible in children born without fathers, or men ascending into the sky, or being transformed into other modes of life. The very beginnings of human science and philosophy are magical omens and spells. As Mr. Hartland observes, no substantial distinction is drawn between the physical and the spiritual:—

> "The abstract entity we call a soul has no existence for them: it is a philosophical speculation, whereof they have no conception. The soul, to them, is but another body which quits at times in life this visible frame, as a man quits his dwelling, on errands of business or pleasure, and forsakes it finally at death, as a corpse is carried out of doors. It is but a fragment of the man. It may take a fresh form, become a new whole, new but the same; for it will differ only in form, if indeed it will differ so much as in form. And the conception of divinity current in the lower culture corresponds with that of the soul. The god is precisely 'a magnified, non-natural man,' though not always in human shape, corporeal and subject to all corporeal wants and infirmities, but endowed with potencies and privileges far beyond those of ordinary men: potencies and privileges, however, the like of which are attained sometimes with much fasting and striving and patience by the greatest shamans. This corporeal nature of the god enables man to enter into communion with him, to put and keep himself in touch with him, to become united with him."

Such methods of communion are those used to cement the tie of kindred, such as eating together, and especially blood covenanting, a portion being offered to the common gods or ancestors. Sacrifices are thus essentially sacramental.

The whole circle of human ideas is influenced by social conditions. What, then, does folk-lore tell us as to the social conditions of yore? It reveals an age when the family is the unit. Early man can no more be understood apart from his brotherhood than can a foxhound apart from his pack. The Bible takes us back to a time of joint tribal responsibility, and of the institution of a goel, or blood avenger, as a means of maintaining the family; and folk-lore takes us still further. Mr. Hartland holds that the South Australian savage, who looks on the universe as the Great Tribe to one of which divisions he himself belongs, is only in a stage through which there is reason to believe every other people in the world has passed or is passing; so many and so widely scattered are its traces, and so deeply impressed are they upon human institutions and beliefs. Funeral and marriage rites alike display the importance of union with the clan, the latter showing forms of sacramental admission, similar to those of blood covenanting, often with an acknowledgment of the rights of the whole kin over the bride, and sometimes with indications of her capture.

From an examination of bridal customs, Mr. Hartland concludes that the ancestors of the European nations must have passed through a stage of society wherein group marriage was the rule. This was the conclusion drawn by Mr. Lewis H. Morgan from his investigations of systems of kinship among savage tribes.* When purchase replaced capture, the help of clansmen was equally called in. But the community thus established was quite distinct from absolute promiscuity,† and would be modified by individual appropriation. The proofs of the early solidarity of the family group, as afterwards of the village community, cannot fail to modify the conclusions of modern sociologists, and deserve study alike by Socialists and Individualists.

Mr. Hartland writes as the mere recorder of facts illustrative of human evolution, and holds no brief for any side. But facts are bound to have their weight, and I confess that to me the importance of folk-lore researches is their bearings upon religion and sociology. Apart, however, from any such conclusions, the work of Mr. Hartland is crowded with interesting illustrations of early thought, custom, and superstition. If its circulation is commensurate with its merits, the author should be well recompensed for the pains he has taken.

J. M. WHEELER.

* The Grimm Library, vols. ii. and iii., The Legend of Perseus. I.—The Supernatural Birth. II.—The Life Token. By E. Sydney Hartland, F.S.A. (London: David Nutt, Strand.) 1895.

* Ancient Society. This conclusion I supported in the first edition of my Footsteps of the Past, published ten years ago.

† In the instructive story of Tamar (Genesis xxxviii.) we see that she only became as a Kadesha to make Judah perform his tribal duty.

THE FALLACY OF ALLEGED CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES.

THAT a radical change has taken place within the last few years in the method of defending Christianity is, no doubt, obvious to most observers of Christian propaganda. It may, therefore, be interesting to ascertain if the new plan that has been adopted is of greater evidential value than was the old. We think it is not, inasmuch as it is based upon assumption; and, further, it is in itself an endeavor to achieve what is extremely improbable. The new method, like the old, assumes that Christianity contains nothing but undoubted truths, and that it is unique in its origin, nature, and influence, which certainly is not the case.

What are Christian evidences intended to prove?

Digitized by Google

Principally that Christianity is a Divine system, and that its teachings are unique and superior to all others as a regenerating force. Now, if by the term "divine" is meant a supernatural power, we allege that no one has any knowledge of what such a power really is; hence we fail to see that there can be any evidence to prove its connection with mundane affairs. Moreover, as we are not aware of any nation or community where the "unique" teachings of Christianity are in operation, no opportunity is afforded whereby we can fairly test their regenerating value. Certain it is that what are called Christian truths are not self-evident, for if they were there would be no necessity to attempt to prove their veracity. Besides, the very fact that so many divergent opinions exist as to the nature of these assumed Christian truths shows that their true meaning is not manifest and uniform. Throughout the Christian era there have always existed different views as to what Christianity really means; and the same disagreement is prevalent at the present time. Of course, this obscure and contradictory phase of New Testament teachings may not affect their utility so far as they can be made useful; but it renders the consistent defence of any one particular view exceedingly difficult.

In former times either miracles, prophecies, Bible inspiration, or the divinity of Christ was deemed sufficient to prove the orthodox claims for Christianity. But Freethought criticism has demonstrated the fallacy of this notion, for either or all of the above "evidences" may be conceded, and then the contention that the teachings of Christ are compatible with a progressive state of society would not be established. It is not now contended that the belief in miracles and prophecies is confined to Christianity. As to miracles, the Bible frequently asserts that they were the result of human agencies. As thought became more advanced the old theory of Bible inspiration was given up, while even many Christians no longer argued for the original theological conception of the divinity of Christ. Thus new ground had to be selected, and among the latest statements of the new departure is one furnished by Dr. Alexander Stewart, "Professor of Systematic Theology in the University of Aberdeen." In his "Handbook of Christian Evidences," after dealing with many other lines of defence, he comes to what he terms "the cumulative effect of the Christian evidences," which, he says, "may be taken as one of the chief grounds of its [Christianity's] acceptance by men of ordinary capacities, opportunities, and education." He gives the following "points," which he considers "contribute to the formation of such a cumulative argument: (1) The preparation for Christ in Israel. (2) The appearance of Christ at the time when Messianic expectation was at its height. (3) That the religion of Christ is co-extensive with the civilisation of the world. (4) The unity of plan and spirit in the books of the Bible. (5) The confirmation of Scripture by memorial ordinances and institutions, as the Lord's Supper and the Church itself. (6) The evidence of Christianity, with which all others will stand or fall, is the impression produced by the personality of Jesus Christ. All others must be regarded as subsidiary and supplementary to this."

Before further noticing these five "points," let us consider some of the reasons that the Professor offers in support of the "cumulative argument." He says: "Much obviously depends on the date of the Gospel narratives and their relation to each other, as well as to the other writings of the New Testament; and all this is proper matter of evidence. Then there is the great subject of prophecy, the correspondence of prediction with event." We grant that much of the value of what is put forth as Christian evidences depends upon "the date of the Gospel narratives and their relation to each other." And it is just here where the defect of the evidences is manifest. Who can tell the exact date when the Gospel narratives were written? The higher criticism of recent years has shown the uncertainty surrounding this event. Even the pious Hartwell Horne, who wrote some years ago in favour of Christianity, noticing the diversity of opinion among eminent critics as to the period when the Gospels first appeared, says: "In this conflict of opinions it is difficult to decide. The accounts left us by the ecclesiastical writers of antiquity concerning the times when the Gospels were written or published are so vague, confused, and discordant that they lead us to no solid or certain determination." The same uncertainty exists as to the date of fixing the canon of the New Testament, for, according to Dr. Samuel Davidson, one of the most eminent Biblical scholars the Christians have at the present day, it is clear that no fixed canon of the Gospels existed before the latter half of the second century ("The Canon of the Bible," pp. 114 and 144). He also admits that "it cannot be said that the canon was fixed in the second century, but merely the incipient efforts to bring it about" (ibid, p. 144).

Now, we submit that this Christian testimony shows that we have no trustworthy evidence as to the period when the Gospels were written and received as canonical. Supposing, therefore, that Christ really said and did what is ascribed to him, it is, to say the least, most improbable that we have a faithful account thereof. And evidently Dr. Davidson's statements support this view, for he writes that "legend and myth speedily surrounded" the person of Jesus. And he adds: "That the life of the great Founder should be overlaid with extraneous materials is special matter for regret. However conscientious and truth-loving they may have been, the reporters were unequal to their work. It is also remarkable that so many of them should be unknown; productions being attached to names of repute to give them greater currency" (ibid, pp. 109-10). Thus, as Dean Alford affirms: "These Gospels, so important to the Church, have not come to us in one undisputed form. We have no authorised copy of them in their original language, so that we may know in what precise words they were originally written" ("How to Study the New Testament," p. 18).

In reference to the alleged relation of the Gospel narratives to each other, surely Professor Stewart has overlooked, not only the many contradictions existing in the Synoptics, but—what is far more damaging to his theory—the pronounced difference in tone and character between the Gospel ascribed to John and those bearing the names of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. We say "ascribed" advisedly, because Dr. Davidson distinctly observes: "The Johannine authorship [of the fourth Gospel] has receded before the tide of modern criticism; and, though this tide is arbitrary at times, it is here irresistible" ("Canon of Bible," p. 127). Mackay, in his "Rise and Progress of Christianity" (p. 184), says: "Many critics, Baur especially, have shown at length the impossibility of considering the fourth Gospel historical, or as anything but the Christianised logos theory in narrative form." The omissions in this Gospel are also remarkable. For instance, some of the principal incidents regarding the life of Jesus as recorded in the first three Gospels are absent in the fourth. Here we have no genealogy, no record of infancy, no sojourn in Galilee, no temptation, no transfiguration, no Jewish Passover, no agony in the garden, no cry of anguish from the Cross, no development of Messianic doctrine, no second advent, and no earthly kingdom. As Greg remarks, "the whole tone of the delineations, the tenor of the discourses, and the general course of the narrative are utterly different from those contained in the synoptical Gospels." From these facts it will be seen that the "relation" between the Gospels is not of a very near character.

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be continued.)

JOHN THE BAPTIST.

IN the third gospel John the Baptist and Jesus are represented as cousins, their mothers being kinswomen (Luke i. 36). The character of their respective sons, and the work devolving upon each, appear in the same gospel to have been well known and the subject of conversation among them. Matthew iii. 14, in like manner, makes the divinity of Jesus known to John before the baptism; it is precisely this knowledge which makes him hesitate to perform the rite, saying: "I have need to be baptised of thee."

It is a very difficult matter, however, to reconcile this synoptic view of the relationship of the two men with the language attributed to the Baptist in John i. 29–34, where he expressly declares (1) that before the baptism he knew him not; (2) that his purpose in baptising was that the Messiah should be revealed; and (3) that the pre-arranged sign by which he should know him was, that he should see the spirit descending and abiding upon him.

Digitized by Google

To avoid the contradiction between the two accounts, it has been suggested that John means, not that he did not know Jesus, but that he did not know him to be the Messiah; which is still in contradiction to Matthew iii. 14. Moreover, if this be the meaning, it follows (1) that, although both Mary and Elizabeth knew the facts, they had never revealed them to their sons, but had kept the miraculous incidents preceding and attending their birth a profound secret for thirty years; or (2) that, if John had heard the stories, he did not believe them. The upholders of the traditional belief may be left to choose that horn of the dilemma which they may prefer. The former supposition is seemingly inconceivable, and the latter is fatal to the credit of the miracles involved.

It follows that we have no historical grounds for believing that John was only six months older than Jesus, or that there was any kindred between the two families, or an intimacy between the two mothers. It is even a matter of doubt whether the Baptist ever at any time acknowledged the Messiahship of Jesus. Our narratives of the baptism are unhistorical (see baptism). John, confined in the prison from which he never came forth alive, sent messengers to inquire whether Jesus was the Messiah (Matthew xi. 2–6; Luke vii. 19–23); but there is no evidence that he was convinced by the reply, which, if the events at Cæsarea Philippi are to be credited (see Cæsarea Philippi), can hardly be authentic in its present form. May it not be assumed that John, had he been convinced, would have instructed his disciples henceforth to follow Jesus? But in Acts xix. 2–4 we have clear indications that he did not do so, and that he never told them that he who was to baptise with the Holy Ghost had actually come:—

"And he said unto them, Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed? And they said unto him, Nay, we did not so much as hear whether the Holy Ghost was given. And he said, Into what were ye baptised? And they said, Into John's baptism. And Paul said, John baptised with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him which should come after him—that is, on Jesus."

It is to be noted that the words, "that is, on Jesus," are Paul's, not John's. If John had told his disciples to believe on Jesus, would not Paul have quoted his words to that effect, instead of resting the whole case on a questionable interpretation of his own?

The supposition is favored by Scripture (Matthew xix. 14; Mark ii. 18; Luke xi. 1; John iii. 25-30), and, indeed, is generally allowed, that John did not turn his followers over to Jesus, but that they continued to exist as a separate body till long after the spread of Christianity. John's failure to instruct his disciples concerning Jesus may, indeed, be accounted for on the supposition that he was dead when the messengers returned; but he cannot then be cited as a witness to the Messiahship of Jesus.

A sect still exists in Persia, in the country around Bassorah, sometimes known as the "Christians of St. John," professing to be the Baptist's disciples. Doctrinally they may have little in common with John, yet we cannot but note the fact that they respect Jesus as an impostor.

It may be regarded as certain that the tyranny of the Roman oppression led to fresh hopes, as the oppression of Antiochus Epiphanes had done before (see Daniel), that the time must be near when God would deliver his people. This, and not divine inspiration, was the source of the Baptist's idea.

John was executed by Herod, according to Matthew xiv. 1-12 and Mark vi. 17-29, for rebuking sin in high places; but there is little doubt that he was moved to the deed in part by his fear of a political uprising in which John's Messianic doctrine seemed likely to culminate. Many years after, the knowledge on the part of Christian believers that their master was among the number of those whom John had baptised made it necessary to represent John as admitting his own inferiority to Jesus; and, this ground-work being obtained, the existing narratives were readily developed with the gradual formation of Christian theology.

C. L. ABBOTT.

—Independent Pulpit.

God proposes, but man disposes.—Benjamin Constant.

ATHEISM NOT AGNOSTICISM.

MR. OTTO WETTSTEIN is a German American Atheist, who scorns the name of Agnostic, and desires to put Atheism on a demonstrable basis. This is how he sets about it in the pages of the Twentieth Century:—

"In law and equity the affirmative is obliged to prove its case. If, then, a proposition is self-evidently absurd, unnatural, and absolutely impossible, why concede to those affirming, without a shadow of proof, that their belief is equally rational with our unbelief, that 'it may be so,' 'I don't know,' etc.

"There is a universe that excludes anything else of like character—two infinites being an absurdity.

"The universe (nature) is here and there and everywhere. This proves that God cannot be here and there and everywhere.

"Two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. Matter (implying energy and force) monopolising every point of space, nothing else can occupy it in addition.

"The universe exists now. Something cannot come from nothing, therefore the universe has always existed.

"Being eternal and infinite, this excludes anything anterior, exterior, or superior to it.

"Is God in the universe, or the universe in God? If there is a God, either of these propositions must be true, yet both are glaringly absurd.

"Can an engineer drive a locomotive and be a locomotive at the same time? If not, how can a God manipulate an infinite universe and be infinite 'Himself'?

"Yet the universe, outside of a God, is an absolute reality, as much so as a locomotive is a reality outside of the engineer. The world is a reality, our planets, the sun, all the countless millions of stars within reach of our telescopes, and the infinitude of stars and systems beyond the reach of our strongest lenses, which science infers to exist—all these are a reality, and all these, yea, every object of knowledge is a reality, and all these are not God! How, then, in the name of reason, I ask, can a God, of whom we know absolutely nothing, be infinite, when an infinite number of material objects—not God—fill all space?

"But does the universe exist in God? If we but imagine for a moment the aspect of the universe to resemble a huge machine of infinite proportions, eternally active in all its vast proportions, the idea of the universe existing within a God will appear equally childish and simple.

"All phenomena are the results of energy co-existent and inseparable from matter. All cosmic motion, change, and life may be traced to this physical and chemical energy pervading all nature—never to a God.

"Mind—the so-called infinite as well as finite—implies limit, localisation, conditions, etc. This fact tends to prove that while God, perchance, might concentrate his mind on the world or some particular sect or individual, considering their exhortations, the rest of the world and the universe for the time being would be Godless!

"From a late scientific authority I quote in proof: 'It is impossible for a person's mind to be in two places at the same time.' Noted chess-players may play twenty games simultaneously, but it is done by speedy transfer of thoughts from one game to another, and not by considering two moves at once.

"Thus 'Omniscience' is impossible.

"Again! Mind implies limit and necessitates organism, brain, nervous force, etc. This, again, makes impossible a God. Let the Church demonstrate how a God without a brain can be a God and all it implies, or how a God with a brain can be infinite, and I will kneel down and worship with them."

FROM the sixth to the tenth century there were not in all Europe more than three or four men who dared to think for themselves; and even then they were obliged to veil their meaning in obscure and mystical language. The remaining part of society was during these four centuries sunk in the most degrading ignorance. Under these circumstances, the few who were able to read confined their studies to works which encouraged and strengthened their superstition, such as the legends of the saints and the homilies of the fathers. From these sources they drew those lying and impudent fables of which the theology of the time is principally composed.—H. T. Buckle.

Digitized by Google

A SERMON.

(Concluded from page 708.)

I HAVE been told—but I don't vouch for its truth—that, if you feed a young puppy with whiskey till you get him drunk, it will stop its growth, and he will always remain a puppy. That is exactly the way revelation acts upon these gospel babes. Once get them fuddled upon one of these pretended revelations, and they never make any more progress, but remain intellectual dwarfs, as long as they live, unless by some fortunate chance they happen to meet with the scientific antidote to the religious microbe; but even then they will carry the effects of the disease to the end of their lives. Millions of these besotted babes, these undeveloped men and women, are sorrowfully wearing out their lives trying to save their imaginary souls by bowing down to an entirely imaginary God, while they totally neglect the real good and true things that pertain to their genuine and temporal salvation. So besotted are they that they consider themselves superior to the wise and prudent, and look down with scorn upon those who refuse to swallow the poisonous dose that they call revelation, and who offer to them relief from the disease that degrades them. They are like the drugged puppies with their eyes still shut and afraid to open them to the light of day, for fear that something awful and entirely imaginary should happen to disturb the dreams that they try to persuade themselves are essential to their happiness.

As has been said, the pretenders to revelation and concoctors of religions have been numbered by thousands, and the religious history of the world is but the long record of the struggles of these conflicting religions for supremacy. The wise and prudent have always been in the minority in all communities, and, therefore, all these systems have been adapted to the capacity of the babes, such being the great majority and the easiest to be fooled. A few of these religions have survived; and the wrecks of those that have gone down in the struggle and disappeared strew the bottom of the ocean of time.

If mankind had been all of one race, but one would have survived, and the degradation of all would have been complete and hopeless. Superstition enforced by priestly rule would dominate all classes, and the wise and prudent minority would be crushed out by fire and sword. Fortunately, the different characters of the different races and peoples of the world inclined each one to adopt a different religion from the others—one more in harmony with the feeling and character of the people. Thus, among the peaceful and moral people of Eastern Asia, Buddhism most strongly appealed to their sense of right and justice; and 500 years of Christian mission work have made no impression upon this peaceful, moral, and tolerant form of faith.

On the other hand, the Aryan race, the most arrogant, aggressive, and intolerant of all races of mankind, found in the Christian religion and in the character of the Christian God the reflex of their own cruel and bloodthirsty dispositions; and so this worst of all religions became the dominant one of Europe and America.

But there is one trait in the character of the Aryan that goes far to redeem him from his faults. That is his love of liberty and ambition to investigate whatever he sees going on about him, to find out its causes and results, and thus put himself in the ranks of the wise and prudent; and then, when he reaches that desirable position, he shakes off the shackles of superstition, and the priest has no further use for him, or he for the priests.

With the Aryan race rests the hope of the world for redemption from babyism. Babes are all right, and everybody who has a heart loves them; we cherish them for their potency of development into reasonable men and women; but the world has no use for those who always remain babes in intellect, and go through life taking their religion upon trust, without as much thought as an ordinary domestic animal. The time is coming for the rule of the wise and prudent, and believers in revelation will be on a par with believers in Santa Claus.

J. P. RICHARDSON.

—Independent Pulpit.

The Church is at rest only when she has everything her own way, or is able, without let or hindrance, to trouble the tranquility of others.—Voltaire.

A GODLY MYSTERY.

"And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh."—1 TIMOTHY iii. 16.

"GREAT God, on what a slender thread You've hung eternal things," sung the pious and ever-lamented Dr. Isaac Watts. In this verse the Deity of Jesus Christ is hung on so slender a thread that we must handle the subject delicately, lest it snap, and the Godhead of our blessed Lord and Savior dissolve into thin air. The momentous question is, Who was manifest in the flesh? Our Authorised Version says God. But our Revised Version says: "The word God, in place of He who, rests on no sufficient ancient evidence. Some ancient authorities read which." Is the Greek ο, ος, or θεος? Learned critics have demonstrated how easily ο, delicately handled, might develop into ος, or ος degenerate into ο. The Codex Sinaiticus reads clearly ος—who. So does the Ephrem MS. The Alexandrian probably has the same, though some say they see, or fancy they see, a stroke over the ος, which delicate handling would convert it into Theos, and give us "God," instead of "godliness manifest in the flesh." The Vatican manuscript is mutilated at this passage. Some swear it should read ος, others Theos. Whether these things occurred by accident or design is a delicate question we need not enter upon; but students of theology are usually trained to look for design in godly matters. The Rev. T. S. Green allows that Chrysostom's citation of this passage, 1 Timothy iii. 16, has been tampered with. When it only needed a delicate stroke to introduce a Deity, a scribe's self-restraint must have been sorely tempted. Great without controversy is the mystery of godliness, and nothing godly is without controversy except its great mystery. The reader who spends his days and nights in seeing all that can be said for ο, ος, or θεος, will probably conclude, as I have begun, by using the words of the inspired Watts, "Great God, on what a slender thread You've hung eternal things."

LUCIANUS.

TWO EPITAPHS.

PRICE HUGHES (prospective).

HERE lies Hugh Price Hughes, who did earnestly try
To write what he thought wouldn't pass for a lie;
His candor was such that, when truth wouldn't do,
He wrote what he really thought ought to be true.

HUXLEY.

In spite of spooks from Palestine,
Who books inspired as well as swine,
And left them "all at sea,"
He worked till death, from days of youth,
At searching for, and finding, truth,
His motive, aim, and fee;
He worked as only good men do,
He worked for Truth because 'twas true!
O well for you and me.

G. L. MACKENZIE.

God Visiting Bradford-on-Avon.

Mr. Goulter Wood writes as follows of an incident which occurred at Bradford-on-Avon, near Bath, in 1805. The bishop visited the town, and the parish clerk said: "Let us zing to the praaze an' glawry o' God dree vusses o' the hundurd an' vourteenth Zaam, a varsion specully 'dapted to the 'casion by myself:—

Why hop ye zo, ye little, little hills?
An' what var do 'e skip?
Is it a 'cos yu'm proud to see
His grace, the Lard Bishop?

Why skip ye zo, ye little, little hills?
An' whar var do 'e hop?
Is it a 'cos to preach to we
Is com'd the Lard Bishop?

Yese; he is com'd to preach to we,
Then let us aal strik' up,
An' sing a glawrious zong o' praayze,
An' bless the Lard Bishop."

Digitized by Google

A Pious Villain.

When pious villains are gibbeted in our pages, Christians are apt to exclaim, "Oh, that is only in the Freethinker." We, therefore, reprint the following article from the Daily Telegraph of October 30:—

"A really remarkable story of religious professions used as a cloak for crime has been revealed in the trial of a man named Hart, who has just been sentenced to five years' penal servitude for defrauding customers to his Birmingham pawnshop. Mr. Hart for some years has led what is generally called a 'double life'; he 'boasted two soul-sides,' a feat described by Browning to be more common than is generally supposed. One of his characters was that of churchwarden of St. Mark's Church, a pious Churchman of extremely charitable proclivities, with a penchant for reading the lessons when allowed to do so. On the other side of his nature he was a thief and a swindler, if nothing worse. Being agent for a burglary insurance company, Hart naturally insured his own shop, and it was a somewhat curious coincidence that on three separate occasions robbers should have broken into his place of business, thereby enabling him to put in as many claims for compensation. His business flourished, and he moved from Birmingham to Olton, where he soon established a reputation for uprightness and philanthropy. Had the vicar only permitted him to read the lessons there, he was prepared to make a present to the whole congregation of new prayer and hymn-books; but, as the vicar declined the pious transaction, the gift was never made. Last year his wife was discovered shot through the head; it was supposed that she had been cleaning a gun, as a duster was in her hand, and that she did not know that the weapon was loaded; a verdict of 'accidental death' was therefore recorded. Only Hart and one young child were in the house at the time of the death. It is said that for many years the Birmingham police knew Hart to be a dangerous thief, but had no definite legal proof against him. Various complaints, however, were made of swindles perpetrated by this upright Christian in the course of his pawnbroking business, one of his tricks being the substitution of paste for real diamonds in articles of jewelry pledged with him. A gold eighteen-carat chain, worth a large sum, was mysteriously transformed, whilst in his keeping, into a hollow nine-carat worth only a pound or two. He preferred, if he could, to swindle women who were unaccustomed to pawnbrokers' shops. One widow forgot to take her pawnticket away after depositing a gold watch; Hart accordingly stole the ticket, and appropriated the watch, pretending that it had been handed to a stranger who had presented the ticket. He frightened another poor widow, who pawned a sewing machine, by enlarging on the awful legal consequences of some technical slip she had made, so that she fled from his shop, leaving the machine behind. He promptly took it to a sale-room and disposed of it. He is said to have been engaged to a young woman of considerable possessions, to whom he gave a valuable engagement ring which he had stolen. This plausible scamp was on his way to church when arrested, and he had the impudence to threaten the police with an action for unlawful arrest. The learned Recorder seemed staggered at the prisoner's cool effrontery, and remarked that in his judicial experience he had never met with a similar case. Fortunately for society, there are not many persons capable of the hypocrisy and cunning which this man exhibited; and upon the whole it is as well that his term of office as churchwarden should have ended, and that his tenancy of a convict's cell should have begun."

Bible Morals.

BUT, although the wilful homicide of a Hebrew was punished with death, the beating to death of a slave is to be punished only if the slave die under the master's hand (Exodus xxi.); a circumstance in which the Hebrew law compares very favorably with the Egyptian regulation. The barbarous lex talionis is fully enforced, and the regulations as to compensation for injuries sustained by the "pushing" of oxen remind us more of the ingenuity of a Kaffir chief than of a divine law-giver. The killing of the thief caught in the act is an ordinary regulation of primitive societies, and the making of restitution shows that the immorality of the act was not considered, but only the loss which it occasioned. Death was, as we should expect, inflicted for adultery; but the lying with a woman who was not the property of another, either as wife or betrothed, has the same want of immorality as among the peoples of antiquity in general.—C. S. Wake, "Evolution of Morality," vol. ii., p. 69.

An event cannot be at once historical and supernatural, for history is only possible on the presupposition of the absolute continuity and homogeneity of experience; and that presupposition is uprooted and annihilated by the presupposition of revelation.—F. Macan, "Hibbert Essay on the Resurrection," p. 116

ACID DROPS.

BULGARIA is a Christian country, and we are not surprised that murder and piety go very well there together. After the brutal assassination of the country's foremost, if not its only statesman, the nation is in a state of intense agitation over the religion of a baby lying in his cradle. He doesn't know anything about it, but that doesn't matter; for, if his religion is to be decided for him, the same is done for most of the babies on this planet. Prince Boris would be baptised as a Catholic in the ordinary course of things; but the Russian party, which is now the dominant one in Bulgaria, clamors for his baptism in the Greek Church. Could there be a more striking illustration of the truth that religion always follows the line of temporal power? Instead of moulding empires, it is moulded by them, though it takes credit for the whole performance afterwards.

What a change has taken place since the poor first Salvation Army began its operations in Jerusalem, under the command of General Peter, the rocky gentleman on whom Jesus Christ promised to build his Church. The Church of Christ is now in a close confederacy with wealth and power. Its only care for the multitude is to bamboozle them. New countries, like America, are just as bad as old countries, like England, in this respect. Just look at the reports of the marriage of the Duke of Marlborough (rank) and Miss Vanderbilt (money). St. Thomas's Church, in Upper Fifth Avenue, New York, was lavishly decorated throughout with the costliest flowers, and the sacred edifice was filled by nearly two thousand of the snobocracy of the city. Gold and jewels gleamed and flashed everywhere. We read that the bride had a two-hundred-pound handkerchief to wipe her nose with, or to sop up her perfunctory tears; and that her wedding presents are worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. It actually took two bishops and a rector to marry this portentous couple. And while the ceremony was being performed myriads of poor wretches in New York, male and female, were slaving to earn a paltry pittance, which can hardly be said to keep them alive, but just to keep them out of the grave. Hurrah for English and American civilisation! Three cheers for the blessed influence of Christianity!

Special funds are being raised this year for missions to the heathen. At the same time we note the statement in the Methodist Times that there are 343,000 people in Glasgow without any church connection.

The Rev. Stewart Headlam says he has no power as a citizen to say what sort of sermons the Rev. Price Hughes should preach, and he wants to know what power Mr. Hughes should have to determine what kind of play or dance he should go to see. Mr. Hughes replies that he only interferes in the interest of morality. But there is only one part of morality that Mr. Hughes seems to care about, and it is the very part whith decent people treat with judicious reticence. Swift's definition of "nice people" was "people with nasty ideas."

The West-end gentleman who cures fat people continues his expensive advertisements in Christian journals. A big one appeared last week in a Christian journal which is very strong on "temperance" and "purity." No doubt the enterprising advertiser knows his public. For our part, we agree with Kant that gluttony is a worse vice than drinking, being more intensely selfish and bestial. The drinker stimulates his brain, the glutton loads his stomach; the one may be a madman, but the other is an idiot.

E. J. Smith and Co., the publishers of A Business Diary, which gives a page with church lessons on Sunday, must be a very pious firm. When an order was given them from the Leek Publishing Co., a reply was received: "We do not recognise you as in the trade. Want nothing to do with Freethinkers or Socialists." The business firms who are desirous of thus restricting their custom must be few in number, and deserve to have their wishes advertised.

The American papers report an outbreak of religion in its old undiluted strength at Texacapa, in Mexico. The local judge ordered ten heretics to be burnt alive. He declared this was carrying out the will of God as revealed to him in a vision. When the news reached Mollango, the chief town in the district, the mayor, with an armed escort, proceeded to the scene of the outrage, and found the people in the public square dancing like maniacs round the ruins of the jails in honor of the Virgin Mary.

It appears that the auto da fé took place on the occasion of the quinquennial celebration of the Coronation of Our Lady of Guadaloupe, a festival which always evokes religious fervor in Mexico. The judge quite coolly justified his conduct on the ground that he had simply obeyed the

Digitized by Google

Divine command. In a vision a saint had told him what to do, and God had wrought miracles to confirm the instructions. He had ordered the constables what to do with the "sinners," who were dragged from their beds and conveyed to jail, which was then set on fire. The "heretics," he said, "were filled with fear, and shouted for mercy; but heaven's will had to be done, and they were consumed to bones, and the vengeance of heaven was averted from our community."

This Lady of Guadaloupe is a perfect vampire to Mexico. An immense proportion of its wealth flows to her shrine, which is furnished with a solid silver railing weighing sixty tons.

A few years ago an individual in an ecclesiastical costume used to cross the frontier from Switzerland into France every morning with a large breviary in his hand. He was a man of dignified aspect, and received every mark of deference from the Customs officials, who sometimes accompanied him part of the way in his daily stroll. At last a letter put the authorities on the alert, and the presumed priest was found to be a professional smuggler, who had contrived to introduce into France at least a thousand watches in his breviary, which, on examination, proved to be a tin box.—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 9.

Quakers are popularly supposed to speak only when the spirit moves them. The spirit in the old days used to talk gibberish (see 1 Cor. xiv.), and even the Quaker deems it necessary to regulate the spirit's proceedings. It is noticed that, in the program of arrangements for the Conference of the Society of Friends at Manchester, "a time limit will probably have to be imposed." We wonder they are not reminded of the text, "Quench not the spirit."

The Rev. Silas Hocking, lecturing on "John Bull in his Best Clothes," the title apparently a plagiarism of Max O'Rell's famous lectures, wound up by saying: "Lastly, John Bull believed in the Sabbath. Infidelity had tried to root itself in English soil, but had not succeeded, and would not succeed. He earnestly looked forward to the day when not only the bread shops, but the liquor shops, would be closed on Sunday." If Mr. S. Hocking fancies that John Bull is going to let the parsons have the permanent monopoly of Sunday, we think he must be very credulous himself, as well as an inculcator of credulity in others.

Sir Claude Macdonald, in his report on the Niger Coast Protectorate, says that he has seen more drunkenness on one Fast-day in godly Glasgow than he has during his thirteen years' experience of Africa.

It is pointed out that, while the Archbishop of Canterbury's Church Patronage Bill would put an end to the sale of the cure of souls by public auction, it would only increase the private traffic carried on through the medium of the Church Patronage Gazette. The sin and shame of the iniquitous traffic does not affect the Archbishop, but only its publicity.

The Rev. G. S. Reaney, who deserted Congregationalism for a better billet in the Church, asks for more public money for church schools. His own school at Christchurch, Greenwich, already takes from Government £355 13s. 8d. The school pence and an endowment bring the sum up to £684 3s. 3d., while the whole amount donated by the church and voluntary subscriptions is £88 15s. 7d. Thus nine-tenths of the income is derived apart from the people who have sole control of the schools.

A number of public men in the United States were appealed to by the American Humane Association for their opinions on vivisection. The majority of them have expressed their disgust at the practice, but Father Tyrell, of the Society of Jesus, boldly says animals "have no rights," and they have no rights because they have "no radical capacity for pure reason." But—your Jesuit always has a but—"animals are the property of their Maker, who lends them to us for our use." "We should take reasonable, but not anxious, care for their well-being and freedom from suffering. Anxious care is unreasonable if the anxiety arises from the false imagination that we are dealing with a person, and, so far, an equal." Compare this balanced inhumanity with the simple words of the Freethinker Bentham: "The question is not Can they reason? but Can they suffer?"

The Echo says: "We are on the eve of a very important struggle on the re-marriage of divorcés question. The facts are said to be these. An English lady was recently married a third time in a West-end church by episcopal licence. She had been divorced by her first husband, had married the co-respondent, and had in turn divorced him in America on grounds which would not have entitled her to a divorce here. Archbishop Benson will be immediately petitioned to cite certain dignitaries before him, in order that the whole question of jurisdiction may be threshed out."

The Church Patronage Gazette gives particulars of about 400 advowsons and next presentations to more or less desirable livings in the Established Church, which are offered for sale by private bargain through the medium of an eminent firm of ecclesiastical agents. For good livings when the incumbent is old about ten years' purchase is required. Thus, a Hampshire rectory with a net income of about £900, which, we are assured, is one of the choicest livings in the South of England—price £6,000, and another in Somersetshire—net income £700, for which six thousand guineas are asked. The additional words "or offer" probably mean that less would be accepted. The word "Sold" conspicuously stamped across the announcement warns us that we are too late for a snug little Durham Rectory, price £3,000. The net income is here £340, from glebe, endowment, etc. It is observable that the population is always stated where it happens to be very small. Careful examination of the list has failed to reveal any such remark as "Population poor and large; great opportunities of useful work." On the other hand, "Society, both lay and clerical, extremely good," is an oft-recurring notification, together with "Healthy and pleasant neighborhood," "Kitchen garden," "Charming scenery," "Golf links in neighborhood," "Good river fishing," and so forth.

The Nonconformist Conscience is up in arms again. Under the chairmanship of the Rev. F. Herbert Stead—brother of the great Stead—a meeting of Nonconformists took place at the Robert Browning Hall, West Newington, and resolutions were passed against Earl Russell and Mr. W. M. Thompson for voting as County Councillors in favor of the Empire license. Earl Russell replies sarcastically that the worst thing about the professed defenders of morality is "the violence of their language and the questionable nature of their methods." Mr. Thompson replies that the purity zealots are doing their best to wreck the Progressive cause in London, and reminds his critics that "the gloomy tyranny of the Puritans was followed by the unspeakable excesses of the Restoration."

It is very funny to see Mr. Stead and the rest of those Nonconformist zealots fulminating from the Robert Browning Hall. Robert Browning would laugh at them if he could only behold their antics. He loved good cheer, good wine, and good recreations. There was nothing sour about him, and he would have been the last man in the world to legislate against his neighbor's amusements.

Mrs. Chant's crusade against the Empire really made matters worse. The drinking and talking promenaders, instead of having a circle to themselves, were simply crowded into a smaller space, to the annoyance of quieter persons who occupied seats in front of them. Zeal is all very well, but it is a dreadful thing without sense.

Mona's Herald, an Isle of Man paper, is down on the local Bishop, who has been evincing a disinclination to acknowledge that Church debts ought to be paid. "We have heard of consciences," it says, "being seared as with a hot iron. Would his Lordship dare to try this process with his? It would be worth sixpence to see him make the attempt."

The pious Chief Constable of Walsall is on the war path. His business is to keep the peace and catch criminals. But that is too prosaic a view for him to take of his duties. He regards the godliness of the town as under his special protection. Accordingly he is prosecuting tradesmen who do a little bit of legitimate business on Sunday. One of these is Mr. Card, who used to be well known in connection with our movement in Birmingham. Mr. Card says he will not give in, and the Chief Constable is bent on ruining him if he doesn't. The papers are full of the matter, and Walsall is in an uproar. What a ridiculous fuss over a few packets of sweetstuff! It would be all right if Mr. Card sold pills.

Miraculous visions still occur in rural parts of Italy. At Petriguano, in the district of Assisi, one Giovannino, little Johnny, probably "the natural" of the district, saw the Holy Family on September 20, and conversed with the Virgin. A little cabin chapel was erected on the sacred spot, like the germs of the great shrines and pilgrimages began. But the new cult has been nipped in the bud. The authorities, knowing these tales are always got up by the priests for their own benefit, had the chapel demolished on the night of October 31, which was dark and stormy. The Blessed Virgin has not as yet made any remonstrance against this sacrilege.

Emperor William has had himself painted as the Archangel Michael, calling on the nations of Europe, symbolised by females, to rouse themselves in defence of religion and morality. Of course the Cross figures in this wonderful picture. Those who have more money than sense can buy an engraving of the picture for six shillings.

Digitized by Google

Professor Marcus Dods, who was not turned out of the Free Church of Scotland for heresy, writes in the Sunday School Chronicle on the way in which the Bible should be taught in the light of the "Higher Criticism." Dr. Dods thinks the children will not esteem the Bible any the less for being told that it contains mistakes. But he advises that they should be told so in a very judicious manner. Yarns like that of the talking serpent in Eden should be explained to children as "stories with a meaning." Very pretty, no doubt; but the trouble only thickens with this advice. For what is the "meaning" of that story? How on earth could its priapic significance be explained to Sunday-school children? We pity the teacher who follows Dr. Dods and finds himself in a very nasty trap.

What a Mississippi of falsehood is history. Here is Father Gerard, of the Society of Jesus, "a descendant," says the Western Mail, "of the famous Father Gerard, of Gunpowder Plot fame" (it does not say if he descends in a direct line), in a lecture on November 5, telling us that our history of the attempt to blow up Parliament in 1605 is altogether wrong. The harmless, innocent Roman Catholics had nothing to do with it. It was Cecil, the King's Minister (an ancestor of Lord Salisbury), who, "if he did not actually originate the plot, at least knew of it long before the pretended discovery, and worked it for its own ends." If national events alleged to have happened less than three hundred years ago can thus be questioned, how questionable must be supernatural ones related of a country much further off, and at a far more distant time?

Noticing Canon Tristram's Rambles in Japan, the Athenæum says: "Of the effect generally of Christianity upon the different classes of the people, of its results, political and social, achieved and likely to be achieved, we know nothing. Against Buddhism it seems to make little way, while it may be doubted whether Christianity has ever, either in Japan or China, produced any impression upon intelligent Confucianists." The truth is that wherever Christianity goes it only succeeds with uneducated populations, who are in what may be called the devil-worshipping stage of culture.

T. C. Hayllar, writing in the Nineteenth Century, says: "I think we ourselves would find it much more difficult to justify our treatment of China by anything to be found within the four covers of the New Testament than the Chinese would to find a sanction for their dealings with us from the teachings of their sacred books. The simple fact is that there do not exist any reasons for the Christianisation of China except from the standpoint of the missionaries themselves."

Public Opinion (November 8) reports that in one of the central departments of France a young woman recently gave birth to a child whose eyes were placed on the top of its head. Evidently this is another case of design, and the infant, who is said to be doing well, should be educated for an astronomer.

Mr. Justice Hawkins, at the Cambridge Assizes, remarking on the question addressed to a child of seven whether she understood the oath, said he did "not believe that one witness sworn that day could explain it."

We are disappointed in the Rev. A. J. Waldron, and if he does not mend his ways we shall have to advise Freethinkers to disregard him and his meetings. He sent us a lame letter about the slanders he was reported to have uttered at New Brompton against Colonel Ingersoll. His explanation is that he did not stand sponsor for the slanders himself; he merely mentioned them, and said that he had nothing to do with them. But why mention them? How would Mr. Waldron like us to say, "We have heard it said that he is a very questionable character, but we have nothing to do with that, as we have to discuss principles, not personalities"? Would he not think our conduct very mean and contemptible?

Mr. Wheeler has shown the utter falsity of Mr. Waldron's statements—probably picked up at second-hand—about Lloyd Garrison and slavery; while his reference to Charles Bradlaugh, in this connection, was not only false, but in the worst possible taste, seeing that "Iconoclast" is no longer alive to defend himself.

Mr. Andrew Shiel, writing to us from Hartford Colliery, Cramlington, Northumberland, informs us that Mr. Waldron, in a lecture at Shankhouse, on November 2, stated, in proof of the evil teachings of Secularism, that the Freethinker had inserted an advertisement of a League for registering prostitution. Mr. Shiel asked him, at the close of the lecture, what the advertisement really was. Mr. Waldron replied that he would send it to Mr. Shiel. He did so, and it was the advertisement of the Legitimation League. We inserted that advertisement, in common with several other London journals, in the ordinary way of business. We have nothing whatever to do with the League, and are in no way responsible for its principles or its policy. However, we have read its program, and we have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Waldron's statement about it is an outrage on common decency.

Mr. Shiel wrote to Mr. Waldron, saying that he had looked through the advertisement and found nothing in it to justify the statement that it was a League for "registering prostitution," and expressing a hope that the reverend gentleman would see his way to withdraw the statement. It is a matter of indifference to us whether he does so or not, for some of the utterances of Mr. Waldron that have been reported to us are such as we do not care to print, and it is really his affair, not ours, if he sinks down to the common dirty level of Christian Evidence advocates.

Roman Catholicism is, after all, the most flourishing branch of the Christian Church. The present Pope has established the new Patriarchate, that of the East Indies, 29 new archbishoprics, 85 bishoprics, 2 abbeys, 59 vicariates, 2 apostolic delegations, and 22 prefectures apostolic. Altogether 194 new titles attest the old inclination of the Catholic hierarchy to subdue the world.

According to the latest returns, there were 107 School Boards which teach the children that nonsensical forgery, the Apostles' Creed. These have just been added to by the Wolstanton School Board, who have decided to teach it by a majority of 6 to 5. As the teachings of the Creed, which is a distinct infraction of the spirit of the Education Act, is sure to lead to controversy, its adoption may not be an unmixed evil.

An eminent theologian has recently announced that the real "function of religion is to preserve and to enrich life, and not to insure the soul." If that is the case, it is evident that there is a good ground for action against the hordes of clerical actuaries who have been realising large commissions out of their post-mortem insurance policies. Securing money under false pretences will be the charge, and before an impartial jury it will undoubtedly go hard with the defendants. A just decision will result in a large decline in business for the New Jerusalem Soul Assurance Co., Limited, and an assignment will surely follow in a short time.—Boston Investigator.

Tidings of Life and Peace is the title of an evangelical journal emanating from Derby. The editor has only bad tidings. He says: "We are living in truly serious times. The popular leaders of religious thought are unblushingly renouncing the very foundation truths of Christianity. The total ruin of man, the absolute necessity of the new birth, salvation by the grace of God, and cleansing by the blood of Christ, have all become (in their estimation) only old-fashioned theories." So Mr. G. Cutting comes to the rescue with the rare old tidings of life and peace for himself and friends, and hell-fire for the majority of the world's inhabitants.

Reviewing P. Hume Brown's John Knox, the Athenæum says of the attitude of Knox to Queen Mary: "The real explanation is Knox's intense belief in God and intense belief in himself—beliefs practically identical, for his God was simply himself, John Knox, writ large, omnipotent as he would fain have been, and omniscient as he was or claimed to be. He seemed to himself God's oracle, a very prophet, and to stand towards Mary as Elijah had stood towards Jezebel." This explanation will suffice for the attitude of many men of God besides John Knox.

The Jews in the Army are wanting some attention paid to their religious requirements. It is considered an excuse for not granting this that some who did not enter the army as Jews might proclaim themselves as of that race to have an extra holiday on Saturday. Needless to say, all Freethinkers in the army require is exemption from the duty of attending the ministrations of other people's religion.

A minister who has recently returned from Johannesburg says: "A week before I arrived a hundred black 'boys' were 'run in' and whipped for the crime (!) of walking on the pavement." Why did not this Christian minister protest against the barbarity on the part of his fellow-Christians at the time, and on the spot where it occurred?

One of the speakers at the recent half-yearly meeting of the London Congregational Union quoted the statement of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes that London is the wealthiest and most sinful city in the world. Perhaps it is. We are not as great an authority on "sin" as the reverend gentleman. But we venture to remark that London is the most church-and-chapely capital in the world. Perhaps this has something to do with the large quantity of "sin" to the square yard.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, November 17, Leicester Secular Hall, Humberstonegate:—11, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible"; 6.30, "Huxley and Agnosticism."

November 24, Foresters' Hall.

December 1, Bradford; 8, Foresters' Hall; 15, Newcastle; 22, Manchester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—November 17, Liverpool; 21, Blackburn; 22, Bolton; 24, Manchester; 25, Derby; 27, Ipswich. December 1, Wood Green; 8, South Shields; 15 and 22, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 31 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

F. Morgan.—There are several books of Humorous Recitations in the market. We have not examined any of them, but Bell's has a good reputation.

Thomas May.—Your letter is no reply to Mr. Collinson.

E. G. Taylor.—Thanks. See paragraph.

F. P.—Obviously not insertable.

E. Pinder and A. J. Hooper.—Clearly a mistake, but too late now for useful correction.

A. H. Coleman.—We will see if the suggestion can be carried out.

Admirer (South Shields).—Thanks for your encouraging letter. Only an active propaganda (as you say) will enable Freethought to reach the millions.

E. Cawley.—Obliged. See paragraph.

H. Jones.—Glad to hear of the success of Mr. Cohen's week-night lectures at Blackburn under the President's new lecture scheme.

E. B.—It was probably refused by the shop boy.

G. E. Macdonald (New York).—Many thanks. Mr. Wheeler will write. Hearty greetings.

President's Honorarium Fund (£100 for the year to provide expenses):—Already acknowledged £71 18s. 3d. Miss Vance now acknowledges the following: H. Barrett, 1s.; A. Cayford, 1s.; E. Self, 2s. 6d.; F. W. Smith, 10s.; W. Mortimer, 5s.; Dr. Nichols, 10s. 6d.

S. M. Peacock.—Mr. Watts informs us that you wrote to us respecting his North Shields lecture, and expressing approval of our lecture scheme. Your letter did not reach us, or we should have noticed it as a valuable testimony.

W. Clogg.—Thanks for your letter and the trouble you have taken.

C. Osborn, who has read our Bible and Beer with "the greatest pleasure," writes: "Although a Freethinker of some years' standing, I have been familiar only with the Agnostic advocates, and only recently seen your organ and efforts. If my opinion is worth anything, I will say that your journal does you great credit, and must do the cause great good. With such a Trinity as Foote, Watts, and Wheeler, you ought to redeem the world."

S. A. Bendit.—Thanks for cuttings.

H. C.—Cuttings always welcome.

W. Barrington.—Your letters in the local press must do good. It is a distinct advance, as you say, when such opinions can be ventilated in ordinary newspapers. We are glad to know that you have derived so much profit from our articles.

W. Dyson.—Our compliments to the Barnsley friends. Keep pegging away, as Lincoln said.

S. Elliott.—The London School Board elections took place last November. We never heard before of the Northampton "infidel" called "Noodles" who has been "converted" at Northampton. Perhaps "Noodles" converted him.

H. W. Jones.—The new edition of Mr. Holyoake's book on Public Speaking and Debate is published at 3s. 6d.

G. Glancy.—We share your hope that the new lecture scheme will revive the Huddersfield as well as other Branches. Let us know the result of Mr. Cohen's visit. It is our intention to press forward. After all, it is what is done that tells; and we believe the Freethought party, in the main, prefers action to paper resolutions and pious opinions.

B. W. Parsons, P. Woodward, and J. R. Barnes.—Transferred, according to your letters to Miss Vance. Thanks.

Papers Received.—Truthseeker—Secular Thought—Freidenker—Echo—Fur Unsere Jugend—Die Freire Gesellschaft—Mona's Herald—Freedom—Pioneer—Liberator—Isle of Man Times—Leek Times—Liberty—Birmingham Daily Post—Two Worlds—Weekly Bulletin—Progressive Thinker—Boston Investigator—Scottish American—Philosophical Journal—Open Court—New York World.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SHILLING MONTH.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

(Where merely the name is given the amount is one shilling.)

W. Fowler, 2s. 6d.; H. A. Huxley, 2s. 6d.; S. Elliott; E. Broughton; A. J. Hooper; H. W. Swisham; E. B., 2s. 6d.; Admirer (South Shields), 2s. 6d.; Pendlebury Friends, per J. Yates, 6s.

Per Miss Vance:—C. Harwood; Edinburgh Branch: McLeash, 2s.; McGregor; Cohen; Brown; Robertson; J. F. Dewar, 4s.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote delivered three lectures for the Birmingham Branch on Sunday, in the Alexandra Hall, which they have taken permanently. It is rather too far from the centre of the town for special lectures, especially when the weather is what it was on Sunday. How it did rain, to be sure! It was quite spiteful in its incessant vehemence. As a consequence, the morning and afternoon meetings were somewhat thinned, though the hall was crowded in the evening with a deeply-interested and most enthusiastic audience. The Branch means business at Alexandra Hall, and has arranged for an active propaganda throughout the winter. The committee are all poor men, but they are earnest workers, and they have an invaluable secretary in Mr. J. Partridge, a quiet, modest man, who does his work with great thoroughness.

Mr. Daniel Baker, the oldest but one of the N.S.S. vice-presidents, attended two of the three meetings. His friends in all parts of the country will be happy to know that he has recovered from his bad attack of influenza, and is now enjoying a fair measure of health. His aged wife, as true and brave a Freethinker as himself, is feeble in body, but her mind is still clear and bright.

Mr. Foote lectures to-day (Nov. 17), morning and evening, in the Secular Hall, Leicester. His subjects are both new, and will doubtless attract large audiences.

Mr. Charles Watts had three enthusiastic meetings last Sunday at Newcastle-on-Tyne. In the evening a heavy storm came on, the rain coming down in torrents, and the wind blowing a hurricane. This, of course, interfered with the meeting at night. An interesting discussion took place after the evening lecture. Mr. Watts speaks highly of the members of the local branch, and also of the new hall they have engaged for Sunday lectures.

On Monday evening Mr. Watts lectured at Stockton-on-Tees under the President's new lecture scheme. Of course the admission was free, and the hall was crowded, even the standing room being occupied. The lecture was well received and heartily applauded, several persons confessing that they had entertained false ideas of Secularism. An old member rose and said that the President's lecture scheme seemed to him the best thing that had yet been done for the party. It is worth mentioning that the collection just covered the local expenses.

Mr. Watts lectures to-day (Sunday), November 17, three times at Liverpool, and during the following week he lectures under Mr. Foote's Lecturing Scheme at Blackburn on November 21, and at Bolton on November 22.

The Prince's Theatre, Bradford, has been refused for Mr. Foote's lectures on December 1, the lessee stating that the trustees will not allow it. An effort is being made to obtain the use of another theatre. We hope it will be successful.

Mr. Foote's Shadow of the Sword, a new edition of which is just issued by the Humanitarian League, was the subject of the first leading article in last week's Reynolds's Newspaper. Our contemporary says that Mr. Foote has "summarised the arguments against war with great skill, ability, and picturesque force."

Digitized by Google

"Slaughter and Christianity," says Reynolds', "seem two very familiar chums in this land. For centuries they have been the closest bedfellows, and our self-righteous people have felt no scruple whatever at the illicit intercourse."

Mr. C. Cohen lectured to a good audience at Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening, and met with a most gratifying reception. He was very loudly cheered at the close of his address. This evening (Nov. 17) the Foresters' Hall platform will be occupied by Mr. James Rowney, who will discuss the question, "Was Jesus a Reformer?" Mr. Rowney has done excellent and ungrudging work in the open-air lecture field, and we hope our friends will rally round him on this occasion.

Mr. Cohen has recently delivered nine lectures under the President's new lecture scheme, with good results in every case. He tells us that fresh interest is thus excited in our movement; people come to hear, members are enrolled, and literature is circulated. Mr. Cohen lectures at Bradford to-day (Nov. 17), and during the week he speaks (under the lecture scheme) at Huddersfield (Monday), Halifax (Tuesday), Heckmondwike (Wednesday), Stanningley (Thursday), and Todmorden (Saturday). Other fixtures are being made for the following week.

The New York Truthseeker of November 2 contains a report of the Annual Congress of the American Secular Union. President Putnam delivered an eloquent address on "Rome or Reason?" Of course he was re-elected. Mrs. Freeman, who resigned the secretaryship, is succeeded by Mr. E. C. Reichwald. Mr. Otto Wettstein is treasurer. The vice-presidents are C. B. Waite, T. B. Wakeman, J. E. Remsburg, and Franklin Steiner. Many subjects of practical interest were discussed, and letters were read from G. W. Foote and Charles Watts "amidst great enthusiasm." It was resolved—"That this Congress recognises the cordial sympathy of our comrades of Great Britain and other countries, and recognises the generous manner in which they have welcomed our official representative, and in the spirit of like fraternity we invite George W. Foote, President of the British Secular Society, and Charles Watts, vice-president, to visit our shores, and we assure them a hearty and universal reception by the Freethinkers of America. It is hoped they will be present with us at the national Congress of 1896."

Mr. George E. Macdonald writes informing our sub that the meetings of the Congress of Freethinkers at New York were "a distinct and unmistakable success." He says: "Tell Mr. Foote that his letter to our Congress was accepted with a shout which he might have mistaken for an English cheer if he had heard it, and the remark should be repeated of the letter from Mr. Watts."

Mr. Macdonald, speaking of Mr. Wheeler's article on "Garrison," says: "Nearly all the veteran infidels of this country were anti-slavery agitators, in so far as they were able to do any agitating at all. Your Christian evidence-monger has been deceived by our Christian history-monger, Johnson; but, being a Christian, he should have known better than to trust any other Christian in matters of this kind. Johnson made a Christian out of Abraham Lincoln, and was obliged to unmake him."

The Scotsman (November 4) hails the Rev. Alexander Robinson's book, The Saviour in the Newer Light, as "a remarkable sign of the times." The author, who is the parish minister at Kilmun, Argyleshire, gives up all the miracles of the gospels, including the supernatural birth and the resurrection. He holds Jesus up simply as a great moral teacher sent by God. The fourth gospel he declares to be most untrustworthy, and says it is "hurled down irrevocably from the high pedestal on which piety used to place it." All this is very gratifying. It shows that Freethought is penetrating the very churches. In the course of time it will be seen by all that Jesus is not even a great moral teacher, but the figurehead of a mythical system.

The following letter, which reaches us from the far north of Scotland, will interest many of our readers: "It may be of some interest for you to hear of how things move beyond the Grampians. I am not in ordinary eligible as a juror, but last week, through some inadvertence, summoned, I attended without demur. I claimed to affirm, and the claim was duly admitted, without objection or remark. On the same day two witnesses made similar claims. One entered into some lengthy disquisition around some conscientious scruples, amidst which the judge checked him, and asked him to affirm if he wished, which he duly did. The second simply asked to affirm, and thereupon was duly affirmed. I was elected by my fellow-jurors as foreman, to deliver their verdict. I am in the midst of a priest-ridden population, and the incident is only noteworthy in so far as it shows that we do move.—W. Duncan."

The Rationalist Press Committee has just issued a very useful pamphlet (6d.) by Mr. Charles Watts on "The Claims of Christianity." Our colleague takes the recent "Handbook of Christian Evidences," by Dr. Alexander Stewart, as his starting-point. He goes over the whole ground with great care and thoroughness, giving telling extracts from all sorts of authorities as he goes along. His writing is firm but temperate, and is calculated to set open-minded people thinking. We sincerely hope the pamphlet will have (as it deserves) a wide circulation.

The Congress of the French Federation de la Libre-Pensée was attended by delegates from a majority of the 200 groups of which the Federation is composed. The question of education largely occupied the attention of the Congress, provincial delegates representing that owing to clerical domination there were parts where the law for compulsory education of 1882 was virtually a dead letter. Municipalities were called on to provide secular education for girls as well as boys, and resolutions in favor of the suppression of the budget des cultes and of the judicial oath were passed.

Mr. E. G. Taylor lectured for the Independent Labor Party at Manchester on the Blasphemy Laws, and the following resolution was adopted unanimously: "That this meeting of the South Manchester Branch of the I.L.P. pledges itself to adopt measures to influence Parliament to remove all laws from the Statute Book imposing disabilities on account of opinion by recommending the Executive of the I.L.P. to advocate and support the Liberty of Bequest and Religious Prosecutions Abolition Bills, and that these two Bills should be included in the program of the I.L.P." A sub-committee was appointed to see to the carrying out of this resolution.

The Secular Almanack, issued by the National Secular Society, and edited by G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler, is on sale. By resolution of the Executive it is now published at threepence. Of course it is slightly diminished in size, but it contains a great deal of information which is useful and interesting to Secularists, who should all obtain a copy, especially as any profit accruing from the sale goes into the Society's exchequer, to be spent on the propaganda of Freethought.

Mr. Sydney Gimson writes to us from Leicester, under date November 11: "I notice that in 'Sugar Plums,' in yesterday's Freethinker, you announce that Mr. Moncure D. Conway was to lecture at South Place Chapel yesterday, on the 'Centenary of Paine's Age of Reason.' I believe this mistake was owing to an error in the South Place lecture list. As a matter of fact, Mr. Conway lectured twice in the Leicester Secular Hall yesterday (as announced in our list and in your Guide to Provincial Lectures)—in the morning on 'Babeuf, and the Centenary of Socialism,' and in the evening on 'How Jesus Sank into the Tomb of Lazarus.' He had two very good audiences, who listened with the closest attention to the lectures. This was Mr. Conway's first visit to the Leicester Secular Society, but we hope it will not be his last. His lectures have given great pleasure, and the information given out by such an original thinker must bear fruit in thoughtful minds. Our Society is honored when we receive such men on to our platform, and from them we get the encouragement to persevere in the none too smooth paths of Freethought work."

An American committee has been formed for the purpose of erecting a memorial to Professor Huxley.

The Bulletin Mensuel, of the French Freethought Federation, reports the proceedings at the unveiling of a monument at Pontoise to Maria Deraismes, the first woman who was made a Freemason. Many of the leading French Freethinkers were present. The monument, which consists of a granite pyramid and a bust, is erected at a circus in the Rue Maria-Deraismes.

Public Opinion, of New York, gives every week careful extracts on religious, as well as other, topics. Occasionally it makes an extract from the Freethinker, and in the latest number before us gives the following striking extract from Alexander von Humboldt: "All positive religions contain three distinct parts. First, a code of morals very fine and nearly the same in all. Second, a geological dream. And third, a myth or historical novelette."

Ella E. Gibson, a well-known American Freethinker, now in her seventy-fifth year, writing to us from Barre, Massachusetts, says: "In my opinion yours is the best Freethought publication I read. I think you in England are ahead of us in America. The way you beat parson Hughes delighted me." During the Atheist Shoemaker controversy some Christian wretch in London sent an infamous letter to this aged lady, his pious malignity being perhaps excited by the fact that her name was Gibson. What a beautiful religion it is that prompts a devotee to commit such a gratuitous outrage! We should like to have five minutes with the scoundrel. The interview should take place near a hospital.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote has engaged St. James's Hall again for three Sunday evening lectures in January (12, 19, and 26). He will probably work the West-End, in conjunction with Mr. Watts and perhaps other colleagues, during the rest of the winter. He is also arranging for courses of week-night free lectures in various parts of London during January and February. One lecture of each course will be taken by himself; the others will be taken by Messrs. Watts, Parris, Cohen, Moss, Heaford, etc.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF FAITH.

Colonel Ingersoll's New Lecture.

Robert G. Ingersoll talked for nearly an hour and three-quarters in the Boston Theatre, on "The Foundations of Faith." He had an immense audience, an enthusiastic reception, and a more than sympathetic hearing. The orator began his new lecture with an account of the way in which scepticism regarding Holy Writ arose in the minds of men. For many centuries, said he, the books of Christianity were accepted as facts. For many centuries the Church had absolute power. Very few questioned its authority; if they did, they ceased to be a part of the population.

A very few denied the dogmas, and most of them were satisfied with a consummation of eternal pain. When now and then somebody had a new idea about some particular passage, he was denounced as a heretic. Still, the heretics multiplied, until there came to be many kinds of Christians, and until all of the various kinds of Christians accepted what they called the fundamental truths—that is to say, the falsehoods at the foundation. Now and then some one went so far as to doubt even the existence of the Infinite Master which humanity had put above the clouds. Such a man was answered with the scaffold, though he generally admitted before he died that he was mistaken. But now and then a man stood by his reason, and was martyred; and all such should be remembered with gratitude by every free man and free woman in the world.

In spite of it all, there was intellectual advance. Doubt continued to spread; somebody looked at the stars, and found that this earth was not the centre of the universe, but was a mere grain of sand on the infinite shore of existence. Then men began to examine the earth, and found it to be more than six thousand years old. Then the Church came, and called these men infidels and rascals. But the objections became so great that the Church had to answer them, and it said that the Bible meant by the six days of creation six epochs, or long whiles. Yet the epoch or long-while theory could not be applied to the age of man on the earth.

According to the Scriptures, man has been upon the earth for 5,899 years. Now, it is known that certain forms of life existed in Europe hundreds of thousands of years ago. In caves once inhabited by human beings there have been found implements, flints, and knives, hatchets and arrow heads, made by men; and in these same caves have been found the bones of hundreds and thousands of these extinct animals, and those that have been extinct for hundreds of thousands of years. Now, every bone witnesses that the Bible is false; every flint instrument testifies that the writers of the Bible were ignorant as to the origin of the human race.

It is certain that hundreds of thousands of years before Adam lived men, women, and children inhabited this earth of ours. I would like the clergy to answer that, and it is no answer to say that I am a bad man; I admit that. Therefore, I say that the Bible is not true, and if it is not true on that subject, why do they call it inspired? If God made this world and wrote this book, he ought to have some idea of when he did it.

Mr. Ingersoll gave what he termed further proofs of the antiquity of the earth, as drawn from historical and other records. He pointed to the lack of scientific knowledge shown by the writers of the Bible. These things, said he, show that the Bible is not to be relied upon. And to me, he went on to say, the fact that it cannot is enough to fill the world with joy. I hate it with every drop of my blood. It has driven millions to insanity. It has been the enemy of human liberty.

If the Bible is incorrect on astronomy and geology, cannot we rely upon it for historical facts? is asked. The lecturer here instanced as grossly improbable or false such a statement as that about Jeroboam's army of 800,000 men, and Abijah's of 400,000; and the one telling of the raising by David of $2,000,000,000 in silver, and $45,000,000,000 in gold, to build a temple ninety feet long, forty-five feet high, and thirty feet wide. The Old Testament, said Mr. Ingersoll, must be given up. The Old Testament, as one of the foundation-stones of our faith, is crumbling; and it is no longer a guide for men of intelligence or courage who have not been possessed by superstition.

The New Testament is just as deceptive as the other. No one knows, for example, when Christ was born; yet Christians seized on the 25th of December, the date of the festival of the sun god, and said he was born on that day. The story of his birth is told in all sorts of ways by the disciples. Matthew knew nothing of the heavenly host; Luke knew nothing of the wise men; Matthew heard nothing of the shepherds, and Luke knew nothing of the murder of the babes by Herod, or of the flight into Egypt. Which of these accounts is true? Why, the genealogies of Christ given by the disciples differ to the extent of fourteen to fifteen generations.

Is there ingenuity in all the pulpits of the world enough to harmonise these palpable contradictions? Why, they do not even agree about Judas. Matthew says that he repented and took the money back. Peter says that he bought a field with it; Matthew says that he hung himself, and Peter says that he fell down and burst asunder. Now, I don't believe that anybody betrayed Christ. If it is true that he made a public entry into Jerusalem, that he went into the temple and discussed with teachers there, is it possible that they had to hire a man to point him out so that he could be arrested? Now, I say with absolute confidence that he was unknown in Jerusalem, had performed no miracles, and never made a triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

Why did not Christ defend himself before Pilate? Pilate wanted to acquit him, but he would not let him. He wanted to find him innocent, but Christ would not help him. Did Christ wish to be convicted? No. But Christians think that without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins; and that doctrine comes from the heart of savagery.

The New Testament is not historically true. You tell me that there is a living God; but why does he permit slavery to exist? Why does he permit Siberia? Why does your God allow injustice to triumph? Why does he give success to brute force and fraud, while innocence and kindness are trampled under foot? What is your God doing—counting hairs? Ministers ask if it is possible for God to forgive man; but I ask if it is possible for man to forgive God.

Mr. Ingersoll here assailed the Christian idea of God, severely criticising the conception of the Trinity. No God, he said, has ever asked me to worship him, or to raise a temple to him; and I am going to wait until he asks me. If I were a God, I would succor the oppressed. If I had the power, no lash should ever have been applied to the back of a slave.

The God of the Christians must perish from the universe. He is of no use. He has never answered a prayer; he has never heard the chains of the prison clank. A God that will not protect his friends ought to get away, and some other potentate ought to take his place.

The lecturer here entered into a discussion of the Christian idea of Christ. He described the doctrine of the incarnation as beyond the reach of reason, as defying observation and being independent of experience. My purpose, he went on to say, is to rescue the reputation of Christ. The God must die that the man may live.

If we are to rightly conceive of the character of Christ, many of the sayings which he is alleged to have uttered were not by him. The New Testament is not inspired, because many of its statements are untrue. Orthodox religion itself has no foundation in truth; beneath its structure can be found no fact.

But someone will say: "Oh, you are trying to take our religion away." No, I am not. Superstition is not religion. Faith without facts is not religion. Well, what is religion?

Digitized by Google

To love justice, to long for the right, to love mercy, to pity the suffering, to succor the weak, to forget wrongs, to remember benefits, to love truth, to be sincere, to love liberty—these belong to true religion.

Mr. Ingersoll here uttered a scathing indictment against the Christian conception of hell, and brought his address to a close by describing the function of hope in the world. Hope, said he, is the consolation of mankind; and let us hope, if there is a God, that he is wise and good; let us hope, if there be another life, that it will bring peace and joy to all the children of men. And let us hope that this poor earth on which we live may be at last a perfect world, without a crime and without a tear.

—Boston Herald.

DEATH OF V. E. LENNSTRAND.

We have to record the death of Viktor Emmanuel Lennstrand, one of the founders and martyrs of organised Freethought in Sweden. His imprisonment for blasphemy, and subsequent establishment of Fritankaren, appealed strongly to the sympathies of English Freethinkers. Viktor Lennstrand was born at Gefle on January 30, 1861, so was only in his thirty-fifth year. He was educated at Upsala University, where he became acquainted with the works of Darwin, Spencer, Mill, and other Freethinkers. With the courage of his convictions, he got into a conflict with the authorities by lecturing in Upsala against Christianity, in 1887. In March of the following year the Swedish Utilitarian Society was started. By May he was sentenced to a fine of 250 crowns for denying the truth of the Christian religion, and, as he continued his propaganda, on November 29 he was imprisoned for three months for the same offence. Mr. Lennstrand defended himself manfully, and challenged the prosecution to prove that what he said about the Bible God was false. These were the first prosecutions for blasphemy in Sweden since 1821, when Professor Erik Gustaf Geijer was indicted for his work on The Protestant Creed, and was acquitted. Having full information of the case from our veteran friend, Captain Otto Thomson, a subscription was started in England, and we had the mournful satisfaction of contributing towards the expenses of his imprisonment. Continuing his advocacy, Victor Lennstrand founded Fritankaren as a journal of Freethought, and lectured throughout Sweden. During 1889 he was subject to no fewer than eight prosecutions for blasphemy, each time being acquitted when brought before a jury, and sentenced when brought before the official tribunals. His last prosecution was for a pamphlet on The Idea of God, which has been translated and published in English. Eventually he served two sentences of three months at Malmo, and one of six months at Stockholm. Of a delicate constitution, it is only too likely these imprisonments ruined and shortened his life, as, in the opinion of his friends, he was not the same man afterwards. Though he continued his active propaganda, he has been for some time past suffering from ill-health, and went back to his native place to die. Of an impetuous nature, it seems likely that the sword has worn out the sheath. In the Social Demokrater (November 2) Hjalmar Branting, the Socialist leader, and one of his former opponents, pays a tribute to him as an enthusiastic fighter and a distinguished propagandist. Lennstrand will be remembered for his sufferings and his efforts to arouse Sweden from her pietistic lethargy. We hope Sweden Freethinkers will unite over his grave to continue the work which he so valiantly began.

Immortality.

It seems to me that the belief in immortality, and the belief in supernatural moral authority, are secondary, incidental, and theoretical beliefs, deriving their existence and their strength solely from the primary, essential, and practical certainties: firstly, that life is the first concern of living beings; secondly, that life is capable of being continually made safer, easier, and happier; thirdly, that the human will is an ulterior agency in improving human resources; and, fourthly, that a more satisfactory total of result is obtainable by the agency of wills set upon virtue than upon wills set only upon immediate self-service. Everything in the history of religious codes goes to show them at the mercy of any and every advance in social feeling. Religious sanctions have ever bent to moralities rather than moralities to them. This is increasingly the case, as social justifications for virtue emerge into recognition.—Miss L. S. Bevington.

BOOK CHAT.

Epicurean Science and Poetry, selected from Lucretius, by Islay B. Muirhead, M.D. (J. Bale and Sons, 85 Great Titchfield-street, W.), is a little volume of translations from choice and important passages of the De Rerum Natura of the great Roman atheistic poet, prefaced by an essay on "The Genius and Influence of Lucretius." Within the compass of twenty pages Dr. Muirhead gives a very good account of the system of the great philosophic poet, and of its influence upon later and even the most modern thought.

* * *

Lucretius has, indeed, an unique place among poets. He is the only one who has a cosmic philosophy. If of Sophocles it may be said he "saw life steadily and saw it whole," of Lucretius it may be said he saw it in relation to the surrounding universe. It is, indeed, a strong tribute to the atheistic view that it has produced the most philosophical of poems, and that, after nearly two thousand years, science, emerging from the slough of Christian superstition, has come round to the views of evolution propounded by Lucretius.

* * *

It is curious what an attraction the Roman Atheist has for moderns, whether scientists or poets. His merits in popularising the atomic theory of Demokritos have been acknowledged by Lange, Tyndall, and Jenkin; while poets have united in praise of his poetry. Dryden, no less deserving regard as a critic than as a poet, speaks of his "sublime and daring genius." Tennyson has consecrated a poem to his thought and tragic end; and Mrs. Browning, holding the very antithesis of his philosophy, in her Vision of Poets, calls up

> Lucretius, nobler than his mood,
> Who dropped his plummet down the broad,
> Deep universe, and said "No God"—
>
> Finding no bottom, he denied
> Divinely the divine, and died
> Chief poet on the Tiber-side.

* * *

Lucretius has not wanted for translators. In verse, Creech Good, Busby, and Baring; in prose, Watson and Munro, have all had their share of popularity. The version of Mr. H. A. J. Munro has the dignity of a classic, yet its merits are best appreciated by scholars familiar with the Latin text. For the popular reader there is still room for a good poetic version which shall combine easy flow of English rhythm with accurate translation of the author's text. As a specimen of Dr. Muirhead's version, we have only room for a few lines of the opening panegyric on Epicurus:—

> When human life lay crushed full heavily
> Before all eyes, under the monstrous weight
> Of dark religion, which displayed her head
> From forth the heavenly regions, menacing
> Men with abhorred front, a Greek first dared
> To lift created eyes, and to withstand
> Her, face to face, unfrighted. Him nor tale
> Of gods, nor thunderbolt, nor the vexed heaven's
> Loud murmur quelled; but nerved with more resolve
> And courage to be first to break the bars
> Of nature's confines.

Dr. Muirhead has made, on the whole, a telling selection of passages. But he has not picked out all the plums, and what he offers us is good enough to make us wish for more.

* * *

The catalogues of Mr. B. Dobell, 77 Charing Cross-road, always contain items of interest. No. 48, just issued, has, for instance, a work by Voltaire, with the bookplate of Hume; also the scarce work written by Marat when in England, and entitled Philosophical Essay on Man, being an attempt to investigate the principles and laws of the reciprocal influence of the soul on the body (two vols., 1773).

* * *

Another and a new book in the same catalogue is the recently-published Poems and Sonnets of Herbert E. Clarke, who is saddened by the realisation of "what man has made of man," and his feelings find expression in vigorous rebel-songs, alike against kings and creeds.

* * *

According to the Daily News, Mr. Johnston, the Orange M.P., has written a novel entitled Nightshade. Deadly nightshade it is, and the Rev. Mr. Werd, one of the characters, says: "It was only last week that a little Sunday scholar who had left Popery was placed on the heated bars of a grate, and lighted turf placed round him till he was almost burned to death." The "almost" happily marks Mr. Johnston's constitutional anxiety to be precise in matters of fact.

* * *

The genius who tried to elevate himself by pulling at his bootstraps has found a follower in the Rev. Mr. Milsee who writes on Jesus as a Higher Critic. Jesus certifies to Daniel and Moses, and therefore they must have written all ascribed to them. The Bible is all true because part of it affirms the authenticity of another part. Such is clerical logic.

Digitized by Google

* * *

Mr. A. H. J. Greenidge, M.A., of Hertford College, Oxford, has put out a monograph on Infamia: Its Place in Roman Public and Private Law. It is curious, to say the least, that the work of Dr. Emil Reich, Greco-Roman Institutions (1890), in which he called attention to the importance of the doctrine of civil honor among the Romans, is not as much as mentioned by Mr. Greenidge.

* * *

Mr. C. L. Abbott, of Austin, Texas, whose article on "John the Baptist" we reproduce in another column, is bringing out An Agnostic Dictionary of the Bible, which is to embody the results of the Higher Criticism.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE WATTS-WALDRON DEBATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—In the last number of the Freethinker, Mr. John Wood, secretary pro tem. of the Christian Evidence Society (Newcastle Branch, I presume), has a letter of criticism re my report of above debate, and in fairness I trust you will make room for my reply.

When Mr. Waldron and his agent (the two witnesses referred to) called at my office, I showed them that my report, before being inserted, had been considerably "boiled down," and that in consequence of this process the word "practically" had been omitted after the words "arguments were." With this correction or addition I must adhere to my assertion, in spite of that I took no "written" notes the first night, only being requested the next day to send report; but, for Mr. Wood's information, permit me to say I took plenty of "mental" notes.

The deductions from ontology and psychology, which Mr. Waldron considered arguments, were but resorts to vocal pyrotechnics to blind his followers, or, as Mr. Watts said, "metaphysical problems" about atoms, etc., which had nothing to do with the subject of debate. To the rest of my report Mr. Waldron took no exception. Mr. Wood says I admitted Mr. Waldron "was certainly a good debater," and blames me for saying one thing and meaning something else. Mr. Wood has been misinformed. I never said so—it is absolutely untrue—and I meant it when I said that Mr. Waldron was certainly not a good debater. A prominent member of the C.E.S. opined that Mr. Waldron showed a great lack of perceptive power. Mr. Wood's experience differs entirely from mine. I, too, have seen a great number of Secularists, and not one differed from me on this point. Can the Secularists Mr. Wood refers to have spoken ironically, and Mr. Wood not noticed it? Mr. Wood draws the inference that Mr. Charles Watts must think otherwise. Oh, for the irony of fate! In the very same number of the Freethinker (p. 709) Mr. Watts thus refers to the debate: "In vain do we look for the successors of such disputants as Dr. Harrison, Dr. McCann, and Dr. Sexton.....they understood the art of debate.....Upon whom has their mantle fallen? I know not." Again, in the Freethinker (April 28, p. 261), Mr. Watts says: "The rev. gentleman was no match, intellectually for Mr. Foote. Debate is an art, and, in addition to a person having the gift to master it, practice is required. Now, it appeared to me that Mr. Waldron was deficient in each of these requisites.....as a philosophical debater he is not great. He seemed not only to fail to grasp the nature of his opponent's arguments, but also to possess a very limited supply of his own."

Entertaining great regard for Mr. Waldron as a gentleman, I regret having been forced into this correspondence.

CARL A. AARSTAD.

[We cannot insert any more letters on such a trivial and barren theme.—EDITOR.]

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

(4) Display, or get displayed, one of our contents-sheets, which are of a convenient size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will send them on application.

(5) Distribute some of our cheap tracts in your walks abroad, at public meetings, or among the audiences around street-corner preachers.

Christianity.

The fundamental theory of Christianity is false, and it is surrounded with a mesh of creeds and doctrines and theories varying from the monstrous to the ridiculous, and from the truthful to the unreasonable. Christianity, as such, never rose above persecution; toleration is not a Christian virtue. It is a low and debasing falsehood that man was perfect once, but is now bad by nature and lost without Christian salvation—a falsehood altogether mean and contemptible. The morally good and the bad are not equally lost forever. When this standard prevails, moral death is certain, and history proves it to the letter. Theological sophistry cannot permanently prevail over truth. Real, true men always have loved and always will love goodness, apart from theology and in spite of theology. And Christianity, founded upon the moral teachings of Christ, has lived, not because of its many theories and doctrines of salvation, but in spite of them. There is no more vital moral truth for mankind than this; not that we were once perfect, but that we are growing better.

The teaching of Christ is overlaid with creeds. Theology, insisting upon its rule and catechism, places a yoke upon our necks which we cannot and will not bear. When we are told that we cannot reason on God's wisdom, and that we must accept what we find or be outcast, we are mocked, though with never so honest intent. Our reason is all we have to guide us, and he who rejects it deserves nothing; he has thrown away his only talent.—William P. Hale.

The Only True Fishing Story.

In connection with the fact that the Apostles were fishermen, I have said that there never was a fisherman who would not lie.

A Lexington man, leading his little son, stopped me not long ago, and the father said that the son had said that he had "a true fishing story that he wanted to tell Mr. Charley Moore." I asked what it was, and the boy said he had "been fishing a few days ago and never got a bite."

That's right; if I make a statement that is not absolutely true, I want to be corrected; but that is the first true fish story that I ever heard or read. The bigger the fish, the bigger the lie. The Jonah whale lie is the biggest one that was ever told, and I have no doubt that the fish lies in the Bible have much to do with the distinguished mendacity of the religion of this country.—Blue Grass Blade.

Not Such an Easy Matter.

A Scotch chaplain was recently appointed to a prison in a certain town. He was a man who made the most of his office, and, entering one of the cells on his first round of inspection, he very pompously addressed the occupant, and the following passage occurred:—

Chaplain—"Well, sir, do you know who I am?"

Prisoner—"No, nor I dinna care."

Chaplain—"Well, I'm your prison chaplain."

Prisoner—"Oh, ye are; weel, I hae heard o' ye before."

Chaplain (letting his curiosity get the better of his dignity)—"And what did ye hear?"

Prisoner—"I heard the last two kirks ye were in ye preached them both empty; but ye'll no find it sic an easy matter tae dae the same wi' this ane."

Pat Got Out of It.

Pat was on his way to church, and on the road met the priest.

"Good morning, Pat."

"Good morning, your riverince."

"Where are you going?"

"To mass, sor."

"Well, Pat, what is the meaning of mass?"

Now Pat did not know, but he was bound not to let the priest find it out.

"The loikes of you asking the loikes of me the meaning of mass!"

"Now, Pat, tell me, anyway."

"I don't like to tell you."

"But suppose a Protestant should ask you?"

"Oh, I could easily tell him."

"Well, I will be a Protestant, and meet you at the next corner."

So the priest walked away, and met Pat at the next corner.

"Good morning, Pat."

"Good morning, yer honor."

"Where are you going?"

"To mass, sor."

"What does mass mean?"

"Well, if you're a Protestant, it's none of your business."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

Foresters' Hall (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, James Rowney, "Was Jesus a Reformer?"

Bradlaugh Club and Institute (84 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): 7, Arthur B. Moss, "A New Age of Reason." Wednesday, at 8, public discussion, opened by R. Forder, "The Passage in Tacitus: Is it Genuine?"

Battersea Secular Hall (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, J. T. Blanchard, "The New Secularism." Monday, at 8, entertainment. Tuesday, at 8, dancing class.

Camberwell (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, Robert Forder, "Pagan Symbols and Christian Imitations." Friday, at 8, free science classes.

Penton Hall (81 Pentonville-road): 7, Joachim Kaspary, "Philosophy or Wisdom."

West London Ethical Society (Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street): 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "Spiritual Dram-taking."

West Ham Secular Ethical Society (61 West Ham-lane): 7, C. E. Ford, "Science and the Bible."

Wood Green (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, Touzeau Parris, "Man: Whence he Comes and How?"

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

Battersea Park Gates: 11.30, Lucretius Keen, "Is Man a Free Agent?"

Hyde Park (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

Birmingham (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, Tom Groom, "What Socialism Is"; 7, "The Need of an Ideal in Life."

Blackburn (Venetian Hall, Darwen-street): Thursday, at 7.30, Charles Watts, "Secularism and Modern Thought."

Bristol (Shepherds' Hall, Old Market-street): 7, Mr. Darné, "Rise and Decline of Christian Dogma."

Chatham Secular Hall (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school; 7, W. Hosford, "The Creed of an Unbeliever."

Dundee (Tally-street Hall): 2.30, discussion class; 6.30, D. F. Gloak, "The Decalogue."

Glasgow (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion—J. Gilbert, "The Division of Labor"; 6.30, Anon, a lecture.

Huddersfield (Friendly and Trade Societies' Hall, Northumberland-street, No. 5 Room): Monday, at 7.45, "Is it Reasonable to Believe in God?"

Hull (Cobden Hall, Storey-street): 7, Mr. Fryer, "Fiction and Freethought."

Leicester Secular Hall (Humberstone Gate): 11, G. W. Foote, "The Use and Abuse of the Bible"; 6.30, "Huxley and Agnosticism."

Liverpool (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 11, Charles Watts, "Theological Puzzles"; 3, "Christian Evidences a Fallacy"; 7, "Secularism in Modern Thought."

Manchester Secular Hall (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, Ernest Newman, "The Common-sense of Atheism."

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, R. Mitchell, "The Christian and Secular View of Death."

Sheffield Secular Society (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 3, F. H. Hart, "Some of the Country-folk of Thomas Hardy, the Novelist"; 7, "Yorkshire to Pennsylvania." Tea at 5.

South Shields (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, music; D. Bow, "What Shall we Do with our Boys?"

Stockton-on-Tees (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, A. Cockcroft, "The Best Means of Furthering Freethought."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. Cohen, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—November 17 and 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

Arthur B. Moss, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Nov. 24, New Brompton. Dec. 22, Leicester.

Touzeau Parris, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—November 17 and 24, Wood Green. December 1, Foresters' Hall; 8, Balls Pond; 29, Foresters' Hall.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

Chapters:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. Bradlaugh, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Freethought Publications.

By G. W. FOOTE.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series, 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. Second Series, 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series, 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 3d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 3d.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 3d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

Bible Handbook for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians. [Edited in conjunction with W. P. Ball.] Complete, paper covers, 1s. 4d.; superior edition, on superfine paper, bound in cloth, 2s.

Crimes of Christianity. Vol. I. [Written in conjunction with J. M. Wheeler.] Hundreds of exact references to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity. Cloth, gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 2d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

The Jewish Life of Christ. Being the Sepher Toldoth Jeshu, or Book of the Generation of Jesus. With an Historical Preface and Voluminous Notes by G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler. Paper covers, 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 1s.

Bible Studies. Essays on Phallic Worship and other Curious Rites and Customs. By J. M. Wheeler. Illustrated, superior paper, 2s. 6d.

Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers of All Ages and Nations. By J. M. Wheeler. Handsomely bound in cloth, 7s. 6d.

Essays in Rationalism. By Charles Robert Newman (Atheist Brother of the late Cardinal Newman). With a Preface by George Jacob Holyoake, and a Biographical Sketch by J. M. Wheeler. 1s. 6d.

Darwin Made Easy. By Dr. Edward B. Aveling, Fellow of the London University. This is the best popular exposition of Darwinism extant. Cloth, 1s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Childbirth, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 9s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S LECTURE,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 22, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell
No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 8s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

Digitized by Google

VERY SPECIAL LINE OF GENTLEMEN'S

Scarboro' Mackintoshes.

25s. each.

In Black, Navy, Fawn, and Brown. Give Chest and Length Measures.

VERY SPECIAL LINE OF

Beaver Cloth,

FOR

LADIES' JACKETS.

5s. per yard, 54 in. wide.

In Plain Colors. Black, Brown, Navy, Fawn, Myrtle, Peacock.

Lot 11

- 1 Pair All-Wool Blankets
- 1 Pair of Sheets
- 1 Quilt
- 1 Table-cloth

21s. Carriage Paid.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the United Kingdom.

BRUNO CLOTH

The most lasting and Fashionable Material for Ladies' Winter Dresses. In all the Plain Colors. 1/9 per yd. 50 in. wide.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH:

A Record of his Life and Work, by his daughter, Hypatia Bradlaugh-Bonner.

TWENTY-ONE-SHILLING EDITION. CONTAINING TEN PORTRAITS.

One copy of the above will be presented to each of the Six Persons (not agents) sending us the largest amounts for Lot 11 and Bruno Cloth between October 20 and December 31, 1895, if the amounts exceed £5 from each person.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4, UNION STREET, BRADFORD.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; God-Making, by G. L. Mackenzie; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

SECOND EDITION. FOURTH THOUSAND.

ENLARGED TO 204 PAGES.

With Hymns by Mr. Tidd Mateon and New Preface.

CLOTH, 1s. 6d.; PAPER, 1s.

The Christ Has Come.

The Second Advent an Event of the Past. An Appeal from Human Tradition to the Teaching of Jesus and his Apostles.

BY E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A.

"The view expounded in this marvellous work amounts to a new revelation. Never in all my life have I read a book of which the logic has appealed to me so irresistibly. The author has fully established the main position for which he contends. Indeed, in my opinion, no scientific fact and no case in the law courts was ever more clearly and certainly proved."—A Barrister-at-Law.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO.

NEW LEAFLETS.

Published by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Price 6d. per 100; post free 7d.

WHAT WAS JESUS CHRIST?
THE BUTTON-HOLER CORNERED. Dialogue.
CHRISTIAN DIFFICULTIES ANSWERED. Dialogue.
THE TRUTH ABOUT FOREIGN MISSIONS.
THE CONSOLATIONS OF RELIGION: A Story.
FIFTY PROOFS THAT THE BIBLE IS NOT INSPIRED.

Also (in preparation): The Gospel of Despair—Holy Horrors—Holy Humor—The Bible God—The Resurrection: History or Fiction—Christianity a Second-hand Religion.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

50 VISITING CARDS FOR NOTHING.—To purchasers of our beautifully-tinted Note-paper and Envelopes. Your name and address artistically printed. Chaste tints and splendid paper. Send eighteen stamps, with name and address, to the Abbey Press, Nuneaton. Post free. No better bargain possible.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 47. SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

MISS LANCHESTER'S CASE.

WE have delayed writing on Miss Lanchester's case, in order that the general dust of controversy might settle and leave room for calm reflection. In all probability the public meetings that have been held will eventuate in nothing. We imagine it to be unlikely that Miss Lanchester will take legal proceedings against her own father, and we fancy that Dr. Blandford's certificate would be regarded in court as an error of judgment rather than an act of criminality. Anyhow the lady does not seem very anxious to pursue the matter; which causes a profane wag to say that the new woman takes as long as the old woman in making up her mind.

Some of those who have buzzed about this affair are animated by ulterior motives. We do not mean that their motives are dishonest or improper, but merely that they look upon the case as a convenient fire in which to warm their own irons. Nor do we censure their action. They are entitled to do what they can to advertise their objects; but, at the same time, we may be pardoned for considering the case from a more general point of view.

Let us first consider it in connection with the lunacy laws. We will begin by laying down the proposition that no man or woman is absolutely sane. Every person is a little cracked, intellectually or morally; some, of course, are more cracked than others; and when they become dangerous to themselves or others, or an intolerable nuisance to all around them, it is right that they should be placed under restraint. Obviously, however, the onus of proof lies upon those who seek to deprive any person of liberty. Incarceration in a lunatic asylum is really imprisonment, though it is not attended by the "punishment" which is meted out in criminal establishments. To shut up everybody who is somewhat cracked would be to imprison the whole population. No one would be left to officiate as keepers. We must discriminate. The line must be drawn somewhere, and it should be drawn, in our opinion, at the point already indicated. Eccentricity must not be treated as madness; otherwise half the geniuses in the world will be sent to bedlam by butchers and greengrocers. Before a person is shut up in a madhouse, it should be proved—not alleged, but proved—that his seclusion is necessary to his own or the public safety; or else, as in the case of an offensive imbecile, that it is necessary to public decorum.

Miss Lanchester did not fall under either of these categories. We have every sympathy with a father who, in the existing state of society, seeks to guard his daughter against an unrecallable act, when he thinks she has not sufficiently considered the consequences; and a certain allowance should be made for human nature in such circumstances. But it was an outrage to lock Miss Lanchester up as a madwoman, and Dr. Blandford's reasons for signing the certificate were simply puerile. All he discovered was that the young lady held uncommon views on the marriage question. He therefore concluded that she was temporarily insane, and that she should be subjected to the regimen of an asylum until she returned to normal opinions. Dr. Blandford made himself the normal standard for the occasion, and some people think he is ridiculously inadequate.

The great sex question cannot be suppressed in this way. It has come to the front, and is going to stay there. All other questions are of inferior interest and importance. The world turns upon two great hinges—self-preservation and reproduction; and as the first chiefly affects the individual, and the second chiefly affects society, we can understand the supreme part played by love in all imaginative literature. The will to live, as Schopenhauer calls it, necessarily moves along the line of sexual affection; and human instinct, which is deeper than reason, looks for the love interest in stories, novels, poems, and dramas.

Hitherto the passion of love has acted rather blindly. But in the course of time every passion is compelled to form an alliance with reason. This is now happening with the passion of love. And one result is the emergence of the marriage question in our best literature. Not to mention foreign writers like Ibsen, we find it in our two greatest novelists—George Meredith and Thomas Hardy. Nothing could be franker or more probing than Mr. Hardy's latest novel Jude the Obscure. Some of its realism is quite Zolaesque. His previous novel Tess—a really great book—presented the marriage question in a different light, but it was still a search-light. Mr. Meredith has treated the same theme, in his own superb, unique fashion, in novel after novel—in Diana of the Crossways, in One of our Conquerors, in Lord Ormont and his Aminta, and now lastly in the Amazing Marriage. The fact is, the old ideas have to be reviewed. Throwing the handkerchief has had its day, and sexual relations will have to be readjusted on lines of reason and self-respect.

This does not imply the abolition of marriage, as some light-headed enthusiasts imagine, but simply its reformation. Miss Lanchester, like the heroine of Mr. Grant Allen's novel, is no doubt a high-minded girl. She is mistaken, however, in supposing that because there are valid objections to an institution as it exists, the institution itself has no justification. All she appears to desire could be obtained by a rational law of divorce, which is bound to come in time. Meanwhile, she should ask herself why marriage originated. It is shallow to answer, Because the man captured or inveigled the woman. Why did he keep her when she had served his purpose? Because she was the mother of his children. Marriage is not based upon sexual instinct. The instinct itself would rather lead to promiscuity. Marriage is based upon offspring. And the reason which determined its existence is the reason that will determine its continuance. Marriage is primarily for the rearing of offspring, and consequently for the future of the race. So long as the procreation of children is not a merely personal, but a decidedly social act, so long will the marriage institution exist, however modified by the progress of a higher civilisation.

Laws cannot prevent illicit sexual intercourse, but society has a right to say what it will respect and guarantee. Those who reject that guarantee, however high their motives, are bound to consider all the consequences. They have to think, not only of themselves, but of other persons. And when the principal third persons are children, whose introduction to the world is a matter in which they are not consulted, it seems to us both wise and just for "advanced" lovers to respect marriage while agitating for its reformation.

When girls are up in arms against our present marriage laws, we may hope that attention will be concentrated upon them; and though the revolt of Miss Lanchester has its painful and pathetic side, and some people will say its comic side, it will doubtless be a factor in bringing about a more wholesome condition of affairs.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

WAS SIR WALTER RALEIGH A FREETHINKER?

AUBREY, in his Lives, set down both Sir Walter Raleigh and Thomas Harriot, his friend, the mathematician, who accompanied him to Virginia, as Deists. Anthony Wood gives the same testimony of Harriot, and it has been noted that, although Raleigh's writings abound with fine expressions of religious sentiment, in the sense of expressing trust in God, they contain no allusion to the positive doctrines of Christianity. It is not surprising that it was concluded that, in the words of Aubrey, "he was an A-Christ, not an Atheist."

The writer of the oldest Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, affixed to his History of the World, says: "He behaved himself at his death with so high and so religious a resolution as if a Christian had acted a Roman, or rather a Roman a Christian. And by the magnanimity which was then conspicuous in him, he abundantly baffled their calumnies who had accused him of Atheism." Magnanimity was, of course, professed to be incompatible with Atheism. The charge against Raleigh had been made at his first trial by Coke, the King's Attorney-General, afterwards Lord Chief Justice. "O damnable Atheist," he said; and this has been generally supposed to have been mere vituperation to make up for a bad cause. "The extreme weakness of the evidence," says Sir James Stephen in his History of the Criminal Law, "was made up for by the rancorous ferocity of Coke." But the Lord Chief Justice, in passing sentence, said: "You have been taxed by the world with the defence of the most heathenish and blasphemous opinions. Let not any devil persuade you to think there is no eternity in Heaven; for, if you think thus, you shall find eternity in hell fire."

Although it has escaped the attention of Raleigh's biographers, there exists among the Harleian MSS. in the British Museum a piece of contemporary evidence showing there was some foundation, if an insufficient one, for this opinion. It is the testimony of one Ralph Ironside, Minister of Winterbro', as to the sayings of Sir Walter Raleigh at a certain supper at Sir George Trenchard's; and, as his evidence gives a curious illustration of the religious dialectics of the time, as well as throws some light on the cast of mind of one of England's worthies, I venture to reproduce a large portion of his prolix narrative. It appears that Mr. Carew Raleigh, Sir Walter's brother, was reproved for some loose speech, and told by this Rev. Ralph Ironside that he thereby incurred the danger of death both of body and of soul also.

> "'Soul,' quoth Mr. Carew Raleigh, 'what is that? Better it were, said I, that we would be careful how the soul might be saved than to be curious in finding out the essence.
>
> "And so, keeping silence, Sir Walter requested me that, for their instruction, I would answer to the question that before by his brother was proposed unto me. I have been, saith he, a scholar, some time in Oxford; I gave answer under a bachelor of arts, and had talk with divers; yet hitherunto, in this point (to wit, what the reasonable soul of man is), have I not by any been resolved. They tell me it is primus motor, the first mover in a man, etc. Unto this, after I had replied that, howsoever the soul were fons et principium, the fountain, beginning, and cause of motion in us, yet the first mover was the brain or heart, I was again urged to show my opinion, and, hearing Sir Walter Raleigh tell of his dispute and scholarship sometime in Oxford, I cited the general definition of Anima out of Aristotle (2 De Anima, cap. 2), and thence a subjecto proprio deduced the special definition of the soul reasonable, that it was Actus primus corporis organici agentis humanam vitam.
>
> "It was misliked of Sir Walter, as obscure and intricate. And I, withal that though it could not unto him, as being learned, yet it might seem obscure to the most present, and therefore had rather say with divines plainly, that the reasonable soul is a spiritual and immortal substance, breathed into man by God, whereby he lives and moves, and understandeth, and so is distinguished from other creatures. Yea, but what is that spiritual and immortal substance breathed into man? saith Sir Walter. The soul, quoth I. Nay, then, said he, you answer not like a scholar. Hereupon I endeavored to prove that it was scholar-like—nay, in such disputes as this, usual and necessary—to run in circulum, partly because definitio rei was primum et immediatum principium and seeing primo non est prius, a man must of necessity come backward, and partly because definitio and definitum be natura reciproca, the one convertible answering unto the question made upon the other. As, for example, if one asked, 'What is a man?' you will say: 'He is a creature reasonable and mortal': but if you ask again, 'What is a creature reasonable and mortal?' you must of force come backward and answer: 'It is a man'—et sic de cæteris.
>
> "'But we have principles in our mathematics,' saith Sir Walter, 'as totum est majus qua libet sua parte; and ask me of it, and I can show it in the table, in the window, in a man, the whole being bigger than the parts of it.'
>
> "I replied, first, that he showed quod est, not quid est, that it was, but not what it was; secondly, that such demonstration was against the nature of a man's soul, being a spirit; for, as a thing being sensible was subject to the sense, so man's soul, being insensible, was to be discerned by the spirit. Nothing more certain in the world than that there is a God, yet, being a spirit, to subject Him to the sense otherwise than perfectum, it is impossible. 'Marry!' quoth Sir Walter, 'these two be like, for neither could I learn hitherto what God is.' Mr. Fitzjames answering that Aristotle should say he was Ens entium, I answered that whether Aristotle dying in a fever should cry, Ens entium miserere mei, or, drowning himself in Euripum, should say, quia ego te non capio, tu me capies, it was uncertain, but that God was Ens entium, a thing of things, having being of Himself, and giving being to all creatures, it is most certain and confirmed by God Himself unto Moses.'
>
> "'Yea, but what is this Ens entium?' said Sir Walter. I answer: 'It is God.' And being disliked as before, Sir Walter wished that grace might be said, for that, quoth he, is better than this disputation. Thus, supper ended and grace said, I departed to Dorchester with my fellow minister; and this is, to my remembrance, the substance of that speech with Sir Walter Raleigh I had at Wolveton. "RALPH IRONSIDE."

This deposition shows that scepticism was the natural attitude of Raleigh's mind, and this we shall find confirmed by the evidence of his writings.

J. M. WHEELER.

THE FALLACY OF ALLEGED CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES.

(Continued from p. 725.)

IT is to be regretted that modern defenders of Christianity content themselves with mere assertion. They appear to think that their statements should be received as if there were no doubt as to their accuracy. Thus Professor Stewart mentions "the correspondence of prediction with event," without even attempting to show their connection. He should remember that, as a matter of evidence, it ought to be demonstrated (1) that the prediction was intended to refer to the event, and (2) that such prediction was impossible without "divine aid." No less an authority than Neander states that it was the custom to refer certain phrases found in the Old Testament to their fulfilment in the New, whether warranted by their context or not. Dr. Davidson also writes: "The alleged coincidence of the Old Testament with the New must be modified by the doctrine of development. It has been fostered by types and prophecies supposed to refer to Christian times by the assumed dictation of all Scripture by the Holy Spirit; by fancied references of the one dispensation to the other; by the confounding of a Jewish Messiah, sketched in various prophets, with Jesus Christ" (Canon of the Bible, p. 256).

A striking example of thus confounding "prediction with event" is seen in the so-called prophecy recorded in Isaiah (vii. 14), "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel," etc. The most superficial reading of the context will show that this passage can have no reference to Jesus, because the birth of the child was to be a sign to Ahaz, and must, therefore, take place during his lifetime. It is very incorrectly translated. Almah, which is the word in the original used for virgin, is never employed to express the sense of the English word "virgin," for which the Hebrew has quite a different term. The word is prefixed with the definite article, or demonstrative pronoun, and should consequently be rendered, "that young woman," and is, moreover, in the present tense instead of the future, which gives a very different reading to the whole passage. In any case, however, the prophecy has not been fulfilled. Christ was not called Immanuel, but Jesus, and the promise made to Ahaz was certainly broken. A prophecy, to be of any value, must contain a clear and unmistakable prediction of an event sufficiently long before that event happens for it to have been impossible to be foreseen by human sagacity. Moreover, the event must be of such a character as not to fall within the ordinary phenomena of cause and effect, or, after all, human thought from the former may have reached the latter. Supposing Bible prophecies could be verified, that would not prove the truth and utility of the entire Christian system. Neither would it be a guarantee that the teachings of the New Testament on the questions of morality and religion were safe to follow.

Digitized by Google

With a view of proving that, while no one particular evidence may prove Christian claims, yet all combined will reach "a common centre," the Professor gives the following two illustrations. The problem, he says, "is not, Can we explain away this or that element by mere chance or natural causes? but, How do the elements all come to meet in one and the same centre? Was it by chance that all the military roads led to ancient Rome, or was it because it was the imperial city?" "In a criminal trial the guilt of the prisoner may be abundantly manifest, and yet it may be possible to show that each of the lines of proof by which it is established is by itself inconclusive." Now, all illustrations, to be of argumentative service, should be analogous to the points at issue; but the above are not so. We can hardly imagine what an old Roman would have said if he had been told that no one of the roads led to the capital, but that, if a traveller marched up the whole of them, he would arrive safely. The fact is, that each of the roads did lead separately to the capital, and what was true of all was true of each. If it had been otherwise, it would have been rather difficult for anybody to have reached his destination. Was it by "chance," we are asked, that all the roads led to the same place? Certainly not, any more than it was by "chance" that not one failed to terminate in "a common centre." In reference to the criminal illustration, it does not matter how many "lines of proof" may be produced; if it were clearly established that someone saw the crime committed, that would settle the question. If, however, Christianity is what its devotees allege it to be, its evidences should be pertinent in every particular; certainly not mere possibility ought to be its characteristic.

Professor Stewart says: "It is obviously the policy of the opponents of Christianity to ignore the cumulative force of the Christian evidences, and to treat each as if the whole burden of the argument rested upon it alone. Desiring to overturn the tree, they cut its roots fibre by fibre." We may here remind defenders of Christianity that, if all the branches of a tree were destroyed, the trunk only would remain, and the probability of its bearing fruit in that condition would be very remote; but, if all the fibres of its roots were cut away, there can be no doubt as to what would happen. It did not seem to occur to the Professor that, if the Christian tree is "divinely perfect," and if it were planted and protected by an omnipotent being, it should be impossible for any human power either to destroy the branches or to "cut its roots." That such of its branches as the doctrines of hell and eternal torments, a personal devil, Bible infallibility, the efficacy of prayer, absolute reliance on, and genuine belief in, the God of the Old Testament, have lost the vitality they were once thought to possess, is a fact that cannot be effectually disputed. No first-class Christian defender can now be found who will in public debate contend for their reality as a "living faith."

We do not "ignore the cumulative force of the Christian evidences," for the good reason that we cannot discover it. Besides, we fail to see how an accumulation of fallacies can be converted into one "sublime truth." The cumulative argument for Christianity really amounts to this: That a god possessing unlimited power created man from the dust of the ground about six thousand years ago, and shortly after made woman from one of his ribs. This God then places them both amidst great temptations in a garden called Eden, and provides a serpent to induce them to go wrong; their natures become corrupt, and the whole of their posterity are thereby made sinners beyond the power of self-redemption. The son of God is then sent to atone by his death for an act in which he took no part, and over which the God-made sinners had no control. To escape from the consequences of the Divine act in the Garden of Eden, all who have heard of the name of Christ must believe in him as the Savior of the world; and if they do not, or cannot so believe, they are, after death, to go "into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels." Christ is to come "in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them."

Such, briefly, are the features that form the cumulative argument for Christianity, and the only "force" we can recognise in it is that of fiction, gross injustice, and unmitigated cruelty. They constitute the "roots" of the orthodox faith, and in all sincerity we ask: What man or woman, whose natural feelings have not been hardened by familiarity with a degrading theology, can see therein any "force" of truth, love, and what is right and commendable? Take, for instance, the threatened "vengeance" upon those who "obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." Is it possible to conceive that the time will arrive when the heavens shall frown on a ruined universe; when the sun shall lose his effulgence, and the moon refuse to give her light; when, amidst the "wreck of matter and the crash of worlds," those who were bound to us by the ties of nature shall be banished to a burning lake, for no other reason than because they were unable to believe in Christ and him crucified? For ourselves, we cannot believe that doctrine is true and valuable which is revolting to the better part of our common humanity. It is better to have no faith than one that proclaims that man's eternal happiness depends upon belief in a capricious God and the reception of an unnatural dogma.

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

PALESTINE EXPLORATION.

THE Palestine Exploration Fund was started over thirty years ago. A large sum of money has been devoted to the purpose of ascertaining what antiquities the Holy Land has to offer in confirmation of the Holy Book. A great deal of real work has been done in the way of surveying and excavation. Eminent men have been employed on the job. Sir Charles Warren, Sir Charles Wilson, Major Conder, Professor Palmer, Mr. Tyrwhitt Drake, and others, have been engaged. Much has doubtless been done; the topography of the land has been accurately surveyed; its geology has been investigated; many books have been issued; many old baseless conjectures have been replaced by more plausible ones. But, as far as confirmation of the Bible is concerned, the clerical contributors to the Fund must have been sadly disappointed. Not that there are no results, but that the results, so far from confirming the truth and inspiration of the Bible, go quite in the contrary direction. Indeed, one of the most eminent of the workers already mentioned is credited on good authority with being the author of Bible Folk-Lore and Rabbi Jeshua. The negative results of the exploration have been quite damning. Not a coin, not a vestige of a scrap of a remnant of the supposed magnificent kingdom of David and Solomon, has been found. The earliest known Jewish coin only goes back to the time of the Maccabees. All the earliest inscriptions are not in Hebrew at all, but in Phœnician, which has a totally different character. The survey of Jerusalem has conclusively shown that either the so-called "Josephus" was never there, or told the grossest lies about the hundreds of thousands there, since the entire plateau on which it is built could never have accommodated more than from thirty to forty thousand inhabitants. The important sites of this one-horse town, in which God Almighty took up his residence, are still in controversy. Christ has got three sepulchres, and the topographers are yet disputing as to where Solomon erected his shanty temple, which was ninety feet by thirty feet, and took seven years building.

All the so-called relics in and from the Holy Land are certainly questionable, and probably fraudulent. They show the site of the Crucifixion in the centre of Jerusalem, when, if it happened at all, it was certainly outside. Accordingly the explorers have shifted the traditional site of centuries from the middle of the city to outside the Damascus gate. The monks show a portion of the stone said to have been rolled from the sepulchre—only the Armenians claim to have possession of the real stone, and say that this is only a forgery. On either side of the entrance are holes through which the imposture known as the Holy Fire is given out every year. Although the

Digitized by Google

Moslems have for centuries laughed at this fraudulent trick of pretending that Holy Fire descends at the sepulchre every Easter, the fraud is still perpetrated by the Christian monks. A visit to Palestine, indeed, so far from confirming Scripture, must rather tend to suggest that the whole system is a deliberate fraud, since nothing but lies and imposture pervade the so-called holy places.

The greatest find, the Moabite stone, was not the work of the Palestine Exploration Fund, but of a French clergyman, the Rev. F. A. Klein, who communicated his find to the German consul. But the stone got smashed, and only squeezes taken from it remain. The inscription shows that, so far from the Bible account being correct, Jahveh was really what Milton calls Dagon, "that twice-battered God of Palestine," for his vessels were dragged to the ground before the face of Chemosh, the Moabite god. Chemosh, in fact, gave Jahveh just such a licking as he is said to have given Dagon.

The once famous Sinaitic inscriptions were deciphered by Professor Palmer, and proved to be, instead of any record of the forty years' wanderings over a territory smaller than Yorkshire, merely late and unimportant cuttings, mostly of proper names. Excavations at Lachish have, indeed, resulted in important finds. They have shown us an ancient civilisation in communication with Egypt. But the civilisation was not Jewish, but Canaanitish. The language was entirely different from Hebrew, and the records show that, while Hittites, Amorites, Philistines, and Phœnicians were known to the Egyptians, the Jews were unknown.

Of course, the gentlemen who are employed on the exploration, and derive good salaries from the Fund, say much has been done to confirm the Bible. They do it in this way. They excavate at Gaza, show it has some big remains, and say: "This is where Samson carried away the gates." They might as well say: "This is where he slew a thousand Philistines with his own jawbone." What they chiefly point to is that, in the words of the author of Bible Folk-Lore, "there remains still much more to be found than has yet been discovered." May they go on, for the fools who pay them are helping to explode their own fetish.

UNCLE BENJAMIN.

MR. FOOTE'S LETTER TO THE AMERICAN SECULAR CONGRESS.

(Reprinted from the New York "Truthseeker," November 9.)

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—President Putnam desires me to send you a communication from England, and I do so with great pleasure. Some day or other—next year probably—I shall have the deeper pleasure of greeting you face to face.

I should begin by saying something about President Putnam's visit to England, which he found still solidly rooted in its old position in the sea, just where Shakespeare died and left it. It is prophesied that our island is to be towed over to your continent for safety, but I fancy it will stop here after all; and the world, and even Freethought, will be the better for variety. We have something to learn from you, and perhaps you have something to learn from us. It is given to no country to monopolise the wisdom and originality of the planet. Mr. Putnam found many things here to admire; on the other hand, he brought with him a most welcome spice of your American humor. He has none of that stiffness which the platform has too often inherited from the pulpit. He is a proof that a man may be serious without solemnity, enthusiastic without fanaticism, and earnest without ceasing to be genial. And this is as it should be, for it is not enough to break away from the fetters of faith, unless we steep ourselves in the finer spirit of humanity. Mr. Putnam struck us as being full of the milk of human kindness. There seems no envy or enmity in his composition. The man who falls out with him must have a genius for quarrelling. We congratulate you on having such a leader at the head of your army. The soldier who smiles when he sees the enemy will be the last to run away.

We gathered from Mr. Putnam that America is "free and independent" in theory, but a good deal the reverse in practice. It is under the curse of religion and priestcraft. You seem to have developed in a single century most of the evils that with us are the legacy of ages. This does not prove that you have a double dose of original sin. It proves that theology is the one great overwhelming evil of human society, and that if it be not checked it will sweep on like an advancing tide on a level shore, and drown the noblest conquests of political and social progress.

We have an endowed religion; so have you. We have a hired man to say prayers in the legislature; so have you. We have blasphemy laws; so have you. We have laws that rob Freethinkers of the common rights of citizenship; so have you. We have the Bible thrust into public schools; so have you. We have Sabbatarian laws, maintained by clerical protectionists, who hate the competition of a free and open market; so have you. We have a huge black army exploiting our industry, and promising fine things to fools in the next world in return for cash and comfort in this world; so have you.

Let us shake hands across the Atlantic. We are companions in misery. Your duty is the same as ours. We have both to fight theology in the name of humanity. We have to enter the Bible-darkened school and liberate the children. We have to destroy every kind of privilege, and inaugurate the reign of equality. We have to secure freedom not for one or some, but for all; freedom to investigate, freedom to think, freedom to speak, and freedom to live. We have to annihilate the despotism of authority, and establish the free republic of reason.

Happily the bane in your case was followed by the antidote. The poison of theology came to you from Europe, but from Europe came also the counteractant of Freethought. Names that dwell upon our lips are not foreign to yours. It is one flag that flies over the forces of true Liberalism, though they be scattered to the ends of the earth, and never touch each other's hands for the width of sundering space. One flag, I say; the grand old flag of Freethought; shot-torn, blood-stained, but ever flying in bold challenge to Xerxes' hordes of tyranny and wrong. It was this flag that inspired the heart of Bruno till it burst in the fire of his martyrdom; it was this flag that Voltaire held high over Europe for half a century, while his eye melted with pity for the persecuted, and his brow darkened with the prophecy of doom to their oppressors; it was this flag that Thomas Paine grasped afterwards, and to which he was faithful in prison and amidst the vilest ingratitude; it was under this flag that Charles Bradlaugh fought and won a hundred battles for human liberty; it is this flag that Ingersoll carries over your continent, while engaged in what Whitman says is the business of all true poets: "To cheer up slaves and horrify despots."

We are not Brunos, Voltaires, Paines, Bradlaughs, or Ingersolls, but we are all men and women, and may all be soldiers in the great army of liberation. And under the flag consecrated by their eloquence, their toils, their sacrifices, and their blood, we may be glad to stand, and happy to fight, and proud to die.

American soldiers of the grand army, I salute you in the name of your English comrades. Be bold and brave; be also vigilant and skilful; let courage go hand in hand with wisdom, and your victories will cheer us in our own fight with the enemies of mankind. Yours faithfully,

G. W. FOOTE, President.

Orthodoxy and Lunacy.

In our lunatic asylums we frequently see persons sent there in consequence of what are called mental religious disturbances. I confess that I think better of them than of many who hold the same opinions, and keep their wits, and appear to enjoy life very well, outside of the asylums. Any decent person ought to go mad if he really holds such opinions. It is very much to his discredit, in every point of view, if he does not. Anything that is brutal, cruel, and makes life hopeless for most of mankind, and, perhaps, for whole races; anything that assumes the necessity of exterminating instincts which were given to be regulated, if received, ought to produce insanity in every well-regulated mind. I am very much ashamed of some people for retaining their reason when they ought to know perfectly well that, if they were not the most stupid or most selfish of human beings, they would become non compos mentis at once. —Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Digitized by Google

BITS FROM INGERSOLL'S LATEST.

An outline of Ingersoll's latest lecture appeared in our last week's number. We have since seen a fuller report, and give our readers extracts from portions which did not appear in the Boston Herald :—

CAN WE FORGIVE GOD?

God has caused his volcanoes to devour the good and the bad, his cyclones to wreck and rend the generous and the cruel, his floods to drown the loving and the hateful, his lightning to kill the virtuous and the vicious, his famines to starve the innocent and criminal, and his plagues to destroy the wise and good, the ignorant and the wicked. He has allowed his enemies to imprison, to torture, and to kill his friends. He has permitted blasphemers to flay his worshippers alive, to dislocate their joints upon racks, and to burn them at the stake. He has allowed men to enslave their brothers, and to sell babes from the breasts of mothers. This shows his impartiality. Ministers ask: "Is it possible for God to forgive man?" And when I think of what has been suffered—of the centuries of agony and tears, I ask, Is it possible for man to forgive God?

Is not this unthinkable God a guess, an inference? Can we think of being without form, without body, without parts, without passion? Why should we speak of a being without body as of the masculine gender?

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

Of the existence of such a being there can be, in the nature of things, no evidence. Confronted with the universe, with fields of space sown thick with stars, with all there is of life, the wise man, being asked the origin and destiny of all, replies: "I do not know. These questions are beyond the powers of my mind." The theologian arrives at the unthinkable, the inconceivable, and he calls this God. The scientist arrives at the unthinkable, the inconceivable, and calls it the Unknown. The theologian insists that his inconceivable governs the world; that it, or he, or she, or they, can be influenced by prayers and ceremonies; that it, or he, or they, punishes and rewards; that it, or he, or they, has priests and temples.

WAS CHRIST GOD?

How is it established that Christ was the Son of God? It is said that Joseph was told so in a dream by an angel. How could Joseph know that he had been visited by an angel in a dream? Could he know that the visitor was an angel? It all occurred in a dream, and poor Joseph was asleep. What is the testimony of one who was asleep worth? How was it possible for Mary to know anything about the Holy Ghost?

Christ, according to the faith, is the second person in the Trinity, the Father being the first, and the Holy Ghost the third. Each of these three persons is God. Christ is his own father and his own son. The Holy Ghost is neither father nor son, but both. The son was begotten by the father, but existed before he was begotten—just the same before as after. Christ is just as old as his father, and the father is just as young as his son. The Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and Son, but was equal to the Father and Son before he proceeded—that is to say, before he existed; but he is of the same age as the other two. Nothing ever was, nothing ever can be, more perfectly idiotic than the dogma of the Trinity. At this point, absurdity having reached its limit, nothing more can be said except, "Let us pray."

THE REDEMPTION.

We have also the scheme of redemption. According to this "scheme," by the sin of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden human nature became evil, corrupt, and depraved. There is no sense in sacrifice, never was, and never will be. Make restitution, reparation, undo the wrong, and you need shed no blood. A god could not accept his own sufferings in justification of the guilty. This is a complete subversion of all ideas of justice and morality. This Christians call "satisfying the law."

Christians believe in infinite torture, in eternal pain. Eternal pain! That word is the disgrace, the shame, the infamy of our revealed religion. That word fills all the future with the shrieks of the damned. That word brutalises the New Testament, changes the Sermon on the Mount to hypocrisy and cant, and pollutes and hardens the very heart of Christ. This is the savagery of Christianity. This it why I hate its unthinkable God, its impossible Christ, its inspired lies, and its selfish, heartless heaven. This is the Christian prophecy of the eternal future: No hope in hell; no pity in heaven; no mercy in the heart of God.

GOD'S BLOOD!

"To feed the Church of God which he hath purchased with his own blood" (Acts xx. 28).

Unitarians, vainly intruding their unholy carnal reason into the sacred mysteries of the Almighty, have argued that it is indecent blasphemy to talk of God's blood, and that we ought to read "the Church of the Lord." This is, forsooth, as though we knew anything more of the Lord's blood than of God's blood. They assume that the writer of the Acts had the same spiritual notions of deity as a sort of nondescript "footless stocking without a leg," such as they hold themselves; and they declare, in the words of J. Wilson: "It is absolutely impossible that a Being without body, parts, or passions could shed his blood" (Scripture Proofs and Illustrations of Unitarianism, p. 115). Know, O vain man, that with God nothing is impossible. As to "a Being without body, parts, or passions," that is a capital definition of nobody and nothing; but it finds no warrant in holy scripture, which solemnly assures us that God has parts and passions—and pretty strong ones too. He has hair (Daniel vii. 9), nose (Isaiah lxv. 5), feet (Ezekiel xliii. 7), hands (Numbers xi. 23), loins (Ezekiel i. 27), bowels (Jeremiah iv. 19), and back parts (Exodus xxxiii. 23). Why, then, should he be deprived of his precious blood? How can I have true communion with him if he is bloodless? In the good old days, when Christian faith was a living verity, they swore by God's blood throughout Christendom. But Christianity has become anæmic, bloodless, and brainless. Its old gospel of gore has degenerated into cant and candlegrease.

So far as the external evidence of this text goes, "the Lord and God" has the greatest numerical amount of manuscripts in its favor. For God's blood alone may be cited the Vatican, the Sinaitic, the Vulgate, and the Syriac; while for the Lord's blood alone are the Alexandrine, Ephrem, and Bezae manuscripts. Under such circumstances, what lover of the Lord, who delights to imbibe his precious blood, would fail to acknowledge his purchase by the blood of God? Lucianus.

New Life in Buddhism.

Japanese patriotism is now likely to take the direction of keeping out Christianity as much as possible, since travelled Japanese have reported that it is decidedly inferior to Buddhism in its effect on the conduct of the people. Dr. Ohlingen, writing on the revival of Buddhism, says: "The Buddhist religion, which still has more adherents than any other, remains for the present undisturbed in China and Thibet, the countries where it has the most power. In India and Japan, however, where it comes into direct contact with Christianity, Buddhism has been put on the defensive, and ably uses the Press. In India the periodicals work chiefly for the restoration and maintenance of Buddhist temples and monuments. In Japan their language is more reformatory and polemic. The Japanese Buddhists claim to be the most genuine, if not the exclusive, defenders of Japanese institutions, and thus appeal to the strongly-developed patriotism of the Japanese. They rejoice in the present reactionary movement, but know that it is at its height, and that foreign influence will soon again prevail. Some acknowledge that the Buddhist religion is much endangered by the freedom of residence accorded to foreigners; but in the end the truth must prevail. 'Christianity is not truth that is proved by science,' they say. All are pretty unanimous in asserting that Buddhism is much superior to Christianity in its teaching of the origin of the world. The dogma that God is the Father of all men, and that we are all brothers before Him, is merely a human one. 'Buddhists do not believe in a divine creation and rule of the world; everything in this world and in our lives is ruled by natural laws, explainable by cause and effect.'"

The discovery of what is true and the practice of that which is good are the two most important objects of philosophy.—Voltaire.

Digitized by Google

ACID DROPS.

When the "solemn blessing of the Church" was pronounced on the Duke of Marlborough and Miss Vanderbilt, the choir, which was hidden behind plants of flowers, burst into a "glad psalm" of "O let the nations rejoice and be glad." The nations are doing it. They are all thanking God for dukes and millionaire heiresses. Even the destitute and starving are praising the Lord.

American lynchings seem to go excellently well with religious exercises. A few weeks ago a negro, who was burnt alive for raping a white woman, prayed so loudly in the fire that he could be heard by all the crowd. During the latest lynching at Frederic, Maryland, for a similar outrage, a Salvation lass was allowed to kneel down by the negro and pray for his soul. That being done, he was strung up and shot. What became of his soul is not reported.

Rev. A. J. Waldron has been debating with another Christian—a Mr. Johannis—at Shields on whether the earth is flat; a very philosophic subject at this end of the nineteenth century. The flat gentleman supported his theory by quotations from the Bible. The round gentleman said he did not believe those texts. The Bible was inspired, but not always accurate. Nor was it the only inspired book. Shakespeare was inspired too. And the gentleman who says so is an agent of the Christian Evidence Society! "Are things what they seem, or is visions about?"

The members of a Christian Guild in the north of London, says the Telegraph, are going to discuss "A Critical Examination of Hamlet." The announcement was too much for a member of the congregation, who solemnly protested "as a Christian." What will this gentleman think when he hears that Christian Evidence lecturers are going about saying that Shakespeare was inspired!

The Boston Standard says anent the Grindelwald Reunion of the Pope: "The pre-millennial unity of Christendom still means that the lion and the lamb shall lie down together, only the lamb must be inside the lion."

The Church Times is very wrath at the advocacy of "unfermented liquor" in communion. It says the divine institution of marriage is to be adapted to the case of men and women with no higher authority than their own caprice, and now the divine command to use the fruit of the vine in the Eucharistic feast must be broken for the sake of inebriates. In Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer the teetotal aspect of the ill effects of communion at its proper strength is adverted to.

An anxious elector of Dublin University asked Mr. Lecky if he was a Christian or an Agnostic. Mr. Lecky replied that he has never severed himself from the Church of England, in which he was brought up. As to the rest, he declined to say anything, and would rather lose the election than admit any one's right to catechise him. There is, of course, a legal sense in which every Englishman is a member of the Church of England.

Christians are popularly supposed to be extensively engaged in laying up treasures in heaven; but, as a sort of foretaste of glory divine, Rev. Antonio Kozlowski, of Chicago, a Polish Roman Catholic priest, has begun a suit for $100,000 damages against the archbishop of the diocese, by whom he was recently excommunicated. Doubtless the Rev. Kozlowski takes the view that his archbishop's action has deprived him of considerable celestial wealth; and, therefore, he will solace himself with worldly dross and muck. Although the archbishop has a sure thing on futurity, he has as yet showed no signs of relinquishing his hold upon the $100,000, thus manifesting a disposition which, in a person of less rank, would be termed selfish.—Boston Investigator.

The Rev. William Radcliffe has a bad record for forgery and embezzlement. He has been sentenced to five years' penal servitude and two years' police supervision for obtaining goods under false pretences. He had previously been convicted, and the police said that he was an associate of the cleverest bank forgers in London. The judge directed that a notification of the case should be sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

This Rev. William Radcliffe has had a long career of crime. In 1888 he was chaplain to a Mr. Blackwood, near Faversham. Whilst there he obtained goods, value £10, from a jeweller named Norman, and then absconded. In September, 1889, he obtained articles by fraud at Tunbridge Wells; in March, 1890, some rings at Portsmouth; and in May, same year, a quantity of jewellery at Cheltenham. In September he was arrested in London for larceny at Margate, and the next month he pleaded guilty to the theft. Dr. Savage and Dr. Ramsden Wells certified him as of "moral insanity," but the Recorder paid very little attention to that, for he sentenced him to eighteen months' hard labor. He served that sentence, and in 1892 he was tried at the assizes in Winchester for obtaining goods, but he was acquitted. In 1893 he defrauded a wine merchant of Jersey, and also a warder of a lunatic asylum, near Salisbury; and in July he was at the Wells Quarter Sessions again sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. He was a plausible fellow with a true sanctimonious twang, and often got employment preaching for clergymen who wanted a holiday.

The Trilby mania has come to England from America, and is taken so seriously by the Rev. T. J. Ball that he writes to the Church Times to complain that in Trilby three clergymen are introduced—one is a drunken roué, the other two are fools. He associates this somehow with Punch being edited by a Roman Catholic.

A Baptist minister, in a rural village in the Eastbourne Parliamentary Division, tells in the Daily News how all the children, although the majority of them are Dissenters, have to attend the Church school. He says: "Not so long since one of the elder children, the daughter of a tenant farmer, was sent home crying because the teacher had told her that all children not baptised belonged to the Devil." This specimen of definite religious instruction, of course, excites the indignation of this Baptist minister. It excites ours that children's minds should be warped and their feelings frightened by religious nonsense of all kinds.

Father Black has presented a petition to the Archbishop of Canterbury, praying him to cite the Bishop of London and Canon Tristram before his Grace and the comprovincial Bishops of the province of Canterbury, to answer the charge that they have controvened the canons of the Church by issuing licenses for the re-marriage of divorced persons. We expect the wily Benson will do his best to cover up the matter.

A curious case of a soldier refusing to do duty has just been before a military tribunal in Germany. In the 2nd company of the Infantry Battalion at Insterburg a recruit named Trott, the son of a landed proprietor, refused to perform his duties. Trott said he was willing to do duty on six days of the week from sunrise to sundown, but he must be exempt from service on the seventh. He said he would rather die than work on the Lord's Day of Rest. Nothing could shake him, and he was sent back to prison.—Daily News.

The young man Giovannino, who, according to the priest, saw the Virgin at Petriguano, near Assisi, has, after a medical examination, been consigned to a lunatic asylum. There were no such institutions in the good old Bible days, when visions of angels were frequent.

The Rev. W. J. Jenkins, rector of Fellingham, now residing in Grove-villas, Muswell-hill, Hornsey, is everlastingly in rows. Week by week his irascible temper brings him before the law or police courts, and at his latest appearance he was fined for assaulting his housekeeper.

The Nation, which occupies the leading place among American reviews, writing on a proposed commission to examine the net results of missionary work in heathen lands, mentions that in Great Britain fifty-four Protestant missionary societies spend a million sterling a year. It says: "Thus far religious people have not even agreed on the theological doctrine to be taught in their own schools at home, and the heathen are daily puzzled and scandalised by the exclusive claims on their attention urged by each of the sects which have missions among them. How little chance there is of any such agreement, however, everyone knows; but until it comes about the Government might well decline lending its gunboats and Maxim guns to every variety of creed which chooses to attack the Chinese philosophy or superstitions."

Miss Codrington, one of the ladies who escaped from the "missionary massacre" at Ku-cheng, has been interviewed by a representative of the Pall Mall Gazette. She denies that the outrage has any special anti-foreign or anti-Christian significance, and declares that the average inhabitants of the district have no sympathy with such doings. In the village of Sa Yong, a day's journey from Ku-cheng, volunteer police kept guard over the mission houses for a whole week, in case the rioters should go there, and, when Miss Codrington returned, not a thing had been touched. It is very evident that the Christian journals in this country have immensely exaggerated the Ku-cheng affair, and dreadfully misrepresented the general character of the Chinese.

According to Miss Codrington, the Vegetarians, who perpetrated the outrage, are "a distinct religious body, holding, curiously enough, as a prime article of faith, that it is wicked to take life of any kind." But the lady need not be astonished. Chinese Vegetarians are not the only people who act against their professed principles. Christianity says "swear not at all," and Christians are always swearing. Christianity boasts a number of fine maxims about loving enemies, yet Christians are fighting all over the world, wherever they suffer the smallest affront or injury. They have actually secured the execution of some fifty persons on account of this very "missionary massacre" at Ku-cheng.

Digitized by Google

Miss Codrington will not draw the moral that we shall from the fact that the Vegetarians are a religious body. There is the secret of all the trouble. It is religious fanaticism which has kindled the flame of hatred in human breasts most fiercely ever since the dawn of human history. According to the Bible itself, the first murder in the world was the result of a religious difference; and as Cain served Abel, so have religionists served each other (when they had the power) ever since.

The Christliche Welt, of Leipsic (No. 32), gives some funny illustrations of Russian religion. It says that, at a trial at Odessa, the examination showed that a feud arose between two Russians because one of them claimed that Almighty God was superior to St. Nicholas. The other, in the interest of his patron saint, resented the slight. At Warsaw the emperor was taking part in a religious service in which, according to custom, the worshipper was to kiss the hand of the priest. The latter, in his confusion at the presence of the visible head of the State Church, failed to offer his hand, whereupon the Czar cried out: "Give me your hand, you dog; I want to kiss it."

The Christliche Welt says that the typical Russian will go to church and strike the floor fifty times with his forehead and then depart, and, as a witness, take a false oath before the courts because some friend has secured his promise to do so for a drink of vodka. He will consider himself justified when he tells the judge the common proverb that "even God himself will take a bribe," meaning by this his accepting so many candles and so many Pater Nosters for certain sins.

Khama, as a Christian chief, has got pretty much what he wanted as to keeping all intoxicants out of his territory. But it happens that Hemuhemu, of the Zwaartkop Location, thinks the missionaries are worse than intoxicants, and forbids them to come on his land. Thereupon an action against Hemuhemu is brought by the Rev. W. Baker, supported by the Missionary Conference of the Wesleyan Church. Hemuhemu is cited before the High Court, and will probably be ruined for having come in conflict with the whites.

The Crescent puts the relation of Christian powers to Africa rather neatly. It says: "In bygone times it was the custom for good Christians to steal Africans from Africa. Latterly, however, this process has been reversed, and the European Powers have contested in unfriendly rivalry at stealing Africa from the Africans."

It mentions, too, that the supply of Bibles, rum, parsons, and white-chokered sky-pilots of all kinds exceeds the demand for "these articles in 'Merrie England,' so a few hundred of them must be shipped off to

> Where Afric's sunny fountains
> Pour out their golden sand

(and the more golden the better), to teach the natives to wear high, stiff-starched, Gladstone collars, flaming yellow neckties, smoke poisonous cigars, sing Sankey's hymns, and drink Jamaica rum, British brandy, Scotch whiskey, and Holland's gin, and thus become good Christians, 'same as the white man.'"

St. John's-wood Chapel is closed at last. The pew-renters dropped down to five, the minister resigned, and the Marylebone Vestry has decided to shut up this gospel-shop altogether. It is suggested that it should be used for Sunday concerts. Perhaps the bigots would squirm at the idea of its being used for Secular lectures.

William Cable, one of the Peculiar People, has been tried at the Essex Assizes before Mr. Justice Hawkins, on a charge of neglecting his own children, whereby they sustained unnecessary suffering and injury to health. The prisoner lost four children from diphtheria in six weeks. In each case he did without a doctor, and followed the New Testament prescription of prayer and anointing with oil. However, as neglect under the Act has to be wilful or culpable, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. Any other verdict would have been a declaration that Christianity itself must not stand in the way of science and common sense in such matters; and a declaration of that kind would create consternation in the Christian fold.

The most curious feature of the prosecution of William Cable is that it was instigated by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Mr. Waugh, the secretary of that Society, is a Christian. In company with another Christian, the Bishop of Chester, he uttered the infamous lie that Secularists were the worst ill-users of children. Yet here is this Mr. Waugh prosecuting Christians for cruelty, knowing all the time that their action is supported (as they say, and as we say too) by the Christian Scriptures! It would be difficult to find a worse inconsistency.

The low fellow who libelled the Hall of Science is now pursuing our old opponent, Harry Alfred Long, for libel. The damages are estimated, not at two farthings, but at the modest sum of £2,100. The Christian Scotsman said they might just as well have been £2,100,000; whereupon this eminent Christian advocate, whose own immunity, because he is not worth powder and shot, has apparently given him a taste for law, has entered an action against the Christian Scotsman. The theological squabble will amuse, if it does not edify, our Glasgow friends.

According to the latest statistics, the heathens of the world still vastly outnumber the Christians, Mohammedans, and Jews put together. Roughly speaking, there are now about one and one half thousand million of people. Of these the Roman Catholic Church claims about 200,000,000, the various Protestant Churches about the same number, and the Greek Church 100,000,000. The total amount of Christians at the highest estimate, including every inhabitant of a Christian country as a Christian, only gives a third of the world's inhabitants. The Jews number about 8,000,000, and the Mohammedans about 180,000,000, leaving 812,000,000 of Buddhists, Hindoos, Taoists, fetish worshippers, etc.—all classed as "heathen."

A question proposed for discussion at a Y.M.C.A. was, "Would Jesus have approved of individual cups in communion?" It was argued that, as tobacco and syphilis were unknown in the days of the apostles, they could all take from a common cup; or, in the oriental fashion, dip their fingers in a common dish; but, if they lived now-a-days and understood the germ theory of disease, they would have been rather more particular.

The appeal of the Rev. H. W. Jones in the divorce case of Worrall v. Worrall and Jones has been dismissed with costs.

According to the Christian Advocate, Prince Bismarck is a most eminent and exemplary Christian. Well, Christianity, though it has "love your enemies" on its lips, has always proved itself compatible with high-handed aggressiveness against all adversaries.

The Planters' Gazette records the sad death of a pet monkey at Calcutta. The adventurous simian climbed into a gentleman's dressing-room, and first of all pouched his patent automatic collar-stud. This did not hurt him, so he took the gentleman's prayer-book. He ate the outside morocco cover and the Thirty-Nine Articles, but he caved in when he chewed the Commination Service. The curse against him who removeth his neighbor's landmark probably finished him. He was a very moral monkey, says the P. G., but religion internally killed him.

At Natal they have started an improvement in Sunday observance by having a band in the Town Gardens. The Natal Mercury says it was greatly enjoyed by a large number of visitors. At the same time, of course, the men of God were strongly denouncing the idea that the Sabbath was made for man, instead of for the monopoly of the ministers.

The North British Daily Mail does not think much of Mr. Swinburne's chance of the laureateship. He has "offended too deeply" against "morality and religion." Poor morality! How sensitive she is, to be sure! Mr. Swinburne has offended against her, like many other poets, by singing of love and beauty, and finding them divine even when they lead, as they sometimes do, to misery and ruin. Poor religion is as sensitive as her dear sister. Mr. Swinburne has called her some very bad names, and as she is so charitable, it is not to be expected that she will forgive him. But is it certain, after all, that Mr. Swinburne wants her forgiveness?

The London Trades Council has absolved the Salvation Army from the charge of "sweating." The majority, however, was not quite convincing. Fifty voted for the Army, and forty-four against. It is noteworthy, too, that the adverse resolution was moved by the representative of the London Compositors; which should be taken in connection with the fact that the charge of "sweating" specially affected the printing department.

Digitized by Google

In consequence of the death of a little girl in America under the hands of a "Christian scientist" who practised only the faith cure, the question has arisen whether the parents cannot be prosecuted as the Peculiar People are here. They, at any rate, are now possibly cured of their faith. The faith cure will lose its power whenever the believers in it are attacked by an epidemic of common sense.

The Schoolmaster (November 16), noticing the letter of complaint against assistants from the Rev. G. Moore, vicar of Cowley, to the Times, remarks that the late master of Cowley Schools found difficulty in getting his salary. It also mentions the case of Mr. Beagle, head teacher of Warborough National School, who was dismissed because he had set up and been elected as an independent candidate for the parish council.

William Dawson, a Leeds barber, has been several times fined for shaving customers on Sunday. He may think cleanliness is next to godliness, and so it is; godliness comes on Sunday, and cleanliness must wait till Monday. Mr. Dawson's customers may think it hard that their faces cannot be properly cleaned up on Sunday, but they have a simple and easy remedy. Let them ask God to stop the growth of their hair between Saturday and Monday. Whatsoever they ask, believing, that they will receive.

Bolton magistrates are carrying on a crusade against clean faces. They are fining local barbers for shaving on Sunday. One of the victims declared that if he suspended business on Sunday morning he would have to apply for parish relief. In order to accelerate his application, the godly magistrates inflicted upon him the maximum fine with costs.

A shocking tale of Christian barbarity to helpless Africans in the Congo Free State is told by the Rev. John B. Murphy, of the American Baptist Mission. He declares that the natives are forced to collect rubber, the soldiers driving the people into the bush. If they will not go, they are shot down, their left hands cut off and taken as trophies to the commissaire. The soldiers do not care whom they shoot down, and they more often shoot poor helpless women and harmless children. These hands—the hands of men, women, and children—are placed in rows before the commissaire, who counts them to see that the soldiers have not wasted the cartridges. The commissaire is paid a commission of about a penny a pound upon all the rubber he gets; it is, therefore, to his interest to get as much as he can.

Ralph Stanton, of New Hirst, Northumberland, who is choir-master in a church at Ashington and a married man, has been committed to the assizes on a charge of criminal conduct with two girls of the Sunday-school. Indecent behaviour took place in the pulpit.

It appears from a correspondent of the Basler Nachrichten that the reported burning of ten heretics at Pachucha, Mexico, is quite correct. When the judge was told that his action was contrary to the laws of the State of Mexico, he calmly replied: "We must obey God rather than men."

A noble-spirited youth is going to rescue the world from Popery and Secularism. He has started the National Society of Prayer. "Object: By special prayer to Almighty God to save the United Kingdom from Infidelity and the errors of Romanism." Every person upon joining will be asked to contribute not less than sixpence," and "must solemnly promise to offer prayer on a stated day." It is hoped that "all who believe in the efficacy of prayer and our present object" will join and send their sixpences. Freethought and Catholicism will soon hide their diminished heads.

The anti-Semitic movement is proving to be a very powerful force in Austria, no less than in Germany, and the Government interference with the election of Dr. Lüger has excited great commotion. Clerical bigotry, which looks with rancor on the legendary crucifixion of Christ, unites with the common feeling of resentment against all the wealthy who use their riches to obtain the possessions of others, and between them the Jews almost have as bad a time in Austria as in Russia

A Temperance meeting held at King-street Church, Maidstone, resolved—"That this meeting is of opinion that the time has arrived when all sections of the Church should decline to receive money for Church purposes from publicans, wine merchants, brewers, and distillers." But why has the time taken nineteen hundred years to "arrive"? Tell us that, good Christians. And why don't you answer Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer pamphlet, instead of passing hypocritical resolutions?

The following is an account of a dinner given by a late Archbishop of Canterbury, in a letter written by the late Sir Archibald Alison, who was present:—"The dinner was served with the utmost splendour; thirty livery servants, and fifteen out of livery, attended on the guests; a profusion of magnificent plate loaded the table; and the viands, cooked with French delicacy, vied with the wines in evincing the hospitality of the noble host. The entertainment altogether was second only to the Royal banquets in St. George's Hall at Windsor. No guest was admitted if not attired in Court dress."

Richard Stephens, aged seventy, has been found guilty of unspeakable offences. The trial took place at the Winchester Assizes before Mr. Justice Wills. Prisoner was a county magistrate at Bournemouth and deputy lieutenant. The other man was a county policeman. "There was a great mass of correspondence," the Westminster Gazette says, "which the judge characterised as the sandwiching together of impurity, piety, gratitude to God for opportunities, and earnest requests that Stocks would never omit daily prayer." Pah! An ounce of civet, good apothecary.

The Glasgow Branch of the Educational Institute of Scotland opens and closes its meetings with prayer, though it does not appear that its deliberations are marked by more wisdom than those of other such institutions. Mr. Lee moved that the prayer be discontinued; this was seconded by Mr. Yates, and of course it gave rise to what the press described as a "heated discussion." Eventually it was decided by 43 to 27 votes to keep on praying. The Glasgow Branch of the E.I.S. is saved.

Parson Light, ex-vicar of Lambourne, on retiring from the Lord's vineyard, has been presented with a silver tea and coffee service worth eighty-five guineas. The subscribers were owners and trainers of horses in the district. Surely the present should have included a tankard.

A band of young lady workers, under the auspices of the Young Women's Christian Association at Birmingham, have passed a rule against kissing. They don't believe in the apostolic injunction to salute one another with a holy kiss. Any girl who does it is to be fined a penny. A Birmingham paper says that if the girls can't kiss each other they will have to fall back on the fellows.

While Dr. Foote, Sen., was addressing the audience on the subject of Comstock prosecutions a gentleman arose to inquire why the American Bible Society was not indicted on the same charge as J. B. Wise. That gave Dr. Foote a chance to tell the story about Goethe, who was called upon by a delegation of ministers to help organise a society for the suppression of immoral literature. Goethe acquiesced, and proposed that they begin with the Bible. Nothing further was heard of the movement.—Truthseeker.

Christian Concessions Insufficient.

It is the merest ostrich policy for contemporary ecclesiasticism to try to hide its Hexateuchal head, in the hope that the inseparable connection of its body with pre-Abrahamic legends may be overlooked. The question will still be asked, If the first nine chapters of the Pentateuch are unhistorical, how is the historical accuracy of the remainder to be guaranteed? What more intrinsic claim has the story of Exodus than that of the Deluge to belief? If God did not walk in the Garden of Eden, how can we be assured that he spoke from Sinai?—Professor T. H. Huxley, Prologue to "Essays upon Some Controverted Questions."

The Inquisition.

The supporters of that barbarous institution were not hypocrites, but enthusiasts. Hypocrites are, for the most part, too supple to be cruel. For cruelty is a stern and unbending passion; while hypocrisy is a fawning and flexible art, which accommodates itself to human feelings, and flatters the weakness of men in order to gain its own ends. In Spain the earnestness of the nation, being concentrated on a single topic, carried everything before it; and, hatred of heresy becoming a habit, persecution of heresy was thought a duty. The conscientious energy with which that duty was fulfilled is seen in the history of the Spanish Church.—H. T. Buckle, "History of Civilisation in England," i. 187.

Obituary.

The Lindsey and Lincolnshire Star reports at length the death and silent funeral of Mr. John Eccles, of Brigg, a well-known and esteemed Freethinker of that district. "When leaving the graveside Dr. Henry Eccles, second son of deceased, thanked all the friends and neighbors who had shown their respect for the deceased by following the remains to their last resting place. Before his death deceased said he wanted no one to tell him what happened in the high and low countries beyond the grave, for it was all the work of imagination and natural desire."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, November 24, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, E.C. : 7.30, "Huxley and Agnosticism."

December 1, Bradford ; 8, Foresters' Hall ; 15, Newcastle ; 22, Manchester ; 29, Camberwell.

January 5, Camberwell ; 12, 19, and 26, St. James's Hall.

February 9, Glasgow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—November 24, Manchester ; 25, Derby ; 27, Ipswich. December 1, Wood Green ; 8, South Shields ; 15 and 22, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 31 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

J. Wood.—Your list is filed. You need not send until the last item appears.

L. J. B.—Canon Driver's Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament will give you the facts about the Old Testament. We recommend it all the more cheerfully because it is written by a clergyman. Supernatural Religion (three vols.) will give you the facts about the New Testament ; but, as it is written by a non-Christian, you might read the late Bishop Lightfoot's reply and judge for yourself. Of course there is plenty of other literature on the subject, if you wish to pursue your inquiries further.

T. Wise.—Thanks for the information.

A. R. Munro.—Thanks for your valuable letter, the contents of which are duly noted. Kindly make inquiries about a hall—a good one. Mr. Foote will come, even if the admission must be free.

J. Partridge.—Pleased to hear you have made sixteen new members already in the new hall. Mr. Foote reciprocates the goodwill expressed by the Birmingham Branch.

J. K. (Plymouth).—Sorry to hear you were so unwell that Sunday.

J. W. Gott.—Thanks for all your trouble in the matter. The bigotry of Bradford is the best reason for an active Freethought propaganda there.

Peter Lang (Edinburgh) doubts the statement in our "Black Army" articles, that no Nonconformist minister in this country is paid five thousand a year. He says he has read in the Inquiry Column of Tit Bits that Dr. Alexander Whyte, minister of St. George's Free Church, Edinburgh, receives a salary of £10,000 a year. Prodigious! Too much so for our credulity. A Scotchman would take as much, but would Scotchmen ever give it? However, we are open to conviction, and shall be glad to hear from anyone who really knows the facts of the case.

J. Benson.—Acknowledged.

W. J. Vaughan.—Mr. Wheeler's Footsteps of the Past is in the press, and we understand it will be ready shortly.

W. Cook.—See paragraph.

A. B. Moss.—It is only Messrs. Watts and Cohen at present who are free for country engagements under Mr. Foote's scheme. We have already announced that courses of week-night lectures are being arranged in London early in the new year, for which the services of other lecturers will be required.

J. Melling.—See paragraph.

H. Lees Sumner.—Thanks for paper.

W. S. Crawshay.—Notices or announcements for the Freethinker must reach us by Tuesday morning.

K. J.—Have put it to Shilling Month.

J. Richards.—Thanks for the information. The omission shall be seen to.

C. de Villiers (Johannesburg).—Letter and photograph to hand. We are well pleased with both. Glad to hear from you at any time. An Atheist is one literally "without God."

A. Dunn.—Only 2s. was paid on the share, as per receipt. We have acknowledged that amount in your name.

H. C.—Thanks for cuttings. We meant no offence in saying that the Birmingham workers for Freethought were mostly poor ; quite the contrary.

J. M. R.—Thanks for cuttings.

J. Munton.—It will be useful.

N.S.S. Benevolent Fund.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges :—Mrs. Henderson, £1 10s. ; G. Rolfe, 4s.

O. R. C.—Shall appear.

President's Honorarium Fund.—Per R. Forder : A. Scotter, 2s. 6d. ; J. Chamberlain, 5s. ; S. H. Munns, £1 ; J. Munns, £1 ; T. G., 1s.

R. Howard.—You surprise us. We thought we had reprinted Mr. Putnam's account of his visit to the Failsworth Secular Sunday School. We will look up the Truthseeker and supply the omission, which was purely accidental.

J. Sage.—Mr. Forder has your order to execute. Gratified to know it is one of your greatest pleasures to read the Freethinker every week.

R. Shedley.—The first is a wide question, that cannot be dealt with in this column. Nonconformist ministers are not paid out of State funds like Church clergymen. An archbishop's salary is not given him to spend upon the poor.

The Battersea Branch secretary asks if any friend will assist at the piano for the Branch on Sunday or Tuesday evenings?

G. Williams wishes to know where he can obtain the Freethinker near Sloane-square.

Papers Received.—Western Figaro—Blyth Weekly News—Echo—South Shields Free Press—Progressive Thinker—Truthseeker—Citizen—Secular Thought—Boston Investigator—Freidenker—Freedom—Corner Stone—Liberty—Look Times—Look Post—Catholic Review—New York Public Opinion—Melbourne Argus—Mental World.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid :—One Year, 10s. 6d. ; Half Year, 5s. 3d. ; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d. ; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements :—One inch, 4s. 6d. ; half column, £1 2s. 6d. ; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SHILLING MONTH.

SUBSCRIPTIONS RECEIVED.

(Where merely the name is given the amount is one shilling.)

Three Newark Friends, 3s. ; A. Dunn, 2s. ; A. Sumner, 5s. ; J. Judge, £1 ; H. W. Parsons, £2 2s. ; Messrs. Platt, Chawn, and Jones, 3s. ; E. J., 2s. 6d.

Per Charles Watts.—G. A. (Liverpool), 10s.

Per R. Forder : J. Hughes, 5s. ; R. W., 2s. ; T. G ; J. H. Carr, 2s. ; J. McMunn ; G. Hutchinson ; R. Rutherford ; A Friend ; S. George ; W. Knight ; T. Reed, 6d. ; J. M., 3d. ; J. R, 3d. ; C. Sedgwick, 1s. 1d.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote lectured twice on Sunday at Leicester. There was a good morning audience, and the hall was crowded in the evening. "Huxley and Agnosticism" proved an interesting subject, judging by the attention and applause. Mr. Sydney Gimson, the chairman, invited discussion, but none was forthcoming. The opposition to the morning lecture was feeble on the part of one critic, and spiteful on the part of another. It is more agreeable to mention that several friends attended the lectures from distant places, three coming over from Derby.

This evening (Nov. 24) Mr. Foote occupies the platform at Foresters' Hall, and repeats his lecture on "Huxley and Agnosticism." London friends will remember that the admission at Foresters' Hall is free. They should try to induce their Christian friends to attend. The lecturer is anxious to preach the Gospel of Freethought to the heathen.

Mr. Foote's lectures at Bradford will, after all, have to be given in the Oddfellows' Hall. We have already noted the refusal of one theatre sine phrase. The Jollity Theatre might have been had, but it was pre-engaged. Application was made for the saloon of the Mechanics' Institute, which has been let to the Fabians, but it was refused to the Secularists. We hope the Bradford and district Freethinkers will mark their sense of all this bigotry by flocking to Mr. Foote's lectures next Sunday (Dec. 1).

Mr. Charles Watts delivered three lectures on Sunday at Liverpool to enthusiastic audiences. Several questions were asked, and answered, after the evening lecture. During the week Mr. Watts has been lecturing at Bolton and Blackburn under the President's scheme. To-day (Nov. 24) he is billed for three lectures in the Manchester Secular Hall, and we hope he will have first-rate meetings. On Monday he visits Derby, and on Tuesday he lectures under the new scheme at Ipswich.

Noticing some Christian criticisms on Ingersoll's recent lectures, the Boston Herald says : "Colonel Ingersoll is one of the first lawyers in the country—a man of high mental capacity and rare reasoning power. To say that boys and girls can answer his arguments, and that what he advances is transparent sophistry to the most immature minds, is to say what any intelligent person knows to be absurdly untrue. If he is met ta all, he must be met in a very different way from this."

Digitized by Google

The same paper concludes its leaderette on Ingersoll by remarking: "His lectures may be denounced as mischievous in their effect, but it is full time that this talk of him as a man of no importance in argument should cease. He is possessed of a high order of talent, and it is not at all to be supposed that he does not evince it in his attacks upon Christianity. He has studied that subject long, and he has made great sacrifices for the sincerity of his opinions. Had it not been for these, there were few men who had more brilliant prospects in public life than awaited Colonel Ingersoll. He may be both pitied and condemned for his delusion, but it is altogether a mistake to rate him as one of small ability."

The Leek Times reprints our last paragraphs on the proposed debate between Mr. Foote and the Rev. W. W. Howard. Our readers will remember that Mr. Howard had framed the proposition he would maintain in debate, and that Mr. Foote then framed his in opposition. Our contemporary appends an editorial footnote, which runs as follows: "Too late and too long for publication this or any other week, we have received the proof of a letter by the Rev. W. W. Howard, sent to a paper printed in Hanley. It is something over a yard in length, and purports to be a reply to the above. Suffice it, Mr. Howard declines Mr. Foote's proposition, and does not agree to submit the question to be debated to three gentlemen of Leek, two of whom are to be nominated by Mr. Howard himself. There will, therefore, be no debate; and, as far as we are concerned, the matter is at an end.—Ed. L. T."

This is just exactly the termination we expected. It is what happened in the negotiations for a debate at Spennymoor, and afterwards at Liverpool. Mr. Howard is a very brave man—on paper; but when it comes to business his courage evaporates in words. He stipulates a condition which he knows beforehand is absolutely impossible. Not content with framing his own proposition, he wants also to frame his opponent's. Which is absurd, as Euclid says.

Mr. C. Cohen lectured on Sunday afternoon for the Bradford Sunday Society, his subject being "Darwinism and Democracy." There was a large attendance, and a good report appeared in the Bradford Observer. Mr. Cohen is lecturing in the district under Mr. Foote's new scheme: November 25, Keighley; 27, Leeds; 28, Bingley.

Mr. A. B. Moss had a good and appreciative audience at Ball's Pond on Sunday evening. His lecture, which the chairman described as interesting and instructive, was received with loud applause.

We venture to call attention again to the Secular Almanack for 1896, which has just been published. We should like to see every copy bought up before Christmas. The price of this publication is only threepence, and every penny of the profit accruing from the sale goes into the National Secular Society's exchequer. The Almanack contains a great deal of information of interest to Freethinkers, which cannot be obtained in any other form.

The Camberwell entertainment in aid of the President's new lecture scheme was a great success. The hall was well filled, and all present seemed to be enjoying themselves. Miss Vance deserves thanks for the hard work she threw into the enterprise. Miss Brown's acting was a surprise. Her bearing was excellent, and her elocution admirable. Mr. Watts, of course, gave complete satisfaction. Mr. Moss convulsed the audience in a broad comedy part. Mr. Foote read Tennyson's "Rizpah," and Madame Burgwitz sang with her wonted charm and effectiveness. The large attendance of ladies gave a bright, social air to the assembly.

Mr. G. W. Foote's Humanitarian pamphlet, The Shadow of the Sword, is an eloquent plea for the substitution of arbitration for war. His arguments are supported by an array of facts and figures which ought to convince the most bloodthirsty of the fatuity of this mode of settling national differences.—Clarion.

The Weekly Times and Echo has a sensible and outspoken article on Dr. John Clifford's Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, which is in its second edition. Our contemporary thinks the book may do good in "certain quarters," but does not reckon its "actual value" as "very high." It refers to Dr. Clifford's "alternating fearlessness of exposures of surface errors, and nervous harking back to the intrinsic inspiration which is somehow supposed to string together a long set of gems, some flawed and some spurious, into one yet priceless jewel." Language of this kind is new in the weekly press.

The Daily News correspondent writes: "The monument to Garibaldi in Milan looks better than was expected. The bronze figure on horseback has a calm and resolute aspect. He is unsheathing his sword, and wears the traditional poncho and Hungarian cap. He is represented as he looked when in the prime of life, during the campaign of 1860. The horse is a majestic animal. To right and left are two bronze groups, 'Revolution' leaning on a lion, and 'Liberty' sheathing her sword after having conquered the tiger, symbolising Tyranny, which lies at her feet. All round the grey granite base of the monument are placed shields inscribed with the names of Garibaldi's principal victories. The inscription is simply, 'To Guiseppe Garibaldi—Milan.'"

Now the winter is upon us the demands are increasing upon the National Secular Society's Benevolent Fund. Mr. George Anderson sends us a cheque for £5, and perhaps other friends will follow his good example. The Committee all work gratuitously, and every application is investigated before assistance is granted.

THE SKY-PILOT.

You have often seen the Pilot
As he sanctimonious stands,
In his glossy coat of broadcloth,
With a Bible in his hands;
And his empty head bent forward
In a pious sort of way,
As he asks the Lord to clothe him
And to feed him day by day.

And you've often heard the Pilot
Expounding Moses's law,
And heard him tell the story
Of great Samson's ass's jaw;
But that he should earn his living
With the sweat upon his brow,
If you tell him ne'er so gently
You will raise a holy row.

No! that ne'er would suit the Pilot,
Who with work's not in accord,
And he hurries up to tell you
He's a servant of the Lord;
If the best you have you give him,
He will want it better still;
For the shepherd must be paid for,
And the sheep must pay the bill.

How he talks of golden pavements,
And the city's pearly gates;
How an everlasting mansion
Each poor Lazarus now awaits;
And he tells us that the weather
In that city's always warm—
But he shears his sheep in winter
To protect his own sleek form.

How he shuns the poor that labor,
And the pauper in the ditch
And proclaims they were created
To be servants of the rich;
Then he helps the great to plunder
And grind the weak and low;
"I'm about my Father's business!"
He says. "He made it so."

You have often met the Pilot
At the picnic and the tea,
At the concert and the lecture,
Where he always passes free;
And you've always met him smiling—
What has he to make him sad?
He has all the world can give him,
So he thinks we should be glad.

He's a "worker (?) in the vineyard,'
So he digs, and prunes, and hacks,
In the glorious work of piling
Burdens on the sinners' backs.
He's the Pilot of Life's Ocean,
Though its chart he'll never know;
And he'll land—or sink—you somewhere,
If you give him half a show.

—Secular Thought. W. A. Ratcliffe.

Heaven in Arizona: "And what may be the principal industry in the territory?" Resident: "Wal, stranger, in winter they mosly set on th'east sider th'house'n foller the sun roun' t' the wes; 'n summer they set on the wes'n foller the shade roun' to th'east."

Digitized by Google

"GODLESS" EDUCATION:

AN OPEN LETTER TO

THE VERY REVEREND JAMES CARMICHAEL, M.A., D.C.L., AND BISHOP'S COMMISSARY, MONTREAL.

MY DEAR JIMMY AND VERY REVEREND DEAN,—It seems very strange at this distance of time and space since we trod the path of learning together up Harcourt-street, Dublin, to Dan Flynn's Academy, to be addressing you in these terms of mingled familiarity and deference. We started in life by different roads. You took up the sword of the spirit, as it is called, to fight the flesh, the world, and the Devil—I took up the sword of the flesh to fight my country's enemies. Judging by the present result at which each of us has arrived, you have been able to carve out for yourself with your spiritual weapon a more satisfactory material position than I with my weason-slitter of Brummagem steel. The last time I saw you with the eye was shortly after your arrival in Montreal one Sunday evening. I happened to be there, when I was enticed by a lady to go to St. George's to hear the new curate from Ireland. It appears to me now as only the other day that I saw you sweep up the aisle amid the other sky-pilots in processional stream, with the same perky pitch of the head, but with an added sanctimonious air befitting and necessary in the new rôle you had assumed since the days when we played tricks on old Swords, the doorkeeper, and made life a burden to one at least of our tutors, little Hugo de Burgh. The sight brought me many reflections, for I had long since lost all faith—indeed, I cannot say I ever had any—in the hocus-pocus business to which you had taken. I am not going to tell tales out of school, but I never had the impression that your life's work lay in the soul-saving line. But that you took to it, and have made it pay, is a proof of your shrewdness, if nothing else. "Great is truth, and it shall prevail," is an old saying with a certain amount of truth in it; but it would be more generally correct if, for the word "truth," "humbug" were substituted. Have you never, my dear Jimmy, when you have retired into your inner self, as I suppose most men do at times, taken a survey of your outer life? And if you have, what have been your reflections? And did not the saying of the Preacher echo lightly on your inner ears: "Vanity, vanity, all is vanity"? Or, as an eccentric old foreigner whom I once met in my world-wandering used to phrase it, "Phantasmata! phantasmata! phantasmata!" You could hardly persuade me that you seriously believed or believe in the reception of any special gift or power on the day some Bishop, Right Reverend Father-in-God, placed his fingers on your head and muttered his incantation after the manner of the wizard at a country fair about to perform the trick of the show. But the aforesaid Rt. Rev. Father-in-God may have been a man endowed with strong magnetic force, and capable of distilling, through his digits into your cranium, an influence which has permanently hypnotised you. If so, you are to be excused and commiserated for the delusions under which you appear, from your recent utterances on the education question, to labor.

You talk, my dear Dean, the usual shibboleth about "godless" schools. Have you ever found "God" in any school? The gabbling of prayers or invocations to a deity who, notwithstanding his attributes of omniscience, omnipresence, and general omniness, never seems to know anything or be anywhere at the right moment to be of use to "his creatures," does not, as you and I know of old, make the slightest impression in a religious sense on either boys or girls at school time. How, therefore, the absence of these performances constitutes "godless" education, I fail utterly to see, and so I expect do you and thousands of others of your brother clericals; only when one is climbing the ladder to preferment you are all compelled to talk in the orthodox jargon of the day. Your very existence as a class, and your influence and power as individuals, to say nothing of the money question, which is not the least vital consideration, depend on your being able to impose—and I use this word in every sense that can be given to it—upon the plastic and ductile intelligence of children. They are made to believe things not true in themselves, or about which the pastors and masters are as ignorant or befogged as the children can be, and you dishonestly evade the issues involved in the open discussion of your more or less sincere beliefs or misbeliefs. The preachers of hell fire and everlasting damnation among the Highland peasants in Scotland have found that, especially with the young, the practical abolition of hell, and the substitution for it of a locality or an existence or a nothing denominated Sheol, has quite upset their minds, and is emptying seats and pews in the kirks to an alarming extent. I notice that at the recent meeting of the Synod the Revised Version was objected to on the ground that "it had a tendency to disturb people's minds." This reminds one of the way the Chinese have explained their unwillingness to accept Western ideas; the same stupid, stolid conservatism. You should imitate the worldly wisdom of the society doctor, who, when his fair patient refused to continue the cod-liver oil (hell-fire) treatment, immediately conceded and prescribed curaçoa and cream (Sheol), and so retained his influence and fees. Don't run or swim against the stream, my dear Jimmy, if you are wise, and have not been entirely hypnotised. The world is moving forward, and to try to put things back is as impossible in the end as to prevent the world going round by sticking a pole into the earth and holding on to it. If you and your class insist on cod-liver oil when the world is clamoring for curaçoa and cream, you will be neither worldly-wise nor otherwise, and, in the vernacular of the day, you clericals will wake up one morning to find yourselves left. At the best you will only be able to stave off the evil day for your own time, for the economic forces that are at work are making for the abolition of the useless and superfluous classes of society, to which you and your cloth of all creeds and grades distinctly belong. The levelling of education and spread of knowledge (science) is rendering everyone who chooses to think capable of judging of the true value of the mumbo-jumboism of supernatural religion as hitherto taught by your class. The day is near when the professional religionist, with his vestments and incantations, will be relegated to the garret of time, where lie the bones of the mastodon and the dodo, and you will only hurry on that time by refusing to recognise the natural forces at work. The spiritual influence of the Pope has been greatly strengthened by his loss of temporal power; but the proof that he and his surroundings do not believe in the kingdom which is not of this world is afforded by the craving and desperate efforts they are making to recover his temporalities. The day they do their spiritual influence will be near to its end. The moral of what I am writing to you, my very reverend Dean, is don't grasp at too much; give us a little relaxation and change of diet. Toujours perdrix is wearisome to the palate. Let us have at least one period of our existence, one function of our mortal lives, free from the intrusion of the sky-pilot. We want education for the ordinary affairs of this life, which the old Latin Delectus told us is short, to be secular, and devoted exclusively to this world's business. You, the mystery men, fetish men, the angekoks of our civilisation, have your churches and Sunday schools to do what you are paid for doing, and, I make free to say, doing more or less badly; for in your efforts to make men appear religious you have quite forgotten or failed to make them moral. However, that is by the way. Study, then, my dear Jimmy, the signs of the times. New lights are breaking on men's minds, and dispelling, somewhat slowly, perhaps, just yet, the phantoms and dogmas of the old, worn-out creeds; but dispelling them they are beyond a doubt, and you and your class know it. Put up your dark lanterns, then, for they are of little further use; and if you still hanker after playing the physician to humanity, take my advice and substitute curaçoa and cream for the old rejected cod-liver oil. It agrees better with the stomach.

And may you live to be a bishop in your turn is the best wish of

AN OLD SCHOOLMATE.

P.S.—Don't forget that your renowned townsman, Oscar Wilde, was a distinguished product of Oxford, which is, according to your jargon, not a godless establishment. On the contrary, God has been there for centuries, and is, so far as I understand, still there. How comes it, then, that this godful institution turns out such as he, and, for the matter of that, hundreds worse?

—Secular Thought.

IT is to the diffusion of knowledge, and to that alone, that we owe the comparative cessation of what is unquestionably the greatest evil men have ever inflicted on their own species. For that religious persecution is a greater evil than any other is apparent, not so much from the enormous and almost incredible number of its known victims, as from the fact that the unknown must be far more numerous, and that history gives no account of those who have been spared in the body in order that they might suffer in the mind. We hear much of martyrs and confessors—of those who were slain by the sword or consumed in the fire; but we know little of that still larger number who, by the mere threat of persecution, have been driven into an outward abandonment of their real opinions; and who, thus forced into an apostasy the heart abhors, have passed the remainder of their lives in the practice of a constant and humiliating hypocrisy. It is this which is the real curse of religious persecution. For in this way, men being constrained to mask their thoughts, there arises a habit of securing safety by falsehood, and of purchasing impunity with deceit. In this way fraud becomes a necessary of life; insincerity is made a daily custom; the whole tone of public feeling is vitiated, and the gross amount of vice and of error fearfully increased. Surely, then, we have reason to say that, compared to this, all other crimes are of small account, and we may well be grateful for that increase of intellectual pursuits which has destroyed an evil that some among us would even now willingly restore.—Buckle's "Civilisation," vol. i., p. 136.

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

A new philosophical series will shortly be issued under the editorship of Professor Knight, of St. Andrew's. The chief feature will be that the philosophies are studied from the sociological point of view.

* * *

Although John Addington Symonds was fond of referring to "God," and maintained that the human "soul" contains said God on this planet, he was by no means a Christian, for he had no belief in personal immortality. In writing to a friend he expressed himself as follows: "I will further confess that, had you gained the proof [of this immortality of the individual soul], this result would have enormously aggravated the troubles of my life by cutting off the possibility of resumption into the personal unconscious which our present incertitude leaves open to my sanguine hope.....Until that immortality of the individual is irrefragably demonstrated, the sweet, the immeasurably precious hope ending with this life the ache and languor of existence remains open to burdened human personalities."

* * *

The last number of the Bellamy Library, Ten Men of Money Island, by Seymour F. Norton, appendix by Henry Seymour, is by no means the least in importance of the series (London: William Reeves, 185 Fleet-street, E.C.). It deals with the financial question in a most attractive fashion. One would hardly think, from the usual run of works on questions of currency and finances, that they could be put in such a lively, simple, and intelligible form as they are by this American writer. His ten men on Money Island are named Plowem, Reapem, Foreplane, Sledgehammer, Dressem, Guidem, Pickaxe, Makem, Discount, and Donothing. The nomenclature gives the key to the story. All goes well while the ten men combine for mutual help; and they erect a bridge, exactly as Governor Le Brock, of Guernsey, did erect a market, by issuing labor notes in payment, receivable as taxes. But all goes ill when Donothing is allowed to do the governing, and Discount the banking of the island. Chapter XII., on "Specie Basis, Usury, and Banking," really gives a masterly insight into mysteries of finance. But Mr. Norton simplifies the problem overmuch, as Mr. Seymour points out in his appendix, and neither of these advocates of free currency considers the strongest objection to free paper currency—viz., that it may not continue to represent equivalent values when a debt is contracted and when it has to be paid. But this is not the place to discuss the currency question. Sufficient to say, Mr. Norton's book is an eminently readable one upon an important question, which but few know how to make interesting. Mr. Seymour's appendix is not so lively as the book, but it is more solid. It may be questioned, however, if the solution of the money question is quite so simple as he surmises. He says: "All that is required is the repeal of the legal tender laws, the demonopolisation of gold," etc. But these things are only simple on paper.

* * *

Buckle and His Critics: A Study in Sociology, by John Mackinnon Robertson (London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co.; 10s. 6d.), is a stout volume of 565 pages, in which Mr. Robertson has elaborately defended the author of The History of Civilisation in England against the disparaging criticism of a large number of writers, including Leslie Stephen, Theodore Parker, John Fiske, G. A. Simcox, Mark Pattison, Oscar Peschel, Professor Flint, Mr. Gladstone, etc. One chapter is on "Buckle's Real Errors," another on "The Development of Sociology." In an appendix, Mr. Robertson gives a synthetic summary of Buckle's ideas. The work is well printed, and has a good index.

* * *

The Wizard Lute, by George Gresswell (Griffith Farran), is a shilling story of a youth magically placed alone, like Campbell's Last Man, in London. The position is one which would speedily show what an essential portion of our nature is sympathy with our fellows.

* * *

Mr. Leonard Huxley, a son of the late Professor, appears before the world as the translator of Hausrath's History of the New Testament Times (Williams & Norgate). The work is a rationalistic one, though it may be doubted if there are the materials for the reconstruction which Professor Hausrath attempts.

* * *

The New Testament, in its revised form, appeared in 1881, and the Old Testament came out in 1885; but the Apocrypha still remained to be revised. It is to be published this month at the Oxford and Cambridge presses. The revisers were appointed by the convocation of Canterbury in 1870, and have been a quarter of a century in doing their work.

* * *

Max Nordau's novel, A Comedy of Sentiments, is published in English this week by Heinemann.

The Rev. W. W. Smyth, a Scoto-Canadian, has made a Scottish version of the New Testament, which is announced as to appear this winter. It will be interesting to note whether he uses the "I sepad" of Thrums, or "A'nu" of Drumtochty. Some time ago the Rev. Hately Waddell put out a version of the Psalms in such "braid Doric" that few Scotsmen, and no Southerner, could understand it.

* * *

Mr. Herbert M. Thompson has written a work on Russian Politics, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish. It treats of the conditions of social life and government now existing in Russia. The emancipation of the serfs and various reforms of the same period are described with some fullness.

* * *

Musings for the Masses, by R. J. Derfel (Manchester), is a very cheap pennyworth, thirty-two pages, of verses and songs. One of them is on Charles Bradlaugh, and all show a love of freedom and sympathy with the masses.

* * *

Rabbi Placzek, of Moravia, has written a book on Darwinism in the Talmud. That old Jewish hodge-podge chronicles a Rabbi's opinion that Adam had a tail. But the doctrine of evolution is older than the Talmud. It is found in Lucretius, and before him in Democritus and Anaxagoras, more than two thousand years ago.

* * *

The Wonderful Visit, by H. G. Wells, is a curious novel. It tells how the vicar of Siddermorton, who was an ornithologist, shot an angel, believing it to be a rare bird, with iridescent wings. "A youth with an extremely beautiful face, clad in a robe of saffron," flutters down to the ground, with "a scream of superhuman agony." The clergyman, who is a delightful character, binds up the broken wing, takes the angel home, and clothes him in a suit of his own clerical garments. This wonderful visitor has some wonderful thoughts on the folly of human arrangements.

THE CAMBERWELL REUNION.

The Camberwell Branch of the N.S.S. scored a great success in the dramatic performance they gave on Wednesday, November 13, in aid of the Lecture Fund. By eight o'clock the compact little hall in New Church-road was filled with a cheerfully expectant and unusually good-tempered audience, for was not their honored President—usually only visible on Sundays at the unapproachable distance of the lecturing platform—sitting there among them as sociable as you please, with his wife and two pretty little girls beside him?

The whole performance went admirably; the amateur element, thanks to the excellent stage management, seemed almost eliminated, and even little Miss Harding, the youngest member of the Company, quite forgot to be shy, and danced with all the assurance and skill of a professional three times her age.

Mr. Watts's dramatic and forcible delivery of "Claude Melnotte's Apology and Defence" was warmly applauded, and Mr. Foote's tender and beautiful reading of Tennyson's "Rizpah" showed the N.S.S. folk their President in a new and very interesting light. The greater number of us only know our President as a lecturer and ethical teacher. True, he talks to us from that vague eminence, the Editorial Chair; but sometimes, when we feel the throb of the kind, true heart that beats behind the printed page, when we see his earnest face light up with noble feeling as it did when he recited on Wednesday, we wish we saw more of him from the human social side—we would like to feel the warm grasp of his hand, and have him among us oftener at such gatherings as these.

One of the best things on the program was A Morning Call, and Miss Annie Brown's Mrs. Chillingtone was certainly a most finished and artistic performance. Miss Brown, who looked remarkably handsome, was ably seconded by Mr. Charles Watts as the impressionable baronet, Sir Edward Ardent, and they gave such a spirited rendering of the sparkling little comedy, they played it with such lightness of touch and grace of manner, that they undoubtedly scored the success of the evening. Madame Saunders gave some excellent pianoforte selections, and Madame Kate Burgwitz sang with all her customary charm of expression. The entertainment concluded with the domestic comedy, A Quiet Family, and Mr. Benjamin Bibbs (Mr. George Brown) was so dogmatic, and his wife (Miss Miriam May) so long-suffering, Mr. Barnaby Bibbs (Mr. Arthur B. Moss) was so very depressed in the beginning and so very irrepressible at the finish, and all the other members of this quiet (!) domestic family were so thoroughly up in their parts, that the audience kept up a running accompaniment of applause, which lasted till the final fall of the curtain.

Veritas.

Digitized by Google

DAWN!

Dawneth the new age:
Comes it light-girdled
Forth from the portals
Of near future time.
All who look forward
This truth shall perceive.

Heavings volcanic
Shake now the surface
Of creeds old and new.
Truth will not falter;
Friendship with error
It ne'er will maintain.

Yahveh, the last god!
Thy son is setting:
Soon shalt thou be with
Brahm, Jove, Osiris,
Baal, and Odin—
An archaic myth.

As Thor drove northward
Ymir the Jotun,
Melting the ice-thralls
That fettered the earth—
New birth inbreathing,
Fair promise of spring;

So doth bright Reason,
Greater than all gods,
Work intellectual
Freedom the world o'er:
Priesthood and dogmas
Dissolve in its light.

Aye! a fair era
Cometh to mankind:
Hunger shall vanish;
War shall we know not:
Freethought, of all men,
Will be the first care.

Speed ye the time, then,
When these things may be.
Comrades! combine, and
It is in your power
To sunder all bonds
Of Humanity.

F. W. Thorrington.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A QUEER NEW SECT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Thinking that it may be of use to your paper, I herewith send you some information concerning a fanatical religious sect—of which you have probably never heard—called the "Swanepoels," and living in the Transvaal. The sect, which is named the "Swanepoels" because it was originally started by a family of that name about the year 1893, live in Klerksdorp, a town in the Transvaal. Its followers, who are, for the most part, ignorant Dutch boer farmers, do not exceed fifty.

The sect was really originated by two men named Piet Swanepoel and C. J. Strydom, who, being "moved by the spirit," as they aver, began holding religious services on the farm of the former called Baviaanskloof, which, translated, means "Baboons' Valley," and which divine services were based on the last chapter of St. Mark, in which Christ exhorts his disciples to remain steadfast in their faith, which would have the effect of giving them the power of healing the sick instantaneously, etc. In fact, their whole religion has that chapter for its ground.

Swanepoel and Strydom, being both eloquent speakers, so worked upon the credulity and feelings of their audience that they all became impressed with the belief that it was possible to obtain the standpoint spoken of in the said last chapter of Mark.

Swanepoel, being a deacon of the Wolmoranestad (a town in the South African Republic) Church, resigned his position, and removed the scene of his preachings to the town of Klerksdorp. It was at this juncture that Strydom, who, I presume, was the more sensible of the two, and evidently seeing that the thing did not pay, deserted his old comrade and resumed his former position of deacon in the Wolmoranestad Church.

In the meanwhile Swanepoel still went on with his preaching; and at length, having obtained a sufficiently strong congregation, built a church, where divine services are held every morning and evening.

They have a belief that they are the chosen few, and that everyone else is "unsound," "possessed of devils," etc. Their devotional exercises are rather of a violent nature. As soon as they enter the church, everyone drops down on her or his knees, starts praying, singing, clapping their hands, and making peculiar noises; and they cause such a tumult when they are holding their services that, although the windows and doors of their church are always closed, yet the noise may be heard a good way off. While they are in this state of mind it is positively dangerous for anyone not belonging to their sect to venture inside the church.

A week or two ago some of them were charged before the magistrate at Klerksdorp for insulting and using violent language towards some people, and they were mulcted in a heavy fine of £5; I say heavy fine, because they are poor farmers.

Not so long ago a lady tried to put her faith to a practical test. She told her co-religionists that she was going to jump up to heaven alive, and for that purpose got on a high wall and attempted the feat—with what result you can imagine, for she came into violent contact with mother earth; which was quite the contrary to her expectation.

How most of these people live is a mystery, although some of them are fairly well-to-do farmers. The more educated (!) farmers in the neighborhood look upon them with the greatest aversion; and their opinion is that the sect will gradually die out when they find out (will they ever!) that they cannot obtain their object in spite of their violent efforts.

This is only one of the many cases in which we see how religion affects the brain and makes fanatics of persons; for one must admit that people who behave like the sect I have named cannot be called sane in any sense of the word.

Before closing I cannot help telling you how much I appreciate, as everyone who loves truth must, the splendid work you are doing, and have done, in advancing Freethought, and hope that you may continue to do so for many years yet. I have been a subscriber to your paper since the beginning of 1895, and hope to be one always, if "God spares me." It is hardly two years ago since I became a Freethinker. I was converted by reading Paine's Age of Reason and some back numbers of your paper; and, although I am only 19 years of age, I have since then made a fairly good progress in Freethought, having read Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Ingersoll, Foote, Strauss, and many others.

I send you, per book post, a photo of myself, taken a few days ago; I also send you a pamphlet by the Rev. Faure, called The Truth About the Bible, for your library. It contains more common sense than one usually would expect from a sky-pilot. Whenever I see anything in any paper worth sending to you, I will do so. C. de Villiers.

Johannesburg, South African Republic.

PROFANE JOKES.

Papa—"Did you ask God to give you your daily bread this morning?" Bobby—"No, papa; I looked in the pantry last night, and saw that there was enough to last for three days."

"My friend," said the long-coated old man solemnly, "have you made preparation for the day of judgment?" "Sir," replied the young man, "that's how I make my living." "Young man!" "I'm employed in the sheriff's office."

"I have been requested," said the pastor, beaming over the pulpit, "to offer prayers for rain, but the superintendent informs me that the Sunday-school picnic is arranged for Thursday."

Minister—"And so you say your little prayer every night before you go to bed? That's right. And now tell me why do you do that?" Little Ethel—"Because mamma says she'll spank me if I don't."

"Mamma, do liars ever go to heaven?" "Why no; probably not." "Has papa ever told a lie?" "I suppose not; he may have." "And mamma, have you ever told one? Uncle Joseph has, and I have, and almost everybody." "I don't know but I have sometimes." "Well it must be lonesome up there with only God and George Washington."

A little girl heard that people were made of dust, and, after watching heaps and columns of it eddying about the street, exclaimed: "Oh, mamma, I just thought there was going to be another little girl."

Parson Toogood: "Don't you think that the great number of Sunday fatalities is a judgment on the American people for abandoning the Sabbath of the Puritans?" Deacon Hardhead: "Well, I don't know. The Puritans had a good many Sunday fatalities themselves whenever the Indians got up an excursion."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, G. W. Foote, "Huxley and Agnosticism."

BRADLAUGH CLUB AND INSTITUTE (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): 7, R. Forder, "Jesus: Man, Myth, or God?" Tuesday, at 8, social evening. Wednesday, at 8, public discussion on "Christian Evidences."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, select entertainment and dance—special collection for benefit of Branch. Friday, November 22, at 8, urgent meeting of members and friends.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, a lecture. Friday, at 8, free science classes.

EAST LONDON (The Hall, Beaumont-street, Mile End-road, E.): 8, debate between W. C. Lyons and J. Tarry, "Is Secularism of More Benefit to Mankind than Christianity?"

FENTON HALL (61 Pentonville-road): 7, Joachim Kaspary, "Brahminism or Indian Priestcraft."

SOUTH LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell New-road): 11.15, Sunday-school; 7, Miss Vallance, "Future Rewards and Punishments."

WEST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street): 11.15, Professor H. Sidgwick, "The Ethics of Religious Conformity."

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, Henry Spence, "The Evolution of the Horse."

WESTMINSTER BRANCH: 7.30, members' meeting at Mr. Stace's, 42 Vincent-street.

WOOD GREEN (Masonic Hall, adjoining the Nightingale Hotel, High-street): 7.30, Tousean Parris, "Christianity a Fraud."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 11.30, F. Haslam, "Come to Jesus."

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

BINGLEY (Co-operative Hall): Thursday, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "Is it Reasonable to Believe in God?"

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 5, tea and social.

BRADFORD LABOR CHURCH: 3 and 6.30, C. Cohen, "The French Revolution."

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school; 7, A. B. Moss, "The New Age of Reason."

DERBY (Athenæum Room): Monday, at 8, Charles Watts, "Secularism in Modern Thought." Usual Branch meeting on Sunday to make arrangements for Mr. Watts's lecture.

DUNDEE (Tally-street Hall): 2.30, discussion class; 6.30, J. Christison, "Drink and Socialism."

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion-class—J. Paul, "Mystic Euphemia: A Criticism"; 6.30, soirée.

HULL (Cobden Hall, Storey-street): 7, Mr. Hauke, "Christian Heroics."

KEIGHLEY (Co-operative Hall): Monday, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "Is it Reasonable to Believe in God?"

LEEDS (St. James's Hall): Wednesday, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "What is Secularism?"

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, Alfred Milnes, M.A., "Causes and Conditions of Foreign Trade."

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, L. Small, B.Sc., "Progress."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 11, Charles Watts, "Theological Puzzles"; 3, "Christian Evidences a Fallacy"; 7, "Secularism in Modern Thought."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, a lecture on "Secularism."

PLYMOUTH (Democratic Club, Whimple-street): 7, Mr. Chubb will lecture.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, select entertainment.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, business meeting; 7.45, J. Bowey, "Secularism Defined and Defended."

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, A. Easten, "Why I am a Secularist."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—November 24, Bradford. December 1, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 15, Blackburn.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Croxton-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Nov. 24, New Brompton. Dec. 22, Leicester.

TOUSSAINT PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—November 24, Wood Green. December 1, Foresters' Hall; 8, Balls Pond; 15, Wood Green; 29, Foresters' Hall.

Price 2d., by post 2½d.,

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE.

BY

DAVID HUME.

With an Historical and Critical Introduction by

G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Worts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 2d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 2d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 2d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 16 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being specionsly and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 8s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 8s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

CHARLES WATTS'S WORKS.

THE CLAIMS OF CHRISTIANITY EXAMINED FROM A RATIONALIST STANDPOINT. 64 pp., 6d., by post 7d.
THE TEACHINGS OF SECULARISM COMPARED WITH ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.
CHRISTIANITY: ITS ORIGIN, NATURE, AND INFLUENCE. 4d., by post 5d.
SECULARISM: DESTRUCTIVE AND CONSTRUCTIVE. 3d., by post 4d.
AGNOSTICISM AND CHRISTIAN THEISM: WHICH IS THE MORE REASONABLE? 3d., by post 4d.
A REPLY TO FATHER LAMBERTS "TACTICS OF INFIDELS." 6d., by post 7d.
THEOLOGICAL PRESUMPTION. An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. S. F. Burns, of Halifax, N.S. 2d., by post 2½d.
THE NATURAL AND THE SUPERNATURAL; OR BELIEF AND KNOWLEDGE. 3d., by post 4d.
EVOLUTION AND SPECIAL CREATION. 3d., by post 4d.
HAPPINESS IN HELL AND MISERY IN HEAVEN 3d., by post 4d.
SCIENCE AND THE BIBLE. 4d., by post 5d.
BIBLE MORALITY: Its Teachings Shown to be Contradictory and Defective as an Ethical Guide. 3d., by post 3½d.
SECULARISM: IS IT FOUNDED ON REASON, AND IS IT SUFFICIENT TO MEET THE WANTS OF MANKIND? Debate between the Editor of the Evening Mail (Halifax, N.S.) and Charles Watts. With Prefatory Letters by G. J. Holyoake and Colonel R. G. Ingersoll, and an Introduction by Helen H. Gardener. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.
SECULARISM: ITS RELATION TO THE SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF THE DAY. 2d., by post 2½d.
IS THERE A LIFE BEYOND THE GRAVE? Reply to Dr. R. B. Westbrook. 3d., by post 4d.
SAINTS AND SINNERS: WHICH? 3d., by post 4d.
EDUCATION: TRUE AND FALSE. 2d., by post 2½d.
THE SUPERSTITION OF THE CHRISTIAN SUNDAY. A Plea for Liberty and Justice. 3d., by post 4d.
THE EXISTENCE OF GOD; OR, QUESTIONS FOR THEISTS. 2d., by post 2½d.
CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILISATION. 3d., by post 4d.
THE BIBLE UP TO DATE. 2d., by post 2½d.
WHY DO RIGHT? A Secularist's Answer. 3d., by post 4d.
WAS CHRIST A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL REFORMER? 4d., by post 5d.
MISCELLANEOUS PAMPHLETS. Cloth 2s., by post 2s. 3d

London: Watts & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet St., E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.
DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.
THE GODS. 6d.
REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.
ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.
CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 2d.
ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.
ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.
PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.
HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.
ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.
TRUE RELIGION. 2d.
THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.
LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.
IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.
LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.
GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.
FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
THE DYING CREED. 2d.
THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford 2d.
THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.
ART AND MORALITY. 2d.
DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.
THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.
SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. Agnostic's View. 2d.
SKULLS. 2d.
THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.
LIVE TOPICS. 1d.
MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.
REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.
REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.
CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.
CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S LECTURE,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Essays in Rationalism. By Charles Robert Newman (Atheist Brother of the late Cardinal Newman). With a Preface by George Jacob Holyoake, and a Biographical Sketch by J. M. Wheeler. 1s. 6d.

Darwin Made Easy. By Dr. Edward B. Aveling, Fellow of the London University. This is the best popular exposition of Darwinism extant. Cloth, 1s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

GOTT'S

10/6 TROUSERS TO MEASURE 10/6

ARE THE BEST VALUE IN THE MARKET.

In Brown, Fawn, and Grey Checks, Stripes, and Mixtures.

FILL UP THIS

Self-measurement Form

AND

STATE COLOR PREFERRED,

And we will give you

A BARGAIN.

TROUSERS.

INCHES

A, Round Waist over Trousers.....
B, Round Seat.....
E to D, Inside Leg Seam .....
F to G, Full Length of Trousers.....
H, Round Thigh .....
I, Round Knee.....
J, Round Bottom .....
Please say Lined or Unlined.....
Side or Cross Pockets .....

The Unemployed Problem

FOR THE PRESENT

HAS BEEN SOLVED.

We have given work to all who have applied for it, and still require large numbers more as agents.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchisedek
S'welp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; God-Making, by G. L. Mackenzie; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

APARTMENTS.—Kitchen and two or three Rooms to Let. Gas, bath, etc.—S., 19 Beecholme-road, Upper Clapton, N.E.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

A Life-size Bust Portrait in Oils. In Handsome Gilt Frame. Suitable for Lecture Room or Hall. Carriage paid £2 2s. 94 Queen's-road West, Walthamstow.

50 VISITING CARDS FOR NOTHING.—To purchasers of our beautifully-tinted Note-paper and Envelopes. Your name and address artistically printed. Chaste tints and splendid paper. Send eighteen stamps, with name and address, to the Abbey Press, Nuneaton. Post free. No better bargain possible.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 48. SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

ANOTHER CONVERTED ATHEIST.

We have received a copy of a sermon by the Rev. J. C. Fellowes, vicar of St. James's Church, Stockton-on-Tees. It was preached to the officers and members of the local Order of Druids—a branch of a great Friendly Society which is well known in all parts of the nation. Its intrinsic merits are very slight, and we only criticise it for an extrinsic reason, which will appear as we proceed.

Mr. Fellowes went in for what is called improving the opportunity. Of course he praised the thrift which provides for a rainy day; but (although he did not use these precise words) he thought still more of the thrift which provides for the day when it will rain brimstone and fire. It is well to attend to the affairs of this life, but how about "the affairs of the life that is to follow this life—the life eternal?" Alas! they are sadly neglected. People are so careless and short-sighted. They put off joining the Church of Christ till it is perhaps too late. "Join now," says Mr. Fellowes. Be some sort of a Christian, whether Wesleyan, Baptist, Catholic, or Churchman. Any church, like any friendly society, is better than none. "There is a home prepared for you in heaven"—God Almighty's almshouse, where you may live as an eternal pensioner. In that beautiful place "there will be no more partings, no more sorrow, no sickness, no pain, but peace, happiness, and content." Very attractive, to be sure; but so is the promise of a fortune held out to a pauper. Fine promises are cheap enough. The question is, will they be fulfilled? Yes, says Mr. Fellowes, if you die in a secular friendly society, you will have a nice funeral, but if you die in our religious friendly society, you will go straight to glory. This is a promise which the priests of all religions make to those who trust them and pay up; but you must die before you can test their accuracy, and (O the lucky dogs!) dead men tell no tales; so that a priest's promise has never to be redeemed.

Mr. Fellowes' religion is of the personally prudential order. It resembles that of the late Rev. Mr. Binney, who explained "How to Make the Best of Both Worlds." There appears to be something very fascinating in it to the ordinary British Philistine. It is scarcely, however, a religion for a gentleman. It is so individual, so egotistic. It reduces this life, and the next so far as it is involved in this life, to a nice calculation of personal advantage. If the Devil could offer better terms, there would be every reason for enlisting in his service. God happens to offer the best dividend, so it is more profitable to invest with him. Such is the philosophy of religionists who, without the least sense of humor, affect to dwell on high ethical and spiritual levels, far above the "grovelling materialist."

How curious it is that so many Christians turn their backs on the teaching of Christ. He never taught people how to make the best of both worlds. To him this life was nothing; the next life everything. Taking thought for the morrow was foolish, if not impious; wisdom, and true piety, consisted in taking thought for the hereafter. Friendly societies exist in direct opposition to the teaching of Christ—so strong and pressing are the interests of this life even in religious circles; yet, by a singular inconsistency, which it is difficult to discriminate from hypocrisy, these friendly societies get a minister of the Gospel of Christ to preach them a reassuring sermon, and he does so with the most perfect serenity, without a scintillation of misgiving.

It is hardly surprising that such preachers—to such congregations—should stoop to every artifice of priestcraft. To induce you to patronise their business the priests offer you a seat in heaven, with the certainty of a seat in hell if you deal with the opposite house; and to silence criticism, and disarm suspicion, they have stories of converted Atheists—men who never deal with the firm to the extent of sixpence, but who wished on their death-beds that they had made all their purchases at that establishment. Every man of God appears to have one of these frightful warnings, and Mr. Fellowes is no exception to the rule. We give his account of the curiosity in his own words:—

> "Again, I have sometimes been asked to go and see a sick man. I have found his wife in great distress. The doctor has ordered him to have some strengthening food; the wife has not the money to get it. I ask, 'Is he in any club?' 'No,' I am told; 'no; I wish he was.' Yes, but wishing will not make him a member. A man has to think about it before he is ill. Once again, Go to your Order, ye Druids; consider its ways and be wise. Let me draw another picture. It was in a house in this parish some years ago; I heard the man was very ill—dying, in fact. I saw his wife first, and she told me she was not sure if her husband would wish to see me, he was an Atheist. I asked her to go and tell him I was there, and if he was willing I would go up and see him. After a little talk with him, I said: 'You are an Atheist, I hear; are you quite sure you are right?' 'I was one,' he told me, 'when I was well, but since I have been lying here, doing nothing but think about it, I am not sure. O God! I wish I had been a Christian.' But, thank God, His ways are not as man's ways; He never refuses to receive any man who goes to him late or early. During the weeks that man lingered on he had the opportunity, and made use of it, to turn to the Savior; and that man died a Christian."

We have seen so many of these converted Atheist stories, and found so many of them to be frauds, that we decline to believe a single one without proof. It is idle to tell us, as we were told in the case of the Atheist Shoemaker, that a Christian minister is entitled to be believed upon his word. This is to put a man in the witness-box and withdraw him from cross-examination. We have yet to learn that Christian ministers are above the common frailties of human nature; and when it comes to lying, we say that they are under peculiar temptations. In the first place, veracity is not a special virtue in the New Testament; in the second place, falsehood for edification has always been regarded leniently (to say the least) in the Christian Church; and in the third place, as a mere matter of fact, the Christian Church has palmed off so many lies upon the world—lies which have been thoroughly exposed by modern criticism—that there is a presumption against, rather than in favour of, its truthfulness, whenever it states anything which is obviously to its advantage.

From this point of view, which we are amply justified in adopting, we beg to ask Mr. Fellowes a few questions. How long is "some years ago"? Will he give us the precise date? What was the name of the dying Atheist he visited? What street did he live in, and what was the number? Is the dead man's widow still living, and does Mr. Fellowes know of her whereabouts? Does the reverend gentleman keep a diary, and is the incident entered there? Did he make any sort of memorandum at the time? If so, has he preserved it, and will he produce it? Has he ever mentioned it before? If so, when and where? And if not, why not?

Digitized by Google

We decline to consider the meaning of a fact before it is established as a fact; otherwise we might be caught in a trap, like the one that Charles II. is said to have laid for the Royal Society. Mr. Fellowes must satisfy sensible people that his story is a true one. We invite him to do so; and, if he does, we will give the utmost publicity to the case. Will he refuse such a tempting offer?

G. W. FOOTE.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH'S OPINIONS.

SHAKESPEARE'S time was one of intellectual fermentation. Grave Burleigh complained that Queen Elizabeth's household was "a coverture for no small number of Epicures and Atheists, because the court is not comprehended within a parish, but seemeth to be a lawless place." Few in his day went further than Raleigh in questioning explanations of the soul and definitions of God. He "misliked" the clerical explanation "as obscure and intricate." He said what the soul of man is had never been resolved, and "neither could I learn hitherto what God is." Yet it must not be supposed he put himself out of communion with the Church of England, which, as a statesman, he may have regarded as a bulwark against the usurpations of Rome. The noticeable thing is that he never adverts to Christian dogmas or doctrines, and this though his writings are pervaded by a sense of the mystery of things, and of the impotence of man in presence of a power greater than his own. "God," he says, in the preface to the History of the World, written after he had been several years in prison, "who is the author of all our tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed unto us, the parts we are to play." "Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world than to resolve that the change of fortune on the great theatre is but as the change of garments on the less. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin; the players are all alike." Raleigh did not directly dispute the accepted doctrines of his time, but he evidently kept an open mind. In his History of the World he follows the Bible stories, but places them beside the legends and traditions of what was called profane history.

A story is told of the destruction of the second part of Raleigh's History. It is said that one day he looked out of the window of his upper storey in the Bloody Tower, attracted by the noise of a brawl in the court below. He witnessed the quarrel from near the beginning to the end. He saw it from a very favorable view, undisturbed by sympathy either way, and fancied he understood it. But when he came to talk over the matter with others he found that he had entirely misunderstood the nature of the whole affair. This made him ponder: If he could not understand what passed under his own eyes, how could he relate the truth of what took place hundreds or thousands of years ago, or, perhaps, never even took place at all? And in a fit of distrust Sir Walter threw the part of his history still in manuscript into the fire.

Our chivalric knight's misgivings were not without reason. A critical reader is obliged to say that, if the major portion of his first part had shared the same fate, the loss to the real history of the past would not have been great. "Bring me something that is true," Sir Robert Walpole is reported to have said to his librarian; "don't bring me history, for that I know is a lie." But the History of the World is, nevertheless, of great interest and value, simply because it gives the thoughts and opinions of Sir Walter himself. Many are the glances at his own time, and, perhaps, King James saw himself depicted in Ninias, "the foolish, effeminate son of a tyrannous, hated mother."

It has been contended that when Raleigh wrote his less known work, The Sceptic, which is professedly an apology for "neither affirming nor denying, but doubting," he may have had a never-carried-out idea of answering his own treatise by a defence of faith. But the evidence of the Rev. Ralph Ironside, already given, shows that scepticism was the natural bent of Raleigh's mind. "The Sceptick," says he, "doth neither affirm, neither deny any position; but doubteth of it, and opposeth his Reasons against that which is affirmed, or denied, to justify his not consenting." He argues that this is the reasonable conclusion "from the consideration of the great difference between living creatures." What is profitable to one is injurious to another; what to one seems sweet and agreeable may to another be the reverse. "For why should I presume to prefer my conceit and imagination, in affirming that a thing is thus or thus in its own Nature, because it seemeth to me to be so, before the conceit of other living creatures, who may as well think it to be otherwise in its own Nature, because it appeareth otherwise to them than it doth to me?" He mentions animal sagacity, and "the dog of Ulysses, who knew his master, having been from home so many years that, at his return, all the people of his house had forgot him." The dog, he points out, "delivereth one kind of voice when he hunteth, another when he howleth, another when he is beaten, and another when he is angry." The Sceptic, in short, is an early argument for the relativity of human knowledge.

His Treatise of the Soul shows the same disposition of mind. It sets out by saying: "There are two kinds of souls—one void of reason, another endued with reason; and of those without reason there are two sorts—one which feedeth and nourisheth the body, the other which giveth sense and feeling." Men thus have three souls, the trees and herbs one, and other animals two. He cites many opinions concerning the soul, only to show their variety and uncertainty. "Some men (which is a shame to utter) have called the souls of women into question; but by what show of argument? Because God framed the woman's rib, and is not said to breathe a soul into her; as though that were not to be understood of the woman which was spoken of the man. Cyril affirms 'That the souls of women are very womanish; hard and slow to understand hard things.' But, by his leave, some women, even in this, have been able to match the greatest men." Man, Raleigh holds, begets souls as well as bodies: "How can it be but God shall be a help to such as commit adultery, if he do give the souls if they beget the bodies?" All this shows a mind given to contemplation, and not readily accepting authority.

Raleigh's mind was never brighter nor happier than when in clear prospect of death. He wrote on the snuff of his candle the couplet:

> Cowards may fear to die, but courage stout,
> Rather than live in snuff, will be put out.

To some who deplored his misfortunes he observed that "the world itself is but a larger prison, out of which some are daily selected for execution." To his faithful wife, when she informed him she would be allowed to have his body, he replied: "'Tis fitting, Bess, that thou shouldst have that dead which was not much at thy disposition when living." Before he left the Gate-house a cup of sack was offered him, and he was asked if it was to his liking. "I will answer you," said Sir Walter, "as did the fellow who drank of St. Giles's bowl as he went to Tyburn: 'It is good drink, if a man might but tarry by it.'" He asked to see the axe, saying, "Dost thou think I am afraid of it?" Feeling its edge, he smilingly said to the sheriff: "This is a sharp medicine, but it is a physician for all diseases;" and, as he laid his head on the block, he said: "So the heart be right it is no matter which way the head lieth."

Thus, after keeping him fourteen years in the Tower, and then liberating him to go to Guiana and gather wealth for the Crown, did, upon his return, that "most dread sovereign" and most dreadful pusillanimous pedant "whom God Almighty, the Father of all mercies, bestowed upon us, the people of England,"* devote to death the greatest of living Englishmen.† His objects were but to gratify his own spite and the enmity of Spain. Between the hours of the resolve and the execution King James spent his time in writing Meditations on the Lord's Prayer.‡ "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them which trespass against us" were words upon his lips that had never sunk into his callous heart.

Lady Raleigh buried the body in the chancel of St.

* Dedication of the Holy Bible.

† Shakespeare, of whom Raleigh was an evident admirer, had died two years previously.

‡ E. Edwards, Life of Sir W. Raleigh.

Digitized by Google

Margaret's, Westminster. The head she had embalmed, a precious souvenir of the perfidy of a King. She lived on till 1647, thus witnessing the ruin of the dynasty which had destroyed her happiness. Raleigh remained on in the hearts of the people. He desired no other monument; and he needs no better epitaph than his own magnificent apostrophe to Death, saturated with thought and feeling as the sea with brine, sonorous as the incessant rush of rolling billows on the resounding shore.

> "O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none have dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hast flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet."

J. M. WHEELER.

THE FALLACY OF ALLEGED CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES.

(Concluded from p. 739.)

PROFESSOR STEWART assumes that "the preparation for Christ in Israel," and his appearance at the time he was expected, afford valuable evidence of the truth of Christianity. This, however, is nothing more than bare assumption, for, if we admit the expectation, the question then arises, Did Jesus, in his character and mission, realise what was expected from him? It is evident that he did not. The Jews were, prior to the advent of Jesus, looking for a king, or temporal ruler, which Christ never was. They had been for a century under the Roman yoke, and their national spirit was nearly crushed out. Hence they were expecting and longing for the appearance of some one to deliver them from their state of political and social submission. Even after his supposed resurrection some of Christ's followers asked him: "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6). They appeared to have no idea that the kingdom he promised was a spiritual, not a temporal, one. Here the expectation and realisation differed, for, while a secular sovereign was anticipated, Jesus frankly stated: "My kingdom is not of this world. I am not of this world."

But, even if it were granted that the Messiah of the Jews did come in the person of Christ, he failed to accomplish his expected mission, which was supposed to be the breaking up of the Roman power and the establishment of a new faith upon the ruins of Paganism. Christ achieved neither of these results. As Clarke says in his Ten Great Religions, the decline of Rome was caused by Cæsarian despotism and the increase of philosophy. "So ended the Roman religion, in superstition among the ignorant, in unbelief among the wise." James Cotter Morison, in his Service of Man, writes thus: "It may with reason be doubted if the fact is as often remembered as it should be, that Christianity arose amid the corruption and decay of the greatest civilisation which the human race had seen amid the death-throes of the ancient world.....It is often assumed that this proud heathenism and Pagan glory were overthrown by the meek and unlearned disciples of the Galilean prophet of God. Nothing can be less true than this assumption.....The fall of the Empire, including the loss and ruin of the old philosophy and knowledge, was an indispensable condition of the spread of Christianity.....The birth of Christianity being on this wise—viz., having taken place in an era of decay and death of art and philosophy, of knowledge, of wealth, of population, of progress in every form; and the absence of these things having been one of the chief negative conditions of its growth and prosperity, we must look for the sources of its nourishment in another direction than these; not in knowledge or the eager questioning spirit which leads to knowledge, but in the humble spirit which believes and accepts on trust the word of authority; not in regulated industry, which aims at constant increase and accumulation of wealth, but in the resigned poverty which, scorning this world, lays up riches in heaven; not in political freedom and popular government, which aims at the progressive well-being of all, but in the stern rigor of arbitrary power, which coerces the vicious and refractory into a little order during their brief sojourn on earth. In the decline and fall of Rome, or, as it would be better to say, in the final ruin of ancient civilisation, the conditions favorable to this order of beliefs or doctrines spontaneously emerged" (pp. 174–5, 178–9).

The fact that the profession of Christianity "is co-extensive with the civilisation of the world" is no evidence that Christian pretensions are based upon fact. Freethought is co-extensive with progress, but orthodox believers will not admit that the former is the cause of the latter. The description of the world before Christianity dawned should be accompanied with a fair account of it when it was under the supreme control of the Christian rule—before science, liberty, and general knowledge changed the entire condition of society. It is said that the evidences converge towards one centre, which is the character of Christianity and its influence upon mankind. To fully understand this claim we should remember that the points upon which this convergence bears are: the abolition of war; the brotherhood of man, regardless of creed; the equality of the sexes; the abolition of slavery; the fostering of mental freedom; the establishment of justice; and the growth and spread of education. Now, after diligent search, we find no references in the New Testament to any proposals whereby, either separately or combined, the above reforms could be effectually obtained. We think it most improbable that Jesus would have been silent upon these questions if they formed a part of his program. It seems absurd to attribute the desire to secure liberty to one who never protested against slavery; or to credit the abolition of persecution and of the other evils of life to him who actually gave injunctions to bear with the one, and not to resist the other.

As an example of an advanced nation, in which Christianity appeared in its earliest times, let us take England. Has the Christian faith in this favored land shown itself to be the power that rids the world of its manifest and detestable blemishes? What has progressed more rapidly in this "Christian" country, under the very shadow of the cross, than Mammon worship, commercial unscrupulousness, extravagant love of military glory, and slaughter? Instead of abolishing war, instruments of destruction are being constantly improved, so that they may accomplish their deadly and savage object the more readily. Where is the brotherhood of those Christians who refuse to worship in the same church, or to be buried on the same side of the cemetery with other Christians? Persecution has not been practised by Christians upon heretics only, but it has been prominent in the fold of the faithful. In twenty years preceding 1688 it is estimated that 60,000 Dissenters suffered, of whom 5,000 died in prison. The power of Christians to issue writs for the burning of those who differed from them was blocked by law only as late as 1677, while the legal prohibition of the burning of witches is dated 1736. True education of the masses was unknown before the year 1870, and individual opinion upon matters of theology was not permitted when the Church was in full power. It is only within the last few decades that the position of woman has received any proper consideration, and even to-day brutality to wives and cruelty to children are frequently the subjects of inquiry in our police-courts. The lack of purity of married life is revealed in our divorce courts, even among the clergy and their aristocratic supporters. In the face of these painful facts, what evidence of the beneficial influence of Christianity does its history afford?

It is idle for Christians to be continually boasting that Christianity has saved the world. It has done nothing of the kind. In its earliest ages it left the evils that then cursed society untouched; despotism, slavery, ignorance, and mental subjection flourished for centuries under its very wings. If Christ has come, the question still to be answered is, Whence comes salvation? Nothing is more melancholy to-day than the fact that devout defenders of the historical faith are crying, in the words of Tennyson, "Ring in the Christ that is to be."

CHARLES WATTS.

If revelation is lost to us, manifestation remains, and great manifestations appear to be opening on our view. Agnosticism is right if it is a counsel of honesty, but ought not to be heard if it is a counsel of despair.—Goldwin Smith, in "North American Review," August, 1895.

Digitized by Google

A PARSON'S DIARY.

GLIMPSES of our ancestors are invariably interesting, and when peeps into the past, by other means than the ordinary official records, afford close and detailed presentments of certain phases of our social history, they are rightly regarded in the light of entertainment and instruction. One of the best channels through which knowledge, not otherwise so fully revealed, can be obtained of the customs and practices of former generations is that of private diaries. Diarists are now almost an extinct class; their vocation mainly existed from the time of the Reformation, when the middle classes more generally acquired the ability to read and write, up to the period of the advent of the newspaper press. The verbatim reports, the minute descriptions, and the concise registers of the modern journalist have supplanted the tedious notes, the erratic entries, and the egotistic writings of compilers of private journals. There is now no opportunity for a Pepys or an Evelyn. Our descendants will not have to depend for their acquaintance with local history on the diaries of industrious country gentlemen, humble village tradesmen, or unlearned schoolmasters. The files of their favorite newspaper, or the volumes of parochial historians, will supply them with all the information they require of the habits, wisdom, and folly of their forefathers. We to-day, however, are compelled to rely on diaries compiled during the last three or four hundred years, if we are desirous of acquiring knowledge of former conditions of particular localities. A country clergyman's diary, extending from 1655 to 1679, which has come under the writer's attention, is of unusual interest and value as rendering a capital picture of the daily life and experiences of a typical rural parson who lived both under the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell and the sovereignty of the second Charles. His diurnal notes form the first sixty pages of the first volume of the Sussex Archæological Society's Collections.

The Rev. Giles Moore, rector of Horstead Keynes, Sussex, left behind him a diary remarkable for its methodical manner of entry and its characteristics of frankness and conciseness. Herein are frequently made manifest the puritanical practices of the times, which, compared with more recent records, enable us to determine the great decrease of religious observance. From his interesting notes we learn that Mr. Moore had, on an average, 180 persons to three communions at his church. In the last three years preceding 1848 the average number of communicants at eight sacraments at the same place had been 148, which is a good deal less than the number which attended those communions in Mr. Moore's time. During the reign of Cromwell religious rites and ceremonies were, of course, most strictly observed by the people, not from any real conviction of their value certainly, or on account of the religious sincerity of the observers, as the succeeding events of the Restoration clearly showed. Signs were not wanting during the time of the Commonwealth, and even in Mr. Moore's own household, of the supremacy of the great passion in those good days, for under date of November 8, 1659, the diarist writes:—

> "Thomas Dumbrell came to mee as servant to dwell with mee, with whom I agreed to give after the rate of £5 a yeare. On December 22 I payed him up to that time £1 8s.; that same night I found him sleeping with my mayd Mary, and I packed them off. January 2—I marryed Thomas Dumbrell and Mary, his wyfe, gratis, and I gave him on his wedding eight stone of beefe, 16s. 8d.; a hind quarter of mutton, 3s. 4d.; and a lambe, 7s. 6d.; besides butter, wheate, and fewell."

Thomas Dumbrell's and "my mayd Mary's" moral delinquencies did not receive such severe castigation as they would unquestionably have done in later days by rev. gentlemen. The public mind is pretty well acquainted with cases in which clergymen have refused to marry couples who have not loved wisely, but too well. To such as these the tender toleration of the Rev. Giles Moore for the weakness of the flesh may be recommended. Our forgiving country cleric had more than one experience of the troublous adventures of his domestics, as witness the following item of his diary:—

> "13th October.—I marryed Henry Place and Mary Holden [another erring Mary!], my two servants, and spent at theyr wedding 20s. I gave the fiddlers 1s. I also gave them a large cake, all theyr fewell, and the use of my house and stables for two dayes, with a quart of white wine; being in all not less than 40s., or one yeare's wages. On the 6th of February following shee was delivered of a daughter, so that the—[here the rev. diarist uses a very strong expression]—went but fifteen weeks and five days after her marriage."

If the entire house and stables were given over to the wedding party for two days, we should not be surprised if the rector had cause to deplore in forcible language a number of other hastily-arranged marriages and the premature arrival of several little cherubs. Mr. Moore included in his diary references to other matters on which his near relations would doubtless have had him more reticent. What were the personal peccadilloes of the Sussex rector are almost wholly left to our imagination, as not unnaturally his note-book was more concerned with the sins of other people than his own faults, and studded more with the records of his own good deeds than the virtues of other people. But we will charitably suppose that this really represented the moral superiority of the shepherd to his flock. It was a little ungracious of Mr. Moore, however, to hand down to succeeding generations a reference to one of his wife's little indulgences as instanced in such an entry as this: "Tobacco for my wyfe, 3d." Perhaps this will shock the virtuous spouses of clergymen to-day who have not yet advanced so far as the scented cigarettes of the new woman.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, according to the point of view, wine was very cheap in the days of Mr. Moore. Claret and dry sherry were chiefly drunk, the former being 1s. per bottle, and the latter but a trifle more. The rector was evidently not a teetotaler. "1st April, 1662.—I had 5 bottles of claret, and as many of sack from London, for which I payed, and for the bringing them down at 2d. the bottle, in all 12s. For a pint of old sack, 6d.; two quarts of muscadine, 3s.; two ounces of tobacco, 1s. For a sugar loafe weighing 4 pounds, 1s." It must not be supposed that Mr. Moore was unduly intemperate; indeed, when, presumably from want of care or thought, he had imbibed a trifle more than was his wont, his pious sorrow is touching to read of. In an entry in February, 1668, he says:—

> "This evening, between nine and ten o'clock, when I had began prayers with my family, I was so overpowered with the effects of some perry which I had taken, not knowing how strong that liquor was, that I was obliged to break off abruptly. O God, lay not this sin to my charge!"

It is a nice word, "overpowered." Ruthless critics would perhaps say that the rev. gentleman was drunk or slightly inebriated. He was not so; only "overpowered." And parson Moore also exercised prudence in the notification of his frivolity, in that the entry was made in Latin! Another paragraph of this diary, in which amusement and instruction are so deftly combined, instances the beneficent qualities of its writer: "I gave Mr. Salisbury, a begging minister, 4d." The individual here indicated was presumably one of those unfortunate clergymen of the Church of England who, admitted to benefices during the Commonwealth, could not stretch their consciences like others to conform to the new doctrines introduced after the Restoration, and so went out one "black Monday" to the number of two thousand.

One entry which, if unexplained, would doubtless perplex modern readers is this: "26th December.—I gave the howling boys 6d." These were not the waits with which we are made familiar at Christmas time. On New Year's Eve, says an explanator, it was, and it still continues to be, the custom to wassail the orchards. At Horstead Keynes and elsewhere the ceremony retains the name of "Apple Howling." A troop of boys visit the different orchards, and, encircling the apple trees, they repeat the following words:—

> Stand fast root, bear well top,
> Pray the God send us a good howling crop;
> Every twig, apples big;
> Every bough, apples enou';
> Hats full, caps full,
> Full quarters, sacks full.

They then shout in chorus, one of the boys accompanying them upon the cow's horn. During this ceremony they rap the trees with their sticks. This custom is alluded to in Herrick's Hesperides, page 311:—

> Wassail the trees that they may beare
> You many a plum and many a peare;
> For more or less fruits they will bring,
> As you do give them wassailing.

Digitized by Google

The practice is not confined to Sussex, but it prevails in Devon and in Herefordshire. Investigators more experienced than the writer may trace the custom back to its origin. The reference to it in the Rev. Giles Moore's diary, together with other curious entries, may perhaps be held to justify the extraction of a few of its choicest morceaux.

FRED WILSON.

THE REVISED APOCRYPHA.

IT is over twenty-five years since Convocation decided on a revised version of the Bible. The revision was to be within the narrowest limits, the first rule laid down being "To introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the Authorised Version, consistently with faithfulness." Nevertheless, the alterations were so important that, although the Revised New Testament was published in 1881, and the Old Testament in 1885, little or no attempt has been made to substitute the new version for the old. The books called Apocrypha formed an integral portion of the Authorised Version of the Bible of 1611, and no edition of it was published without them till 1629. Accordingly, the revision of the Authorised Version of the Apocrypha was included in the scheme. The translators have been a long while about their task; but perhaps that doesn't matter, as comparatively few people care a jot about the Apocryphal books, although the sixth article of the Church of England says the Church doth read them for example of life and instruction of manners. The Council of Trent declared them (with the exception of the books of Esdras) as integral and inspired portion of God's Holy Scriptures; and, for my part, I am fully prepared to believe they are just as much the Word of God as any other part of the Bible, and I am sure they are to the full as interesting reading.

The books of Tobit, Judith, the end of Esther, and the additions to Daniel, all throw light on Bible folk-lore; while the two books of the Maccabees, if not trustworthy historical documents, at any rate exhibit the Jewish version of what was, on the whole, the noblest period of Jewish national life. But it is the books of Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon which most clearly show that Christianity was only a development of germs already in the Jewish soil. The wisdom of Jesus, the son of Sirach, is, indeed, of a more practical order than that of Jesus, the son of nobody knows who. The Wisdom of Solomon is of a more elevated cast than that of the mass of the New Testament. It will be, for instance, hard to beat the following passage from the description of Wisdom in the seventh chapter:—

> For there is in her a spirit quick of understanding, holy,
> Alone in kind, manifold,
> Subtil, freely moving,
> Clear in utterance, unpolluted,
> Distinct, unharmed,
> Loving what is good, keen, unhindered,
> Beneficent, loving toward man:
> Steadfast, sure, free from care,
> All-powerful, all-surveying,
> And penetrating through all spirits
> That are quick of understanding, pure, most subtil:
> For wisdom is more mobile than any motion;
> Yea, she pervadeth and penetrateth all things by reason of her pureness.

If this is not as much inspired as the barbarous cracked-brained nonsense which John the Divine poured forth on Patmos, I wonder wherein inspiration differs from insanity.

The books of Esdras, which were expressly exempted by the Council of Trent in its claim of divinity for the Apocrypha, are specially important for the light they throw both on the Old and New Testaments. The second book (chap. xiv. 21) expressly says that the law of God was burnt, and that Ezra re-wrote it. In verses 42–44 of the Revised Version we read: "The Most High gave understanding unto the five men, and they wrote by course the things that were told them, in characters which they knew not. And they sat forty days: now they wrote in the day-time, and at night they ate bread. As for me, I spake in the day, and by night I held not my tongue. So in forty days were written fourscore and fourteen books." Here "the characters which they knew not" are an evident allusion to the tradition, recorded by Jerome, that Ezra was the inventor of the "square" Hebrew characters which superseded the alphabet in use previously; and the "ninety-four books" are the twenty-four books of the Canon, together with the seventy esoteric books which were to be delivered only to such as were wise among the people. What became of the seventy esoteric books God, the Kabbalists, and Mahatma Koot Hoomi alone know.

This second book of Esdras is now for the first time presented to the English reader in its complete form. It was found that the Oriental versions contained a long passage of seventy verses missing in the Latin text, and in 1865 Professor Gildemeister discovered that a leaf had been deliberately cut out of the MS. which had been taken as the authority for Western MSS. Since then Professor Bensley discovered the passage in a MS. in the Bibliotheque Communale of Amiens, which had once belonged to the neighboring Benedictine Abbey of Corbie. By letting this manuscript drift to a Republican Library, the Benedictines let out one of their many literary secrets. J. M. W.

HOW LINCOLN PRAYED.

AT the commencement exercises at Summitville the class address was delivered by Benjamin F. Phemister, one of Van Buren's teachers, who illustrated the spirit of his subject in the following story of Lincoln:—

"On the first day of January, 1864, while a blinding snowstorm swept with untold violence through the Northern and New England States—while thousands of our brave defenders were suffering upon the gory fields of the South, a man, tall, gaunt, and homely, was seen standing in Pennsylvania-avenue, in the City of Washington. A woman, with her head bared to the hurricane of heaven, with her feet naked to the frozen ground, with her gown tattered and torn, saw him. She, supposing him to be a minister of the Gospel, ran to him, and, falling at his feet, addressed him thus: 'Oh, sir! if you are a minister of the Gospel, if you serve the God who fed Elijah by ravens and Israel with manna, pray to Him to provide me a shelter from the storm and food for my poor starving children! I am a widow. My husband sleeps in the bloody bosom of Gettysburg. I'm sad and forlorn. Oh, pray to the Master till He hears my cry, that he may shelter and feed us, or pray we may die.'

"The tall, ugly man, with his heart overflowing with sympathy, and his eyes flooded with tears, extended both his hands to the dirty kneeling woman and said: 'Woman, get up; you are mistaken. I am not a minister of the Gospel. Jehovah never appears to hear my prayer. For four long years I have been praying for the restoration of our Federal Union and the cessation of this cruel, bloody war. Not until a petition was sent to the States in rebellion in the form of two of the most magnificent armies that ever shouldered a musket, under the guiding hands of Gens. Grant and Sherman, was there ever the remotest resemblance of an answer. My prayers have finally been answered through the instrumentalities of these two armies, under the matchless and daring skill of these two generals. Now, if I had any idea that a prayer would shelter, feed, and clothe you, I would bow down; but I think that the best prayer I can make in your behalf is a prayer to that groceryman on yonder corner.'

"Suiting the generous act to the kind and sympathetic words, that ugly-beautiful man took from his pocket a small order book and wrote: 'Washington, January 1, 1864.—Mr. Groceryman, Sir,—You will please supply the bearer with $25 worth of provisions as she may direct, and charge the same to—Yours truly, ABRAHAM LINCOLN.'"

—Freethought Ideal.

Bridget O'Hoolihan, an elderly Irish cook, had taken a situation in a wealthy family living in a quiet suburb, but at the end of two weeks gave "notice." "Why do you leave us, Bridget?" asked the mistress; "we pay you the very highest wages." "Ye do, ma'am, an' yer a perfect leddy. Oi'm not laven troo ony fault av the family, but this is such a dead old place, wid no chance to do onything loively in it, that, begorry, oi have to mek up a pack o' lies iv'ry toime oi go to confession, or oi'd have nothing to confesh at all at all!"

Digitized by Google

LET HEBREWS REMEMBER THE DAYS OF OLD.

Tune—"Let Erin remember the days of old."

LET Hebrews remember the days of old,
Ere their faithless God betrayed them;
When prophets all future events foretold,
And the heav'ns and earth obeyed them.
The glorious days when the earth was flat,
And the sun went wheeling round it,
With special reversible gear so pat—
But the days are gone. Confound it!

The days when the Red Sea was folded back,
At wish, without a parley,
And over its bed was revealed a track
Like a path through waving barley;
When Moses, 'twixt motionless, spellbound "falls,"
Walked across with his companions;
'Twixt vertical sections of sea, like walls
Of the Colorado cañons.

Let Israel remember the good old day
When the foemen fell "a cropper,"
Through Joshua forcing the moon to stay
With his "Ease 'er, back 'er, stop 'er!"
The day when the sun had to stop his flight,
Ere he reached the spot's horison,
And helped to continue the finest fight
That a brigand ere set eyes on.

The days when the walls of a lengnered town,
That had stood 'gainst rams and missiles,
Would, all in a moment, come tumbling down
At the sound of horns and whistles.
The days when a word could dispel disease
That had baffled all the "sawbones";
And one could an army destroy with ease,
With the help of God—and jawbones.

The days when a dream about ghosts was proof
That the dreamer's girl's bambino
Was got by a ghost for the world's behoof;
But they knew not then what we know.
The days when this ghostling gave splendid wine
To a set of guzzling drinkers;
Religious mania to a herd of swine;
And a threat of hell to thinkers.

The days when, for harness, Effect and Cause
Were by far too wild and mettled;
And long ere the notions called Nature's Laws
Had become sedate and settled.
Now Cause and Effect have agreed to go
In a steady manner, tandem;
And "Laws" have now settled in business, so
We begin to understand 'em.

But oh! for the days that have passed away,
When a loaf increased by eating;
Alas and alack! for the days that stay,
For the saints still live by cheating.
Let all of us think of the godly past,
With its crime-begetting errors;
The blight that its horrible virtues cast,
And its ignorance and terrors.

And let us unfeignedly seek for truth
In the fields of sense and reason;
A quest that makes manhood to bloom like youth,
And protects from mental treason.
Though facts may extinguish the hopes of youth,
And, at times, give rise to terror,
'Tis better to learn a vexatious truth
Than to nurse a pleasing error.

G. L. MACKENZIE.

SOUL THEORY.—"Savages," says the Abbé Raynal, "wherever they see motion which they cannot account for, there they suppose a soul. All men may be considered as savages in this respect until they are capable of instruction and of using their faculties in a more perfect manner than savages do."—Dr. Reid, "Essays on the Active Powers," iv. 3.

ACID DROPS.

THE Conservatives have had a Conference at Brighton. Of course it was resolved to defend to the death the glorious union between Church and State. One of the speakers—a Mr. Foster, of Carlisle—assured the meeting it was not a question whether there should be various creeds, but whether Atheism should "flourish rampant in this land." "Rampant" is perhaps a Tory synonym for "openly." We dare say it is Mr. Foster's wish to make the Church strong enough to slay Atheism with stronger than spiritual weapons. We know what to expect from these gentlemen when they have the opportunity.

The Bible Revisers have finished their work by giving the world a new translation of the "Apocrypha," which is referred to in a Nonconformist paper as "those strange books, once regarded as sacred by the Church of God." Once is distinctly good. Those "strange books" are still "regarded as sacred" by the Catholic Church, and it is not so long ago since they were frequently included within the covers of the Protestant Bible. As for their "strangeness," we fail to see in what they differ from some of the books in the Protestant canon of the Old Testament.

A Yankee book-agent has hit upon a brilliant idea. Finding the Bible hang fire down South, he had all the angels in the illustrations done black to look like niggers. He is now selling Bibles as fast as he can get them delivered. When that line gets slack, he might have Jesus also done in black, and work up a fresh trade in New Testaments.

Dr. Henson, of the First Baptist Church of Chicago, says: "If there be no wrath to come, then every pulpit ought to be demolished, for the Bible is nothing but a tissue of lies.....The Bible proclaims a hell, against which it is the business of the pulpit to warn men." Yes, and just because the Bible proclaims this monstrous fiction, it is entitled to the designation suggested by Dr. Henson.

Not a single one of the Christian papers to which a copy of Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer was sent has (so far as we are aware) even included the pamphlet in its list of "received." They dare not answer the pamphlet, and they cannot afford to let their readers know of its existence. Still, it is having an excellent sale, and we hope there will soon be a call for a second edition. Freethinkers should circulate it amongst their orthodox friends. It is a veritable eye-opener to those who have been deluded by the bold pretensions of modern Christianity.

Meanwhile the Churches, with the drinker's text-book in their hands, calling the same the Word of God, are pushing forward with their intemperate crusade against intemperance. The Nonconformists have practically decided, at a great representative assembly, to support the Church of England Temperance Bill. Sunday closing, of course, figures conspicuously in this projected legislation. That is a point on which all Churches are naturally agreed, as it touches their professional interests. Another part of the new program is "drastic legislation" for clubs. In other words, these silly reformers mean to throw all the clubs in the country on the side of the publican. Such is their statesmanship!

A sky-pilot called Bennetts has a Temperance article on the front page of last week's Methodist Times. It is full of cant and unction, and is often self-contradictory. Mr. Bennetts goes in for Prohibition as one of the means of inaugurating the reign of Christ; the Jewish gentleman, that is, who was so partial to liquor that he turned a tremendous quantity of water into wine to keep a marriage fuddle going. At the same time, Mr. Bennetts sees no "human probability" of the "eradication of the vice of drunkenness from amongst the human race." It will have to be done, if at all, by supernatural power. Very well then, why not go in for the supernatural remedy and let legislation alone?

For our part, we believe the vice of drunkenness can be eradicated by human means. Apart altogether from religion, drunkenness has been chased out of decent society. The heavy drinker was once a hero; he is now a nuisance. Sanitation, both physical and social, is doing its work, and giving us a healthier and cleaner population.

The Queen approves the exclusion of strong drink from Khama's country, and is "glad to see the chiefs have determined to keep so great a curse from the people." Curse! Ahem! Her Majesty is said to take a little of the "curse" herself. But these little utterances, of course, are only intended for the newspapers.

The Sunday News, of Charleston, S.C., shows that the ministers of the New England States in the seventeenth century kept, sold, and bequeathed slaves, and defended the practice from the Bible. They, however, made up for it by calling them freed men of Christ, and expressing the belief that they often had a better chance of heaven than their masters.

Digitized by Google

The Rev. E. R. Donehoo, pastor of the Eighth Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, who has been identified with Chinese mission work for years, has stated in an interview that he believes the efforts to convert the Chinese are futile.

Bishop Durnford prided himself on being laconic in writing. To a chaplain who asked for leave of absence for a trip to the Holy Land he wrote: "Go to Jericho, by all means."

A paper which calls itself "the only aggressive Christian Evidence journal in existence" has the following amusing item:—

THE GREENLAND WHALE.

The following are the average dimensions of this sea monster:

Total length of the animal	95 feet.
Height of ditto	18 feet.
Length of the head	22 feet.
Diameter of the throat closed	3 feet.
Length of the vertebral column	69½ feet.
Weight of the animal	480,000 lbs.
Quantity of oil extracted from one	4,000 gals.

And in the face of this evidence infidels assert the whale could not have swallowed Jonah.

Such aggressive Christian Evidence as this is perfectly irresistible.

At the Conference of Quakers Dr. T. Hodgkin pointed out that George Fox and the early members of the Society of Friends protested against the Bible being called the Word of God, and elevated the inner light above all outward or book revelation. As the Quakers got respectable they became more orthodox, but now that the old book is much discredited the younger section are ready to fall back on the earlier and more rational position.

Mr. Justice Wills, at the Winchester Assizes, sentenced a soldier to twenty years' penal servitude for an exceptionally brutal and cowardly outrage on a girl of eighteen. This soldier, the judge said, acted like a beast, and "others had passed by like the Pharisee of old and refused to help this courageous girl."

We ask our readers to recollect that this is a Christian country, that every regiment has its chaplain, that every soldier must belong to some denomination, and that Freethinking soldiers are compelled to attend "divine service." The soldier who outraged Lizzie Walker had heard plenty of preaching; so had the other soldiers who refused to help her when she was fighting desperately for her honor.

Christian England has so much fighting to do that she keeps up a large army, and upon the majority of her soldiers she enforces the rule of celibacy. What this means in the way of vice is well understood by every man gifted with common sense. The crime of Michael Cagney is only an outrageous illustration of a horrible truth, which is winked at by the Christian Churches.

The Bishop of Wakefield has been preaching at Holmfirth on religious education. Of course it was special pleading in the interest of the black army of sky-pilots. The nation would go to ruin unless children were brought up in the fear of the Lord, and then, if they supported the Church schools, they might save the rates and make the Government shell out more in their support. A self-respecting man, other than a sky-pilot, would be ashamed to put forward such an interested plea for his own class under pretence of moral and religious instruction.

The Financial Times tells a good story of a country sky-pilot who wrote to Barney Barnato in terms something like the following: "Respected Sir,—As the vicar of ——, my aim has always been investment, and not speculation. When your Bank came out I regarded the shares as an investment, and I purchased 400 at £4, sinking my little all in them—and a good deal more. They have now fallen to £2, and I am undone. My parish I cannot face as a bankrupt, and what am I to do? I throw myself on your mercy." Barney, so the story goes, was deeply moved by this touching appeal, and wrote back that in the painful circumstances of the case, he would buy back from the clergyman the 400 shares at £4—the price he had paid for them. Immediately on receipt of this generous reply, the guileless country parson at once wired to his brokers: "Buy 400 Barnato Banks at 2, and send round to Barnato Brothers, who will give you 4 for them." Here endeth the first lesson.

A respectable young woman in the service of a Chatham tradesman's family was found, on Thursday in last week, walking barefooted through the streets with an open Bible in her hand. The police took charge of her as a monomaniac. The open Bible has been declared the secret of England's greatness. It seems to have been the secret of this poor girl's insanity. What a noise there would have been had she walked about with an open copy of Ingersoll's lectures!

The anti-infidel crusader, who has brought an action against H. A. Long, has himself just been ordered by Sheriff Spens, of Glasgow, to repay £95 to Mr. Thomas Edward Mills, of 20 West Cumberland-street, Glasgow, which money he obtained from him to receive him into "full and equal partnership of the Anti-Infidel Crusade."

Macaulay, when bored by a sermon, used to withdraw his attention and read the Prayer Book. Other literature now seems occasionally to be within reach. Witness this from a correspondent of the Church Review: "Whilst staying in a provincial town recently I attended the parish church, and on entering discovered that I had omitted to provide myself with service books. Upon informing the courteous attendant of the circumstance, he promptly supplied the deficiency; but imagine my amazement, on opening the supposed Prayer Book at the Psalms, to find that it was an old cookery book, and the first thing that met my gaze was 'How to Jug Hare!'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

J. R. Willardyts writes from New Orleans to the Daily News on the lynching of negroes. He says: "Here in New Orleans, in broad daylight, have we not seen hundreds of assassins hunting and killing a few poor negro screwmen only because they wanted to earn an honest living? And this is a 'civilised city,' a 'Christian city'! What has civilisation or Christendom said of all those crimes? Not a word! The disfranchisement of the negro will not be worse for him than his assassination or roasting him alive." This writer declares: "A thrill of horror would pass through humanity if the history of the bloody massacres and butcheries that have taken place in the Southern States could be related." And he asks that a Commissioner should be sent from England to investigate. Apparently he has no trust in the Christians of America.

The Rev. W. Bolton, Vicar of St. Mary's, Penzance, is sending a circular to his parishioners asking that they shall sign a form declaring that their children shall be brought up in the faith of the Church and prepared for Confirmation, and further promising that they shall attend punctually and regularly at school and obey those in authority. This is not quite enough, for the parent further declares: "I will take care that my child says daily private prayers, and learns what is appointed from the Catechism and Holy Scriptures." We trust that all Cornish parents are not so servile as to wish their children brought up in the state of subordination desired by their spiritual pastors and masters.

Mr. Gladstone, though retired from public life, still fills the thoughts of the coming generation. On Sunday last the rector of a rural parish in Kent was examining a class of boys of ages averaging from five to twelve. "Who is the patron saint of England?' the rev. gentleman asked, his thoughts fondly dwelling on St. George as a symbol of "Unionism." With one accord the class broke out in loud response, "Mr. Gladstone."—Daily News.

As some compensation for the libel case which is detaining him from Queensland, Mr. H. A. Long's Glasgow admirers are getting up a testimonial for this distinguished Orange Calvinist. According to the Helensburg Times, Harry is not going out on spec, but to conduct an agitation against secular education, and in favour of having the Scriptures re-instated in the schools by Parliamentary enactment. We hope our Australian friends will give a good account of him.

The Church School party's deputation to Lord Salisbury was an amusing business. Not the least amusing part of it was the Premier's reference to the Nonconformists. He said that he quite understood why they were satisfied with Board School religion, because it was their religion that was taught there. Precisely so. His lordship hit the nail on the head. We have been saying the same thing all along. The Nonconformist game is twofold: first, to keep the Bible in the schools, and, second, to prevent its being interpreted in any way favorable to the Church of England. It must not be supposed, however, that we have any preference for the Church party. We detest them both alike. Instead of siding with either of them, we cry, "A plague o' both your houses." Each is trying to teach its own religion with other people's money. In this respect there is not a pin to choose between them.

We dare say the Voluntary schools, as they are facetiously called, will get a large sop from the Tory government, and when it has to be divided the Nonconformists will greedily take their share. Next, we shall see a Catholic University set up in Ireland; and then the landlords—poor devils!—will get their consideration. Really the head of the Tory government ought to be our old friend Barabbas.

Digitized by Google

We say that the Voluntary schools are called so facetiously. What is contributed voluntarily to their maintenance is insignificant in comparison with what is contributed by the State. Here are a few figures from the Daily News of November 21, relating to the so-called voluntary schools of Chatham:—

SCHOOL.	TOTAL INCOME.	SUBSCRIPTIONS.
Chatham Parish School ...	£911 ...	£90
Luton Schools ...	1,389 ...	122
St. John's Schools ...	1,324 ...	47
St. Paul's Schools ...	874 ...	16
Hards Town ...	204 ...	22
	£4,702	£297

The voluntary part of nearly five thousand pounds is a paltry £297, or about 6 per cent—that is, £6 in every hundred is contributed by the friends of these schools, and £94 from school fees and grants from the imperial exchequer. And on the strength of that miserable £6 the "voluntary" people not only clamor for still more money—in consequence of what the Archbishop of Canterbury calls the "intolerable strain" upon them—but strenuously insist on their right to dispense with any sort of public control. Of all the impudence in the world, there is none like the impudence of religion.

How many of the so-called "Voluntary schools" are really entitled to that designation? The annual report of St. John's National School, Birkenhead, for instance, shows that, while £1,850 5s. 5d. was received from the public purse, £7 7s. only was contributed in voluntary subscriptions. Lord Chatham said "taxation without representation is tyranny," yet the Church taxes the public pretty heavily to support schools over which the public have no control.

The last number of Mr. Stead's Spiritualistic quarterly, Borderland, said: "Eusapia Paladino has been the unexpected instrument of driving conviction as to the reality of psychical manifestations by the invisibles into the minds of many scientists, whose testimony can be neither pooh-poohed nor explained away." What will Mr. Stead say now that the tricks of Eusapia have been exposed, and the "scientists," like Professor Oliver Lodge, shown to be far more incompetent to deal with such "phenomena" than the conjurers like Mr. Maskelyne?

Richard Stanton, the married choirmaster at the "Christian Church," Ashington, has been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment with hard labor for offences under the Criminal Law Amendment Act with two Sunday-school girls whom he assaulted in the pulpit. Mr. Justice Grantham remarked that but for the conduct of the girls the punishment would have been much heavier.

Dr. Matthew Campbell, who committed suicide last week at Rugby, had been suffering from religious mania.

Alice Esther Carr seeks a dissolution of her marriage from the Rev. George Henry Carr, a Baptist minister, whom she accuses of adultery, and of throwing her baby across the bedroom.

Father Black declares that, if the Archbishop of Canterbury will not call the Bishop of London to account for permitting the re-marriage of divorced persons, he will apply to the Privy Council to direct the Archbishop to hear the case, as they directed him to hear that against the Bishop of Lincoln.

The Sunday-school Union had a bazaar in the Birmingham Town Hall, and Mr. J. S. Dugdale, Q.C., the City Recorder, made an appropriate opening speech. He ventured the assertion that the number of persons who "came before courts of justice" might have been "diminished if they had come under the influence of Sunday-school teachers." Mr. Dugdale appears to be ignorant of the fact that more than ninety per cent. of prisoners in English gaols have been Sunday-school scholars.

Mr. Dugdale went on to justify prosecutions such as those which are raging at Walsall. He did not want to see a Continental Sunday in England; it was not a day for amusement, but for rest and meditation. Well, for our part, we have no objection to Mr. Dugdale's spending Sunday in meditation, for he seems to need it. What we object to is the ridiculous idea that other people should meditate just when he does. Surely they might be allowed to choose their own time, and no doubt meditation on Monday is as good as meditation on Sunday.

George Bishop was once a Secularist lecturer. He was rather lazy, and so he became "converted" to a less exacting faith. Finally he entered the Church of England as a curate, and really found his true level.

Lecturing recently at Hucknall, the Rev. George Bishop delivered himself as follows: "I believe, according to the New Testament, it is a decided sin for any person to worship in a place not connected with the Church of England." Gods, angels, devils, and little fishes! What cheek! It is just a paraphrase of the old exclamation, "Come to my gospel-shop or be damned." Some people would prefer to be damned.

The Government of the Transvaal ordered November 2 to be observed as a day of humiliation and prayer on account of the prolonged drought. One of the Dutch ministers declined to pray for rain because, in his belief, God was sending punishment on the country on account of the evils which were daily committed, especially on Sundays. While God is withholding his rain, firework-makers are trying to bring it down by shooting rockets at the clouds. One more Dutchman denounced the godless operation. "Hij steek zijz vinger in die oog van die Heere!"—"He is poking his finger in the eye of God!" shrieked the shocked Boer.

An anti-infidel propagandist, whose whole fortune consists in his family name, is visiting Stockton-on-Tees, and the walls of the town are placarded with a warning to the inhabitants to "Beware of Infidelity." A number of hypocritical questions are asked as to the number of "infidel" hospitals, almshouses, and reformatories; the whole winding up with a barefaced, horrible lie about "the foul system of sensuality and free love" advocated by the National Secular Society. Altogether the bill is worthy of the fellow who promised to prove that libel on the Hall of Science "up to the hilt," and so ignominiously failed to do so that the court made him and his "dear friends" pay something like three hundred pounds.

Thomas Sackville Sedgwick has been handed over by the Scotch authorities to the English police. He is charged with embezzling £30 as treasurer of the Wells Wesleyan Sunday School.

A good many clergymen, it is said, have been watching the female bicyclists at the Aquarium. Well, why not? Clergymen are as much interested in anatomy as laymen.

Priest and ex-Nun Arrested.

For a robbery committed some little time ago (says the Telegraph's Paris correspondent) a priest, and a young woman who had formerly been a nun, have been arrested and incarcerated pending a judicial examination. The ex-religieuse, it appears, was admitted into the service of an elderly widow, and, by her engaging manners, speedily won her way into the old lady's good graces. The widow did not hesitate to confide to her new servant the keys of her various cupboards and desks. The unworthy domestic made good use of her opportunities, for, on moving into another house about four weeks ago, her employer discovered that she had been robbed of railway bonds to the value of £800. The police were apprised of the fact, and the maidservant, on her avowal that she had taken the bonds and thrown them into a cesspool, was arrested. One day, however, the widow was surprised to receive a letter from a curé to the effect that, for a commission of £300, he would restore the missing securities. This communication was forwarded to the police, who discovered that the priest had carried on relations with the female prisoner whilst the latter was in her convent. On being again examined, the ex-nun confessed that she had handed the papers to the curé, who was at once arrested, the bonds being found in his possession. In his defence, the ecclesiastic said he intended using them for charitable purposes.

We have no right to believe a thing true because everybody says so, unless there are good grounds for believing that some one person, at least, has the means of knowing what is true, and is speaking the truth so far as he knows it. However many nations and generations of men are brought into the witness-box, they cannot testify to anything which they do not know. Every man who has accepted the statement from somebody else, without himself testing and verifying it, is out of court; his word is worth nothing at all. And when we get back at last to the true birth and beginning of the statement, two serious questions must be disposed of in regard to him who first made it: was he mistaken in thinking that he knew about this matter, or was he lying?—William Kingdon Clifford.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, December 1, Oddfellows' Hall, Thornton-road, Bradford: 11, "How the Bible Stands Now"; 3, "Life, Death, and After"; 7, "Did Jesus Christ Ever Live?"

December 8, Foresters' Hall; 15, Newcastle; 22, Manchester; 29, Camberwell.

January 5, Camberwell; 12, 19, and 26, St. James's Hall.

February 9, Glasgow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. CHARLES WATTS'S ENGAGEMENTS.—December 1, Wood Green: 7, Blyth; 8, South Shields; 15 and 22, Foresters' Hall.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

H. LEES SUMNER.—Thanks for cutting.

J. WOOD.—See paragraph.

J. G. DOBSON.—Mr. Foote is writing you with respect to hall and date. W. R. Bradlaugh's visit will do you no harm; quite the contrary. We like to see Christian Evidence people active; it sets the public inquiring after Freethought.

J. F. HARPSON.—Pleased to hear you made three new members after Mr. Watts's lecture at Bolton.

R. MORGAN.—Thanks. See paragraph. The little pamphlet you refer to will be amplified, as you suggest, when Mr. Foote finds time to do the writing.

G. F. DUPLAY.—Your suggestion that Mr. Foote's article does not express his real opinions renders discussion impossible.

WE have received an envelope containing a postal order for 3s., but no letter. Will the sender kindly tell us how the remittance is to be applied?

H. C.—All right. Thanks for cuttings.

R. S. PENGELLY.—We are obliged. Will use it next week.

J. DUNSMORE.—We are on the watch. All in good time. It is bad policy to give the ruffian gratuitous advertisements.

E. HOWARD.—We note your satisfaction.

MR. FOOTE'S LECTURE SCHEME (Shilling Month).—Per C. Watts: F.S., £1; W. Gregory, 1s.; Jas. Leipper, 10s.; L. Hewitt, 2s. 6d.

R. W. JONES.—We are pleased. See paragraph. All the week-night lectures under Mr. Foote's scheme should be free. You must drop the idea of charging for admission.

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Foote has no sort of connection with the Bradlaugh Club at Balls Pond, neither has it any official connection with the National Secular Society. Mr. Foote simply gave the opening Sunday evening lecture by special invitation of the two local Branches that are co-operating in the Freethought propaganda carried on there. Mr. Forder is acting as a member of the Finsbury Park Branch in this matter, not as Honorary Secretary of the N.S.S. Of course there is plenty of room for all sorts of efforts in so huge a place as London.

J. W. GOTT.—See paragraph. Kindly send us any further notes of Mr. Cohen's tour.

CAMBERWELL BRANCH.—How is it we do not receive your lecture notices weekly?

L. J. B.—Any good bookseller would supply you with Canon Driver's Introduction. It is published at 12s. You might order through Mr. Forder.

G. CLANEY.—Glad to hear that Mr. Cohen's visit to Huddersfield has put new life into the Branch. We wish you all success.

J. P. GILMOUR.—Thanks for cutting, also for the new leaflet of the Glasgow Branch, which is excellent. We hope it is being widely distributed. Syllabus filed.

E. SNEDLEY.—(1) Church theology is taught in Church schools. That is the reason of their existence. (2) Nonconformists have persecuted when they have had the power. They did so in Scotland, in England under the Commonwealth, and most vilely in New England. (3) We do not know of any satisfactory book on English Church History, such as you require.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: W. C. (Dorking) £1; D. Young 2s.

PAPERS RECEIVED.—Cape Times—Sunday Chronicle—Irish Daily Independent—Dundee Advertiser—Glasgow News—Standard and Digger's News—Johannesburg Times—Johannesburg Star—Irish Times—Echo—New York Herald—South Shields Free Press—Midland Counties Express—Cornishman—Helensburgh and Gareloch Times—Secular Thought—Truthseeker—Torch of Anarchy—Freidenker—Progressive Thinker—New York Public Opinion—Two Worlds—Liberty—New York World—Freedom—Boston Investigator—Freethought Ideal.

CORRESPONDENCE should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

IT being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SUGAR PLUMS.

DELICATE and elderly people were, most of them, kept indoors on Sunday evening, when a bitter wind swept through the streets of London. There was an excellent audience, however, at Foresters' Hall, where Mr. Foote lectured on "Huxley and Agnosticism." The chair was taken by James Rowney, who, on the previous Sunday, occupied the platform at a very short notice, and acquitted himself most creditably.

Mr. Foote lectures to-day in the Oddfellows' Hall, Bradford, better places having been denied him. We hope the weather will permit of Freethinkers attending from the surrounding district, as well as from Bradford itself.

Mr. Parris occupies the Foresters' Hall platform this evening (Dec. 1), his subject being "More Bible Symbols, and their Meaning." We hope there will be a good attendance.

The Wood Green Branch has been holding very successful Sunday evening meetings at the Masonic Hall, which is connected with a principal hotel in the High-street. These meetings have incensed the bigots, who have resorted to surreptitious practices. The landlord has received an intimation from the Middlesex County Council that he is violating the conditions of his licence. We do not believe that he is, but he is justified in not incurring the wrath of official tyrants. Of course the Branch has to go elsewhere. It has decided to open a Club and Institute at 4, Lawn-villas, Stewart-crescent, opposite Wood Green Church. Mr. Charles Watts will lecture there this evening (Dec. 1), and there ought to be a good gathering. The tickets (1s. and 6d.) can be obtained of Mr. J. M. Wood, 71, Gladstone-avenue.

Mr. Charles Watts had two very successful meetings, under Mr. Foote's lecture scheme, at Bolton and Blackburn. The hall was filled on both occasions with a most attentive audience, many of whom would not otherwise have heard our principles expounded.

Mr. Cohen has been lecturing under Mr. Foote's scheme in the Bradford district. He has had good audiences, and has succeeded in starting two new Branches of the National Secular Society. On Sunday last Mr. Cohen lectured for the Labor Church at Bradford on "The French Revolution." He had large meetings and an enthusiastic reception.

The Secular Almanack, issued by the National Secular Society, and now published at threepence, is having an improved sale. We have already expressed a hope—and we repeat it—that every copy of the Almanack may be sold by Christmas. We also venture to repeat the information that any profit derived from the publication will accrue to the Society.

Mr. H J Stace, for six years President of the N.S.S., Westminster Branch, was on Sunday evening presented by the members with an illuminated address. Mr. W. Wheeler, who is a member of the local Vestry, made the presentation, and short speeches were added by Messrs. Barrell, Martin, and Littleton. Mr. Stace said he was proud of the honor conferred upon him, though, after all, he had only tried to do his duty. The testimonial, which was much admired, was most artistically executed by a friend, Mr. R. J. Thompson.

Mr. F. Wilson, in his article on "A Parson's Diary," notices the custom of wassailing orchards. This rite, which is not yet quite extinct, is adverted to by Mr. Wheeler when dealing with Christmas customs in his Footsteps of the Past. He considers it a most interesting survival of nature-worship, the libations being originally poured to the earth and tree-spirits.

Daylight, of Norwich, says of The Shadow of the Sword: "Mr. Foote's plea for peace is most eloquent; his appeal ought really to open the eyes of some of the people who talk of war as if it were simply a pastime."

Mr. John Morley does not mean to sequester himself in order to pursue his literary enterprises. He has accepted an invitation to stand for the Montrose Burghs, and as the seat is considered "safe," he will probably be soon back in the House of Commons. When he is there we shall expect him, if the opportunity arises, not only to vote, but to speak, on behalf of the claim of Freethinkers to the common rights of citizenship. Not being a member of the Government, Mr. Morley will be unmuzzled; and what is the use of having principles if you never do anything for them?

Digitized by Google

The irrepressible Rev. W. W. Howard returns to the charge in the Leek Times, and declares that he is still willing to debate with Mr. Foote. "It remains, however, to be seen," says our contemporary, "whether Mr. Foote will consent to forget Mr. Howard's remarks that he does not understand the meaning of that which he writes, is asinine in wit, and hog-like in grunt." Mr. Foote begs to say that he has no further civilities to exchange with Mr. Howard, and he declines to exchange incivilities. He is positively tired of reading Mr. Howard's diffuse and bombastic epistles. All he has to say now is this—if Mr. Howard wants a public discussion he can have it, but he must accept his opponent's proposition as it stands. Let him plainly and definitely say "Yes," on this condition, and the business details can be easily arranged by a joint-committee. This is Mr. Foote's last word on the matter—however many letters Mr. Howard may indite in his apparently too ample leisure.

November 12 was the eightieth birthday of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and it was celebrated in New York by a demonstration and banquet of the National Council of Women. Mrs. Stanton has given her voice and pen for Freethought as well as for the emancipation of her sex, and is deserving of all honor.

We are informed that the exhibits for the Paine exhibition at South Place Institute (Dec. 2 and 3) exceed in number and variety all expectation. Mr. Conway is busy preparing a catalogue. Among the exhibitors will be Mr. E. Truelove, who sends the table on which Paine wrote The Rights of Man, and other relics; and Mr. Wheeler, who sends a number of books.

There is an interesting story about Froude in Mr. G. W. Smalley's Studies of Men, and it is very much to that great writer's credit: "When he began to feel that he was drifting away from the Church, he told his father. His father was the Venerable Archdeacon Froude, not only a Churchman, but a dignitary of the Church, and something of a devotee. The father naturally sought to dissuade the son. Presently he added the weight of paternal authority to his entreaties. Finding this also ineffectual, he told young Froude plainly that, if he renounced the Church, he must renounce his expectations of fortune. The father was rich; wealth lay within the son's grasp; poverty was the price of resistance. Froude told the story very simply. He never said whether he hesitated. He only said: 'I gave up the fortune. I thought I could earn my own living, and I have earned it.' Yet when he threw off the frock he resigned his fellowship, and resigned the headmastership of a school which had just been offered and accepted, and began life over again as a man of letters. He had no income, and no certainty of pay for his writings.'"

The memorial to Huxley will take the shape of a statue to be placed in the Natural History Branch of the British Museum, and medals to be awarded by the Royal College of Science at South Kensington.

The New York Morning Journal gives a portrait of Stephen Girard and an account of this philanthropic merchant of last century, who was a stout Freethinker. His principal ship was named "Voltaire." He had a silent funeral, attended by the Freemasons of Philadelphia. By his will he left a noble college for the education of orphans. In it he prohibited the entrance of any ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister, as he wished the orphans educated in secular instruction only. Yet the black parasites have contrived to over-ride the Freethinker's will, and the children's minds are warped with the pernicious dogmas of the Churches. American Freethinkers should never cease their endeavors to obtain a reversal of this iniquity.

SOMETHING LIKE A FORGERY.

THE story of the woman taken in adultery (John viii. 1–11) is a pretty good instance of what could be done in the way of after-insertion into the Gospels. A yet more striking instance is that of the last twelve verses of Mark. Here Eusebius tells us expressly that accurate copies ended at the eighth verse. And here, in point of fact, do end the two oldest manuscripts, the Vatican and the Sinaitic, though these manuscripts cannot be pretended to be earlier than the fourth century, and are possibly later. Here, then, was Mark, generally thought to be the oldest gospel, pitchforking Jesus into the world like Melchisedek without any account of his birth, father, or mother, and leaving him crucified and buried without any resurrection. Evidently that would never do. Accordingly an ending was supplied with the promise that believers should take up serpents and drink poison with impunity, but he that believeth not shall be damned. When, where, and who perpetrated this forgery is a matter of speculation. The Rev. Heber Evans argues it was Paul; others assign it to Ariston. Whoever the forger was, he did not manage the business well. The preceding writer had just mentioned Mary Magdalene three times as a party presumably well known; but he, very unnaturally, in the ninth—his first—verse explained that the hysterical lady who was the first to recognise her beloved when he got up out of his grave, and threw away the linen in which he had been wrapped, was the same party "out of whom he had cast seven devils."

Dean Alford cancelled the forgery in his Testament. It is rejected by Tischendorf and T. S. Green. The Revised Version detaches the verses, and has the marginal note: "The two oldest Greek manuscripts and some other authorities omit from verse nine to the end. Some other authorities have a different ending to the gospel." This different ending is notable because it has been argued, with some plausibility, that the ending of the gospel at verse eight is too abrupt for the close of any narrative, unless the Holy Ghost at this point suddenly took St. Mark up to heaven, and a cloud received him out of sight. Now, the Codex Regius at Paris, which is assigned to the seventh century and the margin of the later Syriac, has this verse: "And all these things they reported to Peter's companions. And afterwards Jesus himself, from the east to the west, sent forth by them the holy and incorruptible preaching of eternal salvation"; which, of course, makes a satisfactory wind up to the blessed gospel, but would never have been written in the seventh or any other century if the other verses had been known to be the genuine words of St. Mark, inspired by the Holy Ghost.

LUCIANUS.

A Heathen Death-Bed.

The Philadelphia Times reports the death from consumption in that city of a Chinaman, Hong-Toi, whose friends came to his death-bed and read to him from the works of Confucius and Mencius:—

"He confronted death with all the calm courage of the true fatalist, evidently in full possession of all his mental faculties, and firm in his Oriental faith. There was not the faintest evidence of any fear in his manner or his words, nor did there seem to be any longing for life or desire to supplicate for it. To an American whom he knew well, and whom he had learned to regard as a good friend, he said, as he grasped his hand the day before he died: 'Mayhap die one week, maybe one month; die alle same. No solly myself. All light. Solly my mothee, my mothee.'

"To one of his Chinese friends he said, only a few hours before he breathed his last, and when he was almost unable to articulate: 'I think I see the dragons.' It was the last he said. Soon after he sank into what seemed a peaceful sleep, and save for his labored breathing he gave no further evidence of suffering. Slowly and more slowly he breathed, until with a long, gasping sigh he gave up the struggle and rested.

"There was no lamentation, nor any evidence of grief, though it was plain enough that to many of his friends his going was a real sorrow. Five or six of these friends were in the room when he passed away, and as soon as they saw that he was dead they began the preparations for his final disposal."

The Rabbis were proof against serpent bites; and Jesus was by no means original (nor were the Rabbis) in regard to the superstition of taking up serpents with impunity. The Talmud relates that a certain district was infested by an arud. An arud was a cross between a serpent and a lizard, and none the better for that. Well, Rabbi Chanena ben Dosa put his heel upon the hole of the reptile, and was bitten by it; but, like Goldsmith's mad dog, the reptile died, while the Rabbi was none the worse. It must be admitted that, in this instance, it was the Rabbi that was the poisonous animal. A proverb sprang out of this incident, "Woe to the man who encounters an arud; but woe to the arud which encounters Rabbi ben Dosa." Yet the Christians, who have no such power to kill reptiles, want to convert the Jews!—J. Symes, in "Liberator."

Digitized by Google

IS THERE A GOD?

To any man of strong and healthy mind, there is nothing plainer than that there cannot be any such being as the God the Christians and Jews believe in; but whether any kind of an intelligence brought into existence this universe, and still controls it, is a question about which I am unable to form any definite opinion. I have never read a sound argument in favor of such an existence or against it.

It must be true either that the universe has existed always, or that there was a time when it began to exist. It is absolutely impossible for our minds to conceive of a time without a beginning or end, or of space without a beginning or end. No man, therefore, can intelligently believe that the universe has existed always, or that God has existed always. He cannot believe either of these propositions, because they are propositions that cannot be grasped by the human mind. The man who says that he believes the universe has existed always, or that God has existed always, is bound to realise that he does not say this having clearly before his mind the meaning of his words, as he does have when he says he believes the earth is round, or that Chicago has more than a million inhabitants.

And yet, if we do not believe that the universe or that God existed eternally, it seems that we are forced to believe that one or both of them had a beginning, as there is no other alternative; and yet it is simply impossible for us to conceive how God or the universe could have had a beginning.

We cannot imagine that once there did not exist any such being, or intelligence, as that which we commonly call God, and yet that in one minute after there existed a being something like that called God.

We cannot imagine either how this existence came instantly into the fully-developed God, nor can we understand how a being or intelligence might have started at a small beginning and grown into a fully-developed God.

All orthodox Jews and Christians claim to believe that God has existed always, yet that the matter or material of which the universe is made has not existed always, but that God created this matter absolutely out of nothing.

I have never heard from any intelligent Jew or Christian whether he believes God made in an instant all the matter of which the universe is formed, or took more or less time to make it; though they must know that, if God is omnipotent, he could have made it all instantly just as easily as he could have done it in a long time; and they must know that, if an omnipotent God took six days, or six seconds, to create the world, it must have been simply because he preferred to occupy some time in making it, when he could just as easily have done it instantly.

But if we admit that there was a time when matter did not exist, then we are forced to admit that before the existence of matter there were endless cycles of ages when God was doing nothing; for we can no more imagine a God doing something, with no matter of any kind in existence, than we can imagine a man doing something without something with which to do it.

Before God created matter there was nothing but space. We cannot conceive that there was ever a time when there was no space, so that space must have existed eternally.

All religions are compelled to make their gods more or less like men, and the Bible speaks of the hands and feet and arms and ears and eyes of God, and of his seeing and hearing and loving and pitying and hating and being angry, more or less as men do. But, in order to have hands and feet and arms and eyes and ears, and to see and hear, or to have anything like these, or to do anything like these, there must be some matter or material thing in existence.

If, then, God existed before matter existed, it must have been that at that time God had nothing anything like hands or feet or arms or eyes or ears, and that he could do nothing at all like seeing or hearing, because there was nothing for him to see and nothing for him to hear. And, further, if there was no matter in existence, it was impossible that God could have had any form, or size, or weight, or dimension; and, as there was nothing but space, there could not have been any particular place, or any kind of place, and it therefore would have been impossible that God could have been at any place, or could have been anywhere.

It would be simply absurd to say that, before the existence of matter, God was everywhere, as is now commonly said by religionists; for, if there was nothing but space, there could have been no place; and if there was no place, there was no where! It was impossible for God to be everywhere when there was nowhere; and it was folly to say he was at every place when there was no such thing as place, because place cannot exist without matter, and the very idea of place is inseparably linked with matter.

I am, then, perfectly free to confess that I cannot understand how the universe could have existed eternally, or how it could have had a beginning; and yet it seems that one or the other of these must be true.

—Blue Grass Blade. C. C. MOORE.

THE APOSTLE JUNIA (?).

How many disciples Jesus had, how many apostles or messengers he sent, cannot be ascertained. The general opinion is that they were twelve in number; but there must have been more.

1. Paul or Saul was an apostle, it is said; and he was not one of the twelve.

2. Barnabas was another apostle (Acts xiv. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5, 6).

3. Epaphroditus was also an apostle. See Philippians ii. 25, where he is called your messenger. In Greek it is your apostle.

4. Certain parties (in 2 Cor. xi. 13) are called false apostles; but the writer himself may have been of that character, as Paul must be admitted to have been.

5. Lying apostles are mentioned in Rev. ii. 2.

None of the above were members of the twelve, unless the false ones are of that group, which seems quite likely.

6. In Romans xvi. 7 we have a peculiar passage: "Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellow prisoners, who are of note amongst the apostles, who were in Christ before me."

Who was Junia? Man or woman, Junia was related to the writer; was amongst the apostles—that is, was one of the apostles. Was Junia man or woman?

Irenæus says: "For after the twelve apostles, it is found our Lord sent seventy others." Tertullian states: "And he chose other seventy apostles besides the twelve." Clement of Alexandria speaks of "The apostle Barnabas, who was one of the seventy." Origen speaks of the seventy apostles.

Cyprian took the seventy disciples to be Apostles, and calls Church rulers the successors of the seventy. Ambrose and Jerome spoke of other apostles besides the twelve; and Augustine regards the five hundred mentioned in 1 Cor. xv as apostles also.

Chrysostom took the seventy to be apostles; and he regarded Junia as one. He exclaims: "Oh! how great is the devotion of this woman that she should be even counted worthy of the appellation of apostle!" Calmet, in his Dictionary, under Junia, says: "St. Chrysostom, Theophylact, and several others, take Andronicus for a man, and Junia for a woman, perhaps his wife." The Greeks and Latins keep their festival day May 17, as husband and wife.

Theodoret says apostles were numbered by myriads.

If Junia was an apostle, who can grumble? Surely, it is as likely that a woman should be an apostle as that one should be the mother of God! Those who worship one woman as the mother of God need not begrudge Junia the title and honor of apostle. But Christians are so prejudiced. There is little else but prejudice about them.

If Junia was the first pope now, what of that? Rome was never any worse for that, nor is the Romish Church. A woman is better than a neuter any day.

JOSEPH SYMES.

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

(4) Display, or get displayed, one of our contents-sheets, which are of a convenient size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will send them on application.

Digitized by Google

THE JAPANESE OPINION OF RELIGION.

THE following may be most fitly prefaced by Burns's lines:—

O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as ithers see us.

It was at a lecture given on Tuesday week, before members of the Aldershot Military Society, of which His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught is the esteemed President, that the following remarkable and important statement—one fraught with much import to all Freethought readers—was made, and one that we should be lacking in discernment if we did not find a prominent position for in the Freethinker itself. It is a fair criterion of what many great nations think of the religion of so-called Christian countries (sic). H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught was unable to be present, but his place as chairman was ably filled by Sir William Butler, who, in a neat speech, introduced Surgeon-Colonel W. Taylor, M.D., the principal medical officer of the South Eastern District, to the assembly. The title of the lecture was that of "The Medico-Military Arrangements of the Japanese Army in the Field." With the general subject-matter we have little or nothing to do; suffice it to say, however, that the lecturer clearly proved—and it was admitted on all hands—that the arrangements of the Army Medical Organisation in the field were far and away more complete and valuable than those of England, or even Germany herself, although, forsooth, Western civilisation had up till the outbreak of the war regarded the movements of that nation's army as "merely playing at soldiers." In Japan, said the gallant Colonel, who was attached as a British officer on the Japanese staff during the late war, places abound for the teaching of almost every ology; yet it was only in the year 1869 that Japan made up its mind to bring itself into Western civilisation! It was related to him by high authority that, at this time, a commission was sent forth from Japan on a visit to the chief cities of the world for the purpose of determining four things, which should decide the future of Japan. The first great point to be decided was to determine which of all the armies of the world was the best and most suitable for Japan to base the formation of its own army upon; secondly, to determine which was the best navy of the world; thirdly, to decide which was the best system of education in the world; and, fourthly, which was the best religion in the world. The commission executed their mission, and then returned to their beloved Emperor and reported that they found that the French had the best army system, the British navy was the best navy, and the American system of education commended itself most to their minds; but, said Colonel Taylor, with regard to the deciding of the fourth question, the commission reported that, although they had visited the chief cities throughout the world, they had not in all their travels been able to find any religion that was worth following! Much hilarity was caused by this statement by the lecturer, and the risible faculties were still further tickled when Colonel Thompson added that all the so-called religious feasts were a complete farce, and the result of starting an American mission in Japan had been that the intended theological college had now become the greatest centre for Freethought! Yet, added the lecturer in conclusion, and after extolling the virtues of the Japanese mothers, "I have no hesitation in saying that Japan must necessarily become a nation of soldiers, composed of brave, loyal, and ideal men—men who, like the women of the country, esteem it an honor and a privilege to lay down their very lives in the service of their emperor, and for their love of liberty."

Such is the opinion of a great and successful nation of the religion of Western civilisation. Truly a clear manifestation that neither the Japanese commission, its emperor, nor its nation regard religion (save the mark!) as being calculated to bring about that balderdash of universal brotherhood, as enunciated by the people's poet—

The time will come when man to man, the world o'er,
Shall brothers be.

Common sense is evidently the line that the Japs prefer to rely upon.

In Boston, in 1660, Mary Dyar was hung on the old elm on Boston Common by the Puritans on the following charges: She said magistrates had no right over the conscience of men; that God made revelations now as much as ever, was just as near to George Fox as to Moses and Paul, and just as near to her as to Jesus Christ; that priests had no right to bind and loose; that we should call no man "Master" on earth; that sprinkling water on a baby's face did it no good, and gave no pleasure to God. Besides, she said that woman had just as much right as man. And when we bade her hold her peace, impudently declared that she had as good a right to publish her opinions as we had to publish ours. So we hanged her by the neck in the name of God and the Puritan Church of New England. It is an act of religion. Glory to God and the vine he has planted in the wilderness.—Rev. John Norton.

WHAT THEN?

As I gaze at the fathomless sky,
And travel with thought through the past,
As I think of what is when I die
I oft wonder if "I" will still last—
The "I" that is thinking this out,
The "I" that men say is a "soul,
The "I" that is ever in doubt
Of what the Unknown can unroll.
If 'tis true that we all are a part
Of a thinkingless, fathomless all;
If 'tis true that the broken in heart
When dead have no future recall,
What then! Ah, what then?

Suppose it is true that the sod
Will contain all that forms now the "I";
Suppose it is true there's no God
As that told by the priests (they can lie);
Suppose that the future as told
By the priest for his bread is a snare,
A tale but for gathering gold,
Or to coax men wrong burdens to bear;
Suppose that the future is nil
For the toiler now crushed by our laws;
Suppose that the future is nil
For those who are crushed without cause.
If so, ah, what then?

How shall be paid the poor wretch
Now crushed by our cruel social laws?
How shall be paid the brave men
Now fighting for truth and her cause?
How shall be paid the poor slave—
The laborer sweating his brow
To feed the fat belly of cant?
The answer is—Never, or Now.
For if God's unconscious, what then?
If the future for man be but death,
If God be unmindful of men,
And the "soul" be a beating of breath,
What then! Ah! what then?

Wealth says 'tis the tale of a fool
To say there's no future or God;
That men could not hope to o'er rule
If the "soul" was dispersed in the sod.
Cant says 'tis a tale of a fool
To say there's no heaven or hell.
She teaches the poor in her school
That all after death will be well.
But still there's the dark, dreary doubt,
Which through ages and ages has ran
That future may mean ever sleep,
And that God is unmindful of man.
If so, ah, what then?

Are we to wait 'til the "trumpet sound"
To solve the problem I here propound?
Too long has Poverty bowed to Wealth;
'Tis time she tried to help herself.
Ah, see ye not, ye blinded poor,
The priestcraft yoke you do endure!
In spite of every parson's bray,
They cannot prove a word they say.

—Reynolds's Newspaper. JOSEPH TROPWEN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A REAL TRINITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I have for the last sixty-three years, as a confirmed Freethinker, considered the Christian idea of a Trinity or three-part God to be a most absurd and ridiculously crazy idea. Notwithstanding this, sir, you are well aware of the fact that for centuries past the clergy of the twin Churches of Rome and England have vastly enriched themselves by forcing these irrational ideas down the throats of their millions of dupes, amongst whom I feel proud to say that the daily increasing number of Freethinkers are not to be included. But I must here, with your permission, admit of the fact that the above-named clergy are in joint possession of a real, substantial, and tangible Trinity which I must term the Three C's—viz., the Cash, Cant, and Candlegrease Trinity.

T. DUNBAR HARRIS.

"I don't see much difference between your sacred concert programs and your secular concert programs." "The sacred concerts are given on Sunday."

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

It is a healthy sign of the spread of music and musical criticism in this country to see so handsome a volume as that of Gluck and the Opera, a study in musical history, by Ernest Newman (London: Bertram Dobell, 77, Charing Cross-road; 1895). Germany has an abundance of philosophical musical critics, and in France Saint-Saens himself—"the French Bach"—does not disdain the office of study and criticism of his predecessors. Mr. Newman's book opens with a sonnet to Gluck, by David Friedrich Strauss, who found in music one of the chief elements wherewith to replace the effete influence of religion. It is, indeed, the merit of the work that it does not merely study Gluck and his productions, but views them in relation to the whole intellectual tendencies of the time. Mr. Newman says: "Everywhere we see that music has not developed along its own lines without reference to the other arts, but that these and the general culture of the times have helped to shape its course." He deals with his subject from a scientific, not a metaphysical, point of view.

* * *

Gluck, the great reformer of the opera, is a figure of interest to all music lovers, though the quarrels of the Gluckists and Piccinnists, which made a great noise in the third quarter of last century, have almost passed into the limbo of oblivion. The rival schools, however, provoked much discussion, in which men like Rousseau and Diderot joined. The path of reform was, as Mr. Newman shows, led by another Freethinker, Algarotti. Mr. Newman traces and analyses Gluck's own genius to its culmination in Iphigenia in Tauris. Mr. Newman adopts throughout the comparative method. He traces the course of the opera in Germany, Italy, and France, and does not suppose it has made its last effort in Wagner any more than in Gluck. His work is well written, and may be warmly commended to all interested in musical history. Indeed, as we have already indicated, it may claim a higher place as a part of the history of the development of culture.

* * *

From Gluck to Diderot is an easy transition. If the first was master of music of his time, the second was as certainly master of letters. Voltaire alone could compete his supremacy, and, in some respects, his work was more fecund than that of the greatest of modern wits. While Voltaire was crushing l'infâme with a thousand little darts and stings, Diderot, in the Encyclopedie, was uprearing the edifice of modern science and culture, which is slowly superseding the old superstitions. To this great work Diderot gave thirty years of his life, and Voltaire himself recognised that there was no other man in Europe who could have successfully achieved the colossal task. This, too, may be said that, while the Deist Voltaire was for ever fretting at the stupidity, superstition, and bigotry he encountered, the Atheist Diderot pursued his path, ever amiable, ever generous, with a supreme serenity, worthy of a philosopher.

* * *

Diderot sa vie, ses œuvres, sa correspondence, by A. Collignon (Paris: F. Alcon; 1895) is one of many signs that the great Encyclopedist is still an influence among his countrymen. And well indeed it is that it is so. The twenty volumes of his complete works, edited by J. Assezat, is a larger monument, and the greatest of all is L'Encyclopedie itself, for the impress of a genius like Diderot is not only in that which he writes himself, but as clearly stamped on all that comes under his direction, as was the Times when under the editorship of John Delane. But M. Collignon's book of 300 pages is a good introduction to the man and his work. M. Collignon has that happy style which makes French criticism more readable than many an English novel. It is far lighter in tone than Mr. John Morley's study in two volumes; yet it is, on the whole, quite as satisfactory. There is no beating about the bush with M. Collignon. He tells how Diderot, "at the outset of his career, had not raised himself above the Spiritualist theory and the feeble arguments with which it is satisfied," and also how he afterwards had the courage and sincerity to refute his Theistic errors. He shows that he was the first of moderns to broach the theory of evolution, remarking, in his Rêve de d'Alembert, "Organs produce wants, and reciprocally wants produce organs." M. Collignon cites many passages to show that the true precursor of "transformisme" was neither Lamarck nor Robinet, but Diderot. So in art he finds that Diderot was the precursor of Stendhal, Sainte Beuve, and Merimee.

* * *

The Country House is a new sixpenny illustrated magazine (30, Fleet-street). Mr. Grant Allen contributes a story, "The Lack of Kamouska," which is certainly not a hill-top novel. Therein a wrecker's home is called "God's Providence House." Mr. F. Lancaster Lucas has a silly story in which an Atheist is converted by seeing at night a post painted with luminous paint. Mr. Lucas must appraise the intellect of his readers at a very low level. Mr. R. Barr (Luke Sharp) has some really funny remarks on "The Common or Domestic Hen."

* * *

In an account of Verdi, the composer, we read that in 1814 the village of Roncole, Italy, was sacked by the invading Allies. Then the frightened women took refuge in the church—safe, as they thought, under the image of the Virgin; but the soldiers forced the door, and slew women and children until the floor ran with blood. One mother, with an infant at her breast, flew to the belfry and hid there, so saving herself and her child. This child was the infant Verdi.

* * *

Ten thousand copies of the first part of The Woman's Bible have been issued at New York. The State Journal of Ohio declares that this New Bible of the New Woman is the work of the Devil.

* * *

The Free Review for December opens with an article "On Compromise," by J. M. Robertson, which is very interesting on its critical side, but not particularly helpful on the side of practical suggestion. Arthur Lynch's article on "Herbert Spencer" is good reading, though not quite up to the writer's best level. "Salvation Army Charity" is trenchantly dealt with by R. Wheatley, with special reference to "Shelters," which are shown to be a form of philanthropy which earns a handsome dividend out of the worst necessities of the destitute. There are some well-written economical papers, and a peculiar article by a lady, entitled "A Woman's Right," which is marked by all the crudity of the free-love school. J. A. Nicklin contributes a bright, original literary article on "Marlowe's 'Gaveston.'" We also note a two-page review of Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer pamphlet.

* * *

The recently-published Letters of Matthew Arnold contain some references to Miss Harriet Martineau, who says Matthew Arnold "blasphemes frightfully." This was written at a time when Arnold never contemplated that he would be accused of "blaspheming frightfully" by his reference to the "three Lord Shaftesburys." He applauded Miss Martineau's courage even when, owing to the publication of The Letters on the Laws of Man's Development, she was in high disrepute, and says thereanent: "The want of independence of mind, the shutting their eyes and professing to believe what they do not, the running blindly together in herds, for fear of some obscure danger and horror if they go alone, is so eminently a vice of the English, I think, of the last hundred years—has led them, and is leading them, into such scrapes and bewilderment, that I cannot but praise a person whose one effort seems to have been to deal perfectly honestly and sincerely with herself, although for the speculations into which this effort has led her I have not the slightest sympathy. I shall never be found to identify myself with her and her people; but neither shall I join, nor have I the least community of feeling with, her attackers." In later years he speaks of Renan, "between whose line of endeavor and my own I imagine there is a considerable resemblance."

PROFANE JOKES.

Sunday-school Teacher (solemnly)—"Every one must be born again." Tommy Traddles—"Please, teacher, I was born again, the first time." Sunday-school Teacher—"What do you mean?" Tommy Traddles—"I'm twins."

Sunday-school Teacher—"What is faith?" Small Boy—"Taking an umbrella to church when the minister's goin' ter prey fer rain."

Mother—"I don't know what in the world to do with my son; he is a born rover." Neighbor—"Why not make a Methodist minister of him?"

Mrs. Watts—"Why were you not at the church Thursday night?" Mrs. Potts—"I was out of the city. What was going on?" Mrs. Watts—"We celebrated the silver anniversary of the boy evangelist's work in the missionary field. Oh, we had a lovely time."

A Portuguese artificer, who was suspected of Freethinking, was at the point of death. A Jesuit who came to confess him, holding a crucifix before his eyes, said: "Behold the god whom you have so much offended; do you recollect him now?" "Alas! yes, father," replied the dying man; "it was I who made him."

Mrs. Gray—"Was your prayer-meeting good last night?" Mrs. Green—"Rather uninteresting. None of the men who spoke had ever done anything very bad." Mrs. Gray—"But wasn't Mr. Graybeard there?" Mrs. Green—"Oh, yes; but you don't expect he'd confess any of his real crimes, do you?" Mrs. Gray—"Well, he might run a risk of being arrested."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Touzeau Parris, "More Bible Symbols and their Meaning"—with diagrams.

BRADLAUGH CLUB AND INSTITUTE (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): 7, H. Snell, "Was Jesus Christ a Socialist?" Tuesday, at 8, social party. Wednesday, at 8, public discussion—Miss Lanchester Case.

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, F. Haslam, "The Lord's Day: Past, Present, and Future." Tuesday, at 8, social gathering. Friday, November 29, at 8, meeting of members and friends.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7, conversazione. Friday, at 8, free science classes.

EAST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (78 Libra-road, Roman-road): 3, Sunday-school; 7.30, Dr. Kaines, "The Religion of the Knowable."

FINSBURY BRANCH: 12, members' general meeting.

ISLE OF DOGS PROGRESSIVE CLUB (72 Stebondale-street, E.): 11.30, E. Calvert, "Does the Bible Sanction Slavery, and is it a Woman's Friend?"

PENTON HALL (81 Pentonville-road): 7, J. Kaspary, "Parseeism or Persian Priestcraft."

WEST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street: 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "The German Emperor and German Socialism."

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, Harry Sadler, "The Vital Virtues."

WOOD GREEN (Club and Institute, 4 Lawn-villas, Stuart-crescent, opposite Wood Green Church): 7.30, opening lecture by Charles Watts, "Secularism in Modern Thought."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 12, F. Haslam, "Feed my Lambs."

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): G. Bayliffe, "Creation v. Evolution."

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school.

DUNDEE (Tally-street Hall): 2.30, discussion class; 6.30, adjourned debate, "What do Socialists Want?"—opener, Mr. Munro.

FAILSWORTH SECULAR SUNDAY-SCHOOL (Pole-lane): 6.30, Robert Law, F.G.S., "Volcanoes and Earthquakes, their Origin and Distribution."

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion; 6.30, Zosimus, "The Christ of Myth, Mystery, and Mummery."

HULL (Cobden Hall, Storey-street): 7, Mr. Monro, "The Bible God."

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, Rev. F. W. Ford, "The Foundations of Religious Belief."

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, L. Small, B.Sc., will lecture.

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, Mr. Walnscott, "Free Trade and Competition v. Socialism."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, R. Mitchell will lecture; 8, monthly meeting—urgent business.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 11, W. Heaford, "Was Jesus a Socialist?" 3, "The Dual Character of Christ"; 7, "The Dream of Immortality." Tea at 5.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, business; 7.30, Wm. Bowie, "The History of a Piece of Coal."

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, W. Elcoat, "The First Liberal."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—December 1, Edinburgh; 2 and 3, Dundee; 4, 5, and 6, Edinburgh; 8, Glasgow; 11 and 12, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne; 15, Blackburn; 22, Wood Green; 29, Ball's Pond.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Dec. 22, Leicester.

TOUZEAU PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—Dec. 1, Foresters' Hall; 8, Balls Pond; 15, Wood Green; 29, Foresters' Hall.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free.

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 6d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Freethought Publications.

By G. W. FOOTE.

Flowers of Freethought. First Series, 221 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. Second Series, 302 pp., bound in cloth, 2s. 6d.

Bible Heroes. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Letters to the Clergy. First Series, 128 pp., 1s.

The Grand Old Book. A Reply to the Grand Old Man. An exhaustive answer to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone's "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." 1s.; bound in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Christianity and Secularism. Four Nights' Public Debate with the Rev. Dr. James McCann. 1s.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s. 6d.

Infidel Death-Beds. Second edition, much enlarged, 8d. On superfine paper, in cloth, 1s. 3d.

Darwin on God. 6d.; superior edition, in cloth, 1s.

Comic Sermons and Other Fantasias. 8d.

Will Christ Save Us? A Thorough Examination of the Claims of Jesus Christ to be considered the Savior of the World. 6d.

Reminiscences of Charles Bradlaugh. 6d.

A Defence of Free Speech. Three Hours' Address to the Jury before Lord Coleridge. With a Special Preface and many Footnotes. 4d.

Rome or Atheism—the Great Alternative. 3d.

Letters to Jesus Christ. 4d.

Interview with the Devil. 2d.

Philosophy of Secularism. 3d.

Atheism and Morality. 2d.

My Resurrection. A Missing Chapter from the Gospel of Matthew, discovered by G. W. Foote. 2d.

The Folly of Prayer. 2d.

Ingersollism Defended against Archdeacon Farrar. 2d.

Was Jesus Insane? A Searching Inquiry into the Mental Condition of the Prophet of Nazareth. 1d.

Christianity and Progress. A Reply to Mr. Gladstone. 2d.

The Impossible Creed. An Open Letter to Bishop Magee on the Sermon on the Mount. 2d.

What was Christ? A Reply to J. S. Mill. 2d.

The Bible God. 2d.

Salvation Syrup; or, Light on Darkest England. A Reply to General Booth. 2d.

Is the Bible Inspired? A Criticism on Lux Mundi. 1d.

The Dying Atheist. A Story. 1d.

Bible Handbook for Freethinkers and Inquiring Christians. [Edited in conjunction with W. P. Ball.] Complete, paper covers, 1s. 4d.; superior edition, on superfine paper, bound in cloth, 2s.

Crimes of Christianity. Vol. I. [Written in conjunction with J. M. Wheeler.] Hundreds of exact references to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity. Cloth, gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d.

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's Converted Atheist. A Lie in Five Chapters. 1d.

Mrs. Besant's Theosophy. A Candid Criticism. 2d.

Secularism and Theosophy. A Rejoinder to Mrs. Besant. 3d.

The New Cagliostro. An Open Letter to Madame Blavatsky. 2d.

The Shadow of the Sword. A Moral and Statistical Essay on War. 2d.

Royal Paupers. Showing what Royalty does for the People, and what the People do for Royalty. 2d.

Bible Romances. New Edition. Revised and largely re-written. (1) Creation Story, 2d.; (2) Eve and the Apple, 1d.; (3) Cain and Abel, 1d.; (4) Noah's Flood, 1d.; (5) The Tower of Babel, 1d.; (6) Lot's Wife, 1d.; (7) The Ten Plagues, 1d.; (8) The Wandering Jews, 1d.; (9) Balaam's Ass, 1d.; (10) God in a Box, 1d.; (11) Jonah and the Whale, 1d.; (12) Bible Animals, 1d.; (13) A Virgin Mother, 1d.; (14) The Resurrection, 2d.; (15) The Crucifixion, 1d.; (16) John's Nightmare, 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price Twopence,

"A Letter to Lord Ellenborough"

OCCASIONED BY THE SENTENCE WHICH HE PASSED ON

MR. D. I. EATON,

AS PUBLISHER OF

THE THIRD PART OF PAINE'S "AGE OF REASON."

BY

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

Digitized by Google

GOTT'S

10/6 TROUSERS TO MEASURE 10/6

ARE THE BEST VALUE IN THE MARKET.

In Brown, Fawn, and Grey Checks, Stripes, and Mixtures.

FILL UP THIS

Self-measurement Form

AND

STATE COLOR PREFERRED,

And we will give you

A BARGAIN.

TROUSERS.

	Inches
A, Round Waist over Trousers
B, Round Seat
E to D, Inside Leg Seam
F to G, Full Length of Trousers
H, Round Thigh
I, Round Knee
J, Round Bottom
Please say Lined or Unlined
Side or Cross Pockets

The Unemployed Problem

FOR THE PRESENT

HAS BEEN SOLVED.

We have given work to all who have applied for it, and still require large numbers more as agents.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; God-Making, by G. L. Mackenzie; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

50 VISITING CARDS FOR NOTHING.—To purchasers of our beautifully-tinted Note-paper and Envelopes. Your name and address artistically printed. Chaste tints and splendid paper. Send eighteen stamps, with name and address, to the Abbey Press, Nuneaton. Post free. No better bargain possible.

APARTMENTS.—Kitchen and two or three Rooms to Let. Gas, bath, etc.—S., 19 Beecholme-road, Upper Clapton, N.E.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

A Life-size Bust Portrait in Oils. In Handsome Gilt Frame, Suitable for Lecture Room or Hall. Carriage paid £2 2s. 21 Maude-terrace, Maud-road, Walthamstow.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saliva Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Worts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 9d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 9d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 9d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 49. SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

PRAYING FOR INGERSOLL.

IN a great book, which has been the delight of millions of children, and full of suggestion to their elders, Man Friday asks Robinson Crusoe why God does not convert the Devil. It seemed as plain as daylight to that fine, unsophisticated fellow, that as sin came through temptation, and temptation came through the Devil, it would be an act of wisdom to convert Old Nick himself, and thus put a complete stop to the emigration from earth to hell. Not another sinner would exist, and therefore not another soul would be lost. Salvation would be effected wholesale instead of retail. Not one man, but all men, would be saved.

Robinson Crusoe was cornered, and, like other theologians in similar difficulties, he turned the conversation. Man Friday's question stands where it was raised by the wily Defoe. The clergy have never answered it. They have never tried to answer it. They never will try to answer it. It pays them better to pursue the policy of evasion.

Over in America there is a dreadful man called Ingersoll. He is the Devil of the United States. He goes up and down, like Satan in the book of Job, tempting people to desert God and join Humanity. A minister, the other day, said that he had two million followers in the land of the Stars and Stripes. All sorts of devices have been tried to stop his evil career. He has been slandered most outrageously, but pious filth falls off him like water from the back of a duck. It simply won't stick. The people look at "Bob's" face, and say "Lies! lies!" He has been challenged to mortal combat (with tongue or pen) by dozens of dirty little Christian apologists. He has been tackled by some superior men, such as Judge Black, Cardinal Manning, and Mr. Gladstone; and they soon had enough of it, leaving the "infidel" to look round the arena and wonder what had become of them. Some men of God have called him a fool; others have called him too clever by half, and said he would laugh the other side of his mouth when he found himself stewing in brimstone. Some have shouted "Police!" and begged the authorities to suppress this wicked "blasphemer." But it is all no good. "Bob" is jollier than ever. People flock to hear him in thousands. He is the most popular "devil" in the United States. It is said that people rub their hands with pleasure when they see him walking down the street.

Something must be done to save Christianity in America; and if natural means fail, resort must be had to miracles.

A brilliant idea occurred to the Christian Endeavor Society, which has members throughout the Union. It was an idea very much like Man Friday's. The way to save Christianity was to convert Ingersoll; and as they couldn't do it, they resolved to ask God to do it himself. Accordingly a midday prayer-meeting was arranged in all the Christian Endeavor churches. A quarter of a million people—mostly women, we suspect—assembled in the different cities, and offered a prayer of fifteen minutes' duration for the "conversion of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, the famous Atheist lecturer." We are not favored with the form of words used on this occasion. No doubt it would be very entertaining to every Rationalist.

Heine, in one of his most characteristic poems, depicts a young man standing by the seashore and asking a number of questions about the universe. And the end of it is this:—

> The winds sweep, the waves scud,
> The stars glitter indifferent and cold—
> And a fool awaits an answer.

Were the witty poet alive now, he might say that, in America, a quarter of a million fools were awaiting an answer.

Have these people asked themselves how God could convert Ingersoll? There are only two possible ways—force or persuasion. Let us look at both.

Force might take several forms—internal or external, disease or violence. An apoplectic stroke, followed by softening of the brain, might be very efficacious. Or a sunstroke, such as Paul seems to have suffered near Damascus, might work wonders. It is astonishing what mental oddities are caused by sunstrokes. It is conceivable that a sunstroke might make even Ingersoll turn a Christian.

Persuasion is a different matter. It would leave Ingersoll's faculties intact. The appeal would be made to his intelligence. God, in short, would have to play the part of a Christian apologist. In that case, it is difficult to see how "Bob's" conversion could be effected. Infinite intellect is not required to prove the truth, and infinite intellect could not prove a falsehood. Take the Bible, for instance. Ingersoll points out its flagrant self-contradictions, absurdities, and immoralities. How in the name of common sense is he to see them otherwise, without a change in his mental vision or an alteration of his moral standard? And how is that to be brought about, unless God takes him to pieces and makes him up afresh?

These praying Christians might ask themselves whether there is any use in prayer. Some of us remember when all the churches in the United States were praying for the recovery of President Garfield, who fell by the bullet of a pious assassin. Prayers went up to heaven from all parts of the Union day after day, hour after hour; yet Garfield's life slowly ebbed away, and the only answer to millions of prayers was a cold white face upon the pillow.

Is it likely that prayers for Ingersoll will be heard and answered, when prayers for Garfield were neglected? Do the Christians of America fancy they have more influence with God at present than they had ten years ago?

Still, if the American Christians must pray, they should really ask God to supply the Church with a man of brains—equal to Ingersoll's; if, indeed, such a man could ever enter the Church. It is a scandal that they have not such a champion already. There are thousands of ministers, who are paid millions a year between them; yet none of them, nor all of them, can answer one "infidel," who has only his own mother-wit, without the assistance of inspiration.

This farce is a public confession of the weakness of Christianity. A miracle is the last resource of hard-pressed faith, and the miracle doesn't arrive. The game is up. Christian Evidences are played out. Christian apologists are at their wits'-end—if they have any wits to get to the end of. Christianity in America cannot even stand up. It is on its knees, praying for Ingersoll.

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

MOON-WORSHIP.

I HAVE before now expressed the opinion that sun-worship as "the key to all the mythologies" has been considerably overdone. That it did have a large place in ancient religion is certain. Dupuis, Volney, Higgins, Dunlap, and others, have shown this long since, though in some instances their sun heroes were, in my opinion, side by side with lunar heroes, or themselves luni-solar; and what they ascribe to the sun I might, perhaps, rather attribute to the general principle of reproductive life. It is, however, the Aryan mythologists, of the school of Max Müller and Sir G. W. Cox, who, with greater philological knowledge, have yet gone furthest astray by resolving so many myths into those of the sun and dawn, simply because, not fully accepting the evolution theory, they are bent on interpreting the myths of archaic man in accordance with the construction put upon them by highly-developed races like the Greeks and Brahmans. When M. Gaidoz showed that the same myths and customs were found in Central Africa as in Rome, he put a pin hole into the Aryan theory, which Mr. J. G. Frazer, by his Golden Bough, enlarged into a big gap; and Mr. Hartland having, in his Legend of Perseus, traced the same beliefs in all continents, we may fairly say its bottom is knocked out. It is to be hoped the principle of interpreting early man by the higher Aryan types, which is only another instance of evolving the camel out of our own inner consciousness, will soon receive its quietus.

The solar theory of religion has had a number of books devoted to its advocacy. The late Orientalist and archæologist, John O'Neill, saw it was incomplete, and in his erudite Night of the Gods, a work the second volume of which, I hope, will soon be published, advocated a polar theory—the view that ancient religion largely concerned itself with the Pole Star as the Most High. As yet, the lunar theory has had, to my mind, altogether inadequate attention; Gerald Massey, Herr Roscher, and Ignaz Goldziher being almost the only persons who have brought out the importance which the moon must have possessed to ancient races. Since early man's worst dangers were in the dark, it was natural that the light of night should be to him almost as important as that of day. The sun becomes of the utmost importance to the settled agriculturist. But in the preceding pastoral nomadic stage the worship of the nocturnal sky and the stars, which guide the way, prevails. The crescent is still the symbol of the Asiatic races.

Wherever there is sun-worship there is a residuum of moon-worship, but not the converse. The lights of the night sky, forming a contrast to the darkness of the earth, attract a savage more than the familiar daylight. There is an ever-changing drama of growth and decay going on up there which falls in with the fantastic magical character of early faith. Dr. Tylor, in his Primitive Culture, says:—

> "In Africa moon-worship is prominent in an immense district where sun-worship is unknown or insignificant. Among south-central tribes men will watch for the first glimpse of the new moon, which they hail with shouts of 'Kua!' and vociferate prayers to it. On such an occasion Dr. Livingstone's Makololo prayed, 'Let our journey with the white man be prosperous,' etc. These people keep holiday at new moon, as, indeed, in many countries her worship is connected with the settlement of periodic festivals. Negro tribes seem almost universally to greet the new moon, whether in delight or disgust. The Guinea people fling themselves about with droll gestures, and pretend to throw firebrands at it; the Ashango men behold it with superstitious fear: the Fetu negroes jumped thrice into the air with hands together and gave thanks. The Congo people fell on their knees, or stood and clapped their hands, crying, 'So may I renew my life as thou art renewed!' The Hottentots are described early in the last century as dancing and singing all night at new and full moon, calling the moon the Great Captain, and crying to him, 'Be greeted! Let us get much honey! May our cattle get much to eat and give much milk!'"

The importance of moon-worship in the history of the past lies here. The moon, as night-god, is side by side with the sun as day-god; while the moon as month-god is known long before, and has festivals far more frequent than the sun as year-god. The lunar calendar, as I have shown in my "Note on the Calendar" in the Secular Almanack for 1896, long preceded the solar calendar.* The importance of knowing the periodic recurrence of times and seasons set up customs and rites, added to the myths of the conflict of light and darkness, and was an integral part of much ancient religion. Dr. Tylor says:—

> "The rude savages of Brazil seem to worship or respect the moon, by which they regulate their time and festivals and draw their omens. They would lift up their hands to the moon with wonder-struck exclamations of 'Teh! teh!' They would have children smoked by the sorcerers to preserve them from moon-given sickness, or the women would hold up their babes to the luminary. An old account of the Caribs describes them as esteeming the moon more than the sun, and at new moon coming out of their houses crying, 'Behold the moon!'"

As the time regulator, the moon naturally became the special object of worship to women. Luna, the moon goddess, is the same as Lucina, the goddess of light, who brings to light; just as lumen is the same as lucmen. Lucina presided over childbirth, and Juno and Diana are both called Lucina. In the Temple of Luna, on the Palatine Hill, she was worshipped as Noctiluca, and her temple was lighted up every night. This was a representative charm, similar to the dancing by torchlight of ruder peoples.

The moon-worship of the ancient Arabs, Phœnicians, and Carthaginians* is well attested. The adoption of the weekly Sabbath everywhere points to luniolatry; and that the Jews once worshipped sun and moon seems certain from Deuteronomy xvii. 3, Job xxxi. 36, and Jeremiah viii. 2. Anyway, the new moon made their most ancient festival.

It is just possible that the Yahu or IAO of the Jews originally, like Io, represented a soli-lunar deity, the lord god of the Sabbath. Certainly his early festivals were those of the new moon. His function of opening and closing the womb (Genesis xx. 18, xxix. 31; 1 Samuel i. 6; Isaiah lxvi. 9) was especially that of "the Lord of growth." Ioh, in Egyptian, is the moon, and Ehe the cow. When Jeroboam made two golden calves and said, "Behold thy gods, O Israel" (1 Kings xii. 28), the calves were just as likely symbols of the sun and moon as of the sun in Taurus. The altar was decorated with horns, emblems of power, and also of the moon. Cedrennus tells us that "Iao is, among the Chaldæans, interpreted as meaning Intelligent Light in the Phœnician tongue, and Sabaoth as meaning Over the Seven Heavens." The Assyrian moon-god is Sin, whose name probably appears in Sinai and Sennacherib. The expression, "from the origin of the god Sin," was used to mark remote antiquity. Samas, the sun, is called in the Assyrian epic of Ishtar "The Son of Sin," the moon-god (iv. 2); and this points, as Schrader observes, "to a veneration of the moon-god in Babylonia earlier than that of the sun-god," or else to a conception of night preceding the day. Speaking of Mount Sinai, the learned Ignaz Goldziher writes: "The mountain must in ancient times have been consecrated to the moon. The beginning of the Hebrew religion, which, we shall see, was connected with the phenomena of the night sky, germinated first during the residence in Egypt on the foundation of an ancient myth. The recollection of this occasioned them to call the part of Egypt which they had long inhabited eres siniim, 'Moonland' (Isaiah xlix. 12)" (Mythology among the Hebrews, p. 160).

In China, as in Syria and Rome, the priests celebrated the new and full moon feasts. The birthday of the emperor in olden times was always fixed for the first day of a new moon. In Goa and other parts of India the natives prostrate themselves at the appearance of a new moon. "Monotheist as he is," says Dr. Tylor (P. C., ii. 302), "the Moslem still claps his hands at sight of the new moon, and says a

---

* Mas and moon are alike to be traced to the Ur-Aryan ma, to measure. Sanskrit, mas; Zend, mao; Persian, mah; Greek, mene; Latin, mensis; Saxon, mona. Man is the time-measurer, the moon the month-measurer. Strabo tells us that the cult of the moon-god Men, the Lunus of the Roman, was widely established in Asia Minor. The first man among the Maories was Maui, who has been compared to Menes, Manu, Minos, Minyas, and Mannus.

* That great writer, Gustave Flaubert, at once poet and realist, in his splendid reconstruction of Carthage, thus makes his heroine, Salammbo, address the moon with an ancient hymn: "Les épouses hurlent ton nom dans la douleurs des enfantements! Tu gonfles les coquillages! Tu fais bouillonner les vins. Tu putréfies les cadavres! Tu forme les perles au fond de la mer! Et tous les germes, ô Déesse, fermentent dans les obscures profondeurs de ton humidité. Quand tu parais, il s'épand une quiétude sur la terre; les fleurs se ferment, les flots s'apaisent, les hommes fatigués s'étendent la poitrine vers toi, et le monde avec ses océans et ses montagnes, comme en une miroir, se regarde dans ta figure. Tu es blanche, douce, lumineuse, immaculée, auxiliatrice, purifiante, sereine!"

Digitized by Google

prayer." According to Vallency, the Irish, on seeing the new moon, immediately knelt down and repeated the Lord's Prayer. But moon-lore is so extensive that its further consideration must be deferred. The fact that among all peoples there are more remnants of superstitions about the moon than concerning the sun, affords, I think, support to my contention. J. M. WHEELER.

A GLOOMY ASPECT OF CHRISTIANITY.

THE Christian scheme of salvation is pronounced by its exponents as "glad tidings to man," but we regard it as presenting an exceedingly gloomy aspect of a most perplexing faith. The scheme is based upon the assumption that, in consequence of an event that is said to have occurred thousands of years ago, over which the human race had no control, mankind became sinners, and thereby rendered themselves liable to eternal misery and suffering in a future, and to us an unknown, state of existence. According to this scheme, the "everlasting destruction" of some people is a certainty, and this from no fault of their own. Hence we read in the New Testament: "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin.....By the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation.....For, by one man's disobedience, many were made sinners. By man came death ..... in Adam all die" (Romans v. 12–18, 19; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22). This appears to have been Calvin's view, for he says: "We derive an innate depravity from our very birth; the denial of this is an instance of consummate impudence.....All children, without a single exception, are polluted as soon as they exist. Infants themselves, as they bring their condemnation into the world with them, are rendered obnoxious to punishment by their own sinfulness. For, though they have not yet produced the fruits of their iniquity, yet they have the whole seed of it in them; their whole nature cannot but be odious to God" (Institutes, book ii., sections 5, 6, and 8).

That the number to be saved by this scheme is limited is evident, for we read in the New Testament: "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able" (Luke xiii. 24). "For many are called, but few are chosen" (Matt. xxii. 14). We are also told in Ephesians that some were predestined to be the children of Christ; and in Romans (ix.) it is said that others were made "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction." In the Seventeenth Article of the Church of England it is stated: "Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind."

The gloomy feature in this scheme is, that it is impossible for us to save ourselves; we are helpless and entirely dependent upon other resources for our salvation. Hence we read: "Therefore, by the deeds of the law, there shall no flesh be justified in his sight, for by the law is the knowledge of sin." "Where is boasting, then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay; but by the law of faith. Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." "For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not before God. For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Romans iii. 20, 27, and 28; Romans iv. 2 and 3; Galatians ii. 16). The 9th, 10th, and 11th articles of the national religion plainly state that "Original sin is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit; and, therefore, in every person born in the world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." "The condition of man is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith and calling upon God. Wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God." "We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings."

The Bible represents man as being so thoroughly bad that self-salvation is impossible. Its words are: "And the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake, for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth" (Genesis viii. 21). "The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand and seek God. They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one" (Psalm xiv. 2, 3). "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked" (Jeremiah xvii. 9). "For I know that in me dwelleth no good thing; for the good that I would," says St. Paul, "I do not, but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now, if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me" (Romans vii. 18, 19, 20). It is useless to urge that the difficulty is removed by the invitation to go to Christ for salvation, for we cannot go to him by our own exertions. Here is a dilemma in which a poor helpless sinner is placed. In St. John's Gospel (xiv. 6) we read that Jesus said, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me"; and in St. John (vi. 44) it also alleges that Jesus stated, "No man can come to me except the Father draw him." Thus we cannot be saved except we go to Christ; but we cannot go to Christ unless the Father draw us. This cheerless scheme amounts to this: if the Father draws us, we must go; and if he does not draw us, we cannot go, and then we are to be damned for not doing what God has prevented us from accomplishing. This is "glad tidings" with a vengeance! Briefly the matter stands thus: "We cannot do good if we would, for there is no help in us; we cannot be saved unless we have faith; but we cannot have faith unless we pray for it; but we cannot pray unless we have grace; but we cannot have grace unless God gives it; but he will not give it unless we ask it; and we cannot ask it unless he inclines us to do so." May it never be our fate to profess to believe in such theological metaphysics as Christianity here presents.

The question which should now be asked is: If the Christian scheme of salvation was necessary to regenerate the world, why was it not declared immediately after Adam's alleged transgression, so that it might have prevented a single generation going to the grave with the curse of original sin unremoved? But, according to Bible chronology, God allowed 4,000 years to elapse, and numbers of generations not only to live and die, but to run riot in all descriptions of ignorance and iniquity, ere the reparation was made. Why was this? Did it take God—to whom consideration of time is said to be as nothing—four thousand years to determine how to get out of the difficulty which he himself had created? If none could be saved except those who believed in Christ, what became of those millions of human beings who passed away prior to his birth? and what will be the fate of those now living who have never heard, and probably never will hear, the name of Jesus of Nazareth? Were the former saved by anticipation, and will the latter be excused on account of their ignorance? If so, where was the necessity of the atonement at all? If men could enter heaven without the crucifixion, then Christ need not have suffered. His sorrow, agony, and bloody sweat might all have been avoided, and numbers of human beings might have died quietly in their beds, instead of enduring tortures at the stake or on the rack. Besides, if ignorance of this scheme will save people from damnation, is it not useless and cruel to send missionaries to the heathen with the "glad tidings"? Let them not know of it, and they will be punished for rejecting it; inform them of it, and their eternal happiness becomes at least doubtful, for their diversity of organisation and their environment make it impossible that all can accept it as true.

This scheme of salvation is indeed a mystery, and it almost inclines one to believe with St. Mark that "all these things are done in parables; that seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand, lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them" (Mark iv. 11, 12); or with St. Matthew, that "narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matt. vii. 14).

CHARLES WATTS.

Digitized by Google

INGERSOLL'S NEW LECTURE.

(Further Extracts.)

THE AGE OF THE WORLD AND MAN.

THE geologists demonstrated that the author of Genesis was mistaken as to the age of the world, and that the story of the universe having been created in six days, about six thousand years ago, could not be true. The theologians then took the ground that the "days" spoken of in Genesis were periods of time, epochs, six "long whiles," and that the work of creation might have been commenced millions of years ago. The change of days into epochs was considered by the believers of the Bible as a great triumph over the hosts of Infidelity. The fact that Jehovah had ordered the Jews to keep the Sabbath, giving as a reason that he had made the world in six days and rested on the seventh, did not interfere with the acceptance of the "epoch" theory.

According to the Bible, Adam was certainly the first man, and in his case the epoch theory cannot change the account. The Bible gives the age at which Adam died, and gives the generations to the flood—then to Abraham and so on, and shows that from the creation of Adam to the birth of Christ it was about four thousand and four years.

According to the sacred scriptures, man has been on this earth five thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine years, and no more. Is this true?

Let me give you a fact: The Egyptians were astronomers. A few years ago representations of the stars were found on the walls of an old temple, and it was discovered by calculating backward that the stars did occupy the exact positions as represented about seven hundred and fifty years before Christ. Afterwards another representation of the stars was found, and, by calculating in the same way, it was found that the stars did occupy the exact positions represented about three thousand eight hundred years before Christ.

According to the Bible, the first man was created four thousand and four years before Christ. If this is true, then Egypt was founded, its language formed, its arts cultivated, its astronomical discoveries made and recorded about two hundred years after the creation of the first man.

In other words, Adam was two or three hundred years old when the Egyptian astronomers made these representations. Nothing can be more absurd.

TWO REST DAYS.

According to the Bible, Jehovah made the world in six days, and the work done each day is described. What did Jehovah do on the second day? This is the record: "And God said, let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament. And it was so, and God called the firmament heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day."

Now, we know that there is no firmament, and we know that the waters are not divided by a firmament. Consequently we know that, according to the Bible, Jehovah did nothing on the second day. He must have rested on Tuesday. This being so, we ought to have two Sundays a week.

DAVID AS A COLLECTOR.

We are told by this inspired book of the gold and silver collected by King David for the temple—the temple afterwards completed by the virtuous Solomon. According to the blessed Bible, David collected about two thousand million dollars in silver, and five thousand million dollars in gold, making a total of seven thousand million dollars. Is this true? There is in the Bank of France at the present time (1895) nearly six hundred million dollars, and, so far as we know, it is the greatest amount that was ever gathered together. All the gold now known, coined and in bullion, does not amount to much more than the sum collected by David. Seven thousand millions! Where did David get this gold? The Jews had no commerce. They owned no ships. They had no great factories; they produced nothing for other countries. There were no gold or silver mines in Palestine. Where, then, was this gold, this silver, found? I will tell you: in the imagination of a writer who had more patriotism than intelligence, and who wrote, not for the sake of truth, but for the glory of the Jews. Is it possible that David collected nearly eight thousand tons of gold—that he by economy got together about sixty thousand tons of silver, making a total of gold and silver of sixty-eight thousand tons?

The average freight car carries about fifteen tons. David's gold and silver would load about four thousand five hundred and thirty-three cars, making a train about thirty-two miles in length. And all this for the temple at Jerusalem, a building ninety feet long and forty-five feet high and thirty feet wide, to which was attached a porch thirty feet wide, ninety feet long, and one hundred and eighty feet high. Probably the architect was inspired.

Is there a sensible man in the world who believes that David collected seven thousand million dollars' worth of gold or silver? There is hardly five thousand million dollars of gold now used as money in the whole world. Think of the millions taken from the mines of California, Australia, and Africa during the present century, and yet the total scarcely exceeds the amount collected by King David more than a thousand years before the birth of Christ. Evidently the inspired historian made a mistake.

THE WISE MEN.

Matthew says: "Now, when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him."

Matthew does not tell us who these wise men were, from what country they came, to what race they belonged. He did not even know their names. We are also informed that, when Herod heard these things, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him; that he gathered the chief priests and asked of them where Christ should be born, and they told him that he was to be born in Bethlehem. Then Herod called the wise men and asked them when the star appeared, and told them to go to Bethlehem and report to him. When they left Herod, the star again appeared and went before them until it stood over the place where the child was. When they came to the child they worshipped him, gave him gifts, and, being warned by God in a dream, they went back to their own country without calling on Herod.

Is this story true? Must we believe in the star and the wise men? Who were these wise men? From what country did they come? What interest had they in the birth of the king of the Jews? What became of them and their star? Of course I know that the holy Catholic Church has in her keeping the three skulls that belonged to these wise men, but I do not know where the Church obtained these relics, nor exactly how their genuineness has been established.

AN ANACHRONISM.

We are told in Matthew xxiii. 35 that Christ said: "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar."

It is certain that these words were not spoken by Christ. He could not by any possibility have known that the blood of Zacharias had been shed. As a matter of fact, Zacharias was killed by the Jews during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and this siege took place seventy-one years after the birth of Christ, thirty-eight years after he was dead.

There is still another mistake.

Zacharias was not the son of Barachias—no such Zacharias was killed. The Zacharias that was slain was the son of Baruch.

But we must not expect the "inspired" to be accurate.

POLITE SAINTS.

Matthew says that at the time of the crucifixion "the graves were opened, and that many bodies of the saints which slept arose and came out of their graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many." According to this, the graves were opened at the time of the crucifixion, but the dead did not arise and come out until after the resurrection of Christ.

They were polite enough to sit in their open graves and wait for Christ to rise first.

Digitized by Google

JUDAS.

Besides, it is hard to see why Christians hate, loathe, and despise Judas. According to their scheme of salvation, it was absolutely necessary that Christ should be killed—necessary that he should be betrayed; and had it not been for Judas, all the world, including Christ's mother, and the part of Christ that was human, would have gone to hell. Yet, according to the New Testament, Christ did not know that one of his disciples was to betray him. Jesus, when on his way to Jerusalem, for the last time, said, speaking to the twelve disciples, Judas being present, that they, the disciples, should thereafter sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Yet, more than a year before this journey, John says that Christ said, speaking to the twelve disciples: "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" And John adds: "He spake of Judas Iscariot, for it was he that should betray him." Why did Christ, a year afterwards, tell Judas that he should sit on a throne and judge one of the tribes of Israel? There is still another trouble. Paul says that Jesus, after his resurrection, appeared to the twelve disciples. According to Paul, Jesus appeared to Judas with the rest. Certainly Paul had not heard the story of the betrayal.

Why did Christ select Judas as one of his disciples, knowing that he would betray him? Did he desire to be betrayed? Was it his intention to be put to death? Why did he fail to defend himself before Pilate?

According to the accounts, Pilate wanted to save him. Did Christ wish to be convicted?

The Christians are compelled to say that Christ intended to be sacrificed—that he selected Judas with that end in view, and that he refused to defend himself because he desired to be crucified. All this is in accordance with the horrible idea that without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin.

THE INCARNATION.

The New Testament informs us that Christ was the son of Joseph and the son of God, and that Mary was his mother. How is it established that Christ was the son of God? It is said that Joseph was told so in a dream by an angel. But Joseph wrote nothing on that subject—said nothing, so far as we know. Mary wrote nothing, said nothing. The angel that appeared to Joseph, or that informed Joseph, said nothing to anybody else. Neither has the Holy Ghost, the supposed father, ever said or written one word. We have received no information from the parties who could have known anything on the subject. We get all our facts from those who could not have known. How is it possible to prove that the Holy Ghost was the father of Christ? Who knows that such a being as the Holy Ghost ever existed? How was it possible for Mary to know anything about the Holy Ghost? How could Joseph know that he had been visited by an angel in a dream? Could he know that the visitor was an angel? It all occurred in a dream when poor Joseph was asleep. What is the testimony of one who was asleep worth? All the evidence we have is that somebody who wrote part of the New Testament says that the Holy Ghost was the father of Christ, and that somebody who wrote another part of the New Testament says that Joseph was the father of Christ. Matthew and Luke give the genealogy, and both show that Christ was the son of Joseph. The "Incarnation" has to be believed without evidence. There is no way in which it can be established. It is beyond the reach and realm of reason. It defies observation, and is independent of experience.

THE TRINITY.

Christ, according to the faith, is the second person in the Trinity, the Father being the first and the Holy Ghost the third. Each of these three persons is God. Christ is his own father and his own son. The Holy Ghost is neither father nor son, but both. The son was begotten by the father, but existed before he was begotten—just the same before as after. Christ is just as old as his father, and the father is just as young as his son. The Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and Son, but was equal to the Father and Son before he proceeded—that is to say, before he existed; but he is of the same age as the other two. So, it is declared that the Father is God, and the Son God, and the Holy Ghost God, and that these three Gods make one God. According to the celestial multiplication table, once one is three, and three times one is one; and, according to heavenly subtraction, if we take two from three, three are left. The addition is equally peculiar; if we add two to one, we have but one. Each one is equal to himself and the other two. Nothing ever was, nothing ever can be, more perfectly idiotic and absurd than the dogma of the Trinity.

Is it possible for a human being, who has been born but once, to comprehend or to imagine the existence of three beings, each of whom is equal to the three? Think of one of these beings as the father of one, and think of that one as half human and all God, and think of the third as having proceeded from the other two, and then think of all three as one. Think that, after the father begot the son, the father was still alone, and after the Holy Ghost proceeded from the father and the son, the father was still alone—because there never was, and never will be, but one God. At this point, absurdity having reached its limit, nothing more can be said except: "Let us pray."

SACRIFICE.

A man steals, and then sacrifices a dove or gives a lamb to a priest. His crime remains the same. He need not kill something. Let him give back the thing stolen, and in future live an honest life.

A man slanders his neighbor, and then kills an ox. What has that to do with the slander? Let him take back his slander, make all the reparation that he can, and let the ox alone.

There is no sense in sacrifice, never was, and never will be.

Make restitution, reparation, undo the wrong, and you need shed no blood.

THE INFINITE WILD BEAST.

If Christianity were only stupid and unscientific, if its God were ignorant and kind, if it promised eternal joy to believers, and if the believers practised the forgiveness they teach, for one I should let the faith alone.

But there is another side to Christianity. It is not only stupid, but malicious. It is not only unscientific, but it is heartless. Its God is not only ignorant, but infinitely cruel. It not only promises the faithful an eternal reward, but declares that nearly all of the children of men, imprisoned in the dungeons of God, will suffer eternal pain. This is the savagery of Christianity. This is why I hate its unthinkable God, its impossible Christ, its inspired lies, and its selfish, heartless heaven. . . .

That word [hell] drove pity from the hearts of men, stained countless swords with blood, lighted fagots, forged chains, built dungeons, erected scaffolds, and filled the world with poverty and pain. That word is a coiled serpent in the mother's breast, that lifts its fanged head and hisses in her ear: "Your child will be the fuel of eternal fire."

That word blots from the firmament the star of hope and leaves the heavens black. That word makes the Christian's God an eternal torturer, an everlasting inquisitor—an infinite wild beast.

THE PERORATION.

But, says the prejudiced priest, the malicious minister, "You take away a future life." I am not trying to destroy another world, but I am endeavoring to prevent the theologians from destroying this. If we are immortal, it is a fact in nature, and that fact does not depend on Bibles or Christs, on priests or creeds. The hope of another life was in the heart long before the "sacred books" were written, and will remain there long after all the "sacred books" are known to be the work of savage and superstitious men. Hope is the consolation of the world.

The wanderers hope for home. Hope builds the house and plants the flowers and fills the air with song.

The sick and suffering hope for health. Hope gives them health and paints the roses in their cheeks.

The lonely, the forsaken, hope for love.—Hope brings the lover to their arms. They feel the kisses on their eager lips, though they may die alone.

The poor in tenements and huts, in spite of rags and hunger, hope for wealth.—Hope fills their thin and trembling hands with gold.

The dying hopes that death is but another birth, and love leans above the pallid face and whispers, "We shall meet again."

Hope is the consolation of the world. Let us hope that if there be a God he is wise and good. Let us hope that if there be another life it will bring peace and joy to all the children of men. And let us hope that this poor earth on which we live may be a perfect world—a world without a crime, without a tear.

Digitized by Google

—Truthseeker.

CURIOSITIES OF THE HEBREW BIBLE.

To most of us a Hebrew Bible is an unintelligible collection of cabalistic characters written topsy-turvey. But, after the student has mastered its backward alphabet, he finds that it contains curious anomalies of its own. In some places he finds a letter printed unusually large; in others unnecessarily small. If his copy be vocalised—that is, having a cloud of small marks attached to the letters—he will occasionally meet with words without vowels; or, still stranger, vowels without words. Sometimes a letter is printed upside down, or out of its place, and above the general line. The student may think that all these things are due to errors of that much-blamed being, the compositor, or he may have suspicions that the printer has been indulging in the culinary pastime of "making pie." But he will discover that these self-same errors are religiously repeated in every edition of the book to which he has access, whether it be in print or manuscript; and they are even older than the division of the Bible into chapters and verses.

The explanation lies in the fact that the Hebrew text was settled by the Jewish scholars of about the eighth century A.D.; and these scholars, instead of striving to produce a pure text by study and comparison of different manuscripts, simply took one MS. and made every other conform to it. This standard MS. was so servilely copied that the printed Hebrew Bibles of to-day reproduce the clerical errors of their prototype of the eighth century; and, unless they contain these errors, they are considered incorrect.

In many early manuscripts we find the first letter of a page written large, in order to give a good effect to the book; and this is the origin of our capitals. The prototype of the Hebrew Bible was evidently decorated in the same way, for we find initial letters of words still printed in larger type, although these words are now printed in the middle, or at the bottom of a page. Thus in Deuteronomy xviii. 13 and xxxii. 6 we find these "great letters" much larger than the rest of the text, not to mention many other places.

Again, in ancient manuscripts we find the last letters of a line compressed together, and some written small in order to get them in. If we turn to Genesis ii. 4, we see that the h of Behibaram is printed small; in xxiii. 2 the k of Welibkothah; in xxvii. 46 the q of Qasthi; and the same peculiarity occurs again and again without rhyme or reason.

When we are writing, and leave out a letter by accident, we write that letter above the word, and mark its place by a caret—thus Maasseh. The same thing was done in ancient MSS., except that they had no caret, and contented themselves with writing the letter above the line. In Judges xviii. 30 the letter n of the word Manasseh is "suspended" above the line. Without the n the name is Moses; and as the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and all other early versions read Moses, it is clear that this "suspended letter" is merely the result of Rabbinical ingenuity. In Psalm lxxx. 14 one of the letters of the word "wood" is suspended; and this appears to be a genuine correction. But Job xxxviii. 13 and 15 may have been emendations for doctrinal reasons.

If we turn to Psalm xxvii. 13 in the English Bible, we read, "I had fainted unless," etc. The italics of "I had fainted" show that they are not present in the Hebrew. They are merely put in to excuse "unless," which has a row of dots over it in the original. A comparison of old writings shows us that it was the general custom to cancel a word written in error by putting a dot over each letter. Now-a-days we run the pen through the word. This word, "unless," is unnecessary to the Psalm, and, in order to bring it in, scholars who deny the possibility of errors in the holy scriptures are obliged to read into the text something that is not there. Ezekiel xli. 20 contains a still more glaring instance. The first word of verse 21 (ha-hekel, the temple) was written twice over by mistake, and the scribe dotted the first ha-hekel to show that it was to be struck out. But the two words, dots and all, have been carefully copied into every known Hebrew Bible; and, consequently, scholars have sought to make sense of them in both verses. In Genesis xxxiii. 4 we read that Esau fell upon Jacob's neck and kissed him. It may have struck the reader that it is somewhat difficult to kiss a person by falling on his neck. But in the Hebrew the words, "and kissed him," are all dotted, so that it is a mistake to suppose that Jacob was kissed on that occasion. Esau fell on his neck and wept. (Compare Genesis xlv. 14.)

All the above peculiarities belong to the consonantal text; but when the vowels were invented and added to the consonants other remarkable features were developed. In vocalised books a word is sometimes met with unvocalised. This is a sign that it is not to be read at all. Occasionally a word is written with the vowels of another word. Thus "Yahveh" is generally adorned with the vowels of "Adonai"; or, when Adonai already precedes Yahveh, the latter is vocalised as "Elohim"—which, of course, means that the divine name Yahveh is not to be pronounced, but Adonai or Elohim substituted. Ignorance of this fact caused the translators of the English Bible to read the consonants and vowels together, as they were written, and gave us the form, "Jehovah." The word "Molech" arose in the same way. The Hebrew text has Melech = "king"; but the vowel points of Bosheth = "abomination," are written upon it as a sign for the reader to say "abomination" instead of "king."

There are a few places in the Old Testament (such as Jeremiah xxxviii. 16, Ezekiel xlviii. 16, etc.) where words are not vocalised, and are not read, because their insertion is ungrammatical. But there are other still more interesting instances where vowels are written where there are no consonants to attach them to. In the English Bible we read in 2 Kings xix. 37 that Sennacherib was slain by Adrammelech and Sharezer, "his sons." But the words, "his sons," are not in the Hebrew text. The vowels have been written in to make the passage correspond with the later corrupted text of Isaiah. It would have saved our Assyriologists from making themselves ridiculous if they had noted this fact, and not attempted to read on the monuments what was neither there nor in the book of Kings. Similarly, in 2 Samuel viii. 3, we read of David recovering his border at the "river Euphrates." There is no such word as "Euphrates" in the Hebrew text. The mediæval Rabbins wrote in the vowels of the word as a sign for the reader to pronounce it, although it is not in the text. It is evident from the names mentioned in the narrative that David was nowhere near the Euphrates in this campaign. Although the Jewish scholars of the Middle Ages were debarred by superstition from interfering with the text of the Bible as it was handed down to them, yet they had no scruples against touching it up here and there in order to enhance the glories of the Hebrew race.

CHILPERIC.

It Came Back.

At the parish church of Black River special sermons were to be preached and collections made on behalf of the Home and Foreign Missionary Society. To remind them of the annual effort, and to request their attendance in church, Archdeacon Ramson visited many of his flock for some time previously.

A few days after the event had transpired the worthy archdeacon walked into the shop of an old woman, a somewhat hardened case, whom he had seen at church on that day for the first time. Judge of his surprise and amusement when, before he could utter a word of greeting, she startled him by jerking out in great wrath: "Ah, you've comed; I tho't you would. But I'll give no more to your missions, not I. Why, look at that," reaching down a nickel penny from the shelf. "I put that in the plate, and it has comed back to me. I marked it, I did, for I knowed well them niggers never got the money."

Be to the best thou knowest ever true,
Is all the creed.
Then, be thy talisman of rosy hue,
Or fenced with thorns that wearing thou must bleed,
Or gentle pledge of love's prophetic view,
Thy faithful steps it will securely lead.

—Sarah Margaret Fuller.

Digitized by Google

ACID DROPS.

Lord Rosebery has given another alarm to the Nonconformist Conscience. He has actually bought the fine portrait of Gibbon by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the papers say he is very proud of possessing it. A man who prides himself on having the portrait of Gibbon cannot be a fit and proper person to lead a great political party in the "most Christian" nation in the world.

Keir Hardie's Labor Leader is not infallible. In some respects it is not even fairly accurate. It says that "The Secularist movement has died, and is getting itself buried." What a curious confusion! Surely the writer must be Irish. Whoever heard of a dead person superintending his own funeral.

Some time ago Keir Hardie announced that the Labor Leader would have to be dropped in consequence of inadequate circulation. How he got out of the difficulty we don't know, though we hear it was through bourgeois assistance. The Freethinker is not dropping in consequence of inadequate circulation, and it does not depend on anybody's cheques.

The Nonconformists are very indignant with Lord Salisbury for pointing out that Board schools had been worked in their interest. Dr. Guinness Rogers declares that in ten thousand rural parishes throughout this country the children of Nonconformist parents are practically driven into Church schools, and are shut out from the chances of entering the teaching career in the places where they live unless they join a Church which is not the Church of their fathers. The Nonconformist deputation to Lord Salisbury, too, pointed out the practical uselessness in such schools of the Conscience Clause. Yet they unite with the Churchmen in thinking that Secularists should be satisfied with such a fraud. All the trouble which the Nonconformists see in front of them arises from their having deserted their old principle, that the State should have nothing whatever to do with the teaching of religion.

The Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley writes in the December number of the Nineteenth Century on "Reopening the Education Settlement of 1870." One of his illustrations of the management of Church schools is very edifying. It is the case of St. John's National School, Birkenhead. "The report on this school," Mr. Stanley says, "for the year ending the 31st of December, 1894, shows that the average attendance was 1,140; that the voluntary subscriptions were £7 7s.; the fees paid by parents were £272; that the total expenditure for the year was £1,780; about £130 was deducted under the 17s. 6d. limit, on account of the failure of local income. Nevertheless, the income for the year exceeded the expenditure by £100, and in spite of this surplus income the managers failed to pay attention to the demand made by the department that certain defective galleries should be improved, and that cloak rooms should be provided."

The State pays 3½ millions for the support of denominational schools, and the subscribers contribute £800,000; a large part of the latter amount being given to avoid the levying of a school rate. In 1893 no less than 1,061 denominational schools had no subscriptions; while in 674 others the subscriptions amounted to less than 1s. per child.

The Church schools of the 32 Lancashire boroughs raised only £24,532 in subscriptions; while the school fees amounted to £32,364, and the Government grants to £211,879. The Churchmen of Birmingham raise less than £3,000 a year for the maintenance of their schools; while the State contributes over £22,000.

Here are some figures showing what the State pays and what Church people pay for a number of Church schools in London:—

	GRANTS.	SUBSCRIPTIONS.
St. Thomas, Charterhouse ...	£337 19 0 ...	£2 2 0
St. Barnabas, Holloway ...	896 2 0 ...	27 19 8
St. Thomas, Islington ...	675 18 4 ...	3 5 0
St. George's, Camberwell ...	1,085 4 9 ...	58 2 3
St. Peter's, Battersea ...	189 17 0 ...	0 8 6
St. John's, Walworth ...	734 11 10 ...	33 7 9

At Rochdale, for every shilling paid by the State to Church schools the subscribers give less than a penny. At Burslem there is a school with only £6 16s. 6d. subscriptions against Government grants of £856 10s. At Ashton-under-Lyne the subscribers to Church schools pay only one-seventeenth of the whole expenditure. The largest Church school in Southampton (Holy Trinity) has a total income of £1,200; of this the subscribers contribute only £25. The Church school of St. John, Birkenhead, receives from Government £1,577 14s. 10d., and from subscribers £7 7s. The Church school of St. Andrew, Derby, receives from Government £1,236 7s. 8d., and from subscribers £20. The seventeen Church schools in Birkenhead receive from subscribers £633, from Government £7,853. The subscribers contributed 1s. 5½d. per child; the Government 18s. 1d.

Jabez Balfour, the pious scoundrel, who was so fond of reading the Bible, is now doing fourteen years' penal servitude. "Observer," writing to the Standard, says: "A short time ago I happened to be at West Croydon, and heard a beautiful peal of bells at the West Croydon Congregational Chapel. This peal of bells, I am informed, was presented by Mr. Jabez Balfour, and cost between £700 and £800. I cannot help thinking that if those in authority among the congregation at West Croydon wish for the luxury of such a peal of bells, they should be in a position to pay for them, and it seems to me that it would only be a Christian action on their part either to sell these bells or to subscribe their value, and devote the proceeds to the relief of the poor 'Liberator' victims."

The following paragraph appeared in the Westminster Gazette of Wednesday, November 27: "Secularism in the Colonies.—The Secularists of Sydney do not appear to be making much headway. According to the Sydney Telegraph, in 1892 they opened their Lyceum Freethought Hall in Campbell-street, costing £4,500, and dedicated it to the destruction of Christianity and Godism in Sydney. Last month the building was purchased by the Church of Christ for £2,200. At the opening services Mr. James Smith, now laboring for the City Mission, who was vice-president of the Secularists' Society when the hall was built, was among the speakers, and the first person to profess conversion to Christianity was a gentleman until recently secretary of the Freethought party."

This sort of thing will mislead Christians and indifferentists, as of course it is intended to do; but it should not mislead Freethinkers. Supposing the statement as to the building at Sydney to be true, what does it prove? Simply this: That Christian laws incapacitate Secular Societies from holding property in trust for their principles, and that nothing less than this will give them any security. Property that has to be held by a commercial tenure is, sooner or later, sure to be alienated. We have had illustrations of this in England, and the moral of it is that the acquisition of property is a mistake while the law remains as it is. We must go on using halls, without possessing them, and while we can do this—although it is not the ideally best thing—our movement will be very far from being as weak as the enemy fondly imagine it.

The Armenians estimate the losses suffered by their community during the late events in Anatolia at £T10,000,000, and the number of victims at 40,000. They fear that these figures will be considerably increased, owing to the approaching winter and the threatened famine.

The monks of San Francisco, at Bagnorea, Viterbo, have their own way of interpreting the injunctions of the Sermon on the Mount. A band of brigands attacked them, but they made such bold resistance with guns, knives, and any weapon that came to hand, that the armed robbers took to flight.

In the divorce case of Biedermann v. Biedermann the husband told the wife they were not legally married, as she was a Catholic and he was a Protestant. If civil marriage were compulsory, as in other countries, such nonsense would have no chance of being believed.

A telegram from Lima, Peru, states that, a proposal for reforms in the convict revenues having been made in Congress, the Church party were much alarmed, and a number of them assembled outside the House and attacked the deputies as they were leaving. The Congress subsequently censured the Government for neglecting to afford sufficient protection to members of Parliament.

The Rev. J. E. Vaux has a not intentionally amusing letter in the Church Times on "Priests without Blemish." He argues that the injunction in Leviticus, that all things offered to the Lord should be without blemish, applies to the priests. From Deuteronomy it is evident that if Mr. Vaux is right the bishop ought to require all candidates for the holy office to be stripped and inspected before they are ordained.

Mr. Lang, in a recent Daily News article, mentions that the early Scotch ministers solemnly accused a witch of transferring the illness of Archbishop Adamson to a white pony. The horse it was that died.

Paris women who wear bloomers or knickerbockers when riding bicycles will be disqualified from receiving the sacraments of the Church, according to the instructions issued to the clergy by the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris.

Digitized by Google

The Kentish rector who asked a class of small boys who was the patron saint of England received as an answer, "Mr. Gladstone." This reminds one of the incident which occurred a few years ago when a deputation visited Mr. Gladstone at Hawarden to endeavor to enlist his sympathies in some enterprise which they projected. In the temporary absence of the ex-Premier the deputation was received by a friend of the family, who, by way of beguiling time, asked how the scheme was progressing. "Only moderately," was the response, "but we rely upon the aid of One Above." "Ah, yes," returned the querist, with upraised eyes; "he is only washing his hands, and will be down directly." The next instant Mr. Gladstone entered the room.

Oh, for the "good old times"! The Rev. S. Baring Gould says: "With the march of the times we have abolished dames' schools, and cut away thereby a means of livelihood from many a worthy woman; but, what is worse, we have driven the little ones into Board schools that are Godless, where they are taught to despise manual labor, and to grow up without moral principle." Of course, these statements are false; but equally, of course, in clerical eyes, absence of clerical domination means everything that is bad.

Christian civilisation is doubtless a divine article, but it means misery, degradation, and extinction to inferior races. Here is the testimony of the Christianised Dr. Eastman, the learned Sioux Indian, before a congregation of notable Christians at the Church of the Ascension, New York: "My race," he said, "has degenerated physically and morally since civilisation was thrust upon it." He described the Indians, as he knew them in early life, dignified, courteous, brave, merry and fleet-footed, spirited when at the camp fire, grave when at counsel, reverent to their elders, and kindly to their wives. "They owe," said he, "to civilisation the fact that they are now idlers, gamblers, drunkards, and beggars." This lets us understand how highly the Chinese and Japs are to be reprobated for wishing to have nothing to do with Christian civilisation.

An English missionary has been killed in Madagascar. This is a small set-off against the number of Madagascar natives who have recently been killed by Europeans.

Crazed by religion, Mrs. Elias Gilder, of Allantown, Pa., only a few days ago sacrificed the life of her babe to appease the wrath of a supposed angry Deity. The child was suffocated. Its little body had been badly beaten, and the tiny ankles were hacked with a butcher-knife.

Mrs. Rayward, of Hull, had musical tastes, and eloped with another member of the choir in her church. She also eloped with her husband's money. The court has granted him a divorce with £300 damages.

William Horrocks, superintendent of a Farnworth Wesleyan school, and conductor of a Wesleyan Mission Brass Band, has been sentenced to three months' hard labor at Bolton for stealing his employer's goods.

Edward Purkess, bank-manager at Stratford, is arrested on a charge of embezzlement. Between £20,000 and £30,000 is said to be involved. Purkess was a sidesman at Woodford parish church.

Durrant, the Sunday-school superintendent who has been convicted of murdering one of his scholars and fellow communicants in a chapel at San Francisco, appears to have been a most pious scoundrel. He was secretary of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, and prayed with the people after committing the murder. Christianity does not count much as a preventive of crime, but then it is a splendid thing to lay your sins on Jesus afterwards.

A friend of ours got the Freethinker into the Brampton Working Men's New Liberal Club. It was laid on the table, but some bigots used to hide it away. Our friend thereupon pinned the following notice on the paper: "If this paper is not required, have the courage to say so. Do not hide it. It is placed here to draw all classes into the Liberal fold again, for narrow-mindedness lost the Liberals the last election. It is also placed here to contradict the statement that this is just a Methodist Club."

Mr. E. W. Lummis, of West Bromwich, proposes, as "a step towards that Christian reunion which is so much projected," the formation of a Guild of Good Works. If the title rightly represents the idea, we cannot see anything specifically Christian about it, and Mr. Lummis would probably have difficulty in getting Christians to join his Guild on terms of equality with Jews, Atheists, Agnostics, and Deists.

A correspondent informs us that he recently saw an organ in the London streets with a picture of the Last Supper in front, and the tune being ground out was "Beer, beer, glorious beer!" The central figure of the picture seemed to be wondering why it wasn't wine.

The Church Times (Nov. 29) itself exposes the nonsense of Professor Sayce about identifying Kudar-ku-mal with Chedorlaomer of Genesis xiv. Some time ago "Chilperic," in our columns, by giving a literal translation of this chapter, showed its mythical character. Sayce is on the wrong track in trying to find far-fetched historical identifications. But ever since he was called over the coals for his admissions about the non-historical character of Daniel and Esther, he has been trying to keep in with the orthodox as much as possible. They have the disposal of good billets.

According to Colonel Cockerill, the missionaries to Japan are usually half educated, so that the Japanese declare that "those who are so ignorant as to be unable to make a living doing aught else abroad become missionaries." The educated Japanese see through the pretences of the missions, which are mainly the means for enabling incompetent sky-pilots to live abroad in luxury.

The moderator of the United Presbyterian Church deplores the antipathy of present-day church-goers to long sermons. A minister who likes exhorting for a couple of hours stands no chance now-a-days, unless he provides smoking-pews. The Kirkintilloch Herald, however, is not sorry. Few ministers, it says, can preach acceptably at length; in fact, it is "about as much as some of them can do to keep their hearers awake for a quarter of an hour."

Anatole France, writing on his early days in the Forum, says his toy Noah's Ark was a great proof to him of the truth of the Scriptures. In his Bible he saw God with a white beard. He says: "How sincerely I believed in Him! although, between ourselves, I considered Him inclined to be whimsical, violent, and wrathful; but I did not ask Him to render an account of his actions. I was accustomed to see great personages behave in an incomprehensible manner." M. France says: "But I did not understand why God had prohibited that good Flemish Eve from touching the fruits of the tree which gave pleasant knowledge." He came afterwards to think that God said to Himself: "Science does not make happiness, and when men come to know much of history and of geography, they will grow sad."

ON WHEELS.

One parson says a multitude—
E'en leaving out the ladies—
Upon their bicycles to-day
Are steering straight for Hades.

Another vows he's visions had
Much more to mortal liking,
Wherein he saw on heaven's gold streets
The blessed angels biking.

Their wheels, we're told, were gilded, too,
To match the heavenly highways;
And pretty saints in bloomers sped
Along the gleaming byways.

Thus, parsons, tho' they're prejudiced,
Betwixt 'em make us feel now,
Whichever way a body's bound,
He "gets there" on a wheel now.

Male cyclers still may take short cuts
To Sheol thro' Chicago,
Tho' biking saints in bloomers there
Are under an embargo.

M. N. B.

The teaching of the "Sermon on the Mount" is immoral. Take no thought for to-morrow, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, or wherewithal ye shall be clothed." This injunction, so at variance with all economy, prudence, and wisdom, is uttered, not once incidentally, but three times. It constitutes the passport of the indolent tramp, the voucher of the improvident sponge on society, and the senseless excuse for the beggar. No wonder the mythical Jesus "had not where to lay his head," if he acted as he preached. He did not deserve any.—A. S. Hudson, M.D.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, December 8, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell-road, E.C. :—7.30, "Gladstone's Theology." (Admission free.)

December 15, Newcastle ; 22, Manchester ; 29, Camberwell.

January 5, Camberwell ; 12, 19, and 26, St. James's Hall.

February 2, Liverpool ; 9, Glasgow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—December 7, Blyth ; 8, South Shields ; 9, North Shields ; 15 and 22, Foresters' Hall. January 12 and 13, Bolton ; 19, Glasgow ; 26, Edinburgh.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

T. Riley.—Thanks. We have used them.

H. L. Sumner.—Obliged. See paragraph.

Mr. Foote's Lecture Scheme.—G. Dodds' Friend, 1s. ; John Umpleby, £20.

A. Druck's subscription to Shilling Month should have been acknowledged as 2s. 6d.

G. Dodds.—Thanks for cuttings, etc. We printed Mr. Putnam's "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" in the Secular Almanack two years ago. Perhaps we may reprint it in the Freethinker.

H. C.—Thanks for cuttings. See "Acid Drops."

F. T.—See paragraph.

J. Walton.—The Salvation Army captain, whom you heard state that Charles Bradlaugh took out his watch and gave God Almighty five minutes to strike him dead, is probably too insignificant for much notice. Of course the story is a lie. Charles Bradlaugh prosecuted one fellow for telling it in print. We should like to see Freethought propaganda renewed at Hartlepool. Why not speak to the gentleman you mention yourself, and ask him to communicate with us?

J. M. R.—We have not read Tom Duncan's Canadian Woman, but we will look at it as soon as we find time. Thanks for cuttings.

G. F. Duplat.—You certainly suggested—and rather more than suggested—that Mr. Foote did not express his real opinions in the article on Miss Lanchester's case. However, we note your disclaimer of having intended to do so.

F. Cresswell.—Please forward a bill.

J. R. Bowman.—Thanks. See paragraph.

A. Hindley.—Sunday traders are proceeded against under the Act of Charles II., prohibiting people from following their ordinary avocations on the Lord's Day. The penalty is a fine, which, if not paid, can be recovered by distraint.

W. Dyson (Barnsley).—Mr. Foote will offer you a date as soon as possible.

E Shedley.—(1) The word means water-life, all that lives in the water. (2) The Puritans were at first a party in the Church of England, and as they could not make the Church conform to their pattern they attacked it from outside. They did not fight for religious liberty ; in fact, they did not understand it. (3) All sects outside the Church of England are Dissenters. (4) Your brother in America might order what he requires through the Truthseeker office, Lafayette-place, New York.

N. S. S. Benevolent Fund.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges : M. A. M., £1 ; Geo. Anderson, £5 ; Westminster Branch, 5s.

Papers Received.—Herald of Peace—Islington Gazette—Leek Times—The Literary Guide—Freethought Ideal—Two Worlds—Progressive Thinker—Liberty—Boston Investigator—Glasgow Evening News—North-Eastern Daily Gazette—Glasgow Weekly Herald—Isle of Man Times—Der Arme Teufel—Freidenker.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid :—One Year, 10s. 6d. ; Half Year, 5s. 3d. ; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d. ; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements :—One inch, 4s. 6d. ; half column, £1 2s. 6d. ; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

Liberty is not a means to an end, it is an end itself. To secure it, to enlarge it, and to diffuse it, should be the main object of all social arrangements and of all political contrivances.—Buckle.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote delivered three lectures at Bradford on Sunday. Bigotry having refused him every decent hall, he was forced back upon one which is of fair size, but so out of the way, ugly, dirty, and uncomfortable, that the general public would not go there to hear God Almighty. In the circumstances the audiences were as large as could be expected, and the lectures were to all appearance very highly relished. Friends were present from Halifax, Dewsbury, Leeds, and other places. There was a good sale of literature at the bookstall.

Mr. Foote lectures at Foresters' Hall this evening (Dec. 8) on "Mr. Gladstone's Theology," with special reference to his new article in the Nineteenth Century. There should be a large audience. Freethinkers will find this a favourable opportunity for bringing their more orthodox friends to the hall.

The lectures at Foresters' Hall will be discontinued, for the present, at the end of December. Mr. Foote has engaged St. James's Hall for three Sunday evening lectures in January. In February the Athenæum, in Tottenham Court-road, has been engaged for two Sunday evening lectures by Mr. Watts. Other Sunday lectures will be organised in the West-end during the rest of the winter.

Courses of week-night free lectures are being organised under Mr. Foote's scheme in various parts of London during January and February. Mr. Foote will try to start each course himself, and will be followed by Messrs. Watts, Cohen, Heaford, Moss, Snell, etc.

Mr. Foote will be lecturing in London the whole of January, and in the country the whole of February. It is his intention to deliver a number of week-night free lectures, and places that desire a visit from him should communicate as early as possible.

Mr. Charles Watts lectured last Sunday evening at the Club and Institute, Wood Green, to a select but a most enthusiastic audience. Christian bigotry has deprived the local Secularists for the present of the use of a public hall, but the members of this enterprising Branch of the N.S.S. are determined to still carry on their Sunday evening lectures, and we hope that all possible support will be rendered them in their laudable efforts.

Mr. Watts was too unwell to fulfil his engagement at Ipswich on Tuesday, Nov. 27. The lecture was postponed till Thursday, and, as Mr. Watts was still suffering, his place was taken at very short notice by Mr. William Heaford, whose obliging disposition is equal to his profound devotion to the cause of Freethought.

Mr. J. W. Gott, of Bradford, sends us a complete statement of the eight free lectures delivered in the district by Mr. C. Cohen. The deficit on the local expenses amounts to £10 17s. 1d., and the lecturer has to be compensated in addition. The places visited were Halifax, Heckmondwike, Stanningley, Todmorden, Keighley, Bingley, and Leeds. Good halls were engaged in each place, and the attendance was most encouraging, especially at Leeds, where twenty-five names were taken for a new Branch which is in formation. Five new Branches, altogether, have resulted from this effort ; and they will do good work if the propaganda can only be continued. Of course it will be less expensive in future. Mr. Grange has promised to follow up shortly the work begun by Mr. Cohen.

Mr. Foote's lecture scheme is hailed by the provincial Branches as the best new feature of our movement. All that is wanted to make it a triumphant success is money. If any Freethinker is moved to send in a handsome cheque, we shall be happy to announce it as an encouragement to others.

Just as we are going to press we receive a cheque per Mr. Charles Watts for £20 from our veteran friend, Mr. John Umpleby, of Blackburn. Clearly a case of "providence."

The Church party have been badly beaten in the Nottingham School Board elections, the Archdeacon being among the defeated candidates. The Radicals polled 25,000 votes more than "the enemy." No less than 19,000 votes were polled by the Independent Labor candidate.

Hiram S. Maxim, the famous scientist, contributes an article to the New York World, in which he argues that the Chinese acted quite naturally in killing the Christian missionaries, and that it is infamous to demand blood for their "crime." He denies that the Chinese are barbarians ; on the contrary, he says they are highly civilised, or they could never maintain such a large population. As for religious liberty, Mr. Maxim wants to know whether it really exists in any part of the world, except perhaps in Paris and Constantinople. Christians are very tender about their own "feelings," but very indifferent to the feelings of other religionists. "Suppose," he says, "the Chinese were to send missionaries into the Southern part of the United States, that these Chinamen should not only persist in teaching the Chinese religion, but should also erect a compound for women and children. Does anyone believe that the compound would not be attacked and the missionaries murdered? And what satisfaction would the Chinese Government be able to obtain from the United States Government? Simply the payment of a small sum of money for each of the missionaries murdered, while the actual culprits would never be brought to justice."

Digitized by Google

Tit-Bits offers a prize of one guinea for the best quotation from Shelley. No doubt this will excite fresh interest in the beauty of Shelley's poems, and incidentally to the Freethought views expressed in them.

The Herald of Peace, the organ of the Peace Society, gives a long extract on Arbitration from Mr. Foote's Shadow of the Sword.

The Leek Times reproduces our last paragraph on the projected debate between Mr. Foote and the Rev. W. W. Howard. It now remains to be seen whether Mr. Howard means debating or self-advertisement.

Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen, writing in the Forum on "Woman's Position in Pagan Times," says: "Paganism in the North did, undoubtedly, tend to evolve sturdier types of womanhood than Christianity has done; and it accorded a recognition to female intelligence which Christianity has been far slower in according."

A debate on the question, "Are Christ's Teachings Practical?" takes place this Sunday evening at the Northumberland Hall, Newcastle. The disputants are Messrs. Lynn and R. Mitchell.

The Boston Investigator has a very good defence of Ingersoll's methods of dealing with the Bible, from the pen of W. C. Sturoc, who points out that the mission of rationality is to shatter the superstitions which act as a barrier to human advancement, and that talk about destructive and constructive methods is mainly verbal bamboozlement.

There are some lively bits in Mr. Frederic Harrison's "Unto This Last," a conversation on John Ruskin in the current number of the Nineteenth Century. "When I remember," he says, "all the rabid things, the wicked things, the inhuman things, to which great and good men have been driven by faith in the Papacy and the Catholic Church, faith in Calvinism, faith in Communism, faith in Spiritualism—when I think of dying men dragging themselves to Lourdes, generous men turning assassins, and tender mothers adoring the divine judgment that consigns their children to hell-fire—when I reflect on all the folly and wickedness that has stricken men gravi sub religione"—well, when Mr. Harrison reflects on all this he can easily understand a twist in the brain of Ruskin.

With respect to usury, which Ruskin condemns and denounces, Mr. Harrison observes that it is expressly forbidden in the Bible. "He took the Bible," says Mr. Harrison, "and acted on it, come what may, and Bible Christians now mock at him for so doing."

It is all very well," Mr. Harrison says, "for you and for me to ask for a more common-sense creed, and to feel what a ghastly mess the primitive Christians would make of the world if they had their way. But it is too bad that the professing Christians who read their Bible on Sundays, and pretend to believe in it as the Word of God, should laugh to scorn a Christian poet who does in his soul accept it as God's own truth, and resolutely takes it as the law of his life. The Bible undoubtedly does say: 'Thou shalt not give thy money upon usury'; 'I am the Lord thy God'; and John Ruskin says: 'I will not give my money upon usury,' whereat the whole Christian world roars out in mockery and wrath—falls upon him as the Jews on Paul as 'a pestilent fellow,' a 'mover of sedition,' and calls out in a loud voice, like Festus to Paul, 'John! thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.'"

Mr. John Morley's article in the same magazine on Matthew Arnold is interesting, but the style is not up to his best level. "Destroys true epistolary charm" is terrible cacophony. It is enough to break the jaws of a Welshman. Curiously enough, Mr. Morley does not say a word about Arnold's essays on religion, which form so large a part of his prose writings. We wonder if the omission is deliberate—with a view to the by-election in the Montrose Burghs.

We have much pleasure in once more calling attention to Humanity, the little monthly organ of the Humanitarian League, published by Reeves, of 185, Fleet-street. The December number contains a report of Mr. Josiah Oldfield's address at the Memorial Hall on "The Scientific View" of the Rights of Men and Animals. "The Churches' View" is to be given by the Rev. A. L. Lilley on Tuesday evening (8), Dec. 12, Canon Wilberforce in the chair. Some account of this address will be given in the Freethinker. Mr. Frederic Harrison gives "The Ethical View" on January 21, and Mr. G. W. Foote "The Secularist View" on February 18. The admission to these meetings is free.

Alexandre Dumas, the great French playwright, who has just died, was a pronounced Freethinker. It was his personal wish that he should be buried without any religious ceremony. The expenses of his funeral are defrayed by the State. Jules Simon, who is himself a Deist, pays a high tribute of respect to the personal character of Alexandre Dumas. "He was in his friendship, as in his works," says Simon, "upright, tender, and firm."

The Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control (2 Serjeant's-inn, Fleet-street) has issued a series of tracts on National Education. Though written from a Nonconformist point of view, they contain a number of facts and arguments in opposition to the attempts to obtain clerical control over education.

A Burns exhibition is to be held at the Glasgow Institute of Fine Arts next year, and will be open all the summer.

Mr. Herbert Spencer, continuing in the Contemporary Review his chapters on Professional Institutions, deals with the evolution of the teacher and the still incomplete differentiation of the teaching from the priestly class. He takes note of the fact that at the present moment there is going on a struggle to re-acquire clerical control. "Clerics," he says, "have striven, and are still striving, to make the public help them to teach Church dogmas in Church schools. At the present time" (the article was apparently written in June) "the Archbishop and clergy at large are fathering an Act which shall give them State funds without State control. With an arrogance common to priesthoods in all times and places, no matter what the creed, they say to the State: 'We will say what shall be taught, and you shall pay for it.'"

Mr. Watts lectures on Saturday evening, December 7, at Blyth under Mr. Foote's Lecturing Scheme, and to-day (Sunday, Dec. 8) he lectures three times at South Shields under the auspices of the local branch of the N.S.S. On Monday evening, December 9, Mr. Watts lectures at North Shields under Mr. Foote's scheme.

At the last meeting of the N.S.S. Executive a committee was appointed to carry out the customary arrangements for the Annual Children's Party. This is always a very pleasant function. Some hundreds of little ones have a jolly evening, and their elders look on delightedly at a convenient distance. Of course it takes a fair sum of money to defray all the expenses, but the appeal for this object has never met with ungenerous response. Subscriptions pro tem. can be forwarded to Miss E. M. Vance, at 28, Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Arrangements are also being made for the Annual Dinner at the Holborn Restaurant, full notice of which will appear in due course.

Archæology and the Bible.

No less fruitful [than the researches in Assyria] have been modern researches in Egypt. While, on one hand, they have revealed a very considerable number of geographical and archæological facts proving the good faith of the narratives entering into the books attributed to Moses, and have thus made our early sacred literature all the more valuable, they have at the same time revealed the limitations of the sacred authors and compilers. They have brought to light facts utterly disproving the sacred Hebrew date of creation and the main framework of the early Biblical chronology; they have shown the suggestive correspondence between the ten antediluvian patriarchs in Genesis and the ten early dynasties of the Egyptian gods, and have placed by the side of these the ten antediluvian kings of Chaldean tradition, the ten heroes of Armenia, the ten primeval kings of Persian sacred tradition, the ten "fathers" of Hindu sacred tradition, and multitudes of other tens, throwing much light on the manner in which the sacred chronicles of ancient nations were generally developed.—Professor Andrew D. White, in "The Popular Science Monthly."

Digitized by Google

LECTURING NOTES.

FREETHOUGHT advocacy is now passing through a fresh crisis in this country, which deserves the special attention of every member of the Secular movement. Its principles are as potent as ever, and its influence is penetrating more and more into theological, political, and social sections of society. It, therefore, becomes the more necessary that proper care and united action should be manifested in the promulgation of our views. In the various churches the old style of service fails to draw congregations; hence Christians have to adopt a new method of advocacy. Preachers no longer rely upon their sermons as the principal feature of attraction, for the reason that they have found good music and singing to be far more potent in commanding the attention of hearers than expositions of the perplexing doctrines of faith and grace.

The new conditions that have sprung up in the Freethought world require a new departure in advocacy. I do not mean that the battle with theology should cease, but I do mean that our plans of attack need revision, and that the arrangement for lectures should be more carefully studied. At some of my recent lectures in the provinces many complaints were made that the work of preparing for the meetings devolved upon one or two of the members of local societies. This should not be, as it is the duty of each one to take his turn in conducting the affairs of the society. Then, where morning and afternoon lectures are held, the same attention should be shown in conducting them that is given to the evening gatherings. But, as a rule, I have not found this to be the case, except in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and one or two other towns. Of course, the day audiences are not so large as at night. That, however, is no reason why the majority of members should confine their interest to the evening lecture.

It must be recognised that the meetings of the Socialists and Independent Labor Party, being held at the same time as ours, affect somewhat our audiences in the provincial towns, inasmuch as these organisations are largely composed of Freethinkers. Still, the rapid progress of Secular thought during the present decade would, under more favorable conditions, cause our halls to be filled.

The question arises, What can be done to meet the new requirements of Secular propaganda? This question, I believe, will be fully dealt with at our next Conference; but, in the meantime, I suggest the carrying out, to the fullest possible extent, of what is known as Mr. Foote's Lecturing Scheme. Speaking from experience, I pronounce it to be an unqualified success. At my recent lectures given upon this plan all the meetings have been full, and most of them crowded. Admission being free, Christians attended and listened attentively to what was advanced, and, in some cases, they acknowledged that the exposition of Secularism and the criticism of orthodoxy which they had heard were very different from what they expected.

The fact is, we have been so misrepresented by theological exponents that the general public have had no opportunity of fairly judging of the true character of our principles. What we have long required, and what this scheme provides, is a plan whereby Christians should be induced to attend our meetings. Many of them object to pay to hear that of which they have but little knowledge, or very erroneous ideas. I repeat that the success of this enterprise has been most encouraging; and, although the operation of the scheme is, for the time being, confined to week-night lectures, no doubt it will be extended in certain cases to Sunday meetings if sufficient financial support is afforded. It will be a grand day when we are sufficiently wealthy to have free admission on Sundays. Then the largest halls at our command will be filled; our philosophy will be better known, and the triumph of our principles will, in my opinion, be secure.

Under this scheme I have already held twelve meetings, and arrangements are being made for me to lecture under its auspices next week at Blyth and other places in the North of England, in Scotland during January, and throughout the London districts in February. Mr. Cohen has also done good work through the aid of the Lecturing Fund, and many new branches of the N.S.S. have been formed. Thus our practical work goes bravely on, and it is intended that it shall continue.

CHARLES WATTS.

THE VIRGIN OF CHARTRES.

(Nôtre Dame de Soubs-terre.)

"I am black, but comely."—SONG OF SOLOMON, i. 5.

CATHOLICISM supplies its votaries with a multiplicity of virgins. Some are more popular than others. There are, for instance, our Lady of Lourdes, our Lady of Loretto, and our Lady of Guadaloupe, all of whom have numerous devotees, who take long pilgrimages to pay their respects at their respective shrines. But the most venerable of all is Nôtre Dame de Chartres. I am particularly fond of old women. They always know a thing or two, and if you get into their good graces can tell many a quaint and curious story of the past. The oldest of old virgins in Europe was, as I have said, our Lady of Chartres in France, and the question whether the spirit which animated the old statue reincarnated itself in the new statue which takes its place is a most important one. For, alas, the venerable underground Virgin Mother is no more. On the 9 Frimaire of the year II. of the French Republic (Nov. 29, 1793) she was taken from her subterranean crypt and burnt. For some two thousand years she had wrought miracles; yet she could not withstand the Revolution. Virtue had gone out of her, and the question whether the virtue has entered into the modern statue, which has taken the old one's place, is an important one to the archæologist as well as to the hagiologist. For the old statue could unfold a tale. Certain it is that a Druidical grove and grotto existed on the spot where the Cathedral of Chartres now stands, and there was a subterranean idol with the inscription, Virgini Parituræ—To the Virgin who shall bring forth. This virgin was older than Mary, the Mother of Jesus. Did she represent Isis, the mother of Horus; Cures, the mother of Bacchus; or Cybele, the lover of Attys? Her name is uncertain, but her meaning is clear. The black, underground Virgin of Chartres was our ever-virgin Mother Earth, who, sure as Lady Day arrives, sends forth verdure from her teeming womb. She is truly the blessed virgin whose chief feast comes round in mid-August, when the corn is in the ear. Fecundated in spring, she gives birth in December in Beth-lehem, the house of corn. But why was the Virgin of Chartres black? Because she came from the east as well as from the earth. The earliest picture of the Virgin and Child, in the Roman catacombs, is a picture of Isis and Horus. Paris still retains its Greek name, Para Isis (under the protection of Isis), as its great Cathedral bears the name of Nôtre Dame (our Lady)—a term applied to Isis, Ceres, Cybele, and other virgin mothers.

LUCIANUS.

A Calendar for Freethinkers.

The most interesting portion of The Secular Almanack for 1896 is that which might, in forgetfulness, be most easily overlooked. We mean the calendar itself. Instead of the conventional array of new moons, Sundays after Trinity, and the nativities of King George the Third's numerous descendants, a thoroughly novel and instructive list of the birth and death days of great Rationalists meets the delighted eyes. Taking the June catalogue as a sample, we note such names as Littré, James Thomson, W. J. Fox, Paine, Bruno, Harriet Martineau, Colenso, Mazzini, Huxley, etc. Mr. Foote furnishes a useful retrospect of 1895. Mr. J. M. Wheeler, whose fund of curious learning is inexhaustible, writes on the Calendar, old style and new, Easter, Christmas, and the like. Mr. Charles Watts looks hopefully at the prospects of the Freethought "Work of To-day." Full details touching the N.S.S. Council, Principles, and Branches, along with lists of American, Colonial, and Continental Societies, complete a very handy issue.—Watts's Literary Guide.

I am just and honest, not because I expect to live in another world, but because, having felt the pain of injustice and dishonesty towards myself, I have a fellow feeling with other men who would suffer the same pains if I were unjust or dishonest towards them. Why should I give my neighbor short weight in this world because there is not another world in which I should have nothing to weigh out to him? I am honest because I don't like to inflict evil on others in this life, not because I am afraid of evil to myself in another. It is a pang to me to witness the suffering of a fellow being, and I feel his suffering the more because he is mortal, because his life is so short; and I would have it, if possible, filled with happiness, and not misery.—George Eliot.

Digitized by Google

THE REVELATION OF SAINT JOHN THE DIVINE.

"These things themselves are neither true nor rare;
The wonder's how the devil they got there."

It is the horrible dream of a madman; the result of heavy lobster suppers at Patmos. If the rhapsody did not contain certain nasty passages, it would be awfully funny. The writer makes the most awkward blunders, far surpassing those of old Moses anent cosmogony. He predicts a general cataclysm, and all the worlds we see with our naked eyes (for he knew nothing of those that could be seen only through the telescope) go heelie-goleerie on to our unfortunate planet, evidently the centre of attraction, which, according to his weird fancy, is the biggest cosmic lump, and can stand the heaviest of bumps. Chapter vi. 12 I call a transformation scene. The sun is blackened, and the moon (sweet Selena) dyed in blood, ad captandum vulgus. Total eclipse! Verse 13.—"The stars of heaven fell unto the earth even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs." A silly comparison. This event is just as likely to happen as all the cannon balls in the world dropping on the top of an ordinary-sized potato. Where would that potato be? If a few stars only fell upon the earth, our planet would burst up into minute fragments, and disappear like a heap of sawdust in a whirlwind. Yet "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free man [all, in fact, except the women] hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains" (verse 15). Poor devils! There could be neither rocks nor dens to hide in, for nothing would be left of this earth after such gigantic concussions.

VII.—Marvellous to relate, the world is still revolving. The damage done cannot have been very serious. The winds are stopped for devilment. They shall no longer blow on the earth. What a heavenly calm; but, oh, what stenches! No more breezes, gales, tornadoes, or squalls. Verse 1.—After the general smash up the world still revolves, for an angel says: "Hurt not the earth" (verse 3). After these frightful cosmical disturbances, "there was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour" (viii. 1). From this I conclude that there were no ladies in the celestial roost. Trust them being silent five minutes. "Pas si bête." Verse 5.—More cosmical phenomena and disturbances to the sound of seven trumpets. Fancy blowing brass instruments as an accompaniment to voices, thunderings, lightnings, and an earthquake. What a disgusting din! Then follow hail and fire mingled with blood (verse 7). Query, whose? What a horrid mess! It is about the strangest mixture ever heard of, producing something like the effect of a seidlitz powder on an empty stomach. Of course, this queer stuff falling on the earth in large quantities would interfere somewhat with the vegetation. Verse 8.—"Then a great mountain, a volcano, was cast into the sea, and the third part of the sea became blood" (sic). More likely turned into hot water pro tem.—cooked fish (stewed Leviathan) coming to the surface. Verse 9.—Of course, "a third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died." What a haul for Billingsgate! Verse 10.—Another great star fell from heaven (at the blowing of the third angel). It fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters. What a funnily-shaped star! All had evidently not come down. This star is called "Wormwood." Crasher would be more à propos. Verse 12.—Next, "the third part of the sun is again smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars, so as the third part of them was darkened, and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise." This seems to me madness with method. How damnably irritating is this third. I understand the third in music, but not in cosmos smashing.

IX. 1.—Again a star falls from heaven upon the earth with the key of the bottomless pit (sic). I cannot imagine the shape and size of that key; if I could, I would have the key to the mystery.

XII. 4.—More star shooting. The tail of a great dragon drew the third part of the stars of heaven! Still harping on the stars. The repetition of the word third makes one suspect that this fellow had an inkling of the rule of three, but not according to Cocker. And so he raves on. The madder his utterances, the more inspired, no doubt. Of course, we think that the earth will come to an end some day, but not in such an idiotic fashion. How beautifully Byron describes the final catastrophe! I can well imagine it: "Darkness. . . I had a dream that was not all a dream." The English poet's utterances are more true and more sublime than the ravings of the apostolical lunatic.

CHARLES KROLL LAPORTE.

THE PAINE EXHIBITION.

THE centenary of the publication of Paine's Age of Reason is a fitting occasion for bringing together such an exhibition of Paine relics as have been on view at South Place Institute. Mr. M. D. Conway, who, by his Life of Thomas Paine, has done so much for the vindication of the author-hero, and who, with Mr. Todd, the secretary, has been chiefly instrumental in getting up the present exhibition, lays most stress on Paine's political work. But it was by his Age of Reason, which brought him most obloquy, that he is most widely, and probably will be longest, known. So much of Paine's life was spent in America that an exhibition there would be likely to bring out some fresh articles of historical interest; but the present one exceeds both in number and variety all expectation. Four hundred and eighty items appear in the catalogue. It is true the majority of these are books, but that goes without saying in the case of a man whose chief work was done with the pen. Mr. Conway himself exhibited a great variety of Paine literature, including first editions of all his works, and the principal biographies and other works written about him. The most amusing of these, perhaps, is the broadsheet issued by the publishers of the British Workman, entitled "Thomas Paine's Recantation." A large number of portraits, prints, and other relics are also exhibited by Mr. Conway, many of them coming from America. Mr. Conway himself has the excellent oil painting of Paine by Jarvis, which looks better on canvas than in his Life of Paine. The portrait by Romney is probably still in existence somewhere, though its locality is unknown; but the engraving by Sharpe remains and attests its merits. Several copies were lent by various gentlemen, that belonging to Mr. G. J. Holyoake having an inscription from Paine to Clio Rickman. The most notable copy of the Romney portrait was that painted by Millière, and given by him to Charles Bradlaugh. The painter himself was shot on the steps of the Pantheon after the Commune. He died crying "Vive l' Humanité." Mrs. Hypatia Bradlaugh Bonner, who lent this, also sent portraits of Carlile and his daughters, and the baby-shoe worn by Hypatia Carlile while in prison with her father.

There were a number of engravings of the first iron bridge at Wearmouth, designed by Paine. A large-sized engraving and the patent were sent by Mr. Truelove, together with a number of interesting relics, including the table on which Paine wrote The Rights of Man and other works. This table he first saw over half a century ago when in the possession of Clio Rickman. We were pleased to notice a portrait of Mr. Truelove himself, who well deserves place with Eaton, Carlile, Watson, and others who have published Paine's works and maintained a free press.

A number of political medals and tokens in connection with Paine and his time were exhibited by E. Snelling and by A. W. Waters. Jugs, with portraits, etc., were lent by Mr. Willett from his collection of Historical Pottery in the Brighton Museum. A good bust of Paine, published by Mr. Truelove, was on the platform, together with death masks of both Paine and Burke. Among portraits of those brought into connection with Paine were several of Rickman, Eaton, Cobbett (of whom there were a number of relics contributed by his biographer, Mr. A. Smith), Carlile, Frances Wright, etc. Mr. Wheeler sent a portrait of Elihu Palmer, the blind author of The Principles of Nature, who, with Paine, set up the first Deistic Church in America. A well-engraved broadsheet, published by Carlile, showing Paine in a triumphal car, driving away superstition; the first German editions of The Rights of Man (Copenhagen, 1793) and of The Age of Reason; various lives of Paine and works issued by Eaton and Carlile, were also exhibited by Mr. Wheeler.

The only easily accessible objects conspicuous to us by their absence from the room were portraits of Blake, who assisted Paine to escape from England, and views of the Paine Memorial Hall at Boston. There was, however, Mary Wollstonecraft's Original Stories, illustrated by Blake, exhibited by Mr. Buxton Forman, who sent many other interesting works; while Mr. Alfred Morrison contributed many autograph letters and manuscripts of Paine. Other autographs were lent by Dr. Clair J. Grece, who contributed over forty articles. Probably the most curious article of the whole collection was a portion of Paine's brain, sent by Mr. Louis Breeze. Altogether the exhibition was of a most varied and interesting character to admirers of Paine, and the catalogue itself makes a good memento of the occasion. South Place Institute, turned for a while into a museum, was on Monday almost inconveniently crowded, many well-known Freethinkers being present. Music was interspersed, and brief addresses were given by Mr. Conway, Mr. Holyoake, Mrs. Bonner, and Mr. Picton.

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

The specimen page of the new critical edition of the Hebrew Old Testament gives five different colorings of the passage it prints (1 Samuel xx. and xxi.). That is to say, five different writers are represented on this one page of the Bible. The Holy Ghost must have been more than a trinity—a multiplicity of persons.

* * *

R. McClure says of the late Robert Louis Stevenson: "He had no interest in the evangelising spirit. He liked best the primitive man of the islands, unbaptised, and not bartering for powder. The man who, in the Cevennes, wrote, 'Thus, to the high entertainment of the angels, do we pelt one another with evangelists, like schoolboys bickering in the snow,' was not driven to enthusiasm by the missionaries of the South Seas or the effect of their work."

* * *

The Literary Guide (Watts & Co.) for December is as useful and interesting as ever. The brightly written review of Professor Huxley's collected writings is continued. "Jottings" are lively and clever—though, by the way, Thomas Dekker, the old dramatist, should not be printed as Decker. The Rev. Charles Voysey will scarcely like the criticism of his "Theism as a Science."

* * *

The Rev. D. P. Faure, who writes The Truth About the Bible, discourses delivered in the Free Protestant Church, Cape Town (Cape Town Argus Publishing Co.), is a very Liberal "Free Protestant" indeed. In this brochure he gives a lot of facts about the old books, which he regards as a purely human production. Of the ordinary theory of his school, that the Bible is human on one side and divine on another, right on morals and religion though wrong on science and history, he says: "The logical consistency of this theory is difficult to discover, but it is the necessary result of the recent scientific discoveries. The theory of plenary inspiration has broken down before these. Thinking men have been forced to admit that the science and the history and the chronology of the Bible are wrong; and they now claim infallibility for it only when it deals with the regions of the unknown. This theory, therefore, amounts to this, that the Bible is declared infallible in all those parts where it is practically impossible to test its correctness." We are glad to hear the work is having a good circulation, as it must tend to propagate Freethought and break up the old superstitions in South Africa.

* * *

In Miss Garnett's Women of Turkey (p. 73) mention is made that among the modern Greeks there is a custom similar to that we recently cited from M. D. Conway as existing at christenings in Cyprus—viz., of cutting three tiny locks of hair from the baby's head, and throwing them in the font in the name of the Father, Son, and Ghost. The hair symbolises the life, and, in the superstition of many countries, a lock places the person from whose head it is cut in the power of the one to whom it is given.

* * *

The Arcana of Nature, by Hudson Tuttle (London: H. A. Copley, Canning Town, E.; 2s. 6d.; 1895), purports to be a revelation of the History and Laws of Creation. If, as the publisher states, it was first published thirty-five years ago, it was certainly much in advance of the time, even though anticipated by the Vestiges of Creation. It is throughout evolutionary, and so mainly in accord with the conclusions of the latest science that we wonder why the author uses the term "creation" at all.

MR. PUTNAM ON THE FAILSWORTH SECULAR SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

On Sunday morning, amidst alternate rain and shine, I journey over to Failsworth, about four miles from Manchester centre. It is a small manufacturing place of about 15,000 inhabitants; but it has a most wonderful development of Freethought constructive ideas—a Secular Sunday-school which has been in existence over fifty years. It began in a small and obscure way. Its history is scarcely traceable for a while, but it was a persistent movement; there were vigorous personalities connected with it; it grew and flourished; and is now an established institution, with an excellent property and membership. The services on Sunday were exceedingly interesting. There was singing by the little children, and by the larger pupils and the congregation. There is an orchestra connected with the school which is excellent. I gave addresses afternoon and evening. There was a full attendance, notwithstanding the stormy weather. The American visitor was warmly welcomed. He will not forget the brightness and promise of this Secular School, where the freshness of childhood gives inspiration to the work, where we see that our places as we pass on are filled with the energy and the enthusiasm of youth. We realise that Secularism has for its work the art, the music, the poetry, and the beauty of life; that it can interest and educate the child-heart as well as the mature brain. The Secular Sunday-school is a most noble institution.

—Boston Investigator.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A DREADFUL FATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—Though neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I foresee for you, and other prominent Freethinkers, a fate compared to which that of the martyrs of old will be enviable. They were imprisoned, tortured, and burnt. Green wood was supplied by Calvin's executioners to prolong the burning agonies of Servetus. The rack, the wheel, the boot, and many other devices of pious ingenuity, were brought into requisition that heretics might have a foretaste of the eternity of woe which God Almighty has provided for his non-elect. Worse than this awaits you. Yes, worse! for Christians have invariably pursued Freethinkers not only with injury, but calumny. First they took their lives, then their liberties. Now they take their characters. Who has not heard of the wickedness of Voltaire, the horrible death-bed of Paine? But worse, infinitely worse than this, awaits you. When heretics were too strong to be killed, they were left to rot in prison; when they could no more be imprisoned, they were ostracised; and now they can no more be ostracised, a yet more subtle and horrible punishment has been devised. What is it, do you ask? The most malignant, cruel, and abominable charge that can be brought against a self-respecting man. Yes, in days to come they will say that you, Bradlaugh, and Ingersoll were Christians. Already the odious, dishonest lie has been used against the characters of Darwin and Huxley, and I have heard it darkly whispered of Ingersoll and Bradlaugh. How can you hope to escape such great damnation?

Uncle Benjamin.

PROFANE JOKES.

It was a colored preacher who said to his flock: "We have a collection to make this morning, and, for the glory of heaben, whichever of you stole Mr. Jones's turkeys, don't put anything on the plate." One who was there says: "Every blessed niggah in de church came down wid de rocks."

Gilbert Parker recently encountered a Canadian bishop whom he had known in his boyhood. The bishop pompously inquired: "Ah, Gilbert! and are you still writing your—ah—little books?" Mr. Parker answered promptly: "Yes, bishop. And are you still preaching your—ah—little sermons?"

"You fellows," roared the little man with the bristling moustache, "are a gang of thieves, cutthroats, liars, swindlers"—

"What do you mean? You"—

"Embezzlers, suborners of perjury, political tricksters"—

"Shut up, or we'll"—

"Rascals, assailers of innocence, and"—

"You"—

"Oppressors of the poor, wolves, tigers, jackals, skunks"—

"Kill him! Kill him! Bring a rope"—

Demure Little Woman—"Mercy, men! He's only practisin' on an imaginary congregation"—

"What does the scoundrel mean, then?"

"Oh, Jim's no scoundrel. He's got an idea that old-style preachin's too slow, and he's going to start out as a new style of evangelist."

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

(4) Display, or get displayed, one of our contents-sheets, which are of a convenient size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will send them on application.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, G. W. Foote, "Mr. Gladstone's Theology."

BRADLAUGH CLUB AND INSTITUTE (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): 7, Touzeau Parris, "Some Bible Symbols." Tuesday, at 8, social party. Wednesday, at 8, public discussion.

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, W. J. Ramsey, "Good Tidings of Great Joy." Tuesday and Friday, at 8, social gatherings.

CAMBERWELL: North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, C. James, "The Meaning of Atheism."

EAST LONDON (Swaby's Coffee House, 103 Mile End-road): 8, W. Heaford, "Why Should a Freethinker Fear to Die?"

EAST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (76 Libra-road, Roman-road): 8, Sunday-school; 7.30, F. J. Gould, "Life of Bradlaugh."

ISLINGTON BRANCH: 8.15, special general meeting at the Bradlaugh Club and Institute, 36 Newington Green-road.

PENTON HALL (81 Pentonville-road): 7, J. Kaspary, "Judaism."

WEST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street): 11.15, Dr. Stanton Coit, "England's Duty to Inferior Races."

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, Mr. Manning, Dramatic Recitals.

WOOD GREEN (Club and Institute, 4 Lawn-villas, Stuart-crescent, opposite Wood Green Church): 7.30, A. Lewis, "Scientific and Theological Foundations of Morality."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 12, a lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 7, A. Holland, "The Ethics, Humor, and Philosophy of Shakespeare's Works."

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school.

DERBY (Pollicott's Dining Rooms, Market-place): 6.45, J. R. Wright, a paper.

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 11.30, Chapman Cohen, "Charles Darwin"; 2.30, "Christianity and Morality"; 6.30, "Is the Belief in God Reasonable?"

HULL (Cobden Hall, Stocey-street): 7, Mr. Starke, "The Antiquity of Man."

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, Felix Volkhosky, "Exile Life in Siberia"—with lantern illustrations.

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, L. Small, B.Sc., "Progress." Special committee meeting after lecture.

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 11, Edward Aveling, "The Value of Commodities"; 6.30, "Shelley: Socialist and Atheist."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, debate between Messrs. Lynn and R. Mitchell, "Are Christ's Teachings Practical?"

NORTH SHIELDS (Spiritualist Hall, Camden-street): Monday, at 7.30, Charles Watts will lecture.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, Willie Dyson, "Unbelief v. Faith—A Reply to E. W. Bailey, of London."

SOUTH SHIELDS (Thornton's Variety Hall, Union-lane): 11, Charles Watts, "Trust in God: A Delusion"; 3, "Theological Puzzles"; 7, "Secularism and Modern Thought."

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, Mr. Mitchison, a paper on "Buddha."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BARNSLEY (May Day Green): 11, "Salvation Army Charity."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN. 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—December 8, Glasgow; 11 and 12, debate at Newcastle-on-Tyne; 15, Blackburn; 22, Wood Green; 29, Ball's Pond.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Dec. 22, Leicester.

TOUZEAU PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—December 8, Balls Pond; 15, Wood Green; 29, Foresters' Hall.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 16 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

A Life-size Bust Portrait in Oils. In Handsome Gilt Frame. Suitable for Lecture Room or Hall. Carriage paid £2 2s.

21 Maude-terrace, Maud-road, Walthamstow.

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

[Second Series]

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchizedek
S'w'elp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S LECTURE,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

CHARLES WATTS'S WORKS.

THE CLAIMS OF CHRISTIANITY EXAMINED FROM A RATIONALIST STANDPOINT. 64 pp., 6d., by post 7d.

THE TEACHINGS OF SECULARISM COMPARED WITH ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

CHRISTIANITY: ITS ORIGIN, NATURE, AND INFLUENCE. 4d., by post 5d.

SECULARISM: DESTRUCTIVE AND CONSTRUCTIVE. 3d., by post 4d.

AGNOSTICISM AND CHRISTIAN THEISM: WHICH IS THE MORE REASONABLE? 3d., by post 4d.

A REPLY TO FATHER LAMBERT'S "TACTICS OF INFIDELS." 6d., by post 7d.

THEOLOGICAL PRESUMPTION. An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. R. F. Burns, of Halifax, N.S. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE NATURAL AND THE SUPERNATURAL; OR BELIEF AND KNOWLEDGE. 3d., by post 4d.

EVOLUTION AND SPECIAL CREATION. 3d., by post 4d.

HAPPINESS IN HELL AND MISERY IN HEAVEN 3d., by post 4d.

SCIENCE AND THE BIBLE. 4d., by post 5d.

BIBLE MORALITY: Its Teachings Shown to be Contradictory and Defective as an Ethical Guide. 3d., by post 3½d.

SECULARISM: IS IT FOUNDED ON REASON, AND IS IT SUFFICIENT TO MEET THE WANTS OF MANKIND? Debate between the Editor of the Evening Mail (Halifax, N.S.) and Charles Watts. With Prefatory Letters by G. J. Holyoake and Colonel R. G. Ingersoll, and an Introduction by Helen H. Gardener. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

SECULARISM: ITS RELATION TO THE SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF THE DAY. 2d., by post 2½d.

IS THERE A LIFE BEYOND THE GRAVE? Reply to Dr. R. B. Westbrook. 3d., by post 4d.

SAINTS AND SINNERS: WHICH? 3d., by post 4d.

EDUCATION: TRUE AND FALSE. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE SUPERSTITION OF THE CHRISTIAN SUNDAY. A Plea for Liberty and Justice. 3d., by post 4d.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD; OR, QUESTIONS FOR THEISTS. 2d., by post 2½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILISATION. 3d., by post 4d.

THE BIBLE UP TO DATE. 2d., by post 2½d.

WHY DO RIGHT? A Secularist's Answer. 3d., by post 4d.

WAS CHRIST A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL REFORMER? 4d., by post 5d.

MISCELLANEOUS PAMPHLETS. Cloth 2s., by post 2s. 3d

London: Watts & Co., 17, Johnson's-court, Fleet-st., E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendell" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Digitized by Google

AN ACCEPTABLE CHRISTMAS PRESENT

LOT 11.

1 pair All-Wool Blankets.
1 pair Bed-Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-Cloth.

CARRIAGE PAID, 21s.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

Now Ready, Price Three Shillings,

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST.

ESSAYS ON HUMAN EVOLUTION.

By J. M. WHEELER.

With an Introduction by G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—Early Religion—Animism—Fetishism and Idolatry—Totemism—Were the Jews Savages?—Religious Dances—Sympathetic Magic—Kings, Priests, and Gods—Sacrifices and Scapegoats—Killing the God—Nature Festivals—Lent—Easter—May Day—Christmas Customs.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; God-Making, by G. L. Mackenzie; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 9s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—NO. 50. SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE

TALES FROM THE BIBLE.

Tales from the Bible, Told to My Daughter. By F. J. Gould. Issued by the Rationalist Press Committee. (Watts & Co.)

MR. GOULD is a true soldier in the great army of human liberation. We have not the slightest doubt that his worldly prospects have been seriously injured by his devotion to Freethought. He has sacrificed what he valued least, and preserved his independence and self-respect. For many years he has served his ideas with a well-practised pen. His information is extensive, his English is irreproachable, and his style is one of admirable lucidity. We are able to speak with unstinted praise of his Concise History of Religion, two volumes of which have already been published. When the third appears, to complete the work, Mr. Gould may claim—though he will not claim—to have adequately filled an obvious gap in the more instructive literature of Rationalism.

Many of our readers will recollect that Mr. Gould is profoundly interested in the education of children, and sternly opposed to Bible teaching in Board schools. His passionate, but by no means wild, protest against such teaching was widely circulated during the last School Board elections in London, and brought upon him the ridiculous abuse of the Daily Chronicle. Mr. Gould's letter, which appears on another page of the Freethinker, calls upon Freethinkers to withdraw their children from religious instruction. We hope there will be a wide response to his appeal. The present writer has three children who are thus withdrawn from superstitious influence. He mentions the fact, not boastingly, but simply to persuade others, if he may, by his own example. Children are not so cruelly martyrised by this policy as parents are apt to imagine; and, after all, it is well that they should have a taste of something else than mere acquiescence, even in the tender age of intellectual infancy.

Mr. Gould, however, is not opposed to Bible reading by children, though he is opposed to their reading it in public schools. With certain by no means unimportant qualifications, he seems to share the view of the late Professor Huxley on this subject. Like this great scientist, and still greater controversialist, Mr. Gould holds the Bible in high estimation. Of course he is entitled to his opinion, but we must frankly say that we are unable to share it. The literary and historical value of the Bible seems to us to be monstrously exaggerated, even by persons who have emancipated themselves from its supernaturalism. From the point of view of evolution, it is simply invaluable; but this point of view is necessarily impossible to children.

The volume before us is an outcome of Mr. Gould's ideas on the Bible. The tales were written for his own daughter, not yet in her teens, and is published for "readers of her age and general capacity." That the book is well written goes without saying. Judged from the author's standpoint, it is a most excellent performance; and, considering the multitude of Christian books about the Bible, we hazard a hope that this one by a Freethinker may have an opportunity, through a wide circulation, of achieving its utmost possible usefulness.

But the question remains whether Mr. Gould's standpoint is the right one, and it is only fair to let him explain it, as he does in the following paragraph of his Preface:—

> "Many parents, who have freed themselves from the narrow orthodoxy which misunderstands the Bible while professing to revere it, often halt between two opinions. At one time they deem it best to keep the Bible altogether out of their children's hands; in which case the young people are deprived of information which is necessary to the comprehension of a large part of human history. At another time they incline to letting the children receive the popular religious instruction; in this case the young minds get imbued with doctrines and ideas which run counter to reason and to the moral sense. I counsel a middle way. Let the child be introduced to the Bible literature through a simple manual in which the picturesque old legends shall be related; but let the stories be combined with suggestions and warnings which will prevent an intelligent child from believing that all the narratives of the Bible are historical, or all its teachings pure."

The "middle way" is dear to Englishmen, but, in this case, what is its justification? We start, of course, from the position that the Bible is not the word of God; that it is not in any way inspired; that it is entirely a human production; that it is simply a statement of the mythology, legends, religious beliefs, and ethical doctrines of the Jews and the early Christians. Now what is the use of such a book to children, unless they are to accept its mythology and legends as history, and its religion and ethics as divinely authoritative? Christians desire children to accept the Bible in that way, and are logical in making them read it—and it alone of all the "sacred scriptures" of the world. But the Freethinker does not regard the Bible as unique, nor does he recognise its claim to any sort of authority. To him it is one religious book among many, and its importance in any part of Christendom is merely a geographical accident. Giving it a position of uniqueness, therefore, is at once a concession to Christian bigotry and an affront to the principles of evolution and humanity.

There seems to us no more reason for giving children the Bible to read than for giving them the Koran, the Vedas, the Buddhist scriptures, or any other of the "sacred books of the East," which make such a formidable array in Max Müller's edition.

We cannot see, either, that the Bible is "necessary to the comprehension of a large part of human history." The history of the ancient Jews, even if the Bible really contains it, is not of transcendent importance. Civilisation owes immensely more to the great empires of which we only catch glimpses in the Jewish scriptures. From the secular standpoint, a child had far better read Rollin, or some more recent history of antiquity. Above all, let him read Plutarch, who, historically and humanly, is worth all the Bible writers put together. As to the New Testament, how much history does it contain? To learn the history of the Christian religion we have to go to other sources.

The Bible is a book of supernaturalism. There is the fact which makes it an impossible book for the children of Freethinkers. Mr. Gould relates its "picturesque old legends," and what is the result? Most of the simple charm of the original has vanished, and what remains is minimised by the constant necessity of saying "Of course it isn't true." Sometimes the imaginative element is eliminated, and the result is mere distraction. "Out of the darkness," Mr. Gould says, "sprang a man who wrestled with Jacob for some hours." Now there is no man in the story; the other party in that wrestle was superhuman—an angel or Yahveh himself. And in this lies its romantic interest; but there is nothing particularly interesting in a "some hours" wrestle between a couple of mere men, unless it is related with varied and exciting details; and even then there should be some prize or great object achieved at the finish. "Some hours" fighting is all very well, if the victor rescues and marries the lovely ill-used heroine.

Digitized by Google

We should like to treat this subject at greater length, but our space is too limited on this occasion. Our difference with Mr. Gould is expressed frankly—we hope not offensively. We should be sorry to detract from the merit of his book, judged from his own standpoint. It is ably and beautifully written; and, we repeat, if books about the Bible, instead of the Bible, or preparatory to it, are to be used at all, this one should take a high and honorable place. Much information is given incidentally, without being officiously obtruded, and the tales are so arranged as to present a "connected, chronological view of the Old Testament."

G. W. FOOTE.

MOON-LORE.

THE wide prevalence of lunar superstitions tends to show their antiquity. Mr. W. F. Mayers (Notes and Queries on China and Japan, p. 123) says: "No one can compare the Chinese legend with the popular European belief of the 'man in the moon' without feeling convinced of the certainty that the Chinese superstition and the English nursery tale are both derived from kindred parentage, and are linked in this relationship by numerous subsidiary ties. In all the range of Chinese mythology there is, perhaps, no stronger instance of identity with the traditions that have taken root in Europe than in the case of the legends relating to the moon." The Rev. J. Doolittle, in his Social Life of the Chinese (vol. ii., p. 65), mentions their making moon-cakes. In Jeremiah vii. 18 we read: "The women knead dough to make cakes to the Queen of Heaven." According to Rashi, an image was stamped on these cakes. Our hot-cross buns probably commemorate the worship of the moon—Diana of the crossways. The Greeks made, for Selene, cakes called σελῆναι—moon-shaped; and moon-cakes used to be made not so long ago in Lancashire.

The Virgin Mary has been, by some, connected with the moon. She is depicted standing on a crescent, and surrounded with stars. She is called in the Missal "Sancta Maria, coeli Regina, et mundi Domina." Her first worshippers were the female Collyridians, who sought her favor by libations and offerings of cakes. In the Apocryphal Gospel of Matthew, and in the Gospel of Mary's Nativity, we read that when the Blessed Virgin was an infant she ran up the fifteen steps of the temple at full speed, which may, perhaps, describe the progress of the new moon to the full.

What Tacitus says of the Germans, that they believe that certain things are best undertaken in the new moon, or before its full, is applicable to the peasant to-day; and not to the Teutonic race only, but to Slavs, Kelts, Chinese, and Central Africans. Tusser, in his Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, writes:—

> Sowe peason and beanes in the wane of the moone—
> Who soweth them sooner, he soweth too soone—
> That they with the planet may rest and arise
> And flourish, with bearing most plentiful-wise.

In Cornwall people still gather their medicinal plants when the moon is of a certain age, and pigs must always be killed when the moon is coming to the full. By performing all sorts of operations at stated times and seasons, unlettered people kept themselves in time with the lord of growth, the light of darkness, and great time regulator, the moon. While the calendar remained lunar thirteen was a lucky number, but when solar reckoning came in it became a feminine symbol and unlucky.

Aubrey, in his Remaines of Gentilisme (p. 83), says: "In Yorkshire, etc., northwards, some country woemen doe worship the New Moon on their bare knees, kneeling upon an earth-fast stone. And the people of Athol, in the High lands in Scotland, doe worship the New Moon." Camden, in his Britannia (vol. ii., p. 380), writes of the Irish: "Whether or no they worship the moon I know not; but when they first see her after the change they commonly bow the knee and say the Lord's Prayer; and, near the wane, address themselves to her with a loud voice, after this manner: Leave us as well as thou foundest us." Halliwell Phillips mentions, among his Popular Rhymes:—

> I see the moon, and the moon sees me;
> God bless the moon, and God bless me.

This looks like a Christian adaptation of older moon-worship. In Devonshire it is lucky to see the moon over the right, but unlucky to see it over the left shoulder. To see it straight before you is good fortune to the end of the month.

T. Thiselton Dyer says: "Various forms of moon-worship survive in the divinations and superstitious rites still associated, here and there, with its changes, many of which are supposed to influence the affairs of daily life. Thus the peasant considers it unlucky to have no piece of silver money in his pocket to turn for prosperity when he first sees the new moon. In Yorkshire the only way of averting this ill-omen is at once to turn head over heels." "I have known persons," says Mr. Hunt (Popular Romances of West of England, p. 429), speaking of Cornish superstitions, "whose attention has been called to a clear new moon, hesitate: 'Hey, I seed her out a'doors afore.' If not, they will go into the open air, and, if possible, show the moon a piece of gold, or at all events turn their money."

In Berkshire and other counties, says Mr. Dyer, at the appearance of a new moon, young women go into the fields, and, whilst looking up at it, repeat the following rhyme:—

> New moon, new moon, I hail thee!
> By all virtue in thy body,
> Grant this night that I may see
> He who my true love is to be.

Georgina F. Jackson, Shropshire Folk-Lore, p. 256, says: "I was myself accustomed in my childhood, on the first sight of the new moon, to curtsey three times, turning round between each curtsey in the expectation of receiving a present before the next moon. Some require nine bows or curtseys without the mystic turns, and some Shrewsbury friends simply perform the ceremony 'for luck,' without the definite expectation of a gift. The rite prescribed by a lady at Ruyton is to curtsey three times, saying, 'Pretty moon, pretty moon, pretty moon!' It is also lucky to get someone to kiss you when you see the new moon."

Mr. F. E. Sawyer, in his Sussex Folk-Lore and Superstitions, mentions a Sussex girl admitted to one of Dr. Barnardo's Village Homes who (Night and Day, 1881) says she had no knowledge of God; "the only thing she had any reverence for was the moon." She said: "You mustn't point at the moon like that, and you mustn't talk about it." A clergyman of Shrewsbury says he was instructed in childhood that it is wicked to point the finger at the moon! In Germany it is held wicked to point at the stars, "because they are angels' eyes." Mrs. Latham says that in West Sussex they bow or curtesy to the new or lady moon, as she is styled, to deprecate bad luck. The Rev. Mr. Parish says little girls curtsey three times to the new moon, and adds that it would be useless to remonstrate with his churchwarden for trying to catch sight of the new moon over his left shoulder, "especially as he might detect me in turning over my money three times at the same moment." Here I must pause and explain. In old symbology the left side is feminine, the right masculine. To look over the left shoulder has a totally different significance from looking over the right, being the proper way to regard a lady. Turning money in the pocket comes simply from the idea that the increase of the moon causes other things to increase, for which spitting on them is also efficacious.

At the first appearance of the first new moon of the year Sussex girls go out, and, looking on the moon, repeat these lines:—

> All hail to thee, Moon, all hail to thee!
> I pray thee, good Moon, reveal to me
> This night who my lover or husband will be.

In many parts there is a practice of divination by counting the reflections of the moon in the water. This is to tell when the lover, husband, or baby will come. Somerset folk, I believe, are called moon-rakers through this practice. In days gone by it was a common practice among peasants to say, when the moon was full: "It is a fine moon, God help her."

An astronomer showed some Sussex laborers the moon through his telescope. One, being asked his opinion, replied: "Well, sir, it be a gashly sight. Tester, he said so, when he see it; and he wur quite right; for you know, sir, that he haint never been to say well since."

J. M. WHEELER.

Digitized by Google

THEOLOGICAL PERPLEXITIES.

ACCORDING to the New Testament (1 Peter i. 20), the death of Christ "was foreordained before the foundation of the world"; and theology teaches that man was created perfect and immortal. To the non-theological mind this is exceedingly perplexing, inasmuch as, if it were ordained that Jesus should die for the redemption of the world, the transgressions of Adam and Eve were only a part of God's plan, and certainly did not merit any curse, but rather a blessing. To urge that man had a free will does not remove the difficulty. If man had any choice in the matter, and supposing he had chosen differently, God's plans would have been thwarted. The account of creation as given in the Bible implies that man was so made that he could only follow the course which should ultimately lead to the sacrifice of Christ. Thus the fourth Gospel tells us that Christ knew from the beginning that Judas would betray him (John xiii. 21). Now, if the death of Christ was pre-ordained, so also was "the fall of man," as the one depends upon the other. "For as in Adam all died, so in Christ shall all be made alive." If this be true, it was impossible for man to have been created perfect. But if man gave way to temptation, was not that a proof of his imperfection?

This story of the "Fall" suggests the following perplexing questions: (1) How could Adam and Eve have been free to choose when God had given them desires to eat a certain fruit, which he had caused to grow, and when he had also provided a serpent, "more subtil than any beast of the field," to tempt the woman? (2) Did God intend the fruit to be eaten? If yes, Adam and Eve committed no sin in partaking of it; if no, they acted in opposition to the plans of an omnipotent God. (3) Who created the serpent? If God, then he was responsible for the results; if, however, the serpent was not created by God, he was not the creator of all things. (4) If God were correct in saying that everything he had made was "very good" (Genesis i. 31), how did the serpent become bad? (5) How could Eve know, before she acquired knowledge, that the tree "was to be desired to make one wise" (Genesis iii. 6)? Would not this have been putting the effect before the cause? (6) If the plan were foreordained "before the foundation of the world," how was it possible for events to have happened differently from what they did?

What is termed "God's foreknowledge" is another most perplexing theory, inasmuch as it appears to us that, if he knew that a certain event would happen, that event must take place. We think it was Charles Southwell who wrote: "It has often been asserted that the events foreknown by God are certain, but not necessary. Those who say this would do well to consider its absurdity, which is, indeed, very evident. For, if the existence of a future event be certain, is its non-existence in the course of things possible? If its non-existence is not possible, how is the existence of the event contingent? And if its non-existence be possible, how is the existence of the event certain? And if the existence of the event be uncertain, how can the knowledge of its existence be certain?" We commend this foreknowledge puzzle to the attention of modern defenders of Christianity. No marvel that the orthodox doctrines of the Christian faith are being rapidly given up by the intelligent thinkers of to-day. Equally puzzling is the doctrine of predestination, which, if true, renders the freedom of the will an impossibility. For, if God predestined man to a certain condition, and knew that he would adopt a particular course, how could freedom of the will be exercised?

What does the free-will theory imply? Why this: That will, or volition, is a free cause—that is, a cause which is not an effect; a supposition which, to the human mind, is entirely incomprehensible. Sir W. Hamilton says: "Moral liberty does not merely consist in the power of doing what we will, but in the power of willing what we will." If this be so, the question arises, What is this "willing" power, and where is it located? Is it an entity that controls volition? If so, upon what does this power depend? Even Hamilton admits: "How the will can possibly be free must remain to us, under the present limitation of our faculties, wholly incomprehensible. We are unable to conceive an absolute commencement; we cannot, therefore, conceive a free volition." In our opinion, absolute freedom of the will is impossible; for, if a person has the power to call up a desire by the will, it is certain that some prior desire induced him to do so. What, therefore, caused that desire? Suppose an individual says he wills to do a thing, and he does it, he must have had an inclination, or he would not have thus willed and acted. Hence some inclination must have preceded the will, and clearly the will cannot be the cause of that which precedes itself in point of time, and to which, in fact, it owes its existence. According to the free-will perplexity, a man can choose what he likes; but how can he do this when man inherits certain mental and bodily tendencies, or if he has a defective brain or a diseased body? Besides, it is an admitted fact that the capacities of men vary in every race, and that each person's will-power is affected by the nature and extent of his mental capacity. The will of a Newton would differ widely from that of a savage; but why? Simply because the influences that called forth the will in the two cases were of a different kind. The history of the human race proves, to our mind, that there is no universal power of thought and action as is implied by free will. The conditions that produced Napoleon, who was the scourge of Europe, did not produce Washington, who was the deliverer of his nation. Here we recognise the operation of human causes; in the one case in a passion for military glory, and in the other in a love of national freedom.

It is contended by orthodox believers that man feels that he is free; and no doubt this is true. But the point is, free to do what? Simply to act in accordance with his volition, not to cause the volition itself—that is, an effect which is governed by motives and controlled by surrounding circumstances. As Tuttle points out, the human being, physically and mentally matured, is the representative of every law and condition which has ever acted on him or his progenitors, ad infinitum. In him they are not only individualised, they are centrestantialised. He exists because of their action; he is as they have made him. In this sense man is a creature of circumstances. So far as these forces and conditions acted previous to his birth, he is not a free agent, nor is he in his relation to the fixed action of the great forces of nature. But on the circumstances which surround his maturity he acts by virtue of his inherent selfhood, the resultant of all previous conditions which make up that selfhood. In this view he may be considered free, for what we call a man is nothing more nor less than the aggregate of forces and conditions, many of which we understand, and many of which we do not understand. He is free, just as his organisation, representative of all previous conditions and forces, will allow. This freedom is quite distinct from the dogmatical tenet of free-agency, inasmuch as it regards man's existence as an effect becoming a cause, and not a self-existent cause.

Besides, the Christian theory of the freedom of the will is a premium upon indifference and delay in reformation. For, if a person can will to act in one particular manner at any moment, he may lead a life of rascality, and repent only when he thinks his career is approaching its end. Hence we read:

> While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

Such a believer in free will, having, perhaps, spent threescore years and ten in pursuing a course of conduct neither creditable to himself nor useful to others, may delude himself by supposing that at the last moments of his existence he can undergo an entire change of character, and then

> Clap his glad wings, and tower away,
> To mingle with the blaze of day.

CHARLES WATTS.

(To be concluded.)

The Worth of Life.

The value of earthly life has been, and is, often obscured. A certain kind of human conduct in the long run tends to obscure it. This course of conduct has obtained, and for the evolutionist shall retain, the name of unrighteousness. The opposite course of conduct has obtained, and for the evolutionist shall retain, the name of righteousness, the meaning and value whereof is, that in measure of its practice its broad and certain outcome is to make life ever better and better worth living.—L. S. Bevington.

Digitized by Google

A CHRISTIAN HOSPITAL.

DID you ever visit a Christian hospital? Well, no! I did not think there is such a thing. Let us try to imagine one.

As a Christian is forbidden to lay up treasures upon earth, and even to take any thought for the morrow; and as he is forbidden to labor for the bread that perisheth, a Christian hospital could not be a building of any description—unless, by the way, we consider it a spiritual building, a house not made with hands. You see, bricks and mortar cannot be made or procured without a great deal of earthly labor, which, to use Scripture lingo, may also be "devilish." Stones require to be quarried; timber must be felled, dried, and sawn; and all these materials require a great deal of labor to remove them to the place of erection, and more labour still to turn them into a building.

It is clear, therefore, that Christians could never themselves get together the materials and erect a building without disobeying their Master's commands, and risking his heaviest and direst vengeance. Because, you see, at any moment of their lives the Lord Jesus may descend from heaven with a shout; and if he should come to judgment and find Christians working at worldly things, instead of watching for their Lord, as he so positively commanded them, he will "cut them asunder, and appoint them their portion with the hypocrites." And you do not need to be told that no real Christian would risk anything so serious as all that. No, he is so intent upon watching for the coming of Christ that he has not a moment to spare for anything but religious duties; and is even afraid to sleep, lest he should be found in that state when Gabriel's trumpet shall blow.

Consequently, Christians can never erect a building; and their hospitals must be in the open air, with the ground for the floor, the clouds and sky for roof and ceiling, and plenty of ventilation for the patients. Their only light will be the sun, moon, and stars, except when a bright angel shall visit them, or the Devil come and glare upon them with his blazing eyes, sparkling horns, etc.

Some might be tempted to say that the Christian might buy for money what he himself could not or would not make, etc. But, nay! the true Christian parts with all his wealth in becoming a Christian. He cannot be one without doing so. "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv. 33; read the context). A true Christian would as soon be found by the coming Christ committing murder or adultery as in possession of money or wealth.

There will be no stretchers on which to carry the patients to the Christian hospital, for to make such things would require unchristian work. For the same reason there will be no beds or furniture of any kind on the ground, except what nature supplies.

Drugs and surgical instruments and appliances will be entirely wanting, because contrary to Bible teaching, which admits of no cure of a purely worldly nature, none at all. King Asa was afflicted in his feet; the poor man applied to the physicians, and died. He did not apply to Dr. Jehovah, you see, as he should have done; and that gentleman, out of mere rivalry, killed him. And that is sufficient warning to all true Christians not to have anything at all to do with doctors, except they are of the purely spiritual kind.

And, besides all that, the blessed New Testament contains one prescription for every disease whatsoever; and that prescription can never fail. Here it is, in extenso: "Is any sick among you; let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him" (James v. 14, 15).

There is the prescription, drawn up by the Holy Ghost himself, after an eternity's thought and careful study. You see, it covers every kind of sickness, no matter what. And it is warranted to cure, and that, too, on the spot.

And let me say that I never knew it fail in true Christian hands. Of course, if you are only nominal Christian it will not succeed; but if you are of the genuine type the prescription must succeed. If you do not believe me, you can surely believe the Lord's own word and promise! No! Then you are no Christian. Kindly step aside; I am speaking only to the faithful.

Take a look at the prescription; you need not fear Christ will come before you get through it. If he should, you can drop it and look up as if you had been all along expecting him. You are to call in the elders. The elders may be of any character, bad or good—"boom" swindlers; owners of property used for immoral purposes; magistrates who pack the bench for a bribe; judges who act unjustly; lying journalists or lying pulpiteers; adulterers, fornicators, thieves, or what not. The only duty enjoined on you is to call in the elders, not to inquire into their character.

The only difficulty at all in the prescription is the question of the oil. We are not told what sort of oil it should be—train oil, olive oil, cod-liver oil, oil of cloves, colza oil, turps, eucalyptus oil, kerosene, or what. My sanctified opinion is that it does not matter what the oil is; for, after all, it is not that which is to effect the cure, but the prayer of faith. I should say, then, just take whatever oil you have, or leave it to the elders to bring some with them. Many of them are oily enough themselves to meet the case.

The only other portion of the prescription which requires elucidation is the anointing. Is it to be partial, local, or all over the body? Here we have nothing to guide us; and therefore, I presume, it does not much matter. The quantity of oil to be used is not specified; therefore use as little as is necessary. Let the elders put a little on the tip of the nose, on the lips, on the forehead, and on the tip of each ear—where the patient has two of those appendages; and let one of the elders do this while the others apply the prayer of faith. The process will succeed before you scarcely know where you are.

The above is, I think, a very correct, scriptural, and godly description of a truly Christian hospital, and the mode of cure thereat practised and followed. If I am at all in error, the Christians can correct me from their own Divine word; and I shall then feel obliged to them.

When such a hospital is once established it will be a boon to humanity, will it not? Dr. Bevan, Dr. Carr, and Dr. Goe will recommend and support it, I am sure, and invariably go there for cure when they are ill—no matter what the sin may be for which they are afflicted

Besides being so extremely useful in the way just hinted at, how soon such a hospital would destroy all unbelief and convert all Atheists, Infidels, Sceptics, etc., to the true faith!

What can be the reason that the Christians do not set up or establish or inaugurate such a hospital? Are they afraid? Are they in league with the doctors and nurses, who get an income from the present institutions? or are they as sceptical as I am as to the virtues of the prescription? Do they really think Jesus and the Holy Ghost blundered? Eh, what! does James and Co.'s prescription really belong to the category of superstitions? Is that so? Do you tell me that modern scientific treatment of disease is really superior to God's Bible method? Have you more faith in well-trained doctors than in elders? in drugs than the prayer of faith?

Ah, well, my Christian enemy, I congratulate you on your loss of faith. But why do you still keep up your hypocritical profession of faith in what you heartily despise? And why do you hate and slander me for openly repudiating the very superstitions you secretly despise as well as I?—you contemptible, hypocritical coward!

JOS. SYMES.

—Liberator.

DON'T NEAD NO JURNALS.—The following interesting reply, says the Pharmaceutical Era, was returned by a Minnesota doctor to a circular letter soliciting subscriptions to a certain medical journal in the United States: "Your copy of the —— Jurnal come, and the letter to—askin' me to send fifty cens and git it fur a yeer. I don't nead no jurnals. When I git a tuff case I go off inter sum secrit place and tell the lord all about it and wate fur him to put inter my minde what ter do. That's bettern jurnals and nyklopedes and such. If we hed more lord trustin docters and less colleges, weed fare better. The lord noes morn all the docters, and if we go to him fur noledge it ill be bettern jurnals.—Fraternally in the lord, A CHRISTUN DOCTER. P.S.—I've practist medisen morn fifty yeers. You can publish this letter if you want ter."

Digitized by Google

"VICTORY OF THE SCIENTIFIC AND LITERARY METHODS."*

By the new race of Christian scholars it has been clearly shown that the first three Gospels, which, down to the close of the last century, were so constantly declared to be three independent testimonies agreeing as to the events recorded, are neither independent of each other nor in that sort of agreement which was formerly asserted. All Biblical scholars of any standing, even the most conservative, have come to admit that all three took their rise in the same original sources, growing by the accretions sure to come as time went on—accretions sometimes useful and often beautiful, but in no inconsiderable degree ideas and even narratives inherited from older religions; it is also fully acknowledged that to this growth process are due certain contradictions which cannot otherwise be explained. As to the fourth Gospel, exquisitely beautiful as large portions of it are, there has been growing steadily and irresistibly the conviction, even among the most devout scholars, that it represents an infusion of Greek conceptions into Hebraism, and that its final form is mainly due to some gifted representative or representatives of the Alexandrian school. Bitter as the resistance to this view has been, it has during the last years of the nineteenth century won its way more and more to acknowledgment. A careful examination made in 1893 by a competent Christian scholar showed facts which are best given in his own words, as follows:—

> "In the period of thirty years ending in 1860, of the fifty great authorities in this line, four to one were in favour of the Johannine authorship. Of those who in that period had advocated this traditional position one quarter—and certainly the very greatest—finally changed their position to the side of a late date and non-Johannine authorship. Of those who have come into this field of scholarship since about 1860, some forty men of the first class, two-thirds reject the traditional theory wholly or very largely. Of those who have contributed important articles to the discussion from about 1880 to 1890, about two to one reject the Johannine authorship of the Gospel in its present shape—that is to say, while forty years ago great scholars were four to one in favour of, they are now two to one against, the claim that the apostle John wrote this gospel as we have it. Again, one half of those on the conservative side to-day—scholars like Weiss, Beyschlag, Sanday, and Reynolds—admit the existence of a dogmatic intent and an ideal element in this Gospel, so that we do not have Jesus's thought in his exact words, but only in substance."

In 1881 came an event of great importance as regards the development of a more frank and open dealing with scriptural criticism. In that year appeared the Revised Version of the New Testament. It was exceedingly cautious and conservative; but it had the vast merit of being absolutely conscientious. One thing showed, in a striking way, ethical progress in theological methods. Although all but one of the English revisers represented Trinitarian bodies, they rejected the two great proof texts which had so long been accounted essential bulwarks of Trinitarian doctrine. Thus disappeared at last from the epistle of St. John the text of the Three Witnesses, which had for centuries held its place in spite of its absence from all the earlier important manuscripts, and of its rejection in later times by Erasmus, Luther, Isaac Newton, Porson, and a long line of the greatest biblical scholars. And with this was thrown out the other like unto it in spurious origin and zealous intent, that interpolation of the word "God" in the 16th verse of the third chapter of the First Epistle to Timothy, which had for ages served as a warrant for condemning some of the noblest of Christians, even such men as Newton and Milton and Locke and Priestley and Channing.

Indeed, so honest were the revisers that they substituted the correct reading of Luke ii. 33 in place of the time-honored corruption in the King James version, which had been thought necessary to safeguard the dogma of the virgin birth of Jesus of Nazareth. Thus came the true reading, "His father and his mother," instead of the old piously fraudulent words, "Joseph and his mother." And even more important service to the new and better growth of Christianity was the virtual setting aside of the last twelve verses of the Gospel according to St. Mark. For among these stood that sentence which has cost the world more innocent blood than any other—the words, "He that believeth not shall be damned."

Most valuable, too, have been studies during the latter part of the nineteenth century upon the formation of the canon of Scripture. The result of these has been to substitute something far better for that conception of our biblical literature, as forming one book handed out of the clouds by the Almighty, which had been so long practically the accepted view among probably the majority of Christians. Reverend scholars have demonstrated our sacred literature to be a growth in obedience to simple laws, natural and historical; they have shown how some books of the Old Testament were accepted as sacred centuries before our era, and how others gradually gained sanctity, in some cases only acquiring it long after the establishment of the Christian Church. The same slow growth has also been shown in the New Testament canon. It has been demonstrated that the selection of the books composing it was a gradual process, and, indeed, that the rejection of some books and the acceptance of others was accidental, if anything is accidental.

So, too, scientific biblical research has, as we have seen, been obliged to admit the existence of much mythical and legendary matter, as a setting for the great truths, not only of the Old Testament, but of the New. It has also shown, by the comparative study of literatures, the process by which some books were compiled and recompiled, adorned with beautiful utterances, strengthened or weakened by interpolations expressing the views of the possessors or transcribers, and assigned to personages who could not possibly have written them. The showing forth of these things has greatly weakened that sway of mere dogma which has so obscured the simple teachings of Christ himself; for it has shown that the more we know of our sacred books, the less certain we become as to the authenticity of proof texts, and it has disengaged more and more, as the only valuable residuum, like the mass of gold at the bottom of the crucible, the personality and general teaching and ideals of the blessed founder of Christianity. The new scholarship has shown that even such absolute contradictions as that between the date assigned for the crucifixion in the first three Gospels and that given in the fourth, and other discrepancies hardly less serious, do not affect the historical character of the essential part of the narrative. Even the hopelessly conflicting genealogies of the Savior, and the evidently mythical accretions about the simple facts of his birth and life, are thus full of interest when taken as a natural literary development.

Vast masses of myth, legend, marvel, and dogmatic assertion, coming into this atmosphere, have been dissolved, and are now dissolving quietly away like icebergs drifted into the Gulf Stream. In earlier days, when some critic in advance of his time insisted that Moses could not have written an account embracing the circumstances of his own death, it was sufficient to answer that Moses was a prophet; if attention was called to the fact that the great early prophets, by all which they did and did not do, showed that there could not have existed in their time any "Levitical code," a sufficient answer was "mystery"; and if the discrepancy was noted between the two accounts of creation in Genesis, or between the genealogies or the dates of the crucifixion in the Gospels, the cogent reply was "infidelity." But the thinking world has at last been borne, by the general development of a scientific atmosphere, beyond that kind of refutation.

—Professor A. White, "Popular Science Monthly," condensed by New York "Public Opinion."

* New Chapters in "The Warfare of Science."

Bible Slavery.

"If a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished, for he is his money" (Exodus xxi. 20, 21). "I shall never forget the revulsion of feeling with which a very intelligent native, with whose help I was translating these last words into the Zulu tongue, first heard them as words said to be uttered by the same great and gracious Being whom I was teaching him to trust in and adore. His whole soul revolted against the notion that the Great and Blessed God, the Merciful Father of all mankind, would speak of a servant or maid as mere 'money,' and allow a horrible crime to go unpunished because the victim of the brutal outrage had survived a few hours."—Bishop Colenso.

Digitized by Google

THE RIVAL RELIGIONISTS.

["Love ye one another?" See reports of recent Presbytery meetings. Something like the following may soon be looked for if the present keen competition is maintained.]

"HERE y'are, gents! We're a-waiting!
Ladies! Won't you 'ave a seat?
Pure, Refined, and Elevating!
Our's a worship can't be beat!
Cushioned pews and books provided;
Shorter sermons don't exist;
And the grand new organ's guided
By a long-'aired organist!"

"Hi! hi! hi! Now here's a chance, sirs!
That there fellow's talking trash!
Pay your seat-rent in advance, sirs;
Liberal discount off for cash!
Ladies, come, your hearts 'll tingle!
Take a trial quarter—do!
Our young minister is single:
Wants a wife; now, why not you?

"This way! this way with your money!
No collections; no bazaars!
Sermons up to date and funny;
All the choir composed of stars!
Husband, miss? A wife? In here, sir!
We supply 'em plain or toff;
From our membership last year, sir,
Twenty couple 'knocked it off!'"

(OMNES.)

"We're the only 'chosen people'!
Do not be misled although
Every cock on every steeple
Calls you with its canting crow!
Please don't let your order pass us
For your last, long earthly tour;
Bookings made to suit all classes;
We are bound for Jordan—sure!"

—Glasgow Evening News.

ACID DROPS.

THE London correspondent of the Western Morning News is not delighted with the "Tom Paine" Exhibition. In his opinion, the author of the Age of Reason and the Rights of Man was "too much of a bully and too violent in his tone." Anyhow, Paine could write English, which is more than we can say of this anonymous scribbler, whose opinions may be a theme of laughter to his friends. "Too much of a bully" is a ridiculous expression. It implies that Paine ought to have been just enough of a bully—which, as our old friend Euclid says, is absurd.

Thomas Paine was a bully, was he? What, then, are we to think of Jesus Christ? Search the writings of Thomas Paine from beginning to end, and see if you can find anything to equal the virulent abuse which Jesus Christ heaped upon the heads of his religious rivals in Jerusalem. Thomas Paine never called his opponents "vipers" and "children of hell."

The Lord Mayor of London, addressing the London Rifle Brigade, at a prize distribution, told his hearers that their first duty was to their Creator, and the next to their country. We understand that the Rifle Brigade are ready to shoot for their country. We did not know that they were also—and first of all—ready to shoot for their Creator.

The Lord Mayor sang the praises of England, in opposition to those unpatriotic persons who think other countries are in some respects wiser and happy. Why, said the Lord Mayor, they have everything in this country to make them happy. "Everything" is a large order. No doubt the Lord Mayor has everything to make him happy, but how about the million paupers, the myriads out of work, and the thousands who are perishing of destitution in the midst of plenty?

Mr. Hiram S. Maxim, the scientist, mentions that Mr. Davidson, a Scotch engineer, who spent a long time in China, relates that he had never known a native Chinese Christian who was a Christian five minutes after the missionary had ceased to pay him; that the missionaries could have just as many converts as they wanted in China, provided that they paid the price. The regular scale of prices was about three dollars a week for a clever and active Chinaman to go about and secure subjects for conversion; and the regular pay to converts was two dollars a month.

An Austrian officer in the service of the Chinese Government, speaking of the missionary question in China, said that he had never known of an honest Chinaman who was a Christian; that there was no such thing as converting the middle or better class of Chinaman. All the converts were of the lower class, and very poor people; they were Christians simply because it paid them to be Christians; their Christianity was on a strictly cash basis; it was simply a matter of how much they could make.

Bishop Moorhouse, in addressing the Manchester annual meeting of the S.P.G., let out a little fact concerning missionary enterprise in India. He mentioned that those of pure Aryan race, Brahmins and Rajpoots, were hardly as yet touched by Christian influence. Christians often boast of their converts in India without telling the classes from which they are drawn—viz., the aboriginal devil-worshippers, or the lowest castes, who find material welfare in a change of faith. The fact that Christianity succeeds with these, while failing with the higher castes of Hindus and with Moslems, determines its own real status.

A lady South African correspondent of the Sketch says she emphatically endorses the opinion of every colonial, that the missionised African is far worse than the raw heathen native. She says: "Ask any business man or woman who has lived in the Transvaal or Cape Colony why a raw Kaffir is physically and mentally and naturally pure, helpful, willing, and honest, and why that same Kaffir, having gone to some mission station to be educated, comes back supercilious, independent, lazy, and often dishonest, you can get no answer, simply a shrug and 'I don't know, but it is so.'" The secret probably is that the Christian is told he can lay his sins on Jesus, and immediately sets about copying Christian vices, that Jesus may have a good opportunity of displaying his wondrous love for sinners.

Another factor, says this South African correspondent, is that the Dutch Boer, filled with psalms and hymns, repeating texts by the yard, and going in for abundant services and prayer-meetings, is one of the most despicable of creatures. The average Boer is a sanctimonious rascal, who "will lie, will cheat, will slander to the very utmost, quoting Scripture all the time." The Kaffir, seeing Christianity is a mere hypocrisy among its professors, naturally also becomes a hypocrite when he becomes a Christian.

The Provincial Missionary Conference of South Africa has been discussing the question of the polygamy of converts. The Bishop of Bloemfontein, supported by the Bishop of Lebombo, moved that the subject be considered with closed doors; and, according to the Natal Mercury, the opinion was freely expressed that, before a native convert could be admitted to the catechumenate, he should be required to divorce all his wives but one, and put them, with their offspring, away from him.

This attitude has been a usual one with missionaries, but it is in accordance neither with humanity nor scripture. Jesus lived in a polygamous society, but he said nothing against polygamy; and Paul's injunction, that a bishop should be the husband of one wife, does not apply to catechumens, and has been interpreted as meaning that he must have one at least.

Describing a beautiful Chinese temple at Los Angeles, California, a local paper says: "In a corner is another stand, containing a bass drum and a heavy bell, used to wake the god or call his attention when worshippers are present." Probably the bells on the dress of Jewish priests, and the bell sounded at the elevation of the Mass, were originally for the same purpose.

A meeting of converted people was held at Krugersdorp, to which no unconverted people were admitted. Some of the latter requested admittance. A battle royal ensued, in which the church militant was victorious. Tall language was used on both sides, but at last the sinners carried the case before the Assistant Landdrost, who fined two of the saints £5 each, with the alternative of eight days' imprisonment, four days on spare diet.—Natal Advertiser.

In Maritzburg they had not only special prayers for rain, but also against the plague of locusts. The Rev. Mr. Heard, Baptist pastor, refused to pray, saying: "My idea is that the inhabitants of this or any country should first of all have done their level best to destroy the locusts, and then ask God to bless the effort." This minister's improvement on the old theology seems to be that we should act as if there were no God, but talk as if there were one.

The prayers for rain have excited much controversy in South Africa. The Rev. D. P. Faure, of the Free Protestant

Digitized by Google

Church, says: "People might just as well pray for the direct miracle that their crops should be saved without the intervention of rain; but they would no more do that than pray for a broken leg to be miraculously set. Prayer for material blessings—the mere asking for favors—he regarded as degrading. The only legitimate prayer was to ask for spiritual blessings." But surely it is as illogical to expect spiritual miracles as material ones.

"Agnostic" had a good letter on the subject in the Diggers' News. He pointed out that the reasoning of believers is like the gambler's "heads I win, tails you lose." All facts that tell for their case are allowed to count, and all that tell against it are excluded. If what they pray for happens, that proves the efficacy of prayer; and if it does not happen, that proves nothing at all. Such is the logic of superstition in all ages.

A writer in Mrs. Bloomfield Moore's cranky New Science Review argues that the only escape from Materialism is belief in a fourth dimension. What a pity these Spiritists cannot remove from a world where the most perceptible dimensions are the length, breadth, and thickness of their own understandings.

Rubinstein's sacred opera, "Christus," has been performed at Bremen. The authorities ordered that no applause should be given during the performance, as that would be a desecration of the sacred piece.

As late as 1850 smoking was allowed in some churches in Wales. The communion-table stood in the aisle, and the farmers were in the habit of putting their hats upon it, and when the sermon began they lit their pipes and smoked, but without any idea of irreverence.

An American paper says: "There is no error which prevails more widely, even among educated people, than the belief that a man has one rib more in his right side than in his left, the deficiency being supposed to have been inherited from Adam. As a fact, men and women have each twenty-four ribs, twelve on each side."

A pretty quarrel over Hell is raging in the Midlands. It appears that the Rev. Kenneth Bond, minister of the Baptist Church at Swadlincote, came to the conclusion that there was no eternal punishment. Some of the Church members resented their preacher's heterodoxy. It made them quite uncomfortable to think there was any prospect of nobody going to the everlasting bonfire in perpetuity. Accordingly, a meeting was called to consider the situation, and a vote was taken by ballot, which gave the non-everlasting hellites a chance of supporting their minister without being discovered. Twelve voted in favor of Mr. Bond's resignation, and sixty-two against it. Only ten remained neutral, so that the majority was triumphant and decisive.

A number of local preachers "of various denominations" met at Greeley Wesleyan Church to sit (metaphorically) upon Mr. Bond and defend the grand old doctrine of eternal punishment. They expressed "in the strongest possible manner" their disagreement with Mr. Bond's views, and emphatically declared their belief that "such views are directly opposed to the teaching of the Word of God." We hope this quarrel will continue. The more Hell is talked about the sooner it will be extinguished.

Eminent German critics have been deploring the fact that the literature of Germany is fast becoming paralysed, while that of France shows every sign of vitality. Herr Litzmann, professor at Bonn, says: "The literature of Germany is neither hot nor cold, but dreadfully commonplace and destitute of individuality." It has had no poet since Freligrath; no philosopher since Schopenhauer. Meanwhile every person who shows the slightest individuality is in danger of prosecution for lesé majesty—the latest victim being the head of the ethical societies.

A rival contest in clairvoyance between J. B. Tetlow, a Spiritist medium, and Professor Steen, an avowed deceptionist, took place at the Manchester Free Trade Hall. A stake of £100 was said to be involved, but the affair ended in a squabble, and the Sunday Chronicle says: "As a contest it was little else than a farce." What else was to be expected?

Professor A. A. Bevan gives Professor Sayce a good dressing in the columns of the Contemporary Review. He mentions that his conclusions as to the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch are rejected by the most eminent archæologists, such as Schrader, Haupt, Winckler, and Maspero. The last, one of the most eminent Egyptologists, endorses Wellhausen, and holds that the Jehovistic portion of the Pentateuch was composed about 840 B.C.; the Deuteronomic Code, dating from the time of Josiah and the Priestly Code, being post-exilic. In regard to the author of the Priestly Code of the Bible, Maspero says in so many words: "Where the facts do not conform to his design, he abridges, suppresses, alters, and lends them a character purely ideal, or changes them so that they no longer respond to reality" (Hist. Anc. des Peuples de l'Orient, p. 395; 1893). When such eminent archæologists differ, for Sayce to claim his as the verdict of archæology is simply orthodox cheek, and confirms an opinion given us by an eminent Egyptologist, derogatory to his character and his scholarship.

Professor Bevan points out that the archæological evidence relating to the Old Testament depends, in most cases, upon the identification of proper names—that is to say, a person, nation, or place mentioned in an inscription is conjectured to be identical with some person, nation, or place mentioned in the Bible. The Church Times (Nov. 29) showed how shaky were the identifications of Professor Sayce, and Professor Bevan goes still farther. What Sayce reads as Eri-aku, and identifies with Arioch, some of the best Assyriologists hold should be pronounced Rim-Sin. Indeed, many signs can be read so variously that such conjectured identifications must ever be extremely dubious.

Professor Sayce and others insist on identifying the nation called Kheta by the Egyptians, with the Hittites of the Old Testament. Yet one of the most learned archæologists in this country, Dr. E. Wallis Budge, has recently stated that for this theory there is not, in his opinion, "the slightest evidence."

Professor Bevan says, and proves, that Sayce's "knowledge of Biblical criticism is altogether superficial." Nay, he shows this is the most charitable construction to be put upon the fact that he ascribes to "the critics," as a body, "opinions which no critic of repute has ever dreamt of maintaining." Sayce's inference, that Moses must have written because the Egyptians and Assyrians had a knowledge of writing, is shown to be inconclusive. "Even at the present day it is quite usual in the East to find utterly illiterate tribes living in close proximity to great centres of civilisation." Of course Sayce never attempted to touch the question whether such regulations as those given in Leviticus could have been promulgated in the wilderness.

Sir Henry Howorth goes farther than Professor Bevan and other critics. He claims to show that the Septuagint represents a far earlier state of the Hebrew than the Masoretic text of the Old Testament, the received version, which he believes was arranged and published by Akiba and his pupils at Jamnia in the first centuries after the Christian era.; that, in particular, the previous continuous work of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, was then touched up and altered; and that the first book of Esdras, in the Apocrypha, enables us to partly reconstruct the text of that work before it was tampered with and altered.

In Professor Sayce's inaugural address, delivered before the ninth International Congress of Orientalists, he himself pointed to the difficulties of deciphering cuneiform inscriptions. He said: "Sounds which were certainly distinct in Assyrian pronunciation are confounded together in writing, while sounds are separated in writing which may have been identical in pronunciation." Add to this that every character possesses more than one phonetic value, and the difficulty of identifying proper names with certainty must be apparent.

Mr. F. C. Conybeare, M.A., writes in the Expositor for December on "The Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark's Gospel." He mentions that they do not appear in the Armenian versions until a copy of the year 989 A.D., in which they are said to have been written by one Ariston, the Elder. He holds, however, that they were part of the fifth-century Armenian version, and were afterwards erased.

Mr. Conybeare mentions incidentally that old Armenian codices preserve very old features of the New Testament text. Thus in Matthew ii. 9 the Moscow codex of the year 887 reads: "The star.....stood still over the cave where was the child." Now, Justin Martyr, Origen, and the Protoevangelion, ascribed to James, all speak of Jesus as born in a cave like Mithras and other solar heroes.

Dr. A. D. Watson writes on the psychology of religious revivals in the Canadian Methodist Review. He broadly hints that what the Methodists often take for the workings of the Holy Ghost, such as "seizures, trances, and convulsions," are really signs of religious insanity. He says: "It will thus be understood why the objectionable features of revivals are so frequent among the unlettered aboriginal peoples, when missionaries go among them. Indeed, excessive outbursts of feeling, manifested in hysterical proportions, almost invariably occur among persons of an excitable temperament, among those of weak will, or those of a debilitated physical constitution."

Digitized by Google

"Given a number of such persons in a series of meetings, and if the evangelist should appeal chiefly to motives of fear or to the intensely emotional part of the sensibility, rather than to urge the case mainly upon its reasonable and righteous grounds; if the evangelist have a powerfully magnetic and commanding presence, and insist on certain forms without clearly defining that obedience to the Lord, rather than the mere performance of the evangelist's desire, constitutes duty; further, if it be understood or surmised that there would be general approval of any exceptional occurrence, such as prostration or highly wrought or excited movements, these demonstrations are pretty sure to occur."

A good many sky-pilots have reiterated what has never been questioned—viz., that writing was well known in the time of Moses. But they do not tell their auditors the further fact that writing was in existence long anterior to the time assigned to Adam. Chinese documents go back to about 3000 B.C., while some say 7000 B.C. Mr. C. J. Ball, M.A., who has done much to identify Chinese with the Accadian language, says of that tongue: "Five thousand years before our era it already possessed a system of writing which the earliest existing documents prove to have been of pictorial origin."

The murderer Durrant has not yet paid the penalty of his crimes. The body of Blanche Lamont, a Sunday-school girl, was found decomposed on the belfry of the Emanuel Baptist Church, San Francisco, on April 14, and Durrant, who was an usher of the church and a pious superintendent of the Sunday-school, was seen taking her in there on April 3. His trial lasted from July 22 to November 1, when the jury unanimously balloted him as guilty after five minutes' consultation. Another victim was found in the church, and this is occasioning the delay. Durrant went on teaching and attending prayer-meeting, as the district attorney said, "while his victim rotted in the spire that pointed its slender finger to the sky." He was a leading figure in the church, and may point the warning that it is not always safe for young girls to accompany pious teachers into sacred buildings, even in broad daylight.

A telegram from Columbia, South Carolina, says that four prominent whites tortured to death a young negro who was suspected of stealing a Bible. In their zeal for religion, they murdered his aged mother likewise.

The man Covington, who was executed at Bedford for the murder of his girl cousin, spent most of his time in prison in reading religious books. As he made a most edifying ending, he has doubtless gone to join Abraham, Issac, and Jacob in the mansions of the blest.

The Daily News points out that the State contributes £311,383 to Roman Catholic schools, a sum sufficient to pay the whole cost of the secular education given therein. Yet Lord Chief Justice Russell abuses his office by joining in the cry for more State support without State control.

Mr. Justice Day, charging the grand jury at Lincolnshire Assizes, said that perjury was widely prevalent. "It was shocking to think that so many persons called on God to witness that they would speak the truth when they were present for the express purpose of falsehood."

A friend has sent us a little pocket edition of The Life of David, by Peter Annet, who was imprisoned for "blasphemy" in last century, and was mentioned in terms of praise by Voltaire. This edition was published by T. Williams, Broadway, Blackfriars, in 1796. It is bound in old tree calf, and the binder—either personally or by instigation—has put a stroke of genius on the cover, which bears the title: "Life of a Scoundrel."

The number of deaths in India caused by bites of wild animals and reptiles is on the increase. The deaths from snake bites last year were 21,000, and in the same period nearly 120,000 deadly snakes were killed. Wild animals caused the death of 2,800 persons in the same year; the tigers and leopards more than four hundred; the wolves, 175; bears, 121; and elephants, 68. On the other hand, nearly 15,000 wild beasts were killed, including nearly 1,300 tigers, and more than 4,000 leopards. In addition to the loss of human life, nearly ninety thousand head of cattle were destroyed. The bounties offered by the Government seem ineffectual to decrease the number of wild animals. The superstitions of the natives tend to perpetuate their scourge.

The Rev. Frank Hyatt Smith, pastor of the North Avenue Congregational Church at Cambridge, Mass., has been arrested for sending obscene and scurrilous post-cards to members of his congregations. They did not consist of Bible texts, but were to the full as offensive.

The law case between the rival infidel-slayers at Glasgow promises to be very amusing. The pursuer is alleged to have been converted several times. At one time he posed as a converted clown, and after this he was convicted of an assault on a constable at Bristol in October, 1892. He accuses the defender of gross falsehood and calumny.

Elder Ebert, of the Seventh Day Adventists, says that crack-brained John on Patmos referred to the Mohammedan rule in his ninth chapter; and he thinks that the waning power of the Turk is a sure sign of the speedy advent of the much-delayed Jesus. It seems the third part of men are to be slain (Revelation ix. 15), and this means the destruction of the Moslems and other infidels. Hallelujah!

Those sanguine individuals known as Adventists may glean some information about the probable fate of Christ, and the reason for his non-reappearance up to date, from a prayerful consideration of two passages in Matthew. According to Matthew x. 34, Christ says: "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." In Matthew xxvi. 52 he supplements this statement with another: "Put up again thy sword into his place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Brethren, what do you think about it?—Boston Investigator.

Luther R. Marsh, an aged Spiritist who resides with Mrs. Huyler, a medium, at Middleton, told a correspondent as follows: "The spirit of Henry Ward Beecher informed Mrs. Huyler that he (Beecher) would bring before her the spirits of the patriarchs, in order that she might secure from them evidence to establish the authenticity of the Scriptures." This is the very thing that is wanted. Profane sceptics have been suggesting that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are simply mythical ancestors of a Semitic tribe, and Samson no more than a sun-hero. If Mrs. Huyler will only trot their spirits out and have them photographed, all the world will have a chance of being convinced.

The Daily News recently made the following statement in a leading article on Mr. Lecky and the Dublin University election: "Freethinkers have in all ages, and for obvious reasons, supported the principle of ecclesiastical establishment. Establishment and endowment have, in their eyes, the transcendent merit of putting down enthusiasm, of keeping religion in its proper place."

This statement was caught up as "jam" by the Liberator, the organ of the Liberation Society, whose officials seem to forget that Dr. Parker and Mr. Spurgeon refused to appear at any Disestablishment meetings that were marred by the presence of Charles Bradlaugh.

Voltaire and Thomas Paine did not support a State Church; neither did Robert Owen, John Stuart Mill, or Jeremy Bentham. George Jacob Holyoake, like Charles Bradlaugh, has always opposed a State Church on principle, and the "disestablishment of religion" is one of the objects of the National Secular Society. The Daily News should really keep up to date.

Parsons have so long taught that the theatre is the Devil's house—in opposition to the church, which is God's—that some of their hearers have come to believe it. In fact, the Rector of Killamarsh, Derbyshire, has been unpleasantly talked of for going to the Queen's Theatre, and has deemed it necessary to write a letter to the malcontents in defence of his conduct. We hope the poor man of God will come out of it all right. A parson's business is rather a dull one—christening strange babies, marrying people who often ought to know better, attending funerals as a superior undertaker, and preaching what he frequently but half believes. It is only natural that he should yearn for a little amusement.

The Popes.

Cobbett, whose History of the Protestant Reformation is still largely circulated by Catholics, said of the Popes: "To support their pride they shed oceans of blood; they made weak princes the vile sport of their passions—sometimes their victims, and sometimes their executioners. Sovereigns, become their vassals, executed, with fear and trembling, the decrees of heaven pronounced against the enemies of the Holy See, which had created itself the arbiter of faith. In fact, these inhuman Pontiffs immolated to their God a thousand times more human victims than Paganism sacrificed to all its divinities" (Register, vol. xxvi., p. 379).

The history of mankind, if compared in long periods, shows a very slow, but still a clearly marked, improvement in the character of successive creeds; so that, if we reason from the analogy of the past, we have a right to hope that the improvement will continue, and that subsequent creeds will surpass ours.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, December 15, Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street (near Grey's Monument), Newcastle:—11, "Gladstone's Theology"; 3, "Huxley and Agnosticism"; 7, "Life, Death, and After."

December 22, Manchester; 29, Camberwell.

January 5, Camberwell; 12, 19, and 26, St. James's Hall.

February 2, Liverpool; 9, Glasgow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. CHARLES WATTS'S ENGAGEMENTS.—December 15 and 22, Foresters' Hall. January 12 and 13, Bolton; 19, Glasgow; 26, Edinburgh. February 2 and 16, Athenæum Hall, Tottenham Court-road, London.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

PAINTER.—Your repeated subscriptions to the lecturing scheme ought to stimulate more sluggish supporters.

JOHN RICHARDS.—See paragraph.

A. J. H.—No doubt the Ethical Societies are doing good work. We wish them success in secularising morality. At the same time, that is what we have been doing all along; only, in our opinion, it cannot be done without opposing superstition.

W. ROSE.—Mr. Foote will try to let Edmonton have a course of week-night lectures in January.

A. W. B.—It is sheer hypocrisy for the apologists of Voluntary Schools (heaven save the mark!) to argue that they put no financial burden on the ratepayer. Whether the School Grants come out of the rates and taxes is all the same in the long run. The whole people have to pay.

E. SHEDLEY.—It is impossible to deal with the matter satisfactorily in this column.

D. MCINTYRE.—We know nothing of E. Foster's "Story of Lincoln's Life," which you refer to as giving some curious—and, on the face of it, ridiculous—testimonies to the Bible and Christianity. The book shall be looked up, and the matter inquired into. Look for an answer next week.

HELP ME.—We have not time to write the essay you suggest. Nor is there much room in the three verses you mention for a characteristic Freethinker criticism. The story of Jonathan and David is one of the prettiest in the Bible, and hardly lends itself for satire. You would find Mr. Foote's Bible Heroes and Bible Romances helpful in regard to the Scripture generally. Both works are published by R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

E. G. TAYLOR.—We do not see that any reply is necessary in the Freethinker, unless you confine yourself to mere matters of fact. Remember the proverb about fighting the sooty.

A. H. COLEMAN.—The definition of Atheism in Lloyd's Encyclopædic Dictionary is wrong, as might be expected when the editor is a clergyman. Atheism is not "Literally, disbelief in a God." Atheism means—both etymologically and philosophically—"without belief in God." The Atheist is simply unable to accept the evidences of Theism as sufficient. He is therefore "without God." The quotation from Bacon, with other passages from the same author, is dealt with in a special article in the second volume of Mr. Foote's Flowers of Freethought.

A. F. CARTER.—"What Becomes of the Infidel Leaders?" printed in the Christian Million, is really a tract by the late Rev. C. J. Whitmore. All the names are withheld, in order to deceive the public. Mr. Bradlaugh pointed out the falsehood and absurdity of this tract, as we did some years ago in the Freethinker. Some of the persons referred to were never converted at all, and it is ridiculous to call many of them "leaders." The footnote that "practically there is no leader now" is as true as the rest of the statements.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: Hanley Branch, 6s. 7½d.; Westminster Branch, 11s.

J. P. GILMOUR.—Glad to hear you were all so pleased with Mr. Cohen at Glasgow. Professor Black's address is racy reading. It is high time that somebody told the truth about hospitals.

T. J. ROSCOLLAR.—See "Acid Drops." Thanks for your good wishes.

A. W. MARKS.—It was an absurd statement. See our comment this week. Your epithet "silly" is not too severe.

T. E. M.—Your subscription for Benevolent Fund is handed to Miss Vance. The verse shall appear. Pleased to have your opinion that the article on "Praying for Ingersoll" was "bright enough to make a dyspeptic hilarious." Mr. Lecky nowhere makes an explicit declaration of his religious views, though it is easy to see between the lines that he is a Rationalist. Even his praise of Jesus Christ, which is so often cited by Christian apologists, is quite inconsistent with a belief in the Incarnation—as hasty or dull-witted Christians fail to perceive.

A. V. W.—Thanks for your subscription to our "admirable lecture scheme." The paper you mention must have miscarried.

MR. FOOTE'S LECTURE SCHEME.—Painter, £1; A. V. W., 5s. Per Miss Vance:—W. Gregory, 1s.; Isle of Doge Progressive Club, 5s.; H. Hutchins, 1s. Per R. Forder:—W. Stewart, 1s.; J. M. L., 2s. 6d.; Le Diable, 3s.; R. Taylor, 1s.; R. W., 1s.

D. F. GLOAK.—Mr. Foote will visit Dundee when he goes to Scotland in February. Glad to hear Mr. Cohen has "caught on" in Scotland.

ERNEST NEWMAN.—Sorry to hear of Mr. Doog's illness. See paragraph. Will you note that Mr. Foote has booked February 2 for Liverpool?

G. BAKER.—Thanks for cutting. Your order handed to Mr. Forder.

PAPERS RECEIVED.—Arbeiter Freund—De Dageraad—Truthseeker—Christian Life—Sunday Chronicle—Natal Mercury—Natal Advertiser—Johannesburg Star—Digger's News—Critic—South American Journal—Literary Digest—Public Opinion—Liberty—Two Worlds—Der Arme Teufel—Der Freidenker—Post—Cape Argus—Grahamstown Journal—Gloucester Journal—Isle of Man Times—Glasgow Herald—Progressive Thinker—Secular Thought—Manchester Courier.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

CORRESPONDENCE should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

IT being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SUGAR PLUMS.

THERE was an improved audience at Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening, and an improved collection towards the expenses—although a good many people must have been kept away by the bitter weather. Mr. Shallard, of the West London Branch, made an excellent chairman. The lecture on "Mr. Gladstone's Theology" was listened to most attentively, and very heartily applauded. It was followed by a few questions, but no discussion.

Mr. Foote delivers three lectures to-day (December 15) for the Newcastle Branch, in the Northumberland Hall, near Grey's monument. The last time Mr. Foote visited Newcastle it rained vehemently all the day. It is to be hoped the weather will be an improvement this time, so as to give the "saints" in the surrounding district an opportunity of attending.

Mr. Charles Watts lectures at Foresters' Hall this evening (Dec. 15), and also on the following Sunday. Mr. Parris delivers the last lecture there (for the present) on December 29.

Mr. Cohen delivered his first lectures in Glasgow on Sunday. The morning and afternoon meetings were but middling, but there was a good house at night. Mr. Cohen's lectures were highly appreciated and enthusiastically applauded. He has arranged to visit Glasgow again in the spring.

Paisley and Dundee were visited by Mr. Cohen under the President's lecture scheme. At the latter place he delivered three lectures, with which the Branch secretary says "we are all delighted."

The London Freethinkers' Annual Dinner is arranged to take place at the Holborn Restaurant on Wednesday, January 29—Thomas Paine's birthday. Mr. G. W. Foote will be in the chair, with Mr. Charles Watts and other leading Freethinkers to the left and right. The tickets are, as usual, four shillings; and the function is timed to begin at 7.30, so as to give ample time for terminating at a convenient hour.

The Rev. W. W. Howard definitely agrees to debate with Mr. Foote. He has accepted the conditions he said he would never, never agree to, when negotiations took place at Spennymoor and Liverpool. Yet he now talks of having "brought Mr. Foote to the scratch." However, the reverend gentleman's epistolary eccentricities are not our game at present. He appoints Mr. James Cornes, of Norton House, Leek, to form his wing of the committee. Mr. Foote will see to his side of the business as soon as possible. But he cannot debate before March, as his time is fully occupied till then.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote will be very busy lecturing in London in January. He will be in the provinces during the whole of February. It is his intention to deliver several week-night lectures during his country tours. Wherever possible a good hall should be engaged, and the admission should be free. Branches or places that would like a visit from Mr. Foote in February should communicate with him as soon as possible.

Public Opinion, of New York, in its issue of November 21, reproduces Mr. Wheeler's article on "Holy Kissing" from our columns almost in its entirety.

Our American readers—and they are many—may do well to patronise Public Opinion, of New York, which gives interesting extracts from all the world's literature. Public Opinion is very ably edited by Mr. Ernest E. Russell. Its contents are more varied, bright, and impartial than those of its only compeer, the Literary Digest, which, like our own Literary World, is published by a theological firm, and always reminds the readers of the fact.

In the Westminster Review for December Mohammad Barakatullah has an interesting article on Islam and Soofeeism. Of the Moslem mystics he says the very essence of their creed is love. "Tusleem, or submission, is the first letter in the Soofeeic alphabet; Sulhukkul, universal peace and goodwill to all, is the second commandment of their religion; Mahabatulkiul, to love all, is the final but strict injunction to be carried out."

A study of that fine French writer, Gustave Flaubert, by Ernest Newman, appears in the December Fortnightly. Mr. Newman says: "Flaubert held no brief for the Ormuzd of this universe; and if, as the pious Burke once said, 'He censures God who quarrels with the imperfections of men,' Flaubert's sympathies were assuredly not on the side of the angels."

In Herbert Spencer's paper on "Teachers," in continuation of his "Professional Institutions" in the Contemporary Review, he argues that the teacher has evolved from, and is gradually supplanting, the priest, although "the differentiation of the teaching class from the priestly class is even now incomplete." The priests, he notices, are still arrogant enough to claim control of what is taught, and State funds without State control.

The new edition of The Shadow of the Sword, by G. W. Foote, issued by the Humanitarian League, is noticed in the December number of Concord, the organ of the International Arbitration and Peace Society. It is called "an admirable pamphlet, by an old pamphleteer." Its statistics are said to be "valuable," and the peroration is said to be "eloquent" and "worthy of quotation."

The Star says the Paine Exhibition marked the progress of the good work of clearing a great man's name from obloquy.

De Dageraad for December opens with a translation of the poetical prose passage on "The Truthseeker," rendered by G. van Beerse from the English of Olive Schreiner. J. G. ten Bokkel writes on the religious descent of Jesus, referring to early Christian notions and the recently-discovered Sinaitic MS., which attributes his fatherhood to Joseph.

Professor Boyesen considers Pagan woman in many respects superior to her Christian sister, and says in the Forum: "I cannot but think that the Oriental view of womanhood, implied in the Bible, has had an enormous influence in forcibly checking the normal development. The Catholic Church not only adopted, but immensely exaggerated, the disabilities under which the sex had labored in Semitic lands; and the result was that the free-born, sagacious, and nobly self-dependent daughter of the Teutonic forests was dwarfed, subdued, and spiritually crippled until she became the commonplace, insignificant, obedient Hausfrau of to-day."

Mr. Boyesen further remarks: "It will, perhaps, surprise many to learn that the legislation regarding marriage and divorce was, in Iceland and Norway, far more mindful of the wife's interest than it has ever been during the Christian era. The old Icelandic law stipulated, for instance, that if a man were divorced from his wife (even though she were the offending party) he had to return her dowry intact. Divorce was legally obtainable if both parties desired it, and the law did not, as in Christian times, insist upon publicly humiliating and disgracing every man and woman who, in youthful folly, had committed themselves to a choice which made every breath a blight upon the face of life, and the hours a burden to be dragged through the weary length of day."

The Popular Science Monthly, which ever since its foundation by E. L. Youmans has been a foremost advocate of evolution as well as a most interesting répertoire of scientific advance, will next year be published simultaneously in London and New York.

Professor Campbell Black's presidential address to the Medico-chirurgical Society, Glasgow, is reported at length in the North British Daily Mail. It is most refreshingly outspoken. Here are a few bits: "Subscriptions to infirmaries and the building of churches may be regarded as a social whitewash applied to dirty reputations"—"He was a church elder of the most pronounced Calvinistic sanctity, and wore a three-decker white choker"—"Some sapocacious cleric gets up and sententiously and solemnly moves a vote of thanks to the medical officers"—"Some wretched outcast in the tyrant grip of phthisis, forsaken of God and man." It is really astonishing to see these and similar passages printed in a great daily newspaper. What is the world coming to?

Mr. C. Doeg has for many years been a hard worker for the Secular cause in Liverpool. For a considerable time he has been secretary of the N.S.S. Branch. We deeply regret to hear that he is now lying seriously ill, but we hope he will soon recover. Meanwhile all communications about Branch business should be addressed to Mr. Ernest Newman, 1 Saxony-road, Kensington, Liverpool. Mr. Newman is the Branch president.

The Sunderland and Ryhope friends are going to have a social gathering on Christmas Eve, to which they invite all Freethinkers in the district. It will take place in the ball-room of the Guide Post Hotel, Ryhope Colliery, commencing at seven o'clock. There will be songs, recitations, etc., and arrangements will be made for the future propaganda of Freethought.

The Birmingham Branch intends calling a Conference of Midland Branches of Freethinkers early in January. Invitations have been sent out, and on receipt of replies the time and place of meeting will be settled and announced in the Freethinker. It is hoped that there will be a response from Freethinkers at Wolverhampton, Walsall, Wednesbury, Dudley, Coventry, Stafford, Cheltenham, etc.

Obituary.

A REMARKABLE woman and gifted writer has passed away in the person of Louisa Sarah Bevington Guggenberger, whose talents won for her the respect and friendship of Herbert Spencer. Miss Bevington was a poetess of no mean order, as was shown in her first volume, Key Notes, published in 1879, and succeeded by her Poems, Lyrics, and Sonnets, 1882, and her later Liberty Lyrics. She showed the high and able quality of her Freethought in her articles on "Modern Atheism and Mr. Mallock" in the Nineteenth Century (October and December, 1879), in which she argued that "Conscience has taken millenniums to develop, and it has developed in obedience to a need, and not to a creed, springing out of the fundamental demands of progressive existence rather than from the comparatively recent demands of theological aspiration." Miss Bevington contributed a notable paper on "The Moral Demerits of Orthodoxy" to Progress, when edited by Mr. Foote. She was also a contributor to Modern Thought, Mind, the Echo, Liberty, etc. She held the ideal of self-government, and did not scruple to call herself an evolutionary Anarchist. Her last book was entitled Common-Sense Country.

THE interment of Ivy, the infant daughter of Robert and Sarah Boardman, took place at Failsworth Cemetery on Thursday, December 5, the Secular Burial Service being read by Mr. Henry Clough. The interment was to have taken place in the churchyard, but the clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Barnes, refused to allow the Secular Service to be read, and at the last moment arrangements had to be made at the cemetery. Much sympathy is felt for the parents in their bereavement. They, together with many relations, are firm supporters of the Secular movement in this district.

Christianity is nominally in the nineteenth century of its existence; it maintained slavery in its midst, and instituted slavery in the various countries where it planted the cross, for nearly eighteen centuries; and now it is claimed as a universally admitted fact that Christianity had a large share in bringing about the abolition of slavery.—Charles Bradlaugh, "Notes on Christian Evidences," p. 42.

Digitized by Google

WOE IN LONDON.

(After Campbell's "Hohenlinden.")

In London, when the sun was low,
Nigh "dudless" lay on trodden snow,
A dying waif of winter's woe—
Her eyes were closing wearily.

In Canaan, 'neath a genial sky,
The Lord—unless the Gospels lie—
On loafing idlers cast his eye
In pity for their "peckishness."

In London young and old may cry
To God for food, there's no reply.
They weep and pray, and starve and die—
The Lord's no longer pitiful.

Though Christ neglects starved London brats,
He filled with wine some guzzler's vats,
And gorged a mob with loaves and sprats,
In days of old, in Galilee.

In London starving workers dine
With old "Duke Humphrey"; as for wine,
'Twas made by Christ, in "Auld Lang Syne";
But now he's turned teetotaler.

God's ears can hear the flatt'ring "Hail!"
And pleasing anthem; but they fail
To hear the feeble, piteous wail
Of foodless, helpless little ones.

G. L. MACKENZIE.

PIETY AND IMPOSTURE.

M. COURNOT, Advocate-General at Angers, has been enlightening his brother lawyers on the ways and means of accomplished mendicants. In his speech, or address, at the opening of term, M. Cournot said little that is new, for his information about beggars' "guide books" has long been known in Paris. Metropolitan mendicants have for years had at their disposal books in which the names and addresses of charitable persons are inscribed, together with the sums which an artful cadger may manage to extract from them. The Advocate-General of Angers, however, had something original to state in his illustrations of the manner in which people may be duped by so-called miracles at Lourdes. He cited the case of one Rivière, who was an object of universal sympathy and charity in parts of the departments of the Maine-et-Loire and the Mayenne, where he exhibited himself as a hopeless cripple. He also posed as a deaf mute. He used to journey on crutches or by train from one village or town to another, and was everywhere welcomed, fed on the fat of the land, and supplied with money. His thanks he expressed by signs, and it was found that he was able to divine what people said by the movements of their lips. "How wonderful!" cried his sympathisers, and they prayed, good souls, for his complete recovery. Rivière at last started for Lourdes, his pockets well lined with sterling coin and notes of the Republic. He was plunged into the well of icy water, and immediately recovered his speech, hearing, and the use of his limbs. Then he returned in triumph from the sacred fountain. At every station on his way to Marans, in the Maine-et-Loire department, which he particularly favored, collections were made for him, and when he entered that village the church bells were pealed in his honor. He had collected nearly £80 on his way from Lourdes, and at Marans people were adding to his horde. The Mayor of the place, however, suspected something wrong, and, before organising a general subscription for the cripple so suddenly transformed, thought it prudent to submit Rivière to examination by a skilful medical expert. No sooner did Rivière hear that he was about to be taken before a doctor than he promptly disappeared from Marans. A few weeks afterwards he was discovered at Andouille, in the Mayenne, another of his haunts, deaf, dumb, and paralysed. He was condemned to three years' imprisonment for his series of frauds. M. Cournot also amused his colleagues by the story of the ragpicker, whose children were baptised fourteen times by Catholic priests and twelve times by Protestant pastors, the able and artful parents receiving a substantial bonus on each sprinkling.—Daily Telegraph (Dec. 6).

CHINA AND MISSIONARIES.

SUPPOSE that a Chinese missionary society should persist in sending missionaries into the interior of Ireland; that these missionaries should construct a large compound, or enclosure, as the English do in China, and should induce some weak-minded women and children to enter their compound with a view to proving to them that their ancient faith was false and impossible, and should attempt to teach them a new faith, which the Irish believed to be thoroughly immoral, and in reality the religion of the devil? Does any one believe for one moment that the Irish would not turn out, destroy the compound, and murder the Chinese missionaries? and would the Government at London be able to protect these missionaries from being attacked and slain by the Irish people?

It has been suggested by a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette that the British and the American Governments should force the Chinese to pay £2,000,000 sterling for every foreign missionary murdered. I presume that this writer likes to see fair play, and would not ask anything from China which England and the United States would not in like manner grant to China; so China, of course, would have to be paid £2,000,000 sterling for every Chinaman who is murdered either under the English or the American flag. I think that, at this rate, at the end of the first year the balance in favor of China would enable them not only to pay off their war indemnity, but would also enable them to purchase the largest ironclad fleet in the world. H. S. MAXIM.

PRANKS OF BAPTISM.

A YOUNG woman of twenty, named Françoise Grollet, died on Sunday in the village of Massetterie, in the Department of the Puy-de-Dôme. She was expecting to be confined in a few days, but uræmia set in, and, as her relatives supposed, she expired before the doctor could attend from a neighboring village. Her friends sent at the same time for the Curé of the Commune, and he arrived first, carrying the viaticum for the purpose of administering the last rites of the Roman Catholic religion. "The poor woman is dead," they replied to the Abbé. "And the child? Have you thought about that? Perhaps there is still time; it must be baptised." The husband, the father, and the mother were taken aback at the idea of the operation which must be made in order to carry out the ceremony; but when the Abbé said, "Let me do it," they had not sufficient courage to oppose the imperious man of the Church. They left the room, and, in the presence of an old woman of seventy-two, he took a knife, carried out the operation, and baptised the child! The old woman then asked him, "What is to be done with it?" "Put it back again," he replied, and then left the room. On the threshold he met Dr. Girard, to whom he remarked in the most off-hand way, "The woman is dead, but it is all right. I have done all that was necessary."

You may imagine the stupefaction of the doctor when he learned the full significance of the priest's words. Dr. Girard is also Mayor of the Commune, and the first thing he did was to call in the police. In his opinion, the woman was not dead when the operation was performed; she was, he affirms, simply in a state of syncope, which had followed upon one of the attacks of the disease. The police are therefore discussing the question whether to prosecute the Abbé for "homicide by imprudence," or for the "unlawful practice of surgery." The Abbé, on his side, writes a letter to the local paper, the Moniteur du Puy-de-Dôme, in which he discusses and attempts to justify the act, as if it were the only thing which his creed permitted him to do. "What you describe as a horrible operation," he writes, "was one which my sovereign conscience rendered painfully necessary. The woman had been dead half an hour when I arrived, but her relatives assured me that the child was still living, and it was incumbent upon me to make sure that it should go to heaven by baptism, and perhaps give it life on earth by the aid which science could afford. As regards the 'repugnant operation,' the relatives present approved of it, though they refused to carry it out themselves. My rôle in this affair was not marked so much by temerity as by my devotion to my religion." A full inquiry is to be made, and it should put an end to this barbarous Cesarean custom.

—Sunday Chronicle.

We have lost many good things of Cervantes, and other writers, because of the tribunal of religion and dulness. One Aonius Palearius was sensible of this, and said that "the Inquisition was a poniard aimed at the throat of literature." The image is striking, and the observation just; but the ingenious observer was in consequence immediately led to the stake.—I. D'Israeli.

Digitized by Google

JESUS AND HIS FATHER.

Although M. Clermont Ganneau has speculated that Jehovah was not originally a bachelor, but had a consort, afterwards known as Kadosh, just as Baal had Ashtoreth, it is certain that by the time Ezra, or the great Synagogue, or someone else compiled the Jewish writings, the God of the Jews, while retaining his masculine character, was altogether too old, stern, and far-off for anything in the line of amorous adventures. Nor did he make up for his lack of the companionship of goddesses by indulging in those intrigues with the daughters of men for which the deities of Greece and Rome were famous. Jews and Mohammedans alike repudiate such a notion. "Sole Maker of the Heavens and of the Earth! How, when He hath no consort, should he have a son?" asks Mohammed (Koran vi. 100). True, in the old days, "the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took wives of all which they chose" (Gen. vi. 3). But the Ancient of Days, though he commanded his prophet Hosea to break the Seventh Commandment (Hosea i. 2, iii. 1), can never be suspected of having done the like himself. He was not that kind of a deity at all. Ruling a refractory race like the Jews indisposes for sports like those of Krishna with the Gopis.

One cannot help fancying that we should never have heard of this carpenter's wife's Son of God, born without a human father, had not the Pagan world been accustomed to ascribe divine birth to their heroes. The god Apollo was assigned as the father of Plato. Buddha was born from the left side of the immaculate Maya. Alexander the Great gave out that he was begotten by Zeus. Divine parentage was ascribed to Augustus Cæsar, and to the Pagan Christ, Apollonius of Tyana. All the old culture-heroes were born of gods, and usually from virgin mothers. When Christianity spread among the heathen, its hero must have as high an origin as any of them. Justin Martyr, in his First Apology (chap. xxii.), expressly puts him in the same category. He says: "And if we assert that the Word of God was born of God in a peculiar manner different from ordinary generation, let this be no extraordinary thing to you, who say that Mercury is the angelic Word of God..... And if we even affirm that He was born of a virgin, accept this in common with what you accept of Perseus." Mr. Hartland, in his erudite Legend of Perseus, shows that stories of supernatural birth are literally world-wide.

It is curious that of the four gospellers only two mention the virgin birth, which is never alluded to by Paul or the other epistle writers. And these two hopelessly contradict each other. In Matthew, Mary appears unaware of the honor (or shame) brought upon her. In Luke it is announced by Gabriel. Matthew tells us that Joseph, but for his dreams, would have put her away. How Matthew got to know what Joseph dreamt we are left to conjecture. From Luke it does not appear that Joseph knew anything of the condition of his betrothed. Although Mary had sung, "Henceforth all nations shall call me blessed"; though angels announced the wonderful birth to shepherds; though the miraculously-born child had been visited by wise men from the east, and had been declared by Zacharias, "the prophet of the most high," purifications were offered for him as for an ordinary sin-born infant; he had to submit to the rite of circumcision; and when at twelve years of age he stayed in the temple, "his parents" were astonished, and his mother said: "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing" (Luke ii. 41-48). Matthew relates that in his own country they asked: "Is not this the carpenter's son? is not his mother called Mary, and his brethren James and Joses and Simon and Judas?" (xiii. 55). The reply of Jesus, that a prophet is not without honor but among his own kin, shows that he shared the general belief. John tells us "neither did his brethren believe in him" (vii. 5). Perhaps they went to eternal torment for their unbelief; but certainly they were in a position to know the facts of the case somewhat better than the believers of to-day. Be it noted, too, that the Hebrew Christians, the people who, if any, were in the best position to be acquainted with the facts, did not believe in the virgin birth. Moreover, the Syriac Gospel of Matthew, discovered by Mrs. Lewis, makes the distinct statement that Joseph begat Jesus. It was the Gentile Christians, those already used to the fables of men born of gods, who credited and circulated a story which is not only an outrage upon human credulity, but is refuted by the evidence of the very documents upon which alone it is built.

It may be too much positively to affirm that Jesus of Nazareth was the son of Joseph, as Philip told Nathaniel (John i. 45), and as the Syriac Gospel affirms. If it is a wise child that knows its own father, it is sometimes venturesome for anyone else—save the mother—to make any affirmations as to fatherhood. Some suspicion may rest on Zechariah, the high priest; on Gabriel, the messenger; or on the scamp Pandera, to whom the Jews assigned the paternity. But, in view of her marriage and large family, it is charitable to Mary to assume that Philip and the Syriac Gospel were right.

Uncle Benjamin.

BOOK CHAT.

There is a combative air about Spiritual Truth and Common Sense, a plea for Spiritualism, by Brian Hodgson. The author offers to meet, "at any time and at any place he chooses to name," any individual, "be he scientist or theologist, who has the courage to stand up to one of his own size." We are unacquainted with Mr. Hodgson's size, but he talks large. He appeals for spirit return first to "universal experience," and he quotes Dr. Draper as saying "there is a body of evidence reaching from the remotest age to the present time." Yet Dr. Draper plainly implied that the evidence for ghosts, enormous in quantity, is deficient in quality; and if there be but one person without evidence of ghosts or gods, it is incorrect to appeal to "universal experience." The question is, What is the testimony to alleged supernatural facts worth? Mr. Hodgson himself would probably reject the stories of witchcraft, told by Central Africans, on the ground that they must interpret facts in accordance with their own limited ideas and education. The devils are as true to them as the spirits to Mr. Hodgson. Of course we are told the old story about Mr. Crookes and Florence Cook; but in our reading of it an able scientist was grossly humbugged by a clever woman, as in the case of Eusapia Paladino and Mr. Oliver Lodge. There is nothing unusual in a tricky woman being able to deceive a grave professor. But Mr. Hodgson gives us some of his own experiences. He tells us: "During seven sittings my body was systematically subjected to an operation impossible to describe in materialistic terminology." The final object, if we understand Mr. Hodgson aright, was to induce in him a spirit of humility, and he shows it by saying: "Thus I learned how it was that the investigation of Spiritualism has no attraction for the scientist." The person who does not believe himself the medium of supernatural communications seems to be, to Mr. Hodgson, the natural type of arrogance.

* * *

A record of all the old English customs which still exist is about to be published. It has been collected by the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield, rector of Barkham, Berks.

* * *

Messrs. Methuen and Co. announce a new work by F. S. Granger, M.A., on The Worship of the Romans. It deals with such topics as Dreams, Nature-Worship, Magic, Divination, Holy Places, Victims, etc.

* * *

In the catalogue of the Paine Exhibition (No. 10) is mention of a motto inscribed in gold letters. The lines, which are said to be probably by Rickman, are:—

He who dare not reason is a slave;
He who cannot reason is a fool;
He who will not reason is a bigot.

The passage, we believe, is really taken from the Academical Questions of Sir William Drummond, a work which influenced Shelley, and is quoted by him in his notes to Queen Mab. As the work is now rare, the whole passage is worth quoting: "The free and philosophic spirit of our nation has been the theme of admiration to the world. This was the proud distinction of Englishmen, and the luminous source of all their glory. Shall we, then, forget the manly and dignified sentiments of our ancestors to prate in the language of the mother or the nurse about our good old prejudices? This is not the way to defend the cause of truth. It was not thus that our fathers maintained it in the brilliant periods of our history. Prejudice may be trusted to guard the outworks for a short space of time, while reason slumbers in the citadel; but, if the latter sink into a lethargy, the former will quickly erect a standard for herself. Philosophy, wisdom, and liberty support each other: he who will no reason is a bigot; he who cannot is a fool; and he who dares not is a slave."

* * *

The orthodox cannot be expected to relish The Woman's Bible, and "Nym Crinkle" expresses their view in the New York World of Sunday, November 24. He reminds women that all the knowledge concerning the Hebrew Scriptures which is accessible to the race has been garnered for two thousand years by men. This, it may be said, is all the more reason that woman should have her turn. At any rate under the guidance of Mrs. Stanton, she is taking it; and one of her first steps is to unsex Jehovah, and turn him into an hermaphrodite deity. Now, 'Nym Crinkle' objects to this, "because in carrying sexual consideration over into primordial fields she unwittingly postulates a goddess who is subject to the vagaries, the invalidism, and the physical and mental perturbations which are indissolubly united to the finite woman." But is not making God the Father, and masculine, also "carrying sexual consideration over into primordial fields"? and what better is a jealous and tyrannical god than a whimsical goddess? If the New Woman means to run a new deity, the sneers of "Nym Crinkle" will not hinder.

Digitized by Google

CORRESPONDENCE.

SAVE THE CHILDREN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—I have just withdrawn my daughter from religious instruction in a Board school, and have induced neighbors to withdraw three other children in the same school. I earnestly beg Freethinkers in every part of London (and elsewhere) to take the same step. I will gladly advise any parent who feels anxious on the subject, and I will send copies of my leaflet, "Our Children," gratis to any address. This leaflet states reasons for withdrawing children from Bible lessons, and points out the importance of plain, moral instruction apart from theology. This religious difficulty will never approach a settlement until parents, in considerable numbers, take their children out of the Bible classes. The clergy of the churches, wise, exceedingly wise, in their generation, make strenuous efforts to seize the minds of the young. They can laugh at the efforts of Rationalists. As fast as we convert one adult they train up ten children in the old, false way. Let me beg all parents, who value their children's welfare, to consider this most serious question. Save the children; and, in order to ease the children's burden, let parents act together, so that the scholars may be withdrawn, not in units, but in twos, and threes, and fours.

F. J. GOULD.

12 Meynell-road, Hackney Common, N.E.

THE HEBREW BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

SIR,—The puerilities of the Jewish faith concerning the Jewish fetish is a subject not exhausted by Chilperic's interesting article on "Curiosities of the Hebrew Bible." His writings are always instructive, and his Witness of Assyria is a decided acquisition to a Freethinker's library. I am, however, not quite sure if the suspended ain in Psalm lxxx. 14 is, as he says, "a genuine correction." Orthodox Jews say this letter is suspended because the initial of the accursed "tree." It is supposed to refer to the cross; and the wild boar, which ravages the vine of Israel, is the same person the Chinese call "the pig Jesus." Yet the Christian editors, Michaelis, Van der Hooght, Frey, Leusden, and Jahn, have gone on reprinting the suspended ain, just as the Jewish scribes had to adhere to all the mistakes of their copies, unaware that they were thereby perpetuating an insult on their blessed Savior. The Jews also suspended the ain in Jeshu, that it shall not imply he brings salvation. The explanation of these suspended letters being certainly post-Christian, it is probable that the suspension is also; just as the Jews never thought of turning Moses into Manasseh in Judges xviii. 30 until they were far removed from idolatry, and wished to cover the fact that the descendants of Moses were idolaters.

Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. 73), accuses the Jews of cutting out from Psalm xcvi. 10 the words, "from the wood." He says the passage ought to read: "Tell ye among the nations the Lord hath reigned from the wood." But this was a false accusation of the Christian father, and one that falls back on his own party; for, as the note by Otto to the Clarke Ante-Nicene Christian Library says, "These words were not taken away by the Jews, but added by some Christian."

What different meanings may be attached to Hebrew words will appear from the following illustration:—Psalm lxxxix. 49, which in the Authorised Version reads, "Lord, where are thy former loving kindnesses which thou swearest unto David in thy truth?" may be fairly translated to read: "O, my Adonis, where are thy endearments of old which thou sworest for the sake of love, by thy phallus (or Tau), O Amen?" If the Bible throughout was translated in this style, we should be led back to quite a different religion from that taught in the Board schools.

MORE NEBOCHIM.

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

(4) Display, or get displayed, one of our contents-sheets, which are of a convenient size for the purpose. Mr. Forder will send them on application.

(5) Distribute some of our cheap tracts in your walks abroad, at public meetings, or among the audiences around street-corner preachers.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY.

THE monthly Executive meeting was held on Thursday, November 29, the President in the chair. Present: Messrs. C. Watts, E. Bater, J. Potter, J. Zwiebel, F. Wood, S. Jones, E. Quay, H. J. Stace, A. F. Yayter, and Miss Vance (sec.).

Minutes of previous meeting were read and confirmed, and cash statement received.

A letter was ordered to be filed from James Anderson, notifying that he would appeal to the next Conference against the removal of his name from the Society's books. A letter from his Branch (Finsbury) was ordered to be returned, with an intimation that it was unconstitutional, as the power to remove members was vested solely in the Executive.

An application from Paisley asking for permission to reform the Branch, in consequence of the interest aroused by Mr. Watts's lecture under the new lecture scheme, was considered, and permission granted.

The President reported the formation of three fresh Branches in Yorkshire by Mr. Cohen in the same manner; also that he (the President) was arranging for week-night lectures in the West-end of London.

It was resolved to hold the annual Children's Party in January. Several names were proposed to form a committee, and the Secretary was instructed to obtain consent. The full list will be duly announced.

It was also resolved that the Annual Dinner, at the Holborn Restaurant, should be held in January.

The President reported that financial assistance had been rendered to the Battersea Branch from the Lecture Fund.

Mr. Watts moved (seconded by Mr. Stace): "That Mr. R. O. Smith be requested to send some answer to the resolution passed by the Executive at its last meeting"; and, on it being carried, the meeting closed.

E. M. VANCE, Assistant Secretary.

Children's Party.

THE Committee are making arrangements for the annual treat for our little ones, the time fixed being early in February. Miss Vance is secretary, and Mr. R. Forder is the treasurer. Those who have supported us in the past are reminded that funds are needed, and the sums subscribed will be acknowledged in the Freethinker.

R. FORDER, Treasurer.

28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Those Kids!

A pretty little maid had red hair, and often heard it disparaged by neighbors and servants. Said her grandmother to her: "Child, your hair was made by the dear God, and whatever he has made is well done." "Still, I would rather have nothing else made by him," replied the little one.

Dolly (to her brother Tommy)—"Do you know, Tommy, that you come from heaven?" Tommy—"Did I?" Dolly—"Yes." Tommy—"Well, I must have come down a devil of a whop."

A little girl, four and half years old, lately said; "Papa, who made Mary and Joseph?" "Why, God, of course." "Oh, no, papa, that could not be; for, if Jesus is God, and Mary is Jesus's mother, how could God make his own mother?"

"Mamma, I don't want to be an angel when I die, and I needn't, need I?" "Why, Susie?" questioned mamma. "'Cos I don't want to leave off all my clothes, and wear fedders like a hen!"

Jesus knew all things, created all things, we are told. And yet we do not find that he understood one art or one science. His science was just that of any street arab. He was profoundly ignorant of history, of science, and philosophy, as well as of literature. All the greatest works of ancient times were written before his day—the literature of Greece was past its prime before he lived, and that of Rome had reached its highest excellence in his supposed lifetime. He knew nothing of either.—J. Symes.

If you wish depth, genius, imagination, taste, reason, sensibility, philosophy, elevation, originality, nature, intellect, fancy, rectitude, facility, flexibility, precision, art, abundance, variety, fertility, warmth, magic, charm, grace, force, an eagle sweep of vision, vast understanding, instruction rich, tone excellent, urbanity, suavity, delicacy, correctness, purity, clearness, eloquence, harmony, brilliancy, rapidity, gaiety, pathos, sublimity, and universality—perfection, indeed—behold Voltaire.—Goethe.

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Charles Watts, "The Clerical Conspiracy Against Education."

BRADLAUGH CLUB AND INSTITUTE (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): 7, Dr. E. B. Aveling, "Karl Marx and Charles Darwin." Tuesday, at 8, social party. Wednesday, at 8, public discussion—George Standring, "Socialism and Secularism."

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, a lecture. Tuesday and Friday, at 8, social gatherings.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, J. Kent, "Are the Unemployed to go to the Devil?"

EAST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (74 Libra-road, Roman-road): 8, Sunday-school; 7.30, M. S. Nathan, "London Government."

SOUTH LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell New-road): 11.15, Sunday-school; 7, F. J. Gould, "The Life of Bradlaugh."

WEST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (Westminster Town Hall, Caxton-street): 11.15, Graham Wallas, "Public Opinion and Public Action."

WEST HAM SECULAR ETHICAL SOCIETY (61 West Ham-lane): 7, J. Cooke, "Is Suicide Justifiable?"

WOOD GREEN (Club and Institute, 4 Lawn-villas, Stuart-crescent, opposite Wood Green Church): 7.30, Tonzeau Parris, "Sin Against God an Impossibility."

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 12, a lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 7, S. Armfield, "The Birth of the Christian God."

BLACKBURN (Spinners' Institute, St. Peter-street): 11, C. Cohen, "Darwinism and Democracy"; 3, "The Dream of Immortality"; 6.30, "Scepticism: its Meaning and Value."

CHATHAM SECULAR HALL (Queen's-road, New Brompton): 2.45, Sunday-school; 7, F. Haslam, "The Life and Times of Voltaire."

DARWEN (Assembly Rooms, over News office): Monday, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "Is Christianity True?"

DUNDEE (Tally-street Hall): 6.30, discussion, "God is Love—Is it True?"

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion—G. Faulkner, "Some Notes on King Solomon"; 6.30, Mr. McGivern, "The Basis of Materialism."

HULL (Colden Hall, Storey-street): 7, Mr. Grainger, "Random Bible Readings."

IPSWICH (G.E.R., Commercial-road): 7, members' meeting—all attend.

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 11, Dr. Stanton Coit, "The Children of Freethinkers"; 6.30, "The Workings of Conscience in Shakespeare's Plays."

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, Mr. Rhodes, "Christian Evidences and Freethought."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, Ernest Evans, "Water: its Uses and Properties."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 11, G. W. Foote, "Gladstone's Theology"; 3, "Huxley's Agnosticism"; 7, "Life, Death, and After."

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 3, Robert Lane, F.G.S., "Denudation: its Cause, and its Effects upon the Earth"; 7, "Some of the Terrible Monsters of the Ancient World: their Probable Use, and Cause of Extinction"—with lantern illustrations. Tea at 5.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, business meeting.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, Mr. Yates, "Genesis and Geology."

TODMORDEN (Sobriety Hall): Saturday, Dec. 14, at 7.30, C. Cohen, "What Think ye of Christ?"

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—December 15, Blackburn; 22, Wood Green; 29, Balls Pond.

ARTHUR B. MOSS, 44 Credon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Dec. 22, Leicester.

TOUSSAU PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—December 15, Wood Green; 29, Foresters' Hall.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Fins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinzy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 3d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 3d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 3d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 9s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

Price 1s. 6d.; superior edition, superfine paper, cloth, 2s., post free

The Bible Handbook

FOR FREETHINKERS & INQUIRING CHRISTIANS

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND W. P. BALL.

Sold also in separate parts as follows:—

1.—Bible Contradictions. The contradictions are printed in parallel columns. 4d.

2.—Bible Absurdities. All the chief absurdities from Genesis to Revelation, conveniently and strikingly arranged, with appropriate headlines, giving the point of each absurdity in a sentence. 4d.

3.—Bible Atrocities. Containing all the godly wickedness from Genesis to Revelation. Each infamy has a separate headline for easy reference. 4d.

4.—Bible Immoralities, Indecencies, Obscenities, Broken Promises, and Unfulfilled Prophecies. 4d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Vol. I., cloth gilt, 216 pp., 2s. 6d., post free,

CRIMES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Hundreds of exact References to Standard Authorities. No pains spared to make it a complete, trustworthy, final, unanswerable Indictment of Christianity.

CHAPTERS:—1, Christ to Constantine; 2, Constantine to Hypatia; 3, Monkery; 4, Pious Forgeries; 5, Pious Frauds; 6, Rise of the Papacy; 7, Crimes of the Popes; 8, Persecution of the Jews; 9, The Crusades.

"The book is very carefully compiled, the references are given with exactitude, and the work is calculated to be of the greatest use to the opponents of Christianity."—C. BRADLAUGH, in National Reformer.

"The book is worth reading. It is fair, and, on the whole, correct."—Weekly Times.

"The book has a purpose, and is entitled to a fair hearing."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"The work should be scattered like autumn leaves."—Ironclad Age (U.S.A.).

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS :—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being specionsly and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

"." In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

Now Ready, Price Three Shillings,

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST.

ESSAYS ON HUMAN EVOLUTION.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

With an Introduction by G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—Early Religion—Animism—Fetishism and Idolatry—Totemism—Were the Jews Savages?—Religious Dances—Sympathetic Magic—Kings, Priests, and Gods—Sacrifices and Scapegoats—Killing the God—Nature Festivals—Lent—Easter—May Day—Christmas Customs.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; God-Making, by G. L. Mackenzie; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 2d., by post 2½d.,

AN ESSAY ON SUICIDE.

BY

DAVID HUME.

With an Historical and Critical Introduction by G. W. FOOTE.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

AN ACCEPTABLE CHRISTMAS PRESENT

LOT 11.

1 pair All-Wool Blankets.
1 pair Bed-Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-Cloth.

CARRIAGE PAID, 21s.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

A CONFERENCE OF REPRESENTATIVES
OF THE
Midland Branches of the N.S.S.
WILL BE HELD EARLY IN JANUARY,
The object being to form a Federation for the Midland Counties.

Freethinkers in those towns where no Branch exists are earnestly invited to attend. Date, time, and place of meeting will be announced in the Freethinker for December 22.

---

302 pp., superior paper, bound in cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT
[Second Series]
BY
G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS :—

Luscious Piety
The Jewish Sabbath
God's Day
Professor Stokes on Immortality
Paul Bert
Converting a Corpse
Bradlaugh's Ghost
Christ and Brotherhood
The Sons of God
Melchizedek
S'w'elp me God
Infidel Homes
Are Atheists Cruel?
Are Atheists Wicked?
Rain Doctors
Pious Puerilities
"Thus Saith the Lord"
Believe or be Damned
Christian Charity
Religion and Money
Clotted Bosh
Lord Bacon on Atheism
Christianity & Slavery
Christ Up to Date
Secularism and Christianity
Altar and Throne
Martin Luther
The Praise of Folly
A Lost Soul
Happy in Hell
The Act of God
Keir Hardie on Christ
Blessed be ye Poor
Converted Infidels
Mrs. Booth's Ghost
Talmage on the Bible
Mrs. Besant on Death and After
The Poets and Liberal Theology
Christianity and Labor
Dueling
An Easter Egg for Christians
Down Among the Dead Men
Smirching a Hero
Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ
Jehovah the Ripper
The Parson's Living Wage
Did Bradlaugh Backslide?
Frederic Harrison on Atheism
Save the Bible!
Forgive and Forget
The Star of Bethlehem
The Great Ghost
Atheism and the French Revolution
Pigottism
Jesus at the Derby
Atheist Murderers
A Religion for Eunuchs
Rose-Water Religion

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Cloth 1s. 6d., by post 1s. 9d.; boards 1s., by post 1s. 2d.,
TALES FROM THE BIBLE,
TOLD TO MY DAUGHTER.
GIVING A RATIONAL AND ETHICAL VIEW OF THE OLD TESTAMENT SUITED TO THE CAPACITIES OF CHILDREN.
BY F. J. GOULD,
Author of "A Concise History of Religion," etc.
London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.
DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.
THE GODS. 6d.
REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.
ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.
CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.
ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.
ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.
ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.
PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.
HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.
ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.
TRUE RELIGION. 2d.
THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.
LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.
IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.
LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.
GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.
WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.
FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.
THE DYING CREED. 2d.
THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford 2d.
THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.
ART AND MORALITY. 2d.
DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.
THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.
SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.
MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. Agnostic's View. 2d.
SKULLS. 2d.
THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.
LIVE TOPICS. 1d.
MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.
REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.
REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.
CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.
CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 51. SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

NOTICE.

Owing to the holidays, next week's "Freethinker" will be published on Tuesday, Dec. 24. Lecture Notices must be sent in by the previous Saturday.

A BABY GOD.

CHRISTMAS will be here in a few days, and millions of Christians will celebrate, under a new name, the old pagan festival of the new birth of the Sun. Centuries, perhaps millenniums, before Jesus Christ was born or thought of, the twenty-fifth of December was commemorated with good cheering and rejoicing. The sun, the real lord and giver of life, without whose rays the earth would be a sterile rock in a lonely infinitude—the royal sun was once more beginning his triumphant career. His first slight ascent from his winter tomb was a prophecy of spring, with its bursting vegetation; of summer, with its loaded harvests; and of autumn, with its gathered sheaves, and golden fruit, and purple vines. Life was still worth living, hope gleamed through the desolation, men's hearts gladdened, and they danced and sang, ate and drank, and mocked the wrinkled face of care.

Christianity adopted this old pagan festival, and associated it with the pretended birth of Christ. We say pretended, because the birthday of Christ (if he ever existed) is utterly unknown. The earliest Christians were ignorant of it, and, when it was first celebrated, different dates were patronised by various sections of the Church. At length, in the fourth century, when the Church allied itself with the State, and stooped to conquer, and paganised itself to convert the pagans—the twenty-fifth of December was definitively selected, although it was obviously incompatible with the gospel story of shepherds watching their flocks by night, which is an absurdity during mid-winter in Judea.

From that time the SON has been worshipped instead of the SUN. But there has been little difference in the essential character of the celebration. Shibboleths have altered, but the observances have been unchanged. Eating, drinking, and visiting go on as before, and scattered families still meet around the hearth and festive board. Religion raises her voice in the pauses of merriment, but the season is mainly social, and strongly smacks of its carnal origin. It is impossible for the profane mind to perceive any connection between Jesus Christ and roast turkey and plum pudding.

Religion has been called the poetry of unpoetical natures. There is certainly a lack of imagination in ordinary Christians. The birth of a man may be celebrated with carnal festivities, but the birth of a god should surely be celebrated with spiritual recreations. Love-feasts may be all right, if we exclude indiscriminate kissing; but wine-feasts, and still more whiskey-feasts, seem rather incongruous, unless they are a tribute to the Holy Spirit.

There is also a want of imagination in sermons about the birth of Christ, to say nothing of pious conversation on the same incomprehensible subject. Christians say the babe of Bethlehem was God; indeed, the designation of "Mother of God" has been applied to Mary by Protestants as well as Catholics. Words are easily uttered, but it is sometimes difficult to realise their meaning. We invite our Christian friends to form (if they can) some definite conception of a baby god. Just imagine him in the hands of the doctor or midwife, a helpless, wailing little lump of flesh. Fancy him afterwards mewling and puking in his nurse's arms. Picture him learning to walk, with many failures, and sad falls on the part mercifully provided by nature for such mishaps. Conceive him teething, keeping his mother awake at nights, and making his father use the language of commination. Think of a god spotted with measles or raucous with the whooping-cough. Is it possible that a god would (or could) go through all these trials, and be subjected to all these infirmities? Yet this is what the Christian is bound to believe—though happily not bound to understand—with respect to Jesus Christ.

What a position is babyhood for the alleged creator and governor of this illimitable universe! What vanity, what cheek on man's part, to make the Almighty go through all the undignified stages of his petty career! His worship consists in pulling down God to his own level.

When this baby god of the Christians was born, it is said that angels sang of peace and goodwill on earth. This was meant as a prophecy, but it reads like irony. The peace has not come, and the goodwill is as hard to find in our reckless commercialism and wicked exploitation of inferior races, from whom we actually thieve under pretexts of morality and religion. Europe to-day is one big camp. Millions of soldiers are grasping arms, and a terrible part of the wealth of every Christian nation is spent on preparations for war. It is the goodwill of the bloody sword, the peace of thunderous artillery.

Look at the great Nonconformist demonstration just held in London in favor of the Armenians and against the Turks. Religion is at the bottom of all the trouble; it separates those whom humanity would unite. And nine-tenths of the sympathy with the Armenians is a religious sympathy. Christian bigotry is the sentiment which is being stimulated. How many indignation meetings would be held if Christians were slaughtering Mohammedans? And how much more discreet these Nonconformists would be if Turkey were a great power? They do not clamor about the tyrannies in Russia, or go into hysterics over the horrors of Siberia—simply because the Czar commands a million bayonets. And what peaceful sentiments they display! They are trying to induce England to thunder with her battle-ships, and that would mean red war, with European Turkey as a cockpit for all the armies of Europe, probably in fratricidal strife. There is really nothing like religion for stirring up men's minds to what Carlyle called "the due infernal pitch."

G. W. FOOTE.

Digitized by Google

EARLY CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS.*

ARMENIA, which unfortunately has of late been forced on the attention of Europe, claims to be the oldest Christian country, and the Armenian Church boasts of retaining the primitive aspects of its religion. Perhaps it does, for a ridiculous, superstitious hodge-podge it is. It is pretended that Jesus Christ himself corresponded with Agbaros, King of Edessa, who also corresponded with the Emperor Tiberius. Most Protestants regard these documents as forgeries, but they illustrate the Armenian pretensions.

Monuments of early Christianity, other than literary ones, are of the most meagre and uncertain description. Some tombstone inscriptions, catacomb paintings, lamps, and old brass crosses, of uncertain date and possibly Pagan derivation, make but a beggarly collection of Christian antiquities. Our only real sources of information are the documents descended through monkish hands. Until late years these have been mainly those in the care of the Latin Church, whose scrupulous fairness in literary matters is not entirely above suspicion. Certainly the most important sidelights on Christian origins have come from sources beyond the control of the Romish Church. As instances may be mentioned the book of Enoch recovered from Abyssinia, the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles found at Constantinople, the Gospel of Peter found in Egypt, and the Syriac Gospels recently discovered by Mrs. Lewis in the Sinaitic Peninsula.

Mr. Conybeare, though still but a young man, has already done something in helping to throw light on Christian origins by his translations of Armenian texts, and by his edition of the work of Philo, About the Contemplative Life. The Armenians, surrounded by enemies to their faith, have naturally preserved, extolled, and exaggerated the doings of those who have suffered for their creed. The whole of the texts here given are of this description, but they cast many side-lights on the real character of early Christianity, which are well exhibited by Mr. Conybeare in his "General Preface."

Mr. Conybeare notices that the note generally struck by these sainted Christian martyrs is one of hatred, defiance, and imprecation; and this feature of their religion the Armenians seem to have carefully preserved. A curious item is that one saint, Demetrius, encourages another to fight in the gladiatorial show. He rushes on his opponent confident in the saint's prophecy of victory, and slays him at once.

One point is clearly brought out by Mr. Conybeare in his "General Preface"—viz., that the early Christians did not deny, but believed in, the old Pagan gods, whom they regarded as demons. Justin Martyr (Apol. 55) says so explicitly. Mr. Conybeare says (p. 11): "We are thus prepared to find the Christian saints resorting to exorcism against the gods of the heathen." And he gives an instance in which the demons cast out from their images were Dis, and Apollo, and Artemis. Minutius Felix, the earliest Latin apologist (c. 27), similarly professes his belief in the heathen gods and goddesses.

A natural consequence of this attitude was the destruction by Christian saints of Pagan works of art. As our author says: "The obvious way of scotching a foul demon was to smash his idols; and we find that an enormous number of martyrs earned their crowns in this manner." He tells us, moreover, "the most popular of the saints were those who resorted to such violence and earned their death by it." Many must have wondered why the early Christians are said to have been subject to such persecution, while the Jews of the same era, who equally objected to sacrificing to other gods, were exempt. Mr. Conybeare throws some light on this. He tells us plainly that the Christians were punished for their anti-social tendencies. "There was first that rejection of family ties and relationships which accompanied the belief that the world was speedily and any day coming to an end. Young men and maidens were taught not to marry, husbands and wives not to cohabit and beget any more children. Eunuchism, because of the kingdom of heaven, was even tolerated by the very founder of the religion. And all this just at a time when the most thoughtful and patriotic of the Romans were deploring the decay of population all over the empire, and were even making laws against celibacy and holding out rewards to married men with families." Mr. Conybeare further refers to their interference with family relations, their elevation of improvidence and poverty into virtues, their repudiation and ridicule of other cults, and the secrecy of their rites. He says (p. 287), in a passage I must quote at length:—

> "The teaching of Early Christianity was thus altogether subversive of ancient society. So it would be of modern society, and any one set of people who should literally carry it out in their conduct would very soon come into conflict with established law and morality, and would certainly descend, sooner or later, into beggary and destitution. A system of ethics inspired by the belief that the existing order of things is shortly to succeed, and, by an abrupt peripety, give way to a kingdom of heaven, in which angels and superhuman agencies will supersede the slow and arduous methods and industry of this earth—such a system will not much avail us until the promise is fulfilled; we shall be fortunate if it does not put us into much useless conflict with the old and permanent constitution of things. Into such conflict the early Christians fell. They were regarded, and rightly, as enemies of the human race. If it is possible to endorse any judgment of the past, we may endorse this one of the authorities of the Roman empire."

Another point brought out by our author is "the extent to which there gathered round the personality of a favorite martyr the stories which had been believed of the demi-gods and heroes of an earlier age." Surely this is as true of Jesus as of any of the later Christian saints. The supernatural descent and virgin birth had been told of many pagan heroes. Miracles of healing had been related of Esculapius. Buddha had been tempted in the wilderness by Mara. Elisha had raised a widow's son. The feeding of multitudes, walking on water, and turning water into wine were natural incidents ascribed to any solar deities; and prodigies attended the death of Julius Cæsar. If legends clustered round the minor martyrs, surely they did also around the greatest. Mr. Conybeare seems to allow this, for he mentions that the story of the virgin birth is wanting in the earlier "Acts."

Mr. Conybeare will not allow that Christian documents are in any way to be condemned because they relate miracles. He says: "In appraising the historical value of an early Christian document we ought to condemn it; not in case it contains miraculous elements, but in case it be wholly lacking in local color, in case the sentiments and teachings put into the mouths of the actors, and the actions attributed to them, be foreign to their age and country, so far as of these we have any reliable knowledge." Try John by Mr. Conybeare's canons, and, though it is nothing against him that he (according to some MSS.) makes an angel come down to disturb a pool, we may rely on his speaking of the office of high priest as yearly, and his attributing to Jesus discourses and sentiments unlike those of any Palestinian Jews.

Mr. Conybeare is always looking for history, and, of course, he finds it. Even of such a palpable theological concoction as the dogmatic discourse attributed to Callistratus, he can only use the words of Professor Jowett concerning the Phædo of Socrates: "How far the words attributed to Socrates were actually uttered by him we forbear to ask; for no answer can be given to this question. And it is better to resign ourselves to the feeling of a great work than to linger among critical uncertainties." Such an attitude can scarcely be wondered at when we remember that no Christian critic has yet discovered that the "Sermon on the Mount" is a literary compilation, never uttered by one man, either on mount or plain.*

Mr. Conybeare's training at Oxford and among Armenian Christians has hardly served to develop that rugged scepticism which, it seems to me, is a preliminary requisite for sound criticism of early Christian documents. He would seriously have us believe that in these stories of the early Christian martyrs we have the actual record of dialogues between judges and the accused some seventeen hundred years ago! Some nucleus of truth there may be; but a verbatim record—Credat Judæus.

---

* The Apology and Acts of Apollonius, and other Monuments of Early Christianity. Edited, with a General Preface, Introduction, Notes, etc., by F. C. Conybeare, M.A. (London: Swan Sonnenschein.)

* In my paper on "The Literary Character of the Gospels," Freethinker, March 27, 1892, I was the first, so far as I am aware, to announce this view.

Digitized by Google

I should be sorry to leave the reader with a sense of disparagement of Mr. Conybeare. He is both learned and fair-minded. His life, I should say, must have been mainly spent in study, and he is too honest and amiable to readily impute dishonesty to others. Had he, however, mixed much with the world, he would have seen how easily facts get twisted whenever the interests of a powerful corporation are concerned. When such a corporation has had for many centuries sole control of literature, every item thereof must be scrutinised with the utmost caution. Mr. Conybeare's own works confirm the opinion of De Quincey that no one has yet sifted the remains of early Christianity with sufficient critical care. J. M. WHEELER.

THEOLOGICAL PERPLEXITIES.

(Concluded from p. 787.)

In my article in last week's Freethinker I endeavored to show the perplexing nature of the New Testament account of the death of Christ, the Bible story of the Fall of Man, and the theological theory of free-will. The inconsistency of this last Christian teaching is such that it may be well to return to the subject.

There is, underlying the popular view of free-will, the assumption that all persons are endowed at birth with a faculty that selects and decides upon a certain course of conduct, or a particular form of belief, irrespective of the influence of environment. This is a palpable fallacy, for it would be equally as reasonable to suppose that cabbages, for instance, are endowed with power to grow independently of soil, rain, and sunshine. Now, it is a fair question to ask: If man has been designed by a supreme and eternal will, how can he act in accordance with an inferior and temporal will of his own? Further, can there be one great irresistible designing will, and at the same time millions of little changeable wills frustrating its designs? When a person says, "I will to do a thing," and afterwards he wills not to do it, there is no free-will, as the term is commonly understood by theologians, but simply a conflict of ideas, caused by the introduction of fresh factors in the act of determining. The change of determination does not mean that in the brain there is a presiding officer, as it were, who first decides upon one course of action, and then countermands it by issuing different orders. The theological fallacy is in regarding the will as being the cause of the determination, whereas it only expresses the final conclusion arrived at through impressions made upon the mentality by circumstances which at the time were in operation.

In the development of our intellectual and moral powers we pass through the stages of infancy, youth, and maturity, and the excellence or otherwise of our conduct will depend upon the nature of the conditions that surround each stage. There is no volition in man that can produce a moral character from immoral conditions. As a rule, a person's conduct is a reflex of his environment. What we term mind, thought, or will is undoubtedly influenced by causes, internal and external. For instance, defective sight prevents the formation of accurate ideas of distance and of color, and a defective memory may mar the success in life of an otherwise gifted man. Some persons are so criminally inclined by nature that it becomes necessary to place them under restraint; and others are born and trained under such inferior conditions that they are unable to rise to a high virtuous plane. These facts, to a large extent, explain the why and the wherefore of good and bad characters, of rational and irrational conduct. It is not here contended that man is an abject victim to fatalism, for by the accumulation and observance of the lessons of experience he may learn to control nature, and also to create new circumstances that will strongly influence his life. Through discovery and invention persons change under fresh circumstances, which may be of their own making. It is an utter fallacy to suppose that we can divest ourselves of the effects of the civilisation of our time. We can no more do so than we can dismiss all sensation by closing our eyes. Science implies power over matter, and shows that while it controls us we can also control it. Thus, by the careful observation of the manifestation of nature, and by the study of the physical and mental laws which govern man's organisation, we find an explanation of phenomena which theological conceptions do not afford.

Estimates of right and wrong may vary in different ages and nations. It is not, however, the result of free-will, but rather the consequence of the evolution of thought and action. The transformation of noble thoughts into noble deeds is the work of a progressive people, and depends upon material causes. Samuel Laing, in his Modern Zoroastrian, says: "Now, it is certain that the will, like life, memory, consciousness, and other mental functions, is, so far as human knowledge extends, indissolubly connected with matter and natural laws, in the form of certain motions of the cells which form the grey substance of the nerves, and of the nervous ganglia of which the cortex of the brain is the most considerable. This is conclusively proved by experiment. We know that by removing certain portions of the brain of a dog or of a pigeon we can destroy the power of motion while preserving the will, and by removing certain other portions we can destroy the will while preserving the powers of motion. Take away a certain portion of the brain of a pigeon, and, although it retains the power of taking food, it has so totally lost the will to exercise this power that it will starve in the midst of abundance, though it can be kept alive by placing the food in its mouth. In like manner, in the human brain there are certain portions which, if destroyed by injury or disease, will paralyse the power of giving effect to the will by muscular movements, while the destruction of other portions will paralyse the will which originates such movements. Numerous cases are recorded in medical treatises in which the will is completely paralysed for the performance of certain functions, and in such cases the anatomist can lay his finger on the spot where the brain is affected, and when the brain is dissected after the death of the patient it will be found that his prediction is verified, and that this region of the brain really was diseased" (pp. 191–2).

It is asked, if man has not a free-will, or if he is necessitated to do a thing, why should he be punished? The answer is, for his own improvement, and for the protection of society. Punishment affects its motive, motive controls will, and will regulates conduct. According to the free-will theory, punishment is vindictive; it is inflicted for past conduct, rather than for the purpose of preventing wrong-doing in the future. But if I am free, why punish me at all? To tell me I am free to act, and then to punish me for so acting, is a sham. Besides, the very fact of threatening me with eternal punishment, unless I act or believe in a certain way, prevents freedom, inasmuch as the very dread produced by the threat affects my power of choice, and renders free volition impossible. It is a circumstance in itself, supposing I thought it to be true, that would impel me to arrive at one conclusion.

As to the perplexed question of man's responsibility, it depends so entirely upon what is meant by the term, and to whom we are supposed to be responsible. Its true meaning is being amenable, accountable; but this involves a mutual agreement, a contract between two parties. Now, I have no agreement, neither have I made any contract, with God, and, therefore, I feel that I am not responsible to him. I am here without any choice upon my part, and I gave no consent as to the alleged relations between myself and God. If any bargain exist, it is a one-sided one which was forced upon me. Besides, the odds are all against me, for, according to the orthodox theory, I was handicapped from the very commencement. I was, it is said, "born in sin"; "many are called, but few are chosen" (Matthew xx. 16); "broad is the way that leadeth to destruction," while "narrow is the way which leadeth unto life" (Matt. vii. 13, 14). The only responsibility that I can recognise is that to my fellow man, from whom I receive reciprocal service. CHARLES WATTS.

The minister had been in the little Kentucky town but a short time, and when he was called on to preach a funeral sermon he thought it best to pick up a few facts about the deceased. "I trust our brother gone before was a truly religious man?" he said to the surviving brother. "You bet he was," was the earnest answer. "Why, brother, he never tuk out his gun to lay for one of the Simmonses without fust prayin' three hours."

Digitized by Google

THE WOMAN'S BIBLE.

THE first part of the long-talked-of "Woman's Bible," edited by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and colleagues, has been published, and it proves so heretical that Frances Willard, Lady Henry Somerset, and other representatives of the Christian New Woman, have made haste to repudiate all connection or approval. Joined with Mrs. Stanton in the production of this first part, which consists of comments on the Pentateuch, are Lillie Devereaux Blake, Rev. Phœbe Hanaford, Clara Bewick Colby, Ellen Battelle Dietrick, Ursula N. Gestefeld, Mrs. Louisa Southwork, and Frances Ellen Burr. The method of work adopted by these leaders of the New Woman Movement is described by Mrs. Stanton in the Preface as follows: "Each person purchased two Bibles, ran through them from Genesis to Revelation, marking all the texts that concerned women. The passages were cut out and pasted in a blank book, and the commentaries then written underneath."

In her Introduction, Mrs. Stanton defends the attempt of women to look at the so-called sacred books with feminine eyes. She asks: "Why is it more ridiculous for women to protest against her present status in the Old and New Testaments, in the ordinances and discipline of the Church, than in the statutes and constitution of the State? Why is it more ridiculous to arraign ecclesiastics for their false teaching and acts of injustice to women than members of Congress and the House of Commons? Why is it more audacious to review Moses than Blackstone, the Jewish code of laws than the English system of jurisprudence?

"The sentimental feelings we all have for those things we were educated to believe sacred do not readily yield to pure reason. I distinctly remember the shudder that passed over me on seeing a mother take our family Bible to make a high seat for her child at a table. It seemed such a desecration, I was tempted to protest against its use for such a purpose, and this, too, long after my reason had repudiated its divine authority.

"Bible historians claim special inspiration for the Old and New Testaments, containing most contradictory records of the same events, of miracles opposed to all known laws, of customs that degrade the female sex of all human and animal life, stated in most questionable language that could not be read in a promiscuous assembly, and call all this 'the Word of God.'

"I do not believe that any man ever saw or talked with God; I do not believe that God inspired the Mosaic Code, or told the historians what they say about woman; for all the religions on the face of the earth degrade her, and so long as woman accepts the position that they assign her, her emancipation is impossible."

The most notable item in Mrs. Stanton's comment on the first of Genesis is the contention that, since man was made male and female in the image of God, the deity must contain feminine as well as masculine elements. She says: "If language has any meaning, we have in these texts a plain declaration of the existence of the feminine element in the Godhead, equal in power and glory with the masculine, the Heavenly Mother and Father!

"As to woman's subjection, on which both the canon and the civil law delight to dwell, it is important to note that equal dominion is given to woman over every living thing, but not one word is said giving man dominion over woman."

Ellen Battelle Dietrick comes next in the rôle of commentator. She insists that the first three chapters of Genesis contain "two entirely separate and very contradictory stories of creation, written by two different, but equally anonymous, authors." She gives extracts to prove that the serpent was more truthful than God.

Lillie D. Blake considers the rib story a ridiculous myth, but finds consolation in the superiority of Eve to Adam. Of the conversation with the subtil serpent she says: "In this prolonged interview the unprejudiced reader must be impressed with the courage, the dignity, and the lofty ambition of the woman. The tempter evidently had a profound knowledge of human nature, and saw at a glance the high character of the person he met by chance in his walks in the garden. He did not try to tempt her from the path of duty by brilliant jewels, rich dresses, worldly luxuries or pleasures, but with the wisdom of the gods. Like Socrates or Plato, his powers of conversation and asking puzzling questions were, no doubt, marvellous, and he roused in the woman that intense thirst for knowledge that the simple pleasures of picking flowers and talking with Adam did not satisfy. Compared with Adam, she appears to great advantage through the entire drama."

Mrs. Colby thinks highly of the Genesis story of creation, but has qualms about the domestic arrangements of Noah's Ark. She says: "The paucity of light and air in this ancient vessel shows that woman had no part in its architecture, or a series of portholes would have been deemed indispensable."

Further on Mrs. Blake expresses her contempt for Abraham as a man. She sees nothing grand or poetical in his character. On the other hand, she thinks he is a bad pattern for the other patriarchs. She says on this score: "Like many a modern millionaire, he was not a self-made, but a wife-made, man. When Pharaoh sent him away with his dangerously-beautiful wife, he is described as 'being rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold'; but it is a little curious that the man who thus gained wealth at the price of his wife's dishonor should have been held up as a model of all the patriarchal virtues."

Rebekah and Rachel are somewhat roughly handled by Mrs. Stanton. She says it was a good test of the former's patience and humility "to draw water for an hour, with a dozen men looking on at their ease, and none of them offering help." She sums up her opinion of the Pentateuch as follows: "Indeed, the Pentateuch is a long, painful record of war, corruption, rapine, and lust. Why Christians who wish to convert the heathen to our religion should send them these books passes all understanding. It is most demoralising reading for children and the unthinking masses, giving all alike the lowest possible idea of womanhood, having no hope nor ambition beyond conjugal unions with men they scarcely knew, for whom they could not have had the slightest sentiment of friendship, to say nothing of affection."

Near the end of the first part Mrs. Stanton thus sums up her view: "This utter contempt for all the decencies of life and all the natural personal rights of women, as set forth in these pages, should destroy in the minds of women at least all authority to superhuman origin, and stamp the Pentateuch at least as emanating from the most obscene minds of a barbarous age."

When the book of Exodus is reached, Moses is attacked very savagely by Mrs. Stanton. Moses, indeed, has not a single good trait from her point of view. She charges that he deluded an ignorant and superstitious people in order to gain ascendency over them. She declares that woman's inferior place in civilisation is directly attributable to him. She asserts, moreover, that the tables of stone containing the commandments were not given to Moses by Jehovah, but were "faked" by that unscrupulous prophet. Neither has she any great respect for the commandments themselves. "A critical reading of them," she declares, "will show that they are chiefly for men." The following are some of the comments on the Mosaic law: "Women are always considered sufficiently clean to beg, work, and give generously for the building and decoration of churches and the support of the priesthood. They might always serve as inferiors, but never receive as equals."

Incidentally, Mrs. Stanton says: "If women have been faithful to any class of the human family, it has been to the Levite. The chief occupation of their lives, next to bearing children, has been to sustain the priesthood and the churches. With continual begging, fairs, and donation parties, they have helped to plant religious temples on every hilltop and valley, and in the streets of all our cities, so that the doleful church bell is forever ringing in our ears."

"The Woman's Bible" has been received with some cheap ridicule in the American press, but if it gives women courage to express their honest opinion of the fetish book written and supported by men, it will serve no mean purpose.

A worthy clergyman, having been presented to an important living, preached his first sermon from the words, "All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers." He was surprised and distressed when the churchwardens afterwards hinted to him that, though such words might be very charitable when used by a divine tongue, his predecessors in the incumbency would think his use of them rather unjustifiable.

Digitized by Google

FREDERICK DOUGLASS AND INGERSOLL.

All the world has heard of Frederick Douglass, the runaway slave, who became a famous orator and the friend of some of the most distinguished men in the United States; and most Freethinkers have heard how, on a famous occasion, the colored orator, in calling on Ingersoll to speak, introduced him by reciting Leigh Hunt's famous lines on Abou Ben Adhem. It appears from the autobiography entitled Life and Times of Frederick Douglass that the ex-slave had good reason to know that the name of Ingersoll should be written among those who loved their fellow men.

Mr. Louis Levine, of Charleston, who is always doing some good work for Freethought, has sent to the Freethought Magazine an extract from Douglass's book, which we are sure our readers will like to see reproduced in our columns:—

"A dozen years ago, or more [1868 or earlier], on one of the frostiest and coldest nights I ever experienced, I delivered a lecture in the town of Elmwood, Illinois, twenty miles distant from Peoria. It was one of those bleak and flinty nights when prairie winds pierce like needles, and a step on the snow sounds like a file on the steel teeth of a saw. My next appointment after Elmwood was on Monday night, and in order to reach it in time it was necessary to go to Peoria the night previous, so as to take an early morning train, and I could only accomplish this by leaving Elmwood after my lecture at midnight, for there was no Sunday train. So a little before the hour at which my train was expected at Elmwood I started for the station with my friend Mr. Brown, the gentleman who had kindly entertained me during my stay. On the way I said to him: 'I am going to Peoria with something like a real dread of the place. I expect to be compelled to walk the streets of that city all night to keep from freezing.' I told him 'that the last time I was there I could obtain no shelter at any hotel, and that I feared I should meet a similar exclusion to-night.' Mr. Brown was visibly affected by the statement, and for some time was silent. At last, as if suddenly discovering a way out of a painful situation, he said: 'I know a man in Peoria, should the hotels be closed against you there, who would gladly open his doors to you—a man who will receive you at any hour of the night, and in any weather—and that man is Robert G. Ingersoll.' 'Why,' said I, 'it would not do to disturb a family at such a time as I shall arrive there, on a night so cold as this.' 'No matter about the hour,' he said; 'neither he nor his family would be happy if they thought you were shelterless on such a night. I know Mr. Ingersoll, and that he will be glad to welcome you at midnight or at cock-crow.' I became much interested by this description of Mr. Ingersoll. Fortunately I had no occasion for disturbing him or his family. I found quarters at the best hotel in the city for the night. In the morning I resolved to know more of this now famous and noted 'infidel'! I gave him an early call, for I was not so abundant in cash as to refuse hospitality in a strange city when on a mission of goodwill to men. The experiment worked admirably. Mr. Ingersoll was at home, and if I have ever met a man with real living human sunshine in his face, and honest, manly kindness in his voice, I met one who possessed these qualities that morning. I received a welcome from Mr. Ingersoll and his family which would have been a cordial to the bruised heart of any proscribed and storm-beaten stranger, and one which I can never forget or fail to appreciate. Perhaps there were Christian ministers and Christian families in Peoria at that time by whom I might have been received in the same gracious manner. In charity I am bound to say there probably were such ministers and such families, but I am equally bound to say that in my former visits to this place I had failed to find them. Incidents of this character have greatly tended to liberalise my views as to the value of creeds in estimating the character of men. They have brought me to the conclusion that genuine goodness is the same, whether found inside or outside the church, and that to be an 'infidel' no more proves a man to be selfish, mean, and wicked than to be evangelical proves him to be honest, just, and humane."

The Dutch Freethought work, Dominie, Pastor, and Rabbi, by J. G. ten Bokkel, one of the editors of De Dageraad, has been translated into French and German.

A BRAVE WOMAN.

Leslie's Weekly, which is sent to us with other American papers by our good friend, Mr. Louis Levine, of Charleston, gives in its issue for November 28 a number of illustrations of the reception in honor of the eightieth birthday of Elizabeth Cady Stanton at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mrs. Stanton was associated with Ernestine Rose both in the anti-slavery and women's rights crusades, and the first convention in favor of the rights of women was held at her home in Seneca Falls in July of 1848. With her friends, Susan B. Anthony and Parker Pillsbury, both sterling Freethinkers, she edited the Revolution; and, like Ernestine Rose, she has never been backward in pronouncing that the priest has been the great enemy of her sex. Ten years ago she wrote a notable article in the North American Review on the question, "Has Christianity Benefitted Woman?" Later still she contended earnestly for the Sunday opening of the World's Fair, and at present she is occupied in bringing out The Woman's Bible. At the celebration of her eightieth birthday, at which her life-long friend, Susan Brownell Anthony, herself seventy-five years of age, was by her side, she said, as reported in the New York Public Opinion:—

> "We women must now make the same demands of the Church that we have made of the State during the last fifty years for the same privileges that man enjoys. We must see that the canon laws, Mosaic code, Scriptures, Prayer Books, and liturgies are purged of all invidious distinction of sex, of all false teachings as to woman's origin and destiny. To make her the author of sin, cursed in her maternity, a subordinate in marriage, an after-thought in creation, and all by the command of God, is to so overweight her in the scale of being that centuries of civilisation have not yet been able to lift the burden. We must demand an equal place in the offices of the Church, as pastors, elders, deacons; an equal voice in the creeds, discipline, in the conferences and general assemblies. We must insist that all unworthy reflections on the sacred character of the mother of the race, such as the allegory of her creation and fall, and St. Paul's assumption as to her social status, be expunged from Church literature. Such sentiments cannot inspire the rising generation with respect for their mothers. We must demand that the pulpit be no longer desecrated with men who read these invidious passages of Scripture and teach the subordination of one-half the human race to the other.'

Mrs. Stanton's life should be an inspiration to others of her sex. Her consistent Freethought and maintenance of women's rights have brought her the respect of the leaders of thought in America, and her birthday celebration was attended by delegates representing 700,000 women.

WHY INGERSOLL WAS NOT CONVERTED!

The Christian Endeavorers made a fine display of Christian Endeavor by their united prayer, in which many of the Salvation Army joined, for the conversion of "the erring orator," Colonel Ingersoll. The Rev. J. Z. Tylor, President of the Christian Endeavor Union, expressed beforehand the utmost confidence in the accomplishment of the object prayed for; and L. V. Denis, another prominent officer of the Union, declared there were many instances of sinners and infidels being converted that way. In fact, they were too numerous to specify. "I cannot name any just now," said he; "that is, any prominent instances; but I have heard of many persons who have been converted by prayer, and we hope to convert Mr. Ingersoll."

As Mr. Ingersoll has not yet had his brain atrophied or proclaimed his conversion, explanations are asked for, and will have to be given. The effectual fervent prayers of the pious endeavorers have not been answered, not because they were not righteous, but because they were not effectual. And why were they not effectual? The answer, to one in the secret counsels of Jahveh, is easy. Prayers were ordered for two o'clock on the afternoon of December 1. It happened that Jahveh's ears had been dinned for a long time past with the rival prayers of Turks and Armenians, and, on taking his nap (his custom always of an afternoon), he fell into such a sound slumber that he heard nothing of them. His hearing, as many must have noticed, has been defective for a long time. When he awoke, and took his customary promenade in the cool of the day, the prayers were all over. Thus it happens that Ingersoll goes on his way unstricken with softening of the brain.

Digitized by Google

The Jewish priests were better acquainted with the habits of Jahveh than the Christian Endeavorers. The high priest had a garment fringed with bells that the sound thereof might wake up Jahveh whenever he went into the holy place (see Exodus xxviii. 35). The next time the order is given for united prayer for Ingersoll's conversion all the bands of the Salvation Army should be required to pray together also. That may be efficacious, for it is well known to many races that shouts and the beating of drums and gongs are the proper instruments to ward off eclipses of the moon.

UNCLE BENJAMIN.

THE FAKIR OF THE MONKEY-TEMPLE.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Kolnische Zeitung tells the following strange story, which, if true, may help us to believe that Rudyard Kipling's tales of India are not altogether creations of the imagination. This writer says: "Every visitor to Simla (India) knows the Jakko Hill—about 1,500 feet high—in the neighborhood, and the monkey-temple on the top of it. There lives an ascetic, fanatical fakir, who supports himself and the monkeys on the offerings of the faithful, and who is treated by those creatures with the most profound respect. There are two troops or regiments of monkeys, each with its king, who is appointed to that position by the fakir. The king, alone, has the right to eat in the temple; the other monkeys remain outside, and the fakir himself brings a dish of tit-bits for their Kotwal or general. When they have done, they file respectfully before the fakir, who dismisses them with 'Go, my children.' This fakir, who is bronzed by wind and weather, clothed only in a leopard-skin, and whose hair has not been cut or combed for twenty years, is a European. He is able to converse in perfect English, and his name is Charles William de Rousette. His father was a shopkeeper in Simla, and sent him as a boy to the best school there. But an ex-servant of the father had been intimate with the fakir of Jakko, and on the latter's death had succeeded to his position. The young Rousette used to visit him frequently, and the man showed great regard for the son of his old employer. Threatened with some punishment at school, the boy took refuge with his friend the fakir at the temple, but was found there some days later and brought back. He seemed to have lost all interest in life, was always wanting to return to the temple, and one day he suddenly disappeared. The next twelve years he spent in his novitiate, wandering about India, and 'clothed' only with his hair. After the twelve years, he reappeared in Simla as the disciple of the fakir, and on the latter's death succeeded him. The elder Rousette had meanwhile died, leaving a good fortune, but the son made no effort to secure it. He says that he is perfectly happy, and has no desire to re-enter the 'false and corrupt European society.' He has a particular antipathy to the Anglo-Indian clergy, and possesses an extraordinary influence over all classes of Hindus, who revere him as a saint. He is the only instance of a fakir brought up as a Christian, and of European parents, who, though heir to a considerable fortune, leads a wretched life, deprived of all visible enjoyments, and yet to all appearance absolutely happy and contented."

A Pious Show.

A holiness camp-meeting has been in progress some time at Haines's Grove, a few miles from Lamar, and shortly after it had begun a gaudily-painted poster that astonished the natives in that vicinity was put up by the roadside, painted thus:—

"Eureka! Here we are! Great Gospel Show and Holy Hippodrome at Haines's Grove! Greatest display of legendary traditions ever placed on exhibition. Two performances daily, under the management of Happy Charlie, the world-renowned pulpit-pounder and sky-pilot, assisted by Hallelujah Jones, the efficient masticator of yellow-legged chicken. In our gallery of Gospel myths and holy relics may be seen the following: Core of the apple that Eve ate; Jacob's ladder; gold bricks from the streets of the New Jerusalem, and cinders from the other place; blubber from Jonah's whale; broomstick ridden by the witch of Endor; gang-plank over which the animals walked into the ark; Noah's log book; club with which Cain slew Abel; Satan's poker and shovel, etc., etc. New attractions added daily. You keep the grub waggon rolling; we'll do the rest."—Kansas City Journal.

ACID DROPS.

THE Toxteth Board of Guardians have had a little religious discussion in connection with the boarding out of pauper children. It appears that the vicar's wife at Dufton, where the little ones are boarded, is a rabid Churchwoman, and declares that if people go to any gospel-shop but those of the Church of England their salvation is endangered. Mr. Moulding, one of the guardians, thought that bigots of that sort were candidates for a lunatic asylum. In his opinion, we all have a chance of getting to heaven, whether we go to church or not. What a dreadful doctrine! It is enough to make a parson swear till his neck runs over his collar.

Under the heading of "Shocking Depravity at Hoylake," a Liverpool paper records the prosecution of a barber for cutting a man's hair on Sunday. The culprit was let off with a warning, on his promising never to repeat his awful crime.

A correspondent of the Leek Times, who has a poor opinion of the Rev. W. W. Howard's controversial methods, deplores the debate which is to take place between that gentleman and Mr. Foote. He admits that "Mr. Foote commands in many ways our respect, and in this correspondence has proved himself fully more self-restrained than some others." At the same time, he thinks it wrong to "drag things which every Christian holds dear and sacred into the dirt and dust of a public arena." What is still worse, the "seeds of doubt" will be sown "in young minds." Very likely.

Janet Stirling was going to a prayer meeting, but it was a "thick" night, and, as Providence did not guide her, she walked into the Forth and Clyde Canal. The poor woman's body was drowned, and her soul is supposed to have gone to the land of everlasting prayer-meetings, where there is no night—thick or thin—and no canal.

Mr. Foote's Bible and Beer ought to have a good circulation in Glasgow, where a controversy is raging over the great drink question. Mr. F. Faithful Begg, M.P., a son of the great Dr. Begg, of godly memory, remarked that Jesus Christ turned water into wine, while Paul recommended a stimulant to Timothy. This remark has elicited a howling reply from the Rev. R. W. Dobbie, who calls Mr. Begg an irresponsible fool. Such are the amenities of controversy when men of God engage in it.

The Irish Times, reviewing Dr. Kinyon's new book on Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, catches his style and speaks of the old literature as "that guide-book of all humanity." Why, three-fourths of humanity do not even yet possess it, and those who do rarely read it, and fewer still think of regulating their lives by it. But to cant and gush comes natural to pietists when speaking of the Bible.

The papers have been again writing about the worship of the Devil. The adoration of a being who condemns the mass of mankind to eternal woe comes the nearest to this definition of any we know.

The Charity Organisation Society has issued a damaging report on the orphanages, sisterhoods, and other institutions of the Church Extension Association, which refuses to have a committee and submit to a regular audit. The C. E. A. is said to be in the hands of a single person.

The Daily Chronicle has an article on "Salvation Army Shelters," which, it admits, bring grist to the Army mill, and are at the same time centres of pauperism, idleness, crime, and disease.

The police complained, before Alderman Morgan, that the Salvation Army shelter in Fetter Lane was closed against them, and they had to wait outside until thieves came out before they could arrest them. Alderman Morgan said it was a disgraceful thing that people who represent themselves as administering charity should act in this manner.

Dr. John Macleod, the Established Church minister of Govan, has been attacking Dr. Ross Taylor and Dr. Stalker, of the Free Church, hammer and tongs. He twitted them with abortive efforts at Church destruction, said Dr. Taylor's remarks reminded him of the words of Scripture, "A brutish man knoweth not, neither does a fool understand"; and accused him of "cant of the worst description." Scotch Free-churchmen are looking for a smart reply from their leaders. How they love one another!

There are many Christs living in America—Christ Schlatter, Christ Teed, Christ Murphy, and Christ Schweinfurth. The latest addition is Christ Huntsman, who has an establishment called "The Lord's Farm," holding a community of the Lord's People at Pascack, Bergen County, New Jersey.

Digitized by Google

Christ Huntsman has visions and revelations. His followers are simple people, vegetarians, who work seven days a week. They have been much persecuted by their Christian neighbors. All sorts of incendiary rumors were current: that they were "free lovers," and held shameless orgies, which they designated as "Angel Dances"; that they enticed and ruined young women under guise of religious proselyting; that they were blasphemers, and practised hypnotism and other forms of witchcraft. But a lady correspondent of the New York World, who visited them, describes them as innocent people, and thinks that if Jesus Christ was here he would not live as the world lives, but as they live at "The Lord's Farm."

Christ Schlatter, the healer, who eloped from Denver on account of the press, has turned up in Colorado on a white horse journeying to New Mexico. He says the Father had told him to go to Albuquerque, where he would begin a fast, the duration of which the Father would indicate. After the fast he expects revelations, which usually arrive when the brain is weakened. He predicts a social upheaval, which probably is more in the air than any second coming of Jesus Christ.

Christ Schlatter expects to go to Chicago and New York. If well advised, he would keep away from the cities, remembering what his predecessor suffered in Jerusalem. Schlatter stated, in reply to an inquiry, that all the letters which were in Denver would be returned in the proper manner, and whether he handled them himself or not the handkerchiefs would have the same cure and powers. The fact that the sufferers indicated a willingness to have him touch the articles was sufficient, and the actual touch was unnecessary. As with certain patent medicines we wot of, it is the faith that works the cure.

Christ Schlatter, if not himself inspired, is an inspiration to others, and several faith-healers are now parting their hair à la Jesus Christ, and pretending communication with the Father.

Another Christ has turned up in England. His name is Alfred E. H. Gaynor, and he calls himself "Spirit Architect and Constructor of the Universe; the Osiris, or Incarnate representative of the solar power: Buddha, Krishna, and Jesus Christ resurrected." Mr. Gaynor reminds us of a person who was very unpopular at Colney Hatch. He proclaimed himself the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Wellington, and God the Father. This was not giving the other inmates of the asylum a fair chance.

Christ Gaynor appears to be an Anarchist-Communist. In a strange publication, entitled The Truth Book, part 2, which is dated "November, 1895; Olombia, or Millennial Era, I.," he announces Olombia, which is a "Saturnian, or No-Money Commonwealth, with its members, the Spirit Builders of the White Light and the Truth University," which, he says, is now established. We are happy to read that "six hours will be a commonwealth working day, five days will be a week, twenty days a month, and ten days a year. Twenty-nine years will be a commonwealth working limit."

Another mistake of Providence! Gresham Baptist Chapel, Brixton, has been burnt down after a tea-meeting.

"Purple and Fine Linen," East Dulwich, has sent us two halfpenny stamps "towards augmenting the present ridiculously low stipend (only £10,000 per annum) of the Bishop of London." We are grateful for this prompt response to our appeal, but beg to suggest to other intending subscribers that their contributions should be sent direct to his lordship's official residence, Fulham Palace, S.W.—Morning Leader.

Hugh Allen, formerly incumbent of St. Mary's, Old Kent-road, has been sentenced to nine months' hard labor at the Old Bailey for obtaining money by false pretences.

Rev. T. G. Dale, vicar of Alton, Staffs., is in custody on a charge under section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act. We need not be more specific.

The current Homœopathic World records the case of a Sunday-school teacher who suffered from religious melancholy. She was taken to the Homœopathic Hospital, as it afterwards appears, by mistake for the Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic, Queen's-square—was treated with Plumb. Acet 6, and in two doses recovered. Constipation is at the root of much religious disorder.

A tombstone has been found at Cesarea with an inscription, "Monument belonging to Mary and Lazarus." As usual with Palestinian relics, the tomb is a fake. The inscription is in Greek, and it was at first supposed to be merely a monument of two persons by the names of Mary and Lazarus. But Professor Gelzer, of Jena, shows that, in view of the fact that Mary's name comes first, there is no doubt was intended to represent the Scriptural characters. He dates it about the fifth century, when the discovery of apostles' and prophets' tombs was "a flourishing and manifestly also a lucrative branch of industry." At that period it was claimed that the bodies of Joseph, Samuel, Zachariah, John the Baptist, and other Biblical men were found, and many of these pseudo-relics were transported to the capital city of Christendom, Constantinople. It is not impossible that at this period also the pretended remains of the sister and brother from Bethany were transported to Cesarea, which in the ante-Chalcedonian period—i.e., down to 451—was the metropolitan centre of the Church in Palestine.

A Japanese correspondent says: "I find that all the English here dislike the missionaries, at least those I have heard talk about the matter; and the reason is that, whereas they leave England as heroes and martyrs, amid the clamor of Exeter Hall, when they come here they live well and luxuriously. In fact, in the present depressed times they are the only class well off; while others starve, they are in plenty. Indeed, they are the most fortunate class, making more money than if they had to earn their living."

From India comes a story of the beating to death of a girl of the Kumbi caste, whose parents thought she was possessed of devils. She patiently allowed herself to be so treated until she succumbed. W. N. Cooper, in his work on Flagellation, gives an instance of similar treatment by Christians in the Middle Ages.

According to Professor J. F. Jenkins, human sacrifice prevails among a sect known as the "Tshukshem," not far from Yakootsk, Siberia. Old people who have lived beyond the Biblical allotment, and sick ones tired of life, offer themselves for sacrifice. When one of these characters decides to "offer himself up," he sends word to all his relatives, friends, and neighbors, who then visit him and try to persuade him to change his intentions; but all to no purpose. He chooses the manner in which he shall die, and he is killed with great ceremony. The body is then taken to a crematory near by, where it is reduced to ashes, which are carefully preserved in an urn of silver by the relatives. During the cremation the relatives pray to the spirits, begging them to guard the lives of those mortals still left on earth. This custom has been followed by the sect for centuries.

The Rev. John T. Vine, "a venerable evangelist," who was taken to the Butler-street Police Court, Brooklyn, on a charge of drunkenness, is reported in the New York Herald (Nov. 29) as having been very popular in England. It says: "His sermons last summer in the East-end of London drew enormous crowds of workmen." Perhaps the crowds were attracted more by the spirit than by the sermons.

"Clericus," who is a queer cuss, writes to the Isle of Wight County Press to correct the false notion that we shall be judged hereafter by our actions, and not by our beliefs. "We are, and shall be," he says, "held responsible for right faith as well as for right conduct." And what is right faith? "Clericus's" faith, of course. Said we not that he is a queer cuss? "Me and God" should be his motto.

Ball, in his Jungle Life in India (p. 26), says: "Hindus sometimes put crocodiles, which are objects of veneration, with some classes at least, into tanks—an attention which the crocodiles reciprocate by preying, when they get the chance, on their benefactors' persons, or on their flocks and herds." This reads like an allegorical satire on our treatment of priests and other venerated pietists.

Some Christians make teetotalism part of their religion, despite the doings of Jesus at Cana. With the Moslems it is an integral part of Islam. The Sikhs are equally opposed to tobacco, and believe that smokers cannot attain salvation. If a Sikh touches tobacco, he offends the manes of his ancestor. The water touched by a person using tobacco is said to be as bad as spirits, and sends the user and seven generations of his descendants to hell.

A Tennessee mob cut off the ears and fingers of a negro victim, hanged him, and then mutilated the body. The people of Tennessee are so eminently pious that they kept eight men in jail for several months for working on a Sunday.

A writer in the Arena, who proclaims himself "neither a sceptic nor a cynic," but "an orthodox clergyman who loves the Church and writes from a heart which is sad at contemplation of these things," says that the modern preacher is merely the servant of the plutocrat. "Religious professions," he says, "have become a commodity in trade. The Church has waxed, religion has waned; 'Christians' have multiplied, but the significance of the term has become indefinitely vague; quantity has been attained, but quality lost. The result is, as it always must be, quantity too is now in danger of being lost."

Digitized by Google

"Jesus said: 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven!' and the Church is saying, by actions which speak louder than words: 'How easily shall they that have riches enter into and rule the Church'; by which we are bound to conclude that the fittest for membership in the Church are the least fit for the kingdom of heaven."

Sometimes we hear of provincial juries bringing in a verdict of visitation of God in cases of death by lightning. H. O. Forbes says that, if a person is struck by lightning in Java, no one can be found brave enough to lift him from the ground.

According to the Danish statistician, Vahl, there are 304 missionary societies for the conversion of the heathens to Christianity. Seventy-six of these have their head-quarters in England. These organisations employed, in 1892, 5,520 male missionaries, 2,771 unmarried females, 4,285 native preachers, and 45,683 native assistants. The greatest number of missionaries were in the employ of the English organisation—namely, 1,810. The American societies come next with 1,619 men. The Germans have only 525 missionaries abroad.

Simultaneously with the report of how the Kurds at Kharpout offered the Armenians the alternative of conversion or death, we read how fourteen Moslems, born and bred as such in Ufa, Russia, were brought before the Court, and the whole of their property taken because they refused to enter the orthodox church. The Procurator called a number of witnesses, who deposed that the parents of the accused, Mohammedan Tartars, had been forcibly baptised during "the good old days," when conversion by force was looked upon as a soul-saving service to God. But these "converts" were never anything more than Christians in name. Moreover, it was proved that not one of the accused had ever entered a Christian church; they had all been exemplary Moslems from their childhood. The defence was not accepted by the Court, and the whole of the property, including household goods and chattels, of the fourteen Mohammedans was ordered to be sequestrated.

Father Ivan Sergieff, the "miracle worker of Cronstadt," was asked his opinion of actors using the sign of the cross in Count Tolstoi's dramatised work, The Power of Darkness. He thought it not permissible, and expressed his opinion that Tolstoi was himself the victim of the power of darkness. Father Ivan said the impression left upon him by Tolstoi's works was that their author is either a man of prodigious self-pride and of bombastic pretensions and assumptions, or he is a lunatic. How about Father Ivan's own pretensions and assumptions?

Mrs. Chisholm, of Fulton-avenue, Rochester, New York, where the bicyclists meet, applied to the district attorney to suppress the bloomer costume, which, she says, is ruining young girls by the hundred. Said Mrs. Chisholm: "Why, you have no idea how these bloomer girls carry on. They ride up and down so boldly, and last night they sang 'Only One Girl' and 'Her Golden Hair was Hanging,' and all those low songs, so you could hear them blocks away. I know their names, and I want to have something done about it. I've got a mission from heaven to preach against bicycles. I would sooner see my daughter in her grave than ride one of those machines of Satan."

Joshua Critchlow, a farmer of Hartington, claimed sixteen guineas from the London and North-Western Railway Company for sheep who walked up a snowdrift over a wall, on to the railway, and were killed. The defence was that the snowdrift was an act of God. The judge, however, held that it was not the act of God, and the company have to pay.

Professor George D. Herron, of Iowa College, one of the leading Christian Socialists of America, has a light-hearted fashion of stigmatising all who do not follow his ideals as Atheists. Atheism he defines as God-out-ness from life, and religion is God-in-ness in relations. We should say he is God-intoxicated.

H. Nipperdey, writing on Fetich Faith in Western Africa, says: "The white man is regarded by tribes who have seen only a few of the white race as a fetich, and is feared by them, especially by their women and children, as if he were a ghost." The fetich-doctor, or medicine-man, of the negro, is his priest, physician, and chief justice in one, and gets out of him his valuables in return for some trash served up in cloth or leather, or enclosed in a goat's horn, which he will not part with for any price. Selden well says "Priests of all religions are the same."

In the Church of Santa Maria Annunziata, at Naples, once a year, on the day of Our Lady, before its altar kneels a silent row of thirty girls dressed in black, and with folded hands. They are orphans from the neighboring foundling asylum, and once a year those who have reached the age of eighteen have a chance of being chosen in marriage by any honest man whose character is good. At the door leading to the sacristy stands a gray-haired priest, the head of the foundling institution. By-and-bye a young man approaches him, and hands him a packet of papers. These the priest reads carefully, and, being satisfied, leads the candidate towards the row of girls. The man walks slowly along the row—at last he stops: his choice is made, and he stretches out his hand. The girl rises, puts her hand into that of the stranger by way of consent, and together they disappear into the sacristy. The ice having been broken, others follow, and this goes on until the suitors are exhausted, or all the girls have been chosen.—Tit Bits.

George Arthur Lynch, who was executed at Adelaide Gaol for the murder of a boy, died in the cheerful assurance of soon settling down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Speaking to the city missionary, the condemned man said: "Good-by, Mr. Berry; we shall meet in heaven."

Ritualism has made great progress among the Episcopalians of New York, and is said to reach its acme in the just-opened Church of St. Mary the Virgin, whose rector, the Rev. Dr. McKee Brown, has a wealthy congregation. Ritualism in New York, as elsewhere, has advanced usually by these well-recognised steps: The surplice, unlighted tapers, lighted tapers, plain vestments, colored vestments, high mass, and finally the confessional. The old surplice was a voluminous white garment, falling to the feet of the wearer. The surplice now is the barometer of Ritualism. As the Church rises in Ritualism the surplice rises, until finally, in the highest Ritualistic church, the surplice is a cotta, coming to the waist, and upon special occasions trimmed at the bottom with lace. Men may think this making guys of themselves, but it takes with the ladies.

The Rev. I. M. Gibson, of Plattsburg, Mo., says that the Lord's Supper ought to be a real meal, and not a sham supper of crumbs of bread and drops of wine. There is no doubt it was a square meal in primitive times. Paul say. of the early celebration (1 Cor. xi. 21): "One is hungry and another is drunken." In the representations of the Eucharist in the Roman Catacombs it is a common meal, with fish as well as cakes. Dean Stanley mentions fish in the early Eucharists.

William Henry Cadman, a traveller, who has been sentenced to seven years' imprisonment for marrying seven wives, kept up pious correspondence with each of them. When discovered, he invited No. 1 to share his hopes of "the dawn of a better life," and thus to carry out the purposes of her Maker, "in His infinite and mysterious ways."

The Daily News speaks of a crisis occasioned by the refusal of the Bishop of Winchester to license a third altar in the Church of St. Agatha, Portsmouth, erected by the popular High Churchman, the Rev. R. Dolling, who declares he holds it as "part of his duty as priest to exercise his sacrificial powers on behalf of those of his children who were dead as well as those living." The difference between the doctrine of Mr. Dolling and the Sacrifices of Masses, which in the Thirty-first Article are called "blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits," is not easy to distinguish.

The town of Peebles, Ohio, has passed an ordinance requiring a curfew bell to be rung at 8 o'clock every evening except Sunday. When it rings, every boy between the ages of six and eighteen, and every girl between the ages of six and sixteen, unless accompanied by parents or guardians, must be within doors, under penalty of arrest and a fine of not less than $1 and costs.

The Paisley Mirror notices Mr. Cohen's lecture as "at times very eloquent." But the writer says of Secularism: "Granting, for the moment, that it is true, how can it be called satisfactory?" Does he, then, find no satisfaction in truth, or is he only to be satisfied with illusions?

How to Help Us.

(1) Get your newsagent to take a few copies of the Freethinker and try to sell them, guaranteeing to take the copies that remain unsold.

(2) Take an extra copy (or more), and circulate it among your acquaintances.

(3) Leave a copy of the Freethinker now and then in the train, the car, or the omnibus.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, December 22, Secular Hall, Rusholme-road, All Saints, Manchester:—11, "Mr. Gladstone's Theology"; 3, "The Old Serpent"; 6.30, "How and Why was Jesus Born?"

December 29, Camberwell.

January 5, Camberwell; 12, 19, and 26, St. James's Hall.

February 2, Liverpool; 9, Glasgow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. CHARLES WATTS'S ENGAGEMENTS.—December 22, Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell. January 1, Camberwell; 5, Birmingham; 8, Hammersmith; 12 and 13, Bolton; 14, Blackburn; 19, Glasgow; 26, Edinburgh; 29, Dinner of the N.S.S. February 2 and 16, Athenæum Hall, Tottenham Court-road, London; 23, Manchester.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

D. MCINTYRE.—Many apocryphal stories are told about Lincoln, and we should say that the one on p. 120 of E. Foster's book is decidedly of that description. The standard Life of Abraham Lincoln, by W. H. Lamon, or that by his partner, W. H. Herndon, will let you see how heretical were his views on religion.

A. L. (Douglas).—Thanks for your encouraging letter. It is pleasant to know that you "could not do without" your Freethinker. The story in Great Thoughts (a pious paper) about Voltaire's insulting Pope's mother is an infamous concoction. There is no ground for it whatever.

J. D. LEGGETT.—Starkie's is the standard book on the Law of Libel. It is big and expensive. There is a good summary in the late Judge Stephan's Digest of the Criminal Law.

J. BRIERLY.—Thanks. Mr. Forder executes your order.

H. BUTCHER.—Obliged. See paragraphs.

J. F. ARMISTEAD.—We have noticed the matter you refer to.

E. D. H. DALY.—Thanks for cuttings.

T. BROWN.—Mr. Holyoake is not conducting any paper at present. His address is—Eastern Lodge, Brighton. You will find all such information in the Secular Almanack, which only costs threepence. Glad to hear you mean to purchase Mr. Wheeler's Footsteps of the Past, which we shall review shortly.

MR. FOOTE'S LECTURE SCHEME.—A Friend, 5s.; G. Forbes, 1s.; R. Walker, 1s.; J. Walker, 1s.; Nicholson, 6d. Per Miss Vance: Camberwell Entertainment, £3 3s.; Mrs. B. E. Marks, 10s.; S. A., 5s.

C. E. SMITH.—Thanks for your budget, some items of which will be used next week. Glad to have your opinion that Bible and Beer is "a splendid pamphlet." Of course it might be more widely distributed if it were cheaper, but the author is not a millionaire and cannot risk a loss. We heartily endorse your praise of Chilperic's articles, which we are always very glad to receive.

D. D.—Shall appear.

SERVANT GIRL.—Pleased to hear from you. Gordon Scott's poem is good, but rather long for reproduction in our columns.

ANNUAL CHILDREN'S PARTY.—Miss Vance acknowledges receipt of the following subscriptions:—G. W. Foote, 10s. 6d.; C. Watts, 10s. 6d.; Mrs. B. E. Marks, 5s.; W. Middleton (per C. Watts), 2s. 6d.

N. S. S. BENEVOLENT FUND.—Miss E. M. Vance acknowledges: Mrs. B. E. Marks, 10s.; S. A., 10s.; W. Middleton (per C. Watts), 2s. 6d.

J. R. M'LELLAND (Paisley).—Pleased to hear from you. See "Sugar Plums."

ERNEST NEWMAN.—We deeply regret to hear of the death of Mr. Doeg. He was a brave and loyal soldier in the "forlorn hope" section of the army of progress.

J. M. R.—Thanks. See "Acid Drops."

H. W. JONES.—Mr. Foote will write you as to a lecture in February.

W. DYSON.—Miss Enid Stacy is free to call Bradlaugh and Foote "religious men." It amuses her, and hurts no one else. She is incorrect in stating that Secularism is dying. We suspect the wish was father to the thought. She is incorrect also in saying that most Socialists are Christians. They are notoriously not so in Germany and France, and a large proportion of them are Freethinkers in England.

T. CHARLTON.—The debate between Mr. Foote and the Rev. W. W. Howard is not yet fixed as to time and place. We note your suggestion that the Victoria Hall, Hanley, would be very central.

WELL WISHER says he cannot obtain the Freethinker now at Brighton. Thatcher's shop, in Oxford-street, where it used to be sold, is closed. Will one of our Brighton readers give the address of another shop where it can be obtained?

J. B. mentions that the Wiltshire people are called moon-rakers, and a story is told of smuggled goods being raked for in ponds on pretence of raking the moon. The Shadow of the Sword is published at 2d. by the Humanitarian League, 13 Great Queen's-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

T. R. ALLISSON.—Thanks for hint.

E. G. TAYLOR.—Is he really worth all your powder and shot?

H. LEES SUMNER.—The list of newsagents who sell the Freethinker is far too long to publish in every number as you suggest; and you know it would not make very readable copy. Why not write the local newsagent's name, or stamp it, on the three or four copies you kindly give away every week?

J. UPTON.—Mr. Foote will be glad to see you when he visits Liverpool. It is, as you say, the young people that we most want to get hold of, and who are our hope for the future. Thanks for the cuttings.

PAPERS RECEIVED.—Staffordshire Sentinel—Melbourne Age—Der Arme Teufel—South Shields Free Press—Crescent—Melbourne Standard—South American Journal—Glasgow Herald—Isle of Man Times—Liberator—Freidenker—De Dageraad—Progressive Thinker—Two Worlds—New York Public Opinion—Irish Times—Middlesex Chronicle—Jerusalem Star—Manchester Guardian—Le Gaulois—Le Temps—Club World—Arbeiter Freund—Paisley Mirror.

FRIENDS who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

CORRESPONDENCE should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

LECTURE NOTICES must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

LETTERS for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

ORDERS for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

IT being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SUGAR PLUMS.

NEWCASTLE gave Mr. Foote three most appreciative audiences on Sunday, the hall being crowded in the evening, and the applause being very enthusiastic. Mr. Foote delivers three lectures to-day (December 22) in the Secular Hall, Manchester. By special request, he will give a poetical reading before the evening lecture.

Mr. Foote's new pamphlet, Who Was the Father of Jesus? is now on sale. It is a drastic discussion of the great question which really caused all the turmoil of the last School Board elections in London. The subject has never to our knowledge been dealt with so thoroughly and carefully before, and, as the pamphlet is seasonable just now, we fancy it will have a good circulation.

We are glad to hear that Mr. Watts had a good audience last Sunday evening at Foresters' Hall. He again lectures at the same place this Sunday evening, December 22, taking for his subject, "The Religious Man." Mr. Watts will deal with the different types of that much-talked-of individual. There should be a good audience.

We are informed that Mr. Cohen acquitted himself admirably in his recent debate with Mr. Waldron at Newcastle. Mr. Cohen is delivering a good many lectures under Mr. Foote's scheme, and he will shortly give in our columns a brief account of his recent tours.

Canon Wilberforce presided at the discourse on "Animals Rights," from the Church point of view, by the Rev. A. L. Lilley, under the auspices of the Humanitarian League, and there was a good attendance and an animated discussion, in which Mrs. C. Mallet, the Rev. J. Stratton, Mr. Ernest Bell, Miss Woodward, and others, took part. The views that have previously been discussed are the Humanitarian and the Scientific. The one announced for January is the Ethical, when Mr. Frederic Harrison will be the lecturer, and Mr. Passmore Edwards will take the chair. Mr. Foote will follow in February from the Secularist point of view.

Henry Dunkerly ("Verax") had a notable article on "Sunday-School Teachers and the Bible," in the Manchester Guardian of Tuesday, December 10. Of the books of the Pentateuch he says: "It used to be believed that they were all written by Moses, and that they formed substantially a single work, which was supposed to have come down to us just as it left his hands. This is now known to have been a mistake, due to a want of careful examination by competent investigators. The Pentateuch is found to consist of a number of different narratives, composed by persons whose names are unknown, and they cannot have taken their present form till after the Exile."

Digitized by Google

"Verax" mentions a story recorded of Mr. Johnson, one of the missionaries killed in Madagascar. In giving the Malagasy a lesson on Saul and the Amalekites, he could not bring himself to say that the dumb animals and the innocent children had been doomed to death. "That is," comments "Verax," "a religious man in the nineteenth century could not bring himself to tell his converts of a transaction which appears from the Israelitish records to have been done by the direct command of the Almighty." "Verax" concludes his article by saying that, when the change in view regarding the Bible is fully realised, it will amount to a new Reformation.

Secularists in Greenock, Kilmarnock, and Hamilton who are willing to co-operate in arranging for week-night meetings to be addressed by Mr. C. Watts between January 19 and 26, 1896 (under Mr. Foote's scheme), are requested to communicate at once with Mr. J. P. Gilmour, 439 Victoria-road, Glasgow.

The Glasgow Branch holds its Annual Conversazione on Thursday, December 26, at 8 p.m., in the Blythwood Rooms, 155 West Regent-street. Members and friends intending being there are requested to purchase tickets at the meetings to-day (Sunday), or not later than Tuesday, from R. Ferguson, 88 Ingram-street. Gents, 2s. 6d.; ladies, 2s.

Several courses of free lectures are being arranged in London during January and February, under Mr. Foote's lecture scheme. A beginning will be made at Camberwell and Shepherd's Bush, a course of four lectures to be given at each place. Other courses will be given at Battersea, Islington, and Edmonton. It will be seen, therefore, that the President means business, and is not allowing the grass to grow under his feet. Miss Vance, with the assistance of Miss Brown, is seeing to the practical details.

At the French Academy of Moral Sciences a prize was offered for a history and exposition of Positivism, discussing its methods, aims, and applications. M. Leon Say, the appointed judge, took occasion to himself deliver a long discourse on Positivism. He regarded Comte as giving birth to the three currents of Agnosticism, Evolutionism, and Monism, though viewing with misgiving the consequences of these currents of intellectual life.

We read in North Indian Notes and Queries of a sect called Sadh, in Karnal. It says: "It was founded by one Udaydás, and its headquarters are at Furrukhabad. The sectarians are freethinkers, and, as they can see no gods, worship none. Their only ceremonial consists in large public dinners, especially on the Puran Mashi festival. They abjure tobacco, and affect special personal cleanliness."

The New York Review of Reviews gives in its December number a full-page portrait of Herbert Spencer, with a character sketch, said to be written by an eminent English scientist. He says: "Nor must you expect, if you make up your mind to tackle Mr. Spencer's great work, to find any particular tenderness displayed for your creed or your class, your own pet prejudices, social, religious, political, or moral. In all probability you will discover, to your dismay that everything you hold most sacred in life is rudely called in question. The existence of a God, the reality of creation, the truth of the Bible narrative, the immortality of the soul, the foundations of morality, the origin and meaning of marriage and the family, the inherent right of majorities to coerce minorities, the absolute wisdom of governmental agencies, and a thousand other points on which you have hitherto held dogmatic opinions, you will see subjected to most searching and unsparing analysis and criticism."

Mr. F. C. Conybeare recently read a paper before the Folk-Lore Society on the Legend of St. Josaphat and Baarlam. He admitted that the germ of the legend was Buddhistic, and, moreover, that the non-Christian versions of the story contained a parable of the Sower.

Freethinkers do the cause a real service by timely letters to newspapers that are fair enough to insert their views. Last week Mr. Rolley had a good letter in the Echo in answer to the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, and Mr. Wellesley Orr contributed a good reply to the Rev. D. Ellison in the columns of the Blackpool Herald.

Our Huddersfield friends celebrate the Pagan birthday of the sun with "a grand social and dance" in the Friendly and Trade Societies' Hall, which they hope will be well attended by members and their friends.

The Paisley Branch was resuscitated by Mr. Watts's visit under the President's lecture scheme. The hall was crowded on that occasion, and five new members were added to those who had previously joined themselves together. Mr. Cohen followed Mr. Watts, and, though his lecture was not quite so largely attended, it excited much interest. The new Branch has taken Tannahill Hall for its monthly meetings, beginning on Sunday, January 5, when Mr. W. McLean will deliver the inaugural address. Mr. Watts in January, and Mr. Foote in February, will give week-night lectures in Paisley.

The new year's number of the Freethinker (dated Jan. 5) will be a special one, though at the usual price. It will contain exceptional reading matter and some good portraits.

LECTURING NOTES.

My recent visit to South Shields and its districts was a very pleasant one. I found the friends exceedingly earnest in their endeavors to aid Mr. Foote in his efforts to increase the scope and force of Secular propagandism. My audiences were not so large as usual, but that was attributed to the severe weather then prevailing, and to the near approach of the Christmas holidays, which demanded extra attention to business and economy in expenditure; but at all my meetings the greatest enthusiasm was manifested, and a decided intention was avowed by the friends in South Shields to carry on a vigorous advocacy during the coming year.

At Blyth and North Shields I lectured under Mr. Foote's Lecturing Scheme, and one and all expressed their very hearty approval of the President's plan. Undoubtedly this new venture has, as the Americans would say, "caught on," and, if the wealthy friends in our movement will financially mark their appreciation of Mr. Foote's scheme, the practical results will, I feel assured, be most satisfactory. There is plenty of work to be done, fresh districts have to be visited, and a knowledge of our principles has to be imparted to those who hitherto have had no fair opportunity of knowing what our views really are. There are willing and able workers, ready to devote their services to the cause; the only additional requirement is the "sinews of war," and, if these are forthcoming, there can be no doubt that Mr. Foote will see that they are usefully employed in advancing the interests and power of the Secular movement. I am quite in accord with my colleague upon this matter, and I shall be glad when he has the means at his command to keep Messrs. Heaford, Moss, Snell, and others, as active in the field as he has recently been able to command the valuable services of Mr. Cohen.

Personally, I am desirous to render all possible support to the Lecturing Scheme, and, therefore, I wish to intimate to provincial friends that when I lecture in any large town on Sundays it will be a pleasure to me to visit the surrounding districts on the following week-nights. The only expense the branches will have to meet will be the hire of the hall and the cost of advertising the meetings, towards defraying which a collection can be made at all the lectures.

Last Sunday I lectured at Foresters' Hall, London, to a good audience, which was most enthusiastic. This evening, Sunday, December 22, I speak again at the same place, upon "The Religious Man." During January and February I lecture in the various London districts on week evenings, in conjunction with Mr. Foote, Mr. Cohen, and others, under the new Lecturing Scheme. Thus it will be seen that real active work is being done, the result of which must necessarily be the still further advancement of the great principles of Freethought and Secular philosophy.

CHARLES WATTS.

LOVE.

This only do I hold as faith,
And this is all my creed contains—
That love will flourish without scath
When neither creed nor faith remains.

This is the faith against belief,
Which shall awake and disenthrall
The world from its dark dream of grief—
Love—the be-all, the all-in-all.

PYRITES.

Digitized by Google

THE NEW BIBLE.

THE New York Morning Journal prints a symposium on the "Woman's Bible," which, except for the appreciative contribution of Mrs. Anna H. Shaw, would be a total condemnation of that work. Mrs. Shaw is the clergywoman who, at the late celebration of Mrs. Stanton's birthday, said that the worst chain that had ever bound womankind was the chain of religious superstition. The other symposiasts are T. De Witt Talmage, Dr. Joseph H. Rylance, and Mrs. Elizabeth Grannis, editor of a religious paper. Talmage says you might as well publish a shoemaker's Bible as a woman's Bible, and offers other remarks derogatory to the enterprise; Dr. Rylance characterises the work as ridiculous; while Mrs. Grannis declares that it is "utterly preposterous that a committee of women should presume to give us a Woman's Bible." Mrs. Grannis also says that "the best women everywhere are evangelical Christians, and these will be led to believe that the leaders of woman suffrage are what is termed Freethinkers." The calm insolence of the lady in claiming that evangelical Christian women are better than other women is equal to her humility in deprecating female commentary on the Scriptures. In what way she herself is better than Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Gage, Mrs. Gardener, or any other Freethinking woman, or even those Christian women not evangelical, she does not take the space to explain. The mother of Jesus Christ was not an evangelical Christian, and yet the existence and destiny of all evangelical Christians rest upon the question of her anatomical chastity.

Anybody who is led to believe, either from the "Woman's Bible" or from other evidence, "that the leaders of woman's suffrage," so many of them as are women, "are what is called Freethinkers," will not be far out of the way. There are two divisions of the movement. One demands the suffrage in the name of right and justice, regardless of consequences. This division is led by Freethinking women like Mrs. Stanton. The other division demands the suffrage in the name of Christ, in order that God may be voted into the Constitution, the Bible into the schools, and Christian doctrine generally into civil law. This division is led by the churches, Anthony Comstock, and Dr. Funk; and the women like Mrs. Grannis, Mrs. Livermore, and Miss Willard, who imagine themselves leaders, are only followers. Their voice is heard from the pillion, but a minister occupies the saddle and pushes on the reins.

—Truthseeker. G. E. MACDONALD.

ORIGIN OF RELIGION.

MAN, in his ignorance, supposed that all phenomena were produced by some intelligent powers, and with direct reference to him. To preserve friendly relations with these powers was, and still is, the object of all religions. Man knelt through fear and to implore assistance, or through gratitude for some favor which he supposed had been rendered. He endeavored by supplication to appease some being who, for some reason, had, as he believed, become enraged. The lightning and the thunder terrified him. In the presence of the volcano he sank upon his knees. The great forests filled with wild and ferocious beasts, the monstrous serpents crawling in mysterious depths, the boundless sea, the flaming comets, the sinister eclipses, the awful calmness of the stars, and, more than all, the perpetual presence of death, convinced him that he was the sport and the play of unseen and malignant powers. The strange and frightful diseases to which he was subject, the freezings and burnings of fever, the contortions of epilepsy, the sudden palsies, the darkness of night, and the wild, terrible, and fantastic dreams which filled his brain, satisfied him that he was haunted and pursued by countless spirits of evil. For some reason he supposed that these spirits differed in power; that they were not all alike malevolent; that the higher controlled the lower, and that his very existence depended upon gaining the assistance of the most powerful. For this purpose he resorted to prayer, to flattery, to worship, and to sacrifice. To pacify these spirits was considered of infinite importance. The poor barbarian, knowing that men could be softened by gifts, gave to these spirits that which to him seemed of the most value. With bursting heart he would offer the blood of his dearest child. It was impossible for him to conceive of a god utterly unlike himself; and he naturally supposed that these powers of the air would be affected a little at the sight of so great and so deep a sorrow. It was with the barbarian then as with the civilised now—one class lived upon and made merchandise of the fears of another. Certain persons took it upon themselves to appease the gods, and to instruct the people in their duties to these unseen powers. This was the origin of the priesthood. The priest pretended to stand between the wrath of the gods and the helplessness of man. He was man's attorney at the court of heaven. He carried to the invisible world a flag of truce, a protest and a request. He came back with a command, with authority and with power. Man fell upon his knees before his own servant, and the priest, taking advantage of the awe inspired by his supposed influence with the gods, made of his fellow-man a cringing hypocrite and slave. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

"FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT."

Flowers of Freethought are two volumes of editorials on living topics written by G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker. I do not know of anyone in England who has gathered together a larger store of information than Mr. Foote, or who uses it with more happy effect. Taking all these editorials together, they exhibit an abundant knowledge of history, of literature, and of philosophy. Mr. Foote is a dweller in libraries, as well as a man of the world. He browses among books; he gets the best they contain, and he gives it to his readers in a most available and interesting manner. These editorials are short, always to the point, fresh with illustrations, clear cut from beginning to end. Mr. Foote's language is like an arrow; it moves straight to the mark. There is no flourish, no involution of sentences, no fireworks. When you read Mr. Foote you know exactly what he is driving at; there is no obscurity.

Flowers of Freethought are good books to take along on a journey. They are like a friend with whom you can talk for a while, and then keep a golden silence. You can pluck a "Flower of Freethought" here and there, and read according to your own sweet will. You are not obliged to read continuously. You do not have to tackle a whole volume. You have a hundred articles to pick from, on a wide variety of subjects, and in every article you will find the philosophy of Freethought keenly and lucidly expressed. In America these books ought to have a large sale, for they are admirably adapted to our hurrying life. It is very seldom that an American will undertake to read a whole volume. He hasn't the time. He's on the rush; has but a few minutes to spare. The Flowers of Freethought are just the thing. He cannot put in his few minutes to better advantage than by a perusal of one of these terse and freighted editorials. In a small compass he will find a great many stimulating ideas. These are just the books to put into one's travelling bag. They are better than a summer novel, for, while equally entertaining, they are also profoundly and variously instructive.

—S. P. Putnam, in "Truthseeker" (New York).

FATHER, FORGIVE THEM.

"Then said Jesus, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.'"—LUKE xxiii. 34.

IF there is one thing more clear than another from a criticism of the Gospel history, it is that Jesus, the miracle-worker, is earlier than Jesus, the moral reformer. The Sermon on the Mount is a manifest compilation of traditional sayings, never uttered by one person at one place and one time. The peculiar doctrine of forgiveness, inculcated in the story of the woman taken in adultery, is, as we have seen, an interpolation; and the above text, the finest of the alleged sayings of Jesus on the cross, must be put in the same category. The passage is wanting in the oldest manuscript, the Vatican MS. In the Sinaitic it is put by Tischendorf as omitted by S_2, which means a later hand; but the later hand may be that of the insertion. It is wanting in the Codex Bezæ, in the Old Latin, in a copy of the Coptic, and in the Sahidic. These omissions in widely-separated versions are inexplicable, save on the view that the text did not exist in ancient times. The theory of an accidental oversight on the part of many copyists is an imputation on the Holy Ghost and an imposition on human credulity. If Jesus ever said "Father, forgive them," it must have been in reference to the misdeeds of his own followers. LUCIANUS.

Digitized by Google

PARSONS.

Does he, dare he, can he ever think straight or simply on any subject as any other man thinks, edged in as he is by so many limitations! He is considered a gentleman—which, perhaps, you and I are not—unless we happen to behave as such. It is a condition of his noble calling. Perhaps it's in order to become a gentleman that he becomes a parson. It's about as short a royal road as any to that enviable distinction—as short almost as Her Majesty's Commission, and much safer and much less expensive—within reach of the sons of most fairly successful butchers and bakers and candle-stick makers.

While still a boy he has bound himself irrevocably to certain beliefs which he will be paid to preserve, and preach, and enforce through life, and act up to through thick and thin—at all events, in the eyes of others, even his nearest and dearest, even the wife of his bosom.

They are his bread and butter, these beliefs; and a man mustn't quarrel with his bread and butter. But a parson must quarrel with those who don't believe as he tells them.

Yet a few years' thinking and reading and experience of life one would suppose might possibly just shake his faith a little, and teach him that many of these beliefs are simply childish—and some of them very wicked indeed and most immoral.

It is very wicked and most immoral to believe, or affect to believe, and tell others to believe, that the unseen, unspeakable, unthinkable immensity were all part and parcel of source of eternal, infinite, indestructible life and light, is a kind of wrathful, glorified, and self-glorifying ogre in human shape, with human passions and most inhuman hates—who suddenly made us out of nothing one fine day, just for a freak, and made us so badly that we fell the next, and turned us adrift the day after—damned us from the very beginning and ever since—never gave us a chance!

All merciful Father, indeed! Why, the Prince of Darkness was an angel in comparison (and a gentleman into the bargain).

Just think of it—a finger in every paltry pie—an eye and ear at every keyhole, even that of the larder, to catch us tripping and find out if we're praising loud enough, or grovelling low enough, or fasting hard enough—poor God-forsaken worms!

And if we're naughty and disobedient, everlasting torment for us—torture of so hideous a kind that we wouldn't inflict it on the basest criminal, not for one single moment!

Or else, if we're good and do as we are bid, an eternity of bliss so futile, so idle, and so tame that we couldn't stand it for a week but for thinking of its one horrible alternative, and of our poor brother for ever and ever roasting away and howling for the drop of water he never gets.

Everlasting flame or everlasting dishonor—nothing between!

Isn't it ludicrous as well as pitiful—a thing to make one snigger through one's tears? Isn't it a grievous sin to believe in such things as these, and go about teaching and preaching them and being paid for it—a sin to be heavily chastised, and a shame. What a legacy!

And even at that it's a failure, this precious image! Only the very foolish little birds are frightened into good behavior. The naughty ones laugh and wink at each other, and pull out its hair and beard when nobody's looking, and build their nests out of the straw it's stuffed with (the naughty little birds in black especially), and pick up what they want under its very nose, and thrive uncommonly well. And the good ones fly away out of sight; and some day, perhaps, find a home in some happy, useful fatherland far away, where the Father isn't a bit like this. Who knows?

But the poor parson!

He must, willy-nilly, go on believing, or affecting to believe, just as he is told, word for word, or else good-bye to his wife's and children's bread and butter, his own preferment, perhaps even his very gentility—that gentility of which his Master thought so little, and he and his are apt to think so much—with possibly the Archbishopric of Canterbury at the end of it, the baton de marechal that lies in every clerical knapsack.

What a temptation! one is but human!

So how can he be honest without believing certain things, to believe which (without shame) one must be as simple as a little child; as, by the way, he is so cleverly told to be in these matters, and so cleverly tells us—and so seldom is himself on any other matter whatever—his own interests, other people's affairs, the world, the flesh, and the devil! And that's clever of him, too.....—"Trilby," by George Du Maurier.

Old Mercator (to little Billy Ducks, just left school, who applies for situation as office boy, and produces testimonial from clergyman): "We don't want you on Sundays, my good little boy. Have you a reference from any one who knows you on week days?"

CORRESPONDENCE.

THACKERAY'S HERESY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE FREETHINKER."

Sir,—In Freelight, p. 61, I read:—William Makepeace Thackeray was fond, in the early portion of his literary career, of writing very boldly. In his admirable verse he cries:—

Forgive me if, in all Thy works,
I see no hint of damning,
And think there's faith among the Turks,
And hope for e'en the Brahmin.
Cheerful my mind is, and my mirth,
And kindly is my laughter;
I cannot see this smiling earth,
And think there's hell hereafter.

Can you or any of your readers tell me where this verse is to be found in Thackeray's works? C. W.

[We are not sure if this verse is found in the collected edition of Thackeray's works. But it is certainly his. Freelight was edited and largely written by Richard Bedingfield, who was a cousin of Thackeray. Bedingfield was a Pantheist, and wrote in the National Reformer with the signature, B. T. W. R.]

Sequel to a Salvationist Wedding.

A Wife Given up to a Lodger.

There were some remarkable revelations at the Shoreditch County-court yesterday, when a cabinet-maker, named Scott, of Hackney, sued Annie Scott, of Clapton, his wife, for the return of certain furniture detained by her. The defendant, who entered the box crying bitterly, stated that the furniture was hers, the plaintiff, who had left her, having given it to her. They were married in 1892 at the Salvation Army Congress Hall, Clapton, in the presence of four thousand people. They lived together for over two years, but she was now living with a gentleman whom her husband gave her up to. He signed an agreement for her to go and live with this gentleman. After seeing the agreement, Judge French said: "I give judgment for defendant. Here is the plaintiff's signature to this abominable document. That is sufficient for me." The solicitor for the plaintiff said that, as these painful circumstances had been gone into, he must lay the facts of the case before his honor. This young man was weak-minded. He lived happily with his wife for two years, until this man, a brush-maker named Gowling, came to live in the house with them. He had been the cause of all this. The plaintiff was a tool in her hands. The plaintiff stated that when he was married both he and his wife were members of the Salvation Army. She did not buy a single one of the goods, nor did he give them to her. When living in Earlsfield-road, Clapton, they took Gowling with them as a lodger. The landlady called his attention to rather suspicious conduct on the part of his wife and Gowling. One day, in a weak moment, and over-persuaded by the woman, he signed the document produced. His wife and Gowling, who always passed as a very religious man, then lived together, treating him as a lodger, and later on he left. Judge French said these details, shocking as they were, were absolutely irrelevant to the case. He could not understand how any solicitor could act for a man who had put his name to such a document as that before him. He believed the woman's evidence that the furniture was given her, and gave judgment for her, with costs. Outside the court a number of the plaintiff's friends set upon the defendant and severely beat her. Her own friends took her part, and the assistance of the police was needed to clear away the crowd.—Pall Mall Gazette, December 13.

A contemporary says of the Rev. Dr. Carleton (of whom we have not the advantage of having previously heard) that he has not been absent from his congregation on Sunday for seventeen years. If any pious gentleman of his flock has attended service as regularly for as many months, he is entitled to a crown of glory beside which that earned by the Doctor shall appear but an indifferent old felt hat.

A prominent Chicago divine, like all others there, had a very exalted opinion of the city. His end came. Reaching his eternal home, he looked round with surprise, and said: "Really, this does great credit to Chicago. I expected some change in heaven." A black attendant severely observed: "This is not heaven!"

Trance Medium (recovering)—"Yes, friend; while the dormant clay of my body lay here, my spirit was in the heavenly city. I saw the pearly gates, the towers of gold ——" Bicycling Enthusiast (interrupting eagerly)—"How were the roads?"

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

In criticising the pretensions of Theosophy we have expressed the opinion that it is both natural and desirable that the contact of European thought with that of the East should react on Western beliefs. This is shown to the full as much in the profound philosophy of Schopenhauer as in the charlatanism of Blavatsky. A serious and notable example comes to us in the form of some translations From the Upanishads, by Charles Johnston (Dublin: Whaley, Dawson Chambers; 1896). Mr. Johnston, in his dedication to his friend, G. W. Russell, says of these old Sanskrit sacred books: "I have found them wise, beyond all others; and, beyond all others, filled with that very light which makes all things new—the light discovered first within, in the secret place of the heart, and which, brimming over there, fills the whole of life, lightening every dark and clouded way."

* * *

The passages selected by Mr. Johnston for translation are not new to English readers. Sir Edwin Arnold has already, under the title of "The Secret of Death," told, from the Katha Upanishad, of the visit of Nachiketas to the House of Death, or Yama:—

> But coming, all unsummoned, to the House,
> Where red Death dwells, no Yama found he there
> To bid him bitter welcome.

The final passage, "That Thou! art," from the Chhandogya Upanishad, which contains the very essence of Hindu philosophy, is also found in the Sacred Books of the East. Without pretending to any qualifications to speak as to the merits of Mr. Johnston's work as a translation, it seems to hit the happy medium between mere literalness and the ornamental flourishes which we suspect Sir E. Arnold of giving to his versions of Oriental works. There is a quaint, almost child-like, simplicity about the diction, even when the thought is most profound. This suits the Brahmin character. Freed from worldly cares, this caste went in meditation as far as abstract thought can go, yet without practical experience and worldly knowledge. Transcendentalism may be said to have been tried on the banks of the Ganges over two thousand years ago, and even under Hegel or Emerson it has got "no forrarder," while its chief votaries are a subject race under occidentals who have subordinated metaphysics to physics.

* * *

The contributions made by the Brahmins to religion, philosophy, and speculative thought are well worthy the attention of students, and the extracts chosen by Mr. Johnston may serve as an introduction to the Bhagavat Gita and other writings in The Sacred Books of the East. Of their value as philosophy we need not here speak. Something of its gist may be surmised from this quotation from "In the House of Death": "When all desires that dwell in his heart are let go, the mortal becomes immortal and reaches the Eternal." The teaching of the Upanishads is humility, self-control, and universal regard. Christians are too apt to ascribe everything of worth in other religions to borrowing from Christianity. Now, of whatever date these Upanishads may be—and there are good grounds for considering them long anterior to the Christian era—it is certain that their philosophy is unique, and all of a piece. It is, in short, Pantheism pure and simple.

* * *

There is a German translation of The Testament of Jean Meslier, the French priest who abjured Catholicism for Freethought. It is made by Samuel Ludvigh, and is circulating in the United States.

* * *

Two Suffolk Friends, by Francis Hindes Groome (Blackwood and Sons; 1895), is an interesting record of R. H. Groome, who was Archdeacon of Suffolk, and his friend Edward Fitzgerald, the poet and translator of Omar Khayyam's Rubaiyat. Dr. Thompson, the late Master of Trinity, wrote to Mr. Groome in 1885: "Two of the purest living men among my intimates, Fitzgerald and Spedding, were prisoners in Doubting Castle all their lives, or, at least, the last half of them. This is to me a great problem, not to be solved by the ordinary expedients, nor on this side the veil, I think." The problem would have been unveiled could Dr. Thompson have seen that he was in the prison of orthodoxy, while Fitzgerald and Spedding were outside in the free air of liberty and Freethought. It may be doubted if Spedding could have achieved his great work on The Letters and the Life of Francis Bacon if he had not been a Freethinker; while Mr. Groome himself admits that Fitzgerald's translation of the Rubaiyat reflects his own deepest doubts.

* * *

There is a curious picture of Omar Khayyam Fitzgerald in these recently-published reminiscences of his friend, F. H. Groome. The poet, Mr. Groome says, was always perfectly careless as to dress. "I can see him now," he adds "walking down into Woodbridge, with an old Inverness cape, double-breasted flowered satin waistcoat, slippers on feet, and a handkerchief, very likely, tied over his hat. Yet one always recognised in him the hidalgo. Never was there a more perfect gentleman." Mr. Groome says that a former rector of Woodbridge once called on Fitzgerald to express his regret that he never saw him at church. "Sir," said Omar, "you might have conceived that a man has not come to my years of life without thinking much of these things. I believe I may say that I have reflected on them fully as much as yourself. You need not repeat this visit."

* * *

Gibbon wrote his Roman History once; but the history of his own life he wrote no fewer than seven—or, indeed, eight—times. The manuscript versions themselves have been preserved among the Gibbon papers, which since the historian's death have remained in the safe custody of the Sheffield family. These seven autobiographies, together with Gibbon's Journals and correspondence, are now published by Murray.

* * *

The editor of the South-western Presbyterian feels constrained to warn his readers against "the subtle poison" of humanitarianism which he finds lurking in some of the Drumtochty stories by "Ian Maclaren." For example, in the case of the good physician, Dr. Maclure, it appears that, with all his kindness of heart and nobleness of character, he was not "a professor of religion, or even an attendant at church." Horrible! And yet Dr. Ian Watson is the idol of the kirks, and himself a meenister.

* * *

Mr. John Hollingshead, in My Lifetime, has a good story of the pious doings of Bendigo, the converted Nottingham prize-fighter. Bendigo was an active, not a passive, missionary—a member of the Church Militant. Those who knew his strength and weakness played upon them. "Ben," said one of his supporters, pointing to a group of men at a public meeting, "do you see those fellows?" "Yes," said the converted one. "Do you know what they are?" continued his tormentor. "No," replied the ex-pugilist. "They're Atheists, that's what they are," continued the tormentor. "Wot's Atheists?" asked the simple-minded and not too well-educated Bendigo. "They don't believe in God, Bendigo." "Wot?" shouted the fighting-man, snorting like a war-horse, "don't believe in not no God. Here!" (taking off his coat) "let me get at 'em! I'll damned soon show 'em wot's wot!"

* * *

Essays and Notices, Philosophical and Psychological, by T. Whittaker, B.A., is published by T. Fisher Unwin, and includes his rationalistic essay on "The Philosophy of History," which we have previously noticed.

* * *

Was Israel Ever in Egypt? or, A Lost Tradition, by G. H. Bateson Wright, D.D., is published by Williams and Norgate.

Obituary.

It is with great sorrow that we have to record the death of our secretary, Mr. C. Doeg, on December 15, at the early age of forty-seven. This regret will be shared by all Freethinkers who have ever met him and have enjoyed an hour in his genial company. He had a great enthusiasm in work for popular causes. He was a compositor by trade, and had always been a staunch Trade Unionist. His energy, ability, earnestness, and readiness to put his principles into practice placed him always in the forefront of the various movements with which he was connected. His loss to the Secularist cause in Liverpool is great. For many years, Sunday after Sunday, he had been at his post of duty, often to the sacrifice of his personal comfort and gain. Socialists, Trade Unionists, the unemployed, and all who need help, will miss his willing work. He will live long in the memories of his Liverpool comrades.—L. Small.

I regret to have to record the death of Mr. William Allen, of Walthamstow, at the age of forty-seven, which took place on the 13th inst. He was for many years a prominent member of the old Balls Pond Branch, but the last few years he had been doing active work in Walthamstow. He will be remembered by many for his ardent support of our movement and the manner in which he helped to bind Freethinkers together. He suffered a long, painful illness for eight months with a calm fortitude that was remarkable, and we are conscious that his death is the loss of a brave soldier to the Freethought army.—William Simons.

The idea of the miraculous, which a superficial observer might have once deemed its most prominent characteristic, has been driven from almost all its entrenchments, and now quivers faintly and feebly through the mists of eighteen hundred years.—W. E. H. Lecky, "History of Rationalism," i. 198

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

[Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

Forresters' Hall (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Charles Watts. "The Religious Man."

Bradlaugh Club and Institute (84 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): 7, James Rowney, "The Atonement: Ethical and Historical." Tuesday, at 8, social party.

Battersea Secular Hall (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.30, open discussion on "Socialism." Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday, at 8, social gatherings.

Camberwell (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, a lecture.

Deptford Anarchist Group (Smith's Coffee Tavern, Deptford Bridge—adjoining Broadway): 7.30, T. Cantwell, "Anarchism and Secularism."

Penton Hall (81 Pentonville-road—Humanitarian Society): 7, Joachim Kaspary, "The Real Jesus."

West London Branch N.S.S. ("Sun in Splendor," Portobello-road, Notting Hill Gate): 7.30, half-yearly general meeting.

Wood Green (Club and Institute, 4 Lawn-villas, Stuart-crescent, opposite Wood Green Church): 7.30, C. Cohen, "The Origin of Man."

Open-Air Propaganda.

Battersea Park Gates: 12, F. Haslam, "Peace on Earth."

Hyde Park (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

Birmingham (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 11, members' meeting; 7, W. J. Russell, "Christ and Confucius."

Bristol (Shepherds' Hall, Old Market-street): Boxing Day, at 7, concert and dance.

Derby (St. James's Hall, St. James-street): Friday, Dec. 20, at 8, C. Cohen, "What Think ye of Christ?"

Dundee (Tally-street Hall): 6.30, discussion—"Christianity and Woman."

Glasgow (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion—J. Gunn, "Swedenborgianism"; 6.30, A. Paul, "The Birthday of Jesus."

Heckmondwike (Lombard Coffee Palace, Market-place): 2.30, meeting—local Freethinkers invited.

Huddersfield (Friendly and Trade Societies' Hall, No. 5): Wednesday, Dec. 25, grand social and dance.

Hull (Cobden Hall, Storey-street): 7, Mr. Hendy, "Historical Evidences for Christianity."

Leicester Secular Hall (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, Arthur B. Moss, "The New Age of Reason."

Liverpool (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, Ernest Newman will lecture.

Manchester Secular Hall (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 11, G. W. Foote, "Mr. Gladstone's Theology"; 3, "The Old Serpent"; 6.30, "How and Why was Jesus Born?"

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 7, M. E. Copland, "Thomas Paine"; 8, monthly meeting.

Sheffield Secular Society (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, J. Pearson, "Toryism, Liberalism, and I.L.P.-ism." Members and friends' annual soiree and ball on New Year's Day.

South Shields (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, music; 7.30, W. Cook, "Ancient Philosophy."

Stockton-on-Tees (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, G. Thwaites will read a paper "On Health."

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. Cohen, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—December 22, Wood Green; 29, Balls Pond.

Arthur B. Moss, 44 Gordon-road, Rotherhithe, London.—Dec. 22, Leicester.

Touzeau Parris, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—December 29, Foresters' Hall.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 10s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

Monthly, Price 1d.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. Foote. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

Robert Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE and J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; God-Making, by G. L. Mackenzie; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Now Ready, Price Three Shillings,

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST.

ESSAYS ON HUMAN EVOLUTION.

By J. M. WHEELER.

With an Introduction by G. W. Foote.

Contents:—Early Religion—Animism—Fetishism and Idolatry—Totemism—Were the Jews Savages?—Religious Dances—Sympathetic Magic—Kings, Priests, and Gods—Sacrifices and Scapegoats—Killing the God—Nature Festivals—Lent—Easter—May Day—Christmas Customs.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

CHARLES WATTS'S WORKS.

THE CLAIMS OF CHRISTIANITY EXAMINED FROM A RATIONALIST STANDPOINT. 64 pp., 6d., by post 7d.

THE TEACHINGS OF SECULARISM COMPARED WITH ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

CHRISTIANITY: ITS ORIGIN, NATURE, AND INFLUENCE. 4d., by post 5d.

SECULARISM: DESTRUCTIVE AND CONSTRUCTIVE. 3d., by post 4d.

AGNOSTICISM AND CHRISTIAN THEISM: WHICH IS THE MORE REASONABLE? 3d., by post 4d.

A REPLY TO FATHER LAMBERT'S "TACTICS OF INFIDELS." 6d., by post 7d.

THEOLOGICAL PRESUMPTION. An Open Letter to the Rev. Dr. R. F. Burns, of Halifax, N.S. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE NATURAL AND THE SUPERNATURAL; OR BELIEF AND KNOWLEDGE. 3d., by post 4d.

EVOLUTION AND SPECIAL CREATION. 3d., by post 4d.

HAPPINESS IN HELL AND MISERY IN HEAVEN. 3d., by post 4d.

SCIENCE AND THE BIBLE. 4d., by post 5d.

BIBLE MORALITY: Its Teachings Shown to be Contradictory and Defective as an Ethical Guide. 3d., by post 3½d.

SECULARISM: IS IT FOUNDED ON REASON, AND IS IT SUFFICIENT TO MEET THE WANTS OF MANKIND? Debate between the Editor of the Evening Mail (Halifax, N.S.) and Charles Watts. With Prefatory Letters by G. J. Holyoake and Colonel R. G. Ingersoll, and an Introduction by Helen H. Gardener. 1s., by post 1s. 2d.

SECULARISM: ITS RELATION TO THE SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF THE DAY. 2d., by post 2½d.

IS THERE A LIFE BEYOND THE GRAVE? Reply to Dr. R. B. Westbrook. 3d., by post 4d.

SAINTS AND SINNERS: WHICH? 3d., by post 4d.

EDUCATION: TRUE AND FALSE. 2d., by post 2½d.

THE SUPERSTITION OF THE CHRISTIAN SUNDAY. A Plea for Liberty and Justice. 3d., by post 4d.

THE EXISTENCE OF GOD; OR, QUESTIONS FOR THEISTS. 2d., by post 2½d.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILISATION. 3d., by post 4d.

THE BIBLE UP TO DATE. 2d., by post 2½d.

WHY DO RIGHT? A Secularist's Answer. 3d., by post 4d.

WAS CHRIST A POLITICAL AND SOCIAL REFORMER? 4d., by post 5d.

MISCELLANEOUS PAMPHLETS. Cloth 2s., by post 2s. 3d.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d
Contains Articles on Nervousness, More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleeplessness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 9d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 7d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 7d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 7d.
All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 2s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,
4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S LECTURE,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

180 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes' pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 31. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell
No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d. Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 8s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

Digitized by Google

AN ACCEPTABLE CHRISTMAS PRESENT

LOT 11.

1 pair All-Wool Blankets.
1 pair Bed-Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-Cloth.

CARRIAGE PAID, 21s.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

First Series (cloth), 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Old Nick—Fire!!!—Sky Pilots—Devil Dodgers—Fighting Spooks—Damned Sinners—Where is Hell?—Spurgeon and Hell—Is Spurgeon in Heaven?—God in Japan—Stanley on Providence—Gone to God—Thank God—Judgment Day—Shelley's Atheism—Long Faces—Our Father—Wait Till You Die—Dead Theology—Mr. Gladstone on Devils—Huxley's Mistake—The Gospel of Freethought—On Ridicule—Who are the Blasphemers?—Christianity and Common Sense—The Lord of Hosts—Consecrating the Colors—Christmas in Holloway Gaol—Who Killed Christ?—Did Jesus Ascend?—The Rising Sun?—St. Paul's Veracity—No Faith with Heretics—The Logic of Persecution—Luther and the Devil—Bible English—Living by Faith—Victor Hugo—Desecrating a Church—Walt Whitman—Tennyson and the Bible—Christ's Old Coat—Christ's Coat, Number Two—Scotched, Not Slain—God-Making—God and the Weather—Miracles—A Real Miracle—Jesus on Women—Paul on Women—Mother's Religion.

Second Series (cloth), 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Luscious Piety—The Jewish Sabbath—God's Day—Professor Stokes on Immortality—Paul Bert—Converting a Corpse—Bradlaugh's Ghost—Christ and Brotherhood—The Sons of God—Melchisedek—S'welp me God—Infidel Homes—Are Atheists Cruel?—Are Atheists Wicked?—Rain Doctors—Pious Puerilities—"Thus Saith the Lord"—Believe or be Damned—Christian Charity—Religion and Money—Clotted Bosh—Lord Bacon on Atheism—Christianity and Slavery—Christ Up to Date—Secularism and Christianity—Altar and Throne—Martin Luther—The Praise of Folly—A Lost Soul—Happy in Hell—The Act of God—Keir Hardie on Christ—Blessed be ye Poor—Converted Infidels—Mrs. Booth's Ghost—Talmage on the Bible—Mrs. Besant on Death and After—The Poets and Liberal Theology—Christianity and Labor—Dueling—An Easter Egg for Christians—Down Among the Dead Men—Smirching a Hero—Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ—Jehovah the Ripper—The Parson's Living Wage—Did Bradlaugh Backslide?—Frederic Harrison on Atheism—Save the Bible!—Forgive and Forget—The Star of Bethlehem—The Great Ghost—Atheism and the French Revolution—Pigottism—Jesus at the Derby—Atheist Murderers—A Religion for Eunuchs—Rose-Water Religion.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

TO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

—A Seasonable Pamphlet—

WHO WAS THE FATHER OF JESUS?

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

Price Twopence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Cloth 1s. 6d., by post 1s. 9d.; boards 1s., by post 1s. 2d.,

TALES FROM THE BIBLE,

TOLD TO MY DAUGHTER.

GIVING A RATIONAL AND ETHICAL VIEW OF THE OLD TESTAMENT SUITED TO THE CAPACITIES OF CHILDREN.

BY F. J. GOULD,

Author of "A Concise History of Religion," etc.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

A CONFERENCE OF REPRESENTATIVES

OF THE

Midland Branches of the N.S.S.

WILL BE HELD ON SUNDAY, JANUARY 5,

The object being to form a Federation for the Midland Counties.

Freethinkers in those towns where no Branch exists are earnestly invited to attend. Time and place of meeting will be announced in the Freethinker for December 29.

Printed and Published by G. W. FOOTE, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

The Freethinker

Edited by G. W. FOOTE.] [Sub-Editor, J. M. WHEELER.

VOL. XV.—No. 52. SUNDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1895. PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE STAR OF CHRIST.

EIGHTEEN hundred and ninety-five years ago, according to Christian chronology, a wonderful star was seen in the East. Somehow or other it escaped the notice alike of Jews and Pagans. It was never heard of by the chroniclers of prodigies. In fact, it was only visible to three "wise men," who were fools enough to follow it. They must have rested all day and journeyed all night, and we may imagine their delight when it came to a standstill. We are told that it stood over a certain house, and the three wise men knew the little King of the Jews they were looking for must be inside that building.

That star was more than wonderful—it was thrice wonderful. It must have moved along in the earth's atmosphere, and, as the Yankees say, low down at that. Anyone who thinks otherwise should just go outside his front door on a fine, clear night, fix his eye on the likeliest looking star, and then walk down the street and decide which house it is over.

Having come from nowhere, the star went back to the same place. It was never seen before or after. It was fetched out, so to speak, by the story-teller, and replaced in the bag when the trick was ended.

The wise men came from the East, which is a large region. If you face the sun at midday, north of the equator, the East is all the world on your left hand. The wise men came from there, and returned there. It is not surprising that they got lost, and there is no record of their having been found.

That wandering star heralded the birth of a baby called Joshua, or more commonly (in the Greek form) Jesus. He was to astonish the world, and he has done it. King Herod wanted to settle him in his cradle. Some people say it is a pity he failed. But the king took a wrong course. Instead of sending one of his detectives after the wise men, he exacted a promise of information from them, and they went home (or somewhere), and left him in the dark. Herod was therefore obliged to kill many children instead of one. He ordered the massacre of every child under two years of age in the whole neighborhood. Curiously, however, Herod's worst enemies never heard of this infamous deed. Josephus, who rakes up all he can against Herod, is silent over this stupendous atrocity. The consequence is that persons who are endowed with more sense than faith decline to believe it ever happened.

For thirty years the world knew nothing of the baby born under the wise men's star. Then he burst upon the public as a preacher. Three years afterwards he was executed for sedition. While he was dying the sun was eclipsed for three hours. This is an astronomical impossibility. It must, therefore, have been supernatural. The power which produced this astounding darkness was the same power which made the moon stand still for General Joshua. Perhaps it was like the Egyptian darkness—a thick one that could be felt, one that could be cut into slices. But a still more wonderful thing than the darkness itself is the cat-like vision that was possessed by the people of that age. They saw excellently well in the dark; in fact, they did not notice it was dark; so they never mentioned it, and the most prodigious eclipse in all history is without the attestation of a single contemporary.

It is surprising that the star of Christ's birth did not show up again in the darkness of his crucifixion. It had a splendid opportunity of distinguishing itself. For three hours it might have skipped in the sky, and secured universal attention. Perhaps it was aware of the cat's eyes of the general public, and refrained from wasting a big display.

For some time after the crucifixion the star of Christ was hidden. Then it began to appear to a multitude of low, illiterate persons, whom it lured to entertain great expectations beyond the tomb. Many of them expected that Christ would come again, and establish a universal kingdom, in which they would enjoy fine positions. But they looked for him in vain, and died without a glimpse of him. Whether they saw him after death is more than anyone can say. Our private opinion is that they saw him as much after death as they did before.

The star of Christ rose higher and higher in the heavens, and it shone the more brightly in the darkness which fell upon civilisation. At length it became the only light men had to walk by, and history tells us what monstrous doctrines and practices flourished in that obscurity. It was an age of faith and an age of filth. The masses were oppressed and miserable. Kings ruled despotically by the grace of God. Nobles were masters of the very lives of their dependents. Priests lorded it over the laity, and were mostly ignorant, idle, luxurious, and profligate. Lazy monks and hysterical nuns too often realised the worst dreams of pandemonium. Intellectually and morally, Europe sank into a state which would have seemed impossible to the Greeks and Romans.

This state of things continued for nearly a thousand years. Then there was a stir in the darkness. The stifled mind of man began to assert itself. Ancient literature was read, a few bold spirits studied science, printing was invented, maritime discovery opened up new ideas of the world, and astronomy whispered the great secrets of the universe. "Light, more light!" became a daily growing aspiration, and the priests of darkness trembled at their altars. They determined to keep back the light if they could. They imprisoned investigators, tortured those who had courage to think for themselves, and slew myriads of men who were touched by "the prophetic soul of the wide world dreaming on things to come." But the light still spread, and the star of Christ paled in its splendor.

Religions, said Schopenhauer, are like glowworms; they require darkness to shine in. This is true of Christianity, as it is true of every other superstition.

The star of Christ is approaching its utter extinction. As a god, the Nazarene is dead already. Few educated and intelligent people believe the full orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. Even in professional Christian circles stress is laid upon the human and ethical aspects of the "preacher of the Sermon on the Mount." All this shows a general drifting from the dogma of his godhead. It is absurd to bespeak our sympathy and admiration for a supernatural being. A god does not invite approval; he demands obedience. In vain does Count Tolstoi picture an arbitrary Christ, and manufacture a new Christianity by a process of selection from the ruins of the old system. The result only commends itself to those who are seeking a dignified escape from orthodoxy, without being ready for a complete spiritual emancipation. A played-out god should have his niche in the historical pantheon; he should not be thrust into the Valhalla of actual heroes. This truth is instinctively admitted by ordinary men and women, who listen with impatience to these high-pitched panegyrics on the man Jesus. Stripped of his deity, he is not imposing enough to be the centre of universal reverence. Jesus has had his day, and the great god Christ is dead; dead, this time, beyond all hope of resurrection.

Digitized by Google

G. W. FOOTE.

PANTOMIMES.

PANTOMIMES are what our American friends call an institution. Christmas comes but once a year, but when it comes it brings pantomimes as surely as plum puddings. Fairies and transformation scenes are, to townspeople, almost as natural an accompaniment of Yuletide as holly and miseltoe. If, however, we look up the accepted authorities, we shall find pantomimes set down as quite a modern institution. We are led to suppose that, because the first Drury Lane pantomime was produced in 1702, the thing was then wholly new.

In my Footsteps of the Past I have argued that the customary ascription of the drama to the Christian miracle plays of the Middle Ages is wrong. I hold that the drama has developed, not from the Church, but side by side with it, from the mimetic movements of early man. Mummery, or imitative magic, as I hope to convince readers of my book, is rather the foundation of the Church than the Church the founder of the drama. So with pantomimes. In certain of their features—their masks, mummery, supernatural and allegorical personages and transformations—they represent ancient features of human thought; and this, in part at least, is the source of their delight to children.

Doubtless the name of pantomimes, and certain elements in them, were borrowed from the Italians in the early part of last century. But names are easily misleading. The Italian Arlechino is quite different from our spangled and splendid Harlequin. Moreover, as Isaac Disraeli pointed out, the Italian pantomimes were themselves descended from the early Roman popular diversions. It was exactly so in England. When pantomimes were introduced into our theatres, they, as Mr. Gomme has already noticed, "travelled along thoroughly English lines, and met a tide of popular English drama which just then flowed into London from the country."

We are told that Manager Rich, of Drury Lane, happened to hit upon pantomimes, and they were copied everywhere, because their success was prodigious. But why so? Because they hit the taste of the country people then flocking into the towns. They had previously been used to mummery and puppet-shows at Christmas, and in London the same thing was catered for more gorgeously. That the magical element was early predominant we may guess from Pope's lines on the rival houses of Drury Lane and Covent Garden:—

> When, lo! to dark encounters in mid air
> New wizards rise—here Booth, and Cibber there.
> Booth in his cloudy tabernacle shrined;
> On grinning dragons Cibber mounts the wind.

The severer critics cried out against these mummeries, as they rightly called them. But it was this that was the great source of attraction.

In the old mummery a chief aim was to surprise by the oddity of the masks and the splendor of dresses. In the Records of Norwich, 1410, we read of a wealthy citizen who was crowned King of Christmas, and rode in state dressed in silks and tinsel, preceded by twelve persons as the twelve months of the year. Mummers in grotesque dress and imitating animals followed. There is a curious manuscript in the Bodleian, written and illuminated in the reign of Edward III., in which the mummers are exhibited wearing the heads of animals. One wore the head of an ox, another of a goat, one of the hare, another of the dog, and so on through the list. Strutt mentions that in the year 1348 the king kept his Christmas at Guildford, where the mummers exhibited. Eighty buckram tunics of various colors were provided, forty-two visors of different similitudes—fourteen with female faces, fourteen with faces of men, and fourteen heads of angels made with silver. There were tunics wrought with the heads of dragons, swans, peacocks, etc., fourteen of each; and a variety of others were provided. In other instances whose record has reached us there were heads of deer, swine, owls, and fish which had been prepared at great cost, and were worn by the mummers. They seem to have entered the rooms to dance, and to imitate the sounds of the beast or bird in whose similitude they appeared; but we do not read of anything they did beyond this in the way of playing their parts. From the ragged remnants of such popular plays at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsun yet preserved to us, we may infer that the main import of Yuletide mummery was the celebration of the triumph of light over darkness, and that mummers really preserved some features of ancient religion. The essence of Yuletide mummery was nature worship, and after the Reformation this was so clearly seen that an Act was passed ordering that, if any persons disguised themselves as mummers, they should be treated as vagabonds and sent to prison for three months. From this blow the old custom never recovered, though it lingered in places; and in the Court masques some of the old features were preserved, as in Ben Jonson's Christmas his Masque two of the characters are taken by Minced Pie and Bride Cake. When pantomimes were introduced into the theatres, they came as a revival and illustration of earlier customs.

Our old mumming and puppet shows were themselves but dramatised versions of traditional tales. The nursery stories upon which popular pantomimes are still built are the ancient ones, such as Jack the Giant-killer, Cinderella, Beauty and the Beast, Whittington and his Cat.* In witnessing the pantomime we may become children again, and catch some glimpse of ancient thought handed down to us by tradition from the earlier ages of the world, served up with all the splendid accompaniments of beautiful scenery, magnificent dresses, dazzling lights, and joyous songs and dances. This at least may, perhaps, serve as an excuse for an old fogie like myself paying a visit to the pantomime "only once a year," just to witness, on the mimic stage, the assured triumph of Light over Darkness, and of Youth, Beauty, and Love over Age, Ugliness, and Hatred.

J. M. WHEELER.

A Religious Epidemic.

The Alienist tells of a peculiar religious movement which took place in the province of Kiev, Russia, in the winter of 1891-92. The originator was a Stundist, who began to suffer from hallucinations, among others perceiving extremely pleasant perfumes, which he declared to be the smell of the Holy Ghost. Then he conceived that he was possessed of the Holy Ghost, and that he was Jesus Christ. He obtained numerous peasant followers, who sold their possessions, gave up work, and looked upon their insane leader as the Savior of the world, in which there should soon be new regulations; no one should die, and no one should have need to work or to care for the future, for God would care for them all. Most of them suffered from hallucinations of the sense of smell, perceiving extremely agreeable odors, which they described as pertaining to God and heaven. Many had a feeling of remarkable bodily lightness, as if floating in the air, and many others were taken with convulsions, manifestly hysterical. The congregations were always noisy and excited, some falling to the earth, others jumping, striking themselves on the breast, and shouting inarticulately. Some would imitate conversation; but it consisted of incomprehensible, senseless sounds, which they believed to be a language spoken somewhere. Most of them were emaciated and anæmic. The epidemic was finally overcome by the authorities; those who were most insane being shut up in asylums, while the hysterical were sent to hospitals and convents.

I sent my soul through the invisible,
Some letter of that after-life to spell;
And by-and-by my soul returned to me,
And answered, "I myself am heaven and hell."

Heaven, but the vision of fulfilled desire,
And hell, the shadow from a soul on fire,
Cast on the darkness, into which ourselves
So late emerg'd from, shall so soon expire.

—Omar Khayyam.

* Mr. Clouston (Popular Tales and Fictions) shows the tale of Whittington was current in Persia in the century before Sir R. Whittington was born. Possibly the story of the cat was associated with him from his acate, or "purchases." In September, 1668, S. Pepys went to Southwark Fair, "and there saw the puppet-show of Whittington, which was pretty to see," and, he adds, "how that idle thing do work upon the people to see it, and even myself too."

Digitized by Google

CHRISTMAS AND ITS ASSOCIATIONS.

"We are such stuff as dreams are made of." So wrote the inimitable Shakespeare; and, although he applied the words to ordinary men and women, they would be equally applicable to Christianity and the story of the advent of its hero. There is no doubt in our mind that a large portion of the Christian faith is composed of the very same "stuff as dreams are made of." This is particularly so with the theological associations of Christmas, which is the period that orthodox believers celebrate in honor of the alleged birth of their Master. If the New Testament may be relied upon, the inception of Christianity was exceedingly dreamy, and it certainly was not in harmony with the present welcome and hilarious manner, which most sensible people appreciate, of commemorating this pagan festive season.

According to the Gospel ascribed to St. Luke, Joseph was "espoused" to Mary, the mother of Jesus, when an angel appeared and made an important announcement to her that, although a virgin, she would "bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus." This information astonished the affianced bride, who exclaimed, for a very good reason, as given in Luke i. 34: "How shall this be?" Joseph, the engaged young man, was also naturally concerned at the condition of his future wife, and "was minded to put her away privily." St. Matthew, however, informs us that while Joseph was thinking the matter over an angel appeared to him "in a dream," and stated that the father of the coming little stranger was the "Holy Ghost." The only assigned reason given in the account for this new and remarkable mode of reproduction was that once upon a time a prophet said, without referring to either Joseph or Mary, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel" (Isaiah vii. 14). The fact that this alleged prophecy had no reference to Jesus, and that he was not called Immanuel, does not seem to convince Christians of their absurdity in connecting the two events. Perhaps in this matter the perceptive powers of believers are "overshadowed" to this day. It is said that dreams go by contraries, but Joseph, when he was awakened out of his sleep, seems to have been satisfied that his dream was a reality, for he took Mary unto him as his wife. Evidently Joseph was as easily duped as many of Christ's followers, who believe the story, have been since. It would be difficult to induce any sensible person to believe that such a Holy Ghost procedure could take place in the present age.

But Joseph did not have all the dreaming to himself, for the wise men of the East, who had instructions to report on this matter to Herod, had "a dream that they should not return to Herod," and, therefore, they did not carry out their instructions. Then Joseph had another dream, in which he was told that he should take the mother and child into Egypt in case Herod should seek to destroy the son of the Holy Ghost. This, we are informed, was done because another prophet had said (not, be it remembered, in reference to Christ): "Out of Egypt have I called my son" (Matthew ii. 15). Yet another dream overtakes Joseph, in which an angel instructs him to take mother and child back, "for they are dead which sought the young child's life." But this time Joseph did not display the same confidence in God's warning as he had previously done, for he turned aside "into the parts of Galilee," fearing that Herod's son and successor might do some mischief to the progeny of the Holy Ghost. This, it is said, was done "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets—He shall be called a Nazarene." Of course, the prophets here referred to made no allusion whatever to the hero of the Gospels, as may be seen on reading Judges xiii. and 1 Samuel i. However, Jesus had already honored Bethlehem by being born there, and now it was sought to make Nazareth immortal by a visit. Perhaps the strange account given of these occurrences may be attributed to the fact that people who are given to much dreaming get confused notions of things; and it often happens that the dreamer, when awake, is unable to make either "top or tail" of his vision. It strikes us as being peculiar that, if the birth of Jesus were supernatural, there should be so much anxiety necessary to protect him from injury. If the Holy Ghost, aided by God, were the author of his being, surely the two combined should be more than a match for the machinations of Herod or anyone else. Further, we cannot but think that, if Joseph had been more wide-a-wake, he would not have been deluded by such dreamy, angelic announcements. It is quite clear that to make-believe was a much easier process in the early days of Christianity than it is now.

St. Mark does not appear to have heard of these very remarkable dreams, for he introduces Jesus full grown from Galilee to be baptised by John, who makes Jesus appear as an unknown person, as one who standeth "among you whom ye know not" (John i. 26). After this it is alleged Jesus was "found," not as the offspring of the Holy Ghost, but as the son of Joseph. Not only do Mark and John omit to refer to Joseph's dreams and peregrinations up and down the different countries, but Mary nowhere mentions the peculiar nature of the angel's visit to her at Galilee and its unique consequences. It is not even stated by Luke that she dreamt that the angel visited her, nor does she again refer to the matter, after the speech in which she made the false prophecy that "all generations shall call me blessed." Is it not singular that the very one who must have known of the miraculous birth of Jesus, if it had been true, was silent all her life upon the subject? One must be gifted with poetic vision to see in this story any solid foundation for the advent of what is termed the greatest moral power ever revealed to the world. No Rationalist can consistently accept the inexplicable account of the origin of Mary's son as given in Matthew and Luke, inasmuch as it is in direct contradiction of all known laws of human generation.

Perhaps the next most important event recorded as having taken place in those dreamy times of early Christianity was what is said to have happened to Peter when he went to the top of the house to pray (Acts x.). He saw heaven opened, and a "vessel descending unto him" containing "four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air." Being hungry at the time, and having been told to "kill and eat," he refused by saying: "Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean." But the interpretation of the appearance of this vessel, and of the "voice" which "spake" thrice before the "vessel was received up again into heaven," is the amusing point of the story. This vision, or trance, completely revolutionised what was inaugurated in the dream of Joseph. At first it was intended that the efforts of the principal subject of the dream should be confined to the Jews, for we are told "that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company or to come unto one of another nation" (Acts x. 28). The vision entirely changed Peter's policy, for from that time he was not disposed to confine his sayings and doings to the Jews. He ceased to obey the injunction of Jesus to "go not into the way of the Gentiles," for he said: "God had shown me" by the vision "that I should not call any man common or unclean." After this "eye opener," which he received in a "voice," Peter opened his mouth and said: "Of a truth, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons." Those who heard Peter's declaration were "astonished," because, as they argued, this new announcement "poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost on the Gentiles." But Peter replied that they had "received the Holy Ghost as well as we," and could not be forbidden. Now, but for that vessel of wild beasts, etc., and the voice which said "Kill and eat," probably there would have been no permission given for embracing other nations into the Christian fold.

At the present season, when our streets resound with Christmas carols intended to recall the realisation of Joseph's dream in Judea, and when it is celebrated upon a day on which it is generally acknowledged he was not born, Christians may do well to pause and reflect upon the dreamy absurdities recorded in the tenth chapter of Acts. From the story as there set forth it is clear that the original proclamation, "Peace on earth, goodwill towards men," was intended for the Jews only. Moreover, even to-day, notwithstanding Peter's vision, there is neither peace nor goodwill existing among all Christian men, to say nothing of all mankind. One nation is steeped in jealousy and mistrust of another, while the followers (a long way off) of Christ are hurling reproaches at their co-believers who belong to another section of the Christian community. The realisation of this peace and goodwill is but a dream, although a pleasant one, and it would be still more pleasant if it duly affected the dreamers in their wakeful moments. Unfortunately, this has not been the case, for, after eighteen hundred years of Christian profession, the world is still in arms, and we are saddened with the cry of "war and rumors of war." Millions of money are being spent annually, and some of the best skill of the country is being employed, in preparing for battle with those for whom "Christian England" has but little goodwill. It is said the "Man of Peace" came, that the Cross was established, and that its influence was felt; and yet discord, envy, and malice, to an alarming extent, mar the happiness and tranquility of our race. Instead, therefore, of relying upon Christian dreams as foreshadowing the means whereby peace and goodwill shall obtain, let us turn our earnest attention to the lessons learnt in our wakeful moments, and endeavor to bring about this desirable object by fostering national justice, personal freedom, and the true brotherhood of the human family, irrespective of creeds, wealth, and social distinctions. If this is done, then, as the festive season comes round, we shall have better reasons than we now possess for believing that all well-wishers of their kind will enjoy "A Merry Christmas."

Digitized by Google

CHARLES WATTS.

WHAT IS OUR PROGRAM?

IT is to clear the human field of weeds, the rank over and undergrowths of superstition, so that useful and beautiful plants, plants intellectual, plants moral, and plants æsthetic, may be grown in the greatest possible plenty.

To us the world appears an immense jungle, or forest and jungle combined, with here and there a patch of land more or less cleared and planted with useful plants. We observe that, where the original forest-jungle has not been cut or cleared away by human labor and sound sense, little or nothing grows that is of benefit to man. There man is blind, ignorant, a creature of impulse, dreamy, submissive, slavish, with most of the possibilities of his life missed or wasted, and with little or no hope of improvement in this world. But where the ground has been cleared we find man has reached his highest development, is the most intellectual, most independent, pushing, and hopeful as regards the life that now is. And just where the ground has been most perfectly cleared, there man himself reaches his highest perfection—intellectual, social, and moral.

The forest-jungle of which I am speaking consists of the world's superstitions, amidst which nearly all the real elements of human progress are either wanting, or else are choked and stunted by the weeds and poison-plants around them. We argue, therefore, that, since up to date, the less superstition, the more knowledge—the more independence, the more virtue. If all superstitious jungle-forests were cleared away and burnt up, the world would be immeasurably the better for it in every sense.

As this is our belief, and as we respect mankind, lament man's slavery, his ignorance, his enslavement to priests and superstition, we are doing our best to destroy superstition wherever we can, with the full persuasion that, by so doing, we advance the interests of man much more than we possibly could do in any other kind of work we could undertake.

We know that our motive is good—the best and purest possible, in fact; and we know that our work is good.

Although most of our work is clearing the ground, yet we are incessantly dropping seeds of truth, of encouragement, of morality and good behavior, as we move about the field. Ay, when a favorable wind blows we stand on some elevated spot, and fling seeds of truth into the gale, that they may be carried and sown as far as may be in the forest-jungle of superstition. Much of this seed takes root and springs up here and there, putting new thoughts and emotions into the forest-jungle dwellers, and inciting them to set to work to cut down and cart away, or burn up, the enormous masses of fungus-growths, which merely tend to cheat, impoverish, mislead, poison, and torture them.

Those who oppose and vilify us and our work are of two sorts: 1st. The wild beasts and reptiles which abound in the forest-jungle, and there prey upon human dwellers. The whole round of parasites and creatures which live and flourish upon superstition are our deadly foes. 2nd. Those who either cannot, or do not, understand us are in a fright, thinking that, if we cut down the jungle, we shall leave the land bare, barren, and uninhabitable. They think superstition to be the only shelter and only comfort for man; and some of them positively fear that the human race would perish without it. This, of course, is the result of ignorance—an ignorance priests and clergy do their best to encourage.

These, then, are the only foes we have—the only opponents of our pioneer work. Our task is to show the ignorant that, just in proportion as superstition abounds, so do poverty, ignorance, sickness, epidemics, and general misery—misery arising from physical evils, and also from panic fears and frightful creatures of the imagination. Our task is to show them that, as the jungle is cleared, and plants of knowledge and science flourish, so do civilisation and the good things of time increase and abound, while fears and bugbears cease to haunt the brain.

No work could be more humane than ours, or more helpful to man. We do not teach the virtues of trust in another, but of self-dependence. Our gospel is that, if a man is not saved, and blest, and happy upon earth, he never will be at all; that, if he does not contrive to save himself, there is no possible salvation for him; that his greatest need is salvation from his saviors, the various orders of priests and clergy, who hold him in bondage and fleece him here, under the shallow pretence of saving his soul in some impossible state after death.

I confidently call upon the lovers of truth and of humanity to help us in this great and glorious work of ours. At the same time, if we have honest and reasonable opponents, I ask them to send on their objections to our work for publication in this journal.

JOS. SYMES.

—Liberator.

THE CREED OF INGERSOLL.

IN a sermon on Colonel Ingersoll, the Rev. Minot J. Savage recently made the following remarks, as reported in the Boston Sunday Post:—

The ideas of which Colonel Ingersoll is at present the most prominent exponent in this country are not new. I suppose he would not claim that they are. Nor are his methods original, except as far as they spring out of his personal characteristics and peculiarities. His ideas are very largely those of Voltaire, of Gibbon, of Hume, of Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, and of a good many others of our prominent revolutionary heroes; and, curiously enough, they are largely the ideas of the most intelligent Biblical critics of the modern world, of men who are still nominally connected with the orthodox churches. Yet, if his ideas are not new, Colonel Ingersoll has so identified himself in the popular mind with those ideas that they have come to take his name, and so he stands before the modern world as one of the marked religious signs of the times.

Colonel Ingersoll is, in my opinion, the most remarkable popular orator to-day on earth. I have heard the best speakers in this country; I have heard some of the best speakers in England, including Mr. Gladstone, and I do not know of a man living who is so mighty a master over a popular audience as is Colonel Ingersoll. And the secret of his power as a popular orator is not far to seek. He is a master of expression—wonderful in his power of moulding and shaping words to the utterance of his thought. Then, again, he is a poet, and he has a deep, high, broad sympathy with whatever is human. There is nothing that touches the interests of men that does not find an echo in his heart and brain. He feels with a power that is simply colossal. Moreover, he is the mightiest popular orator in his power, not only on religious, but on other topics which he treats. He has an unsurpassed fund of wit and humor; his power in this direction is exerted without malice and without effort.

Is Colonel Ingersoll an honest man? Does he believe himself to be a reformer, or is he only a vulgar, cheap sensationalist? Does he prostitute those gifts of his for the purpose of making money? This is the common charge that is hurled against him; and let me note here, as very significant, that this is almost the only one which is hurled against him, and for this reason—that no other can be made even for a moment. What were his antecedents? His father was a Presbyterian clergyman, and he tells us how, when a boy, he spent some hours looking up into the sky thinking of hell. His was the kind of childhood thousands and thousands of boys have had to experience. It has been charged against him that he was without reverence for his parents in that he attacked Presbyterianism. But he himself has shown that men do no honor to their parents by going around swearing that the false views held by their parents were true.

Digitized by Google

I believe that he is as honest and as earnest as was John Calvin or Richard Baxter. I believe he is as sincere in his opinions—whether you choose to call them religious or irreligious—as any man that ever lived or spoke. Does he need to lecture on religious subjects to get money? If he had had no other resources, or if he made twice as much in that as in any other way, and if he devoted himself exclusively to that, the charge might have some basis. But he is able to earn money as a successful lawyer, and he does in that way earn all that he wishes or needs. Besides, he can earn money by lecturing, whatever his subject may be. Then, again, it seems to me that, so long as the great majority of ministers feel a divine call to leave a small parish and a poor salary in order to go to a large parish and a large salary, it is not quite safe for them to trust to the attempt to blacken Colonel Ingersoll's character by charging him with being influenced by pecuniary motives. I believe, then, that he is earnest and sincere.

Now, what are his positions regarding religious belief? He is the great red-hot antagonist of those teachings of the Church which he regards as incarnate and infinite cruelty. The great thing he attacks is the orthodox belief in hell, because he thinks it crushes the human heart, blots out human happiness, makes people afraid to think, turns the brain into a dungeon, and prevents human progress. Colonel Ingersoll's sympathy is the key to his character and career. I have never known a man more tender, more easily moved; he is as sensitive and sympathetic to all the movements of life and thought about him as the leaves of the poplar to the air. It is this tremendous power of sympathy that turns him into a flaming hatred of anything that seems causeless, inexcusable cruelty. So this one great, horrible, world-shadowing dogma of eternal hate has been the one thing that he has devoted his life to fight.

EVOLUTION OF THE DEVIL.

THE Devil originates from the exact same spot as God—namely, from human fear. The earliest gods are all ugly devils. The first religious rites are spells to ward off evil, and sacrifices to bribe the powers that be to transfer their malignant attentions to somebody else. But as in the beginning there were gods many and lords many, so were there devils many, and early religion largely concerns itself with the question of how to deal with the devils. For they are all around and even inside of us. All sickness is attributed to them, and a whole legion may take up their abode in one person. The differentiation between gods and devils, in the sense of beneficent and maleficent powers, is in early times mainly the difference between ghosts of one's own tribe and those of hostile tribes. The ancestral spirit may be supposed propitious to his tribe, even though he be extolled as a cannibal delighting in blood; but the gods of other peoples—and often the peoples themselves—are set down as devils. Moreover, one's own parents and chieftains were rather feared than loved, especially after their death, so that the worship even of ancestral gods was mainly a propitiatory diabolism. The more deities were invested with arbitrary, irresponsible power, the less clear their differentiation from devils. And the gods, being derived from dead chieftains, ever tended in this direction. Jahveh was regarded by the Jews as their national protector. But, for all that, he was a dreadful and jealous god, who might manifest his displeasure in thunder, lightning, fire, or pestilence. Jahveh, indeed, asserts that he is the author of evil as well as of good (Isaiah xlv. 7, Amos iii. 6). He was a consuming fire, to be worshipped in fear and trembling.

In the story of the Fall in the Garden of Eden, as we find it in the Old Testament, there is no clear trace of a devil. The story is told to account for many puzzles—man's hard lot, woman's child-bearing, and the prone position and horror excited by the serpent, among other things. The most subtle beast of the field only developed into a devil after contact with the Persians, who, as light and fire worshippers, had in their cult the glaring contrast of the principles of light and darkness, Ahura Mazda and Angra Mainyu; or, as the Greeks called them, Ormuzd and Ahriman. Before the Jews were brought into contact with the Persians these nature deities had assumed ethical characteristics—the god of light being the representative of all that was pure and beneficent, and the other of the opposite. Each had a kingdom of his own. Good men and women belonged to the kingdom of Ahura Mazda; bad ditto to that of Angra Mainyu. During the captivity in Babylon the Jews received this questionable gift of an adversary—Satan or the Devil.

Critics allow that Asmodeus, the demon who figures in the book of Tobit, is none other than the Zend demon, Eshma Deva, with hardly a change of name. This shows a way was open by which the Parsee devils could enter into Judea, and by the time of the Gospel writers they had got there in swarms.

Satan makes his first entrance in the Bible in the book of Job. This probably dates it, as Driver, Cheyne, and Davidson think, about the time of the captivity. Here, however, "the adversary" is, if not an angel of light, at least among the sons of God, and talks on familiar terms with the deity. In the Parsee books we read of the Opposition, and in Job it is in Hebrew the Satan, the presence of the article denoting a similar poetical abstraction. The next appearance of Satan is in the book of Zechariah, who saw "Joshua, the high priest, standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him." Here again Satan is the opposing counsel, and the scope of his devildom is by no means clear.

In the book of Chronicles Satan stands out more completely, especially in its contrast with the books of Samuel. In the latter (2 Samuel xxiv. 16), which are by far the earlier, God moved David to number Israel, and then punished him for doing so. This is a real picture of the good old God who cannot be distinguished from a Devil. But in Chronicles xxi. 1 we are told that Satan provoked David to number Israel. No doubt a just reconciliation of these passages would make out God and the Devil to be one and the same, for which, as I have hinted, there is a good deal to be said.

In the New Testament, however, the Devil comes out clearly as a personality. As I have shown in my pamphlet on Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible, far more clearly defined personal characteristics are ascribed to him than to the Holy Ghost. He is the head of an organised kingdom, with angels under him (Matthew xii. 24–26, Revelation xii. 9, Ephesians vi. 12), and is described as the prince, and even the god, of this world (John xii. 31, 2 Corinthians iv. 5). He has power to transform himself into an angel of light (2 Corinthians xi. 14), and to deceive the whole earth (Revelation xii. 9, xx. 8). Belief in possession by devils naturally led to the horrors of witchcraft, and the rationalists who first threw doubts on the existence of witches were accused of Sadduceeism and unbelief in the Bible. "The giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible," wrote John Wesley. It is more. All the considerations applied to show that the Devil has no real existence, but is only a poetical abstraction, can logically be brought to bear on his divine antagonist.

J. M. W.

A sporting Marquis, who married a Gaiety chorus-girl, prided himself on his hats. He went into his hatmaker's in Piccadilly, and asked for a new one to be made. The shop-walker took the hat, and walked to the far end of the shop to give the requisite instructions, leaving the hatless Marquis standing in the shop. At this moment there entered the short-sighted Bishop of X., also in want of new headgear. He looked behind the counter; there was nobody there. He only saw a small man, who might have passed for a shopkeeper, standing staring at him. So he took his peculiar hat off his head and went up to him. "Do you think, my good man," he said persuasively, "that you have a hat like that?" The Marquis looked at him for a moment speechless with indignation, while the shopkeeper, seeing what was amiss, hurried up as fast as he could. Unfortunately, the Marquis found his voice before the hat-man reached his client. "No," he said, giving the Bishop back his headgear; "I haven't got a hat like that, and if I had, I'm d——d if I would wear it." The Bishop doesn't go to the same shop now.

Digitized by Google

BETHLEHEM OR GREENWICH.

IN nought B.C., or nought A.D.—
It matters not, take either;
The whole affair is nought to me,
So take them both, or neither.

At any rate, the dateless date
Was found within a stable
At Bethlehem, if parsons state
A fact, and not a fable.

This zero morn a goblin child—
Or bastard little stranger—
Appeared amidst the straw, and smiled
Or squall'd within a manger.

This stable stood on parallel
North, two-and-thirty, nearly,
And five-and-thirty east from hell—
That is, from London, clearly.

The monks began, it now appears,
To date from "Bedlam's"* stable;
But not till full six hundred years
Had sanctified the fable.

Now, all our books and deeds we date
From Yahveh's "incarnation,"
Or what we now denominate,
In law, "affiliation."

The folk that claim the sign "A.D."
For Christ are green as spinach,
Since Time and all earth's belt must be Referred direct to Greenwich.

If birth of Him that saves our race
From Eden's fell ophidian
Begins our years, His natal place
Should be our first meridian.

But no; despite devout pretence
Of sanctified obedience,
The Christian has a lively sense
Of secular expedience.

Once, three wise noodles chased a star,
And found themselves in "Bedlam";
Now, Greenwich and Polaris are
Preferred to faith in dead Lamb.

O, Christians all! for once agree—
From pope to Stewart Headlam—
And let your prime meridian be,
Not Greenwich Park, but "Bedlam"!

G. L. MACKENZIE.

One morning last week, while waiting for the train, I overheard the following conversation between two young men, who were waiting also: "I say, Bill, our young Dick, as goes to the Church Sunday-school, was a-readin' in the Testament last night about things as I never knew before. He read as Jesus Christ's father was a carpenter; but he was a bit of a preacher hisself, and he used to preach for nothing, and all his pals was fishing coves; but after a bit the bigwas killed him, by fixing him on two pieces of wood nailed crossways. Now, Bill, I thinks as if he and his pals could come alive again, and visit this country, and go into any of our churches, they would be forced to sit on the forms down by the door, where our poor people sits. But, Bill, I am sure they would not be here very long, as the bishops and parsons would soon have them nailed up again for preaching under price; in fact, they preached for nothing at all, which would be playing the devil with the trade of the Church. What do you think, Bill?" "Well, Fred, I thinks the same as you; and I am sure that, if they went into any of the swells' seats, and sat on the beautiful cushions, they would soon be kicked out of the church altogether, and sent to Limbo."—T. DUNBAR HARRIS.

* Contraction for "Bethlehem"—a mad-house.

ACID DROPS.

LAST Sunday was Peace Sunday, and the representatives of the Prince of Peace were in the full flow of their cheap eloquence. Most of them, however, if not all, forgot to say that Christian nations do the principal part of the fighting on this planet. They also build the warships, make the artillery, rifles, bayonets, and gunpowder, and generally play the devil at every point of the compass. But on Sunday, and especially on Peace Sunday, they go to church and swear butter wouldn't melt in their mouths.

It is amusing to read the Methodist Times account of the great Nonconformist demonstration on behalf of the Armenians. Dr. Parker's speech is described as "too moderate." He actually "recognised difficulties in the situation." The other speakers didn't. They were very strong on "Cromwell," and yearning for gunpowder and blazes. There would be a pretty kettle of fish boiling if these fanatics were able to direct the foreign policy of England. It is well enough to sympathise with the Armenians. Every man of common sensibility must long to secure them against their oppressors; and the tale of murder, mutilation, and outrage is enough to make the coldest blood boil. But what, after all, is it that stands in the way of their enfranchisement? Simply the bitter jealousies of the Christian powers. Were they united on behalf of the Armenians, and animated solely by a desire to aid them, the Sultan would give way in five minutes.

Mr. William Watson, one of the most promising of our younger poets, seems to have lost his head over the Armenian business. His two sonnets in the Westminster Gazette on "The Purple East" are not lacking in a certain power of expression, but his concluding apostrophe of England is too bellicose—perhaps not for an irresponsible poet, but certainly for a responsible statesman.

> How long shall they be borne, O England? Up,
> Tempest of God, and sweep them to their doom.

We have a very decided objection to England's playing "the tempest of God." If the tempest once began, it would soon be the Devil's.

Perhaps the poet will tell us whether England was playing the "tempest of God" when she mowed down the Matabele with her gatlin guns.

We have no doubt that the American Freethinkers will do their best to damp down the jingo spirit in the United States. The idea of a war between the land of Ingersoll and the land of Bradlaugh is too shocking (if not ridiculous) for contemplation. President Foote, of the National Secular Society, can't think of pointing a rifle at President Putnam, of the American Secular Union. Give these two a bottle of good wine and a good cigar, and they would settle all the bother to the satisfaction of every honest and sensible "patriot." We suggest that they should be appointed arbitrators. It would be better than leaving the quarrel to the professional politicians, who would boil their kettles over hell without shuddering.

Christians in general have always had a surprising knowledge of what goes on (or doesn't go on) in supernatural regions. They talk about God—to use Matthew Arnold's expression—as though he were a man living in the next street, with whom they are on terms of personal intimacy. And of all these know-all Christians the Methodists would come out first in any examination. Here is a recent illustration of their excellence in this line. There is a Methodist Union movement in South Australia, and, according to one minister at Broken Hill Conference, it seems that "God, the angels, and all that is sensible and good are on the side of the union, whilst its only opponents are the Devil and a few Methodist preachers." In our opinion, this is a rather blasphemous way of asserting that the speaker is right and his opponents wrong.

Taking the name of God in vain is common amongst religious people. They might, however, leave the Devil alone. It is not pretended that they have any right to speak for him.

The Rev. W. Berger says of his fellow sky-pilots: "Oftentimes ignorance is the helmet, bigotry the breastplate, hypocrisy the shield, and hate the sword with which they arm themselves." Mr. Berger is evidently a man of some Christian experience.

The following is likely to be a bitter pill to those who are for ranking Huxley among the Christians: "Grand Hotel, Eastbourne, September 14, 1890. Dear Mr. Hyde Clarke,—I am glad to see that you are as active-minded as ever. I have no doubt there is a great deal in what you say about the origin of the myths in Genesis. But my sole point is to get people who persist in regarding them as statements of fact to understand that they are fools. The process is laborious, and not yet very fruitful of the desired conviction. —Ever yours very truly, T. H. HUXLEY."

Digitized by Google

Dr. Miller, the founder of the Madras Christian College, which was established in connection with the Free Kirk of Scotland, is spoken of as almost a convert to Brahmanism. At any rate, he has given up all pretensions to Christianity being an exclusively divine faith, and, in an address to the students of the college, gave credit to Hinduism for presenting to the world, as no other religion has presented it, "the omnipenetrativeness of God" and "the solidarity of men."

Dr. Miller also gave utterance to the following language, according to the writer in the Congregationalist: "You have not to do with churches or with missionaries. The very plan of the world shows that in them there is evil and mistake. They have no authority as your guides. It is of Christ you have to judge. He stands apart, seeking to found no sect and to upset none."

The writer in the Congregationalist, who seems to speak from an intimate knowledge of the situation, says: "Many claim that these statements clearly reveal the reason why, during many years, so few of the students of that college have made an open profession of Christ. It certainly shows that Dr. Miller has a novel idea of the functions of a missionary college in a heathen land, and that he is entirely out of touch with at least nine-tenths of the Christian missionaries of India." The fact is, of course, that Dr. Miller is a little too enlightened for the Christianity which claims there is no salvation for any except those who rely on the blood of Christ.

Many reasons have been given for the fact that the missionaries in India have no success in the cities, and in the provinces the converts are mainly from the aboriginal tribes which have not been gathered up into Hinduism. The secret is an open one, illustrated by Christian missions in every part of the world. When it comes in contact with savagery, Christianity triumphs; but when with a civilised faith, whether Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, Confucianism, or Brahmanism, it makes no headway.

A survey of the whole field of Christian missionary enterprise proves conclusively that Christianity succeeds only where it meets barbarism, while in what are called Christian countries culture ever tends to replace and obliterate the distinctive features of Christianity. The Christian Churches may continue their missionary activity among barbarous peoples, but in the centres of the development of culture they more and more enter into the character of worn-out powers, and entirely fail to make impression on cultured peoples educated in other faiths.

On the other hand, the culture of the age, its material acquisitions, its science and its secular spirit, are ever extending their dominion. The races who will not accept our religion are mastering our science. All arts and industries are becoming world-wide. Despite competition, they tend to become means of union between the nations of the earth, while its various religions are the causes but of strife and division.

The Crescent says: "Brother Muslims, while you are reading this copy of the Crescent, calmly enjoying your right to serve God as your conscience deems right, a fellow man, named R. R. Whaley, of Church Hill, State of Maryland, United States of America, lies a prisoner in gaol, under a Christian law, prosecuted by Christians against a fellow Christian, his only offence being that he hoed cabbage plants on Sunday in his own garden. What a religion of peace and goodwill to men Christianity truly is!"

A real "dispensation" has happened at Fairmont, Tenn. The Rev. D. F. Levy has just died there of blood-poisoning, caused by running a splinter into his knee when he threw himself violently on to his knees to pray.

Jesus taught his followers not to be as the hypocrites are, who stand in the synagogues and corners of the street to pray, but to enter their closets, shut the doors, and pray in secret. Mrs. Hudson did not heed that direction while in church conducting a prayer meeting, so she is stricken down in a moment. Here is the telegraphic dispatch: "Anderson, Ind., November 24.—Mrs. W. W. Hudson, while kneeling in her pew at church to-day and conducting prayer, was stricken with paralysis. She was in the best of health when she entered the church."

Another warning comes from Clifton City, Mo., where George Steele, a well-to-do farmer, dropped dead in the Methodist church, while leading the choir at a protracted meeting. He was 45 years old, and was in excellent health up to the time he was stricken. Probably the powers above did not relish G. Steele's sacred music.

According to a correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, there are four Conventicles of Luciferans (or Satanists) in Paris. He does not know much about them, but says that Madame de Montespan was a blasphemous devotee. They steal consecrated hosts and chalices, so it is certain they are believers. Indeed, they represent elements of early pagan faith never yet overcome by Christianity.

Real Devil-worship has conventicles everywhere, for what other is the worship of a being who condemns most of his creatures to hell-fire? Jahveh, we are told, is a man of war (Exodus iv. 3). He swore to have war with Amalek from generation to generation (Exodus xvii. 16). He burns with anger, his lips are full of indignation, and his tongue is a devouring fire (Isaiah xxx. 27). A smoke came out of his mouth so that coals were kindled by it (2 Samuel xxii. 9). If these are not descriptions of the Devil, they might easily be mistaken for such.

What worse item of Devil-worship is there than belief in salvation for the guilty through the efficacy of the blood of an innocent person? Persons holding such a doctrine have not much reason to exclaim against Devil-worship.

A correspondent of the Progressive Thinker states that about forty years ago the Rev. Simon C. Hewitt, a Universalist minister, was engaged in a house in Boston constructing "The Mechanical Jesus of the New Dispensation." This was a spiritually directed apparatus which was to revolutionise the machinery of the world. The Mechanical Jesus died, but not by crucifixion. It had its heart torn out by a graceless mob, who regarded the idea as blasphemy. The correspondent of the P. T. considers "the Mechanical Jesus" was a sort of John the Baptist to modern electricity.

The burglar's wife who has joined the Salvation Army at Preston, and confessed where her husband—now in jail—hid the proceeds of his burglaries, recalls the story of the Frenchman. "No," he said, "I do not like it, when Madame has one of her pious weeks. She goes to confession? Yes, but it is my sins she confesses!"

A choice commentary on the efficacy of Christian preaching of peace and goodwill is that the Pagan Romans kept the peace of the world with less than a tenth part of the soldiers of Christian Europe. "Peace Sunday" comes just when the two nations who are foremost in spreading Christianity are quarrelling over the affairs of a country thousands of miles distant from either of them.

The Chicago Parliament of Religions was trumpeted as a sign of something more than the much-talked-of re-union of Christendom. It was supposed to herald the sympathetic union of all religions. The millennial time seems, however, still distant. Hindus and Moslems still fight in India; Jews and Moslems are still persecuted under the Czar; Christian missionaries have been massacred by Chinese, Armenians by Turks; and at the very centre of Christendom Italy has to take precautions against the preaching of a holy war for the restoration of the temporal dominion of the Pope. When will people give up looking for peace and goodwill to flow from what has ever been a fruitful cause of strife?

The Rev. Newman Smyth, a leading American Broad Churchman, says we might at first think repulsive the opening chapters of Hosea, wherein the Lord tells the prophet, "Go take unto thee a wife of whoredoms" (i. 2); and again, "Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress" (iii. 1). But, viewed as a poetic allegory, we discern that "through his intense purifying love, stronger than sin or shame, Hosea had received his prophetic consecration." It is an historical fact that Jewish harlots were consecrated persons; but are these the sort of stories to be put indiscriminately before children?

The catechism of the Rev. A. F. Gace, vicar of Great Barling, Essex, which a lady teacher tried to introduce by viva voce questions in a London Board school, contains, among other choice items, the following: "Q.—We have among us various sects and denominations who go by the general name of Dissenters. In what light are we to consider them? A.—As heretics; and in our Litany we expressly pray to be delivered from the sins of false doctrine, heresy, and schism. Q.—Is Dissent a great sin? A.—Yes; it is in direct opposition to our duty towards God."

Another question was the following: "But why have not Dissenters been excommunicated? A.—Because the law of the land does not allow the wholesome law of the Church to be acted upon; but Dissenters have virtually excommunicated themselves by setting up a religion of their own, and leaving the ark of God's Church." This Catechism has reached twelve editions, being very popular with High Churchmen.

Digitized by Google

Cardinal Vaughan stands up for Catholic schools as the most moral and religious. No doubt they are religious enough, but their superior morality is open to question. It appears that there are 397 Catholic children in Industrial Schools at part cost of the Manchester School Board. The number of Protestant children in the same category is 387. In other words, although Catholics are in the minority at Manchester, a larger number of Catholic children are under a magistrate's order of detention. Secularists' children don't seem to figure in the statistics.

Canon Gore preached at Westminster Abbey recently on "The Efficacy of Prayer." He appeared to think prayer was not sufficient in the case of the Armenians. Englishmen would have to make "sacrifices incomparably greater" than any they have yet contemplated; and thus, we presume, answer the prayers that fall unheeded on the ears of the Sphinx of the Universe.

An extraordinary case of superstition is reported in the French press to have just occurred at Beziers, near Montpellier. A Spanish woman, named Marie Riviere, living in the Rue du Seminaire, believed herself possessed of a demon. To exorcise this and die purified she soaked her clothes in petroleum and ignited them, persuading her husband to act similarly.

The Catechism used in schools in the Polish provinces of Russia declares, in the most unequivocal manner, that the authority of the Czar proceeds immediately from God. It says his humble subjects owe him "worship, obedience, fidelity, the payment of taxes, service, love, and prayer." "We should, if required, sacrifice ourselves in compliance with his will, both in a civil and military capacity, and in whatever manner he deems expedient." In short, the religion inculcated in this Catechism is mainly Czar-worship as "the Vicegerent and Minister of God, to execute the Divine commands." It is because the Pope is really in this respect a rival that every effort is made to drive Polish Roman Catholics into the bosom of the Russian Orthodox Church.

Mr. W. T. Stead is bringing out a series of Penny Poets, as a sort of opposition to the Penny Dreadfuls. We looked into his penn'orth of selections from Matthew Arnold, and found the whole thing ridiculous. Mr. Stead's introduction was longer than all the poems put together. It was such a little Arnold to all that intolerable quantity of Stead! And the paper was so wretched, and the general appearance so unlovely, that Arnold, had he been living, would perhaps have cursed his inclusion in this cheap and nasty enterprise.

Mr. Stead, however, is a good Nonconformist, though we don't know of what particular brand; so it is natural that he should be puffed in these papers and lifted sky-high on billows of flattery. One of these papers assures him that he has "raised for himself a monument more enduring than brass." Brass! What an ill-chosen word! Surely the praise of Mr. Stead's friend lacks finish; anyhow, it lacks discretion.

By way of apology for the sordid look of these Penny Poets, Mr. Stead's pious friend remarks that "the paper, binding, and illustrations are not the book after all, any more than the vile body is the man." Vile body is distinctly good. It is Christian philosophy in a nutshell. But the poor Christian is incapable of acting up to his principles. The carnal element will assert itself. When he is looking about for a wife, he likes the "vile body" of his future partner to be as comely as possible; and he forgets the "vile" altogether when he sees her decked out for the matrimonial altar.

The late Rev. Peter Mackenzie was an extraordinary clown, and his ridiculous mince-meat of Bible stories was heartily relished by thousands of Wesleyans who were afraid to go to a circus and smelt brimstone in a pantomime. They are going to publish his biography, and also to erect a monument. We suggest a statue, with the head grinning through a horse-collar. Peter might have taken a prize at any country fair.

The Rev. Dr. James Stalker, of Glasgow, says the Bible has a human, a very human side. Yet he advises people not to dwell on this. He says: "But the Bible has another side, through whatever human media it may have reached us; it is a gift from the Eternal Spirit, and it is intended to be the food of the human spirit. For the appreciation of this, however, there is requisite a totally different sense from that which weighs the pros and cons of evidence as to dates and authorships." This totally different sense, we should say, is nonsense.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has given a point blank refusal to the demand of Father Black that he shall put the Bishop of London on trial for infringing the canon law by permitting the re-marriage of divorced persons. The English Church Union, after receiving this rebuff, are going to petition the Episcopate to "stop the scandal," as they call obedience to the law of the land.

Professor Sayce did not relish the exposé of his dubious Assyriology in the Church Times, and he writes to that paper giving the authority of Mr. Pinches as backing him up. It turns out, however, that Professor Sayce has not even seen the tablet which he interprets as confirming Genesis xiv., while the C. T. reviewer has, and tells him that when he has had that advantage he will see good reason for admiring the caution of the late Eb. Shrader. The reveiwer also mentions that his condemnation of Sayce's readings was largely based on the remarks of Mr. Pinches, who himself writes to the C. T. asking students to suspend judgment until the publication of the tablet texts.

In the French Midlands the pagan custom of having a Yule log, or cosse de Noa, on the household hearth at Christmas still survives. According to venerable tradition, it should be taken from an oak felled at midnight, and is kindled at midnight, by the head of the family, after receiving a sprinkling of holy water. This is a survival of sun-worship.

The Jewish feast of Chanuka, held at this part of the year, is considered as a patriotic festival in honor of the Maccabees. It doubtless preserves remnants of an earlier nature festival, being a "feast of lights."

CONDITION OF WOMEN IN BURMA.

Opponents of the Woman's Rights Movement are wont to remark that women have never proved their ability to maintain a position of perfect equality with man, and the advocates of the movement often base their arguments upon cases of such hazy antiquity that it is very difficult to accept the testimony. According to the Journal of the Maha-Bodhi Society, Calcutta, there is no need for this. There is a country in which women are as free as men, right at this present time, and that country is Burma. The paper gives an enthusiastic description of the Burmese women. We condense its main points as follows:—

Before the law, in religion, and with regard to the moral code, men and women are here perfectly equal. The women administrate their property themselves, and when they marry it remains in their full possession. The Burmese husband has no jurisdiction over his wife's belongings, nor over her person. She is perfectly free from the day of her birth. The age of the knights, who praised their women as goddesses and treated them like slaves, never came to Burma. No lover there composes sonnets in which woman is spoken of as a supernatural creature, only to look upon her as an inferior being as soon as he marries her. Religion in Burma has never described woman as the cause of all evil, and never warned man against her devices. On the other hand, no Pope has called her the "last hope of the Church." No mediocre literature has imbued women with false ideas regarding themselves, men, and the world in general. Hence they are left to decide for themselves what is befitting.

Married or single, all Burmese women have an occupation besides their home duties. Among the upper classes they look after their property; among the middle and lower classes they generally manage stores. Most retail stores are in the hands of women. As business is conducted during three hours of the day only, it does not interfere with their home duties. Women may, however, adopt any calling they please in Burma, without fear of shocking public opinion. Curiously enough, sewing and knitting are specially male occupations. The great liberty enjoyed by the women of Burma enables them to extend their views of life, and makes them tolerant. They know their weakness and their strength, and reckon with them. Divorce is obtained very easily in Burma, but less than one of every hundred marriages is ever annulled.

Christmas Paganism.—On the face of it, Christmas is a Pagan festival. The head of the house, who invites his scattered family to make merry with him at this time, does exactly what his Pagan ancestors did centuries before the Christian era. Nor has the strong arm of religion quite banished the Pagan name, for, in many parts, Yule-tide and Yule log and a glad Yule are still favorite terms.—"Footsteps of the Past," p. 184.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Foote's Engagements.

Sunday, December 29, North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road, Camberwell:—6.30, "How and Why was Jesus Born?"

January 5, Camberwell; 12, 19, and 26, St. James's Hall.

February 2, Liverpool; 9, Glasgow.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mr. Charles Watts's Engagements.—January 1, Camberwell; 5, Birmingham; 8, Hammersmith; 12 and 13, Bolton; 14, Blackburn; 19, Glasgow; 26, Edinburgh; 29, Dinner of the N.S.S. February 2 and 16, Athenæum Hall, Tottenham Court-road, London; 23, Manchester.—All communications for Mr. Watts should be sent to him (if a reply is required, a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed) at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S.W.

Mr. Foote's Lecture Scheme.—Per D. Baxter, 4s.

J. W. Sutcliffe.—Pleased to hear you are forming an N.S.S. Branch at Bingley. Miss Vance is sending you the necessary information.

F. Creswell.—Received with thanks.

S. J. Bellchambers.—Glad to hear from you again.

Well-Wisher (Brighton).—West, 28 Edward-street, supplies the Freethinker.

C. W.—Mr. Wheeler's new book gives a pretty full account of Christmas customs.

L. Levine (Charleston).—Seasonable compliments.

Owing to the holidays, and our going to press so early, the usual answers to correspondents mostly stand over till next week.

Papers Received.—Chicago Daily Tribune—Public Opinion—Monthly Record—Crescent—Boston Investigator—Hairdressers' Chronicle—Two Worlds—Melbourne Age—Glasgow Herald—Dublin Evening Herald—Secular Thought—Truthseeker—Der Arme Teufel—Freidenker—Manchester Guardian.

Friends who send us newspapers would enhance the favor by marking the passages to which they wish to call our attention.

Correspondence should reach us not later than Tuesday if a reply is desired in the current issue. Otherwise the reply stands over till the following week.

Lecture Notices must reach 28 Stonecutter-street by first post Tuesday, or they will not be inserted.

Letters for the Editor of the Freethinker should be addressed to 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

The Freethinker will be forwarded, direct from the publishing office, post free, at the following rates, prepaid:—One Year, 10s. 6d.; Half Year, 5s. 3d.; Three Months, 2s. 8d.

Orders for literature should be sent to Mr. R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Scale of Advertisements.—Thirty words, 1s. 6d.; every succeeding ten words, 6d. Displayed Advertisements:—One inch, 4s. 6d.; half column, £1 2s. 6d.; column, £2 5s. Special terms for repetitions.

It being contrary to Post-office regulations to announce on the wrapper when the subscription is due, subscribers will receive the number in a colored wrapper when their subscription expires.

SUGAR PLUMS.

Mr. Foote lectures to-day (Dec. 29) in the Secular Hall, Camberwell, his subject being, "How and Why was Christ Born?" Next Sunday (Jan. 5) he lectures again from the same platform. On Sunday, January 12, he begins his course of three special lectures in the Banqueting Room, St. James's Hall. The tickets for this course are now on sale, and can be obtained at 28 Stonecutter-street, or personally from Miss Vance at any of the London meetings which she is arranging under the President's lecture scheme. The expenses of these St. James's Hall meetings are naturally heavy, and we hope our London friends will make a special effort to fill the room on each occasion. The subjects are calculated to appeal to the general liberal public as well as to Secularists.

Mr. Touzeau Parris delivers the last lecture (for the present) at Foresters' Hall this evening (December 29), and will doubtless have a good meeting. It is Mr. Foote's intention to work the West-end of London for some time in the new year, and Sunday evening lectures are being organised there accordingly.

Mr. Cohen is back in London. During his absence of thirty-two days he has delivered thirty-four lectures, nineteen of them being under Mr. Foote's lecture scheme.

A course of free lectures under the President's lecture scheme is billed take place at the Athenæum, Godolphin-road, Goldhawk-road, Shepherds Bush, London, W., on Wednesday evenings, January 1, 8, 15, and 22. The West London Branch will doubtless do its best to make these lectures successful, and to capture fresh members from the audience. Mr. Foote opens the course with a lecture on "The Curse of Creeds." He will be followed by Messrs. Watts, Cohen, and Moss. Of course there will be a collection in aid of expenses, which in this case are fairly heavy.

Another course of lectures is arranged to take place on the same Wednesdays in January at the Secular Hall, New Church-road, Camberwell. Mr. Watts opens this course, and it will be closed by Mr. Foote, with Messrs. Cohen and Heaford intervening. These lectures are under the auspices of the Camberwell Branch, whose members will probably try to fill the hall with residents in the neighborhood.

A third course of free lectures is arranged to take place in the Assembly Rooms, Edmonton, on Thursday evenings, January 2, 9, 16, and 23. This course will be opened by Mr. Foote, who will be followed by Messrs. Snell, Heaford, and Forder. The Wood Green friends will of course do their best for the success of this course of lectures.

Two other courses of free lectures are being arranged for Battersea and Islington in February, of which due notice will be given in the Freethinker.

Tickets are now on sale for the Annual Dinner, which takes place at the Holborn Restaurant on Wednesday, January 29, which is Thomas Paine's birthday. The next day is the anniversary (alas!) of Charles Bradlaugh's death, and his services to the "good old cause" will not be forgotten in the after-dinner speeches. Those who defer purchasing tickets till a few days before this function should at least mark the date in their "engagements." We hope to see a big representative gathering of London Freethinkers.

Miss Vance and the committee are making arrangements for the Annual Children's Party. This is a function which must on no account be neglected. It is better than a play to watch hundreds of little ones, many of them very poor, romping, racing, eating, drinking, and generally having a high old time. And the climax comes when the prizes and toys are distributed. Of course a good deal of cash is required to pay the fiddler for this merry dance, but that has always been forthcoming. Subscriptions can be sent to Miss Vance, or to Mr. R. Forder, the hon treasurer—both at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

On Christmas Eve, December 24, there will be a distribution of boots, etc., to poor children of the Balls Pond neighborhood at the Bradlaugh Institute, 36 Newington-green-road, N. Hours from 5 till 8 p.m.

On January 1 a portrait of Mr. Bradlaugh will be unveiled by Mrs. Bonner at the Bradlaugh Institute. Mr. George Anderson will preside at 8.15. Mr. Foote is unavoidably absent, being billed to lecture at Shepherds Bush.

Nya Sanningar, the organ of the Swedish Freethinkers has reached its twentieth number, and gives its readers an excellent portrait of Thomas Paine.

The Hairdressers' Chronicle has a sensible article on "Sunday Shaving in Barbers' Shops." It says: "The man who delivers milk and cream at our doors every Sunday morning, the carrier who supplies the Sunday paper, are public benefactors; they supply nourishment for the body and food for the mind, and why should they be denounced as violators of the law? Several men engaged in the labors of the day cannot afford the time to be bathed and barbered except on Sunday. If a man may perform this duty himself, why should he be deprived of the right to employ another to perform it? Does the employing constitute the wrong?"

The Freethought Magazine for December gives its readers a portrait of Mr. William J. Ros, who has contributed many bright, original articles to the American press under the nom de plume of "Hudor Genone." Mr. Roe's biggest book is entitled Inquirendo Island. Mr. T. B. Wakeman writes on "Thomas Paine in France," and Dr. Felix Oswald and Judge C. B. Waite pulverise the Rev. Dr. Kaye.

The Moslems in London have held a meeting and decided to start a mosque—indeed, have opened a temporary one at the West-end. There is a mosque at Woking and one at Liverpool, but the followers of Islam in London desire one of their own. The opinion was expressed that the movement should become a missionary one, and things made as easy for converts as possible.

Digitized by Google

SHALL I LIVE AGAIN?

I DO not think it possible that I can have a conscious existence after death. My body and mind are the product of earth. They have been evolved out of the elements and the surroundings, or environments, of our solar system, except, perhaps, the ego, or the conscious atom, that first began the sentient life of this planet. That may have floated from some remote star, or been brought by a comet. The heaven that Jesus preached was to be in the renovated earth. He never conceived of any other planet or star. The only way we can live after death is by our descendants or our works.

The priests of old times invented heaven for their special benefit, and they offered it to the highest bidder.

The Greek poets used to sing the praises of eternal sleep; and it seems to me that they made it very desirable to a weary, worn-out soul. There were to be in the heaven of Jesus mostly uninteresting persons and things. There were to be no earthly, sensual, or devilish things in his heaven. Why did he not tell us what the enjoyments there would be? My answer is, Because he knew nothing of such a place. St. Paul labored long and arduously to establish the belief in a future existence; but what did he think he would find to do in heaven? Even Theodore Parker could give no account of the heavenly kingdom. No learning, no science, no philosophy, has ever shown any knowledge of such a state of existence. Man's soul is not fitted to that kind of a place. It would be there like a fish out of water. All our faculties would be useless. No Almighty Being could turn our souls into angels. He would have to make creatures with not one particle of the old earthly nature in their composition. As old Job asked, "Will ye lie for God?" The poet Pope aptly complains that—

> Men would be angels, angels would be gods;
> They quit their proper spheres and rush into the skies.

—Investigator. DEAN DUDLEY.

HUMAN SACRIFICE!

A SAVAGE king, it seems, has, in respect
Unto the mem'ry of an ancestor,
Offered up human lives as sacrifice;
That thus their souls might company his shade
As fitting escort to the unknown world.

* * * * *

Hearing of this, a nation civilised
Becomes infected with the mania
That leads men thus their kind to immolate,
Believing not that their dead need a train
Of subject souls to furnish regal state
During the passage o'er the waves of Styx,
They yet a counter superstition have
To set against the savage one;
For they
Are curst with worship of the God of War;
And at the shrine of blood and human groans,
Reeking from myriad, age-long sacrifice,
They purpose slaying those who volunteered
To give themselves in satiation of
This demon's ever-searching crimsoned lust.

* * * * * *

Which people civilised is, and which
The savage race? Placed in the balance, weigh
The merits of these superstitions dire;
Which call ye worse? When, when will England cease
To look upon another's fault alone?
When seek to right the wrongs that press upon
The lives of her own crowded populace?
That greater wisdom were by far, and thus
She only can throw off the shackles of
The prison-night of war; emerging to
The sunlit atmosphere of human peace.

F. W. THORRINGTON.

Mrs. Loftie—"The organist at our church is the most stupid fellow in the world, and is always playing the most inappropriate selections. Why, at Carrie Curfew's wedding he played, 'Trust her not, she's fooling thee.' The very idea!" Mrs. Posted: "Stupid? Indeed he is not. He was once engaged to Carrie himself, and she jilted him. He knew what he was about when he selected that tune."

GOD'S NOSE.

"The nose of the Ancient of Days is life in every part."—"Zohar," Idra Rabba; sec. 201.

I HAVE been taken to task by a correspondent for, when writing on "God's Blood" (Freethinker, p. 741), alluding to various other portions of the anatomy of deity. It is supposed that, because I mention the Lord's nose as one of his prominent features, I can have no poetry in my soul, and am like the person devoid of music, "fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils." Now, I am rather partial to poetry, though I prefer Shakespeare to Ezekiel, Tennyson to Zechariah, and Morris to Malachi. But I happen to hold a theory about poetry, which, whether right or wrong, I am entitled to maintain till shown to be in error. My view is this: Physics come before metaphysics. Belief in the literal concrete fact precedes belief in the abstract allegorical expression. The metaphors of the poet are often remnants of actual beliefs. "Breath" was known before "spirit"; the sun was regarded as the eye of heaven, before there was any notion of an all-seeing deity; it was thought that magicians could actually stop the course of the sun, before theologians discovered that the narrative in Joshua was poetry.

Just so with God's nose. If now a poetical symbol, it was once as real as any other portion of the deity. All early gods are "magnified non-natural men," and the Bible God is no exception. He has the form and feelings of man. Like man, he has eyes, only sharper. Like man, he has a nose, only keener. He not only rests, but is "refreshed" (Exodus xxxi. 17). Genesis says that when Noah offered a sacrifice "the Lord smelled a sweet savor" (Genesis viii. 21). Could such an expression have been used if the original idea had not been that the Lord was altogether such another as man? Nay, Herbert Spencer thinks that Jahveh, like other deities, was originally a dead chieftain. Again, God says (Leviticus xxvi. 31): "I will not smell the savor of your sweet odors." And once more (Amos v. 21): "I will not smell in your solemn assemblies"—i.e., on the day of feasting. Upon this Gerald Massey remarks: "This divinity, like the Kamite (Gold Coast) Amanse, the spider-god, talks through his nose" (Natural Genesis, i. 80, 81). When, then, the Lord's nostrils are spoken of, I form the inference that originally the Lord was supposed to have a nose. Why else were sacrifices and incense so constantly offered before him? I take it he was first supposed to like roast meat, and then had to be content with the smell. Belated Ritualists continue to offer their decrepid deity incense, though he has long since lost his olfactory organs. As the organ of smell was of greater relative importance to archaic man; as the lower races still greet by rubbing noses, and smelling is synonymous with knowledge, I am not joking, but quite as serious as one ought to be in writing upon such a solemn subject, when I say that probably the proboscis of deity was originally the most prominent thing about him.

LUCIANUS.

MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE.

THE following bits on Missionary Enterprise are all clipped from the Yorkshire Evening Post:—

It is difficult to say if, or how far, the missionaries themselves have contributed to the emeute. But their own testimony is not encouraging. "I stayed in An-Haien," writes Mr. David Callum, one of the foremost of the missionaries, "for about two months, preaching and book-selling—preaching on the street, by the riverside, in the markets, and right inside the temples in front of the idols!" What would happen, I wonder, if a party of Chinese missionaries forced their way to the altars of our churches and commenced a vigorous onslaught on the Christian faith!

Missionaries in China reckon their harvest as amounting to a fraction more than two Chinamen per missionary per annum.

One missionary in China, after laboring nearly six years, confessed he had no male converts. This is the usual experience.

For every converted pigtail a thousand of our own heathen at home might be done good to.

It is a melancholy fact that there is spent annually on the despairing task of converting the heathen Chinee a sum of £350,000, which is equal to the combined incomes of the ten chief London hospitals.

The entire scheme of missionary work in such places as China is utterly useless, expensive (of money that could be employed to far better ends at home), and demoralising. So writes a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette.

In one province of China 23 missionaries claim to have converted 11 Chinamen in eight years.

Most of our missionaries who have toiled in Madagascar for years confess that they are beginning to despair of this race.—Times.

Digitized by Google

LET THERE BE LIGHT.

"At the St. Pancras Vestry last evening the Electricity Committee recommended that the charge for supplying current for churches and chapels be 5d. per unit, the rate charged for public street lighting. Dr. W. Smith, in moving the adoption of this recommendation, said that at present only one of the seventy churches and chapels situated in St. Pancras was lighted by electricity; and, as an inducement to the others to follow this example, it was deemed desirable to make a reduction in the charge as compared with the cost to private customers of 1d. a unit. Of course until dusk the charge would be uniformly 3d. per unit, as hitherto. Mr. Menzies stated that an additional reason for desiring to get places of worship to use the electric light on Sunday was that on that day the staff had little or nothing to do. The motion was adopted."—Sun, December 12, 1895.

Is not this lovely? One church has contracted to take the light, some of the others will, and all are hoped for by the Electricity Committee.

We have all heard the tales of the sweated labor employed by the great Bible-producing societies, but this is a new development of the sharp commercialism of the modern church, whipped up by a deliberate premium on Sabbath-breaking. The churches are to have an advantage over the ordinary customer of 1d. per unit, a bonus which is to be made by what is really an intensification of the Sunday labor of the staff of the electrical works. It is just possible that there is a legal aspect to this question which it might be worth while raising. It is a point of some delicacy, and would require some careful looking up; but any Freethinking vestryman or ratepayer, with the legal turn of mind and patience of Charles Bradlaugh, might give the clerical members a cold shock by suggesting that the rebate of 1d. per unit in favor of the church lights is an illegal relief of church expenses, at the cost of the ordinary ratepayer. That this is not so far-fetched as at first sight may seem will be admitted when recalling the actions raised by several London vestries against the London County Council to recover rates levied on London parks—one of the stupidest things ever done by pig-headed vestrydom, for the vestries themselves have to raise the money with which the C.C. has to pay the rate to the vestry, plus the awful law costs.

T. S.

RELIGION.

Religion makes enemies instead of friends. That one word, "religion," covers all the horizon of memory with visions of war, of outrage, of persecution, of tyranny, and death. That one word brings to the mind every instrument with which man has tortured man. In that one word are all the fagots and flames and dungeons of the past, and in that word is the infinite and eternal hell of the future.

In the name of universal benevolence Christians have hated their fellow men. Although they have been preaching universal love, the Christian nations are the war-like nations of the world. The most destructive weapons of war have been invented by Christians. The musket, the revolver, the rifled cannon, the bombshell, the torpedo, the explosive bullet, have been invented by Christian brains. Above all other arts the Christian world has placed the art of war.

A Christian nation has never had the slightest respect for the rights of barbarians; neither has any Christian sect any respect for the rights of other sects. Anciently the sects discussed with fire and sword, and even now something happens almost every day to show that the old spirit that was in the Inquisition still slumbers in the Christian breast.

Whoever imagines himself a favorite with God holds other people in contempt.

Whenever a man believes that he has the exact truth from God, there is in that man no spirit of compromise. He has not the modesty born of the imperfections of human nature; he has the arrogance of theological certainty, and the tyranny born of ignorant assurance. Believing himself to be the slave of God, he imitates his master; and of all tyrants, the worst is a slave in power.

When a man really believes that it is necessary to do a certain thing to be happy forever, or that a certain belief is necessary to ensure eternal joy, there is in that man no spirit of concession. He divides the whole world into saints and sinners, into believers and unbelievers, into God's sheep and Devil's goats, into people who will be glorified and people who will be damned.

A Christian nation can make no compromise with one not Christian; it will either compel that nation to accept its doctrine, or it will wage war. If Christ, in fact, said, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword," it is the only prophecy in the New Testament that has been literally fulfilled (also Luke xii. 49-53, xiv. 26).—Robert G. Ingersoll, in "Some Reasons Why."

THOMAS PAINE.

Freethinkers must frequently have been surprised at the long-continued prejudice concerning such men as Paine and Voltaire. Even liberal papers like the London Echo still persist in speaking of "Tom" Paine. It appears that Christians inculcate prejudice even in the school-room, and school-books contain some notable examples of pious fraud. In Mackenzie's Nineteenth Century (p. 14) occurs this startling footnote: "The primary object of Voltaire's attack was Christianity, as represented by the Roman Catholic Church of his day," etc. On the next page Voltaire is referred to as "the withered unbeliever."

In another book by the same author, America: A History (p. 104), a great man is thus sneered at: "Conspicuous among those whose writings aided in convincing the public mind stands the unhonored name of Thomas Paine, the infidel." It is well to mention that both these school-books are published by Nelson and Sons, Paternoster-row.

Singular that almost every Christian engaging in controversy violates the Christian principle—charity. It is a liberal education in religious tactics to know the real Paine from the "bogey" set up so long by orthodoxy. The Religious Tract Society is chiefly responsible for the continued publication of the recantation lie about Thomas Paine.

Paine, as a writer, is not wanting in the more finished graces of imagery and illustration. Edmund Burke himself might have envied the illustration of his too exclusive compassion for the sufferings of the noblesse in the French Revolution. "Mr. Burke pities the plumage, but he forgets the dying bird."

C. E. S.

FREETHOUGHT IN INDIA.

In a Church paper of recent date there appeared an article from a missionary in India, bewailing the fact that infidel writings have found their way to India. Listen to his tale of woe. Speaking of the educated Hindus, he says: "They adopt Atheism or Agnosticism, following such teachers as Mrs. Besant, Madame Blavatsky, and Colonel Olcott, whose writings, as well as those of such men as Ingersoll, Huxley, and Spencer, have flooded the country."

How strange that the Hindu, whose religion teaches him to hold all life sacred, should reject a religion whose meek and lowly Savior said: "Those mine enemies who would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay before me." How unreasonable for him to adopt Atheism instead of a belief in a triple God who sacrificed one-third of himself in order to partially appease the wrath of the other two-thirds. How it must strengthen his heathenish double of the Christian Bible to find a large number of the missionaries' own countrymen doubting and ridiculing it; to find them asking for an explanation of its numerous contradictions, and condemning its obscenity and immorality. Is it not shocking that the poor benighted heathen, who has been taught to place morality and justice above all else, should fail to appreciate the beauties of a religion which has left in its wake such a record of crime and bloodshed as has no other which the world has ever known; a religion which has, whenever possible, silenced all opposition by torture and imprisonment; which is to-day making a desperate effort to regain its legal hold upon the people? Terrible, indeed, is the thought that the record which nature has written of her evolvement from a low to a high order of being should be placed in the hands of the pagan, that he may contrast it with the Biblical mud man and spare-rib woman.

Must not his doubts be still further increased by learning that our planet in its present condition is the result of ages of growth, instead of a nice flat world on "pillars," which was created in a few hours, with a firmament set with cute little stars which "sang together," and could go frisking about upon occasion, and finally land in a stable; and, worse yet, must he learn that the sun is an immense body many times larger than the earth, the centre of our planetary system, around which the world revolves, instead of being a light in the sky which will stand still when man orders it to, while a horde of barbarians whip other barbarians?

How sad to think that the poor missionary, who has devoted his life for a good salary to the spread of the Gospel among the heathen, should have to contend with Western scepticism as well as Eastern heathenism. What wonder that he cries: "Woe is me! Christianity is falling! is falling?"

A. Cramer.

"I have no fear of the future," said a sad-looking man; "I suffer so terribly from rheumatism that all I want is to be somewhere where it's warm."

Digitized by Google

BOOK CHAT.

On January 1 the catalogue of Renan's library will be published, with a view to sale by auction. It is especially rich in works of Biblical and Oriental interest. There are more than three thousand works, in several languages, comprising the chief literary sources of Biblical criticism. It would be a pity if such a collection were dispersed, and it is to be hoped that it may find a resting-place in some public library or institution. Renan, before his death, expressed a hope that it might be kept together. He was at much pains to make it complete and representative, and its unique value, of course, remains only so long as it is undivided.

* * *

Dean Hole, in his Little Tour, tells of a Chicago man who came one morning to his office with such a radiant smile that his partner could not refrain from inquiring the cause. "My dear fellow," he replied, "my doctor ordered me to walk here from my house, and this morning I have been able, in consequence, to do three splendid acts—enough, surely, to make any man happy. As I was passing one of the churches I saw a poor woman with a baby in her arms, weeping bitterly on the steps. I inquired the cause, and she told me that she had brought her little darling to be baptised, but that the priest said she must pay a dollar, and that she had no money. I told her that I had nothing in my purse but a ten-dollar note, but that she might take it to the priest, and I would wait outside for the change. She brought it, with such profuse expressions of gratitude and praise that in my modesty I hurried away. Hear now what I have done, and refrain from envy, if you can. I have dried a poor woman's tears; I have placed her little one upon the heavenly road; I have passed a false ten-dollar note, and have got the change in my pocket!"

* * *

England, the Remnant of Judah, and the Israel of Ephraim, by the Rev. F. R. A. Glover, is one of the many cranky works devoted to the Anglo-Israel mania. Mr. Glover thinks that "Ollan Fola of Tara," in Ireland, was really Jeremiah, who migrated there after the taking of Jerusalem—in search, we presume, of a milder climate. He took, it appears, the daughters of Zedekiah with him, and there is no record of his return, or theirs, to the land of Judah; whence it follows that our own royal house is descended somehow from the daughters of Zedekiah. Selah!

* * *

A powerful anti-Christian work has been published in Japan by Inone Tetsujiro, a professor of the University of Berlin, where he holds the degree of Doctor in Philosophy, and who has seen the actual working of Christianity in Christian lands; and he shows that, wherever the Christian religion is in the strongest force, there the people are worst off, and the nation weakest, while the most educated classes hold it in but half-disguised contempt. The absence of patriotism and of the inculcation of citizen and domestic duties is a strong point with Dr. Tetsujiro, who says that patriotism is the true religion of Japan. He urges that "Christianity is contrary to the welfare of country and home," and therefore unsuited to the Japanese State and the Japanese people.

* * *

Thomas Paine's Rights of Man (3s. 6d.) comes to us from A. and H. Bradlaugh Bonner, Took's Court, E.C. Mrs. Bonner states that this is a collated edition, based on the earliest issues of the work, and especially on the Symonds issue (1792), which is said to have been revised by Paine himself. Mr. J. M. Robertson furnishes a long and excellent biographical introduction. The book is well printed, and stands midway between the shilling edition and the expensive edition of Mr. Conway. It is intended to be the first volume of a complete issue of Paine's writings.

* * *

The Introduction to the Talmud, by M. Mielziner, Ph.D., Professor of Talmud at the Hebrew Union College, Chicago, reminds us of Christian books on the Bible, in that it exalts the beauties of the Talmud, while passing over its absurdities and obscenities. It must be allowed that the Talmud contains some fine ethical maxims. Indeed, some Christians, recognising this, have pretended that they may have been taken from unrecorded sayings of their legendary Christ. Professor Mielziner closes his brief though careful survey of the ethics of the Talmud with this characteristic passage: "The liberal spirit of Talmudic ethics is most strikingly evidenced in the sentence, 'The pious and virtuous of all nations participate in the eternal bliss,' which teaches that man's salvation depends not on the acceptance of certain articles of belief, nor on certain ceremonial observances, but in that which is the ultimate aim of religion—namely, morality, purity of heart, and holiness of life." This is certainly better than "He that believeth not shall be damned."

*

At Munich is being published a collected edition of the works of Wilhelm Weitling, a Freethinking Social Democrat, who was born at Magdeburg in 1804, and died in America in 1871. The most famous of his writings was The Gospel of Poor Sinners, of which an English translation appeared in 1848. He also wrote The Workmen's Republic: Humanity as it is and as it should be, etc. The edition will have an historical biography of Weitling by Dr. C. Hugo.

DUTY.

Were I to know beyond dispute
  This life ends all,
I would go on nor change my way
From this same path I tread to-day
  Whate'er befall.

Duty is ever duty still;
  Nor need we care
What lies across the great divide;
There's work enough upon this side
  For all to share.

To do some good deed every day,
  To lift mankind
From lower depths to higher planes,
Are worth far more than sordid gains
  Of any kind.

Yea, even to have brought one soul
  Into the light
Of hope and love is better far
Than wealth and fame and glory are
  To any knight.

—Myron H. Goodwin.

French Views on Death.

Le Journal of Paris recently asked several notables their views on death. The late A. Dumas, who has since met death, answered: "I maintain that we should think often of death if we desire to have at all times a fairly correct conception of the things of life.—A. Dumas, Fils."

Other replies were as under:—

"If death is an evil, it is an indispensable evil, and, as a matter of simple justice, ought not humanity to be subject to the same lot which it metes out to the inferior orders of creation? We must one day disappear and pass into Paradise, hell, Nirvana, or nothingness. But as for that, let each one believe as he will. You don't expect me to speak about the beyond, do you?—William Bouguereau (Member of the Institute)."

"Death is the quarter of an hour after life's banquet which Rabelais speaks of. I sincerely hope that you will ask me on the day of the next carnival what I think of life.—Jules Claretie."

"According to the ancient myth, death and love are brothers; the one gives life, and the other takes it away. In a word, death is the necessary end of every act and every form of being. Without it the world would be insensible, immobile, and, according to our conceptions of things, a mere void.—Berthelot (Secretary of the Academy of Sciences)."

"Death is the close of a more subtle life. In the flower it sets free the perfume, in the chrysalis the butterfly, and in man the soul.—Juliette Adam."

"If there were no old age, death would be an abominable thing; but, as there is old age——H. Meilhac."

"Death is only the end of life. It is good, because it frees us from the imbeciles and the canaille, with whom we are forced to come into contact.—J. L. C. Jerome."

"Kindly excuse me. I think so badly of death that I could not, in a grave matter of this kind, express a properly impartial opinion.—Paul Strauss."

"There are no theories which will enable one to bear with resignation the death of others, of those whom one loves, or, at any rate, such theories cannot be set forth in a newspaper interview.—Marcel Prevost."

"Here is my reply to your question, 'What do you think of death?' Chut!!!—Alphonse Daudet."

Civilisation.

Christians claim that our civilisation is due to Christianity. The claim is not true. The cause is mistaken for the effect. Our civilisation has modified Christianity. It was once a Christian duty to murder Freethinkers and witches, and to uphold slavery. Christians now deny that such things were ever right. Christianity has changed. New interpretations have been put on Scripture to make it less repulsive to mankind. Christianity is following up the march of civilisation, but keeps a long distance in the rear.—Boston Investigator.

Digitized by Google

Distance of the Stars.

The sun is but a small star compared with others much further off; but even it is ninety-one millions of miles from this earth. A railway train, running at the rate of forty miles an hour, without stoppages, would require 90,625 days, or 248 years, in getting to the sun. There are other suns a great deal further off; one of the nearer ones of these is "Alpha of the Centauri," which it would take the above train many years to reach; and some of the further-off ones the train would not reach for some centuries. Astronomy can verify this. Then where is the heaven above? Is it a mental fiction, like the soul said to leave the body at death, but of which there is no proof, though people die daily in our midst, with every opportunity of seeing all that occurs? Will some well-educated Christian give a few words of explanation? GEORGE ANDERSON.

Sorry for Aaron.

The Youth's Companion tells of a church choir that repeated many times, "Oh, turn my pi—, Oh, turn my pi—, Oh, turn my pi—, Oh, turn my pious soul to thee." Dean Hole tells in his New Memories how one of these anthems annoyed the first Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Connecticut, Dr. Samuel Seabury. The Bishop was visiting the parish of Middletown, and an anthem, composed by a local musician, was sung. The words were those of the 133rd Psalm, and eight times the singers repeated the phrase, "That ran down upon the beard." At a dinner, after the service, the Bishop was asked, at the suggestion of the composer, what he thought of the music. "Oh," he replied, "I daresay it was very good, but I sympathised so with Aaron that I could not attend properly. I thought that the running down of the ointment eight times could hardly have left a hair upon his head."

Bits from Ingersoll.

Religion is supposed to consist in a discharge of the duties we owe to God.

If God is infinite, we can neither give, nor can he receive, anything. Anything that we do, or fail to do, cannot, in the slightest degree, affect an infinite God; consequently, no relations can exist between the finite and the Infinite, if by relations is meant mutual duties and obligations.

Some tell us that it is the desire of God that we should worship him. What for? Why does he desire worship?

We cannot assist the Infinite, but we can assist our fellow men.

The civilisation of man increases as the secular power of the Church decreases.

Man, in his helplessness, has, by prayer and sacrifice, endeavored to soften the heart of God?

Why should a Christian believe in religious toleration, and yet worship a God who does not?

Side by side across the open Bible lie the sword and fagot.

Every church is a cemetery, and every creed an epitaph.

Reason, Observation, and Experience—the Holy Trinity of Science—have taught us that happiness is the only good, that the time to be happy is now, and the way to be happy is to make others so. This is enough for us. In this belief we are content to live and die. If by any possibility the existence of a power superior to, and independent of, nature shall be demonstrated, there will then be time enough to kneel. Until then let us stand erect.—Selected by L. Levine.

Obituary.

We have to notice the death of two New England Freethinkers of standing, Mrs. Ellen Batelle Dietrick and Dr. O. B. Frothingham. Mrs. Dietrick was one of the editors of the Woman's Bible. She was founder of the Women's Industrial and Educational Union, of a home for old women, a cooking school, and a kindergarten. By her pen she did good service to the cause of Freethought and woman's emancipation in the pages of Liberty and the Twentieth Century. Dr. Frothingham, at one time a clergyman of the Unitarian Church, became more radical, and was first president of the Free Religious Association. He became a disciple of Mill and Spencer, and in 1879 severed all his church connections, and was reckoned among the Agnostics. He had reached his seventy-third year.

We regret to record the death, on December 19, of Mrs. Mary Attwood, who expired at 2 Trinity-road, Sheerness-on-Sea. Mrs. Attwood was a lifelong and consistent Freethinker, interested in everything and everyone connected with the movement. In accordance with her own wishes, her brother-in-law, Mr. A. W. Marks, carried out a silent funeral.

FREETHOUGHT GLEANINGS.

DURING the first few centuries after the fall of the Western Empire, literary activity at Constantinople had fallen to its lowest ebb. In the West, amidst the general neglect of learning and literature, the collecting of books, though not wholly forgotten, was cared for by few. The charge of books, as well as of education, fell more and more exclusively into the hands of the Church. While the old schools of the rhetoricians died out new monasteries arose everywhere. Knowledge was no longer pursued for its own sake, but became subsidiary to religious and theological teaching. The proscription of the old classical literature, which is symbolised in the fable of the destruction of the Palatine library by Gregory the Great, was only too effectual. The Gregorian tradition of opposition to pagan learning long continued to dominate the literary pursuits of the monastic orders and the labors of the scriptorium.—"Encyclopædia Britannica," art. Libraries.

In Christian England, when it first becomes known under that name, one of the most striking features is the popular belief in the power of human beings to make contracts with demons. Special penances were provided for those who, by evil practices, acquired the art of sending forth tempests: in this and in similar cases it is always clear that the punishment is inflicted, not for believing in the influence of the demons, but for making use of that existing influence to attain an end. The demons themselves seem commonly to be identified with the old pagan gods, who were held in honor many generations after Augustine's mission. Even as late as the beginning of the eleventh century it was thought necessary to enact that Christianity should be maintained and Heathenism expelled. The clergy, during the whole of this time, seem to have been most firm believers in the power of those who styled themselves magicians or enchanters; and it was even decreed that, if one of the clergy himself practised the forbidden arts, he should be degraded.—L. O. Pike, "History of Crime in England," p. 58.

There is no alleviation for the sufferings of mankind except veracity of thought and of action, and the resolute facing of the world as it is when the garment of make-believe, by which pious hands have hidden its uglier features, is stripped off.—Professor Huxley.

Mankind has never groaned under the yoke of a more atrocious combination of moral, mental, and physical despotism than at the period when the Christian hierarchy had reached the zenith of its power.—Dr. F. L. Oswald.

PROFANE JOKES.

In the S—— family desert was sometimes jokingly called "the afterwards." The kitchen girl, coming in at dinner with a message from the lazy cook, lost the sentence by the way, and announced, timidly: "Please, mum, there's no hereafter."

Tired Child (at church)—"Mamma, how much did you put in the collection?" Mamma—"A penny, my dear." Child—"Well, the preacher gives an awful lot for his money." Mamma—"Yes, my dear; but it was like one of your soap-bubbles—very big, but mighty little substance in it."

"Mamma," said the little boy, in a whisper, "is this church buildin' insured?" "Hush, Johnny," she answered. "I presume it is." Johnny was silent a few moments. Then he returned to the attack. "Couldn't the Lord take care of it?"

"If a church burns down when it hain't got any insurance, don't it show that the Lord takes better care of the insurance companies than he does of the church."

Aged and infirm Old Man (to country parson, who has been reading the Bible to him)—"Lor' now, sir, and how many wives does it say Solomon had?" Parson—"Seven hundred, William." Old Man—"And how many concubines?" Parson—"Three hundred." Old Man—"Lauk a mussy, sir, but what a blessed privilege them early Christians did enjoy."

Judge Stringer: "I understand that during his recent illness Tarantula Jack experienced a change of heart?" Alkali Ike: "You bet he did. When he found himself at death's door, with Dr. Slade doing his level best to pull him through, he sent for Preacher Harps, confessed his sins, made his peace with heaven, and resolved to lead a better life if he was spared. And when I dropped in to see him this afternoon I found him propped up in bed before the open window, with his revolver in his wasted hand, peacefully shootin' the glass out of the back winders of the Salvation Army hall, across the alley."

Digitized by Google

SUNDAY LECTURE NOTICES, ETC.

Notices of Lectures, etc., must reach us by first post on Tuesday, and be marked "Lecture Notice," if not sent on post-card.]

LONDON.

FORESTERS' HALL (Clerkenwell-road, E.C.): 7.30, Touzeau Parris, "The Mystery of the Birth of God."

BRADLAUGH CLUB AND INSTITUTE (36 Newington Green-road, Balls Pond, N.): Tuesday, Dec. 24, 5 to 8, distribution of boots, etc., to poor children. Thursday, Dec. 26, at 8.30, social party. Sunday, Dec. 29, at 7, C. Cohen, "Gods and God-Makers." Wednesday, Jan. 1, at 8.15, unveiling of portrait of the late Charles Bradlaugh by Mrs. Bradlaugh-Bonner.

BATTERSEA SECULAR HALL (back of Battersea Park Station): 7.45, select entertainment and dance. Tuesday, at 8, special social gathering. Thursday, at 8, members' general meeting—election of officers and other important business.

CAMBERWELL (North Camberwell Hall, 61 New Church-road): 7.30, G. W. Foote, "How and Why was Christ Born?"

EAST LONDON ETHICAL SOCIETY (74 Libra-road, Roman-road): 8, Sunday-school; 7.30, Zona Vallance, "The Old Faith Grown More Wide."

PENTON HALL (81 Pentonville-road—Humanitarian Society): 7, Joachim Kaspary will lecture.

WESTMINSTER BRANCH (42 Vincent-street): 8, members' meeting.

WOOD GREEN (Club and Institute, 4 Lawn-villas, Stuart-crescent, opposite Wood Green Church): 7.30, a lecture.

OPEN-AIR PROPAGANDA.

BATTERSEA PARK GATES: 12, F. Haslam will lecture.

HYDE PARK (near Marble Arch): 11.30 and 3.30—lectures, weather permitting.

COUNTRY.

BIRMINGHAM (Alexandra Hall, Hope-street): 5, tea and soirée.

DUNDEE (Tally-street Hall): 6.30, discussion.

GLASGOW (Brunswick Hall, 110 Brunswick-street): 12, discussion—W. Reid, "Utopias Unlimited"; 6.30, Zeisman, "The Gentle Art of Criticism."

HULL (Cobden Hall, Storey-street): 7, Saracen, "Priests and Progress."

LEICESTER SECULAR HALL (Humberstone Gate): 6.30, musical and literary evening.

LIVERPOOL (Oddfellows' Hall, St. Anne-street): 7, J. Roberts, "Greek Philosophy: Socrates—Antisthenes."

MANCHESTER SECULAR HALL (Rusholme-road, All Saints): 6.30, a lecture.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE (Northumberland Hall, High Friar-street, near Grey's monument): 5, tea; 7, social. All Secularists invited.

SHEFFIELD SECULAR SOCIETY (Hall of Science, Rockingham-street): 7, select entertainment. Wednesday, at 5.30, tea, soirée, and ball.

SOUTH SHIELDS (Captain Duncan's Navigation School, King-street): 7, music; 7.30, a lecture.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES (32 Dovecote-street): 6.30, a meeting.

Lecturers' Engagements.

C. COHEN, 12 Merchant-street, Bow-road, London, E.—December 29, Balls Pond.

TOUZEAU PARRIS, 32 Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London, W.—December 29, Foresters' Hall.

STANTON, the People's Dentist, 335 Strand (opposite Somerset House).—TEETH on VULCANITE, 2s. 6d. each; upper or lower set, £1. Best Quality, 4s. each; upper or lower, £2. Completed in four hours when required; repairing or alterations in two hours. If you pay more than the above, they are fancy charges. Teeth on platinum, 7s. 6d. each; on 18 ct. gold, 15s.; stopping, 2s. 6d.; extraction, 1s.; painless by gas, 5s.

TWO FREETHINKERS.—Ladies and Gentlemen requiring SUPERIOR CUT GARMENTS at moderate prices. First-class Style and Fit Guaranteed.—H. HAMPTON, Artiste Tailor, 14 Great Castle-street, W. (three doors from Regent-street). Patronised by leading Freethinkers.

Read "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

MONTHLY, PRICE 1D.

Edited by JOHN GRANGE.

Of all Newsagents to order. Wholesale, Mr. Forder.

NOW READY.

The Bar Sinister and Licit Love,

The First Biennial Proceedings of the Legitimation League, With PORTRAITS of the VICE-PRESIDENTS, and of EDITH LANCHESTER and LILLIAN HARMAN.

Articles by various writers, Reports of Meetings, Lectures, Dinners, etc.; Reviews, Criticisms, Balance-sheets.

Résumé OF THE GREAT LANCHESTER CASE.

207 pages, cut, in illustrated cover, price 1s.

ALSO READY.

THE DAWN OF CIVILISATION,

By J. U. SPENCE.

Cheap Edition, 176 pages, cut, in ornamental cover, price 4d.

London: Wm. Reeves, 185 Fleet-street, E.C.
Leeds: Geo. Cornwell, 4 Upper Mill-hill, Boar-lane.

ALLINSON FOR HEALTH.

HOME CONSULTATIONS—10 a.m. to 1 p.m., 10s. 6d.; 6 p.m. to 8 p.m., 5s. Patients Visited.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. I. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Management of Infancy, Health, Longevity, The Teeth, Tobacco, The Drink Question. Also the Cause and Cure of Disease, Constipation, Biliousness, Eczema, Blackheads and Pimples, Nervousness, Coughs and Colds, Chest Complaints, Deafness, Thread Worms, Long Worms, Tape Worms, The Itch, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. II. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on The Healing Power of Nature, Urine, Saline Starvation, the Hair and its Management, Sleep and Sleeplessness, Want of Energy, etc. Advice for the Thin, for the Stout; Simple Fever, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Whooping Cough, Ringworm, Hypochondria, Bloodlessness, Diarrhœa, Ulcerated Legs, Tumours, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. III. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on No More Death, Management of Young Children, Unsuspected Domestic Poisons, How to Grow Tall, to Keep Warm, to Live One Hundred Years, to Improve the Memory, and to become Beautiful and Attractive. On the Cause and Cure of Stomach Troubles, Flatulence, Sleepiness, Varicose Veins, Boils and Carbuncles, Sebaceous Tumors and Warts, Hay Fever, Winter Cough, Chilblains, Epilepsy, and on the Diseases Produced by Taking Mercury.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. IV. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Hardening, Work and Overwork, Sugar and its Abuse, Milk as Food, the Tomato, Poultices, Quinine, Against the Knife, Arsenical Poisoning, Tonics, Against Stimulants in Disease, about Swallowing Pins and other Articles. Also Cure of Sunstroke, Dog Bites, Pains in the Back, Pediculi or Lice, Chicken-Pox, Synovitis or Inflammation of the Joints, Tonsilitis or Quinsy, Herpes (Tetter or Shingles), Erysipelas, Ulcer of the Stomach, Epidemic Influenza, Sciatica, Psoriasis or English Leprosy, etc.

MEDICAL ESSAYS. Vol. V. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.
Contains Articles on Pure Water, The Mouth, Its Use and Abuse; Rules for the Aged, Training, Blood Letting, Nose Bleeding, Felon or Whitlow, Ingrowing Toenail, Gum Boil, Cold in the Head, a Red Nose, Flushing and Blushing, Toothache, Sore Mouth, St. Vitus' Dance, Goitre, Mumps, Inflamed Eyes and Eyelids, Fits, Fainting, Apoplexy, Spitting and Vomiting of Blood, Vomiting, Wounds, Burns, Scalds, Bruises, etc.

The Five Volumes, strongly and neatly bound, price 6s. 8d., post free.

HYGIENIC MEDICINE. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.—An Eye Opener to Drug Takers.
RHEUMATISM: ITS CAUSE AND CURE. Post free for 2d.
DIET AND DIGESTION. Post free for 2d.
CONSUMPTION: ITS NATURAL CURE. Post free 2d.

All these Books, bound in One Vol., post free, 3s. 6d. Send Postal Order.

THREE PAMPHLETS FOR YOUNG MEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 1d.
A BOOK FOR MARRIED WOMEN. For Postal Order for 1s. 2d.

All communications to be addressed to—

DR. T. R. ALLINSON,

4 Spanish-place, Manchester-square, London, W.

Works by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES. The only complete edition in England. Accurate as Colenso, and fascinating as a novel. 182 pp. 1s. Superior paper, cloth 1s. 6d.

DEFENCE OF FREETHOUGHT. A Five Hours' Speech at the Trial of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. 6d.

THE GODS. 6d.

REPLY TO GLADSTONE. With a Biography by J. M. Wheeler. 4d.

ROME OR REASON? A Reply to Cardinal Manning. 4d.

CRIMES AGAINST CRIMINALS. 3d.

ORATION ON WALT WHITMAN. 3d.

ORATION ON VOLTAIRE. 3d.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. 3d.

PAINE THE PIONEER. 2d.

HUMANITY'S DEBT TO THOMAS PAINE. 2d.

ERNEST RENAN AND JESUS CHRIST. 2d.

TRUE RELIGION. 2d.

THE THREE PHILANTHROPISTS. 2d.

LOVE THE REDEEMER. 2d.

IS SUICIDE A SIN? 2d.

LAST WORDS ON SUICIDE. 2d.

GOD AND THE STATE. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part I. 2d.

WHY AM I AN AGNOSTIC? Part II. 2d.

FAITH AND FACT. Reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

GOD AND MAN. Second reply to Dr. Field. 2d.

THE DYING CREED. 2d.

THE LIMITS OF TOLERATION. A Discussion with the Hon. F. D. Coudert and Gov. S. L. Woodford. 2d.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH. 2d.

ART AND MORALITY. 2d.

DO I BLASPHEME? 2d.

THE CLERGY AND COMMON SENSE. 2d.

SOCIAL SALVATION. 2d.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. Agnostic's View. 2d.

SKULLS. 2d.

THE GREAT MISTAKE. 1d.

LIVE TOPICS. 1d.

MYTH AND MIRACLE. 1d.

REAL BLASPHEMY. 1d.

REPAIRING THE IDOLS. 1d.

CHRIST AND MIRACLES. 1d.

CREEDS & SPIRITUALITY. 1d.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S LECTURE,

ABOUT THE HOLY BIBLE.

Price Sixpence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Price 1s., post free,

SATIRES AND PROFANITIES

BY

JAMES THOMSON (B.V.)

(Author of "The City of Dreadful Night").

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NOW READY.

BIBLE AND BEER

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—

Drink Traffic and Local Veto
Christian Methods of Reformation
Old Divines on the Lawfulness of Drinking
Paley and Sydney Smith
Church Opposition to Temperance Movement
Bible Drinks
Scriptural Praises of Wine
Jesus and the Wine Miracle
The Last Supper
Communion Port
The Two-Wine Theory
Religion and Intoxication
Religious Drinking in the Bible
Water-Drinking Heretics
Christianity and Mohammedanism
Church Drinks
Absurdity of Bible Temperance
Appeal to Common Sense

This pamphlet should be in the hands of every Freethinker for constant use against the upholders of the absurd claims of the Bible and Christianity in regard to Temperance. No pains have been spared to make it complete and unanswerable.

Price Fourpence.

LONDON: ROBERT FORDER, 28 STONECUTTER STREET, E.C.

W. J. Rendell's "Wife's Friend"

Recommended by Mrs. Besant in Law of Population, p. 32, and Dr. Allbutt in Wife's Handbook, p. 51. Made solely by J. PULLEN, 15 Chadwell-street, Clerkenwell; 2s. per doz., post free (reduction in larger quantities). For particulars send stamped envelope.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.

BEWARE of useless imitations substituted by some dealers and chemists, the words "Rendell & Co." and "J. W. Rendall" being speciously and plausibly introduced to deceive the public.

LOOK FOR AUTOGRAPH REGISTERED TRADE MARK

W. J. Rendell

No. 182,688.

IN Red INK ON EACH BOX, WITHOUT WHICH NONE ARE GENUINE.

Higginson's Syringe, with Vertical and Reverse Current, 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. Dr. Palfrey's Powder, 1s. 2d. Quinine Compound, 1s. 2d Dr. Allbutt's Quinine Powders, 3s. per doz. All prices post free.

W. J. RENDELL, 15 Chadwell-st., Clerkenwell, E.C.

THE BEST BOOK

ON NEO-MALTHUSIANISM IS, I BELIEVE,

TRUE MORALITY, or THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF NEO-MALTHUSIANISM.

By J. R. HOLMES, M.M.L., M.V.S., M.N.S.S.

160 pages, with portrait and autograph, bound in cloth, gilt lettered. Price 1s., post free.

 In order to bring the information within the reach of the poor, the most important parts of the book are issued in a pamphlet of 112 pages at ONE PENNY, post free 2d. Copies of the pamphlet for distribution 1s. a dozen post free.

The National Reformer of 4th September, 1892, says: "Mr Holmes pamphlet . . . is an almost unexceptionable statement of the Neo-Malthusian theory and practice . . . and throughout appeals to moral feeling. . . . The special value of Mr. Holmes' service to the Neo-Malthusian cause and to human well-being generally is just his combination in his pamphlet of a plain statement of the physical and moral need for family limitation with a plain account of the means by which it can be secured, and an offer to all concerned of the requisites at the lowest possible prices."

The Council of the Malthusian League, Dr. Drysdale, Dr. Allbutt, and others have also spoken of it in very high terms.

The Trade supplied by R. FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C. Other orders should be sent to the author.

J. R. HOLMES, HANNEY, WANTAGE, BERKS.

PRICE THREEPENCE,

THE

SECULAR ALMANACK FOR 1896.

EDITED BY

G. W. FOOTE AND J. M. WHEELER.

Among the Contents are:—Notes on the Year, by G. W. Foote; A Note on the Calendar, by J. M. Wheeler; The Work of To-Day, by Charles Watts; God-Making, by G. L. Mackenzie; The Bishops and their Wealth; Information Concerning the National Secular Society; Freethought Work and Organisation; Lecturers; Etc.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Now Ready, Price Three Shillings,

FOOTSTEPS OF THE PAST.

ESSAYS ON HUMAN EVOLUTION.

BY J. M. WHEELER.

With an Introduction by G. W. FOOTE.

CONTENTS:—Early Religion—Animism—Fetishism and Idolatry—Totemism—Were the Jews Savages?—Religious Dances—Sympathetic Magic—Kings, Priests, and Gods—Sacrifice and Scapegoats—Killing the God—Nature Festivals—Lent—Easter—May Day—Christmas Customs.

"The book is well done throughout."—Weekly Times and Echo.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

THOMAS PAINE'S WORKS.

The Age of Reason. New edition, with Preface by G. W. FOOTE. 1s.

Miscellaneous Theological Works. 1s.

Complete Theological Works. (Including the Age of Reason.) Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Rights of Man. Centenary edition. With a Political Biography by J. M. WHEELER. 1s.; bound in cloth, 2s.

ROBERT FORDER, 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

AN ACCEPTABLE CHRISTMAS PRESENT

LOT 11.

1 pair All-Wool Blankets.
1 pair Bed-Sheets.
1 Quilt.
1 Table-Cloth.

CARRIAGE PAID, 21s.

J. W. GOTT, 2 & 4 UNION-STREET, BRADFORD.

—A Seasonable Pamphlet—

WHO WAS THE FATHER OF JESUS?

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

Price Twopence.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Cloth 1s. 6d., by post 1s. 9d.; boards 1s., by post 1s. 2d.,

TALES FROM THE BIBLE,

TOLD TO MY DAUGHTER.

GIVING A RATIONAL AND ETHICAL VIEW OF THE OLD TESTAMENT SUITED TO THE CAPACITIES OF CHILDREN.

By F. J. GOULD,
Author of "A Concise History of Religion," etc.

London: Watts & Co., 17 Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, E.C.

THE CONFERENCE OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE

Midland Branches of the N.S.S.

WILL BE HELD AT THE

ALEXANDRA HALL, HOPE-STREET, BIRMINGHAM,

On Sunday, January 5, at 2.30.

MR. WATTS Lectures Morning and Evening.

Tea will be provided at 5 o'clock for Delegates and Friends.

FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT

BY

G. W. FOOTE.

First Series (cloth), 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Old Nick—Fire!!!—Sky Pilots—Devil Dodgers—Fighting Spooks—Damned Sinners—Where is Hell?—Spurgeon and Hell—Is Spurgeon in Heaven?—God in Japan—Stanley on Providence—Gone to God—Thank God—Judgment Day—Shelley's Atheism—Long Faces—Our Father—Wait Till You Die—Dead Theology—Mr. Gladstone on Devils—Huxley's Mistake—The Gospel of Freethought—On Ridicule—Who are the Blasphemers?—Christianity and Common Sense—The Lord of Hosts—Consecrating the Colors—Christmas in Holloway Gaol—Who Killed Christ?—Did Jesus Ascend?—The Rising Sun?—St. Paul's Veracity—No Faith with Heretics—The Logic of Persecution—Luther and the Devil—Bible English—Living by Faith—Victor Hugo—Desecrating a Church—Walt Whitman—Tennyson and the Bible—Christ's Old Coat—Christ's Coat, Number Two—Scotched, Not Slain—God-Making—God and the Weather—Miracles—A Real Miracle—Jesus on Women—Paul on Women—Mother's Religion.

Second Series (cloth), 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Luscious Piety—The Jewish Sabbath—God's Day—Professor Stokes on Immortality—Paul Bert—Converting a Corpse—Bradlaugh's Ghost—Christ and Brotherhood—The Sons of God—Melchizedek—S'w'elp me God—Infidel Homes—Are Atheists Cruel?—Are Atheists Wicked?—Rain Doctors—Pious Puerilities—"Thus Saith the Lord"—Believe or be Damned—Christian Charity—Religion and Money—Clotted Bosh—Lord Bacon on Atheism—Christianity and Slavery—Christ Up to Date—Secularism and Christianity—Altar and Throne—Martin Luther—The Praise of Folly—A Lost Soul—Happy in Hell—The Act of God—Keir Hardie on Christ—Blessed be ye Poor—Converted Infidels—Mrs. Booth's Ghost—Talmage on the Bible—Mrs. Besant on Death and After—The Poets and Liberal Theology—Christianity and Labor—Dueling—An Easter Egg for Christians—Down Among the Dead Men—Smirching a Hero—Kit Marlowe and Jesus Christ—Jehovah the Ripper—The Parson's Living Wage—Did Bradlaugh Backslide?—Frederic Harrison on Atheism—Save the Bible!—Forgive and Forget—The Star of Bethlehem—The Great Ghost—Atheism and the French Revolution—Pigottism—Jesus at the Derby—Atheist Murderers—A Religion for Eunuchs—Rose-Water Religion.

London: R. Forder, 28 Stonecutter-street, E.C.

Printed and Published by G. W. Foote, at 28 Stonecutter-street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google